tion again from a Maritime Province standpoint, I have another calculation and a few figures which it will not take up much time to submit to the House. In the inception of this work, after the acquisition of the North-West Territory, it was generally believed it would be found necessary to construct a trans-continental railway. I do not think there was much objection to that by anybody in the Maritime Provinces. But it must be borne in mind that our people were given to understand that $30,000,000 in cash was all the people of this country would be required to pay in order to insure the completion of the road, and that the balance of the expenditure would be entirely made up from the proceeds of the sale of land in that territory. Now, Sir, I am not going to say to-night that the people did not themselves, in the last elections, perhaps, assent to that contract; although I am satisfied that if they had known all that has taken place since then, a very different tale would have been told. But the transaction was beyond their reach; it was closed; they had no redress. Now, Sir, let us look at what the Maritime Provinces are called upon to pay in connection with this transaction. First of all, we have $5,000,000 expended in surveys in that North-West Territory. I am not going to say these surveys have been worth very much to the Railway Company, as I believe they have not adopted the line which was originally decided upon for that road; but, that the expenditure was made for that purpose is a fact. Then we are to give, in completed roads, an amount which, according to the Minister of Railways' own estimate, will be $23,000,000. Then there is the $25,000,000 cash subsidy, $9,000,000 from the proceeds of the land, and this $30,000,000. Then I think I may fairly claim to add $3,000,000 for interest on the cost of construction up to date, and these items, together, make just $100,000,000. I think I may fairly say that the people of the Maritime Provinces represent one-fifth of the population of the Dominion. If so, it follows that the proportion to be paid by the Maritime Provinces is $20,000,000 in round numbers. New Brunswick's proportion will be $7,000,000, and from this large expenditure I have no hesitation in saying the Province will never derive any direct benefit. If the hon. member from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) can be accepted as the exponent of the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—and I hope he cannot—New Brunswick has nothing to look forward to in connection with the line. We have been told for years that the terminus would be placed in the Maritime Provinces and that we might expect to reap some benefit; but after the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland, St. John and Halifax have nothing to expect. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) urged that the construction of the road would open up a market for our manufacturers. The contribution of $7,000,000 by New Brunswick will involve an annual payment at 4 per cent. interest of $300,000. Does the hon. gentleman consider that manufacturers in St. John and Moncton will receive benefit in proportion to that large outlay? I do not. I will, no doubt, be told that I do not represent the majority of the people of the Province. I am sorry to say that the people of New Brunswick are rapidly becoming powerless to redress their grievances, and the country is fast drifting to ruin in consequence of the extravagant expenditures in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway and works of a similar character. In some counties the people are showing a disposition to go in and obtain a share of the spoils. I hope the hon. members for New Brunswick will support the amendment, and as the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) went so far as to say that he should insist on traffic which originated in the Dominion being shipped from a Dominion port, we confidently count on his support to the amendment. If there has been any motion or amendment in the course of this discussion which has borne directly on the interests of the Maritime Provinces, especially the interests of New Brunswick, it is the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention, at this early hour of the morning, to review the Resolutions before the House, and I intend to confine my remarks to the amendment which is now the subject of discussion. It must be apparent to every hon. member that the desire of the mover of the amendment is to embarrass members who represent constituencies in the Maritime Provinces. If that be his intention, I think he has taken a very awkward way to secure the object he has in view. For this reason, I have not the slightest hesitation in recording my vote against the amendment, on several grounds, the chief of which is this: If we were to accept the amendment, we should erect an almost insurmountable barrier to the attainment of the object which the hon. member pretends to have in view. I will give way to no one in my desire to see the traffic of the great Canadian Pacific Railway come through Canadian territory to a Canadian terminus and be shipped there. I believe that is going to be the result of the great enterprise which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have in hand, but if we throw obstacles in the way, and refuse to grant assistance we shall defeat the very object we all have most sincerely at heart. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very difficult to please. They attempt to show that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have gone beyond their contract, have done wrong, in fact, in expending money to secure an outlet on the Atlantic Ocean; that they have gone beyond their contract in acquiring an interest in lines to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. To-night we have had hon. members from New Brunswick objecting to the passage of the resolutions and proposing amendments because the Company have not gone far enough in securing an Atlantic terminus. An hon. member quoted a paragraph from a statement by the president of the Company; but he forgot to mention, after stating that Portland would be a busy place, that upon the return of the directors from Portland to Montreal, an answer was returned to Portland announcing that the Company declined to have anything further to do with the city. We have also the fact that the city of Halifax has placed on the minutes of its council the well understood desire of the people to have a winter port there, in Canadian territory. We are all agreed as to that object; but we differ as to the manner in which it may be accomplished. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) has submitted an amendment which would tie up the resources of the Company and prevent them acquiring interest in railways running through the United States. One of the essential elements we have to look to in regard to a winter port in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, is that the Company will take an interest in some American railway passing through Maine. It is known, to myself, at all events, if not to other hon. members, that the representatives from the Maritime Provinces have been urging the Government to adopt a course which will bring the Canadian Pacific Railway into closer connection with the Maritime Provinces, and to that end we have addressed a letter to the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to which we have received the following reply:—

“THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY,

“OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, MONTREAL, 11th February, 1884.

“DEAR SIR,—Referring to your letter of the 5th inst., and to the accompanying memorandum and copy of resolution relating to the question of an Atlantic terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Although I have not had an opportunity of bringing the matter formally before my colleagues in the direction of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I may safely say that ever since the formation of the Company, we have felt that it was only a question of time when the Pacific Railway must reach every important point in the Maritime Provinces, and especially their most important seaports, and that this could only be accomplished either by lines owned or controlled by the Company, or by friendly connections with other lines having identical interests.

Mr. KING.

“This Company, as you are aware, has already invested a very large sum of money for the purpose of securing an independent connection with the lines south of the St. Lawrence. But apart from this, individuals connected with the Company and deeply interested with its success have made large investments in lines leading to the Maritime Provinces, the success of which greatly depends on their connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and perhaps this is the best assurance I can give you of our readiness to co-operate with you in perfecting the connection between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Maritime Provinces.

“It should be decided that the best way of accomplishing the object in view would be by completing the direct line from Montreal to Moncton, via Sherbrooke, Megantic, Matawamkeg, Fredericton and Moncton, I think, with the assistance of the Maritime Provinces and with such subsidies for the portion of the line within Canadian territory as may be fairly expected from the Dominion Government, the means might be found to complete the connection, which would be the shortest one possible.

“Yours truly,

“GEO. STEPHEN, President.”

Now, if we were to tie up the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by attaching conditions which would prevent them from investing any part of their funds in American railway securities, with a view of attaining a port in the United States, we would be proposing something which, I believe, would be entirely inoperative. We might, by passing such an amendment, so hamper the Company that they would be unable to accomplish the object in view. For these reasons, I shall not have the slightest hesitation in voting against the proposed amendment. I am somewhat obliged to my hon. friend who moved the amendment for his glowing description of Halifax harbour. It is a splendid harbour, as every one who has visited it knows. I believe it is one which the Canadian Pacific Railway look upon with favour. They must do so, if they wish to find in the Maritime Provinces the port best adapted for the output of the great trade which, as has been so eloquently described by hon. members, will be carried to the east, in future, over this line. I believe that there are other ports of great, if not equal importance, with claims to a share of the trade which will pour down from the west. I believe that we shall have all our ports busy with the shipments which will be brought down by the shortest route to the seaboard, and thence finding their way to Europe. It is for this reason, and because I believe we can rest with implicit confidence upon the Government carrying out the scheme proposed to reach the Maritime Provinces, without imposing such conditions upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, as would really defeat the object we have in view, that I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). I promise the House that I shall only trouble them but a very few minutes. With reference to the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I think he has misstated the amendment before the House. It only goes so far as to prevent the money we are voting being spent to build up a harbour in the United States, and I heartily concur in that proposition. I do not intend to say anything about the general question which has been discussed almost ad nauseum for the last week or ten days. It has been ably dealt with by both sides of the House; but I just wish to refer to our condition in the Maritime Provinces, and especially in New Brunswick, with regard to the question of a winter port, which is now the subject under consideration. There is no doubt of the fact that it is of great importance that the winter port for the trade of this Dominion should be in some of the Maritime Provinces. The fact that the trade goes to a certain port always brings population; and population always makes a market for the manufactures and farm products. We were led to believe we went into Confederation, that the population of Halifax and St. John were to be largely augmented; that they were to become, in fact, the Liverpools of North America in those Provinces. I am sorry to say that those anticipations have not been realized. The inhabitants of the cities of Halifax and St. John have not increased; they have not even retained their natural increase. St. John has not increased at all this last decade. Halifax has, to some extent, but it has not had the natural increase it would have had if there had been no emigration from it. This is a state of affairs which is to be deplored, and I hope before the subject is dismissed we will have some assurance that those ports will have a fair share of the trade of this Dominion. I confess that we were somewhat startled by the pamphlet which was circulated lately with reference to the acquisition of property at Portland by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the purpose of placing their winter port at that city; and those apprehensions have been very much increased by the speech of the hon. member for Northumberland to-night. I do think that that speech requires an answer from the hon. Minister of Railways. I think that some explanation or excuse should be offered for that speech. That hon. gentleman surely does not treat us with his usual generosity. Speaking of making St. John or Halifax a winter port, he says that we cannot work against nature; that ports are not made, for nature provides them; that trade will find its level, and will go to the nearest port, which is true to a certain extent, and if railway communication had been afforded the Maritime ports by the shortest instead of the longest route, his declaration would have some force. Now, Sir, if there is one gentleman in this Chamber who is responsible for establishing the long road to St. John and Halifax, it is that hon. gentleman. We were to have a commercial railway, and we were given a military railway. A railway by a direct route would be only 425 miles long; we were given a railway 761 miles long; and the hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that that railway cannot compete with the railway to Portland, which is only 300 miles long. The hon. gentleman, however, says not a word of giving us a shorter route, and he speaks authoritatively, because it appears he was one of the gentlemen who went to Portland to negotiate. I hope he is mistaken, however, and that the Directors of that Company will do something for us. On coming into Confederation, we were promised facilities for trade and commerce. It was said that unless we got such facilities, the Union would not be any stronger than a rope of sand; and I believe that if we were not to have had a commercial railway, and facilities for commerce with the Upper Provinces, New Brunswick would never have gone into the Union. I am satisfied of that; and I have always contended that the fact that we did not get that was a breach of promise, and that we were brought into the Union under false pretences. You may think that is strong language, but it is a fact believed not merely by a majority, but believed universally in the Lower Provinces. We might have had a railway exclusively on Canadian soil 580 miles long; and by crossing the State of Maine to St. John, the distance could have been reduced to 425 miles. I do hope the Government will take measures to give us at least the shortest road that can be built to our principal ports. But whatever is done, we must admit that the route to the American port of Portland has an advantage of 125 miles. But some engineers have given their opinion that the high grades on the Grand Trunk Railway, which are said to be from 70 to 80 feet to the mile, in quite a number of places, are such as will give a short line to our ports a decided advantage, in respect to gauge, and compensate for greater distance. If that short route were built, it would reduce the distance from St. John to Montreal about one-half. Now, I contend that if we are to have any interest in this expenditure for the Canadian Pacific Railway, we must have built for us the shortest road that can possibly be constructed to enable our ports to compete for the traffic. I do hope that the Government will adopt every measure in their power to accomplish that end. We are called upon to pay our share of the enormous expenditure, the extent of which the mass of the people scarcely comprehend. I shall conclude by expressing the hope that everything that can be done in the direction of giving us facilities for exportation from the Maritime Provinces will be done, and that no part of the people's money, which we are now granting, shall be expended in building up American ports.

	McGreedy,

On the main motion being put.

Mr. BLAKE. There are some other amendments that I think it would be proper, before this measure is concluded, to bring to the attention of the House, but as the hon. Minister of Railways, who appears disinclined to back his opinions by his vote, has announced that the Resolutions do not contain all the provisions of the Bill, it will be expedient to defer the amendments until I see fully the details of the Bill. Therefore, I do not propose to offer the amendments now.

Resolutions read the second time and concurred in.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER introduced Bill (No. 101) to amend the Act intituled An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, and for other purposes.

Bill read the first time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1:30 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 25th February, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 102) to amend the Act 41 Victoria, chapter 16, intituled: An Act respecting the traffic in Intoxicating Liquors.—(Mr. Robertson, Shelburne.)

Bill (No. 103) respecting the liability of carriers by land.—(Mr. Congblin.)

Bill (No. 104) further to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878.—(Mr. Ives.)

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 14) to amalgamate the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto and the Toronto Corn Exchange Association.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 20) to amend the Act incorporating the Ocean Mutual Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 39) to incorporate the Provincial Bank.—(Mr. Macmillan, Middlesex.)

Bill (No. 27) to incorporate the Halifax Marine Insurance Company, limited.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Pictou Marine Insurance Company, limited.—(Mr. McDougald.)

Bill (No. 42) to incorporate the Commercial Bank of Manitoba.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 43) to incorporate the Union Trust Corporation of Canada.—(Mr. Hesson.)

Bill (No. 19) to grant certain powers to the Commercial Cable Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Bill (No. 10) to further amend the Act to incorporate the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 51) to amend the Act incorporating the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 64) to amend the Acts relating to the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 65) respecting the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Central Ontario Railway.—(Mr. Platt.)

Bill (No. 75) respecting the Manitoba Colonization Railway Company.—(Mr. Ross.)

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Calgary Waterworks Company.—(Mr. Ross.)

Bill (No. 78) to incorporate the Calgary Omnibus, Tramway and Transfer Company.—(Mr. Ross.)

Bill (No. 80) to amend the Act incorporating the Napanee, Tamworth and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Bell.)

Bill (No. 81) further to amend the Act incorporating the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to "The Battleford and Peace River Railway Company."—(Mr. Woodworth.)

Bill (No. 84) to incorporate The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pontiac.—(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

Bill (No. 85) respecting the Erie and Huron Railway.—(Mr. Smyth.)

Mr. BLAKE.

Bill (No. 88) respecting the Real Estate Loan Company of Canada, limited.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 89) to amend the Act incorporating the Great American and European Short Line Railway Company and to change the name thereof to "The Montreal and European Short Line Railway Company."—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 90) respecting the Great Northern Railway Company.—(Mr. Bossé.)

Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Niagara Frontier Bridge Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Traders' Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Beaty.)

NEW BRUNSWICK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 54) relating to the New Brunswick Railway Company and to the railways leased to the said company.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain the object of this Bill.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). The Bill is simply to confirm some agreements and leases made by this company with other lines. It will go to the Railway Committee in the usual course.

Bill read the second time.

THE ALBERTA BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. ROYAL, in the absence of Mr. Ross, moved the second reading of Bill (No. 76) to incorporate the Alberta Bridge Company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not object to this Bill being read the second time and sent to the Private Bills Committee; but I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman, who has charge of the Bill in the absence of the promoter, to the fact that it seeks for very extensive powers, for the right to build bridges over all the rivers flowing from the Rocky Mountains, in other words, to take possession of all the ferries at all the good crossings. The hon. gentleman will see that considerable opposition may be expected to it in Committee.

Bill read the second time.

THE PARKDALE SUBWAY.

Mr. WALLACE (York) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 82) to legalize a certain agreement between the village of Parkdale and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, and other railway companies, and for other purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like the mover of this Bill to explain its object. I have not been able to place my hands on a copy of the Bill and therefore I do not know its objects, but it struck me that perhaps it was intended to provide compensation for the families of the thirty-two people who were murdered, slaughtered, butchered, on January 2nd, by an accident on the Grand Trunk. I would like to know if that is the intention, and if it is not, we should have, at all events, some explanation of the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. The Bill is for the purpose of legalizing an agreement which has been come to between the village of Parkdale and the Grand Trunk and a number of other railway companies, for the construction of a subway at the intersection of these roads in the village of Parkdale.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have now obtained a copy of the Bill, and I have listened to the explanation, and I must say that I am very sorry that such a provision as I have mentioned has not been made out of the funds of this great corporation, which is striving to grasp everything which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has not got hold of, and, between them both, they will have the whole country between them by-and-by. I think in the meantime, however, while this slaughtering is going on on the Grand Trunk and other roads, these companies should be held responsible for the destruction which they cause. At all events they should be made to pay damages for the great loss of life and the injuries they inflict. I am told that no practical compensation has yet been given to the families of those people who were murdered or slaughtered on the 2nd of January. There were no less than thirty-two heads of families killed, so that probably 150 souls will have to suffer by the careless management of the Grand Trunk on that occasion, and still we hear hardly a word about these things. These railway people have the audacity to ask for a Bill in relation to the very locality where the accident occurred, and yet they make no provision for these families—no provision for the sufferers by an accident which arose from the misconduct and the disgraceful management of the road.

Mr. BEATY. I may say in reference to this Bill that the city of Toronto had no part in the original agreement, and does not intend to be a party to this arrangement. The city opposes the arrangement, and does not intend to give any aid towards the construction of the subway. I merely mention this by way of protest, so that it will not be assumed that the city will meet any liability for the work.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who has just spoken if there is any provision made for the compensation of these families?

Mr. BEATY. No, this Bill has nothing to do with the question of compensation. I suppose if the hon. gentleman wishes to provide for compensation, he can, if he likes, introduce a Bill for that purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am quite aware of that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move the adjournment of the House

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I merely want to make an explanation. Of course I submit if the Speaker tells me to sit down

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit to the wishes of the House, of course, and I will sit down; but, before doing so, I will say to the hon. gentleman that he ought to have provided for compensation in this Bill.

Bill read the second time.

SAN FRANCISCO, WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ROYAL moved the second reading of Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the San Francisco, Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Mr. BAKER. I would like the hon. gentleman to explain this Bill.

Mr. ROYAL. The object of the Bill is to grant a charter to a company to construct a road from San Francisco to Hudson Bay. I suppose the portion first constructed will be from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay and then connection will be made by the shortest route with the Pacific Ocean at San Francisco.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there any provision in this Bill for compensation to the families of those people who were murdered, slaughtered—

Mr. AMYOT. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman state his point of order, or else shut up?

Mr. AMYOT. My point of order is that the hon. member should not address any member in this House, directly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not addressing any gentleman in this House directly, and I am perfectly in order. I have addressed no gentleman in this House, and I am in order to address the Chair on this occasion, and I intend to do so, with the permission of the Chair. I say that as there was no provision in the last Bill for compensation to the families of those who were slaughtered at Parkdale, by this mismanagement of the Grand Trunk, I hope the hon. gentleman who moves this Bill has made some provision of that kind. That is all I have to say.

Bill read the second time.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to continue the work of the Geological Survey in the examination of the southern and western shores, and of the south-eastern interior of Vancouver Island, during the year of 1884?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Geological Survey will be continued as usual in British Columbia. Much work has already been done, and maps and reports have been published relating to parts of the district named. The country lying along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway is deemed the most important at present, and is now receiving attention. Further examination of the coasts of the Province is very desirable, but cannot be carried on satisfactorily without a suitable steam launch, which is not now available.

THE MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, When did the Minister of Inland Revenue tender his resignation, and when was it withdrawn?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was tendered on the 19th of February, and withdrawn on the 21st.

REPRESENTATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA IN THE CABINET.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision to have British Columbia represented in the Cabinet at an early date?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Cabinet is full just now, and I have no intention of turning out any of my colleagues.

LICENSE ACT OF 1883.

Mr. COURSOL, in the absence of Mr. OUMET, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish throughout the Dominion a police organization, under its own control, in order to secure the effectual operation of the License Act of 1883; or to leave that task to the Commissioners for the several districts and to their inspectors?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the intention to leave that task to the Commissioners.

MILITIA TENTS.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant) enquired, Is it the intention of the Minister of Militia, to have tents that may be required for the Militia, manufactured in Canada? Have any steps been taken with the view of ascertaining the price at which tents can be manufactured and sold in Canada? Were any tents purchased from the National Tent Manufacturing Company or the International Tent Manufacturing Company of Ottawa, during 1883? If so, from whom purchased; the number purchased; the quality and style; and the price paid?

Mr. CARON. A vote has been placed in the Estimates, with the view of having such tents manufactured in Canada. Two offers have been made to manufacture tents—one at $18, and the other at $18.65. The only tents purchased by the Department in 1833 were three small square sample tents, intended for officers, at $19.50 each, complete. They were purchased from the National Tent Manufacturing Company. The cost of imported tents is $25 each.

GAS INSPECTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint a gas inspector this year for the Province of British Columbia?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That question is now under consideration.

MAIL BETWEEN MEDICINE HAT AND FORT McLEOD.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. CAMERON, (Huron) enquired, Has the contract for carrying the mails between Medicine Hat and Fort McLeod been let? If so when, to whom, and at what price and terms were tenders called for?

Mr. CARLING. There is no mail service between Medicine Hat and Fort McLeod, nor is it the intention of the Government to ask for tenders for a mail service.

THE GOVERNMENT HERD IN THE NORTH-WEST

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. CAMERON, (Huron) enquired, Has the herd of cattle belonging to the Government in the North-West been sold? If so how many cattle were there in the herd? When were they sold, to whom, how and at what price, and how paid or payable?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Indian herd of cattle in Treaty 7 has been sold. There were 599 head, consisting of: cows, 188; two-year old heifers, 312; steers, 40; bulls, 30; and calves, 32; making 599. These cattle were sold by private sale on 23rd July, 1883, to Col. DeWinton, at $35 per head, and $1,000 additional for right to claim any stray cattle belonging to the herd; in all, $21,965. This amount is payable as follows:—Cash payments, $5,490; on 23rd October, 1883, $5,490; on 23rd January, 1884, $5,490; and on 23rd of April, 1884, $5,495. All these amounts have been paid except the last, which will be paid on the 23rd of April next.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT FORT McLEOD.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. CAMERON, (Huron) enquired, Does the Government purpose erecting or has the Government now under contract the erection of any public buildings at or near Fort McLeod, North-West Territories? If so were tenders asked for or does the Government purpose calling for tenders? If under contract, when was the contract entered into, who are the contractors, what is the nature of the buildings, what is the contract price?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only buildings I am aware of are the new police barracks we have erected to accommodate 100 men and 100 horses at Fort McLeod. These buildings have been erected by the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company at a cost of $45,000. The contract was entered into in August last. Tenders were not invited. The annual report of the Commissioner of the Mounted Police, which is now in the printer's hands and will be presented to-morrow or next day, deals very fully with these buildings and their construction.

MAJOR-GENERAL LUARD.

Mr. MULOCK. The motion which appears on the paper in my name concerning Major-General Luard, I am advised by his medical adviser it would be better not to proceed with to-day in consequence of his not being in a very vigorous state of health. Out of regard for General Luard, I must defer to the advice of his medical advisers, and inasmuch as I cannot ask that the motion should stand, according to the Rules of the House, I must do what is next in order and allow it to drop; but, at the same time, I shall put in a notice to bring the matter up at some future day.

Motion withdrawn.

HARBOUR IN ESSEX COUNTY.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for a return of all reports of engineers respecting the construction of a harbour on the north shore of Lake Erie, in the county of Essex, whether at Leamington, Kingsville or elsewhere, together with the estimated cost of said harbour at each place, said: I make this motion to supplement information which has already been applied for, in connection with these harbours. It has been stated in the public prints, that Kingsville harbour, now being constructed, has been undertaken to serve the personal ends of myself and the hon. member for South Essex. I am satisfied no hon. member of this House would make such a statement, without having first seen the papers, and I, therefore, move for the papers, in order to show that the statement that this is a political job is utterly unfounded. I may state that for the last fifteen years, the inhabitants of that portion of the county of Essex bordering on Lake Erie, have been urging on the several Dominion Governments which have existed during this period the necessity for a local harbour in that section. At the General Election of 1874, Mr. McGregor, a supporter of the Mackenzie Administration, pledged himself that if he were returned, the harbour would be built at Kingsville and under that Administration, I think in 1874, a survey of the harbour was made by Mr. Kingsford, one of the engineers then attached to the Department of Public Works. He reported to the Government in May, 1874. In his report Mr. Kingsford states that:

"It seems to be conceded that Kingsville has the preference over Colchester, Leamington or Ruthven. . . . Vessels can make this port, Kingsville, in a westerly gale, with her wind ahead; and it is further contended that there is no difficulty in leaving the harbour when once they get in, as the coast lies in such a direction that vessels can get under way with any wind by hauling to the pier. It is further urged that less sea is experienced at this spot than at any other point on the coast."

Mr. Kingsford estimated the cost at $36,400. Mr. McGregor represented to the people in that part of the country that this matter was under the consideration of the Government and would appear in the Estimates in 1876-77, but as those were the years of famine, no action was taken by the Government, and no appropriation made. After the change of Government, petitions were sent to me urging that this work should be constructed, and delegations were sent from Kingsville, in 1879 and in 1880, to the Government, to urge the construction of the harbour. In 1880, the Government sent up the late Mr. Lindsay, Civil Engineer, attached to the Department of Public Works, who, with his staff, spent the summer of 1880 surveying the north shore of Lake Erie, in the county of Essex. That gentleman sent in a report on the various places proposed for harbour works and the relative cost of each. He estimated the cost of constructing the harbour at Kingsville $34,000, at Leamington $180,000, at Pelee Island $160,000. The Chief Engineer of the Department of Public Works visited these localities personally, and his report will show that, in his opinion, Pelee Island was the proper place for a harbour of refuge for the shipping frequenting Lake Erie, and he disapproved of the selection of Leamington. He said, however, that with a smaller expenditure a harbour might be constructed at Kingsville, which was only six miles out of the highway of vessels running between Detroit River and Buffalo, while Leamington is nine miles out of that highway. He disagreed with his subordinate, Mr. Lindsay, as to the fitness of Pelee Island, considering the island the proper place for a harbour of refuge suitable for vessels of all sizes. I urged on the hon. Minister of Public Works the expenditure of the larger amount in the most suitable place, but finding that I could not succeed, I did the next best thing and succeeded in obtaining an appropriation for the construction of a smaller harbour at Kingsville and that work is now going on. I am not aware of any jobbery or impropriety in connection with this work. It has been undertaken at the wishes of vessel owners navigating the lakes and frequenting the locality. The natural position of the harbour is such that its construction offers no difficulties, and I am quite satisfied it will be a public benefit to the shipping interests and that for the smaller classes of vessels it will be an excellent harbour of refuge. With a little additional expenditure at Kingsville which, I trust, the hon. Minister of Public Works will undertake, I am satisfied it will be the most perfect harbour of refuge we have in our inland waters. I never heard, until an evening or two ago, in this House, and afterwards in the newspapers, that anyone, either in Essex or elsewhere, thought there was anything improper in connection with the construction of this harbour—a harbour that was promised ten years ago by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power. And it is one that has been urged again and again on the succeeding Administration for the last few years. Although I never promised it to the electors in any political contest, still, feeling that the work was good in itself and must have the approbation of my opponents, I thought we would be more than justified in urging its construction upon the Minister of Public Works. Now that the work is being constructed under the auspices of the present Government, it seems that parties who formerly urged it upon the preceding Government, when they were in power, are trying to interfere with the construction of the Kingsville harbour and are endeavouring to make a little cheap political capital against my friends for constructing it. They may make gentlemen in this House and people who know nothing of the locality believe that there is something improper in it, but they will not succeed in doing so in the county of Essex, and more especially in the immediate neighbourhood where the work is being carried on.

Motion agreed to.

DISPOSAL OF GOVERNMENT MILLS NEAR CALGARY.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), moved for, 1. A copy of all Orders in Council, Departmental orders, orders and correspondence respecting the sale, lease or other disposal of the grist and saw mill owned by the Dominion and situate south of Calgary, North-West Territories, to whom disposed of, when, at what price, and how paid or payable; 2. A statement showing the original costs thereof, the costs expended thereon, when the same was erected, including working expenses; 3. A statement showing the quantity of agricultural land or timber limits disposed of with said mill or mills, or to the person who purchased or obtained the same; 4. All applications for the purchase or leasing of said farm lands and limits; 5. A statement of the machinery in said mill or mills, and the cost thereof; 6. All other correspondence in respect to said mill or mills, lands and limits. He said: On the 11th of this month, I asked the Government the following question:—

"Have any of the saw and grist mills erected by the Dominion of Canada, in the North-West Territories, been sold, leased, or otherwise disposed of? If so, how disposed of, when, to whom, at what price, how paid or payable? Was the disposal by public auction, or private sale?"

And, in reply to that question submitted by me to the Government, the First Minister made answer as follows:—

"The saw and grist mills at Old Man's River was sold by the Indian Department to Mr. Peter McLaren, for $10,000, on October 22nd, 1881. The sum of $5,000 was paid down; the balance is to be paid by annual instalments of one-fifth, with interest at 6 per cent. The disposal was effected by private sale. Besides the pecuniary price, the sale has been made subject to the following conditions: That the purchaser is to keep both mills in perfect running order; that he will grind Indian and Government farm produce at one-half the rate charged to other parties; that he will make the lumber required for Government and Indian purposes at $20 per 1,000 feet for five years; that the grinding of the grain and the making of the lumber for the Government and Indians shall have preference over any other work done at the mill; besides which, he was to take over the servants of the mill from that time."

Now it appears, by this statement of the hon. the First Minister, that these saw and grist mills on Old Man's River were sold by the Government in 1881 to Mr. Peter McLaren for the sum of $10,000, part cash and part on time, and subject to certain conditions. Now, what I object to and what I complain of is that the mills were sold, as the hon. gentleman states, by private sale, and sold to a political friend of the Government, Mr. Peter McLaren. This same Mr. Peter McLaren is a gentleman who has received a good many considerations at the hands of the Government in the last few years. He is the same Peter McLaren in whose interests, for whose benefit, and in whose behalf the Government thrice vetoed the Rivers and Streams Bill, and thereby violated the constitutional rules laid down by the First Minister himself. I find Mr. Peter McLaren's name more than once in returns submitted to Parliament, as an applicant for and a licensee of large portions of the public domain in the North West Territory, and now he appears to have got this saw mill, and this grist mill, and the lands connected with them, and the plant, and the machinery, for the sum of $10,000; and he appears to have got it without competition, without asking for tenders, or letting the public know this valuable property was in the market for sale. I say the property is a valuable property. So far as I have been able to trace it up in the Blue-books, the property has cost us a good deal more than we have got for it. The property consists of a grist mill, a saw mill, and the plant and the machinery and the land connected with them, and I am told it consists of something more. I am told that, in addition to this, Mr. McLaren has got a valuable timber limit.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He says not.

Mr. CAMERON. Whether the price of the timber limit is included in the $10,000 or not, I am not in a position to state. I am, however, informed that he has this timber limit in connection with this same saw mill. I do not know what induced the Government to sell this property. The mills were put up for special purposes. I do not know whether that purpose has been served or not. I do not know upon whose recommendation the Government have been induced to sell it. Whether any of the officials in the Department have advised the Government that the property is no longer of service or of use to the Government, for the purpose for which it was originally intended, I know not. Who valued the property I know not, or whether it was valued by anybody in the interests of the Government and the interests of the country or not, I cannot say. I suppose the papers, when they are submitted to Parliament, will give information upon this subject. What I object to in the disposal of properties of this kind, what I objected to in the disposal of other properties that I have had to discuss on the floor of Parliament this Session, is the sale, or the disposal, or the leasing by the Government of valuable public properties without competition, without letting the public know, at all events that those properties are in the market, or are to be disposed of, or are to be sold. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that it is unfair to the public, that it is unfair to those who desire to invest in the North-West Territory, that it is unfair to the country, that the property of the country should be disposed of by private sale and without competition, or without getting the best price that can possibly be got for it. It puts the friends of the Government in a different position to that in which other public investors are placed, it gives them an advantage over others who desire to invest in the North-West Territory; it is a policy that is bad in the interests of the country and ought to be changed without any delay; and when the Government see fit to change it, I hope they will stick to it and not make constant changes in the regulations or system by which the public domain is to be disposed of in the North-West Territory, that they will adhere to a strictly business principle in the disposal of the property there; and the only fair and honest way is by public competition. Then every man is on a footing of perfect equality, and the man who will give most for the property will be the possessor of it. This property may have been disposed of for its full value. That is not the point. What I complain of is that it is disposed of without public competition. In order to get further information on the subject I move for these papers.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down states that the purchaser of this property is a person who has received several favours from the Government; that he is the person at whose instance the Government disallowed the Streams Bill, and attacked the constitution of all the Provinces. This is not, perhaps, the proper time to argue this question; we may have an opportunity at some future time of arguing it. He states, further, that this Mr. McLaren is an applicant for several favours from the Government. I would like to know what particular ones they are. Mr. McLaren is well known as one of the wealthiest men in this section of the country, and is a large lumber owner. I know of no property that he is applying to the Government for except one limit on Shell River in the North-West. He paid the highest price for it that anyone in the North-West paid for any limits; but he has only one-quarter interest in that limit. The only other property he purchased in the North-West is this saw mill and grist mill—at least he supposed there was a saw and grist mill there. He made the purchase from the Indian Department. It was well known that the Indian Department had been offering that property for sale for a long time, that there were several other offers for the property, and that Mr. McLaren made the best offer for it and got it. But instead of getting what he purchased, what he honestly believed he was purchasing—a grist and saw mill—when he went up there, he found there was no mill there. He paid the full amount to the Indian Department, all they had expended on the property, and more too. Besides that, he gave to the Government $2,500, which was all the limit was valued at, and he expected to get a mill. He has not to this day been able to get the limit; he has not been able to get the Government to carry out their arrangement with him, by which he would get the limit, the limit he honestly believed he had bought, and of which, by some means or other, he is not yet the possessor. If the hon. gentleman thinks the purchase is such a valuable one—and he stated it was a valuable one—I have no doubt that Mr. McLaren would be willing to give the hon. gentleman the property for the amount of money he had expended on it—in fact, I am sure of it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would like to hear from the Government on the question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will bring down all the papers.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Mr. COOK. How much did he pay for the limit?

Mr. HAGGART. He paid $2,500, and was supposed to get fifty miles. He has not got anything yet. He considers he has been cheated out of it.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT AT WINDSOR, ONTARIO.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for correspondence respecting the employment of D. Brassard and J. Bushell in the service of the Customs Department at Windsor, Ontario, said: This motion has been standing for some time. I wish to take the opportunity to make some complaints as to the manner in which the Customs Department is managed at Windsor. I consider that the staff there is altogether insufficient for the amount of work that is to be performed. The work there has vastly increased of late years, but there has not been a corresponding increase in the number of officers to perform it. More than that, the officers who are performing the duties there are altogether insufficiently paid. The Collector of Customs at the port of Windsor has a great deal more work to do than the collectors at Montreal, Toronto, and other large cities of the Dominion. Although the amount of the entries brought there daily is not very great, the number of entries is exceedingly large. The Collector there is the medium of communication between a great many persons doing business in a number of western cities. They write to him, or wait upon him personally, to make enquiries respecting the Tariff and other regulations of the Customs. Nearly his whole time is occupied with work of that kind, and in addition, he has to do all the correspondence work of his office. His surveyor, who should be engaged at the outside work, has to do clerk's work in the Customs' office; while the clerk is engaged nearly ten or twelve hours of the day in keeping the books. These men are not paid in proportion to their services. These are men who have been for twenty-three years in the service of the Government, and are only getting from the Customs Department the magnificent sum of $600 a year. The two men whom I have specially mentioned in this return were, I understand, appointed twelve months ago to perform certain services which are of a permanent character, but they have not yet been made permanent officers. They are receiving a per diem allowance, although their services are of a permanent character. They are required at the Canada Southern Railway Station, which has now made Windsor its point for crossing the Detroit River. I complain that the officers at Windsor are taken away from their proper duties, and that the superior officers who ought to be engaged in their own important spheres have to perform the duties of inferior officers. The Collector of Customs for the Port of Windsor has been forty years in the public service, and has always been distinguished for his fidelity and his attention to the duties of his office. A very serious responsibility rests upon the Collector at that port. I think at present he receives $1,700 salary, while there are many Collectors of Customs at other ports throughout the Dominion whose salaries range from $2,500 to $3,000. I have repeatedly brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Customs, and I believe it has been brought to the notice of the Department by the Inspector of Ports. I know the insufficiency of the staff, and I think, also, the question of salaries, has been brought under the notice of the Minister, more than once, by the Collector at that port. I think that, while we desire to see all due economy in the Public Service of Canada, neither this House nor the people of Canada want to see their public servants starve. There is another reason why I think the officers ought to be a little better paid. I do not think that any hon. member in this House, or the Minister, thinks that a public servant should be kept on a starvation salary, especially when he is placed, like the collector at Windsor, in a position where he has to handle public money. When officers are insufficiently paid, they are exposed to the temptation of appropriating public money. Now, I do not believe that any Government officer in the Customs Department at Windsor would be guilty of that. They have the handling of large sums of money which are paid direct to them at the Custom House at the Ferry Docks, and I think that many men treated as they are treated would be liable to be tempted to misappropriate the funds passing through their hands. I am quite satisfied that such is not the case, although, at one time, when certain other officials were in office, discrepancies were reported. I think men holding these positions, with the responsibility of bank officials, should be paid something more than salaries frequently given to porters and messengers in the Departments at Ottawa. I know more than one instance of men with over twenty years service—I know one who has been in the service for twenty-seven years—having salaries of $600, while young men in the service at Ottawa receive after four or five years salaries of $1,000, $1,200, and even $1,800. The officers in the outside service do more work in a week than the officials at the capital do in a month. The duties of the collector at Windsor are more onerous than the duties performed by any other collector in the Dominion. He has been forty years in the service, he has never received any censure, and is looked upon as a most efficient and excellent officer—the Minister will not gainsay that statement—and yet his salary is less than is given here to a second-class clerk who has served six or eight years. He is the means of communication between the Government and merchants in the western States, and he performs those duties in a most efficient manner. I think means might be taken to increase his salary as well as that of the other officials to whom I have referred. Neither the Minister of Customs or any other business man would treat faithful, efficient, and life long employes, in their private business in the manner in which the officials are treated at that port. During a number of years I have urged this matter on the attention of the Government unsuccessfully, and I feel I am only doing my duty by endeavouring to obtain justice for those men and stating publicly that which I have been doing privately.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no objection to the motion being adopted; but I am not aware of any correspondence with the Department in reference to those officers. The representation made to the Department by the Inspector was that as this other railway company had placed upon the Detroit River ferry boats by which they could connect the line of railway with the Michigan Central, it was absolutely necessary to place officers there to take charge in the same manner as they did at the Grand Trunk ferry, and on that representation the two gentlemen mentioned were placed on duty, as I before explained to the House, at a per diem allowance. They have not been permanently appointed, for this reason: I anticipate that additional assistance will be required in order to protect the revenue at that point, and to perform the extra duties which will be imposed on the officers there, or rather I might say created by the fact of the new line of railway crossing at that particular point; and as soon as it is ascertained exactly the number of officers that will be required in looking after the revenue, checking the goods that cross the ferry and manifesting, they will be added to the staff. The construction of new railways, not only at Windsor but also at Clifton, will necessitate the placing of a number of extra hands on the staff from the simple fact of the building of new bridges and establishment of new ferries. I will not enter into the general question raised by the hon. gentleman in regard to salaries. I know it is a common complaint with himself as well as a number of other hon. members; and perhaps it is gratifying to know that I am the only Minister who is abused for not expending public money. If the public service can be properly performed and the revenue properly protected, I am of the opinion that there is no necessity to add additional men, except where it is absolutely necessary, and I am not prepared to admit the theory laid down by many hon. gentlemen that the salaries of a large number of public officials should be increased. Many of the officers to whom the hon. gentleman has called attention are well worthy of the highest salaries which can be paid under the law, but as a general rule the men who occupy positions of a responsible character receive as much as they could earn at any other vocation of life; and while the service can be performed for the amounts now paid I do not believe the country would justify the large expenditure in increased salaries which has been urged upon the Department. I can assure the hon. gentleman that whenever a case is brought under my notice where I believe it will be in the interests of the service that an increase should be given, and that the officer is worthy of the increase or promotion, I shall have no hesitation in bringing it before my colleagues with a recommendation that it be carried out.

Motion withdrawn.

POSTMASTER AT DUART.

Mr. CASEY, in moving for copies of all applications, recommendations or other correspondence connected with the appointment of E. McCollum as postmaster of Duart said: This is a motion to obtain information in regard to transactions connected with the post office at Duart, of which I have been informed since I arrived here. I believe that a Mr. Tait has been postmaster for a number of years, although he has not been acting as such for some time. The gentleman who has lately been acting is a Mr. Macdonald, who, I believe, has given general satisfaction to the people of the district served by the office. About two weeks ago, however, Mr. Macdonald received notice, either from the Department or from the Inspector that he was to deliver up the books and papers on a certain day to Mr. McCollum, another resident of the village, who was said to have been appointed in his place as postmaster. Now it is unusual, and not in accordance with the policy of Governments, as a rule, to dismiss a postmaster, or a deputy postmaster, or any person acting as postmaster under the regular officer, unless complaint has been made, and an investigation held upon that complaint. I suppose that some complaint must have reached the Department in regard to Mr. Macdonald, or Mr. Tait, who was the regularly appointed postmaster, and that they had some good reason for taking the action they took. I must either suppose that, or else that they must have been carried away by applications or representations made by some one in the neighbourhood, and that they acted without due consideration in the matter. I am inclined to think that the latter supposition is correct, because I am informed that when the papers came down to Mr. McCollum that gentleman refused to sign them; he said that he had heard nothing about the matter, that he did not know that he was to be appointed, that he had never asked for the position, and that the whole transaction took place without his knowledge. Such being the case, I have been requested to move for any correspondence, applications, or recommendations, connected with the matter, and perhaps the hon. Postmaster General will at this moment give such verbal explanations as will clear the matter up.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I may say that I had a motion on this subject, which I was asked to move by some friends in the neighbourhood of Duart, but as the hon. gentleman represents the constituency in which it is situated, and as he had a motion on the same subject, I felt bound in courtesy to withdraw my motion. The complaint which reached me was, that the postmaster of Duart had been removed for his political predilections, and for my own part I must protest against any interference with postmasters on any such grounds. We have difficulty in getting efficient men; we pay them a merely nominal sum—no remuneration at all adequate to the trouble or labour which is involved in the position. I believe there are a great many postmasters who are only paid at the rate of $10 or $20 a year, and though they do not, perhaps, have a great deal of work to do, the office is one which keeps them tied up, for people are in the habit of calling at all hours of the day; they are also responsible for money letters. I know of a case that happened not long ago in my constituency, where a postmaster whose salary was about $20 a year, had to pay $100 for the loss of a letter, an amount which took away the whole of his salary for five years. I think we should allow our rural postmasters to freely indulge their political predilections, because the favour is not conferred upon the postmaster in appointing him, but he confers a favour on the Department and the general public in accepting the office. I know of many cases in my own constituency where I think the pay is inadequate. I believe the pay is regulated according to the number of stamps sold and the number of letters sent through the office; but in some cases there may be few stamps or letters transmitted, while there may be a great many newspapers mailed, and the trouble in connection with making up the monthly or quarterly returns may be just as great as where the volume of business is larger. I would be glad to see some scheme by which the salaries of rural postmasters should be readjusted, and placed on a better basis. At any rate I do not think that their position should be regarded from a political point of view. So far as my own constituency is concerned any recommendations which I have made have always been in favour of the best available men in the neighbourhood, and according to the wishes of the people in the locality.

Mr. CARLING. There are no applications in the Department in connection with this office. The facts are that Mr. Tait removed from Duart to St. Thomas, and we took the recommendation of parties in that particular locality for the appointment of a particular man as postmaster. That is really all that has taken place in regard to the matter.

Mr. CASEY. The removal of the postmaster from Duart St. Thomas took place a considerable time ago—some years ago I believe.

Mr. CARLING. No, I think it was in the fall of 1882.

Mr. CASEY. At all events Mr. Macdonald has been acting as postmaster for a number of years.

Mr. CARLING. Not for a number of years.

Mr. CASEY. Well, since the spring of 1882, or some time before that—he has been acting for two or three years at least—since Mr. Tait went to St. Thomas, things have been allowed to remain in statu quo. The acting postmaster did the work and received the pay. The mere removal of Mr. Tait to St. Thomas, which took place so long ago, could scarcely be a reason for making the change, for the change in the occupancy of the post office was not made until last month. The hon. member for Essex has spoken of a reason which was hinted to him by friends in the neighbourhood, who objected to the change, the reason mentioned being a political one. I may say that I was informed of the same thing, though I scarcely gave the report credit. It was stated that the reason for the change was, that Mr. Macdonald took some part in a demonstration expressive of pleasure over the fact that the late hon. member for Bothwell had been unseated, and that this allegation had been used by some parties as a lever to induce the Government to dismiss him and to put some one else in his place. I could hardly believe that that was the reason, but the Minister's explanation has been so utterly unsatisfactory that I begin to think there is something in it. The hon. Minister did not, however, state distinctly whether the appointment of Mr. McCollum has been definitely made, or whether he has accepted the position—whether he is now the postmaster of Duart or not.

Mr. CARLING. I may say that it is not customary or usual to appoint anybody as postmaster who has been acting in that capacity under the postmaster. The Department knew nothing about Macdonald who was acting for Mr. Tait. Mr. Tait removed to St. Thomas and the Department acting upon the recommendation I have mentioned, appointed the other party.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. McCollum has been appointed?

Mr. CARLING. No, a Mr. Britton, I believe, has been appointed.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has not improved his explanation, because he still bases the change on the removal of Mr. Tait from the neighbourhood, and that event took place over a year before. So far as Mr. Tait was concerned, the office was, at the date of the change, exactly as it had been for some time before; and Mr. Tait was responsible to the Government, as he had been for years. I do not see why the same arrangement should not have been continued, why Mr. Tait should not have remained responsible to the Department, and why Mr. Macdonald should not have been allowed to go on with the work as before. I suppose, at all events, there have been some recommendations sent in to the Government, and some complaints made, or the action would not have been taken.

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Macdonald was there first, acting for Mr. Tait, and we knew nothing about Mr. Macdonald until the office became vacant. We do not hold Mr. Macdonald responsible for the management of the office at all. We do hold Mr. Tait responsible, and when Mr. Tait left the office, we relieved him from the duties of his office, and put another in his place.

Mr. CASEY. It was not when he left the office, but a year afterwards, and when Mr. Macdonald made himself obnoxious to the Government.

Mr. CARLING. There are no papers except confidential papers, which cannot be given to the House.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman refuses the papers, then?

Mr. CARLING. They are confidential papers.

Motion negatived on a division.

OCCUPATION OF IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) moved for a return showing the names of persons who have, during the past year, applied to the Department of Immigration to obtain the services of immigrants, giving the number and occupation of the immigrants applied for, and the number and occupation of those whose services were so obtained.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, who is absent, I regret to say, from illness, has requested me to say that there is very little correspondence in the Department on this question; that most of the applications which have been made, have been made verbally to the agents at the different stations, where they are located, and directly to the agents at Quebec where the immigrants land; and what correspondence on this subject there may be in the Department will be brought down at the earliest moment. The demand for labour during the past summer has been very great, and it has been utterly impossible, the Minister informs me, to furnish the quantity that has been required in the Dominion. This is very much to be regretted, from the fact that wages, particularly of farm labourers and other labourers, have been much higher in every part of the country than before. A large number of navvies have been brought from the other side of the line during the past year, simply because labour could not be procured in this country, although the parties desirous of obtaining this labour had their agents all through the Dominion, at every port where immigrants landed, as well as at inland ports. This circumstance is to be regretted, because it would be well if the immigration was sufficiently large to furnish the demand, not only of the farming community, but also on public works. The papers, so far as the Minister has them, will be brought down at the earliest moment.

Mr. PATERSON. It is pleasing to know that there has been such a demand for labour during the past year as the hon. Minister is able to assure us there has been; but I am sure he will agree with me that we all desire that labour should be found abundant enough to supply the demand for it. If he could conveniently give all the information in regard to the point covered by my motion, I should be glad. He tells us in general terms that the demand has been for navvies and farm labourers; but I understand that a great many mechanics have come from foreign countries to our shores, and he will notice that my motion asks that he should give the occupation of those that have been applied for, and also the occupation of those whose services have been obtained. I judge that, without much trouble, the hon. Minister could get a memorandum from the agent at Quebec, and from the other agencies, as to the number that have really been applied for, as to the trades that they have followed in the old country, and as to whether they were required for those trades in this country. If the hon. gentleman took this trouble, I think the return would be all the more complete.

Mr. BOWELL. I explained to the hon. gentleman that there have been a large number of applications made, of which there have been no record; but I can assure him that all the correspondence covered by his motion will be brought down. There is no doubt that a large number of men who came to this country were mechanics, but if they could not find work as mechanics, they have gone to work at something else. That is the course pursued by industrious men who are willing to work, and all who applied for work on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and have been physically able and willing to work, have received employment whether they were navvies or not.

Mr. BLAKE. I can hardly fancy that the course which the hon. gentleman mentions with reference to applications for labourers by employers of labour, is extensively pursued. It seems to me extraordinary if an employer of labour should make an application to an agent for labourers, there should be no entry or record made of it. It seems to me that it would be one of the first duties of an agent, to keep such a record, in order that the application might be filled at a future time. I can hardly think that the offices can be conducted in such a loose and perfunctory manner as the hon. gentleman's remarks indicate. In reference to those for whom employment is obtained, there should also be a register kept. It would be useful in the case of a man coming and saying: "Well, I am of such an occupation and I want such an employment." He would be told at once: "I have nothing for you; go elsewhere you must look for yourself." If there is to be employment for an individual, the name of the employer should surely be recorded in order that communication might be made to applicants and applications should be entered so that information should be given to the employers. It would be a great convenience in the management of these offices that a fuller report be kept in the future.

Mr. IVES. If immigration to this country were as small as it was four or five years ago, it might be possible to keep a record at the office of the Minister at Ottawa of all immigrants arriving and of all applications for labour, but with our largely increased immigration of late years, it would be absurd to expect that all applications by the employers of labour to the agents who take charge of all immigrants at their arrival in port should be entered in a record at the Ottawa Department. Those agents travel more or less through the country with the train loads of immigrants, and employers of labour make their applications to them personally. In my own case, I have on several occasions applied to the agents who meet the steamer at Quebec and Halifax, to get me any labourers I might require. For instance, I got a gardener last spring and during the summer, and also half-a-dozen men whom I employed at other kinds of labour, and I did not think it worth while to write to Ottawa to ask the Department to order Mr. Campbell or Mr. Clark to obtain for me a gardener when I saw those gentlemen passing through the town in which I live every week to meet the steamer. I applied to them personally, and I know this is the way the matter is worked by everybody else. I do not see what good could be served if such oral applications were sent to Ottawa. If the object of the hon. gentleman is, by obtaining these returns to base an argument that the enquiry for labour has been small because a very small number of applications are on record at Ottawa, I think it very unfortunate, because I know I have never made an application here, though I have made no less than a dozen to the agents personally, and others, I am sure, have applied in the same way. I wish to give notice of my protest against a return of the kind asked for being taken at all as any indication of the demand for labour or the extent of immigration.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman is on the wrong tack, but it is fortunate that he has cast this suspicion on me, as it will have the effect of causing the hon. Minister of Agriculture to take steps to procure a list of the applications from outside sources, and thus save himself from the unfortunate position in which he would be placed by bringing down a return showing but very few applications. I have not the object in view stated by the hon. gentleman. My only desire is to obtain full information, and my opinion is that a full record should be kept of all applications as furnished by the different agents. We have had reports of these officers which deal with matters, in my opinion, not within their duties and omit other matters within their office. I remember one of those immigration agents who, in his report to the Department, gave us page after page of a dissertation on the beauties of the National Policy, and the state of the crops throughout the country, and a great deal of which information was not within the scope of his requirements. I would suggest that agents should be directed to omit information of that kind and confine themselves to give information really valuable, by keeping a record of the requisitions that are sent to them for labour, so that we may have some idea as to the demands that exist for labour and the means for supplying that demand. Had the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe paid attention to my remarks, he would have seen that my object is simply to ascertain what applications were sent in to the Department through the agents, during the year, so that we may know the different occupations in demand. When my hon. friend asks for a gardener, his request should be entered by the agent to whom it was made, and if he had asked for twenty-five or thirty shoemakers, or carpenters, or men in any other branch of trade, that request should also be entered, with a statement of the branch of trade required. I have no sinister object in view at all, but solely wish to obtain all the information available, and such information it would be valuable to put in possession of the people.

Mr. SPROULE. I entirely concur with what my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe has said, because I was applied to two or three years ago for the purpose of getting hands to do farming work, and when I wrote to the agent, Mr. Donaldson, at Toronto, although I applied for some twenty-five men I could only get three during that season. The following season several parties asked me to write for farm labourers, and when in Toronto I saw Mr. Donaldson and made verbal application to him but was unable to get any. Consequently this last season I did not deem it expedient to make any application because I saw it would be impossible in our part of the country to get these men sent on as they were taken up before they reached there at all. A large number of applications would be sent in if people thought there was any likelihood of their getting half the men they required.

Motion agreed to.

MINING REGULATIONS.

Mr. LISTER, in moving for copies of all petitions, letters and correspondence from any person or persons to the Minister of the Interior, or any other member of the Government, relating to the mining of gold and other minerals in the North-West Territories, said: I have reason to believe that a petition, largely signed by miners in the North-West Territory, has been forwarded to the hon. Minister of the Interior, asking that mining regulations should be passed by the Government for the benefit of the miners in that country. I am not aware that the Government has as yet taken any action in the matter, but I desire to call the attention of the Government to the great importance of attending to it at once. I believe there is no doubt about the fact that, as long ago as eight or ten years, it was discovered that the North-West Territories, the Rocky Mountains on this side, contained very valuable minerals. Explorers have been in that country for many years, and, within the last two or three years, a large number of miners have gone in there. No mining regulations have, however, been passed. There is no law by which an explorer, or a "free miner," as he is called, to use the language of the mining laws in force elsewhere, can acquire a title to any property. I believe it is a fact that many persons, whose names I shall not mention at this time, though I may have occasion to refer to them in the future, have taken possession of valuable portions of that country, claiming to have a right to certain lands to the extent of as much as 160 and 320 acres. The result has been to drive off the free miners, to drive away the explorers, who have gone in there with nothing but a pack on their back, expecting from their experience to get the benefit of what they might discover, and there is to-day a state of dissatisfaction and confusion existing in that country. I believe in the mountains there are 500 or 600 miners wintering, ready to commence operations in the spring, and I believe I am safe in saying, that when the spring opens, that number will be added to by at least 1,000, and, unless the Government take speedy steps to issue mining regulations for these men, confusion must ensue, if nothing else. I have been informed that the Government have received claims from a number of these people, and that in pursuance of the permission they have received from the Government, they are in possession of this property. I am informed that the Government has granted, or proposes to grant, mining licenses for forty acres of land. If any such thing as that is done, it is in contravention—it is against the well-known laws of all mining contracts of this continent. A mining claim should not be more than 300 by 1,500 feet, and the Government should, in no case, pass the fee in the land to the miner, and should give, at the most, the quantity of land I have suggested. I trust the Government will see fit at an early date, or even now, to answer to this motion, because I merely bring it forward for the purpose of again calling the attention of the Government to it. I bring it forward at the request of numbers of miners who have written to me, and who are very much dissatisfied indeed and I hope the hon. Minister who is representing the Minister of the Interior in this House will, to-day, give such an answer or utterance to this motion as will satisfy these people in the North-West Territory. If there is one class of men above another whom the Government of the country should seek to pacify and assist, it is the miner, who, as I stated a moment ago, went into that country, into those mountains, with nothing but his pack on his back, enduring all kinds of hardships, for the purpose of benefiting the country. Everything in the way of assistance that is possible should be given to these men, and I trust the First Minister will now give such an assurance to these men as will satisfy them. I remind him that spring will soon be on, and hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of men will be flocking into that country, and the consequence will be very disastrous indeed unless the Government, in its wisdom, sees fit to do something in the meantime.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman says that he has had a great many complaints, and there has been dissatisfaction expressed by a number of miners. I think, if he had stated that he has received communications from prospectors, he would have been more accurate.

Mr. LISTER. Well, call them prospectors, if you like.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are a good many prospectors, I have no doubt, who are there, and I hope will do good service to the country by developing the mineral resources, especially at or near the Rocky Mountains. He says a good many have gone in. They have gone in this year, and, though most prospectors, if they have found a good thing, do not disclose where it is, yet, from the rumours we hear, and the evidence which, with more or less certainty, reaches the Department of the Interior, there is, no doubt, a general opinion that there is a considerable mineral region of both gold and silver near the Rocky Mountains, or in that vicinity. The law already gives certain rights—inchoate rights to prospectors, certain encouragement to prospectors, and, when they become miners, the claims of those who really make discoveries, who have spent their money and developed the riches of the country, will of course be considered in preference. The hon. gentleman knows—or perhaps he does not know, as he did not state it—that mining regulations were issued last year, and there may have been some applications, but if so they were very few, under those mining regulations; but the fact that those regulations were issued has called forth a great deal of discussion, a great deal of information has been sent, and the Department of the Interior has examined the Australian laws, and the laws in force in the United States, in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, for the purpose of preparing an amended system of regulations for miners. I may inform the hon. gentleman that these regulations have been prepared for some little time, and were until lately under the consideration of the Government, as prepared by the Department. Those amended mining regulations are now approved and ready for publication in the Gazette. They will appear I believe in the next Canada Gazette, and will be laid on the Table, and I hope the hon. gentleman will find they are such as he can approve.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it is a pity the hon. gentleman did not cause these researches to be made in the mining regulations of Australia, Nova Scotia and the United States before he issued his regulations, instead of afterwards.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Last year?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will look at the regulations, he will find that there are some of those adopted taken from the United States and some from Nova Scotia. They were prepared with a view to the experience of both those American mining countries. Since that, the consideration has been extended to other countries, in consequence of Australian miners, prospecting in the North-West, having made certain valuable suggestions, which have been taken up.

Mr. LISTER. I desire, in answer to the First Minister to say that application has been made to the Department of the Interior, not only by myself, but by actual miners—not prospectors—for a copy of these regulations, and they have not been able to get them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, not yet.

Mr. LISTER. Not the new ones, but the ones you say were issued last year; and if we cannot get them in Ottawa, it is very unlikely prospectors could get them in the North-West Territories. These prospectors are the men who have to be protected, and the difficulty with them is this: Several of them who have discovered what they believe to be mineral leads have been warned off by these companies that I have referred to—men who claim that they have a right to 320 acres of land and 160 acres pre-emption for mining facilities—large companies who, I believe, have no claim at all unless the Government has given them one. When these prospectors have discovered what they believe to be mineral lands, the companies tell them that the land belongs to them, that if their discoveries are within the limits of that permit, then they have no right to them. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can only say again that if such is the fact, that large tracts of land have been granted to particular individuals, then I say it is a violation of every mining law on this continent, British Columbia included. I believe the mining laws of British Columbia are the best on the continent, and if the Government will follow those laws it would be doing justice to everybody. I hope when these mining rules come down—I won't pretend to criticise them now—I hope the Minister will have followed the mining regulations of British Columbia. Those are the mining regulations the miners of that country want—not that large tracts of land should be locked up in the hands of a few individuals. We want to get a large number of miners in there, because that is one way to develop the country, and we must encourage them with fair regulations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With the permission of the House I would say one word. The hon. gentleman says that he knows—that he heard from miners—that they have found people claiming to have possession of 320 acres from the Government. I think I can safely say, Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have heard it; I can safely say on the part of the Department that such a statement is erroneous, quite erroneous, thoroughly erroneous. If the hon. gentleman had been up there himself he would know that there are very few valuable lots which somebody has not laid a claim to. If people are prevented from settling by the pretended claims of others, very few will find vacant lots at all.

Mr. LISTER. The mining regulations will settle all that.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There is no doubt in the world but that what the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) says is correct, that persons who have gone in there during this last fall with a view, I suppose, of developing the resources of that country, have been warned off by men who have been there before them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Every claim-jumper warns off his neighbour.

Mr. CAMERON. On several occasions this last fall, when I visited the summit of the Rocky Mountains, I heard parties make these complaints, parties who had gone there with a view of prospecting and making their fortune. They went up into the mountains, and they were warned off by two or three companies who have established themselves in the neighbourhood of the railway there, and who claim to own a large portion of the country. How they do it is quite clear. When these men go there they stake out, say, so many feet, and send the claims down to Ottawa. But they do not confine themselves to staking out a claim for the company; but they put in fifty or one hundred claims in the name of their employes, or their friends in Canada, or in England; and in that way they pretend to get possession of a very large portion of what is considered a valuable region. Now, whether they have any right to it or not, of course is out of the question, but that the thing is done is beyond all reasonable doubt; and the sooner these regulations are promulgated and the people know exactly what they can and cannot do, the better it will be for the interests of the people up there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The pretended claim is made in this way: A person goes into the mountains, or near the mountains, and he finds, or fancies he has found, a mine. He may apply as a settler and claim to have a homestead and pre-emption as agricultural land. The hon. gentleman knows, however, that that would give him no title to either gold or silver, under the Act.

Motion agreed to.

SHAREHOLDERS IN THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MULOCK, in moving for a statement showing the names of all shareholders in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the amounts of stock held by each of said shareholders on each of the following days, namely: the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th October, 1883; 4th, 11th, 18th, and 25th of November, 1883; 2nd, 9th, 16th, 23rd and 30th of December, 1883; 6th, 10th, 20th and 27th of January, 1884, said: This motion covers the period of about four months. I think, perhaps, it would be as well to cut down the number of days asked for and with the permission of the House, therefore, I would limit the motion to the 14th, 21st, and 28th October, 1883, and the 4th of November, 1883. I desire, if possible, to ascertain to what extent this stock is passing into the hands of the ordinary investing public.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria, B. C.) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Before that reasonable request is put, I wish to correct the statement I made respecting the days on which the tender of resignation of Mr. Costigan was made, and his withdrawal of it. His tender was on the 18th; it was given to me on the 19th, and withdrawn on the 20th—just twenty-four hours afterwards.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said the 21st, this afternoon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has given me a corrected memorandum. I spoke from recollection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is rather unwise to move the adjournment of the House. We have now been forty days in Session, and have completed [scarcely any business yet. The paper is very full, and I would like to know upon what grounds the hon. gentleman moves the adjournment. If it is for the purpose of going to the festivities this evening, nobody is kept here, they can go if they like. But, there are a large number of gentlemen who desire to stay and attend to public business.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in that regard, and I would like to know whether he is not going to the festivities himself?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to my right hon. friend that I have been honoured with a card of invitation, but if the House sits and attends to business I will not go. If it does not sit the probability is that, like a great many more, I will go. But I think it is my first duty to stay here and attend to the business of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The reason I asked was, that I supposed my hon. friend was most patriotically going to sacrifice his wife's relations, and going to the ball himself.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for copy of Order in Council passed in September last, providing for the payment of $130,000 to the Government of British Columbia, on account of Esquimalt Graving Dock reimbursements, said: The House has been engaged in considering a question involving millions and this is only a small matter of a few thousands. I desire to obtain the information for two reasons: First, that I may know the precise date on which the Order in Council was passed; and second, the exact amount embodied in the Order in Council, as leading up to some other matters that will shortly come before the House and which will materially affect the interests of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to.

THE STEAMER SIR JAMES DOUGLAS.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for detailed statement of all monies expended upon the dredge steamer Sir James Douglas, in connection with the hauling out, lengthening of, repairs to, and launching of said vessel from 1st January, 1882, to 31st December, 1883, said: In this connection I would state that I am very sorry to be called upon to move for this statement, because I have reason to know that some years ago something like $28,000 or $30,000 were expended on this steamer, and it was considered necessary by the Department to expend this amount, although my knowledge leads me to suppose that whenever the amount of money necessary to be devoted to repairs to any steamer exceeds two-thirds of the original value, it is better to condemn the vessel. But there is another matter connected with this expenditure for which I desire to obtain the information, and it will be subsequently asked for in another notice of motion which I will be called upon to move.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) also moved for statement showing numbers of officers and crew of steamer Sir James Douglas, their names, rank, pay and date of first appointment, the average cost per month of maintaining said vessel, for the twelve months ending 31st December, 1883, nature of service in which she has been engaged for the period mentioned, increased speed obtained by lengthening, date on which she was last swung for adjustment of compasses, and copy of deviation table made therefrom. He said: The main object of calling for this statement is that I may be in a position to know whether in the Province of British Columbia there has been great laxity evinced in the swinging of vessels for the adjustment of their compasses, as I think it is highly desirable, before picking holes in the coats of other people, we should ascertain whether the Dominion Government steamers have complied with all the requirements under that particular head.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION EMPLOYÉS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for a statement showing the names, rank, pay, date of appointment of all officers, clerks, messengers, and servants employed in the various Departments of the Dominion, in the Province of British Columbia, including Dominion Government Agent and those employed under him, said: I am desirous of obtaining the necessary information under these respective heads, because, as many hon. members are doubtless aware, we are constantly importuned for increases of salaries in the various Departments, and I wish to obtain exactly the dates on which such appointments were made, and other details, so that I may be in a better position to give definite answers to my constituents and to those employed in the Province, when they make applications of the character to which I have referred.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to call the attention of the Government to a question which occurs to me in connection with this motion. It appears to me that all the information which is asked for is to be found in the blue-books of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and it is a question whether we should encumber the files and records of this House under these circumstances. I do not oppose the motion, but I think if the information can be obtained in the way I have stated, such motions would appear to be useless.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the motion should be allowed to pass, because it seeks for information about a special matter in a particular province, and it does not belong exclusively to the Marine Department. The hon. gentleman gives a reason for asking the information, and I do not think we should refuse it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not oppose the motion, but it does seem to me that my hon. friends the members of the Government, are fond of imposing work upon themselves.

Mr. BAKER. This is a matter which affects my particular constituency, and I hope the hon. gentleman will allow me to know a little more about my constituency than he does.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know I am out of order, but I may be allowed to say that while I do not interfere with the hon. gentleman's constituency, I have the right which every hon. member has, of stating his opinion, and I say I think a great deal of time is expended uselessly, and a great deal of money, too, in getting information which could as well be obtained in the blue-books.

Motion agreed to.

BREAKWATER AT POINT ESCUMINAC.

Mr. MITCHELL, in moving for all papers, communications and correspondence with the Government or any Department thereof, in relation to the construction of a breakwater at Point Escuminac in the Bay of Miramichi, N.B.; also, all reports, surveys and plans made by any officer of the Government in relation thereto, said: I may say that the Bay of Miramichi is one which is resorted to by a large number of fishermen, not only from the adjacent coasts of that county, but also from the adjacent counties of Gloucester and Restigouche, and representations as to the requirements of the fishermen in the way of a breakwater at Point Escuminac have frequently been made to me. I have therefore felt it my duty to place this motion on the paper in order to get such information as may be in the hands of the Government, and any surveys and plans which have been made, in order that we may judge of the propriety of acting upon that information.

Mr. BAKER. I think the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is equally guilty with myself in taking up the time of the House needlessly. I think I must cast on the hon. gentleman, in this respect, the same reflection which he cast upon me.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the hon. gentleman can point out any similarity between the two cases, or any inconsistency on my part, I shall be obliged to him, and I think the House will be obliged to him. My case differs in this respect from his, that this is a question of saving life and protecting an enormous and valuable and extensive industry. It is known that storms frequently rise, and that sometimes no less than 40 or 50 boats have been wrecked in a single storm, whereas, if there had been a harbour of refuge the lives of these people, and the loss of their boats would have been saved. I think there is a great difference between such a motion as that, and a mere attempt to create popularity, or a desire to make political capital. I am not saying that that is the feeling which influenced the hon. gentleman who has made this personal attack upon myself, simply because I pointed out, what is apparent to everyone, that it is necessary to curtail motions which are made merely for personal ambition, or political notoriety; but I say that I made no speech for effect upon my constituents, but simply made the motion. With regard to his motion, I ventured the suggestion to the Minister, because I believed that the information sought was to be obtained in the blue-books which are published by the Department; and because I did this, the hon. gentleman makes an attack upon me, after I have made a motion in the interest of my constituency and the adjoining constituency, as well as in the interest of human life and of the commerce and trade which surrounds our coasts. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that when a motion is made in this House every gentleman has a right to criticise or object if he thinks it necessary to do so, and a person must not be supposed to do it from captious motives because it may not suit the ambition or the desire for notoriety of certain hon. gentlemen. I tell him, as I tell every hon. gentleman, that when I think it necessary to criticise any motion, whether it comes from the Government or the Opposition, I shall be ready to do so in the exercise of my public duty and my personal right.

Mr. BAKER. If the hon. gentleman cared as little for political squibs as I do, he would say far less in the House than he does. I regret that I am called upon to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of airing his eloquence.

Motion agreed to.

MINING AND METALLURGY.

Mr. HALL moved that a Select Committee be appointed to obtain information as to the methods adopted by the Geological Surveys of this and other countries, in the prosecution of their work, with a view of ascertaining if additional technical and statistical records of mining and metallurgical development in the Dominion should not be procured and preserved, with power to send for persons, papers and records; and that said Committee consist of Messrs. Baker (Victoria), Dawson, Cameron (Inverness), Ferguson (Welland), Holton, Laurier, Lesage, Lister, Mulock, Wood (Westmoreland), and the mover. He said:

I only desire to say a word in reference to this motion, which is not intended as any reflection on the administration of the Geological Survey. I think, however, that there is a feeling that this Survey is not keeping pace with the geological progress of the country, though I believe the fault is rather in the system itself, than in its administration. I find that thirty years ago a motion similar to this was moved, and the Committee which was appointed upon the motion obtained some valuable information, and the survey has since been conducted on the suggestions made by that Committee. Great progress has been made in geological matters since that time, but I cannot find any evidence of any attention having been paid to this subject in the House during the thirty years which have elapsed since that time, except the desultory remarks which are made when this appropriation comes up in the House upon the Estimates. I think after the lapse of so long a period, new investigations should be made, and possibly new suggestions offered in reference to the conduct of the Department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not consider this motion at all a reflection on the Geological Branch of the Department of the Interior; on the contrary, I think it will be of assistance to the Director of the Survey, and I have not the slightest objection to the Committee. I would therefore just throw out a suggestion to my hon. friend, who I suppose will be the Chairman of the Committee, to take great care not to incur any great expense in summoning witnesses, which is the chief objection to Committees of this kind. I think most of the information can be got here, without much expense in the way of paying the travelling expenses of witnesses, and the cost of keeping them here.

Mr. BLAKE. I was about to make the observation which the hon. gentleman has just made. I confess I think he has been rather late this Session in granting Committees with power to send for persons; and I was a little afraid lest this Committee might think proper to send for persons to Washington or some other places—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Or for Mr. Huxley or Mr. Tyndall.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps not so far—in order to obtain information. If the object is to examine persons engaged in the service here, there can be no objection; and if the Committee wishes to obtain information with respect to other countries, they can obtain such as is contained in the reports, without calling the persons engaged in prosecuting the different services.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite right, and if the information cannot be got here, a series of questions can be sent to scientific men, who I have no doubt, will be glad to send to the Committee all the information in their power.

NAVAL STATION AT ESQUIMALT.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Dominion and the Imperial Governments in reference to the continued maintenance of the naval station at Esquimalt and the continuous presence of at least one of Her Majesty's ships in British Columbia waters, said: Article 9 of the terms of Union stipulates that the influence of the Dominion Government shall be used to secure the continual maintenance of a naval station at Esquimalt. One of the members of the Administration, when I put a question on this subject the other day, desired me to bring it up in this form. I am anxious to receive this correspondence; and inasmuch as the hon. member for Northumberland—who reminds me very much of the lion on the top of Northumberland House, of whom it is said that you do not know which way his tail turns—is very anxious to get away to the ball, I will make my remarks as brief as possible under the circumstances.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend from Victoria is determined to drag his coat-tail and have a fight. When the hon. gentleman has been as long in public life as I have been, he will find that it scarcely comes with good grace from him to twit an old member of the House with speaking frequently and making speeches for political effect, especially as I find that he has eight or nine motions on the paper, while during the whole Session I have only had one. I think in seconding the motion of the hon. gentleman, I showed my desire to support him whenever he submits a motion that has merit in it and is not mere buncombe.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will use a more parliamentary term, and say, that is merely for political effect. But my hon. friend must not think he can provoke an old dog like myself with impunity—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A lion.

Mr. MITCHELL. And if I refrain from protracting this debate and the other debates that will arise out of the motions in which the hon. gentleman is interested, it is simply because many gentlemen around me are anxious to get away to the festivities of this evening, and because I see that the hon. gentleman has got his paint and feathers on, and is anxious to display them before that galaxy of beauty which is awaiting his presence.

Mr. BLAKE. I remember also that lion to which my hon. friend has referred, and he forgets that it was made of stone instead of brass; and although it was said that if you looked at it, you would see its tail wag, I do not remember ever hearing that lion growl.

Mr. BAKER. I consider it my duty to state for the information of the House that although the hon. gentleman claimed to be an old member of the House, and although I have admitted he is old enough to be my father, I have the same right to speak in this House as he has, and I can say his attempt at modesty is only equalled, if not exceeded, by his feigned youthful appearance.

DISMISSAL OF DANIEL McCOURT.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence with reference to Daniel McCourt, lately dismissed from his office as lock tender on the Cornwall Canal, and all papers in any way bearing upon the subject of his dismissal, including copy of any letters or reports of the Superintendent of the Canal, with a statement of the date of Mr. McCourt's appointment, and his age at the time of his dismissal, said: It has been represented to me that Mr. McCourt was appointed as long ago as 1862; that he was dismissed in the month of June last, after twenty-one years' service, being still in what I am now disposed to call the prime of life, namely, the age of fifty; and that he was in the full vigour of health, and an excellent servant, possessing the best character, and having received the most favourable reports of his efficiency from his local superior. Mr. McCourt has a wife and family, and has been dismissed, so far as I can ascertain, without any cause. Under these circumstances, we should know why he has been dismissed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways, I would say there is no objection to this motion. With respect to the statement of the hon. gentleman, I know nothing of the facts, but my knowledge of the course taken in such matters by the hon. Minister of Railways is, that in such cases he errs on the side of too much leniency, and for the sake of the persons principally interested, he is too apt to keep people in the service after their usefulness is gone.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria).

Mr. BLAKE. I hope the papers will come down early Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for: 1st. For statement of the particulars, with dates of the expenditure of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in connection with the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway; 2nd. For statement in full detail of the particulars of the amount of $473,000 or thereabouts, stated to be for sundry advances, carriers, back charges and other matters; 3rd. For a statement, in detail, with dates of the payments on account of interest on stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway; 4th. For copies of all reports and data on which the estimates of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and Mr. Schreiber, as to the cost of completing the Canadian Pacific Railway, are founded. He said: These are points on which the information before us is deficient. In the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways, I will not enlarge on the subject, but will take this opportunity of saying across the floor what I have stated to the hon. Minister himself privately. Most important information which it would not take one hour to prepare has been asked for a fortnight or more ago, and has not yet been given. We have asked for information with respect to the cost of the 40 miles from Callander westward, that was built a year or two ago, before the Company let the contract to the construction company, and though asked for two or three weeks ago, the information has not yet been given. The cost of the work from Winnipeg to a point 45 miles east, where the construction company's contract began, has been asked for and not yet obtained; also, in respect to the work from that point to Calgary which was completed a considerable time ago, and from Calgary to the summit of the Rockies, the latest completed, it is true, but completed as long ago as the end of October last. There is a great deal more asked which ought to be given, but I merely signalize these four points with respect to which there really ought to be no delay. I am very anxious to have the particulars contained in this memorandum also at the earliest moment. All the information I have asked for is essential to the consideration of the measure before this House.

Motion agreed to.

WHARF AT CRANE ISLAND.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation), in moving for: 1. Copies of tenders received for works on the pier at Crane Island, last year; 2. A statement of the tenders made according to the scale of such tenders; 3. The name of the party tendering to whom the contract was awarded; 4. The amount expended for the work; 5. The salaries paid to the Superintendents of Works, if any, said: Mr. Speaker, the object I have in view in making this motion is to verify the statement of whatever tenders may have been received for the construction of the pier at Crane Island. I do not know whether the information I have received is correct or not, but I have been asked to move for a statement of these tenders, because it is said that the parties tendering, to whom the contract has been awarded, had not put in the lowest tender. I have been told that there was a couple of tenders put in for a lower price. If the hon. Minister of Public Works is prepared to give me at once some accurate information on this point, and to tell me whether or not the contract has actually been awarded to the lowest bidder, I shall not proceed with my motion; if not, I should desire to have the required information.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) As near as I can remember, the parties to whom the contract has been awarded were the lowest bidders; the contractors are Messrs. Langlois & Hickman. The amount of their tender was $10,500. The tenders were advertised for from 6th December, 1883, to 8th January, 1884.

Motion withdrawn.

WHARF AT ST. JEAN PORT JOLI.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation), in moving for: 1. Copies of tenders called for and made last year for the extension of the wharf at St. Jean Port-Joli; 2. Of the contract awarded to the party tendering, if such contract was awarded; 3. A statement of the amount expended last year on the said work; 4. The names of the persons, if any, who had charge of the said work, and of the salary allowed and paid to each such person; 5. A statement of the work done, showing dimensions, quantity and quality, said: Mr. Speaker, in making this motion I desire to again call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the manner in which the work at this wharf has been done, either by contract or otherwise. In the first place I must congratulate the hon. Minister for having caused this work to be done, and at the same time I wish to draw his attention to the following fact: Last year when the question came up before the House, it was stated to me, as a reason for the postponement of the work, that the contract ought to be let out by tenders. I hold in my hand the report of Mr. Percy, the Chief Engineer, giving as a reason that the attention of the Minister of Public Works had been called to the fact that these works ought to be let out by contract. Here are, in a few words, the reasons given last year:

"That the amount available having been appropriated for the construction of works for extending the pier, he immediately countermanded the orders which had been given, having in view the placing of the works to be constructed under contract."

Well, in spite of the attention I have given to the subject, I have not been able to discover in the newspapers that tenders had been asked for. I do not mean to say that the work has not been as well done, but I mean to say that it was expected that the works should be done by contract. It may be that the work has been done by contract, but if that was the case, the fact was certainly unknown to me, and also unknown to the people of that locality. If I am rightly informed—and I have reason to believe that my information is correct—I think that these works ought to be done by day's work. Under those circumstances, I should desire to know what has been the cost of the work, the quantities of work which have been done, and at the same time who were the overseers, and whether or not they are the same persons whose names were mentioned last year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for l'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), I must say that, in fact, the intention had been to let out this work by contract, but that after consulting the Chief Engineer, after reckoning up the amount at our disposal, and after examining the difficulties of the work, it has been decided that it would be better not to give out the work by tender, but to have it done by day's work, as had been done by the late Administration. Consequently the Department has followed the same line of conduct. As to the overseer—I think that is the information desired by the hon. member—an officer of the Department, Mr. Augustin Gagnon, has been sent there to oversee the work. This work offered great difficulties, and we intended to do it well, and under these circumstances we deemed it our duty to employ a man of great experience, and to whom the Government could safely entrust the work. Mr. Augustin Gagnon has been paid $3 per day. There is no objection to granting the motion of the hon. member, and the information asked for will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for: 1. Copies of all Orders in Council respecting the appointment of an Administrator of the Government of the North-West Territories in the absence of Lieut. Governor Dewdney; 2. All correspondence that subject between the said Lieut. Governor and the Government, or any member thereof; 3. All correspondence respecting any mission entrusted to said Lieut. Governor, the nature of such mission, and the instructions given to said Lieut. Governor respecting his mission; 4. The name of said Administrator; 5. All correspondence, including telegrams, between said Governor and the Government, within the last month, as to his proposed visit to Ottawa. He said: I have been informed that Mr. Dewdney, Lieut. Governor of the North-West Territories, is not at his post just now, that he has been sent upon some mission to British Columbia or elsewhere by the Government, and that an Administrator has been appointed in his place to the North-West instead of Lieut. Governor Dewdney. Of course, he may be absent upon an important mission and it may be important that he should be absent, but it strikes me that it is an extremely unfortunate period for the Lieut. Governor of our Territories in the North-West to be absent. The First Minister has no doubt observed, within the last day or two, an account of a serious outbreak—it is said to be so, at all events—among some of the tribes in the North-West Territory. It is said that Pie-a-pot's band is in a state of practical rebellion, and that other tribes are generally discontented, and that there is a general row in progress in some of these tribes. Whether that is so or not, I cannot tell, except from what I see in the public press, but, whether that be so or not, it is an unfortunate thing that the head of that Department should be absent from his post just now, and that his place should be filled, as I am informed, by a young man named Hayter Reed, an assistant in the Lieut. Governor's Department. I am told that the Lieut. Governor was on his way to Ottawa, and that a telegram was sent to him from Ottawa, telling him not to come to Ottawa, and that he was sent back to the West or to British Columbia upon some mission. That he has not arrived here is quite clear. Why he was sent back, of course, I do not know, and I hope to get this information from the papers I have just asked for. I think, as I said before, that it is unfortunate he should not be there now, to look after the disaffected Indians, to protect the people up there from any results that may follow from the dissatisfaction or discontent, or from any row there may be in the Indian encampments there. It is unfortunate, too, if it is a fact, as I am informed it is, that this young man has been appointed in the absence of Lieut. Governor Dewdney, that such an appointment should have been made. There are men there who have been in the service for a very long time, and if any honour was to be conferred they were entitled to it. There is Lieut. Col. Richardson who has been administering justice there for a number of years, and no man stands higher or enjoys the public respect more than Lieut. Col. Richardson. Then there is Lieut. Col. McLeod, an efficient officer, a man who stands high; and there is Judge Rouleau, another of the officials engaged in the administration of Civil and Criminal Justice there. But all these men are passed over, and this young man, Mr. Hayter Reed, is said to have been appointed. It may be all right, but I desire to know the reasons; I desire to know why Lieut. Governor Dewdney is absent just now; I desire to know what mission he has been sent upon, and also whether the Government have any information as to this alleged outbreak among the Indians?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD Mr. Speaker, I must say I think it unfortunate that my hon. friend, when he makes his motions, generally contrives to include in the reasons a series of rumours, most of these being altogether unfounded. In the first place, he says he hears from rumour that Mr. Dewdney was summoned down to Ottawa.

Mr. CAMERON. I knew he was.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What?

Mr. CAMERON. I know he was. He was at Winnipeg on his way down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Brought down here?

Mr. CAMERON. I know he was on his way down here; he was at Winnipeg.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that he is altogether mistaken, that Governor Dewdney never had any intention of coming here this winter; that, on the contrary, it was understood that he was not to come here this winter, that he never was summoned here. If he went to Winnipeg, it was on business as Indian Commissioner at Winnipeg, of which I know nothing. I tell the hon. gentleman it is so. He may shake his head, but it is so. The rumour is a falsehood, got up, as so many of these rumours are—not of course by the hon. gentleman—got up for some reason unknown to me, but not creditable to the parties who get them up, either to their veracity or their bona fides. The hon. gentleman says that he hears also that he was sent on an important mission. Sir, he is sent upon no mission. The circumstances are simply these: The winter time is the easiest time for the Indian Commissioner and Lieut.-Governor to get away. Summer is the time for business. In the winter the Indians are kept at home by the climate, and by the depth of snow, and there is no danger of their making trouble, as there is in the summer time. Mr. Dewdney has been in the employment of the Government some four years. He has never returned to his home where his property and his interests are—in British Columbia—since his appointment. As he has but little to do just now, and had got through with his North-West Council, he asked for leave of absence for two months or six weeks to go to British Columbia, and to take Mrs. Dewdney with him to see her mother. He wished to do some business of his own, and intends to be back in Regina by the 1st of April. That is the simple reason why Mr. Dewdney asked for leave and got it. Then, as to the fact of there being a rising of the Indians. In one place some hungry Indians broke into a store and took away some sacks of flour. The agent says it is of no significance whatever; of course, these things are greatly exaggerated, as all such things are. That is the statement made to the Government. Then, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman claims that Mr. Hayter Reed was appointed Administrator. Mr. Hayter Reed is Assistant Commissioner, and if anything should happen to Mr. Dewdney it would be my bounden duty to recommend him to be Commissioner as being the ablest Administrator that we have among the employés there. Mr. Reed is a member of the Bar of seven or ten years' standing, I suppose, and perhaps longer. He is a gentleman who has distinguished himself there, and has a great acquaintance with the Indian character. Although a lawyer practising in Coburg, he had a military taste, and he went up there with a military force some years ago. He has been a good deal through the country and has become thoroughly acquainted with the Indian character and with the Indian languages, so that the Government were only too glad to employ Mr. Hayter Reed. He has full charge, having full acquaintance with, and cognizance of, all matters connected with Indian affairs. He was appointed to do the work because, as Assistant Commissioner, it is convenient that he should do the duty of Administrator. That is the fact with respect to Mr. Hayter Reed. All this story about this gentleman being summoned here mysteriously, and sent back mysteriously, and going off on a mysterious mission to British Columbia, is all manufactured out of whole cloth.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. BLAKE. I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman express so much indignation at these rumors as to Mr. Dewdney visiting Ottawa, and to hear him say they are discreditable to the persons who have spread them abroad. I dare say it was not without some foundation. I had myself heard something like it, and which might, perhaps, be deemed, by persons who do not know the hon. gentleman as well as I do, pretty good foundation for a rumour of that kind. I have heard him state across the floor, in answer to an observation of mine made about the Lieut. Governor, that he had come down, that he had directed him to come down, and so long as he remained responsible for the administration of affairs he would have him down here every winter in order to advise and consult him informally about North-West affairs. Well, as I said, those who do not know the hon. gentleman might possibly have supposed that the rumour was well founded, and that the hon. gentleman's policy would last as long he remained First Minister and responsible for the administration of affairs. Therefore, when they heard that Mr. Dewdney had got as far east as Winnipeg, they might suppose, putting two and two together, that the hon. gentleman's statement held good for this Session. They knew he was First Minister and supposed his policy was continuous. It now appears that, instead of coming east to see his political god-father, the Lieut.-Governor has gone further west to see his mother-in-law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to make merry over it. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Dewdney was down here spending his time and amusing himself instead of attending to his duties. What I said across the floor, last Session and the Session before, was that whenever he was wanted here I would bring him down every Session, when business required; that is what I said. He was not wanted here this Session and therefore he did not come, but if I wanted him next Session I would bring him down notwithstanding any taunt of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I attribute the hon. gentleman's being down here to another reason altogether. Some years ago when the North-West Act was passed, the hon. gentleman said there was no occasion for any Governor. I suppose he said so with a view of keeping the position vacant for Mr. Dewdney.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is infinitely more in the remarks of my hon. friend than there was in the remark of the hon. gentleman who preceded him. I did say so, and I think when I said so it was so, and that there was no necessity for appointing Mr. Laird and giving him $7,000 for doing nothing, for doing just what Mr. Cauchon and Mr. Morris had done before him for a salary of only $1,000 in addition to the then salary. I said so and I think so. But when Mr. Dewdney was appointed, instead of his getting $7,000, which Mr. Laird had got and never did anything in the world for it, he got $2,000 in addition to his salary as Commissioner. This present year, for the first time, there is really a necessity, or a great expediency, rather, for a Lieut.-Governor being at Regina, because for the first time there has been a North-West Council, with six or seven elected members, and they had a Parliament of their own. Therefore it was this year, for the first time, nearly an absolute necessity for the Lieut.-Governor to be at Regina, instead of holding a nominal office and meeting the North-West Council once a year.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is quite clear the hon. gentleman has neither read the Statutes nor the history of that country when he says that Mr. Laird did nothing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, he did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The North-West Act was passed in 1875, before Mr. Laird went there. Duties were imposed by this Act which he knows Governor Morris never discharged. Governor Morris discharged no duties whatever, legislative or executive, in connection with the North-West Territories. He was Lieut.-Governor nominally of the whole West, but he was not Lieut.-Governor of any organized system of territory. He was Lieut. Governor of Manitoba with a sort of quasi judicial authority over the rest of the territory, but he had no fixed duties whatever to perform. The Act was passed in 1875, and under that Act the duties to be discharged were of a very onerous character, and Mr. Laird did discharge those duties infinitely better than they have been discharged since he left.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I say the hon. gentleman has utterly forgotten the facts of the case; he has utterly forgotten the law; he has utterly forgotten the duties that were thrown upon Mr. Laird, and he has utterly forgotten the fact that Mr. Laird never did anything as Lieut.-Governor, except as Commissioner, that Mr. Morris had not done before him.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If the hon. gentleman will consult the Statutes of the North-West he will see what Mr. Laird had to do in connection with making treaties with the Indians, and in many other things.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, I know it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No, the hon. gentleman is not willing to say anything but what suits himself. The hon. gentleman is not ashamed to do a gross injustice to a man who is not present to defend himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is Mr. Dewdney here to defend himself?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think he is. Where the hon. gentleman is, he is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Ditto.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE ON NORTH SHORE OF LAKE ERIE.

Mr. WILSON, in moving for a return of all reports of Government engineers respecting the construction of a harbour of refuge at Port Stanley or Port Burwell, on the north shore of Lake Erie, together with the estimated cost of each, said: I wish briefly to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the condition of these harbours, and I would also like to direct his attention to the condition in which the greater portion of the harbours on the north shore of Lake Erie really are. It is well known that these harbours are at the present time, to a very great extent, neglected. True, several years ago a considerable amount of money was expended on one of them, namely, Port Burwell; but the only amount expended at Port Stanley was $4,000 for a lighthouse. Unfortunately, from some cause or other, I do not know the reason why, we have been totally unable to get a single dollar expended on either of these harbours by the present Administration. Unfortunately for me, and unfortunately for the people along the coast, we have not been so successful as the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) in inducing the Government, after making an examination of the harbour, and deciding not to vote money to make it a harbour of refuge, to expend a reasonable amount of money on them to make them safe for the unfortunate mariners who are compelled to sail up and down that coast. That hon. gentleman succeeded in getting a certain amount applied to Kingsville harbour, although there was close at hand a very fine harbour, Rondeau; and I believe a very large amount of money has been appropriated and will be expended in making that harbour more useful to shipping. It must be borne in mind that the section of country to the north of Port Stanley and Port Burwell, and all the smaller ports along the north coast of Lake Erie, would afford very large trade, if the Government would only take into consideration the necessity of keeping them in a proper state of repair. But we find that after a vessel leaves Rondeau, coming down, she cannot find any port of safety in case of a storm unless she passes Long Point. Thus she has to traverse about 100 miles of coast, where no provision has been made by the Government for the safety of vessels during storms. It is not a very unfrequent circumstance, in fact it occurs year after year, that we find lamentable loss of life taking place, owing to, what I am not afraid to call, criminal negligence on the part of the present Administration. I believe they might have done something; I believe a small expenditure would have placed those ports in a good position and have enabled the lives of mariners to be protected, and the Government is bound to protect those unfortunate individuals sailing up and down that coast. When a vessel was unable to enter a port on account of the lack of expenditure by the Government, it would be supposed that the Government, which talked a great deal about protection, would have placed a life-boat at one or other of those ports to which I have referred. They have failed, for some reason or other, to do this, and they have done everything in their power to divert the large traffic that took place across the lake to the railways. It may be that the railway is a very important factor, and that we should do our utmost to drive the traffic off the lakes; but if that is the Government's policy, it is their duty, in the interests of the mariners on Lake Erie, to make some provision whereby those men would have an opportunity of having their lives saved in case of storm. I therefore urge on hon. gentlemen opposite that, if they will not appropriate a sixpence, and there is no sum down in the Estimates, for either of those ports, they might make a provision whereby life-boats would be provided for those ports, and the lives of mariners be thereby protected. If the Government will provide for life-boats to be placed there, I will guarantee to get willing and ready hands to man them and endanger their own lives for the sake of preserving the lives of mariners. I move this resolution in order to call the attention of the Government to this matter; I hope they will consider it, and see that it is their duty to make the provision I have suggested.

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS DUTIES ON HAY.

Mr. IRVINE, in moving for copies of all despatches or correspondence between the Government of Canada, and that of the United States, or between the Government of Canada and the British Minister at Washington, having reference to excessive Customs duties on hay grown in and exported from Canada to the United States, and the refunding of the same, said: The motion of which I have given notice relates to a subject of very considerable pecuniary interest to a number of farmers and others who have been engaged in the exportation of hay to United States markets. The rate of duty exacted by United States Customs has been 20 per cent. ad valorem, and very often shippers were compelled, rather than incur the danger of a penalty, to invoice the article higher than the actual first cost, so that $2 per ton has generally been paid on New Brunswick shipments. Under the United States Statutes, the only way to bring hay within the 20 per cent. list was to consider it a manufactured article. American importers at length objected and appealed to the courts, which decided that it should not have been placed in the manufactured list and that 10 per cent. only was the proper duty. Canadian exporters now claim their rights and naturally demand a refund, but they have been told by their Boston agents, in some cases, that no refund will be obtained except where the duty was paid under protest. It is inconceivable that the Government of the United States would take such a position as this in order to evade payment, and as it is highly important to get all the information on the subject calculated to aid the parties concerned to get their rights, I trust the Government of Canada will promptly supply all the information in their power. When the correspondence becomes public, the individuals can then better determine how to formulate their claims and press for their speedy adjustment.

Mr. SCRIVER. As the hon. gentleman has stated, this matter involves pecuniary interests of a considerable amount, as a very large quantity of hay has been exported, not from the county which I represent, but from the adjoining county during the period when the United States Customs authority exacted 20 per cent. duty. As the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. (Irvine) has stated, this duty was exacted upon the supposition, or upon the principle, that hay was a manufactured article; and suit was commenced by one of the importers of hay in the United States, founded on the statement that hay was not a manufactured article. The courts decided in favour of this latter contention, and upon that principle the surplus was refunded in a number of cases. It appears, however, to be a matter of Statute or a regulation of the Customs Department in the United States, that in no instance will the duties be refunded, even if it should afterwards appear from the decisions of the courts to have been improperly exacted, unless a protest was entered when the duty was paid. I suppose from statements I have seen in the newspapers, that representations have been made to the Government here, and they have been asked to interfere, so far as they could legitimately do so, for the relief of those who feel that they have been unjustly treated in this matter. I can hardly see how, with propriety, the Government could directly interfere in a matter which comes within the jurisdiction of the courts and the Government of the United States; but if such interference could properly be made, there is no doubt that, in view of the important interests involved, and the large sum of money which has been paid and which has come out of the pockets of the exporters, or, more properly speaking, out of the pockets of the producers of the hay in Canada, it would be very desirable that some representations should be made by the Government here to the authorities at Washington.

Mr. ORTON. I may say that the subject which has been introduced by the hon. gentleman, is one which interests me, as a large quantity of hay has been exported from my section of the country. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, have described the difficulties which have occurred. It seems that those who entered a protest when the duties were paid have, by the decision of the courts of the United States, a claim to have the money refunded, but it seems rather hard that all those who have paid should not have refunded to them the amount which was improperly taken. It doubtless is a delicate question to interfere with the affairs of a foreign country, but it is just possible that some representations might be made by the Government of this country which would not seem at all improper, and by means of which justice might be done to our exporters, or as the hon. gentleman has said, more properly speaking the producers of hay in Canada, who have exported largely to the United States. I suppose that this question involves a sum of at least $1,000,000.

Mr. SCRIVER. No, about $500,000, I believe.

Mr. BOWELL. The statement made by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) is, so far as my recollection serves me, substantially correct; but I have no recollection of any objection being taken by the United States authorities at Washington to the payment of drawbacks on the duties paid on hay, because it was not paid under protest. In July or August last, a despatch was received from the British Minister at Washington—I am speaking entirely from memory—stating that all moneys which had been paid in excess of the proper amount of duty, as established by the judgment of the courts, would be repaid to the parties who had paid them, on proof being furnished of the duty having been so paid. That is my recollection of the despatch which was published at that time in all the newspapers of the country, as we considered it of such importance, that it was at once given to the press. However, the despatch will show what the conditions of repayment were when it is brought down. This is the first time I have heard—perhaps I have not watched the case so closely as my hon. friend—but though it has been brought under the notice of the Department, as well as under the notice of the Finance Minister a number of times, this is the first time I have heard that objection was taken by the United States authorities on the ground that these duties had not been paid under protest. I may be in error, but I think it will be found that the despatch from the British Minister simply states, that on proof of the duty having been paid, the amount of money improperly paid will be refunded. The Government, however, have done what they could in bringing this matter to the attention of the authorities in the United States, in order to obtain from a friendly Government, repayments of money which have been paid by subjects of this country, improperly. I am sure that, as has been stated by my hon. friend behind me. (Mr. Orton) there can be no objection to calling the attention of the United States authorities to any improper conduct, whether intentional or unintentional, on the part of the Customs officers of the United States, for I can assure the House that if any of their merchants or importers get into any trouble of that sort, representations are promptly made, and they are attended to in the manner they should be attended to. I am quite sure the United States Government will accord the same consideration to any representations of that sort which may be made to them by this Government. All the papers we have will be brought down as early as possible.

Mr. SCRIVER. The statement I have made as to the position taken by the United States Treasury Department in this matter, has been made so often by the parties interested, and so recently, that I can hardly believe the facts to be otherwise.

Mr. BOWELL. It is possible my hon. friend is correct, for I am only speaking from recollection of the despatch to which allusion has been made.

Mr. ORTON. Some of the exporters in my county have employed counsel in Washington, and the reply they received from them was exactly the same as my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. CATUDAL. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I fully concur in all that has just been said by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), and I may say that not only has the American Government requested that the duties should be paid under protest, but that in a case in which I was myself personally interested, and in which I myself paid duties under protest, because I had not appealed from the decision of the Collector of Customs to the Secretary of the Treasury, and then sued the American Government, I was refused a remittal of a duty of 10 per cent. which I had overpaid, and such refusal was based on that principle. I think that the hon. Minister of Customs is certainly in error in saying what he has just said; at least, his memory is at fault, for I am certain that the facts stated by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) are strictly correct.

PORT ROWAN LIFESAVING STATION.

Mr. JACKSON, in moving for copies of correspondence in reference to a charge against the captain of the life-saving crew at Port Rowan, in the county of Norfolk, Province of Ontario, in not saving the lives of the crew of the barque Fitzgerald in November, 1883, said: I desire to call your attention to an article that appeared in a Buffalo paper, called the Evening News, charging the captain of the life-saving crew at Port Rowan, in the county of Norfolk, in the Province of Ontario, with gross negligence, in not saving the lives of the crew of the barque Fitzgerald, who lost their lives in attempting to make the shore in their yawl-boat on or about the 14th of November last. I have taken some pains to ascertain the facts in this matter, and in my opinion there was a mistake made, or an error in judgment, on the part of the captain; but that was not the cause of the loss of those valuable lives, nor was the captain in any way responsible for it. Port Rowan village is situated on the west side of Long Point, on the mainland, about three miles across the bay from the shore of Lake Erie. On the 14th of November last, the barque Fitzgerald was driven ashore about six miles in a south-westerly direction from the village of Port Rowan. In order to get to the wreck, the captain would have to travel about seven miles in a south-westerly direction, and go around the head of a marsh, and then one mile down the beach to the wreck. A farmer living on the mainland, about two miles across the marsh from the wreck, saw this vessel when she went ashore. He got into his buggy and drove to Port Rowan, a distance of five miles, and notified the captain that the vessel was ashore opposite his place. Now, here comes the mistake, in my opinion. The captain instead of taking his crew and boat, jumped into a buggy and started off to reconnoitre. The crew heard of the vessel being ashore and went to look for the captain, and found that he was gone. They asked for the key of the boat-house and found that that was gone. They then went to the Deputy Custom House Officer, who was in charge of the station, and asked him for permission to open the boat-house. He gave them permission, and the crew took out the boat, put it on the trucks, and followed the captain with all haste. Before they reached the wreck with the boat, they met the captain returning, who told them to turn about and take the boat home, as the crew had been drowned an hour or two before he had reached the wreck. These are the facts of the case, and therefore I claim that the captain was not in any way responsible for the loss of those lives. However, some of the sailors with whom I conversed in the village asserted that the captain was not competent to manage the boat in a high sea, and they therefore objected to serve under him. In support of that, I have only to state some of the captain's own acts on a former occasion. A few days prior to this vessel going ashore, the Siberia was wrecked near the same point, and the crew were obliged to remain on the vessel nearly the whole of one day and one night. The next morning the captain tried to rescue the crew, and in doing so he asked one of the sailors to take the helm, and he would take the stroke oar. The sailor did so, and they succeeded in rescuing the crew from the wreck. Now, I think the conduct of the captain on that occasion fully justified the sailors in refusing to serve under him as captain. Now, I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine to the inefficient state in which I found the service at that point. The captain took me to his boat-house and showed me his boat, which he says is a very good one; but there is nothing else. They have no life preservers, no life jackets, no lines or mortars of any kind—in fact nothing but the boat. They are, therefore, left without anything to protect themselves in a heavy storm. I think that the service requires a good deal of replenishing; and in connection with this matter, I might call your attention to the fact, if there is any point on our inland waters where a permanent life-saving station is required, it is at this point. There were no less than five vessels wrecked there last fall, and eight valuable lives lost; and scarcely a fall passes without wrecks at this particular point. Therefore, if the hon. Minister could see his way to erect a permanent life-saving station there, it would be a great boon, not only to the sailors of our own country, but to American sailors. There is no doubt that those valuable lives were lost because the sailors did not know there was a life station there. Had there been a permanent life station there, they would have known it, and perhaps valuable lives would have been saved. I hope the hon. Minister will look into this matter, and see that the service is supplied in future.

Mr. McLELAN. I must thank the hon. gentleman for having stated publicly that the charge against the captain of having neglected his duty, and of having thereby allowed the lives of the crew of that vessel to be lost, is unfounded. I made enquiry into the matter at the time, and the fact is, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that the crew took to their boats before any one could have reached them, and the boat was immediately swamped. I am aware that the boat at that station does not possess all the improvements of the life-boats of the present day. I have, however, had two of the most approved life-boats made in Buffalo; and I have had specifications of those made, and they are now ready. I intend to have a number of life-boats of the most approved pattern in use manufactured as early as possible; and if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct, that that is the most exposed position in the west, we shall place one of the improved life-boats at that station.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S COMMISSION, &amp;c.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved for copies: 1st. Of the Commission appointing His Excellency the Governor General of Canada; 2nd. Of the oath and oaths required by law, and under what law to be taken, and taken before assuming the duties of his office; 3rd. Of such instructions accompanying the Commission of His Excellency, as may, under the rules and regulations of the Colonial Office, be communicated to this House. He said: I desire to bring before the House the Commission of the Governor General, because the Commission does not run as it ran formerly. Since 1875 and 1876, owing to different communications to the Colonial Office, it was understood that the future Commissions would be altered, and I understand that accordingly the Commission of the late Governor General, the Marquis of Lorne, was made in conformity with some suggestions that were then put before the Colonial Office by the present leader of the Opposition. I am anxious we should be made aware as to the tenor of the changes made in former Commissions. As to the second part of the motion, the oath required to be taken, I will not say much, because I may refer to it in the motion that follows this. The third part is to have such particular instructions as may be put on the Table of the House, according to the regulations of the Colonial Office, if any of such instructions may be put before the House. During my absence the hon. member for Montmagny made a motion similar to this second part. That motion has been granted, but it is only granted as to a part of this. What I desire to know is, under what particular law the oath taken by the Governor General is taken.

Mr. AMYOT. I think this motion should be granted. It is very important for every part of Confederation that we should understand exactly what is meant by the oath of the Governor General. If that oath has been faithfully reported by the press, a part of it declares as follows:—

"I do declare that no foreign prince, person, prelate, State or potentate, hath, or has a right, to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, preeminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm, and I make this declaration upon the true faith of a Christian; so Help me God."

This is a matter of fact. If, in the Province of Quebec, by our Statutes, by our laws, by treaties, Catholics recognize the Bishop of Rome as their ecclesiastical prelate, they are entitled to do so by law, and we should not take the Governor General by surprise and make him swear to such a statement. At the same time, I declare my highest respect for the Governor General, the most popular and respected and worthy representative of Her Majesty, but it is important there should be no possible misunderstanding upon such an important point. I know there is no bad will anywhere; everybody is disposed to recognize the rights of every member of the Confederation; everybody is disposed to recognize the force and value of treaties; but it is important, that in such a matter as this, we should not shrink from any responsibility.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to granting this motion. With respect to the oath, that is fixed by Imperial Statute, and of course we cannot, except by an Address to Her Majesty, ask Her Majesty to get an Imperial Act passed altering the tenor of the oath. As to the instructions, there can be no objection to bringing them down.

QUEBEC LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS' COMMISSIONS, &c.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved for copies: 1st. Of the Commission appointing the several Lieutenant-Governors of the Province of Quebec, to wit: Sir Narcisse Fortunat Belleau, René Edouard Caron, Luc Letellier de St. Just and His Honour Théodore Robitaille; 2nd. Of the oath and oaths required by law, and under what law to be taken, and taken by them before assuming the duties of such office respectively; 3rd. Of such instructions accompanying the respective Commissions, and such other instructions as may, from time to time, have been communicated to them respectively. He said: In relation to this, I do not suppose there will be any objections to giving copies of the Commissions to the several Lieutenant-Governors. The point which I think this Government may remedy, is felt to be, to a certain extent, rather difficult, and renders rather difficult the position of certain parties who do not belong to the Church of England, in taking the oath of the office of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. There have been, at any rate, four different oaths assigned in the Province of Quebec, or in the realm generally. First, there was the oath which is to be found in the Act of 1774, by which no person professing the Roman Catholic religion is required to take the oath of Elizabeth, but the following oath instead:—

"I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George, and Him will defend to the utmost of my power against all traitorous conspiracies and attempts whatsoever which shall be made against His person, Crown and dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known, to His Majesty, His heirs and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies and attempts, which I shall know to be against Him or any of them; and all this I do swear without any equivocation, mental evasion, or secret reservation, and renouncing all pardons and dispensations, from any power and person whomsoever, to the contrary, so Help me God."

That was the form of the oath to be taken in the Province of Québec, which replaced the "I, Elizabeth." In 1829, under the Emancipation Act, another form of oath was adopted to meet the views of the Roman Catholics at the time. I need not read it, because everybody knows it. Before that, in the interval between this Act of 1829 and the "I, Elizabeth," there was another formula prescribed by the 8 and 9 William III., chapter 3. That formula again contained an oath to the same effect, but different. Now, since that again, in 1858, the last formula was adopted by the Act 21 and 22 Victoria, chapter 48, and this is the oath that is now taken by the Governor General and by the Lieutenant-Governors. I do not see that the Governor General, in his present position, can have any objection whatever to taking this oath. Not belonging to the Roman Catholic faith, he cannot possibly object to it; but, in reading the oath as it is at the present time, for my part, I see the greatest difficulty in asserting what this oath asserts; first, as a matter of fact, and secondly, as a matter of opinion. In reading the last part of this oath attentively, it is a declaration of a fact which, I think, cannot be asserted here under the actual circumstances of the country. Nobody can deny that in this country, at the present moment, not only under the treaty but under the general tolerance, if there was no treaty at all, of all denominations, there is a recognition of the different denominations and different religions in this country. Therefore, upon this point alone, as a matter of fact, independently of any treaty stipulations, there is an authority somewhere, outside of the supremacy of the Crown of England, existing in this country, not only for the Roman Church, but for all other denominations also, which are not the Church of England. In reading the oath as it is, it may be properly worded otherwise. I would not make this motion if I did not feel that it is entirely within the competency of the Federal Government, if I did not feel that, in appointing the Lieutenant-Governor, this Government may make the formula of an oath which may be required under the circumstances, and which, in my opinion, ought to be nothing else than the one I cited in the first instance under the Quebec Act of 1774, or that to all intents and purposes. I do not know for what reason this old formula has not been adopted, especially for the Province of Quebec, which I understand is the only Province in which there are Roman Catholic Lieutenant-Governors.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). Manitoba.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I know there was D. A. Macdonald, in the Province of Ontario.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Cauchon.

Mr. BOWELL. Sir Edward Kenny.

Mr. CASGRAIN. At any rate, I speak more particularly for the Province of Quebec, as hon. members understand. I will read the last part of the present oath.

"I do declare that no foreign prince, person, prelate, State or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, preeminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm; and I make this declaration upon the true faith of a Christian."

I contend that the formula, as it stands to-day, in my interpretation of it as a lawyer, would go so far as to say that, as a matter of fact, there is no recognition whatever of any authority, preeminence or power whatsoever exercised, say for instance, by the Bishop of Quebec, from which place I hail. As a matter of fact, as I see with my own eyes, I do not see the possibility of asserting what is contained in this oath. The oath goes on and gives a matter of opinion, and says, "or ought to have any jurisdiction."

An hon. MEMBER. That is so.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is a matter of opinion. Everybody may have a very distinct opinion of what such a person ought to have or ought not to have. There is a great conflict of opinion to day all over the world on this subject. It is a mere matter of opinion. It is not a form of oath which is simple and clear, which sets the thing plainly and clearly. Under the Supremacy Act, it was plain and clear. You could take that oath or you could not take it. But this oath is intended to be given as a relief. Under the circumstances in which the Province of Quebec is situated, I do not think it is a relief at all, and I think this oath may be so amended as to meet all the requirements of the position of the present Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec for instance, in taking the oath. I submit this because I know we can settle any difficulty that may exist in that formula. As to the oath taken by the Governor General, I know it must be done by reference to Great Britain, and by some entente with the Home Government; but this particular oath, I think, is under our control, and, I think we may safely adopt a certain formula which would meet the requirements of existing circumstances. I need not even go further than this: the wording of the Statute would go against our own legislation, the recognition of the status of the Roman clergy. They have a position of precedence here to a certain extent. They are recognized by law. They are a corporation also recognized by Statute, so that they exercise, not only the spiritual powers, but in certain cases in the Province of Quebec, they exercise to a certain extent judicial powers and temporal powers, as regards the construction, for instance, of their churches. They can order their churches to be made, or to be placed at a certain locality. They exercise there a judicial power which is granted and recognized by law, which is granted them by Statute. That, therefore, would be another reason why the wording of that oath is so general that certainly it must be with the greatest difficulty that it can be taken at the present moment by Roman Catholics in the Province of Quebec. As to the third part of the motion, it will also be desirable to have any instructions which may have accompanied the respective Commissions. It is also proper to know whether, when they leave the limits of the several Provinces assigned to the different Lieutenant-Governors, they are obliged to have these instructions from the Federal Government, as the Governors General receive when they leave the limits of the Dominion of Canada. I think, if I am not mistaken, they require to have formal authorization in order to be able to leave the limits of their respective Provinces. I suppose that also forms part of the instructions. It is not contained in the general law. I hope this motion will be carried, and when the papers are brought before the House we may move in another direction.

Mr. VALIN. Does the hon. gentleman intend to find any fault with any of the votes given by the Lieutenant-Governors? Perhaps the hon. gentleman for l'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) desires to find some error in the nomination of the Governors. I think there was an error committed at one time, and the hon. member ought to have made his motion then.

Mr. HESSON. In view of the circumstances this evening, I think my hon. friend ought to apologize for having wasted, to some extent, the time of the House in this matter, in detaining you, Mr. Speaker, and so many other hon. gentlemen here. I deem this one the least important of all the motions that have been made. If my recollection serves me at all, we have had the services of some very able Governors General and Lieutenant-Governors, during the past, in this country. All discharged their duties with equal conscientiousness and fidelity to the Crown, and they have all found it possible to take that oath. But, Sir, as it is just possible that the country may lose the services of the hon. gentleman when it is his turn to be appointed Lieutenant-Governor, because he cannot take that oath, because he may find it too severe for him to take, it might be worth while to have it changed in order to suit his convenience.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, there can be no objection to sending down copies of the Commissions to the several Lieutenant-Governors. They are all of similar tenor, I presume. Then, as regards the oath required by law. As my hon. friend has just said, the oath as now administered has not been found very difficult in the Province of Quebec, because all the Lieutenant-Governors since Confederation have been very good Catholics, and they have found no difficulty in taking the oath. Still, if there is any real, or any semblance of an objection, I do not see why it should not be removed. I presume the oath has been framed for Lieutenant-Governors since Confederation on the models of the oaths taken by Governors before Confederation. The practice, I presume, has not been changed. Speaking now from first impression, and without looking into the matter at all, I do not see why the oath may not be simply for the performance of duty, and an oath of allegiance—an oath stating that the party will perform the duty of his office during his incumbency, and the usual oath of allegiance. That is my present impression. There is just this thing that occurs to me. The Governor-General is pledged to take the oath as representative of the Sovereign; Lieutenant-Governors are supposed to be representatives immediately of the Governor General, and immediately of the Sovereign, and it might be held by some legal minds that the same necessity which governs the oath of the Governor General might govern the oath of the Lieutenant-Governor. That is a question that might arise; that is to be looked into. But I scarcely think that it ought to prevail if it were thought of any importance to make it a simple oath for the performance of duty and an oath of allegiance. I know that not very long ago it was felt in some quarters that the oath ought not to be asked from Roman Catholics. I know that was held in some influential quarters, and of course, that feeling ought to be consulted. The Minister of Justice and myself will take the opportunity of considering the subject, and of seeing whether that objection—if it be an objection, and I think it is, to some extent, an objection—could be removed. We will take occasion to look into it.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Statement of dates at which:—

1. West	$\frac{1}{2}$	Section 31,	Township 5,	Range 14 West, were purchased, and the names of the purchasers and the price of each section at the time of purchase.—(Mr. Livingstone.)

Statement of the rebates made in respect of parcels (1) and of parcels (2), with copies of all correspondence on the subject of the sales, purchase money and rebates, and statement of the reasons why rebates were granted in some cases, and refused in others.—(Mr. Livingstone.)

Copy of a memorial to His Excellency in Council, signed by Frank Moberly and W. A. McCallum, on behalf of the inhabitants of Neebing, praying for relief with reference to their bonuses to the Prince Arthur's Landing and Kaministiquia Railway Company.—(Mr. Blake.)

Copies of all accounts and vouchers, including transport requisitions, rendered by the Canadian Express Company to the Department of Militia and Defence, for transport during the months of May, June, July, August and September, of 1883.—(Mr. Somerville, Brant.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10:03 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 26th February, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT FOR ASHWEDNESDAY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that when this House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next at three o'clock, in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

BOTHWELL CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada a certified copy of the judgment of the said Court in the election appeal, relating to the electoral district of Bothwell, in which appeal John Joseph Hawkins, Esq., was appellant, and William Thomas Smith and Robert Perry Wright were respondents, by which judgment the Hon. David Mills is declared to be the duly elected member to represent the said electoral district.

AGRICULTURAL BANKING BILL.

Mr. ORTON introduced Bill (No. 105) to provide banking and loaning facilities for those engaged in agricultural pursuits.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to enquire, Mr. Speaker, whether this is in order; whether this should be introduced by Bill, or should not be initiated in Committee?

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, I cannot tell what the nature of the Bill is, but, if it relates to banks and trade, it will have to originate in Committee, but the hon. member, in introducing his Bill in this way, takes his risk that it may be stopped at a subsequent stage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the Bill is to incorporate a bank, it need not be introduced in Committee, but, if it is a general Bill, affecting trade and commerce, of course it must be.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not a Bill to incorporate a bank, for the hon. gentleman introduced it as a public Bill. I am not objecting to his procedure, but I only suggest that he may find himself at a subsequent stage in a position where he will not be able to get on at all, and, therefore, he should consider at this stage whether the Bill, which none of us has seen, is not one which must originate in Committee of the Whole.

Bill read the first time.

FACTORIES BILL.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 106) to define certain offences against persons employed in factories.

Mr. BLAKE. The introduction of this Bill has been delayed for a long time. It was announced that it was to be the Bill, as I understood, which was brought forward last Session, with certain amendments which were printed and distributed to members before the close of the Session. I do not know whether this Bill, as now introduced, is in the condition of the Bill we received at a late stage of last Session, or whether further amendments have been introduced. If the latter is the case, the hon. gentleman might briefly explain what those amendments are. Furthermore, I have called attention, by motion, in the ordinary way, to the existence of some representations on the subject of the Bill which have not been brought down, and I observe, by the ordinary sources of information, that further representations have since been made upon the subject. I think it is expedient that these should be brought down early, so that we may see what those on both sides, whether manufacturers or employés, think in reference to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Bill was delayed for two reasons. First, we understood that representations were to be made to the Government by the body referred to by the hon. member. Those representations were made and the Government took them into consideration before deciding upon the Bill finally. Then the Bill was delayed until the papers could be brought down. The papers have been laid before the House, or will be to-day, and they included the suggestions made by this organization. There is very little change in the Bill. I think the only change is one reducing the hours, for which children of 12 or 14 years of age can be employed in a week.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LOAN BILL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that all the stages of the Bill founded on the Resolutions moved by Sir Charles Tupper respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway shall have precedence every day, after Routine Proceedings, until the House otherwise orders.

Mr. BLAKE. We are now arrived at the second stage of the proceedings of the hon. gentleman's proposed legislation on this subject. I have, until we are all wearied of it, reiterated demands for information which have not been complied with, and now it is proposed to press this measure on from day to day without supplying this information, or allowing the time, when it is supplied, which I believe to be essential to a sound decision. It is proposed to-day to proceed even more rigorously than by the hon. gentleman's former Resolution, for we are now not even to have an opportunity of making enquiries, of asking questions on those points with reference to which we would much prefer to have information otherwise. Even that opportunity is to be taken from us, and the Bill is to be pressed on without any further information. I do not doubt that the hon. gentleman will be sustained, but I desire to take the sense of the House upon this motion, and I therefore call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Motion agreed to on the following division:—

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to know if the right hon. gentleman has any explanations to give with reference to the resignation and withdrawal of the resignation of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have twice answered that, and I do not intend to answer it again.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has not answered it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have.

Mr. BLAKE. He answered me yesterday by giving certain dates, which he calls particulars, in reference to this matter. On a former occasion the hon. gentleman volunteered some statement with reference to it, but he made no explanation of the causes of the resignation of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. He did not state what the cause of that resignation was, nor did he state the circumstances under which that cause, whatever it was, had been removed. The hon. gentleman has given us no information on both those points, which are, however, of great public interest. Therefore, I cannot agree with the statement that he has answered the usual demand in a manner that the circumstances require.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman and I cannot agree upon that point. I do not know whether he heard my answer the other night—my statement. I took occasion to state—although I said I would not answer it again, I will repeat what I said—I stated that my hon. friend and colleague had tendered his resignation for matters personal to himself, but matters not affecting the general policy of the Government, and which had not the most remote connection with the measure in the hands of my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways; that I refused to present the resignation to His Excellency for his acceptance; that my hon. friend withdrew his resignation for reasons which I have given, and which are of no interest to anybody in the world, and can have no political significance, and can be of no constitutional significance. My hon. friend withdrew his resignation. I was very glad of it, and I hope he may long remain my colleague.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman still refuses to give us the reason of the resignation. He said, on a former occasion, that there had been an explanation between him and the hon. gentleman, and after that explanation it was that the withdrawal took place. The hon. gentleman says that the resignation had nothing whatever to do, either with the general policy of the Government or with the particular question, which was then, and has been before this House ever since the Session commenced. It was, however, some matter or other in respect of which an explanation of the First Minister was essential to remove the difficulty, whatever it was, and it was consequent upon that explanation of the First Minister that the hon. gentleman withdrew his resignation, and remained a member of the Government. We are to have no explanation therefore, of the conduct of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman left his office, left his seat here, was ostentatiously, or otherwise, in the back benches conducting his correspondence, carrying on his business, just under the clock. A critical moment arrived in the discussions which had been engaging our attention, and the hon. gentleman announced his intention to speak before the division upon the question that was then before us—the division upon the motion to go into Committee. The First Minister begged him to postpone his remarks until concurrence. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue—at that time, I presume, only holding office until his successor was appointed, and more properly to be called the member for Victoria (N. B.)—declined; he declined to comply with the request of the First Minister; he declared his desire not to speak at that moment for personal reasons, that he was not in a fit condition to speak; but he declared that, if necessary, he would speak, and upon that the First Minister, who had declared that he would take the division that night, yielded to his late colleague—as he was at that time—he yielded to the hon. gentleman whose position was so ambiguous, who insisted that this was a very important question upon which his sentiments must be delivered before that vote was taken—I say he yielded to his request, and the debate was adjourned upon the motion of the hon. member. On the following day the hon. member intimated once again that he would not make his speech on account of the state of his voice; he felt that he could not deliver his sentiments with justice to himself in the condition of his voice at that time, and, therefore, he wished that these remarks which were to be delivered before the House came to its decision on the motion to go into Committee, should be postponed until concurrence. Well, concurrence came, and the hon. gentleman was silent. It is true, he spoke in a way which the Minister of Railways does not speak—he spoke by his vote, but by his voice he spake not, and he spoke by his vote in a manner which certainly we had no reason to expect, after the statement of the hon. gentleman that he must speak before this question was disposed of, as it was a very important question and was being pressed too fast. As the right hon. gentleman will not tell us what the cause of the resignation was we are left to conjecture.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LOAN BILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 101) to amend the Act intituled: An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAKE. It is by no means my intention—

Mr. MITCHELL. Carried.

Mr. BLAKE. I know how eager my hon. friend from Northumberland is that this measure should be carried, but I hope he will permit me to intercept its passage for a few moments. It is not my intention to enter into many of the points of the long discussions which have engaged our attention; but there are a few points which, notwithstanding the very imperfect state of the information before us, it may be convenient should be noticed and restated in the light of the information which we have to-day. In the first place I observe that this measure of the hon. gentleman contradicts very largely his statement that it was not proposed in any respect whatever to alter the contract of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. In contradiction of that statement the 11th clause reads thus :

"So much of the act and contract hereinabove cited and referred to as is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act is hereby repealed."

This, is indeed, rather an awkward phrase—to talk of repealing a contract—and I suppose the hon. gentleman is under the impression that the contract was made the law of the land by a former Act of Parliament, and, therefore, he uses this phrase of repealing the contract. But the clause is either useless and unnecessary so far as the contract is concerned, or it contradicts his argument; because, either the contract is altered or it is not. If it is not altered, it is unnecessary to declare that any part of it is repealed or altered; if it is altered, the hon. gentleman's arguments that he was not altering the contract falls to the ground. Now, Sir, with that criticism only upon the Bill before us at this stage—because I quite recognize the propriety of dealing with the details of this Bill at a later stage—I proceed simply to state my view of some of the figures which have been gathered in the course of the discussion, and in the briefest manner to indicate their pertinence upon what, I think, ought to be the decision of the House. I want, then, to restate my view of the cost of construction of the contracted line, in the light of the figures which the hon. gentleman from time to time has given us. I divide the contracted line into three sections, which seem to me to be most convenient for the understanding of that point. On the section from Callander to Port Arthur, there has been spent, according to the first statement of the hon. Minister, $5,550,000; on work done but not yet paid for on that part, $3,000,000, making a total of work done of $8,550,000; and the hon. gentleman's estimate to complete it is $13,250,000; making a total of the cost from Callander to Port Arthur of $21,800,000. From Winnipeg to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, his estimate to complete it is $17,500,000; and from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to Kamloops, the hon. gentleman estimates the cost to complete, at $12,000,000, while the manager of the Railway Company has estimated it at $10,100,000. These three sets of figures give us a total of the cost of the contracted line, $51,300,000, according to the Minister of Railways, and $50,000,000, according to the manager of the road. For constructing this work, costing this $50,000,000 or $51,000,000, the Company is to receive Government subsidy, $25,000,000; Government sections, $28,000,000; Government lands, town sites, and bonuses already received in cash, $9,000,000, or a total of $62,000,000. The value of the 21,250,000 acres of choice land yet unsold at $2.36 per acre, the price already received for that sold, is $51,300,000, and the cost of the Government surveys, &c., which fall into the work as I have always contended, $5,000,000, making a total of $118,300,000, or an excess, I do not say in value, but an excess in cost, of $67,000,000 or $68,000,000 beyond the expenditure which is to be made by the Company itself. To that it is now proposed to add as a further benefit to the Company a guarantee of which the present value is $7,400,000 and a loan of $22,500,000. These statements indicate in the clearest way in which it is possible to deduce a proposition that the loan is not needed for the contracted work, and that either incapacity or outside operations or both, have proved the trouble which has necessitated this application. They indicate something more. The cash assets received from the public, and to be received, are $25,000,000 of subsidy, $9,000,000 of lands, and $22,500,000 of a loan, making $56,500,000 received and to be received from public resources, exclusive of what may be obtained from future land sales. The Government, therefore, is to provide every shilling to construct the contracted line, because I have shown that the contracted line has cost $50,000,000 or $51,000,000, while I have shown that the Government cash and proceeds of land already received amount to $56,500,000, so that there is an excess of $5,000,000 odd or $6,000,000 odd, according as you take the estimate of the manager of the railway or the Government estimate of the cost of the completed work, which excess is equal to the equipment for the contracted line. Under these calculations we obtain this result: that the cash received and to be received, exclusive of future land sales, is enough to build the whole contracted line and hand it over, properly equipped, into the hands of the Company, besides 21,000,000 acres of land and Government work to the value of $28,000,000, independent of surveys. That result would be a very extraordinary one if it stood alone; but we could measure it, if that was all, what the public loss was to be. There is, however, an additional difficulty, for besides providing the whole funds to complete and equip the contracted line, and besides providing as much more, or more than as much more, in assets as a free gift, a great capital stock has been created, a great capital stock mostly water, and thus charges have been created in favour of individuals on that road, the whole cost of which is provided and more than provided by the public money. So that besides building the railway and giving those handsome bonuses, we have arranged by the powers we have given and the application of those powers for a mortgage on the North-West and the Dominion of Canada in favour of the Company in respect of this inflated capital stock in the future. What does that mean? If I rightly read the statement of the Company in one of their organs, the other day, they state that they expect the production of wheat in the North-West to be 27 bushels to the acre. Five cents a bushel on the charge upon the carriage of that grain in excess of what a fair rate would be, in excess of a fair cost of transport and a fair profit, when you remember that the capital is provided by the public, and not by the Company—I say, 5 cents per bushel excess would be equivalent to $1.35 per acre rent. But that is not all. Because it is not only on the outgoing wheat that the extra rate is to be charged, but on the incoming goods which are to be purchased by the wheat of the farmers, and those goods are higher in point of value, and higher rates proportionately are well known to be exacted by railway companies on such goods. So that practically the rent charge upon the wheat land of the farmer in the North-West, assuming an extra charge of 5 cents per bushel being required in order to meet the system of financing and construction adopted, instead of being only $1.35 per acre, will be more than double that rate, being in fact from $3 to $3.50 per acre. The practical result then is, that the road is built by the public and is to be charged for as if constructed at a very expensive rate by a private company. But so far I have assumed the figures of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I want to point out that the expenditure itself appears to be very much inflated; and here I come to considerations in respect of which, as I have repeatedly pointed out, further information is necessary in order that we may reach an absolute conclusion. That further information is so essential with respect to the eastern section, that I do not intend to complicate the discussion at this stage with arguments in the absence of that information. But the central and western sections are, for certain reasons, in a somewhat different position, and I wish to restate certain figures and my conclusions from those figures with respect to those sections. The hon. gentleman has given the House as the expenditure to complete the central and western sections, from Winnipeg to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, $17,500,000. How is that divided? I have asked for the information, by motion, by private enquiry, by question, and I have asked across the floor, but I have been unable, so far, to obtain a statement as to how it is divided, and therefore, to some extent I have to deal in conjecture. What shall be the basis of my conjecture? I wish to reach a conclusion, as to how that amount of $17,500,000 is divided between those two sections; first, 615 miles from Winnipeg to a point 45 miles east of the Saskatchewan, where the construction company's contract commenced; and second, the line from that point to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, which is as far as the construction company's contract extended. My information is derived from the return of the railway company as to the expenditures on the construction company's contract, which gives three different items specifically: the western section, exceeding $2,500,000, and two general items, one, materials and supplies, $1,790,000, and another, transportation, $1,380,000, making an aggregate, for the general items, of $3,170,000, as to which we have no information as to how much applies to the western, and how much to the Lake Superior and Nipissing, or eastern division. I conjecture that by far the larger portion of the transportation charges applies to the western division; I conjecture that by far the larger portion of materials and supplies, by all odds, if not the whole of them, applies to the eastern section; and I assume, in the absence of that information for which I have called so often, and which has been, up to this time, denied, that out of the aggregate of $3,170,000 no less than $2,500,000 is to be applied to the western section. Add that to the $2,500,000 specifically applied, according to the Company's return, and you get as the true cost of the line from the point 45 miles east of the Saskatchewan to the summit of the Rockies, $5,000,000 for 345 miles of railway. If you deduct that sum of $5,000,000 from the total of $17,500,000, you will find $12,500,000 as the cost of 615 miles running west from Winnipeg. Now, Sir, we have two elements, one positive, and the other, to some extent, conjectural, from which we may draw some inferences as to what the fair cost of the prairie section would be. The first, as I said, is positive. The hon. gentleman has given as the cost of 169 miles of branches in the North-West, $1,830,000, or $10,700 a mile for branches constructed by this company in the prairie section. Upon the assumption which I have made as to the cost of the 345 miles to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, that portion would cost only $14,500 a mile. Now, this latter section is an expensive section. It is a section which embraces the heavy bridge over the Saskatchewan River, which the newspapers tell us will cost about $500,000. It embraces some heavy rock work—some pretty heavy mountain work. This section also embraces by far the largest and most expensive part of the transportation charges; there is the geographical position, the stuff has to be carried further, and, therefore, it is a very expensive section in this sense. Yet we cannot find, under our present dearth of information, ground for believing that it costs more than $14,500 per mile. Now, if the branches in the prairie cost $10,700 per mile, and if the heavier and more expensive work on the 345 miles from the Rockies to the Summit, cost $14,500 per mile, what shall we say is a fair charge for the 615 miles from Winnipeg to the point already indicated? I suppose about $12,000 per mile would be deemed, under such circumstances, a fair charge for the intermediate part. Now that would give for the 615 miles $7,380,000; but, so far as we can learn in the present defective state of the information, it has cost $12,500,000; or $20,300 per mile—an excess of $3,300 per mile, or an excess of $5,120,000 over what I assumed to be a fair aggregate price. If you say $14,000 per mile, there would still be an excess of $4,000,000 on that central section. Now, Sir, these or similar figures have, from time to time, been given on this side of the House, in the course of this debate, and hon.

gentlemen opposite have been challenged to give us the information which would correct our error, if there be an error, to point out to us where we were wrong, and to show what the facts were, and if the facts be such, or substantially such, as I have stated, to give the explanations which those facts imperatively demand. But we have had no contradiction, no explanation, no information, no argument, upon this point. What inferences are we to draw from the absence of this information; from the fact that the contracts are refused to us, from the fact that we cannot get the contracts for the construction of this part of the work; that we are told that they are only contracts for part of the work, that Langdon, Sheppard & Co. contracted only for sub-grading, that they did not contract to buy steel rails and put them on, and, therefore, that we are not to hear what they were paid. We get the contract of Langdon, Sheppard & Co., with the construction company, but we do not get the earlier contracts on the central section. Now, Sir, what inferences are we to draw when these facts are brought before the House for many days, and remain up to this moment unchallenged; when we point out that to a considerable extent we are acting upon inference and conjecture; when we point out how that inference and conjecture may be displaced if erroneous; when we show that it is the easiest thing in the world to get us full information on these subjects? What inferences are we to draw from the pressure to have this Bill read and to get it through all its stages under these circumstances? Why we must draw this inference and this only: that work has been done, and transactions accomplished with reference to the construction of this road, which will not bear investigation; that there has either been over expenditure of an enormous character—incomprehensible, unless speed at all cost was the object, or that the Company has been, by its contractors or others, defrauded in some monstrous way. One thing or the other, or both combined, would be alone adequate to produce the results we have indicated, if those results stand. And what I complain of is, that the results are allowed to stand, that the information, the explanation, the argument which would throw light on these subjects, in spite of all requests for information, is not forthcoming, and that we are left to these disagreeable inferences besides. Now, Sir, we are about to lend this Company $22,500,000 more money; we are to enlarge the sphere of their operations, to enable them to proceed with great activity, the hon. gentleman says, to enable them to proceed with great activity in the building of branch lines as well. I maintain that it is of the last consequence before we give those powers, that, now that we perceive that under the guise of a private company it is this corporation which is to administer the public funds, we should have a full, thorough and perfect account of the stewardship of that Company; and that if transactions which, it will be admitted I think by everybody, demand explanation, remain unexplained, we ought not, if we are to discharge our duty conscientiously, to go further and to give added power which may be abused as we are obliged to infer at this moment, and under these circumstances, the powers already granted have been abused. Now, Sir, I wish to take one other point, and to refer partially to the operations with the contracting company. I omit for the same reason which I gave before—namely, that the condition of the operations and the condition of the figures render a statement of the transactions as to the eastern section more complicated and confused, though I believe it is easy to draw extraordinary conclusions from that statement and from those figures, but I throw it to one side for a moment, and I deal exclusively with the western section. For the western section the price to be given to the construction company was $17,880,000 in cash, and $25,000,000 in stock of the Company. I have already indicated that the cost to the summit of the Rockies, as nearly as I can make out in the absence of information, was $5,000,000. The manager has publicly stated that the cost to complete would be $10,100,000, which would make the aggregate cost of that section, $15,100,000. The Government declares that it will cost $12,000,000 to complete, which would be an addition of $1,900,000, and would make the aggregate cost to complete $17,000,000. There is the statement as we have it. The Company says $15,100,000 is the cost from the 345 miles east of the Rockies to Kamloops, and the Government says $17,000,000 is the cost. Of course, in each case, the legitimate profits of the contractors are included. Now, Sir, you find, that according to the statement of the manager, the contracting company's contract gave $2,880,000 more cash than the fair cost of the section, and $25,000,000 of the stock of the Company thrown in—that, according to the Government statement, the contracting company's contract gave $980,000 more cash than the fair cost of the work, and $25,000,000 of stock thrown in also. It is quite clear, therefore, that this contract was not based upon commercial principles. It is just such a contract as would be made if both the parties to it were on the same side. If a man were contracting with himself, and some one else was to pay the piper, then such a contract would be made, but not otherwise; and this is just what was the condition of this case. It was the condition of this case that a Credit Mobilier had been formed—that a contracting company had been formed to the extent of more than four-fifths of the stockholders of the Company itself, and that the Company was contracting with itself to build this section, and to build it at a price and under circumstances wholly indefensible. Now, what was the object of absorbing into the western section $25,000,000 of the common stock, and into the eastern section $20,000,000 of the common stock, being all the stock that was to remain unissued—$45,000,000? The object was that the shareholders might obtain, without paying for it, a further large proportion of the capital stock which should form a mortgage on the North-West and the Dominion, to be paid off by the tolls on this railway later on. That was the object, and that has been the result; for a contract, made as this was, in which the stock was not rated at so much on the dollar, but in which the price paid was so much money and so much stock, would be treated for that purpose as if the stock was dollar for dollar, representing the cost of the road according to the tolls that would have to be paid upon it. The result on the western section of the line would be that the power of the Company to insist on the non-interference of Parliament and of the Government to diminish the tolls, would have arisen to the extent of $2,500,000 a year, irrespective of the $25,000,000 to be issued to the contracting company for this western section, without one dollar of valuable consideration having gone into the road, or having been paid for it by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. This may not be so. It may be that this contract was a wholly reasonable one, that it represents the real value of the work; but if it be so, what are we to say of the estimates of the manager of the Company and of the engineer of the Government as to the real cost of the work? I have been simply contrasting the contract of the contracting company with the estimates of the Government, those estimates are either right or wrong. If right, the results which I have indicated follow; if wrong, where are we to-day with reference to our loan of $22,500,000, and with reference to the calculations that have been made as to the repayment of that money? But, Sir, that was not all. It was said by the Company in their explanations, that they themselves carried on those works which the contracting company agreed to carry on—that they did the work through their own manager, and made the arrangements through sub-contractors, and paid the value of the work—that that was a temporary arrangement made with the contracting company under which the work proceeded; and thus it happened that they paid for the supplies and for the work done directly to those who were doing the work. But if this was so, how does it happen that $500,000 is paid directly to the contracting company, which turns out to be still in the contracting company's hands, and which is now spoken of as an asset of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—a debt due to it from the contracting company? The contracting company, it is said, did nothing—did not let the contracts and did not do the work; but the Canadian Pacific Railway Company supervised it through their own officers, and paid for it directly; but $600,000, for some purpose unstated, at some time ungiven, on some conditions unknown, was handed over to this contracting company, and remains in their hands. Now, when we remember that more than four-fifths of that contracting company are the Canadian Pacific Railway Company themselves, you will see that these applicants to us for further assistance have, to the extent of $450,000 or $500,000 in this single transaction, taken the moneys of the Company and put them into their own pockets, and they claim indulgence and assistance from us, because they will not pay those moneys back to us. There is the situation. Now, I have asked for information about that—when, why, for what purpose and on what conditions $600,000 was paid to the contracting company, and for what reason it has not been repaid; and no information is vouchsafed. And yet we are told that we are to pass a Bill giving further large powers to this Company, which does not deign to give us information as to those matters which surely are of a character that deserve, nay, demand explanation. Well, Sir, one further bit of information has been elicited from the hon. gentleman's papers. We were told that it was in the interest of the Government that no longer should that unjust method of payment be continued which involved a fixed mileage payment, and that it was necessary to resort to sounder business principles, and to adjust the payment to the relative values of the different kinds of work done—otherwise the Government might be without the necessary funds to cause the Company to complete the heavy section. Well, we find where they have stopped, where they are blocked, where they are at. They are at the 95 mile section, the heavy section on the eastern part, which the manager of the Company estimates will cost $7,400,000 or about $78,000 a mile; and it is because they are there and they already anticipate and forestall the excess of payments on the lighter sections, that we are now called on to draw from the public resources a greater amount, in order that they may go on accordingly to the new and confessedly heavy section. Under these circumstances, I do not intend to enter into a vast number of other topics which have been discussed more or less fully, and in respect to which I believe our position remains as strong as it was on the first day. I do not want to complicate the discussion by reverting to them at present. Nor do I go into those minuter details on which at a subsequent stage I shall offer an observation or two and an amendment or two; but I have pointed out what I think are the reasons why this House, even now, should pause and decline to assent to the second reading of this Bill, because of the information we have, and because of the information we have not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a personal explanation in reference to some remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. When the question was put from the Chair as to whether the Bill should be read the second time, I assented, as it is a common practice for hon. gentlemen, as they may favour a Bill or object to it, to say "carried, carried," or "lost, lost." The hon. gentleman chose to select me out, and to use these words: "I know why the hon. member for Northumberland is so anxious to have the Bill passed —"

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. These are the very words the hon. gentleman used; I took them down at the time.

Mr. BLAKE. I certainly did not say that, for I have for a long time wondered very much why the hon. gentleman has been so anxious, and I never have been able to learn. What I said was that I knew very well that the hon. gentleman was anxious that the Bill should pass.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like very much if the hon. gentleman will state definitely what he meant. I, too, have wondered very much at the opposition of the hon. gentleman to this measure, and what motives have inspired him. It would be wrong for me to impute any motives to him; but if he will explain what he meant by that remark, I will thank him very much. If the hon. gentleman has any desire to attack my motives or the principles that inspired me in the course I have taken in reference to this Bill, I challenge him before this House to state them now.

Mr. BLAKE. I have already said that it has been a matter of great curiosity to me to know why the hon. gentleman was so anxious, and that being the case it is impossible I should say I knew his motives, for I do not, nor, as far as I know, does anybody else. I did say, when the hon. gentleman called out very loudly, "carried," as I was in the act of rising, without waiting to ascertain whether it was proposed to indicate from this side of the House any suggestion with reference to the measure proposed by the Government, without giving me the ordinary opportunity of rising to indicate what my course would be, the hon. gentleman cried, "carried," "carried"—I thought in that he did exhibit great anxiety that the Bill should be carried. I said that I saw and knew he was very anxious, but I thought he should give me a little opportunity of stating my views, and not allow himself to be carried away by his anxiety.

Mr. MITCHELL. I had no objection to the hon. gentleman stating his views. I desired to hear them, for I, too, had some anxiety to know, watching the course of the hon. gentleman in relation to this Bill, what were the motives that inspired him in relation to it. I must confess, when I took up the Debates the other day and saw the discussion that had arisen from the remark of the hon. member for King's as to the fact that Mr. Tyler, President of the Grand Trunk Railway, had stated—

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will not impute any motives.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not going to.

Mr. SPEAKER. You spoke of the motives.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said if I was allowed to impute motives, but I am not going to impute motives. I said if I had any desire to find out the cause which lay behind this antagonism, to a measure which the country desires, and which prompts this protracted opposition, this fighting it stage after stage, asking, even at this remote time after a discussion of three weeks, for further delay, and endeavouring to make capital out of these Resolutions by placing them on the Table of the House, and, for aught I know, when he goes to the country he will make them the subject of platform attacks and speeches against the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have no motive in anything I have done except a desire to serve my country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen opposite may greet this with derisive cheers, but I challenge any hon. member in this House, or anyone in the whole country, to state the contrary. I am not beholden to the Canadian Pacific Railway; I never was counsel to the Canadian Pacific Railway, as some other hon. gentlemen have been to the Grand Trunk Railway, and if I have supported this measure I have done so because the country requires the construction of that railway, because the men who have undertaken its construction are men who can claim from this country the credit of having undertaken an enterprise which few men of their high standing and their large means would have risked their standing and means in undertaking. I feel that the hon. gentleman unjustly assailed myself, who have said scarcely anything about this Bill—nothing except when the hon. member for the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon) chose, the other night, to propose a Resolution which was liable to mislead some of my fellow members from the Maritime Provinces in reference to the winter port, I felt called on to make a five minute speech. Does the hon. gentleman propose to muzzle me? Does he think that because of his great talents and assumption and perhaps that assurance for which he is rather celebrated, he can throw out a sneer against me and have it spread broadcast through the country? I challenge him and those who say derisively "hear, hear," to point out one statement that bears out the hon. gentleman's reflection on the motives which induced me to support this Bill. I challenge them to do so.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. gentleman has chosen, under the guise of not imputing motives, to impute them again, although it is extremely painful—

Mr. MITCHELL. Better learn manners yourself.

Mr. BLAKE—to me to say anything about personal matters, I will say that everybody knows, were I to pursue my profession, I could be earning to-day $20,000 to $25,000 a year, and I receive from it in consequence of my political duties the sum of $2,500.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was not my intention to trouble the House with any further remarks, as I felt it would be better to deal in Committee, with any observations and criticisms on the measure at present. I will, however, make a few remarks on some points which the hon. gentleman has raised in the observations he addressed to the House. He says that in the first instance I had stated there would be no alterations, and that it was not proposed to make any alterations in the original contract. Having explained very fully to the House, in the course of my remarks when introducing the Resolutions, the points in which the text of the Resolutions differed with the text of the contract, I think it is rather futile criticism for the hon. gentleman to indulge in, to draw the attention of the House to the fact, that of course there are modifications, not substantial, in the contract. The contract, however, in all its vital details, remains precisely as it was. The amount of work to be performed by the Company is the same; the amount of subsidy for the work performed is the same. There is no substantial alterations proposed to be made. The alterations are rather verbal than otherwise. The last point to which the hon. gentleman objected refers to one of these alterations, and that is as to the mode of payment. The hon. gentleman has not undertaken to say that the proposal contained in the Resolutions and the modifications of the contract as to the mode in which the payments are to be made—from being a mileage subsidy to being a subsidy according to the work performed and to the relation it bears to the whole contract—the hon. gentleman has not undertaken to say that this proposal is not a practicable and perfectly just method of applying the public money proposed to be put into the work as the work proceeds; and not having questioned that, it is not necessary for me to say further than to say that in the early part of the work, the payment according to mileage subsidy, was a convenient and practicable and accurate mode of adjusting the payment of the work done, whereas at the present stage of the work, it would not be found a practicable or just mode, as regards either the Government or the Company. I do not intend to say much about the hon. gentleman's demand for further information. All I can say is this, that the hon. gentleman has placed before the House a vast number of demands for information, and in every case I have stated to the officers of my Department that every particle of information the hon. gentleman has asked for and which it is in the power of the Government to lay on the Table of the House should be prepared and laid on the Table as promptly as possible. With reference to the information asked for which had relation to matters not in the possession of the Government, I have requested that these motions made by the hon. gentleman should be immediately communicated to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that they should be informed that it was my desire that as promptly as possible all the information asked for should be furnished. I will say more, that after a very long parliamentary experience, I have never, on any occasion, seen a larger amount of information laid before the House in regard to any question under consideration by the House. I have never, either in this House or any other Legislature, where I have had the honour of sitting, found in any single instance information more full, more exhaustive or more complete, than has been submitted on the present occasion. I am in the judgment of this House when I ask whether this House has not been furnished, not only with full information, but whether the hon. gentleman himself, with all his ability, is able to show a single point upon which he can say that, for a full, a fair and candid consideration and judgment of this question by the House, it is necessary to have one particle of information that is not before the House. I say there is not, Sir, and I say it boldly and unhesitatingly. I say that the hon. gentleman cannot show, I say that no hon. member of this House can show, can put his finger upon one particle of information that has been sought from the Government, that is necessary to the consideration of the question that is not now on the Table of the House, and in the possession of hon. members. It is impossible to comply with the marvellous ingenuity of the hon. gentleman in devising and framing motions for information. He asks you what is the cost of a certain section of the road, and very properly asks. He asks what money has been expended between Callander and Port Arthur; we give him the information. And then he wants to know how much of that particular money has been applied to some particular half mile of that 550 miles.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman has exactly come down to half a mile, but I give that as an illustration. He selects some small segment of a work which is in progress, of a work which is being constructed, and everyone who is at all acquainted with railway construction knows that it is impossible, from day to day, in a remote section of the country, to learn how much money has been expended upon five miles here or ten miles there. I say it has no bearing upon the question. Having given the hon. gentleman the information as to the amount of money expended between two given points, covering the entire works of the Company, and having given that section by section, dealing with the different sections as provided by Parliament, the hon. gentleman and every hon. gentleman in this House has all the information that is required in order to a careful consideration and a just decision in regard to the question. Then, the hon. gentleman, not satisfied with expenditures, asks me what are the estimates, what are the Government engineer's estimates of the cost of this work? and I tell him. I did not wait to be asked; I gave the Government engineer's estimate of the cost of this work. Then he asks how much of that estimate is to be applied to this section and how much to that section? and I give that to him. I give him the most exhaustive and the most complete information, not only of everything within the knowledge of the Government, but I give him the estimates, I give him the calculations, I place the figures in his hands; and yet he is not satisfied. He says: I find the manager of the road and the president of the road, in some statement addressed to the shareholders and to the general public, have differed in their opinion with your engineer as to the cost of the work. I cannot help that. I have no control over the statements which the president or the manager of the Company may make from day to day as to their estimate of the result here or the result there. I have furnished the hon. gentleman with the most accurate calculations of the Department, and I have drawn his attention to the fact that the calculations submitted by the Department and by the same engineer to the House three years ago, compared with the position in which the question stands to-day is the best evidence of the reliance to be placed on those calculations. I have seen calculations made by very high authority that differ with these results quite as largely as anything to which the hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to-day. I do not intend to do that which would be impossible, to follow the hon. gentleman through the maze of figures which he has thrown over this subject, I will not say for the purpose of mystifying it, but the hon. gentleman knows how impossible it is for any person, even one familiar with the subject, to take up a page of figures that are thrown down in this way hurriedly before the House. But the hon. gentleman makes a great point of the expenditure of $17,500,000 in this western section, and has great difficulty to find how it is possible that the $17,500,000 that we have stated to the House we have the evidence has been expended upon the main line from the Red River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains—he cannot understand how it is possible that such an extravagant estimate as that can be justified or maintained. Why, the hon. gentleman knows that he made an estimate, he knows that he took the high authority of my hon. predecessor, he knows that that hon. gentleman had made a most careful estimate, taking section by section, from the Red River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Not on that line.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He says not on that line, but I suppose he got the best line he could get, and, if we have been able, if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have been able, to get a better line, so much the better for the country. But, as I said before, the hon. gentleman, with all the aid—and invaluable aid it was—of my hon. predecessor, made a calculation covering this same distance from the Red River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains, and he gave the House the benefit of those calculations. What were they? Was it $17,500,000, which now he cannot understand it possible to have been expended there? Why, it was $42,000,000 for that same distance. There it stands, after all the attention my hon. predecessor had given to this question; and he had examined it closely and minutely. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that the road that has been constructed is not as good a road as he proposed to construct? He will not say so. He will not find a gentleman in this House, or in the country, who knows anything about railway construction, who will not admit that the road which has been constructed for $17,500,000 is infinitely superior to the road which he estimated to cost $42,000,000. I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to be in any great difficulty as to where this $17,500,000 has gone, as it has covered a work superior to anything contemplated by the hon. gentleman, superior to anything which it was contemplated in this House would be done. And more than that, that $17,500,000 embraces the most magnificent provision for shops, machine shops, engine houses, and everything that enters into the management of a great line of railway communication, in the city of Winnipeg. The hon.

gentleman wants to know why there is the discrepancy between the amount they spent on the branches, and that which they spent on the main line. There is a great discrepancy, but the one was the main line of railway and the other were branch lines of railway, which would not need the great expenditure provided for the main line, for bearing the whole of the great volume of traffic through this country. So you have not only the fact that the road did not require to be so expensively constructed, but you have the whole magnificent equipment—as everyone will know who looks at the figures, an enormous equipment—provided for this distance on the main line which is covered by the $17,500,000, while on the branches there is no equipment, there are neither shops nor engine houses, there is none of this enormous expenditure which has been made for the great central depot of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Winnipeg. The branches get all the benefit of it, but they are not charged with a dollar of it. It is charged to the trunk line which required it, which required this enormous and costly equipment. And all this station equipment which is required in connection with it is charged to the main line and not to the branches, though they get the benefit of it. So, whether you take it in connection with the work itself, or take the figures presented in connection with any estimates that have ever been made, you will find that, instead of the amount being so unreasonable as to excite the hon. gentleman's suspicion that the money has not been put in the road, that there is some dishonesty of the Company, in the statements they have made, the hon. gentleman ought to find, in his own estimate, a different declaration. Was the hon. gentleman making an exaggerated estimate at the time he was endeavouring to block this Government in going on with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway at all, at the time he was declaring that the Government was going to plunge the country into an enormous and unjustifiable expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway? Was he exaggerating purposely the cost of this road when he put it at $42,000,000? I will not do the hon. gentleman the discredit to believe that any such idea influenced him. I believe he made a fair and careful calculation, with the assistance of my hon. predecessor, of what the road would actually cost, and he stated frankly to the House the facts. Having done so, having put himself on record, having given it as a deliberate opinion, based on that of the former Minister of Public Works, who had examined this question for years, that that road from Red River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains could not be built for less than $42,000,000—I say it does not lie in the hon. gentleman's mouth to come down here to-day and to cavil over the expenditure of this sum for a better road than was contemplated, with magnificent equipment and rolling stock, machine shops, engine houses, and everything on a magnificent scale—to endeavour to raise an imputation in this House that there is something dishonest, because all this has been accomplished for $17,500,000, that he himself declared would cost this country, if we went on and did it ourselves, $42,000,000. Now, Sir, it will not be necessary for me, I think, to say any more on that point. The hon. gentleman says that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company contracted with itself in respect to this construction company. Well, Sir, he shifted his ground. What was his charge the first night that he spoke on this subject? Why, Sir, his charge was this, and there was a great deal in it: he complained that certain members of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had been making money out of the construction company—that was the charge of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. I had not the facts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well, I will admit that.

Mr. BLAKE. I stated it from the hon. gentleman's own statements.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will admit that the hon. gentleman had not the facts, and I will admit that if he believed, as he undoubtedly did believe, that certain members of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were making money out of the construction company, it was his duty to the House, and his duty to the country to bring such a fact forward for consideration, because it was a very important one. The result is that the hon. gentleman finds that he was entirely mistaken, finds that no such thing occurred, finds that this fear he had was totally unfounded, finds in fact that every dollar that was made in connection with the construction company was made for and on behalf of the humblest shareholder if he had only one dollar of stock in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The ground was cut from under the hon. gentleman's feet. But he is equal to the emergency. What he supposed was a great wrong to the Company appears altogether to be unfounded; the Company all share alike. But still he is not satisfied because the Company associated themselves with the construction company. Well, Sir, there is nothing very new in that. The hon. gentleman knows that this Company found that it required, independent and outside of all the money they could get from Government sources, a large sum of money to go on with this railway—if they went on with it promptly—and what did they do? Why, Sir, they did what is not unusual in such cases; they endeavoured to enlist, and they did enlist, as the hon. gentleman will see by looking at the shareholders, the associates of the whole Company; they associated with a number of leading influential firms, such as Morgan, Drexel & Co., and a number of other large financial establishments in the City of New York, by which a large outside influence was induced to come in and buy stock in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—a number of gentlemen who could not be induced to come into this enterprise by any other means, and in that way the Company was rendered stronger and their own capital rendered greater for the purpose of the construction of this railway. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman need not go into any minute calculations of the amount of stock and the amount of payment that that construction company were to receive, because he knows that it has been dissolved; he knows that they have not received a dollar of stock; he knows that when the time came that it was found necessary to get the stock guaranteed, the effect of which would be to give greater value to the stock of these outside parties that they were to receive as a construction company, than the stock would have borne independently of the guarantee furnished by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it then became necessary to dissolve that arrangement. In the settlement it appears that there was a certain amount—I believe an unsettled amount—that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company claim the construction company as such owes the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But that was nothing that ought to excite any suspicion in the mind of the hon. gentleman or of anybody else. The operation itself of uniting with the construction company to endeavour in that way to bring a greater amount of capital into the enterprise, and to widen the basis of the operation of the parties interested in the Canadian Pacific Railway, had in it nothing whatever calculated to excite any suspicion on the part of any person. It was a natural proceeding, it was a course usually pursued by great companies in connection with great enterprises, and the very fact that it had been dissolved shows that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is not to suffer, has lost nothing by the operation, and that no person in fact will suffer with relation to it, because these outside members of the construction company will not derive any profit from the guarantee given to stock to which they were not entitled, as the stock that it was proposed should be given to them had no guarantee. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman talks again about a mortgage on the North-West; again, Sir, he brings up this question of the sufferings of the North-West, and the mortgage on that country. I think, Sir, the hon. gentleman has had his answer. He has not had it from me; he has had it from the fact that notwithstanding that the party opposite, notwithstanding that the press representing hon. gentlemen opposite, have done all that lay in their power to foment a spirit of bitter discontent in the North-West; notwithstanding that the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite have been willing to discredit Canada if they could damage the success of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; notwithstanding that measures have been resorted to that I regard as the most utterly discreditable that ever can attach to any party in the world, notwithstanding all this, I say the very people themselves on behalf of whom they pretend to speak, disclaim and repudiate their utterances. I say that the Canadian who can justly be charged, in view of the position in which Canada stands to-day in relation to that great North-West, with endeavouring to foment discontent, with endeavouring to get extracts from newspapers to show that the country is in a state of revolt—that are calculated in fact to inspire that revolt, with falsely stating to the country and all over the world that the people were ripe for revolt in that great North-West—I say there is nothing that in my judgment ought so to damn the reputation of any public man, or of any part of the press of this country, as to be justly charged with a crime so heinous against the best interests of Canada itself. Sir, from the hour this Canadian Pacific Railway contract was laid on the Table, on every possible occasion, the hon. gentleman opposite has exhausted all his great powers for the purpose of exciting discontent and hostility against this Government in the minds of the people of the North-West. And yet, Sir, what is the result? Why, Sir, when the House comes to the consideration of this great measure that he is now opposing with all the bitterness, with all the hostility, and all the ability of which he is master, in struggling against the contract itself, the hon. gentleman gets his answer. And from where? Not from me; it would be a feeble answer I could give the hon. gentleman in comparison. He gets it in the fact that the measure has the solid and united support of the representatives of the North-West with the exception of one single man, who has to be dragged reluctantly to the front—one man alone out of all the representatives of the North-West, stands like a criminal in the box, trembling while he gives a reluctant support to the proposition of the hon. gentleman opposite—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a question of order. I think the Minister of Railways in designating any hon. gentleman on this side of the House as a criminal is out of order—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not.

Mr. CHARLTON—and I desire him to withdraw the words.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no such words to withdraw, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say. I should be very sorry to make such reference to any hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You did, all the same.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You said he is like a criminal in the box.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated that he stood trembling like a criminal in the box. I am in the judgment of Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

the House as to whether that was not a correct description.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is a great pity that such an allusion should have been made to an hon. gentleman. The speaker hardly said he was a criminal; still it is a pity the word criminal was used.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Nothing is further from my thoughts than to intimate criminality on the part of the hon. gentleman. I will say that without any hesitation. But, as I said before, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has received his answer on that point more fully and more conclusively than any answer I could give. I do not think it is necessary to prolong this discussion, a discussion which is not called for by the position in which the question stood. I propose to draw the attention of the House, when it resolves itself into Committee, to the points in which the Bill differs from the Resolutions which I had the honour to submit to the House. I may say that the leader of the Opposition has not thought it beneath him, on two or three occasions, to refer to the fact that I have not voted in relation to this question. I am in the judgment of the House when I say, if there is any hon. gentleman in this House who has the courage of his opinions, it is myself; no hon. gentleman whom I have ever met on the floor of the House will say that I have not the courage of my opinions, and hon. gentlemen will at a very early period, probably in the course of to-day or to-morrow, have an opportunity of ascertaining exactly what has prevented me from doing that which I regret most deeply. Not having had the opportunity of doing that which I shall be most proud to do, and which I trust before this Bill becomes law, I will have the opportunity of doing, backing, as I am accustomed to back, my opinions by my vote.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister of Railways has told the House that it is impossible to follow the vast amount of figures thrown at his head by the leader of the Opposition at very short notice. The leader of the Opposition has not given him many figures to consider, not many figures to explain to-day. I think it was quite within his power to note down the figures brought before him and give the information, if he was pleased to do so, with respect to the points which have been suggested. The hon. Minister claims that all the information necessary to a consideration of this case has been given to the House. Yet the hon. gentleman has not told us now, as he has not told us in the past, where the $600,000 overpaid to the construction company has gone. He has failed to give us the items as to the comparative cost of the different sections of the railway; and it is on this very point that the leader of the Opposition has pointed out to him that if the information that has been conveyed to the House is correct, it involves one of two things; either that there has been a grossly extravagant expenditure on the construction of the 615 miles of prairie section, or that the figures reported to this House as having been paid to the construction company are not and cannot be correct. With respect to the return giving the amounts paid to the construction company, I ask the Minister of Railways if he will say that the House is in a position rightly to understand that construction company; if it is in a position rightly to comprehend the state of affairs from the manner in which that report has been made to the House? Here you have the amounts given in bulk sum,—the cost for transportation charges, for labour furnished before the date of taking the contract, &c. These are not divided between the different sections, and hon. members are called upon to judge of this large financial transaction, involving the interests of the country and its well being, and are left to work out the figures in such manner as they may, without the slightest help being furnished by the Minister of Railways or information given that ought to be placed in its possession, before hon. members are asked to give a decision on this question. I again call the hon. Minister's attention to the statement which has been furnished to the House, and to the manner in which the amounts were paid to the construction company. The statement of account with the North American Railway Contracting Company is as follows:—

Cash Advances—Western Division.
Sundry small vouchers for supplies and labour.....	$ 127,340
Langdon, Shepard & Co.....	1,118,528
Jas. Ross, Manager.....	1,280,831
		$2,506,700
Nipissing Division.
Payment of labour and small supplies.....	$1,389,127	1,389,127
Lake Superior Division.
Payment of labour and small supplies.....	$2,014,608	2,014,608
		$5,910,436
Material and supplies furnished.....	$4,164,511
Less material and supplies, net.....	2,373,820	1,790,691
Labour furnished before date of construction contract.....	$78,482	78,482
Transportation Charges.
Amounts paid out for back charges on freight.....	$ 103,315
Canadian Pacific Railway Company's charges .....	1,274,970
		$1,378,286
Cash advanced.....		600,000
		$9,758,096
Value of work done estimated at actual cost.....		9,158,096
Balance due.....		$600,000

The amounts, I repeat, are not divided. We are not in a position to say how much of the transportation charges is to be added to the western and how much to the eastern section, and it is absolutely necessary in order to make a definite calculation we should have that information. But as we are not in that position, I made a calculation which I submitted to the House the other night, and which I think is very much in the same line as that which the leader of the Opposition has given to-day, and I again submit that further information should be laid before the House before the Bill is read the second time. We have the total cost of the western section placed at $2,506,700; but, as I said before, we do not know what proportion of the other items should be added. In order to be sure, I add all materials and supplies to the amount of $1,790,891; then I add the labour furnished before the date of the construction contract, whether on the eastern or western division, and I add all the transportation charges, I do not care whether they belong to the eastern or western divisions; in order that there may be no loophole for the Minister, I add every dollar included in these items, except specific items and amounts expended on Nipissing and Lake Superior division. Adding these amounts, what is the result? The construction company obtained for building 345 miles of railway $5,754,359, or at the rate of $16,680 per mile. As the leader of the Opposition has said, the Minister of Railways has given the House the total cost of the western division as $17,529,175. Deduct the amount paid the construction company for the part of the work they executed, $5,754,590, and we find that 615 miles of line over the prairie cost $11,774,816, or $19,143 per mile. That was the cost of building the prairie road, while the construction of 345 miles, including the half million dollar bridge over the Saskatchewan, and the 100 miles of mountain work, cost little over $16,000 per mile. Will the hon. Minister tell us that, with these figures, which he has been challenged to take up, and place a different construction on them, there is not need for more information?

Either the figures given as the amounts paid to the construction company are incorrect, or the amount expended on the 615 miles of prairie road is a grossly extravagant one and needs explanation. Let us look at the matter from another point of view. What were the construction company to receive for constructing the western division? We have the contract. The leader of the Opposition has already told us what the contract was. They were to get $17,830,000 in cash, and they were to get $25,000,000 of the stock of the Company in addition. Now, let us take those figures and work them out. We have already ascertained that the amount paid the construction company, adding everything except the two specific amounts for the Nipissing and Lake Superior divisions, was $5,754,359. The general manager of the Company says they can construct the balance of the work remaining to be done, for $10,100,000, and therefore the whole cost, paid and to be paid, for the construction of the part as to which they entered into a contract with the construction company would be $15,854,359. To complete that portion of the road they gave the construction company $17,880,000 in cash, or $2,025,641 more in cash than the total amount paid for it, and necessary to be paid on it, in order to complete; and mark, that in addition to that amount they were to pay or hand over to them, $25,000,000 of the capital stock of the Company. And yet the Minister will sit in his place and say that we are in possession of all the information necessary to form a judgment upon this matter. He will sit there asking independent members, men who feel the responsibility resting upon them in entering into an engagement so large as this contract, an engagement so important as the one we are now about to make—he asks them to vote this enormous amount of money, and in the face of these figures, without attempting a refutation or an explanation of them, he contents himself with rising in his place in the House, and saying that he cannot carry these few figures in his head, that he has not time to jot them down, that he will not attempt to answer them, but that he is convinced that a more unpatriotic and disloyal lot of men than the men who would dare to question those figures, does not exist. Well, Sir, we need not talk sentiment upon a matter like this; it is not necessary that we should abuse one another in considering a large and important transaction of this kind. I venture to say that the Minister of Railways, and those who vote with him on this question, have no reason at all to find fault with the tenor of this debate, so far as it has been conducted from this side of the House. I do not think the Minister of Railways will charge hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that they have unduly pressed considerations which might be pressed in regard to this matter. We have been very careful during this discussion not to impute any motives, as has been done by the Minister of Railways himself, I am sorry to say—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

Mr. PATERSON—yes, yes—and I think it was due to the hon. gentleman, after he had done so, to have made a full retraction of what he said. It would have been more creditable on his part than it was to attempt to maintain a statement which was unparliamentary in its nature, and one which it was not creditable for him to make. The Minister knows that he should be in a position to give the information we require; he knows we are arguing from figures furnished by himself—not trumped up by ourselves, but his own figures, and we have worked these figures out, and we can arrive at no other conclusion than the one we have arrived at; and we say we will be obliged if he could show us that they point to any other conclusion. He does not do so; but he rises in his place and he is content with abusing us, with playing the part of a scold, with trying to evoke the party enthusiasm of hon. gentlemen behind him, by making remarks which are not creditable to him about an hon. gentleman on this side of the House. He says we have received his answer, and received it from a man who is infinitely his superior. Well, if that is his candid conviction with regard to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) I will not argue that point with him, but I say that if the hon. gentleman will take Hansard and read the speech of the hon. member for Lisgar, he will find that there is not a single argument in that speech in favour of granting this money, or for the early completion of the Lake Superior section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the interests of the North-West or of Manitoba. His whole argument is based in the idea that it is in the interests of eastern Canada; but so far as his own country is concerned, so far as Manitoba and the North-West are concerned, there is not a single argument in that whole speech which points in that direction. I challenge the hon. Minister to produce a single argument in that speech tending to show that the payment of this money is necessary in the interests of Manitoba and the North-West. And that is where the whole argument of the Minister of Railways lay. We were told that we must have the road completed in order that the North-West may be settled and the country developed. But what does the hon. member for Lisgar say? Port Arthur is the point which he lays stress upon. When he speaks of wheat being carried from Winnipeg to Montreal for 25 cents per bushel, how does he propose to do it? By rail north of Lake Superior? Not at all, but he says that the railway Company will build elevators at Port Arthur, that the wheat will be stored there during winter, and then sent down by the mixed water and land route to Montreal, and there is not a line in his speech which says that the completion of the road north of Lake Superior is at all necessary in that respect in the interests of Manitoba and the North-West. The Minister of Railways is welcome to any comfort he can draw from that speech in the shape of an argument that we should spend this money to settle the plains of the North-West, because the hon. member for Lisgar says if it is of value at all it is valuable for eastern Canada. Let me say to the Minister of Railways, as he endeavoured to throw contempt on one of the members of the Opposition, in language that was unbecoming to him as a gentleman, that the hon. member whom he attacked stands in this House, and in the country, as honourable a man, as bold and as brave a man, as any gentleman who dares to attack him in this House; and if he thinks, as his language implies, that the other members from that Province were seduced from their party allegiance because of personal or provincial advantage, I say that if there has been a member in this House who has been strong enough in his convictions as to right and wrong, to take a position rendering him liable to the taunts which the Minister threw out, acting from a sense of duty—for certainly no one has anything to gain in a pecuniary point of view for acting in opposition in such a case—if a man is found determined to do the right under such circumstances, I say it ill becomes any member of this House to rise and charge that man with having acted as if he were a criminal in the dock. We have had many votes upon this question, and sometimes it has been difficult, I have no doubt, for hon. members with provincial interests clashing, to rise and do their whole duty; but I say the character of the hon. gentleman, whom he has attacked, stands out as that of an honest and a brave man, and that such a charge may not be levelled against him—I say that if such a charge be leveled against that man, we, on this side of the House will rise and protest. I do not propose to go into this matter further. It is about to be considered in Committee, and we will try to elicit more information while it is before the Committee. There have been no speeches made here for the purpose of protracting this debate.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. There have been no speeches made, I repeat, for the mere purpose of prolonging the discussion, and I think I speak within the knowledge of hon. gentlemen opposite, when I say that when it was determined to close the discussion at a previous stage, it closed too soon for some hon. gentlemen opposite. Now we have asked the hon. gentleman for information which will enable us to determine the nature of this transaction. The Minister of Railways has had pointed out to him the particular points as to which, at this particular moment, we require information. The figures are before him where he can see them; and we should like to know whether that was the whole amount paid to the construction company for constructing that western part, and if it was, how it came that they built the road in the mountainous region, with a half-million dollar bridge in their work, at $16,000 per mile, while it cost over $19,000 per mile to construct the road on the prairie section on the figures the hon. Minister himself has given. I say that the figures which the leader of the Opposition has given, the points he has brought before the House, ought to have some explanation before this Bill is pressed to a second reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I desire, if my voice will sustain me, to say a very few words about the calculation which the hon. Minister of Railways has several times during this discussion brought against myself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not against.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, practically so. I am given as the authority used by the hon. member for West Durham, and I acknowledge to have been the authority; but the hon. gentleman must remember that the summit in the one case was a very different distance from Winnipeg from what the summit was in the other case. If he looks at the matter, he will find that the summit referred to in the previous calculation was at least 150 miles farther west. He must also know, if he knows the route taken, that after crossing the North Saskatchewan, the country is exceedingly rough nearly the whole way to the Yellow Head Pass, and that we would have had to ascend the slope south of the Pembina River, and traverse several branches of the McLeod River and the Athabasca River, so that the bridging would have been excessive on the whole of that line. He must also remember that the calculation embraced eastward, that country along which he took the line one time, after his abortive attempt to engage some company. The hon. gentleman will remember that the country was so rough that he gave up all idea of retaining the grades east of Selkirk, and attempted to make merely a colonization road instead of a traffic road. In the calculation I made, I endeavoured to sustain the entire grades, from end to end of the line, and it is one of the advantages of the line I selected, that in no part, from the Ottawa River to the Pacific Ocean, was there a single grade exceeding 52·80 feet to the mile. I know nothing of the road constructed through the prairie, but I have no doubt it is a uniformly excellent one. But whatever the quality of the road may be, the circumstances are wholly different, and the hon. gentleman cannot make any fair comparison between the cost as estimated by myself, on the other route, and the cost of the road constructed on the southern route. I am exceedingly sorry that I am utterly unable to manage my voice so as to give utterance to all that I desire to say on this subject; but I wish, at all events, to correct a misapprehension under which the hon. gentleman seems to have laboured on several occasions, as I consider it rather unfair to impugn the calculations I made, and to attempt to show that they are inconsistent with the facts of the case as stated by myself.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to say that the hon. gentleman opposite has, perhaps unintentionally, entirely misrepresented the nature of my speech, and the calculation to which he referred. In order to show what the calculation was, it is only necessary for me to read:

"The road from Fort William to Selkirk was estimated at $18,000,000; the Pembina Branch cost $1,500,000, and adding $100,000 for the Red River bridge, we reach a little over $25,000,000. From Selkirk to Edmonton, according to the old grades and style of construction, the hon. member for Lambton estimated at $17,650,000, which, added to the $25,000,000 makes a total of over $42,500,000 as the amount, including what has been spent for surveys, which it will have cost the country, irrespective of interest and construction, to reach the point which I suggest as the reasonable terminus for the prairie section of the road."

It was therefore a road from Fort William to Edmonton, including the Pembina branch, which was estimated to cost $42,500,000. I take this from my speech on page 1,440 of Hansard of 1880.

Fleming,

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I beg respectfully to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Sutherland) has not voted.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Bruce). The hon. member did not come into the House until the vote was being counted.

Bill read the second time.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before moving, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the Chair, I would like to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to a correction which the hon. the leader of the Opposition made, and for which I am obliged to him, because, of course, I am anxious that everything should be as accurate as possible. The hon. gentleman drew my attention to the fact, that the central section which he had estimated at $42,500,000 covered the whole distance from Port Arthur to Edmonton. The mistake arose from the fact that we have in the Bill and in the contract termed the central section that portion from the Red River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains; and it was in applying the term "central section" which appeared, at all events, in the hon. gentleman's calculation, to have embraced the distance from Port Arthur to Edmonton that led me into the inaccuracy, and I am glad the hon. gentleman called my attention to it, although I think my illustration is quite strong enough, even under the correction. The distance from Port Arthur to Selkirk is 407 miles, and the cost of that section is $14,705,000; deduct that from the distance that the hon. gentleman refers to and it will leave the distance between Red River and Edmonton, 811 miles, to cost $27,295,000. The hon. gentleman's estimate covers, he says, the distance from Port Arthur to Edmonton $42,500,000; deduct the cost of the line from Port Arthur to the Red River from it, and that leaves $27,295,000 for the 811 miles between Red River and Edmonton, the prairie section, or $33,656 per mile. That, I think, is a sufficiently strong contrast between the amount that is charged and stated in these papers to have been expended by the Company and to which the hon. gentleman takes such grave exception, and the amount estimated by him. Instead of this amount the hon. gentleman himself stated—I will take at his own estimate—the cost from Red River to Edmonton at $17,500,000.

Mr. BLAKE. I read from my speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You did; but take the $17,500,000 which the hon. gentleman read from his speech as his deliberate estimate of the cost from Red River to Edmonton 811 miles, and I want to know why the hon. gentleman should think the amount expended extravagant, when $17,592,175 is put down as the amount covering the cost of 964 miles. If the hon. gentleman was making a fair and legitimate estimate when he estimated, according to his own statement, 811 miles of the road to cost $17,500,000, surely he cannot complain if 964 miles, or 153 miles more than the hon. gentleman estimated for, and that running into the crest of the Rocky Mountains, embracing the heavier work, cost only the same amount as that which he estimated only for 153 miles less. I trust my hon. friend will see that it is not competent for him, under those circumstances, to complain. Now, let me draw the attention of the House to the fact that, according to the hon. gentleman, the estimate of $17,500,000, he estimates that road to cost $21,568 per mile. Take the distance from Winnipeg to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, 964 miles, which cost $17,529,175, according to the statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, instead of being $21,568 per mile, according to the hon. gentleman's least estimate for the prairie region, it is only $18,153 per mile actual expenditure, yet the hon. gentleman is driven to the conclusion that I am sure he would be very reluctant to arrive at, that there has been a dishonest statement made to the House by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say so, but I cannot see how the thing can be surrounded by suspicion, as I understood the hon. gentleman to insinuate, if the cost per mile of the road is over $3,000 a mile less than he himself estimated, and the road is admitted, by every person who has had any opportunity to judge, to be of the very best character. Then we have the actual expenditure of the Pembina branch. No one who knows the condition of these roads, will say that the Pembina branch is anything like so good a road as has been constructed from the Red River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains by the Canadian Pacific Railway, yet that road cost us $17,495 per mile; and that without any of this enormous expenditure in shops, engine houses and everything of that kind connected with the service at Winnipeg. The House will, therefore, see that whether you take the hon. gentleman's estimate for the cost of the Pembina branch, the figures of the amount stated to have been expended by the Canadian Pacific Railway are amply borne out, and the work performed 964 miles from the Red River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains executed for a sum no larger than the hon. gentleman estimated it would cost to complete the road from the Red River to Edmonton, a distance of 153 miles less. I do not think that it is necessary for me to say more in reference to that. But I wish, before sitting down, to express to the House the great regret at the way in which I found my reference to the hon. member for Marquette was received by the House. I wish to state in the most distinct terms—it is due to myself, to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, that I should say so—nothing was further from my mind than to cast the slightest imputation upon the character of the hon. member for Marquette, and I regret very much that in the heat of debate I should have used an illustration which led hon. gentlemen on that side to suppose, for a single moment, anything of the kind was in my mind. What I wished to convey and what, perhaps, I hardly had a right to convey, was my impression that the hon. gentleman had given a reluctant support to the leader of his party. That was all I intended to convey, and if the language I used was capable of any other construction, I wish to withdraw it in the most full and unqualified manner.

Mr. BLAKE. We have heard with great pleasure the hon. gentleman's last statement, and when we learn that the language which we heard the hon. gentleman use was simply intended to convey what was an entirely erroneous impression, that the vote of the hon. member for Marquette was reluctantly given, we shall know how to estimate other expressions of the hon. gentleman, of equally great strength, in the debates in future. The hon. gentleman and his followers have frequently charged me and my hon. friend with having made an estimate of $42,500,000 for the work from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains, and I waited, while the hon. gentleman's followers were indulging in these extravagances, to see whether it was going, on an ascending scale, to come from the lips of their leader in this question, the Minister of Railways; and in good time it came, and the hon. gentleman answered my argument with reference to estimates and expenditures of to-day by repeating, himself, the statement we have heard several times in this House this Session, that I had made an estimate, and my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) had made an estimate, of $42,500,000, as the cost of that which was now costing only $17,500,000, and I was told that was an adequate answer. If anybody will take the trouble to refer to the speech in which the figures which have been misquoted are contained, he will find that I stated that my hon. friend from East York, then representing the county of Lambton, had taken up the estimates of the engineers, Mr. Fleming and Mr. Smith, and had collated those estimates, had applied them to the country and to all the information he possessed, and had deduced from that, as their estimate of the cost of construction at the time that estimate was made, which was in the year preceding the year 1880—I think as long before as 1877 and 1878, and perhaps earlier—the figures which I gave. We all know that the circumstances as to railway building were very different then from what they are to-day. I gave those as the estimates of those engineers. They were not my figures—I have stated so repeatedly. They were not the figures of my hon. friend from East York in any other sense than this, that he declared them to be his view of what the engineers stated was the cost.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. And the hon. gentleman assents to that, and he assents to the view that that was the engineers' estimate of the cost at that time. That engineers' estimate of the cost at that time—for we have got it down to that, that here was an accurate statement of what the engineers, prior to that time, I think, in 1876, 1877, and 1878, had estimated for the cost of that work—the engineers' estimate I gave for the whole line, as deduced by my hon. friend from East York. The first point I took this afternoon, and the only point, was that the hon. gentleman's whole statement was founded upon a very gross blunder, upon an allegation that I had said that that portion of the line which had now been constructed for $17,500,000 would cost, according to these old estimates, $42,500,000. Well, the hon. gentleman took time to consider, and he had the recess to do it in, and I presume he has the speech before him here, because I had the Hansard for that year and sent it back to the library, and when I sent for it again I could not get it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Shall I send it back?

Mr. BLAKE. No, I have got one now, I am happy to say, from another quarter. With that before him and with plenty of time while he took his dinner to consider it, he now comes back and brings forward another statement, which could not be as inaccurate as his statement of the afternoon, but which is as inaccurate as it is possible to be under the circumstances, which is as inaccurate as it was left to him to be. What did he say? With my speech before him, convicted of having made a very gross misstatement of that speech, and having had two hours' time in which to consider the matter, he goes into figures, and says I have made an error in the statement of $17,500,000, and that the truesum, from my own statement, for this distance from the Red River to Edmonton, is $27,500,000, and he enters into figures to prove it. He says: "From Fort William to Selkirk you say cost so much; I deduct that from $42,500,000 and get $27,500,000, and therefore you ought to have put the $27,500,000 instead of the $42,500,000; you do not know your business; I correct you; I amend your $10,000,000, and I charge you with having really intended to say, four years ago, that this piece of the line cost $27,500,000." What are we to say, either of the hon. gentleman's fairness or of his capacity to understand facts in print before him, in view of the portion of my speech which I am about to read:

"The Canada Central Railway subsidy reaches $1,440,000; the surveys, including those location surveys, which, after all, come out of the pockets of the people, whether called exploratory surveys or location surveys, amount to $4,000,000."

There you see, Sir, is $5,440,000.

"The road from Fort William to Selkirk was estimated at $18,000,000—"

That is $23,440,000.

"The Pembina Branch cost $1,500,000—"

That is $24,940,000—

"And, adding $100,000 for the Red River bridge, we reach a little over $25,000,000."

There are my figures. I have simply interpolated, in reading my speech, the additions of each calculation, in order to reach, if possible, the hon. gentleman's capacity for figures.

"From Selkirk to Edmonton, according to the old grades and style of construction, the hon. member for Lambton estimates at $17,650,000, which, added to the $25,000,000, makes a total of over $42,500,000 as the amount, including what has been spent for surveys, which it will have cost the country, irrespective of interest and construction, to reach the point which I suggest as the reasonable terminus for the prairie section of the road."

Now, Sir, ought I to have made it $27,500,000? Where will the hon. gentleman find the $25,000,000 which, I trust, I have now proved to him is in the calculations? Whatever fantastic tricks he may play with his own figures, I ask him not to try them on mine, but just to leave them where they are standing. So much for that. The hon. gentleman will perceive, I trust, that he is not on sound ground when he proposes to add $10,000,000 to my estimate of $7,500,000. But the hon. gentleman says: "I am all right, even so." First, he wanted to make it $42,500,000, and then $27,500,000. He is beaten out of the $42,500,000, and now he is beaten out of the $27,500,000, and he comes down to $17,650,000 and he is perfectly happy. What difference does it make to him that this afternoon he declared, with all the weight attached to his position, that I had estimated a piece of road analagous—the same piece of road, at $42,500,000, and that he is now beaten down to the $17,650,000 in his estimate? Nothing at all. He is quite imperturbable, and says it is all the same. The country is a very different country, as my hon. friend from East York said. We have lately declared that the railway Company was running over a much better country to the southward, a much better country for railway construction, than the country over which my hon. friend's line went. My hon. friend did not propose to choose the very easiest line for railway construction, but the best line in the national interest, the line which he thought would do most good, even though it might cost a little more money, and it was that line from the Red River to Edmonton of which my hon. friend from Lambton was speaking, and with reference to which the estimates were made. But the hon. gentleman says: "I will apply the estimates for a line from the Red River to Edmonton to a line from the Red River to the Rocky Mountains, by a southern route, and what the one cost the other must cost." Then there is a great deal more bridging in the old projected road, and lastly, the rails are well known to have been estimated at a much higher rate in reference to those old estimates, than the low prices at which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were able to obtain the rails which they laid down on the prairie section. An hon. gentleman the other day, in the course of this debate, setting off certain incidental advantages from rapid construction, against the cost of rapid construction, pointed out that rails had been purchased at a very cheap rate indeed, and it is true that they were purchased at a very cheap rate. These three elements I mention at the moment, but it is out of the question to say that, under any circumstances, even the hon. gentleman's application of $17,650,000 instead of $42,500,000 to a road which is not the same, on an estimate made some seven or eight years ago—I do not mean made by my hon. friend from Lambton, but that the data on which it was based were made some seven or eight years ago—is now admissible. If the hon. gentleman will look at the other estimates he will see that they were over-estimates; he will see that, as I said the other day, the engineers seemed to conclude that the building of the railway by the Yellow Head Pass would cost altogether about $120,000,000. I gave the details, which the hon. gentleman agrees were an accurate representation of their estimates. But if you look at each section you will find that these were over-estimates of the engineers. When we take the British Columbia section from the Tête Jaune Cache to the shore and find what my estimate was, and take his present estimate from the Rockies to the shore, and compare them, the hon. Minister might as well say: "You have nothing to say, because you thought from the Tête Jaune Cache to the shore, Mr. Schrieber's, Mr. Fleming's and Mr. Marcus Smith's views would have led to such an amount—you have nothing to say now that we were able to construct this road for so much less." That has nothing to do with it. My argument was based upon the present estimates, not upon those old estimates of the engineers with reference to another line; it was based upon an intelligible proposition. I showed what the branches in the North-West had cost this country; I showed what, as nearly as I could show, the expensive western portion of the work, partly prairie and partly mountain, with a heavy grade leading to the summit of the Rockies, had cost this Company, according to their own figures; I showed that in one case it was $10,700 per mile, and in the other case $14,500 per mile, with expensive bridging, with some heavy rock work, with some mountain work, and with the longest distance for transportation of materials which existed over the whole constructed line. And I asked, when I had the branches at the east costing $10,700, when I had the mountain and western section costing, as far as I could make out, $14,500—I asked what figures you could fairly put for the section in the middle, the 615 miles of level prairie section? That was the question I asked. And the answer I gave myself was, that I supposed about $12,000 per mile, being something like a mean between those two figures, and I suggested a calculation upon that basis, and also upon the basis of $14,000 per mile. I think that was a practical, sensible, reasonable and business-like way of dealing with the question in the premises. Now, I claim that my argument remains wholly unanswered. After the hon. gentleman's explanation of the meaning of the words used by himself, I suppose it is hardly necessary for me to say that I did not say or imply that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had made dishonest statements to Parliament; on the contrary, when the hon. gentleman told us that he had sent down auditors to look into their books, I said that I did not doubt that their books were accurately kept, and correctly represented the transactions of the Company. I have no idea of such a thing as the contrary. But, Sir, I did point out that the Company had been subjected to some extraordinary conditions, either of being defrauded by these contractors, or of there being an over-expenditure in the contracts—unless the figures I gave could be explained. What I asked for was that explanation, and I have not received it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I understood the hon. Minister of Railways to convey the impression that the cost of the section from Red River to the mountains, $17,500,000, included the cost of the equipment, and if he did intend to make that statement, I think it well to have it corrected now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; that includes the cost of the shops, stations, and expenses of terminus at Winnipeg.

Mr. CHARLTON. Very likely the hon. gentleman made use of language without thinking, but the impression left upon my mind—and, I am sure, upon the mind of the House—was that he intended to include the cost of equipment. The hon. gentleman also made a statement, that, taken in connection with any estimate that has ever been made, the road was cheap. Now, I think the hon. gentleman himself made an estimate of the cost of the road, from Red River to Jasper House, of $13,000,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; that was for a tramway

Mr. CHARLTON—an estimate of $4,500,000 less than the alleged cost of this section of the road.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will remember that I said that was only for a tramway.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, it was a road which was proposed to be a railway—a colonization road, as the hon. gentleman termed it—a road passing over a much more difficult section of country, with heavy bridges to construct, and a road that could not by any possibility have been constructed as cheap as the road now in existence; yet the hon. gentleman said this road was cheap in comparison with any estimate that had ever been made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. For a road of that character.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman is certainly rather reckless in his statements of figures, as has been shown to-night. I wish to reiterate the statement that has been made that we certainly do require more information in reference to this matter, before this House is in a position to judge as to whether this Company is entitled to receive from us a loan of $22,500,000. Sir, we are dealing with the public interests, we are dealing with public funds, in the most reckless and the most unwarrantable manner. And I protest now, as I have done before, against the Government committing this country to undertakings in the dark—the country being in ignorance, and Parliament being in ignorance, of the condition of that Company and the manner in which that Company has carried on its operations. We know that the Company has received more than twice the sum of money it has expended upon the line it contracted to build; and there is something monstrous in the proposition made by these gentlemen, that the country should commit itself to this expenditure without Parliament being permitted to know all the facts in connection with the affairs of this Company. I believe there is no other country in the world where an attempt of this kind would be made, that there is no other country in the world that has a Government feeling itself so strong as to set at defiance all principles of prudence, all principles of honesty in the administration of affairs, in demanding that Parliament should commit the country to an expenditure of this extent in the absence of vital information, of information that we certainly ought to be possessed of, in order that we may know the full scope and possibilities of this measure.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I want to make one or two observations in answer to the reply of the Minister of Railways to my hon. friend for North Norfolk, who has just taken his seat, in reference to his estimates, in 1880, of the prairie section being for a cheaper road. The hon. gentleman has told us at different times since that statement was made in the House, that it was for that class of road. He did not tell us at the time he was submitting the returns that such was the case. But the point I call his attention to is this: that in 1880, when he gave his estimate of $10,000 a mile or, with equipment, $13,000 a mile, for the prairie section, he also gave his estimate for the cost of the Lake Superior division and an estimate of the western division in the mountains. I presume if he was giving estimates for a certain class of road over the prairie at that time, he was giving an estimate for a like road on the other portion. And the figures show that, in that estimate he then gave, the 335 miles from Jasper to Kamloops was to cost $43,660 per mile. Now, then, we have ascertained from statements he has made, and from statements of the general manager, that the Company proposed to construct this first-class road from the Rockies to Kamloops, through a similar country, for the sum of $10,100 per mile; that is, if we take the 300 miles which the hon. Minister gives as the distance, in the detailed statement he made to the House. I know he has varied that statement a few miles at different times, but the detailed statement of the distance, as I took it from his own very able speech, is 300 miles. The 300 miles, estimated at a cost of $10,000 to complete, gives a cost of $3,000,000. The estimate of 1880 for that road that was to be an inferior road, was $43,660 per mile; therefore, in that particular, his estimate of 1880 was above the actual cost of construction by some $10,000 per mile. Now, take the Lake Superior division. His estimated cost of 800 miles at that time was $20,000,000, or $33,333 per mile. Now, this, we gather from the general manager's estimate, will be sufficient to complete it. As for the 447 miles remaining to be completed, the figures given to us by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), are to the effect that they will be completed for $14,000,000, or $31,320 per mile. On the Lake Superior section, the estimate of the Minister in 1880 is reduced by the actual estimate. While that is the fact, that the hon. gentleman over-estimated in 1880 the cost by $10,000 per mile on the western section, and $2,000 per mile on the Lake Superior section, we find this with respect to the prairie section: That the portion which he estimated to cost $10,000 per mile, without equipment—and we are speaking without equipment in all these cases—has actually cost, according to the figures he himself furnished, by my strongest calculation, when I put in all the transportation charges, cost of supplies, &c., into the cost of construction, no less than $19,143 per mile for 515 miles. I do not understand how the hon. gentleman can say that he was talking about a different class of road. I just mention this point, as the hon. gentleman stated in his observation in connection with the remarks made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that his estimate of 1880 might not be considered, because he was estimating on an entirely different class of road.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments. During the afternoon, in my absence, I believe, the Minister of Railways attacked me, and used some very strong and unparliamentary language, abusing me for voting as I did upon the Resolutions; but he subsequently apologized to the House. I wish this House to understand that I will never vote for party and sacrifice the interests of my constituents. I will give my vote independently, as I think best in the interests of the constituency I represent, in the interest of the Province, and for the good of the whole Dominion; and whenever I bring up a motion or move an amendment, I will state my reasons for so doing. I will not only give my reasons, but I will remain in my seat in the House and vote. In moving this amendment, I was only formulating the opinions of my constituents, and carrying out a pledge made to them during the election, that, at the first opportunity, I would move that this obnoxious monopoly clause be struck out of the Canadian Pacific Railway charter. I have done so, and notwithstanding the threats held out by the Minister of Agriculture, that I dare not present myself to my constituents after voting as I had done on these Resolutions, I would inform the hon. gentleman that I am prepared to answer to my constituents for every vote I have polled in the House, and not to the Minister of Agriculture; and I believe all I have stated in the House, on this question, will be endorsed by my constituents, and I will go back to that country with, probably, a cleaner sheet than the hon. members from that Province who voted for the Resolutions.

Motion agreed to; and Bill considered in Committee and reported.

SELF-GOVERNMENT BY INDIANS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 22) for conferring certain privileges on the more advanced bands of the Indians of Canada, with the view of training them for the exercise of municipal powers.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman explain the Bill?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say that I did, to a certain extent, explain the Bill when it was introduced. The Bill is for the purpose of encouraging the Indians of various bands to elect councillors, who will have powers analogous, to a certain extent, to those powers which are given to members of municipal councils. The measure is tentative to a certain extent, and the powers are limited, but it is hoped that the larger and more advanced bands will work upon this system, and as they prove themselves worthy and capable of carrying out the intention of this Act, Parliament will, by degrees, grant them more powers. It provides for the election of six councillors, and the elections are to be annual. The powers mentioned in the Act, to be exercised by the council, are as follows:—

“The council shall have power to make by-laws, rules and regulations, which, if approved and confirmed by the Superintendent-General, shall have force as law within and with respect to the reserve, and the Indians residing thereon, upon all or any of the following subjects, that is to say: The religious denomination to which the teacher or teachers of the school or schools established on the reserve shall belong, as being that of the majority of the Indians resident on the reserve; provided that the Roman Catholic or Protestant minority on the reserve may also have a separate school or schools with the approval of and under regulations to be made by the Governor in Council; the care of the public health; the observance of order and decorum at elections of councillors, meetings of the council, and assemblies of Indians on other occasions or generally on the reserve, by appointing constables and erecting lock ups or by the adoption of other legitimate means; the repression of intemperance and profligacy; the subdivision of the land in the reserve, and the distribution of the same among the members of the band; also, the setting apart for common use, wood land and land for other purposes.”

There are also powers as to trespass by animals, the construction and repair of school houses and other buildings, roads and bridges, water courses, &c. These are the purposes of the Act, and the clauses are the mere machinery for carrying them out.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As nearly as I can understand, from a brief perusal of the Act, it, in fact, provides for the election of a council who shall discharge the duties, as nearly as may be, which have been discharged by the chiefs in the past.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. But the powers are much more extensive.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; much the same.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I understand that the Bill makes provision for the collection of taxes on the reserves. This is a matter which will seriously affect the county of Hastings, for at present the Indians occupying the reserve in Tyendenaga pay no taxes, but the tenants residing on the Indian reserve pay taxes to the county. That county has spent a large sum of money in constructing gravel roads and building bridges; and if these taxes are to be paid to the Indians, and not to the county, it will be a serious injustice to other portions of the county, as Indians and whites alike, are allowed to use these roads and bridges. We have a number of bridges, as well as a large number of roads, which have been built entirely by the county, and as the Indians have a right to use them, I think, unless they are to be assumed by the Indians, it is only fair that they should contribute to the county funds. I would also like to ask, if the white settlers on the reserve are to be deprived of their right to the franchise?

Bill read the second time;

And the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the preamble,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Though I am not in order, I may be allowed to say, with reference to what has been stated by my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. White), that this Act is merely an experimental one, for the purpose of enabling the Indians to do by an elective council what the chiefs, by the Statute of 1880, have already the power to do. In some of the tribes or bands, those chiefs are elected now, in others the office is hereditary, and in other bands there is a mixture of both systems. This Bill is to provide that in those larger reserves where the Indians are more advanced in education, and feel more self-confident, more willing to undertake power and self-government, they shall elect their councils much the same as the whites do in the neighbouring townships. My hon. friend asks me if there is any provision for the Mohawk band, in the township of Tyendenaga, contributing towards keeping up the roads. That, I think, must be an arrangement between the band and the county. At all events, under this Act, the Indians have power to tax themselves for the construction, and maintenance, and improvement of the roads. As regards the franchise of the white men on the reserve, this Act does not deal with that at all. In the Franchise Bill, which is on the Order paper, some means may, perhaps, be taken to give votes to those white men on the Indian reserves, as well as, perhaps, to the Indians themselves who have habitations and have assumed the responsibilities of white men.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The explanation is, of course, all I want. I only wanted to protect the county and the white men on the Indian reserve. If the Franchise Bill does it, of course that is satisfactory.

On section 2,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This clause states that the term “reserve” includes two or more reserves, and the term “band” includes two or more bands, united for the purposes of this Act by the Order in Council applying it. Do I understand that it will be necessary for two bands to co-operate in each case? What is the meaning of this clause?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The word “reserve,” in ordinary parlance, means a single reserve; but should there be two reserves of the same tribe of Indians near each other who wish to unite for the purposes of this Act, they may unite into one band, and have one elective council. That is merely enlarging the meaning of the word “reserve.”

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If they are of different tribes, may they be united?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Different bands of the same tribe.

On section 3,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps the hon. First Minister will favour the Committee by stating whether representations have been made to him with reference to this Act, by persons more directly interested, whether he thinks some of the more advanced bands will avail themselves of this Act, and what provision will be made for satisfying the honour—I suppose I may use the term—of the chiefs who will be dispossessed of power by this Act. Many of them are very tenacious of their power on the reserve, and I think, that unless some provision is made, their feeling of pride will prevent some of them from embracing the Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In some of the tribes there are hereditary, in others elective chiefs, in others hereditary and elective chiefs combined. There are great varieties of organizations in the different bands. It is not proposed in any way to affect the status or the rank of the chiefs; but, as in the Act of 1880, where an elective system of chiefs has been adopted, the hereditary chiefs retain their rank, but lose their power. I will say to my hon. friend that I have received a good many suggestions from different bands of Indians—from educated men, who are quite capable of judging of the effect of this law. On the whole, the Bill has been favourably received by the more advanced bands. There is to be no force exercised on the Indians; this measure is only intended to give them the opportunity of adapting themselves to the white system as much as possible. Some of them are very anxious to stand on an equality with, and to have the same responsibilities and duties as the whites. Only a day or two ago, I received a very valuable paper from an educated professional man, who is an Indian, with respect to this Bill—from a gentleman whose opinion I value. I have only been able to look over it cursorily, and I shall not ask concurrence until I read this paper carefully, and see if any necessary amendments are suggested by it.

On section 5,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the hon. First Minister proposes to confer the franchise on the male Indians. He seems to have lost part of his gallantry, and draws the distinction in the case of the Indians, I suppose, because this Act is for municipal purposes. Of course, it may be that there are widows residing on the reserves who may be interested in the system of assessment which may be resorted to, and may have to pay taxes. I know that in some of the tribes the women have occupied a very prominent place. In the kingly tribe of the Mohawks, I think the right to nominate the successor is vested in the women.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad to learn from my hon. friend that he is interested in extending the franchise. By slow degrees, the idea of placing woman on an equality with man has grown in the civilized world, but I do not know whether, among Indian tribes, the idea has reached that stage that it has in the Canadian Parliament. Perhaps my hon. friend, when he considers the matter, will move an amendment to extend the right of voting to the ladies of the Indians in his constituency, in whom he takes so fraternal and paternal an interest.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will the hon. gentleman not take the responsibility?

On section 10,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. First Minister is aware that in the largest reserve in Ontario there is a fund which was raised many years ago in England, and which was originally to be applied for the benefit of the Indians of British North America.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Through the New England Society.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Through the means of that society they, I think, maintain on this reserve some six or eight schools, and an industrial institute, also wholly, I believe, out of their funds. I presume there is nothing in this clause or Act that will affect the working of that in any way whatever.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Nothing whatever.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do the provisions of this Bill extend so as to include the Indian tribes in all parts of the Dominion—for instance, in the Maritime Provinces?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

On sub-section 3, section 10,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to bring to the notice of the hon. First Minister whether there would be any objection to giving further powers under that sub-section. They have the power to make laws:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

“For the observance of order and decorum at elections of councillors, meetings of the council, and assemblies of Indians on other occasions, or generally on the reserve, by appointing constables and erecting lock-ups, or by the adoption of other legitimate means.”

The question is, whether there would be any objections, in a large reserve numbering some thousands, to having a stipendiary magistrate live upon the reserve, with power to deal with questions coming up. We have found in times past that a great deal of litigation went on, which, instead of being discountenanced, was rather encouraged by the magistrates, so that a great deal of time was lost in trivial cases. In a large reserve it might be well to give the local commissioners the powers of stipendiary magistrate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite right. In the last amended Indian Act, there is a provision by which the local agent or Indian agent may have the power of a stipendiary or police magistrate. I cannot, however, speak positively, as I do not expect this to come up to-night. The suggestion is well worthy of all consideration.

On sub-section 5, section 10,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). One of the most difficult questions in the advancement of the Indian and in fitting him to assume the duties of citizenship and manhood, is to be found in the sub-division of these reserves. The Government of the hon. gentleman many years ago tried to advance the law in this respect, but there has been no progress made, and I think the sub-division of a reserve a great difficulty. The intelligent Indian will, by thrift and industry, acquire the possession of 100 to 200 acres, while others will lose their land. Those frugal Indians are the class fitted to assume the duties of manhood, so they reply: we do not want the privileges of citizenship, which simply mean the power to tax us and involve a surrender of more than half the possessions that we have. I certainly cannot find fault with the Minister for anything he has done, for, if he asked me how the remedy was to be brought about, I could not tell him, and I should not like to find fault with him unless I could suggest a remedy. But here is the difficulty of dealing with the matter. Whether this will remedy it or not I do not know. If the Indians can do it among themselves, that would be desirable; but, on the other hand, it would have to be guarded so that any rights which might have been acquired, whether legally or not, but rights recognized on the reserve for years and years, should be protected. It would never do to give any six men the power to go and arbitrarily change the bounds, although, I presume, the safety of that will be found in the fact that it will have to have the sanction of the Superintendent in Council before it is done, and that they would see that no injustice was done to any one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite right. The old Enfranchisement Act, passed in old Canada, when Sir Edmund Head was Governor General, and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, as well—and he took a great interest in that matter—was passed with a good intention, to encourage by degrees the Indians to enfranchise themselves, to become freeholders, and to assume the responsibilities of citizenship. But, in the first place, the machinery was rather cumbersome. By way of protecting the Indians from the consequences of their own improvidence, they were surrounded with so many safeguards that really it became rather a complicated system for them to obtain enfranchisement; and then there has been, as the hon. gentleman says, considerable reluctance among the Indians to adopt the Enfranchisement Act. They have great advantages as they are now. They have their reserves, they have their land in common, they deal with the land, after their own fashion, they do not pay any taxes, they are not obliged to serve in the militia or to serve on juries, and they really have all the advantages of the protection and order maintained by the Government of the country; and yet, except by the purchase of dutiable goods, whether of Excise, like whisky, or imported goods, they contribute nothing to the public revenue. The Indians are quite well aware of that, and they resist the attempts of the Department of Indian Affairs to make them responsible fellow-subjects of ours. I know a case in Lower Canada, of an Indian who was a large merchant, worth, they say, from $50,000 to $100,000. When he was asked: "Why do you not become a white man and be elected to Parliament?" he would shrug his shoulders and say: "No; I am only a poor Indian." He did not wish to pay any contribution to the State. It is very difficult to get them to adopt the Enfranchisement Act. However, it had not been altogether a dead letter. In some instances it has been accepted to a very small degree, and I am not at all sure that, even in those instances, it has been altogether successful. The enfranchised father, who has proved himself worthy of it, occupies the estate, but too often it happens that the estate is dissipated by the children. They return to the semi-wild habits of the tribe, and the property is lost. Still, there must be an end to that sometime. The Indians are being now very well educated. I think the hon. gentleman would say that the Indians in his vicinity are an educated people on the whole, and there must be some time when they will cease to be in a state of tutelage, and will be obliged to assume the responsibilities of civilized men. This measure, however, does not affect that. The clause about the division of the estate is simply to introduce a system among the Council. If we can get the Council to pass some general law under this Bill, which is now before the Committee, by which the houses and improvements of individual Indians are recognized and protected, it will be a great step. There will be no forced rules, and, if the Indians in any given tribe have immemorably some arbitrary mode of sub-division, or a termination of the occupancy, we cannot help that. It would be very unwise to try to force white ideas on the red men prematurely. This is merely to make an attempt to encourage them to do it, if they will.

Mr. DAWSON. I think very few Indians have become enfranchised under the old Act, and it is highly desirable that there should be some provision made by which they could become enfranchised with greater facility than they can at present. There are a great many people treated as Indians who are really not Indians; they are only part Indians—less than half Indians. In the district I represent, there are a great many Indians and half Indians, and the half Indians are equal, in many cases, to their white neighbours, and just as fit to exercise the franchise. At West Bay, on the island of Manitoulin, for instance, there is a French settlement. They are more French than they are Indians; they are well educated, and they are very intelligent; they farm a little, and are well advanced. It is very hard that such of these people as desire to become enfranchised cannot do so without adhering to the very cumbersome and difficult provisions of the Act that now exists. I believe that very few indeed have become enfranchised under that Act, and if something could be introduced in some of these Acts which would simplify it, it would be a great benefit. Taking this case, where the Indians are to have separate holdings within the reserve, to have their own farms, but still the property to be, to a certain extent in common, under the Government, so that they are not to have the right to dispose of it, I think that at the same time they should be allowed the franchise, or the more intelligent of them might. Some standard should be established by which the intelligent Indians might be allowed to have the same privilege as their white neighbours. If they understood that they had that, it would tend to elevate them in their own estimation. Let them know that they were equal to the white man when they conducted themselves like a white man and it would tend to their improvement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend, and I have given notice of a Bill for the amendment of the Indian Act of 1880. I have kept the two subjects separate. This is merely a tentative Bill to introduce quasi municipal institutions among the Indians themselves. It is that alone, and has nothing to do with any other subject. The other Bill, which stands for the second reading, is a Bill which I prepared for last Session, but other matters crowded it out, so that I could not lay it before the House. It is in type now, and the hon. gentleman will see that there is an attempt in that Bill to meet his views.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I suppose this Bill is not intended to have any effect on the Indians of Oka? They are not in the reserves, and I suppose they are not on the same terms as the Indians in other parts of the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it will not have anything to do with the Indians of Oka. They are on the Seignior, owned by the gentlemen of St. Sulpice. They are occupants on the estate of another party. That is not an Indian reserve in any sense.

Mr. BLAKE. I should like to ask whether this clause, as to the prevention of trespass, is intended to prevent trespass exclusively by animals belonging to the reserve, or to apply generally to animals owned by persons outside of the reserve coming upon the reserve and trespassing. If the latter, it seems to me that it will be extremely convenient that the Bill should be the general law of the locality. Whatever is good enough on the subject of trespass, impounding, &c., for the white people, ought to be good enough as regards trespasses on the Indian lands, of the cattle of white people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take it that the Superintendent General will see that the law is applied, in all cases, equitably.

On the sub-section 10, section 10,

Mr. BLAKE. That is a serious thing—"the removal and punishment of persons trespassing upon the reserve, or frequenting it for improper purposes." That establishes a sort of criminal law. What is it proposed to make the maximum punishment?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In no case to exceed $30 fine, and in no case to exceed thirty days' imprisonment. That is the Act of 1880.

On the sub-section 11, section 10,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think that is a new provision. I think there has been no officer similar to a treasurer appointed for any of the bands before. I would just ask the First Minister, if this treasurer will have any moneys coming to his hands, other than the money that may be raised by levying and assessment upon property? Supposing the bands do not assess themselves, and expenses are incurred by the Council, said expenses would be defrayed out of the money that the bands receive from the Government. Will that money pass through the hands of the treasurer, or be disbursed by him?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; but by the Superintendent, as heretofore.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The treasurer will have charge of no moneys except such as may be raised by tax levied on their lands?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is one of the difficulties which my friend objects to. He suggests that there should be no treasurer, but that the local agent of each band should be in fact the treasurer of the band. I shall fully consider that point before concurrence.

On sub section 12, section 10,

Mr PATERSON. I see there is no provision made for the appointment of an assessor. The council of chiefs will act as assessors, I suppose?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; they pass a by-law for raising money, and the by-law will provide for that. They will appoint the machinery, of course. It will be an annual assessment. This is really to encourage them to tax themselves. Sometimes they do subscribe very liberally, especially for educational purposes.

On section 11,

Mr. BLAKE. Why should not this be extended to the whites? It is an admirable clause: "Any member of a council elected under the provisions of this Act who shall be proved to be a habitual drunkard, or to be living in immorality, or to have accepted a bribe, or to have been guilty of dishonesty, or of malfeasance of office, shall be disqualified from acting as a member of the council."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It would be a very good clause for the whites.

Mr. BLAKE. Why should we be more moral with our Indian friends than with ourselves?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It might diminish the members of the Opposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will risk it.
Bill reported.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time, considered in Committee, and reported:—

Bill (No. 36) to authorize a further advance to the Province of Manitoba, in aid of the Public Schools therein.—(Sir Leonard Tilley).

Bill (No. 37) to provide for the salary and travelling allowances of the Judge of the County Court of Cariboo, in the Province of British Columbia.—(Sir John A. Macdonald).

The following Bills were read the second time and referred to their respective Committees:—

Bill (No. 63) to consolidate certain railway companies therein mentioned under the name of the Eastern Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Macmaster).

Bill (No. 72) to incorporate the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Innes).

Bill (No. 94) to empower the Sovereign Fire Insurance Company to relinquish their charter, and to provide for the winding up of their affairs.—(Mr. Mackenzie).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 28th February, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND THE HIGH COMMISSIONERSHIP.

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday, in looking over the proceedings of this House for the previous day, and also over some returns, I discovered that, under the law, Sir Charles Tupper had forfeited his seat in the Canadian Parliament, and I felt it to be my duty, having received that information, to apprise the hon. the Minister of Railways that I would take the earliest opportunity of bringing the matter before the House, and I wrote him the following letter:—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"Wednesday, 27th February, 1884.

"DEAR SIR,—I have this afternoon had an opportunity to examine the papers laid on the Table last night, and, being of opinion that the seat for Cumberland is, on the facts disclosed, vacant, I beg to apprise you that I shall bring the question before the House to-morrow.

"Yours faithfully,

"EDWARD BLAKE."

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that it is imperative not to lose an instant, in the situation in which we are at present, in laying the facts before the House and asking for its judgment upon them. If it be the case that, many months ago, a Minister of the Crown in Canada has, at the request of his colleagues, accepted an office which not only vacates his seat, but renders him ineligible for a seat in the House of Commons, if that be the case and that Minister has, since that time, retained his place in the Cabinet, I think you will agree with me that, if we pause there, the situation is grave enough. It is not necessary to elaborate the constitutional doctrine upon that point. I shall trouble the House with two brief extracts from our standard work on the subject, one the opinion of the writer, the other a citation in support of that opinion:—

"While, as we have seen, there is no absolute necessity for every member of the Cabinet to hold a Departmental office under the Crown, the spirit of the constitution requires that every one occupying a seat in the Cabinet should also be a member of one or other of the Houses of Parliament, and no one should be introduced into the Cabinet, or be permitted to continue therein, who is out of Parliament; unless he is likely to be returned by some constituency within a reasonable period."

One of the cases cited is that—

"In 1835, when Sir Robert Peel's Ministry was being constructed, it was determined to confer a seat in the Cabinet upon Sir George Murray, the Master-General of the Ordnance. He accordingly became a candidate for a seat in the House of Commons, but was defeated in the County of Perth. It was then agreed, between Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington, that it was inexpedient, and would establish an inconvenient precedent, were he to continue in the Cabinet. After his rejection at Perth, Sir George Murray volunteered to resign his Departmental office, but Sir Richard Peel wrote and urged him to retain it. He added, however, 'I have more difficulty about the Cabinet, and I need not say solely and exclusively on the score of constitutional precedent. The holding of a seat in the Cabinet by a responsible adviser of the Crown—that adviser being neither in the House of Lords nor Commons—is, I fear, extremely unusual, if not unprecedented, in modern times * * *. Of course, if there were any immediate prospect of your return, the objection could not apply.' After this Sir George ceased to attend the Cabinet councils, although he continued at the head of the Ordnance Department until a change of Ministry occurred."

I say that, if it be the case that a Minister of the Crown has accepted, and has for some months held, an office which not merely vacates his seat, but renders him ineligible for a seat in this House, the situation, if we went no further, is grave. But, if public attention, at the time of that appointment, being directed to the circumstances and to the difficulties with reference to the seat in Parliament, which apparently grew out of it, were diverted from those difficulties by a statement in the Ministerial organs, obviously and necessarily, from the nature of the case, inspired, a statement that these difficulties did not exist, because no emolument was attached to the office, under the terms of the arrangement with the Minister, if the public was deceived, if the Parliament was deceived, if the people were deceived, by a statement of that description, and we were permitted to go on as long as we have gone on, on these terms, the situation would be still more grave. If, Sir, you find that a Minister has been sitting in this House when his seat is vacant and his election void, the situation is still graver. If you find that a Minister has been moving Resolutions, proposing Bills, pressing upon the consideration of the House important measures, sustaining the policy of an Administration, fulminating diatribes against members of the House of Commons who may be opposed to his views, telling them that they are giving reluctant votes, and using language with reference to them which, as it was withdrawn, I shall not allude to further, if you find such language used by a Minister who, although a Minister of the Crown, had at the moment he used it no more—not so much—right to be on the floor of the House as the page or the messenger I see before me, and had no more right to address the House or to take part in its deliberations than that page or that messenger, then I think you will agree with me that the situation is of the gravest character. And, if that Minister was so far conscious of his situation that, although he sat here from day to day, although he spoke here from day to day, although he moved here from day to day, yet, when the time came to take a division upon the motions he moved, the Bills he introduced, and the Resolutions he propounded, he presented the ignominious spectacle of flying the division list, and declining to appear and record his vote as a member of the House of Commons, what words shall I use to describe such a situation as that? I think, if this be the state of the case, you will agree with me that I am not merely entitled to call attention, but that I am bound not to lose an instant, after this condition of things has been revealed, in calling the attention of the House to it, and asking it to apply, as far as it is possible at this moment to apply, the proper remedy. The law in reference to qualifications or disqualifications for seats in Parliament, has been from time to time varied in the direction of greater stringency, and, as it stands to-day, it is to be found on our Statute Book in the Act assented to in the year 1878, which provides, with certain exceptions which are not applicable to the present case, that:

“No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada, at the nomination of the Crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance or emolument, or profit of any kind is attached, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote therein.”

That being the state of the law, the office of High Commissioner for Canada—[The hon. DAVID MILLS, member elect to represent the Electoral District of Bothwell, here entered the House and took his seat.] I rejoice, Sir, that I have been interrupted. I rejoice to know that the gross injustice perpetrated by the late Parliament has been found, by the event which has just taken place, not to have accomplished its object, and that justice, though long delayed, has not been wholly denied to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat beside me. I trust that the justice which the people of Bothwell in the first instance, and the courts of the land in the second place, did in the case of the hon. member for Bothwell, will be done by this House to-day in the case of the late member for Cumberland. Now, Sir, the Act establishing the appointment of High Commissioner, provides that:

“The Governor may, under the Great Seal of Canada, from time to time appoint an officer to be called the High Commissioner of Canada, who shall hold office during pleasure.”

And it provides:

“That the High Commissioner shall receive a salary of not more than $10,000 per annum, and the same shall be payable out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.”

It is quite clear from this reading of the Statutes that you have here a salaried office, at the nomination of the Crown, within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. Besides this salary an allowance was voted by Parliament of $4,000 a year for certain contingencies, making a total of $14,000 a year as the allowance and salary of the office. Sir Alexander Galt was appointed forthwith—indeed his appointment, in some sort, preceded the passage of the Act—but after the passage of the Act, he was appointed a High Commissioner formally, and paid the salary; and for a period of a little over a year the Government paid, out of the allowance of $4,000 a year, his house rent his light account, his fuel account and his taxes, besides, I believe, some other charges. But in March, 1881, as appears by the papers laid on the Table, an Order in Council was passed providing that, in lieu of payment of house rent, fuel, light and taxes, an allowance of $3,500 be made to Sir Alexander Galt, High Commissioner, to be taken from the annual vote for his personal contingencies, to commence from the 1st day of April, 1881; so that what the Government had up to that time done themselves, directly out of the vote, in the way of paying this portion of Sir Alexander Galt's living expenses, was thereafter done by Sir Alexander Galt himself, by means of his own expenditure of this allowance of $3,500 a year, which he used as he pleased, and which, therefore, was more a salary, nominally, than an allowance. Upon this subject there were debates in Parliament in two successive years. The first year, when the allowance was proposed in the discussion in Supply, in the vote of the amount required to provide for contingent expenses of the High Commissioner of Canada, in London—$4,000—I said:

“I have a particular suggestion with reference to the Supplementary Estimates. We have various headings, as, for instance, ‘Harbours and Rivers,’ ‘Quebec,’ ‘Nova Scotia,’ &c. I propose we should have a separate heading, ‘Galt,’ with different sub-headings.

“In reply to Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT,
“Sir SAMUEL L. TILLEY said this item was to pay the rent of his house and other contingencies. If there be travelling expenses they would fall under that item.

“Mr. BLAKE. So the office is to cost $14,000?

“Sir SAMUEL L. TILLEY. Yes.”

Subsequently, upon concurrence upon the item, on the 4th of May, 1880, I said:—

“Mr. BLAKE. I think the proposal to pay $14,000 in all to the High Commissioner of Canada is excessive. I do not think that expenditure is commensurate with the resources of the country. The American Minister, at the Court of St. James', only receives $17,500, and the proposal to pay our London agent $14,000 seems to me to be entirely disproportionate. I move in amendment:

“That the said resolution be not concurred in, but that it be resolved, that the proposal to pay the London agent $10,000 a year for salary, and in addition $4,000 a year for rent for a dwelling house and allowances, in all $14,000, is excessive.”

“Sir SAMUEL L. TILLEY. It was stated very clearly and distinctly I think, that this arrangement is calculated to save a very large sum of money to the Dominion. With regard to this vote, I would say the Lieut.-Governor of Ontario has a salary of $10,000 a year, and he has his house rent, fuel and various other contingencies, amounting to far in excess of $4,000 allowed him. I think it could scarcely be expected that the representative of the people of Canada, living in London, should not receive something like an equivalent to the sum appropriated for the expenses and salary of the Lieut.-Governor of Ontario.

“Mr. BLAKE. I am not disposed to admit that he is worth twice as much as you are.

“Sir SAMUEL L. TILLEY. That is no test at all, because we are supposed to be here on patriotic principles, and not for mercenary considerations. When I state what is a fact, that some managers of banking institutions receive $20,000 to $25,000 a year, I think the amount proposed to be voted is comparatively small. I think the House will not sustain my hon. friend's proposition.”

And there, if nowhere else, the hon. gentleman was right, for my proposition was voted down. In the following year a further discussion took place upon the subject, in March, 1881, when the vote again came before the House:

“Amount required to provide for contingent expenses of the High Commissioner of Canada in London. . . . . $4,000.

“Mr. BLAKE. It was very natural that a bulk sum should have been asked last year, as the arrangement was a new one, and it was necessary to make proper provision, but it was said, I think, that the amount was properly an allowance. I would like to know if it is now voted simply as an allowance or an amount to be accounted for?

“Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is practically an allowance.

“Mr. BLAKE. That being the case, I think it would be better to call it an allowance not accountable, rather than a contingency.”

The then hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) made a speech on the subject, in which he said :

"He is liberally paid, for, besides his salary and $4,000 of an allowance, I think there will be found somewhere in the Estimates a further sum of $14,000 for other expenses said to have been incurred by him. We paid the expenses of himself and family to England."

Then Sir Leonard Tilley said :

"If you allow 2 per cent. for that operation——"

That was an operation with reference to the purchase of the cable——

'you have another saving of $3,000, which with the other two items, would more than cover the $14,000 expended during the year, to say nothing of the other services he has rendered. So that, although we have as yet been unable to transfer to our High Commissioner certain duties that are performed by our agent at the present time, during the current year there will have been saved in these operations alone a sum equivalent to his salary and the contingent expenses that have been referred to. I am sure that the hon. member from West Durham will be glad to know that there has been a shilling, that there has been a pound, that there is a certain sum of money saved as compensation for the $14,000 expended."

I read these passages to remind the House of what the understood situation of the whole business was in 1880 and 1881. You find it agreed and acknowledged that the practical emoluments and profits of this office are $14,000 a year. You find it assimilated in argument to the position of a Lieutenant-Governor of a Province—say, the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario—who receives, besides his salary of $10,000 a year, as the Finance Minister stated, his house rent, fuel and other contingencies, making allowances for more than $4,000 a year. You find it acknowledged by the Finance Minister that this is practically an allowance in addition to the salary; and you find an Order in Council providing that $3,500 of it is to be payable to the High Commissioner himself in lieu of payments by the Government, so that he can spend it as he pleases, and if he chooses to live at an hotel, or in lodgings, he may live at either place, and he may save his house rent and certain other incidental expenses. Nobody can doubt that this is an addition to the emoluments; if anybody doubts it let me ask him how much worse off he thinks the Commissioner would have been if the allowance or contingent provision had not been made? He would have had, in that event, to pay for his house rent and other contingencies out of his salary of $10,000 a year, so he would have had just so much less than he has by means of the allowance. How are salaries, how is income, spent? Why, they are spent in paying for house rent, fuel, light, taxes, and other living expenses. How does the Minister spend his salary? A portion of it goes in paying rent of his house, or the interest of the purchase money, and in paying for his light, fuel and taxes. If we were to agree to provide a contingent allowance for these, that would be enlarging his salary by just so much; and by whatever name you call it this is practically an addition to his salary. But the Statute which, as I have said, has been made stronger from year to year, and which has been directed to avoiding the possibility of the receipt of emoluments of any kind consistently with holding a seat in Parliament—excepting the excepted cases—the Statute, I say, does not confine itself to the salary; it says "the salary, wages, with allowance, emoluments, or profits of any kind, permanent or temporary;" and that, of course, covers this allowance, emolument, or profit. Take the case of His Excellency the Governor General, which I may be allowed to refer to, as the Finance Minister referred to the case of a Lieutenant Governor. The salary is $48,000 odd this year, and we know the Public Accounts show what a very large sum in addition we provide each year, which is practically an addition to the salary in various personal expenses and the expense connected for the maintenance of Rideau Hall, which is also provided for him. Another way to look at this is to reverse the figures and suppose for an instant that the salary was $4,000, and the allowance for expenses $10,000, instead of the salary being $10,000 and the allowance for expenses $4,000. Who can doubt, whichever way you look at it, that we are dealing here with an office of which the emoluments, profits, allowances and salary amount to $14,000 a year. That was the condition of things during the tenure of that office by Sir Alexander Galt; the Opposition criticising the amount of the salary and allowance, condemning them, and proposing that the amount should be reduced, stating that $14,000 was too much, the Government not insisting that the amount paid was not $14,000, but insisting that $14,000 was just enough and not at all too much. And the matter went on until Sir Alexander Galt resigned and Sir Charles Tupper was appointed. Amongst the papers brought down is an Order in Council, dated 13th May, 1883, which is as follows:—

"CERTIFIED COPY of a report of a Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the 30th May, 1883.

"On a report dated 30th May, 1883, from the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, stating that it will be necessary to appoint a successor as High Commissioner for Canada in London in the place of Sir Alexander Galt whose resignation takes effect on the 1st June, 1883, and that Sir Charles Tupper has kindly consented to proceed to England and perform the duties of the office for the present without salary, "Sir John Macdonald recommends that a commission do issue to Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner.

"The Right Honourable the First Minister also states that the expenses of the High Commissioner will be paid in the same manner as the expenses of Sir Alexander Galt.

"The Committee concur in the recommendation of the Right Honourable the Premier and submit the same for your Excellency's approval.

(Signed) "Jno. J. McGEE,
"Clerk Privy Council."

And approved it was. So there you find the appointment of Sir Charles Tupper; and the Order deals with two parts, the salary and the allowances. As to the salary, there is no absolute renunciation of the salary in this Order in Council. It is merely for the present that the salary is renounced, and consistent with that, arrangements might be made for the obtaining of the salary at any time. And it is exceedingly likely, I think it is the better opinion, that under such circumstances, an office with a salary attached to it, accepted under such a provision as I have referred to in this Order in Council—if there were no more—that would be a disqualifying office in the hands of the man who had accepted it. The view which prevails in England has been so rigorous as to be applied to cases even where no such provision as to profit existed, and no question of allowances was involved; and one of the latest cases which has occurred was in 1879, when Mr. Herbert Gladstone, son of the Prime Minister, accepted a lordship of the treasury expressly without salary; but it was an office of emolument, and although he accepted it without salary, a new writ was issued and he went back to his constituents and was re-elected, that being an office which he could not hold without vacating his seat, but which did not disqualify him from sitting in the House after reelection. Whatever may be said as to the question of salary being conditional and there being an arrangement for the renunciation of the salary temporarily by the hon. gentleman, who was to receive the salary of the Minister of Railways all the time—I say whatever may be said as to that, it is clear upon the question of allowances. I have shown you how the question of allowances stood at the time; I have shown you the votes upon it; I have shown you the Order in Council upon it, and the practice upon it, and the mode in which the matters were carried out: That Sir Alexander Galt received the allowances for two or three years, and after the arrangement had been made with Sir Charles Tupper, you find the Order in Council expressly stating that the expenses are to be paid in the same manner as in the case of Sir Alexander Galt. So that it is perfectly clear that this portion of the emoluments or allowances connected with the office was, at the time the office was offered to and accepted by Sir Charles Tupper, to be payable to him. The facts follow, for I find from the papers that, on 27th August, 1883, very shortly after his appointment—he was appointed in May and sailed in June—this memorandum:

Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner, in account with Bank of Montreal, London.

Credits granted by Finance Department.

Aug. 27—To Cheque ..... £800
£800

—LONDON, Sept. 5, 1883.

This is in the return of the payments made to Sir Charles Tupper for allowances. He thus received on the 27th August, 1883, £800 sterling, being equivalent to $4,000 which was the amount of the allowances voted for the whole financial year now current, and which terminates on 30th June next. He received, I say, within two months of the commencement of the financial year the allowance which was to last for the whole of the year, and it has been held by him ever since. Amongst the papers I find the following:—

FINANCE DEPARTMENT in account with Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner for Canada.

Cr.
By amount of notes for expenses of High Commissioner placed at my credit in Bank Montreal, London..... £300 0 0

Dr.
To paid expenses..... £795 2 4
" balance in my hands..... 4 17 8
£800 0 0

It shows that the hon. gentleman not merely received the money but spent it. Though I asked for the details, no details are given, and very properly so. Because Sir Charles Tupper did not give any details, and he did not give any details very properly, because the Government had no right to call on him for details; they made this allowance to him in a bulk sum which he had the right to spend as he pleased, and therefore he gives no details, but simply says, I have spent the money. It was not spent in removal expenses; it was not spent in travelling expenses. It was spent absolutely for the purpose for which it was granted no doubt; but it was not spent for those other purposes to which I have referred, which is made quite apparent from the fact that an Order in Council was passed on 21st September, 1883, or a month after the allowance was received, to this effect:

“THE COUNCIL,
“21st September, 1883.

“On a memorandum dated 15th September 1883, from the Minister of Finance submitting a communication from Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada in London, in which is stated that his removal expenses amount to the sum of $836, and recommending that as there are no funds out of which the same can be paid that a special warrant of His Excellency the Governor General do issue for that amount, the same to be taken in addition to the $4,000 voted for ‘contingencies of the office of the High Commissioner in London.’

“The Committee advise that a special warrant do issue accordingly.

(Signed) “J. J. McGEE,
“C. P. O.”

So you find $836 in addition were paid for removal expenses to London. And the return also shows other considerable sums paid to Sir Charles Tupper for travelling expenses during the period of his stay on the other side of the water. For instance, I find an account here on page 5 for £162 13s. 6d., and another account for £65 sterling. I think, Sir, I have now established clearly that Sir Charles Tupper has occupied and held this office, receiving at any rate, part of its emoluments; and as I have pointed out the office, being a salaried office, and an office of profit, the arrangement as to undertaking it, the salary being only renounced for the present, and the arrangement as to the other part of the emoluments being distinct and clear. As to the agreement, as to the understanding and as to the action, the emoluments being not merely due but actually received, the case is perfectly clear. It is perfectly clear that the office, as held, is an office of emolument. He was the Minister of Railways with a salary of $7,000 a year. The duties of both the offices could not be simultaneously discharged; and while acting as High Commissioner he gets his salary as Minister of Railways, and $4,000 a year of these allowances. While acting as Minister of Railways here, he gets his salary as Minister of Railways, and also these allowances of $4,000 a year, for the period he is here. Now, Sir, the English Statute law is not so rigid as our own in terms, but the constitutional application of it to analogous cases is clear as day. The office of Warden of the Cinque Ports was formerly an office of substantial emolument—a very considerable salary was attached to it; it was not a disqualifying office, but it was an office the acceptance of which vacated the seat. The salary was taken away, but there remained the substantial perquisite of the right to occupy Wardour Castle, and some nominal perquisites in the shape of wrecks and others of a kind, which, I believe, were purely nominal. But the office was granted and with these various perquisites, and when Lord Palmerston accepted that office, it was held that a new writ should issue, that his seat was vacated by the acceptance of it, and he went for reelection to his borough of Tiverton. So that if you take the ordinary mode of vacating seats in the English House of Commons, they had not the power, and I believe they have not now the power, of resignation; they must get out by accepting a disqualifying office. When a member of the House of Commons of England accepts the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, or the Escheatorship of Munster, which are offices that have no fees really pertaining to them—nobody gets a shilling out of them—but still they have the effect of vacating the seat. Such is the construction of the law, the seat is inevitably vacated when the office is accepted, although the emolument is in the shape of a perquisite, and a nominal perquisite at that. The law has been construed in fact, as being so extensive as to include the case of a member of Parliament accepting the office of Attorney General in a British colony; for when Sir Bryan O’Loghlen accepted the office of Attorney General in one of the Australian colonies, his salary being paid by the Crown in Australia, and out of the public moneys of Australia, it was held, and held by the very decisive vote of 180 to 11 in the House of Commons, that by the acceptance of that office he vacated his seat in Parliament. The principles of the construction of a Statute of this description are well stated in a citation, which is made in one of the cases, from that great constitutional writer, Hallam, who says:

“These restrictions ought to be rigorously and jealously maintained, and to receive a construction in doubtful cases according to the constitutional spirit, not as if they were of a penal nature toward individuals, an absurdity in which the careless and indulgent temper of modern times might sometimes acquiesce.”

That observation is of the weightiest character. It is of a character so weighty that it cannot be too pointedly impressed on the mind of the House. It is not a penal Statute against an individual; it is a most beneficial Statute in furtherance of the public weal in the preservation of the great principle of the purity and independence of Parliament; and it has been construed with reference to that circumstance, and with a view to further that result. Sir, this subject has been the subject of discussion, in times past, more than once, and Sir Charles Tupper himself has given vent to his views with the vehemence, not to say the violence, with which he generally speaks when he is moved. In 1877 he used this language :

"It was inexpedient and improper, unless the Parliament of Canada was to become a by-word, and the independence of the Parliament of Canada a by-word, in the mouths of the people of the country, that while that law stood on the Statute Book the Public Exchequer should be used for the purposes of pouring money out of its coffers into the pockets of members of the Parliament of Canada."

Then he says :

"These hon. gentleman, however, must go back to meet the various faces of their intelligent constituents, who knew and felt that whatever the necessities of the Government might be——"

Mark these words and apply them to the case in hand :

"who knew and felt that whatever the necessities of the Government might be, public principles were of vastly higher and of vastly greater importance than the exigencies of a Government, however deserving they might be of confidence in other respects. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) said he was opposed to the views of his right hon. friend with reference to the independence of the Senate, and he voted and proclaimed the necessity of passing a law that would operate on that body of the Legislature in the same way as the law existing in reference to this House. He believed that the hon. gentleman had undergone, not only a conversion, but a backsliding on this point. Having got on the Treasury Benches, the hon. gentleman found it necessary and desirable to use the members of the Senate on important public services, and to place in the hands of members of the Senate large sums of public money to disburse for their expenses."

The hon. gentleman said that I had tried, but unsuccessfully, to put the Senate in point of constitutional disqualification on a par with the House, and that not having been done when my friends attained power, use had been made of that power to use the hon. members of the Senate on important public services, and to place in the hands of members of the Senate large sums of public money to disburse for their expenses. He goes on :

"The hon. gentleman had found no danger to the independence of the Senate, provided that the hon. gentlemen were able to keep their seats on the Treasury Benches, and he did not further interfere with it."

"When they desired to send some one on the most important mission that any gentleman could be selected from Canada to perform—to deal with the question of reciprocity—these hon. gentlemen selected a senator from the other end of the building, and as far as the Public Accounts showed he was not left without an ample supply of public money, directly or indirectly, to meet all the necessities, and to-day what did the hon. gentlemen find or consider it necessary to do on a still more recent occasion, in connection with the great Centennial Exhibition? When these hon. gentlemen wanted to secure the services of able, efficient and talented representatives for Canada, at a most important crisis, they again went back to the Senate and chose hon. gentlemen, and supplied them with the public money they required in order to fully, and vigorously, and efficiently represent the Government of the country."

So you see that the Minister of Railways complained that the law not having been amended, the Senate not having been put on a par with members of this House in this regard, the Government of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was not acting rightly, in that senators had been appointed, as he stated, to offices and commissions and employments, and given large sums of money liberally to pay their expenses. He thought that would not be according to law if applied to a member of Parliament, and that as he succeeded in preventing it being the law with reference to the Senate, my hon. friend was blameable because he had acted upon the law as it applied to the Senate, though I have reason to believe that the late Senator Brown did not accept anything in connection with his mission to Washington at all. Now, Sir, this subject also came up in the following year upon the occasion of the passage of the Act to which I have referred as the present Act for securing the independence of Parliament; and much discussion took place with reference to that Act. The hon. the present First Minister said :

Mr. BLAKE.

"It was a doctrine which was propounded for the first time, that the rights of Parliament were superior to the rights of the people, and that, whenever they did come into collision, the right of the people must yield. He thought they were the representatives of the people; that they were sent here to represent them; that they were the servants of the people; and that when the rights of the people and the rights of Parliament—the rights of their representatives—came into collision, the rights of their representatives must yield to the rights of the people. This was a cardinal principle of the British constitution, and this was the cardinal principle that must obtain in all free countries, and all Parliaments. But the object of this Bill was to secure the independence of Parliament, not the independence of the rights of the people."

The hon. member at this time was arguing for an amendment to the Bill in the direction of greater freedom from disqualification. He was arguing that the mischief to be guarded against did not apply to certain sections by which it was proposed to disqualify persons in the service of the Local Governments. He continued :

"What was the danger, the hazard, that the independence of Parliament was running? The independence of Parliament had to be guarded against the improper influence of the Crown; in other words, had got to be guarded against the influence, direct or indirect, of the Government of the day. That was the object of this measure, and the object of a measure of a similar kind passed in England. The object was, that members of Parliament should be true and faithful representatives of the people, quite independent in their positions of all influence from the Crown; quite free from any chance of the Crown putting on any screw, or using any influence or power or authority over them; and so soon as that principle is obtained, so soon as a member of Parliament was free from the chances, or suspicion, or opportunity of the Crown appealing to his personal interest—so soon as this was obtained, then the Act could go no further. Then came the great question that the choice of the people should be as much as possible unlimited. Now, if they would look at this Act and at the old Act, they would find that the object of the first clause was to prevent any person holding an office of emolument under the Crown from becoming a member of that House. These officers were at the mercy of the Crown; they might be dismissed, they might be removed to positions more advantageous or less advantageous, their promotion or increase of salary or rank depended on the Crown, and no member of Parliament ought to be so dependent."

Once again :

"They should always keep before them the grand principle of the independence of Parliament, and that no man should be eligible for Parliament who could be held to be dependent upon the Crown and liable to be influenced by the Crown."

Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman adverted to the penalty. As the House knows, the penalty at that time was $2,000 a day. It was proposed to reduce it to $200 a day, upon the ground that so enormous a penalty was self-destructive—was destructive of its object; that it would not be enforced; that it excited feelings of compassion; and that a smaller penalty would be more likely to be really efficient. The hon. gentleman raised doubts which I agree in thinking that his present action has done much to give weight to. He said :

"The fifth clause was reasonable enough, that the penalty of $2,000 a day should be considered too large, and $200 inserted in its place. The law undoubtedly looked reasonable enough at the first blush, and if the proposed amendment were carried, it would prevent such a pathetic appeal as that made last Session by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in favour of Mr. Speaker in respect to the penalty of £60,000. But a penalty, in order to be effectual, must be efficient for a purpose. A division might be taken in which the administration might be supported by one vote, and a man who knew he had forfeited his seat, might run the risk of giving his vote and paying $200. He would not, however, be so ready to do so if he had to pay $4,000. That consideration should be taken into account in settling the amount of penalty, and, personally, he was not wedded to $2,000."

"Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland). He is liable to expulsion.
"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the view of the law was that that punishment was not sufficient, and that the offender's purse as well as his person must pay the penalty."

Here, Sir, we have as I conceive, the case of a Minister of the Crown, not voting, it is true, as I have said, but sitting here, arguing here, declaiming here, pressing forward measures here, since the beginning of the Session in defiance of the reduced penalty of $200 a day, which applies to sitting as well as voting. Then, Mr. Plumb said :

"He admitted that the penalty of the present Act was excessive, but at the same time it might be said there was no excuse for any violation of the Act, and no reason why the penalty should be incurred, and it was certainly a false step to reduce the penalty so that a man with a fat contract in his pocket could afford to pay it. On some very important measure, a man holding such a contract could afford to pay the proposed penalty and vote upon it. The reduction of the penalty from $2,000 to $200 per day was a great wrong, and it showed at what price the hon. member who had introduced the Bill valued the independence of Parliament. They had set a price upon it—$200 per day.

As I have said, I am afraid a mistake was made; it may be that if the penalty had been left where it was, or retained at a higher rate than $200 a day, we should be spared the scandal that has been inflicted on Parliament and on the country this Session. Who is to pay the penalty now? Now, Sir, I have not complicated this case with a single word with reference to the incompatibility of the Ministerial office with the office of High Commissioner, or with reference to the incompatibility, on other grounds, of the office of High Commissioner with the position of a member of Parliament. These are distinct questions; they are questions of the gravest importance, which, as I said early in the Session, I intend to take an opportunity of raising. They are constitutional questions—questions of policy—while this is the question of the seat for Cumberland, and I do not complicate it with a single word with reference to those points. I think it will be made clear by what has occurred that the penalty is not sufficient—that more was required to have prevented this thing. I think it will be clear to the House that a breach of the law has been committed; and in view of the conduct of the Minister, in view of the plainness of the law, in view of the Order in Council which I have read, in view of the moneys which have been received, in view of the course which the Minister has taken since the commencement of this Session in reference to voting, I believe I am not speaking harshly or uncharitably when I say that there has not merely been a breach, but a wilful, a conscious, and an intended violation and breach of the law. That, Sir, is not merely wrong: it is a flagrant insult to this House. It is a flagrant insult to this House that an hon. gentleman, a Minister of the Crown, having no right to sit here, should on false pretences be sitting and moving and addressing this Assembly. I believe, Sir, the House will agree with me that that condition of things should not longer remain; that the people of Cumberland, who for the last nine months have been unrepresented in Parliament, should be placed in a position to be here represented; that this Parliament should be purged of the presence of one who has no right to a place amongst us; and that the House ought to take prompt and decided action. I move:

That it appears, that the office of High Commissioner of Canada is an office in the service of the Government of Canada at the nomination of the Crown, to which salary, wages, allowance, emolument or profit of some kind is attached, within the meaning of the Act for further securing the Independence of Parliament.

That it appears that in addition to the salary of $10,000 a year, attached to the office of High Commissioner, there has been voted yearly, since the establishment of the said office, a sum of $4,000, to cover amongst other things, the payment of house rent, fuel, light, and taxes of the High Commissioner.

That it appears that on the 23rd of March, 1881, it was ordered by the Governor in Council, that in lieu of payment of house rent, fuel, light and taxes, an allowance of $3,500 be made to Sir Alexander Galt, then High Commissioner, to be taken from the annual vote for his personal contingencies (being the said sum of $4,000) to commence from the 1st April, 1881.

That it appears that thereafter during the tenure of the office by Sir Alexander Galt, such allowance was regularly made.

That it appears that Sir Alexander Galt resigned on the 1st June, 1881, and that Sir Charles Tupper, then member for Cumberland, and Minister of Railways and Canals, was appointed High Commissioner of Canada in his place, retaining the office and salary, $7,000 a year, as Minister of Railways and Canals and the Order in Council making and appointment, bearing date the 3rd May, 1883, states, that Sir Charles Tupper has kindly consented to proceed to England and perform the duties of the office for the present without salary; and that the expenses of the High Commissioner will be paid in the same manner as the expenses of Sir Alexander Galt.

That it appears that the said Sir Charles Tupper accepted, and still holds the said office of High Commissioner of Canada.

That it appears that on the 28th August, 1883, the said Sir Charles Tupper, as High Commissioner, received from the Government of Canada £800, or $3,893 33, in respect of the said allowance of $4,000, being neither a fraction of the whole sum voted and payable for the current financial year, ending 30th June, 1884.

That it appears that the said payment is exclusive of the removal expenses of the said Sir Charles Tupper, amounting to $836, and of the travelling expenses of the said Sir Charles Tupper, amounting to $836, and of his travelling expenses as High Commissioner.

That the seat of the said Sir Charles Tupper, as member for Cumberland, was, prior to the commencement of the present Session of Parliament, by reason of the premises vacated, and his election has become null and void.

That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make out a new Writ for the election of a member to serve in this present Parliament for the Electoral District of the County of Cumberland, in the place of Sir Charles Tupper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has stated that this question is one of Parliamentary practice, and he said that he carefully divided the question of the expediency of uniting the two offices from the question of whether Sir Charles Tupper had his seat or not. It is a pity that that principle, that rule, had not been before the hon. gentleman's mind from the time he commenced his speech until the end. But he took the occasion, at a time when he thought, perhaps, my hon. colleague was not in a position to answer, to make an attack on him which did not, I think, raise the hon. gentleman in the opinion of the majority of this House. I shall not imitate his course. I shall not look back to other circumstances, to other individuals, to other votes, and to other speeches and conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, but shall confine myself strictly to the discussion of this question. It is of course impossible for a House like this, composed of a majority of laymen, to come to a conclusion upon it on the nonce, on the spot, on this question being raised for the first time, and I am going to move an amendment to this Resolution, in accordance with the universal and uniform practice of Parliament, that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. This Committee will examine into all the authorities, look into all the cases, report fully upon this question, and inform this House what conclusion they have come to; they will perform the duties for which they have been specially selected, and the House, on their report and with full information, will be able to decide whether my hon. friend has his seat in this House or not. The hon. gentleman says that my hon. friend insulted this House; that he was acting in contravention of the rules of Parliament in speaking, in moving and in pressing questions of importance before this House. All I can say is, this House does not feel the insult. This House knows no insult was intended. My hon. friend has been advised that he did not forfeit his seat. He has been advised that he is still the member for Cumberland and has every right to sit or vote, but the question having been raised in the public press, the hon. gentleman did not choose to record his vote and add to the weight of the opinion of this House on the great questions before it. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the mischief which the Independence of Parliament Act was intended to cure. The Independence of Parliament Act was passed for the purpose of preventing the Government of the day from inducing members who are not members of the Government of the day, who are otherwise independent, to sell their independence for the sake of office, profit or emolument. That is not the case of my hon. friend. He was a Minister at the best or at the worst; it was an accumulation of office. He could not be supposed to be bribing or inducing an independent member of Parliament to sell his principles, to sacrifice his principles, or to give his support to the Government by a promise of office. Mr. Speaker, it does not come within the mischief of the Act, in the first place. It does not come in any way within the mischief which the Act was intended to cure. The hon. gentleman has quoted from Mr. Todd's constitutional work on Parliamentary law. The hon. gentleman knows that that is an authority that is always received with respect in this House, and it so happens that I hold in my hand a letter written by Mr. Todd, which I propose to lay before the Committee, if the House sends this question to be discussed there, in which he says;

"But, on the other hand, the English practice will clearly sustain the member so circumstanced in retaining his seat, as will appear from the following precedents."

He gives a series of precedents on the point, that the seat was not vacated in any way whatever. That was the opinion of Mr. Todd, and the opinion of Mr. Todd as applied to the case of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways.

Mr. BLAKE. As to English practice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As to English practice, I know that perfectly well; but the hon. gentleman commenced by referring to English practice and quoting English cases.

Mr. BLAKE. I said our law was more stringent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Do not interrupt me, please. The hon. gentleman read the Order in Council which stated that Sir Charles Tupper had kindly consented to act as High Commissioner for the present, and, of course, he said, that was understood, and, after the present had disappeared, and the future had become the present, some arrangement would be made to pay him a salary. Mr. Speaker, we all remember the circumstances under which Sir Charles Tupper went to England last year. He was struck down from overwork, and was obliged to absent himself from attendance on this House for nearly a month before the end of the Session. His health was so shaken and imperilled that he thought he would be obliged to give up the position he held in the Government. His colleagues, agreeing in this, I am sure, with the opinion of a majority of this House, thought it would be a great loss to the Government, as it would be to any Government, to lose the services of so able a Minister, so good an administrator, as Sir Charles Tupper, and, Mr. Speaker, I individually pressed the hon. gentleman to go to England. I pressed him to get that rest which he had earned, and which his health demanded, in the hope and in the belief—a belief which, I am happy to say, proved to be correct—that rest from his labours, change of climate and change of work would restore him to the same state of health that all his friends are glad and proud to see him enjoy at this moment. He did so, Mr. Speaker; he went to England; and he went with the express understanding and condition that, during the time he was in England and serving as High Commissioner, he should enjoy no salary. It was a condition made in the Order in Council. The hon. gentleman says that, although it was in the Order in Council, it is not made a condition, it is merely made a statement. But I hold in my hand the commission under the great seal of the Dominion, issued by Lord Lorne, in which it is said:

"Now know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in your loyalty, etc., we do hereby nominate and constitute you, Sir Charles Tupper, knight, to be the High Commissioner for Canada from and after the first day of June next, in the room, place and stead of Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt, knight, whose resignation takes effect on that day, to have, hold, exercise and enjoy the said office unto you the said Sir Charles Tupper, knight, without salary, but otherwise with all the duties, power, rights and advantages unto the said office belonging."

So, Mr. Speaker, he was to go without salary. There was the condition of his office, the condition of his holding, the tenure under which he held the office of High Commissioner. Their argument is: Oh, but there are some emoluments, there are some expenses or allowances; and the hon. gentleman pressed that, that the word "allowance" was to be held to apply to my hon. friend's case, because rent and other expenses were to be paid. The meaning of the Statute is that no party who receives a salary, or anything in lieu of a salary—

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, in lieu of a salary; that is the law. We remember when the law was altered, and the occasion of it. It was said that a man might not receive a salary, but might get an office similar to that of a registrar, where the emoluments came from fees in lieu of a salary.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the fair construction of the Statute, but we know perfectly well that expenses, simply as expenses, allowances in the nature of expenses, or expenses which will be called allowances, stand upon their own footing. We know that our Act was intended to meet the same view that the various Acts in England were passed to meet, to prevent members who were mere hangers on of the Government for emoluments' sake sitting in Parliament and affecting to be independent members when they had no independence. Now, there is a question which the hon. gentleman fairly enough raises, and, if he had confined himself to the legal argument, no one could object to it. He says our Statute is more stringent than the English law. It may be so, and it is a fair argument to use, though I do not see the force of the argument myself. He says that, under the strict construction of our Statute, a member might lose his seat in Canada when he might not in England. That is a fair argument to discuss, and one which I am quite ready to discuss with him before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but the reason we passed the Act is the same as the reason why Acts were passed in England, and the Parliament of Canada had no desire, had no intention I am sure, other than to follow the judicious and praiseworthy precedent set in England, of protecting the independence of Parliament by legislating in the same spirit and in the same direction. We know, Sir, that in England there could be no objection to it. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is not considered an objection in England for a member of Parliament to take an appointment from the Crown, he receiving no pecuniary advantage adding to his means, to his revenue, to his income; if his income is not added to, although his expenses may be paid, every farthing of them. Why, Mr. Gladstone, the Premier of the present Government, when an independent member of Parliament, in opposition to Lord Beaconsfield, accepted the office of Lord High Commissioner to the Ionian Islands, he went in the Queen's ship, he lived in the palace, he occupied it as High Commissioner, every farthing of his enormous expenses was paid during the time he was there to settle the question whether the Ionian Islands should remain under the protectorate of England or be added to the Kingdom of Greece; and no Opposition member, no Ministerial member thought he was offering an insult to Parliament, by accepting large allowances, enormous allowances. No member thought he could attack an opponent by speaking offensively of him or raising the point at all. Mr. Gladstone's independence was known; Mr. Gladstone's expenses were paid, and he had a title almost identical to that which my hon. friend took when he went to England—He was Lord High Commissioner; my hon. friend is High Commissioner. Mr. Gladstone's expenses were paid; my hon. friend's expenses will be paid. But nobody thought for a moment that Mr. Gladstone was offending against the independence of Parliament, or offering an insult to Parliament. No one ever thought that. It was reserved for the hon. gentleman to cast an imputation across the floor against a man of equal standing with himself, and whom he greatly fears—whom he greatly fears, and, Mr. Speaker, if we take the present leader of the Opposition in England, Sir Stafford Northcote, we find that he accepted a commission from Mr. Gladstone as Lord High Commissioner to Washington. And I was there. I did not lose my seat here—because I dare say it would have been brought up against me, I would have been told that I was offering an insult to Parliament, that I was sacrificing my independence by requesting the Governor General to let me go to Washington on an imperial mission. England paid all my expenses, and therefore I could not lose my seat,—and the Lord knows, I have been attacked enough without that. Sir, look at the Public Accounts in England of the expenses of the Lord High Commissioner at Washington. Why, that Commission cost tens of thousands of pounds. Sir Stafford Northcote was not supposed to have forfeited his seat, to have forfeited his independence, or in any way to have infringed upon great constitutional principles, by going to Washington, and then returning home and sitting through the whole Parliament. No one ever thought of taxing him with having committed any impropriety. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is another question—my hon. friend was not only a member of Parliament but he was a member of the Government. There is no point clearer than that a mere accumulation of offices in the Minister, as laid down by the late Mr. Todd—

Mr. BLAKE. Qualifying offices.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says: Supposing that any Minister or any member of Parliament in England had accepted the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, would he not have lost his seat? Yes, Mr. Speaker, he would. Any member of Parliament would have lost his seat; but if the First Lord of the Treasury, a member of the Government, accepts the double office of Chancellor of the Exchequer as well, he does not forfeit his seat. It is an accumulation of offices. He does not forfeit his seat; he keeps his seat. Mr. Gladstone was First Lord of the Treasury and he was Chancellor of the Exchequer—he has given it up now, and Mr. Childers is Chancellor of the Exchequer. If Mr. Childers choose to resign it and if it was convenient for Mr. Gladstone to accept it again, the latter would not lose his seat; he would assume the double office again, but he would keep his seat.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Mr. Gladstone accepted both offices when he took office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That may or may not be the case. I will read upon that point:

"In 1809, when Mr. Percival, Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Portland Administration, was commissioned by the King (upon the Duke of Portland's resignation) to form a new Ministry, he assumed for himself the office of First Lord of the Treasury, in addition to that of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Desirous of knowing whether this act necessitated his reelection, he consulted the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Lord Chancellor, and the law officers of the Crown. All these authorities concurred in the opinion that Mr. Percival's seat was not vacated. (See Walpole, Life of Percival, vol. 2, p. 62).

This memorandum goes on to say:

"It is true that in 1861 Lord Palmerston, then First Lord of the Treasury, vacated his seat and went for re-election upon accepting from the Crown the Lord Wardenship of the Cinque Ports. (See Ashley, Life of Palmerston, vol. 2, p. 207). but this would appear to have been an unnecessary and superfluous proceeding, for in August, 1873, a case parallel to that of Mr. Percival occurred. Mr. Gladstone being then First Lord of the Treasury, assumed, in addition thereto, the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was contended by some persons that under these circumstances the law required that he should offer himself for re-election. But Mr. Gladstone was properly advised by the Crown Law Officers that such a course was unnecessary, inasmuch as an exchange of offices, and an accumulation of offices, by a Minister of the Crown, are identical in principle. Mr. Gladstone accordingly did not vacate his seat. (See Law Times, Vol. 56, p. 246.)

"In point of fact there would be no difference between such a proceeding and that of the continuance of the seat after Parliament had decided to increase the salary attached to the office held by a Minister of the Crown."

There is the principle. Now, when our salary was raised in 1873 from $5,000 to $7,000, we did not vacate our seats; and the addition of another office is simply an accumulation of offices accompanied or unaccompanied, as the case may be, with an addition to the salary. Then Mr. Speaker, on these two points—first, that my hon. friend has not vacated his seat; and in the second place that besides being a member of Parliament, he was Minister of the Crown—on these points according to all the authorities his seat is not in any way affected. It was an accumulation of offices, and he was not liable to the imputation of bribing himself. Now, Sir, I do not propose to elaborate these cases. As you can well see from the manner in which the hon. gentleman has opened the discussion, and the imperfect reply I have made to him—on the nonce—the only word I had that the hon. gentleman was going to move in the matter was just before coming into the House—the House can see that the case presents very many considerations, and opens a very wide question. Therefore, I move the following amendment:—

That all after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted:

The question whether Sir Charles Tupper is now the member for Cumberland, or whether he has vacated his seat as such, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not think the hon. First Minister has any substantial ground of complaint as to the manner in which my hon. friend from West Durham made his proposition. I do not think that any unnecessarily harsh language was used with respect to the hon. Minister of Railways or with respect to the extraordinary and anomalous position the hon. Minister of Railways has occupied in this House for the last six weeks. Now the hon. First Minister tells us that the Minister of Railways was advised that the acceptance of the office of resident representative agent in London did not vacate his seat in Parliament although there were certain emoluments connected with the office. Now, if I am not very much mistaken, the hon. Minister of Railways himself stated in the last Session of Parliament—or if not in Parliament, out of Parliament—that the acceptance of the office of High Commissioner to England would necessarily vacate his seat. I know, at all events, that about the time the late member for Cumberland was appointed to that distinguished position, some organs of the Government intimated to the public that the acceptance of the office of High Commissioner by the member for Cumberland, then Minister of Railways, would necessarily vacate his seat; and it was stated particularly, and stated very distinctly, that the hon. gentleman would not return to his duties in Parliament, that having accepted that office the seat would necessarily become vacant, and there would be a new election for Cumberland. Now, the hon. gentleman referred to the opinion of Mr. Todd on that subject. Of course, we all have great respect for the opinions of Mr. Todd upon questions of constitutional law and constitutional usage. But to make that opinion worth anything, one would require to know exactly what the propositions submitted to Mr. Todd really were. Was Mr. Todd made aware of all the facts connected with this transaction? Was Mr. Todd aware that the Government proposed to give the High Commissioner an allowance of $4,000 a year, which was formerly given to Sir Alexander Galt? And besides, before forming an opinion, as to the weight that should be attached to the views of Mr. Todd, one would require to see what the opinion really is. I have not seen it, I have not heard it read altogether. I do not know the foundation, the groundwork of facts before Mr. Todd when he gave that opinion; and until all these matters are laid before us, the House is not in a position to be asked to act on the opinion of Mr. Todd, however much we may respect Mr. Todd's views respecting constitutional questions. We all know that during the last Session of Parliament the then Minister of Railways was not in very robust health. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) has told us it was at his earnest solicitation that the hon. Minister of Railways accepted this position, because his health was a matter of deep concern to his friends, and the trip across the water was made with a view to recovering his health. But it was an extraordinary mode of aiding Sir Charles Tupper to recover his health to appoint him to a high office involving very considerable duties and very heavy responsibilities. And at the same time to continue him in the responsible position of Minister of Railways. He was not only Minister of Railways and assumed to be discharging all the duties connected with that office, but he was High Commissioner and supposed to be discharging duties connected with a position of such high importance. The hon. gentleman asks the House to believe that the hon. Minister of Railways proceeded to England for his health's sake, when he was actually given additional work to do. I cannot understand that such was the reason why the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was appointed to the position of High Commissioner. The hon. gentleman has told us that the Minister of Railways was appointed to this office without salary. I propose showing, in a moment, that it is of no consequence, in so far as the Minister's right to sit in Parliament was concerned, whether or not he accepted the salary of $10,000 a year attached to the office. The hon. gentleman read a part of the commission appointing Sir Charles High Commissioner. I do not want any better evidence than that which the hon. gentleman himself has submitted to Parliament that his seat is now vacant. It is true that Sir Charles Tupper accepted the position without the salary attached to the office, but he accepted it with all the advantages and privileges, allowances and emoluments, and all the profits and perquisites connected with the office. It seems to me that under the reading of the law now under discussion, in the light of the commission produced, it is just as effectual in vacating the seat whether he accepted the salary attached to the office or not. Then the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government told us that the allowances attached to or in connection with the office were not in lieu of the salary; that they were usually given in England, to English statesmen when discharging important functions abroad and had no relation whatever to the disqualification of a member accepting them. The hon. gentleman will recollect perfectly well that the old law, the law of 1868, provided that:

"No person holding any office or commission or employment in the service of the Government of Canada at the nomination of the Crown to which an annual salary or fee, allowance or emolument in lieu of an annual salary was attached."

Is that the law now? No; the law has been altered and changed. Why? It was found in more than one case that in the practical working of this section of the Act of 1868, methods were constantly adopted of evading it, and therefore it was thought important that there should be no chance given for the Government of the day to employ any person who held a seat in Parliament at either salary or something in lieu of a salary. That law was altered for some purpose. It was altered with the sanction of the hon. gentleman. It was altered in 1871 by the hon. gentleman himself. Why did he alter it? If the law was right, as the hon. gentleman says it now is, why was the law of 1868 altered? Why did the hon. gentleman in 1871 pass the Statute in question? Let us see what the law says:

"No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada, at the nomination of the Crown, to which an annual salary or any fee allowance or emoluments, or profit of any kind or amount whatever from the Crown is attached, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote in the same during the time he holds such office, commission or employment."

You will have observed, Mr. Speaker, that the old Statute simply provided that no person receiving any salary or anything in lieu of a salary should be appointed to an office in the gift of the Crown and at the same time occupy a seat in Parliament. The law is much broader, wider and fuller now than it was in 1868, when the old law was in operation. It now provides that no member of Parliament shall be appointed to any position at the nomination of the Crown to which any salary or any fee, or any emolument, or any allowance, or any profit of any kind is attached. Will the hon. gentleman pretend to argue that the $4,000 a year which is the allowance made by Parliament to the High Commissioner, is not an allowance, an emolument or a profit under this Act? Unless the hon. gentleman can argue that, and that is the law which I have just read, he cannot for one moment be heard to say that the late member for Cumberland is entitled to sit in Parliament. The hon. gentleman has referred to several cases in England where a Minister of the Crown was appointed to a similar position, with allowances, without vacating his seat; but in every one of these cases the individual had a right by law to hold office and still occupy his seat in Parliament. Will the hon. gentleman argue that he can appoint a Minister of the Crown to be Collector of Customs? Can the hon. gentleman say that Sir Charles Tupper can receive the emoluments and allowances attached to this office, and at the same time sit as the member for Cumberland? I say it can't be done. The First Minister says this is a complicated question, a difficult question, a question of law and fact, which requires investigation; it is not a plain question, and therefore he wishes it referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That was not the hon. gentleman's opinion always. To my mind it is a perfectly clear case, and there can be no doubt respecting the interpretation of the law bearing on the case. If the hon. gentleman were called upon as counsel to give an opinion as to the effect of the wording of the Statute of 1878, he would not have any doubt regarding it. To me, Sir, this is just as clear and perhaps clearer than the position of a member of the late Parliament of Canada in 1877 was to the First Minister then. A motion was made in that Session to refer the case of a member of that Parliament to the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the ground that he had some contract with the Government. The hon. gentleman waxed indignant at the proposition; he said it should not be done, that there was no necessity to do it, that the law was perfectly clear, that the responsibility rested on the shoulders of the Government and that the Government ought to deal with the matter promptly. They were, he said, responsible to Parliament and the country for the mode in which the laws were administered, and they knowing, as they must have known, that the member in question had vacated his seat by having accepted a contract under the Government, it was the duty of the Government to declare the seat vacant and to order the issue of a writ for a new election; and the hon. gentleman protested against its being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That was the line which the hon. gentleman took then; and if he will refer to the language which he made use of in 1877, when discussing this question, he will find that what I have stated is absolutely correct. Now in this case, it appears to me that the law is manifestly clear; I cannot see how there can be the possibility of a doubt about its meaning. The facts are in a nutshell; there is no mystery, no complication about them, unless the right hon. gentleman can place some mysterious and unheard of construction on the Statute which makes it illegal for members to hold seats in Parliament who are appointed to offices with salaries or allowances attached. The member for Cumberland, while Minister of Railways, was appointed High Commissioner under the provisions of the Statute to which my hon. friend from West Durham has referred. Now it is true that in the commission appointing the hon. gentleman and I believe in the Order in Council as well, the office is conferred without the salary, but with all the advantages connected therewith. There was evidently here a premeditated, designed attempt, to evade the law, on the part of the First Minister, who intended from the very time he advised his colleague to accept this office, that he should not only be Minister of Railways, but should be High Commissioner, with all the allowances and perquisites attached to that office, and that he should, at the same time, occupy his seat in Parliament. That was the intention and the design, otherwise there could be no object in providing in the Order in Council and in the commission that the office should be accepted without salary. We can thus see how the law can be evaded, how it can be trifled with, if the hon. gentleman can appoint any member of the Government to the highest, and most responsible position in the service of the Government, and still permit him to occupy his seat on the floor of Parliament. Suppose the salary attached to this office was $1,000, or even $100 dollars, and the perquisite, allowances, emoluments and profits were $10,000; the nominee could easily say "I will accept this office without salary, but I insist upon my 'allowance' of $10,000." He would then be receiving every dollar to which he would be entitled if he were appointed with the full salary stated in the commission, and thus evade the law. All the hon. gentleman has to do is to change the law, make the salary say $1,000, and the emoluments $10,000 or $15,000, and the Minister of Railways can hold this office and retain his seat in Parliament as long as he likes. Now, it is worth while drawing the attention of the House for a moment or two to the peculiar wording of the Statute of 1880, authorizing the appointment of a High Commissioner to England. Here are the words:

"The High Commissioner shall receive a salary of not more than $10,000 per annum, and the same shall be payable out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue fund of Canada."

Now you see, that by an Act of Parliament, a salary of $10,000 is attached to the office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, the High Commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, that is the salary, which by the wording of the Act, is attached to the office, and it is open to no other reasonable construction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A salary not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. CAMERON. That does not affect the question. I do not care if the hon. gentleman by Order in Council makes the salary $5,000 or $15,000. What I say is that the salary is attached to the office of High Commissioner, and the Government have no power, by an Order in Council, to deprive the nominee to that office of the salary which is attached to it. I lay it down as a legal proposition, and I defy the hon. gentleman to contradict me; that in defiance of the Order in Council the hon. member for Cumberland might if he saw fit to-morrow bring an action against the Government to recover that $10,000, and there is not a court in Canada but would give him a verdict for $10,000. To-morrow, the hon. gentleman may get a new commission appointing him anew to that office, and he may by that commission get the full salary of $10,000, and say further that if Parliament and the country should unfortunately be deprived of the hon. gentleman's services as a representative in this House, he can bring an action against the Government for and recover every dollar of the $10,000 of salary attached to the position of High Commissioner. Now, if you look at the disqualifying Act, you will find that it declares:

"No person accepting or holding any office, commission, or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada, at the nomination of the Crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance, or emolument, or profit, of any kind is attached, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons," etc.

Now, the salary is attached to the office, as I contend, and I say that the moment you admit that proposition, the other necessarily follows. The salary being attached to the office, the hon. gentlemen having accepted the office, he is entitled to the salary and necessarily vacates his seat. But I do not think it is necessary to go that far, in order to show that the hon. gentleman is disqualified from occupying his seat. We have here the word "allowance." What is the meaning of the word? Does it mean salary? No, for if it did there would be no necessity for putting it there. The hon. gentleman who passed the Act of 1871, from which this clause is taken, must have attached some different meaning to the word "allowance," or the word "emolument" or "profit" besides the meaning attached to the word "salary." These words have each a different meaning and signification. Now let us look what is the meaning of the word "allowance," because if it can be shown that the Minister of Railways has received any allowance, and that "allowance" has a distinct meaning, apart from the word "salary," he is disqualified by the Act. Worcester says that the meaning of the word is: "That which is allowed for the expenses of maintenance." Now, what is the hon. gentleman receiving this money for if not for the purpose of maintaining himself and family on the other side of the water, and if so it comes under the provisions of the law. Worcester says that another meaning is "a limited portion of food and drink." Of course £800 sterling would pay for a considerable portion of food and drink; but there is still another meaning, "something conceded as a compensation." He gives another definition—he says an allowance is gratuitous, and may be paid in any form. Now, that is just the position here. I do not recollect at this moment whether there is any statutory law fixing the exact amount that should go to the High Commissioner by way of allowance. I understand that to be entirely in the discretion of Parliament; it is a mere gratuity—something given for the purpose of maintaining the position. It is given every year by Parliament, with the sanction of the Ministers of the Crown, and on their advice and responsibility; and having been given by Parliament and received by the High Commissioner, I say the hon. gentleman has brought himself under the disqualifying Act, and that beyond all reasonable doubt. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman got £800 sterling shortly after he was appointed. What has he done with it? Was it given for the purpose of maintaining him? Will the hon. First Minister say it was not given for that purpose? Because if he cannot say so, his argument goes for nothing. Can he say it was not compensation for the services rendered by the hon. gentleman? Can he say it was not part of the emoluments, part of the perquisites of the office? Can he say it was not some pecuniary gain or advantage or benefit? If he cannot say so, I maintain that the case of the hon. member for Cumberland comes under the disqualifying Act, and that his seat is now vacant. Now, Sir, let us for a single moment see if there is any loop-hole by means of which the hon. gentleman can evade the provisions of the Act of 1878—any means by which he can say, although I received $4,000 from the Government of Canada to maintain and support me, to pay my house rent and my fuel and gas bill—any means by which, having admitted all that, he can evade the provisions of this Act. Now, we know perfectly well that these sums have been paid all along. In 1880, when the office was established, we paid a large sum by way of "allowances"—say over $5,000; in 1881 Parliament voted $1,000 for the same purpose; and in 1883 the Public Accounts show that a sum of £542 18s. 2d. was paid on account of the office of High Commissioner in England. I do not know what the items are that make up that sum, in addition to the salary of $10,000. Now, I ask again, what were these sums paid for? I say they were the "allowances," the "emoluments," the perquisites of the office, and the hon.

gentleman, having received them, I contend, vacated his seat for Cumberland. If it could be shown that there was any doubt or misapprehension on the part of the hon. gentleman as to what the law really was on the subject, if it could be shown that the hon. gentleman misread or misunderstood the provisions of the Act of 1878 for preventing members of Parliament from holding offices in the gift of the Crown with salaries attached, in that case perhaps the course suggested by the hon. First Minister would be the correct one. I ask you if there is any doubt—if the hon. gentleman has not, knowingly, wilfully occupied a seat in Parliament, knowing that he was disqualified? Has the hon. gentleman done it in ignorance? No; he appears to have done it in wilful defiance of the law. What has been the hon. gentleman's conduct in Parliament? If he had misapprehended or misread or misunderstood the law, there might be some ground for the motion made by the hon. First Minister; but he could not have misunderstood the law. He has been here since the first day Parliament opened, advocating certain measures. By his own energy, force and eloquence he has almost carried some of these measures through Parliament; but, as the hon. member for West Durham says, when it became necessary for a vote to be recorded, we found the hon. gentleman leaving the House, and not backing his opinion by his vote. If the hon. gentleman was acting in good faith, there could be no reason for his shirking the responsibilities attaching to every member of Parliament, introducing a Bill, the responsibility of voting for it to become law. I say he has violated the law openly and knowingly, else he would not have taken that course; and having violated the law openly and knowingly, he does not deserve any consideration at the hands of Parliament, and his seat ought to be declared vacant at the earliest moment. I ask the hon. First Minister to point to a single instance, in the whole history of Parliamentary Government, in this or any other country, in which a Minister of the Crown has pursued the course which has been pursued by the hon. Minister of Railways in this instance, or in which even a member of Parliament has pursued such a course? The hon. gentleman will fail to adduce a single instance that will justify the hon. Minister of Railways in the course he has pursued. I know that the hon. Minister of Railways has said and done many extraordinary things in his long and eventful political career; but the most extraordinary thing he ever did was to sit in Parliament when he had no right to do so, and to initiate and carry through Parliament measures of legislation, when he was not prepared to assume the responsibility of backing up his views by his vote. The hon. gentleman had no right to be here during the whole of this Session of Parliament, and I say that from his conduct one can come to no other conclusion than that the hon. gentleman knew that he had no right to be here. Now, let us see what the hon. First Minister himself said when a Bill was submitted to Parliament in 1877 on this subject. Let us see what high ground he then took against members in similar circumstances to those of the hon. Minister of Railways, occupying their places on the floor of Parliament. The hon. gentleman was then a real purist in this matter; if there was not any doubt but that the seat became vacant by the conduct of the member, the matter ought to be dealt with promptly by Parliament; then, the hon. gentleman's opinion was that members of Parliament should be, like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. But now, he allows his colleague to occupy his seat for six weeks, and to initiate and carry measures through Parliament, when he knows that by the Statute he had no more right to a seat in Parliament than the door-keeper without the door there. Now, I say that the hon. gentleman took high ground in 1877, when questions were under discussion that related to independence of Parliament, and when a Bill was introduced for the purpose of indemnifying persons who had unwittingly violated the law. The hon. gentleman does not take such high ground to-day. The hon. gentleman knows that in olden times they did not refer cases of this kind to the Committee on Elections and Privileges. They had a summary way of dealing with men who occupied seats on the floor of Parliament which they had no right to occupy, and I sometimes regret we have not to-day more of those sturdy out-spoken vindicators of the Constitution in Parliament. If we had, this question would have been dealt with in the earlier days of the Session, and the hon. the Minister of Railways would not have been occupying for the last six weeks a seat in Parliament which he had by his own conduct forfeited. In the olden days, if a member of Parliament accepted an office under the Crown to which any allowance or any fee was attached, they did not go through the formality of referring his case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but his seat was at once declared vacant, and he was expelled from Parliament, if he had not the good sense to resign. Parliament expelled him without hesitation, if he had the indecency to sit in Parliament without having the right to his seat. Two hundred years ago that was the course taken, and I say I regret we have not to-day more of the sturdy old vindicators of the Constitution in Parliament that they had 200 years ago. Then, in 1693, Mr. Isaacson was expelled for having acted as Commissioner of Stamp Duties. They had no such strict law then as now, they had no law at all of the character of the law we have now, yet so anxious were they to maintain the freedom and the independence of Parliament that no person who occupied a position under Government with any allowance attached to it, was allowed to sit in Parliament. Mr. Cornish in the same year was expelled for the same reason. Yet to-day we have the hon. gentleman, as High Commissioner, receiving £300 sterling for allowances and perquisites for the purpose of meeting the expenses connected with his own maintenance in his mission to England—we have Ministers admitting that, yet we have him sitting on the floor of this House, not voting, it is true, but initiating and carrying through the Legislation of the country, just as if he had not been appointed to any office except the one he holds as Minister of Railways. In 1700 Sir Henry Furness was expelled for acting as trustee for circulating Exchequer Bills; in the same year Mr. Heathcote was expelled for the same offence; in 1762, the seat of Mr. Lind who had accepted the office of Conservator of the privileges of the Scotch nation in the Netherlands and resident there for the affairs of Scotland, was declared vacant. None of these cases were anything like as clear and strong as that of the hon. Minister of Railways, yet in all of them the seats were declared vacant and in some of them the members were expelled. In 1869 a new writ was issued for Poole in the room of Mr. Jeffrey, Consul-General to the Queen of Portugal; and in the Cambridge Election case in 1866, it was determined that the Counsel to the Secretary of State for India was disqualified to sit and vote in Parliament, as holding a new office created under the India Act of 1858. There was no salary attached to that office; there was no lump sum fixed as salary; the Counsel got fees or "allowances" only, and yet his seat was declared vacant because he was appointed to a position of emolument under the Crown. Here, however, in defiance of the Act of Parliament, in the face of his own Commission, in the face of the fact that he received these allowances and perquisites, he sees fit to occupy a seat in Parliament; and it appears from the statement of the hon. the First Minister that the hon. the First Minister is disposed to justify him. If we only do our duty towards Parliament and the people, we shall declare this seat vacant now. Hon. gentlemen will understand that the disqualification for a seat in Parliament does not depend entirely on the salary attached to the office, but, as the hon. member for West Durham showed, if there are any emoluments, perquisites or allowances attached to the office, the seat becomes vacant just the same as if a fixed salary were attached to it. Before the recent changes in the law in England, the office of King's Sergeant, an office of importance, had no salary attached to it, and if the hon. gentleman will enquire he will find that when Mr. Sergeant Best was appointed to that distinguished position, he had the patent creating him King's Sergeant so drawn that it would not contain the words usually contained in a patent of that kind. He had it so drawn, that it gave him only the office and not the perquisites connected with it. These perquisites were not in money or in allowances for fuel, maintenance, coal, or house rent, but there was a certain quantity of stationery given to the King's Sergeant each year, and in order that he might not, on this account, be disqualified to hold his seat in Parliament, Mr. Best had the patent so drawn as to exclude the words granting these perquisites. This is a case in point. It was admitted that if the patent had been issued in the usual form, Mr. Best would have been disqualified from occupying a seat in Parliament, and to get over that difficulty every perquisite connected with the office was excluded from the operation of the patent. Is that the case here? No, Sir, the advantages, the perquisites and the allowances attached to the office of High Commissioner are all handed over to the hon. Minister of Railways. Another case in point, is that of the Chiltern Hundreds. In England, the only way a seat can be vacated in Parliament is by the member receiving the appointment to and accepting the office of Steward or Bailiff of one of Her Majesty's three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Bournemouth. Everybody knows there is no salary attached to these offices, but there are certain perquisites attached to them, and as the warrants appointing members to the positions say: "Together with all wages, fees, allowances, etc.," they assume the form of places of profit, and thus vacate the seat. The hon. the Minister of Railways has his fees, with the emoluments and allowances connected with the office of High Commissioner, and he took good care to get the allowances before he left Canadian territory to discharge the important duties that devolved upon him in connection with this mission. There could not be a clearer case than the case referred to by the hon. member for West Durham, that of Viscount Palmerston. It is a case expressly in point. The very words used in appointing the hon. Minister of Railways to the office of High Commissioner are the very words used in the appointment of Viscount Palmerston, in 1881, to the distinguished office of Constable of Dover Castle. The hon. Minister of Railways accepted office without the salary, but with the perquisites and the allowances—with an allowance of £800 sterling—and yet he still occupies a seat on the floor of Parliament. There was never a greater outrage perpetrated upon Parliament.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. CAMERON. Hon. gentlemen opposite may call derisively, oh, oh. I do not expect anything else from hon. gentlemen. They sustained the hon. Minister of Railways in forcing the Bill through Parliament, giving $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway; now they will defend and justify him for illegally occupying a seat in Parliament. I say boldly, that no member of Parliament ever occupied a more humiliating position than the hon. Minister of Railways. He comes illegally into Parliament; he forces legislation through Parliament, and at the critical moment, when the vote is to be taken, and after having rallied his friends, the hon. Minister rallies, Mr. Speaker, behind your chair. He told us the other day he always had the courage of his convictions, that he always voted according to them; but his courage to-day, like that of the immortal Bob Acres, oozed out of his finger ends. What has the hon. gentleman to be afraid of? The Act of Parliament provides in clear terms that he is not entitled to sit or vote in Parliament, and that he who sits and votes in Parliament without the right to be there, shall be liable to a penalty of $200 for each offence. He is liable to a penalty of $400 per day, if he sits and votes. The hon. gentleman's courage was only equal to his convictions to the extent of half of $400. I say now that, if we want to sustain the independence and freedom of this Parliament, if we want to maintain the honour and dignity of this Parliament, if we want that the fountains of legislation shall be pure and uncorrupted, if we do not want to have members here who are incapable of giving free and unbiassed voice to their opinion, then the motion of my hon. friend from West Durham ought to prevail, and ought to prevail now. I shall vote for that motion. I shall support that motion. I shall, with all my power, both of voice and vote, sustain that position, and it is the only honourable and fair position that a man can take. I am satisfied that, if you search the history of this country you will find no parallel to the case of the hon. gentleman, and I trust that the student of the history of Canada in the future will find no case except the case of the hon. the Minister of Railways, where a Minister has been appointed to an important position, with emoluments, and allowances, and perquisites attached to that office, and yet has not had the courage to go before his constituents and ask for their confirmation of the position which he has taken, if a confirmation could be had in the case of the hon. gentleman. There is no justification for it. There is no justification for the position that the Minister of Railways occupies. There is no justification for the position the Government occupy, knowing full well for the last month that the Minister of Railways had no more right to that seat than the page who is on the floor of Parliament, and the Ministers have been derelict in their duty to the people and to the Parliament of this country; otherwise, on the opening day of the Session, they would have introduced the resolution that my hon. friend has now introduced, and declared the seat for Cumberland vacant.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I observed that the First Minister commenced his speech, in reply to my hon. friend from West Durham, by accusing him of having degraded the debate by making certain observations. These were not observations of my hon. friend himself, but he read them from a speech made by the hon. the Minister of Railways some two or three years ago, and addressed to the House on an occasion similar to that which occupies the attention of the House at this moment. It seemed to me, when the First Minister made his observations, that they were rather a censure upon his colleague than an attack upon my hon. friend, for, if it were an improper thing to quote those observations, how much more improper was it for the hon. gentleman who addressed them to the House. The First Minister said that these perquisites which the hon. gentleman received, these allowances which were voted him, were no part of his salary, and that the Independence of Parliament Act expressly provided that it was only allowances given in lieu of salary which could disqualify a member for sitting in the House. The hon. gentleman, it is quite obvious, had forgotten the words of the Independence of Parliament Act. Those were the words in the Act many years ago, but the right hon. gentleman himself ought to have remembered that a colleague of his proposed an amendment to the Act in consequence of objections made to the present Judge Gray for sitting in the House. Mr. Gray was paid in a particular way for undertaking the codification of the laws of the Provinces. The hon. gentleman had appointed Mr. Gray to that office. He proposed to pay him in a way different from that provided by the Independence of Parliament Act, and it was for the express purpose of meeting that particular case that the Act was changed at that time, and has been further changed and made more strict in its provisions since that time. One thing that impressed itself on my mind very strongly, when the hon. gentleman was addressing himself to the motion of my hon. friend, was this: He said there was no objection to a Minister holding an accumulation of offices. That is true, if the offices are such as a Minister is entitled to hold, or any party is entitled to hold and sit in the House. But he took this position, that a Minister might hold a position which would disqualify any other member. The hon. gentleman held, as I infer from his remarks, that it is perfectly true that, if a private member of the House were appointed to this particular office, he would vacate his seat, but that the rules which apply to other members under this Independence of Parliament Act do not apply to a Minister of the Crown, because a Minister of the Crown cannot be influenced to vote for the Administration, he cannot be purchased to vote in the way an ordinary member can, and therefore the reasons for the law relating to the independence of Parliament do not apply to a Minister of the Crown. But, Mr. Speaker, in looking at the Independence of Parliament Act, I find other provisions. I find it is declared that persons holding certain fees, wages, allowances, or profit of any kind whatever shall be disqualified to sit in the House. I find that the Act goes on and makes certain exceptions, and in the exceptions it includes persons holding certain offices, Secretary of State, Minister of Justice, Minister of the Interior, and other Cabinet offices are mentioned, and it further continues in these words: "Or any office which may be hereafter created to be held by a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada"—any other office which may be created to be held by a Minister of the Crown. Is this an office created to be held by a Minister of the Crown? Is it a Cabinet office? Certainly not. It was created, and Sir Alexander Galt was appointed to it. It was created for the purpose of being held by some one who is not a Minister of the Crown, for the purpose of being held outside of the Government altogether. The character of the office is not changed by appointing a Minister of the Crown to it. The moment he is appointed, he vacates his seat in Parliament. What would be the conclusion which would flow from the statement of the right hon. the leader of the House? The conclusion would be that the hon. member for Cumberland may accept this office and continue to sit here, and it does not affect his seat because he is a Minister of the Crown; but, if he resigned his seat in the Cabinet, he would be disqualified, because as a private member he would be holding an office in which he might be influenced to support the Government against his judgment. That shows that the line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman is not tenable. Can it be that Sir Charles Tupper, that the Minister of Railways, could hold this office without its affecting his seat, because he is a member of the Government, and that, by resigning his position as a member of the Government, the Independence of Parliament Act would be revived against him, and his seat would be vacated because he was High Commissioner? That is sufficient to show that the construction which the hon. gentleman seeks to place upon the law is not a reasonable construction; and we have, besides, the rule that the inclusion of certain offices is the exclusion of all others. You have in this Act declared, on general principles, that any party holding an office of profit or emolument, to which a salary is attached, shall thereby vacate his seat; you have in addition to that certain exceptions taken, and those exceptions include certain Cabinet offices now existing or certain other Cabinet offices which it may be found necessary hereafter to create; and when these are specially mentioned, it is perfectly obvious that no other offices can be included within that exception, except those expressly set forth.

Mr. MILLS.

That being the case, I think it is perfectly clear that the seat of the Minister of Railways has become vacant in this House, and I shall vote for the motion of my hon. friend, and against the proposition of the First Minister, because I have no doubt in my mind, and I think an enquiry is altogether unnecessary.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Speaker, I rise, first, to protest, as a member of this House, against the imputation which I think is wrongly cast upon the conduct of a member of this House and of a member of the Government, who has, in the office which he has accepted in the disinterested manner in which he has done it, not only not forfeited his seat in Parliament, but certainly acquired the thanks of this Parliament, the thanks of the people of this country. I may say, speaking personally, that I have also been prompted to rise upon this occasion, in order to set aside once for all the absurd and unfounded rumours which have been circulated by Opposition papers, that there had been dissensions between myself and the hon. Minister of Railways. Our political, official and personal intimacy has never ceased, and not even a shadow has ever come over our intercourse. Therefore, I hope this rumour will be forever set at rest in the minds of those people who have nothing else to do but to try to excite division in camps that are never divided. I was sorry that the mover of the first resolution thought necessary to use expressions which, upon an occasion of this kind, were not warranted. I think, in a discussion of a question so important, hon. members might have avoided personal attacks upon the hon. member against whom this proposition is made. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman who has made the proposition, that the hon. member for Cumberland, in accepting the office, did not do so for the purpose of making any profit or lucre, which is forbidden by law and by honesty. I desire to say a word as to the manner in which the High Commissioner has performed his duties in England and in Europe. It is known to every one that he has occupied that position with great credit to this country. On more than one occasion he has performed services which have gained for him the gratitude of the whole community. On one occasion we know that it was owing solely to his personal energy, solely to his special acquaintance with certain parts of science, that he was able to secure great advantages to this country in one of the most important branches of its trade. I, for one, am exceedingly happy to render this testimony in his favour. On one or two occasions the hon. Minister of Railways has visited France in order to pursue negotiations toward extending commercial relations between France and Canada. I have had correspondence with eminent men in France who have spoken highly of that hon. gentleman's high qualities, and have acknowledged the credit he was doing to this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, in coming to the question before the House we should endeavour not to confuse two separate questions—the position of a member of Parliament, and the position of a member of the Government. An hon. member has quoted the Statute of 1868 and has contended that that Statute clearly shows what was the real intention of our Parliament at that time, and what the view was in England when similar Statutes were passed. That clause has been repealed, but it was not repealed for the reason mentioned by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). That clause stated that a member of Parliament would be disqualified by holding any office to which was attached any salary or emolument, or for which he received anything "in lieu" of a salary. What was, and what is, the intention of Parliament? Everybody knows that it is to prevent a member of Parliament from being under the undue influence of the Crown by receiving certain profits or emoluments that might destroy his independence as a representative of the people. The words "or anything in lieu of a salary," were added because fees might be given to a professional man really amounting to a yearly salary, or to prevent accepting offices where a commission on dues collected would have taken the place of emoluments. It was never meant to cover the case of a member of the Government for performing certain services and incurring certain expenses, and in which position he could in no wise be unduly influenced by the Crown. In that case, the Minister is still in the pay of the Crown, and the Statute was never meant to cover such a case. It was not intended to prevent a member of the Government from being paid his necessary personal expenses when acting in the capacity of an agent of the Government if that capacity was not inconsistent with the duty he had to perform as such member of the Government. The hon. member has asked whether a member of the Government could be appointed, for instance, Collector of Customs at Toronto, or Montreal, and receive fees or salary therefor. No Sir, he could not, because then he would be receiving a salary or a fee. But I would put the question in another shape. Suppose a difficulty arose in one of the districts of British Columbia in respect to the collection of Customs, and suppose the Minister of Customs, by an Order in Council, was authorized to go and settle the difficulty which the Collector of Customs himself could have settled, and suppose the Minister, in fulfilling this mission, was promised that his expenses would be paid, would he thereby be disqualified? Would he be disqualified for doing the work of a Collector of Customs? Suppose a Minister of the Crown was sent on a mission abroad, as has been the case in England, and that he was also authorized to perform other duties, but without receiving a salary therefor, and if the Order in Council appointing him, specially mentioned that no salary was attached to the mission—in that case would he not be entitled to have his expenses paid? The hon. member says that two hundred years ago the members of the English House of Commons were a great deal more strict in these matters than we are now, that the proceedings were more rigorous, and that a member of Parliament who received any money from the Crown would not be entitled to keep his seat. Two hundred years ago the law upon the subject was not more severe than it is to-day. All I know is that during the last century, during the continental wars of the first Empire, there was a celebrated man who was, for several months, on the continent fulfilling important duties. This Minister, I am sure, received large sums of money, from the British Government, and no one ever imagined that, acting as he did in a public capacity for the Government, he forfeited his seat in Parliament—I refer to Lord Castlereagh. Is it not a fact that the spirit of the law in England has ever been that Ambassadors and Ministers to Foreign Courts still held their seats in Parliament? They did so long before any legislation enabling them to retain their seats whilst under pay from the Crown. Two hundred years ago the spirit of the law in England, being the same as it is to-day in Canada, did not exclude from seats in Parliament those Ministers who received both the salaries and the expenses of their mission. The acceptance of a commission in the army did not prevent a member from occupying a seat in Parliament. It will be answered that these cases have been provided for by Statute. But I say it was the intention of the English Parliament, and it was held long before any law was enacted in that respect, that the fact of Ministers accepting special missions and receiving money from the Crown in respect to such missions, should not prevent them from holding seats in Parliament. Our Statutes, and especially the Statute of 1878, all point in the same direction. The Act of 1878 provides:—

"No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada at the nomination of the Crown or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages allowance or emolument or profit of any kind is attached."

There is the meaning of the law, the spirit of the Statute, the intention of the Legislature: that is to say, that the holding of any office with a "profit of any kind," which is equivalent to a fee for the performance of work done, equivalent to a fee for the time taken up in such employment, such fee, such emolument, such allowance, being a profit for work done, is considered to be a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. I need not refer to the assertion, because I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will not take the point much into consideration, that in the Order in Council referring to the appointment of the Minister of Railways, no mention is made of any salary; on the contrary, the salary is specially suppressed. Again the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) said that the Minister of Railways or his heirs and assigns, after he had left his seat in the House, could recover the amount of $10,000 salary as High Commissioner. Well, we all know such exaggerations are not to be taken into consideration by this House; but the statement shows to what means hon. gentlemen opposite will have recourse in order to try and make an argument. So the question is, whether the office which the Minister of Railways held and the services rendered by him in his capacity as High Commissioner, were such as to render him, as a member of the Government unfit to hold his seat in Parliament. I say no. I say that, because a member of the Cabinet can, outside of his Department, fill a mission, at the bid of the Crown and for the benefit of the country, provided he has done it and given the whole of his time and the benefit of his experience, talents and efforts, without hope of any profit whatever to himself, and no Statute forbids that his expenses in the service of his Government and the country should, under such circumstances, be paid to him. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) contended that much depended on whether the office held was one which could be held hereafter by a Minister of the Crown, and he affirmed that the office of High Commissioner could not be held by a Minister of the Crown. Suppose for a moment that the expenses of the Minister of Railways in England and on the continent had not been paid, surely this question would not have arisen, or if it had arisen, it would have fallen to the ground. The argument of the hon. member for Bothwell, that it was not competent for the Minister of Railways to fill an office which cannot be held by a Minister of the Crown, cannot obtain, because I contend that a Minister can lawfully, and according to the Statutes, be appointed High Commissioner, provided he receives nothing in the shape of profit, as set forth in the Statute, and salary is specially mentioned in the Order in Council as not to be received by him, and it has not been received by him. Then the whole question is whether the sum received is a fee or an emolument, or whether it is only the ordinary expenses which a Minister of the Crown can receive; and I hold the opinion that it is one of those cases. It is to be regretted that such a case should have been brought before the House. Everyone acquainted with the work performed by the High Commissioner, would consider it a degradation of Parliament to indict and impeach a Minister of the Crown and member of Parliament for having done gratuitously duty for which everyone will praise him and which the country will thank him for having performed.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. First Minister will lay on the Table the entire letter, from which he read an extract.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will give the hon. gentleman a copy of it.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the debate closes? Before eight o'clock?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. There is an ominous "but" in it. It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CASEY. I should hardly have troubled the House with regard to what appears to me to be a very clear and simple case, were it not for my connection with a former case of a somewhat similar character, in the discussion of which the right hon. Premier and other members on that side of the House took a very different position from that which they now take. I refer to the motion with regard to the seat of the hon. Mr. Anglin, then Speaker of this House, who was accused of being in the position of a contractor under the Government, and of having thereby vacated his seat in Parliament. It will be remembered, Sir, that on that occasion the attack was made, not as now, by a motion capable of being amended, capable of being dealt with by the House in the ordinary way, but by an amendment moved to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, when no amendment could be made, when, consequently, a subsequent motion with regard to the disposal of the case could not be made until after the original amendment was disposed of. Now, Sir, on that occasion, I moved the reference of the whole case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the right hon. Premier, yourself, Sir, and other prominent members of the party, directly opposed that reference, claiming that the case was a clear one on the face of it, that no matter of law or fact was in doubt, and that it was one which the House could and should dispose of without reference to any Committee. I venture to think that the cases are very different; that on that occasion there were matters of fact and matters of law in doubt, as shown by the fact that opposing views of those matters of law and of fact were taken by members on the same side—by the members of the then Opposition themselves. There were matters of law in doubt as was shown by the finding of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who found that there had been, on a previous occasion, a precedent for exactly similar transactions taking place without vacating the seat of the member whose right to sit was in question. They found that a member of this House had previously held a printing contract under the Government without vacating his seat, but that in view of subsequent legislation, in view of the moral aspect of the case, it was inadvisable to abide by those precedents, and they consequently reported in favour of vacating the seat. Now, Sir, if at that time, in a case where there was on the face of it so much room for doubt, where there was room for enquiry—room for doubt as to the law as well as to the facts—if, in such a case, the right hon. gentleman opposite felt it his duty to urge that the House should proceed to execution at once, without further form of trial, then certainly it is the duty of the House to proceed in the present case without reference to a Committee. I must here quote a few remarks on this point by one of the leading legal gentlemen of the House, the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in regard to this matter. He is reported as having said:—

"The position which he took was simply this. He believed there was no subject for enquiry by a Committee. If there was any doubt which would render a reference to a Committee necessary, he would not support the resolution. But no person had suggested that the facts could be questioned."

Now, Sir, I think the analogy is complete. Nobody suggests here that the facts of the case can be questioned. There is no doubt whatever that the hon. gentleman who has been acting as Minister of Railways was appointed as High Commissioner; no doubt that he went to England; no doubt that money was paid to him, which he received and converted to his own use. Then the member for North Simcoe proceeded to say:

"What could the Committee say or do? It could only say that the member for Gloucester had entered into a contract for printing with the Government, for which he received the money, and that they found this to be a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. But the House knew all about that without a Committee."

Now, Sir, what could a Committee say in this matter? They could only say that they found that certain payments had been made to the hon. gentleman in question, that those payments were contrary to the Independence of Parliament Act, and that therefore, to use the words of the hon. member for North Simcoe, "there was no object in sending the matter to a Committee." There is no object now, more than there was then, in sending the matter to a Committee, because, unless the Committee have some peculiar power of manipulating language so as to make it mean something else than is meant upon the face of it, the hon. gentleman's other contention on that occasion, that there is no question of law, is borne out here. The words of the Act have been quoted by my hon. friend beside me, and by other hon. members, that any allowances, or fees, or profits, constitute a breach of the Act. Now, Sir, if this allowance, amounting to £800, is not an allowance in the terms of the Act, I cannot imagine what would be an allowance. It is by the resolution of the House as much a part of the emolument of the High Commissioner as the original salary of $10,000 is; it is as much something for the private use of the Commissioner as his salary is; it is as much an allowance, or an emolument, or a profit, as any other money received in connection with a position could possibly be. Now, as I contend, the facts are admitted. There is no room for doubts as to the facts; and I contend that there is equally little room for doubt as to the interpretation of the Statute. Indeed, this has been practically admitted by the Secretary of State (Mr. Chapleau), who spoke this afternoon in defence of his colleague. He did not attempt to say that there was not any breach of the letter of the Statute; he practically admitted that the letter of the law had been broken, but he contended that the spirit of the law was intact. He asked what was the intention of Parliament in passing this Act, and he replied that it was to maintain the independence of members of Parliament; that it never was intended to prevent a member of the Government, who was receiving a salary as such, from receiving money, not for his own use, but for expenditures as a member of the Government attending to the Government's business. Nobody ever contended that it was. It has never been contended that the payment of a Minister's travelling expenses was a breach of the Act, but that proves nothing in regard to the present case, because this was not an allowance for travelling expenses; it was not an allowance to a Minister travelling as a Minister, and attending to the duties of a Minister. It was an allowance to an official, appointed by Order in Council, by his colleagues in the Government, as a servant of the Government, and appointed to do the work of a particular office created by Statute and one to which certain emoluments were allowed partly by Statute and partly by vote of this House. There is no parallel whatever between the case of a Minister who has his travelling expenses paid as a Minister, and the case of a Minister who attempts to assume, at the same time, the character of a paid official of the Government. The hon. Secretary of State said, by way of illustration that a Minister could not be a Customs officer, but if the Minister of Customs went to an outpost to settle some questions in dispute, he would have the right to have his expenses paid. There is no doubt about that. But on the other hand, there is no doubt that if the Minister of Customs allowed himself to be gazetted as Collector of Customs at Toronto, without salary, and if he went and served there as Collector of Customs, and, without drawing his salary, was allowed $4,000 for six months' work, acting there as Collector of Customs, and not as Minister of Customs, there would be clearly a case of breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, and his seat would be vacated. The hon. Secretary of State referred to the case of a Minister going abroad on Government business, who, he said, might receive his expenses, so long as his Commission noted the fact that no salary was attached to the position he held. Well, Sir, no case has ever occurred before, that I am aware of, of a Minister going abroad as something else than a Minister—in the character of a nominated and paid public servant; and no parallel can be drawn between this case and the case of a Minister travelling for the purpose of floating a loan, of scattering information with reference to Canada, or any like service. The law of the case is admitted by implication by the hon. Minister to be against his contention, which he only claims to hold good in regard to the moral effect of the law. He said that the intention of Parliament was to prevent any undue effect on the action of the member concerned, on account of favours he had received from the Government, or words to that effect, that in this case nothing of the sort could be urged; that the hon. High Commissioner was a member of the Government already, and could therefore not be affected by any favours they showed him—in fact, that no favour was being done to the hon. gentleman by appointing him High Commissioner. He said that anything in the nature of a fee or recompense for the work done was illegal, but that the money paid in this case could not be regarded as a fee or recompense for work done or as a means of influencing the action of the hon. gentleman. Well, Sir, we must recollect that the total amount of money paid to Sir Charles Tupper was considerable. He was absent about six months, and was paid, in all, something over $5,000, only a very small part of which, about £160, was for travelling expenses, and another small amount for expenses of removal. But, in addition to this, he was receiving a salary as a Minister, and I suppose he also hoped to receive his Sessional allowance as a member of this House during the time he was in England he received about $3,500 as a Minister; he also received payments at the rate of about $8,000 a year. Whether you call it salary, allowance or fees, it was applied solely to his own use, and was not intended for travelling expenses or anything of the kind, because his travelling expenses were paid over and above. As to the contention of the hon. Secretary of State that the Commission was no favour to the hon. gentleman, I am not so certain. We all know that that hon. gentleman is sometimes in a weak condition of health, and we all know that a trip across the Atlantic has, on previous occasions, had a marvellous, I might almost say a miraculous, effect in the way of improving his health. We all know that three years ago he left Ottawa in such a condition of health that his physicians spoke of him with a gloomy shake of the head. We all know that he did not leave his house until he started to cross the Atlantic, and that he was wonderfully improved and apparently able to attend to business as soon as he reached England. Even if this appointment did not enable him to save any money, it afforded him at any rate an enjoyable trip to the old country, and I hope produced as good an effect on his health as the former trip did.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

M. CASEY. It seems to disagree with the digestions of hon. gentlemen opposite—judging from the noises they make—to suggest that the late member for Cumberland had been improved in his health by a trip to the old country. They do not, surely, deny that the former trip improved his health. They do not, surely, ridicule the idea that it had a beneficial effect because, if they jeer at that, I am bound to think that they do not believe it did. The hon. Secretary of State dismissed contemptuously the contention of my hon. friend from West Huron that the late High Commissioner could sue the Government for $10,000 of salary as being still due to him, notwithstanding the arrangement expressed in the Order in Council as existing "for the present." Now, if the hon. Secretary of State, who is a gentleman of high legal attainments, instead of dismissing this contention with such an appearance of contempt, had analyzed it and shown us that there was nothing in it, his treatment of the matter would have been much more satisfactory to the House. We have, on the one hand, the statement of an eminent lawyer, that the late High Commissioner could sue; we have, on the other hand, a contemptuous dismissal of that statement without any argument; so that, I think, the inference must be in favour of the hon. member for West Huron. If the contention could have been shown to be wrong, I think the hon. Secretary of State would have shown it, instead of contenting himself with the casual reference he made to the matter. But, Sir, the hon. Secretary of State wound up his remarks with an appeal of a very peculiar nature. He said it was "beneath the dignity of Parliament" to punish a gentleman who had done such service to the country as the hon. High Commissioner, by declaring his seat to be vacant. Well, I do not know that the services rendered by that hon. gentleman were so very conspicuous. I do not remember that he did anything more than one would naturally expect from a gentleman occupying that or any other position. He attended to the duties of his position, I believe, and that is what is expected of any one who is appointed to an office. Perhaps it may be urged in his favour that he was not paid quite as much as his predecessor; but if a man accepts an office, even at a reduced salary, he is bound to fulfil the duties of that office as carefully as if he had a higher salary, and nothing can be said to the credit of the High Commissioner beyond the fact that he attended to his duties. What extraordinary results he achieved, differing in kind or degree from those achieved by his predecessor, we have not been told, and do not know. But even supposing his claims for services rendered had been as eminent as the hon. Secretary of State contends, is that any reason why his seat should not be declared vacant by this House if it is vacant, or why this House should decline to assert what it believes to be the truth of the matter as regards the law and the fact. I hardly think so, Mr. Speaker. I think, and I believe the House will agree with me, that the dignity of this House is better consulted by our seeing that no person sits in it who has not a right to a seat here, than by trying to screen, on the ground of exceptional services, any member of this House who has laid himself open to the charge of having vacated his seat. But, Sir, I am not content to rely upon my own opinion in this matter, however good I may think it to be. I am able to quote an opinion in regard to the duty of the Government in a case of this kind, which will, I have no doubt, have the greatest weight with this House. I am able to quote the opinion of yourself, Sir, when you were not as yet the Speaker of this House—an opinion whose authority will be greater, no doubt, by the subsequent fact of your elevation to the Chair you so worthily fill. This promotion conferred upon you by your own friends will, no doubt, add to the authority of your opinion with them. You stated on that occasion that:

"The object of the Independence of Parliament Act was to secure the independence of Parliament, and to take care that no contractors, placemen or office holders should have a seat in the House."

A little further on you said:

"There was nothing wrong in the Government giving a contract to a member of Parliament, but it was wrong in them to conceal the facts from Parliament and the country, and not to issue at once a writ for a new election to fill the vacancy caused thereby."

Mutatis mutandis, I think this opinion will have very great weight. There is nothing wrong, in your own words, Mr. Speaker, in the Government giving an office to a member of the Cabinet, but it is wrong for the Government to conceal the facts from the Parliament and the country, and not to issue at once a writ for a new election, to fill the vacancy caused thereby. I simply substitute the facts on the present occasion for those that were alleged to have existed on the former one, and your opinion, Sir, should convince the hon. the First Minister that he ought, some time ago, to have issued a writ to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of the hon. Minister of Railways to the office of High Commissioner. The hon. the First Minister himself was very clear in the opinion that it was the duty of the Government who knew a member had vacated his seat for any reason, to call the attention of the House to the fact, and to take measures to fill the place vacated. "Who knew," he asked, "that the Government, in 1874, was giving a contract to a member of Parliament, and yet allowing him to retain his seat?" He may with more force ask to-day: Who knew the Government, in 1883, were appointing one of themselves to a Government position in which he received allowances and yet allowed him to retain his seat? Who knew this, yet continued in this hon. member in his position of Minister of Railways? Who knew this and yet allowed that hon. member to urge forward by voice, though not by vote, the most important legislation before us this Session? "Who," he asked again, "knew the hon. Mr. Anglin was, week after week, month after month, quarter after quarter, receiving his Commission at the hands of the Government, for which he signed receipts?" I ask: Who knew, on the present occasion, that the hon. Minister of Railways was receiving, not month after month, or quarter after quarter, but all in one lump sum, pretty much in advance, the whole allowance for a whole year's work in the first six months of his incumbency, and yet continued him in his place as Minister of Railways? The First Minister then said:

"They knew that his (the Speaker's) seat was vacated, and yet they did not take the steps which ought to have been taken but made the country believe that Mr. Speaker was member for Gloucester, which he was not, and that he was Speaker of this House, which he ought not to be. This was the conduct of the Government, and it was a great triumph for the Opposition when they saw those members opposite had belied all their professions and had taken the course they had."

Substitute for these alleged facts, the facts of this case. They knew his seat was vacated, and yet they did not take the steps which ought to have been taken, but made the country believe that the hon. Minister of Railways was member for Cumberland, which he was not, and that he was Minister of Railways, which he ought not to be. It was a great triumph for the Opposition, when they saw those hon. members opposite had belied all their professions and had taken the course they had. If that was proper language to address to the Government of that day, it is proper to address to the Government of this day. If it was proper, constitutional and courteous to say it at that time, it is preeminently proper, courteous and constitutional to say it now, in regard to existing facts. If there ever was anything calculated to excite the indignation of the House and the people, it is, that, sitting on that side of the House, as Minister of the most important Department of the Government, for the time being, is a gentleman who has no more right to a seat in this House, to use the right hon. gentleman's own words, than one of the pages. A great many of the gentlemen opposite were here when those words I have quoted were uttered, and they did not then howl at all in disapproval, as they are now howling. On the contrary, they cheered them to the echo. Why? Because they were addressed to the hon. gentleman who filled the Chair before you, Mr. Speaker. But when I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to accept the words of the Premier himself on that occasion and apply them to the present case, they are not slow in signifying their displeasure. I do not know that I need quote any further authorities on this question. I believe those I have quoted are ample. I believe your own authority, Mr. Speaker, the authority of the Premier, and the authority of the hon. member for North Simcoe, will be quite sufficient to convince hon. gentlemen opposite that they should, on this occasion, proceed to immediate execution without further enquiry before a Committee. If there was any ground at all for the contention that the House should decide immediately in the case of Mr. Anglin, there is certainly ample ground why the House should take immediate action now. I will not detain the House longer by entering fully into the feelings entertained by us and by the country at large, with respect to this case. I believe these feelings will be manifested in a way that will startle hon. gentlemen opposite, even in a few days, as soon as the news goes abroad, that this charge has been made in the way it has been, and that hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the action they intend taking. An expression of the strength of that feeling will be made very soon, but it will remain for a later period to give a full test of its strength. As I see an hon. friend of mine opposite looking very dull at the prospect of that future, I can understand his feeling; but no doubt it will be very pleasant for us, at all events, to have an opportunity of testing the feeling of the country on this subject.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Speaker, this seems almost a repetition of the debate that we had last Session in regard to sending a certain matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It does seem to me that it would be more in accordance with that judicial spirit that has not been, I am sorry to say, evinced by certain hon. gentlemen opposite, that we should send this matter where it should be sent, and where it will be dealt with in a judicial and in a proper and unprejudiced manner. The debate this Session was opened by the hon. leader of the Opposition in an acrimonious spirit, and not in the way that the debate last Session was opened; and I could not see for the life of me, why it should not have been dealt with by that hon. gentleman in the judicial and liberal way that would have become him, and that was within his right. This motion is a question of privilege. It is a question of whether we should denude a member of this House of his privileges here, whether we should strike him down and not allow him to sit here longer or vote in this House without further enquiry, or send this matter where it will be properly tested in a proper crucible for the test. I have given some attention to the question since this debate was opened, and I find, and I believe the hon. member for West Durham will find, that he will be as compelled to give in his adherence to the voice of the majority as he did last Session on the legal point. Last Session I had the honour to quote in this House the Act of 1872, which seated the member, now the member for King's, P.E.I. I was met then by the hon. member for West Durham with a derisive cry that that Act had been repealed, and that was supplemented by the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I., who ably seconded the hon. member for West Durham in his efforts; and we found, on investigation, that it was not repealed, and that the hon. member now for King's, P.E.I., was entitled by law to that seat; and we have heard no more of that debate since, although the time of the House was taken up, hour after hour, in debating it, although the member for West Durham declared then, as he has declared to-night, although the member for West Huron declared then, as he declares to-night, and although the member who has just taken his seat declared then, as he declares to-night, that there was no doubt about this question at all, and we ought to proceed at once and seat a gentleman of the name of Dr. Robertson; and, if we had done it, we would have done it in defiance of the law, we would have done it in defiance of the plain Statute, and this House would have been in the humiliating position of having put on record a wrong done, and of having done a wrong to the constituency which is now ably represented by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. The leader of the Government, the Premier, has moved that this question shall go, and he has touched upon the points of why he thinks the member for Cumberland is entitled to a seat in this House. First, he says, in all fairness, that Act, liberally interpreted, never touches this case at all. He says that the Act was made for the purpose of not allowing any member to sit in this House who was subject to Governmental influence. That is not this case. It cannot be said that the High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, member of Government, was susceptible to the influence of the Government, and therefore had no right to sit in this House; and, when you look back upon the Independence of Parliament Act of 1878, you have a right to look back and see why it was placed before this House and enacted. We all know it was the outcome of what was called the Anglin Committee, that it was upon the report of that Committee, that some proper steps should be taken and an Act re-enacted, that the Act of 1868 was re-enacted, and we have the Act of 1878. I went into the library to see what was said on that occasion, and I have listened to the hon. gentlemen opposite, who have cited what you yourself said, Mr. Speaker, or some other gentleman said, different members of this House said, but they have not touched the point yet of in whose interest or why this Act was passed. Certainly, if a vacancy exists, a writ ought to be issued. They said a writ ought to be issued. That is the question. The Premier of the day, then, the hon. member for East York, upon the debate on the Bill introduced by Mr. Lafamme, then Minister of Justice, used these words:—

"The clause passed by this House"—referring to this Act of 1878—"was clearly intended to preserve its independence, which could only be done by limiting the choice to those who were in an independent position and not subject to Governmental influence."

That is the reason he introduced this Act. Then, could it be said, giving a free and liberal interpretation to this Act, that the High Commissioner, who had proceeded to London to exercise the duties of that office, was subject to Governmental influence, and that the Independence of Parliament Act was passed to prevent him from sitting in this House? Certainly not, because the intention of the Act was expressed by the Premier of the day. So, taking a broad and liberal view, it did not touch the hon. member. It may as well be said that the Minister of Customs, who undertakes the duties of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the time being, and goes abroad to execute those duties—goes outside of the Dominion—charges his expenses to the office, and it comes under the head of emolument or allowance is therefore unable to sit in this House. Such a contention would be silly and idle, and no member of the House would dare to place such a proposition before it. Therefore, the Act was not passed in that interest or for that purpose. Then, Sir, it was passed to keep persons out of this House who were subject to Governmental influence. I will come then to the legal part of the Act. I would rather not have discussed this question. I thought it would have been better that the member for West Huron, as a member of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, who was going to sit as a judge, should not have discussed it. I thought it would have been better that the member for West Durham who, however, had some colour, it is true, because he moved his resolution, and was met by this amendment, should still have waited for the report of the Committee before discussing it. But, since it is clear that hon. members have chosen to speak upon it, who are much older members of the House than I am, I think it is only right and proper that I should follow in their wake. The Act of 1878 enacts that:

"No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada, at the nomination of the Crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance or emolument, or profit of any kind is attached, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons."

Well, the Act of 1880 created a new officer, a resident representative agent for Canada in the United Kingdom, to be called the High Commissioner for Canada, and that enacted, among other things, in the last clause, that "The High Commissioner shall receive a salary of not more than $10,000 per annum, and the same shall be payable," and so forth. Very well; the salary has not been attached by this Act, referring back to the Act of 1878.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH. "Hear, hear," derisively says the hon. member for West Durham. I had the pleasure of being interrupted by him last Session when he said the Act of 1872 was repealed, and it was not repealed, and I think his derisive "hear, hear," will be turned into solemn silence before many weeks. I say the salary is not attached by Act, because they may give the High Commissioner nothing. If it were said that it should not be less than $500, if a minimum was put, it might have given some colour to the contention, but, when it said, "not more than $10,000," it did not attach the salary. Then we have had the patent from the Crown read, and that did not attach the salary. That took away the salary. It took away any emoluments or allowances whatever, and therefore the hon. member for Cumberland stands in this House to day with this Act not touching him legally. I assert that. I believe that. I have looked into it. The argument is very short and very clear, and I do not believe the hon. member for West Durham, after looking at the Acts, and after hearing read the patent in which it is stipulated that he should not receive a dollar for his services, would put in writing his opinion that he accepted an office to which a salary was attached. He accepted no such office. As shortly and as clearly as I possibly could, I have first shown that this Act, liberally considered, did not apply to the High Commissionership at all, because the High Commissioner was a member of the Government, and secondly, that it does not apply to him legally. I do not think that the hon. member for West Durham should have gone out of his way, at the threshold of this debate, to excite unkindly feelings on the part of members of this House. It was his right as leader of the Opposition, or as member of this House, to bring this matter to the notice of the House; but I do not think it conduced to the strength of his argument to lecture the hon. member for Cumberland; to speak of him as the ex-member for Cumberland, and to point to one of the pages and say he had no more right to sit there than one of the pages of this House; and when he undertook to tell him that he had committed a flagrant violation of Parliament; that he had insulted the members of this House by daring to sit here; when he undertook to tell him that he had been fulminating diatribes here by the day, and without having a right to sit here at all, I do not believe that added to the strength of his argument, if argument he had. Then why was it done? Why, coolly and deliberately, before the assembled Parliament of Canada, if he had a legal argument, why did he not, with his great and acknowledged ability as a Chancery lawyer, who boasts that he never tried a jury case in his life, that he has always been appealing to judges—why did he not appeal to this House as judges? Why did he appeal to the lowest passions of his own followers? Why did he use language to the hon. member for Cumberland, the High Commissioner, that was calculated to irritate the friends of that gentleman in this House? Why, Sir, I will venture to say that he has not got a generous foe on the other side of the House who did not feel annoyed to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition so inopportunistically, so unprovokedly and so wilfully endeavour to appeal to passion and to excite the hostile feelings of members of Parliament. He was followed by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), who joined in the chorus, and they asked why my hon. friend did not go back to Cumberland and be regularly re-elected, saying that if he did dare to go before his constituents, so great were his crimes as High Commissioner, so great were his crimes as Minister of Railways, and so great were his crimes as one of the leaders of the Conservative party in this country, that he could not be elected in his own constituency. Do they not know that there would not be a man to oppose him when he went there? Do they not know that for twenty-five long years he has met the best men they could put up against him, and that, notwithstanding all their efforts, he has been returned every time from his own county in his native Province. He has nothing to fear from them, and everybody knows that they know it right well. Then why did they adopt this querulous tone instead of the calm, judicial tone that ought to characterize us in deciding whether the hon. member for Cumberland has a seat in this House or not? I say the hon. member went out of his way to do it; I say it was not complimentary to him to do it; and I believe, from the bottom of my heart, that had the hon. Minister of Railways sat in his seat, had he had the opportunity of replying—which the hon. gentleman knows he has not got this Session—but had he been sitting here, the hon. gentleman would no more dare to use the language he did than to cut his hand off. But to tell him that he dare not back up his opinions by his vote! Who is this hon. gentleman, that he would lecture the Minister of Railways on courage?—the man whose back no enemy has ever seen, the man whom, over and over again, he has refused to meet on the same platform, hand to hand, and hilt to hilt, to try out the great national quarrel between them. And is this the gentleman who, during the time he was Minister, and supported the Government of the hon. member for East York, swept with his coat-tails making right angles with his body out of that door, from time to time, and did not dare to stand up and vote! Was he the one to lecture the man who never refused to back his opinions by his vote?—who never refused to back his vote by his opinions? Why, Sir, I expected some one would have called him to order; I thought you, Sir, possibly might have done so—although it might not have been strictly within the line of your duty; although the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) the other night was called to order for a much lesser offence; and after the hon. gentleman himself had strayed from the subject to refer to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—I say, Sir, that any one who had the slightest idea, the slightest scintilla of knowledge of the orders of procedure of this House, would have singled out the member for West Durham as being the greatest transgressor against them. I thought it was in good taste for the hon. member for Cumberland not to vote. I thought that after they had raised the question in the press, after they had moved for papers, after they had, at all events, given a quasi notice that they intended to prosecute this matter—I thought it was a proper thing that he should not vote in this House. It seems that that does not meet with the approval of the hon. member for West Durham. Why, Sir, he could not leave the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott) alone the other night, because he would not vote. When the latter gentleman asked to have the rules read, and when the rules were read, the hon. gentleman for West Durham said that he did come within those rules and he wanted him to vote. The hon. member for Argenteuil answered: "I do not like to vote; there are certain reasons for it." Everybody knew that the hon. member legally, and outside this House, has been connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as their solicitor, and he did not wish to vote on questions in which that Company was concerned. Was the hon. member for West Durham as sensitive last summer when, according to Sir Henry Tyler, he proceeded home to England with a suitably prepared speech to deliver before the Privy Council as the counsel in Canada of the Grand Trunk Railway? If the hon. gentleman says that connection is severed, I would ask his pardon at once. But, certainly he is not the member of this House to impute want of delicacy to members who refuse to vote because there is a slight shadow of a shade of reason why they do not wish to vote. The hon. member was driven the other night to say that he had given up $25,000 for $2,500. He has always complained, however, of other members bringing their personal concerns into debate, and of their telling what emoluments or what salary they were receiving. I say that if the hon. member for West Durham finds the members of this side of the House, during this Session, more irritable than they have been, and giving him back sometimes two Rolands for one Oliver, and sometimes heaping upon him a little more than he wishes to get, he may thank himself for the intemperate speech he has made here to-night, in regard to a man who has done more in one year of his political life to build up the land of his birth, to build up the country that he loves and that he has worked for, than the hon. member could do for the rest of his natural lifetime—yes, and I may repeat it, more than he could do for the rest of his natural lifetime, if he transformed himself into the patriotic Canadian which he has not, up to this moment, evinced himself to be. We know the great services that the High Commissioner has done for us in England; we know that the farmers of this country are of one accord, no matter whether Grit or Tory, in according him the greatest praise that can be given any man for the dispatch, for the executive ability, and for the value of the services rendered to them when he reopened the markets for their cattle in England; and they will unanimously agree that he has done more for them than all the speeches of the hon. member for West Durham can do for the next fifty years. I repeat that when another question of this kind comes up, let us act in a judicial spirit if possible, let us see if we can get at the pith of the matter and give a proper verdict. We may have prejudices—we cannot divest ourselves entirely of them; but we certainly can refrain from dealing with a great question like this, a question respecting which Mr. Gladstone and all the great leaders of parties in England affirm, that where there is any doubt the matter should be sent to a Committee. That has been over and over declared and adhered to. There is not only a doubt here, but a very grave question. I think the hon. gentleman had a right to bring it up, but with the papers before me, with the patent, with the Act of 1878, with the speeches of the hon. members who passed that Act, with the High Commissioner Act of 1880 before me, until I am better informed, I believe the hon. member for Cumberland has as much right to sit here as I have myself or the hon. member for West Durham. I happened to be a member of that Committee, and if the hon. member for West Durham convinces me that I am wrong, I promise him I will not do as he did last Session—go out of the building and refuse to vote. I did not intend to speak at any length; I merely rose to give expression to my feelings, and in doing so I have tried to keep within Parliamentary rules; but I do say that in future, when we have a matter of this magnitude before the House, I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will deal with it in a manner different from that which they have dealt with it, not in the offensive and insulting manner in which it has been dealt with by some members who have spoken on the question.

Mr. BLAKE. If no other hon. member wishes to address the House, I desire to say a few words in reply. Who is it who has been said to be sometimes engaged in reproving sin? After the temperate, the courteous, the kindly, the regular speech of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Woodworth), I think I may apply that proverb to the hon. member, not in order to violate once again, as he says I have done, the decencies of debate—

Mr. WOODWORTH. I beg pardon, I never said such words as "decencies of debate."

Mr. BLAKE. But you stated so in substance.

Mr. WOODWORTH. State the words.

Mr. BLAKE. I am speaking of the substance. I would not befoul my mouth by repeating the hon. gentleman's words.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I rise to a question of order.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I ask the Speaker if I am not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is perfectly in order in rising to a point of order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I rise to a point of order. I did not use the words, "violated the decencies of debate." The hon. member said he would not befoul his mouth with my words when I ask him to repeat the words I used.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD. When one hon. member says he will not befoul his mouth by repeating what another hon. member has said, he must be held to state that the hon. member has used language which was unparliamentary, and which he would not and could not, as a gentleman, have used. That is the charge against the hon. gentleman, and I think he is out of order, unless he establishes that the hon. member for King's did use language that would befoul the mouth of an hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER. I regret very much, that in our debates, one of the rules of the House is transgressed by many hon. members. I will first read the rule, and then apply it to this case. Rule 13 says:

"No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor or person administering the Government of Canada; nor shall he use offensive words against either House, or against any member thereof; nor shall he speak beside the question in debate. No member may reflect on any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded."

In a great many of the speeches made in this House, offensive words are used against hon. members, which I very much regret; and I think the hon. gentleman, in this case, has perhaps used words which are offensive to an hon. member.

Mr. BLAKE. I bow at once to your decision, Mr. Speaker, as I have always done. I regret that you should deem the words used to be offensive. I conceive that the language which the hon. member used demands, or deserves, or justifies at all events, very strong language from myself; but if I have used language contrary to parliamentary usage, I very willingly withdraw it. I was about to observe that I would not follow in the hon. gentleman's course and conduct my remaining portion of the debate in the spirit in which he proposed it should be conducted—the spirit, in fact, which he introduced into the debate. He complains that I expressed an opinion on this case, and that I endeavoured to justify that opinion by an argument, and he thinks it would be better for me if I had not expressed any opinion. I have moved that the seat of the hon. member for Cumberland be declared vacant. I propose to ask the House to affirm that proposition. That is a legitimate motion.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon. gentleman has again misstated what I said.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I rise to a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is not the time for a personal explanation. When the hon. gentleman has finished his speech, you can make a personal explanation.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I rise to a question of order. I say the hon. gentleman has misstated what I said.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already said the explanation must be made after the hon. gentleman has finished his speech, not now.

Mr. BLAKE. The First Minister has himself, on former occasions, made motions like this which I have proposed. In 1877 he moved that the seat of Mr. James Norris, then member for Lincoln, be declared vacant, and that a new writ should issue. He expressed his opinion, and sustained it as well as he could by an argument of the case, and said it was perfectly clear. I do not myself very clearly perceive how I would have paid due respect to the House if, making the motion, which is a legitimate motion, setting forth that the seat is vacant, I had abstained from pointing out the reasons on which, in my judgment, that motion should be assented to. The First Minister has said there is no salary attached to this office, and that circumstance disposes of the case. He says that, having looked into the matter for some time, such is his opinion as a lawyer, and that it disposes of the case altogether. In the first place, there is more than salary here. In the second place, the language of the Act is: "The hon. Commissioner shall receive a salary of not more than $10,000 a year." He is, therefore, to receive a salary. So much is clear: "He shall receive a salary." The maximum salary is to be $10,000 a year; and the Act says that the salary shall be payable out of the unappropriated revenues forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada. This, therefore, makes the High Commissioner a salaried officer, even although the actual amount of the salary had not yet been fixed, because the law says there shall be a salary. The quantum is supposed to be as yet unfixed; and if it remains unfixed, such would be the law. But more has been done, as the papers show, because an Order in Council was passed, as I have said, on Sir Alexander Galt being appointed, or immediately afterwards, actually fixing the salary at $10,000 a year, and the papers indicate that the salary of the High Commissioner was fixed at the maximum here prescribed. My position with respect to this matter is sustained by the argument of one of the ablest parliamentarians known, a man of almost unexampled prestige and knowledge of parliamentary matters of his day, Mr. C.W. Wynn, who, in the case of D. W. Harvey, the Southwark case, moved that the writ should issue, and dealt with this very question of the salary—the quantum—not having been assigned. He thus argued:

"It may be contended that this is not an office of profit, on the ground that no salary has been actually annexed. But the Act of last Session says that 'It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to fix and appoint such salaries to be paid to such registrar, clerks and officers as they shall think proper, which salaries, together with such other expenses in and about the execution of this Act as the said Commissioners shall direct, shall be paid, by the said Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes out of any moneys to arise from any of the duties under their care and management.' Now, it seems to me that under this clause a duty is imposed upon the Treasury which they are to discharge, by fixing the amount of salary to be enjoyed by the Registrar. We all know that the words 'It shall be lawful,' are constantly construed as imposing a duty, and I apprehend that if the hon. member for Southwark had continued to hold the office which he has resigned, and that the Treasury had not fixed a salary, might have compelled the Commissioners of the Treasury to assign him one. What should be the amount of the salary would, indeed, be left to their discretion, but it would have been imperative upon them to fix one. It might further be contended that no emolument or profit has been received from this office. But the hon. member in his letter to the Noble Lord, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, said that he would not receive any emolument or profit from the office, if Parliament should be of the opinion that its acceptance would oblige him to vacate his seat. The hon. gentleman's refusal to accept a salary was therefore only a qualified refusal, dependent upon the decision of Parliament, as to the effect of accepting a salary. This, I contend, does not exempt him from the disqualification created by his original acceptance of the office. Let the House suppose that a change of Administration takes place, and that the new Ministers do not think it convenient immediately to dissolve Parliament, would they, supposing them to execute a renunciation of the salaries attached to their offices for a couple of months, be thereby rendered capable of holding their offices without vacating their seats in Parliament? I apprehend not. It seems to me that when Parliament constitutes an office, and directs a salary to be paid, the individual appointed to that office has no right to divest himself of the salary. The office still has all the qualities of an office, and it is wholly immaterial whether the person holding it accepts a salary or not. There is to prevent an individual accepting the Chiltern Hundreds, whether he claims the salary attached to the stewardship or not. I have been told that it is not the invariable practice to refuse the salary attached to that office, for that one gentleman who accepted it did afterwards take the salary of £10 for the half-year which expired before the office was disposed of to another person. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a new office or profit under the Crown, created since the Statute of Anne, and consequently not tenable in conjunction with a seat in Parliament, whether the salary be claimed or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is good law.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, I dare say it is. At any rate, I have read it all, and have not followed the hon. gentleman's example with reference to another paper, which I am about to read throughout. The Committee reported shortly afterwards that they were of opinion that the office was an office of profit; that Mr. Harvey had accepted the office, and that his seat was vacated. Now, Sir, it will appear from what I have read, I think, that the case is not such as the hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Woodworth) has stated. The hon. gentleman concluded his observations by repeating something which had been said before by the right hon. First Minister. He declared that I was afraid to meet the Minister of Railways, and that I would not have made these observations had the Minister of Railways been able to be in his seat; that I knew he could not be here to answer me, and that, therefore, it was, that I stated that proposition. Now, Sir, under the law of Parliament, the Minister of Railways, claiming to be the sitting member for the county of Cumberland, had a right to take his seat on this motion. He had a right to speak after this question was put, and was called upon, after speaking and making his explanation, then and then only to withdraw. That is the course which has been pursued on several occasions. It was pursued on the occasion of the references in 1877. I recollect the present hon. member for the city and county of St. John, speaking in answer to the motion against him. I recollect the late hon. member for Lincoln speaking in answer to the motion against him. I recollect the member for Cumberland himself, when a personal motion was made against him a good many years ago, on an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, directed to a particular act of his as a Minister of the Crown, speaking in his place in answer to the motion, and then withdrawing. In this very case which I have just cited, the case of Mr. Harvey, the question was discussed and the authorities of the House were agreed that it was the duty and the right of Mr. Harvey to speak if he pleased, after the motion for a new writ had been made, and Mr. Harvey did address the House after the motion for the writ was made, and then withdrew. Consequently, Sir, knowing the law of Parliament on this subject, knowing that the Minister of Railways had as much right to sit and speak on this motion as he had the right to sit and speak on any other motion which has been made this Session, knowing that he was in his place in this House, and had himself formally answered a personal motion, I had no right, no reason to believe, and had not the remotest expectation, that he would carry his delicacy and modesty so far on this occasion as to disable himself from sitting opposite to me, as he has for some years, and assume a seat to your right. He had the right to speak; he had spoken before on similar circumstances; he was in the House, and how should I know that he was not going to avail himself of his right? Hon. gentlemen have said I am afraid of him. Well, Sir, I have sat opposite to the hon. Minister of Railways for sixteen years, more or less; I have been engaged in many a hot contest with him, and have not observed that I have any reason to be afraid of him. I do not perceive any ground on which I should be afraid of him. The hon. gentlemen invent the passion of fear for me. They are determined to believe that I must be afraid of the Minister of Railways, and they choose to say so. I tell them that I am not conscious of entertaining any such fear—that I know of no ground for it. He certainly has a great capacity for words; he certainly has a large collection of strong adjectives; he certainly has great volubility, but I have not been able to perceive any reason why any hon. gentleman, any hon. member of this House, however humble he is, who has a good cause to maintain, should be afraid of the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, the Secretary of State began his speech by declaring that he must consider what the motives of the Minister of Railways were in accepting this appointment, and then he discussed the question at some length. He also introduced the services of the High Commissioner of Canada as an element in the discussion. What have they got to do with it? We are here discussing a question of Statute, of parliamentary law, whether the seat for Cumberland is vacated or not. However good a man may be, the Secretary of State must admit—however bad a man may be, I am myself obliged to admit—this question has to be decided irrespective of his goodness or his badness, his merits or his demerits, whether he has done much or little, whether he has done well or ill, whether his motives have been laudable or the reverse—we have to decide whether the seat for Cumberland is full or empty, altogether irrespective of any considerations of that description. For what purpose then was it introduced? Then the hon. gentleman says the intention of the Act is to prevent a member from being under the influence of the Crown, under obligation to the Crown, and therefore it does not apply to a Minister of the Crown. Does it not? May not a member who is disposed to be hostile to the policy of a Government be seduced into acquiescence in that policy by being made a Minister? May not a Minister who differs from his colleagues on some question of public policy be seduced into silence, into acquiescence, or into both, by being retained in his position as Minister? Have not we heard of such things? Have not we witnessed such things? Have we forgotten them already?

Mr. BLAKE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I think we have not forgotten them, and I do not think we shall hear much more in this discussion of the extraordinary proposition, that there is to be less jealousy, less watchfulness, less care, less vigilance, on the part of the people of this country and the Parliament that represents them, with reference to the dealings of a Minister with public moneys, than with reference to the dealings of other members of Parliament with public moneys. That is the question. Ministers, forsooth, occupy such a lofty position that they could not be influenced, no matter how much more they should get—that they could not be influenced, no matter what favours the Crown might shower upon them. Cannot a Minister, who holds his office reluctantly, who wants to leave the Administration, be persuaded to remain by getting an office with perquisites and advantages. Have we not seen it happen? Have we not heard of such a thing within the last few days? And yet it is said, forsooth, that Ministers are not within the mischief of the Act. Whatever the hon. gentleman says about the mischief of the Act—and we are threatened with an Act on the subject of the Independence of Parliament—the hon. gentleman may observe—unless, indeed, it is proposed to set up one rule for Ministers, and another for the common herd, one rule for those who are above common temptations, who have nothing to ask for, and therefore may take all they please, having the power and the will, and another rule for the common herd of members of Parliament, over whom a tighter rein must be kept, because they are not above such influences—the hon. gentleman may observe that Ministers sometimes depart more easily than ordinary members. They are of the same flesh and blood that we are; they are subject to like passions with ourselves; if we are likely to be influenced by the attractions of honour and emolument, by the attractions of filthy lucre, so are they. Sitting in this House, they are subject to just the same restraints, and I believe ought to be subject, if there is to be any distinction, to still greater restraints than ordinary members. Well, suppose, said the hon. Secretary of State, that a member of the Government, say the Minister of Customs, is called upon to go somewhere to investigate the affairs of some Custom House, and his expenses are paid, is his seat to be voided on that account? His seat is to be voided if the law so says, and if the law has that operation, I dare say a good many seats would be voided. But I can understand a very reasonable distinction, which I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not see. This case has reference to the Minister acting in his quality of Minister. A Minister is here; his house and household are here; he lives here or ought to live here, at the Capital. He is allowed his salary in order that he may live, in order that he may pay the expenses of his household—his house rent, fuel, light and taxes; send his children to school, provide food and drink, and pay for his clothes and those of his wife, if he has one. These are the objects to which his salary is intended to be applied; the salary is kept up to enable the man to live. If, under such circumstances, a Minister is called upon to go on a work for a month or six weeks to a distant part of the country, his establishment has to be kept up in his absence, and his expenses go on as usual. He cannot pack up his traps, and take his wife and family and household goods along with him, and call on the State to pay the cost of his doing so. He makes nothing out of that work, and his expenses must be paid. But suppose a Minister, in his quality of Minister, were appointed, if he could properly be appointed, on some distant mission, for some long and definite time; suppose he were allowed to take his family and his furniture along with him to his new residence at the expense of the State; and suppose that his establishment here had to be altogether broken up, so that it would not be subject to any of those expenses, such as rent, taxes, fuel, light, &c., which are paid for by the State in his new residence, is it not obvious that he occupies a wholly different position? Is it not obvious, in that case, that he is making money? That that $4,000 a year, which otherwise would have had to come out of his salary for those very objects, is saved from his salary? But the argument of the hon. gentleman was wholly inapplicable to the case in hand, because it was confined to the case of a Minister acting in his quality of Minister. It was not in his quality of Minister that Sir Charles Tupper went to England to discharge those duties and receive those allowances. It was in his quality of the holder of the office of High Commissioner of Canada, for whom the salary was voted, which he did not receive, and for whom the $4,000 a year was voted, which he did receive. That makes the case altogether different, because, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, if it was in some other quality than the quality of Minister, if you carried that argument out to its legitimate conclusion, the salary, or emolument, or profit, in whatever shape it might be, would have no effect. The hon.

Secretary of State also said that this matter ought not to have been brought before the House—that the question ought not to have been raised. Was that the view of his leader? He has been himself for a long time a First Minister, and the leader of a party, and perhaps he has not learned thoroughly those lessons of subordination which belong to a follower instead of a leader, and to a follower although a colleague. His leader said that my argument was a fair argument. That while he did not agree with it, he thought it was quite proper to leave it to the Committee. That he thought it was a complicated question with a great deal to be said on both sides, &c., &c., and that the House, composed largely of laymen, could not be expected, at a moment's notice, to come to a right conclusion, and that the question should go to a Committee, where all the precedents would be considered, and the arguments weighed, and where a sound conclusion would be reached on the question which his colleague, the Secretary of State, says ought not to have been raised at all, because there was nothing in it. Well, the hon. First Minister does not venture to meet my motion by a negative, which would be the logical conclusion of the hon. Secretary of State's remarks. If there is no case of enquiry, why do you not negative my motion? But the hon. First Minister says there is a case to be enquired into, and he proposes that it shall be enquired into. Then, Sir, there was a good part of the speech of the hon. First Minister that I have heard often before. I have heard those references to the English cases, and especially to the case of Mr. Gladstone and the Ionian Islands, at least half a dozen times.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only at the beginning of this Session, in answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. I heard them so often that I forgot that. That was his argument when we were considering the Independence of Parliament Act, as compared with that which prevailed at the time of Confederation, and were objecting to his alteration of the law. We heard that argument from time to time, subsequently, when we called for amendments, when we pointed out defects in the law, when we pointed out the abuses which the hon. gentleman made of the loopholes which he purposely put into the law, and when we, from time to time, pressed upon public attention the necessity of greater stringency, until in the end, by dint of a striking example, we drove the hon. gentleman's colleague, in his absence, to bring forward a measure which culminated in the Act of 1871, and which altered the law. The hon. gentleman told us that it is not a salary but a wage, allowance, profit or emolument in lieu of a salary, and said that is what the law is. This is not what the law is; it is what the law was, and as the hon. gentleman would have it to be, if the hon. gentleman had his will today. It is the law which he was forced out of by the pressure of the Liberal Opposition between 1867 and 1871. The law was altered in 1871, and the words he cherishes so much, which he believes in so fully, which he has argued from so often, and which he holds so dear that he almost imagines they are in the Act still, were struck out of the Act in order that the law might be more wide, clear, stringent and binding in its operation. The hon. gentleman said: Quite true, I struck out the words, but after all the accumulation is just the same—I go back to my old ways, and walk in my old paths. But it is not so; the law is not the same. The hon. gentleman says that he appeals to the English cases, these cases of Mr. Gladstone and the others. Sir, the English law is not our law. We occupy a different position here from that occupied in England on public questions, as I have frequently shown. We occupy a position in which the question of money emolument is of even more consequence than in England, and their law is not so stringent as ours, because so stringent a law as ours is presumed not to be necessary there. If these gentlemen have gone upon these missions, I have no doubt whatever that they occupied, during the time they went upon these missions, just the position of a Minister, whom I suggested as going on a mission of a perfect character, in answer to the Secretary of State awhile ago. I have no doubt they were gentlemen of large means, who kept a country house and a town house, etc., and kept up those establishments in the same way when away as when at home, so that their allowance for their house expenses was a very different thing from the allowance for house expenses and house rent of a man whose only house is the house the State pays for. If you had called upon those gentlemen, keeping up a country house and a town house in England, to pay the rent of a house in the Ionian Islands or in Washington, they would have to take money out of their own pockets to do so; but in the case of the hon. gentleman, he sold his house here, sent his furniture across the water, removed his establishment—had only one establishment—and for that establishment he is here paid out of his salary, and was also, in England, paid by the State. The hon. gentleman says: But there is an accumulation of offices, and, under the English law, the reason of the case is entirely in favour of that, and I have Mr. Todd in favour of it, and I say to you, that concludes the question. This argument is entirely fallacious. I do not hesitate to say, that whatever the Committee on Privileges and Elections may do—and I know something of these matters—they will not come to the conclusion that the doctrine of the accumulation of offices can have any application in this case. I shall not this evening enter into a discussion whether the doctrine of the accumulation of offices could have a reference to the conjunction of two political offices with us. My belief is that it could not. My belief is that you could not arrange for a Minister to hold the two offices here of Minister of Finance and of Minister of Public Works under our Constitution and laws. But however that may be, it has no application in this case. The English law as expounded, if rightly expounded—and I assume, for the purpose of argument, that it is rightly expounded—is simply this: that if there be two political offices which may be held by the Minister of the Crown in conjunction with each other, if he may have both, or, holding one, may accept the other without a fresh election, on account of the acceptance of the second, each of them must be an office which he is capable of holding and yet sitting in Parliament; each of them must be a Parliamentary office. Now, I do not think that is settled law even in England. I have not looked into the matter lately, but my recollection is that the cases of Mr. Gladstone were distinct; that in the first case in which he held these offices in conjunction, he accepted them when forming his Administration and accounting to his constituents. In the other case, he did not accept the Chancellorship of the Exchequer—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Low had it.

Mr. BLAKE. I was going to say so. He resigned; Mr. Gladstone accepted it, and he did not accept it until after he had been elected; and there was much criticism on the subject of that acceptance at half salary, as it was said. There was very strong argument used in the press and by political men opposed to Mr. Gladstone against the view that he could sit in the coming Session of Parliament without a fresh election. The sudden dissolution which took place prevented that question being decided. He went to the country, was defeated, and ceased to be both First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. The question, therefore, never became a practical one. I admit there are some precedents on either side, but I do not agree that it is settled law. Even if it were, it is monstrous to say it could apply to a disqualified office. Are we to hear it said that in addition to the other privileges in a constitutional country, jealous of the prerogatives of the Crown yielded by Ministers, jealous of the influence of Ministers, there is this privilege, that a man who is a Minister may accept a disqualifying office, an office which would disqualify anyone else from sitting in Parliament at all, and because he is a Minister he may sit here? Is that the proposal? Is it to be said that an office which could not be held by any other member of Parliament without vacating his seat may be held by a member of Parliament who happens to be a Minister? That argument is absurd, and I venture to say will not receive the support or sanction of any constitutional authority. I will read the letter of Mr. Todd to which, the hon. gentleman alluded:

“MY DEAR SIR JOHN,—As I observe in the newspapers criticisms in relation to Sir Charles Tupper, Minister of Railways and also High Commissioner for the Dominion in England, continuing to hold his seat in the House of Commons, and as it is probable that the question of his right to retain his seat will be raised at the ensuing Session, it has occurred to me that you might like a reference to certain English cases bearing on this point. And first, I would remark, that the point is urged in the newspapers, that in order to avoid disqualification, a member accepting an office to which a salary is ordinarily attached, may resolve to fulfil the duties of the same without emolument. But this will not, according to British practice, suffice to sustain the seat. It has been ruled otherwise in the case of Daniel Whittle Harvey, which is noted in my ‘Parliamentary Practice in England,’ Vol. 2, page 260. You will find the arguments in support of this view in the debates cited in the note.”

The hon. gentleman did not read that part. He began with the but. I do not know whether he agrees with Dr. Todd's views or not. He told us, when he gave a partial reading of the letter, that he cited from Mr. Todd, who is our constitutional authority, whose opinions were deferred to, and that Mr. Todd believed Sir Charles Tupper could hold his seat, and that he, Sir John, was going to read the letter. He began, however, with the but. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman agrees with this view I have just quoted from Dr. Todd's letter as applicable to the case or not. If he does, it settles the question; if not, it must destroy, in his opinion, the value of Mr. Todd as an authority.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman said I did not read the whole letter. I sent the hon. gentleman, however, the whole letter, and the hon. gentleman did not quote from all that Mr. Todd wrote on the subject, but left out the most important point. For instance, he did not read that sentence. He read the next sentence, in which it says that Mr. Bathurst, Secretary of State, took the office temporarily of President of the Board of Control, and it was held that he did not vacate his seat. The hon. gentleman did not read that. He read the next sentence and dwelt upon it. He dwelt upon the case of the Warden of the Cinque Ports and Lord Palmerston.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He quoted that, and in answer to his quoting British precedents, I said, here is what Mr. Todd says about British practice, and I quoted that portion of his letter.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not read one word from Dr. Todd's book on this branch of the case at all, but I read what Dr. Todd says on page 233 and page 234, with reference to the constitutionality of a Minister of the Crown, with a seat in the Cabinet, holding his office without a seat in Parliament. That was the only quotation I made from Dr. Todd's book on the subject I am now discussing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not upon Lord Palmerston and the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports.

Mr. BLAKE. Am I not to be allowed to refer to the original authority; am I not to be allowed to cite the case of the Cinque Ports and others without referring to Dr. Todd's book? I got that from other books altogether.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You did not read that part from Dr. Todd's book at all?

Mr. BLAKE. I did not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then the hon. gentleman skipped that part; he read before it and he read after it, and he skipped that.

Mr. BLAKE. Why, Sir, it is not in this part of Dr. Todd's book at all. This part of Dr. Todd's book is in reference to the presence of Ministers in Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is the page?

Mr. BLAKE. 233 and 234.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is the other page?

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know. I will try and find it out for him if he likes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no use in showing courtesy to that gentleman. I sent him that letter. He is unworthy of it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says there is no use in showing courtesy to me, that he sent me that letter, and that I am unworthy of it. Now, of course, he sent me the letter. The hon. gentleman read a portion of the letter; and he was called upon to read the rest of it. He said he would read the rest of it. My hon. friend asked for it, I asked for it, one or two of us asked for it, and in the end he said he would send us the letter to see what that letter was of which he read a portion, and then he chooses to accuse me of discourtesy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The House sees it.

Mr. BLAKE. I dare say the majority of the House sees it, because they always look through the hon. gentleman's spectacles:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to order. The hon. gentleman chooses to attack the majority of this House and say that they are not independent members of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say so. I said they always looked through the hon. gentleman's spectacles, and I appeal to every vote they have given in this House to prove it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to order. I say that statement is not true, and I am a living proof of it. I do not see through the spectacles of the First Minister, and I have shown by my voting with the hon. gentleman last Session on a very important question, that I did not see through the spectacles of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is the left centre. I did not count him as one of the majority. He is a party by himself. I apologize to the hon. gentleman if he thinks I suggested that he is submerged in the majority in this House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad the hon. gentleman recognizes my position as the leader of an Independent party in this House, and the only Independent party.

Mr. BLAKE. "On the other hand," says Dr. Todd—

Mr. ORTON. I rise to a question of order. I look upon it that this House has been insulted by the hon. member. I think when the hon. member accuses members of this House of looking through the spectacles of another hon. gentleman, it implies that they are voting simply and solely upon his judgment, and not upon their own.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not said. It was simply said that they looked through the spectacles, and I cannot interfere on that.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sure the hon. member for Wellington will not accuse the First Minister of not seeing straight.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The First Minister does not wear spectacles.

Mr. BLAKE. Dr. Todd says:

"But on the other hand, English practice—
And this word is underlined—

"English practice will clearly sustain the member so circumstanced in retaining his seat, as will appear from the following precedents. In 1809, when Mr. Percival, Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Portland Administration was commissioned by the King (upon the Duke of Portland's resignation) to form a new Ministry, he assumed for himself the office of First Lord of the Treasury, in addition to that of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Desirous of knowing whether this act necessitated his reelection, he consulted the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Lord Chancellor, and the Law Officers of the Crown. All these authorities concurred in the opinion that Mr. Percival's seat was not vacated. (Sir Walpole, life of Percival, vol. 2, page 52.)"

There you see the case is one of the character I refer to. Ministerial offices, Parliamentary offices, neither of them a disqualifying office, held in conjunction—

"It is true that, in 1861, Lord Palmerston, then First Lord of the Treasury, vacated his seat and went for reelection upon accepting from the Crown the Lord Wardenship of the Cinque Ports. (See Ashley, life of Palmerston; vol. 2, page 207.) But this would appear to have been an unnecessary and superfluous proceeding, for, in August, 1873, a case parallel to that of Mr. Percival occurred. Mr. Gladstone, being then First Lord of the Treasury, assumed in addition thereto, the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was contended by some persons that, under these circumstances, the law required that he should offer himself for reelection. But Mr. Gladstone was properly advised by the Crown Law Officers that such a course was unnecessary, inasmuch as an exchange of offices and accumulation of offices by a Minister of the Crown, are identical in principle. Mr. Gladstone accordingly did not vacate his seat. (See Law Times, vol. 56, page 246.)"

Once again, there is a conjunction of Ministerial offices, an amalgamation of offices by the Minister, but they must be offices each one of which will not disqualify him from sitting in Parliament. If one be a disqualifying office, even though the sacred robe of a Minister is on the man who takes it, that sacred robe will not save him from disqualification:

"In point of fact, there would be no difference between such a proceeding and that of the continuance of the seat after Parliament had decided to increase the salary attached to the office held by a Minister of the Crown."

Once again, you see the argument. There is the principle on which Dr. Todd goes. It is the same thing as if, in the case of a Minister elected while a Minister, or after he accepted office, Parliament decided to increase his salary; that would surely not apply to his accepting an office which constituted a positive disqualification for his seat.

"For the vital point of principle involved in a case of this description is really between the absolute 'independence' of a member of Parliament, and the justifiable 'control' which is exercised by the Crown over members who are likewise office holders. That 'control' is not affected by the mere addition of the amount of emolument received, whether the same has arisen from increase of salary or from 'accumulation' of offices. The question whether the office of 'High Commissioner' to England is or is not compatible with that of a Minister of the Crown in Canada, is, of course, a wholly different question, and must be argued upon its own merits."

So that Dr. Todd himself feels that the precedents he cited as English precedents, and the argument he advanced might or might not apply; at any rate, he did not intend to imply that they were of the least force in deciding the question in hand—

"In presenting to your notice these precedents, I make no reference to the precise wording of our Canadian Statutes on the subject. Upon this subject, you are better able than myself to express an opinion. I have limited my remarks to English precedent, which undoubtedly embodies the true interpretation of constitutional law applicable to the case."

So that, Sir, first of all, Dr. Todd's argument is in favour of the view that the non-acceptance of the salary makes no difference, and that the office, if it be a disqualifying one, is a disqualifying one though the salary is not accepted. Secondly, his view is that, according to English practice, ar accumulation or conjunction of Ministerial offices, each of which is not a disqualifying office, each of which is capable of being held, and a seat in Parliament held at the same time, a conjunction of these two offices, being an accumulation, does not necessitate a reelection. Thirdly, his view is that he is not at all implying or stating that the office of High Commissioner for Canada is an office of the character of the precedents to which he has referred; and, lastly, he disclaims implying any interpretation of this case, according to the wording of our Canadian Statutes, to which he does not refer at all, saying he speaks only of English practice. That is the opinion of Dr. Todd, which is said to decide this question. Now, the hon. gentleman stated that Sir Charles Tupper did not wish to vote on these various matters because the press had said something about his position, and he did not desire to vote. The law says that a person who is not a member, whose seat or election has become void, shall not sit or vote. If there was a reason for his not voting, there was a reason for his not sitting; there was the same reason for his not sitting—of feeling, of principle, of view—precisely the same. His vote was not wanted. What was wanted was that he should be here to expound the policy of the Administration; so he declared that he would, as my hon. friend from West Huron has said, save as many penalties as he could, in sitting, inasmuch as his sitting here was in the interests of the Administration, and not voting, inasmuch as the majority was so multitudinous that his vote could be spared. But, Sir, this is not all. The hon. gentleman, the Secretary of State (Mr. Chapleau)—once again to refer to his argument—has said that this question is one so trivial that it ought not to have been brought before the attention of the House. What did Sir Charles Tupper himself say when his not voting was challenged? He said:

"The hon. gentleman will, at a very early period, probably in the course of to-day or to-morrow, have an opportunity of ascertaining exactly what has prevented me from doing that which I regret most deeply—not having had the opportunity of doing that which I shall be most proud to do, and which I trust, before this Bill becomes law, I will have the opportunity of doing—backing, as I am accustomed to back, my opinions by my vote."

There was a great mystery. It was something which he most deeply regretted—his not having voted. Yet he had not voted, and we were to learn, in the course of the day, or the following day, what that was. Well, we have two sources of information—the Ministerial organs and the notice paper. On the next day the Ottawa correspondent of the Montreal Gazette said:

"It is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure amending the Act relating to the High Commissionership. It appears, under the law at present, Sir Charles Tupper cannot vote in the House while holding the office of High Commissioner, the Act declaring that he shall receive a salary in such capacity, and this technical obstacle is to be removed."

And the Ottawa correspondent of the Toronto Mail, of February 27th, said:

" WHY SIR CHARLES TUPPER DID NOT VOTE.

"It is understood that the reason Sir Charles Tupper has not voted this Session is because of a technical objection that might be raised. A Bill will be introduced to remove the doubts existing."

Such is the information which we have got within a day or two from the Ministerial organs, as to the hon. gentleman's view of his position and the Government's view, namely, that he was debarred from voting. If he was debarred from voting, he was debarred from sitting, and if debarred from sitting and voting, he is not a member of this House. I said there was one other source of information to which we might appeal, and only one, and that was the notice paper. On it I find given a notice by Sir John A. Macdonald:

"On Thursday next, a Bill respecting the Independence of Parliament Act of 1878."

Sir, I shall vote against the amendment.
Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I rise to a personal explanation. The hon. member who has just taken his seat declared that I had found fault with him, because he had given his opinion in regard to this matter. On the contrary, I have not done so, but excepted him, as he had moved a resolution. Before the amendment was moved by the hon. First Minister, the hon. member for West Durham stated the very opposite of what I had stated in my remarks, and I rose for the purpose of an explanation. I have always understood, hitherto, that that privilege was accorded a member when he rose for a personal explanation, and I have to-night learned the contrary for the first time. I have submitted to it at his hands, and I now give him fair notice that hereafter I shall neither ask quarter from him nor shall I give it.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved, that as the time for the reception of reports from the Committee on Private Bills expires to-day, the same be extended for a period of three weeks, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY LOAN BILL.

On the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 101) to amend the Act intituled An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, and for other purposes, being read,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move that the order be discharged, and that the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole, with instructions to insert the following amendment:—

The Canadian Pacific Railway shall not, nor shall any of its branch lines nor any line of railway leased by the Company or under their control, be at any time amalgamated with the Grand Trunk Railway or any of its branch lines or with any branch lines leased by the Grand Trunk Railway Company or under their control. And such amalgamation and any arrangement for making a common fund or 'pooling' the earnings or receipts of the said two railways, or their or any of their branch lines, or of any railway lines for parts thereof leased by the said companies, or either of them, or under the control of either of them, shall be absolutely void.

This provision, however, not to extend to traffic or running arrangements made with the assent of the Governor in Council, nor to hinder the acquisition by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of the railway between Quebec and Montreal, known as the North Shore Railway.

The Supreme Court of Canada shall have jurisdiction to enforce the provisions of this clause and to prevent, by injunction or otherwise, any infraction thereof and to punish any breach or disobedience of any order, decree or judgment of the Court in this behalf, and for these purposes shall have all the powers, both at Common Law and in Equity, of a Superior Court of original jurisdiction.

I am sure, Sir, I need not take up the time of the House with any arguments to show the advisability of adopting this provision. We all recognize that the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are two great and powerful corporations in this country, and I believe it will commend itself to the judgment of this House and meet with the hearty approval of the people, that due competition shall not be prevented, as it would be prevented by such a proposal as was intimated a short time ago by the Managing Director of the Grand Trunk Railway, that that Company should enter into arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by which they would obtain the entire and exclusive control of the railway lines of communication in the great Province of Ontario. I believe, Sir, that the public interests will be promoted by the adoption of this measure, to which I have referred, which circumstances have forced upon the attention of the Government as being essential to protect the country from having its entire railway communications absorbed and controlled by one great and powerful company controlling the entire lines of communication within our borders. As I have said, this is a proposal that, I believe, will so commend itself to the judgment of the House as to render it unnecessary, at this late stage of the Bill, to occupy further time in its discussion.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it is to be regretted that the hon. gentleman should not have given notice of this proposal, in order that the language in which it is expressed might have been considered a little by the House. With the general proposition I need hardly say I heartily concur. Having been fighting for many years against monopoly in one part of the Dominion, I am little disposed to throw any obstacle in the way of any plan which may tend to prevent the creation of a still more gigantic monopoly in the rest of the Dominion. Whether the clause is needful, I do not at this moment remember. I do not remember that there is any power on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to amalgamate with the Grand Trunk. I doubt if there is—I certainly should be surprised if there was. Of course, if there is no power it can do no harm to express the proposition that they shall not have such power: Whether it is expedient that an exception of an extraordinary character should be made to our general system of jurisprudence, whether it is not more expedient that the ordinary courts of the country should be resorted to in the first instance, in order to do the right and prevent the wrongs which may arise under the operation of this clause is, I think, rather a serious question. I think it will be rather a serious question that the proposal should be made—unheard of, so far as I know—to confer, in this class of cases, original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court. That is, of course, in one sense, a question of form. But with reference to the general conduct of jurisprudence with reference to the question of how we shall work it, the question of whether the provincial right to have causes civil or criminal administered by the courts created by the Provinces—subject, of course, to appeal to the Supreme Court—should not be maintained in this case is, I think a serious question. I quite admit that under the Constitution the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction to create a Supreme Court, or courts for the better administration and execution of the laws of Canada. That was an essential provision, because in the absence of such a provision it was possible that the laws of Canada might remain unexecuted, for want of Provincial Courts. The Provinces might create courts not having that jurisdiction, or they might inhibit their courts from exercising jurisdiction in cases of certain laws, and that power was necessary under the ordinary laws of the Constitution; but unless there was some such conjuncture as I have mentioned, I think it was intended that the laws of Canada, civil and criminal, as well as the laws of the Provinces themselves, should be administered by the provincial courts, and that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court should be an appellate jurisdiction. The mode in which the proposed clause is to be enforced is also of a very vague description. I am not very well satisfied with the draughtsmanship. I think if the House had one or two days' notice of the clause, so that the legal members would have had an opportunity of considering it, some suggestions might have been made which would have had the effect of improving it. It has a laudable object; but it is always to be remembered that a mutual understanding between these two Companies, that they shall charge the same rates and fares, will make such a clause waste paper.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to hear the leader of the Opposition express his great satisfaction with the amendment which has been submitted by the Minister of Railways. It was found fault with me to-day, in another place, that I was not sufficiently supporting the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill—that I had not taken sufficient interest in it. I was also found fault with the other day by hon. gentlemen opposite for expressing too much sympathy with the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill. Now, my object in performing my duty in relation to public questions in which these railway corporations are involved, is to guard the public interests so that there shall be no monopoly on one side or on the other. There has nothing been submitted to Parliament this Session—although it proposes to restrain the powers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—which has given me so much satisfaction as the amendment of the Minister of Railways, for if there is one thing to be guarded against by the people of Canada, it is that the powers of these two great companies—for as I said the other day, everything that the Grand Trunk had not taken from Canada seemed to be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway—shall not be united. I wish that, in the legislation we are now adopting, while we will do, and ought to do, everything possible to help this great national undertaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which they have so far carried out so successfully, with such credit to themselves and honour to the country—it is our duty so to guard the interests of the country that for the future no combination, no proposition such as we saw might possibly have arisen a few months ago, for a union between the heads of these two great companies should be allowed; that it is our duty to prevent such a union coming to a successful issue by which the interests of the people of Canada, by the establishment of one grand monopoly in this country. I am glad to hear the leader of the Opposition express himself so well satisfied with the amendment, and I believe it is the only thing in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Act upon which I have heard him express himself in that way. As to the legal question, I shall not enter very much into it. I do not pretend to find the same objection that the hon. gentleman finds to that portion of the amendment. But I say that whatever remedy may be devised, I want the best, the speediest, and the most effectual means to prevent these companies doing what we all desire to prevent them doing—combining between themselves and forming one grand monopoly. We have too many monopolies now, and I wish to prevent the extension of them in future.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that the hon. leader of the Opposition expresses his satisfaction with the amendment, because it will have the effect of repressing, or obstructing, or preventing monopoly. Well, it is satisfactory to hear that declaration from the leader of the Opposition, but that satisfaction was rather qualified by the statement in the last sentence of his speech, that the amendment would be made waste paper by the two companies coming to an agreement between themselves. With respect to the point he raised, that it might be left to the courts of original jurisdiction in the various Provinces of the Dominion, the House will see that the courts of one Province can only affect the portion of the railway within that Province, and this railway will run through Provinces yet unborn—as well as Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime Provinces and British Columbia, so that any one court, in any one of the Provinces, could not have that complete control of the subject that the Supreme Court, which is the common court of the whole Dominion, would have. But, as my hon. friend who has spoken says, these railways ought not, and I do not think will require, to have recourse to the courts. It was necessary that some provision should be made to enforce the law; but these great corporations cannot afford to break the law, cannot afford to act against the declared will of Parliament; and when any arrangements for amalgamation, or for working together in any way, are not approved of by the Government who represent the people of Canada, and such arrangements or such amalgamations, or such agreements, are declared absolutely void, these companies will, as a matter of course, yield to the direct voice of Parliament. There is a technical question, which has been raised, that the Supreme Court might be made a check court, as it is a court of original jurisdiction for some purposes. But that question requires a good deal of consideration. The Exchequer Court sits with one judge, with an appeal to the whole Bench, and it is thought that it would be better, in case of any extreme instance of infraction of the law, that application should be made at once to the Supreme Court, to a full Bench, and the mere statement or intimation of the court to either of these railways of any action being illegal, would have full and final effect.

Mr. WELDON. The question might arise as to whether or not the Supreme Court could act out of Term, because that court only sits by law during Term, and it might be necessary to confer with a judge to have a different arrangement made.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps I may be permitted to make another practical suggestion. The hon. gentleman knows that it might be difficult, under his arrangement, to have a prompt decision. There is always one judge in town for pressing emergencies, who could always hear a case, and in case of an appeal, the full court could be summoned, and got together. I rather think that if the hon. gentleman would provide for the matter being taken into the Exchequer Court, with a speedy appeal to the Supreme Court, he would make an improvement.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported with an amendment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the amendment be now read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a convenient opportunity for making a suggestion that I have to make. I move:

That the said Bill be not now considered, but be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House, with power to provide for all the interests of the Company, and all railway securities and railways, including established lines, shall be pledged to the Government as additional security for the proposed aid.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot accept the amendment of the hon. gentleman. It would have the effect of making the Government responsible—in case of default taking place and the Canadian Pacific Railway coming into the hands of the Government—for all the obligations that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may have entered into, and for all the lines they have leased, and it is not the intention of the Government to allow itself to be placed in that position. I must ask the House to reject the amendment of the hon. gentleman.

Ferguson (Leeds & Gren.),	McNeill,

Mr. BLAKE moved :

That said Bill be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with power to provide, as a condition of the proposed advances, that any contracts to be let for the construction of any part of the works of the Canadian Pacific Railway, whether on main or branch lines, shall be let only after such public notice, and upon such conditions as the Government shall approve; and that no Director of the Company shall be directly or indirectly interested, either as members of a construction company, or otherwise, in any such contracts.

Motion negated on the same division.

Mr. BLAKE moved :

That the Bill be referred back to a Committee of the Whole with power to provide, as a condition of the proposed advance, that the expenditure of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall be subject to the audit of the Auditor-General of Canada.

Motion negated on the same division.

Mr. BLAKE. As I cannot persuade hon. gentlemen opposite to change their course in any way, I will not, although I have some other suggestions to offer and objections to make, trouble those hon. gentlemen too much by putting them in form.

Bill read the third time and passed, on the same division reversed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:25 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 29th February, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDITION TO COMMITTEES.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the Mr. Mills and Mr. Temple be added to the Standing Committees on Privileges and Elections, and on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. TUPPER As the case of the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which I am at present a member, I would, under the circumstances, and for obvious reasons, beg to be excused from serving on that Committee. I therefore wish to withdraw.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not necessary for the hon. gentleman to attend the Committee.

Mr. TUPPER. In order that my non-attendance on that Committee may not lessen the number of its members, I wish to withdraw altogether from serving on that Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In that case I would move that Mr. Tupper be discharged from being a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that Mr. Girouard be appointed in his stead.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, in moving that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair, I desire to take advantage of the motion to make my statement to the House in regard to the financial condition of the country, and the policy of the Government with regard to the Tariff at the present Session. It will be remembered, Sir, that in the Session of 1882, as well as in the Session of 1883, I felt myself warranted in stating that at no period in the history of Canada did the credit, the financial standing and the general business of the Dominion stand in so good a position as it did at those two periods. I am in a position, I think, to state to-day that at no previous period in the history of this country did the credit of Canada and the financial condition of Canada stand better than it does now. With respect to the general trade of the country, I regret to say that owing to the depreciation in the value of lumber, which is one of our principal exports, owing to over-trading in certain branches in the Dominion, as well as over-imports, we have a depression at the present time, which I trust will not be of long duration but will be speedily overcome, and we may soon be in the position we occupied a year ago, prospering in every particular. I trust, Sir, that the statement I am about to submit to the House will add to the evidence which has been given from year to year since 1879, that the policy adopted by the Government in that year has been successful and in the interests of Canada. Sir, I desire in the first place to call attention to the receipts and expenditures for last year, and I will be brief in doing so because the details of the expenditure for the last fiscal year, as contained in the Public Accounts for that year, are in the hands of hon. members; but there are some points to which I desire to call the special attention of the House. I may state, what every hon. member knows, that the receipts for that year were $35,794,649, that the expenditure was $28,730,157, leaving a surplus of $7,064,492. Adding to that the $1,009,000 received from the sale of lands in Manitoba and the North-West, gives us a surplus for that year of over $8,000,000. Sir, it has been said, and it will be said no doubt during this discussion, that the expenditure for the fiscal year 1882-83 being $1,663,054 in excess of the previous year, it is an evidence of extravagance on the part of the Administration. In order to meet that charge I desire to state the items composing that additional expenditure, and then I will leave the House to decide whether the Government, because they are responsible primarily as submitting the Estimates to Parliament, are open to the charge of extravagant expenditure during that year. The $1,663,054 of increase may be stated as follows, these being the principal items. Sinking fund, $53,412. That is simply, as every hon. member knows, a redemption of the debt to that extent over and above the previous year. Subsidies to Provinces, $75,673. That we know is a payment made under statute, which requires that every tenth year the subsidies to the smaller Provinces be increased until they reach 80 cents per head of the population, on 400,000 each, and the additional concession made to Manitoba as well. Legislation (election expenses) $158,568. That amount was required for expenses connected with the General Elections. No objection can therefore be made to that item. Postal service, $195,522. When I state to the House that the increased receipts were $213,000 it will be evident that there has been no increased taxation with respect to that item. Railways and canals working expenses, $371,364. When I state to the House that the increased income during that year from those public works was $390,000, against an increase of expenditure of $371,364, the House will understand that no additional taxation was imposed under that head. Immigration and quarantine, $184,763. When we take into account the increased immigration to this country during that year, I think every hon. member will say that the money was well expended, and that it will yield an adequate return. Mounted Police, $109,369. That expenditure was under the authority of Parliament, made upon the statement of the Minister of the Interior at the time, that for public reasons the force should be increased. It has been increased and that additional expenditure was incurred during that year. The increased expenditure on public works and harbours was $436,359. This expenditure, I am sure, will be generally approved of. It was an expenditure demanded by Parliament on account of our large surplus, which gave us the opportunity of giving increased accommodation, and increased facilities to our commerce by the improvement of our harbours and the construction of public buildings throughout the Dominion of Canada. That expenditure of $436,358 was not only voted by Parliament and cheerfully granted, but it will, I am sure, be acquiesced in by both sides of the House. The increase in the administration of justice was $33,893. This increase became necessary owing to local legislation requiring the appointment of increased judges in different parts of the Dominion. Then we have an increase of $150,000 for the bounty to the fishermen, which had the almost unanimous concurrence of this House, and met with the general approval of the country. These items make about $1,600,000, and it will be found that only a small portion—that portion which was expended on public works, and that portion paid as a bounty to the fishermen—were direct charges on the country; that is to say, they were increases which would necessarily increase the taxation of the people. Therefore while the expenditure has been increased about $1,600,000, the taxation has not covered one-half that amount, and the expenditure for the other portion was on public works and other public services yielding more than compensating revenue in return. Now, Sir, there were other expenditures during the year chargeable to capital account amounting to $14,171,413. How were these expenditures met? In the first place, there was a surplus from consolidated revenue, amounting to $7,064,492; proceeds from the lands of the North-West, $1,009,019; deposits in the savings banks of the country, $4,445,445; and under the arrangement made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, we received the proceeds of the sales of their bonds, which were in our hands, these proceeds amounting, at the close of the year, to $2,694,000, upon which 4 per cent. interest was paid. This covered all the expenditures of that year, without our being under the necessity, as I stated last Session, of going abroad for a dollar in order to meet this expenditure. I may say further, in answer to the charge of the imposition of increased taxation by this Government upon the people of Canada, that deducting the surplus from the receipts of Customs and Excise since 1879, and charging simply the amounts which were necessary for the payment of the expenditures of the Government, our expenditure per head of the population since 1879, has been less than the average of expenditures from 1874 to 1879. I recollect that the leader of the Opposition in the speech he made in answer to the Speech from the Throne, remarked that I was great on averages.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Well, Sir, I believe that that is a correct principle to apply, and especially to the conduct of a Government. No Government would be justified in taking one particular year of their expenditure and presenting that to the country as an evidence of their economy; neither would it be fair for an Opposition to take a particular year, in which perhaps the expenditure was large, owing to circumstances over which the Government had no control, or if they had control, circumstances under which they felt it desirable to make increased expenditure in the interests of the country—I say it would not be fair that such a year should be specially selected. Therefore, in all discussions on this subject, I desire to take the averages as well as the expenditures in particular years, as evidence of our economy or of our extravagance. Now, Sir, we find that last year, deducting the surplus, the taxation per head of our population from Customs and Excise, and these are the only heads of taxation, was $4.82½ as against an average of $4.88 per head from 1874 to 1879. We also find that taking the average from 1879 to 1883 it amounted to $4.81 per head, against an expenditure from 1874 to 1879 of $4.88 per head. Under these circumstances it will be found that while it is true that the receipts have been large, while it is true that during last year our surplus has been large, the amount which was necessary to pay the expenditures of the country and afford all the appropriations necessary for public works, and every other expenditure, the taxation on the people of the country was less than the average from 1874 to 1879. Now, Sir, it may be interesting to the House to know under what heads the increase of income took place. The increase in Customs was $1,428,012; Excise, $375,257; Post Office and Money Orders, $212,503; Public Works, including Railways, $390,004; increased interest received $87,184. The increase in the Customs may be stated under the following heads: Railway carriages, lumber, manufacture of, and coal, $520,000. I may say, that a large portion of the duty paid on railway carriages and locomotives was upon railway carriages and locomotives imported by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who required them earlier than they could be made in this country. Our manufacturers of locomotives were so fully occupied at that time that even the Government had to send abroad in order to get the supply necessary for the increased traffic on the railway, and locomotives had to be imported to meet pressing demands. On brandy, gin, rum, whiskey and wines, the increase was $236,000; on fruits and sugar, $242,500; on laces, hosiery, jewellery, $71,000; wheat flour, $46,000; machinery, $150,000; pig iron, $28,000; glassware, $54,000. The increase of Excise revenue was mainly on the article of spirits; and the decrease on tobacco was about covered by the increase of revenue received on malt. That was before the decrease of 8 cents per pound of Excise took place in the article of tobacco. These are the items with reference to the operations of the last year. I desire now to call the attention of the House to the estimated income and expenditure for the present year. This is an amended estimate made from our experience down to the present date. The estimate of Customs for the current year was $21,500,000. The amended estimate is $20,250,000. Now, Sir, it may be asked by the House, what has occurred to produce this reduction? I may state in answer to that question that the imports of last year were $5,000,000 in excess of the estimate and the revenue from Customs $1,000,000 in excess of the estimate. I am satisfied, and it is now well understood, that the imports of the last year were greater than was warranted by the demands and by the consumption. We are now feeling the effect of that over-importation, because there is a corresponding reduction in the revenue received from Customs as the result. Then, there is another cause. Since this time twelve months, a large portion of the imports into Canada have decreased in value. As those hon. members who are engaged in business know perfectly well, many of the articles imported have fallen in value, owing to the increased stock in hand in the United States and in the old country. I know of one article, which was formerly sold for $9, but which is now sold for $6.75; and so with many other articles. Therefore, the over-importation of $5,000,000 last year, and the fall in the value of imports this year, have resulted in a reduction in the total imports down to the present time; and, estimating that the next four months will yield one-half of the revenue that has been received from Customs in the past eight months, I place the estimated income for the current year at the following figures:—

Customs .....	$20,250,000
Excise .....	5,550,000
Post Office .....	1,800,000
Public Works, including railways.....	3,000,000
Interest on investments .....	800,000
Other sources .....	800,000
Total income .....	$32,200,000

The amended estimated expenditure is $31,200,000. The estimate made this time twelve months placed the expenditure at $31,010,000; but we have had to expend a very considerable sum on public works—for the completion of the public buildings in Manitoba, on the harbour of Toronto, and on works in various other parts of the Dominion where works were absolutely necessary, and the sum voted was not found sufficient—so that the expenditure under that head has been increased; and therefore I estimate that the total expenditure this year will amount to the sum named, leaving a surplus of consolidated revenue of $1,000,000. I estimate that the proceeds from public lands in the North-West will amount to another $1,000,000, making the total surplus for this year $2,000,000. It may be said, by hon. gentlemen opposite that this is a great falling off from the surplus of $8,000,000 last year; but it will be remembered that this time twelve months I estimated the surplus from consolidated revenue for the current year at $2,250,000, my present estimate being $1,250,000 less. Well, let us see, Sir, what circumstances have led to that reduction. In the first place, the expenditure has been increased, while the receipts have been reduced. Why is there such a great difference in the surpluses of the two years—$8,000,000 in the one case, and $2,000,000 in the other? Simply because, having that surplus, the Government felt that they could come to the House and ask Parliament to appropriate a much larger sum of money for public works, including buildings and harbours, than was ever asked from Parliament before—a sum of money that will reach $3,250,000 during the current year, or an increase of about $1,500,000. The Government felt, Sir, that with the surplus they had at their disposal, they were justified in asking Parliament for these appropriations; Parliament granted them; and these moneys are now being expended for these purposes. In addition to that, we have increased expenditures on the postal service, on payments on account of Sinking Fund, on Immigration, on Militia and Defence, and on Mounted Police for the current year. Well, Sir, there was an increased expenditure of $2,250,000, with an estimated reduction in the revenue, which we supposed would leave us with a surplus of $2,250,000; whereas, owing to the falling off in the revenue, it is estimated that our surplus will be $1,000,000 from consolidated revenue, and $1,000,900 from public lands. It must also be borne in mind that the revenue was decreased from other causes. What were they? One was a reduction of taxation of $2,250,000 as compared with the year 1881-82. What were the reduction? $844,016 on tea; $76,313 on coffee; $91,719 on tin sheets and blocks; $200,000 on stamps; $50,000 of postage on newspapers; $700,000 of reduction in the tobacco duty; $1,000 on scrap iron; $14,250 on periodicals; and $50,000 on wire and other articles; making about $2,300,000 of reduction in the taxation of the country, which of course reduced the surplus. Now, Sir, we come to the subject of the estimated income and expenditure for the fiscal year 1884-85. The estimated income is as follows:—

From Customs.....	$26,000,000
“ Excise .....	5,550,000
“ Post Office.....	1,800,000
“ Public Works, including Railways .....	3,000,000
“ Interest and Investments .....	750,000
“ Other sources .....	800,000
Total estimated income.....	$32,000,000

I may mention here, as one of the causes of reduced income from Customs which we have taken into account is the increased producing power of the manufactures of Canada. The manufactures of the country have been increasing from year to year to such an extent as to materially affect the revenue of the country by causing a reduction in the imports. The estimated expenditure, according to the Estimates now on the Table, will be $29,811,639. It will be observed by hon. members, that the estimate, so far as public works are concerned, of $1,900,000 provides for the completion of public works, for which votes were taken last Session and are being expended this year. They contain no new item and it is probable therefore that a very considerable amount will appear in the Supplementary Estimates for public works in addition to those contained in the Estimates before us. It is probable that Parliament will be asked for some expenditure with reference to the obtaining, or, at least, securing the extension of railways, and of course the interest of that sum will have also to be provided. It has been intimated here that it may be found desirable to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway system from Montreal to Quebec, and an amount may be required for that purpose. There may be expenditures also beyond that, but whatever they may be, there will still be, in addition to the expenditure on public works, some items, no doubt, of that kind to be added. It is estimated therefore that the Supplementary Estimates will amount to $800,000 which will make the total expenditure for the next year $30,611,639: the estimate surplus from consolidated revenue is $1,400,000, and the estimated receipts from land in the North-West $1,250,000, or a total estimated surplus for next year of $2,650,000. The leading items of increase are: Militia, $139,000; Mounted Police, $54,000; Post Office, $211,000; and the leading items of decrease are sinking fund and interest $235,000, Public Works $750,000, Indians $147,920. Under these circumstances, it would appear that during the current and the next year the surplus will probably be in the neighbourhood of $2,250,000 per annum, and it will probably be satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite who have objected from time to time to the large surplus to learn that it has been reduced by a reduction of taxation, by decreased importation, the result of increased manufactures in the country. Now I desire to call the attention of the House to objections that have been taken to the Tariff of 1879 by hon. gentlemen opposite who have complained of the enormous surplus that we have received in the past; who complain that we have been taking from the pockets of the people a large sum of money which it would be much better to have allowed to remain there. The hon. the leader of the Opposition in the remarks he made upon the subject, said: “$20,000,000 have been taken out of the pockets of the people during the last four years unnecessarily; yes, he said not only $20,000,000, but probably $30,000,000. When I read that statement, I read it as delivered elsewhere; when it was made in the House, one of my colleagues, sitting near me, said: “What does he mean by that?” That was the question I asked myself when I read that statement for the first time. Well, I concluded, from the remarks made, that the hon. member not only took into account the $20,000,000 we had received but he added the interest on that and other charges, the profits, I suppose, that the consumer had to pay to the middleman. I presume that is what the hon. gentleman meant. Now, let us see how the case stands. We have had in the last four years an average surplus of $5,000,000 a year, but $4,000,000 of that, or nearly, has been the proceeds of land in the North-West; that therefore, was no tax upon the people. You may take $4,000,000 off that, at all events, to commence with. Then let us see how far the position taken by the hon. member, if I understood him aright, is carried out. He estimates, I presume, from the remarks that fell from him, that the consumer pays not only an increased duty but an increased profit on that duty to the man from whom he purchases the goods. Is that clearly established? I will appeal to every hon. gentleman in the House to-day who is doing business whether the manufacturers in the United States and the manufacturers in the old country have not approached him in the last three or four years and offered to sell him goods at a lower rate to meet the increased duties that have been collected and gone into the Treasury of the Dominion. We know that is the case. No one knows it better than the hon. Minister of Customs who has been brought in contact with this from day to day since 1879. Everybody understands this fact, and therefore a very considerable portion of the $16,000,000 of Customs that has been paid into the Treasury of the Dominion over and above what was necessary to pay our expenditure, has been, beyond doubt, paid by the manufacturer abroad. Is it a fact that the consumer always pays the increased duty? We know perfectly well that many of our men who are largely engaged in business complain that the imposition of the 2½ per cent. additional duty upon the goods they import is just so much out of their pockets, as they do not get it from the consumer. That is the allegation very often made. I will quote an authority here which the hon. leader of the Opposition, I think, will not object to, to show that in many cases and certainly in some, the consumer does not pay the duty. I quote, as an authority, the hon. gentleman who has just left his seat and is sitting at the lower part of the front benches (Mr. Paterson, Brant). The hon. leader of the Opposition may not consider him quite as good authority, judging from what has occurred lately, as if it came from the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Richard Cartwright.) Still I know he has great confidence in the opinion and judgment of the hon. member, and therefore I will give the leader of the Opposition that hon. gentleman's view to show that in many cases the consumer does not pay the additional duty. I refer to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) who said, in 1876:

"The other year the Finance Minister, in revising the Tariff, gave some encouragement to our industry which it never had before. The result was that 1,000 men who were engaged in that industry in Germany were literally transported, by the change in the Tariff, to Canada and set to work here. The cost of the article was not increased one iota, and Canada got all the benefit. The middlemen suffered a diminution of profits, but for them nobody seems to care much, the producer and consumer receiving all the sympathy."

That is the statement, no doubt a correct one, and it is applicable to many other articles upon which the duty is increased, the consumer not paying it. The experience of the last four years has proved beyond doubt the wisdom, or, at any rate, the fairness of that Tariff; that is the wisdom of its provisions in securing the necessary revenue, and besides the necessary protection for the industries of the country. Now it will be well understood by hon. members that if a Tariff had been framed that would simply give revenue sufficient to meet the expenditure for the first year or two, there would, as our manufacturing industries increased, in two or three years be a condition of things that would require the readjustment of the Tariff and the imposition of increased duties.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Well, Sir, the Tariff was to a certain extent, I admit, an experiment, because we did not know exactly what it would produce. We found that, by its application to the imports of the country, from the improved condition of the country increasing those imports, though we had a deficit in the first year, as the result of the over-importation of the year previous, we had in the next year a surplus of four millions, in the year following a surplus of six millions, and in the fourth year a surplus of seven million dollars. Under these circumstances, finding that that Tariff was ample to meet not only all that was required for the time being, but to meet the requirements of the future, the Government asked Parliament to take off two millions and a quarter of taxation. What is the position we are in to-day? Notwithstanding that the people have been relieved from the payment of that two millions and a quarter of taxation, notwithstanding that there has been a large increase in the manufacturing industries of the country, still we have a surplus of from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 a year, sufficient to meet any further increase which may take place in the producing power of our manufacturers throughout Canada. Under these circumstances, we are in a position to-day to meet Parliament and say, we have provided for the past, we have had a surplus in the past, we have reduced taxation, and the revenue, without any change so far as increased taxation is concerned, is ample and sufficient for the future, expenditure that may fall upon the Dominion. Now, under those circumstances, I hold that this Tariff has been in that respect a success. It may be said: "It is true, but should you not have made it something less than it was and not have had such a large surplus during the three years to which you refer?" We might have done it, but I doubt if it would have been politic, even if we knew that such would have been the result. What has been the effect? We have been able to take off the duties on the necessaries of life, many of them, and we have been able to do what members of the late Government said they intended to do if they had been in power when they had a surplus revenue. They justified themselves in not collecting revenue sufficient to pay the expenditure from 1875 down to 1879, because, when good times came, they would take the surplus and appropriate it to paying the deficits during that period. We have done that. We have paid off these deficits. We have reduced our debt. By the legislation that has taken place here, we have increased the Dominion note circulation since 1879 by $6,500,000, and by providing that we should deposit Dominion debentures guaranteed by the Imperial Government for a part of it, we have not been required to keep one dollar of gold more than when we had a circulation of $11,000,000 or $12,000,000; therefore we have had an increased circulation of $6,500,000 without any great cost to the country. We have reduced the interest of our debt by having a respectable surplus, and thus increasing the value of our securities; and, more than that, we have, by the course we have pursued with reference to the appropriating of this surplus in reducing our debt, placed ourselves in such a position that the net interest paid by the Dominion of Canada during the last fiscal year was $290,000 less than we paid in 1879-80. Under these circumstances, Sir, I think that the policy of the Government has been justified, the Tariff has been justified, and I believe that the evidence that we will be able to submit a little later on will confirm our friends and supporters who have sustained this Tariff up to the present time in the conviction that it is the policy to pursue for the future. I propose to follow, to-day, the course which I have pursued since 1879, and which, I think, is the most satisfactory line to take, and that is, year after year, to place upon record the answers to the objections that were made by hon. members opposite when that Tariff was under consideration. I purpose, on the present occasion, to take up as I have in the past, all the objections urged by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1879, and to produce, from our Trade Returns and from the statistics that we have, evidence that I think will be satisfactory to this House and to the country, that their fears, entertained and expressed in 1879, have not been justified by results any year since that period, down to the present. But I desire, before I go any further, to call the attention of the House to the few changes that the Government propose to make in the Tariff. I say they are few and unimportant, because, after considering this question carefully, the Government thought it best, this year at all events, to disturb the Tariff as little as possible. I know it has been said we have since 1879 made a good many changes every year, and I think they were wise and judicious, but we all felt at the time that it was desirable to do as little in that way as possible, unless the public interests demanded them; but in the present year the changes are not important, and they are in this direction—they are in the direction of giving to the manufacturer articles that are now unenumerated and pay 20 per cent, at a reduced rate of duty of 10 per cent., or to place them upon the free list. This is still recognizing the principle of maintaining and encouraging the industries of Canada. The articles it is proposed to place upon the free list are as follows:—Belting cloths. Boracic acid. Canvas manufactured from jute, 58 inches wide, for floor oil cloths. That has been free when uncalendered, and I may say here that the parties engaged in this industry throughout Canada thought they had a right to import and did import the uncalendered article for a time, but it was found to be not consistent with the law, and it is proposed to place the jute canvas calendered in the same position as uncalendered jute canvas was before. Cherryheat welding compound. Grease and grease scrap was upon the free list before, but connected with it was the condition "when imported by soap manufacturers." That is struck out and it is open for any person as well as soap manufacturers to import grease and grease soap. Indigo paste and extract. Indigo has been free in the past, but they have a new preparation of indigo called "paste and extract" for the same purposes, and it is proposed to introduce these articles into the free list. It will be remembered that last Session it was decided by Parliament that iron beams, sheets, plates, and knees, for iron or composite ships or vessels, should be free, and it is now proposed to add angles to that list, and make it iron or steel, because the parties are importing and using steel as well as iron, and it is simply placing steel for these purposes in the same category, and adding angles. Oxide of manganese. German mineral potash. Sulphate of sodium. Steel for saws was free before. We add straw cutters cut to shape. We strike out colcothar. It was an uncertain article, and an attempt was made to import other articles under that name. Vegetable fibre for manufacturing purposes. That also involved a great deal of difficulty in the Customs Department, and it is proposed to strike that out. Fish-plates, steel, to be struck out of the free list, and they will come in under the iron and steel plates at the same rate of duty. Then I come to the dutiable list. Acetic acid, raised from 15 to 25 per cent. It was found that a very strong description of vinegar under the head of acetic acid was imported, and it probably was acetic acid, but, by reducing it, and adding large quantities of water, they converted it into vinegar, and paid less duty than the man who imported vinegar, so it is to be placed at the same rate as vinegar, and therefore it is proposed to put such a duty upon it as will make about the same rate of duty as is paid on vinegar. Caplins, unfinished Leghorn hats, now paying 25, are to be the same as finished—20 per cent. Carpeting and mats of hemp are to be the same as jute. Jute now pays 25 per cent., but hemp does not. A difficulty occurred with reference to the character of the article that was entered, and they are to be made both the same. Celluloid moulded into sizes for knife and fork handles, and not manufactured, 10 per cent. This has become necessary in order to supply one or two outleries that have been started in the Dominion, and it is proposed to admit handles unfinished at 10 per cent. Last year we placed 27½ per cent upon cottons, prints, and dyed cottons—they remain the same. Jeans and coutilles were left on the 20 per cent. list, with one or two articles of a similar description of cotton, and it is proposed now to place jeans and coutilles only for corset makers, at 20 per cent. Cotton, 42 inches wide, for enamelled cloth. This 42-inch cotton is not made in the Dominion of Canada. The manufacturers of window shades were given the right to import it at 15 per cent., and this is extending it to the manufacturers of enamelled cloth. Earthenware decorated, printed or sponged and all not elsewhere specified—this is the same as at present, 30 per cent. I may state here that the reason for the more definite description is that a question has arisen between the importers and the Customs Department with reference to the Tariff as it exists at present. An action was brought by a firm in Montreal, claiming that the Customs Department had made an illegal collection. A suit was brought, and the verdict was given in favour of the Department; and it has been thought better in order to prevent any difficulty in the future that the description of the earthenware should be more specially given. India rubber vulcanized handles, for knives and forks, 10 per cent. Iron,—cast-iron forks, in an unfinished condition, 10 per cent. Labels for fish cans and other printed matter, to pay 6 cents per lb. and 20 per cent. Pins of all kinds at present under the Tariff, made of brass wire, were one rate of duty, and of iron wire another rate; and as a considerable amount of capital has been invested in Ontario in making these pins the duty is made 30 per cent. on all. Soap powders, 3 cents per pound. Steel now $5 per ton, is to be $3 per ton and 10 per cent. This is in order to equalize the duty more generally, and gives some more protection to the steel industry than it had in the past. Steel,—rolled round wire rods, under half an inch in diameter, for manufacturing wire. It now pays 10 per cent. without any condition attached to it. Arrangements are being made for the manufacture of wire, which now pays 15 per cent., and in order to give the manufacturers some profit it is proposed to reduce that description of iron used in the manufacture of wire, to 5 per cent. Needles, cylinder, hand frame and others,—this particular description of needles manufactured in the Dominion of Canada is to pay hereafter by this proposal 30 per cent. Now, I come to the question of the sugar duty. During the last six months the Government have had their attention called to this question by a number of individuals throughout the Dominion of Canada. I may mention that during last year, in October or November, a new tariff on sugar came into effect in the United States. That tariff is based upon the saccharine value of sugar below No. 13, tested by the polariscope. It has, by its operation, changed very considerably the trade in that country, and it has effected, to a certain extent, the trade with us, because a class and description of sugar that was formerly manufactured for, and taken largely by, the American market, suited our Tariff. That is now changed, to a certain extent, and the result has been that imports of sugar from the East Indies and from Brazil have increased considerably during the last six months. Therefore it became a serious question with the Government as to how they were to deal with this matter. I may say here that difficulties under the existing Tariff have arisen, as the Minister of Customs knows very well, under the following provisions: All sugars imported from the countries of produce paid no duty upon packages or charges, therefore sugar imported from the country of growth, suffered various deductions, according to the value of these packages, and the amount of these charges. These varied from 7 up to, in many cases, 27, and great difficulty has been experienced by the Department in order to get at an accurate statement of these charges. Then, on the other hand, difficulties have been experienced by the Department in ascertaining the exact value of sugar. In some cases it was known and afterwards discovered that sugars were imported below their value, and unreasonable and illegal deductions were made for packages and for charges. After having given this matter a good deal of consideration, the Government have decided for the present—though the matter was pressed on them very strongly, and there is a good deal to be said in favour of adopting the polariscope test,—to delay action at all events for the present Session, in order to give them an opportunity of investigating this matter fully, because it is a question that we cannot deal with in a hurried manner and without giving it full and mature consideration, as otherwise disastrous results might occur. We can make an investigation ourselves; we can enter upon negotiations, which will, no doubt, be not only desirable but necessary, in the present state of arrangements between the United States and Spain. It will be one of the objects, I am sure, of the early efforts of our High Commissioner when he returns to Europe, to endeavour to make some arrangements with Spain on that subject; therefore we thought proper that this matter should stand, at all events, as far as the adoption of the polariscope test was concerned, until the next Session of Parliament. To obviate existing difficulties, we make this proposition: that while the duty now collected upon sugars imported from the country of growth and produce is 30 per cent., after deducting charges, it is proposed to make the invoice for the payment of duty free on board, including packages and all charges, and to reduce the duty to 27½ per cent. That is the proposition; and it will give about the same result. And it has been decided, also, to establish such a system as will prevent what has occurred in the past—an improper and illegal entry of goods at one port and at a lower price than at another port. The arrangement is to be made so that there will be a uniform fixed rate throughout the whole Dominion, with reference to the cost of sugar, in the future. Now, Sir, another change is proposed. At present, the rate of duty collected on molasses, when used for conversion into sugar or syrup, is 25 per cent., and for domestic purposes, 15 per cent.; it is proposed to reduce the duty on all molasses to 15 per cent. when it comes from the port of production direct, and to remain as now 5 per cent. higher if it does not come from the port direct. The duty is to be collected free on board. Then, chloride of zinc and sulphate of zinc, used in the manufactures, is to be reduced to 5 per cent. It is in the unenumerated list at present. Then will follow the repealing of all clauses inconsistent with the foregoing; and it is proposed to amend section 8, 42 Vic., chap. 15, with reference to damaged and perishable goods. At present, if less than 25 per cent. of the whole invoice is damaged no return can be had. It is proposed, now, that if for instance in a case containing plate glass or glass of any kind 25 per cent. of the package is destroyed, then the party is to have the benefit. If 20 packages out of 100 packages at the present time were destroyed and not amounting to 25 per cent. of the whole, the party would not get any benefit. These are the provisions contained in the proposals to be submitted to the House. They, if anything, reduce the amount of revenue that will be collected under their operation.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask if you propose to take the duty off corn meal?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not at the present Session.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope you will at a very early period, at some future Session, consider it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I desire to call the attention of the House to the objections that have, on former occasions, been raised to this Tariff. One was that it would damage our credit in England. It will be remembered very well by hon. gentlemen who were in the House in 1879 that that was one of the principal objections brought forward by hon. gentlemen opposite. It has not damaged our credit down to the present time. In October last, our 4 per cent. securities were higher than they ever reached before. They were, ex-dividend, 14 per cent. more than we obtained down to 1878 or 1879. I will take this opportunity of stating what arrangements were made in England, when I was last there, with respect to the maturing loan. I placed myself, by authority of the Order in Council, in communication with our agents there, with respect to the redemption of the loan. After conference with them, it was decided that about November it would be wise to place a loan for £2,000,000 sterling on the market to redeem in part the 5 per cent. securities that fall due on 1st January, 1885. This would leave us with a smaller amount to place in the market the next year. It was suggested by the agents that that loan should be a short one, for ten years, and at 4 per cent., that we might be in a position to say to the holders of the present loan maturing on 1st January next, bearing 5 per cent., we will either exchange those with you dollar for dollar or pound for pound, which would be placing the 4 per cent. loan at practically 1½ or 2 per cent. premium, because we had three coupons to pay on the debentures maturing on 1st January next, or exchange them as far as they go, or allow the agents to purchase them as they were placed on the market. They then suggested that next year, later in the season, in December, we should place a 3½ per cent. loan on the market for thirty years for the redemption of the balance of that loan, and for the £2,000,000 sterling we would probably require to meet the expenditure on carrying the Canadian Pacific Railway to completion. They, of course, said that a 3½ per cent. loan would not bring as high a rate as a 4 per cent.; but they gave as their reason for suggesting that the loan, to be issued last autumn, should be for ten years at 4 per cent., that it would enable us to exchange them for 5 per cent., and the probabilities were that when the ten years had expired and the debentures were redeemable we could replace them by 3½ per cent. debentures nearly at par. That was their idea, and therefore they suggested a loan for a short period. The matter was left in that position with the understanding that I should cable them or communicate with them whenever a desirable opportunity offered to place on the market the £2,000,000 sterling, or $10,000,000 for ten or twenty years—we had not fully decided on the period, but they suggested ten years. In the meantime a proposition came from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to deposit $16,000,000 and in February a further sum of $4,000,000 on account of the proposed guarantee, and I at once communicated to the agents that this proposal having been agreed to, the matter would stand over for the present. We thought under these circumstances we could use a portion of the $16,000,000 and the $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 to be received on the 1st February, in the redemption through the agents of the 5 per cent. falling due in January next. The matter remained there; and I may here add that after I came from England, and after conference with my colleagues, it was decided, having made a pledge in the House last Session that if a loan were necessary during the year in order to meet the exigencies and requirements of the people of Canada who required as executors of estates and trustees to make investments, we would float a loan here for a limited amount—to place a $1,000,000 loan on the market and that the minimum should be par. References have been made out of the House and in the House to that loan, those made out of the House, I will not say those made in the House, being made with a view of damaging the credit of Canada. But what are the facts with regard to it?

The facts are these: That hon. gentlemen opposite know right well that the only loan we have placed on the Canadian market down to 1880 was at 6 per cent.; that in 1880 or 1881 it was decided to call in those 6 per cents., and we stated to the parties who held them that they could either have 5 per cents. or their money, and only a portion of the amount was taken in 5 per cents. And this last loan is the first loan ever floated by the Government of Canada at 4 per cent. or a shade less, as this was. It may be said that it was a great mistake to place that loan on the market without being quite sure the whole of it would be taken up. It was not offered, because there was a pressing want of the money. There was no reason why we should float a loan at a less rate than in England except to meet the demands to which I have referred, which the Government were pledged to do; and there could be no doubt we could have floated the $4,000,000 loan without any trouble had we adopted the course invariably followed in England of making certain allowances to brokers and paying percentages indirectly to parties tendering for the bonds; we were approached on that subject, but we neither paid any party in the shape of a syndicate, nor gave any commissions, nor paid any brokerage. The brokers asked a certain commission and we declined to give it, but we felt we were under an engagement to Dominion investors. We had taken up nearly every Dominion security payable in Canada. We had taken up the sixes, the fives, and the only debentures that remain now are the Savings Bank fives which are payable in a year. Many of those who were trustees of estates came to us within the last year or eighteen months asking for securities of this kind. The Government had pledged themselves, for I had stated in the House that when a loan was necessary it would be placed in our own market and among our own people. When the loan was offered we found that many of them had placed their money in banks—I do not know at what rate of interest. The banks found it in their interests to urge their depositors to allow this money to remain. Therefore we have not placed as large an amount as was expected of the loan. I had applications from England as well as from the United States. One was from a firm in Boston—Blake, Bros. & Co.—no connection, I believe, of my hon. friend opposite, but they wanted to float the debentures in the American market. I said no, these securities are held for Canadian investors, and if we had sold four million instead of one we would have had to seek temporary investment for the money. Therefore it was placed at 2½ per cent. premium in the meantime; but if we find that this is more than our securities bring in the English market we may reduce the rate. Pending that necessity, however, we felt that it was best to keep them where they are, and we told the applicants that they were held for investment in Canada, and not out of it; and for the purposes which I have stated, and to which we had pledged Parliament they would be devoted. Under these circumstances that loan cannot be considered a failure, because it was placed at a lower figure than we have ever obtained money for in Canada. We now receive money, it is true, in the savings banks, on call, for which we pay 4 per cent. It may be asked were you acting in the interests of the country in placing them at par? I call attention to one or two facts which though they are applicable to the discussion of the guarantee by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, did not come up in that discussion, though, I thought, it might be stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, that we might have obtained money on better terms in England. Taking money at par in Canada, the interest and principle paid here, is as good as at 2 or 2½ per cent. premium in England. The ex-Minister of Finance knows perfectly well that when we go into that market and ask tenders for a large sum of money it is done on the wholesale principle. He knows perfectly well that the difference between every day rates quoted for the small lots, and what the Government realizes from large loans is about 2 per cent.—that is the Government realizes about 2 per cent less than the figures given in those quotations. That is generally the case; but in addition to that, let me say, that we have to pay 1 per cent. premium, and for a large portion one-quarter per cent. brokerage. For debentures running thirty years, one-half per cent. is paid to the agents as commission for the payment of coupons, and amounts to over one-half per cent. during that period. These amount to 1½ per cent. Then the difference between having our money here, paid into our own Treasury, and having it paid in England, and transmitted here is equal to three-quarters of 1 per cent. more, and therefore there is a difference between obtaining the money here at par in preference to obtaining the money in England, amounting to 2 per cent. Therefore we felt justified in naming par as the minimum; and we felt ourselves justified in a financial point of view in taking the money at 4 per cent. from the Canadian Pacific Railway. We felt if we could obtain $4,000,000 at par, well and good, but to give it at less than par would be to place it at such a rate that it would not be in the interests of the country to dispose of it. We are therefore holding it for its original purposes, but if it is found to be desirable or necessary we may place it at a lower rate. Now, what was our position? Our position last autumn was most favourable. We had reduced the amount of the bonds of Canada in the hands of capitalists in England, to the extent of $10,000,000, between 1879 and 1883. We have not been compelled to go into the English market for a dollar since 1879. The fact of our not requiring to do so gave us, of course, a favourable position in the money market. Then, as I stated here last Session, the chances were, that beyond placing the loan on the market for £2,000,000 to meet the £2,000,000 sterling we were redeeming or had to redeem this year, the exchange of the debentures at 4 per cent. for the $29,000,000, after deducting the sinking fund falling due next January—we were going into the market simply to exchange securities rather than to ask for new loans. The result has been that from our surplus, from our improved credit, the securities of Canada stand to-day from 3 to 4 per cent. higher than those of New South Wales, which used to be 2½ per cent. above Canada. Now, I am free to admit that the obligations which we have undertaken by the measure which has just passed this House, will of course, compel us to go into the English market for more money than we otherwise would have required. When we made arrangements with our agents for the exchanging of securities, they agreed not only to redeem but to place the new bonds for £2,000,000 at one half per cent., whereas under the old arrangement it would have been 1 per cent. for redemption and 1 per cent. for payment. This is a favourable arrangement and will save us a large sum of money. The probabilities are that owing to the rapid progress of the work on the Canadian Pacific Railway, we will have to go to the English market within a year for £3,000,000 on a thirty years loan. It may be desirable next year to provide £3,000,000 sterling by a short loan of seven years, which will fall due in 1891, when the advance becomes due and payable by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that that will be somewhat embarrassing, considering that we have $29,000,000 to redeem on the 1st of January. It may, or it may not. Much will depend on the state of the money market at the time; but we are in this position: That if it should be found desirable to do so in the interests of the country, as the debentures which mature on the 1st of January next are not absolutely payable on that date, we may avail ourselves of our option and allow their redemption to stand for another year, and it is for this reason among others that the Government exacted from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company a rate of interest which would place them beyond all chance of loss, and with probably a very considerable gain. Now, Sir, that is our position, financially, on the other side of the Atlantic. Our credit has not been damaged. Our credit, as I say, was never better than it is at the present moment, and never has there been a period in the history of the country when we could go to the old country to obtain a loan for the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway on more favourable terms than we can at present. Our interest last year was $290,000 less than it was in 1880-81, and in another year or two, at all events, we shall redeem our 5 per cent. debentures for others bearing 4 per cent. or less, and we are in a position to state to Parliament that even with the engagements we have made, the maximum net interest which was paid in 1880-81 will not be exceeded when this great work is completed. Well, Sir, there was another objection. We were told that the Tariff would decrease our trade with Great Britain. I do not desire, Sir,—because I think it would be an unfair way of dealing with this question—to shirk meeting every objection which has been taken against this Tariff year after year. I present the facts and place them on record, so that we may have a means of judging for ourselves, year after year, as to their value. Now, Sir, has it decreased the trade with England and increased the trade with the United States? Let me give you a few facts. In 1876-77 our imports from the United States entered for consumption were $51,312,669; from Great Britain, $39,572,239; making a difference in favour of the United States of $11,740,430. In 1877-78 our imports from the United States, entered for consumption, were $48,631,739; from Great Britain, $37,431,180; making a difference in favour of the United States of $11,200,559. In 1878-79 our imports for consumption from the United States were $43,739,219; from Great Britain, $30,993,130; making a difference in favour of the United States of $12,846,089. In 1882-83 our imports for consumption from the United States were $56,032,333; from Great Britain, $52,052,468; making a difference in favour of the United States of $3,979,865, against an average difference of $12,000,000 in the previous year. Now, Sir, it may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the increased imports during the last year or so are in greater proportion from the United States than from Great Britain. I admit that the proportionate increase from the United States was greater last year than formerly. This was due to exceptional circumstances. Just let us look at the imports into British Columbia and the North-West Territories during the last year from the United States in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The increase of the imports from the United States into those two Provinces of the Dominion during the past year as compared with the year 1881-82, was so nothing like $9,000,000. As I stated before, the duty paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on imports of locomotives and rolling stock from the United States during the past two years was nearly $1,000,000, showing that that Company alone must have imported $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth of articles of that exceptional character from the United States during that period. You will also find, if you trace the increased imports from the United States during the past year, that a very large amount consists of cattle which have been taken from the United States into our North-West country for the grazing companies. But, Sir, these items are exceptional, and the figures I have given show that the difference in the imports from the two countries has been largely in favour of Great Britain. Now, Sir, I want to state further the aggregate trade with Great Britain—the total imports and export—was in 1879 $67,288,848, whereas in 1883 it was $99,197,684, an increase, in that period, of $31,908,836. The aggregate trade with the United States in 1879 was $70,904,720, and in 1883 it was $97,701,056, an increase of $26,796,336, as against an increase of $31,900,000 in our aggregate trade with Great Britain. Let me state further that the increased duties on the imports from Great Britain, under the new Tariff, are 2½ per cent., while on the imports from the United States they are 6 per cent.; showing that the application of the Tariff has not been against England and in favour of the United States, but, on the whole, largely in favour of trade with England as compared with the United States. Now, Sir, another statement made was that by the imposition of the duty on breadstuffs, we would materially interfere with the transportation of foreign produce through Canada. I recollect that the hon. gentleman who took his seat in this House yesterday (Mr. Mills) argued this point at considerable length. He endeavoured to show the advantage that we possessed in having these exports pass through Canada, in the shape of business to our railways and employment to our people, and he urged that the effect of the duty on breadstuffs would be very damaging to Canadian industry in every way. Now, I hold in my hand a statement furnished by the Customs Department of the value of the produce exported from Canada, not the produce of Canada, for several years, which is as follows:—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

1876.....	$6,417,506
1877.....	6,746,654
1878.....	9,856,246
1879.....	7,618,442
	<hr/>
	$29,638,848
1880.....	12,462,486
1881.....	17,137,799
1882.....	6,003,233
1883.....	8,196,366

In 1882 there was a general falling off in the exports from every port on the continent. This statement shows that the average annual export of foreign goods from Canada during the four years from 1876 to 1879 was $7,409,712, while during the four following years, from 1880 to 1883, it amounted to $9,699,971—a satisfactory answer, in my judgment, to those gentlemen who entertained fears on this subject. Now, Sir, it was also argued that this Tariff, if it proved to be a protective Tariff, could not be a revenue Tariff, and if it was a revenue Tariff it would fail as a protective Tariff. Well, it has proved to be a revenue Tariff; that hon. gentlemen opposite will not undertake to deny, for they complain that it has given too much revenue. Let us see, then, what evidence we have that it has encouraged the manufactures of the country. Two years ago, we had two gentlemen employed to visit the manufactories of the country, in order to ascertain if legislation was necessary to protect the labourers in factories. They gathered from a portion of the manufactories of the Dominion a certain amount of information most valuable in its character, showing the increased products of these manufactories, the increased number of persons employed in them, and the increased amount of wages paid. We have on various occasions produced certain information which we think cannot be controverted, and I follow the same course now. Take, for instance, the article of raw cotton. We can gauge very correctly the quantity of cotton manufactured, or its increased manufacture in the Dominion, from these returns because cotton is not produced in the country, and therefore the imports of that article will give very accurately its increased manufacture. In 1877-78, the imports of raw cotton were 7,243,413 lbs.; in 1878-79, they were 9,720,708 lbs.; in 1881-82, 18,127,323 lbs.; and in 1882-83, 27,353,491 lbs. That shows pretty clearly that the Tariff operates as a protective Tariff or as an encouraging Tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite will, perhaps, say that it is now too highly protected, causing over-production, though they helped to induce many persons to go into that industry by stating on the floor of Parliament that it paid the parties who had investments in it at 60 per cent. The imports in wool in 1877 and '78 amounted to 6,330,034 lbs.; in 1881 and '82, they amounted to 9,682,757 lbs.; in 1882 and '83, to 9,821,104 lbs. That gives a pretty fair index, though not so clear as in the case of raw cotton, because it is pretty well understood that an increased quantity of our home grown wool has been consumed in the manufacture of woollen goods in the past year. Still there is an evident large increase in the importation of wool of a quality not grown in Canada. Hides and pelts were imported in 1877 and '78 to the value of $1,207,300, and in 1882 and '83 to the value of $1,963,744, showing pretty clearly there has been a large extension in the manufacture of leather of various kinds. The increased value of machinery imported is shown by the following return :—

"	1879	.....	40,3809
"	1880	.....	503,853
"	1881	.....	1,022,518
"	1882	.....	2,194,445
"	1883	.....	2,757,570

This is undoubted evidence of the increased development of our manufacturing industries of various kinds. I saw it stated in the leading organ of the Opposition, when this statement was made by one of the papers on the Government side that it was an indication that the Tariff had failed to encourage the manufacture of machinery in Canada. Well, I wrote a few letters to parties in Ontario on this subject, who were engaged in the manufacture of machinery, and then, answers were most satisfactory. They are rather long to read here, but one establishment said its production had increased by $238,000 in the four years; and the others all said that they had a large increase, from a third to a half—some doubled the number of employees—and they attributed this increase to the policy which established manufactures in the country, thus creating a demand for machinery they had not before. With reference to my own Province, there is a firm largely engaged in the manufacture of machinery there. I did not write to this firm, but I know an application was made to it from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to do some work, and the manager replied that he was so full of orders that he could not tender for the work required by the Department. In all parts of the Dominion, there has been increased production of machinery, and machinery that could not be obtained here has been imported during the last year to the extent of $2,757,570, showing pretty clearly the extent to which manufacturing industries have been increased throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. Take also the article of coal. It is quite true the consumption of coal has been increased by the development of our railway traffic, and we know that it has been considerably increased through this cause within the last three or four years. In 1878 the imports of coal amounted to 892,446 tons, and in 1883 to 1,686,617 tons, showing an increase of 719,791 tons while the increased consumption of Canadian coal in 1883 over 1878 was 700,000 tons making a total increased consumption of 1,493,171 tons over 1878. It is quite clear there must be some cause for this increased consumption beyond the increased requirements of the railways, and all understand this to be the greatly increase number of factories driven by steam. It is not denied that the increase in factories established throughout the Dominion has been very great indeed. This is the evidence I have adduced to show this policy has been not only a protective policy in its encouragement to manufacturing industries but it has also been a revenue producing policy. It was said the Tariff would not benefit the coal industry. I estimated in 1879 that in four years the increased output of coal in the Dominion of Canada would be 400,000 tons; and the returns I have received from Nova Scotia, though these are not quite complete, and those from British Columbia show clearly that the increased output of coal, as compared with 1879, for the last calendar year was 2,000 tons a day, for every working day, or a total of nearly 700,000 tons of an increase. That, I think, is an answer, and a forcible answer to the fears entertained and the opinion expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite that this Tariff would be of no service to the coal industry.

Mr. CHARLTON. What proportion of the increased output is from British Columbia?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not much; it is mainly from Nova Scotia. Now, we come to two or three pet industries that have been pointed out by hon. gentlemen opposite as industries encouraged unnecessarily by the Parliament of Canada, as industries that have been pampered by an unnecessarily protective Tariff. I refer more especially to the cotton, woollen and sugar industries. With reference to the cotton industries, I think that hon. gentlemen who were in the House in 1879 and in 1880, will recollect that it was said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the capitalists who had invested their money in the cotton mills of the country were receiving enormous profits, at the expense of the mass of the people. That was the statement. Now I am not quite sure from what has taken place that these hon. gentlemen will not change their line of argument and say that this Tariff has been destructive to the cotton industry, that the men who have invested their capital in it will lose their capital, and that the public, the consumers, will obtain little or no benefit from it. That probably may be the line taken, but whatever may happen in the future, my impression is that though cotton stocks have fallen considerably from what they were a year or two ago, it will be found that the dividends which are being paid are fair and reasonable, and that the prices paid by the consumers of cotton in Canada are less to-day than they were in 1877-78. I am prepared to establish that the grey cottons manufactured in the Dominion to-day are sold by the manufacturers at prices as low, if not a percentage below what the same article is sold for in Massachusetts to men in the trade there. With reference to other cottons, the statements that I have had are that, deducting the expense in bringing them here, the cottons are sold to the consumer to-day at about 10 per cent. above the price in the United States. They are buying both grey and bleached cottons to-day for less than they could buy them under the Tariff of the hon. gentleman opposite of 1877-78. It is true that that industry has experienced difficulties; it is true that many of the parties who put their capital into the companies for the erection of cotton mills incurred liabilities beyond the extent of their paid up capital, and, when the mill was finished, as a rule—I know it is so in several cases—there was a debt upon the mill and they had no capital to work it, and the result was that they had to obtain assistance from outside, and that assistance was rendered them as long as it was possible for the party who undertook to render it to grant it. But there was a limit to which even the strongest financial man in the Dominion of Canada could go in that respect, and, when the amount of discounts in the various banks of Canada on cotton account had reached a very large sum, and that they could not be extended, a difficulty arose. They had been manufacturing more cotton of a particular line (greys) than there was demand for, which increased their difficulties. A panic occurred, and the result was a depreciation of cotton stocks—and it has to a certain extent continued down to the present time. It became necessary, in order to diminish the stock on hand of a certain class of goods, that the number of employes should be reduced, in order that their operations might be put in a healthy condition. Then, when that became necessary in order to right matters, what was said? The lumbermen of the country are diminishing this year their output, because there is a large stock on hand; but has there been anything said anywhere against their doing so? Has there been any complaint from any quarter in reference to it? Has the wisdom of their course been questioned at all? No; but the very moment a few hundred operatives in a cotton mill were out of employment for a month, there was a cry through the country that the National Policy was a failure, that this pampered industry was in a desperate condition, and was in this condition as the result of the protection that had been given. I am prepared to say here to-day that these industries, though they are in difficulty for the want of capital—and that is the main cause—are placing themselves in such a position that an occurrence such as took place last summer will not take place again. They are arranging to have diversified manufactures. They are arranging that this surplus stock shall not occur again with reference to any one particular class; and, as far as I can learn, the dividends paid by many of these companies, under these circumstances, have been very fair indeed, and the only complaint of the stockholders is that they do not go into their pockets, but go to pay liabilities. Never mind; they get the benefit of them. But, while I believe these industries will pay and are paying reasonably at the present moment, the point I want to bring out is this, that the consumer is obtaining his goods, the clothing that he requires, the cotton necessary for himself and his family at a price less than he would have had it under the Tariff of the hon. gentleman opposite. Now, the next pet industry was the sugar industry. It was said that large fortunes were being made out of that. I should not wonder now if we were told by the gentlemen opposite that the protection we gave them has encouraged the construction of so many sugar refineries, that there is ruin before them as well.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, that is their business, not ours. But I saw the dividend declared the other day by a company that was not very fortunate in its outset, I speak of the Halifax Refinery. It was not a very large dividend, but they declared a dividend, and I have reason to believe that the other refineries are paying a fair and reasonable return for their outlay of capital. The trouble now with hon. gentlemen opposite will be that they are not getting 30 or 40 per cent.; there would then be a grievance in reference to this matter. What is the position in which the consumer is placed to-day? It was said that the consumer would pay a largely increased price for the sugar he consumed. I think I am in a position to state that, at no period in the history of Canada, has the consumer of sugar had it at as low a price as he has obtained it during the past year, and I think I am in a position to state further that, had the Tariff of the hon. gentleman opposite been in operation during the last year, the consumer would have paid under that Tariff more for the sugar than he has paid during the past year. There are many persons opposed to this Tariff who are under the impression that the manufactured goods to which I have referred, cotton and sugar, cost more than they did under the Tariff of 1877-78. Well, it is quite natural that many persons, reading the Opposition papers, should get that idea, but I was very much surprised that a leading statesman, who should be thoroughly posted on this subject, was himself mistaken with reference to the matter. I refer to my hon. friend, if he will allow me to call him so, the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). In a speech he delivered in Scotland—I do not know if it is correctly reported—he is reported to have made this statement:

"With regard to the sugar manufactories, the policy of the protectionist Government was such as to make it impossible to import sugar from any other country, and the Canadian people were taxed from two to three cents, or a penny to a penny and a-half penny per pound, more than formerly in order that sugar refineries might be established in the country. There were now five, and the probability was that there would be some more before long, leading to over-production, and all this going on at the expense of the country."

Further on he says:

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

"Now, there was no doubt whatever that the farmers would soon find out that they pay, as they are now paying, nearly two prices for cotton goods, and an additional price for prints in addition."

If my hon. friend was mistaken, as I allege he was, in reference to this, then it is quite reasonable to suppose that others who had not the same facilities for obtaining information upon the subject might also be misled. But it would strike the gentlemen present on that occasion, and some of them probably were interested in sugar refineries, as singular that under our Tariff we had only increased the duty between raw sugar and refined 5 per cent. as between the Tariff of 1878 and the present Tariff—only 5 per cent., except in regard to the United States, where they give a bounty, and therefore we make them pay on the duty paid value, but in regard to Scotland or England there was only 5 per cent. difference as between raw sugar and refined compared with the Tariff of 1878. And supposing that was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a cent per pound. These gentlemen would naturally ask themselves, how is it that, if the value of sugar to the consumer is 2 or 3 cents a lb. more than it was before, we cannot get our sugar into the Canadian market when we only pay an additional duty of  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a cent per pound. It would naturally strike them as very strange. I know that my hon. friend opposite must have been under that impression when he made that statement. But the facts are apparent to every person that sugar was never so cheap as it is at present. All sugar is cheap, I admit; but even with the low price of raw sugar under the Tariff of 1878, sugar has been during the last year, sold all through the country at a price less than it could have been imported under the Tariff of 1878. Now with reference to woollen goods, another article on the list here. It is said that the poor are taxed to pay the increased duty on woollen goods. Well, now, we have discussed that point in this House from year to year; we have discussed it on the platform outside the House, and I think the country is coming to understand that question pretty well. I think people understand that at the present moment that woollen goods manufactured in Canada to-day are sold at a less price than they could have been sold if imported under the Tariff of 1878. I think that is well understood. I think the poor men, the labouring men, the men in moderate circumstances, and even the rich men who wish to consume as good manufactured woollen as can be made, all pay less for them to-day than they would have paid under the Tariff of 1878. New industries have been established in various sections of the country; even Prince Edward Island made a most creditable exhibit of woollen goods at the St. John Exhibition—that Province which, it has been said, over and over again, derived no benefit whatever from the National Policy. Now, Sir, at the present day the people know how it operates. It has been said that the farmer would be taxed and would have no benefit whatever under the operation of this policy. In 1882 I entered very fully upon that point, and my case was not as strong then as it is to-day. Then the hon. gentleman opposite asked us, as did their organ from month to month—where is the benefit to the wheat producer of Canada by your Tariff? Well, I admitted that they were not benefited 15 cents per bushel, but they had a small benefit—I placed it at something like 2 cents per bushel, and I had to admit that it was small. I went on to show that they had benefits in other directions which were very important to them indeed—that they had the benefits of better markets—home markets—that they had higher prices. The hon. gentleman opposite, perhaps, will take the course to-day that he has taken on former occasions, and attempt to show that the policy has increased the cost of living to the workingman beyond any increase of wages that is paid him. If he does, I will ask this House, I would ask hon. members who are cognizant of the facts to which I refer, whether the increased expenditure that we have to make at present in the cost of living, is not largely on the products of the farm? I appeal to housekeepers everywhere and ask them whether the increase that has taken place in the cost of living, is not mainly in the increased cost of food produced by our farmer, they having a better market and getting better prices for their produce. I need not enter into details further than to say that to-day the farmer has clearly and beyond doubt a protection of 8 and perhaps 10 cents a bushel upon his wheat, over and above what he would have with the Tariff of 1878, and receives that additional price. There is no question about that whatever. And I will venture to say that you may travel through any portion of the wheat producing sections of Canada, and you will not find a man who is producing wheat who will raise his voice or cast his vote in favour of making wheat free—unless, perhaps, he be a very extreme party man. But, from all I can learn—and I have had pretty good opportunities of testing public opinion within the last two or three months—the universal voice of Reformers and of Liberal Conservatives, is: Don't change the duty on wheat. That is the demand. Well now, Sir, what do they pay in increased duty? Their tea is cheaper, their coffee is cheaper, as well as many other articles they consume, their cotton, I assert, is cheaper; their sugar is cheaper, their agricultural implements are cheaper—almost every thing they require is cheaper than it was in 1878, and I am satisfied that is their own testimony. Therefore, as far as the farmer is concerned, there is no ground for complaint, because he will understand and appreciate the position just as well as the hon. gentleman opposite, and at no period in the history of the National Policy do the farmers understand it better than they do to-day. Now, Sir, we come to the iron industry that they said was another pet industry and they particularly declaimed against the duty on pig iron. We also gave a bounty to that industry, yet notwithstanding the bounty to this industry, hon. gentlemen opposite state, it is in financial difficulty. Well, that is quite true; and I can assert, Mr. Speaker, that if they were not in receipt of the benefits of a protective Tariff and a bounty they could not continue to run a day longer. Though we require to pay from the Treasury a considerable amount of money as bounty to that establishment, or to any other that may be established, the parties who are engaged in it pay into the Treasury an equivalent to that bounty; and if it became a question as to the existence of that establishment, or the payment of the bounty, it could be easily settled, because the country would lose all these people and the revenue that is paid by this and other industries connected therewith would be lost by the closing up of that establishment. It may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite: "You have not succeeded in establishing any new industries of the kind, you have scarcely kept this one alive." Well, I believe the iron industry the world over is in an embarrassed condition to-day; every one knows that. You may go to Pennsylvania, you may go to England, you may go to any iron country the world over, and you will find the prices are lower, almost, than they were ever before; therefore, I am in a position to state that it is only by the protection given, and the bounty that was paid, that this establishment is kept in existence. We have had another indication of that. A company was formed last autumn in England with a capital of £370,000, for the manufacture of charcoaled iron. They are likely to accomplish something still. I have no doubt their operations are somewhat paralyzed by the unusually low price of iron at the present moment. Therefore it cannot be expected that we can have prosperity in any particular industry of this kind when it is not in a flourishing condition anywhere else. Well, Sir, we come to another point. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: "What have you to say with reference to the argument you have adduced here on former occasions as to the value of bank stocks as an indication of the condition of the country? What have you to say with reference to the equalizing of the imports and exports—which the hon. leader of the Opposition referred to in his Speech in the debate on the Address?" Well, Sir, I say this, that the record shows that with reference to the balance of trade our policy has had, to a great extent, the effect we said it would and I will prove it. But a word or two with reference to bank stocks. Last Session of Parliament, as the hon. leader of Opposition stated, I made no reference to that subject as an evidence of the prosperity of the country; because I felt at the time that the value of bank stocks was at a point beyond which, in my judgment, the resources and rests of the banks warranted. It arose from various causes; it arose, in the first place, from men who could not obtain more than 4 per cent. for the money deposited in banks and various other institutions sought to get a larger return by investing in bank stocks; and hence this increased demand. It is true that it had the brokers who were engaged in these operations bulling the market, and forcing stocks above the point which, I believed at the time, and a great many people agreed with me, was beyond their real value. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) may ask as he did at Lennox three months ago: "What explanation has the hon. Finance Minister to offer as to the reduction in the value of bank stocks, which equals \$7,000,000 as compared with the value in 1882?" Well, I can say to him in reply: What has the hon. gentleman to say to the fact that since Parliament met, or since 1st January, the stocks of the Bank of Montreal and that of other Banks, have largely increased in value. The hon. gentleman stated at Lennox that:

"Some gentlemen present knew to their cost that, although it was not possible for the Reform Government to add one cent to the value of their tariff, yet that a Finance Minister who did not understand his business and would persist in acting on his own advice contrary to that of able men around him, could destroy the market for their barley by destroying the malt-producing interest of Canada, as Sir Leonard Tilley had done most wantonly. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) The course followed had been suggested to him (Sir Richard), but on enquiry he found that if he started in that direction he might give American maltsters the opportunity which they had long been seeking of using our action for the purpose of excluding Canadian malt. He therefore abstained. Sir Leonard Tilley took a different view. He put on a duty, and in so doing struck a blow not only at an important Canadian industry, but at the interests of our barley-growing counties, because it was of great importance to farmers that, if there should be for a time a surplus of barley, it should be malted in our own country and held over until such time as a rise in prices occurred. Now they were entirely in the hands of Oswego merchants and American maltsters. (Cheers.) Not long ago the Finance Minister stated that the Dominion was safe for another seven years of uninterrupted prosperity. Scarcely were the words out of his mouth than the list of bankruptcies began to swell to such proportions that the list for 1883 would prove greater than that of the worst year of the depression when Mr. Mackenzie was in power."

The Bank of Montreal stock was the barometer of stocks generally, and that it had gone down millions. The value of that stock to-day is $3,000,000 over what it was on the 1st January last. This would be evidence, if I were to follow the line of argument adopted by that hon. gentleman, that business is rapidly improving, a conclusion which I am not disposed to object to. What were the circumstances which led to the depreciation in the value of bank stocks? Several circumstances combined to bring about that result, but I do not hesitate to say that the outrageous mismanagement of the Exchange Bank had a great deal to do with it. It is quite true that when the final crash came it did not affect terminally the banking institutions of the country; but it affected men seeking investments and those who held bank stocks as investments, they were led to the conclusion that as permanent investments these stocks were not satisfactory securities to hold. The consequence was that such persons sought investments elsewhere and placed their bank stock on the market, and that circumstance together with the disturbed state of the market at the time would assist the "bears" to force stocks below their real value; and that indeed was the result. What was there to justify that great reduction? I have a statement here which shows that nine or ten of the banks increased their rest during last year by $1,780,000, and still their stock had depreciated in value for the reasons stated. But they are now advancing, being restored to a figure nearer their fair value, and I am satisfied they will reach a higher point than at present. The existing position of bank stocks does not deprive us of the argument we used before, that it was the satisfactory financial condition of the country, that increased the value of those stocks, and they are far higher to-day than they were in 1878, and will go still higher.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

Bill (No. 24) to incorporate the Halifax Steam Navigation Company, limited.—(Mr. Stairs.)

Bill (No. 28) to incorporate the Canada Temperance and General Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Middlesex.)

Bill (No. 45) to incorporate the Owen Sound Dry Dock Shipbuilding and Navigation Company, limited.—(Mr. Allen.)

Bill (No. 47) respecting the winding up of the Spring Hill and Parrsboro' Coal and Railway Company, and the sale of the property thereof to the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 50) respecting the International Railway Company.—(Mr. Hall.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company.—(Mr. Gunn.)

FIRST READING.

The following Bill (from the Senate) was read the first time, on a division:—

Bill (No. 107) for the relief of John Graham.—(Mr. Jamieson.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Previous to Recess, Sir, I was calling the attention of the House to the statement that was made out of the House by the hon. member for South Huron, and in the House by the hon. leader of the Opposition, relative to the sudden fall that had taken place in bank stocks. I stated that the fall in stocks was of an exceptional character, and did not go to prove that it was the result of a depression in the general trade of the Dominion. I think, Sir, that when I state that since the 1st of January these stocks have risen on an average over ten per cent.—the Bank of Montreal from 179½ to 189, the Ontario Bank from 103 to 100½, the Bank of Toronto from 165½ to 178½, the Merchants' Bank from 108 to 114½, the Bank of Commerce from 118½ to 121½, and the Federal Bank from 122½ to 136—it will be quite clear to the House that a fall in bank stocks cannot be claimed as a proof of general depression in the trade of the country. It has arisen, in my judgment, in part from the circumstances to which I referred. I also stated before Recess that there did not appear to be any good or substantial reasons why that fall should have taken place, taking into account the addition to the Rest in the last year; and I may now just read what the increases in that account were in several of the banks during the last year:—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Montreal.....	$ 250,000
Toronto.....	60,000
Ontario.....	110,000
Merchants'.....	400,000
Commerce.....	250,000
Dominion.....	100,000
Hamilton.....	65,000
Standard.....	60,000
Federal.....	150,000
Imperial.....	250,000
Molson's.....	75,000

Total Increase..... $1,770,000

This would appear to show that between 1882 and the present time, unless some very extraordinary circumstances have happened recently, these stocks should have increased rather than decreased in value; and I have no doubt that it will be found before long that the value of the stocks will be quite equal to what they were in 1882, when they were probably nearer their true value than they were, in 1883. I mention this, Sir, in connection with bank matters, to show that though the stocks had fallen a good deal between the spring and the autumn, still that was not to be attributed solely to a depression in the trade and commerce of the country. Now, I come to another point to which my attention and the attention of the House was called in a very emphatic manner, by the hon. leader of the Opposition—in a very sarcastic manner too, but, at the same time, in one that elicited applause from his supporters. That point was that the Government had emphatically and distinctly stated that this policy was calculated to bring nearer together than the policy that previously existed the value of imports and exports; and he quoted some statements of mine made in 1879 or in 1880, to the effect, that there was really a balance then on what I considered the right side, that the imports of the country were less by a small sum than the exports, that this was a healthy state of things, which it was desirable to continue, and that the policy adopted in 1879 was calculated to bring the two, the exports and the imports, nearer together. Now, the hon. the leader of the Opposition, no doubt, in his remarks referred to the fact, because it is a fact, that the imports of last year were larger than they were the year before, and that the difference between the imports and the exports was greater than in the year before and the year previous to that. Now, I still hold to the proposition that, ordinarily speaking, it is in the interest of the country to increase our exports and to decrease our imports by the extension of our own manufactures. This proposition I lay down that if we can increase our exports and diminish our imports by producing in the country articles formerly imported it is better than to import those articles, inasmuch as it gives employment to the people and more nearly adjusts the balance of trade. But circumstances that have taken place in the last year or two that have increased materially the imports, and there has been no corresponding exports to meet that increase. We all know the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have expended in the construction of their road and branches something like $58,000,000 in two years; we all know that in addition to that, the hon. Minister of Railways has been constructing during the last two years a portion of the Pacific Railway; we know that the Government have been importing rails and other material for the portion of the line constructed by the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway have been importing steel rails, locomotives, rolling stock and other material, perhaps to the extent of $10,000,000 during the last year. These are exceptional circumstances, but still, I venture to say, hon. gentlemen opposite will give us no credit whatever for them in the account. When we take into consideration the circumstances of the last year or two, we cannot expect anything else but an increase in the difference between the imports and the exports, because, taking into account all the money that came into the North-West for its development and improvement, taking into account all the imports for the Canadian Pacific Railway, all the imports by the contractors and by the Government with reference to the construction of this railway,—what have we in return in the shape of exports? We have nothing as yet. Therefore it is under the exceptional circumstances to which I refer that the imports have been increased as compared with the exports during the last two years and especially during the last year. But I maintain the facts on record in the Trade Returns during the last five years show, beyond doubt, that this policy has brought nearer together the imports and exports than they would have been by the policy that previously existed. I will give some facts to prove this, and I will state these facts to show that, notwithstanding the increased imports for the Canadian Pacific and the Government Railways, and the large expenditure in the North-West that induced imports, we have still brought the balance of trade more in our favour than we could have done under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. The value of imports per head of the population in 1883, notwithstanding the circumstances I have mentioned, was $ 8. What was it in 1873, when no exceptional circumstances existed? It was $33.58 per head. In 1874 it was $32.22 per head; in 1875, $30.24; in 1876, $22; in 1877, $23.29; and in 1878, $21.44 per head—or an average on the population of those years of $27.14 per head; while, during the last four years, with these exceptional circumstances existing which I have mentioned, the average has been but $23.02 per head, or a difference of $16,000,000 per year in favour of the latter period. During the last year if the imports per head of the population had been the same as they were in 1873, we would have had $152,000,000 of imports instead of $132,000,000, making a difference of $20,000,000 during the year. This establishes beyond doubt the effect of the policy, because there is just about that amount of increased manufactures in the Dominion during the years to which I have referred. I took this afternoon as an illustration, the value of raw cottons imported. If we take the returns submitted by the cotton mills we find something like an increase of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 in the manufacture of cotton alone; therefore all the labour and capital expended, everything connected with this industry was so much saved to the country and a diminution of the imports. So with reference to all the manufactories in the country and their products. If these goods had not been made in the country they would have been imported, and we ask you, considering the prosperity of the country last year, and as a consequence large importations, whether, if we had not the Tariff by which we have been able to produce by these industries, $16,000,000 a year more than we produced in 1879, the balance would not have been larger against us than it is? I hold that a policy which, if it does not increase the exports, will diminish the imports, must have the effects of bringing the exports and imports nearer together than would have another and opposite policy. I ask whether this has not been sustained by these facts? I have dealt with the leading objections down to the present time, that have been made against the policy adopted in 1879, and I think that the answers I have given, taken from the returns and other public documents, are sufficient, and the subject needs no further remarks from me. But there are some new objections which have been made lately. One new charge brought against the Government in the last twelve months is that they have neglected the interests of the country by legislating in such a way as to change the legislation in the United States with reference to the duty on malt, and thus injuring the people of Canada. Why it is well known that for the last seven years, there has been a conflict in the United States between the maltsters and the brewers. The maltsters have been endeavouring to obtain an increased duty and to shut out the malt from Canada. They failed in their endeavours until the last Session of Congress when they gained a victory over the brewers and obtained an increased duty on malt. By that operation, they have shut out a very considerable export of malt from Canada to the United States during the last year. It is quite true that a concession on the other hand was made which really is a benefit to our farmers, though limited, by taking 5 cents per bushel off the duty on barley. We are told the Government of Canada is responsible for this. Let me read an extract from a speech made by Sir Richard Cartwright at Lennox some three or four months ago:

“Some gentlemen present know to their cost that although it was not possible for a Reform Government to add one cent to the value of their barley—”

That is declared by a gentleman who was in the late Government.

“That a Finance Minister who did not understand his business, and would persist in acting on his own advice, contrary to that of able men around him—”

When I read this speech I said, the late Minister of Finance has not such a very depreciatory view of the gentlemen on this side of the House, as I supposed he had. He says—I understood it so when I read it first—that the gentlemen around me were men of ability, and I would not accept their suggestions. But let us see.

I began to think, who was it sitting around me of the able men, my colleagues and those supporting us, who took exception to the legislation which we introduced. I could not recollect any one of my colleagues or any member on this side of the House. The gentleman who did take exception was the ex-Finance Minister, the present member for South Huron, and therefore the remark must have applied to him, as “the able men around me.”

“As Sir Leonard Tilley had done most wantonly. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) The course followed had been suggested to him (Sir Richard), but, on enquiry he found that, if he started in that direction, he might give American maltsters the opportunity which they had long been seeking of making our action the ground of excluding Canadian malt. He therefore abstained. Sir Leonard Tilley took a different course. He put on a duty, and, in so doing, struck a blow not only at an important Canadian industry, but at the interest of our barley-growing counties, because it was of great importance to farmers that, if there should be for a time a surplus of barley, it should be malted in our own country, and held over until such time as a rise in the price occurred. Now they were entirely in the hands of Oswego merchants and American maltsters.”

This is the report of the speech made in which a charge is brought against the Government in reference to this matter. Well, Sir, I am here represented as a most obstinate Minister of Finance. The gentleman opposite represents himself in this case as the pliant Minister of Finance. I have heard the hon. gentleman and his friends opposite speak of the Government, and of myself as Finance Minister as being too pliant, and say that all the people had to do was to come and ask that certain concessions should be made to certain interests, and those concessions were made at once. That is a different character, from what is given here. Here I was obstinate and would not take the advice of able men around me. And, Mr. Speaker, the general impression of those with whom I have had any conversation on the subject since 1878 was that that hon. gentleman opposite was the obstinate man who would not take any advice, who would not be influenced by any suggestions that were made. Now, let us see; is it a fact that the action of this Government had anything to do with this increase of duty on malt in the United States? No, Sir; none whatever; and, when I read to this House the effect of the Tariff introduced by the hon. member opposite, and of the Tariff introduced by this Government, with reference to malt, and show the rate of duty that was collected upon malt when the change took place, you will see what grounds the hon. member had for making the statement he did at Lennox. Under Mr. Cartwright's Tariff of 1878—this is for part of the year—42,232 lbs. were imported, the value was $1,388, duty $1,055.77, or 78 per cent. In 1879, that is, under the Tariff submitted by this Government, the imports were 129,634 lbs. value $3,346, duty collected $2,592.63 or 77½ per cent., a fraction under that collected in 1878. In 1881 the duty was changed, as the hon. member knows, and malt was put in the same position exactly as barley, the duty being 15 cents per bushel Customs, and 1 cent per pound Excise. That has been the law from 1881 to the present time. That was the law that was in force when the change took place in Congress. In 1881, we that year imported 10,553 bushels, value $10,270, duty collected $5,171, or a fraction over 50 per cent., against 80 per cent. that the hon. member imposed. In 1882-83, we imported 15,979 bushels, value $15,099, duty paid $7,509.93, or a little less than 50 per cent., and yet the hon. member told them at Lennox on the eve of an election—I will not say that it was at all to affect it, but only to show what an outrageous Government this was and that they should not send any one here to support it—that we had deprived producers of that section of the country of selling their barley to the maltsters, and that their interests were sacrificed, when the duty, from 1881 to 1883, was 30 per cent. less than the hon. member himself imposed in 1878. Yet, he said we were responsible for that change, and, as that is one of the charges which I thought might possibly be brought to-night, though I do not know that it will, I thought it just as well to spike that gun at once. There is another charge, and a very general one, made all over the country, to the effect that we have imposed a duty of 35 per cent. upon imports to Canada. That is the general statement. There are a few articles that pay 35 per cent., but we know that last year the average duty on the whole imports was something like 19 per cent. I had the pleasure of addressing a meeting at Strathroy, which was referred to by the hon. member opposite the other night, and the member for Brant was present on that occasion, and he took that exception to the Tariff policy of the Government. He said to the audience, imagine your sending to Germany and importing a certain article, and, when it reached the borders of Canada, you are charged 35 per cent. duty on it, what an outrage that is. Well, I must say that, after reading the speech of the hon. member for Brant in 1866 two or three times, I should claim him, though he calls himself a Free-Trader, as one of the soundest Protectionists in the Parliament of Canada, taking his speech as a criterion, and nothing could be stronger than the way in which, in the extract I read from his speech to-day, he justified the then Finance Minister in imposing an increased duty on cigars, which he stated had an excellent result. But I say to him, and to all such, but especially to him, that, if he takes exception to 35 per cent. duty on a limited number of articles, he must not forget that the Finance Minister, to whom he appealed in 1876 for further concessions, did in 1878 change the Customs duties on cigars and cigarettes. The returns for 1878 showing the duty collected on 21,050 German cigars, valued at $10,680, as $12,687.10, or nearly 120 per cent. The Excise duty on this quantity of cigars would have been $3,423.60 at that time. The protection given to the manufacturer was $4,263.50, or 40 per cent. The hon. member was grateful for a little less protection than that, and in a year or two afterwards he obtained 40 per cent. protection, and it he says produced wonderful results; it brought a thousand people, even before the change was made in 1878, into the country, and the article manufactured cost the consumer no more than it did before. Still, the hon. member will, I presume, here as elsewhere, denounce the present Government for putting 35 per cent. duty on any articles of imports. The general objections that have been taken with reference to this Tariff have been largely met by the results. The results have been, in most cases, to decrease the cost of the article to the consumer, and in many cases the increased duty that has been imposed upon it has enabled the producer, having the market to himself, to give to the consumer the article cheaper than he could have done under other circumstances, and cheaper than he ever had it before. And so, while exception may be taken to the policy which has for its object protection to the industries of the country, still our friends will be found sometimes even denouncing a policy that is doing just exactly what some of the hon. gentlemen opposite sustained, supported, defended, and spoke of approvingly. Now, Sir, we come to the question of the general depreciation of the country. Let us see what evidences we have of that. I admit, Sir, and I regret that it is so, that the wheat crop of Canada as a whole was less last year than it has been for some years previous, and this circumstance has no doubt affected, to some extent, the business of the country during the autumn and the present winter; because, had the eighteen or twenty million bushels of wheat which we are supposed to have lost by a short crop, been raised, sold, and the proceeds reached the hands of the farmers of the country, no doubt there would have been greater ease generally than there is at the present moment. But there is this to be considered, that while there was a deficiency in the wheat crop, there was at the same time a large surplus in the hay crop, nearly amounting in value to the loss in the wheat crop. So that while the farmers have lost on the wheat crop, their abundant hay crop will enable them to raise a greater number of cattle for export next year; and therefore I am satisfied the general result will be largely maintained by the increased export of cattle which they will be able to make by having in Ontario alone two and a-half million tons of hay more than usual—to say nothing of the increased crop in the other Provinces. But while I admit that a short wheat crop has caused a somewhat depressing effect, I must also admit that the price obtained for lumber at the present time is not as great as it was last year and the year before. There is also an over stock already on hand, and people are not manufacturing in certain branches as much this winter as they did last, and that also has had some effect upon the general trade and business of the country. There are other circumstances to which I referred this afternoon—over-importation and over-trading, which have left the importer and retailer with stocks on hand that cannot be immediately converted into money. These circumstances also have a depressing effect. But what evidence have we beyond this of the general depression and stagnation of trade in the country? Sir, we have undoubted testimony as to the generally prompt payment of liabilities falling due in the banks. We see by the press that the bank managers who have been interviewed in Montreal and elsewhere with reference to payments, state that they are satisfactory; this could not be if there was the great depression of trade which hon. gentlemen opposite have been asserting exists, and which they have been pointing to as, in some cases, produced by the National Policy. These things have been referred to before, and they show there is no general depression, or suffering, or want, and no unusual number of people out of employment—not at all. What are the best evidences we can have that the mass of the people are being employed, and that they have spare funds at their disposal? It is as I have stated over and over again in this House, the increased accumulation of deposits in the savings banks by people who have earned money over and above what they require for their expenditure or can use in their legitimate business, and have deposited the surplus. I may here explain to the House—and I do so for the purpose of answering a statement made by the hon. member who followed me last Session with reference to the savings banks deposits—that the savings banks in the Maritime Provinces, are conducted upon a principle that was in force there before the Union. The Post Office Department does not receive money in those Provinces as it does in Ontario and Quebec. Down to 1879, these savings banks' agents were authorized to accept as much as $10,000 from any one depositor, and the result, of course, was a natural temptation and inducement to business men to make deposits, inasmuch as they had interest paid from the day of the deposit up to the day of the withdrawal of the deposit. But notwithstanding these advantages enjoyed to 1879, what was the fact? The fact was that the increased deposits in these savings banks, and in the Post Office Savings Banks throughout the Dominion increased but $2,800,000 during the five years from 1873 to 1878. But what took place after that? The Government ordered that these deposits should be limited to $3,000 a depositor in 1879, and that the interest should only be paid from the commencement of the month, that is, if a deposit was made on the 2nd of the month interest would only be payable from the 1st of the month following; and if it was drawn on the last day of the month no interest should be paid for that month, thus greatly lessening the inducements to deposit in the savings banks of the Maritime Provinces. Well, what was the result? The result was that in 1879, these deposits increased over withdrawals $710,669; in 1880, $1,845,222; in 1881, $4,703,715; in 1882, to $5,931,989; in 1883, to $4,450,445, a total increase in five years of $17,722,094, as against $2,800,000 in the five years previous, with greater inducements to deposit. It must be borne in mind that in Ontario and Quebec no one, except at Toronto, has a right to deposit over $1,000 in one name, and notwithstanding that fact, the increase during that period was the sum I have named. During the present year the amount deposited is $1,755,079 greater than the withdrawals, showing that even this year there is still on the part of the masses of the workingmen and others, an ability to add to their earnings and to their deposits in the Government Savings Banks. I think there can be no better evidence given that there is general prosperity in the country. Let us go a little further. The total deposits in the chartered banks on 31st July, 1879, were $63,848,145. On 31st July, 1883, four years later they were $99,241,325, being an increase in that period of $35,393,180, and an increase during the five years of $53,000,000 taking into account both the Post Office Savings Bank and the chartered banks of the country. This is evidence that the people are earning money and have a surplus or they would not be in a position to add so largely to the deposits in our banking institutions. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) stated last year that this was no proof of increased earnings among the masses, because there appeared to be a much larger increase in the Maritime Provinces than elsewhere, and it could not be pretended that more money had been earned in those Provinces than in Ontario and Quebec. In the Lower Provinces the people have not been in the habit of making deposits in the banks and the banks have not encouraged the payment of interest on deposits, and the result has been that the spare money of the people of the Maritime Provinces has for many years gone into the savings bank, while the chartered banks of Ontario and Quebec have paid perhaps a higher rate of interest than the Post Office Savings Bank, and the people have deposited largely with those institutions. That accounts for the apparently large increase in the Maritime Provinces as compared with Ontario and Quebec. It may be said that within the last three or four months the wages of employes of manufacturers in the Dominion have in some cases been reduced; that we have not so many men employed just now as we had three or four months ago. I am free to admit that Canadian manufacturers have to-day an unusual strain put on them.

And from what cause is this strain? Every hon. member knows that manufacturers in Great Britain, where the policy of Free Trade prevails, and manufacturers in the United States where Protection prevails, have surplus stock on hand, that they are reducing the number of their employes, that they are diminishing their wages, that they are compelled to sell their surplus stocks, and the stocks they are even now producing from day to day at a lower rate than usual. Those reductions have in many cases taken place, though resisted by the operatives in both England and the United States. What is the result? Our American neighbours and British manufacturers, owing to their profits being reduced and the wages paid to their operatives being now lower than before, come to our market and are sharply competing to-day with the Canadian manufacturers. As the prices paid for labour in the United States must regulate to some extent the price of labour in Canada, because if the wages are not about equal the operatives will soon pass across the line. Our manufacturers found it necessary to increase the wages here when an advance took place in the United States in order to keep their men; but now that there is a reduction in the United States owing to reduced prices, our manufacturers, in order to successfully compete, have also to reduce the prices of their products and in some cases the wages of their operatives. But what would have been the condition of those working people and of those manufacturing industries established throughout the country if it had not been for the National Policy? Why, if it were not for the protective tariff that shields to a great extent our industries and manufactures we would be over-run, and one-half or three-fourths of our factories would be closed within three months. These circumstances give the opponents of this policy a ground for attack on the Government and the policy. Let me say this, that we cannot object to such an attack if made against individual members of the Government or against the Administration as a whole; but what we do object to is, that the attack is made in such a way as to affect the best interests of Canada, to depreciate our credit at home and abroad, to discourage men from coming to the country and investing their capital here, and to discourage the people of the country by the cries of depression, by cries of distress, by cries of ruin. The leader of the Opposition, when speaking in the House about six weeks ago, said we had the cry of soup kitchens again. That statement might be very well to make a point; but was there anything in it of practical significance? The proposal to which he referred, in London, was made by the editor of a newspaper supporting the Administration, because there were a number of families, as there are every winter in every city of the Dominion, widows and those who are worse than widows, suffering children and many aged and infirm persons, requiring assistance. Is it right to draw the inferences the leader of the Opposition did, because benevolent individuals endeavour to provide food for the poor, it may be for some immigrants who, not finding employment in the country in the winter, have reached the cities and require assistance. But does this compare with the condition of affairs in 1878-79 when we, members of Parliament and the citizens of Ottawa, were asked to subscribe to buy bread for hundreds of men, who although they were willing to work, were starving? Is that the case now in any city of the Dominion? In regard to the city of London, I have here a statement made by the Mayor of east London about two months ago, or about two or three weeks before the speech to which I have referred was delivered by the leader of the Opposition. That gentleman says that the condition of east London has wonderfully changed within the last two years; and he is not a Liberal Conservative. And why has that change taken place? He said that two years ago 200 houses were to let, and now they are occupied, and he should know, because he is an agent for the selling and letting of houses. He speaks of the men employed in the railway car shop and steel works and dwells in most hopeful terms as to the condition of the city; and all this comes from east London just in advance of the statement made by the leader of the Opposition. We have benevolent men and women in Toronto, Ottawa, London and other cities, providing for the necessities of the needy; but I ask hon. members whether anything has recently taken place which will compare with the condition of affairs in 1877-78.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Yes; much worse.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Much worse! Then, Mr. Speaker, it is needless for me to make any further statement. When the hon. gentleman rises in his place and endeavours to defeat the policy of the Government by stating that the country is in a worse position to-day than it was in 1877 and 1878, with reference to employment for the people of the country, I want no further statement to satisfy independent men on both sides of the House that these gentlemen are seeking really some other object than the good of the country. I am amazed at the statement of the hon. gentleman that the country is in a worse state than it was five years ago; but if that is to be the line to be taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, I wish to refer to the fact that Sir Richard Cartwright, who was not then a member of the House, at the meeting to which I have referred, said to the people, look at the state of the country at the present time: "Why," said he, "the bankruptcies this year will be in excess of the worst year of the Mackenzie Administration." But how disappointed must the hon. gentleman have been when he found that they only amounted to about one-half of what they were during the three years 1877-78-79. I have the returns here, and they show that in each of those years they were nearly double those of last year, notwithstanding the fact that the figures for last year include nearly 260 failures in Manitoba and the North-West—failures of an exceptional character, owing to causes which every person knows. We know that the spirit of speculation which existed in Winnipeg, a city of 25,000 inhabitants, was such that they were asking for lots in that city as much as, and more than could be obtained for lots in the centre of the city of Toronto—as much in some cases, as was asked for lots in Chicago. The hon. gentleman must have known that that was a state of things which must soon come to an end; that there was nothing to warrant such large prices; that they were the result of the spirit of speculation; and that outside of the speculation in land there were very large importations by men in business, importations in excess of the demand; that these men over-estimated the extent of the population which would be brought into the country, and that it was found, at the close or middle of last year, that they were not in a position to pay for the supplies they imported. For these reasons, disaster overtook these people; it was exceptional in its character, and I am satisfied that they are rapidly rising and will rapidly rise from that condition of things. But no community, no city, under similar circumstances, could expect any other result. There were 260 failures in the west out of 1,300 in the Dominion. The whole number in the Dominion, involving the sum $15,000,000, including Manitoba, in which there was little or no business done in the other years to which I refer. But notwithstanding this fact, the amount of bankruptcy was only a little over one-half what it was in those three years. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman—unlike his position in the case of the malt duty, for he could not have known the facts exactly, because the year was not closed—still he claimed that there was blue ruin everywhere, his mind was so seized with gloom that he had to take that view of the situation. Hon. gentlemen seem to see no daylight whatever—nothing but gloom and darkness before them. I do hope that when the hon. member who replied to me last year, and who gave me reason to hope from his former speeches what his real sentiments were, that if the day should ever come that he would be Minister of Finance, he would stand by the policy he advocated in 1876. Now, that the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) is here, he will take a different view. True to his extreme opinions and proclivities, true to his extreme views on Free Trade, I suppose he will repeat the arguments and the statements made by him on former occasions, in favour of Free Trade and against the National Policy. I hold this, that while at the present time there is some depression from the circumstances to which I referred, there is no reason whatever for apprehension. And let me say this, that had these depressing circumstances taken place under other conditions, as I have already intimated, the depression would have been four-fold greater than it is to-day. As I said last Session, when hon. gentlemen were stating: You are fortunate, you are lucky, everything is prosperous with you, your National Policy is therefore accepted by a large portion of the people—my answer was, and my answer is now, that the National Policy is more valuable in the days of depression than it is in the days of prosperity. I say that this National Policy, which provides employment for the people who would otherwise be idle, will continue to establish its reputation and establish itself in the hearts and affections of the people of the Dominion of Canada. And though I shall regret indeed if the line which has been indicated is taken by these hon. gentlemen, who stated this evening that the country is in a worse position than it was in 1878—though, I say, I shall regret that this line should be taken, because it is calculated to damage the country, still at the same time, in spite of those declarations, in spite of the declarations which may be made to-night, or in the course of the debate, in spite of the articles which have appeared in the Canadian, American and English papers, calculated to damage the credit of the country, there are resources in the country, there are vigour and power and energy in the people of the country, and there is in this policy to which I refer that which gives hope and energy to the people, which will place us to a considerable extent above and beyond the influence of such speeches and such arguments as may be made against the National Policy, in this Parliament or elsewhere.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, having been prevented by express provision of an Act of Parliament to that intent made and provided, from being present last year when the hon. gentleman made his financial statement, I am not quite as familiar as I could wish to be with the course of the discussion in 1883. But I will venture to say, although I was not present then, that I have very little doubt that the hon. gentleman on that occasion took a very different tone, and struck a very different attitude from that which he has assumed to-night. Sir, it was not for nothing that the hon. gentleman, in the present instance, found it necessary to apologize and defend, and excuse as far as he could, as well as he knew how, the policy of which he has been the exponent for so long. He undoubtedly made some remarkable admissions to which I shall direct your attention and the attention of the House. The hon. gentleman told us, and told us truly enough, that it is not possible for his policy to avert over-production and consequent injury to manufacturers or the loss of wages to their unfortunate employees; nor could his policy avert poor harvests, or give us a larger market for lumber, or prevent a decrease in the value of goods, nor could it check over-importations. All true, Mr. Speaker. But why is it that these economic truths are now dawning for the first time upon the hon. gentleman and his followers? Were not those things as true when my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie) presided over the affairs of Canada as they are to-day? Were any allowances then made by—not the hon. gentleman who was at that time snug and safe in Fredericton while other hon. gentlemen were bearing the heat and burthen of the day—not by the hon. gentlemen. I say, but by the hon. gentleman whom I see sitting beside him. What excuse were they willing to make, for my hon. friend when precisely these very things occurred, only in a far greater degree, in a far more intensified degree, and when in consequence of those things my hon. friend was obliged to struggle for some considerable time with financial difficulties. Sir, I hail it as a sign of improvement that the hon. gentleman at last, after a long time, is waking up to what the country is also waking up, that this policy, whatever it may be, is no panacea, that it won't save the country hard times, that it won't save a single man. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman admitted some things; but the hon. gentleman has an old habit of not telling us, when he makes these financial statements, all the expenditure which we are likely to incur in consequence of his policy. On the present occasion he told us, it is true, what we could guess without his telling us, that, in addition to the estimates we have here, doubtless large supplementary estimates are going to be brought down. We are accustomed to that. It is a misfortune—a misfortune from which I admit neither Government was quite free—that besides the facts detailed on the first occasion of making the Budget statement, there are generally other facts not then detailed, involving considerable additions to our expenditure. In my time, I can only say, I tried to keep those expenditures as low as possible. I was not always successful, any more than the hon. gentleman. But the hon. gentleman, gave us a hint that probably a million more than the estimates would be required. He dealt in the most gingerly fashion possible with the other question of how many millions this railway extension policy of which he spoke was to cost—of what additional interest charge to the country it would involve. Now, surely the hon. gentleman, when making the financial statement, could tell us whether we are going to spend $4,000,000, or $8,000,000, or $12,000,000, under the guise of a railway extension policy. Surely we ought to know that. Surely the hon. gentleman will not refuse to tell us roughly—I do not ask that he should tell us exactly; but surely he can tell us within a million or two—what this railway extension policy is likely to cost us. It is a question of interest. It has been a question of interest to a great many of the supporters of the hon. gentleman, and I think we ought to know what the final figure is to be. How many millions? Perhaps the hon. Minister of Railways will tell me how many millions. We have been dealing with so many millions lately, that a few millions more or less cannot in the least discompose the hon. gentleman. I see they do not; but surely, to gratify my natural curiosity, he will tell me what is the bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In good time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is the time. Surely we ought to know. How many more millions are going to be added to the debt of the country. I think, Mr. Speaker, that they are not dealing quite fairly with the House and the country, or their own supporters, in keeping that interesting information at the back of their heads. Now, I do not suppose the hon. gentleman is going to repeat the process which he carried out in 1873. Then, I recollect, he brought down a Budget statement; but, although he must have been well aware of what was in contemplation, he did not tell us, if my memory serves me, by $3,000,000 a year, what was to be the total expenditure under the new obligations which the country was going to enter into. Sir, I do not suppose he is going to add $3,000,000 in the present instance to our expenditure; but he is going to add a considerable sum, and what that sum is, I repeat, we ought to know. Now, I would like to have heard from the hon. gentleman a little more fully, a justification of the present enormous taxation. I would like to have been informed, a little more fully than he has condescended to tell us, what his policy is going to be in the event of a large reduction of imports; and I would like that for two reasons. The hon. gentleman knows—indeed he admits—that it is a thing very likely to happen; and more, he tells us that it is very desirable. The year of all years which he held up, and always has held up as a model year, is that especial year in which our exports slightly exceeded our imports. Well, Sir, if his policy is going to be as successful in the future as it has been in the past, if our imports are going to be reduced so as just to balance our exports, then it is clear, on the hon. gentleman's own showing, that we must expect a very large reduction of revenue; and we have some right to know how he proposes to meet that reduction, in such event. Sir, the hon. gentleman, in dealing with this question, and with the recent condition of the country, was in a difficulty, and a rather serious difficulty. By his own language, on the last occasion of his making a financial statement, he had practically estoppel himself from looking the situation in the face. On that occasion the spirit of prophecy descended on the hon. gentleman—or rather, I should say, a spirit of prophecy descended on him. There are differences in spirit which probably the hon. gentleman did not understand. He was good enough to tell us then that we need take no fear for the future—carry on all sail, quoth the hon. gentleman, I am at the helm, and you are safe for seven years. Now, Sir, he has given several reasons for the depression which exists. I will give another: It was the misplaced confidence which his supporters in the House and in the country put in the hon. gentleman's prophetic vision on that occasion. Sir, I was a little at a loss to understand exactly what the hon. gentleman's speech implied in the matter of depression. One-half of his speech, as I understand it, was taken up in showing that there was no depression, and the other half in assigning reasons for the existence of the depression. As my hon. friend knows, I am not a profound lawyer, but it does occur to me that there is such a thing as an objection to a plea for multifariousness. Are we in a state of depression, or are we not? I can hardly make out, from the speech of the hon. gentleman, what particular line he takes on the present occasion. It would not trouble me whether he took the one or the other, for this reason—that I can neither agree with his statement that we are not in a state of depression, nor with his explanation as to the causes which have brought about that depression. Sir, I do not believe, that there is a man of business in this House or in the country, who will say, that to-day Canada is in a very satisfactory condition, commercially or financially. At this present moment, as the hon. gentleman must know, men are apprehensive, men are not anxious to enter into new enterprises. I am sorry to say that the old enterprises are not giving as good an account of themselves as we could wish. Now, I say there is no sufficient cause for that. The check which we have encountered is apparently a slight one. One particular crop in one-half of a Province—true, a very important Province—has been a failure; but I say that under ordinary circumstances that failure should not have produced the state of apprehension or the state of depression which undoubtedly does exist to a very great extent in this country. Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman that it is beginning to dawn on men's minds, even on the minds of his own supporters, that high taxes do not insure national prosperity, and that wise statesmen will count the cost before they throw tens of millions of dollars away to aid a company that may get into difficulties. Now we will take some of the tests that the hon. gentleman has in former times, aye, and to-night, applied, and we will see to what extent those tests indicate the present position of the country. The hon. gentleman spent a good deal of time in explaining how and why it was that the shrinkage in bank stocks was not to be taken as a matter of serious moment. I do not consider them myself as a matter of extreme moment, but I point this out, that when those stocks were high the hon. gentleman took credit for their being high; he declared that was one of the results of his policy. These stocks have shrunk to a very large extent within the last twelve months. True, there has been a rally in one or two of the most important of them within the last few weeks, and perhaps certain Resolutions which lately passed through this House might explain to those who wish to know why those one or two particulars stocks have rapidly ascended within the last fortnight or month. But the fact remains, that the stocks, as a whole, are many millions of dollars less in selling value to-day than they were this time twelve months. Why, even the Bank of Montreal stock sold on the 13th of February, last year, at 202½, and to-day, according to the hon. gentleman, it is about 188 or 189, I forget which. There is large shrinkage there, even taking the present figures, if he likes. Then the hon. gentleman just now alluded to the number of bankruptcies. I do not in the slightest degree consider that a matter of congratulation, but at the same time, as the hon. gentleman chooses to bring the question up, I may remind him that according to one authority, the amount of bankruptcies in Canada was $15,949,000, for 1883, and according to another authority, $22,155,000. If, as I suspect, the latter included the failure of the unfortunate Exchange Bank, I am inclined to think that the latter sum is the fairer and more proper one to take in estimating the extent of the bankruptcies in Canada in 1883. The hon. gentleman, as far as my recollection serves me, was not correct in saying that the bankruptcies in 1876, 1877 or 1878 were double even the smaller sum mentioned. I speak from recollection, but I am positive that in none of those year did they reach $30,000,000 or $32,000,000, which would be the double of $15,949,000. I will not, at this moment, dwell on this other test which the hon. gentleman gave last year—the prosperity of the manufacturers or the contentment of the people. I may have more to say on both those heads before we sit down, but allow me, Sir, to tell the hon. gentleman that he is very much mistaken if he believes that, at this moment, in the principal cities of Canada the people, and particularly the employees of manufacturers are either prosperous or contented. I say it with sorrow and regret, that in the chief city of Ontario it has been stated publicly and it has not been contradicted—I believe that it is a fact—that several thousands of people were indebted to charity for a part of their subsistence during the present winter. There are other tests, however, on which the hon. gentleman is fond of dwelling, and to which we shall come after a little while. There is the test of the increase of population and the increase of traffic on our railways. I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware that for months back the trade of our principal railways has shown a great and alarming decrease. That surely is not, in his opinion, or in that of any other hon. gentleman, a proof that this country is at this moment in a very prosperous condition. But I desire to say a few words on a matter to which the hon. gentleman alluded in this connection, and to which, if I am not mistaken, some of his colleagues have very often alluded, and that is, the extent to which this hon. gentleman's policy has increased our trade with Great Britain and diminished our trade with the United States. Now I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman made that statement with any intention to deceive the House. I do not accuse him of doing that. But I say that the hon. gentleman was hardly fair in making a comparison between the year 1883 and the year 1876, in the matter of the trade of the two countries. One was a prosperous year the other was a year of considerable depression. However, I would pass that over, but I will call the attention of the House to this, that when the hon. gentleman spoke of the imports from the United States in the one year and compared them with the imports from the United States in the other, he wholly and entirely forgot to inform the House that under the present Tariff, imposed by himself, the nominal imports entered for our consumption from the United States almost exactly represent our true imports, whereas, in 1876, as everybody familiar with the Trade and Navigation Returns knows, our nominal imports from the United States include a great many millions of dollars for goods that were entered in transitu, and simply passed through this country on their way to Great Britain. That fact vitiates entirely the hon. gentleman's comparisons from first to last. I will go back a little further. I will take the year 1873, which is a fair year of comparison with this year of 1883, and as this point has been made a great deal of by the hon. gentlemen in this House, and on the other side of the Atlantic, I call the special attention of the House to the effect which the present policy has on our trade with Great Britain and the United States. In 1873, a year which compared fairly with the year 1883, our imports from Great Britain were $68,522,000; our true imports from the United States in the same year, deducting those goods which passed in transitu, although they were, under the old form, entered for consumption, were $40,488,000. Our true exports to Great Britain, of our own products of the same year, were $31,486,000; our true exports to the United States of our own produce, deducting short returns, were $37,262,000. What were the facts last year—facts well worth knowing? Our imports from Great Britain were $52,000,000; our exports to Great Britain, of our own produce, were $39,672,000. Our imports from the United States in goods which really and actually entered into consumption, were $56,000,000; our sales to the United States were $35,963,000, as before, striking out short returns. Now, Sir, what is the result? Why, the result is this, that, as between the years 1873 and 1883, we purchased from Great Britain $16,500,000 less in 1883 than in 1873, and we purchased from the United States $15,500,000 more than we did in 1873. We sell to Great Britain, of articles of our own production, very nearly $8,000,000 more, and we sell to the United States $1,250,000 less; so that, if it does matter particularly, the trade between ourselves and Great Britain and ourselves and the United States is, at the expiration of the decade of ten years, $40,000,000 worse under the hon. gentleman's policy than it was in 1873. Now, the hon. gentleman knows that I am taking those statements from his own Trade and Navigation Returns. He knows that they cannot be controverted, and that they do not show the whole of the facts, because it is well known to everybody that, in 1873, under the old policy, we carried on a large contraband trade with the United States, selling them several millions of dollars' worth of goods that did not appear in our returns, and now, under his policy, the United States sell us several millions of dollars' worth of goods that do not appear in their returns, or ours either. Sir, I do not insist very much on the question, because I do not regard it, as the hon. gentleman appears to do, of very great moment, but it is of moment in this way, that the hon. gentleman here and the hon. gentleman's colleagues elsewhere have pointed triumphantly to the facts, as they stated them, as proof that this was a Tariff which favoured trade with Great Britain, and to a considerable extent diminished trade with the United States. Now the House, gentlemen on this side and gentlemen on that side, can judge for themselves how just was the boast that our present policy had increased our trade with Great Britain, had diminished our trade with the United States. The hon. gentleman laid great stress on the amount of deposits in savings banks. Now, as far as it goes, that is a good sign. I am not going to dispute that position with the hon. gentleman. But I will call the attention of the House to one or two facts. First of all, I call the attention of the House to this, that a good deal of these extra deposits in the savings bank were obtained by the hon. gentleman by paying interest largely in excess of the current market rate. When the banks would only give 3 per cent., the hon. gentleman continued to give 4. That is to say, he continued to pay more for money at call, about one-third more, than those who were dealing in that commodity thought it was worth. Moreover, it is a great mistake to suppose that the money which we borrow from the people only costs us 4 per cent. All the expenses of management, amounting to from a quarter to a-half per cent. on the present deposits, have to be added. Moreover, if he adopts the ordinary rules of banking, if he preserves in gold, as he ought to do, a sufficient reserve to meet unexpected calls which may come upon him, a considerable sum would have to be kept in hand—not on deposit in the banks, that would not answer in such a case, but in gold—without paying interest. So that, altogether, the result would be that the hon. gentleman is borrowing money at call, and pays about 25 per cent. more for it than he would if he had borrowed it for a long term from the public here or in England. Then, there is another consideration. The hon. gentleman, it is true, has got some $26,000,000, or more perhaps, from the people of this country at call, and a large sum, also at call, in the shape of the note circulation. Now, I do not regard the note circulation as likely to be a serious source of embarrassment, but it is quite on the cards that the hon. gentleman one of these days may be called upon for a considerable portion of these deposits. I do not say that it will happen. None of us can venture to say what will occur, but I say there is a chance of such an occurrence, and under no circumstances is it wise or prudent to borrow a considerable sum of money at call, and to pay considerably more for it than you can obtain the money for for a fixed period of definite duration. Then, I am not at all sure that the fact that the people of Canada are not able to employ that large sum of money to better advantage than 4 per cent., is at all a proof that things are in a prosperous condition. I would rather say it was a proof that we were approaching the stationary state, that there was a difficulty in employing money in Canada to good advantage. I am not sure that a wise statesman would bring forward the amount of money on deposit at 4 per cent. in savings banks in a country like Canada as a proof that the people were prospering as he would desire them to do. If they were, it would be taken out and used in other ways, in building up towns and cities and developing the country in a hundred different ways, and it would be better employed, if the country were really prosperous, than in being handed over to the hon. gentleman and by him invested in more or less permanent forms, from which he may find it rather difficult, at some time or other, to recover it. Now, I agree with the hon. gentleman in one respect. The hon. gentleman said that this was a fit time to review our position, a fit time to consider the platforms of the two parties in this country with respect to its financial management. As I understand it, the platform of the Liberal party was, and is, that it is the duty of a wise Government to keep down the taxes and to keep down the expenditure of a country, in the position of Canada, as low as it fairly can. We say also, Sir, that it is the interest of the people of Canada that, so far as the Government can make or keep it so, Canada should be a cheap country to live in, a country where a man's wages should go far, a country where a man could obtain a good return for the money he has to lay out, and, for that reason, we say it is a folly to impose heavy taxation on the great mass of the community for the temporary benefit of a small portion of the manufacturing interest. I repudiate most utterly, for myself and for my friends here, every imputation that we have the smallest animosity toward the manufacturers of Canada. I repudiate that entirely. I say that we are the true friends of the great bulk of the manufacturers of Canada. I say we are their true friends, and I say that everything that tends to impoverish the bulk of the people, who are the customers of the great mass of the manufacturers, tends to endamage the great mass of the manufacturers. I say that the hon. gentleman's policy is trebly foolish in this respect, in view of the fact that Canada has an enormous stake in developing the great country to the north-west of us; I say that his policy is especially adapted to retard and impede that development, and to put every possible obstacle in the way of the unfortunate settler who may trust his fortunes in the North-West under the present Government. In all these points, the policy of the hon. gentleman, as defined by himself and by his colleagues, is directly in opposition to ours. They hold that it is well to heap up taxes and to heap up expenditure; they hold, and the Minister of Finance, has often explained, that it is the interest of the people that things in Canada should be dear; they hold that it is the interest of the great mass of the population that a small number of persons should be subsidized at their expense; they hold that the way to help and to develop the North-West is to put on taxes, and to make the small capital at the settler's command go as short a way as possible. On all these points we have ever taken issue with the hon. gentleman—we take issue now, and we will continue to take issue, and we will do our best to explain to the people on all occasions—how exceedingly they have been deceived by the sophistries, not so much of the hon. gentleman as of those who sit beside him, and who, as I said, succeeded five or six years ago in converting the people for the time to their view of the matter. Now, Sir, I will say one thing for these gentlemen, they have lived up to their creed, they have done their utmost to raise taxation to the highest point, they have done their utmost to raise the expenditure of Canada to the highest point, and it is not the first time, either. Now, we have had five years' experience, and I say, as well as the hon. gentlemen, that the time has come when we can see what we have really done, and also at what cost it has been done. Sir, the hon. gentleman defines his policy as a great experiment. He said the truth. It was a great experiment, and it was an experiment which, at the time it was tried, had every thing in its favour. We had hard times—by no fault of the late Administration; we had the example of the United States, which no doubt had a very great influence on many of our people; we had the clamour of a small and influential class who saw their own private interest in assisting the hon. gentlemen; they were able to make magnificent promises; promises cost nothing, and they made them freely, and therefore they did succeed in persuading the people of Canada to try the experiment which, as the hon. gentleman says, they have just been putting into action. Then, when the experiment was tried, they were favoured by a rather remarkable combination of accidents. I do not suppose the hon. Minister of Finance, although he has said some rather strange things, although he has advanced some rather curious theories—I do not suppose that he, although I have no doubt some of his followers are quite capable of saying it, and perhaps of believing it—I do not suppose the hon. gentleman is going to tell us that the fact that in 1879, and shortly after, money became extraordinarily cheap and plentiful in New York, in London, Paris, Amsterdam, and almost in all the great centres in commerce in the world, was produced by the National Policy adopted in Canada; and yet, Sir, that was a very important factor in the condition of the people of Canada, that undoubtedly proved a great benefit, and the reaped a great advantage from the fact that money at that time had become cheap and plentiful in all the money centres of the world. Almost at that same time, there took place, as every man knows, a great revival in the United States. Now, I am always happy to agree with the hon. gentleman if I can; it is not often, I am sorry to say, that I can do so; and I entirely concur with him in saying that the prosperity of Canada is very intimately connected with the prosperity of the United States; but I do not believe, Sir, that the fact that we imposed very heavy taxes in Canada had a great deal to do with the other fact, that trade and commerce throughout the length and breadth of the United States revived in 1879, and I hardly think the hon. gentleman himself will venture to say so. Then, Sir, added to these things, we had, as everybody knows, extraordinary good harvests and extraordinary good prices—produced by the National Policy, were they? No; but by the fact that, unfortunately in England, Ireland, and on the continent of Europe, there were bad harvests at the identical time that we had good ones, so that we had at once unusually good prices and an unusual quantity of things to sell. Then, Sir, the North-West was opened up, and beyond all doubt for a time that gave a great impetus to trade and business in Canada. Had it been wisely and well done, had it been wisely and well administered, it would have continued to give a great impetus up to this time. And Sir, last, but by no means least, the hon. gentleman had the advantage of coming into office and reaping the fruits of five years of honest and prudent Administration under my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). Sir, I am astonished at the ingratitude of hon. gentlemen opposite—as regards myself, I do not expect much gratitude from them—I waived my claims; but they ought to be grateful to my hon. friend beside me. If the hon. gentleman supposes for one moment, if the hon. Minister of Customs supposes that I am here as a craven apologist, he makes a great mistake. I am here not merely to defend, but to justify and to maintain the whole conduct of my hon. friend during his Administration.

Mr. BOWELL. And to defend your own conduct?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am prepared to do both.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not very generous to do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not claim credit for generosity. This is not a question of generosity, but of fact and truth. Sir, I do not deny there was depression at the time of my hon. friend's Administration. There necessarily was depression, but there was ten times more in the United States than in Canada at that time. I do not deny that my hon. friend made mistakes; I do not claim for him that he is infallible. I grant he made mistakes; and more, Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman what were the mistakes my hon. friend made. My hon. friend, in the excess of his zeal for the public service, greatly over-exerted his physical strength; that was one mistake. My hon. friend, in the excess of the kindness of his heart, was far too generous to hon. gentlemen opposite; that was another mistake. I admit, also, that in the excess of his patriotism, he somewhat over-estimated the sense of honesty and intelligence of a certain portion of his countrymen. Now, Sir, those are faults which I will admit on the part of my hon. friend; and to do justice to the hon. gentlemen opposite, I will further say that they are faults that there is not the slightest danger any of them, collectively or individually, will ever commit. Sir, I am prepared to maintain, here or elsewhere, that whatever my hon. friend's mistakes may have been, his policy was substantially wise, and just, and good, and that it would have been infinitely better for Canada had it been carried out from that day to this. Sir, it was a great misfortune that, prior to 1873, Canada neglected the warnings and the cautions which were given to her by that hon. gentleman and his friends. It was Canada's folly that, in 1878, she held him responsible, because those identical results had occurred which he had showed must occur in certain contingencies, if those warnings were neglected or disregarded. It has not been the first time—it won't be the last—when men like my hon. friend, for doing all that mortal men could do for the benefit of their country, have found themselves treated with ingratitude by the country they have served.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). It was your friends who turned him out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the people made a great mistake in deposing my hon. friend in 1878; and I will tell the hon. gentleman more, that perhaps in his heart of hearts he is beginning to think that too. Now, Sir, how stands the case to-day? The hon. gentleman has given us his explanations. He tells us, if I took down his words aright, that one cause, among other things, of the present depression, is the fact that our lumber industry is not as good as it was. Now I will just call his attention to this. It may be true, I dare say it is true, that during the ensuing six months our lumber industry may slacken, but I see in the returns laid on the Table, that whereas, during the last six months of 1882, we had exported of products of the forest, $18,090,000, we had exported in the last six months of 1883, $18,183,000 worth. Now, Sir, that cannot be urged as proof of any present depression. There may be risk in future—I am not prepared to say there is not; but the fact that we sold $100,000 worth of lumber up to 1st January, 1884, more than up to 1st January, 1883, shows that that is not a cause of the distress which has occurred up to the present time. He talks also of over-production and of the poor harvest. Well, I will agree that all those things are factors in the matter. But there are other causes, and I will tell the hon. gentleman and the House what those causes are. Canada to-day is distressed, there is no doubt of it, and I am afraid the reasons are these. First of all, because a great deal of the money of the people has been taken from them by excessive, unjust and oppressive taxation. Next, Sir, because the policy of the Government has caused a great lock up of capital in manufactures which were not wanted in so small a country as this. Then, Sir, a very considerable loss, as to which I will have a good deal to say hereafter, has been caused by the emigration which has taken place from Ontario and Canada at large, also largely caused by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. The fourth cause is the locking up of capital which has taken place in the North-West, for which also I will show those hon. gentlemen are responsible. And the fifth cause is the increased cost of living, for which the hon. gentleman's Tariff and its indirect results are seriously responsible. I do not deny that the poor harvest in western Ontario has done its share; but I say that of all those causes, far the greater number and the more important ones are directly attributable to the policy of the present Government. Now, Sir, we come to the question of the first cause—the onerous taxation—and here there are a few considerations to be presented to the House. There is the nominal taxation, the amount paid into the Treasury; there is, in the next place, the amount taken out of the pockets of the people, which does not go into the Treasury, but which is paid to a few hundreds of men scattered throughout the Dominion. The hon. Finance Minister disputed some of the assertions of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) as to the extent of that. I do not suppose any intelligent protectionist can be found who will deny the plain and simple fact that, whether protection in itself be good or be bad, whether protection does or does not make us an adequate return—from the very nature of the case, protection must be costly, from the very nature of the case, if you impose a taxation of 20, 30 or 40 per cent., as the case may be, to exclude certain goods, and cause others to be manufactured in the country, just in proportion as you increase the manufactures, you must impose a large additional tax on the people. I do not suppose the Minister of Finance himself will venture to deny that proposition; I am sure those of his supporters who have looked into the question will not venture to do so. Now, I am not going to speak of the indirect effects of protection; I am going to speak of the things to which the hon. gentleman has alluded himself. And first of all, we will take the article of sugar. The hon. gentleman says that sugar is very cheap to-day. It may be so. The hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that it is cheaper to-day than it was four or five years ago. It may be so. That does not affect the argument at all. Our position is this: under the tariff of the hon. gentleman, sugar is much dearer than it need be, after deducting the sum which goes into the Treasury. To-day, I am informed by men of high standing in the trade, you could say down at Montreal, free of duty, those classes of sugar which are most in demand in Canada, at the rate of $5 per 100 lbs. I am informed by those gentlemen also, that if they buy those sugars from Canadian refineries they have to pay $8 per 100 lbs., being an excess of $3. We consumed, in 1883, 152,000,000 lbs of sugar. I will allow a large percentage, 12,000,000, to go for the waste in converting that into such sugar as the people require; but every man can see for himself that if you could buy that sugar at 5 cents per lb, duty free, and are obliged to pay 3 cents more to the refiner, what the cost to the people of Canada that extra 3 cents per lb. is. It is $4,200,000. Of that sum $2,467,000 went into the Treasury, and more than $1,500,000 was lost. That is the state of the case now under the hon. gentleman's Tariff. So, Sir, we find this result. In 1878 we imported 108,000,000 pounds. Our duty then was largely below our duty now; our duty then was about 25 per cent. less than it is to-day on the grades of sugar which go into consumption. In that time we have added about 30 per cent. to our consumption, and we have added 25 per cent. to our duty, and the result is that we have received $100,000 less money. We obtained $2,567,000 in 1878, with a lower scale of duties, on 108,000,000 lbs. of sugar; on 152,000,000 lbs. in 1883 we received $2,476,000, although we have added largely to the duties. There is an illustration, if the hon. gentleman wants it. I do not mean to say there may not be some counterbalancing advantages to be offered, that some trade may not be brought to Montreal by that policy. That is not the point. I am not arguing whether protection is good or not. But that protection costs the general public many millions more than actually goes into the Treasury. The same is true, though not to the same extent, of coal. Coal is a raw material to manufacturers. Every man knows when you place a duty on that article that the amount paid into the Treasury does not measure the amount taken out of the pockets of the people. Everyone knows that if the hon. gentleman has succeeded, as he thinks he has, and perhaps he has, in causing about $20,000,000 worth of textile goods to be manufactured here, presumably giving employment to 14,000 or 15,000 persons, that has only been done by imposing a duty, probable of 30 per cent., certainly not less than 25 per cent, on all consumers of the goods. And therefore, I say in estimating the taxation of this country you must add many millions to the sum actually paid into the Treasury in fact we must add an amount which we cannot satisfactorily measure. The hon. gentleman is in this dilemma. If he disputes these figures, if he thinks he does not give employment to 14,000 or 15,000 persons, that he has not succeeded in causing our manufacturers to produce that quantity of goods, what then becomes of the home market which was to recompense the rest of the people for the amount of taxation to which they were to be subjected. Let the hon. gentleman make his selection. I repeat that I am not arguing as to whether protection is good or bad, but simply as to what it actually costs the people of the country. The result is this: Canada to-day is a very heavily taxed country. There are other countries more heavily taxed than we are, perhaps, but not many. Let us compare our position with that of England and with that of the United States; and let us bear in mind that it was not always so; that Canada started on the race of national life very lightly burthened, indeed, by comparison with other countries. Now, I have never contended, I do not now contend, that it is possible to avoid all increases as a country grows in population. I am willing to admit, that as the country increases in population, a very considerable increase of expenditure is necessary and legitimate. But, Sir, I ask the House is this a reasonable state of things? In 1867, Canada commenced her career with a total population, as shown by the Census Estimate, of 3,375,000. Canada's total taxation then was $13,500,000. In 1883, deducting Indians, the population is probably about 4,300,000—certainly not more than 4,375,000—and the taxation, according to these returns, had swollen to $35,800,000. Our population had increased not quite 1,000,000, or barely 1,000,000; our taxation had increased by $22,250,000. Our taxation per head in 1867 amounted to $4; our taxation in 1883 amounted to very nearly $9 per head—and much more, if we were to take into account the enormous amount of additional taxation to which I have alluded, which is taken out of the pockets of the people, although it does not go into the Treasury. So that, while our population increased about 30 per cent, our nominal taxes have increased about 200 per cent. Now, I admit that abstract propositions cannot always be depended on. But I say that in matters financial you can almost certainly, with safety, lay down this proposition: that whenever, without war or some other extraordinary cause like that, you find the taxes of a country increasing very rapidly, increasing out of all proportion to its population, you may rest assured that the Government has been grossly extravagant, and in all probability grossly corrupt. And when you find the taxation remain stationary for a term of years, you may feel equally assured that the Government has been honestly and economically conducted. Now, Sir, it is a matter of importance that we should know how we stand by comparison with the two great countries with which we do most of our business and most of our trade. I want to call the attention of the House to the way in which the present position of Canada contrasts with the present position of the people of the United States, who, like ourselves, have the misfortune, as I conceive, of labouring under an unfair system of taxation. In 1867, I find that the taxation of the United States, from all sources, amounted to about $396,000,000, their population then being, as nearly as possible, 36,000,000, by estimate. Sir, in 1883, the taxation of the United States by the President's Message was $398,287,000, and the population, by estimate, 54,000,000. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, as he truly says, is great on averages, so to oblige him I will take the United States averages for 1867, 1868 and 1869, lest he accuse me of taking a particular year, and taking those averages we have this result: At the time that Canada was commencing her national existence, the taxation of the United States was $10 per head, as nearly as may be. We find, Sir, that the taxation of the United States is now a mere fraction over $7 per head. We find that in seventeen years the taxation of the United States has sunk from $10 to $7 per head—has sunk from about $50 per family to $35 per family —and in the same seventeen years the taxation of Canada has risen from $4 per head, to $9 a head, and from about $20 per family to about $45 per family. If the hon. gentleman wants another comparison, I will take the expenditure for the same years and the results are almost worse. The expenditure of the United States, on the average of those years, appears to have been $8 per head, while now it is less than $5 per head. Canada's expenditure in 1867 was $1 per head; Canada's expenditure is now more than $7 per head. So that, while the United States have reduced their burthen nearly one half, Canada's burthen has been nearly doubled in proportion to her population. Those are serious considerations, and none the less serious because, in comparing the case of England, I find that in that country, seventeen years ago, the taxation per head amounted to £2 5s. 8d., while the taxation now is about £2 9s. per head. So that while we in Canada have been adding to our taxation at the rate of about $5 per head, England was contented with an addition of some 80 cents per head. Now, Sir, can any man say that this is a satisfactory showing? Can any man say, knowing the circumstances of the United States, knowing that they had then just emerged from a great civil war, that they are still burthened with was charges amounting, if I remember right, to $66,000,000 last year for pensions alone—can any man say that it is a satisfactory thing to the people of Canada to find that the record, as between us and them, is so excessively against us as appears from these figures. It is not a pleasant thing for me to say—I have no doubt it is not a pleasant thing for hon. gentlemen to hear—but I have yet to learn that it is our duty to conceal the facts of the case because they grate unpleasantly on the ears of hon. gentlemen opposite. More, Sir, when did all this occur? Did it occur in increases evenly distributed over the seventeen years? Not so, Mr. Speaker. These increases all occurred in two periods, one beginning in 1867 and terminating in 1874, and the other beginning in 1879, and extending down to the present time. In those two periods all the increases I have referred to arrived—in those two periods, and those alone. Sir, in years gone by, men were wont to talk of the ignorant impatience of taxation; now-a-days it would be infinitely more to the purpose if our people were persuaded to lay aside their ignorant acquiescence in taxation. Because, if you consider, you will find that these enormous increases of taxation are fraught with great dangers to the future welfare of this Dominion. I remember well when my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) was Premier, we considered this matter, and we had come to the conclusion that every dollar of unnecessary expenditure meant, in one way or another, a dollar taken out of the pocket of some man who was earning wages, and therefore that every million dollars added to the expenditure, meant, practically, that one day's wage was taken from every wage-earner throughout the Dominion. And if, as I believe, that be a true and fair statement, let the House bear in mind that in adding this $22,000,000 to the taxation of Canada in seventeen years, about twenty-two days' wages, to all intents and purposes, have been subtracted from the wage-earning classes of the Dominion, and I say that this is a reason, and a good reason, why my hon. friend always opposed, why he always hesitated, to add to the burthens of the people, to add to the already enormous taxation of the people of Canada. Now, Sir, I say that the condition of the wage-earning classes in Canada to-day is not good. I say that it compares unfavourably with the condition of things in England. In England, as the hon. gentleman knows, or as he ought to know, care is taken to provide that every man who earns less than, say $2 a day—less than about £150 a year—should be—except his free will and proper motion—exempt from taxation; and it is one of the best features of the English fiscal system that it is so. Here our taxes are so arranged that they press more heavily on the men who are called upon to support their families out of their daily earnings than on any other class in the community; and press, next to them, on the great producing class, the farmers and the lumbermen of this country. Sir every man knows that the labouring class in this country need more than the same class in other countries. They need more fuel, more food, better shelter; and all these things have been made dearer by the policy of the hon. gentleman. I doubt if to-day, in Canada, you can point to anything that is really cheaper than it is on the other side of the Atlantic, except certain kinds of food and land in certain parts of the country. Now, if the hon. gentleman wants to know what I compute, so far as I can judge, to be the absolute loss to the country by his policy of excessive taxation—taking into account, as I have said, not merely what goes into the Treasury, but the amount paid to a certain number of persons throughout Canada—I tell him that I believe it is no less than $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 a year for the last four or five years. True, Sir, the hon. gentleman may plead that he has saved the necessity of our going into debt thereby. Again I say, this is good so far as it goes; but it is a most wasteful mode of borrowing money. If there is one thing more certain than another, it is this, that no matter on what system taxation is levied, you cannot put money into the Treasury without taking out of the pockets of the people more than you put in; and if that is true under an honest revenue system, it is infinitely more true under the system of which the hon. gentleman is the exponent. Moreover, I say that Canada requires its own capital, and the hon. gentleman might have known that, if it were only from the failure of his own domestic loan the other day. The hon. gentleman laid some stress on the fact that although that loan failed, other applications had come in to him. Now, I say, whatever his motives may have been—and I am not disputing that his motives were good—that in view of the probability that he would have to go on the London market to borrow large sums in a year or two, he committed a huge blunder in either issuing that loan, or allowing it to fail. He has put himself into this position—that when he goes to London or elsewhere to borrow money, the mere fact that he attempted to borrow in Canada and failed, is sure to be used by some parties to depreciate the securities he has to offer. Either he ought to have left it alone, or to have taken pains to make it a success when he did attempt to float it. Now, as to the expenditure for 1884-85. It appears from the hon. gentleman's statements, that we are in all probability committed to an expenditure of $31,000,000, or thereabouts. I am not going to say what can be done now in the way of cutting down that expenditure. Probably it could be reduced; but how for I am not in a position to say. But I say this: had my hon. friend beside me remained in power, there was no reason whatever why the expenditure should have exceeded $25,000,000 or $25,500,000; and I am perfectly certain that my hon. friend would have contrived to keep it within that limit, which is only $2,500,000 more than the hon. Minister of Finance declared some years ago was ample to carry on the Government of Canada. And, Sir, the proof is this—that whereas my hon. friend, when he went into office, found himself obliged to spend $23,300,000 a year, and had to meet a host of great and sudden demands, aggregating an annual addition to the expenditure of $2,500,000, he did it without adding more, in the long run, than $250,000 to the expenditure which he found when he went in. Do not say that my hon. friend beside me had no great public works to carry on. My hon. friend carried on greater public works than the hon. Minister of Railways or his colleagues did. As I said the other night, he has no need to dread a comparison between the works done under his auspices, and those done under the auspices of the hon. Minister of Railways. Sir, if the hon. gentleman wants the details of the expenditures which were incurred by us after the year 1874, I am prepared to give them. I find that my hon. friend was obliged to provide for interest and sinking fund alone on account of the great public works caused by the engagements of his predecessors, $1,400,000; for Indians, $260,000; for Mounted Police, $135,000; for Prince Edward Island, in consequence of the terms of the Treaty, about $300,000; for the Post Office Department, $330,000; and for the Supreme Court, $50,000; making in all, as nearly as may be, $2,480,000 additional to the expenditure which he found when he entered into office. Sir, he would have been perfectly justified, under those circumstances, had he gone out with an expenditure of $26,000,000; instead of that, he went out with an expenditure of $23,500,000. Then there was another cause, that is the loss occasioned by reason of the capital which is locked up in manufactures. Now, I agree that this is a matter of estimate. I agree that no absolute statistics can be got. I will simply state what I believe to be the case. Let other hon. gentlemen who know the facts in their respective localities and may have better opportunities of ascertaining them than myself, let them state what they believe to be the total quantity of capital which is locked up at present in manufactures, and not returning profits to the owners. Now, I have made some enquiry, and collected all the information in all the quarters I could, and I have come to the conclusion that from $8,000,000 to $12,000,000, perhaps more, are at present locked up, unproductively, in manufactures throughout this Dominion. This has been brought about directly by the policy of the hon. gentlemen, and it is the usual result of any increased taxation for the purpose of protection. Now, the hon. gentleman would fain escape the responsibility of all this. The hon. gentleman would have us believe that by his policy of collecting together many thousands of poor workmen in the cities of this Dominion, he and his Government are not responsible, because, as always happens in these cases, when trade slackens, these poor people are thrown on the streets or compelled to work for half wages. Sir, I say the hon. gentleman is responsible. I say the direct result of his policy has been to gather together these men, and to keep them in such a position, that a trifling reverse may expose them to want, and throw them on the community for support. I say he is responsible for it; and as we are on this question of Protection, I say that the hon. gentleman, if he be really and sincerely an advocate of Protection, ought to have taken a great deal more pains and care than he has done to extend protection, not merely to the rich manufacturer, but to the workmen whom he employs. I say that his conduct with respect to the Factories Act alone shows how little he cared for the poor employee when the interests of the employé conflicted with those of the rich employer. He had the experience of the United States and the experience of England before him, he had the report of his own Commissioners to guide him; he knew right well that many of the persons employed in manufactures were unfairly dealt with, as they always will be unless the Government steps in to see that women and children, at any rate, are not pressed and driven beyond their strength. Yet five years after the introduction of his policy, he has not condescended to bring down and give the first reading to the Factory Bill intended to protect these poor creatures. Moreover, I say that those workmen have good right to complain of the policy of the Government in bringing here, at the public expense and in encouraging to come here, people to compete with them. If you are going to have protection at all, let it be thorough-going; protect the labourer, who needs protection quite as much as the employer; do not allow his wages to be cut down and competitors to be brought here at the public expense to underbid the men who are employed in the subsidized manufactories of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman dwelt at some length on the state of the specially protected industries. I thought he might have remembered that we had long ago pointed out to him that so surely as you protect particular industries, so surely you do confer very great advantages on the men who, so to speak, are on the ground and have control of those industries for the moment; but the inevitable result, when you give these or any men an undue advantage by law, is to bring in a great deal more capital than is required, the ultimate result of which is invariably over production and depression, injury to the workingman and the employé alike. The hon. gentleman has intensified the evil. It is quite true that even when you have the whole world for a market, depressions will at times occur, but when you try to stimulate production by artificial means in a small community, disasters must happen, and probably will happen at a very early date, as they have in this particular instance. I repeat, in all this, the hon. gentleman has done great injury to the great mass of the manufacturers themselves; I repeat, that the manufacturers of Canada are hurt when capital is destroyed or locked up, and they are still more hurt when the great bulk of the people, who form their customers, are impoverished. Both those results have accrued from the policy of the hon. gentleman. Now, I observe that the hon. gentleman spoke on this occasion with very much bated breath, as to the magnificent surplus at his disposal. But I cannot quite agree with him, even in what he said on that question. He claimed he had $7,000,000 last year from the increase of ordinary revenue over expenditure, and $1,000,000 of additional surplus from the sales of land in the North-West; but I failed to hear the hon. gentleman say one word of the $600,000 or thereabouts which he had spent and charged to capital account for surveys in the North-West, in connection with those very lands. Surely, if he claims $1,000,000 as additional surplus on the one side, although it properly belongs to capital account, he should deduct the $600,000 on the other side, which are charged to capital account for the survey of these very lands, a portion of which he has sold. The hon. gentleman's calculations may be correct or they may not, as regards the probable surplus at the end of the year, but one thing is clear, that whereas last year he had a surplus of very nearly $4,957,000 on the 20th of February, he now has an apparent surplus of $930,000, and no more. Now, if that goes on, as it appears to be going on, during the next few months, it is, to say the least, a matter of doubt whether the hon. gentleman will have any surplus at all. Perhaps it is as well he should not. It is clear the hon. gentleman's surplus tempted him into very unnecessary expenditure and to incur very undue liabilities; but I point out the fact to the House, because it is right they should understand how very seriously the revenue is being reduced and the expenditure is being increased within the past six or seven months, of which alone we can speak with perfect knowledge. Now I come to a question of the very gravest moment, to which the Government have on various occasions called attention. It is a question on which there is a very great conflict of statement between our own authorities and those of the United States. I might argue justly that Ministers would be estopped, at least some of them, from questioning the authorities of the United States statistics, because they invariably used them, and used them rather harshly, against ourselves, when we were in their place, but I do not regard that as a matter of much importance. What I do regard as of infinite moment, is to ascertain the actual facts of the case; and I propose to do so, not from any American statistics but from our own census returns and from our own various municipal returns. I have stated that one cause of the depressed condition of this country arose, in my judgment, from the fact that there had been a very large emigration indeed from various parts of this Dominion. Now we cannot absolutely ascertain all the facts as to all the Provinces, but we can to a very considerable extent, at any rate, as regards the Province of Ontario, and I propose to do so. There we have got a tolerably accurate system of municipal returns, and we find from those, when properly checked, that although we cannot determine absolutely the population at any one moment, we can determine, with very considerable accuracy, the relative increase or decrease in the population, provided we apply the proper checks, by taking not only the number of persons who are returned as of school age but those who actually attended school. At the risk of tiring the House, I must call attention to the very remarkable statistics which have been produced by the Ontario Government in respect to this point. In 1878, we find there were in Ontario, between the ages of five and sixteen, 492,360 children; in 1879, 494,424; in 1880, there were 489,924; in 1881, 484,214; in 1882, 483,817; and in 1883 about the same number. We find that there were reported in actual attendance at schools 467,433, in 1878; in 1879, 461,845; in 1880, 454,395; in 1881, 459,826; in 1882, 457,178. Now, I call the careful attention of the House to this fact that, as I said before, I do not contend that those figures are absolutely correct, but I contend that they are relatively correct. It is impossible to suppose that several thousands of assessors throughout the country, during those four or five years, men at least, one-half of whom are probably supporters of the hon. gentleman, could have deliberately conspired together to falsify returns, and we are justified therefore in assuming those are relatively correct. What do they prove? They prove that by the test of the children of that age and by the school test, which affords a necessary and useful check, the school population of Ontario, from 1879 to 1882, had decreased by 10,670. Sir, that is a very serious matter. Here we have, first of all, a positive, absolute loss, ascertained in that fashion. We have, besides that, the loss of the natural increase of the population, which is considerable, and which I shall presently compute. We have also the displacement by immigration, be it large or small, because it is quite clear that the population having absolutely decreased, all the people who came in there as immigrants have been absorbed and have failed to make up the loss. Now, Sir, we will see, for these five years, what that amounts to. I find that the natural increase of Ontario, which possessed a population of nearly 2,000,000, according to every rule and according to all the information I could get, ought not to have been less than 40,000 a year. What the immigration into that Province may be can only be estimated, but if there be any truth whatever in the statistics furnished us by the Department of Agriculture, it cannot have been less than 20,000 in each of those years. So, if you add together, first of all, the positive, ascertained loss, as evidenced from the school registers, and the loss of the natural increase, and the loss by displacement measured by the number of the immigrants who came in from year to year, you find that, in 1879, we lost about 52,000, in 1880 we lost 80,000, in 1881 as many, in 1882, I am happy to say, a smaller number, about 62,000, and probably, as far as we can now ascertain, about 60,000 in 1883. Sir, that makes a total loss, including these three causes—because everybody, I think, will admit that, if the school population has really decreased 10,000, the total population, of which the school population forms a fourth, must also have decreased by four times that number—a total loss for Ontario in these five years of about 334,000. Now, it is quite true that a considerable portion of these people have gone to Manitoba. On looking at the returns brought down by the Minister of Agriculture, I find that, up to April, 1881, there were 19,000 persons in

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Manitoba and the North-West born in Ontario; by the same returns, I find that, in 1881, although that is of course including three months prior to 1st of April, and therefore, a little too much, 18,000 appear to have come from Ontario; in 1882, 32,000—I am taking his own statistics—and, in 1883, we believe about 25,000; in all, not quite 100,000 of these people may be counted as having left Ontario and settled in Manitoba and the North-West. Now, I speak for Ontario alone. I have no pretensions to speak for the depopulation, if it do exist, in Quebec or in the Maritime Provinces, but perhaps the hon. Minister of Public Works, who formerly declared that it was a matter of the greatest possible importance to repatriate his countrymen, could speak as to the depopulation of Quebec. I heard an hon. gentleman, I do not know whether he is in the House or not, the member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), a few nights ago declare that he believed that 500,000 or 600,000 people had gone from Quebec to the United States. I would fain hope that that is altogether too large an estimate; but, if we are to believe that gentleman, if we are to believe the Minister of Public Works, if we are to believe the dignitaries of the church, who have made it a matter of comment in their pastorals, a serious depopulation has been going on from Quebec likewise. What would my friends from the Maritime Provinces say? What would the gentlemen from New Brunswick and Prince Edward and Nova Scotia say? Do they or do they not believe that numbers of their fellow-countrymen have left those Provinces within the last few years? I leave it for them to speak. I speak only of what I know; I speak only of what I have reasonable grounds for believing; I pay no attention to foreign statistics; I am basing myself exclusively on our own Census and on the municipal and the school returns of the Province for Ontario. Now, Sir, there are collateral proofs of this fact, and proofs which can hardly be disregarded. I have here a return of nearly 200 towns and villages throughout Ontario. It is perfectly notorious that, during the last ten years, our towns and villages grew much more than the rural districts in which they stood, as a rule. Every man who looks at the Census knows that. Now, what do these returns show? They extend over five years also, from 1878-79 to 1883. Well, they show these rather remarkable facts, that, out of 118 villages in Ontario, averaging about 1,000 souls, 79 were stationary or retrograde, and of the remainder, several had not increased as much as the natural increase would warrant. Of sixty-four towns, averaging 3,000, forty-one were stationary or retrograde, and several of the remainder had not increased as much as then atural increase would warrant. It is quite impossible for us to disregard plain, patent facts like these, which every hon. gentleman who chooses to examine the municipal statistics of Ontario can ascertain for himself, as I have done. But I will give one or two particular instances, which may impress the House more than these general statements. The other day, wishing to ascertain, as nearly as I could, the facts in this matter, I applied to the Mayor of the town of Goderich, the chief town of the constituency of my hon. friend behind me. In 1871, according to the Census, that town had a population of 3,954; in 1878, according to the municipal statistics, it had grown to 4,663; according to the last municipal statistics for 1883, supplied me by the Mayor of that town, it had shrunk in five years from 4,663 to 3,818. Sir, I say that it is a serious matter. Why, the county you yourself represent would furnish another illustration. In 1871, the county of Frontenac, according to the Census, contained 16,300 people; the natural increase ought to have brought that up to 20,000 souls, but the last Census shows that, instead of 20,000, the population of Frontenac was 14,993. Instead of gaining 3,000, as it should, it had lost about 1,400 souls.

For further proof, I caused the school population of eight townships in my hon. friend's constituency and my own, to be carefully gone over, and here again I must pray the indulgence of the House, because the subject is one of first-rate importance. I find that, in the space of six years, the school population of those eight townships had gone down as follows:—Beginning at 10,180, it had been reduced to 9,600, 9,400, 9,200, 8,600, 8,300, and finally to 7,570. It is possible, of course, that I may be mistaken here, and let me say this, that in this instance, I would be very glad indeed to have it proved that I was mistaken. I would be very glad if the Minister of Finance or any of his friends will show that these statistics which I have referred to tonight are erroneous, and how, and why. So far as I can see, these statistics deserve our respect, if they are properly checked. I have not contended that they are absolutely accurate; I do contend that they are relatively accurate.

Mr. POPE. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I shall preserve my own opinion until I see much better arguments than have been put in print, at any rate, by the hon. gentleman or any of his deputies. There may be arguments as yet unstated; I am open to conviction, and I shall be glad to hear them. Now, I want to call attention to certain facts connected with the immigration to this country. We have heard these hon. gentlemen declaring that they have brought, I think they said, 130,000 people into Canada within the last year, 112,000 in the year before, and 47,000 in the year before that. Sir, these people may have come. If they have come, then the displacement of our own population in Ontario has been very much greater than I supposed; but I shall presently show the House that, even if these people did come in with the intention of settling here, it is, to say the least of it, an exceedingly questionable matter whether they have stayed in Canada. Now, Sir, we have no absolute proof as to what has become of the men who have arrived since our last Census, but we have tolerably convincing evidence as to what became of the immigrants who came into Canada during the decade between 1871 and 1881. Sir, I find, on looking at the returns of the Census that the foreign-born population in 1831, was 609,000; I find that Ontario, in 1881, had 429,000 foreign-born population, while in 1871 it had 442,000. I find that in the four old Provinces in 1871, quoting from the Census, the foreign-born population was 593,000; in 1831 in the four old Provinces, it was 566,000. Now, Sir, I call attention to these facts. According to our immigration returns, 342,575 people have settled in Canada, as these returns allege, between 1871 and 1881. Now, I will allow as large a percentage for death rate as you can ask; I will allow, say for 120,000 deaths of foreign population, and what is the result? Why, Sir, we find that had those 342,000 people settled here, we ought to have had at least 222,000 more foreign population in the Dominion, in the four old Provinces, in 1881; instead of that, we have 27,000 less; so that it follows, beyond possibility of controversy, according to the statistics of the Department of Agriculture, that of the 342,000 who were said to have come and settled in Canada, not 90,000 have stayed. I suspect that the same result would come out, even if the figures are maintained in respect to the 112,000 or the 130,000 whom the hon. gentleman asserts to have settled in Canada of late. Now this is a very serious matter; I say the absolute loss to us is extreme. It is hardly possible to estimate sufficiently the value of the emigrants who leave Canada. First of all, a very large proportion of those who leave us, as every man of us can see who chooses to inspect an ordinary train leaving Canada, consists of men in their prime. In the next place, it is notably the fact, as far as Ontario is concerned, that almost all the men who leave Canada to seek homes elsewhere are possessed of very considerable capital. I believe, Sir, if a fair average was taken, it would be found that each one takes in money, and money's worth, nearer $2,000 than $1,000 from this country. I know in the few cases concerning which I have taken the trouble to ascertain the facts, I have been astonished at the enormous amount of capital which was being removed from Canada to seek investment elsewhere. Now, Sir, what is the value of those men as compared with that of ordinary immigrants? Sir, I have no prejudice against immigrants. We can welcome all good, industrious immigrants, although we do not wish to see immigrants coming here unless they are prepared to better their condition; but, Sir, I say, in no spirit of prejudice, that one Ontario farmer, one Canadian farmer, possessed of reasonable capital, is worth, either as a tax-payer or as a producer, any half dozen foreign immigrants who may come into this country. I scorn to put a money value on my countrymen, although the American people are in the habit of calling every able bodied immigrant worth $1,000 to the public; but, Sir, I decline to rate our brethren at so much a head. Still, I do say that those men who leave Canada in that way take away with them, and take from us, a most important element of national wealth and a most enormous amount of the capital of Canada. And these gentlemen want to arrogate to themselves that they are the only friends of Canada. Their policy, they tell us, is a policy of "Canada for the Canadians." What are the facts, as disclosed in the United States Census for 1881? Why, Sir, they show that 700,000 Canadians were then found in the United States, and I believe that if the census were taken to-day, it would show the number of Canadians in the United States to be nearer 1,000,000 than 700,000. Sir, it is no wonder the people of Dakota have a high opinion of the Premier, and are fond of declaring that Dakota needs no land agent while the present Premier of the Dominion has control of affairs. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not disposed to deny that this has gone on for a long time, but I think it has gone on with a vastly accelerated ratio since the hon. gentlemen came into power and introduced their present policy. Our own Census, as I have shown, proves conclusively, first of all, that the foreign immigrants who come here do not stay here, and next, that the total increase of the population hardly equals the natural increase to which we are entitled. More, what is true of Ontario is true also—I do not want in the least degree to disguise the fact—of the New England States, and to a great extent it is true of the State of New York. But, Sir, there is this all-important difference: when the New Englander, or the New Yorker, quits his parental home and goes westward, he does not cease to be a citizen of the United States, and to contribute to its wealth and importance; but when our people leave the older Provinces, the majority of them, I am sorry to say, do not find homes within the Dominion, but they go to swell the importance, the strength and the wealth of the people of the United States. A few weeks ago, I was conversing with a very intelligent gentleman, the editor of a large newspaper in the western part of Canada, and I asked that gentleman to examine his list and tell me how many subscribers he then had in the United States. After examining his list, he showed me that he had 300 subscribers who had formerly been inhabitants of Canada, but who, within the last two or three years, had become inhabitants of the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. Please name the paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The name of the paper is the Expositor, of Seaforth, and if the hon. gentleman chooses to go and visit the editor, I have no doubt he will show him his list. Now, I do not deny that the drain of capital may, to a certain extent, be balanced. It is true we get back, in the shape of immigrants and the capital they bring, a certain percentage, but it is a most disadvantageous exchange to us. We give the very best, the prime of our population, and we do not by any means get the best, nor is it all a prime population that comes to us. Sir, if it be true that of 342,000 immigrants who came within the last decade, only 90,000 at the outside have remained with us—I see no answer to these statistics that I have taken from the returns made by the Department of Agriculture and from the Census—if that be true, what impolicy it is on our part to bring these people here, to pay their passage, to have them come to Canada, and then leave Canada and report that they could not make a living here, and had to go elsewhere. Sir, I say our whole immigration system requires revising, from the top to the bottom, and I believe it would be better for us all if we adopted the policy of the United States. Diffuse information if you will, but certainly do not bring people here, as we have been doing, to compete with our own labourers in many walks of life, when, in all probability, three-fourths of them will find their way to the United States, and send word to their friends and relatives in England that they had tried Canada and could not obtain a living in it. Well, Sir, all this was bad enough in past times. But in past times there was an excuse for it. In past times, it was true, we had not practically at our disposal a great quantity of land, on which those people might be settled. It is utterly inexcusable now. Sir, a few years ago a most extraordinary opportunity was presented to the Government of Canada. It was one of those great opportunities which come but once in a century, and I may say, once in the lifetime of a nation. It was an opportunity, given to those hon. gentlemen, by which they might have fully redeemed all their other errors and blunders, and they were neither few nor far between. I have never contended that the fiscal policy of a nation is more than one factor in its progress. I admit, frankly, that such things have happened as that a prudent and economical administration has been combined with a very bad fiscal system. I admit it is possible we may have a good land policy and a bad fiscal system. Those hon. gentlemen, a few years ago, came into office to find substantially all the essential work done for their hands. Thanks to the patient toil of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie) for five years, one great avenue to the North-West was all but opened. Thanks, to do them justice, to the enterprise and energy of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company, another avenue had been opened for some time. That magnificent country was practically placed at their disposal. The people of Canada, and notably the people of Ontario, were most anxious to go there. All the pent-up energies of many years were seeking an outlet. Every man who knows our people is aware that for years back we had been looking for such a field for energy and capital as the North-West then presented. The men were there, the money was there. Outside capital was ready to aid them to any reasonable extent. Absolutely, all that was necessary was to leave that country alone and let the people develop it. And, absolutely, they could not even do that. The very best settlers in the world were flowing into Manitoba. I never in all my life saw men so thoroughly capable of, and so well calculated for developing a country as the settlers who were going from Ontario to Manitoba in the early years of the hon. gentleman's Administration. I say they chose deliberately to ruin everything. I say that was bad if done from ignorance; if done from any other motive, it was an iniquitous breach of trust. What were the requirements of the North-West? They were three. First, the people needed cheap land; second, cheap goods; and third, and most of all, cheap and abundant means of transportation. How did hon. gentlemen supply those wants? Do not hon. members know that every vexatious obstacle and impediment that could be conceived in the way of land regulations placed in the way of intending settlers? Large tracts of land were withheld from settlers—the very tracts which the people desired to enter upon. Faith was broken with them in every possible way; their small capital was reduced by heavy and excessive taxation, and all opportunity of getting cheap transportation, although the people were prepared to provide it at their own cost, was shut out. Two policies were possible. One was to construct a road as a Government road, run it cheaply for the first few years, so as barely to pay expenses, and adopt a liberal policy for side lines, a policy substantially the same as that which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) proposed to introduce, and which would have contributed enormously to the wholesome development of the North-West, if put in force either by those hon. gentlemen or by the late Parliament. Then, there was the other plan: to allow the utmost freedom of competition, as was the right of the people of the North-West, provided the Government did not choose to construct the road and run it in the way I have described. What did they do? They forbade all competition, and as soon as the Government road was constructed, they handed it over to a private corporation; they not only turned it over, but they resigned all control over it. No grosser outrage was ever committed on a free people than that which was committed, by the Government and Parliament of Canada in thus interfering with the plainest rights of the people of the North-West. I say, moreover, that there never was such a case of sacrificing ends to means as in that act. What use is the Canadian Pacific Railway to us? Why should we be burdened with the payment of $100,000,000 for it, but for the opportunity presented of providing homes for hundreds of thousands of our people who are asking them at our hands? What hon. gentlemen opposite have done has been to deprive those people of the chance of settlement, to take away from them every possible inducement to go there. And the secondary results have been almost more important still. I remember well the position of the country in 1880. At that time, all kinds of railway projects were in agitation, and there was this remarkable feature about them. In old Canada it is not an easy task to devise railways which will prove profitable until after a long term of years. Very often the country opened up is of an inferior character and not likely to secure immediate settlement. But in the North-West it was scarcely possible for a man of ordinary judgment to plan a railway which would not in all human probability have brought in a large number of settlers and have become a reasonable source of profit to the promoters, within a short space of time. As I have said, no better settlers could be imagined than those who were rushing in from Ontario. There was perfect readiness on the part of outside capitalists to co-operate; and, moreover, such branch lines as were proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell, when he was Minister of the Interior, would really have been the best of all colonization schemes. The companies would not have been given, nor did the hon. gentleman propose to allow them, absolute control of the land; it was to have been retained under the control of the Government, and it would have been only profitable to the Company when they succeeded in placing actual settlers upon it. But all these projects were paralyzed by law. The right to construct such roads was taken away. What was the result? There was at once a complete stoppage of the influx of the best settlers; they would not go to a country where their rights were trampled on in that fashion. Capital that stood ready to develop that country, which its owners would have only been too happy to have invested in this manner, being thus debarred from its natural outlet, was directed into other channels, and there have been scenes in Manitoba and the North-West the like of which has scarcely been exceeded since the days of the South Sea Bubble. Moreover, all the branch lines which might have been and would have been constructed were utterly abandoned. No man could venture to build railways in face of the conditions on which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were entitled to build their line. The whole country was plunged into a state of discontent, of which hon. gentlemen opposite are very far indeed from having heard the last. Now, Sir, had they acted otherwise, had they acted sensibly and prudently, had they allowed the people to do what the people were only too ready to do, to-day instead of having a paltry 150,000, or thereabouts, of people, strung along 1,000 miles of railway, we would have had, in all human probability, 500,000 settlers in Manitoba alone. We would have had from 2,000 to 3,000 miles of branch lines in active operation, and we would have been able, in place of the miserable export we now have, to have exported, in all human probability, at least 20,000,000 bushels of wheat in this very year. Sir, the Canadian Pacific Railway itself would have had an infinitely better chance of success than it has to-day. Instead of its being a costly, a hazardous and a doubtful experiment, that railway with such a Province to draw from would have stood infinitely higher than it does to-day, with all the backing which the hon. gentleman can give it. Now, Sir, it does not lie in the mouth of these gentlemen to say that I exaggerate when I assert that we might to-day, in 1884 or 1883, have had an export of 20,000,000 bushels of grain from that country. Did not the Minister of Railways himself say that he hoped to see an export of 600,000,000 bushels of grain produced by the 100,000 settlers who would soon be settled in that country? I will not say that even this was an extravagant or an extreme view of the case, but I do say that but for most unwise interference of the Government which prevented the people from securing the direct railway communication which they would otherwise have got, it is perfectly certain that there would have been 20,000 settlers in Southern Manitoba to-day who would have been in a position, in all likelihood, to have exported the quantity of grain I named. It has been done elsewhere. I am not speaking of an impossibility, but of a thing which has been done again and again in the United States, close beside us. Now, it is well for us to consider how all this came about. I am sorry the First Minister is not here, because to a very considerable extent I hold him directly responsible for the miscarriage. I certainly am not a blind idolator of the hon. gentleman, but I know him well, and I appreciate many of his qualities quite as much, perhaps, as hon. gentlemen opposite do. I admit that the hon. gentleman is a good tactician, that he is a wire-puller of the first force, but I say that the hon. gentleman has never, either now or in former years, shown himself to be a good and capable administrator. Out of his own mouth let me convict him. No man was louder or more outspoken in his condemnation of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) because he proposed at one and the same time to act as Premier of Canada and to take charge of a Department of the Government. But the hon. gentleman, when he entered office, took into his hands the charge of by far the most important Department of the Government, in conjunction with the task of performing the duties of Premier. Sir, he may have attended to his duties as Premier, but no other evidence is required than his own declarations on the floor of the House, when he was endeavouring to pass the Estimates through Parliament, to show that he did not attend to the duties of his Department. And in this very city, as I am informed, a few months ago, when cross examined on oath, he declared that though he was sworn to discharge the duties of Minister of the Interior, he knew nothing at all about the conduct of the most important branch of his own Department. I am glad that since that declaration he has ceased to hold that office, for no matter what a man may be, no matter what his talents may be, I say that he could not possibly discharge the duties of Minister of the Interior unless he originally possessed, or unless immediately after entering office, he took pains to acquire an intimate personal knowledge of that country. And I say it is a great misfortune to Canada, and probably to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the First Minister should have, during all that time, chosen to occupy the position of Minister of the Interior. Now, Sir, one word as to the demands of the people of the North-West. Sir, I am heartily in sympathy with them; I say that those demands are substantially just. I say that it is in the highest degree in the interests of the Dominion of Canada that they should be conceded without delay. And as I have done before, I warn the Government, and so far as I can, I warn the people of Canada that unless they accede to the just demands of the people of the North-West, they will only have their own obstinacy and folly to thank for it, if the day should come, though I hope it never may, when Canada may lose the North-West, which it has so persistently discouraged. Sir, I utterly repudiate the idea that the people of the North-West are under any obligation or compliment to the people or the Parliament of Canada. On the contrary, I say the Parliament and Government of Canada have most grievously oppressed and maltreated the people of the North-West. Now, Sir, it may be that the lock-up of capital there is the smallest injury which Canada has sustained—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him to state what those just claims of the North-West are?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will tell the hon. gentleman. I say that the tyrannical monopoly should be abolished; that reasonable and fair, and just land regulations should be given and acted upon, and not changed from day to day and from hour to hour, at the caprice of a Minister at Ottawa, who knows and can know nothing about the interests of that country, who has never condescended to set his foot there—I mean, of course, the late Minister of the Interior—who never even condescended to go as far west as Chicago, who never, I believe, has put his foot on prairie soil in his life, either in Canada or anywhere else. If hon. gentlemen want to know more of these demands let them look at what the North-West Council, nominees, many of them, of the hon. gentleman, say of the claims of the North-West on the people of Canada. I was stating, Sir, that perhaps the lock-up of capital was the smallest injury, but that is great enough. Few of us perhaps know how widespread has been the desire of the people of Ontario, in particular, to acquire property in the North-West. I doubt if you could find a single hamlet in which there are not a considerable number of people who have some money in the North-West. I was at pains, at Winnipeg and Toronto, and elsewhere, to make a number of enquiries as to the amount of capital locked up there, and I believe I am largely within the mark in saying that, in all human probability, more than $20,000,000, within the last three or four years, have been locked up in the North-West. I do not say that all that money is lost, though no doubt a good deal of it has been lost; but I say that it is locked up and fixed, and that to all intents and purposes it is locked up to the people of Canada for the time being, and, therefore, one considerable cause of the stringency and depression which, as I contend, does undoubtedly exist here now. Moreover, I say the House should not suppose that it is as easy to undo the evil we have done as to do it. Sir, the seed time has been thrown away, and years must elapse before we find ourselves in one half as favourable a position for developing the North-West as we were in a few years ago. The money is gone or locked up as I have said—the men have gone too, which is worse. And if hon. gentlemen want to know where they have gone, I can tell them where part of them have gone. Let them go to northern Dakota, and they will find that in one whole division of that State, about 150 miles in length by 60 miles in depth, nine-tenths of the population in that district, are composed of Canadians, a very large number of whom, I grieve to say, went to Manitoba first, and afterwards crossed the border. Sir, if hon. gentlemen want to know what that means, I say that the area I have described would equal one-half of the whole western peninsula of Ontario. Draw a line from Toronto through London to Lake Huron and all the country south of that line, including twenty-three of the best Ridings of Canada—an area equaling the counties of Essex, Kent, Lambton, Bothwell, the Elgins, the Norfolks, the Middlesexes, Welland, Haldimand, the Wentworths, the Brants, the Oxfords, Monk, Lincoln Halton, and Peel would barely equal the territory of Northern Dakota, which is now occupied by Canadians who sought homes in Manitoba and—thanks to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite—were unable to find them there. Sir, I said there was also another loss. The hon. gentleman has added—intentionally or not—but he has added largely, despite what he may say to the contrary, to the cost of living in this country. The hon. gentleman knows—if he tries to retrench, he will soon find out if he does not know—that it is very hard indeed, for either nations or individuals who have become accustomed to a certain style of expenditure, to retrench that expenditure. Sir, I say any wise statesman to-day would shun, as he would shun poison, any legislation which would tend to increase the wealth of the few at the expense of the impoverishment of the many. I say that there is no greater danger, politically speaking, confronting society than the aggregation of large fortunes in individual hands; and the hon. gentleman, if he pays any attention to the movements of current thought, knows, or ought to know, that I speak the truth. I say that it is a thing which invariably produces corruption on the one side and misery on the other. I say it justifies socialism. We, in Canada, a few years ago, if we had not great wealth, had an exceedingly fair distribution of what wealth we had. The hon. gentleman's policy has contributed largely to alter that condition of things, and to cause this country to approximate the very condition in the Old World which has led so many people to leave the Old World and seek a home on this side of the Atlantic. The hon. gentleman can show no single instance anywhere, in which huge fortunes exist, in which there is not intense poverty at the other end of the scale. Now, let us see what the hon. gentlemen opposite can be held responsible for. For the poor harvest they are not responsible in one sense, inasmuch as they certainly could not avert it; although I say they are responsible in this sense, that when bad harvests overtook the country, during the Administration of my hon. friend, they falsely charged him with being the cause of it, and falsely pretended that if they were put in office they could do better. I say they are responsible for the excessive taxation which exists, for the amount of capital which is needlessly locked up in unproductive manufactures, for the capital which is lost by emigration, which is very large, for the capital which is locked up in the North-West, and for the general inflation and the increased cost of living in the country. Now, how do these hon. gentlemen propose to remedy all this? I did not hear in the statement of the hon. gentleman, any relief proposed now. He takes credit to himself that he was obliged to reduce certain taxes. Well, Sir, considering that he put on probably twelve or fifteen millions more taxes per annum, than were at all required, I do not think we owe him any great thanks for that. Still, as far as it went, it was good; but it was not by any manner of means what he ought to have done or what is called for by the present necessities of the country. Now, I had thought that I might take this occasion to speak of the Administration and the policy of my

hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) more in detail; but that, I see, looking at the time, I must reserve for some other occasion. Still, I will say this, that I am prepared to show, if the hon. gentleman wants to have it shown, that the deficits which existed during my hon. friend's Administration—the deficits of 1876, 1877 and 1878—were due to the extravagance—aye, to the deliberate misconduct—of his predecessors. I say, Sir, that the deficits which would have existed in 1874 and 1875 were turned into surpluses by us. I say more—that the mischief which afterwards occurred was due to the neglect by hon. gentlemen opposite, of my hon. friend's warnings, and I say, that in spite of all, we had substantially mastered all those difficulties by sheer economy, and that, with the solitary exception of the sum required for sinking fund—which, as the hon. Minister of Finance truly said this afternoon, goes wholly to the redemption of debt—we had, before we left office, succeeded in establishing an equilibrium. More I say—our Tariff, had it been maintained, would have provided an ample revenue the moment trade revived. The Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, as the statements of 1879 and 1880 show, wholly failed to afford a revenue until that revival took place. I say further—if, instead of having recourse to a comparison of my hon. friend's Administration in difficult times, with their Administration in prosperous times, hon. gentlemen opposite compare their Administration in a time at all approaching the stringency we had to face, my hon. friend has not the faintest cause to fear a comparison of his Administration with the Administration of Sir John A. Macdonald in former years of stringency. More, Sir—I say had our policy prevailed, the taxes and the expenditure of the country would have been many millions a year less to-day than they are now, and the taxation would have been infinitely more fairly levied. I say, as I have said before, that had the people been permitted, as we would have permitted them, to use the great advantages which presented themselves in Manitoba, that Province to-day would have contained half a million of prosperous and contented settlers, instead of being, as the hon. gentleman well knows, a mass of discontent. I say there would have been no tyrannical monopolies; and although there would have been undoubtedly a considerable removal from Ontario, that would have gone to swell the population of our own country, and not the population of the United States. Now, Sir, in all this I am not claiming very much. I am only claiming that affairs would have been administered with reasonable prudence, and reasonable economy, and reasonable discretion; and I say, that as much as could have been done in Manitoba, has been done again and again in the United States. Now, Sir, I do not want, as the hon. gentleman did, to enter on the realm of prophecy; I am not going to venture on any predictions. But I may recall the past. I may recall the fact that, in 1873, under somewhat similar circumstances, the hon. gentleman thought there was a long career of prosperity awaiting us; and I may recall to him the fact that, scarcely were the words out of his mouth, as scarcely were the words out of his mouth last year, before the fair prospect was overclouded. Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman has a period of commercial difficulty before him—though I trust he will not be called upon to face any such commercial disaster as overtook the country during the Administration of my hon. friend—I ask him, and I ask the House, how he is prepared to meet it. Sir, our resources have been dissipated, while our liabilities have been indefinitely increased. It is quite on the cards, if the hon. gentleman's own policy should be carried out, and our imports should be reduced to the level of our exports, that instead of having $30,000,000 or $31,000,000 to rely on, he might find himself reduced to $26,000,000 or $27,000,000; while at the same time he has swollen his expenditure to such a figure that there is scarcely any reasonable ground for believing that it can be reduced below $30,000,000 or $31,000,000. Now we have to confront, not only this grievous taxation, but an absolute reduction in the population of our richest Province, and there is this difference, at any rate, between the trouble which may overtake us now and the trouble which overtook us in 1874, that although it may be true that in both cases something was due to the extravagance of the people themselves, though more I think, to unavoidable misfortunes, which could not by any possibility be foreseen or prevented, still in the present instance when there have been no disasters of any real importance, we have nothing to thank but our own wilful imprudence for the position we are in to-day. We have nothing to thank but our own folly if the advantages of our position have been thrown away and prove insufficient to save us from serious reverses. Now, if I am to sum up the losses we have sustained, I feel some difficulty in doing it. I believe the excessive taxation to which the hon. gentleman has subjected this country, has involved a loss of not less than $50,000,000 in the course of the last five years; I believe that the locking up of capital in manufactures has involved a loss of not less than $10,000,000, and the locking up of capital in the North-West, a loss of not less than $20,000,000. As to the loss we have sustained by the depletion of our population and the amount of capital withdrawn from Canada to provide Canadians with homes in the United States, that, I confess, I almost hesitate to compute. I know it to be very large and vastly in excess of all we have received from any immigration into this country, but how large it is, it is almost impossible for me or anybody else to calculate now. The hon. gentleman, besides by involving us, as he has, in an annual expenditure of not less than $30,000,000 a year, has unjustly and improperly added $5,000,000 to our annual expenditure. Let him capitalize that at 4 per cent. and see what amount that will represent. I say nothing of the additional millions which have not been paid into the Treasury but have been paid in subsidizing certain industries in this country. I will only allude to the hundred millions in money and subsidies which we have granted to a Company for the purpose of creating a railway monopoly through the North-West. We do not know if the $100,000,000 will do or what further demands will be made. I have put down nothing for the last bad harvest, the shrinkage of stocks, the loss we have incurred, according to the hon. gentleman's principles, by the fact that our imports exceeded our exports last year by $30,000,000 or $34,000,000. If hon. gentlemen opposite choose to add all these things together, they may compute for themselves; they may compute what four or five years of those hon. gentlemen's Government has cost the country. For myself, I will not hesitate to say that, looking at the thing all round, I believe we would have done better if we had borrowed $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 and thrown the money into the sea or had blown it away in fire works, as other nations have done, than allow these hon. gentlemen to control the Administration of this country. Five years of their government have done as much mischief to Canada, relatively to our population and resources, as four years of civil war did to the country and the people to the south of us. But though we may measure the material injury we have sustained, how shall we estimate the moral? I predicted in 1878, that if the people of Canada chose to restore those hon. gentlemen to power, three results would accrue. First of all, I said, and I repeat it now, that by restoring those gentlemen to power, after what they had been proved to have done, we would degrade and demoralize public opinion from one end of this country to the other. I said, in the second place, that by the system they proposed to introduce, if allowed to put it into effect, they would impoverish the great bulk of the people. I said, in the last place, that if they were restored to power, after what had occurred, all restraint and wholesome control on the part of the people, over Parliament or the Government, would be removed, and that there would be no check on the extravagance and corruption which would ultimately prevail. I am sorry to say that the worst results I predicted have been fulfilled. We are confronted to-day with a Government which may be defined as a Government compacted of all the sinister interests in Canada. It is not, as its leader once said, a Government steeped to the lips in corruption, but a Government which is corruption incarnate. What have we seen within the last two weeks, within the last few days? What have we seen within the course of the last year or two? We have seen the whole representation of the Great Province to which I belong so villainously gerrymandered that one half of the electors are allowed to return two-thirds of the representatives to Parliament; that one-sixth of the people, to all intents and purposes, are practically disfranchised, and we saw that done by virtue of a Census which, itself, is a deliberate fraud and as to which you can only assert with confidence one fact, that it does not truly state the number of people who were in Canada on the day it pretended to be taken. We have seen worse than that. We have seen civil servants of that Government, who were proven to have conspired to defraud, or who, at any rate, were proven to have aided in causing their employers a loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars, restored to office and the act defended on the floor of this House; we have seen the judiciary prostituted by the appointment to a place on the Bench of a gentleman against whom suits were impending which, if proven, would have shown him to be utterly unfit to take his seat on that very Bench before which these actions were brought; we have seen contracts for large sums of money given away in deliberate violation of the law and in a fashion that justified the idea that the men who got the contracts were expected to render yeoman's service, by providing secret funds for electoral corruption; we have seen large tracts of valuable lands, the property of the public, secretly sold for about one-third of their value to the highest officials of the country, and not a word heard in reprobation from the gentlemen who used to be so loud in denouncing my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) if it were discovered that he, on any occasion, had allowed a contract to be given to one man for a few hundred dollars more than it had been tendered for by another; we have seen two Premiers, one of the Dominion and one the great Province of Quebec, unseated for shameless bribery and corruption, committed under circumstances which show that, if not equally, they were morally guilty of acting in connivance with the culprits; we have seen one great Province brought to the brink of financial ruin by the extravagance and corruption of those entrusted with its administration, to its great loss and the loss of the whole Dominion; we have seen other Provinces repeatedly deprived of their just and legal rights, in defiance of the former public declarations of the very men who vetoed those laws passed by the Provincial Legislatures; we have seen a deliberate plot on the part of the Federal Government, by means I shall not characterize, as they deserve to be characterized, to overturn the Local Government in Ontario. Sir, it failed, as it deserved to fail, and in this failure there is, perhaps, the best ground for hope that the people of Canada and the people of Ontario are beginning to understand and appreciate the mode in which those hon. gentlemen are carrying on the Government of this country. We have seen hundreds of thousands of the very choice and flower of our fellow countrymen driven into exile by the policy of these hon. gentlemen; we have seen $100,000,000 of public money given to build up a railway monopoly; we have seen the taxation of this country raised to a point far beyond the taxation of the United States to-day, and equal to that with which the United States emerged from their great civil war; and we have seen all that done under a fiscal policy, for which the hon. gentleman is specially responsible, which is so contrived as to bear most heavily on the poorest portion of the community, next, most heavily on the producing classes, and, by an exquisite refinement of folly, most of all and worst of all, on the very men who are now engaged in endeavouring to settle, to develop, and to make valuable the country to the north-west of us. Still, bad as all this is, I do not despair. In one thing I agree with the hon. gentleman—the resources of this country are great. Other countries have sustained equal injuries and have survived them, not without bitter suffering, but they have survived them, and I believe the resources of Canada are enough; I believe there is enough sterling honesty and ability among our people, if properly organized, to restore an honest form of Government yet. But, although I do not despair, I am not over-confident. I am aware that mischief has been done which it will take generations to repair; I am aware that the whole future of this country has been very heavily mortgaged indeed, and I do not cheat myself with the cheap philosophy that everything is bound to come all right somehow. Reason does not tell us that, history does not tell us that, experience does not tell us that. It may be that things will come right, but they will not come right of their own accord; they will have to be set right, and it may be after a long and painful struggle. More, Sir; I say it with regret, but I say that the people of Canada have deliberately retrograded; I say that the people of Canada have not shown, as a whole, that regard for their liberty, that jealous watchfulness of men in power, that is the price that every free nation must pay for being properly governed. I say that to-day, in Canada, to our shame and loss be it said, public morality is painfully low and public opinion is painfully weak.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; I say it. I am not afraid to say it. Our duty is plain enough, and we mean to do it. Our duty is not to shrink from telling unpleasant truths because we happen to stand at odds on this floor. We may be at the odds of one to two; we are at the odds of one to two, although our numbers here do not at all represent fairly and honestly our true following in this country. But I say this, be the odds what they will, so long as we have seats here, we will not cease to warn the people of their danger, we will not cease to call those hon. gentlemen to account. Sir, the hon. gentlemen have power indeed, they may have recourse to their old style of argument, they cannot answer our arguments perhaps, but they can pass Acts of Parliament to turn us out of the Legislature. That they can do, and that, if they choose to try it again, they are welcome to do; but, except by such arguments, they will not silence gentlemen on this side of the House; they will not silence them by any impudent assertions on their part that they are patriotic, and that we are to be denounced because we choose to call attention to plain and manifest facts. Was that the way in which the hon. the Minister of Railways used to conduct his opposition from this very seat? Was he afraid of stating unpleasant facts because he thought it might injure the credit of this country? If he concealed anything, Mr. Speaker, his concealment was the highest style of art, for no one on our side ever suspected him of doing it. I regret exceedingly that things are as they are, but I say it would be infinitely worse if, being as they are, we should hesitate to declare our opinion. I admit that we may be out-voted and that we may be out-numbered, but what I say to my friends behind me is, that so long as they are true to their own convictions, and so long as they are not afraid to defend them here and to defend them elsewhere, the Liberal party may, here in Canada, as it has elsewhere, be temporarily defeated, but the Liberal party cannot be beaten, and the Liberal party will be safe to win in the end.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before we adjourn, I wish to state to the House that the intention of the Government is not to proceed with the Franchise Bill on Tuesday.

Mr. BLAKE. I presume this debate will probably be proceeded with on Tuesday?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:45 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 3rd March, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 108) to amend the Act respecting gas and gas meters.—(Mr. Costigan.)

ADULTERATION OF FOOD AND DRUGS.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill intitled: "An Act for the prevention of adulteration of food and drugs."

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has moved for leave to introduce a Bill with a different title to that standing on the Notice Paper, which is: "An Act to amend and consolidate, as amended, the several Acts relating to the adulteration of food and drugs."

Mr. COSTIGAN. I now beg leave to introduce Bill (No. 109) to amend and consolidate, as amended, the several Acts relating to the adulteration of food and drugs.

Bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in introducing Bill (No. 110) respecting the representation of the Territories in the House of Commons, said: Mr. Speaker, on the 8th day of May, 1882, a minute of Council was passed authorizing the dividing of a portion of the North-West Territories into four Provisional Territorial divisions, and in that minute of Council, a portion of which I hold in my hand, it is alleged that the division was made for the purposes of settlement, for the convenience of settlers, and to facilitate postal service. This minute of Council was passed and approved of by the Executive Council on the recommendation of the First Minister. It was submitted to Parliament, and sanctioned on the 16th May, 1882, and by it that portion of the North-West Territories comprised within the four Territorial divisions to which I have referred was bounded and named as specified in the minute of Council. There is the Territorial division of Assiniboia, containing an area of about 95,000 square miles, and that Territory is bounded, according to the minute of Council, on the south, by the International boundary line; on the east, by the western boundary of the Province of Manitoba; on the north, by the ninth correction line of the Dominion Lands system of survey; and on the west, by the line dividing the tenth and eleventh ranges of townships numbered from the fourth initial meridian in the Dominion Lands system of survey. The District of Saskatchewan, contained, it is alleged in the minute of Council, an area of about 114,000 square miles, and it is bounded as follows:—On the south, by the District of Assiniboia and the Province of Manitoba; on the east, by Lake Winnipeg, and Nelson River, flowing therefrom into Hudson Bay; on the north, by the 18th correction line of the Dominion Lands system of survey; and on the west, by the line of that system dividing the tenth and eleventh ranges, numbered from the fourth initial meridian. The Territory of Alberta contains an area of about 100,000 square miles and is bounded on the south by the International boundary line; on the east, by the District of Assiniboia; on the west, by the Province of British Columbia; and on the north, by the 18th correction line. The District of Athabasca contains an area of about 122,000 square miles, as set out in the minute of Council, to which I have referred, and is bounded on the south by the District of Alberta; on the east, by the line between the tenth and eleventh ranges of townships in the Dominion Lands system before mentioned, until, proceeding northward that line intersects the Athabasca River, then by that river and Athabasca Lake, and Slave River to the intersection of the latter river with the northern boundary of the district, which is to be the 32nd correction line of the Dominion Lands system, and is very nearly the 60th parallel of north latitude; and on the west, by the Province of British Columbia. A reference to the map which accompanied that minute of Council will show, that a very large portion, perhaps a most important portion, of the whole North-West is covered by these Territorial districts. Now the minute of Council was submitted for the sanction of Parliament by the First Minister, then Minister of Interior. The hon. gentleman in submitting it for the approval of Parliament stated that the proposed divisions were in the public interest, for the public benefit, for the convenience of settlers as well as for postal service; that he expected that at no distant day a considerable population would flow into those four Districts, and that it would not be long before it would become necessary to erect those four Territories into four Provinces with, of course, all the rights which Provinces would be entitled to, including local self-government, and representation in this Parliament. Now, Sir, I may say that, to some extent, the hon. gentleman's statements and predictions have been verified. I know that a large number of immigrants have, within the last two years, settled within the Territories mentioned, and especially within the Territories of Assiniboia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. I know, Sir, that in those Territories there are several fine, prosperous, growing villages and towns, some of them having a very considerable population. I know that in certain other portions of the Territories a very considerable number of immigrants have taken possession of lands within the last two years. I believe, from some knowledge of the region, especially the Territories of Assiniboia and Alberta, that the tide of immigration for the last year, at all events, if not the last two years, has tended in that direction, and I believe that the tide of immigration which we expect to flow into the North-West will, to a very considerable extent, be settled in the Territories of Assiniboia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. I believe, Sir, that with ordinary care and prudence, with an ordinarily capable management of public affairs in connection with the North-West Territories, inside of a period of three years, a very large population will be settled in the Terriories to which I have just referred, and especially in those three which I last named. I know, Sir, that there are complaints, and serious complaints, coming from the people settled in those localities, as to the mode in which the affairs of the North-West have been administered for the last few years. I do not know to what extent the Government have set to work with a view of redressing the grievances and wrongs complained of by the settlers in the North-West Territories. I do know that from some three visits to these western regions, especially in 1882 and 1883, that the people settled in the villages and towns to which I have referred, are strongly in favour of having these Territories erected into Provinces, and of having representation in the Dominion Parliament. Now, Sir, in order in some measure to meet the desires of the people of the North-West, in order in some extent to give them the means which will enable them to come to Parliament to state their grievances and complaints, I venture to submit to Parliament a Bill having for its object the representation of the North-West Territories in the Dominion Parliament. I am aware, Sir, that an hon. member of this House has given notice of a motion upon this same subject. The motion on the Order Paper of this House reads as follows:—

"That in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Government take such measures as may seem to them most advisable for granting Parliamentary representation to the inhabitants of the Territorial districts of the North-West."

Now, Sir, that motion does not suit me; it does not go far enough. In fact, you cannot accomplish the object I have in view by a motion. I not only express the desire that the people of the North-West Territories should have representation in this Parliament, but I propose, so far as I am able, to give them representation here, and I propose that they shall have that representation at a very early period—at the next Session of Parliament. It is desirable to give the inhabitants of the North-West Territories representation in this Parliament. The sooner that object is accomplished the better, both for the people of that country and the people of the Dominion generally. I am aware that this question has been discussed in the Senate Chamber. I am aware that a friend of the Government there submitted a question to the hon. Minister of the Interior looking in the same direction as my Bill. The question submitted in the Senate was to the following effect:—

"Enquiry of the Government as to the advisability of granting Parliamentary representation to the inhabitants of the Territorial Districts of the North-West, and an enquiry whether the Government have taken or intend to take the same under consideration."

Now, the enquiry was proper enough, but an enquiry is a very empty thing. It can serve no good purpose but to ascertain from the Minister of the Interior, what policy the Government have on this subject. What was the answer of the Minister of the Interior to that question? Was it such an answer as would satisfy the reasonable desires of the people of the North-West Territories? Did he give them any satisfactory assurance that their request on this very important subject would be acceded to by the Government? The Minister, after having discussed at length, the condition of affairs in the North-West Territories, and having had the usual fling at the Liberal party and the Liberal press, for their attitude respecting that country, he makes the following statement:—

"I am sure it will be gratifying to the people of the North-West Territories to have their interest and institutions submitted to the House as they were by my hon. friend from Niagara, and discussed in this House so intelligently as they have been. It will show them that they are not, in their remoteness from the capital, forgotten by the legislators who sit in this Parliament, and it will, I am sure, impart a feeling of confidence to them, and increase the assurance which they feel that their interests and their feelings will be earnestly considered by the Government, and also by Parliament."

And then the Minister of the Interior winds up by saying :

"That is all that I feel called upon to say with respect to the enquiry of the hon. gentleman."

Now, Sir, this, I think, was, under the circumstances, a very extraordinary answer. It gave very little comfort or assurance to the mass of the people in the North-West Territories, who, for the last year at all events, have been crying aloud to the Government for representation in the Dominion Parliament; and it did not give much assurance to the North-West Council, who, I believe, represented to the Government the propriety of having the North-West Territories represented in the Dominion Parliament. What does the Minister of Interior say to them? Does he give them the assurance of the Government that their reasonable request shall be acceded to, and that representation in this Parliament shall be given to them? No, he does not say that. He says: "You must be grateful for the interest we take in your welfare; Senator Plumb, of Niagara, has set forth your claims in his usual able manner; it is true, you are very remote from the capital of the Dominion, but we like you all the same; your claims will in due time be considered; it is true, you pay taxes without representation in this Parliament, but then you must submit in the meantime to pay taxes and to obey our laws without having a voice in the passing of those laws or in the administration of public affairs in the country in which you live; it is true, you want representation in the Parliament which makes your laws and imposes taxes on you; but then you ought to be satisfied with your present condition, because the Government will consider your case." And then the Minister winds up by saying: "That is all that I feel called upon to say with respect to the inquiry made by the hon. gentleman from Niagara." Now, I say that is not sufficient to allay the discontent which I know exists in the North West Territories upon this question. It does not meet the fair demands of the people who have gone up there from the older Provinces, and of the immigrants from the old country. The men who have settled there are the pioneers of the country, and are opening up to the extent of their ability, the vast and unbounded resources that exist there. I know that these indefinite promises, these vague assurances, will not satisfy them; they will only be satisfied by the Government dealing fairly and honestly with the matter, and giving them the representation in this Parliament that they ought to have. We tax them and impose laws upon them, and we expect them to pay those taxes, to submit to those laws, and to render a hearty allegiance to the country under whose flag they live; and yet we do not give them any voice in the passage of the laws which govern them. Sir, I propose, in the Bill I am about to introduce, to release the people of those Territories from what I consider a condition of tutelage. They are living there in the position of Crown colonists. They have nothing that can properly be called a Government, and nothing that can properly be called representation. I propose to remedy that condition of affairs by giving them a representation in the Parliament of Canada. At present, the settlers, in our North-West Territories are in a position inferior to that of the settlers in the territories of the United States. I propose in my Bill to put them in a superior position. When any portion of the United States is formed into a territory, it is given a territorial Government and representation in Congress. The people of the American Territories send delegates to Washington, who can express the wishes and wants of the people they represent on the floor of Congress; and Congress pays more attention to them than it does to men who merely speak after having knocked about the country for a while. Now, if I were a resident of the North-West Territories, I would not be satisfied with the kind of representation given to the American Territories. We know that the general Government there have unlimited control over the Territories; they appoint the Governor, the Executive, and the Judges of the Territory. It is true, the inhabitants of the Territory, when they reach a certain number, have a right to have constituted a territorial Government, and the right to send a representative to Congress; and when they reach a certain other number, they have a right to be erected into a State, with all the rights, powers, and privileges of a free sovereign State. By the fourth article of the American Constitution it is provided that Congress shall have the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States. The power of Congress over the Territories every one who is familiar with the Constitution of the United States knows is of two kinds. First, the power that affects the Territory itself, the management of it as property, to guard and improve it as such, and to prepare for sale and sell it; and second, the powers which concern the government of the people who reside within the Territories. Before the Territories are erected into States, Congress establishes the Government of these Territories, assumes full responsibility for their Government, appoints Governors, Judges and executives for the Territories and controls their public domain. It is only when a certain population is known to exist in any particular portion of the land in the United States, that it can be constituted a Territory, and it is only when a much larger population is resident in a Territory that it has a right to become a free and sovereign State. These Territories of the United States have the right to send representatives to Congress who have all the powers and rights and privileges of representatives from regularly organized States with the exception that they have not the right to vote. - I presume that the representatives from our North West Territories shall hold all these powers, advantages and privileges enjoyed by the representatives of the United States Territories and shall have in addition the right of voting in this Parliament. The principle is a sound and good one that when we find the population in our Territories large enough to be capable for self-government, we ought to give them self government; when their population is large enough to justify our giving them representation in Parliament, they ought to have that right. It is a sound principle that no portion of our population should be compelled to pay taxes without being represented in Parliament. Taxation without representation, it is said, is tyranny. We impose our laws on the people of the North-West, but we do not give them any voice in the framing of those laws; we impose taxes on them, but we do not allow them to come here and vote and be heard on the subject of those taxes. The condition in which they are placed is anomalous and unjustifiable, and the quicker it is changed the better it will be not only for the progress and prosperity of the North-West Territories, but for the progress and prosperity of the Dominion at large as well. The Government of the United States, as a general rule, keep abreast of the times, and when there is a population—it may be a sparse and limited population—in any portion of their public domains, that portion is constituted a Territory. The population may be large or small, but such populated portions are constituted into Territories, and they have the power to have territorial general assemblies; they pass their local ordinances subject to the approval of Congress and which may be vetoed by the Federal Congress. Still, they have all the powers they require. The principle or ground upon which the United States erect their public lands into Territories is worth considering. The Statesmen's Year Book for 1833 shows that the following Territories were organized since 1850:—

	Area	Population
New Mexico 9th Sept., 1850 .....	124,450 83 miles	61,547 in 1850
Colorado, 1861 .....	105,517 "	34,277 in 1865
Nebraska, 30th May, 1854 .....	122,007 "	{ 10,716 in 1850 12,519 in 1863

In that State, the population from 1850 to 1863, thirteen years, had only increased about 2,000; I venture to say the population in our North-West Territories has quadrupled that in the last two years.

	Area.	Population.
Washington, 2nd Nov., 1853... ..	71,300 sq. miles.	11,063 in 1850
Utah, 9th Sept., 1850 .....	109,690 "	133,693 in 1850
Dakota, 1861 .....	152,500 "	14,181 in 1870
Arizona, 1863 .....	130,800 "	9,658 in 1870
Montana, 1864 .....	146,080 "	25,595 in 1870
Wyoming, 25th July, 1868.....	97,800 "	9,118 in 1870

I venture to say that each one of our Territories, especially the Territories of Assinibolia, Alberta and Saskatchewan have more than double the population of any of three-fourths of the Territories that I have just referred to had when they were erected into Territories. If that is so, there is no reason why our Territories should not be erected into Provinces with all the rights and privileges of free, independent, and sovereign Provinces, and be represented in this Parliament. You will recollect that when British Columbia was admitted into our Confederation, her population was estimated then to be about 12,000 white people; yet we gave her six representatives in this Parliament and three Senators. When Manitoba joined Confederation, her population was estimated at from 12,000 to 15,000. The exact number of people residing in Manitoba was unknown, but the gentlemen who spoke during the discussion on the admission of Manitoba into the Dominion give this as the closest estimate. We gave Manitoba an independent existence as a Province; we erected it into a sovereign state with all the advantages, rights, powers and privileges of sovereign states. We gave it representation in this Parliament to the extent of four members, and in addition the right to send two representatives to our Canadian House of Lords. The importance of our Territories is now so great that it will justify Parliament in, at once, dealing with this question. The hon. Minister of Railways the other night when speaking on the Railway Resolutions, pointed out—and, in my opinion that was the best portion of his speech—the great importance not only to Manitoba but the North-West Territories to the Dominion. He pointed out the enormous increase in the money received from Customs, not only in Manitoba but in the North-West Territories, as well as the increase of immigration in 1880-81, 1882-83; during these years the immigration amounted to 141,560. I venture to state now that the larger portion of the immigration from our western country is settled in the Territories outside the boundaries of Manitoba, that is the population that has made its way there within the last three years. The hon. gentleman stated that $3,000,000 was brought into Manitoba and the North-West Territories during the last three years. I make bold to say that he underestimated the amount; I believe a larger sum has gone into these Territories from the older Provinces, and that now, Sir, the importance of the Territories has become so great that representation in the Dominion Parliament appear to me to be an absolute necessity. I say that representation in this Parliament will encourage the settlers there. Most of the settlers in the Territories are people who have come from the Province of Ontario, where they have been accustomed to free government, where they have been accustomed to free institutions, where they have been accustomed to manage their own affairs in their own way, and to have their representatives upon the floors of Parliament advocating their interests; and I believe that the Government could take no more popular step than to give the people of the North-West Territories representation, and to give it at once. I tell the hon. gentleman that his Government never did, or could not possibly do, a more popular thing than to give the North-West Territories representation in this Parliament—I do not mean in this Session—that cannot be done—but to pass a law to enable the North-West Territories to send each one representative to this Parliament, to be here at the next Session. The government of the North-West Territories is a peculiar kind of government. It is not a free government. They have not representative institutions there in the true sense of the term. They are governed by a Council. One-half of that Council are nominees of the Crown, the other half elected by the people. The Council consists of the six appointed by the Crown, six elected by the people, and the Lieutenant-Governor; they all sit in the same Chamber, I believe, and take part in the discussions. They are dealt with purely as a Crown colony, the nominees of the Crown rule, and, naturally, people who are accustomed to free institutions will not be satisfied with that condition of affairs, and the sooner it is remedied the better. What is the remedy? I know it may be said that the population there is sparse, is not large, and that therefore it would not be wise or judicious to give them representation in this Parliament until we know what the population is. I know it is a difficult matter to ascertain with correctness what the population of the North-West Territory is, but I am bold to say that the population, especially the population of Assinibolia, has not been over-estimated. The estimate of the population there is between 20,000 and 30,000. I believe there are fully 25,000 people who are now residents, permanent residents, in the Territory of Assinibolia. If that is so, is there any reason in the world why they should not have representation in this Parliament? They are quite capable of exercising the franchise. They are men who have gone there from the hon gentleman's constituency and from my constituency, they are men who all their lives from the time they come of age, have been accustomed to exercise the franchise in their own country, and they are men who feel it to be a wrong and an injustice that laws should be imposed upon them in the passing of which they have no voice. I know that in the Territory of Assinibolia there are large and important centres of population, such as Broadview, Troy, Regina, Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat, Qu'Appelle, and a large settlement along the east shores of Long Lake. There is also a large settlement on the north shores of the Qu'Appelle River. A large settlement went in their last fall and settled north of the town of Regina, and, if the lands had been open south of the railway belt, there would have been a large settlement south of Regina within the 24-mile belt, and even south of the 21 mile belt. The entries in the agent's office in Regina are, I think, as large as those in nearly all the other offices together. I believe there were 2,000 entries for homesteads made in that office up to the 1st January in the present year. If that is so, can there be any reason why the people of the North-West Territory should not have representation in the Dominion Parliament? I say their condition is not a satisfactory condition. It is not a condition which a single member of this House would tolerate for a day without making a solemn protest to the Government against that anomalous and unsatisfactory condition of affairs. It is a matter of justice, not only to the people of the North-West Territories, but to the people of this Dominion. It is a matter of justice to this Parliament, and a matter of justice to the Government of this country. When we are dealing with questions affecting the North-West Territory, how many members of Parliament are there here who know anything about the country, except what they have heard from people who have visited that region, and one gives one account of it, and another gives another account of it.

No man can properly and successfully govern that country without knowing something of it, without being conversant with its wants, without visiting it, going among the people there, and ascertaining exactly what the wants and desires and wishes of the people of the North-West really are. Every Session of Parliament, every day of every Session, large, important, complicated, difficult questions are cropping up here with reference to the government of the North-West Territories. Is there anybody here who knows anything about it? Will the First Minister say that, for the years he was Minister of the Interior, he knew the first thing about the North-West Territories? He knows perfectly well that he did not, and he had the candour to admit that he did not. He told us, I think, in 1882, that he had never read the report of his Department until it was submitted to Parliament, and I feel certain that the gentleman who has succeeded him knows, if possible, still less. Now, the men who live in that country, the men who make their homes there, the men who intend to live there and intend to grow with the growth of the country and prosper with its prosperity are the very men of all others whom the First Minister ought to have upon the floors of Parliament to consult with him, to advise him, to advise this Parliament, and to give advice as to what is best to be done as to the management of the North-West Territories. And these men are not here. These men could tell us something about the wants of the country, but they are not here. I propose that they shall be here, and that they shall be here during the next Session of Parliament, and I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman will be able to get from the North-West Territories men who will be a credit not only to the country they represent, but to this Parliament. I read the other day, and I extracted it from a paper published in the North-West Territories, an article on this question, which I propose to trouble the House by reading. It is a well written article, which deals with this question in a generous and liberal spirit, and deals with the Government in a generous and liberal spirit. The article goes a little farther than my Bill goes, but it goes no further than I would like the Government to go. The article impresses upon the Government not only the propriety of giving representation in this Parliament to the Territories, but it advocates, in the interests of the Government and in the interests of the North-West Territories, the propriety of having the Minister of Interior a resident of the North-West Territories. Now, I cannot by Act of Parliament prescribe the mode in which the First Minister will select his Cabinet. That is in his discretion; but I tell the hon. gentleman that, in my judgment, no wiser or better step could be taken than to have some man from the North-West Territories administering the affairs of the Department of the Interior. It is a local department. Every law we pass here affects those people personally, immediately, and directly, and no one could administer the affairs of that Department better than a man who is conversant with the country and knows all about its wants. The article is in the following words:—

"From a theoretic point of view it would seem as if the only sound principle were the broad one that the best men should be sought for the high and responsible duties of members of the Dominion Government, quite irrespective of lines of longitude. But the question has another side. The science of government is essentially a practical science. And this is more emphatically true when the country to be governed is one stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and embracing almost every variety of habits and industries. The simple fact is that a sober, intelligent people, such as Canadians are, need very little government except that of a local character. They are quite capable of governing themselves and in the main prefer to do so. In this respect they are in the van of the world's political progress. Local self-government is the predestined goal of free peoples. The trend of modern national movements is all in that direction. (There will, of course, always be need of solidarity in certain matters of national concern, and these must be kept exclusively within the sphere of the central authority.) But those matters are after all comparatively few, especially while we have no national status and, consequently, no direct negotiations with foreign nations. The chief work of a Canadian Government, then, partakes more or less of the character of local administration, and, the Department of the Interior becomes in the nature of things almost a North-West Department. Reason and justice demand that it should be filled by a man well versed in North-West ways and wants. So long as the administration of the public lands of this great country is in the hands of the Central Government, so long should the Departmental Administrator be a man thoroughly versed in the affairs and closely identified with the interests of the North-West. Nor will our readers think us altogether deficient in respect for administrative genius when we add that it would not be very difficult to find a score of men in Manitoba and the Territories as competent to fill such an office as three-fourths of the present aspirants for Cabinet honours in either political party."

Sir, I agree with every word of that article. I think it is an article just to the point, and I only hope that the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches will pay some attention to it, and to the wants, requirements and interests of the North-West Territories. Sir, I propose by this Bill, so far as I can, to remedy some of the grievances under which the people of the North-West Territories are now suffering, and to that end I propose to give them representation in this Parliament; I propose in the interests of the North-West Territories that each shall send one representative to this Parliament; that that election for the Territories shall take place before the 1st of December next, and that the representatives thus elected shall occupy seats on the floor of this Parliament during the next Session, so that we may have the benefit of their advice on all that concerns the great North-West Territories. The hon. gentleman can see the great advantage we now enjoy in having representatives from Manitoba who are more or less acquainted with that Province, and the advantage will be still greater when we have representatives from the Territories themselves. I therefore say that it is of the first consequence to the well being, prosperity and growth of the North-West Territories that their claims in this respect should be recognized by the Government. I know my Bill cannot pass unless it receives the assent of the Government. I have introduced it, and have drawn the attention of the Government to it, and now on their shoulders rests the responsibility. On my last trip to the North-West I promised some of the leading men there, and some of the strongest supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, that one of the first things I would do during this Session would be to introduce a Bill giving the people of the North-West representation in this Parliament. I waited for some time to see if the Government proposed dealing with this matter, but so far they have given no indication that they intended to do so; and from an answer given to the Senator from Niagara in the other House I am led to believe that the Government do not intend to deal with this question this Session. In order that the matter may be promptly drawn to the attention of the Government I venture to submit this Bill, and I now move for leave to introduce a Bill respecting the representation of the North-West Territories in the House of Commons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It can answer no good purpose to discuss this subject until we see the hon. gentleman's Bill. Of course, we grant him the usual courtesy of introducing it, though from its terms, as the hon. gentleman substantially states, it is a measure which must be under the guidance of the Government of the day. However, when the Bill is introduced we will see what its provisions are. I merely wish to add, Mr. Speaker, and call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this—we do not know whether it is in the Bill or not—but from the remarks of the hon. gentleman it is quite clear that he intends to be the next Minister of the Interior. He says he is strongly in favour of the Minister of the Interior living up there. Now, my hon. friend has made large investments in the North-West, and I am glad to learn, proper investments, and it is therefore quite clear that my hon. friend is going to live there. We must therefore consider this measure of his as an insidious attempt to take possession of the ground, and to cut out any of the hon. gentlemen opposite from the chance of being the next Minister of the Interior. I hope he will be as fortunate as any of my hon. friends on the other side. I wish him all prosperity when he is there. In the meantime we will consider my hon. friend's Bill.

Bill read the first time.

THE ST. CLAIR FRONTIER TUNNEL COMPANY.

Mr. HALL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the St. Clair Tunnel Company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend proposes to add a clause of some considerable importance, which we have not had an opportunity of considering. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow the Bill to stand until we have an opportunity of considering this clause, as I think it will be more convenient to take it up before the Bill goes into Committee.

Bill allowed to stand.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the time and passed:—

Bill (No. 40) to amend the Act incorporating the Ottawa, Waddington and New York Railway and Bridge Company.—(Mr. Hickey.)

Bill (No. 67) further to amend the Act to incorporate the Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No. 53) to incorporate the Gananoque, Perth and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

DREDGES AND TUG FOR USE IN CANADIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) enquired, Has the Government during last year entered into a contract for the construction of one or two dredges and a tug for use in Canadian territory? If so, who is the contractor? Where does he live? What is the contract price? Who is superintending the construction? Where does such superintendent reside?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, contracts were entered into for two dredges and tugs. The cost of one dredge is $13,800, and of the other, $17,000. The cost of one of the tugs is $10,775, and of the other $12,000. The contractors are Morgan & Sutton, of Lockport, and the superintendent is Mr. J. R. Arnoldi, Mechanical Engineer of the Department of Public Works.

THE ELEVATOR AT HALIFAX.

Mr. KIRK enquired, When was the elevator at Halifax finished? When was the first cargo shipped through it, and how many cargoes have been shipped through it since?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The elevator was finished in the spring of 1883. The first cargo was shipped through it on the 17th of May, 1883, and three cargoes have been shipped through it since.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, What was the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway line: 1. From Winnipeg to a point 45 miles east of the Saskatchewan? 2. From that point to Calgary? 3. From Calgary to the summit of the Rocky Mountains? 4. From Callander to a point 40 miles west of Callander?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have received a communication from the Secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to the effect that it is not possible to give all the details asked for, but they will be ready by Friday.

LIFE-BOAT BUILDING AT WELLINGTON, ONT.

Mr. PLATT enquired, What was the total cost to the Government of the life-boat building at Wellington, Ont., and to whom was the amount paid? Was anything paid for the site of said building, or for the superintendence of the work of construction? If so, what amounts, and to whom paid?

Mr. McLELAN. When the hon. gentleman put the question the other day as to the tenders, I forgot to mention that four offers had been made for the construction of the house, varying from $1,000 to $550. Upon the advice of the engineer of the Department, all these were declined, and the work was done under the superintendence of Mr. Garnier at a cost of $451. An additional sum of above $350 was expended in providing means for launching the boats speedily into the water. Nothing was paid for the site. Mr. Garnier was paid $55 for superintending the work.

TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Mr. VAIL enquired, Does the Government intend this Session, to introduce a Bill to increase the travelling expenses of the County Court Judges of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who now have to travel over three or four counties to hold their County Courts; so as to approximate more nearly to the allowances of the County Court Judges of Ontario, for travelling to hold Division Courts over one county.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As the hon. gentleman knows, the latter part of the question is rather irregular, as it contains a statement of fact. I may say, however, that the whole question of Judges salaries and allowances is now under the consideration of the Government.

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. SKIFFINGTON.

Mr. BLONDEAU enquired, Whether Mr. Skiffington heretofore a detective of the city of Quebec, is employed on the Intercolonial Railway? If so, by whom was he recommended? What are his instructions and duties? How long has he been employed? What is his salary?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Skiffington is employed on the Intercolonial Railway. He was recommended by the superintendent of the railway; his duties are police duties in connection with that road; he has been employed since January, 1880, and his salary is $70 per month.

BOUNTY TO FISHERMEN.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Why the mackerel fishermen engaged in trap-fishing on the coast of Nova Scotia are not paid the bounty allotted to other fishermen, and whether it is the intention of the Department during this year to make any change in existing regulations, so as to enable this class of fishermen to draw their proportion of the bounty.

Mr. McLELAN. As the hon. gentleman knows the bounty was paid to fishermen who were affected by the terms of the Washington Treaty, and we considered that we should not interfere with that arrangement. I may say, however, that we may find it necessary to make some change in the regulation of the Department in that respect, but I am not prepared to say what changes should be made.

AUTOMATIC BUOY IN LOCKPORT HARBOUR, NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Is it the intention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries to place an automatic buoy, during the coming season, at the entrance of Lockport Harbour, Nova Scotia.

Mr. McLELAN. This is a matter at present under consideration. These buoys are found to be very expensive, and lately we have lost a number of them. It is to be considered if some other means of giving warning might be used, which would be certain, more permanent, and less expensive.

THE GOODWIN CLAIM.

Mr. FLEMING enquired, Has any claim been preferred against the Government, for extra work, upon the wall or fence separating Wellington and Bank Streets from the Parliamentary grounds, by James Goodwin, George Goodwin, or the estate of James Goodwin, since 1879? If so, what were the nature and amount of such claim, and has it been paid?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was a claim preferred against the Government for extra work upon the wall separating Wellington and Bank streets from the Parliamentary grounds, by Jas. Goodwin, Geo. Goodwin, or the estate of Jas. Goodwin. That claim was made on the 21st June, 1879, and the details were sent by Mr. Goodwin to the Department on the 26th of June, 1881. It was for extra excavation in earth and rock and masonry. The claim was carefully considered by the late chief architect, Mr. Scott, and the present chief architect, who both considered that the sum of $5,374.46 was due to Mr. Goodwin. This amount Mr. Goodwin accepted, and it having been placed in the Supplementary Estimates of 1882-83, it was paid when it became available. No further claim has been made.

CLAIM OF H. J. BEEMER.

Mr. FISHER enquired, Has any award been made to H. J. Beemer on account of his claim for extra work in connection with his contract, or contracts, for work on the gates and fortifications of the city of Quebec? If so, what amount has been awarded and how much paid on account thereof?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Beemer made a claim of $16,230.94 for extra work and losses sustained through delays, &c. The chief architect, having reported that Mr. Beemer was entitled to $5,000, that sum was offered to him and accepted by him as payment in full of all claims, provided Council consented to it. The matter is now being considered in Council. It will not be paid without the sanction of Parliament.

CLAIM FOR GAS LEAKAGE IN OTTAWA GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Has the Ottawa Gas Company presented any claim to the Public Works Department for gas leakage in connection with supplying of gas to Ottawa Dominion Government Buildings? If so, what is the amount of such claim?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Ottawa Gas Company has not presented any claim for gas leakage.

APPOINTMENT TO MILITARY COLLEGE STAFF.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex) enquired, Whether any appointment has recently been made to the staff of the Military Colleges? If so, whether the party appointed was a graduate of the Royal Military College? If not, why?

Mr. CARON. I am not in a position to answer the question of the hon. member. I do not know exactly what information he desires to get. Appointments are being continually made to the staff of the Royal Military College. If the hon. gentleman will specify what appointment he refers to, or the date of it, I will give him the information he requires.

Mr. ROBERTSON.

THE GRAVENHURST-CALLANDER RAILWAY.

Mr. O'BRIEN enquired, Is it the intention of the Government, in view of the proposed completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the end of the year 1885, to take such measures for the immediate construction of the line from Gravenhurst to Callander as to insure its being ready for traffic by the 1st day of May, 1886?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say that it is the intention of the Government to take proper measures to secure the construction of the line from Gravenhurst to Callander.

CHARGES AGAINST THE POSTMASTER AT WHEATLEY.

Mr. LISTER moved for a copy of the report of the Post Office Inspector in London to the Postmaster General, made during the year 1883, on charges made against a Mr. Cox, the Postmaster at Wheatley, in the County of Essex, and investigated by the said inspector or his deputy, together with all letters and other papers to the Department relating to the same. He said: I desire to say, without wishing at all to prejudice the case of the gentleman who occupies the position of postmaster at Wheatley, that it has been represented to me that this postmaster during the year 1883, in the course of his duty, received a letter containing $500; that that letter was proved to have come into his possession; and that no trace of it was ever found afterwards. It has also been represented that in the sale of stamps there was also a deficiency in his account. I understand that these charges have been investigated by the Post Office Inspector at London, and that the postmaster has refunded the $500. Be that as it may, if these statements are true, and this man was a defaulter, he should have been dismissed. I am told that he was an active politician. I hope it is not the case that his political services have saved him from this crime, if he has been really guilty of it; because, if people throughout the country are given to understand that their offences will be overlooked on account of their political support, I can only say that it will demoralize the whole public service. I trust that the hon. Postmaster General will be able to deny these representations. If they are true, the man ought undoubtedly to have been dismissed. I shall refrain from saying anything further until the papers are brought down.

Mr. CARLING. The postmaster's name is not Cox, but Fox, and the amount of money that was said to be in the money letter was not $500, but less than $100. The only document I have on the subject is a confidential report made by the Inspector to the Department, that this money letter was missing, and that it having been proved that the letter had been posted at the Wheatley post office, the postmaster made good the amount of money. There is no correspondence, and there are no reports but the confidential report to which I have referred.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has said nothing about the stamps.

Mr. CARLING. There is nothing in the motion in regard to stamps, and I have made no enquiry in regard to them. I understand that the postmaster was in good standing at the time, and the only charge against him was with regard to that money letter.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman refuse the report?

Mr. CARLING. I certainly refuse to give the House the confidential report from the inspector. I think all confidential reports by inspectors to the head of the Department are for the Department and not to be made public.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose there will be some reference to stamps in the report, confidential though it be.

Mr. CARLING. I think not.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand the postmaster has placed himself in this position, that a money letter was lost, either through his fault or under such circumstances that it has been found necessary to propose to him that he should refund the money. In such a case the circumstances should be made public. If they were such as not to inflict any stigma on the postmaster, it is better they should be made known; if, on the other hand, they were such that the postmaster ought not to be retained, the public has an interest in knowing that fact. If such circumstances have existed, as the Postmaster General says have existed in this case, Parliament ought not to be deprived of an opportunity of judging the action of the Government in retaining the postmaster in the public service.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is absolutely necessary for the efficient performance of the service of inspectors who feel themselves called on to report rumours, impressions and everything that will inform the head of the Department as to any particular enquiry or enquiries, that these reports should be confidential and not made public. That rule is I think invariable. A motion can be easily formed so as to warrant the Postmaster General in stating the full facts why he came to the conclusion that this postmaster should not be removed, but it is absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the service that confidential reports should be treated as confidential.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Postmaster General has already stated, that in consequence of the report of the inspector, this officer was called on to refund the money. If that is the case we are entitled to see the report.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Postmaster General can bring down a full statement of the facts, either of his own motion, or take an opportunity to-morrow before the Orders of the Day are called, to explain why this officer is now postmaster.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) misunderstood me. I do not think I said the postmaster was called on, in consequence of the report, to refund the money, but the attention of the Department was called to the fact that a money letter had been mislaid or stolen. The inspector enquired into it, and found it was not for $50, but for less than that, and the postmaster said that if he had evidence that the money letter had been posted and that the amount in it was that represented, he would make it good, on the parties giving their affidavit to that effect.

Motion withdrawn.

SWAN CREEK SURVEYS.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury), in moving for copies of all reports of surveys made with a view of improving the navigation of Swan Creek and Swan Creek Lake, Sunbury County, N.B., by dredging or otherwise, and all correspondence referring thereto, said: I have made this motion for the purpose of ascertaining what the report is. I am aware surveys have been made at this point by the engineers of the Department and I am anxious to get the report.

Motion agreed to.

MAIL SERVICE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for copies of petitions and correspondence between the Dominion Government and any person or persons upon the subject of a daily mail service between Port Townsend, in Washington Territory, and Victoria, in the Province of British Columbia, being substituted for the semi-weekly service at present existing, said:

I am perfectly aware that when British Columbia came into the Union, we only applied for a fortnightly mail between Victoria and San Francisco, 750 miles, and for a semi-weekly service between Victoria and Port Townsend, 38 or 40 miles; but it must be apparent from the returns that have come in every year since Confederation to the hon. members of the Ministry that the importance of British Columbia is vastly increasing. The export of gold, lumber and coal cannot be over-estimated, and I think that in view of this increasing commerce, more frequent mail communication should be given us, so that we may be placed in precisely the same position as any other Province in this respect. I am not aware that any other Province in the Dominion—with the exception of Prince Edward Island for a brief period last winter, when there was a temporary cessation in the mail service owing to the ice—that has not daily mail communication and frequently several mails a day. All that British Columbia asks is, that as now we are labouring under a great number of disadvantages from our connection with the confederacy without deriving any of the corresponding benefits which accrue to the eastern Provinces, we should have the same facilities as those which the other Provinces enjoy. I dare say it is in the memory of the Administration that three years back, a petition was sent in to the Privy Council in these words:

"That it is highly important to the commercial and general interests of the Province that more frequent and regular mail communication should be maintained with the United States, in order that Canadian and foreign correspondence may be facilitated to the utmost: and whereas daily communication has for some time past been in operation to Port Townsend, on Puget Sound, distant some thirty-five miles from Victoria, where mails destined for British Columbia, remain on storage from two to three days each week, until a steamer crosses the Straits twice a week, to convey them to this Province; whereas, your petitioners are informed, and believe that for a slight addition to the subsidy at present paid to the carrier of the mails on Puget Sound, daily mail communication with British Columbia can be established. Your petitioners therefore humbly ask, the attention of Your Excellency's Government to this matter, in the hope and belief that the disabilities under which the mail service now labours, will be speedily remedied."

This petition was signed by a very large number of the influential people in Victoria City, Victoria District, New Westminster, Esquimalt, Yale, Salt Spring Island, Quesnelle, Saaniche, Clinton, Stanley, Barkerville, Soda Creek, Kamloops, Spence's Bridge, and Cache Creek, and, if it were not a matter of saving time, it would have been signed in many other places. I mention this to show that it is not essentially a Victoria matter that I am advocating, but a matter which is necessary in the interests of the whole of the Province of British Columbia, that we should have more frequent communication, and that daily mail which I now advocate. I cannot too strongly impress upon the Government the advisability of giving this their very earliest attention, so that what I now advocate may be established at a very early day.

Motion agreed to.

CITY POSTMASTER FOR VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and any person or persons upon the subject of appointing a city postmaster in Victoria, B.C., separate and distinct from the office of Post Office Inspector; as also of all matters in connection with improvements to said post office and increased efficiency of that department, said: I regret, Mr. Speaker, that all my motions come together, as it looks as if I desired to occupy unnecessarily the attention of the House, but that is not my intention. I desire this information particularly, for I am led to believe that other influences have been brought to bear to capsize, so to speak, representations made by my colleague and myself. We advocate that, inasmuch as the city of Victoria has now attained to such proportions as to entitle it to a city postmaster, distinct from the Post Office Inspector, it would be to the interest of the Department to have those two offices separate and distinct, so that the duties of the Inspector might be satisfactorily performed, which could not be done if he were stationed at the city of Victoria. We advocated, as the hon. the Postmaster General will bear me out, that the office of inspector should remain, and that we should have a city postmaster appointed. Provision was made, in a certain way, in the Estimates, for this change then advocated by my colleague and myself, and we went away feeling confident that this change would take place. I have reason to believe that there has been some other influence brought to bear, that there has been some other representation made to the Department at variance with the representations which we made. We are here to represent the people, and to state to the various Departments what we consider necessary, not only to the different constituencies we represent, but to the Province of which we form a part of the representation. Therefore, I am particularly anxious to find out from whom the recommendation came to make the change which has been made; and, when the papers come down, I hope to have the information I desire.

Motion agreed to.

MASTERS AND MATES CERTIFICATES.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), in moving for a return showing the names, rank, present positions occupied, length of service at sea, of each individual who has received a certificate of either competency or service, under the Act passed last Session making provision for the examination of masters and mates of coasters and inland waters, from the passage of said Act to the nearest possible date, for each and every Province of the Dominion; as also a statement giving dates, and names of applicants who have been refused certificates of service, and whose certificates have been, for some reason, withheld, and the reason for such refusals or retentions, said: I would only say in this connection that, being a nautical man, I take a great interest in everything that pertains to navigation and the examination of masters and mates. I have, therefore, a desire to see what effect the Act of last Session has had, not only in my own Province, but also in the whole Dominion, and I also desire to find out who the people are who have applied for certificates of competency and service under the Act passed last Session.

Mr. McLELAN. There is no objection to give the hon. gentleman all the information connected with the return except the great amount of work it will impose upon the Department. A very large number of certificates have been issued, and from thirty-five to fifty are being issued every day, and the whole staff of that branch of the Department are occupied in the preparation of those certificates. It is therefore a very unfortunate period to impose upon that staff the duty of preparing all these returns. I think it would be better for the hon. gentleman to delay his motion for some time, until we get through with the work of issuing the certificates, and, in the meantime, any information the hon. gentleman may require from the Department, he can have by calling. We would be most happy to furnish him with any information as to the workings of it, and the results of it; but, if he wishes a full return, it would be better for him to delay his motion for a period until we are in a better position to comply with it.

Mr. BAKER. I shall be very glad indeed to comply with the request of the hon. gentleman. My only object is to obtain the information, and the particular time is not of so great consequence. What I should like, at an early date, is, the small return which I ask for in connection with my own particular Province. That would not take much time. I think it will only take about half an hour.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, that can be granted. The motion may pass with the understanding that some delay may be necessary in complying with it.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION OF VESSELS ON LAKES SUPERIOR AND HURON.

Mr. DAWSON, in moving for a return showing what vessels navigating the waters of Lake Superior and Huron were inspected during the past season of navigation, under the authority of the Government, with the names of the inspectors; also, a statement of vessels lost or stranded on those lakes, within Canadian waters, showing the localities where disasters occurred, and the number of lives lost in each case, during the season of 1883, said: I would amend this motion by adding the words "during the season of 1883," so as to give the Department as little trouble as possible in making out the return. In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I drew attention last year to the losses on the Great Lakes, and I am sorry to say that that record has to be supplemented with another list of losses during the past summer. Last year I drew attention to no less than twelve steamers that had been lost during the three years previous, involving a loss of life of nearly 300 persons, chiefly my constituents, who were drowned in the waters of the Georgian Bay, or lost their lives in burning steamers. I considered it my duty to draw the attention of the Government to these circumstances in order that some remedy might be applied. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries last year promised to bring down a Bill which would, as far as possible, provide against the occurrence of such losses and the burning of steamers, by a better mode of inspection and by preventing vessels from going out when they were overloaded or unseaworthy. I hope the hon. Minister has not given up the idea of legislation in this respect, and that the Bill will yet be brought down. The following vessels were lost within the past three years: The Wabano, lost on the Georgian Bay; the Simcoe, foundered in Lake Huron; the Jane Miller, foundered in Georgian Bay; the Northern Queen, wrecked; the Winnipeg, burnt; the Columbia, foundered; the Manitoulin, burnt; the Asia, foundered; the Josephine Kidd, burnt in sight of Wiarton; the Vanderbilt, burnt in the north channel of Lake Huron. The reason why I make this motion is to draw attention to the further losses which have occurred during the past year, and which ought not to have occurred. In the beginning of December last, there was a steamer going down from Port Arthur along the coast, and she took in tow an old schooner, the Jane Hurlbert, loaded with supplies, and having a large crowd of men on board. Everybody knew that schooner to be unseaworthy. She had been thirty years on Lake Superior, and was only used during fine weather, in moving from one point to another. Well, that heavily-laden schooner was put in tow of a small steam tug to go down the coast about 150 miles, with these men and supplies on board. All went well with them until after passing Silver Islet, some distance. They kept too far out, and a squall arising the steam tug captain, getting alarmed, cut loose from the schooner. The schooner got into the trough of the sea, and she had neither sail nor a man on board who knew how to manage her. There was simply a crowd of men who were trusting entirely to the steamer to tow them safely to their destination; and in the storm the whole number, some twenty or twenty-five, at least—and some say a good many more—went down with the schooner and were lost. Now, surely this is a thing that ought not to have occurred. Surely there ought to be some authority at the harbour or port that would say, after an inspection of a vessel of that kind: "You shall not go out with such a vessel in weather like this; you shall not risk the lives of these men and take them out where the chances are about equal whether they will get ashore or perish in the waves." But that is not the only case. Another vessel called the Enterprise, through mismanagement, went down with seven souls on board at the Straits of Missisnagna and all perished. There have also been other disasters and losses which I need not particularize; but I will say it is necessary that some measures should be adopted to prevent unseaworthy and overloaded vessels from going out. The fact is that old hulks that have been in use in other waters are sent up to Lakes Superior and Huron, and they come to grief in stormy weather. There is another point to which I would refer. Very good vessels have been lost through the cargos of wheat they carry, shifting its position. Now, ocean-going vessels are obliged to have shifting boards, or to put the wheat in sacks, which cannot shift, but on these lake vessels there is no regulation whatever. They load the wheat in bulk, and when the vessel gets into a heavy sea and rolls from side to side, the wheat shifts and down the vessel goes. That was the case with the Simcoe on Lake Huron, when she went down with twelve people on board. A very good law was passed last year providing for the examination of masters and mates of vessels, which, I have no doubt, will do a great deal of good. But some means ought to be taken to see that vessels are properly constructed. Some vessels have such heavy works on deck as to render them top heavy, and in a gale of wind they are turned over and go down. In all cases I think it would be necessary, as in ocean vessels, to have a summer line and a fall line, so that the vessels should not be loaded beyond a given depth; and then there should be inspection at the ports to prevent them from carrying a load on deck in stormy weather. Captains sometimes put the load on deck in order that they may throw it off more easily when they come to a port, and this exposes the boat to great danger in case of a heavy sea. I think the Customs officers should attend to such cases, or that the harbour masters should exercise some oversight in reference to them. A departmental return was brought down last year in reference to these losses. It contained a great deal of information, but the Department was not in possession of the details of all the disasters that had occurred. Here is a letter with that return from a Mr. Mackenzie, of the Port of Prequ'Isle, near Owen Sound, and he says, in regard to these losses:

"With regard to my views and opinion of the loss of the Jane Miller: I am fully convinced she was lost by being in a damaged condition previous to loading and then over-loading in that state. She had run on Olub Island the previous trip and had to be scuttled to keep her from going to pieces, and after having been raised was leaking badly and loaded in that state without any repairs. I place the following as my opinion in the matter.

1. The Jane Miller was in a damaged state before loading from being on the rocks at Olub Island, and was leaking.
2. Overloading without repairs; in fact she was loaded too much for any condition and weather.
3. Incapacity of her captain.
4. Recklessness of her captain in not paying attention to the weather. He would pay no attention to storm warnings, when it was well known all the best captains had the fullest confidence in the correctness of the storm warnings this season."

That is Mr. Mackenzie's view. Here is the view of Inspector Risley of Toronto, in regard to the Asia. He says:

"It is evident from their number, there is something wrong somewhere, either in the build of the vessels, their loading or their management, perhaps all three contribute. The startling feature of them, the total loss and great loss of life also points in the same direction, that there is some radical defect that should be removed. I would therefore recommend that the Minister appoint two persons to assist me in the investigation into the loss of the Asia."

It is Mr. Risley's view that there is some radical defect; and certainly, in my opinion, the Department of Marine and Fisheries should take measures as soon as possible to have some system established by which there will be some regulation so that vessels cannot go out over loaded in the fall of the year. It is chiefly from over-loading that these losses occur. I may be excused from calling attention to this matter, as it is within the waters of the constituency I represent that these disasters have occurred. Within the last few years no less than three hundred of the people of Algoma or more have been carried to the bottom of the Lake or been burnt on burning steamers. Moreover, these people were not of the class known as navvies going up the lakes, but were men settled in the country, traders and capitalists who are the most active in building up a new country. We lost the two leading men on Manitoulin Island—Mr. Tinkis of Manitowaning, and Mr. Robert Henry, of Mudge Bay, one residing in the middle and the other at the end of the Island. These two men had built up large villages which are growing into towns, and the loss of such people is no ordinary loss to a new country. Under these circumstances, my constituents have urged me to press strongly on the Government the necessity of some inspection being enforced in order to prevent such disasters from taking place; in my remarks I have enumerated fourteen vessels lost with a terrible sacrifice of life.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I think the importance of the motion which has been made by the hon. member and of the subject he has brought before the House can scarcely be exaggerated. I, like the hon. member for Algoma, represent a constituency which adjoins the waters of Lake Huron, and I am besides specially interested in the matter to which he has referred, because he has adverted to a report which was made with reference to an unfortunate man who is now no longer alive to defend himself. I refer to the late captain of the Jane Miller, a vessel which was lost within sight of the windows of my own house. The captain of that vessel, so far from being an incapable man, as is represented in the report alluded to, was a man of notorious capacity, of the very greatest energy, possessing the fullest knowledge of his profession and at the same time almost infinite resource. In fact if there be one reason more than another which probably brought about the loss of the Jane Miller on the night referred to, it was because the captain was so specially capable and trusted too much to his resources. It is notorious in that neighbourhood that he was an exceedingly skilful man. The Jane Miller, according to the opinion of all those in that neighbourhood, was lost from this cause: From over-loading and improper loading, and from the peculiar form of the vessel, and those are matters which have been brought before the notice of the House by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson). I think it is impossible to press too strongly on the consideration of the Government the importance of having some definite step taken in order to overcome the danger arising from those sources. So far as over-loading is concerned, I think if something of the nature of the Plimsoll mark were adopted, and a circle placed on the broadside of each vessel, it would have a very beneficial effect in saving life on the lakes. In England every vessel going to sea bears on her broadside a circle, and through the middle of it there is drawn a horizontal line, so that everyone can see if the vessel is loaded below the line or not, and in that way notice is given to the public by the officer sailing the vessel whether or not he is infringing the law. It is a simple provision, and one which has been found to work very well in England, and I do not see why it might not be adopted here. Then again, as the hon. member for Algoma has pointed out, it is very necessary that there should be some definite measures adopted to prevent improper loading, which is a different thing from overloading. In many cases vessels are lost by reason of their carrying too much deck cargo, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, and I believe in the particular instance referred to, that of the Jane Miller, this was one of the reasons why she was lost. Cargo was piled high up on the deck, and when she was turned in towards the land to get some firewood, the supply having been all burnt up, she listed and the centre of gravity being too high she turned right over. It is quite clear that the accident occurred very suddenly, for she was lost within a few yards of the shore and no one got to land. It was a severe night, there was a snow storm, but the water was perfectly smooth, and as the accident occurred so suddenly there was not time for those on board, who were no doubt all under cover, to get clear and get to shore. At all events every soul on board was lost within two or three hundred yards of the shore. If the vessel had been built decently, not like a two-story house placed on a saucer, she would not in all probability have been lost; but the vessels now navigating our waters and carrying passengers are built on that principle. They draw scarcely any depth of water, they carry high superstructures, built on a shallow base, and so soon as they get into the trough of the sea they become perfectly unmanageable. This great superstructure acts as an unmanageable and untrimmable sail, and when it begins to blow, and when she is paying off the wind a little too much or carrying too much weather helm, there is no possibility of doing anything to save the vessel, and she is entirely at the mercy of the elements. Until we have stringent regulations in operation disasters will occur on the lakes; and I hope the Government will address itself to this serious question, because it is in point of fact to those traversing our lakes a matter of life or death.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad the hon. member for Algoma placed this notice of motion on the paper because it gives hon. members another opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister of Marine and of the Government to the very large number of lives and the large amount of property lost annually on the inland waters of Canada. For several years there has scarcely been a season without some record of loss either of life or property on Georgian Bay, Lake Huron or Lake Superior. As the navigation of our inland waters increases, the subject grows in importance. A few years ago the small number of vessels to be found on our lakes made it possible that only a small loss could be sustained, compared with what occurs to-day. But as year after year the trade on those lakes increases, as well as the number of people who travel by water, the larger these losses seem to become, and the greater the amount of property that is destroyed and the number of lives lost. Last year in one port on the Georgian Bay we find that no less than 767 vessels entered and departed, and that was the only port out of a large number on Lake Huron and Georgian Bay into which boats of these various lines entered. We find also that at that one port the tonnage of these vessels amounted to no less than 320,755 tons, so that from these facts we can estimate the importance of the subject before the House. It is true that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has been making amendments to those Acts within the past few years, and he has thereby done much to mitigate the dangers to the travelling public, as well as the liability to loss of property. I think those late amendments are in the right direction, and the only objection that can be taken to them is that they do not go far enough, and that there are other amendments which I think, it would be desirable in the interests of life and property, should be made. The first amendment which he made provided for the inspection of boilers, and it has done a great deal of good.

Mr. McNEILL.

It has removed from use a large number of boilers which might be expected at any time to explode or to lead otherwise to the destruction of life and property. The next amendment provided for the inspection of hulls, and when we learn that the hull of one of the vessels which went down near Parry Sound was said to be so rotten that the wood could be pulled in pieces, I think that is sufficient to show the importance of that amendment. Then we have a Bill for the examination of Masters and Mates, and one whose importance, I think, cannot be overestimated, because it is essential that none but competent men should be put in charge of those vessels. But, as I said before, I think we might go further. Last year when this question was under discussion in the House I suggested if possible an amendment should be made which would compel the inspection of cargoes, not only as to their quantity, but as to the manner in which they are distributed on the boats. I still think that such a provision is necessary. I think we should have some competent officer appointed to see that vessels leaving their ports are not improperly loaded. I understand that there is a law which would prevent vessels from leaving port overloaded, but the difficulty, as I am informed, is that no person seems to have power to stop these vessels when they are overloaded. I think it would be a decided improvement if some competent person was assigned the duty of looking after these vessels, with imperative instructions that no vessel should leave port when it was overloaded, or the cargo distributed in such a way as to endanger life or property. Again, I think that inspections should be made more than once a year. One of the vessels, as mentioned by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), was considered seaworthy in the early part of the season, but after undergoing the dangers of the season she was not inspected again, and the result was that she made another trip, in which she lost her cargo and her crew. Then again, I think before vessels go out an inspection should be made as to whether they carry all the life-saving apparatus that is necessary. A boat may be laden lightly at one time and not require so many of these appliances as when she is heavily laden, or when a larger number of passengers are carried. I think, therefore, it should be the duty of the inspectors to see that the number of these appliances should bear some proportion to the number of passengers who may be upon her on a particular trip. I think that in view of the increasing trade on the upper lakes, in view of the large number of vessels that have been lost, and the large number of lives that have been sacrificed, the Minister of Marine and the Government should not consider it out of place to make more stringent laws in reference to these matters, and by so doing they will earn the respect of the people of the country, and do a great deal in preventing the loss of life and property which now take place.

Mr. O'BRIEN. This is a matter in which my constituents are largely interested, as many of them have to do most of their travelling by means of such vessels as have been described by the hon. gentlemen. Some of these vessels belong to a class of old hulks which, though they may be fit enough to navigate the Welland Canal, are totally unfit for sailing in the more dangerous waters of Georgian Bay and the Upper Lakes. Their square shape and their high sides, standing high out of the water, render them perfectly unsafe when storms arise on these waters, and especially along the rocky shores of the Georgian Bay. I suppose it is not thought of much consequence whether these vessels are suitable for such a service or not, considering that so few wealthy people, members of Parliament, and people of distinction, travel by them, and that because only settlers and fishermen and that class of people are lost, these calamities do not amount to much. I think if members of Parliament, or a Minister or two, had to travel on them, we would soon find the law amended. As to the cargoes they carry, the difficulty is not, perhaps, so much about the weight of the cargo as the manner in which it is loaded, as it is considered convenient, in going from one port to another, to put the greater part of a cargo on the upper decks. The build of these vessels is exactly as described by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and it is such as to make it utterly impossible for them to resist a storm of any severity, especially when the wind is aft. They are built altogether too high, and the upper works are too light in proportion to the lower works, so that they are liable to every sort of accident. I hope that either by some law or some system of inspection, measures will be taken, before another season, to prevent a recurrence of such accidents. If something is not done, I think a very heavy responsibility will rest upon those who are in charge of this matter. I speak strongly on this subject, because during the last two or three years many families in the constituency which I represent have not only lost their property but their lives, or their relatives have been sacrificed by these accidents. The danger is not so great on the class of vessels which ply from Sarnia and other ports, to Duluth, because the owners of these lines are interested in building them and fitting them in such a way as to render them suitable for the service; but it is on the smaller routes, such as those from Midland and Penetanguishene, that we find the worst class of vessels. It is true they are chiefly employed in navigating among the Islands where there is no great risk, but at the same time, they have frequently to navigate the open waters, in which they are exposed to great danger. I hope the Minister will take the matter into consideration, and that he will regard himself as being under a heavy responsibility in the matter, for the country will look to him to provide some remedy for the evils which have been indicated.

Mr. ALLEN. The experience of those who have had anything to do with the vessels which are navigating Georgian Bay has been really disheartening. I can endorse every word that has been said by the hon. member from North Bruce, especially with regard to the vessel called the Jane Miller. I had the honour of being a partner in another business with the captain of that vessel, and a more honourable man, or a better seaman could not be found. He is a man thoroughly acquainted with every corner and every bay on the lake. There is not the least doubt that that vessel was lost through overloading, and I hope the Government will make arrangements for preventing vessel owners and captains and mates from overloading their vessels, especially in the fall of the year. It is a melancholy fact that a great many of the vessels now lost on Georgian Bay and Lake Huron have been lost from this cause. I hope the Government will adopt such measures as will not only necessitate the proper inspection of vessels, to see that they are seaworthy, but as will also prevent overloading.

Mr. LISTER. I wish to say just a few words on this motion. Living on a lake port, and being somewhat familiar with shipping on the inland waters of this country, I agree with all that has been said by the gentlemen who have preceded me. There is no doubt whatever that some legislation is necessary at this time. We must bear in mind that within the last two years the inland shipping of the Dominion has grown to enormous proportions. We also know that many of the ship-owners of the Province of Ontario have done everything which they possibly could do to protect the lives of the sailors who may be in their care for the time being; but we were also aware that many vessel owners have not taken that care which was incumbent upon them. On the Upper Lakes—Lake Huron and Lake Superior—it is notorious that vessels are sent out loaded, which are entirely unfit for the voyages for which they are intended, as well as improperly loaded; and the result is, that within the last two or three years, there has been an appalling loss of life. It is time the Government should take this matter into their own hands and introduce such legislation as will protect life on the great inland waters of this country. I hope, now that the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine has been called to this important matter, he will not fail to take some active steps in the interest of that neglected class, the sailors of this country. It is true they have no representative here to speak for them, but they are under the care of this Government as much as any other class in the country. I hope that the present unsatisfactory state of affairs will soon cease, and that the Government will take care to protect the lives of sailors by seeing that unseaworthy vessels are not permitted to go out, and that all vessels are properly loaded.

After Recess.

Mr. McCALLUM. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject have pointed out the importance of caring for the great interest of the marine of this country. Well, Sir, the present Government, I consider, has dealt justly with that interest. A very large amount of money has been spent to build harbours to provide for the safety of life and property, as well as to erect lighthouses, in order to guide vessels at night and keep them out of danger; we have also a life-boat service in the interest of the sailors. I believe the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) said that the sailors had no friends in this House. I say that all Governments in this country have looked after the interests of the sailors. We have an inspection of steamboats. Formerly the inspection of vessels was done by the underwriters: but it was only last year, I believe, that we provided for the inspection of hulls. I know that the class of vessels formerly built in this country were not the best class for heavy weather; they were too light. Some hon. gentlemen have spoken of the danger of overloading; but the principal trouble with a vessel is when she is light. Many of our vessels have been built to carry a large cargo on a small draught of water, owing to our shallow harbours and canals; but there will not, of course, be any more of that class built, as our harbours and canals have been deepened and enlarged. With regard to the loss of life on our inland waters, hon. gentlemen must not forget that so long as we have men employed in the carrying trade of this country, there will be more or less loss of life. So far as inspection is concerned, I consider that we have a good class of inspectors; but the trouble is that, with most of our vessels, there is more danger when they are light than when they are loaded. There is no man who has more interest in having a vessel properly loaded, than the man who sails her and risks his life upon her, and he is the man who should see to the loading of that vessel; and scattered as we are on these inland coasts, it would cost a large amount of money to maintain a sufficient number of inspectors to look after the loading of vessels. Therefore, hon. gentlemen have not given due consideration to this matter when they say that we should have vessels loaded under Government inspection.

Mr. STAIRS. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say one or two words to the House on this matter, though somewhat against the argument adduced by the hon. gentleman who has preceded me. I wish to caution the Government to be very careful in anything they do to provide for the inspection of vessels in the Lower Provinces. I agree with all that has been said before as regards the importance of the Government doing everything that can be done towards the preservation of life and property on the lakes and also on the sea-coast of this Dominion, but I think the experience of the Maritime Provinces does not tend to show that, with respect to the coasting, any great risk is run. An inspection would only show that, on the whole, our sailing vessels in the Maritime Provinces are well and thoroughly built and are manned by men who perfectly understand how to sail them, most of these having navigated such small vessels around the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick from the days of their boyhood. They are practical seamen, who have grown up in the service and thoroughly understand all the ins and outs and all the intricacies of coast navigation. Taking the average of a large number of years it has been found that very little loss of life has occurred on or along the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick through these coasting vessels, nor as to the question of overloading, have there been many accidents from this cause; very few accidents have occurred in the case of vessels engaged in the coal trade in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick through overloading. The Government should be very careful in this matter and should not apply the inspection on any very strict laws to these vessels, unless it be found absolutely needed, and experience has shown that such an inspection is not needed. I will say, however, that should, after enquiry and examination, the Government find a strict inspection necessary, I would, in the interest of life and property, be very willing to see a careful inspection carried out.

Mr. GUILLET. This is a very difficult matter to proceed with, one involving very important interests, and the Government in this matter should move very carefully and slowly. We have nothing before us to show that there is not already sufficient protection to life and property, as regards vessels navigating our sea-coasts and inland waters; we have no petitions from the Sailors Unions or from the sailors themselves or the people themselves. The sailors have had their interests looked that after by this Government, which was careful to see the wages of the crew were made a first lien on the vessel, and that payment of wages could be enforced by the sailors on their going before two magistrates in any port. As regards overloading, it will be very difficult to fix a loading line. The most scientific ship builders have had difficulty in this, especially with vessels built entirely of wood, the conditions of which are constantly changing. This suggested inspection would also involve the placing of an expert inspector in every little harbour, in many of which the fees would not, by any means, be sufficient to afford him an adequate salary. As to the carrying capacity of vessels, that varies with the different kind of cargoes carried. There are great differences in cargoes. A vessel can, with safety, carry a much larger tonnage of coal than of iron, at least 25 per cent. more. It will be seen, therefore, that it will be very difficult for the Government to apply a rule. Such a course would probably do more harm than good to the trade of the country. As regards mercantile vessels engaged exclusively in the carrying of merchandise, there is no necessity for an inspection; as regards vessels carrying passengers I will not undertake to say, but we have no complaint of any loss of life or unnecessary risk on that account. In the Upper Lakes the loss of life has been chiefly caused by ignorance of the character of those lakes, through shoals and sunken rocks not being marked on the charts, but the Government are now having surveys made, especially in Georgian Bay, in order to show more clearly the dangers of navigation. The Government deserve great credit for the protection they have given to navigation, by the erection of lighthouses and the building of harbours of refuge wherever they may be placed with advantage, particularly in inland waters.

Mr. PAINT. Reference has been made to the Plim-soll Act. It is not as applicable to this as to the old country, where a great many owners of ves-sels command and control their own property. In England the Plim-soll Act was intended to reach parties who loaded old vessels very deeply and sent them to sea with the intention of wrecking them. Many of these men were not able to insure such ships in England, but patronised the insurance companies on the con-tinent of Europe where they were not known. The great danger arises, even in our own Dominion, from overloading, at our coal ports, and where stone cargoes are carried; but this might be remedied to some extent by a careful Port Warden, who would dictate to what extent a ship would load, or if she were too deeply laden, would compel her to discharge a part of her cargo. Our ships in the Lower Provinces are built under inspection, but this has not been the custom, I understand, on the lakes heretofore. Our Lower Province ships have been more seaworthy, and have been classed under Lloyd's Survey, the French Bureau Veritas or the American Lloyd's. This inspection is applied to all vessels over 150 tons burden. Our small fishing vessels have not yet come under the inspection; but they are substantially built. It has been found, I must acknowledge, that at times even a high premium of insurance has not deterred owners and shipmasters from overloading their vessels. Although great vigilance is exercised by the underwriters in the different ports, owners of cargo and bottoms have not assisted them in this direction. Of course it will be a very proud thing if this Dominion should possess the best merchant shipping Act in the world, which might justly be expected of us, inas-much as we are acknowledged to be the fourth country as regards the owning of ships. We should aim at perfecting the building and controlling the sailing of our mer-chant marine to the utmost extent possible. I trust that if there is anything done in connection with this matter, the Act will be made to extend to British Columbia as well, as there they make large shipments of coal and lumber; unless the shipping trade should be relegated to the Chinese. In that case, of course, there would not be so much cause for anxiety.

Mr. STAIRS.

Mr. DAVIES. If I understood correctly the remarks of the hon. gentleman who moved this motion, he appealed to the Ministry to make the Inspection Act a little more stringent than it is at present, and I understood him to have spoken with reference to facts in the part of the Dominion from which he comes. There is no doubt a good deal to be said from his standpoint. However, there is such a thing as legislating in too great a hurry, and without proper regard to the interests of the large lumber of those who have their money invested in ships in this Dominion. The Inspection Act, which has been the subject of conversation for the last hour or two, is stringent enough, and too strin-gent in many respects. I had occasion, at an early part of the Session, to call the hon. gentleman's attention to its stringency, and its unfair stringency, in view of its vesting arbitrary power in the hands of an inspector who is practi-cally irresponsible, and I was in hopes, from what I then said, and from the facts which I knew to be in the hon. gentleman's knowledge, that he would have seen fit to con-sider the question of granting a Court of Appeal, to which an injured ship-owner could appeal in cases where the inspector used his powers in an unfair or arbitrary manner. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has made up his mind in that matter, but I do think there can be but one answer to the demand made on the part of ship-owners, that their property should not be subjected to an arbitrary inspection without their having the right to appeal. There are one or two respects in which I think the Act is defective. It does not apply to steamers which trade between the United States or any port in the United States and the Provinces. There are several of these lines and some of them are of a very excellent character. There is the line between St. John and Eastport, which has been running for many years, and I believe has never had an accident. Then, there is the line between Boston, Halifax, and Prince Edward Island, and other lines, and, while these steamboats are not subject to an inspection at all, our own are subject to inspection. I do not condemn the Inspection Act per se. I think that, if it is applied to our own boats, it should also be applied to these foreign boats, or boats running to a foreign port. I desire, however, to call attention to the controversy which has been going on in England for the last six months between the shipowners and the energetic president of the Board of Trade there, Mr. Chamberlain. Although the shipowners in England have a right of appeal, which they have exercised successfully in many instances, in the protection of their own interests, they are not satisfied, and insist on going further; and the claim they make has been put forward with such ability, and has been backed up by such an array of facts, that the Board of Trade, as I gather from the remarks of its president, is about to provide that the inspector shall not alone, of his own mere motion, be allowed to make an order, but shall be accompanied on his inspection, when he inspects a ship, by a representative of the shipowner. Now, with us, the inspector comes down alone, and goes when he likes—and I do not object to that, of course—on board of the steamer, unaccompanied by any one on the part of the shipowner; he makes his report, and from that report there is practically no appeal whatever. No matter what loss or inconvenience the shipowner is subjected to by it, he must abide by it. I think there is no other branch of our law, in which interests so tremendous are involved, that are left to the decision of a practically irresponsible judge. I would submit to the hon. Minister that, instead of proceeding in the direction of making the Act more stringent in the cases to which it now applies, he should proceed more in the lines in which the Government of England is proceeding, that is, that the shipowner shall have the privilege, when the inspector makes his inspection, of having a representative of the shipowner on the inspection, having an equal voice with the official inspector, and, if they do not agree, let the appeal go to the Minister. If it goes to the Minister now, as in form it is provided in the Act that it shall go, it goes on the report of the inspector himself, and the Minister can make but one ruling on the facts which are presented by the inspector, because no one supposes that the inspector will report facts which will justify a reversal of his decision—he will rather report facts which will justify its being confirmed. The Minister has no means of getting other facts. He is practically, as I said before, a mere puppet in the hands of his inspector. He must necessarily be so; he has not a personal knowledge of the vessel inspected; he cannot have that personal knowledge. He only obtains it through the mouth of his inspector, whose report he will be bound to support. The Minister seemed to think there would be a difficulty in constituting a Court of Appeal, owing to the necessary expense, but I do not think there need be much expense. The Court of Appeal might be a very simple one indeed. But I would read to the hon. gentleman the remarks made by Mr. Chamberlain, president of the Board of Trade, to the shipowners of Liverpool upon this very question, not limiting the rights the shipowners already had, but rather extending those rights and giving them the privilege of having a representative at the inspection itself, so that their rights might be properly guarded at the outset:

"I ask you to remember what happens now. The Board of Trade official is really witness and prosecutor, if you please, and judge in the case himself. He goes down to your ship, and thinks it is overloaded or that certain repairs or alterations should be made in it. He requires them to be made, and in the great majority of cases—for there really have been very few appeals indeed—you make them, not, perhaps, because you agree with him, but in order to save trouble and further expense; and you make them upon his sole authority. That is the position now. Now, what do I propose? I propose that my officer should no longer be able to stir a step in the first instance without he was accompanied by one of yourselves, and that he should have with him at every step a representative of the shipowners, with an equal vote. The result of that would be to give to the shipowners an absolute veto upon all the preliminary proceedings of the Board of Trade, unless we thought the matter of such serious importance that we carried it to the Court of Appeal. See how that would work. I presume you would elect as your representative an honest and honourable man. Our surveyor would think a ship was overladen. He would go to the shipowners' representative. The whole matter might be settled in half an hour. At any rate, there would be no delay. They would go down to the ship together. They would hear what the owner of the ship had to say to the matter. The Board of Trade surveyor would have an opportunity of knowing, which he has not now, whatever reasons the owner had to allege against the proceedings the surveyor was anxious to take. He would very likely be convinced, and if he was not, he could not proceed without the authority of the representative of the shipowners. The matter would then have to come to the Board of Trade. I believe it would come in very few cases. I believe there would be such an understanding that the interests were common interests between the representatives of the Board of Trade and the representatives of the shipowners, that in the majority of cases the matter would be settled on the spot."

Even in England, where a Court of Appeal exists, the President of the Board of Trade suggests that it would be more in the interests of shippers that the inspector should be accompanied by a representative of the shipowner at the inspection in the first instance, so that justice might be done from the start. Now the inspector is unaccompanied, and, unless he asks the shipowner's agent to accompany him, he goes alone and inspects the vessel, he makes what report he pleases, which is practically unappealable from, and I submit that this has worked, and is calculated to work, great and grave injustice. I believe that, if any change is made in the Act which now exists, and in respect of the property now subject to the Act, it should be made in the interests of the shipowners, to give them a right to be represented when the inspection is being made, and if that is not done, that they most assuredly should have, as every other subject has when his property and rights are invaded, the power to take an appeal to some independent tribunal.

Mr. McLELAN. I have to thank the hon. gentleman who introduced this subject, and who has been the means of eliciting the expressions of opinion which we have heard from various members of the House who feel a deep interest in this matter. This question has, to a large extent, engaged the attention of the Government, and, as head of the Department specially entrusted with the management of these affairs, I have taken a great deal of interest in it and given it very careful consideration. I have listened with attention to the observations that have been made by different speakers on this subject, in order to ascertain the opinions of those who represent those interests in various parts of the Dominion. It is quite true, as has been said by the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum), that all Governments have given consideration to this question, and all may be said to have been the friends of the sailors and to have done much for their benefit. As has been said by my hon. friend, our coasts have been lighted, and are now as well lighted, perhaps, as any marine coasts in the world; we have endeavoured to buoy all the shoals and dangerous approaches on our coasts; we have provided fog-signals at the principal points, in order that the sailors may know where danger exists; and we are now engaged in the survey of the Georgian Bay and Lake Huron, that have not been heretofore sufficiently surveyed. It has been brought to the attention of the Government that rocks and shoals exist in the lakes that were not laid down on the chart. When this matter came to my notice, I brought it to the consideration of my colleagues in the Council, and received authority and instructions to make arrangements for a survey of those lakes, in order that the dangers existing there might be more clearly defined and made known to the mariner. Parliament was good enough to authorize an expenditure for that purpose. I may say that we were not able to obtain from the Admiralty, at an early date, the appointment of a man to undertake this work until the season was considerably advanced; however, he had time to spend several months in the Georgian Bay and ascertain the exact bearing and locality of a number of shoals, and these have been laid down on the new charts which have been issued by the Admiralty this winter. That survey will be continued during the coming summer, and as the work progresses from year to year, the results will be laid down upon each new chart that may be issued by the Admiralty. I know there has been considerable loss of life upon these Upper Lakes; but I do not know that there has been more loss there than in the navigation of other waters. The trade is very large upon those lakes, and is increasing; still, I do not think the proportion of loss has been very much more than upon the ocean. It ought to be very much less. I admit that if proper care were taken in the construction of ships and in the management of vessels, the loss of life would be much less. About the time I came to the Department, there had been two or three very serious disasters upon the lakes, that turned my attention specially to that subject. I had reason to believe that the cause lay, to a considerable extent, in the construction or form of the vessels. I obtained the services of a practical man and sent him to examine quietly the construction of the vessels that were employed upon the lakes, and to give me privately the result of that investigation. He found in that investigation that many vessels were engaged in carrying passengers, which were properly described by some hon. gentleman here as mere saucers, with a large superstructure, that perhaps four-fifths of the tonnage of the vessel consisted in the houses on the deck and the superstructure which rendered them top-heavy; in other words, they were like so many sails that could at no time be furled, and the force of the winds took entire possession of the ship and they became unmanageable. These vessels were mainly engaged in carrying passengers. I then felt that it was necessary that something should be done in order, if possible, to control the use of such vessels through which, I have had no doubt, considerable loss of life was occurring. For this purpose a Bill was introduced and passed in the Parliament of 1882, providing for the inspection of the hull of all passenger vessels. We had previously provided for the inspection of the boilers and machinery of steamboats, but there was very little inspection by competent and practical men of the hulls of steamboats. In that Act, it is provided that properly qualified inspectors should be appointed from whom vessels should obtain a certificate. It was provided that these inspectors should make an inspection of the vessels, and that, together with the Inspectors of Boilers and Machinery, they should fix the number of passengers that a vessel would be permitted to carry upon a certain route. It has been stated by some hon. gentlemen that we should have gone further and have provided for the inspection of all steamers and all vessels engaged in the freight trade as well as those engaged in the passenger trade. We felt, however, that it was perhaps unwise to attempt too much at the outset, and that our first duty was to consider and provide, as far as possible, for the safety of passengers. The inspectors of the underwriters largely attended to the inspection of all freight vessels, whether of sail or of steam; in the same manner, as it has been stated here to-night, in the Lower Provinces, and in sea-going ships, the inspection of English Lloyds and French Lloyds is given, and is demanded, by all shippers of freight for all vessels upon which they wish to ship cargoes. Now, in the Upper Lakes we found that shippers of goods had their own inspectors; shippers of cargoes and insurance offices had their own inspectors to look after freight vessels, and therefore it was not so necessary or so imperative that the Government should take upon itself the inspection of all freight vessels. The Act of 1874 is an Act against overloading or sending to sea unseaworthy vessels. That Act is sufficiently stringent, but so far as I am aware, it has not been acted upon. I do not know whether the Act is too cumbersome or the machinery too costly, but I know it has never gone into operation. Under that Act it is provided:

"If complaint is made to the Minister that any ship registered in Canada is, by reason of the defective condition of her hull or equipments, or by reason of her being overloaded or improperly loaded, unfit to proceed to sea, or on any voyage on any waters within the limits of Canada, the Minister may cause such ships to be surveyed by a person appointed by him—first exacting from the complainant, if he thinks fit so to do, a deposit of money to defray the expenses of the survey. . . ."

Other provisions provide for the condemning of the ship and contain a declaration that any person who sends such a vessel to sea, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. That Act, as I have said, has not been acted on since I took charge of the Department, and it may be said to be inoperative. Looking at the disasters that have occurred on the lakes, I had it under consideration to present to Parliament a short Bill to make it necessary that all vessels should have a load line, as has been suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite. One of the great dangers in navigating the class of vessels sailing the lakes, is the form of their construction. The engines are placed far aft and bring down the stern and force up the bow, and unless care is taken in loading, vessels often go to sea in an unworthy condition. I had it under consideration to provide that no vessel should go to sea unless drawing a certain depth forward, that depth to be defined by the Inspector. In endeavouring to mature the plan, I found many difficulties arose in the way of having it properly carried out, and a law which cannot be properly executed and for which sufficient machinery is not provided, is worse than useless. I acted on what the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) advised, that we should not be in too great a hurry to legislate. I left the matter under consideration, to see whether I could devise any proper machinery by which we can obtain a proper inspection of vessels when leaving port. The steamers trading on the lakes have many points of call. In the morning, a steamer may start out properly loaded, but at ten o'clock in the morning she may have put off some freight and taken aboard other freight, and be quite out of trim, and as the vessel may call at three or four points during the day, she may be in different trim on leaving each port. So the House will see that there is great difficulty in devising machinery by which vessels can be compelled to leave port in proper condition. The matter, I say, has been left in abeyance, to see if it is possible to devise proper machinery to carry out the plan I have suggested, or whether the injury inflicted on trade and navigation by the attempted enforcement of such a law, would be greater than the benefits that would be derived from it. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has referred to the English Act, and to the fact that we go further than that Act, and has said that there is no appeal in this country. I would inform the hon. gentleman that there is an appeal from the inspector to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and that the Minister is not in any case, as the hon. gentleman supposes, the puppet of the inspector. The duty of the Minister is to enquire into the facts, and if the facts presented appear to him not to warrant the withholding of a certificate, it is in the power of the Minister to make proper arrangements for the running of the vessel. The hon. gentleman has also stated that we do not require the inspection of vessels trading outside the Dominion. All vessels registered within the Dominion and plying to any port within or outside of the Dominion, come under the Inspection Act. It is provided that vessels registered in foreign countries, and trading in Canada, are subjected to the inspection laws of the country where they are registered. I do not know there are any other observations made by hon. members which require explanation on my part. I have only to say that all papers connected with the matter will be laid before the House, and all possible information given to hon. members; and I have again to thank the hon. member for Algoma

(Mr. Dawson) for having introduced the subject and elicited the opinions of the various members who have spoken in regard to it.

Mr. BRECKEN. When the question was before the House some ten or twelve days ago, with respect to Prince Edward Island, I did not speak on it; I do not intend to speak at any length now. I have listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. Minister, and from the little experience we have had in the Island of the effects of the Act as now worked, with respect to the inspection of steamships, I had hoped that the hon. Minister would take a different view of the law as it now stands. I do not agree with my colleague when he says that the Minister is a puppet of the inspector; but, judging from the inspection in the Island, it would be a great boon if the inspector were accompanied by a merchant representing the shipowner. Our steamers were stopped running last autumn, just when the great bulk of our carrying trade was commencing, and notwithstanding the remedy of an appeal to the Minister of Marine. It was a great injury to our people, and they have not yet stopped complaining about the effect of the law. I would submit, with great deference, as I am not a nautical man, that it would be a very great advantage if the Act were altered so that the shipowner should be represented at the time the inspection takes place. I know it is the duty of the Government, and the Minister in charge of that important branch of the public service, to see that vessels are seaworthy, and that the lives of passengers and crew are properly protected; but judging from what has taken place in Prince Edward Island, it is quite possible that the working of the law, as it now stands, might operate in a way in which the Government would not like to see it operate. It is worthy of consideration as to whether a Court of Appeal should not be provided; at all events, it is of great importance that the condition of the vessel should not be left to the arbitrary decision of the inspector at the time.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. member will allow me to explain. I brought to the notice of the inspector the fact that complaint had been made that he examined the vessel without the knowledge of the owner. I understood from him that part of the inspection had been made in the presence of one of the members of the steamship company, that he had spent altogether parts of two or three days in the inspection, that he had made a voyage on the steamers, and had inspected them, both at Pictou and on the Island. I think it is a rare exception rather than a rule, that the owners of the steamship are not present with the inspector when he makes the inspection. I believe that in all cases which have been brought to my notice, excepting this one instance, no inspection has been made in which the steamboat owner was not present at the time.

Mr. DAWSON. I may be permitted to remark, that in reading the statement of Mr. Mackenzie, who is the keeper of the observatory at Presqu'Isle, near Owen Sound, I had not noticed that he had made some reflections upon the captain of the Jane Miller. I take this opportunity of saying that I knew the captain well. He went down with his vessel, and I knew him to have been a most excellent and worthy man. He was mate of the steamer Ontario a long time, and he stood very high in the country and among the navigators of the lakes. I may say that the case of these lake vessels is entirely exceptional, and that the same description does not at all apply to sea-going vessels, as to the class to which I have been referring. The number of these vessels that are lost is quite out of proportion to the losses anywhere else, because of a whole fleet of vessels which were plying on the Georgian Bay five years ago, I believe not one remains, except a small vessel, the Maganetawan, plying into Parry Sound, and another small vessel called the Warton Belle, which plies near the coast. In fact, the loss of a fleet has been three times repeated, and the loss of life has also been very great, so that, as I have already stated, the case of these lake vessels is exceptional. The Minister of Marine is perfectly correct in saying that these losses are in a great measure due to the construction of the vessels. There is no doubt that the boats which have been taken to these waters were entirely unfit for navigation. As to the navigation itself, it is probably the safest and best in the world. This is proved by the fact that steamers which are properly appointed, and properly provided, meet with no accidents. The Sarnia steamers have been running for twelve or fourteen years, and not a single loss has occurred, or a single serious accident. The same remark is true of the Collingwood line. The difficulty is in the class of vessels used, and what I suggested was, that some authority should be given to the Custom House officers, or to some other officer at the port—without adding too much to the expense—to prevent these vessels going out overloaded. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum), says the captain is the best judge of when his vessel is overloaded. I believe he is perfectly right, but the trouble is that it is never left to the captain to say when his vessel is sufficiently laden. He comes with his boat to a place where a load is waiting him, and he is not consulted as to whether he can take it or not, but he is compelled, in most cases, to take it. I know of instances in which captains refused to overload their vessels, and they saved them in consequence. There can be no doubt that the hydrographic survey of the coast which is just now being carried out, under the direction of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, will do an immense amount of good. It was very much needed; it was called for for years, and I am happy to know that the Department has sent a very able officer to do the work—one who was commended by the Imperial Government. He was at this work last summer, and so far he has been most indefatigable in carrying out his duty. That the coasts are gradually getting to be well lighted, there can be no doubt. New lights are being put in every year, and they are having a very beneficial effect in allowing vessels to run at night, where otherwise they could not. I think, however, that this improvement might be carried further. I think the Sault Ste. Marie River might be lighted so that vessels could be run at night, as thereby an immense saving to vessels, generally, could be effected. I may say, in conclusion, that I am glad so many hon. gentlemen have taken part in this discussion, as it will draw attention to the matter, and I am happy that the attention of the Minister of Marine has been called to it, and that he has manifested so much interest in the matter.

MONEY ORDER REGULATIONS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of the regulations affecting the Money Order Branch of the Postal Department, prior to the change recently made as to the regulations for payment of money orders, and copies of the regulations now in force, with dates, said: I may briefly explain that the cause of this motion, as I explained privately to an official of the Post Office Department, was a communication I received relative to the increased delay and certain precautions taken in the payment of money orders in the neighbouring city of Hull, in which some four days' delay took place, under the arrangement now in force, as compared with the former arrangement. As I have reason to believe that no recent regulations have taken place, it may have occurred from some general regulations which differ as to the relative importance of the place. However that may be, I make the motion, and I shall be glad to know what is the explanation of the delay to which I have referred.

Mr. CARLING. I am not aware that any change has been made in the regulations of the Department upon this subject. If, however, the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to pass for the present, I will make enquiry and give him the information.

LOTTERY FIRM AT ST. STEPHEN, NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. WELDON, in moving for a statement of the receipts of the Post Office at St. Stephen, N.B., during the years 1879, 1881, 1882 and 1883; also, a statement of the value of postage stamps sold at the said office; also, copies of any correspondence, statements or memorials in reference to posting of circulars by a lottery firm or company at St. Stephen, N.B., said: My object in making this motion is to call the attention of the Government to what has been going on, as far as we are informed, in the town of St. Stephen. A lottery firm there has issued a large number of circulars, which are sent, not, I believe, through the New England States, but through the western States, and the United States Government are powerless to stop them, because, under the postal arrangements, they are obliged to forward postal matter to its destination. If these circulars were posted in the United States, they would be stopped at once, but, as it is, no doubt a large amount of fraud has been perpetrated, and the firm are reported to be growing rich. I find that a larger revenue is collected from stamps and postage at St. Stephen than at St. John. Though St. Stephen has only a population of 2,500, I find that the revenue is $36,189, while in St. John the revenue is only $35,891.47, Fredericton, $9,510, and Moncton, $6,815. This shows that the number of stamps sold at St. Stephen is quite abnormal, and I have no doubt that the large sale is accounted for by this extensive fraud which has been carried on. My object in making this motion is to call the attention of the Postmaster General and of the Government to this matter, and to urge that some steps should be taken to put an end to it. I believe a large amount of money has been paid in, but as for prizes being drawn, no such thing has taken place. The whole affair is a fraud, by which some persons are rapidly becoming rich.

Mr. CARLING. There is no objection to giving the amount of the receipts for the different years mentioned, as well as the value of the postage stamps sold during those years; but as correspondence has taken place between the Post Office Department and the Department of Justice, and also between that Department and the Local Government, I am not in a position to submit it at present. The other information will be brought down without any delay.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman is not able to give us more information on this subject. We have all noticed in the newspapers, for a considerable time past, statements with reference to this fraud which has been going on in St. Stephen. A number of years ago—in 1878, if I remember rightly—we had a discussion with reference to the advisability of giving sufficient powers to the Post Office Department, with the view of stopping just such frauds; and singularly enough, if my memory does not deceive me, the shocking example brought forward was that of St. Stephen, N.B. It was explained that St. Stephen, which is just across the boundary, was made the retiring place to which the promoters of this fraud went, and from which they deluged the country with those stamps. The House was reluctant to apply the usual remedy, namely, that under certain regulations the Postmaster General should have power to have these suspected letters opened; but a tentative remedy was adopted, giving the Postmaster General power to order that the circulars should be stamped as suspected to be frauds, and sent in that way to their destinations. I should like to know whether any effort has been taken to stop these frauds by the use of that remedy, or whether this law on the Statute Book has been allowed to be a dead letter, and these wages of iniquity allowed to be gathered in without an effort being made to stop this thing.

Mr. CARLING. I think I stated that the Department had called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the matter, and that the Minister of Justice is now in correspondence with the Attorney-General of New Brunswick with reference to it. It is not for the Department to carry out the law, but to call the attention of the Department of Justice to the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. This law has nothing to do with the Department of Justice. It is entirely for the Post Office Department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I presume that the Postmaster General, in the exercise of discretion, called the attention of the Minister of Justice to this matter, in order to get his opinion and assistance in the way of prosecuting any frauds. I remember the discussion which took place some years ago in regard to these lottery frauds, which were really a scandal. As I understand, correspondence is now going on with the Attorney-General of New Brunswick, as the speediest way of putting an end to these transactions, and therefore my hon. friend cannot well bring it down until it is complete. I hope it will be completed before the end of the Session, so that my hon. friend can bring it down, and measures may be taken to stop the frauds complained of.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend has misunderstood me. I did not allude to any prosecutions at all or to anything that took place in the Department of Justice. I alluded to the law of the land, which gives the Postmaster General the power to say these letters should be stamped as suspected of fraud. I would like to know whether that law has been put into force.

Mr. CARLING. I will enquire and give the House the information.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

CLAIMS OF JOHN ROBERTSON.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for all correspondence, reports, departmental orders, orders of the Land Board, and other papers connected with the disposal of the west half of Section 6, Township 2, Range 14, west of the principal meridian, Manitoba, and particularly of all papers connected with the claims of John Robertson and of one Wallace, to the said lot, said: I make this motion in consequence of a communication which I received from Mr. John Robertson, who forwards me some portion of correspondence that passed between him and the Department of the Interior. A letter of his to that Department, dated 24th October, 1883, says:

"On the 8th November, 1882, I procured a homestead and preemption entry for the west half of Section 6 in 2-14, and during the winter I hauled building timber for a frame house and log stable, and fence timber. Prior to May 9th, 1883, I commenced breaking and preparing to build. Owing to the burning of two saw mills in the neighbourhood, I was unable to procure lumber until the wet season was over, when I could haul it from Brandon. During the month of June and the early part of July, I got over thirty acres broken and partly back-set and frame of house up. I then hauled lumber from Brandon, and other material for completion of house. After having house nearly enclosed and stable walls up, I received notice from Nelson Land Office that an application had been filed for the cancellation of my claim. I made out a statement, by way of defence, and had eight affidavits attached in support of the same. This was about the middle of August. Some time afterwards, the inspector, Mr. Aitman, came and inspected my claim. Since that time, up to the 22nd of this month, I had no further information regarding it. On the 22nd I received a letter from Nelson Land Office, a copy of which I herewith enclose. From the favourable report the inspector made of my improvements, I supposed there would be no cancellation granted by the Land Board and went steadily on with preparing for the winter. I was residing on my claim for some time prior to the Inspector's visit, and have been since, having completed my house so as to be habitable. I have over sixty bushels of potatoes stored in cellar for winter use, between forty and fifty bushels of seed grain, also a quantity of grain for feed. I have also put up hay and prepared a stable for wintering stock, and have no other stable in which to winter them, and at this season of the year, with winter just on, to have my improvements taken from me by the Land Board to gratify personal spite, seems, to say the least, very unfair, and I take the liberty of writing these facts, hoping you will interfere in my behalf with this decision of the Land Board and give me fair play, as I am a bona fide settler and doing my best to make a home in the land. I might just say here that the parties applying for the cancellation of my claims are the same Allens who have given my sons so much trouble regarding their claim, particulars of which you will get in another letter. In reference to my improvements, I would just say that I have a good house, 14 by 18, finished with pine lumber, tar papered and shingled, with good cellar; also, a log stable, 18 by 22, and have just burned lime and got ready for finishing my house for winter. Your early attention and reply to this will oblige,

"Yours respectfully,

"JOHN ROBERTSON."

The answer to this is dated the 16th of November, 1883:

"SIR,—I have the honour, by direction of the Minister of the Interior, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated 25th ult., setting forth the facts and circumstances connected with your occupation of the west half of Section 6, Township 2, Range 14, west of the Principal Meridian, and stating you have received notice from the Land Board that your entries having been cancelled, the land is to be sold by tender within thirty days from the 16th October, the date of the notice to you. In reply, I am to inform you that the subject of your letter has been communicated to the Dominion Lands Commissioner, at Winnipeg, for his report thereon.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN R. HALL,

"Acting Secretary."

Mr. Robertson states:

"Afterwards, I visited the Land Board at Winnipeg, but got very little satisfaction, as Mr. Walsh was then at Ottawa. All that I learned was that the highest tender was by Mr. Wallace. I have got no official information since, but have heard from another source that it was awarded to Mr. Wallace. As I have no other land in the Province on which to build a home, and as farming is the business of my choice, I wish to know, before spring opens, if I shall have to look in a strange land for that which is denied me in my own, or, in other words, do as hundreds have done, go to Dakota and swear allegiance to the Government at Washington, a move at which my British blood revolts. Nevertheless, having a wife and eight children, duty demands and necessity compels me to try and provide them a home."

Mr. CHARLTON. Very unpatriotic.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me this is an instance in which it would be well for the House to receive some explanation of what seems to be somewhat arbitrary conduct. A very considerable delay occurs in affording information, and conduct of this kind demands explanation. Mr. Robertson writes to headquarters, the 24th of October, and receives an answer the 16th November, simply telling him that his letter has been referred to the Land Commissioner at Winnipeg for report. He gets no further information, although it is now March and the winter passing over; and while in this state of uncertainty, some information was conveyed to him from outside quarters, that his land has been sold over his head, but he has no accurate information as to what his position is or anything on which he can base his future arrangements. The hon. gentleman stated the other day that there was no instance of a bona fide settler having been evicted. Mr. Robertson has not been evicted, but stands in a fair way of being evicted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Robertson, as the hon. gentleman opposite said, is certainly a most unpatriotic individual in threatening to go to Dakota and taking away his eight children because he says the Land Board, through private spite—though what private spite the Land Board can have against him I cannot see, nor does he show it by his letters—have proceeded against him. Mr. Robertson forgot to tell you that he is a land jumper, and that he got his land by informing on the man who had settled on the land before—by informing that he was not a settler, and was not improving the land. Robertson got that man's house and lot, and having done so, ought to have gone on the lot himself, but he did not do so. He says that it was put up to tender, and that Wallace got it, but he forgot to tell the hon. gentleman that he was one of the tenderers himself, and did not get it because Wallace gave more for the land. In this case, John Robertson obtained an entry for the half-section as a homestead and preemption by procuring the cancellation of the entry of the person in whose favour an entry had already been made, the grounds of cancellation being that the said person was not a bona fide resident on his homestead and was not fulfilling the conditions required by law. Subsequently, application was made to cancel Robertson's own entry for the same reasons, and in the course of the investigation made by the Land Board, it was proved that Robertson was not a bona fide resident on his homestead but a keeper of a hotel or stopping place in the village of Cartwright. His entry was thereupon ordered to be cancelled. Against this Robertson protested, and the case was kept open for a long time in order to give him the opportunity of showing cause why the decision of the Board should not go into effect. Finally, Robertson failing to furnish the required evidence, the Commissioner, finding the half-section to be much more valuable than the ordinary homestead and preemption lands, offered it at competition, the person offering the highest bonus to be permitted to take the land, subject to the usual homestead conditions. Robertson was invited to tender for it, and did tender. But one Wallace offered a higher bonus, and on the 20th December last the Minister of the Interior decided that Wallace's offer should be accepted—Wallace to pay Robertson the value of improvements on the land.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman misunderstood the statement of Mr. Robertson. Mr. Robertson did not impute any private spite to the Land Board or the office at Ottawa. He said: I do not know what private spite the Land Board could have. This proposal to Council was made by some individual out of private spite towards him. He did not impute any private spite towards the officers. What he did impute and does impute, and what I now repeat is, that there seems to be great remissness in announcing the decision of the Board to Mr. Robertson, who had not, at the period this letter was received a while ago, been enabled to obtain any information of the decision of the office in response to his application, made so long ago as the 25th October last. I do not know whether there was any other communication to Mr. Robertson from any other quarter than has been stated to me, but it is clear that the communication he received in answer to his letter of October, by the letter of November, did not ask for any other information or evidence, but told him simply that the matter had been referred to the Land Board at Winnipeg, and he seems to have received no further information from the office.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think any one who was so imprudent, under existing circumstances, as to go to live in Cartwright, might have expected such treatment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like, apart from the interesting question my hon. friend has raised, if the First Minister can state what is the usual policy of the Government, supposing this statement made by this person to be so far correct as that he had erected what, in that country, is supposed to be a reasonably substantial cottage on the ground. Is it the habit of the Land Board, after some considerable amount of money has been spent, to put it up without allowing any compensation whatever for buildings erected upon the premises, independently of any ground that may have been broken up? That is a point, I think, the hon. gentleman might perhaps inform us upon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This land was awarded, on the 20th December, by the Minister of Interior to Mr.

Wallace. I did not wish to be understood to say that private spite was charged against the Commissioner, but he said that the Commissioner had decided the matter on private spite. I said I did not see how any private spite could affect the decision of the Commissioner or the Board. It was no interest of theirs; they are appointed for the purpose of doing justice and carrying out the law, and I have no doubt they did so. This man made his tender, he offered for it, and it is because he did not get it that he makes this complaint. I dare say he need not run away to the United States with his family, if he has a good hotel to live in in the village of Cartwright. The practice, when any person fails to carry out the homestead law, is this: For instance, if a person goes on and ploughs up some land and is not a resident, the Act is imperative. The party must be a resident, and, by professing to break up a little land or commence to build a house, he does not acquire any right under the Statute. It was attempted last Session to alter the Statute, and provide that persons who made improvements, without residence, would thereby establish a claim, but the House, very properly in my opinion, rejected that idea, because that is just what speculators would do. They would see a fine property they wished to get, an eligible lot, and would commence to make improvements without any bond fide intention of becoming settlers. The only true and satisfactory evidence that a party is going to settle on his homestead, is residence on the homestead, and not improvements. Parliament decided that such a qualification was not sufficient, but the party must be an actual resident. But the general rule is that, if the party has made improvements, the homesteader who goes on and takes advantage of these improvements shall compensate him for them. Mr. Wallace, who in this case got the place at public competition, will have to pay compensation for those improvements.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that a part of the terms, or is it simply that the hon. gentleman means to see that that is done?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is part of the terms on which Wallace bought.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That he was to make compensation for improvements on the lot?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Motion agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE, in moving for all correspondence between the Government of British Columbia and the Government of Canada, on the subject of Chinese immigration into said Province, said: I have no intention of detaining the House with any lengthened remarks, but would simply express the hope that the Government will cause the papers to be sent down at an early date, as I intend to bring this subject before the House in a few days.

Motion agreed to.

ASSISTANCE TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. MULLOCK, in moving for a statement showing the respective amounts of Dominion, provincial and municipal money, either by way of bonus or otherwise, paid towards the construction or equipment of railways (other than the Canadian Pacific Railway), since Confederation, with dates of such payments and names of the respective railways so aided, said: It will be remembered by all hon. gentlemen in this House that a few nights ago, on the 20th February, the hon. the Minister of Railways, in addressing the House on the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway, intimated that it might be proper to recoup to some Provinces moneys expended in aid of railways, where the character of those railways was not wholly of a provincial nature. I am not prepared to express any opinion whatever on that point, nor, in making this motion, do I wish to be considered as assenting to, or dissenting from the view so foreshadowed; but it appears to me that, in order to fairly deal with such a question, it would be proper for the House to be fully informed as to what moneys have been expended by the various Provinces, either directly by the Provinces or by municipalities, in the construction of railways which are of a Dominion character. We know that this House, last Session, passed an Act declaring that a great many railways were railways for the general welfare of Canada. The Act amending the Consolidated Railway Act removed from the jurisdiction of the Provinces a great many railways that had been incorporated by the Provinces, that had been aided by municipal and provincial moneys and whose entire cost, I may almost say, was borne by money derived in this manner. Now, if a scheme of recoupment is to be entered upon, it appears to me it would be proper that the scheme should be a general one. The remarks made by the hon. Minister of Railways indicate that not one Province alone but several Provinces are referred to—he speaks of “Provinces” in his remarks. I know that, as far as the Province of Ontario is concerned, I can point to railways that certainly seem to be Dominion in their character, railways constructed largely with public moneys, designed to connect that Province with the great North-West, and with Provinces east. When we have this information which is asked for, and we have the system of railways disclosed that are now in existence, we shall then, and not until then, be in a position to determine how the recoupment, if any, shall be made. The information asked for in the motion, appears to be necessary to a proper consideration of the question in any respect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to the motion; that is to say, the Governor General will be asked to get this information, but he will have to apply to the different railways, and perhaps to the different municipalities, in order to get returns—certainly to different railways.

Mr. MULLOCK. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is required to get the respective amounts of Dominion, provincial and municipal money given in bonuses, or otherwise paid towards the construction of railways.

Mr. MULLOCK. The Lieutenant-Governor of each Province is supposed to be an officer who would be obliged to obey the order of the Governor General; he is appointed by the Governor in Council. A communication directed to the Lieutenant-Governor of each Province would, I think, receive the attention asked for. But, inasmuch as one of these Provinces—British Columbia—is so remote, and there might be a great deal of delay before getting that return—

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is no railway there.

Mr. MULLOCK. Then the return need not wait a reply from that remote Province.

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon. gentleman refers to the statistical report furnished to the Department of Railways, he will find the information there—only, if I remember aright, not divided. At great pains, during the Administration of my hon. friend from East York, Mr. Brydges commenced a collection of this information, and that has been going on since, and the information thus obtained is in the office of the Minister of Railways. The totals of public and municipal moneys granted for each railway will, when looked at and dissected, enable the hon. gentleman, from his own departmental records, to see how much has been given since Confederation, which is the only thing my hon. friend who makes this motion, wishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is this difficulty: In 1875, I think it was, I gave directions to have the statistical account prepared, and circulars were sent to the railway companies and to the Local Governments, and information was obtained in that way, of a complete character. But in Ontario, particularly, and I think, also, in Nova Scotia, and to some extent in New Brunswick, some further operations have taken place since that time; and I doubt very much if circulars have been sent since then to obtain additional information from municipalities or railway companies. It might be necessary to send circulars again if the returns are to be made complete.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection in the world to getting these returns. I understand from the hon. gentleman opposite, that most of them can be obtained in the Department of Railways. If so, they can easily be dissected and severed—the various items of bonuses, and the railways to which they are given.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is all there is. These statements show the amount obtained from the Government, or the amount obtained from the municipality, whether as a bonus, a free gift, or otherwise, and the total amount expended on each road. The information is pretty complete as it is, except, as I stated, what has been done since these circulars have been sent out. I do not know whether these circulars have been sent out again or not.

Mr. MILLS. I have no doubt the Minister of Railways has obtained this information, and I supposed the First Minister would have been cognizant of all the facts, because, I think, by the General Railway Amendment Act of last year, he has been given control of a large number of railways that were chartered by the Provincial Government of Ontario, at all events, and subsidized by that Government. The hon. gentleman certainly does not intend to take control of these railways and exercise dominion over them on behalf of Canada, without compensating the Province to the extent of its contributions to these railways. There is no doubt whatever that when the Government of the Province of Ontario aided these railways it intended to control the policy upon which they were operated, and the aid was given, and could only be justified on the ground that it was of provincial advantage. Now, the hon. gentleman has taken control of these railways, he has made them corporations of the Dominion of Canada, and it is very extraordinary if the Government which he leads has done that without considering all the consequences which must necessarily flow from adopting such a policy. The hon. gentleman certainly must have considered, or at all events his colleague must have considered, the question of the obligations that were incurred in consequence of this policy.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). I move that the words "or grants of land given" be inserted after the word "money," in the second line. I know one or two railways that are of a provincial character, and which have been aided by grants of land from the Provincial Government.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton). Would it not also be advisable to amend the motion so as to include any amounts due to the Dominion by railway companies at Confederation, and also what has been remitted to such companies?

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

HOME OR SUPPLY FARM ON PINCEP CREEK, N.W.T.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for: 1. Copies of all Orders in Council or Departmental Orders and correspondence and documents respecting the sale, lease, or other disposal of the Home or Supply Farm on Pincer Creek, N.W.T., to Messrs. Christie, Stewart, Tupper, Pope & Co., or any of them, or any other person; 2. The number of acres ploughed and under cultivation on said farm, when sold, or disposed of; 3. The quantity of land so sold, leased or disposed of; 4. The buildings on said farm and the costs thereof; 5. Copy of all applications for the purchase or lease of said farm, and a copy of the conveyance, lease or other writing respecting such sale or lease; 6. The price or rent obtained therefor, and how paid or payable; 7. The names and residence in full of all applicants for such purchase or lease, and of the grantees, lessees or purchasers; 8. A statement showing whether said farm was disposed of by public or private sale; 9. A statement showing the quantity of stock, plant, farming implements and utensils on said farm, when disposed of, and the disposal made thereof. If sold, to whom, when, and at what price, and on what terms disposed of; 10. The number of horses, mares and cattle on said farm. When disposed of, and how; 11. The costs expended on said farm for ploughing, cultivating, fencing, building and all other improvements. The cost of plant, farm implements and machinery of all kinds, describing the particular articles or things; 12. All correspondence between the Department of the Interior and any person or persons respecting the sale or other disposal of said farm.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I ask the hon. member to what farm he refers. I answered his question about Pincer Creek farm the other day.

Mr. CAMERON. This is in regard to the farm of which I spoke the other day; I want the applications made for leasing or purchasing it, and I understand there were applications for both; I want a copy of the agreement with Mr. Stewart. The hon. gentleman stated that he had a lease of it on shares.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I said Mr. Chipman.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon. gentleman said Mr. Stewart, in the answer he gave me, and I am told that Mr. Stewart is claiming the right to this farm. A person from the North-West, of the highest responsibility, has written that Mr. Stewart is on the farm and is claiming to be the lessee of it in the meantime, with the right to purchase.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The truth of the matter is, that the hon. gentleman is making these motions without knowing sufficient of the facts to warrant him in doing so. There are two farms on Pincer Creek, one an Indian farm and the other a Mounted Police farm. Which does the hon. gentleman mean?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I referred to the Indian farm.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Chipman has got that for a year.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the hon. gentleman will refer to his answer he will find, according to my recollection of it, that he said Mr. Stewart had it. Does the hon. gentleman now say there are two supply farms on Pincer Creek. There is no such report in the Department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are under two different Departments. This is the answer I gave the hon. gentleman. It is in writing from the Department, and I read it. It is as follows:

"Pincer Creek Indian farm was leased on shares on 8th March, 1893, to James L. Chipman, for one year, from 1st April, 1884. The lessee is to have three-fourths and the Department one-fourth for that year. The stock, plant and farming implements were transported to the Indian reserve in the McLeod district. The lease was a private transaction and was not made by auction."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Is there a Capt. Stewart occupying any one of the supply farms at Pincer Creek?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has now found out that there is another farm.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I say it is impossible to find out, from the reports, what we have in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Indian Department has nothing to do with one of these farms.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Give me information in regard to both the farms?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will give the hon. gentleman an answer in regard to both. I have already given an answer in regard to the Indian supply farm. With respect to the Mounted Police farm: this farm covers about 300 acres; it has been found a source of expense instead of profit, and the Stewart Ranching Company were permitted to occupy the farm buildings and dwelling house on condition that they took charge of the horses without charge; this arrangement to continue for one year; it expired in the fall and proved a very satisfactory one. The Company have still charge of the farm and are maintaining about 100 head there; the Government will resume possession in the spring. There are some conditions which I cannot well read to the House, but I will send the lease over to the hon. gentleman and he will ascertain all the particulars.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Both the farms are under lease, on shares?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Chipman farm was under lease last year and the lease will expire in the spring. The Stewart lease expired last August. The Company wish to give up the herd, finding that, except at great expense and by keeping a detachment of police there, they are unable to keep them. So on the condition that it suited the Ranch Company to occupy the house, it was handed to them on a lease of one dollar for the whole place, on the conditions I have mentioned, and sundry other conditions which the hon. gentleman will find in the paper I shall send him. There was no sale, no attempt at a lease, no lease, except the occupation for one year, as it suited the Ranch Company to get possession of the buildings for their purposes, and it suited the Department to hand them over the care of the cattle under the clauses of that lease for a year.

Mr. TUPPER. In this rather mixed up motion, I notice the name of Tupper among the different parties who are said to be interested in that farm. I notice also that in the notice of motion on the order paper, that the name appears "Stewart Tupper." I enquired of Mr. Stewart Tupper whether he was interested in the farm, or ever had been, and I ascertained that he knew nothing about it, had no interest, direct or indirect in it, and cannot understand this reference to his name. I would like to know what the hon. gentleman means by including the name I have referred to in his motion?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the hon. gentleman will wait till the papers come down, he will find out all about it. I put the notice on the paper from what I conceived to be reliable information, that a person by the name of Stewart, and a person by the name of Tupper, had something to do with it.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman hears that some one of the name of Stewart, and some one of the name of Tupper, had something to do with it, and he puts the two names together. I think the hon. gentleman, before bringing the names of private individuals before this House, should endeavour to take the trouble to sift the information he gets and see if it is reliable.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) If the hon. gentleman will read the notice he will find that it is Stewart and Tupper.

Mr. TUPPER. It is correct on this paper, but on the journals of the House it will appear as I have stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is trying to make a little political capital for a week or a fortnight against two of my colleagues, one Mr. Pope, and the other, Mr. Tupper, and he puts these names in the paper when there is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) The hon. gentleman has no right to make such a statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have the right.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I received information which I believe to be reliable, that some person by the name of Stewart, and another person by the name of Tupper, and another by the name of Pope, were connected with this matter, and relying on that information—which I now have in my desk, and which I have no objection to show the hon. gentleman—I put the notice on the paper. I say that in doing so I am fully within my right, believing my information to be reliable, and I say that I shall never hesitate to exercise my rights to ask such questions, nor for such information as I am entitled to ask.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the original motion the name appears "Stewart Tupper."

Motion agreed to.

LIQUOR LICENSE ACT OF 1883.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Government and any of the Local Governments of the Provinces, respecting the Liquor License Act of 1883, said: I think it is pretty generally understood that some correspondence has taken place between the Dominion and the Local Governments on the subject of this Act. I know from the public press, at all events, that very strong protests were made by the Province of Quebec in regard to this Act, insisting upon the Government not enforcing it. In Ontario, the Local Legislature, in Session assembled, protested strongly against it, and

"Resolved, that it is the duty of the Government to take all necessary steps to firmly maintain the constitutional and legislative rights of the Province to regulate and control the liquor traffic."

I know that the public men of both sides there have practically taken the same view. I notice that in a discussion which has taken place lately in the New Brunswick Assembly, the same view is repeated by leading men on both sides. I believe that there are difficulties which have arisen under the Act of 1883, and that representations have been made to the Government on that subject by one or two of the Provinces, at all events. I am desirous of getting that information, and therefore I make this motion.

THE GOVERNMENT HERD IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for: 1. Return showing all Orders in Council and Departmental Orders respecting the sale of Government herd cattle in the North-West to any person or persons or company; 2. All applications made for the purchase of such cattle to the Government or any officer thereof; 3. All notices of sale or tenders called for by the Government for the sale or other disposal of such cattle; 4. A statement showing the price paid for such cattle, cost of maintaining the same since purchased, the price obtained therefor, to whom and when sold, a general account, with dates and items of the expense of said cattle since purchased and the net proceeds of sale; 5. All correspondence respecting the sale of said cattle. He said: Some days ago I put a question to the hon. First Minister with respect to the Government herd of cattle in the North-West, asking whether they had been disposed of; if so, to whom, how and at what price; what the cattle originally cost, and what the cost of maintaining them was until they were disposed of. The hon. First Minister answered the questions as follows:—

"The Indian herd of cattle has been sold. There were 599 head, consisting of: cows, 188; two year old heifers, 312; steers, 40; bulls, 30; and calves, 32; making 599. These cattle were sold by private sale on 23rd July, 1883, to Col. DeWinton, at $35 per head, and $1,000 additional for right to claim any stray cattle belonging to the herd; in all, $21,965. This amount is payable as follows:—Cash payments, $5,490; on 23rd October, 1883, $5,490; on 23rd January, 1884, $5,490; and on the 23rd of April, 1884, $5,495. All these amounts have been paid, except the last, which will be paid on the 23rd of April next."

Now, in this the hon. gentleman tells us that 599 cattle were sold at $35 each, aggregating $21,965; and he tells us further that $1,000 was paid for the right to claim any stray cattle belonging to the herd. The hon. gentleman did not tell us how many cattle were missing from the herd, or how many strayed away. It is an extraordinary thing that these cattle should have strayed. The hon. gentleman did not tell us how many were in the herd originally. I am told that 1,200 were bought and brought into the country some years ago. There must have been some considerable increase since then; and yet, only 599 of these cattle could be got together. I want to know what has become of the balance. It is stated that a person was in charge of this herd for some time at $300 a month, that he was dismissed, and that another person, Mr. Ives, was afterwards put in charge of them at $200 a month. When were the cattle lost? When the first person was in charge or when Mr. Ives was in charge? Now, I should like to get all this information. What I especially object to in the disposal of any of our property in the North-West, whether of this description or real property, is that it should be disposed of by private sale. The hon. gentleman complains that these charges are constantly made; but one has only to read the hon. gentleman's answer to see that there is ground for them. Why should these cattle be sold to Col. DeWinton at private sale? No person knew that they were in the market except Col. DeWinton. I have been told, and I have been informed by letter, that several persons in the North-West wanted to buy these cattle, and were willing to give more than the Government got for them; but they had no opportunity, because the Government took care that the cattle should be sold by private sale. I complain of the whole policy of the Government with respect to the disposal of public property in the North-West Territories. Just look at how many cases of this kind have come to our attention this Session. The hon. gentleman admitted that the Pincer Creek supply farm was sold to the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec by private sale; he admitted that a grist and saw mill was sold by private sale; I am told that a valuable timber limit was also granted by private sale; and the hon. gentleman told us the other night that a valuable contract was granted by private arrangement. All these sales were made without public notice, and that is what I object to. I make this motion with the view of getting information on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT FORT McLEOD.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for: 1. Copies of all Orders in Council or Departmental Orders respecting the erection of any public buildings at or near Fort McLeod, North-West Territories; 2. A statement showing the nature and kind of such buildings, the estimated cost thereof, the purpose for which to be used, the plans and specification thereof, a copy of the notice or advertisement calling for tenders for the erection of such buildings, the tenders, the contract, a statement showing the names of the contractor and the sureties given for the completion of the contract; 3. All correspondence respecting the same. He said: On this matter I submitted an enquiry a few evenings ago to the First Minister, and received from the hon. First Minister the following answer:—

"The only buildings I am aware of are the new police barracks we have erected, to accommodate 100 men and 100 horses at Fort McLeod. These buildings have been erected by the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, at a cost of $45,000. The contract was entered into in August last. Tenders were not invited. The annual report of the Commissioner of the Mounted Police, which is now in the printer's hands and will be presented to-morrow or next day, deals very fully with these buildings and their construction."

Now, this is an extraordinary position. Here are public buildings erected for the accommodation of the Mounted Police in the North-West Territories without tender, without any competition, and by whom?—by builders? No, Sir, by a coal and navigation company. Now, I want to know what a coal and navigation company has to do with erecting public buildings for the Mounted Police? Who compose this company? What authority has it under its charter to erect public buildings? It is said that Sir Alexander Galt is the president of this company. I searched in the library for the charter of this company, but could not lay my hands on it. But it does appear an extraordinary thing that a contract of this kind should be given to a coal and navigation company. Surely there are carpenters and builders in the North-West who would gladly undertake such a contract. The late High Commissioner is said to be the president of this company. Has it come to this, that the late Lord High Commissioner of Canada has come down to erect stables for the Mounted Police? I trust that the present Lord High Commissioner will not return to the humble occupation of "stable builder." The contract was given to this coal and navigation company for $45,000 without competition, although there were many mechanics and builders quite willing to tender for and undertake the work, had they known such a building was to be erected. We have fair ground for complaint that these contracts should have been given without tender, and especially that, in this latter case, the contract for the erection of the Mounted Police Barracks, should have been given to a coal and navigation company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am really very sorry that this transportation company, headed, it is said, by the late Lord High Commissioner, should have so degraded themselves in the aristocratic mind of the hon. member for West Huron, as to build a barracks. Sir Alexander Galt and his son, were up there looking after this building. They are not above earning an honest penny in putting up buildings and making themselves generally useful, but I am sorry that Sir Alexander Galt has come between the wind and the hon. gentleman's nobility. I will write him that in the mind of the hon. member for West Huron, he has degraded his order, the equestrian order to which he belongs, because he contracted to build a barracks and a stable. Why was it not advertised? advertise it at Calgary, at Fort McLeod. There were carpenters up there, says the hon. gentleman, to build establishments for a hundred men and a hundred horses. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has been at Fort McLeod, if he had, he would know that the present barracks, last autumn, were in imminent danger of being washed away, that they were hanging on by the skin of their teeth to the bank of the river, and it was necessary to put up new barracks. It so happens the coal and transportation company were the only persons there who had a saw mill and a timber limit, and the contract was given to them. Perhaps it will be some consolation to the hon. gentleman to know that there has been a most severe punishment inflicted on Sir Alexander by the fact that he is going to lose a great amount of money through this contract.

Mr. MILLS. Was the timber limit given by private contract too?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was given as all other timber limits in the North-West were given, when I had not much to say about it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would ask the hon. member for Simcoe the way of giving contracts for timber limits.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The first thing the right hon. gentleman did on coming into office was to cancel the license to the hon. member for Simcoe, on the ground that it was not in the public interest to do such things.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was on the ground that the day before the Administration resigned, they granted this timber license.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If it was rightly given, it should not have been cancelled on that ground.

Mr. MILLS. In this case, which the hon. gentleman presents to the House as a precedent, I did grant to certain parties a timber limit which had been applied for months before, and only stood over in consequence of our having been engaged in the elections. It was granted on precisely the same terms as those on which others had been granted for several years, and the reason we adopted the course of granting timber limits by private contract was, that provision had been made for timber limits on public tender, but in the early days of settlement of the North-West we found there were no parties to tender. The difficulty was to get people to accept limits and erect mills for the accommodation of the public. At the time that limit was granted, with very proper restrictions in order to prevent any abuses or attempt to select land specially well timbered, there was but one mill on the Saskatchewan from which the people from Prince Albert or other points where settlements had taken place could be supplied. They were paying upwards of $100 per thousand feet, or thereabouts, at the time that timber limit was granted for the express purpose of creating competition in the public interest. I do not think that is the condition of the North-West to-day. Many persons are engaged in lumbering there now, many mills are erected there, and there are many men there who would be only too glad to have an opportunity of purchasing timber limits. The hon. gentleman undertakes to assign an instance which he declared he disapproved of, and which he disallowed, in my opinion, improperly and against the public interest. But there is no reason for continuing that system, now that the condition of things is entirely changed. The right hon. gentleman knows well that timber limits are sold in Ontario by public auction. He knows well that the same system was adopted in the North-West, but was abandoned on account of the impossibility of carrying it out when the country was new and circumstances different from what they are now. But the hon. gentleman continues his system, obviously, from all we can learn in the papers, in the interests of certain parties. There are instances where timber limits were sold by the hon. gentleman at $5 a square mile to parties who were not engaged in the lumber business at all, but who were merely speculators, and who turned around and sold those limits at $2,000 a square mile. Now, the hon. gentleman assigns as a reason for giving this contract to the transportation company that they are in possession of a timber limit in that country. How did they come in possession of it? How came it about, if timber is so scarce that other parties cannot supply it, that the Government should have placed themselves in that condition towards this company? Has it come about by adopting, in this particular case, with regard to the timber, the policy he has pursued in reference to the contract for this particular building?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I understand the hon. gentleman gave as a reason for cancelling the limit grant in this case that the license was issued the day before we left office.

Mr. MILLS. Not so.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If it were so, the hon. gentleman should not forget that the day before he left office, when a vote of want of confidence was pending against him, he appointed his colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance, to a Governorship, another colleague to a Judgeship, another to another Governorship, and besides, during the week in which he was under the ban of the House altogether, he appointed five or six hundred people besides. Had we taken the same course, the hon. gentleman's followers would have been scattered right and left. Perhaps it was a mistake that we did not; perhaps we were mistaken in our leniency. The hon. gentleman has certainly done enough to open our eyes in the course he has pursued.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad anything is able to open the hon. gentleman's eyes to the mistakes he has made. It has taken him a long time to open his eyes; but do you expect, Mr. Speaker, we are going to have a discussion scattered all over the North-West on this very harmless motion of the hon. member for West Huron? The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) says we made all kinds of appointments before we resigned in 1873. There was a most indignant remonstrance, a most able State paper, which I do not think has ever seen the light, from the hon. gentlemen opposite, pointing out the iniquities of the Government in having done what the hon. gentlemen complain of now. After the elections of 1878, up to the very moment they left office, hon. gentlemen opposite did exactly the same thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will put a motion on the paper, we will discuss it, and I will bring down that important paper, that ably drawn paper, and we will compare how far the remonstrances, the indignant remonstrances, made against their predecessors in 1874 comported with the action of the Government in 1878. I am quite willing to go into that whole subject. The hon. gentleman says I am quoting this as a precedent. No; I did not quote it as a precedent—that is, the case of the hon. member for Simcoe—but, in answer to the hon. gentleman who made this motion, who said that in all cases there must be competition, that everything must be put up for public tender, timber limits and all, I simply said that we followed the example of our predecessors. He says, "Oh, to be sure, we did that; we were right when we were in, but you are not right, now you are in," and he says the circumstances of the case have altered. And so they have altered, and what is the course of the Government? The Government exacts, when a party goes and explores, and applies for a timber limit, that he should bring a plan. If it is within the district within which timber limits are granted, as a reward for his exploration survey, on producing his map to show that he made an exploration survey, he gets his limit for a bonus and a fixed stumpage rate. I think both the bonus and the stumpage are reasonable. They have been always the same, I think. But, if there are more than one applying for it, the limit is put up to competition, and the person who makes the highest tender gets it.

Mr. HESSON. It occurs to me that the hon. member for Bothwell has not drawn a fair distinction between the action of the present Government in reference to the timber limits, and the action of the Government when he was Minister of the Interior. I recollect distinctly that the hon. member for Bothwell granted no less than 200 square miles of timber limits to Mr. Cook, a friend of his own at that time. That hon. gentleman would have obtained a monopoly, and yet it is said to be objectionable for the parties who are now building the Government buildings at Fort McLeod to have a timber limit and a mill. Well, Sir, we have four, where the hon. member would have given the country but one huge monopoly, controlling 200 square miles. The present Government adopted a different policy and limited the quantity to be granted to any person or company to 50 square miles. I think that is an important consideration, and likely to prevent anything like huge monopolies in timber limits in the North-West.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I wish to remind the member for East York, who spoke of the Judges and Governors who were appointed by the Government of 1873, that they appointed them before any adverse vote was given. No adverse vote was ever given in this House, and therefore they enjoyed, under parliamentary usage, the confidence of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH. What does the hon. member for Bothwell say? If he wishes to correct me, he can stand on his feet and correct me in the usual way.

Mr. MILLS. I said nothing. I never said a word.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He never does.

Mr. WOODWORTH. But the Mackenzie Government, when the verdict of the 17th September, 1878, was given, which routed them, according to the common saying, horse foot and artillery, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, knowing that that verdict was so overwhelmingly against them, appointed judges in this country. They appointed Judge Wetherbe, in Halifax; they appointed him to the Supreme Court Bench. I do not know that any governors were appointed. I do not know that there was any vacancy, but I have no doubt that if there had been any vacancies, they would have carried out the same policy.

Mr. BOWELL. They appointed Custom House officers.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Certainly, they did as much as they could, when they knew that the fiat of the people was pronounced at the polls against them; while the Conservative Government, which resigned in this House when no adverse vote was given—and it is not known to-day whether any ever would have been given against them—appointed to office, when they had the reins of power and were sustained by a majority in this House and the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I wish to say one thing more to the hon. gentleman opposite. Perhaps he will say the circumstances were different. The buildings at Battleford cost $90,000—no tenders. At Fort Pelly, they cost over $60,000—no tenders. But, of course, the circumstances were different.

Mr. BOWELL. They were on this side; that is the difference.

Motion agreed to.

MAJOR-GENERAL LUARD.

Mr. MULOCK moved for copies of all letters of complaint respecting the conduct of Major-General Luard, at Cobourg, or elsewhere, sent by Lieut-Col. A. T. Williams, M. P., or any person or persons to the Government, or any member thereof, together with copies of all replies thereto, and of all documents and other correspondence in the possession of the Government relating to such matters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask the hon. gentleman to let that stand.

Mr. MULOCK. Of course I must yield with a good grace, but this is the second time it has stood at the request of the Government, and I was advised the last time to renew the motion, and I have been compelled myself to allow it to drop once.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will take care that the hon. gentleman's motion will get a fair chance.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose this is the last time of asking? Motion allowed to stand.

THE CASE OF DETECTIVE SKIFFINGTON.

Mr. BLONDEAU, in moving for all copies of all reports, letters and documents whatsoever, in relation to the action brought by one Skiffington against Thomas Michaud and Florian Dumais, of St. Pashal, in 1881, before the Justices of the Peace, together with copies of the complaints, orders, evidence, judgments and bills of costs; also of charges made against the said Skiffington, or respecting him, as to the non-payment of the costs attending the actions by him instituted and dismissed with costs against him; also of all correspondence on that subject between private individuals and the Department of Railway, and between the latter and the said Skiffington; also of all documents in relation to the complaint of Auguste Martin, of St. Pascal, Clerk of the said Magistrates' Court, against the said Skiffington, charging that the latter did not pay him his fees and expenses; and of all documents connected therewith, said: To oblige my hon. friends who may not understand French, I will try to explain in the English language my reason for making this motion, although in doing so I must beg the indulgence of this hon. House, as I am not using my native language. In 1881, Mr. Skiffington, the so-called detective of the Intercolonial Railway, applied to the Secretary of the Justice of the Peace at St. Pascal, for two warrants to have Thomas Michaud and Florian Dumais arrested for trespass on the line of the Intercolonial Railway. Of course these two men, who are very peaceable citizens, were greatly annoyed, and in order to protect themselves they employed a lawyer to defend them against the charge brought against them by the said Skiffington. I suppose Skiffington expected to have everything his own way, but when he saw the lawyer championing the case of these two men, he judged it prudent to drop the case against Michaud. As that gentleman does not speak a word of French, and as he had to deal with French people, he had to employ an interpreter through whom to make his proposition to Michaud. The proposition was, that if Michaud would pay the expenses he would withdraw his prosecution against him. But Michaud refused, saying that his case was in the hands of his lawyer and he was ready to proceed with it. When Skiffington saw that he could not get out of his difficulty without proceeding with the cases he had to go on with them, and these two cases were disposed of by the Magistrate, who dismissed both actions with costs against Skiffington. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, you would expect, of course, that Skiffington had to pay the expenses of these two warrants, but such was not the case. Having vainly applied to him many times, finally the secretary to the Justice of the Peace, Mr. Martin, asked me if I would present his bill to the Railway Department. I did so, Mr. Speaker, although this Mr. Martin is not a political friend of mine, and I endeavoured to obtain justice for him just as if he were one of my political friends, and I say that justice must be done in the present case. I myself presented that bill to the manager of the Government railway a year ago, and after having called upon him many times to see if there was any decision, I am to-day no further advanced toward a settlement than I was then. At present, however, Skiffington pretends that he does not remember that he had two peaceable men brought before the Magistrate at St. Pascal, but he says now that two men bearing the same name had been arrested at Rivière du Loup as thieves. Well, Mr. Speaker, what can you think of a man that is trying to conceal the real facts, that is trying to evade the question, and who is trying by one means or another to get rid of paying the costs of his blunder. Sir, I am at a loss to understand how it is that such a man is appointed to so high a position. If we are to judge him by his actions, he can do what he pleases, and have peaceful people arrested and put to heavy expense to defend themselves against his tyranny. How is it that this man does not report his doings to some of the high officials of the railway? If we require any information about his conduct we cannot get it. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is giving too much power to a man of his reputation. How is it that that man, who has been dismissed from the police service of the city of Quebec, has succeeded in obtaining the responsible position he now holds on a Government railway? I do not believe that there is any necessity that such a position should be given to a man of his character. It ought to be given to a man of good reputation, one who can command the respect of the employees of the road and of the public. I do hope that the hon. Minister of Railways will see that that case is settled and not allow any more delay to intervene in the matter. Although I have been told that these papers were to be referred to the hon. Minister of Justice, to see if the Local Government were not obliged to pay these expenses, I must say that, in my humble opinion, the Local Government has nothing to do with the folly of that detective. I hold the Government, or rather the Department of Railways, responsible for the acts of their employees. I claim that justice ought to be done at once by the dismissal of that officer, for he is a black spot on the Department of Railways, and dishonours the position he occupies on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. BILLY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to address this honourable House still less to make my first speech to-day, but the question raised by my hon. friend, the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Blondeau) is one in which my own county is so greatly interested that I will take the liberty of making a few remarks on the subject. These remarks will be as follows: Facts similar to those mentioned by my hon. friend, took place in the county of Rimouski. In 1881, Mr. Skiffington had four farmers' sons, very quiet and law-abiding people, arrested for obstructing the track of the Intercolonial Railway, in the parish of St. Flavie, in the district of Rimouski. As I then had the honour of sitting as a Magistrate for the district of Rimouski, the accused were brought before me and evidence was taken. The examination held on the first day was not sufficient to commit the prisoner, for trial. The examination was adjourned to another day, and when that day arrived other witnesses were heard, with the same result. There was a second adjournment; then a third, and finally the fourth examination brought to light the fact that there were no witnesses to prove the charges made against the accused. I was therefore obliged to discharge the prisoners, and the examination involved a large amount of costs, which were never paid. The clerk of the court applied to the Quebec Government, who refused to pay them. He then applied to the Federal Government, with about the same result. The Province of Quebec holds the plaintiff responsible for the costs of preliminary examination, when such examination fails to establish the guilt of the accused. Furthermore, when it is proved in the preliminary examination that the charge is well founded, the Government of the Province of Quebec only pays the bailiff's charges. Now, if we apply to Mr. Skiffington for the payment of the costs, he will answer: Personally, I have had nothing to do with that; I was an employé of the Government and it was as such that I made the deposition which has caused the arrest of the persons in question. I think that if we examine the Act of British North America, of 1867, we will see that by clause 91, section 17, the Federal Government alone has the right to enact laws concerning criminal offences and the procedure connected therewith, the Provinces having only the power to constitute the courts. Now, I submit that if the Federal Government alone have the right to enact criminal laws, they should pay the cost of carrying out those laws, just as the Provinces pay for the administration of civil justice. That being the case, it seems to me that the Federal Government ought to pay the cost of the administration of criminal justice, and it is for that reason that I call the attention of the House to that question, being, on the other hand, well satisfied that if the Federal Government should take upon themselves the cost of criminal procedure, the Province of Quebec, for one, will not regret it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Minister of Railways is not in his seat, because he would have been in a better position to give the explanations asked by my hon. friend. However, I will not fail to submit the question to him and to draw his attention to it. And I have no doubt that he will do all he can in the matter. There is no objection to granting the motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF ROGER AMERO.

Mr. WOODWORTH, in moving for a copy of despatches in reference to the arrest, detention and indictment of Roger Amero, a French Acadian, belonging to Digby, N. S., discharged from custody on an indictment for murder, in the State of Massachusetts, United States, said: The facts are simply these: A man of the name of Roger Amero, belonging to Digby, N.S., a French Acadian by birth, had the misfortune to be arrested in Digby by two detectives from Massachusetts, United States, on a charge of murder. On evidence, which I think altogether insufficient, he was extradited and taken by the detectives to Massachusetts. That was some time last March, and he was put in jail and kept there until a short time ago, making some nine months altogether, I understand, in jail. It was then found that instead of his being connected in any way or having anything to do with the murder of a woman by the name of Mrs. Etta G. Carlton, at Watertown, Massachusetts, he was in the town of Gloucester at the time the murder was committed, and for a week afterwards, a fact which ought to have transpired long before it did. So heated was the public mind in Massachusetts at the time of this foul and atrocious murder that, had the trial taken place last June, he would, no doubt, have been hanged, and yet he was perfectly innocent of any crime. The detectives, whose duty it was to gather all evidence, and the prosecuting attorney, whose duty to a stranger was to see that he had a fair trial, failed to perform their duty. The Attorney General, I think his name was Sherman, instead of doing that, gathered all the circumstantial evidence that was possible against the prisoner, kept him in jail during all the time, and it was not until Governor Butler, who is best known as General Butler, was asked by counsel, Messrs. Crowley and Gale, to place detectives at their disposal to look up the evidence and see if the prisoner was really guilty, and whether he had any connection with the crime or not, that two detectives were detailed by him, at the expense of the State, and placed at the service of the counsel to defend Amero. They went to Gloucester, and found that he was at Gloucester at the time of the murder, and could not have any connection with the crime which was committed at Watertown, a good many miles distant. Even then, Attorney General Sherman, in the court, refused, until a few days ago, to complete the discharge of Amero, and enter a nolle prosequi, and the Judge told him he thought it was his duty to do so, as there was not one tittle of evidence against the prisoner. It was not until then that Amero was released. I understand the pretext for that un-British, unmanly, inhuman conduct on the part of the Attorney General in Massachusetts was that the real culprits were still at large and; if he kept Amero, this poor French Canadian, in jail, the minds of the real culprits would be relieved, and it was supposed that it would thereby be more easy to secure the real criminals. It is broadly stated in the papers of the United States that this was the pretext on which they kept this man in jail. Amero, after being released, became a maniac. His two sisters, who were in Digby at the time of his arrest, became also insane, and have gone to an asylum. The family is broken up. There is a mortgage of $300 on the place, and a foreclosure is threatened. I do not wish to inveigh in improper terms against the conduct of Attorney General Sherman, or against the two detectives; but it seems to me that the Extradition Act must be a little faulty if it permits detectives to come from the United States, or any other country, and take from our shores any person on such flimsy pretexts as they took Amero. There was a reward of $3,500 offered to anyone who would secure the conviction of the guilty party. This was a very great temptation, and those men were bound to convict Amero. And I must here say that the thanks of Canadians are due to Governor Butler for the humane and Christian conduct he evinced on that occasion. It was not his legal duty—and everyone knows he is an eminent lawyer—to detail detectives to help the defence to work up their case, but he did it for humanitarian reasons, and as a philanthropic and humane man; and I understand from good authority and from reading the newspapers as to what took place in court, that the Attorney General complained of the action of the Governor, and sent a note to the Governor, saying, that while he was on one side of the case the Governor was on the other; to which the Governor replied that he had doubts in regard to the case, and was resolved to obtain the full evidence in regard to it, so that they might be able to decide whether Amero was guilty or not. So we have the fact that Amero was in jail nine months, and that on being released he had to go to a mad house; also that his father was in jail eight months, for the laws of the United States allow the confinement of a witness until the day of trial, unless he can give proper bonds for his appearance. Then we have the fact that the two sisters became insane. Too much praise cannot be given to Judge Savary, of Digby, who was most indefatigable in his efforts to give Amero a fair trial. Day after day and week after week he continued his efforts, and he even solicited subscriptions to have the prisoner properly defended, and the bar of Nova Scotia subscribed so that counsel might be obtained. To show you what was thought in the United States of this terrible miscarriage of justice, this outrage, as it proved to be, I will read what is stated in this newspaper, which is called the Lynn Bee. The article is headed, "Detectives and Rewards:"

"The public will clearly remember the facts connected with the brutal murder of Mrs. Etta G. Carlton, at Watertown, Mass., and the subsequent arrest, confinement and extradition of Roger Amero for the crime. The public will also call to mind the peculiar and romantic particulars of his arrest by Detectives Wood and Wiggin, the confession of his uncle, and the seemingly strong and conclusive evidence that was collected by those enterprising officers. So great was the public stir that fears were entertained of lynching, and every precaution was taken to prevent such unlawful proceedings. Amero has been incarcerated in prison for nine long and weary months. The public have impatiently clamoured to have him tried and, if guilty, executed, and could not understand why there was delay in having him brought to justice. To-day the whole matter is explained by the announcement that the case against Roger Amero for the murder of Etta G. Carlton, is nolle prosequi for lack of evidence. To-day this poor ignorant Frenchman is turned adrift penniless, broken in spirit and character, to go home half crazed by the accusation of the terrible crime of murder—home where two sisters are said to have gone mad from brooding over his unjust arrest—home to his old associates, to have the finger of scorn and slander pointed at him as a man accused and arrested for the most horrible crime in the criminal annals. Why is this? It is solely and simply because there was $3,500 reward offered for the conviction of the murderer of Mrs. Carlton. Whatever explanation may be offered, the detectives in charge of this case must long ago have known that this man was innocent. When it comes to be understood that they did not dare bring the case before an intelligent jury, the public will realize on what slender evidence they have made this poor fellow's name a by-word. It is a burning shame, a disgrace to the detective profession, an insult to humanity and an outrage on justice: Amero may be and probably is a poor, ignorant and shiftless fellow—

I may say that this is a mistake, as Amero was an industrious, sober and hard working man—

"but to barter what honour he had, to craze people with grief at his danger and disgrace, to sell his life for $3,500 reward, is a business compared to which the slave trade and robbing graveyards for gain is honourable and respectable. We submit that the rich and prosperous State of Massachusetts has allowed a dastardly wrong to be committed against a poor and unoffending man. There should be some redress for him. If he had been rich and powerful, the whole country would have been ablaze with his wrongs. But poor and penniless, he is allowed to be wronged and ruined with feeble protest. Let an example be made of those responsible for the injustice done this innocent man, that detectives may not be so fast in the future to manufacture evidence to secure a liberal reward."

I think, Sir, that representations, possibly, ought to be made by this Government, or that, at all events, some remuneration should be made to this man and his family for this arrest—made it is true under the guise of law, but without sufficient evidence, and with this reward staring the detectives in the face. He was cruelly kept in jail, when the detectives either should have known that there was not evidence against him, or else there was a dereliction of the plainest duty, which was, to find if the evidence was sufficient, to find, at least, that Amero was in Gloucester when the murder was committed in Watertown. I think that thanks are certainly due to Governor Butler, but for whose humane action this man, I believe, would have been imprisoned, if not hanged.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This case, detailed so feelingly by my hon. friend, who has made the motion, is pitiable in its details—I never heard a worse case—and pressed as it has been before this House, it requires the most searching investigation. Of course it is a matter upon which the Government, I do not think, can directly intervene. This person, who appears to be innocent—who, at all events, has been discharged for want of evidence against him—was surrendered under the Treaty of Extradition—handed over, as in other cases, to the American authorities—the Canadian Government placing implicit trust in the good faith that the extradited persons should be justly treated when they are surrendered. That is the conventional arrangement between every two nations who have an Extradition Treaty, having confidence in each other's laws and in their administration. If there be in this case such a sad departure from all the rules of just and right, I think it might be well to consider it as an exceptional case, and that extra efforts should be made to compensate, so far as can be, this unfortunate man for the domestic and family ruin which has been caused by the proceedings in this case. The papers will be brought down at once, and then, perhaps, some further action will be taken upon them.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Motions for the following Returns were severally agreed to:—

Return of a detailed statement of the amount paid Mr. Joham O'Brien on his contract for building the Princess Louise, with the respective dates and the respective amounts paid, together with any certificates upon which the same or any portion has been paid.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Return showing the length, in miles, of the Intercolonial Railway, between Rivière du Loup and Moncton, and the original cost of constructing the same; also the length of said road between the boundary of New Brunswick and Truro, together with the cost thereof, not including the rolling stock.—(Mr. Burpee, Sunbury.)

1. Copies of all Orders in Council or Departmental Orders respecting the reservation for a town site at Fort McLeod; 2. Copies of all orders or regulations respecting the said town, the terms and conditions on which it is proposed to dispose of the same; 3. Copies of all claims made for any portion thereof by squatters or others, all rulings of the Department in respect thereof; 4. Copies of all correspondence on any of the said points.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Copies of all correspondence, tenders and accounts in connection with the purchase of moccasins by the Department of Militia and Defence during the year 1883.—(Mr. Somerville, Brant.)

Correspondence regarding the purchase of tents during 1883, by the Department of Militia and Defence.—(Mr. Somerville, Brant.)

Return showing the amount paid for drawback on cotton duck used for sails for ships and fishing boats, under the authority of the Customs Act of last year; Return to show to whom paid, the amount paid to each, and whether for sails of ships or fishing boats.—(Mr. Kirk.)

Statement showing the amounts derived from the sale of buildings on the Intercolonial Railway, between Hadlow and Rivière du Loup, inclusively; by whom sold, the name of the purchaser and the price paid for each building.—(Mr. Blondeau.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:10 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 4th March, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FRAUD IN RELATION TO CONTRACTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that an order was made some time ago referring the Bill for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys to a Special Committee, and that owing to the fact that no quorum of that Committee has been obtained no report has yet been made. Perhaps the House would order that a new Committee be struck, or that the Committee should meet for the purpose of making a report, or perhaps some other course might be ordered by the House in order that we may arrive at a conclusion. I make this suggestion in order that the Government who have the guidance of the House in such cases may decide what course they will adopt in the matter. I confess, for my own part, that I have been guilty of not attending one meeting of the Committee, and I do not desire to throw any blame on members of the Committee, who, I have no doubt, were prevented from attending for good reasons. The Committee has been called six or seven times, and though five out of its nine members constitute a quorum, no quorum has yet been obtained.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. member will see that having called the attention of the House to this matter, he has done sufficient, I have no doubt, to induce members of the Committee to have a meeting soon, in order that they may dispose of the matter which was referred to them by the House. The hon. gentleman says that he himself was absent some few days. The hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, and probably some other members, were in the same position, or else were occupied on some other Committee. If the hon. member takes care to speak to the members of the Committee, I have no doubt a day and an hour for a meeting may be arranged, as there can be no desire on the part of members of the Committee not to meet and obey the order of the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. I think it will answer very well. There is a notice of a meeting of the Committee for to-morrow, and if there is not a sufficient attendance, I may move that the quorum be reduced, or take some other course.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT ACT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill respecting the independence of Parliament Act of 1878, 41 Victoria, Chapter 5, said: The first clause provides that that Act shall be amended by declaring:

Provided further, that nothing in this section shall render ineligible any person holding any office, commission, or employment of the nature or description mentioned in such section (A) of this clause as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein, if, by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided that he shall hold such office, commission, or employment, without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emoluments or profits of any kind, that may be attached thereto.

Another clause makes provision for the seat of my hon. friend who sits near me. I shall propose that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the proper stage.

Mr. BLAKE. I move an amendment to add the following words:—

“And to impair the efficiency of the said independence of Parliament Act.”

Amendment negatived on the following division:—

Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that for the remainder of the Session Government business shall have precedence on Thursday after Routine business.

Mr. BLAKE. I regret that the hon. gentleman has proposed this motion, because during the greater part of this Session already the hon. gentleman has taken for Government business almost all of the days for private members. Therefore, the practical result of the proposal is to infringe at a very much earlier period than usual upon those days which are devoted to private members. There is the less necessity for it, because Government business can always be proceeded with on any day after the close of private members' business. Considering the time already occupied in the consideration of the Canadian Pacific Railway Resolutions and the course now proposed, practically nearly the whole time of Parliament will have been given up to Government measures.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman. We have five days in the week and Mondays and Wednesdays are still reserved for business in the hands of private members. I think that last Session there was a general impression that our Sessions were too long, and we met early in January this year to meet the well understood wishes of the House. The Government have some important measures, but they are not numerous, as will be seen by the paper. I believe it is the feeling of this House that, if possible, prorogation should take place before Easter; and, with the assistance of the House, and with an understanding on both sides, that in considering future measures we shall not have so many or such long speeches, I think we shall be able to get through the business by that time. At the outside, prorogation should take place by the 14th of April, so that hon. members can feel that they have done their duty to their country without seriously impairing their own private affairs. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we shall give every facility for the consideration of measures and motions in the hands of private members. By the exercise of kindness and courtesy across the floor, I do not think that any measure will be shoved out or prevented from receiving due attention by the House. But I think that under the circumstances, if the House is willing, I must proceed with my motion.

Motion agreed to on a division.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 36) to authorize a further advance to the Province of Manitoba, in aid of the Public Schools therein.—(Sir Leonard Tilley.)

Bill (No. 37) to provide for the salary and travelling allowances of the Judges of the County Court of Cariboo in the Province of British Columbia.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

INDIAN BANDS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the third reading of Bill (No. 22) for conferring certain privileges on the more advanced bands of the Indians of Canada, with the view of training them for the exercise of municipal powers.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. First Minister said the other day he thought some alterations might be made. He has decided evidently to let the Bill remain as it is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will be very glad to confer with the hon. gentleman privately on this Bill, but in the meantime I think it had better go through.

Mr. BLAKE. The conference will then be no use so far as this House is concerned.

Bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Ways and Means.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I would very gladly, had it suited the convenience of this House, have replied to the hon. gentleman on Friday last, because I think that every one who has read the speech which the hon. gentleman delivered will admit it was one to which it would have been better to reply on the spot. If, Sir, the reasoning and the facts advanced by an hon. gentleman who addresses this House are to be judged by the conclusions at which he arrives, I think we may fairly assume that, so far as the public outside are concerned if they take the trouble to follow the hon. gentleman to his conclusions, there is not much likelihood of any serious damage being done by the speech he delivered. I find that after the hon. gentleman had given us numerous details as to the loss this country had sustained, he concluded with this extraordinary statement:

"For myself, I will not hesitate to say that, looking at the thing all round, I believe we would have done better if we had borrowed $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 and thrown the money into the sea, or had blown it away in fire works, as other nations have done, than allow these hon. gentlemen to control the administration of this country. Five years of their government have done as much mischief to Canada, relatively to our population and resources, as four years of civil war did to the country and the people to the south of us."

When an hon. gentleman, who has occupied the position of Finance Minister in this country, whose position in this country was so high that he has been honoured by his Sovereign by being decorated, will venture to make a statement of this kind in the face of Parliament and the country, I think we may fairly say, either that he has lost all sense of that responsibility which should attach to hon. gentlemen when they address Parliament, or that he has become thoroughly reckless as to the effect anything he may say will have. Not only did he state this as his first conclusion, but his second conclusion was also remarkable:

"More, Sir; I say it with regret, but I say that the people of Canada have deliberately retrograded; I say that the people of Canada have not shown, as a whole, that regard for their liberty, that jealous watchfulness of people in power, that is the price that every free nation must pay for being properly governed. I say that to-day, in Canada, to our shame and loss be it said, public morality is painfully low and public opinion is painfully weak."

That is the statement of the hon. gentleman who appears now to rejoice in having made it. I tell the hon. gentleman that the people of this country will weigh those words and ponder over them; I tell the hon. gentleman that the people of this country will not quietly submit to insult, simply because they have chosen to believe that the hon. gentleman's administration of their affairs was not in the interest of the country, and therefore exercise their undoubted right of relegating him to the position he now occupies. The hon. gentleman commenced his speech by telling us that an Act of Parliament had prevented his being here during last Session. We have heard that statement before from other quarters, but what is the fact with regard to the hon. gentleman himself? He represents to-day a constituency for which he might have run if the people would only have selected him in 1882—a constituency which he represents to-day as the result of the great pressure brought to bear upon a representative assembly of the Liberal party in that constituency by the hon. leader and the ex-leader of the Opposition, who told them that the discussion of financial questions in this House was likely to occupy a much greater amount of attention in future, and that the presence of the hon. gentleman in Parliament was of great importance to the party, and who thus succeeded by a majority of two in an assembly of some 120 of the Liberals of the Riding in inducing them to nominate him and to send him here to occupy the position he now holds. I dare say the hon. gentleman felt keenly the rebuke, for it was practically a rebuke, which was administered to him by that convention at that time; I dare say he is still smarting under that rebuke today when he tells them, as he tells the country, that they have woefully retrograded, that their moral tone is lowered and their public opinion painfully weak. Does the hon. gentleman say that he was out of Parliament last Session in consequence of an Act of Parliament? Where was the county of Lennox which he had represented for years and which he used to carry by from six to eight hundred majority? It was open to him, if he had so chosen, to go there. The party in power to-day had been in office for four years; their policy was before the country; its effects were known to the people; the hard times which, he said, had deceived the people into supporting his opponents had passed away, and he might have gone back to his old constituency. But no; he did not go then, and what is more, he did not go even at the last vacancy in that constituency where he was best known, but preferred on the contrary, that the extraordinary course should be pursued of opening what was probably the safest constituency for the party in the Province of Ontario, in order that he might take his seat in this House. And, Sir, in the constituency which he did run for, in the constituency of Centre Wellington, what was the fact? Was he left out of that constituency by the effect of an Act of Parliament? Was that the cause of his defeat? Why, Sir, in the townships composing that constituency which were in the constituency in 1878, and where my hon. friend who now represents it obtained at that time a majority of only six, the hon. gentleman was left in a minority of 130, with all the prestige of his position surrounding him. And with these evidences that the people, at any rate, have no confidence in him, he comes to this House, under the peculiar circumstances under which he has come to it, and deliberately, in the first serious speech he has to make, insults the people of Canada in the manner which I have quoted here. The hon. gentleman told us that the tone of the Finance Minister was somewhat different from the tone of the Finance Minister at the last Session of Parliament, and he, apparently in a tone of rejoicing, suggested to us that this policy, it was now admitted, would not avert over-production and consequent injury to manufacturers, or avert loss of wages to their unfortunate employes, that it would not avert poor harvests or give larger markets for lumber, or check over-importation, and he tells us true enough. Yes, true enough, but was that an evidence that his policy was correct? Because, forsooth, there are certain things that no policy which can possibly be adopted can avert, therefore the doctrine of the hon. gentleman, as carried out when he was in office, was that those evils which may be averted, those things which may be done, shall not be done, but we shall fold our arms and look on, and, admitting that Providence over-rules us, admitting that harvests may be bad without our influence, admitting that, merchants may over-import, that manufacturers may over-produce, admitting all these things, we will simply fold our arms, and refuse to do the things which we can do and which the policy of this Government has shown we can do wisely and well, for the promotion of the interests of the country. The hon. gentleman then went on to speak of the enormous taxation which exists in Canada to-day, and, with a forgetfulness of the exact facts of the case, he made a statement which, in view of the fact that he has been Finance Minister and is to-day the financial exponent of a great party in this country, I think he ought not to have made. He tells us that the taxes of this country to-day are $35,000,000, and upon that basis he undertakes to compare the position of Canada with the position of the United States and with that of England, coming to the conclusion, advising all and sundry who may be interested in knowing anything of our position, that the people of Canada are in a worse plight than those of the mother country or of the United States in respect of taxation. Why, the hon. gentleman knows that, of that $35,000,000, there were at least $6,524,950 that were not taxes in any form or shape. As well might the hon. gentleman charge that the merchants of Canada are paying taxes for the freight charges they pay to the independent railway companies of the country as to say that they are suffering taxation from the fact that they are paying for the transport of their goods over the Intercolonial Railway. As well might he charge that the people of this country are suffering taxation for any service that is performed for them, as to say they are suffering taxation from the postal service that is provided for them. And so with other branches of the public service. As I say, of that $35,000,000, no less than over $6,524,950 cannot, by any fair statement, be called taxation for the people of this country. But the whole system, as it seems to me, of charging the revenues of the country as taxation, and of citing that as the measure of the burdens of the people is an entirely fallacious system. Let me point out one or two facts in connection with it. I take 1874-75, and I find that the revenues which the hon. gentleman had during that year were $24,648,715. I take 1877-78, and I find that the revenue which the hon. gentleman had was $22,375,012, or a decrease of revenue during that period of $2,273,703. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to tell us that the taxation of this country was higher in 1874-75 than in 1877-78? Why, he had introduced amendments to the Tariff adding $1,600,000 to the taxation of the people of this country during that interval; and, so far from it being a measure of the burdens of the people, it was in fact but a measure of this, that the people in 1877-78 were less able to purchase goods, were less able to enjoy luxuries, were less able in fact to live comfortably, and, therefore, the receipts by the Government were less than they were in 1874-75. Why, the rate of duty paid by the people of Canada in 1874-75 was 12.83. In 1877-78 when we had the smaller revenue and therefore the less taxation, it was 14.03 per cent. That was the condition of things between those two periods. Then, I take other periods. I take 1867-68 and 1873-74, and I find that our revenues in 1867-68 were $11,700,681, and in 1873-74 they were $20,123,185, and that, between those periods, the Government of this country had actually reduced taxation by taking duties off a number of articles which were taxable in 1867-68. Will it be pretended that the burden of taxation in this country was greater in 1873-74 than it was in 1867-68? I venture to say that no man outside of this House, or inside of this House, who looks at this question fairly and desires to deal with it fairly, will pretend for a moment to say that the receipts of the Government are the measure of the burden of taxation of the people of this country. Why, during the last half year, we have had a great reduction in the receipts by the Government. Have taxes gone down? The greater part of the hon. gentleman's speech was devoted to telling us that the people of this country were worse off than they were in the corresponding period of the previous year. Surely they were not worse off by the fact that they were less taxed. That was not the reason for their being worse off. Therefore, this whole system of taking the receipts of the Government as a measure of the burden of taxation in this country is an utterly fallacious system which I think the hon. gentleman ought not to have resorted to in the discussion of a subject like this on the floor of Parliament, in view of the fact that all his utterances—unless indeed people will go to the end of his speech and read the two passages which I quoted in opening my remarks—everything that he says here, may be used outside to the prejudice, not of a party in power, which is a matter after all of secondary importance, but to the prejudice of the country itself, and of its best interests. Now, it is said, and truly said that we have had a period of less prosperity than we had a year ago. It is quite true that there have been some insolvencies, some failures in the country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Surely not.

Mr. WHITE. But what are the facts in regard to them? I find that during last year the number of insolvents was 1,384, and the amount of liabilities $15,949,361. I find that in 1879, which was the year when we felt the greatest effect of the depression which existed previous to that time, we had 1,902 failures, and $29,347,937 as the liabilities of those failures. But, Sir, in reference to the failures of last year it is only fair to refer to those which occurred in Manitoba and the North-West. The hon. the Finance Minister, in referring to this matter the other day, spoke of the failures in Winnipeg—I presume he meant those in Manitoba and the North-West; and I find, Sir, that the failures in Manitoba and the North-West during the last year were 232, with liabilities of $2,869,000. So that, taking a fair comparison of the failures in the two periods I have mentioned, we find that the failures during last year were 1,152, and the amount of liabilities $13,080,000, as against 1,902 failures in 1879, and liabilities of $29,347,937. But, Sir, if we take the increase in the number of traders in that time we will find the comparison still more significant. In 1879 there were 56,000 traders in Canada, and 1,902 failures, or one failure to every twenty-nine traders; while in 1883 there were 65,000 traders with 1,384 failures, or one failure to every forty-seven traders. That was the difference between the two periods of 1879 and 1883. Now, Sir, there were failures in the United States during that period as well. The failures there increased almost exactly in the same proportion that they increased in Canada during the last three years. In the United States the number of failures rose from 4,735, in 1880, to 9,184, in 1883, and the liabilities from $65,752,000 to $172,874,000. Now, Sir, what was the opinion of those who, after all, have, perhaps, the best means of knowing the exact condition of the country? I find that Dun, Wiman & Co., in their report, referring to the condition of things in the United States, in spite of those large failures, said this:

"While, on the one hand, the disasters of the year that is closed have shown weak spots in the commercial fabric, which were least expected in prosperous times, there are undeniable evidences of a stability and profit existing which few occurrences make public. It is safe to say that there is to-day in the United States a greater number of successful business men than ever before; that there are numerous departments of manufacture and trade which are yielding a liberal return, that corporations of immense wealth, influence and usefulness are prosperous beyond what they have ever been before in their history, and that monetary institutions throughout the land are on a generally safe and paying basis. The season just ended has been an extremely favourable one for the "cattle upon a thousand hills," taking into the winter all four-footed animals in the best condition, and leaving them less dependent upon winter supplies, which will thus be saved. The additions to our population by immigration, and the contributions to the wealth of the country from that source have been greater than in any previous year. Sections of the country, which in former years were either unproductive or depressed, are now thriving beyond all former experience."

Now, Sir, that was the statement of Messrs. Dun, Wiman & Co., in relation to the failures in the United States, which had increased in the same proportion as they have increased in Canada. What was the statement of the same firm in relation to Canada itself, last fall, in the city of Montreal, which, I suppose, I may say is, to a very considerable extent, the barometer by which may be tested the commercial condition of the Dominion of Canada? There were parties in that city attempting to create almost a panic in connection with commercial matters, and Mr. W. W. Johnston, manager of Dun, Wiman & Co., Montreal, published the following circular, dated 28th October, 1883:—

"It is to be deeply regretted that sensational rumours and innuendoes reflecting upon the collective and individual credit of our banks and merchants are daily circulated. For a month past every day has brought with it a crop of these exciting causes of uneasiness. No class of trade interests being exempt from attack.

"In our opinion, after gathering pretty close data at most points, there is no good reason for apprehending any general commercial distress. The conditions which lead to general weakness are largely non-existent. No one short crop will cause any great or lasting trouble. With the effect still felt of previous fair harvests in our favour, the temporary evil of one low average growth can well be endured. Commercial interests will still maintain sufficient vitality to be secure from serious interruption.

"Most of the stoppages we have seen have been created by the most natural causes—would occur in the best of times and carry but little real significance with them—in so far as their reflection upon a community is concerned. If such interests drop quietly out from time to time it is a positive help.

"Many will remember the excitement of last spring and the character of most of the concerns which went to the wall. Wonder was afterward commonly expressed that the sensations of that time should have reached the pitch they did.

"Within the past ten days, we have been asked the most ridiculous questions about some of our oldest and strongest houses. One of the latest—a house handling a capital of several hundred thousand dollars, with a bank balance in its favour of $50,000 or more, and with a well managed business. Another, with a balance in its favour of near $30,000, conservative and able to pick its custom.

"No censure can be too severe upon the authors of these rumours, and if created in selfish interests, they take on a colouring disgraceful and unworthy in the extreme."

That was the opinion of the local manager of Dun, Wiman & Co., in the city of Montreal, in relation to the condition of trade in that city at that time. Well, Sir, I go further. At that time a number of the merchants of Montreal were interviewed, and their views were obtained as to the absolute condition of trade. I will not trouble the House with reading all these statements, but I find that almost every one spoken to gave testimony to the effect that, while business was quiet, there was no ground for serious alarm; there was soundness at bottom, and there was no serious fear as to what the effect of the temporary depression would be. I find, for instance, that Mr. A. F. Gault said:

"The merchants generally, he believed, looked forward to a fair trade in the spring. The importations were considerably less this fall, as compared with the last two or three years. The cotton trade had improved somewhat since the last reports."

I find that Mr. J. S. McLachlan, of the firm of McLachlan Bros. & Co., reported:

"A fair fall trade, but payments had been delayed, owing to the late harvest, which had been fully two weeks behind any previous year. Importations were, of course, lighter than during the past two or three years, owing to the increase in home manufacture. The importations for the spring trade, he thought, would be considerably lighter than last year. In all classes of home manufacture, the prices had been lower than they had ever been before."

Then, Sir, I find that the Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau, whose opinions, I presume, will be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite—unless, indeed, the vote he gave in another place last night may have some effect upon them—but I find that he is reported to have stated:—

"That while the sales have not been very good the remittances have, on the whole, been satisfactory. The stocks held generally throughout the country were light, and business in the town and other small centres was not, in his estimation, overcrowded. There had been a large number of failures during the first six months, but during the latter part of the year the number had been very limited indeed. The importations had been much lighter this fall than during the last two or three years, and their orders for the coming spring were about 25 per cent. less than last year. The state of the cotton trade had, he thought, been grossly misrepresented, and was not nearly so bad as some people tried to make out. He did not believe, either, that the manufacturers were so overcrowded with goods as had been stated."

Then, Sir, I find that Mr. James O'Brien, of the firm of James O'Brien & Co., wholesale clothiers, reported

"A splendid fall trade, with very fair payments. The stocks held throughout the country were not generally speaking large, and the business in the towns was not more overdone than it had been during the last twenty years."

Messrs. Cantlie, Ewan & Co., reported

"The trade this fall rather quiet, but still what business was being done was a good, sound business. Remittances were very good; the importations had been much lighter this fall than during the last few years, and one wholesale dry goods firm had reported to them that their importations for the spring would be £11,000 less than last year. This did not mean that the sales of this firm would be any less than this year, but simply that they would sell just that quantity of Canadian instead of imported goods."

Mr. Thomas Workman, whose opinion as a merchant I fancy, will have some weight in this House, declared that "The volume of business doing was scarcely equal to last year, but still it had been very satisfactory so far, and payments had been very fair. The stocks held throughout the country were, if anything, a little large, and there were rather too many people in business in the towns, but he did not feel at all discouraged; he thought that the future was very promising. There would not, he thought, be a very extensive business done during the coming season, but he could not see any elements of danger, which some people seemed to anticipate."

I might go on reading a number of these, but I will not detain the House with reading more than this additional one: Mr. Hutchison, vice-President of the Dominion Commercial Travellers' Association, a body of gentlemen, who have probably as good means of knowing what the condition of trade is, as any person can have, at the annual dinner of that Association, given in the Windsor Hotel, at the end of December last, made this statement:

"Let me say, shortly, then, as the result of personal experience, as well as from information gathered by comparing notes with brother travellers, we do not regard the commercial outlook of the country such as by any means to occasion alarm."

That, Sir, was the position of trade in the estimation of a gentleman whose means of knowing what was going on were probably as good as those which almost any other gentleman could possess. Then I find on December 1st, Mr. Smithers, Manager of the Bank of Montreal and President of that institution, made this statement:

"They did not anticipate any serious difficulty on the part of importers and manufacturers in meeting their engagements falling due in February and March, and they had no indications of any strain on the mercantile community. They could not recall the name of any firm that had made any unusual propositions to them, their lines of discount being all down and very reasonable."

And the managers of the Merchants, Commerce, People's, British North American, Molson's and Toronto Banks, all expressed practically the same opinion at that particular time, in relation to the condition of trade in this country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Might I ask the hon. gentleman, without interrupting him, the date of Dun Wiman & Co.'s letter?

Mr. WHITE. October 20th. Then, Sir, I have an authority as recent as December 1st, 1883, which hon. gentlemen opposite usually regard as a tolerably good authority. I mean the authority of the Toronto Globe, which, in a lucid interval, said as follows, in regard to the condition of trade:

"Our export trade has grown rapidly. In nine months of this year the value of cattle and sheep sent to Great Britain exceeded the value of the wheat and flour we sent. This year we have had a magnificent hay crop, and the root crop has been good in many sections. We should, therefore, be able to export more cattle and more butter and cheese, and thus make up to a great extent for the shortage of the grain crop. Our lumber trade, too, is depressed, but it is not by any means in as bad a condition as it has often been before. On the whole, the prospect, although clouded and somewhat gloomy, is not such as to justify the alarm which seems to be felt in some quarters."

These are the opinions of a number of persons in relation to the condition of trade. But we have another test, and after all, perhaps it is one of the best tests that can be applied as to the condition of trade, and that is the position of the banks in the different intervals. I find, Sir, the condition of the banks at the end of 1882 and 1883 respectively, gives us an exceedingly good estimate of what was the condition of trade. The following are the figures:—

CIRCULATION AND LOANS.
	Dec., 1882.	Dec., 1883.
Circulation.....	$36,501,694	$33,589,454
Loans on stocks .....	$16,861,583	$10,415,155
Loans to commercial companies .....	12,153,533	15,254,866
Discounts.....	144,414,188	133,378,550
Over-due debts.....	3,131,551	4,396,298
Total loans .....	$176,560,774	$163,444,869

Then I take the cash resources of the banks, which were, in fact, much larger in 1883 than 1882. They increased in the aggregate—I will not trouble the House with going over the details—from $41,077,273 to $52,184,833, an aggregate increase during that time of $11,000,000. Then the condition of the exchanges was exceedingly favourable to the banks, comparing these two periods. The statement is as follows:—

	Dec., 1882.	Dec., 1883.
Due United States .....	$ 211,375	$ 135,141
Due Great Britain.....	1,349,442	1,430,171
	$1,560,817	$1,565,312
Due from United States.....	$11,140,072	$18,060,156
Due from Great Britain.....	1,813,235	4,225,913
	$12,953,307	$22,286,069

The deposits were practically maintained during the period. They were as follows:—

	Dec., 1882.	Dec., 1883.
Dominion Government deposits.....	$ 8,468,228	$ 7,032,410
Provincial Government deposits.....	2,192,045	3,176,330
Public deposits.....	96,879,514	96,609,746

But I come to another point, and that is the condition of bank stocks. The hon. Finance Minister has made reference to this matter. I am aware that the condition of bank stocks is not always to be taken as an absolutely accurate test of the condition of the commerce of the country; but it has its influence, and it must be regarded as an important factor in determining that condition. Sir, what do we find? That for eleven banks, Montreal, Ontario, People's, Molson's, Toronto, Jacques Cartier, Merchants, Eastern Townships, Commerce, Quebec and Hamilton, the aggregate value of those stocks on January 2nd, 1879, amounted to $38,357,000, and on the 2nd January, 1884, to $48,803,000, or an increase in the value of the stocks of those eleven banks during the period from 1879 to 1884 of no less than $10,446,000; and curiously enough since this Parliament opened we have had an increase in the value of the stocks of those eleven banks, amounting to nearly $3,000,000, the exact figures being $2,977,000. But still more strange, I find that since the speech of the hon. gentleman, since the commercial people of Canada have had the opportunity of knowing what terrible losses this country has sustained, since they heard that there were some $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 which might as well have been thrown into the sea, or sent off in fire-crackers, as other nations have done, the stocks of these banks have increased nearly $500,000. They are actually to-day more valuable than they were five days ago, according to the reports of yesterday's transactions on 'Change, by the sum of $430,000. I think I may accept that fact as an evidence, at any rate, that whatever effect the hon. gentleman's speech may have had in this House, it did not very seriously alarm those who are in the habit of dealing in commercial transactions, and of studying precisely what is the position of commercial affairs. Then with regard to the shipping trade, how was it during the last year? I find that the total tonnage of vessels arriving in the city of Montreal in 1880, was, 628,271; in 1881, 531,929; in 1882, 554,646; in 1883, 664,263; or an increase of very nearly 111,000 tons last year as compared with the year before, in the tonnage of vessels which visited the port of Montreal. Those figures certainly do not look as if we were suffering very seriously in connection with the commerce of the country, in spite of the quietness which prevailed in many respects. Let us take next the Post Office and Government savings banks. The Finance Minister has already given us the figures, the total deposits for the year amounting to $17,722,094. There has been a steady increase in those deposits as the following figures show. The increase in 1879 was, $710,669; in 1880, $1,845,272; in 1881, $4,783,715; in 1882, $5,931,989; in 1883, $4,450,415. Those were the increases during the last six years. Last year with all the depression of which we heard, with all the misery that was said to exist among the people of this country, there was actually an increase of $4,500,000 in the deposits of the people in the Government and Post Office savings banks of the country. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to say that he did not regard those figures as an absolute evidence of prosperity, or as a thing to be rejoiced at. He told us that they indicated two things: First, that the Government were paying 4 per cent. for money, which, in the ordinary banks of the country, was worth only 3 or 3½ per cent., and that therefore they were out-bidding the chartered banks for deposits of the people's earnings. Then he told us further, that it was an evidence that this money, which was lying in the Post Office and other Government savings banks, ought to be employed in ordinary commercial or industrial pursuits outside. As to the latter argument I confess I was somewhat astonished when I found the hon. gentleman after laying down that doctrine, telling us that already there were ten millions of the people's money in this country invested in non-productive industries. What does the hon. gentleman want? If the people put their money in the savings banks they are told that they are making a great mistake, that they should put it in the productive industries. If, on the other hand, they put their money in productive industries, they are taunted with putting ten million dollars of their money in what the hon. gentleman describes as non-productive industries, to the great loss and danger of the people of this country. But is it a fact that the Government are out-bidding the chartered banks for these deposits? If that argument were true the hon. gentleman should be able to show that the deposits in the regular banks of the country have decreased during the period to which he refers; but so far from that being the case I find that from the 31st of July, 1879, to the 31st July, 1883—and, as I have shown from the other figures I have quoted, they were practically the same at the end of the year—there was an increase in the deposits in the ordinary chartered banks of the country of no less than $35,393,180. So it cannot be said by any process of reasoning that the country has lost in consequence of these deposits having been made in the savings banks. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not always think it was a bad thing to cite the deposits in the savings banks as an evidence that the country was tolerably prosperous. I am not going to quote hon. gentlemen against themselves, because I think that is a practice more honoured in the breach than in the observance; but, I think, we may fairly in this case, when the hon. gentleman comes back to us as he does, announced in advance as the financial exponent of the party of which he is a member—I say we may fairly refer to what he said, not on the floor of Parliament, but in the most formal way in which a Minister can make such a statement, namely, in a circular addressed to investors in England, as an evidence of the views he entertained at that time. I find in that circular, issued in 1874, Mr. Cartwright stated:

"The deposits in savings banks and societies have increased from £1,240,059 sterling, in 1867, to £3,754,820 sterling, in 1875."

At that time it was a matter to be rejoiced at, a matter to be presented to the investors in England as an evidence of the prosperity of this country, that there were large deposits in the savings banks, and the hon. gentleman very properly used it for that purpose. But to-day, when he finds that those increases stand in the way of the gloomy picture which he desires to paint, he tells us that these figures are an evidence either that the Government have been out-bidding, and improperly out-bidding, the banks for deposits, or that money has been put in the savings banks which should have gone into productive industries outside. As to this question of money going into productive industries, I may point out that of this $17,750,000 at deposit in the savings banks at the close of last year, no less than $11,976,237 were in the Post Office savings banks. Now it is well known that a depositor of the Post Office savings banks cannot have at his credit, at any time, more than $1,000. Well what do we find? I find that there are, at this moment, no less than 61,063 depositors in those Post Office savings banks, persons who have accounts in those institutions, and that the average amount to the credit of each depositor is considerably under $200. Now, I think, we may fairly assume that the 61,000 persons who average $200 each in the savings banks of the country, are hardly in a position to invest in those productive industries which the hon. gentleman says ought to have absorbed this money, but that, on the contrary, a fair inference from the figures is, that the people of Canada, the working people of Canada, the ordinary wage-earners of Canada, are the persons who have been depositing, and are keeping accounts in the Post Office savings banks of this country, and that the fact that this large amount lies in these banks to their credit, ought to be the best evidence we can have, that there is no such distress in Canada as the hon. gentleman desired to picture. We are told that there is great destitution among the people; and the hon. gentleman referred us—and indeed we were referred once before in this Parliament—to the fact that here and there soup kitchens have been established, as evidence that the National Policy, forsooth, has not succeeded. Now, Sir, there are, undoubtedly, in all our large cities and centres of population, the poor who have to be attended to. It is one of the glories of this country, I think, that by a system of voluntary contributions from the people, in Montreal—and I believe the same remark applies to Toronto and other cities—commodious establishments have been erected which are devoted expressly to the care and maintenance of the poor, whom we are told by Him who spake as never man spake, we will have always with us. It is quite true that we have this class of people in the country; but let me give you one or two illustrations. In the city of Hamilton, at the opening of the present municipal year, my very dear personal friend, though political opponent, the present Mayor of Hamilton, made his inaugural address, in which he so far forgot the mayor in the politician as to venture a remarkable statement regarding the terrible amount of misery in that city. A member of the Council at once called upon him to give particulars. He declined to give particulars; but at the very next meeting, if I mistake not, of the City Council, the Mayor came down and withdrew everything he had said, and declared that among a large number of families, some 110, whom he had visited in company with two of the aldermen on a charitable mission, he had not found more than one or two mechanics out of employment. They were the old, the decrepit, widows and orphans—that class of people for whom we always make contributions, and properly so, and whom we ought to make our best endeavour always to assist. Then, in the Local House, a member representing one of the ridings of Wentworth made a statement regarding the condition of his riding, which the town council of Dundas repudiated as injurious to their town, and as not properly representing the condition of the industries and the people of that town. Again, Sir, before one of the Committees of this House—if I may be permitted to refer to it—we learned that among those who are the subjects of charity in the city of Toronto, 226 are old men and women and 400 children. I venture to say, Sir, that if you will go through our cities to-day you will find very few men able and willing to work who are out of employment. Wages may not be so great as they were a year or two ago. The same conditions are obtaining here as obtain in the United States and in England at this moment. Wages are going down in consequence of the general depression and the decrease in the value of goods. These things happen everywhere in spite of every policy. They are found in England under Free Trade, in the United States under absolute protection, and in this country under quasi protection which in the United States would be regarded as almost Free Trade.

An hon. MEMBER. And in France.

Mr. WHITE. In France as well. Everywhere you find these conditions; you find that working people must take less for their labour, just as people take less for their goods. But I venture the statement, that there is not to be found in the cities and towns of the Dominion any such condition of things as that which we were compelled to face in 1877 and 1878, when, Sir, we had bread riots in the city of Montreal; when we had what were almost bread riots in the city of Ottawa, and when there were, in almost all the cities and towns of this country, men able and anxious to work, who could not get employment. There is no such state of things at this moment. Is our present condition exceptional? I said that the same thing exists in England. I have here an extract from a leading editorial in the London Daily Telegraph, of February 14th, which is as follows:

"Times are bad all round. There is difficulty and despondency not in one trade but in all. A Liberal authority states that the year has begun badly everywhere for business men; the depression of twelve months ago has been intensified. On all sides we see evidence that business is unprofitable and that production is to be curtailed. Wages throughout the country are falling fast. It is a common saying in the city that there is at the present time no trade so bad as the iron trade except the grain trade, and that the cotton industries are worse than either. All this will lead to thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands being thrown out of work."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What paper is that?

Mr. WHITE. The London Daily Telegraph.

Mr. PATERSON. What an unpatriotic paper!

Mr. WHITE. Possibly. We are dealing with questions seriously in this House; although I have no objections to try conclusions with the hon. gentleman in the other tone if that be the tone he desires to adopt. So much, Sir, for the condition of trade in this country at the present moment. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman told us that this policy had failed because it had not brought about that increased trade with Great Britain which it was predicted it would bring about; and he took for his comparison the years 1873 and 1883. Why should he have taken those two years? Does he not know that in 1873 the condition of the United States as to the price of labour, as to the cost of production, and as to the price of commodities of every kind, was such that it operated as a better protection to the people and manufacturers of Canada than any protection we have had since or before? Does he not know that at that particular time you could buy goods in Canada in our retail stores for almost half—certainly three-fourths—of the price paid for them in the United States? Does he not know that the United States in those days was an exceedingly dear country owing to conditions that still remain, arising out of the inflated currency which had been in circulation. Sir, a comparison between the years 1873 and 1883 is not a fair comparison; but what would be a fair comparison would be a comparison of the period from 1873 to 1878, with the period from 1879 to 1883, and I take these periods, because the trade returns are made in the same way from 1873 to 1878, and from 1879 to 1883, and the disturbances referred to by the hon. gentleman do not exist. And, Sir, what do we find? I find, Sir, that from 1873 to 1878, our imports from the United States increased from $17,735,678 to $48,631,739, or an increase of $1,000,000, and I find that from Great Britain, during that period, our imports decreased from $68,522,776, to $37,431,180, or over $31,000,000, so that during the period in which this hon. gentleman controlled the affairs of this country, during the period in which he had, for the sins of this people, charge of its finances, while the imports from the United States increased $1,100,000 the imports from Great Britain decreased over $31,000,000. That was the position in which we then stood with regard to our imports. With regard to our exports, I find that during the same time our exports to the United States decreased from $42,072,526, in 1873, to $25,244,898, in 1878, or a decrease of $16,827,728; and while our imports from Great Britain were decreasing in the enormous ratio I have mentioned, our exports to Great Britain had increased but $7,197,691. What was the condition of things from 1879 to 1883, during which period the hon. gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches have been in office and the National Policy has been in force? The imports from Great Britain increased from $30,993,130 to $52,052,465, or an increase of $21,059,365; while the imports from the United States, though they also show an increase, show but an increase of $12,293,114. Our exports to Great Britain in this period increased $10,849,499, and our exports to the United States $13,503,222. But if we analyse the trade between the two countries, we will find that our importations from Great Britain of the manufacturing products of that country which it is their interest to export, increased in a far greater ratio relatively than the figures I have just given indicate to us. The imports from the United States from 1878 to 1883 increased $7,400,594, but the increased importation of raw material and machinery alone amounted to $9,483,652, or $2,082,058 more than the entire increase; so that over two millions dollars more than the entire amount of the increase of our imports from the United States, were in raw material and machinery which are certainly an evidence of the growth of manufacturing industry in this country, and went into the development of that industry. If we take railway supplies and settlers' effects, we find that the imports from the United States of raw material, machinery railway supplies and settlers' effects, altogether amounted to $5,483,240 more than the total increase in imports from the United States. What has been the result with regard to Great Britain? From Great Britain, our total increase was $14,621,285, in which raw material, machinery, railway supplies and settlers' effects amounted to $4,693,286, or an increase importation of ordinary manufactured goods from Great Britain of $9,927,999 or $10,000,000, in round figures; so that the effect of the policy which has been adopted, so far as that effect has developed itself in our trade returns up to this time, has been that while the importation of ordinary manufactured goods from the United States has decreased $5,500,000, the importation of the ordinary manufactured goods of Great Britain has increased upwards of $10,000,000. I take another evidence of the effect of this policy on the trade of the two countries respectively as to its being a policy inimical to Great Britain, because that was, as I understand it, the point the hon. gentleman desired to make. I find that the rate of duties on imported goods from Great Britain increased from 16·1, in 1877, to 19, in 1883; and from the United States it increased from 08·5 to 14·5 in the same period. That is to say the increase in 1883 over 1877 on goods from Great Britain was 02·9, and on goods from the United States 06, or, taking a percentage of increase on the duty itself, the duty on British imports was increased 18 per cent. on the duty itself, while the duty on imports from the United States was increased upwards of 70 per cent. on the duty itself. That is the result of the statement furnished by the trade returns in relation to our trade with Great Britain. Then we come to the question of the balance of trade to which the hon. gentleman was good enough to refer. I find that our entire imports in 1878, were $93,000,781, and our exports $68,158,789, of the produce of Canada alone, not including the produce of other countries, making an adverse balance of $24,922,993. The adverse balance in 1883, was apparently very much greater, the imports amounting to $132,264,022, and the exports to $88,334,031, making an adverse balance of $43,919,804. But when you come again to deal with the question of raw material, railway supplies and machinery, whose importation was in fact the test of the development of manufacturing industry in this country, I find that, leaving those out, the actual adverse balance in 1878 was $12,114,919; and in 1883, $12,401,121; and that in spite of the fact that we had so largely increased our imports from abroad. Comparing 1874 and 1875, during each of which years there was a balance of trade against us of upwards of $50,000,000, I think we can fairly say this Tariff has not been a failure in producing, as near as possible, an equilibrium between our imports and exports. The hon. gentleman dwelt at considerable length on the expenditures in this country; and he sought to leave the impression on the minds of those whom he addressed, in so far as they were disposed to take impressions from him, that the expenditure of this country had been terribly extravagant, and that if he and his friends had remained in office, $25,000,000 would have been the limit of the expenditure necessary to carry on the affairs of the country. What are the exact facts? In 1873, the expenditure was $23,503,158; in 1883, it was $23,730,157, a difference of $5,226,999. But when you come to analyse this increase, you find that in the items of the interest on the public debt, sinking fund, subsidies to provinces, legislation, immigration, public works, Indian accounts, militia, and the collection of the revenue, no less than a sum of $4,537,041 included under those heads. It may be that the hon. gentleman, had he been in office, would have been able to lessen the expenditure in regard to these items. It may be that he could have reduced the interest on the public debt, but judging by the way the interest was increased when he was in office, I may be permitted to have my doubts as to the success of the experiment. It may be, Sir, that he would have been able to decrease the amount payable for the sinking fund. It may be that he would have refused to give any additional subsidies to the Provinces, and in that respect he might have decreased the amount. It may be that he could have decreased the amount payable for legislation, although I think that the members of this House and the people at large will say that, if anybody is responsible for the extent of the expenses of legislation, hon. gentlemen at all events must take their full share of the responsibility. It may be that he could have decreased the amount for immigration—that is a matter of public policy. It may be that he would have decreased the amount for public works, $861,000, but, if he did, the people who have had that expenditure in public works all through this country, would have been deprived of the advantage of that expenditure, and I venture to think they very much prefer the condition of things as they exist. It may be that he would have decreased the cost of the militia. It may be that the collection of the Revenue would not have cost so much under him as under this Administration, although, if one is to judge of the results by the five years during which he controlled the finances, he would not have been very successful in that particular. There was an increase on these items alone of $4,500,000, which, added to the $23,500,000, would make $28,000,000 as the amount of expenditure, even if hon. gentlemen had been in office and had exercised all the economies they could have exercised, and not the $25,000,000 he says would have been the limit of the amount he would have expended. I take the item of collection of Revenue. It is a large increase it is true, $1,321,631, but two items alone of that increase make up $1,234,590, and, while the increase in the expenditure has amounted to that, the increase in the revenue from those two branches of public works and post office has amounted to over $400,000 in excess of that, so that we certainly have not lost much under the circumstances in that operation. But a better comparison to take, as an indication of what would have been the expenditure if the hon. gentlemen had been in power during the prosperous time we have had, and which they tell us would have been prosperous if they had been here quite as much as under the present Administration, is to take the years 1875-76, when they were fairly seated in their saddles and in a position, as they thought, of going on in a prosperous career of administration for years. We find that the total expenditure in 1875-76 by hon. gentlemen, who tell us to-day that they never would have increased the expenditure beyond $25,000,000, was $24,488,372, and that, as compared with the expenditure of last year, leaves a balance of $1,241,785 in excess. I take special items in regard to that. Take the ordinary expenditure which may be said to be controllable expenditure. I find that the increase in the ordinary expenditure was $684,096, and that the increase in the Indian grants included in that ordinary expenditure, was $830,636, or more than the entire increase of the ordinary expenditure. So, leaving out the Indian grants, which, I think, I may fairly assume to be to a large extent beyond the control of any Administration, if we are to adopt the principle of feeding rather than fighting the Indians in the North-West—a policy which every one will say is a wise policy—then the ordinary expenditure was actually less by $146,540 in 1883 than in 1875-76. Then, I take the collection of the revenue, and I find the increase in that was $1,853,516, of which $1,773,641 was for post office and public works alone, the revenue from public works and post office increasing during that period $546,126 more than the expenditure. This leaves an increase for the collection of all the other revenues of the country, outside of the two items of post office and public works, of $79,875 the increased revenue from those other sources having been $10,887,296, while the debt and subsidies increased no less than $1,731,172. That is the position of a comparison between 1875-76, when hon. gentlemen were in the full swing of their administration of the affairs of this country and 1883, which was an exceptional year of great prosperity, when, by a policy accepted by Parliament, and accepted by the country, the Government were generous in their contribution to the public service, especially to public works, for the benefit of the people at large. But we are told that the debt has increased. Well, the debt has increased. It increased, in seven years, from 1867 to 1874, by $32,596,323, or an annual average increase of $4,370,903. I do not think the hon. gentleman can complain of that. That increase had taken place when he went to England to make his loan. When he issued his famous circular to the investors, to the money-lenders of England, I find that he makes this reference to that increased debt:

"The whole of this debt has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility. Though many of the public works have so far yielded but a small revenue in comparison with the interest on their cost, much of the expenditure has been regarded by the Imperial and Dominion Governments as necessary, not in the interests of Canada exclusively, but also on national grounds, so much so that at various times the Imperial Government has sanctioned guarantees in aid of their construction to the extent of £8,400,000."

That was the testimony of the hon. gentleman as to that first increase of debt. Then the hon. gentleman came into office, and during the period from 1874 to 1879 the public debt of this country increased $34,665,223, or in five years an average of $6,933,040. I know that the hon. gentleman tells us that he is not responsible for that increase. I know that he tells us that that increase was necessary because of obligations which they inherited from the party who preceded them in office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. I understand the hon. gentleman to concur in that view of his argument. Now, Sir, what was the obligation which they inherited? Was it the deepening of the canals? Why, that was a matter under Confederation Act made contingent on the condition of the finances of this country, and, when those gentlemen came into office, so far were they from assuming the obligations incurred by their predecessors that they actually cancelled the tenders sent in for the works on the Welland canal and advertised on their own responsibility for new tenders for the construction of this work. It does not therefore lie with them to tell us that they inherited that responsibility from the party who preceded them. They might, under the Act of Confederation, if they thought the finances of the country did not justify it, have postponed indefinitely the enlargement of the canals, so far as any obligations were concerned. Then they say the Pacific Railway was an obligation. If so, it was an obligation that we should within ten years, or as near that as possible, construct a railway to connect British Columbia with the railway system of old Canada. Did they regard that as an obligation? Did they, when the first contract was proposed to be let in 1880, regard it as an obligation? No; they voted in a body against it, declaring that the measure of the obligation was the financial condition of the country. Therefore, they assumed that responsibility of their own motion which they might have left over, if they had chosen so to do, assuming, of course, that the position they took in 1880 was a correct position. Sir, there were no obligations incurred by those hon. gentlemen, the responsibility of which, in view of what has taken place since they left office, they are in a position to throw upon their predecessors in office. They assume those responsibilities themselves, they entered upon the construction of those public works, they incurred that debt, of their own motion, and having incurred it they ought not in all fairness, in all reasonable decency, to come down and say: "We had to do this because the obligation was thrown upon us by our predecessors in office." No, Sir, they increased the debt by an annual addition to it of $7,000,000 in round figures, during the period they were in office. Well, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House came in, and they have increased the debt from that time to the present by $15,476,547, or an annual average increase of $3,869,037. But, when you come to deal with the progress of the interest charges—which after all is the measure of the burden of this debt upon the people of this country—you will find that the condition is much more favourable to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. From 1867 to 1874 the annual increase in the interest charge was $207,715 per annum; from 1874 to 1879 it was $222,345 per annum—and I am now taking the net interest charge, not the gross interest charge. From 1879 to 1883 there has been an actual decrease in the net interest charge on the people of this country of $60,866. So that if, since the Conservative party came into office there has been an increase in the debt, that increase, measured by the annual burden, measured by the interest charge—which is the true measure of its burden on the people of this country—has actually decreased $60,866. Then, Sir, if you take the gross interest charge, we find this: That from 1867 to 1874 the interest charge increased $181,595 per annum; from 1874 to 1879 it was $279,067 per annum; while from 1879 to 1883 it was $32,035 per annum. Then, Sir, what has been our position with regard to expenditure upon capital account? The debt has been increased, we admit, but what have we been doing with it? Why, Sir, I find that the expenditure on capital account in excess of the additional debt from 1867 to 1874, was $13,778,037; from 1874 to 1879 the addition to the debt in excess of the expenditure on capital account, was $6,720,083, that is to say, those hon. gentlemen added that much to the public debt for carrying on the ordinary affairs of the administration of the country, and not in public works in any sense whatever. From 1879 to 1883, we have spent on capital account in excess of the increased debt $22,463,439. That is the position in which the two parties stand in relation to the debt of this country. I have not said a word here as to the point which the hon. gentleman disputes, namely, that of the increase of that earlier Conservative period, a sum of upwards of $14,000,000, was a mere matter of account, was an assumption of the debts of the Provinces, which passed from the people in the several Provinces to the people in the Dominion—I have not dealt with that at all; I have assumed the whole. There is an increase in the public debt which has been made by both parties, and the result, I think, is one of which the Conservative party need not be in any way ashamed. But, Sir, it has been said that the policy of the present Government has been to pile up surpluses, and we are told that it has involved a terrific tax on the people. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not always hold it to be a bad thing to have a surplus. I can remember what he said in that famous circular—a circular which is invaluable as a model in presenting the position of this country to people outside. We find that the $13,000,000 of surplus that occurred during the earlier years of Confederation, was not then regarded by him as in the slightest degree a ground of complaint; on the contrary it was presented to the people of England as a thing we ought to be proud of, as an evidence of the increased stability and the greater credit of the people of Canada. Here is what the hon. gentleman said:

"The revenue has shown a continuous surplus during each year since Confederation in 1867, although it has in the interval been charged with much heavy expenditure of an exceptional kind. The eight years since Confederation, therefore, exhibit an aggregate surplus of £3,443,111 (sterling), not including the sinking fund which has been partially applied in redemption of debt, and partly expended on new works."

That was the statement of the hon. gentleman as to the position of a surplus at that time, when he was able to go to England and present to the people there the fact that during the preceding six or seven years there had been this large surplus in the public treasury. But when we come to deal with the question of the cost of administration we find another significant contrast. The hon. gentleman tells us that the country has been extravagantly managed, and that they would have managed it much more cheaply. Well, let me give one illustration, one contrast, of the manner in which the revenue was collected under their Administration and under the present one. Take the cost of Customs collection. I find that in 1878 the Customs receipts were $12,795,693, while in 1883 they were $23,172,369. I find that the cost of collection in 1878 was $714,527; while the cost of collection in 1883 was $757,245; that is, our revenue increased during those years no less than 81 per cent., while the cost of collection increased only 6 per cent. Now, Sir, in reference to that cost of collection, it is to be remembered that in the five Provinces east of Manitoba, namely, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, the number of ports increased during that period from 295 to 314; and yet the cost of collecting the revenue in that increased number of ports was decreased by $9,919. Then, Sir, the increase in the cost of collection in Manitoba was $29,770, but the revenue increased during that period from $223,530 to $1,764,806. In the North-West Territories the increased cost of collection was $4,121, while the revenue increased from $19,098 to $63,165 during the same period. The outside service in the Customs Department, namely, the experts which have been employed, and the detective service, have been rendered necessary the changes that were made in the tariff, cost $12,526. Now, let me give you another contrast. In 1873-74 the imports were $128,213,582, the duties were $14,421,883, and the cost of collecting was $567,765; while in the years 1878-79 the imports were $93,031,787, the duty collected was $12,795,693, and the cost of collecting was $714,527; or in other words, during the period that hon. gentlemen were in office, when they were economically managing the affairs of the country, when they were establishing for themselves that claim to condemned alleged extravagance on the part of their opponents, I find that the imports decreased 23 per cent., the revenue decreased 11 per cent., while the cost of collection increased 27 per cent. But, Sir, we are told by the hon. gentleman that there has been increased taxation to the people of this country in another form—that we have enormously increased the taxation of Canada by the increased cost of goods as a result of the protective duties which have been imposed. The hon. gentleman estimated this loss to the country at $50,000,000; I wonder he did not make it a $100,000,000. Let me give the House one or two points which the hon. gentleman made with respect to it. Take first the article of sugar. The hon. gentleman said:

"To-day, I am informed by men of high standing in the trade, you could put down at Montreal, free of duty, those classes of sugar which are most in demand in Canada, at the rate of $5 per 100 lbs. I am informed by those gentlemen also, that if they buy those sugars from Canadian refineries they have to pay $8 per 100 lbs., being an excess of $3. We consumed, in 1883, 152,000,000 lbs. of sugar. I will allow a large percentage, 12,000,000, to go into the accounts for the waste in converting that into such sugar as the people require; but every man can see for himself that if you could buy that sugar at 5 cents per lb., duty free, and are obliged to pay 3 cents more to the refiner, what the cost to the people of Canada that extra 3 cents per lb. is. It is $4,500,000. Of that sum $2,467,000 went into the Treasury, and $1,500,000 was lost."

That is the statement of the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, I do not know to what kind of sugar the hon. gentleman refers as being that consumed by the great majority of the people of Canada, whether he refers to granulated or yellows. If he refers to yellows, the price in Montreal to-day, and it has been so for some little time, varies from 5½ cents to 7½ cents, the latter being almost as pale and bright as granulated sugar. And granulated sugar in Montreal to-day is worth 8½ cents per lb. But we are not left to surmise in regard to the prices of sugar: it is a fortunate thing for us we are not. When the hon. gentleman roams into the region of surmise he is immense; 300,000,000 or 400,000,000 are matters of little consequence to him. But in this matter we are not, as I have said, left to surmise; we have the actual facts with which we can deal. As to this sugar question generally, I think the hon. gentleman admitted that as regards the $1,500,000, which he said was lost, some little advantage accrued to the country from the increased shipping brought to the port of Montreal. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is an important factor in the trade of this country. If we can build up a trade with the sugar-producing countries of the world, giving to them in return for their sugar, fish and other products we may have to send them, we have accomplished a great deal towards promoting the trade of the Dominion. I find that one of the results of this policy has been that, while in 1878 we imported from the West Indies only 7,500,000 lbs., and from Brazil nil, (we had been doing a little import trade with South American ports, but it had dwindled away to nothing), we imported in 1883 from the West Indies 72,750,000 lbs., and from Brazil 36,886,052 lbs.,—a branch of trade which every one will admit is of very considerable importance. That is to say, we imported from those two countries 85 per cent. of our entire import. We imported 8½ per cent. from the East Indies, China, etc., and 6½ per cent. from Great Britain and the United States, this being refined. Now, Sir, in 1878 the total import was 108,951,920 lbs., the duty on which was $2,567,803. Of the total quantity imported 95,154,570 lbs. were above No. 13 Dutch standard, and the duty paid was $2,289,840. In 1883 the total imports reached 156,697,834 lbs., of which 4,283,488 lbs. were above 14 Dutch standard—the line being increased to 14 instead of 13 as was the case under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. The total duty paid was $2,666,763, of which $108,407, was for sugar above 14 Dutch standard. As to the question of the enormous protection given to the refiners under the present rate of duty, let me point out this fact: last year, on the average price in New York, less drawback, $5.70 per 100 lbs., the duty by the Cartwright tariff would be $1.43. The actual duty on the refined sugar imported was $2.50. So that the protection we have had in connection with this duty amounts really to only 12½ per cent. I venture to say there is no industry in Canada with so small a protection, when you come to consider the relation of the raw material to the refined article, as has the sugar industry. As to the question of prices and what we have paid for the sugar: The average price in New York, that is to American consumers, was $3.64. The average price in Montreal for the same period was $3.40; so that the people of Canada were actually obtaining their sugar on that basis at 24 cts. per 100 lbs., or nearly a quarter of a cent per lb. less than the people of the United States were paying for sugar from American refineries. But taking it under the Cartwright tariff, with duty and charges added and drawbacks deducted, the average would have been $8.93; while in Montreal, as I have said, the actual average was $8.40, or a difference in favour of the present Tariff to the consumer, as compared with the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite of 53 cents per 100 lbs., or a little over one half cent per lb. Taking the consumption at 140,000,000 lbs., the hon. gentleman's own figures, as representing the refined sugar provided for consumption, from the 152,000,000 which were imported last year, have, as a result of this policy, that, instead of paying 2 to 3 cents per lb. more for sugar, as has been strangely stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, we have actually had a sum equivalent to $700,000 put into the pockets of the people as money saved on sugar, compared with what they would have had to pay under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. Or if you take the price in New York to the consumer, and in Montreal to the consumer, about which there can be no question, for it is a matter which can be ascertained from lists of current prices, then the people of Canada have had the advantage of $350,000 last year over the people of the United States as the result of our present policy.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. WHITE. When the House rose I was dealing with the argument of the hon. gentleman as to the serious taxation imposed on this country by the extra duties under the National Policy, and I had referred to the article of sugar, to which he made special reference, and I pointed out what I think is the case, that so far from the National Policy having imposed extra taxation on Canada it has really been a great advantage to the country even in the matter of cheapness. I come now, Sir, to the article of cotton, which, perhaps, is the one that the National Policy has more developed than any other industry in the country. I am quite aware, Mr. Speaker, that there has been during the latter part of the last year, a depression in the cotton industry in this country. That depression has been in common with the depression in the same industry in England and in the United States. Here it has arisen from causes which were almost certain to produce a depression sooner or later, and the effect of it has been to cause methods to be adopted by the cotton manufacturers which, I believe, will render less likely a depression of that kind in the future. When you remember, Sir, that as late as October, 1882, the cotton mills were unable to supply the demand in this country, that they were unable to fill the orders which were coming into them, I think you will agree with me that the collapse—if one may use that expression—was more sudden than most persons anticipated. But during that time two-thirds of the cotton mills of Canada were running on ordinary grey cottons. It was one of the most natural things in the world that upon an industry of that kind springing into existence, the manufacturers should first produce that particular class of goods which was certain to find readiest market. During last fall the cotton mill owners met together and resolved to lessen by a considerable proportion the production of their mills. Three mills, and only the three, closed down altogether, and they closed only for a month. The Hudon mill, it is true, closed for some three weeks longer, not because of any question of depression, not because of a want of a market for the goods they were producing, but because of the condition of the water in the St. Lawrence River. But, Sir, in spite of that depression in the cotton industry, one cannot but feel that an enormous development in that industry has taken place in Canada. In 1878 there were seven cotton mills in this country. At this moment there are no less than twenty, and if you take the capacity of the mills into account, these twenty are equivalent to thirty of as great capacity as the seven which were in existence in 1878. The mills are now adopting the plan of producing different varieties of cotton. Instead of producing as they did before, almost exclusively, grey cottons, they are going into, in some cases, forty or fifty different classes of cotton goods; and I am glad to know that an industry which has recently been established—or rather is about being established, for it has not yet commenced work—in Magog, that is a print factory, instead of undertaking to produce the cloth, as originally intended, is going to take the cloth from the other mills and become simply a print factory, and that alone. In that way, I think the cotton industry has before it no such gloomy prospect as a great many persons are disposed to think, but that with the conditions which at present exist, with the low prices at which cottons are being sold, with the greater facilities for production which have resulted from the establishment of these mills, in the early future the cotton industry will resume the prosperity which belongs to it, and which attached to it during the earlier period of its recent development. But, Sir, in this question of the price of goods, if the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite be a correct argument, then ordinary grey cheap cottons in Canada ought to be at least somewhere about 30 or 35 per cent. dearer than in the United States or Great Britain. In order to establish his argument that this Tariff has been an extra tax on the people, he must first establish that proposition. Well, Sir, has that been the fact? I have here a statement in which the American prices are taken from the New York

Economist of January 12th, 1884, and the Canadian prices are taken at the mills, and I find that the average prices of goods in Canada have actually been just about the same as they were at the American mills. The American price for Whitinsville 33 inch, is  $6\frac{1}{2}$  for 33 inch, Canadian  $6\frac{1}{2}$  cents; for American Pheham, 35 $\frac{1}{2}$  inch the price of which was  $6\frac{1}{2}$ , for 36 inch Canadian  $7\frac{1}{4}$ ; for American Hero 35 $\frac{1}{2}$  inch, the price was 7 cents; for 36 inch Canadian the price was  $8\frac{1}{4}$ ; for 35 $\frac{1}{2}$  inch American Whitinsville the price was  $7\frac{1}{4}$ ; for Canadian 36 inch the price was  $8\frac{3}{4}$ ; for American Dwight Anchor 36 inch the price was 9 cents; the same width Canadian 10 cents. For Langdon G. B. 36 inch the price was 10 cents; for 36 inch Canadian the price was 11 cents. But, Sir, when you come to the weight of the goods—which after all is a very important factor—taking the goods by the pound, I find that the average of the United States cottons was 23 $\frac{3}{10}$  cents per pound, and of the Canadian 22 $\frac{3}{10}$  cents so that giving the weight of the goods, the price of these cottons was actually lower in Canada than in the United States, the prices being at the mills in both places. Now, it must be remembered in the discussion of this question, that we derive our revenue from Customs duty under any tariff we may adopt. I do not understand that hon. gentlemen opposite propose to adopt Free Trade in the sense in which it is adopted in England. I do not understand that they propose to abolish all Custom duties, and adopt the principle of direct taxation in order to raise a revenue for the purposes of Government. Taking a 17 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. tariff, which was the tariff when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, we have a right to add, on their principle, that 17 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. to the cost of cotton goods coming into Canada, and if then we can show that the goods are cheaper than in the United States, their argument as to the taxation involved in this tariff is entirely swept away.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. The hon. gentleman seems to doubt that. Does he pretend to say that, adding 17 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. to the cost of the goods in Canada, and with a 35 per cent. duty, which does not add more than 17 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. to their cost in this country, the cost to the people of Canada has been increased by the increased duty? Nothing of the sort. On the contrary, the result of the larger market secured to the Canadian mills by this policy, the result of the investment of capital in those mills, the result of the market being to a greater extent, to an enormously greater extent, secured to those mills in Canada, has been to reduce the cost by the larger output of the different mills. Everyone knows as a principle, which is perpetual, which never varies in regard to manufactures, that the larger the output the less the price at which the articles can be produced, and by securing all those different cotton mills, by having some thirty mills—taking capacity into account—instead of seven in Canada, and with a reasonable assurance of a market for those thirty mills, instead of for the seven, the natural result is, that we get the goods a great deal cheaper than we would have had them under the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and as a matter of fact, we have the goods at a lower price than prevailed under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me give you a fact, which can be verified by anyone who chooses to enquire into the matter, as to the cost of cotton goods in September, 1878, as compared with the cost now. The price of raw cotton in September, 1878, was 11 $\frac{3}{4}$  cents per lb., and the cost of cotton goods, 370 yards to the lb., was 7 $\frac{3}{4}$  cents, or 28.67 cents per lb.; while to-day—when I say to-day, I mean the commencement of this year, to which these figures apply—raw cotton is 11 cents a lb., and cotton cloth 3.35 yards to the lb., is 22 $\frac{3}{4}$  cents a lb.; so that there is only three quarters of a cent difference in the price of raw cotton at these two periods, while the cost of ordinary cotton cloth has been reduced from 28.67 cents per lb. to 22 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents per lb. That was the result of the larger output by these mills. Then, Sir, there is another article to which I desire to refer as illustrating my point; and I refer to it because an incident has recently occurred in Canada which gives an undeniable proof that the duty has not as a general thing been paid by the consumer. I refer to the cost of locomotives, as shown in a contract recently made with the Intercolonial Railway with the Kingston Locomotive Works, in connection with which very disgraceful and unwarrantable attacks have been made upon yourself, Mr. Speaker. Now, Sir, what are the facts with regard to that contract? The hon. member for South Huron, the ex-Finance Minister, will know something about this, for, if I mistake not, he is a shareholder in that Company; and the hon. member for Kingston will know something about it, for, if I mistake not, he is a Director in that Company. Tenders were asked, if I remember rightly, for fifteen locomotives of a certain class, from the United States as well as from Canada. The lowest tender was from the Grant Locomotive Works, for \$10,900. Now, if we add 15 per cent. duty to that—and hon. gentlemen opposite would regard that as the very perfection of a low revenue tariff—the cost of those locomotives brought into Canada would be \$12,535 each. The tender of the Kingston Locomotive Works was \$11,300, or \$1,235 less than the article could be brought for from the United States, with 15 per cent. duty paid on it. Then, there were four locomotives required of a different class. The Cook Locomotive and Machine Company, an American Company, made the lowest tender which was \$11,000 at the shop, which, with a duty of 15 per cent. added, would give \$12,650 as the price in Canada. The Phoenix Works, of St. John, N. B., built the locomotives, and delivered them, for \$11,300 or \$1,350 less than the price for which they could have been imported, with the duty paid on them. Not only was that the fact, but there is another rather remarkable circumstance in connection with this matter. There were four American locomotive works competing for this contract; and the average price, according to tender, at their shops was \$11,250, while the Kingston works tendered at \$11,300; so that the difference between the cost of these locomotives at the shop in Kingston, and at the shop in the United States was only \$50 each in favor of the American manufacturer. And yet hon. gentlemen will tell us that the 25 per cent. duty charged on locomotives coming into the country represents a tax on the people of this country. The hon. gentleman knows that under the tariff which existed before, these works which had been in operation had practically ceased to operate altogether; they were dead—practically dead. But a new Company influenced by the conviction that under this Tariff they would at least have a chance of the market in Canada, bought the old establishment out, and put money into it to increase its capacity, with the result which I have just pointed out, that to-day we are getting locomotives in Canada within \$50 of what they could be got for in the shops in the United States, or, in the contract to which I have referred, for \$23,925 altogether less than we would have been compelled to pay had we bought them in the United States and brought them in and paid 15 per cent. duty upon them. Now, Sir, these particulars—I do not intend to give others, although I could do so—I think certainly establish that the effect has not been to increase the price to the consumer, but they show us what has been the value of the National Policy to this country. I ventured to say at the commencement of my remarks this afternoon, that the hon. gentleman had, because there were certain things that we could not control, taken the ground that we should not deal with those that we could control. What was it that deepened most seriously the depression that existed in this country in 1877, 1878, and the early part of 1879? It was the fact that this country was being made a slaughter market for the surplus productions on the other side of the line. Everyone knows that at times of depression manufacturers are most anxious to find a market anywhere for their surplus products; and in order, if it may be, that they may keep up the price in their own market for the remainder, they will give the foreign market the article at a lower price. We are told that this is better for the man in the foreign country. So it may be for the moment, while the depression lasts; but the moment that depression is past, and things get back to the position, which I think we may call the normal position, when the necessity of sacrificing the surplus product disappears altogether, then we find that the people who were foolish enough to suppose that it was an advantage to get this surplus product thrown into the country as a slaughter market, have to pay a higher price for the goods and the labour of a foreign country, instead of getting the same article in their own country, produced by the labour of their own country, and at a lower price than they could get it for outside. I venture to say that at no time since the National Policy has been established, has it been of more value to the manufacturers of Canada than it is at this moment. Already, as everyone in business knows, owing to the depression on the other side of the line, there is a disposition manifested to repeat the process that went on in 1877 and 1878. Were the low Tariff such as we had then in existence to-day, our manufacturers, everyone of them, would either be closed up, or compelled so to work as to realise no profit, practically, whatever. But the Policy now in operation is, at least to a greater extent than the old policy, preserving this market to the Canadian manufacturer, is preventing that slaughter to the extent to which it went on formerly, though not to an entire extent, and in that way is doing more for manufacturers at this time than it has done at any time since it has been in operation. It is precisely in times of depression that a policy of this kind is of most value to a country, and not of least value, and he misunderstands the object and the advantage of this policy, who ventures to say that because you have depression you should therefore abandon the policy which lessens and mitigates that depression, and prevents it becoming what it would become, under other circumstances. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to indulge in a screech on behalf of socialism. He told us we were building up in this country two great classes. He told us we were building up a class of subsidized millionaires, and in so doing were creating, as all history proved, according to him, a class of paupers on the other side; that wherever, as he put it, there was great wealth in the hands of individuals, there was to be found great poverty on the part of the masses. And we were told that that was one of the results of our policy, and that we were not only doing this, but doing it to an extent which would justify socialism in this country. It occurred to me as somewhat strange that the hon. gentleman should close this part of his speech by a statement of that kind, when, during the whole of the earlier part of that speech, he had been telling us that the money put into manufactures had all been lost, that these industries had been unproductive, and that instead of being millionaires those who had sunk their millions in manufactures had lost their money. Both those statements cannot be true; but what is true is that this policy is enabling men who have business capacity and capital and who understand their work to go on and reasonably prosper; it enables them also to afford employment in this country for the working people of this country, which would not be afforded under the policy of the hon. gentleman. Now I come to a point to which, I am bound to say, I very deeply regret the hon. gentleman found it necessary to refer in the way he did. This country has some difficulties to contend against. We are just on the highway to prosperity—I am not speaking now of the National Policy, but of the natural prosperity which a great country like this is almost certain to achieve for itself. We are just on the highway to that prosperity, if we are only true to ourselves. But we have excited the jealousy of rivals outside of this country and of some enemies within it, and it is a matter of the gravest regret that an hon. gentleman occupying the position which the ex-Finance Minister does occupy, should have devoted so much energy, so much study, and so much labour to the production of statistics in order to prove that this country, if the same conditions continue which, he says, have existed for the last five years, would become absolutely depopulated within the next ten or twenty years. I am bound to say that was not a fair, I am bound to say that was not—I shall not use the word patriotic for hon. gentlemen opposite do not like it—but it was not a true position for the hon. gentlemen to take. He has been at the trouble of getting from his friends all over the country municipal and school statistics and everything of that kind for the purpose of showing that this country is practically becoming depopulated, and when he finds the census stands in his way, he says the census is fraudulent, is not to be believed, is utterly worthless as a guide to the conditions in this country. Well, what do we find? The hon. gentleman selected one or two counties in this country. He selected your own county, Mr. Speaker, and one or two others, and he said these counties are becoming depopulated and therefore this whole country is becoming depopulated. No other fair inference can be drawn from what he said but that he wanted to create this impression. But what do I find in the 86 electoral divisions of the Province of Ontario, for he dealt only with that Province? During the last decennial period the population in 86 divisions in that Province increased not less than 320,000 people. That was not a decrease; that did not indicate that we were becoming practically depopulated, and, Sir, out of the whole of those 86 divisions, there were only 9 constituencies in which there had been any decrease; and in these 9 constituencies the aggregate decrease was under 6,000. Yet, with these facts open to the hon. gentleman, he did not hesitate to give the sanction of his important and high position in this country to the statement that we were continually losing population, that our country was becoming in fact depopulated, that it was becoming a country where we could not hold our own people, and to which therefore the people of other countries would be exceedingly foolish to come. I remember hearing a statement of this kind made many years ago, and I know in England it did great injury to Canada. It was made by Sir Charles Dilke in the House of Commons when Mr. McCulloch Torrens brought in his motion for state aid to immigration in 1870. Sir Charles Dilke then made the statement, which he probably took from the speech of some person like the hon. gentleman, who was indifferent to the effect it might produce on the interests of the country, that there were more people going from this country than coming into it, that we were actually becoming depopulated. I had, at that time, the honor of representing the Province of Ontario, in England, for the moment, in connection with emigration matters, and I had a controversy with Sir Charles Dilke in the columns of the London Standard on this question, and by the testimony of the Toronto Globe, which, after all, I must say, did me every justice in that matter, I was able then, as I trust I will be able now, to show there was no ground for the statement, but that it was made in the interests of immigration to a foreign country rather than in the interests of immigration to this colony. The hon. gentleman referred to the depopulation of some of the towns in Canada. Well, what do we find? We find that, according to the last Census and during the decennial period, in forty-three towns, incorporated towns having under 5,000 inhabitants each, in the Province of Ontario, the increase of population was in the aggregate 32 per cent.; and we find that in the whole of those forty-three towns there were but two in which there was a decrease in population and that decrease was infinitesimal. Every one knows that in a new country like this, towns spring up at every likely place as railways are built, and that when the result of building a railway does not turn out to be for any particular town precisely what those who went in, in the first instance, hoped it would be, that town will suffer while others near it will grow up and increase. When the one ceases to prosper, the other prospers still more abundantly from the accretion obtained from the losing town. That is a kind of thing that occurs everywhere in a new country. It is no indication of a loss of prestige in the country, nor of a loss of prosperity or a decrease in population. It is simply one of the incidents connected with the development of a country and of the building up of towns in a country, as the result of railway development, and is an incident which, as everyone, as I have said, who has been an observer of things knows, must and does occur perpetually. In the nineteen towns and cities in the Province of Ontario, having over 5,000 inhabitants each, there has been an increase of population during the decennial period of no less than 40.2 per cent. That was the condition of things as to the increase of population in Ontario during the period to which the hon. gentleman referred. It is quite true that people have gone from Canada into the United States; it is quite true that we have not been free from that tendency to migration which obtains all over this continent, and which caused the State of Vermont, for instance, in the decennial period from 1860 to 1870, to lose in population some 7 per cent., and during the last decennial period to increase only one-half of one per cent; which caused the State of Maine to be almost stationary, and a number of the other eastern States to increase in nothing like the ratio in which the western States increased, as people move on from the east towards the west. But what do we find on comparing our condition with that of the United States? I propose, in a moment or two, to deal with the argument which the hon. gentleman dealt with, and which is a perfectly fair argument in a way—that we lose population to the nation, while they simply transfer population from one part of the same nation to another. I shall deal with that presently. But, taking the original thirteen States of the Union, I find that they have lost, of their native population, according to the last decennial Census, 19.08 per cent., while Canada has lost of its native born population 16.47 per cent. I find that even the three States of New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania, have each lost a larger number of their native-born population than Canada has lost. New York has lost of its native-born population 1,189,261; Ohio has lost 1,034,373; Pennsylvania has lost 783,515, while Canada has lost 712,368. Now two of these, at any rate, Ohio and Pennsylvania, are considerably smaller in population than Canada, while New York has probably the same or perhaps even a little more population than Canada. They are three States of the Union which are esteemed to be among the wealthiest and the most prosperous States of the Union. And yet, by that process of migration, by that disposition to go westward to seek for new fields, they have each of them lost a larger number of their native-born population than Canada has lost. Even the western States, even those new States, those prairie regions, where people have gone within the last thirty or twenty or ten years, as the case may be, and where they are building up for themselves homes, even those States are losing their native population. Minnesota has lost of its native born population, going into other States of the Union, 39,479. Kansas, the paradise of one hon. gentleman opposite, has lost 46,085 of its native-born population. Texas, the paradise of another of the hon. gentlemen opposite, has lost 44,315. So, even in those western States that same process has been going on of migration to the west. Taking the percentages of loss of native-born population by States, I find that Rhode Island has lost 17½ per cent, Wisconsin 15½, Massachusetts 15, New York 23½, Pennsylvania 18½, Connecticut 22½, Ohio 32½, Vermont 53½, Maine 28, Illinois 17.85, and Canada 16.47. Of these ten States all but two have lost a larger proportion of native-born population than the Dominion of Canada has lost. Under those circumstances, I think I may fairly say that the tendency of migration is not a matter to be wondered at, that it is not a matter which is to be cited as an evidence that this country is not prospering. In the earlier part of the history of Canada, we had western counties to which the people could go. Taking three counties, with which I am tolerably familiar, Huron, Bruce and Grey, I find that, in 1851, the aggregate population of those three counties was 35,352; in 1871, twenty years afterwards, their aggregate population was 174,075, and I find that, in 1881, the aggregate population was 216,873. In 1870—well, certainly in 1867, of that I can speak of my own personal knowledge—those counties, the northern part of Huron, the whole of Bruce, and the western part of Grey, were without railway facilities at all. You could put one point of a compass on Mount Forest and describe a circle of 45 mile radius without touching a railway, and yet, when farmers had to cart their grain as much as 90 miles to get down to Guelph, which was the leading market town at the time, when they had to cart their grain or, during the winter, to take it down in sleighs, during that time the increase in population was from 25,000 in 1851, to 174,000 in 1871; and, if anyone will go through those counties, as I was in the habit of going through them some few years ago in connection with railway matters, he will find everywhere, as I, an old Peterborough man, found in the county of Bruce, and on almost every concession line, men who had gone from Peterborough to Bruce to settle there, in order to get cheap lands for themselves and their sons, and to bring their family together, selling their farm in the older county to get new lands and build up a new home in the newer county. But, in process of time, those places got filled up, and then people went further west. We had no prairie region to which they could go. They were compelled to go to the western States by an almost unavoidable impulse, to find prairie land on which to settle with their families, to get land comparatively cheaply, and to make new homes for themselves. They went there, and, as one and another went and wrote back to their friends, that process of emigration, begotten of the best kind of emigration agent, the successful settler in the new district, kept going on; and that, so far as the western States were concerned, was one of the causes which brought that emigration to the western States. Take the State of Michigan, where no less than 147,000 of the population are native-born Canadians. And who are they? They are men who have gone there, attracted by the lumbering operations which are carried on in that State, men who found in it the opportunity for labour which they could not get in old Canada at the time. And in the eastern States, where you find large settlements of French Canadians, they went there to get precisely the kind of work, which happily many of them are now getting in Canada, in the mills and factories of that country, and thus they swelled the population. It is, or should be to us as Canadians, a matter of sincere satisfaction to know that, though they are settled in that foreign country, they have not forgotten that they are Canadians, and that, during recent years, the tendency has been not to go from Canada to the States, but it has been the migration of Canadians coming back into Canada. Last year, if I am correctly informed, there were about 20,000 of the immigrants who came into the country, according to the statement issued by the Immigration Department, who gave themselves in at the port of entry as being returned Canadians. Then, we are opening up in the Province of Quebec fields which will give an opportunity for these people to come back to their native land. My hon. friend, the King of the Gatineau, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright), gave us last year a magnificent description of the country in the rear part of his county. We know that the Rev. Curé Labelle, that patriot priest, who is doing perhaps more than any other individual man in the Province of Quebec to develop its interests, is bringing back hosts of Canadians, and settling them in parts of the country which a few years ago were looked upon as practically uninhabitable. Then, in the Lake St. John region, we have another North-West opening up for the Province of Quebec, and before many years are over, I believe we will find a development of population in those districts which were regarded as of no value—when it was thought that Lower Canada, particularly, consisted of a strip of land along the St. Lawrence, and the rear country was looked upon as an inhospitable wild—we will find settled there hundreds of thousands of Canadians carving out for themselves happy homes, and among them we will find returned Canadians who were expatriated and went abroad to get work which they could not get at home, but who seized the first opportunity to settle in their own native country when new fields were opened to them. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough to attempt to justify the extraordinary statements which have been made by the officials of the American Government as to the emigration from this country. Sir, I am astonished the hon. gentleman should have done it. If he had looked at the simple fact of the number of passengers, as given by the railway companies, who can have no motive whatever in deceiving anybody in a matter of this kind, if he had looked at the number given of those who cross and of those who come back, he would have seen that these statements could not, in the very nature of things, be true or accurate in any sense whatever. Sir, in another place evidence has recently been taken on this subject, and what do we find? We find a statement made as to how these figures have been cooked—and I use the word advisedly—cooked, I believe, as part of the policy which is being adopted, and to which the hon. gentleman who spoke on Friday night, I am bound to assume as a matter of courtesy, inadvertently lent himself—cooked for the purpose of injuring this country and of preventing that development which jealous rivals desire should not take place in Canada. I find that a Mr. Irwin, who was deputy-collector at the port through which all this extraordinary emigration takes place, gives this evidence:

"You asked what method I used and what data I had to go upon in making up the report. It was simply arrived at by taking the four quarters of the year and allowing more for the summer, spring and fall quarters than for the winter, as the ocean steamers could not land at Quebec or Montreal during the winter. In reply to your enquiry as to whether any attempt or pretence was made of counting the number of emigrant passengers, I would say that I never, during my term of office, saw or heard of anything of the kind being done."

That, Sir, is the gentleman who is making these returns, and here was his evidence as to how he made them up. Then he goes on to make another statement:

"I was told to estimate what I thought was the numbers of immigrant that arrived from all trains, etc., for the quarters ending March 31st, June 30th, October 30th and December 31st, as each ensuing quarter came round, and was given to understand that an increase in each quarter corresponding with the quarter of the preceding year was required to be shown. On one occasion my report was sent back to me with instructions to put in more females and children. I asked, jokingly, where I was to get them, and was told to manufacture them. In fact the whole matter was treated as a joke. Someone would say to me, "Where do you get your facts in the case?" and I would reply that "figures were facts and could not lie."

Then, Sir, we have a statement from another gentleman who was also engaged in the work of preparing these statistics which hon. gentlemen opposite are not ashamed to cite on the floor of Parliament to the injury of this country:

"With regard to the emigrants from Canada, the statement was got up from a guess at the probable number of passengers on the different trains. We would average, say, six cars to a train and sixty people to a car, and call half of the whole lot immigrants. At certain seasons of the year, when travel was light the average would not, of course, be put so high, but the whole thing all through was nothing but guess work. We never pretended to make a count of the passengers to know whether they were immigrants or not. In fact it was impossible, as we had neither time or men enough to do such a thing. Charles Irwin and myself got up these returns entirely by guess work and copying off the old returns, and before my time he helped Crawford and others of my predecessors to get them up. The idea was to make the immigration look as big as we could. I know myself of large crowds of men going to the lumber woods in the fall who were taken as immigrants, although we knew perfectly well they would all go back to Canada in the spring. In getting up the returns, the way we got at the occupations of the immigrants was this: We took so many thousand persons, and called so many of them carpenters, so many blacksmiths, so many painters, etc., and the balance we called farmers. In fact, the whole thing, from beginning to end, was nothing but the purest guess work."

Sir, that is the evidence of the gentlemen who were employed in preparing these very figures which the hon. gentleman on the floor of Parliament, in spite of his high position, in spite of the responsibility which he ought to feel attaches to every statement he makes, ventured to say were to be believed; and he actually went through the country getting municipal and school returns, and returns from some towns that happened not to have prospered the last few years, in order that he might sustain the statements which, I am bound to say, are utterly unworthy of credence, in view of the manner in which, as it now turns out, they have been prepared. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman went on to deal with the question of foreign population. He said there could not possibly have been so many immigrants coming into Canada during the last ten years because, forsooth, there were not as large a foreign-born population at the end of the ten years as there was at the commencement. He assumes that 20,000 a year was a very large death rate for that foreign population. Now, Sir, it is impossible for any one, I care not who he may be, to make a correct or absolute analysis of figures of that kind and to find out precisely what the death rate of that foreign population was. I think we may fairly assume that from 1861 to 1871 there were comparatively few immigrants settled in Canada. At that time the mode of keeping immigration returns, accepted as immigrants all who came to the ports of Quebec and Montreal, not at all deducting those who simply came in transitu and passed through. It is well known to every one at all acquainted with Canada during those ten years, that there was comparatively little foreign immigration during that time—I think I am right in that estimate, and I appeal on the point to every one who knows anything of the matter during that decade. It follows, therefore, that the foreign population of the country in 1871 was composed largely of old people, and the death rate which the hon. gentleman referred to does not, I believe, in any sense whatever represent the death rate which took place during that time of the foreign-born population in Canada. If the hon. gentleman will look at the American Census, if he will take the foreign immigration that came into the United States from 1870 to 1880, and, following the process of reasoning which he has adopted in this case, if he will take the foreign-born population in the United States at the end of that period and at the end of the previous period, he will find that there were in the United States more than a million of foreign population less than there should have been under the process which he applies to Canada. Wherever that million went to in the United States it certainly is not to be found in the United States now; and in view of that fact, and especially in view of the fact that many of this foreign population may have been merely migrants not remaining in the country, I think we may fairly assume that the process upon which the hon. gentleman founded his argument was not a fair or correct one. Now, Sir, I think it is unnecessary to say any more on the subject of immigration, or on the migration which the hon. gentlemen have referred to. To-day, fortunately, we are not in the position we were in formerly; to-day, fortunately, we have our own North-West, to which these immigrants can go; they are not bound to go into the United States any longer. And, Sir, more than that, the Americans themselves are going into our North-West, simply because it is a newer country, and the tendency is to remove to newer countries. Why, Sir, a system of migration is going on in the North-West itself. If you go up the South Saskatchewan to Prince Albert, you will find along the banks of the river two or three hundred settlers who were formerly residents of Manitoba. If you will go up to Edmonton you will find there a number of settlers who made their first settlement in the neighbourhood of Prince Albert or in Manitoba, the tendency being perpetually to go west. But with that country now open, with the opportunity to the Canadian emigrant to go in and find a home in his own country instead of in the United States, I venture to believe that the Census returns of the current decennial period will tell a very different tale from that which the Census told at the end of the last decennial period. And this brings me to deal with the question of our North-West. I know I have been accused of being unfriendly to the North-West, because of a remark I made in this House the other day. That remark has been travestied everywhere as if I were an enemy to that country. Thank God, I do not stand here to-day requiring to assert my friendship to the North-West and my earnest hope for its welfare. For twenty years, by tongue and pen, with such ability as God has given me, I have been an earnest and enthusiastic advocate of the North-West of this Dominion, and I believe, as strongly as I believe I am standing on the floor of this House, that the future of this country depends on its development, and without that development, without its success, the future of the old Provinces is hardly worth considering at all, that is, in the sense, I mean, of an independent and prosperous community. Our people will go westward, and the future prosperity of these old Provinces depends, I say entirely, and I use that word advisedly, as we stand on this continent to-day, upon the development of our North-West country. Sir, I used the term the other night, and I repeat it, that those are the greatest enemies to the North-West who are endeavouring to convince the settlers that they should be "spoon-fed" by the older Provinces. That is the fair and reasonable meaning of my statement. But are the settlers parties to that? I shall require better evidence than anything we have seen in the past before I believe it. People have gone into that North-West country. They have found grievances, if grievances they may be called, which are incident to new settlement. They are nothing, as difficulties, to compare with the difficulties which attended settlers in the old Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; but they are incidents which they bear, and which I believe they are prepared to bear, courageously, hopefully and with the result of finding themselves before long prosperous and well-to-do settlers. The hon. gentleman talked of sympathizing intensely with those who wished their grievances in the North-West to be redressed. I ventured to ask him, across the House, what those grievances were, and he was kind enough to refer to two, and to two only: First, the land regulations; and second, the railway monopoly. Now, Sir, what are the grievances connected with the land regulations? Sir, are those grievances greater than those which have obtained in the neighbouring States, which are our rivals in efforts to obtain population for our North-West? Does the settler going into the Canadian North-West stand in a worse position than the settler going into Dakota, Minnesota, Kansas, Texas, or any other States or Territories of the American Union? No; on the contrary, the land regulations are infinitely more liberal in the Canadian North-West than they are in the United States. The regulations have been changed, we have been told. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when on this side of the House, changed the land regulations frequently. At one time they shut up against settlement large portions of the North-West altogether, and the last regulations they made before going out of office were to open those lands to homesteaders and settlers at $1 per acre, but with the understanding that they should afterwards pay what the Government might consider the value of the lands when the railway was built and they came to assess that value. That was the condition of the land regulations when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power. The present Government have changed the regulations on two or three occasions, and on every occasion they have changed them for the better; until to-day they stand as much superior to those previously in force under the previous Government as it was possible for one set of regulations to be superior to another. We were told there were some reservations in the North-West; that there were large reservations in southern Manitoba and that the Mile Belt along the line of railway was reserved. As regard the reservation of the Mile Belt, that certainly could not be a serious injury to settlers going in there to make homes for themselves. There was a reason for that reservation. There was a disposition to speculate to an enormous extent in town and village lots in the North-West. Wherever a station was placed, there people expected a town would spring up. The same thing was going on and the same disappointment will follow, as occurred in 1855-56, when the Grand Trunk was being built and plans of paper towns were to be found in every hotel, and when the people expected to make fortunes by buying a town lot at a railway station. There was a terrible awakening then, and the awakening in our North-West villages and towns has also been of a very serious character; and I believe, as regards some of them, there will be great disappointment in the future. But it was not desirable that people should be induced to take up lots in the Mile Belt and hope to have a station on the lot and convert it into a town plot. The moment stations were fixed along the line the difficulty was removed, and the Mile Belt was thrown open to settlement; and at this moment settlers can go into the North-West and into every part of it, on the railway reservation, I mean the even numbered sections of the railway reservation, on the even numbered sections of the Colonization Company's grants, throughout the whole North-West the land is open for homestead and preemption, not as in the United States, for homesteading alone or for preemption alone. Every man can take a homestead of 160 acres on the payment of a fee of $10, while in the United States he has to pay fees running from $15 to $28, according to the lands he happens to get. In addition, the settler in the North-West can take a pre-emption of 160 acres alongside his homestead, and he can find himself immediately in possession of 320 acres of good land, on which he can settle with his family. Where are the grievances in connection with these land regulations? Is it a grievance that a man can go there and obtain 160 acres for nothing and another 160 acres for a comparatively nominal sum? No; there is no evil connected with the land regulations of to-day. What is wanted in that country, and what I trust will be given at all times, are civil, kind officials, who will recognize, when immigrants go in, that there is nothing they want so much as a kind shake of the hand and a God bless you. Cold officialism sometimes drives back immigrants and settlers, and any officer who undertakes to be guilty of it in the North-West, should be punished by instant dismissal, however valuable his services may be. That, Sir, I believe, will be the policy in relation to the liberal land laws which now prevail in that country, and I am bound to say that I think there is no grievance of that kind. But we are told that there is a grievance in relation to the monopoly of the railway. Sir, is it a grievance that that a country like that, which has just been settled, which is just being settled, should have already some 1,200 miles of railway built through it, without a dollar of cost to the people who live in it? Is that the grievance which hon. gentlemen opposite complain of? They tell us, if it were not for that monopoly clause independent lines would have gone into that country and they would have had the competition which they say they desire. Sir, a very shrewd man in this country, a practical engineer, whose name is well known to a great many people, and I venture to say, to every gentleman in this House, I mean Mr. Thomas Keefer, once said, that the longest railroad journey a man could take was the journey from the charter to the rolling stock. Sir, the mere giving of opportunities to build a railway, the mere granting of a charter, does not build a railway. These settlers in the North-West, or rather those who are undertaking to speak in their name, pretend to think that the Northern Pacific would have built railways into that country. Sir, already that bubble has burst. That road has enough to do to take care of itself at this moment, without building branches either into our country or into their own. But, Sir, we have had two or three railway companies, ay, several railway companies, chartered, and what has been the result? There is no difficulty about competition within the country itself. Any man can get a charter from Parliament—I sometimes think they can get them too easily—who will come here and propose to build a railway from Winnipeg to any part of that country, except across that Fifteen Mile Belt. Several charters have been obtained, and how many railways have been built? The South-Western Railway has been partly built, and I believe, but for the conduct of the agitators in that country, who, I fear, have been thinking more of their politics than their country—but for the effect of their agitation, but for the news which went abroad that there is discontent in that country, a disposition almost towards secession or rebellion, I believe that arrangements would to-day have been completed for the construction this season of 112 miles of the South-Western Railway. Let us hope that it will be built by some means or other. Then take the North-Western from Portage la Prairie, westwards, over the old trail which went towards Prince Albert. What is the position of that road? A few miles have been built and an advantage has been derived from it, and to-day the promoters are in England endeavouring to raise capital to complete it. And how are they met? The news that comes is that the enemies of the North-West, the agitation of so-called settler's grievances, have had such an effect upon the British mind that they are met with this agitation, wherever they attempt to get a dollar of money to put into that road. There is no difficulty about building railways through the North-West, and as to that so-called monopoly clause, hon. gentlemen know that it was the policy of both political parties in this country that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built in such a way, and the territory preserved in such a way, that the traffic of the North-West should have at least a reasonable chance of coming down over our own lines and through our own channels of communication. That was the policy of both political parties. The charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway does not affect old Manitoba at all. It has nothing to do with old Manitoba. There is no privity of contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that railway charters shall be disallowed within the old boundaries of Manitoba, and as to the portion of the Province which is included in the new boundaries, if it applies to that, it applies by the deliberate act of the Manitoba Legislature, which passed an Act sanctioning it. We have had an announcement made on the floor of Parliament which, I believe, will be carried out, that with that railway built north of Lake Superior the interests of this country, in connection with the trade of the great North-West, as well as the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway, will render unnecessary any exercise of the power of disallowance; but that on the contrary, with that road built through that section of the country, the object of the Company will be to secure traffic from the western States over their line north of Lake Superior, down to Montreal and Quebec, and from Quebec to the ports of the Maritime Provinces—that that will be their policy rather than to cut off communication with the American States. And what does the monopoly amount to? Unless it can be shown that it has resulted in practical evils to the people of the North-West, it is simply idle to talk about it at all. I find, taking the matter of freight rates—and I make the statement here from information which I believe to be correct—that during last fall there has been a higher price paid to the farmers for grain along the line of the Pacific Railway in the North-West than along the portions of the line of the Northern Pacific, in the corresponding condition, in the United States. Now what are the relative rates of these two railways, which are corresponding railways, both carrying grain from the west to the east. From Winnipeg to Port Arthur, on the Canadian Pacific, the rate is 28 cents per 100 pounds; from Geneva to St. Paul, the same distance, on the Northern Pacific, it is 33 cents; from Manitoba to the Landing, 539 miles, is 30 cents; from Eagle's Nest to St. Paul, on the Northern Pacific, for the same distance, it is 48 cents. From Brandon to the Landing, on the Canadian Pacific, 568 miles, the rate is 33 cents; from Taylor to St. Paul, on the Northern Pacific, the same distance, it is 55 cents. From Verdun to the Landing, a distance of 615 miles, the rate is 56; from Sully Springs to St. Paul, the same distance, on the Northern Pacific, the rate is 64 cents. From Broadview to the Landing, 699 miles, the rate is 37½ cents; from Glendive to St. Paul, on the Northern Pacific, 690 miles, the rate is 80 cents. From Regina to the Landing, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, 792 miles, the rate is 40 cents; from St. Martin to St. Paul, 790 miles, the rate is 90 cents. From Calgary to the Landing, a distance of 1,275 miles, the rate is 63 cents, and the same distance on the Northern Pacific, the rate is $1.40. So that the rates you get for the longer distances on the Northern Pacific are actually double what they are on the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is the condition of the freight charges on these two roads, one running through American territory, and the other running through Canadian territory. Sir, there is no doubt whatever that the question of transportation is the great question for the North-West—the one important question, which overtops all other questions. The one question which challenges every man who goes into that country is, whether he can secure for his grain such a price as will enable him to cultivate profitably, and that question is answered by the price it is going to cost him to get at the market. Last night I took the liberty of telegraphing to Mr. Van Horne, as to the rates of freight which are to be charged for wheat from Winnipeg to Montreal during the coming season, and what is his answer? I will read it to the House:

“On opening navigation, rate on wheat by railway to Port Arthur, lake from there to Owen Sound or Algoma, and railway thence to Montreal, will be 28 cents per bushel, including elevator charges, but by railway to Port Arthur, thence by water to Montreal, it will be about 25 cents per bushel.

“W. C. VAN HORNE.”

I venture to say that when you have established the fact that by this road you can take Manitoba wheat from Winnipeg and bring it to the port of Montreal at 25 cts. per bushel, and when we remember that that wheat, at the port of Montreal, is worth at least 10 cents a bushel more than wheat from the Province of Ontario, which practically makes the cost of transport 10 cents less on the bushel, you have done away altogether with the question of monopoly. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have as great an interest, Mr. WHITE (Cardwell.)

almost, as the country itself has in the development of that country. The success of their enterprise depends entirely on the manner in which they can put settlers into the country; and the manner in which they can put settlers into the country, depends entirely on the manner they treat them when in the country. What did we find last fall, when the difficulties occurred in connection with the stories of frozen wheat in that country, and the actual fact of frozen wheat in some cases. When the settlers went to the Managers of the Canadian Pacific Railway and laid the matter before them, they found them ready to meet their views at once; and upon that frozen wheat there was an immense reduction made at once in the freight charges, in order to compensate the settlers, as far as they could, for the damage done to them by this unforeseen and almost unprecedented event. Sir, there is no ground whatever upon which any just complaint can be made in relation to the facilities afforded to that country compared with any other part of this North American Continent; and, Sir, I venture to say—and I am sure people outside of this House, uninfluenced by their party sympathies and their party desires, will agree with me—that there is no part of the Continent of America to-day, similarly situated with the North-West Territories which has the same railway facilities afforded to it, and at the same comparatively low rate of charges. Now, Sir, these parties say that they want branch roads, and I sincerely hope they will get them. If they will give capitalists a chance to have confidence in the country, if they will only hold their hand, and if hon. gentlemen in this House, who are making use of the temporary agitation there for their own advantage will only hold their hand—if they will not create an impression in the minds of capitalists everywhere that that country is not a safe country in which to invest capital, because it is liable to political tumult, and possibly to political changes—if they will only avoid that—then, Sir, I venture to say that money will be got to build these branch railways, and before ten years more the people of the North-West, in every part of it, will be able to realize that their lots are indeed cast in pleasant places, and that they have indeed a goodly heritage. Sir, the hon. gentleman did not refer to other grievances which the people urge. He did not refer to the project of the Hudson Bay Railway, which they ask to be built immediately at the public expense—practically at the public expense—because I believe they are asking the Provincial Government to guarantee the bonds of that Railway. Now, Sir, I sincerely hope that the Hudson Bay route will prove to be a success. I believe it will prove to be a success. It is a commercial question—entirely a commercial question. No building of railways to the Hudson Bay, by this House, will ever make the Hudson Bay route a success, unless you can convince merchants, shipowners and underwriters, that it is a safe route for vessels. But I am sure that the people of the North-West will be glad to learn the announcement made the other day in the newspapers as to the policy of this Government with reference to that project. In this, as in everything else, the Conservative party are the pioneers in good works in the interests of the North-West. Sir, I am sure the people of the North-West were glad to learn that it is the intention of the Government this year to cause a thorough exploration to be made of the feasibility of that Hudson Bay route, and that increased inducements are to be given to capitalists who are disposed to enter on the work of the Hudson Bay Railway. I am not afraid, as one belonging to the older Provinces, as a resident of the city of Montreal, of any effect that will be produced on the eastern Provinces by the opening up of that route. No; Mr. Speaker, the more you can develop that North-West by additional routes, the more you develop its value as a factor in the progress of the whole country. If you can secure to the people there a means of getting their grain out of the North-West by way of Hudson Bay, and from that point to Liverpool, by a shorter line than the route by way of Montreal, and if, as the result, there is a large increase in the trade and population of that country, I say that will inure to the great advantage of every part of this Dominion; and we may fairly look forward to increased competition for the trade of that North-West, by the older channels, as soon as the new one is opened up. All that is wanted is that people will be true to the country. Sir, it seems an extraordinary thing that men can imagine that by a mere stroke of the pen that country can be converted into an iron girdle of railways traversing it. Wonders have been already accomplished in connection with it. No other part of this continent has seen similar wonders; and if hon. gentlemen will only give that country a chance, and make up their minds for once that they will sink their party and think only of their country—if they will only allow capitalists to have full confidence in that great country, I venture to say that before five years are over, we shall hear no more of Manitoba grievances, because the practical experience of those five years, and the practical results accompanying it, will be such that every semblance of what to-day is regarded as a grievance will have passed away, and the country will be in that condition of prosperity which every man in this country earnestly hopes for it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, opened his speech with a rather violent attack upon the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). He was good enough to inform us that he was a little doubtful, on Friday night, whether it would not be better that he should have replied at once to the statements of that hon. gentleman. Judging by the length of time that he has kept us to-night, listening to him—I will not say wearying us—I think the House will admit with me that it was well that he deferred his remarks until an occasion when he would have more time. There was a slight tone of fault-finding in the hon. gentleman's speech, and he said some things that I think he might have left unsaid—something which, if they were necessary to be said, would perhaps, have been better said by somebody else. It is said that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones; and when the hon. gentleman referred to the fact that my hon. friend from South Huron had been defeated in the last general election, and took exception to the truth which that hon. gentleman uttered, which he knew to be a truth, that he had been legislated out of his seat in Parliament, I could not avoid thinking that it would have been well if some other gentleman had alluded to that circumstance. The hon. member for South Huron, as is well known to the hon. member for Cardwell, had received the unanimous nomination of the Reform party in Centre Huron. The unanimous nomination of that party in that Riding meant the election of the member; and when hon. gentlemen opposite introduced their Bill, which is known in the country as the Gerrymandering Bill, it was found that that constituency was blotted out of existence altogether. The elections were sprung upon us, there was no time to make preparations, and the hon. gentleman from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) ventured to contest a riding that had been held by the enemy for years and years, and which had been strengthened by the enemy by virtue of this very Gerrymandering Bill. My hon. friend failed, and for one Session this House lost his valuable services. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) says we had to open a constituency in order to get a seat for the hon. gentleman. True, but it is not the first time an hon. member of this House has been defeated. If I remember aright, the hon. gentleman's (Mr. White) great chieftain, the leader of the Government has, on more than one occasion—at any rate on one occasion—been defeated, and they had to go a long way to find a constituency for him, but they did find one. Then there is my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, a gentleman who, I believe, has the confidence of his supporters from the Province of Quebec in this House. The fortunes of battle have been against him on one occasion, if not oftener, and he too had to seek another constituency. And how about another hon. gentleman, just about as distinguished, in his own estimation, as the two to whom I have alluded? How about his finding seats whenever he sought them in this House? How about the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) who alluded in such tones to the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) for not being able to find a seat? If I am not mistaken, the hon. member for Cardwell tried his fortunes in the Riding of South Wentworth on one occasion. I think that was his first venture. The people there liked him very well, but they did not like him quite well enough to have him for their representative; therefore, he was bound to look around and try to find another constituency which would be more kind to him. I am not sure, but I think his next venture, Sir, was in the county of Prescott. If I remember aright, however, that county preferred another man at the time. If I am not mistaken, the hon. gentleman ran also in his own city of Montreal. He has found fault with the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) that he did not run in Lennox where he was known, and said that the fact that he ran away from Lennox was an indication there was something wrong. But we find that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. White) ran at home, where he was known, they would not have him. Am I entirely mistaken in saying that he tried his fortune the second time, but was not more successful? True, after years of repeated trials and failures, a seat was secured for him through the kindness of the leader of the Government, in a constituency where the Tories are so nicely and snugly hived, that it was almost impossible for a supporter of the Government to be defeated. There again you will find that the hon. gentleman should not have found fault with the hon. member for South Huron in going where he was not known, because I venture to say the hon. gentleman himself was a stranger to the people of Cardwell. He had to take letters of recommendation and commendation from the leader of the Government to them, and probably it was as much due to the authorization of the Premier, as in virtue of his own ability, which, I admit, is considerable, that the hon. gentleman is sitting here as representative of that county. I do not challenge his right to sit here. I would not have made these remarks had not the hon. gentleman undertaken to make what I thought was rather ungenerous allusions to the hon. member for South Huron. In this matter of representing a free and intelligent people in this House, it does not become any gentleman to be too strong in the denunciation of those who have failed to secure their election. I have caught myself, in a humble way, entertaining, to perhaps a slight degree, that feeling of egotism which seems to pervade, in such a large measure, the bosom of the hon. gentleman; and I have thought that it would be almost impossible to beat me in my own county; but I can assure him, thanks to the last Legislation, my last election was very tight indeed, and I believe I would not, of course, be of sufficient importance to the country to have any one find a seat for me in that case, as was found for the hon. member for Cardwell, after he had been rejected by four constituencies. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to make an admission to which we all agree. It was a new admission for him to make: that is, that no policy in this country can guard against over-production, or, in effect, stave off depression. How the mighty have fallen! How the times have changed! But after having made this admission, the hon. gentleman used his best efforts to prove that, after all, there is no depression in the country. His tone was different from that of the Finance Minister who, conscientious man that he is, knew there was depression in the country; he felt it, he was depressed himself, in common with the country; he felt that the promises he made the people, that all the statements he had made with reference to what he would do, were not being fulfilled. He felt conscious that he had claimed to exercise powers which are believed to be exercised by a power greater than he or any combination of gentlemen in this House; he remembered that he had told the people that if they would return him and his party to power, certain results would follow; that there would be plenty of employment and high wages to the operatives, that the price of farm products would increase and that every one would be prosperous and happy. He does not feel so well to-day, and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Farrow), who is interrupting me, does not feel perfectly happy himself. I can tell the hon. gentleman that, as the Finance Minister delivered his speech, he delivered it as a man who felt that somehow or other circumstances beyond his control had so arranged it that that the eggs this year were smaller than they had been previous years, and I tell that hon. gentleman that until he will get the Finance Minister to wave his wand again and get the eggs restored to their original size, that unless he secures to us larger and more bountiful crops and higher prices than he has, there will be uneasiness, there will not be that perfect happiness which we were promised. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to tell us that, after all, though the Finance Minister had intimated by his tone that he felt there was some depression in the country, he did not believe there was any great depression in the country at all; and I call the attention of hon. members to the plan adopted, on more than one occasion, by the hon. member for Montreal—I beg his pardon, I did not say Montreal designedly, but having said so, I ask your pardon, Sir, and the hon. gentleman's pardon, for having made that mistake—but I will ask the hon. members of this House if it was not a natural mistake to make. I will ask them if the hon. gentleman, in rising to address this House, ever addressed us in terms other than these: What are the interests of Montreal? What are the interests of the port of Montreal and of the Montreal merchants? Has he ever lifted his voice on behalf of Cardwell? Does he ever mention their interests? No wonder I made the mistake I was trapped into, of considering him as the hon. member for Montreal. He has done this time and again, but on no occasion more deliberately than on this one. He, the reprepresentative of an Ontario constituency, the reprepresentative of the people, he who is here to talk on matters appertaining to the State, to advocate the best interests of the majority of the whole people of this country, has turned himself into an advertising agency, and advertises certain merchants in Montreal who write him letters. I do not wonder the hon. gentleman will get letters from merchants in Montreal, when he says to them: I want these letters, that I may read them on the floor of Parliament, and having read them they will go into Hansard, and, peradventure, by some strange method, may find their way into the columns of that widely circulated paper, the Montreal Gazette, and your business will be widely advertised and great good will be done. How very likely that these gentlemen will tell him that their trade has gone to the dogs, and they expect to be in financial straits next week? We can understand the value of such testimony. We do not want the testimony of any one merchant in Montreal, or of any dozen merchants in Montreal, in reference to this matter. We would be pleased to hear of their welfare in the ordinary channels and by private means, but to have them blazoned abroad upon the floor of this House as proof positive that a state of prosperity exists in this country, because these gentlemen say that, after all, their trade is moderately good, is, I think, to do something that is very little short of insulting the intelligence of the members of this House. The hon. gentleman stated that my friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) had pursued a very wrong course in criticizing the receipts and expenditure of the Government, that he had made some statements that he thought he should not have made; and then he went on detailing matters, giving us figures, selecting years to suit himself, and he asks us to accept that. There was one very noticeable thing; he did not attack the accuracy of a single figure, as far as the expenditure and receipts of the Government where concerned, given by the hon. member for South Huron, that I remember—not one single one. He attempted to pick out a certain year here and a certain year there, he put this construction upon it and that construction upon it, but as to undertaking to challenge, disprove, or dispute the statements, the figures of the hon. member for South Huron, though he has had some days to do it, I fail to see that he upset any one single calculation he made. And what is the value of the figures given to us by the gentleman himself? He says there are certain receipts coming to us from sources other than Customs and Revenue. While you have increased expenditure upon your railways, and upon your post office, and upon your canals, you have increased receipts from those sources, and they swell the total receipts, and therefore, according to the hon. gentleman, to say that all the receipts show the burden of taxation upon the people of the country is ridiculous, it is a wrong method altogether to apply to it. But will he say that the receipts through Customs and through Excise do not show, do not indicate, do not tell the burden of taxation that is upon the people? And, if he looks at that item, he will find that there has been $10,000,000 more in that direction taken from the people of the country in the year 1883 than in the year 1879; and, if it was taken from them, I hold that the people, having paid it, have borne that burden. As to whether they were able to bear it or not, is another question for us to consider. That they have paid is true, for it has come out of their pockets and gone into the Treasury. I want to lay down one or two points with reference to this expenditure, for I will not follow the gentleman through a maze of figures, but will just give to you, Mr. Speaker, or recall to your mind, certain facts. As was alluded to by the hon. member for South Huron, when we started in Confederation, we started with an expenditure of $13,000,000. After seven years of Conservative rule, it had expanded to $23,000,000. I am willing to admit here, and it is right that I should do so, that there was the admission of other Provinces, that there was the assumption of the debts of the Provinces, and that there were many causes that led to bring that up, but the fact remains, nevertheless, that our expenditure went from $13,000,000 to $23,000,000. Then the Reform party came into power; for five years they held the reins; there were increased demands for public service during the five years, as there had been during the seven years before; the public business had to be carried on, and it was carried on by our friends, while in the Government, at an additional cost to the country, not of $10,000,000 during the five years, but of a little over $1,000,000; and when they went out, they left to the gentlemen who succeeded them a country whose business was being carried on, if you left out provision for the sinking fund, with an expenditure that was about nearly equalized with its revenue. They left it in that state only for us to find, at the end of five years of these gentlemen's rule, that the expenditure had gone up from the $24,000,000 and a little over where they found it, till the expenditure for the year we are now in, 1884, will probably show an expenditure of $31,000,000. That is their record. There may be these ideas that the Finance Minister and the hon. gentleman threw out to blind the eyes of the people as to increased revenue, while there is increased expenditure, from our publics works, but that went on under both Administrations. For purposes of comparison, the figures hold good; and they are as I have given them to you. I desire to call attention to this one point, and it is a serious thing with reference to the expenditures of the country. Our population increased, I think, at about the rate of 2 per cent. per annum. It would only be natural to expect that our expenditure may go on and increase at something like the same rate as our population. If it went no faster, I do not think there would be great cause for alarm. If it had increased in that proportion, the hon. gentleman would not be to be blamed for having the public expenditure, at the present time, at something like $27,000,000. That would be about the rate at which it might stand. Instead of that, we find it is $31,000,000—$4,000,000 more, we hold, than it should be. Now, the House knows, intelligent business men know, that if a man in his own business, living on $1,000 a year, suddenly increases his expenditure till he is expending $1,400 a year, unless his means of revenue has become greater, he is getting into a bad condition; and so it is with the nation; $4,000,000 of expenditure, if it be fixed and cannot be reduced—and the expenditure of a nation, like the expenditure of an individual, once let out, is very difficult to bring in again—$4,000,000 of an additional fixed expenditure on the country represents a capital of what? It represents a capital expenditure, at 4 per cent., of $100,000,000, and there is where we are under the management of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Take the details, if you will, of their expenditure. Take the controlling items in that. Take the cost of Civil Government, that they found such fault with the Mackenzie Administration for, because it increased somewhat under them. Where is it? In every Department almost, I believe, you will find an increase. Take the matter of immigration. In that, you will find a tremendous addition to the burden that the people have to carry; and on that one point I might remark that, if there is any expenditure that the people have a right to find fault with on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is in reference to the expenditure which they ask on immigration, because, when the House was asked to vote the immense sum of money and the immense number of acres of land we voted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, one of the strong reasons given to us why we should do it was that they would become such great immigration agents, that they would people up our North-West country, and lift the burden of immigration expense we had to bear off our shoulders. I remember the language used by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who said that millions of money would be saved to us in that way. I remember the language of the Speech from the Throne, which told us that we must be in haste to pass that bargain, as no systematized effort by the Company could be made to bring in that immigration until we did. I remember the language of the member for West Toronto (Mr. Beatty), in moving the Address, when he urged it as one of the great advantages to be obtained. I remember the language of the hon. the Premier, urging that we should give immediate and continuous attention to that Bill, in order that the Syndicate might be in a position to bring this about. And yet, after all that has been done, what are the facts with reference to our immigration expenditure? Why, in 1879-80 we were asked to vote $183,204. Then our bargain was made, but the next year was the amount reduced? No; we were asked to vote $250,812, or $67,608 more; and the next year we were asked to vote $253,061, an increase of $69,857; and the next year we were asked to vote $437,734, an increase of $254,530. For the current year we were asked, in the Estimates, to give $520,221, an increase of $337,017; and in the Estimates before us now, for 1884-85, we are coolly asked to give $526,375, or an increase of $343,171 more than we did in 1879-80. Where are the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite? What are the Syndicate doing in this matter? Where is the return? Where is the value for these millions of dollars that we have expended on bringing immigrants into this country, or trying to get them to come here? And the immigrants that we have already brought to this country, are they here now? We have had laid on the Table, within the last few days, petitions yards in length, with hundreds of signatures, from the working men of the towns and cities of this country, who know whereof they speak, and who tell us that there is no room for any more immigrants. The mechanics of this country say: "If you bring them here you simply bring them here to find either that there is no work for them in those branches of mechanism in which they are instructed, and they must drift over to the other side, or they must displace an equal number of our own men." Thus the process will go on of swelling that exodus which, I am sorry to say, notwithstanding the elaborate attempt of the hon. member from Cardwell, to prove the contrary, is going on from this country to an extent that is deplored by every hon. member on this side of the House, as it is deplored by every member on the other side. It is time this whole question came under review; it is time we addressed ourselves to ascertaining whether our present policy is wise. If we were bringing people from the older countries and peopling our North-West with them, then it would not be so bad; but from the figures submitted by the hon. Minister of Railways, we do not find any such increase as would warrant the expenditures we have made in reference to this one item. Now, Sir, I would just like to ask hon. gentlemen what they think with reference to the question of surpluses at the present time. Is a large surplus a good thing or a bad thing? Last year, when a surplus of some $8,000,000 was announced, there was great cheering, great clapping of hands, great applause from hon. gentlemen who sit behind the Finance Minister. This year he announced that the surplus will not be anything like $8,000,000—that it will be something like $1,000,000—and we have returns for six or seven months of the current year, which would hardly warrant us, I think, in looking even for that amount. What has become of it? What has become of our surplus? "Oh," say the hon. gentlemen opposite, "the Opposition should rejoice, because they thought a surplus was not a good thing to have, anyway." Well, Sir, the Opposition would rejoice if the surplus had been brought about by a reduction of taxation on the people of the country. If articles that are charged 35 per cent. had been reduced even to 30 per cent., we would have given the hon. Minister some credit; if the articles of prime necessity such as breadstuffs and coal, were relieved from taxes and had been given more cheaply to the people, who are suffering from cold during this inclement season of the year, and there had been a decrease from that cause, then the Opposition would have said there was some reason in it. But we say that this surplus has shrunk from $8,000,000 to $1,000,000, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, while this excessive rate of taxation remains in full force; and we say the inference is, that the hon. gentleman has overstrained the powers of the people, he has discounted their powers, he has in past years been drawing from them the wealth which now they need, in order to enable them to tide over the difficulties that I fear, from his own statement, are in store for us. Now, we have had, for three or four years past, very good times, the hon. gentleman tells us. Well, Mr. Speaker, at the present time, it is true, we are not in a desperate condition in Canada. I believe there is a great deal of reserve strength, even now, among the people of Canada, that may enable us to tide over the difficulties that are before us; but, Sir, it will require prudent management on the part of our business men, it will require prudent management on the part of the Government of this country, to enable us to tide over successfully the hard times which are before us. Sir, if the country is to get safely over this period of depression, how is it to do it? How have we got into this condition? Sir, because we have been living faster than we ought to have lived in this respect. And if the people of this country, having brought large sums into it from sources, one of which has failed them this year, find that now, when they have less to expend, that their powers to economize are lessened, that trade is depressed, how much of that is due to the Finance Minister, one cannot say. He is a happy man, at any rate, amidst this depression [or at least he tries to be. When he has a surplus he rejoices in it; when he has not a surplus he rejoices in it, because, he says, the imports have diminished and therefore he has not got as much revenue. But here let me point out to the House what has been the great cause of the prosperity of the country for the past few years, and in doing that I would ask the attention of the House to the consideration of the fact that we cannot in any measure sympathize with the ideas thrown out by the hon. Minister and those who supported him in days gone by, that this excessive taxation, that this high tariff of his, was after all a source of the wealth that is in this country. Where, Sir, shall we look for the secret of the prosperity this country had during the past three or four years, despite the depleting efforts of the Minister in taking money from the people to the extent of millions and tens of millions, that ought to be theirs now, in order to enable them to tide over the commercial depression? Sir, the year 1879 was one of the worst years we ever had in this country, and the hon. member for Cardwell has quoted the price of bank stocks for that year. But 1879 was not a year of the Mackenzie Government; it was a year during which the National Policy was in existence, and it was a year in which there was more misery, and more failures, as the hon. member for Cardwell told us, than there has been in any year since. And how did we get out of it, Sir? How did we enrich ourselves? Was it by taxing ourselves to double the amount, and taking it out of our already impoverished pockets that we became wealthier? Who will venture to say so? From whence did the money come? The secret lies in the Trade and Navigation Returns, which show this fact, that our exports during the past four years exceeded those of 1879 by no less than $84,000,000. I call the attention of the House to the circumstance that on three items, lumber, animals and their produce, and agricultural products—three items in behalf of which no sane man would venture to say the National Policy would have the slightest beneficial effect in any shape, manner or form—from those three items, during the last four years, there have been derived of foreign gold $80,000,000 more than in 1879. That is the secret of our prosperity. Any man can see it; it does not require any peculiar talent to discover it; $80,000,000 more of gold in circulation could not fail to give a wonderful stimulus to the springs of commerce, and beneficial results could not fail to flow therefrom. But what has become of the money? How is it, that so soon as we have a partial failure of crops we begin to see signs of, and to hear rumours of, and to feel the effects of depression? The Finance Minister is largely responsible for locking up the money. By his trade policy he has caused a vast amount to be locked up as unproductive capital in manufacturing industries, as the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out. By mad speculation in the North-West, millions more are locked up. Moreover the Government have taken millions more out of the pockets of the people; and we feel that these extra $80,000,000 have not made us feel so easy as we have a right to expect. I would ask the Finance Minister to consider whether he has not locked up some of the capital in unproductive manufacturing industries. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) and the Finance Minister, say that we, the Opposition, occupy a peculiar position in arguing this question, because we said at one time that this so-called National Policy would increase the price of articles to the consumer, that it would enrich manufacturers, and then we said that manufacturers are being ruined. Both propositions are correct. In the first stage of high protection, you have a short supply, a large demand and high prices. When you reach the second stage, over-production, you have unproductive capital and reduced prices to the consumer; but under a high Tariff, it is possible for manufacturers to combine, and combine they do, and restrict production, and thus hold up the prices to the consumer and make their capital available. I will give the hon. Minister some of the effects of the Tariff. But before doing so I will allude to a personal remark in reference to this matter, as the Finance Minister has on this, as on other occasions, sought to bring me in as a sort of godfather to his Tariff, and has sought to cover himself by a statement made by me in 1876.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It was the best speech you ever made.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why, I know it by heart. I am glad the hon. gentleman has taken out the Hansard, because if he will read the connecting sentences to the statement to which he referred, he will be ready, if he is an honourable man, to inform the House that when he quoted that remark he quoted it out of its connection; that he forgot to tell the House that the hon. member for Brant emphatically declared he was not a protectionist; that he was not one of those who believed in building a Chinese wall so high as to shut out trade; that he was in favour of a defensive policy; that he believed, when goods came in large quantities, under a Tariff framed for revenue purpose, it was the duty of the Finance Minister to levy duties on such articles, and thereby give the benefit to the country. That I said then, and I stand by it. But when the hon. gentleman quoted me, he utterly misquoted me in that connection. The hon. gentleman was laying down the proposition that the $16,000,000 extra taxes taken out of the pockets of the people beyond the wants of the public service, were not paid by them but by producers abroad—foreign manufacturers. The hon. gentleman adduced, as proof the speech of the hon. member for Brant, in 1876, from which he read a quotation—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct him? I said from two causes. One was that it was not paid by the people, because manufacturers abroad paid it in part; and the other was—and I quoted the hon. gentleman in support of it—that the middleman lost some of his profits and the consumer did not pay them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am glad the hon. gentleman has made the explanation, because he left the impression that I had said that the producers paid the duty on articles coming in. If he quoted the language, as regard to middlemen, then it was right enough. I pointed out, however, that a change had been made with respect to goods coming into this country, and I instanced the benefit resulting from consumers paying no more, not because the foreign manufacturer paid the duty, but because the prices of articles on which middlemen had large profits, were somewhat reduced.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is the point.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is true. It is a matter of satisfaction to me to know this, that while the hon. gentleman endeavoured to say something in order if possible to make me feel a little bad in regard to the reentrance into Parliament of the hon. member for South Huron, as to the leader of the Opposition having more faith in the hon. member for South Huron than the humble individual now addressing the House, there is no quarrel on that point. If that view is entertained by the leader of the Opposition, and I have not the slightest doubt it is, my view entirely corresponds with that of the hon. gentleman. If it were a matter of any consequence to me, I have this drop of consolation in my cup, that the hon. Finance Minister, the gentleman ruling, so to speak, the destinies of this country, in an important particular, has declared in this House that the sentiments which were enunciated by the humble individual now addressing it, were the grand principles which had been embodied in the National Policy, and that he had grasped those grand principles of fiscal legislation, and that the hon. gentleman was now carrying them out. But I would point out this, that, like other pupils who conceive too high an opinion of their abilities and undertake to do work better than their masters can do it, the hon. gentleman, if he has misunderstood the principles laid down by me, should resign his position and give way to the man from whom he has learned those great ideas and not attempt to spoil a good design by bad workmanship. That, I think, would be the only right and proper course to adopt. Again, the hon. gentleman has referred to the duty on cigars, a sweet morsel which he has rolled under his tongue. The hon. gentleman went up to Strathroy and met me on a public platform there when I made my statement; but though he had two and a-half hours in which to open the meeting, and I had only one hour, and though he had all night, if he had chosen to, reply to my remarks, he was not equal to the task of answering them at that time. It was only when he came to the Capital and got some officer of the Department to make up a statement which he has laid before this House, that a reply was attempted; but unfortunately for him this is a statement which it would have been better if he had not submitted; because, while the hon. gentleman seems determined, on every possible occasion, to wrestle with this matter of the duty on cigars, every time he attempts it, it trips him, and he appears to worse advantage than he did before. He tells us that 21,000 odd German cigars were imported into this country, but surely he must mean pounds; if he does not mean that, I cannot tell what he does mean. But if he means 21,000 cigars, at his calculation, it would make them $500 a thousand, or 50 cents for each cigar. He must have got matters mixed in some way, for I find that he works out the calculation, and he says there was 40 per cent. duty at that time. If he will go home and work out the proposition himself, and not trust to the gentleman who appears to have led him astray on this occasion, he will find that the effect of the change of the duty, which was made on that article by my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), would have been this. What were the facts? At this point, I may say that, as the hon. gentleman appears to refer to this matter, because he desires, if possible, to lead the House to believe that I have a personal interest in the matter, cigars did not form at any time a very large portion of my business, but that I have been for some months out of it altogether, so I advise him not to refer to this subject again for that reason, especially as it appears to place him at such a disadvantage. The state of protection on that article was from 2½, 5, 10, 15, 20 and 25 per cent., according to the cost of the article. The average protection was 11 per cent. and the change in the Tariff raised it to 15. When the hon. gentleman from South Huron revised his Tariff at that time—the necessities of the revenue demanding it—the duty was increased to 15 per cent. That was the change made in the Tariff at that time, and it was under the operation of that change that the beneficial results, which I pointed out, flowed. If the present Finance Minister can find any way to increase his revenue, and at the same time produce the beneficial effects which flowed from the change in the Tariff which was made by my hon. friend from South Huron, by imposing not more than 15 per cent. duty, I do not think the people of this country will find fault with him. I may say, with regard to the article of tobacco, that I believe the people of Canada are willing to pay rather a higher duty upon it than upon such goods as cottons and woollens and other such necessities of life, such as the hon. gentleman has taxed. I think if the hon. gentleman refers to this subject, he will find that he has accomplished nothing by it, and that, in the future, knowing now that I am not now interested in the change of Tariff, and was never interested, except to a very small extent, he will see that it is rather strange that I should have given up this portion of my business at a time when the protection upon that article is double what it was under the previous Finance Minister's Tariff. I pass on to say this, that I have in this House, and on the public platform, laid down what I considered was the policy followed by the Reform party when they were in power—the policy of securing revenue by Customs taxation, and levying duties on articles made in this country, which, while securing a revenue, would afford an amount of protection to the people of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite assert that we are free traders, and that we desire to close the manufacturing industries of this country. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has lectured us upon this matter. He has denounced the policy of the hon. member for South Huron, and the policy of the Mackenzie Administration, because, as he said, they would not give increased protection to the manufacture of this country, during the time of depression, and thereby add to the taxation of the people. Does that hon. gentleman remember his views, as expressed by a resolution at the time of the Mackenzie Administration, when my hon. friend for South Huron was Finance Minister? The hon. member for Cardwell has been an active member of the Dominion Board of Trade in years gone by; he has spoken there with ability, he has moved resolutions there, and he has almost taken charge of the proceedings of that body, which has given to the world, in days gone by, in its published reports, all the information he presented in reference to these matters. What were his views at that time? Why, Sir, in an amendment to a motion which was moved by Mr. Wilkes, of Toronto, the hon. member for Cardwell, moved the following resolution:—

“That without expressing any opinion on some of the details of the present Customs Tariff, or the anomalies, which are inevitable on all tariffs, this Board is of opinion that no change should be made in it unless the exigencies of the public service—”

I think I have heard that hon. gentleman use the term, exigencies, on other occasions; it seems to be a favourite word with him—

“demand a larger revenue, and that in such case any increase to be made shall be made in accordance with the principle of the present Customs tariff which, while not interfering with the commerce of the Dominion, affords incidental protection to the manufacturers; that this Board is further of opinion that the permanency of the fiscal policy of the country is most important, alike to the commerce and manufactures, and that no change should be made in the Tariff unless demanded by the absolute exigencies of the revenue.”

That was the resolution of the hon. member for Cardwell and he made a speech on that occasion, in which he made this statement:

“If we could have a 20 per cent. tariff, and the assurance that it must be permanent, I would go in for it. But to my view, if we got that 20 per cent. tariff, strong opposition would arise on the ground of too high taxation. If such a tariff were imposed, and afterwards reduced, it would inflict more, much more, harm on our manufactures than if it had never been imposed. What is wanted is permanence. The 15 per cent. protection gives us fair assurance of that, and under it our manufactures have prospered in the past. It has placed our manufacturing industries in a position of which we may well feel proud. It is a tariff not likely to be lowered in accordance with the views of a fancy financier like Mr. Wilkes, and therefore it may be looked upon as a fair permanent tariff, and as a permanent tariff which ensures to every man engaged in manufacturing industry adequate protection for all reasonable time to come. A 15 per cent. tariff means more than 15 per cent. protection to manufacturers. There is the cost of transport of goods from the other side of the water, which amounts on an average to at least 5 per cent., so that there is now a protection equal to 20 per cent. That ought to be sufficient for any industry suited to the country; and as to others, it would be unwise to attempt to sustain them by fiscal props."

Then, again, we find that an amendment was moved by Col. Walker, of London, declaring that a 15 per cent. Tariff was enough, and the hon. member for Cardwell withdrew his amendment, because he believed in Col. Walker's amendment, and he voted for a solemn declaration that 15 per cent. was a tariff high enough for all reasonable time to come. Still the hon. gentleman undertakes to lecture us, on this side of the House, because we would not increase the duty—and what for? For the exigencies of the public service? No, Sir; and yet that was the only reason which he thought could be given for being in favour of a 15 per cent. tariff, and yet he is found supporting a 35 per cent. tariff, a tariff which gives a 40 or 50 per cent. protection on refined sugar. Was it the exigencies of public service in this case? No, Sir, but the exigencies of party, and the exigencies and other things which did not operate upon the hon. gentleman in times gone by. Now, I come to speak of another subject, which the hon. gentleman touched upon very gingerly, a subject upon which the Finance Minister, in years gone by, has laid down very strong ground, and that is the question of the balance of trade. That is another of those awkward things which, at this particular time, have got out of joint. The Finance Minister has given the House the benefit of his views on that question on more than one occasion. I would just remind him now of the position he took at one time, and I ask him, judging from that position, to tell us what he supposes this country is coming to. The hon. gentleman is reported, in the Toronto Mail of February 24th, 1881, as saying this:

"During the last two years we have nearly equalized our exports with our imports (Cheers). Whatever free traders may say our people cannot understand the theory that the larger the excess of our imports over our exports the more prosperous is the country. We say that, as with the individual, so with the nation, and that if he expends more than he receives poverty stares him in the face. If, on the other hand, his receipts exceed his expenditure, his condition is hopeful. The latter is the condition of the Dominion, if we take into account our receipts for freights (Cheers)."

In his Budget Speech in this House in 1880 he said:

"At the close of the year we will find that by the reduction of the imports and the increase of exports, the balance of trade, which some gentlemen think is of no importance, though I think it is of vital importance to this country, will for the first time in the history of the Dominion, be in our favour."

In his Budget Speech of 1879 he said this:

"There are other difficulties. The volume of imports has not much diminished. Regarding the matter as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the volume of imports has not been materially reduced. I look upon large imports, ever since the Dominion was organized, showing a large balance of trade against us, as one of the causes of the trouble with which we have now to contend—one of the difficulties that it is our duty to remedy. Imports have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large, showing distinctly and clearly, in my judgment, that they ought still further to be diminished."

Again he said:

"It appears to me that we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of our imports from all parts of the world."

The hon. gentleman was convinced that the country was going to ruin if the balance of trade was against us. He laid that down as a proposition, and he said that it was necessary that our attention should be turned to it; and as soon as his massive intellect is turned to any subject, you may be sure that that subject shall be attended to. Well, turning his attention to the mass of our imports and exports, did he succeed in equalizing them? No, but he succeeded in increasing our imports $24,000,000 in 1881, $38,000,000 in 1882, and $50,000,000 in 1883. It seemed to be something he could not manage. And he had that terrible thing, as he considers it, a balance of trade against us, to the extent of $7,000,000 in 1881, $17,000,000 in 1882, and $34,000,000 last year. I would suggest that he should turn his attention to this matter a little more seriously. The thing is getting in such a position that he is hardly able to control it. He tells us, however, that after all, there is one redeeming feature about these imports. They prove, he says, that our workmen and mechanics are earning better wages, and are able to spend more money. Another explanation, I suppose, will be given to us in a year or two when, under the depressed circumstances which seem to be coming upon us, these imports will be reduced again. Now, what are the facts with reference to the balance of trade? In the seven years, from Confederation to 1874, the average annual balance of trade against us was $22,123,745; in the five years of the Mackenzie Government, the average annual balance against us was $21,023,215; and last year the balance against us was $34,168,218. I need not review the arguments, with reference to the balance of trade or the statements as to how it is made up; but I will say that it does not require one to be very familiar with political economy, to understand that when any man lays down the proposition, that when you find the Trade and Navigation Returns, on their face, showing a balance of trade against you, you are that much poorer, he has not mastered the elements of political economy in the slightest degree; and the hon. gentleman is beginning to understand that, and is beginning to hedge on that question, while still attempting to save his reputation, by saying that on the average, during the last four years, we have more nearly equalized our exports with our imports. Now, I come to consider the effect of the Tariff on the industries of this country; and I desire first to call your attention to the effect it has had on the manufacturing industries of the country. In connection with that let me call your attention to a statement made by the hon. Finance Minister in 1881. I propose to show, by reference to authorities which I think he will not venture to contradict, that the statement he made in this House, in 1881, with reference to the increase in our manufactures in this country, was not strictly correct. At that time, he came before us with information, gathered from sources which he did not give us access to, showing the increase which had taken place in many lines of manufactured goods. And that information, the authorities which I am now about to quote will show was wholly inaccurate, and such as should not have been given. What was his statement in 1881? Then he was in the hey-day of his glory. He saw prosperity about him; he saw the effects of the stimulus that was given to the country by the large amount of foreign money that was brought into the country from the causes I have stated; and in the height of his pride and glory, he boasted that his Tariff had made this wonderful change. He boasted that on all sides old factories were employing more hands, new factories were opening up, a great stimulus was given to trade; and he had a table prepared, which he said would demonstrate that the increased prosperity was not brought about by the increased exports, but by the development of our manufacturing industries. He told us that he found that the number of persons employed in the manufacturing industries of the country had been augmented by 14,000, representing a total increase with families of 42,000. If, of these 14,000, 7,000 were occupiers and tenants, were they not, he asked, practically building up a new city in that year of 40,000 inhabitants? Then, by some process of calculation which I do not yet understand, he declared that another 20,000 ought to be added, and claimed that the operation of his Tariff in 1881 was adding to this Dominion a city of 60,000 inhabitants; and there, he claimed, was the source of our prosperity. Well, Sir, he did not give us, in detail, the number of operatives employed in all the manufactures of the country. He gave us that information with reference to two lines. He told us the number employed in the corset factories for one, and I can only judge of his other calculations by those which he gave us. He said that there was an addition of 500 hands to the number of operatives employed in the corset factories, in 1881. In the years 1880 and 1881, the very time this hon. gentleman was giving us those statements, the Census was being taken, and we had not last year, or the previous year the Census returns in our hands, but we have them now. While the Census may be inaccurate with reference to the population, and I believe it is, from the manner in which it was taken, still the manufacturers, in making their returns of the number of hands they employed, the capital they had invested and the amount of their productions, would now be very apt to under-estimate these items. What were the returns made by the manufacturers themselves, of the people employed in factories? At the very time when the Finance Minister said that 500 hands were employed in the corset factories, the Census shows that the total number employed was 320, of whom twenty-three were men over sixteen, fourteen boys under sixteen, eight girls under sixteen, and 275 women over sixteen. The other estimate as to the extra number employed was in the boot and shoe industry, and what did he say with reference to that industry. He said:

"The boot and shoe industry has increased 25 per cent. both as to the amount produced and the number of employees. We find them, moreover, working full time, while before they worked but two-thirds time."

What does the Census show? Does it show any proportion like that. The House will be astonished to learn, after hearing the statement of the Minister, that, according to the Census, while in 1881 we had 18,949 hands employed in that industry, in 1871, ten years previous, we had 18,719, or, after two years Administration of the hon. gentleman's policy, when, according to his statement deliberately made in this House, the number of operatives had increased 25 per cent. and the production in an equal ratio, there were but 230 more men employed in that industry than in 1871. Had there been an increase of 25 per cent., there would have been, 4,600 hands employed in 1881, more than in 1871, whereas the increase was only 230. If only 230 is the actual increase out of his estimate of 4,680, at this rate, his city of 60,000 dwindles rapidly into insignificance. Then we had a reference to the sewing machine industry. When I pointed out the fact that while, under the National Policy, certain manufacturing industries, such as sugars, cottons, and to a certain extent, woollens and one or two others, had benefitted, the old manufacturing industries were not benefitted but many were positively injured by this Tariff, and when I instanced the sewing machine industry as one which gave signs of being hurt instead of benefitted by the National Policy, as shown by the exports of that article to foreign countries, the hon. member for Cardwell replied to me in the following language:—

"Speaking of my (Mr. Paterson's) statement that the exports of sewing machines had declined, he (Mr. White) said it was true, and he thought while I was speaking that he would write down to the manager of the Williams Sewing Machine Company in Montreal and ascertain the cause of that circumstance, and here is the reply—"

Another advertising dodge of the hon. gentleman, another means of puffing the Montreal sewing machine concern:

"In reply to your enquiries, I am happy to be able to state that our business has been very much improved by the operation of the National Policy. We are now employing three times as many hands and making three times as many machines as before the National Policy came into operation, and we find the home markets very much improved. That is to say, we find that more machines can be sold, though we do not get at a higher price; in fact, prices are rather lower than they were, but we do not complain of this, as we much prefer doing a large business with small profits than a small business on large profits. It is much more profitable and satisfactory."

Here is a gentleman whom the hon. member for Cardwell led us to understand was employing three times as many hands and turning out three times as many machines through the operation of the National Policy as he did before. The hon. member certainly could not have read that letter with any other intent than to give this House to understand that the sewing machine manufactories in this country were all benefitting to the same extent as this Montreal factory; at any rate, he took care to make no exceptions. How do the facts stand with reference to that as shown by the Census, an authority the hon. member for Cardwell will not gainsay? In 1881, 1,188 hands were employed in that line, and 1871, 966 hands; or in all the ten years, an increase of only 222 hands, and the production, instead of increasing, actually decreases to the value of $75,187. That is to say, we had less value in sewing machines produced in 1881 than in 1871, ten years previous, yet the hon. member for Cardwell read us a letter, which we were not in a position, officially and authoritatively, to contradict, informing the House that there were three times as many hands employed and there was three times the production in that manufacturing industry as before the National Policy. Let us turn back to the boot and shoe industry which the hon. Finance Minister told us was turning out 25 per cent. more work than formerly. If they had turned out 25 per cent. more work than in 1871, ten years previous, there would have been an increased production to the extent of over $4,000,000, whereas the actual increase was but $1,762,265. I desire to call your attention to the condition of a few other of the manufacturing industries of this country, as revealed by the Census. The hon. Finance Minister and his supporters cannot go behind their own official figures. I am not reading letters from private individuals, but the official figures given in the Census, the returns made by these manufacturers themselves. I said I would show you from these statements that the old manufacturing lines of this country are not thriving any more under the National Policy than they were in 1871, under the 15 per cent. tariff. I have instanced two lines, but I will give others. In relation to our foundries and machine shops, large industries employing a greater number of hands than any others, with one or two exceptions. What are the facts? In 1871, the number of hands employed in those establishments was 7,653, and in 1881, ten years later, after two years' operation of the National Policy, the number had only increased by 136 men. In agricultural implements, the increase of working men in ten years has been 1,110, a greater increase than in the other lines, but not much more than the natural increase that ought to take place through the increase of our population, and the opening up and development of the North-West, which has afforded a wider market for these articles. Take carpenters and joiners. In 1871, we had 5,408; in 1881, we had 5,702, an increase of 294. Take our rolling mills, another important industry. In 1881, the number of hands employed in those mills was 699, against 762 in 1871, or a decrease of 63, and the production has diminished in the same period to the extent of $653,100. Take our ship-yards, an industry in which our friends from the Maritime Provinces are interested. What have been the effects of the National Policy upon the ship-yards in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? Has it stimulated, has it developed that industry? Has it given employment to a greater number of hands there? Let the Census figures, the official figures, the authoritative figures, compiled by the Minister of Agriculture, speak on this point—and they speak with no uncertain sound. In 1871, 6,046 men worked in the ship-yards of this Dominion. In 1881, had that number increased? No; but that number had shrunk to 4,454—1,592 less hands in the ship-yards of this Dominion, in 1881, than ten years before, in 1871. Why do not the members from the Maritime Provinces support this National Policy that is giving such employment to their ship-yards? Why do they not support this National Policy that has taken out of their ship-yards 1,592 men in the last ten years, instead of placing thousands in them, as the hon. gentlemen opposite said it would? And what is the value of the products of the ship-yards? In 1881, under the National Policy, the value of the products of the ship-yards is nothing like what it was in 1871, under the policy of the hon. member for East York. Why, the products of the ship-yards have shrunk, in the ten years, $875,004. There is the result upon that industry, a large industry, a great industry, an industry in which the people of this country, many of them, are vitally interested. Take the result in the manufacture of shingle making, an important industry in the wooded portions of our country, and there are actually 711 men less employed there than ten years before, and there is a product of $124,000 less than in that year. And so you might run through the list, with some exceptions. There has been an increase of cotton operatives, there has been an increase in the woollen manufactories. There has been an increase in our furniture manufactories, but not much more in the article of furniture than would be warranted by the increase of population. In the tanneries, there has been an increase, but not much more than the increase of population would warrant. In the sugar refining industry, what do you think has been the effect produced by the National Policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite? What marvellous effects have been produced in the employment of labour in that industry? We have had it detailed to us in this House, time after time, in days gone by, by the Finance Minister and those who support him. What great development, what great amount of labour, has been given to the country in the sugar refineries? We have it here from the official documents. In 1871, we had 359 men employed in the sugar refineries of the country, and in 1881, we had 723, or we have 364 men more men employed in our sugar refineries two years after the National Policy came into operation, than we had ten years before. There is a very great increase, is it not? 364 men employed. And, in order that the men, the 364 that were employed more, should have been employed, the Tariff was so arranged that the people of this country paid more for the article of sugar, by loss of duty and extra price paid, as has been said in this House time and again, to the extent of more than a million dollars. I grant the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I grant the hon. member for Cardwell, that there were some months when there was keen competition, and the prices of sugar in this country, sold by our refiners, were kept down lower; but I challenge the hon. gentlemen opposite to tell me whether, in the first stage of this high Tariff, which was enacted for the benefit of the sugar refiners, the refinery of Redpath & Son did not clear nearly a million of dollars in that year from the price they got from the people of this country. If it is remedied now, the price was paid at that time. The hon. member for Cardwell did not give us the figures in detail, so that they could be worked out, but I take issue with him on that question and say that, in the article of sugar, by the loss of duty and the increased price, there is to-day a loss of $1,500,000, if you reduce all that sugar to a granulated basis, compared with what it would have been under the Cartwright Tariff. I am sorry the member for Cardwell is not in his place, as I would like to give him these figures. I see the Finance Minister has also retired. I am sorry that I have wearied the hon. gentlemen, but I see the indefatigable Minister of Customs is there, and I know that he can attend to several Departments at once; and, if not, I will send for the Minister of Railways, who can attend to any number of Departments, because we had the statement from the First

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Minister that, when that gentlemen was broken down by too much work in attending to one office, he prescribed for his restoration to health another office in addition, and sent him across the sea. I am sure that, if we had him here now and put another office on him, he would be restored to the most robust health. I will give to the Minister of Finance, or rather I will give to the Minister of Customs, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, these figures. In the last year of the Trade and Navigation Returns, we imported 148,446,081 pounds of sugar under No. 14. That is the kind of sugar that is imported by the refiners to make into refined sugar. Now, speaking of yellow sugars, as the hon. member for Cardwell knows very well, no calculation or comparison can be made, because yellow sugars are a non-descript, and there is no way of doing it. The only way is to reduce all your sugar to a granulated basis, because then you have a standard article and a standard price in both countries. Therefore, I reduce the sugar refined by our manufacturers to a granulated basis, and, to be on the safe side, I allow 12½ per cent. as a loss in bringing raw sugar into granulated sugar. Well, taking that as a basis, the product would have given 130,000,000 pounds of granulated sugar this year.

An hon. MEMBER. Too much.

Mr. PATERSON. I know it is too much, but I put it on that basis to be safe. Now, granulated sugar in Montreal, taking the statement of the hon. member for Cardwell, is worth $8.12, less 2½ cash. Granulated in New York, quoted from the New York Herald of February 6, was 2$7.50 the long price, with a drawback off, which is taken off when sold to a foreign country, of $2.80. The net price a Canadian purchaser would have to pay would be $4.70 a hundred, or, in other words, the net price of granulated sugar in New York, below the price in Montreal, is $3.22 per 100 pounds. Now, 130,000,000 pounds, at $3.22 per pound, amounts to $4,183,000. If there was no duty at all levied upon sugar coming into this country, you would have a saving of $4,183,000 by buying sugar in New York. But there is a duty levied upon it, and we know the amount of duty that went into the revenue from sugar this year—and what was it? It was $2,467,729. That leaves $1,715,271 that is unaccounted for. Now, I will not say that the Canadian refiner has pocketed that amount of money. I do not mean to say he has, but I say that these figures show that, somewhere or another, there is $1,700,000 odd that has to be accounted for. It has been paid by the people of Canada, at all events, in the price. We can test it in another way. The Finance Minister ventured the statement that, under the Tariff of the hon. member for South Huron, sugar could not be laid down from the United States as cheap as you can buy it at the refinery in Montreal to-day. Why, Sir, a more rash statement was never ventured by a Minister of Finance on the floors of Parliament than that. If he had taken the least possible care to ascertain whether his figures were right, the hon. gentleman would have found how mistaken he was. What are the facts? I have said sugar could be bought in New York at $4.70 net, and the duty under the old Tariff on sugar, at $4.76, would be $2.18 per 100 pounds. The duty on 130,000,000 pounds, at $2.18, would be $2,834,000. That is the duty that would have been paid under the old Tariff on 130,000,000 pounds of granulated sugar brought into this country. But instead of that amount, the sum that has gone into our Treasury this year, as the result of the duty on the sugar that has produced these 130,000,000 lbs. of granulated, was $2,467,729; or we have a loss to the revenue of $366,271. What more? The price of granulated in New York is $4.70; the duty under the Cartwright Tariff would be $2.18, which would make the sum of $6.88 which it would cost us duty paid, leaving out the question of freight. We now pay in Montreal $7.92 for the same sugar; take this $6.88 that we would have paid under the old Tariff from New York, from the $7.92, and we find that the extra price the consumer pays is $1.04 per 100 pounds. Take 130,000,000 pounds, at $1.04 per 100, and you have an extra price paid by the people of Canada for their refined sugar, over and above what they would have had to pay, with the duty, under the Cartwright Tariff, of $1,352,000; to which, if you add the loss to the revenue of $366,271, you have a total loss to the people of this country of $1,718,271. So much with reference to the sugar question. Now I come to speak of the cotton industry, an industry that, I admit, has been benefited by the operation of the National Policy, by promoting it in this country; an industry, however, that suffers to-day, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for South Huron and others on the floor of this House, from the unduly high protective Tariff, which has brought about a depressed state of affairs, which can only be remedied by a combination of the manufacturers to restrict production and force up prices. Now, what do we find with reference to the cotton industry? Has it produced the beneficial results, in this country, that we were told to expect? Sir, the benefit we were told would flow to this country from protection to manufacturing industries, was the employment of a greater number of hands, who would receive larger wages. What does the Census return exhibit with reference to this industry? I call the attention of the hon. members of this House, and through this House the attention of the operatives of this country, to what the Census reveals, with reference to the operation of this cotton industry. I ask the attention of the wage-earning class of this community; I ask the attention of the members of this House, who are bound to have regard to the wage-earning class—I ask them to think over these figures furnished to us by the Census, and to say whether we are able to rejoice that high wages are being given to the cotton operatives. The Census shows some eighteen cotton factories in operation in 1881. It reveals the fact that there were employed in these factories, of men over sixteen years of age, 975; of women, over sixteen years of age, 1,445; of boys, under sixteen years, 542; of girls, under sixteen years, 565, or a total number of hands employed in these eighteen cotton factories of 3,527. The total yearly wages paid these cotton operatives, including, no doubt, the salaries of the managers, book-keepers, and all the high officers who are employed in these establishments, and who, in making their returns to the Census, have no object to serve in returning less yearly wages than were actually paid—the total yearly wages are returned as $714,250. Divide that among the 3,527 operatives and what does it give you? A yearly wage of $203 to each of these hands, including all the highly paid officers, or $4 a week on an average to these operatives. If you deduct the high priced salaries, I will venture to say the result will approximate, or come dangerously near, the figures worked out by a prominent newspaper man in this country, from figures furnished by the gentleman who told a Star reporter that he gave the Finance Minister the cotton statistics which the latter gave to this House, these figures thus worked out showing that the cotton operatives were working for about $1.50 per week, I think. And yet the First Minister, on a public platform in Ottawa, asked the working men of this city to endorse this policy and send him back to power; asked them to pronounce on the question of whether they wanted good times, prosperity, steady employment, high wages: or whether, on the other hand, they wanted poverty, want of work, and low wages. He said that was the issue for the working people of this country: "Return us to power and you will have the same prosperity that you had in days gone by." I ask him how he justifies that expression with the words the Finance Minister uttered the other day, finding fault with the Opposition, when he said that though the lumbermen were restricting their operations, yet the moment a few hundred cotton operatives were thrown out of work for a month a great cry was raised in the country. How long does he expect the operatives to remain out of work? How many months would he desire to have operatives remain out of work who are earning the munificent sum of $4 per week each, including, in the average, the salaries of all the high-priced officials? "Oh," but these gentlemen say, "it cannot be helped on the part of the cotton manufacturers. They must look out for themselves." Well, what are the results? We have heard a great deal about cotton being cheaper than it was ever before, that there was not much profit to be made by these cotton manufacturers now. What do we find with reference to that in 1881? The Census enables us to understand that point. I have given the total yearly wages. If we add to that the total value of raw products, $1,927,655, the two amounts make a total of $3,759,412. We find that these cotton manufacturers made, while paying their operatives at the rate of $4 per week, $1,069,507 in a year. Their capital invested was $3,476,500, on which they made a profit of $1,065,507, or over 30 per cent. With these figures before us, figures taken from the Census compiled by hon. gentlemen opposite, we can understand that the cotton manufacturers, at all events, if they be deprived at the present time of great profits, are in not quite so bad a position as their operatives, who work at $4 per week and have not constant employment. I do not like to refer to particular mills, or to attack any man in business, or to allude to any business firm on the floor of Parliament; but speaking in general terms, I would say that one mill, employing 724 hands, has averaged 40 per cent. dividend; three others, employing 736 hands, have averaged about 39 per cent.; but there are certain other factories which have not paid so well, and these have reduced the average to somewhat over 30 per cent. on the capital invested. It will be seen that, while the cotton operatives have increased in the country, they are not that source of wealth we would desire them to be. We would be very glad if it was possible to pay them higher wages, and the country received the benefit. At this point, I desire to bring before the attention of the Finance Minister a question worthy of his consideration, but to which he made no reference in his speech. I refer to the manufacturing of flour. What does the Census tell us in regard to that industry? It points out that in flour and grist mills there was a capital of $13,856,923 invested; there were 6,472 hands employed, and the yearly product was of the value of $41,772,372. In no other manufacture in the country, with the exception of saw mills, is there an equal capital invested, and very few other industries have more hands employed. What is the position of that industry to-day? The hon. Finance Minister has told the House that his policy is a policy of protection for the manufactures of the country. The hon. gentleman told us last year, when he added 10 per cent. to agricultural implements, that it was done because our manufacturers were being crowded and jostled in the North-West, and it was the policy of the Government to give additional protection to our manufacturers rather than lose the market, and that when manufacturers were being crowded by outside competitors, he would arrange the Tariff so as to give them additional protection. I ask the hon. gentleman to-night how it is that, having made such a declaration and promise, and after I have pointed out that this large manufacturing industry, with more capital invested than any other interest but one, is not only not protected by the Tariff but is legislated against, he takes no steps to give them relief. A return has been brought down showing the importations of flour, as compared with wheat, during the past six months. The result is that under the operation of the Tariff, 1,068,493 bushels have been imported, in the shape of flour, from American sources, while only 74,389 bushels have come in as wheat. An appeal might be made to the hon. gentleman, on behalf of the millers, for redress, on patriotic grounds. Why does he fail to increase the duty when it fails to protect these manufacturers, when he raised the duty on agricultural implements, in order, as he said, to save them? The hon. gentleman thought it was incumbent on him to protect the poor classes from wearing shoddy cloth. I would ask him if there was danger of contagion in wearing shoddy cloth, whether there was not additional sin in allowing the food consumed by the people, which goes to form bone, sinew and blood, to be tainted and corrupted by flour drawn from Yankee sources? The hon. Minister stated in his speech this year, that the farmers are now getting the benefit of the duty on wheat to the extent of 8 or 10 cents, because there was a short crop, and no farmer would desire the removal of that duty. That might be true, for this was the first, and might be the only year, when it would be of any advantage. But the policy of the Finance Minister is not to protect manufacturers by reducing the duty on raw materials; but it is to protect manufacturers by increasing the duties on manufactured articles imported from foreign countries, and he has told the House that the foreign manufacturers pay the duty. If that be so, it is easy to provide a remedy. Instead of flour remaining at 50 cents a barrel, the Finance Minister's duty, according to his doctrine, is to increase the tax by another 25 cents, and give Canadian manufacturers fair play in competing with the manufacturers across the line. The hon. Minister may say that the Opposition would object to an increased duty on flour—and so they would, in all probability. But we are not responsible for this Tariff; we are not pledged to it in any way. The hon. gentleman's statement, made on the different platforms of this country, and on the floor of this House, was that, when any manufacturing industry of this country was placed at a disadvantage, from foreign manufactures coming in, he would use the Tariff as a means to prevent this competition, and provide a remedy. I have brought the matter to his attention, and leave him to deal with it. Now, Sir, I come to consider the question of how this Tariff is affecting our farmers. I admit that this year there has been an increased price to the farmer from the duty on wheat. But it is because this has been a year of short crop, a famine year in Canada, a year such as we do not often have, and a year which I trust we may not often have. I say, in the first place, that a Tariff which taxes the bread which fills the mouth of the orphan and the widow, is not a Tariff which should commend itself; and while I say that such has been the operation of the Tariff this year, the Finance Minister knows, and the House knows, that under ordinary circumstances, and in ordinary years, the imposition of this duty on wheat has had no effect on the price whatever, and he knows that while the anomaly prevailed with reference to the duties on wheat and flour in years gone by, it did not hurt the milling industry, because the duty on wheat had no effect in advancing its price. He knows that now this has changed, and as the miller has to import his wheat from the other side of the line, it is only this year that the duty on wheat has given the farmer any benefit whatever, and in ordinary circumstances, he cannot hope to derive any benefit from it whatever. I would ask, in the next place, what has the National Policy done for the lumbermen and the fishermen. The hon. gentleman himself does not pretend that it has done any good to the lumbermen, who are employed in one of the greatest industries of the country. It went on to thrive, as thrive it might, as after his policy came into operation it continued to prosper, as prosper it could, after his policy came in, but whether it prosper or not, his Tariff has no effect upon it whatever, except it be to injure it by the higher prices which are charged for supplies of various kinds. And what is to be said as to the effect upon the wage-earning class of this country? Has the Finance Minister carried out his pledges to them? Has the First Minister and the Minister of Public Works, who asked for their votes expressly on the ground of this policy, and who both appealed to them on the issue that this policy would secure for them steady employment and high wages, kept their promises? I ask these hon. gentlemen if they have implemented their promises, and I reply they have not. I say it is known to the Finance Minister that the promises made by him at that time have not been kept. The answer to that question was to be seen in the hesitating manner, the altered tone of voice, in which he gave us the Budget Speech this year, a speech which was received almost in solemn silence by this House, whereas, in other years, his supporters cheered and rehearsed his words to the echo, as he announced that every workingman in the country was being employed in the country and at a higher wage than before. I say that he should carry out the promises which he gave to these men, that their wages would be increased, and that steady employment would be secured to them. Hon. gentlemen say that there are good times in the country, but the best answer to that statement is made by the leather workers of Montreal, who lately asked their employers for an increase of wages, who are reported to have written to their masters that they did not think of striking, that they would almost sooner starve than strike, but that, as their wages were only $6 or $8 a week, as they had families of seven or eight, they could not hope to pay their way; that, owing to the low wages, they could not educate their children, as they had to put them in factories at twelve years of age and under, and they appealed to their masters to increase their wages, if possible. Sir, the policy of the hon. gentleman has driven the workmen of this country into the position of suppliants, who have to beg their masters in order to get their wages increased to a living rate—to a rate which existed before the National Policy was introduced. They tell the Finance Minister that the cost of living has gone up to the extent of 30 per cent., and I think their testimony on that point is more valuable than anything the hon. member for Cardwell, or even the Finance Minister, can give us, with reference to that. We need not argue on the floors of Parliament this question as to the cost of living. It is a question which can be best answered in every home in the country, and by the inmates of every such home; and I leave it to them to determine whether or not the cost of living has increased under the operation of the National Policy. Let the hon. Minister of Finance go to Hamilton, which was paraded as being especially benefited by the National Policy, two years ago. Let him visit the various machine shops, as he did a few years ago, when he was making his triumphal tour through the country, at a period when we were having good times, as a result of the sums of money which were coming into this country from the sales of our goods abroad. Let him go to these places now, and he will find that wages have decreased 10 and even 20 per cent.; he will find men working on short time, and then let him recall the promises he made, that his policy would give the workmen steady work at high wages. But he has not gone to Hamilton, and I do not think he will go. Sir, the position of the Minister of Finance is a proud position, but high as the honour is, I think it is a pity that such a position should be occupied by virtue of promises which were given, but which are now proved to be promises which have not been verified—which cannot be verified—proved by the bitter experience of those to whom they were made and to whose support the hon. gentleman, in a large measure, owes his present position. In conclusion, I would allude to one or two remarks which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) made in reference to the observations of the hon. member for South Huron, as to the exodus from this country. As I understood the hon. member for Cardwell, he charged my hon. friend with having cooked the American figures in making his calculations. Having read that hon. gentleman's speech, I have only to say that I have been unable to ascertain that he did so. I believe that the hon. member for Cardwell was out of order altogether in referring to proceedings before a Committee of this House, but as I did not call attention to the matter, I certainly think I may be permitted to say that the testimony of an official, who stated that he had deliberately falsified the returns he had sent to the United States Government, is not worth very much, and that it was not very creditable to the hon. member for Cardwell that he should bring such evidence into this House to support his statements. The hon. member for South Huron, as I understand, used no American statistics with reference to this matter at all—they were all Canadian statistics. These figures are a fair matter of argument, and if the hon. member for Cardwell can, by fair arguments, meet them on the ground upon which they were offered, and refute them, I believe the hon. member for South Huron would be glad to find that they could be refuted. I have not gone into the matter, but this much I do know, that as the increased cost of living in this country may be left for decision to the inhabitants of the country, so this matter of emigration from Canada to another country may be left to the people of this country, each man being left to determine for himself, as he looks around his county, whether or not men have gone from that county or not. I should be glad, if in looking into the matter, we find that none of our countrymen have gone into foreign countries—that none of them are now living as citizens of a foreign land. The hon. member for Cardwell pointed out that large changes had taken place in regard to the residents of the adjoining States. He lost sight of the fact that, while in that country the people went from one State to another State, they were still in their own country, they were still paying taxes and their employment was still adding wealth to their own country. He did not venture to tell us that the thousands of people who are migrating from State to State come into our country. If there should be a large population from our own country going to Manitoba, we would rejoice in that, because we would like to see the foundations of that country laid by our own citizens; but what we lament and grieve at is, that after many of them have gone to that country, intending to make it their home, they have been forced—despite what the hon. member for Cardwell can say, the testimony is too plain, and has been too often repeated—forced by vexatious restrictions and laws, which were not made in the interest of that country, to leave their own land and their own flag, and to cast in their lot with a people who, while not unfriendly to us, are still another people. These are the facts we deplore, and the hon. member for Cardwell, or any other hon. gentleman opposite, will talk for a long time before they will convince us that there is not good reason why people should leave that country. That they are leaving it, cannot be denied, and I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite on what ground are they leaving it? The climate is as good, we are told, as the climate of Dakota; the soil, we are told, and I rejoice in it, is more fertile than the soil of Dakota. I believe, and I rejoice in it, that our North-West is a better country than are the north-western States, and that being the case, how is it that Canadians, born in Canada, with all the love for our flag that we have, are leaving a country that is as good in climate, more fertile in soil, with our own flag waving over it—how is it that they are leaving a land with all these advantages to settle in a foreign land, where a foreign flag floats over them, and where the soil is inferior to ours, unless it be that bad legislation has driven them away? The hon. member for Cardwell makes light of this. He speaks of the monopoly clause as if it were nothing. Why, Sir, say to freemen going into that country—what is the fact, that we have a law on the Statute Book of Canada, placed by hon. gentlemen opposite—that that immense country, with all its resources, with all its possibilities, with the prospect of its producing millions upon millions of bushels of wheat, is to be tied up, to have its produce carried over one line of railway for the next fifteen years, and I ask if you do not point to something that is calculated to strike a chill to their very souls. When you tell them that there is a clause on the Statute Book of Canada which the Parliament of Canada itself, when it had an opportunity by the reopening of this contract, deliberately refused to expunge, that for fifteen years from to-day it will amount to an offence for any man or number of men to dare to tap that North-West country with any railways from the United States, in order to afford the people competition, you can readily understand that something exists which which will naturally make people hesitate before they decide to settle in that country. Sir, these hon. gentlemen talk about patriotism—patriotism, exemplified by fastening the fetters of monopoly on the North-West country, and by their refusal to relax those fetters. Patriotism with a vengeance that is. Then, Sir, people go there to find the lands of this great corporation exempted from taxation. They find that when they have grown their wheat, and want to export it, they will have to pay the price which that railway company may ask. These are the things which have prevented that country from being rapidly settled and becoming the great country which it ought to be to-day. Here we are this year, when hundreds of thousands ought to have been settled in that country—here we are, with people scattered over it, far fewer in numbers, I venture to say, than would have been found in that country had my hon. friends remained in power and given effect to their policy in reference to that road. What a folly this House committed when it sanctioned the contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I refer not to the fact that $30,000,000 has been thrown on top of all that we gave them before, but to the fact that they originally received far more money and land than was required for the work to be done—that that great country was practically handed over to them to do with it as they pleased. I ask if, when the Parliament of that day committed that huge blunder—to use no harsher name—they did not inflict a great loss on the people of this country? What are we getting in return? Hon. gentlemen tell us we are opening up the country and they ask us to look at the people who are going in there. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite if there is a man, if there is a woman, if there is a child in that country not born there, who did not go in over the road that was built by the Mackenzie Government before these hon. gentlemen came into power at all. It was after we had opened up that country that people went in, and that a city of thousands of people arose there—that, according to the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways, there were 61,000 people in that country—that there was a means of ingress into it—that you could go into a Pullman car at Ottawa, and not get out of it till you were in the North-West. The country was in that position when hon. gentlemen opposite handed it over, with $25,000,000, 25,000,000 acres of land, and $25,000,000 worth of completed road to a Company, and supplemented it the other day, handsomely and generously, with $30,000,000 more, which they say, however, is ours and will return to us; consoling this House with the thought of the man who had a note which another man had given him and then run away, and who said: "I do not care if he has run away, for I have his note—I have security." Why did we not keep that road and build it ourselves, as it was being built by the Mackenzie Administration, and as the leader of the Government, himself, said, was the policy of his Government, the Mackenzie Government having built the difficult part, so that we could push it out into the prairie as settlement required it, open up branches, and, as the commerce and requirements of the country demanded, build the ends. Sir, that would have been a wise policy; but it is too late to propose that now. A Statute was passed by which these fetters were placed on the country, and an opportunity was afforded by the re-opening of the contract to give a remedy to that country, but it has not been used. We have the promise of the hon. Minister of Railways that when this Company slacken their hand the Government will not exercise the power they have exercised in the past, of disallowing charters in the old Province of Manitoba, and then some relief may be given. The hon. member for Cardwell took my hon. friend from South Huron to task, because he said that the moral sentiment of this country had been lowered by hon. gentlemen opposite. I admit that the language of the hon. member for South Huron was pretty strong. He can speak strongly when he likes, and I believe he speaks most strongly when he feels most strongly. I would ask the hon. member for Cardwell, if he were in his seat, whether, when the hon. member for South Huron said that the moral tone of this country had been lowered by the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, he did not himself believe that statement to be true. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the people of this country are not influenced by the example that is set them by men in high places; I would ask him whether the young men of this country ought not to be taught to look to their representative men, to the men who occupy seats in this House, and especially the members of the Ministry, as men from whom they may take that line of conduct in life which will tend to ennoble them, and make them the men they ought to be; I would ask the hon. member whether, judged from that standpoint which himself admits to be the true one, the tendency of his party and the action of the Government and the past Parliament which supported that Government, did not tend to lower the moral tone of the people. The hon. gentleman referred to the Gerrymandering Act, and I refer to it again. I would ask of him who was a party to that Gerrymandering; Act I would ask him and those who acted with him in that matter, and primarily the Ministers, upon whom the responsibility rests, if they did not lower the moral tone of this country. I would ask them if their example is to be an example to the young men, the sons of Canada, that are growing up in our midst, what lesson will the young men learn from that Act of the Parliament of Canada? They will, if they follow the example set by the Minister in that Act, justify the oppression of the weak by the strong, justify the oppression of the poor by the rich, and the business men of this country, if they follow the example set by the hon. Ministers in that question, will learn that the proper course of procedure in trade is when they get a man in a position where he cannot help himself, to better their chances at his expense. Yet the hon. gentleman will try and find fault when I say the moral tone of the country has been lowered. The greatest charge that can be made against the Government lies in that very fact; financial mistakes can be remedied, but to injure the morality of the community, as they have injured it, not only in this but in other cases, is to do an injury to the State beyond computation. In other respects, hon. gentlemen opposite have not done that which it was their duty to do. I do not claim that the members of the Opposition are all that can be desired, in the way of purity, when we come to our election contests; I do not claim that all the virtue and morality is on the one side and that none is on the other side; but this I do say, on behalf of the Liberal party, that they have ever desired and striven to have laws placed on the Statute Books of Canada that would tend to bring about purity in election contests, and hon. gentlemen opposite have always resisted any measure to that end with all their power. This I will say on behalf of the party with which I have the honour to be connected, that their aim has ever been to obtain such a law as would give us purity in elections, while hon. gentlemen opposite have always thrown impediments in our way. These and other acts done by this Parliament are noted in the country, and by reason of their operation a state of things has been brought about that every well-wisher of his country trusts may not be too deeply rooted to be effaced. I desire to say, in conclusion, that I am of opinion with the hon. member for South Huron that, great as are the blunders that have been committed, if the Ministry will but, from this time forward, enter upon a higher course, a better policy, that notwithstanding their financial blunders, they can be recovered from in time by a country with the great resources which ours possesses; but I do ask that, whenever in the future they will be called, as they have been in the past, to set an example to the youth of the country, they should be equal to their position; I ask that their conduct should be such as will elevate the people, and we will get over the financial mistakes they have made. I will say this, that amidst much that is depressing in this country, although the public tone is lower than we would desire to have it in the press of the country, there is one thing I have witnessed that has given me pleasure, and that is that we have in this country yet sufficient high spirit and just feeling on the part of the French Conservative press to enable them, while standing by their party, to refuse to be parties to the foul slander that has been attempted to be cast on the leader of the Opposition, when the members of that Province who, in this House, were manly enough to stand up and while maintaining their party allegiance, to say that they would consider it unworthy of themselves to endeavour to lower the character of a gentleman whose character is untarnished in its honour, the press of that Province echoed their sentiments. It is one of the bright things amidst much that is depressing to find that the whole press has not got so low as to endeavour to steal falsely away the character of an hon. gentleman, whose high place in the estimation of the people it is not possible for the press or any one to lower. Not only hon. gentlemen on this side, but hon. gentlemen opposite—those who are not eye to eye with him—know in their heart of hearts that he is a man worthy of their regards. Driven by the personal taunts of members—who, I hope, forgot themselves, for that is the most lenient way of putting it—he was compelled, in self-defence, to give us a little part of his private affairs, and we learned what was known to some of us before, that there is no gentleman in the country or House who is making the sacrifices of a pecuniary nature, in serving the people of this country, that are being made by him.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. Is that derisive? Does the hon. gentleman who ironically cheers, mean that he is sacrificing as much in coming to this House?

Mr. BOWELL. He may be just as honest if he has not so much to sacrifice.

Mr. PATERSON. He may be, but I am speaking of the sacrifice.

Mr. BOWELL. A widow's mite is as much as his.

Mr. PATERSON. That is quite true; but does the hon. Minister of Customs, who interrupts me, feel he is capable of making such a sacrifice. Would he even sacrifice his wife's relations, or any of his cousins and aunts? Until he is prepared to follow that example, and until he is prepared to give a little better evidence of a self-denying spirit than I venture to say will be found in some of the appointments he has made, till he can take that position, it does not become him to attempt to weaken the force of what I am saying in reference to this subject. As to that gentleman who, in this House, although he leads the Opposition, moulds largely the legislation, who is always in his place, and who, in private legislation, brings the great weight of his ability to bear upon it, and helps to shape and form many of the Government measures, I ask is he a gentleman who may be taunted, is he a gentleman who may be vilified, is he a gentleman whom hon. gentlemen opposite may rise and in a moment of forgetfulness, taunt as occupying a position unworthy of him? We stand not many on this side, but we wish it to be understood—I, for one, wish it to be understood—that, while prepared to accord all that is right and just to hon. gentleman opposite, while willing at all times and desirous to conduct the debates in parliamentary style and language, while willing to accord to them everything I can in the way of conscientiousness for the votes they give, I tell them that, if they rise to vilify, if they rise to insinuate against the character of the gentleman who leads this party, if they rise to attempt to brow-beat the small band who represent that party in this House, they will find opposed to them a body of men who, though few in number, know enough and are able enough to maintain their rights at all times and on all occasions, and to point out to this Government, when they feel it their duty to do so, wherein they have erred in this matter, as I have endeavoured to do to-night, pointing out to the Finance Minister that promises which have been made have not been kept, and that it is hoped that in future he will amend his action, and that we will have cause to believe that he was promising what he had it in his power to do, and that, having it in his power, he is willing to have it carried into effect.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on the following Resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the following articles be added to the list of goods that may be entered free of duty when imported into Canada, viz:—
  - Bolting cloths, not made up.

  - Equal to number nine, and not above fourteen Dutch standard, a specific duty of three-fourths of a cent per pound, and twenty-seven and a-half per cent. ad valorem.
  - Below number nine Dutch standard, a specific duty of one-half cent per pound, and twenty-seven and one-half per cent. ad valorem.
  19. Melado, and concentrated melado, three-eighths of one cent per pound, and twenty-seven and one-half per cent. ad valorem.
  - On all the above sugars, melado, and concentrated melado, when not imported direct, without transhipment, from the country of growth and production:—
  20. Above number fourteen Dutch standard—a specific duty of one cent per pound, and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.
  - Equal to number nine, and not above number fourteen Dutch standard, a specific duty of three-fourths of one cent per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.
  - Below number nine Dutch standard, a specific duty of one-half cent per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.
  21. Melado, and concentrated melado, a specific duty of three-eighths of one cent per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.
  22. Concentrated cane juice, concentrated molasses, concentrated beet root juice, and concrete, whether imported direct or not, a specific duty of three-eighths of a cent per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.
  23. Syrups, cane juice, refined syrup, sugar house syrup or sugar house molasses, syrup of sugar, syrup of molasses, or sorghum, whether imported direct or not, a specific duty of five-eighths of a cent per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.
  24. Molasses, other, when imported direct, without transhipment, from the country of growth and production, fifteen per cent. ad valorem, on the value thereof free on board.
  25. Molasses when not so imported, twenty per cent. ad valorem.
  - The value upon which the ad valorem duty shall be levied and collected upon all the above named sugars, melado, syrups, molasses, &c., shall be the value thereof free on board, as provided by section 77 of the Customs Act, 1883.
  26. Zinc, chloride, salts and sulphate of, five per cent. ad valorem.
3. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal all such parts of the Act 42 Victoria, chapter 15, and of the Acts amending the same, or of the schedules of such Acts, as imposes a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem on "mill irons and mill cranks and wrought forgings for mills and locomotives and parts thereof, weighing 25 pounds or more," and on "stationery of all kinds, not elsewhere specified,"—or which imposes any other duty of Customs on any of the foregoing articles than those imposed thereon by this Resolution, or which admits any such articles free of duty when imported into Canada.
    4. Resolved, That section 8 of the Act 42 Victoria, Chapter 15, be repealed and the following enacted:—
    8. An allowance may be made for deterioration by natural decay during the voyage of importation, upon perishable articles, such as green fruits and vegetables imported into Canada, but in assessing the same, and in estimating the damage by breakage upon brittle goods, such as crockery, china, glass and glassware, under the provisions of sections 53 and 54 of the Customs Act of 1893—such allowance or damage shall only be made and allowed for the amount of loss in excess of 25 per cent. of the whole quantity damaged, and only in case claim is made therefor, and the loss or damage certified, upon examination made by the appraiser or proper officer of Customs, within three days of the landing or arrival of such goods at the port of destination thereof; and provided, the duty has been paid on the full value thereof, on application to the Minister of Customs, a refund of such duty may be allowed and paid, in the proportion and in a fulfilment of the conditions above specified, but not otherwise.
- Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.
- (In the Committee.)
- On Resolution 1,
- Mr. BLAKE. I suppose it is not the hon. gentleman's intention to go farther than the free list to-night?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; I would like to get all the Resolutions through to-night.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to continue my observation to the Finance Minister, without his interposition. I do not think it would be reasonable to take the whole of the Resolutions to-night. They have been placed before us at a very recent period. We did not anticipate that the hon. gentleman proposed to take all of them through to-night. Some information is required in reference to some of these points, not on the free list, as far as I am concerned, but as to the effect on the trade of some of the subsequent proposals, and I think the hon. gentleman should allow us to discuss them in Committee, after that information is obtained.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That might be done on Concurrence; but, at the same time, I do not desire to press them. Of course, nothing can be gained, as hon. members opposite, if they desire, can prevent the Resolutions being passed to-night. We might give the information on Concurrence, but, if he prefers, we will take the free list to-night, and the others on Thursday.

Mr. BLAKE. Nothing would be gained by waiting for Concurrence, if we got the desultory debate on Concurrence. We might as well have it in Committee.

Resolution 1 agreed to.

Progress reported, Committee to sit again.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:55 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 5th March, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FRAUD IN RELATION TO PUBLIC CONTRACTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desire again to call the attention of the House to the matter which came up yesterday. I thought that the intimation then given by the hon. Minister of Public Works would have received attention; but I am sorry to say that his advice was ineffective. Although a meeting of the Special Committee, to which Bill No. 12 was referred, was called for to-day, nothing was done. I think the proper course, unless the House chooses to do otherwise, would be to reduce the quorum of the Committee. Therefore I move, seconded by Mr. Charlton, that the quorum of the Special Committee, to which was referred Bill No. 12, intituled, An Act for the prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, be reduced to three members.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When I stated to the hon. gentleman yesterday that I thought that the fact that he had called the attention of the House to this matter, would most likely obtain a quorum for the Committee, I did not think the hon. gentleman would call a meeting immediately, because members have other Committees to attend and other things to do, and if the hon. gentleman had given forty-eight hours notice, I have no doubt the Committee would have met. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is rather quick about it. I am not aware that there is any desire to prevent this Bill being considered. When I was speaking yesterday, I forgot the members who were away. The hon. member for Lincoln is sick and is away from town, the hon. member for Victoria was away at the time, and the hon. gentleman himself had been absent, so that out of nine members, three that we know of were away, and it is not surprising that among the remainder there has not been found a quorum. I certainly think that the hon. gentleman should allow the Committee to meet in the ordinary way. I do not know whether or not this motion requires a notice; but I think the rule that we have been following has been that when a Committee requires to change its quorum, a report is made by the Committee to the House, and upon that report a motion is made by the chairman or some other member of the Committee to change the quorum. The quorum in this case is not large; it is five. I think the hon. gentleman should allow the Committee to meet in the ordinary way, after giving sufficient notice.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend stated yesterday that the Committee had been convened six or seven times fruitlessly. I have no knowledge, in my short Parliamentary experience, of such a state of things as that having existed heretofore. The hon. gentleman states what is true, that the general practice is, when a quorum is to be reduced, that it should be on a report of the Committee; but he will observe that my hon. friend cannot get the Committee together in order to make a report. If the hon. members who are on the Committee and who have undertaken to discharge this duty, did not object to being placed on the Committee when their names were mentioned, they ought to serve; because I need not say that the hon. First Minister or whatever gentleman is leading the House suggests the names of the members of these Committees to which Bills are referred. In this particular instance, the Committee was modified at the request of the hon. First Minister or of some hon. member opposite, who was acting for the Government at the time. I do not suggest this motion should be pressed after what the hon. Minister of Public Works has said, but I say it is an extraordinary and exceptional state of things that a Select Committee composed of nine members struck by the direction of the House should have been convened six or seven times without a quorum being obtained. I trust my hon. friend's next attempt will be more successful. We know it is the rule of the House that members opposed to the principle of a bill should not be on the Committee to which it is referred, that he should not be placed in the anomalous position of endeavouring to carry out the principle of a measure to which he is opposed, or of seeking to defeat it by staying away.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I was put on the Special Committee after the original Committee was framed. I was not aware, at the time, what the subject matter of the Bill was. I attended on two or three occasions when there was no quorum, and at the last meeting, when we had some informal discussion, there not being a quorum present, I said that I ought not to have been put upon the Committee, inasmuch as that I had, during the last Session, voted for the expulsion of the Bill my hon. friend then introduced, which was substantially the same as this one. I promised to attend the next meeting but was prevented by illness, and the next day, left for the west, and have since been absent until this morning. I do not therefore feel that I am open to the charge I understood the hon. member for West Durham to be making against a majority of the members of that Committee, of simply abstaining from attending, in order to prevent the Committee from carrying on its deliberations.

Mr. BLAKE. After the statement of the hon. gentleman for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), I would suggest that his name be struck off the Committee and another substituted.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The matter is entirely in the hands of the House, and I suppose the hon. gentleman will suggest the name of some hon. member to replace that of the hon. member for North Victoria in order that the Committee may be convened.

Motion withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that Mr. Cameron (Victoria) be relieved from serving on the Committee, and that Mr. Macmaster be substituted for him.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 112) to prevent Sunday Excursions.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 113) to amend the Act 38 Victoria, Chapter 83, respecting Copyrights.—(Mr. Béchard.)

Bill (No. 114) for the prevention of the Adulteration of Food and Drugs.—(Mr. Costigan.)

INCORPORATION OF QUEBEC PILOTS.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether the Government consider that the Act 13 and 14 Victoria, chapter 123, incorporating the pilots for and above the harbour of Quebec, and the Act 16 Victoria, chapter 258, amending the same, are still in force; and if not, what are the reasons for their opinion that the said Statutes are not in force?

Mr. McLELAN. This is a question of law upon which the Department has not obtained an opinion from any legal gentleman, or from the Department of Justice.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. SMALL enquired, Is it the intention of the Government, during this Session, to introduce any amendments to the Civil Service Act?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The matter is under consideration, and it is likely that during this Session some amendment to the Civil Service Act will be introduced.

EXPORT DUTY ON PINE AND SPRUCE LOGS.

Mr. VAIL enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill the present Session to repeal the export duty on pine and spruce logs?

Mr. BOWELL. No, Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill to that effect.

CLAIMS FOR LOSSES ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government has in its possession any report from one of the Dominion arbitrators in relation to a claim preferred by a Mr. Fraser, of the county of Pictou, for a sum to compensate him for losses suffered by him in consequence of the burning of his fences and a certain quantity of his wood? Does that report show that the fire in question was occasioned by one of the Government locomotives on the Intercolonial Railway? Did the Government at first refuse to pay that claim, and why? Did the Government subsequently pay that claim, and why? What difference is there, in equity, between that claim and that preferred by Mr. Joseph Charles Lislois? What difference is there, in law, between the two claims?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg leave to say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that the Government has a report in its possession from one of the Canadian arbitrators in relation to a claim preferred by Mr. Fraser, of the county of Pictou, for a sum to compensate him for losses suffered by him in consequence of the burning of his fences and a certain quantity of his wood, that that report shows that the fire was occasioned by one of the Government locomotives on the Intercolonial Railway; that the Government did refuse to pay that claim; that the Government subsequently paid the claim, in consequence of an award made by the arbitrator that it should be paid; and that the difference between that claim and the claim of Mr. Joseph Charles Lislois is that, in the one case, the arbitrator made an award in favour of the party, and in the other case, the arbitrator stated that the Government were not legally liable.

THE BOUNTY TO FISHERMEN.

Mr. McISAAC enquired, In what counties of Nova Scotia has the bounties to fishermen for last season's fishing been paid, and how soon shall it be paid in such counties (if any) as have not yet received the same?

Mr. McLELAN. I believe the cheques have not yet been issued. A large staff in the Department is engaged in preparing them, and examining the claims, and as soon as possible the cheques will be sent out in all the counties.

LIGHTHOUSE ON GOOSE ISLAND, NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. KIRK enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to erect a lighthouse on Goose Island, Guysboro' County, Nova Scotia, this year, for which a sum was voted in 1882.

Mr. McLELAN. There has been a good deal of delay in procuring a site for the erection of the house, a larger sum being demanded for it by the proprietor of the point selected by the officer than we thought we were justified in giving. Steps will be taken to expropriate land and proceed with the erection of the building.

PIER IN BELLE RIVER, ESSEX COUNTY.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Did the Government advertise for tenders for the construction of the pier in Belle River, county of Essex? If so, did such advertisement appear in any paper published in the said county? The name and residence of each person tendering, with the amount of each tender? Was the contract let at the tender price? Has any change been made in the work? What security was taken for the performance of the work? If cash, how much? If sureties, name and residence of each?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not a pier. Two piles are being placed on the west side of the entrance to the river, and a few more on the eastern side. We are building no pier.

SALE OF POSTAGE STAMPS AT WINDSOR, ONT.

Mr. LISTER enquired, Has R. Venn, of Windsor, been appointed by the Government to sell stamps? If so, when was he appointed and what is his salary? Has he been authorized to sell such stamps in the post office at Windsor? Does he pay rent? If so, how much?

Mr. CARLING. A license was granted on the 28th March, 1883, to Mr. Venn to sell postage stamps; he is paid by commission; he sells stamps in the lobby of the Windsor post office, and pays no rent.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LOAN BILL.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following letter from the Governor General's Secretary:—

"Sir,—His Excellency the Governor General having appointed Chief Justice Sir William Ritchie his Deputy to give the Royal assent to the Bill respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, I have the honour to inform you that the Deputy Governor will attend at the Senate Chamber on this day at 5:30 o'clock, p. m., for this purpose.

"I have the honour to be Sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"MELGUND."

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the object of good government is to promote the general welfare of the people by a careful encouragement and protection of whatever makes for the public good, and by an equally careful discouragement and suppression of whatever tends to the public disadvantage.

That the traffic in alcoholic liquors as beverages is productive of serious injury to the moral, social and industrial welfare of the people of Canada.

That despite all preceding legislation, the evils of intemperance remain so vast in magnitude, so wide in extent and so destructive in effect, as to constitute a social peril and a national menace.

That this House is of the opinion, for the reasons hereinbefore set forth, that the right and most effectual legislative remedy for those evils is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, for beverage purposes.

He said: I do not think it necessary to offer any apology for asking the attention of the House to this Resolution. I think it will be generally agreed by the members of this House that the functions of Parliament are of two kinds. It is, of course, the duty of Parliament carefully to scrutinize and supervise the details of all enactments upon subjects which come under its purview; and it is equally the important duty of Parliament to investigate as carefully, and to discuss as thoroughly, the principles upon which its legislation is founded in order that such legislation may be as effective and as salutary as possible. Subjects for legislation, Sir, do not often take their rise in Parliament itself; but they generally arise from the wishes, the necessities, or the grievances of the people outside of Parliament, and after a course of agitation in the public mind they find their way to Parliament where they demand consideration, discussion and settlement. I am here to-day to state that in my humble opinion there is no stronger feeling in the hearts and minds of the people of this country upon any subject whatever than the feeling with reference to the traffic of intoxicating liquors, and the best means for mitigating the evils arising therefrom, or of doing away with them altogether so far as possible; and I desire to-day to give expression, so far as I possibly can, to what I think are the wishes, the feelings and the desires on this matter of at least a very large portion of the people of Canada. I know that however feeble and hesitating my words may be, there will be in them a striving for expression of the thoughts and convictions of a very large portion of the people of this country in reference to this subject. I am not going to say how large, or how general, or how multitudinous are the demands of the people for legislation against the liquor traffic, but I know this much, that about ten years ago there appeared on the floors of this Parliament a most eloquent though silent plea in reference to this same matter, and in the line of the Resolution which has just been read. At that time there were laid upon the Table of the House petitions signed by tens and scores of thousands of earnest men and women; I think there were petitions signed by municipal councils, by the officers of great religious bodies which were fairly influential and representative in their character; and if I mistake not, resolutions were also laid upon the Table from at least two or three of the Provincial Legislatures of this Dominion, and the prayer of all these petitions and resolutions was in the line of the Resolutions which I have just presented to the House. So much with reference to the constituency which is interested in this matter. I think I may also safely say that during the ten years which have elapsed since then this feeling has not grown less, but on the contrary it has grown broader, and deeper, and more intensified. Not only is there a large constituency of persons in Canada who, I believe, are demanding that the traffic in intoxicating liquors should be prohibited by legal enactment, so far as this Parliament has power to do so, but I am emboldened to say a few words to-day in behalf of this Resolution because of the importance of the matter itself. We are here, Sir, as legislators sent by the people from the different constituencies of Canada. We spend three or four months in the year in discussing and enacting legislation upon such subjects as demand legislation at our hands. We have spent a great deal of time and a great deal of energy in discussing matters of Tariff and revenue. The object of these discussions and the consequent enactments is two fold: First to raise, as easily and as lightly as possible, a sufficient revenue for the wants of the country; and in the second place, to make the conditions of labour as favourable as they can be made, and to devise means for the greater development of our resources. And yet, during the seventeen years which have elapsed since Confederation, I think I am within the mark in saying that the money which has been spent by our people in the liquor traffic would, by many millions, exceed the average of the revenues which have been gathered by this Government over the whole Dominion. I think I am also within the mark when I say that the conditions of labour and the development of the country have been materially hindered and retarded by the operation of this same traffic. An important subject of legislation is that which concerns immigration, and the policy of bringing in people from abroad to settle our new country, and, by their labour, to develop its resources, and by their industry and virtue, to contribute to the permanency and the beauty of the civilization we are building up; yet I think, Sir, I am within the mark when I say that during the seventeen years which have elapsed since Confederation the result of the liquor traffic in this Dominion, from its eastern to its western limits, in the idleness it has produced, the crime it has excited, and the waste of resources which it has caused, has gone far to nullify the good results of our immigration policy, and has taken out of the productive industries of this country and rendered useless for its development, almost as much brawn and muscle as have been brought into it by the immigration policies of all Governments from Confederation to the present time. Sir, we are concerned with the development and good government of our country as well, and it is the object of our deepest and best consideration that such legislation should be placed upon the Statute-Books of this country, so far as our powers extend, as will contribute to the development and prosperity, to the continued peace and good order of the communities which make up this country. And yet I am within the mark when I say that the evils resulting from the liquor traffic in the Dominion have done more to retard the prosperity of the country and to sow germs of disorder and discontent than any other other evils probably with which this country has been afflicted. So I say, Sir, if we look at the importance of this question, we may be sure that this Parliament is not going beyond its duty, and and that hon. members are not going beyond their privilege when they venture to call the attention of the House to the best means of dealing with and of mitigating the serious evils which result from this traffic. Sir, if the object of good government be to protect what is good, to prevent what is evil, and to develop so far as we can the best in society and in the nation, I do not know of any question which towers higher, which comes nearer, which appeals more strongly for solution than the one we have under consideration to-day. And, Sir, if we regard, on the one hand, the magnitude and dearness of those interests which are affected by it, and if we regard, on the other hand, the magnitude of the mischiefs which are, and which have been wrought by it, the wonder is, not that this request has come to-day into Parliament, but that it has not sooner come, that it has not been more constantly and more importantly preferred. If we look into the country, and see what has taken place there within the last twenty years, if we look at the hold this question has taken upon the best heart and best brain of the Dominion, if we watch the forces in all their departments which are displayed and the activity at work with respect to this great question,—I say if we look at this we will come to the conclusion that this is no idle demand which has been made and is now being made of this Parliament, but that it is a deep and wide spread current of feeling and thought which is setting in towards the doors of Parliament and is no idle and no vain thing. Therefore, I move these Resolutions this afternoon, feeling that a very large constituency of the people of Canada are in sympathy with them, and feeling as well that the importance of the subject demands the very best and most serious consideration that any body of men in any deliberative assembly can give to it. And, Sir, I hope this will be the initial step in an agitation already begun and carried on in this country, an agitation begun and which I hope will be carried out in Parliament which will not stop until the strongest possible moral sentiment from without shall have been aided and supplemented by the very strongest possible legal enactment from within the halls of Parliament. The Resolution which I move to-day is a simple one. It has to do in the first place with intoxicating liquors as beverage only. It has nothing to do with the manufacture, importation or sale of intoxicating liquors considered as articles of use in chemical, mechanical or scientific ways. It simply brings down the matter to a discussion of the method upon which legislation should proceed with respect to the sale, manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. And if any hon. gentleman asks me, why it is I have proceeded by Resolution rather than by any other method, I state that out of several reasons I think these are good and sufficient. In the first place, a Resolution is within the competence of any member of this House and places this question, so far as the discussion of the principle is concerned, solely upon its own merits, taking it out of the ranks of party and out of the feelings which are excited when party warfare takes place. In the second place, the Resolution will do this, and is destined to do this: it is to raise a discussion in Parliament upon a principle, a discussion which will challenge the attention of the country and produce an interest throughout the country, as having been started and carried on in Parliament, which probably could be reached as well in this as in no other way. Again, Sir, it will test the strength of the principle of prohibition in Parliament; and if it be found that the strength of the prohibitory principle here is not commensurate with the strength of the feeling outside, it will give the people of Canada an opportunity of exercising the constitutional method of bringing up within the halls of this Parliament the measure of strength to the support of this principle which is warranted and called for by the measure of the strength of this principle in the country without. Again, the Resolution is introduced mainly and chiefly for this reason: that in a resolution we are cut off entirely from a mass of details which would otherwise cumber it. The moment that an enactment is proposed before a deliberative assembly, it must run out into details, and these details will strike minds in different ways, and immediately differences and divergencies of opinion take place. This is not hampered by any details. It is simply a question of principle to be discussed and to be decided on its merits; and I think in a matter of such importance as this, it is of the very first significance that in all succeeding legislation with respect to this subject, before it takes place we should have set ourselves deliberately, honestly and candidly to discuss and settle, if possible the proper principle which should guide that legislation. I may be met, at the very threshold of the discussion, with this question: why is it that you prefer to adopt a different course with respect to the trade in intoxicating liquors, from that which you adopt with respect to any other trade. You have, for instance, factories in this Dominion. There are certain dangers which are incidental to the running and working of those factories. Now, it may be said to me: you do not rise in Parliament and ask, that because there are certain evils and dangers incidental to factory life, therefore, a Bill should be introduced to prohibit factories in the Dominion; but you simply set your self to work to guard against evils, which may come from them, and make everything as secure as possible, and when you have done that you feel you have done the best for the industries as well as for the people among whom they are carried on. Why, then, it may be asked, do you propose to adopt a different course towards the traffic in intoxicating liquors? Now, Sir, I am bound to say that I believe that that is an honest question and I think it deserves an honest and a candid answer. I say that we propose to adopt a different plan of treatment with reference to the traffic in intoxicating liquors, because necessity demands a different mode of treatment from any other of the industries of the country, that we can think of. And if you ask me proof of that I cannot give you better or more practical proof in the beginning than this, that the attitude which Government and popular mind has assumed towards the liquor traffic in the last fifty years, is one of the best indications that there is something radically wrong in that traffic otherwise such an attitude would not be assumed. What is that attitude? It is an attitude of opposition, of aggressive opposition, of continued and strengthening repugnance and hostility. I ask you to think of any Anglo-Saxon Government to-day which during the last twenty years has not set its face more and more in a position of determined hostility with reference to the liquor traffic, has not watched it as an enemy, has not looked upon it as ruinous, has not hampered it by checks and restrictions by limitations and prohibitions. Sir, I say that the history of legislation within the last fifty years in all Anglo-Saxon countries, with reference to the treatment of the liquor traffic, has been a history in which these two things have been marked: first, suspicion and the open expression of hostility to the traffic from Governments, and in the second place the aggressive nature of the limitations and restrictions and prohibitions which have been thrown around it. I make the statement here to-day which I think is a moderately fair one, that there is no Anglo-Saxon Government which would dare to sweep away all the restrictions upon the liquor traffic, or if it did sweep them away could live six months after having done so. I also think I am right in making the statement, that there is no Government or party in Anglo-Saxon countries to-day which can take away a single restriction which at present is put about this traffic without the loss of party prestige and public favour by that relaxation. I think this proves at least that there must be something radically wrong in the traffic when these are the attitudes of Governments towards it and in such an aggressive and continued way. But if the attitude of Government has continually shown a repugnant and an increasing hostility to the traffic, much more can this be affirmed of the popular feeling of the Anglo-Saxon race. Sir, I do not know of a single public legalized evil, or a single evil legalized or unlegalized which has drawn forth so strong, so wide and so representative expressions of disapproval as has this same traffic within the half century which has just passed by. Allow me, Sir, to call the attention of the House to some of these expressions which have leaped up from the deep sea of the popular feelings of the Anglo-Saxon world, which have crystallized themselves into expressions, which are living and will continue imperishable as an index of the attitude of the popular mind with reference to this traffic. Long ago, in the British House of Lords—I think nearly two centuries ago, certainly more than one century ago—Lord Chesterfield, in speaking of the prohibition of the traffic in ardent spirits, amongst other things, said these memorable words :

“Let us crush these artists in human slaughter, who have reconciled their country to sickness and ruin, and spread over the pitfall of debauchery such a bait as cannot be resisted.”

Sir, in 1839, Lord Brougham, that man of great brains, and great purposes as well, uttered these words :

“To what good is it that the Legislature should pass laws to punish crime, or that their Lordships should occupy themselves in trying to improve the morals of the people by giving them education? What could be the use of growing a little seed here and plucking up a weed there, if these beer shops are to be continued to grow seeds of immorality broadcast over the land germinating the most frightful produce that ever has been allowed to grow up in a civilized country, and I am ashamed to add, under the fostering care of governments.”

Rowland Hill, a man of note and nobleness, said :

“Public houses—the bane of the country—excite the strongest indignation in my mind.”

Dr. Chalmers, that noble and representative Scotch minister, said :

“For ourselves we would have rejoiced if, by an entire stoppage of the distilleries, the beastly intoxication of Scotland had been suspended.”

Oliver Goldsmith, witty and versatile, gave expression to this truth :

“Ale houses are ever an occasion of debauchery and excess, and either in a political or religious sense it would be our highest interest to have them suppressed.”

Lord Bacon, an epitome of terse and pregnant wisdom, said :

“All the crimes on earth do not destroy so many of the human race or alienate so much property as drunkenness.”

Richard Cobler, that reformer in the people's best interest, stated :

“Every day's experience tends more and more to the conviction that the temperance cause lies at the foundation of all social and political reform.”

John Bright, the eloquent and noble tribune of the people, said :

“A monster obstacle is in our way—strong drink, by whatever name the demon is styled, in whatever way it presents itself, this prevents our success; remove this one obstacle, and our course will be onwards, and our labours will be blessed.”

The London Times, as far back as 1853, stated :

“It is a peculiarity of spirit drinking that the money spent in it is at the best thrown away. It neither supplies the natural wants of man nor offers an adequate substitution for them. * * * * * No way so rapid to increase the wealth of nations, and the morality of society could be devised as the utter annihilation of the manufacture of ardent spirits constituting as they do an infinite waste and an unmixed evil.”

At a later date it said :

“The use of strong drink produces more idleness, want, crime and misery than all other causes put together. * * * * * Drinking baffles us, confounds us, shames us, and mocks us at every point. It outwits alike the teacher, the man of business, the patriot, the legislator. Every other institution flounders in hopeless difficulties, the public house holds its triumphant course.”

Cardinal Manning, that representative and beloved Catholic English clergyman, states :

“I wish well to all trades, but with a reserve. I hope the baker may bake and sell more bread as long as he lives. I hope that every clothier may sell more yards of broadcloth and make more coats every year that passes over his head. I hope that every farmer may sell more wheat. But I cannot say in my heart and conscience that I hope the brewer will brew more beer, or the distillers distil more spirits, or the publicans sell more of both. (Cheers.) There is a limit to my good wishes. I wish that all trades may prosper except one. The prosperity that I wish to that one trade is that it should cease.”

Again he says :

“The evil ought not to be permitted to grow in order that the police may be called in to repress it. (Cheers.) Prevention is not only better than cure, but prevention is a duty, and cure is a lame halting attempt to undo an evil which we have wilfully permitted.”

Mr. POSTER.

And yet again :

“Of this he was perfectly certain, that if the great drink trade expanded itself every year, and continued its activity in intoxicating and poisoning the men of this country they would be every year losing their power of self-government and the safety which came with it, and those very centres that ought to be their safety would become their chief dangers.”

Sir, in 1877, the British Parliament appointed a Committee of the House of Lords who went into a long two years' investigation with reference to the evils coming from intemperance, and there is this pregnant sentence which occurs in the beginning of their report :

“When great communities, deeply sensible of the miseries caused by intemperance; witnesses of the crime and pauperism which directly spring from it; conscious of the contamination to which their younger citizens are exposed; watching with grave anxiety the growth of female intemperance on a scale so vast, and at a rate of progression so rapid as to constitute a new reproach and new danger; believing that not only the morality of their citizens, but their commercial prosperity, is dependent upon the diminution of these evils; seeing also that all that general legislation has been able to effect has been some improvement in public order, while it has been powerless to produce any perceptible decrease of intemperance, it would seem somewhat hard when such communities are willing, at their own cost and hazard, to grapple with the difficulty, and undertake their own purification, that the Legislature should refuse to create for them the necessary machinery, or to entrust them with the requisite powers.”

The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury states :

“There is one dreadful evil overspreading the whole land which makes havoc of our workmen—the evil of intemperance. Unless you make distinct and positive efforts against it you will be neglecting an evil which is eating out the very heart of society, destroying domestic life among our working classes, and perhaps doing greater injury than any other cause that could be named in this age.”

Goldwin Smith, our own, I suppose I may call him, profound and philanthropic thinker, says :

“It is too clear that the rapid extension of this system of saloon drinking is threatening the very life of the community; that it is producing a physical and moral pestilence more deadly in the deepest sense than any other plague, which stalks the infected cities of the East; that it is bringing great masses of our working classes into a self-imposed bondage, more complete and more degrading than slavery itself; that it is not only filling the present with unspeakable misery and vice; but blighting the prospects of labour for the future.”

The London Telegraph says :

“Our revenue may derive some unholy benefit from the sale of alcohol, but the entire trade is nevertheless a covenant with gin and death.”

The New York Tribune, which, of all papers of this continent, might be expected to say the least stirring and pointed thing with reference to the liquor traffic, in its issue of February, 20th says :

“Many people who pride themselves on their practicality are wont to sneer at the opponents of the liquor traffic as mere ‘sentimentalists.’ No doubt there is much sentiment in that opposition, but it is sentiment based upon the hardest of facts. The truth is that if all the other evils that afflict society are put together they will not nearly equal in weight and sinister effects the one enormous and universal mischief of intemperance. Wherever we turn, in short, we encounter this subtle and sinister agency. It is a blight which lies heavy upon our civilization, and which will have to be cleared away before that civilization can become an object of just pride and satisfaction.”

The Right Hon. William E. Gladstone, that grand old man and most noted statesman, stated in his place in the House of Commons in 1880 :

“It has been said that greater calamities are inflicted on mankind by intemperance than by the three great historical scourges—war, pestilence and famine. That is true for us and it is the measure of our discredit and disgrace.”

And, Sir, as the last indication of that feeling which I will cite, let me ask the attention of this House to a paragraph which appeared, of all places, in the Queen's speech in Great Britain last year, when her Ministers put into her mouth these words :

“After a succession of unfavourable seasons in the greater portion of the United Kingdom, the produce of the land has, during the present year, been for the most part abundant, and trade is moderately active. The growth of the revenue, however, is sensibly retarded by a cause which must in itself be contemplated with satisfaction; I refer to the diminution in the receipts of the Exchequer from the duties on intoxicating liquors.”

Sir, I consider that as one of the most conclusive indications of what the popular feeling with reference to this traffic is that can possibly be adduced. Would such a sentence as that have been put in the Queen's speech if the cotton industry or the iron industry had been depressed—if there had been a falling off in the revenue from any other industry? No, Sir, the only item with reference to which a falling revenue could call out such a paragraph as that is the one whose failure is an indication of the advancing sobriety of the people—an indication that the stream of intoxicating liquors which has been poured out with such deadly effect in Great Britain for centuries past, has at last shown some sign of becoming more shallow and less heavy and destructive. Sir, I hold that these expressions, strong, forcible, and widely representative, occurring as they do through two centuries of Anglo-Saxon history, are fair indications of that feeling of repugnance and hostility which lies deep down in the best heart and the best brain of the Anglo-Saxon world, and which is rapidly leavening that unto its own measure and its own quality. Sir, I think that the two pivotal points on which this whole question turns are these: first, is this traffic in its nature and its results such as to demand legal suppression? And secondly, are the rightness and efficiency of prohibition capable of proof? If we can establish the affirmative of these two propositions, our course is clear. This principle agreed upon and established, legislation must proceed upon that well-established and true principle. Well, Sir, if you will allow me, let us, then, take up this first question: Is this traffic, in its nature and its results, such as to demand total legal suppression? I do not know, Sir, where we can better go for proof of this than to science, physiological science, economic science, social science—and finding out what is the answer of these three, come to a petty fair conclusion as to whether the nature and the results of this traffic are such as to demand its suppression at the hands of the State. And first, Sir, with reference to physiological or medical science, what is its voice with reference to alcoholic liquors? Alcoholic liquors may be said to be made up of two great constituents—alcohol and water, in varying proportions. I hold in my hand an analysis of three or four kinds of alcoholic liquors which will show the fact. For instance, in an Imperial pint of English ale, which weighs 22½ oz., it is found that 18 oz. is water, 2 oz. is alcohol, and 2½ oz. other material. It is found that the same quantity of port, weighing 21½ oz. contains 16 oz. of water, 4 oz. of alcohol, and 1½ oz. of other material. The same quantity of brandy, 20½ oz. in weight, contains 9½ oz. of water, 10½ oz. of alcohol, and ½ oz. of other material. Rum, that expressive, but not very classically named liquor, in the same quantity, weighing 20.148 oz., has 5 oz. of water, 15 oz. of alcohol, and 1.48 oz. of other material. Gin, weighing 20 oz., has 12 oz. of water, 8 oz. of alcohol, and nothing of other material. These figures go to show the make up of these liquors scientifically, and if we apply the analysis to all the different kinds of alcoholic liquors, we shall find that the principle constituents are alcohol and water. Now, Sir, it is not at all necessary for me to speak of the results or good qualities of water; we are all cognizant of them. What we have to do then is to ask what is this substance, alcohol, which makes up the chief basis of all alcoholic liquors? To whom shall we go for an answer, if we do not go to the medical and scientific men, and I wish, if the House will allow me, to read a statement, short as I can possibly make it, of the attitude and the opinion of medical and scientific men as shown by the utterances of great bodies of these men on this matter. In 1847 two thousand and upwards of England's eminent medical men signed and published a declaration to this effect:

"We are of opinion:—That a very large proportion of human misery, including poverty, disease and crime, is induced by the use of alcoholic or fermented liquors as beverages; that total and universal abstinence from alcoholic liquors, and intoxicating beverages of all sorts, would greatly contribute to the health, the prosperity, the morality and the happiness of the human race."

Later still, one hundred and upwards, of the representative physicians and scientific medical men of New York signed and published the following declaration of their views:—

"1. In view of the alarming prevalence and ill effects of intemperance with which none are so familiar as members of the medical profession, and which have called forth from eminent English physicians the voice of warning to the people of Great Britain, concerning the use of alcoholic beverages, we the undersigned members of the medical profession of New York and vicinity, unite in the declaration that we believe alcohol should be classed with other powerful drugs; that when prescribed medicinally, it should be with conscientious caution, and a sense of grave responsibility.

"2. We are of opinion that the use of alcoholic liquor as a beverage is productive of a large amount of physical disease; that it entails diseased appetites upon offspring; and that it is the cause of a large percentage of the crime and pauperism of our cities and country.

"3. We would welcome any judicious and effective legislation—State and national—which should seek to confine the traffic in alcohol to the legitimate purposes of medical and other sciences, art and mechanism."

This is signed by the President and the Professors of the College of Physicians and Surgeons; it is signed by Willard Parker, M. D., a man eminent in the medical world, and by upwards of one hundred others of the representative medical men of New York. Not many years ago ninety and upwards of Montreal's foremost medical men gave expression to their sentiments in this form:

"We, the undersigned members of the medical profession in Montreal are of opinion:

"1. That a large portion of human misery, poverty, disease and crime, is produced by the use of alcoholic liquors, as a beverage.

"2. That total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, whether fermented or distilled, is consistent with, and conducive to the highest degree of physical and mental health and vigour.

"3. That abstinence from intoxicating liquors would greatly promote the health, morality and happiness of the people."

This was signed by G. W. Campbell, A.M., M.D., Professor of the principles and practices of Surgery and Dean of Faculty of McGill, Montreal, and ninety others. In 1874 the Medical Association of the United States met in Detroit and gave expression to this opinion:

"That we are of the opinion that the use of alcoholic liquors as a beverage is productive of a large amount of physical and mental disease; that it entails diseased appetites and enfeebled constitutions upon offspring; and that it is the cause of a large percentage of the crime and pauperism in our large cities and country."

In 1876 there was held a great International Medical Council in the city of Philadelphia. It was one of the largest and ablest medical bodies ever convened, and their deliverance upon the subject is as follows:—

"1. Alcohol is not shown to have a definite food value by any of the usual methods of chemical or physiological investigation.

"2. Its use as a medicine is chiefly that of a cardiac stimulant, and of an admittant of substitution.

"3. As a medicine, it is not well fitted for self-prescription by the laity, and the medical profession is not accountable for such administration, or for the enormous evils resulting therefrom."

Such was the deliverance of medical men with reference to this substance, alcohol, which forms the basis of the alcoholic liquors which are the wholestock in trade of this traffic in alcoholic beverages. Science strips herself free from every prejudice, she frees herself from every old custom, she has gone into her laboratory and dissecting room, she has conducted her scientific investigations, and in calm, clear, authoritative tones she tells the people that alcohol has no food value, that as a beverage it is productive of infinite misery in the way of disease, ill health and death, that it is a poison to be ranked among poisons and labelled as dangerous; and she asks the people to beware of it as an enemy of the human race. Let me give you some views of representative scientific medical men, individually, on this matter. Dr. Carpenter, than whom there is no more noted physician in Great Britain or probably in the whole rank of medical physiologists throughout the world, says:

"In the average man, the habitual use of alcoholic liquors, in moderate or even in small quantities, is not merely unnecessary for the maintenance of bodily and mental vigour, but is unfavourable to the permanent enjoyment of health, even though it may, for a time, appear to contribute to it."

Sir William Gull, a Fellow of the Royal Society and Physician to Her Majesty, stated in his evidence, in 1877-78, before the Lords' Committee:

"I should say, from my experience, that alcohol is the most destructive agent that we are aware of in this country. * * * I would like to say that a very large number of people in society are dying day by day, poisoned by alcohol, but not supposed to be poisoned by it. I know it is a most deleterious poison."

Dr. Benjamin Richardson, a very celebrated medical analyst says:

"Finally, to sum it all up, I find that alcoholic drinks give no strength, reduce the tone of the blood-vessels, build up no muscle, destroy its powers, and make it less active for work; that these drinks in the most moderate quantity can be of no use to me or anyone else as a substance for food. We are sometimes told that it is fanatical, it is impractical, it is contrary to the interests of individual men, or classes of men, to speak those things and oppose alcohol. Be it so. In another age it will be a wonder that such arguments as those we are obliged to use, were ever necessary to convert an unwilling world. In the meantime unhampered by any of those plausible excuses, it is our duty, whether it be called fanatical or philosophical, practical or impractical, advantageous to class interests or opposed to them, to unite, body and mind, heart and soul, in suppressing this evil at its root, and in endeavouring to make this earth something nearer heaven, by pulling down from its high place the demon Drink, who still reigns so triumphantly in the land in which we live."

Dr. Thomson, a Fellow of the Royal Society and Surgeon Extraordinary to His Majesty the King of the Belgians and Surgeon to University College Hospital says:

"I have long had the conviction that there is no greater cause of evil, moral and physical, in this country than the use of alcoholic beverages. I do not mean by this that extreme indulgence which produces drunkenness. The habitual use of fermented liquors to an extent far short of what is necessary to produce that condition, and such as is quite common in all ranks of society, injures the body and diminishes the mental power to an extent which I think few people are aware of. Such, at all events, is the result of observation during more than twenty years of professional life devoted to hospital practice, and to private practice in every rank above it. Thus, I have no hesitation in attributing a very large proportion of some of the most painful and dangerous maladies which come under my notice, as well as those which every medical man has to treat, to the ordinary and daily use of fermented drink taken in the quantity which is conventionally deemed moderate * * *. But if I ventured one step further it would be to express a belief that there is no single habit in this country which so much tends to deteriorate the qualities of the race, and so much disqualifies it for endurance in that competition which in the nature of things must exist, and in which struggle the prize of superiority must fall to the best and to the strongest."

And as a final evidence I shall quote the words of Dr. Andrew Clark who is known to some gentlemen in this House and is favourably known as a medical authority the world over:

"As I looked at the hospital wards to-day and saw that seven out of ten owed their diseases to alcohol, I could but lament that the teaching about this question was not more direct, more decisive, more home thrusting than even it had been."

"Can I say to you any words stronger than these of the terrible effects of the abuse of alcohol? It is when I myself think of all this that I am disposed, as I have said elsewhere, to rush to the opposite extreme, to give up my profession, to give up everything and to go forth upon a holy crusade, preaching to all men, beware of this enemy of the race."

Sir, I rest my case, on its scientific aspect, with these testimonies that I have read before this House, and I hold that we have a perfect right to conclude from them that, so far as the voice of science in a medical and physiological way is concerned, science puts in no plea for the maintenance of this traffic; that, on the contrary, its whole plea is that the traffic is an enemy to the human race, in the words of the celebrated Dr. Clarke, and as such it ought to be suppressed, ought not to be allowed to exist. Well, Sir, let us next ask, what is the voice of Economic science with reference to this liquor traffic? I am not one of those who believe that the doctrines of the political economist are hard cast-iron doctrines which must be applied in every country and at every age, without reference to the differing circumstances and capabilities of the country where they are sought to be applied. I have not read very many of these books through, but I believe I have arrived at three or four common sense economic rules, which will commend themselves to this House and to the country; and I am within the bounds of all reason when I state that, other things being equal, the maximum of prosperity in a country is to be reached (1) by the frugal and proper use of all its material resources, (2) by the wise conservation and employment of its labour power, (3) by the prudent and useful expenditure of the earnings of its labour, (4) by having the minimum of non-producing and dangerous criminal elements. Now, if these four propositions be true—and I do not think it is necessary to say a single word in attempting to prove their truth—let us ask the question, what is the attitude of the liquor traffic with reference to these four propositions? I state unhesitatingly, and I challenge contradiction anywhere, that the liquor traffic antagonizes every one of these simple canons of economic truth. The first one is, that countries will be most prosperous, other things being equal, when the frugal and proper use of all their material resources is ensured. What then with reference to the liquor traffic and the material resources of the country? Sir, it commences in a waste of the best and most precious material resources of a country. In Great Britain to-day it is estimated by their most eminent statisticians that the quantity of grain destroyed each year in order to make the alcoholic liquors that are consumed in Great Britain amounts to the total sum of between 70,000,000 and 80,000,000 bushels of grain, or of produce equivalent to it; some 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 of it is pure, unadulterated grain. In the United States of America, from 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 bushels of grain is used up in the manufacture of the alcoholic liquors that are taken in that country; and, in our Dominion of Canada, where a partial failure in one of our grain crops has this year produced wide and deeply felt disturbance, we every year give up from 2,500,000 to 3,000,000 bushels of grain, to be made into intoxicating liquors to be distributed and used through this country. That makes a total, in these three Anglo-Saxon countries, of 70,000,000 and 50,000,000 and 3,000,000—in round numbers 125,000,000 of bushels of grain, which are the material resources upon which the liquor traffic first operates in order to make the wares it has for distribution. Now, let us for a moment look at that immense pyramid of grain—125,000,000 of bushels, if you please. That can be used in three different ways. We may take it, as God has given it to us, we shall the constituents neatly and deftly put together for the best preservation and reproduction of strength in the human frame; we may turn it into the channels of food supply, to feed our men and our cattle, and it will bring forth its results in fruits; for anyone will tell us that, if we put it to that use, it will be put to the use that God intended it for, and to the use which will be of the greatest service to the community and to the people. There is another use to which this grain can be put. The torch may be applied to that pyramid of grain, 125,000,000 of bushels, and it may be destroyed by fire. In that case, Sir, it is simply wanton and reckless waste. There is another use to which this grain may be put, and that is this, it may be put through certain processes by which its food value is entirely or almost entirely destroyed, it may be turned into what is physiologically and chemically known as a poison, and which is sent broadcast through the community and through the country to do its work and bring forth its result of evil, of disease, and of death. Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted in my remarks by your announcing to the House the receipt of a letter from His Excellency's secretary, I was calling the attention of this House to the waste of material resources consequent upon this traffic in our country, and I had just stated that, in these three Anglo-Saxon countries, at least 125,000,000 of bushels of grain, or of produce of equal value, were destroyed in the manufacture of these liquors. I was proceeding to state that there were three uses to which this grain could be put—the one legitimate use of food supply; it could be burnt and so recklessly and wantonly destroyed; or it could be distilled and brewed into a liquid which lost the food properties of the original grain and which contained deleterious and poisonous qualities such as have been pointed out in the medical and scientific testimony I have read before this House. Now, I state this, that, if it be a proper canon of economic truth that the frugal and proper use of all material resources is necessary to the maximum prosperity of a country, that traffic which deliberately destroys so much as 3,000,000 of bushels of grain in our own country, so much as 50,000,000 of bushels of grain in the United States, or so much as 70,000,000 of bushels of grain in Great Britain, and destroys its food value, and turns it into something which is not valuable as a food but is destructive and deleterious as a beverage, I say that that traffic stamps itself as antagonistic to a country in that economic sense; it offends against the simple rule, the proper and legitimate use of the material resources of the country. Well, Sir, let us go one step further and ask, What is the attitude of this liquor traffic to the labour power of a country?—for we laid it down as a second rule that the maximum prosperity of a country, other things being equal, was to be reached by a wise conservation and employment of its labour power. Well, Sir, I find in the first place that in the manufacture of these liquors in the Dominion, 1,411 persons are engaged in breweries, 285 are engaged in distilleries, and I have made an estimate which I am sure will not be considered excessive, that 10,000 persons are engaged in the distribution of alcoholic liquors. Thus we reach a total of about 12,000 persons who are engaged in the manufacture and distribution of alcoholic liquors in the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, I state this, and I do it calmly and deliberately, believing that it cannot be successfully contradicted, that all the labour of these 1,411 men employed in breweries, of these 285 men employed in distilleries, and of these 10,000 persons engaged in the distribution of alcoholic liquors, is labour which, to say the least of it, is lost as far as the proper end of labour—which we must always keep in view—is concerned. Suppose, for the sake of illustration, that these 12,000 persons were engaged in a legitimate and productive business—a number of them in the fields at farm work, a number of them in the mines at mining, and a number of them in various departments of building. Suppose, then, I come up and say to these 12,000 men: "Come with me and I will give you work. Leave all the business you are now engaged in, and I will employ you for a year and pay you equal or greater wages." Immediately the 12,000 labourers leave off their work in the field, the mine and the workshops, and I set them to work in this way: I say to them, "Go yonder to the forest, 12,000 of you, and hew down the tall trees that are growing there, carry these down to the mills which have been built for the purpose; have those trees all sawn into thin strips, and have these strips cut up into still thinner pieces, and when you have done all this, at the end of the year, gather up what you have prepared and apply the torch to it and burn it up." Is it not patent to every person who follows the illustration, that all the labour of those 12,000 men employed in this way during the year, has resulted in nothing, has been lost to the country, and in the meantime, the field, the mine and the workshop have been lying idle? So, Sir, I think, and I do not believe it can be controverted, that the labour of 12,000 persons, employed in the manufacture and distribution of intoxicating liquors, is labour which, for all productive purposes, is lost to the country. And I say the traffic in alcoholic liquors offends that second rule, which we have laid down, that other things being equal, the maximum prosperity of a country is to be found in the wise conservation and employment of its labour power. Not only is that true with reference to the labour employed in the liquor traffic, but I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, which cannot be left out of view, that the traffic in intoxicating liquors destroys and nullifies a large proportion of our labor power. In 1834 a commission was appointed by the British House of Commons, of which Mr. Buckingham, was chairman, and one of the first sentences of the report of that commission was the following:

"The loss of productive labour in every department of occupation, to the extent of one day in six throughout the kingdom (as testified by witnesses engaged in various manufacturing operations) by which the wealth of the country, created as it chiefly is by labour, is retarded or suppressed to the extent of one million out of every six that is produced, to say nothing of the constant derangement, imperfection, and destruction in every agricultural and manufacturing process, occasioned by the intemperance and consequent unskillfulness, inattention, and neglect of those affected by intoxication, producing great injury in our domestic and foreign trade."

Now, Sir, that is not the statement of a temperance fanatic; that is not the statement of a partizan; it is the statement of a cool Conservative committee, who for years investigated this question, and took evidence, and ended by declaring that one labourer out of every six had his labour nullified and destroyed in Great Britain, so far as production was concerned, as a result of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and that therefore one sixth of the possible production of Great Britain was prevented by the fact of the existence of this traffic. Sir, I do not pretend for a moment to say that the loss of labour in a new country like ours is at all comparable to the loss of labour in a thickly settled country like Great Britain, but it is patent to every hon. gentleman in this House that a great deal of labour is wasted in Canada as a direct result of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Suppose, as a moderate computation, that every liquor shop, every distributing centre in Canada, destroys and nullifies the labour of at least two individuals; according to this estimate, in the 10,000 liquor shops of the Dominion, the labour of a force of 20,000 men is nullified, destroyed, and lost to the country completely, so far as their productive power is concerned, by reason of the liquor traffic which exists in our midst. I state, therefore, that the traffic in alcoholic beverages offends against this second rule which we have laid down, that, other things being equal, a country will be prosperous in proportion to the wise conservation and employment of its labour power. Sir, let me go a step further and call the attention of the House to the waste of wealth consequent on the liquor traffic. Eminent statisticians in Great Britain and the United States have made most elaborate calculations on that point, but I propose to take the official calculations. It is calculated that in Great Britain the people spent, last year, $650,000,000 for alcoholic beverages; it was calculated that in the United States the liquor bill amounted to $700,000,000. Well, Sir, after looking somewhat closely into this subject and making, as I think, a fair and moderate estimate, I come to the conclusion, and believe, that the people of Canada spend for alcoholic beverages each year a sum pretty nearly equal to $40,000,000. So, Sir, in this new country of ours, which so greatly needs to husband its resources and turn its surplus wealth into capital for the development of the country, the people spend at least $40,000,000 per year. Now, Sir, let me call the attention of the House to another illustration which bears upon this subject. Here is a labourer, and we will suppose that he earns $450 per year. We will suppose it takes $100 of this amount for the fair and reasonable expenses of living for himself and his family. That man, then, has $50 of surplus left. Now, it is apparent to every one that the future of that man, so far as this world's goods are concerned, depends upon the disposition he makes of that $50 surplus. If he places it in the savings bank year after year, he is laying up something for a rainy day and laying the foundation of his own independence. If he invests the amount in real estate and gradually makes for himself a home, he is doing the same thing. But if he goes to a gentleman and gets from him fifty pieces of brown paper and hands over $50, and then takes those fifty pieces of brown paper and slips them away in a drawer at home, in the opinion of every common sense man he will have uselessly spent his surplus, and he will be as poor at the end of the year as at the beginning. But let me go a step further with that illustration. Suppose that man goes into one of the low or high dram shops and spends the surplus of $50 for intoxicating liquors, which does him harm and injures his family as well, every sensible man will agree with me when I say that he has more than wasted his surplus, for he has used it to his own injury and to the injury of his family. It is exactly the same with a country as with individuals, but in a greater degree, and that country which wastes its surplus wealth on alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes, which are so little use and so great an injury, wastes its resources and spends where it should not, and prevents itself from becoming as rich as the productive resources would entitle it to be. So I say the traffic in alcoholic liquors offends against the third rule we have laid down, the prudent and useful expenditure of the earnings of labour. Let me for a moment call the attention of the House to a third result. We laid it down as a rule, too, that the maximum of prosperity, other things being equal, will be reached in a country which has the minimum of non-productive and of dangerous or criminal elements. What is it, Sir, that is one of the first results of the traffic in intoxicating liquors either in a community or in a country? It is to create non-producers, more or less of them; and every non-producer created is a burden to the country and must be maintained by the honest earnings of the people who do work and who do produce. Suppose, for instance, you have five labouring men and their families, and those five men enter into partnership, pool their earnings and the surplus of their earnings as well. We will suppose each to be earning $400 a year. The five will, therefore, earn $2,000. It takes $350, we will say, for each man's reasonable expenses of living, which gives a total of $1,750; so that at the end of the year the five persons will have a surplus of $250. Suppose one of those five men becomes incapacitated in any way from earning; he and his family are still to be kept. There are, however, but four now earning, and these at $400 each will give a total of $1,600 a year. But it takes $1,750 to keep the five families, so that there is a deficit of $150 because of the throwing out from productive labour of one of those five men. This deficit has to be made up out of previous earnings or it has to go as a mortgage on future earnings; in either way the fifth man who falls out from productive labour is a drag and a burthen on the four who remain in it. So, I say, it is plain and clear that every non-producer in the country is a burden to the country, and has to be kept by the honest labour, and out of the honest earnings of the people. Whatever is true in individual cases is true of the nation as a whole, and every one who has looked into the subject knows and is certain that the traffic in alcoholic liquors results in producing a large number of persons who are non-producers, who do not earn their own living, who are thrown on charity, public or private, and consequently retard the progress and accumulation of wealth of the country. It is the same with regard to the dangerous and criminal elements which come out of this traffic as an inevitable result, which has been known and appreciated and deplored for centuries, and at no time to a greater extent than in the present day. So that the liquor traffic antagonizes that rule which makes the prosperity of a country amongst other things depend on having a minimum of non-productive and dangerous or criminal elements within its borders, for all those criminal elements have to be cared for, restrained and watched, and this the country, either from its general or special funds, has to pay, and for the cost of this the people are responsible. So, Sir, when a demand is made for a prohibition of the liquor traffic, I say there is no argument that economic science will put forth to withstand this plea: That this traffic commences in a waste of raw material, that it continues in a waste of the labour resources of the country, that it ends in a waste and deterioration of labour power and of human life. So, Sir, when we desire that the liquor traffic should be suppressed by legal enactment, we are within the bounds and rules which economic science on every page lays down, and which will join us in declaring that the liquor traffic should be legally suppressed in the best economic interests of the country. Now I wish to go from this a step higher. We have been talking about physiological science and economic science, but there is something which is higher and more important than that, viz: the social necessities and considerations which are forced upon us. Physiological science and economic conditions are worthy of our best attention, but these are only the conditions on which society is built up and the social fabric is constructed, and this is something of far higher import and far more weighty than the others of which I have just made mention. Into human society certain factors enter; some of them for good and some of them for evil. Our educational institutions strive to impart to society that intelligence, that knowledge, that information which will at one and the same time give a guarantee of its permanency and also adorn and beautify it. Art and literature and industry come to help as factors for the building up and enrichment and beautifying of society. Invention gives all its contrivances for its comfort; commerce gives all its explorations and carrying for its enrichment and its wealth; and all these good forces join and unite themselves to make of society a great edifice in which the power of man, supplemented by the principles and practices of morality, will make a superstructure strong and powerful, and beautiful as well. I say what society demands is of far greater consideration to us than what either physiological science or economic science demands. When the liquor traffic enters into this society as a factor, what happens? I will make my remarks as short as possible, for I do not want to detain the House at too great length, yet I feel it is not demanded of me in the interests of this subject, and those to whom this subject is dear, that I should unnecessarily shorten my remarks even though some impatience is manifested in the House; but I submit that the importance of the question which I am attempting to treat warrants me in making my remarks sufficiently lengthy to enable me to place the question properly before the House and the country. Now, Sir, what happens when this traffic enters as a factor into this beautiful structure that we call society. I shall not make my remarks very long, but I say the first result that comes to our cities and towns, to the distributing centres of strong drink, is the creation of idleness, the taking away of industry from its work, the taking away of labour from its employment, the filling up of the benches of the idle, and this idleness at every distributing centre, multiplied by the number of these distributing centres, gives us a vast area of idleness produced in the country, of labour taken from its proper employment, of productive power stolen from its proper functions—a vast amount of idleness which gathers about this liquor traffic in all its distributing centres. None of us can begin to compute, not having the personal knowledge, the loss which every year, and every hour, comes to this country throughout its length and breadth by the idleness which is produced by the liquor traffic. But not only is idleness produced, but disorder is produced. If there is one thing which civilization specially prides itself upon, it is upon having brought the genius of order out of the wild wastes of savagery and barbarism, and having taken her by the hand and led her along in the van of civilization, says to us that so long as good order reigns in civilization there will be permanence, there will be progress, there will be stability, there will be beauty, and there will be strength of civilization as well. I state to-day, from my place in this House, and I defy contradiction, that there is no more potent seed germ of disorder in this or any other Anglo-Saxon country than that which springs out of and is involved in this liquor traffic as it flows through this country. None of us can find out, for we have not the scope of mind, the comprehensiveness of mind, to grasp it, the multiplied disorders which arise through the country out of the germ seeds which are sown by the liquor traffic as it flourishes among us from year to year. What comes next? Pauperism is injected into society; labor is pulled down into idleness; and the inevitable result is that that which should be wealthy and independent, able to take care of itself, is reduced to a pauper's condition; plenty is dragged out of its seat, and poverty takes its place. Go to the old country, read the records of the Poor Law Unions, read the records of Parliamentary investigations, and if we use our eyes even in our own communities, we will find that there is no more potent cause of pauperism in the country, no more potent cause of criminality than the liquor traffic by the dissipation which it produces, by its taking away the independent aspirations, taking away the desire, on the part of mankind, to improve their position, by its tendency to sink a man lower and lower in the strata of society. Pauperism raises its gaunt form in every one of our villages and cities all over the country. There has been a talk about soup kitchens in Parliament this Session, Sir. I make this statement believing it to be true, that though some people are brought into the condition of recipients of charity because death has suddenly struck down their friends, or because of the visitation of circumstances which cannot be controlled; I say that the great mass of the pauperism and poverty which goes round begging for charity, is that which is the direct result of the dram-shop, where the earnings, which should have gone for food, have been wasted in dissipation and debauch. That is the pauperism which forms the mass and weight of the burden in the old country, and that is the pauperism which is growing to be the mass and weight of the burden in this country. And as it is one of the strongest hindrances to the prosperity and progress in this or any country, let us who are beginning to build up a new nationality, let us who are growing up from rural constituencies, from small towns and village constituencies—let us look to it that the cause which produced this burthen of pauperism is weeded out of our country while it is still young, so that while we go on to a denser population, we may grow up with less of that pauperism which has afflicted older countries. What else is injected into society by the liquor traffic, and by the distributing centres of that traffic? Crime, Sir. There is no more hydra-headed monster that dogs the steps of civilization, none of a more terrible or revolting character than that which shows itself, not only in our great cities and in our centres of civilization, but in our rural communities as well—one which waits on the footsteps of civilization and christianity all over the world. Christianity with its light and beauty takes hold of men's hearts and transforms our whole civilization, but it has behind it the terrible dogging footsteps of that multiplied crime, which is a dark shadow that may set off in greater brightness the civilization which has just advanced, but which is none the less a source of disgrace and shame to our country. It is something to which the best legislative minds of this or any other country should devote themselves, and they would raise themselves in the estimation of all the best people if they would put their gigantic powers towards solving it. I say, Sir, that this patching up on one side, while this ulcer sore and source of crime is allowed to remain, is not a statesmanlike thing, is not a common sense thing: is something which experience proves to be wrong: is something which the common sense of mankind will not much longer tolerate. Sir, if there be one thing which marks the legislation of to-day as against the legislation of fifty years ago, it is the paternal character of the present legislation. Men have got beyond the idea that they are here simply to recruit soldiers, to gather taxes, and carry on war, and let the best interests of the country take care of themselves, and they have come to the conclusion that in the future it is the practical duty of legislators to dig down into the causes which lie at the root of social deterioration, to stamp out these causes of crime and pauperism by proper measures of restriction, and in this way infuse a light and brightness into society which could not be infused in any other way. Sir, is it necessary for me to go into statistics to prove that crime comes from that traffic? No, it is not. But still, I feel it is my duty to ask the attention of the House for a few moments while I give them the results of experience of men abler perhaps than any of us to give an opinion upon this question, with reference to the criminality induced and produced by this traffic. Sir, I take first our own country and I begin with the Province of Ontario. In 1881 the total commitments were 9,229, and of these the number committed for drunkenness and disorderly conduct was 3,328. In 1882, the total commitments were 9,620; drunk and disorderly, 3,447. In 1883 the total commitments were 9,880; drunk and disorderly, 3,895. The inspector, in his report of 1883, states:

"The most deplorable feature is the very large increase in the commitments for drunkenness, the figures being, in 1882, 3,497; in 1883, 3,925, an increase of 393, or 11.38 per cent. The percentage which the commitments for drunkenness bear to the total commitments is 29.42, against 36.35 per cent. in 1882, showing that, not only are the commitments for this offence numerically greater, but that the proportion they bear to the total commitments is also increased. It is to be hoped that the efforts now being made by the various associations for the promotion of temperance will have the effect of reducing the large number who find their way, through this vice, to the goals of the province."

A Committee of this Parliament of 1875, reported that the commitments to the common goals of Ontario and Quebec in the years 1870, 1871 and 1872 were 28,289, of which 21,236 were for drunkenness and kindred crimes—80 per cent. of the total. In nine years, from 1875 to 1883, inclusive, the total number of commitments to the goals of Ontario were 98,063, of which 33,444 were for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, or 34 per cent. of the whole. In 1881, the nine cities of Ontario had a total number of arrests for all crimes of 13,196, of which 6,926 were for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, being 45 per cent. of the total arrests in those nine cities. Sir, this proves that in Ontario, which is in some respects the pivotal Province of this Dominion—one which has as great advantages as any in moral training and educational training—more than that, Sir, one which has, I believe, one of the best Liquor License Laws to be found on any Provincial Statute Book—is shown an increasing number of arrests, and an increasing number of convictions for drunkenness and disorderly conduct. In the city of Toronto last year, the total number of arrests for all crimes was 6,636, of which 3,407, or 50 per cent. of the whole, were for drunkenness and disorderly conduct. I wish now to give what I consider one of the most conclusive tests which has been given in any country or in any age with reference to the crime caused by intemperance. I hold in my hand part of the eleventh and twelfth annual reports on the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of labour, a very excellent institution—I wish we had a counterpart of it in this Dominion—a body of very able and intelligent and industrious men, whose sole duty it is, at the command of the Commonwealth Legislature, to give their whole time to making such investigations as they are ordered to undertake. They were ordered by the Massachusetts Legislature to undertake an investigation with reference to the percentage of crime resulting from the use of intoxicating liquors in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; and what were the results, as shown in their eleventh report?

ROYAL ASSENT.

A Message was delivered by René Elouard Kimber, Esq., Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

“MR. SPEAKER,—

“Sir William Ritchie, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of Your Honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.”

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate Chamber.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Deputy Governor had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bill:—

An Act to amend the Act intitled: An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, and for other purposes.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FOSTER. I find, Sir, that the investigations of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics show that during the 20 years, from 1860 to 1879, the total number of sentences pronounced in the Commonwealth was 578,458, of which 340,814, or 60 per cent., were for what the Bureau denominates distinctly rum crimes, that is, crimes which came directly from violations of the license laws, and cases of drunkenness and disorderly conduct and from excessive indulgence in spirits. Well, Sir, that left 40 per cent. of the crime of the State of Massachusetts, and the question came as to what category that 40 per cent. should be distributed into; and so the Bureau of Statistics were instructed by the Legislature to continue their investigations, and to report, during the next year, as to what proportion of these crimes would be attributable to the traffic in intoxicating liquors. That Committee went to work. It took Suffolk County, which includes the city of Boston, as its base of operations and it investigated the criminality in that county from September, 1879, to September, 1880. It went about this work in the most methodical manner. It not only had agents who attended every trial during the year, but those agents were instructed to most thoroughly investigate the causes of each crime, and the antecedents of the persons who committed the crime. They went back into their history, they traced up that history to its beginning, and after a most elaborate investigation they penned their report, of which this is the result: From September 1st, 1879, to September 1st, 1880, there were 16,897 sentences, of which 12,289 were for distinctively rum crimes. That left 4,608 cases, which the Bureau undertook to investigate, and as the result of their investigation they found that of these 4,608 crimes, 2,097 were committed by persons who were in liquor at the time of the commission of the crime, making 12 per cent. of the total attributable directly or indirectly to intoxicating liquors. Adding 72 per cent. for distinctively rum crimes to this 12 per cent., we get a total of 84 per cent. of all crime due, directly or indirectly, to the use of liquor, as the result of the investigation of the Bureau. I will give the concluding part of their report in their own words:

“These figures paint a picture, at once the most faithful and hideous, of the guilt and power of rum. Men and women, the young, the middle-aged, and the old, father and son, husband and wife, native and foreign born, the night-walker and man-slayer, the thief and adulterer—all testify to its ramified and revolting tyranny. Therefore, the result of this investigation, in view of the disproportionate magnitude of the exclusively rum offences, and considered in connection with the notorious tendency of liquor to inflame and enlarge the passions and appetites, to import chaos into the moral and physical life, to level the barriers of decency and self-respect, and to transport its victims into an abnormal and irresponsible state, destructive and degrading, calls for earnest and immediate attention at the bar of the public opinion and the public conscience of Massachusetts.”

I think that that report, giving the results of an investigation most impartially and most thoroughly carried out, cannot but be very conclusive. It sets forth the alarming and preponderating influence which the use of intoxicating liquors has in the production of crime in these countries of ours. I wish, besides, to read to you the opinions of several of the most eminent judges of Great Britain with reference to their experience in this matter. As early as 1670, Sir Matthew Hale, Chief Justice of England, said:

“By due observation extending over twenty years, I have found that if the murders and manslaughters, the burglaries, and robberies, the riots and tumults, and other enormities that have happened in that time, were divided into five parts, four of these have been the issues and products of excessive drinking—of tavern and ale-house drinking.”

Lord Chief Justice Coleridge said:

“I can keep no terms with a vice that fills our jails, that destroys the comfort of homes and the peace of families, and debases and brutalizes the people of these islands.

“There is scarcely a crime that comes before me that is not directly or indirectly caused by strong drink.”

Judge Patterson says:

“If it were not for this drinking you (the jury) and I would have nothing to do.”

Judge Anderson says:

“Drunkenness is the most fertile source of crime, and if it could be removed, the assizes of this country would be rendered mere nullities.”

Judge Wightman says:

“I find in my calendar that comes before me, one unfailing source, directly or indirectly, of the most of the crimes that are committed—intemperance.”

Mr. Justice Hawkins declared this:

“His lordship appealed to the members of the Grand Jury not only to repress, as far as possible, the crime of drunkenness, but also to bring their influence to bear upon those who encouraged drunkenness. It was a very serious matter, and he could not express too strongly his opinion that both those who indulged in the baneful and pernicious vice, and those who encouraged it, should be put down with a strong hand.”

Lord Chief Baron Kelly said:

“Two thirds of the crimes which come before the courts of law of this country are occasioned chiefly by intemperance.”

Mr. Frederick Hill, late Inspector of Prisons in England, and a high authority on penal science, writes:

“I am within the truth when I state, as the result of extensive and minute enquiry, that of four cases out of five, when an offence has been committed, intoxicating drink has been one of the causes.”

Dr. Elisha Harris, of New York, after a thorough inspection of prisons, says:

“After two years of careful inquiry into the history and condition of the criminal population of the State, I find that the conclusion is inevitable that, taken in all its relation, alcoholic drinks may be justly charged with far more than half the crimes that are brought to conviction in the State of New York, and that full 85 per cent. of all convicts give evidence of having, in some larger degree, been prepared or enticed to the criminal acts, because of the physical and distracting effects produced upon the human organism by alcohol and as they indulged in the use of alcoholic drinks.”

The Board of Police Justices of the city of New York, in their report of 1874, says:

"We are fully satisfied that intoxication is the one great leading cause which renders the existence of our police courts necessary."

Governor Dix, of New York, said :

"Intemperance is the undoubted cause of four fifths of all the crime, pauperism, and domestic misery of the State of New York."

Sir Thomas Chambers, Q.C., M.P., as Chairman at a meeting addressed by Sir W. Lawson, in Westbourne Park Chapel, London, March 22, 1882, said :

"I am in a position of course to see and to feel the mischief of intemperance, as administering the criminal law at the central criminal court for a long series of years; and my experience only confirms and strengthens the view I have held for very many years, that if we could absolutely put an end to the vice of intemperance in this metropolis and in other great towns in the country, we should put an end to nearly all the crimes of violence which are brought before the public tribunals."

Mr. Justice Denman, at the Surrey Assizes, in August, 1882, said :

"I don't know in enforcing the considerations which are placed before the judges as a part of their duty in the proclamation against vice and immorality which has just been read, that any judge can better discharge his duty than by again and again calling the attention of the gentry of the country as well as inhabitants generally to this fact, that the great bulk, I might almost say the whole of the offences of violence which take place in the counties of this land, are directly ascribable to the habit of drinking to excess."

The Recorder of Dublin, the Hon. Frederick R. Falkiner, Q.C., at the annual Licencing Sessions, held in October, 1881, in Dublin, said :

"I have been for a whole week trying cases such as no Christian Judge ought to have to try—cases of outrage and violence in this city, every one of which originated in public houses. The drinking system of Dublin is responsible for three sentences of penal servitude and seven heavy sentences of imprisonment which I had to impose, varying from twelve to twenty-four calendar months. I marked the evidence in every case, and every one of them began in a public house. It is the drink system and the drink alone that leads to all this misery and crime and sorrow."

Mr. Baron Dowse, in charging the jury in a case heard in a Commission Court, Dublin, in November, 1881, said :—

"He found that drink was at the bottom of almost every crime committed in Dublin. Even in cases that had no apparent connection with drink at all, if closely investigated, as he himself had done in many cases, they would be found to have their origin in drink."

Such is the testimony, and it is only a small part of the testimony that may be culled from the utterances of criminal judges, from the utterances of judges of Police Courts for the last hundred years, which I offer to this House in support of this proposition, a self-evident one, I know, but one which none the less requires to be supported by this evidence, thus kept alongside of the assertion in order to make the conviction, if possible, deeper and still deeper, but evidence that intoxicating liquor, as it is distributed and used throughout the country, is at the bottom of nearly nine-tenths of all the crime which has to be tried in the various courts of the country, and, if it is at the bottom of all the crime which has to be tried, it is also at the bottom, as the cause of that criminality, of what are the worst influences and the worst retarding causes to our prosperity that possibly a civilized country to-day has to labour against. Now, will you allow me to sum up the points I have made with reference to the traffic, in its nature and in its results. It is true that physiological science labels alcoholic liquor a poison and pronounces it dangerous, and, in the words of the eminent Dr. Andrew Clark, goes forth on its mission of proclaiming to the world that it is an enemy to the human race; it is true that the plainest rules of economic science, as applied to the keeping and proper use of our material resources, as applied to the wise conservation and proper employment of labour, and as applied to the prudent management of our surplus wealth and to the gaining of that invaluable consideration in any country, a minimum of the non-producing and criminal element, it is true that every one of these rules is antagonized by the liquor traffic, which destroys the material resources of the country, which works against its labour power, renders much of it useless, and turns much of it into ways which result in no benefit to the community or advantage to the country, which goes against the proper husbanding of the earnings of the country, which ought to be put by in surplus or put into capital, for the better and further development of the resources of the country; it is true, beyond cavil or doubt, that it is the very bottom cause of that great non-producing element, of that great criminal and dangerous element in our society which has to be watched and guarded and maintained, which, by the opinions of the judges and by the consensus of all men of intelligence, takes a place in our country and in all Anglo-Saxon countries which is to be deplored, which is to be investigated, and which, if possible, is to be alleviated. I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have made good my proposition that the traffic in intoxicating liquors antagonizes all these in its nature and effects, and that as such it demands total legal suppression at the hands of the State.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported and read the third time and passed :—

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the River St. Clair Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Macmaster.)

Bill (No. 11) respecting the Union of certain Methodist Churches therein named.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 61) to amend the Act to incorporate the Synod of the Diocese of Saskatchewan, and for other purposes connected therewith.—(Mr. Williams.)

Bill (No. 48) to incorporate the Atlantic Mutual Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Nova Scotia Mutual Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Live Stock Insurance Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Traders' Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Bill (No. 94) to empower the Sovereign Fire Insurance Company to relinquish their charter, and to provide for the winding up of their affairs.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

Bill (No. 30) to extend to the Dominion of Canada the powers of the corporation called "De Nederlandsch-Amerikansche Land Maatschappij" (The Netherlands-American Land Company).—(Mr. Abbott.)

RELIEF OF JOHN GRAHAM.

Mr. JAMIESON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 107) for the relief of John Graham (from the Senate).

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION BILL.

On the Order for the consideration of Bill (No. 6) to provide for the punishment of Seduction and like offences being read,

Mr. CHARLTON. The vote in the Committee by which the first clause of this Bill, as introduced, was struck out, was a very close one, the majority being only three; and I have made some changes in the clause as it originally stood, which, I think, will obviate the objections to it which some members entertained. I think also that the country will desire to know what members of this House favour that clause, and what members are opposed to it. For that reason I shall move: that the order be discharged, and that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, with power to insert the following as the first section of the same:

Any man who shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and have illicit connection with any unmarried female of previously chaste character, and not over twenty-one years of age, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable as hereinafter provided.

The changes made in this clause, as compared with that in the Bill as originally introduced, are, that the subsequent marriage of the parties is not a bar to conviction, and there is a limit introduced as to age, the limit of age being twenty-one years. Many members of the Senate last year expressed themselves as willing to support the Bill if a limitation of this kind were inserted. Although I do not myself approve of the limitation as to age, yet to strengthen the Bill in the House and to render its chances for becoming law better than they otherwise would be, I waive my own views, and adopt that view of the case.

House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Section 1 agreed to.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved that the Committee rise.

Motion negatived on a division.

Committee rose and reported.

On motion that the amendment be read a second time and concurred in, being put,

Mr. FOSTER moved, That the said Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with power to insert the following, as the second Section of the said Bill:—

Any man who by means of a feigned or pretended marriage has sexual intercourse with any woman of previously chaste character, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable as hereinafter provided.

Also to insert the following as Section four of the Bill in the place of Section three of the Bill as first introduced:—

Provided that the evidence of the female in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, shall be corroborated as to the offence mentioned in the first section hereof as to both promise of marriage and seduction, and as to the offence mentioned in the second Section hereof as to both the feigned or pretended marriage and the sexual intercourse, and as the offence mentioned in the third Section hereof, as to the inveiglement or enticement, by some other material evidence; and to provide that Sections four, five, six, seven and eight in the Bill (No. 6) as first introduced, be numbered five, six, seven, eight and nine respectively.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I rise to a point of order. If I understood rightly amidst the noise, the hon. member for Norfolk moved the second reading of the Bill as amended, and my hon. friend from King's has moved an amendment to that motion, seconded by my hon. friend from Norfolk. I do not understand how the same hon. gentleman can move the motion and second an amendment to it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I moved the second reading of the amendment, and not of the Bill. That amendment was declared carried. With reference to the motion now before the House, it was rendered necessary by the division of what, in the original Bill, was the first section of the Bill, into two sections. The first section, as introduced, provided a punishment for seduction, under promise of marriage, and also for a feigned or pretended marriage. This was divided into two. The amendment I put into your hands was that seduction, under promise of marriage, should be a misdemeanor, and that was carried in Committee. Then my hon. friend moved that a pretended or mock marriage should be a misdemeanor. That makes two clauses of what was formerly the first clause of the Bill. The balance of this proposed amendment consists merely of the verbal alterations rendered necessary by introducing a new clause into the Bill. The third clause in the original Bill provides that offences which are specified in the first and second clauses shall be corroborated by other material evidence. There are now three classes of offences, and it became necessary to change the phraseology of what was then the third section of the Bill, and to provide that the offences named in the first, second, and third clauses, instead of the first and second clauses, should be corroborated by other material evidence. The only question which the House has to pass upon now is whether a feigned or pretended marriage shall be a misdemeanor. All the other portions of the motion are merely the necessary changes in case this section, with reference to feigned marriages, becomes the second section of the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. gentleman has not answered my point of order. It was that my hon. friend moved the motion which you put from the Chair, to which my hon. friend from King's moved an amendment, seconded by my hon. friend from Norfolk. That is certainly the case.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will make it clear. I should have declared the motion for the second reading of the amendment carried, and then the motion should have been that the Bill be now read the third time, and in amendment to that the hon. member for King's made his motion.

Mr. CAMERON. That motion then, for the third reading of the Bill, would be moved by my hon. friend from Norfolk, and then my hon. friend from King's moves an amendment to that, which my hon. friend from Norfolk seconds, thereby seconding an amendment to his own motion, which clearly cannot be done.

Mr. SPEAKER. In order to make the minutes correct, I declare now the question to be that the amendment be now read the second time and concurred in. Shall that be adopted?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then comes the motion of the hon. member for King's. Who seconds that?

Mr. DAVIES. I second the motion.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The amendment is so lengthy, involving so many verbal alterations, and, I think, some alterations of substance, that I do think that the consideration of it should be deferred to another day, in order that we may see it in print and have an opportunity of understanding it. I have been quite unable to follow either the motion of my hon. friend from King's or the explanation of it which my hon. friend from Norfolk has given, and do not desire to vote on it without having it plainly in print before me.

Mr. BLAKE. I really do not see that there is as much complication in this as the hon. gentleman for Victoria thinks there is. We had in the Bill, as it was before us awhile ago, three different classes of proposed offences, of which two, however, were combined in one clause. That one clause, in which these two were combined, was stricken out of the Bill, and the provision in the remaining portions of the amendment referred to were necessarily confined to the only offence which remained in the Bill as it stood. These are provisions as to evidence, as to the woman being permitted to give evidence and certain corroboration being necessary. Of course to make the Bill consistent with itself, when the Committee decided to strike out the first clause, the provision as to evidence was confined to the only remaining offence in the Bill. The House has inserted one additional offence—seduction under promise of marriage. Now, it is proposed that the House shall insert the other offence which was stricken out—seduction obtained by means of a feigned or pretended marriage. Perhaps it would have been better if my hon. friend had divided the matter still further, and had not proposed the alteration in procedure until the House had decided upon the insertion of the second offence; but it is clear that, if the House decides upon that, the remainder is simply consequent upon it and upon the change we have just now decided to make. It is no alteration in any way. The Committee and the House both decided upon the principles of evidence which should be applicable to this class of offence, namely, that the woman should be allowed to give evidence, but that there should be corroborative evidence. And all that it is proposed to do in the same form of words is to apply to the three offences that rule of evidence and procedure which we have already agreed should be applied to the one offence that the House agreed formerly should be in the Bill.

Mr. BERGIN. The fact that the leader of the Opposition has found it necessary to make such a lengthened explanation ought to be sufficient to show the House that the explanation of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was not such as was satisfactory to the House. I strongly approve of that clause of the Bill which was stricken out at the first reading, and I should like to see it become law; but, Sir, I am not prepared to vote for that which I do not and cannot understand, as it has been put before the House. I think my hon. friend, who has many supporters on this side of the House as well as upon that, would do well to have it printed and put properly before the House, so that we can all intelligently vote upon it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I really think, under the circumstances, that it ought to be postponed, so that we can consider this long amendment. It may be, and I have no doubt it is, that some portion of the amendment is merely in consequence of the division into two branches, introducing one which was lost before. There is so much new matter introduced in this amendment which was rejected before, that I really think we had better not proceed with it to-night. I think the hon. gentleman had better move that the debate be adjourned, and as the motion will appear in the Votes and Proceedings, we will have a better opportunity of considering it. It is out of the question that we can be forced to vote upon a long resolution, which we have no opportunity of reading; and, perhaps, we may differ in opinion as to these amendments being merely technical.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is to my recollection, and I think it is to the recollection of the House, that the First Minister suggested to my hon. friend for North Norfolk that he should prepare and introduce this identical amendment which has now been introduced by the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster). The First Minister declared, in the course of the discussion some days ago, that he advised my hon. friend to take that particular offence—the offence of obtaining connection by means of a mock marriage—and cover it by a clause such as has been now prepared and introduced; and if I understood him, he then expressed approval of such a clause. Now it seems to me as simple a proposition as could well be made before the assembled wisdom, that such an offence as is mentioned by my hon. friend should be made a crime; but as grave doubts have been expressed whether it is a crime by law, I do not think my hon. friend could do better than to insist on that being put in. No doubt the third reading may, in that case, be left over, but as the hon. gentleman the other evening expressed an extreme desire to have the Session close in a short time, and as he has taken Thursdays from this time out, I think there is every reason why my hon. friend should proceed. The fact of the matter is, in all probability, unless my hon. friend proceeds to-night, he may have his Bill entirely lost, and I strongly advise him, therefore, to accept no delay.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken in stating that I advised this clause should be adopted. This clause, as introduced by my hon. friend from King's, provides that any man who, by means of a mock marriage, has intercourse with any woman of previously chaste character, shall be guilty of misdemeanor. I did not agree to that; I did not advise that. I advised there should be a distinct clause, making the fact of a feigned marriage an indictable offence, and that any man who induced a woman to marry him by mock or pretended marriage should be guilty of a misdemeanor. That was my suggestion, and I think it is a confusion of terms as it stands now.

Mr. CHARLTON. I separated these two offences, thinking that the amendment now in your hands would be imperilled by coupling it with the motion making seduction a crime, and for that reason I separated the offences. I informed my right hon. friend I intended to do so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think he approved that course. Now, Sir, what follows that section with regard to making mock marriage a crime, is mere verbal changes in the Bill. As it exists, that adds one new clause to the Bill—it makes three clauses in place of two, and it renders it necessary to specify that corroborative evidence shall be had in three cases instead of two. I would suggest that all in that motion be struck out that relates to procedure, and that we merely deal with the amendment with regard to mock marriages. The House can understand that, and we will leave the changes that are rendered necessary in the adoption of these two sections, to be made afterwards.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This does not make the feigned marriage a misdemeanor.

Mr. CHARLTON. It makes it a misdemeanor, coupled with the consequences that follow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quite a different thing.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of course, the House will pass upon that. I suggest, in order to simplify the matter, that all in that resolution relating to the procedure, relating to the changes in the numbers of the sections, be struck out, and that the House accept the amendment with reference to making feigned marriage a crime.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. gentleman is making it still more difficult to understand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What the First Minister appears to have been reported to have said was this:

"This clause had better be struck out, as it is ineffective for any purpose, and a clause prepared by the hon. gentleman, making a feigned marriage a misdemeanor, and providing that if the feigned marriage be followed by co-habitation, it would be an aggravation of the offence."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quite a distinct thing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a fine distinction the First Minister is drawing. He is willing to make a feigned marriage an offence, and if followed by co-habitation an aggravation of that offence, and is that not just the principle that is taken here?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What I said before, and what I have said now, is that a feigned marriage should be an indictable offence, and if that feigned marriage is followed by another outrage, that would be an aggravation of the first offence. That is what I said.

Mr. BERGIN. I rise to a point of order. It appears to me the hon. gentleman cannot, in accordance with the Rules of this House, spring an amendment of this kind on the House without notice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes he can.

Mr. SPEAKER. On motion for the third reading, an amendment of this kind can be introduced without notice. The amendment is in order.

Mr. CHARLTON. Although it may be urged that the motion is a long one and not easily understood, yet I repeat that it is simply a motion to make a feigned or mock marriage a crime, and all that follows that motion is merely verbal changes that are rendered necessary in the Bill by making two clauses out of one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall move that the debate be adjourned. I think, in common fairness to those who desire to vote understandingly, the House will allow this debate to be adjourned.

Mr. BEATY. I join in supporting the amendment to adjourn the debate, because the question is now so badly mixed up that I am quite sure the House does not understand it. I do not understand it myself, although I voted for the amendment proposed originally. I now find the Bill has been somewhat reconstructed, so much so that it is not in its original shape, at all events, and I think it is better to have it printed and then we will be able to understand it. I trust the House will agree to adjourn the debate, so that we can have an opportunity of seeing what is in the Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Bill is not reconstructed; it contains no new offence. It merely divides the clause that provided for two offences, and it places these offences in two separate sections or clauses. There is no new matter brought in, and there is nothing in the amendment but what was in the original Bill, together with the necessary verbal changes. I would not object to the postponement of action on this Bill, if the result of that postponement would not prove the death of the Bill; but at this stage of the Session, postponement simply means that the Bill will not be acted upon this Session, and no friend of the measure will vote for the motion of the right hon. gentleman. The matter is plain and simple. The three offences contained in the Bill are mentioned in three clauses, whereas, when the Bill was first introduced, they were mentioned in two clauses, and corroborative evidence will have to be given in regard to offences mentioned in three clauses instead of two. The matter, as I have said, is very plain, and the most ordinary intelligence can understand it, and I am unable to understand how any hon. member could make it honestly a reason for wishing postponement.

Mr. BERGIN. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to impute motives.

Mr. CHARLTON. There can be no doubt whatever that favourable action on the proposition of the right hon. gentleman means the death of the Bill, and for that reason

I urge the friends of the Bill to oppose what would otherwise meet with my approbation. I wish to see the Bill acted upon by the House, and would prefer that it should not be killed in a bye-way instead of in open contest.

Mr. IVE'S. There is a great deal of hair-splitting about this matter. It strikes me that it is not very complicated, and that we might pass upon it to-night.

Mr. HESSON. I really do not understand the Bill, in consequence of the changes made in it. I am desirous of seeing the principle carried out, and I wish to vote for it; but as there seems to be a great deal of misunderstanding in regard to it, I think the Bill should be reprinted. I favour the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn the debate (Sir John A. Macdonald) agreed to, on the following division:—

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 38) to prevent fraud in the manufacture and sale of Agricultural Fertilizers.—(Mr. Massue.)

LAW OF EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 3) further to amend the law of Evidence in Criminal Cases.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron).

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I had intended, before Mr. Speaker left the Chair, making a short reply to some observations which were made at a previous stage of this Bill, by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I would not perhaps have presumed to reply to that hon. gentleman if he had confined himself to a discussion of the Bill on its merits and demerits. I would have left my arguments to stand against his, and left the House and the country to judge which had the most merit; and, Sir, I would not have had the presumption of thinking that my view would have prevailed against his. But the hon. gentleman went further, and tried to draw the attention of the House to what I said, not so much by attacking my motives, as by dealing with what he chose to call the attack I made on the public morality of the country, and that being the case, I think it is but right that I should say a few words on that point. In the first place, I wish to say that I had no intention of making an attack, such as has been designated by the leader of the Opposition. Whether the words I used were sufficiently strong to warrant him in styling them as he did, an attack upon the public morality, I leave to the House to say. I had no intention of using such strong language, and I hope I shall not be unfortunate enough to-night, in my choice of language, as to convey the idea that I am making an attack upon the public morality of the country. What I intended to say was, that I believed that the laws of our country had a tendency to encourage perjury. I believe they have. I believe that, owing to that tendency, the country has drifted in that direction, and that to-day more perjury is committed in courts of justice than formerly. I said further, that there were many cases in which the amounts involved were too important, and the interests of the parties were such that evidence was given which made it a wonder, indeed, that jurymen were able to arrive at a correct conclusion, and which left the impression that perjury had in many cases been committed. Sir, I stick to that statement. But, Sir, I wonder why the hon. gentleman was so ticklish about this question of public morality. It being my first speech, I thought to myself how careful hon. gentlemen must be in the expressions they use so as not to be tripped up by a gentleman of such standing, of such commanding ability, as the leader of the Opposition—ability which, I must say, I always admired before I came to this House, and which I have learned still more to admire since I became a member of Parliament, and from which I certainly do not wish to detract. I also thought, on referring to some language made use of by the hon. gentleman on previous occasions in this House, that it was similar to what I had used the other night, and that I might ask him to substitute his language on these occasions for the expressions which I used the other night, though I do not think I would care to express myself so strongly as he did. I ask the House to go back to the Session of 1880, when the hon. gentleman was discussing a Bill entitled, I think, a Bill for the suppression of crime, and let us see what the hon. gentleman said:

"Some years ago, when it was the duty of the late Government to call attention to this subject, statements were made which indicated that the rate of increase of crime in Canada was of a very extraordinary and alarming character—"

The hon. gentleman then gave some figures, and proceeded to say:

"knowing there has been an increase, in two years, at the rate of 25 per cent. But that even does not represent the true state of the case, because the ratio of increase is, unfortunately, progressive."

I scarcely think that my language, the other night, was so strong as that. When I said that, I thought our legislation had a tendency in a particular direction. The hon. gentleman said further:

"There is something radically wrong in such a state of affairs. Our population has certainly been increasing during these two or three years at a very slow rate, but there has been this increase, in the graver classes of crime of, at least, 25 per cent., which is certainly extremely disheartening."

A little further on he said:

"My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has been good enough to send me an advanced copy of the General Criminal Statistics to which I then referred, and I find that the increase of crime throughout the community is even more startling than I supposed."

So we find that in one sentence the hon. gentleman finds the condition of things alarming, in another, crime is steadily progressive, and in another, that the condition of things is startling. He said further:

"We have no ground for congratulating ourselves in reference to the morale of the country, and some repressive step is required to prevent the further increase of the evil growing so rapidly as it is in the large cities more particularly."

The other night the hon. gentleman was the champion of the morality of the country, thinking that I had made an attack upon it by the words I used, when I had no intention of casting any slur upon the people of this country. The litigants of the country have among them many men who desire to tell the truth, but even these litigants embrace but a small proportion of the people of this country. Even if I had referred to all who involved themselves in litigation in this country, they would form a very small minority, as compared with the whole population of this country, and therefore what I said was not to be interpreted as an attack on the morals of the people of this country. The hon. gentleman said:

"We have no grounds for congratulating ourselves in reference to the morale of the country, and some repressive step is required to prevent the further increase of the evil growing so rapidly as it is, in the large cities more particularly."

In 1877, the hon. gentleman said:

"Upon the whole, he believed that the main difficulty in the question was to be found in the question of perjury—"

The very same argument that I use at present—

"In the very great temptation which already existed in civil cases, and still more in criminal cases, not to tell the truth. There were cases, however, occurring every day in civil matters—"

I spoke of civil matters—

"in which the interests in regard to property, and still stronger, the excitement occasioned by hostile feelings, particularly in suits between relatives, were so great that the temptations to commit perjury were very great; but notwithstanding that fact, the operation of the law had been as he had stated."

Now, which of us two had used the stronger language in reference to the morals of this country? It seems to me that his language was very much stronger, indeed, than any I used; and as reported, Sir, I have nothing to take back, and I have not endeavoured to correct the report of my remarks in any way, or spoken to the reporters about it; I have nothing to take back, although I might make this qualification, that what I said applies to a very small number of people in this country, and that I did not mean to imply that everyone engaged in litigation committed perjury, but I simply intended to say that our laws had that tendency, and they having that tendency our people had drifted in that direction. I had my attention called to this subject on account of the rebuke I received from the hon. gentleman, and on account of a reference which I have seen, in one of the public journals of this Dominion, to this subject. What my hon. friend said was made all the more striking against me by his remark that if what I stated was true as to New Brunswick, I spoke for my own Province, it was not true so far as the Province of Ontario was concerned; and yet, only a few days afterwards, I picked up a journal printed in Ontario, in which I found these words:

"Judge McDougall deserves the thanks of the community for the stand which he has taken in respect to the matter of perjury in minor cases. Mr. LANDRY (Kent).

cases. It is an evil which deserves to be, as far as possible, rudely and effectually stamped out. It is very true, that in dealing with this matter, a great deal of allowance must be made for the defects of human nature."

The article then goes on to explain these defects of human nature, and to point out that witnesses may swear falsely without committing perjury; and then it says:

"But after all due allowances for mental peculiarities, dullness of perception, and defectiveness of understanding, the fact remains that there is a vast amount of downright perjury, properly so-called, practised almost continually."

Now, Sir, this was not intended for New Brunswick. It was printed in a paper published in Ontario, which has, perhaps, as large a circulation as any other paper in this country; and it was not printed because of anything said in reference to this, but it was written by a gentleman who believed what he wrote, and he used language stronger than was used by me. I thought it was due to myself that I should say this much, because I have received letters from gentlemen in my own Province asking me what I had said; because some of my friends had seen the remarks of the hon. gentleman in the public press, which are much more widely circulated than mine, owing to his standing and position in this country; and being asked what I had said to call forth such a rebuke from the hon. gentleman, I felt that I had not deserved it, and that he must have thought that it would have the effect of lowering me in the Province of New Brunswick, in connection with the very first remarks I made in this House. My hon. friend from the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon), got up afterwards, and said I was not speaking for the morals of the people of New Brunswick, and that the people there were more moral than I represented. I do not wish to retaliate on my hon. friend, but I think it was rather unfair for him to twist me in the way he did, after the manner in which he spoke of his constituents in 1880, which I suppose he remembers himself. Having said so much with reference to myself, I simply now repeat that I have not found any necessity to change my mind with regard to this Bill. I think it is one that should not be adopted by this House; and I am encouraged in that view by the fact that although the second reading was carried by forty-nine majority, after it was discussed more fully, and hon. gentlemen looked more closely into it, the next majority in favour of the Bill was only five. I hope that now, instead of having any majority in its favour, it will be rejected, and that this Committee will not discredit itself by aiding it to become law.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very sorry the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), should suppose that I made any attack on him, or had any desire to lower him in the opinion of this House or of this country, or of his Province. If he reflects for a moment on what I said, he will see that any suspicion of that kind is unfounded, and that from my point of view I was not merely justified but bound to say what I did. I will repeat what the hon. gentleman said and what I said—I read from Hansard:

"There is temptation, and so much of it that it is a deplorable fact to-day that there are very few important cases tried in this Dominion, involving a large amount of money, where there is not such swearing on both sides as to make people believe that perjury has been committed."

That was the observation I took exception to. I said that had the hon. gentleman confined his observation to his own Province, much as I regretted the state of things which it developed, I should not have felt called upon to say anything; but speaking of my own knowledge, not a recent one, of litigation in Ontario, I did not think that that observation represented the true state of affairs. It was an observation which I think I did not too severely characterize when I said:

"I have not heard, in a long time, a greater slur on the state of society in Canada than that which the hon. gentleman's words, if they were applicable to the whole of this Dominion, would not merely imply but describe—that the condition of the morals of our population was steadily deteriorating; that the crime of perjury was now so rife that it is suspected, with too often good cause, to exist in the great majority of cases that take place.”

That was my paraphrase of what the hon. gentleman said, and I think it is a tolerably accurate paraphrase, erring, if at all, on the side of mitigating rather than exaggerating the strength of the hon. gentleman's observation. Now, the hon. gentleman has said that he is vindicated by something that has appeared in some newspaper as to the great amount of perjury that is committed in petty causes. He will observe that in the course of some observations which I made and which he has been criticising, I used these words :

“I have heard of late there is more laxity of swearing in some of the tribunals before which petty cases are tried; in the division courts. Whether the greater solemnity which prevails, the presence of a larger audience, the presence of counsel in the causes, instead of their being conducted as they usually are conducted in the division courts, may tend to a greater looseness in the other courts or not, I know not; but I do speak of what I think I do know, when I say that that description, that lamentable description of things which the hon. member for Kent, N. B. (Mr. Landry), gave as the prevalent state of things in his own Province, would be wholly inapplicable to the Province in which we are now situated.”

You will observe that my observation had reference to important cases. The hon. gentleman spoke expressly of important cases, and in speaking of those cases he spoke of that class of cases with which I was more familiar when in practice; and when he declared that a sad state of things existed as regards the sanctity of the oath, I felt bound to repudiate his assertion, as far as it affected the Province from which I come. With reference to what he said about the increase of crime generally, I founded my observations on certain statistics which, I think, I read in the course of my speech, and which are not inconsistent with anything I said on that occasion or to-night. The hon. gentleman finds he has nothing to recall; I have to say that I find nothing to recall in what I said, either.

Mr. WELDON. I was not in the House the other evening when the hon. gentleman made his remarks with reference to the increase in perjury, but I read his speech, and must say that my experience does not bear out what he said. In our Province, during the last twenty-seven years, I cannot call to recollection any case in which the parties were committed by the judges for perjury and found guilty. The whole principle of this Bill has been tested in England and elsewhere in regard to civil cases; and I have seen criminal cases in which great injury and injustice was done, by the parties employed not being allowed to give evidence. As far as New Brunswick is concerned, I must say that perjury does not exist to the extent the hon. gentleman has indicated.

Mr. BOSSÉ. I move that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. IVES. This Bill is not an attack upon the principles of criminal law as understood, practiced and established and approved by this Parliament. It is simply the extension of the principle already recognized and acted upon. The same arguments precisely which were used when we adopted the amendment that permitted the defendant, in the case of assault and battery, to give evidence, is now proposed to be extended to other cases of misdemeanor. Until hon. gentlemen can tell us how the crime of perjury has become more frequent by the adoption of the amendment which we adopted a few Sessions ago, with respect to common cases of assault and battery, I do not think we should be frightened out of extending the provisions of the law in this matter. It does not seem to me so serious a question, that it should be treated in the summary way proposed by the hon. member for Quebec. We adopted the principle years ago, and we adopted it again the other day when we sent this Bill to a Committee, and I do not see now any reason why we should kill the Bill by adopting this motion.

Mr. BOSSÉ raised a point of order. The Bill could not be discussed on this amendment.

Mr. BLAKE. We have a right to discuss whether it is expedient this Committee should rise or not. My hon. friend is saying why it should not rise. You cannot take that rise out of us.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The effect of the motion of the hon. member for Quebec, if carried, would practically be to kill the Bill. I think this would be an unfair course to take. The House has already assented to the principle of the Bill, and the First Minister, than whom there is no better judge, assented to it on two or three different occasions. The Bill, in 1833, was referred to a Committee composed of perhaps the best criminal lawyers of the House from Ontario and the other Provinces. The Bill, as now submitted, is just the Bill which was reported by that Committee, and, therefore, I do not think it would be fair to ask the House to rise now.

Mr. DESJARDINS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I fail to see what can justify the great haste shown by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). During each Session—for what purpose of notoriety I am at a loss to understand—he seems to endeavour to make a specialty of criminal matters. This may be very amusing for him, but I believe that Parliament has something more practical to deal with, and that before going any further in a procedure, as the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) has very properly said, would result in increasing the number of false oaths before our courts of justice, it is prudent, at least, to pause awhile. As it has been said by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), we have had some experience in the procedure which permits the defendant to give evidence in his own behalf, or the husband and wife to testify in favour of one another, in cases of simple assault. Well, we should first wait for more experience as to the working of that law, so as to be able to see how far the fears which were expressed when this first Bill was passed, were well founded. I believe that the time elapsed since this Bill was passed is not sufficient to justify our taking another step in that direction. My impression is, Mr. Speaker, that the tendency of this legislation is to diminish the respect due to an oath which is not a simple matter of form, but also comprises an act of faith very important in religious creeds. Considering that the present Bill has a most dangerous tendency, I think that the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Bossé) is justified in asking that the Committee do now rise without reporting.

Motion agreed to on a division.

Committee rose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and (at 11:05 o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 6th March, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

AN IMPERFECT RETURN.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the imperfect character of a Return made the other day to an Address of the 16th April, 1833, for copies of all correspondence, reports, and Orders in Council, with reference to the claim of Mr. Dustan, of Halifax, for a remission of duty on machinery for a sugar refinery. Nine months elapsed in the preparation of this Return, and all we get is, on the 31st January, 1884 :

"In return to the enclosed Address of the House of Commons for copies of all correspondence, reports and Orders in Council, with reference to the claim of Mr. Dustan, of Halifax, for a remission of duty on machinery for a sugar refinery, I beg leave to state that there is no correspondence on that subject on record in this Department."

The Address called for Orders in Council and reports, as well as correspondence. Mr. Johnson, who writes this, of course would have no Orders in Council, and he does not answer as to reports. I understand the practice to be that these Returns are sent into one of the Departments—I believe to that of the Secretary of State—whose business it is to examine them and see whether they are proper answers to the Orders and Addresses of the House; and it seems to me to be an extraordinary thing that, after so long an interval, so very imperfect an answer should be given. It was stated publicly last Session in the newspapers that a very large remission of duty had been made to Mr. Dustan, with reference to this sugar refinery. When I moved the Address, the Government did not intimate that there was no correspondence. They granted the Address and now, as I say, after an interval of nine months, we get an imperfect answer without any information at all.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will enquire about that portion of the Address that has not been answered and have the information brought down.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CASEY. Before you leave the Chair I wish to make a few remarks on the speech with which the hon. Finance Minister introduced his Budget to us. In that speech he treated us to a very different style of oratory from that to which we have been accustomed of late years. Of late years the hon. gentleman has been triumphant in his tone. His speeches have been a perfect psalm of triumph, from beginning to end; we have discerned in them the joyful trump of victory, sustained by the deep bass of the boom of the National Policy, but this present speech is different in tone. Instead of the customary psalm of triumph we have a speech full of apology—a speech, which from beginning to end, is nothing but an apology for the partial failure of the Government policy in certain respects, and an explanation of the reasons of that failure. Instead of the triumphant sound of the boom, we hear but the still small voice of an accusing conscience which the hon. gentleman has not been quite able to stifle. When he prophesied to us last year continued prosperity, when he saw before his mind's eye the seven fat years of inspiration, the seven fat kine stretched in long perspective before him, he spoke with an air of certainty, with the conviction of one to whom the stars had told something of what was about to happen. Then, as on previous occasions we were inclined to suspect that his prophecy had been inspired by the astrologer royal, the seer Wiggins, who sees the winds afar off, and whom the hon. gentleman keeps in his own Department, possibly for the purpose of furnishing him with private information of this kind. If we were inclined to suspect that the hon. gentleman's prophecies originated from that source, when we heard them, we are still more inclined to suspect it after hearing the explanations this year. We are familiar with the course adopted by Wiggins in explaining why his predicted storms did not appear. He has always been able to show that although it was not very stormy here, it had been very stormy in the Indian Ocean, or on the coast of Japan, or somewhere else, and it was not his fault if the storm did not take place in our neighbourhood; it was not his fault if something had gone wrong with the elements. In short, the cause of the failure was everywhere else but in the seer himself. The hon. gentleman's explanations in regard to the partial failure of his policy are something of the same nature. He has tried hard to make us understand that the depression he admits does exist is not so bad, after all, and if it does exist, it is not the fault of the Government, or of that miraculous, wonder-working, revivifying and encouraging policy with which they have favoured the country, and he winds up with the hope that "we may soon be in the position we occupied a year ago, of prospering in every particular." That is a very lame conclusion to come to after all the glowing prophecies with which he favoured us only one year ago. He went on to tell us there was no depression worth speaking of in the agricultural interests. There had been, he admitted, a bad harvest of wheat but the deficiency was made up by the extra good hay crop, because the farmers would be able to feed more cattle, and consequently export more cattle next spring. But if the deficiency in wheat be so great as he has said, 20,000,000 bushels, it will take a large increase in hay to make up for it. Even if the necessary extra millions of tons of hay were furnished by the hay crop, that would not quite compensate for the deficiency in wheat. We must remember that hay is not so saleable as wheat, and if it is to be turned into beef you must first have the cattle. In a season when the wheat crop fails farmers are not flush of cash, and are, therefore, not in a position to purchase the extra number of cattle to be fed and exported as the hon. gentleman expects. We must remember also that stall-fed cattle require grain as well as hay, for you cannot fatten cattle exclusively on hay, and the hon. Minister has placed an obstacle in the way of farmers obtaining that particular kind of grain most profitable in feeding cattle by putting a duty on Indian corn; and although he has agreed to give a rebate on the duty on Indian corn when imported for the purpose of distilling or starch-making, yet, no rebate is granted the farmer when he imports the corn for the purpose of adding wealth to the country by using it to feed cattle. On the whole the farmers are not likely to be very flush of money during the coming year. I do not want to draw an alarming picture of their condition, because it is not alarming, but they are likely to continue to be shorter of money than they have been and less in a position to bear with equanimity the burdens they have been bearing for some years past. The hon. gentleman went on to speak on the question of the depression that exists among the workmen and the poor. He told us there was "no general suffering, that there was no unusual number of people out of employment." Well, the evidence of our senses in every city and manufacturing town in Canada contradicts that statement. We are all aware, from our own experience and the reports in the press, that there has been an unusual number of people in want and suffering in Montreal, Toronto, London and Ottawa, and all the important cities in the Dominion. Some of these people are no doubt starving immigrants, but who is responsible for that, if not the Government, considering the inducements they have held out to immigrants of a class who are not needed here, to come out to this country? Having allowed paupers to come here from Irish workhouses, can the Government claim to be free from responsibility? I think not. But even if the question only concerned our own people, we are able to assert, though we do so with sorrow, that the number of our own people out of work and suffering want this year is greater than it has been for years past. We have the hon. gentleman's own admission on the subject, for he tells us it was to be regretted that the cotton manufacturers had "discontinued" a number of employes this year. That is a nice euphemism for saying they were dismissed; and it is preferable to the phrase used by the organ of the Government, the Toronto Mail. The hon. Minister says they were "discontinued in order to allow the cotton owners to place their business on a healthier footing by reducing production." The Mail gave a different explanation. It said those poor fellows wanted rest, that they had been working so hard on account of the increase in cotton manufacturing the past few years, that they wanted rest, and their considerate employers had discontinued them for a few weeks, or months, in order to enable them to recuperate in the enjoyment of their savings of the preceding four years, so that they might be in good condition for work again the coming spring. Sir, I think that the hon. Minister has been more polite to the workingmen, has, at all events, studied their feelings more than his organ in Toronto has done. I leave it to themselves to settle their difference in this respect. When an hon. gentleman on this side alluded to the existence of a soup kitchen in London—something which I believe my hon. friend, the Postmaster General has never seen in that city before—

Mr. CARLING. I beg your pardon. There is one there every winter. I do not think a winter has passed by for the last ten or twenty years that there has not been something of the kind in the city of London.

Mr. CASEY. Well that is a much worse showing for the National Policy than I had supposed.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman must be aware that the city of London is the centre of a large rural district and the poor people come in from the agricultural districts, and as they remain in the city during the winter, they have to be provided for by the city.

Mr. CASEY. Just so. Then the Postmaster-General says that it was not the poor workingmen who have to be provided for the past few years, but the impoverished farmers, the poor people from the agricultural districts. If he prefers to put it that way, well and good.

Mr. CARLING. I did not say it was the impoverished farmers; I said it was the poor and destitute people from the villages and surrounding districts who came to the city.

Mr. CASEY. The poor and destitute people from the rural districts, the hon. gentleman said. Well, Sir, if destitution has existed in the rich farming community around London to such an extent as to compel the benevolent people of London to establish soup kitchens the past few years, it reveals a state of things even worse than I had supposed. I confess that, although I live within 20 miles of London, I never heard of this destitution before. I never heard before that there was so much poverty and destitution in and about London, and I believe that the hon. Postmaster General has somewhat exaggerated the condition of affairs there during the last few years. However, I believe that an unusual number of people are now receiving relief in London. An alderman of that city, a strong Conservative, stated over his own name in the newspapers, during the last municipal campaign, that there were between 1,200 and 1,400 unemployed workmen in the city of London, a larger number than he had ever before known to be unemployed there. Although this statement is so unfavourable to the Conservative party, that Conservative alderman of the city of London has never withdrawn it or denied it. So, then, in London, at all events, things are in a worse condition than they have ordinarily been. The Finance Minister objected to a reference to this matter by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; he said it was wrong to make a charge against the benevolent people of the city of London for relieving the poor by giving them bread. Now, Sir, we do not make a charge because benevolent people relieve the poor, but we make a charge against the Government, that it is largely in consequence of their policy that these poor exist in such numbers. We know, of course, that we have the poor always with us, but we are able to understand the reasons why the poor are with us in greater numbers in some years than in others. I think we are able to state distinctly, in this case, that the unusual number of poor people at present in the city of London, as well as in other towns, is due to manufacturing having been unduly stimulated the last few years by a protective tariff—stimulated to such an extent that a good deal more has been produced than the country can consume, with the inevitable result that production had to be stopped for a time, and the workingmen who might have been profitably employed under other circumstances, are thrown out of work and have to remain unemployed until the country has consumed the surplus produce already manufactured. My hon. friend, the Minister, objected again, because we called attention to this state of things. He said we were crying down the credit of the country, that we were acting unpatriotically in referring to this depression. Well, Sir, I could quote you from speeches—not of the hon. gentleman, because he was not here—but of his colleagues in 1875-76-77-78, containing expressions with regard to the state of gloom and depression in which the country was then plunged, which I would not like to repeat myself in regard to the present condition of the country, and which I would not like to repeat even if the condition was as bad now as the hon. gentleman asserted it was then. They went into superlatives, into exaggeration, into extravagance in describing the depression that then existed. It was their whole stock in trade; and it was simply by producing the impression that the country was then in a state of such gloom and difficulty that it could not be made worse, and might be made better, that they were enabled to carry a majority on behalf of their great panacea for all such evils, the National Policy. Now, Sir, it is doubtless a bitter pill for the hon. gentleman to be reminded that notwithstanding the existence of that cure all that same gloomy state of things, in a modified form, has already begun to recur. In dealing with the state of the country, the hon. Minister stated that the depression is not as great amongst the cotton manufacturers as we assert, because they still earn fair profits and declare good dividends. Well, it is admitted that those dividends are vastly less than the dividends they have been declaring the past few years. But if they are now earning fair profits, what is to be said of the exorbitant profits they have been making the last four or five years? If now when their industry is admittedly depressed, they are earning fair profits, what exorbitant profits have they been wresting from the people of Canada, when protection was in full swing, and they received the full benefit of the taxes imposed? Why, Sir, if the profits are still fair, are they reducing production? Why are they dismissing their operatives? Is it fair to the workingman, if everybody is to be protected, to allow the employers, the moment they make less profits than usual, to "discontinue" their operatives for as long a time as they please? I do not think it is, if we are to have protection all round.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Discontinue the Government.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend near me suggests that the remedy would be to discontinue the Government. That is, no doubt, a solution that will come sooner or later. Sir, why is over-production an evil and a loss? Over-production means an unusually large production of articles of value, articles which go to form the wealth of a country. Why is an unusually large production of these articles a source of loss to the manufacturer, and a source of depression to the country? Why can we not sell those articles abroad and make a profit upon them? Why can we not show to the world at large that protection to Canadian manufacturers enables them to sell their goods abroad, and to compete with the foreign manufacturer in the foreign market?

Why can they not do that? Simply because the manufacturers cannot afford to do it; simply because the home production of our manufactures has been artificially stimulated, at an artificially high cost, and therefore they cannot sell their goods abroad at a remunerative price. They cannot even sell them abroad for what they cost to manufacture. The hon. gentleman tells us that so far from protection having enabled them to compete in a foreign market, and enabled us to establish an export trade, we are not yet enabled to compete with the foreign manufacturer in the home market. He says the protected industry of the production of pig iron could not exist, and could not compete with foreign competition, even in our home market, unless we gave it a bounty of so many dollars per ton in addition to the protection. Is he not crying down the credit of our iron and cotton manufacturers, and the credit of our country, when he tells the world that these industries are so feeble, so shaky, that they can only be kept up by bounties, and that they cannot compete with the foreign manufacturer even in the home market? I think he is. The cause of this depression has been already alluded to—it is due to the stimulation which preceded it. We all know as a matter of theory and as a matter of history in regard to other countries, that protection inevitably brings about over-stimulation and consequent over-production and consequent depression. We are now able to realize this fact in our own experience. We have been through two stages, over-stimulation and over-production; we have had the "boom" and the spree, and now we are suffering from the headache. The stimulation had exactly the same effects as a glass of brandy has on the nerves—stimulation for the time followed by depression next morning. The hon. gentleman proceeded to discuss the effects of the Tariff on different classes of the community. He said the Tariff had been on trial some years and had proved itself to be fair and equitable. Let me consider his arguments and proofs in this connection. He said, in the first place, that the taxation had been less on the average during those years than under the tariff of the late Government, because he said the foreign producer pays a large part of the duties. That is quite true under certain circumstances. When the foreign producer is afflicted with such a glut of merchandise as the Canadian manufacturers appear to be afflicted with at the present time, he may be willing to make such terms, to reduce his price sufficiently to enable the importers to pay the duty without loss—that is quite possible, and I believe many of the Canadian manufacturers would be glad just now to sell their goods to the United States on such terms. But the Finance Minister asked the House to believe that such has been the ordinary course of trade, that during good times, such as we have just experienced, the foreign producer of manufactured goods, especially the American producer, has been reducing his prices to Canadian importers to the extent of the duty; and in asking the House to accept that statement, he asks hon. members to believe more than even his own supporters can believe. The contention is so absurd that I cannot imagine the Finance Minister expects it to be taken seriously or as anything more than a jocular excuse for the taxation which he is imposing. The hon. gentleman made an average of the taxation imposed on the principle of deducting the surplus each year from the revenue of that year. He said that deducting the surplus, the rate of taxation was $4.82½ per head. But why deduct the surplus from the taxation? Has it not been paid by the people as much as the rest of the revenue? Were not the $8,000,000 which the hon. gentleman claims as last year's surplus, taken out of the pockets of the people as really as the money expended? The surplus must be considered in computing the taxation as much as any part of the revenue. If so, we must add to the taxation $8,000,000, which would show the amount of taxation per head last year to be $6.42, instead of $4.82½ as the hon. gentleman claims. The Finance Minister has taken great credit to himself because the Tariff has been a great source of revenue. I do not know that the hon. gentleman is entitled to such great credit, because he was able to raise a great revenue by high taxation; it does not require any great amount of financial genius to impose sufficient taxation to obtain a large revenue; but to such credit as attaches to that performance, he is entitled. He has obtained a tremendous amount, an exorbitant amount of revenue. He says he framed the Tariff so as to produce that. Let us look at his explanation in detail. He said:

"The Tariff had to be so framed that it would produce too much at first, in order that it might afterwards, when the importations are reduced in consequence of the increase of home manufactures, produce as much as the expenditure of the country required."

The hon. gentleman further said:

"Finding the Tariff continued for some years to produce a surplus they were able to remit $2,250,000 of taxation."

That is evidently an explanation after the fact. He did not make it when the Tariff was first proposed; it was intended to fit the fact, but it does so very clumsily. What are the circumstances of the case? In the first year of the National Policy, the Tariff produced a deficit. Every year afterwards it produced an increasing surplus, and the very largest surplus was produced in the year in which the hon. gentleman remitted $2,250,000 of taxation, as he himself claims. If he had foreseen the movements of the trade. If he had fitted the Tariff to meet them. If home manufacturers had reduced the importations, the results would be these. In the first year there would have been a large surplus, and it would have decreased year by year with the increase in home manufactures and increased imports until an equilibrium was reached. But the very opposite state of affairs has been produced. Consequently the hon. gentleman either did not frame his Tariff with that intention, or the results were exactly opposite from those which he expected. I do not think I need argue any longer to prove that he did not frame the Tariff with this intention, because the hon. gentleman himself admits that he did not know what the Tariff was going to do. He said:

"Even if we had known to what extent revenue would exceed expenditure, it would not have been good policy to keep it lower. By keeping it high we have been able to remit $2,250,000 of taxation on the necessities of life."

This is admirable. By his own figures we have had in those years a surplus of $20,000,000, which he reduces by $4,000,000 from the proceeds of western lands. We have his own admission that $16,000,000 have been taken unnecessarily from the people by the Tariff; but he says that by taking that amount he has been enabled to remit taxes. To remit taxes to what extent? To the extent of $2,250,000; that is to say, that he has been able to remit to the people about one-seventh of the amount of money which was unnecessarily taken from their pockets, and the Government have expended the other $13,750,000 which was unnecessarily taken out of the people's pockets, and out of the circulation and business of the country. But notwithstanding the fact that the surplus was so large last year, we find by the hon. gentleman's own statement that the revenue is now decreasing; and why? For the same reason that it was small in 1879, because the people are not well off and cannot import as much as usual and accordingly do not pay so much revenue. That is the reason why we had a deficit the first year of this Tariff, and the hon. gentleman's predictions were so far mistaken, because while that deficit was never expected, it was also never expected that we should have the surplus which has amazed the hon. gentleman so much. But we all know that the Tariff was not framed on this or any principle. We know that it was framed after private consultation and caucussing with the representatives of the different interests that were to be benefitted by the Tariff. We know that as far as possible the respective claims were balanced against each other, and the result was the Tariff. What I complain of is, that the present proposed changes have been made on the same principle, that they are the result of communications with parties to be benefitted. The detailed explanation given by the hon. Minister, will show this. He tells us that he has put on a certain tax because a certain interest has represented that it will be benefitted thereby; that he has put on a certain other one, because some manufactory of that description of goods is expected to start, and he has put on this tax in order to help them to go on. I say that the original tariff and the amendments which have been made to it from time to time, are just as much of the nature of private legislation as any Bills which are sent to the Private Bills Committee, or to the Railway Committee. The whole Tariff and all its amendments are a mass of private legislation, put together by the Government on the ex parte statements of the persons who are interested, without hearing any evidence as to the effect on other interests, without the check which is imposed by consideration in the Committee; and they bring them down to the House and ask their followers to put them through as Government measures when they are legislation of a wholly private and personal character, intended solely for the benefit of individuals and classes in this country. But, Sir, not content with this glorification of the Tariff as a revenue producing Tariff, the hon. gentleman says it is a grand protective Tariff which has really encouraged to a wonderful extent the home manufactures of the country. In proof of that statement the hon. gentleman tells us that two years ago a commission visited certain establishments—I think, so far as my knowledge of the establishments goes, in most cases, picked establishments, chosen for their prosperity and for their friendliness to the Government—he says that this commission visited such establishments and that they reported favourably as to the production of those manufactories, and the wages that were paid to the operatives. But this was two years ago; this was in the height of the boom, in the height of the good times; in a period when the fumes of the stimulant supplied by the National Policy were yet in the brains of the commercial world; before the period of depression and headache came on. No wonder this commission gave a good report two years ago, especially when we consider that the commission was appointed for the purpose of making a good report, and that it was likely to be faithful to its duty. But would the hon. gentleman like to send out such a commission now, to visit, for instance, the cotton operatives who are working on half time, to visit the soup kitchens, to compare notes with the men who are out of work in the different cities and question the starving immigrants? Would he be willing to publish as an official document a verbatim report of what was heard and seen on such a visit? Would he like, Sir, to issue a commission to find out how this Tariff protects the operatives, for he says it does protect them? He asked where they would have been now in the present depressed state of things if it were not for the National Policy? Still, he admits that the cotton mill-owners are allowed to discontinue their operatives whenever it suits them, in order to add to their profits, and I do not see where the National Policy protects them in that case. It does not prevent the operative being dismissed just as he used to be in the old days when the fly sat on the wheel. But does the workingman get any advantage in wages, seeing that he enjoys no fixity of tenure? No; the hon. gentleman says he does not, because he tells us that the wages of the cotton operatives and other operatives have had to be reduced on account of the reduction of wages in similar trades in the United States. He says the circulation of men between the two countries is so free that when the wages of men are reduced on the other side, they have to be reduced here also. I do not exactly see the force of his reasoning. I do not think the Canadian operative would be likely to migrate to the United States simply because the wages of workmen on the other side have been reduced. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Finance can explain the matter, but at all events he says the wages here have fallen to the rate paid in the United States. What good effect is the National Policy having on the wages of the operatives, if they are ruled now as they were before by the rate of wages in the United States? What has the National Policy done for the salary or recompense of the workman? I do not think the Minister could explain that point very satisfactorily. But there is a point which the hon. gentleman did not notice with regard to the protection which the National Policy affords to the workingmen; and that is that the inevitable effect of its operation is to produce at regular periods these crises, that state of things which leads the employer of workmen to discontinue his operatives, to give them a rest when they are over-worked; and so long as this protective policy continues, these crises will recur more frequently and more severely than under a freer system of trade. The operative will find that the only protection which the National Policy gives him is the protection from over-work, which it affords him by giving him regularly recurring periods of rest. But the hon. gentleman argues that it is not only the operatives who are reaping a benefit from the National Policy, but the consumers; because, he says, the consumer shares its benefits. And in what way does the consumer share? Because, he says, our manufacturers, having the market to themselves, can, and do, reduce the prices. The hon. gentleman shows a deep knowledge of human nature, and I am sure we can all agree with him in this, that the object of the manufacturers in seeking to obtain control of the market was simply to reduce the prices. It was for that reason that the manufacturers of the United States maintained that grip of the market which they have so long had—simply in order that they might be enabled to give the people goods at a cheaper rate than they could get them if they were allowed to buy freely from the foreign producers. These manufacturers cannot have had any desire to obtain increased profits for themselves by getting control of the market. The Finance Minister tells us that that cannot be the idea, that it was to benefit the consumer as well as the manufacturer that the home market was given, and that that benefit has followed. But leaving joking apart, laying aside the humorous style in which the Finance Minister has chosen to treat this subject, let us look at the facts. The fact is, that the reduced prices are consequent upon the glut of the market, produced by his protective policy, but these prices though no doubt referable to that policy, are merely temporary. They are certainly not constant. They began with the glut of the market which now exists; they are not consistent with profits to the manufacturers; the manufacturers are not selling at these reduced rates, with the expectation of making profits, but simply because they have stocks on hand, and will do anything to get the cash, and when the consumption has overtaken the production, they will sell at the old rates. The Minister of Finance tells us himself, that these manufacturers are "placing themselves in such a position that the reduction of prices will not occur again." He takes credit on the one hand for the reduction of the prices, and on the other hand he says that the manufacturers are taking steps to prevent such a reduction again taking place. I believe the hon. gentleman is right. He refers, no doubt, to the rings which have been formed by the manufacturers in the past and which were formed by the cotton spinners as we know, some weeks ago; by the producers of coal oil and countless other rings of that kind, of which we know nothing, but of which the Finance Minister no doubt knows. But suppose we give the National Policy all the credit for this temporary reduction; the benefit to the consumer is just about in the same proportion as the benefit which the hon. Finance Minister conferred on the tax-payers, by his remission of taxation. For four years we have paid unusually high prices for goods, and now that a season of depression occurs, the manufacturers have, like the Finance Minister, remitted a little of what they took from us, and the amount returned will be in about the same proportion to that which was formerly and unnecessarily taken away from us, as the remission by the Finance Minister was to the amount of needless taxation. In other words, perhaps about one-seventh of what we have overpaid will be returned to us. But it is distinctly untrue—I am sure the Minister will not assert it—that on an average during those last years, during the good times, goods have been cheaper than under the old tariff. That is not a question which requires argument, because there is no man who has had to buy any protected manufactures in that time who is not as well aware of the fact as I am. And now I come at last to consider the interests of a class of people with whom I am better acquainted than with the manufacturers and workingmen—I mean the farmers. What has been the effect on the farmers, not only of the Tariff, but of the general policy of the Government? The hon. Minister says that the farmer has no cause of complaint because his tea and coffee are cheaper, his cottons and woollens cheaper, and his agricultural implements cheaper than they were under a revenue tariff. Perhaps his tea and coffee are somewhat cheaper, but everybody knows what a small proportion tea and coffee, and sugar if you choose, bear to the general expenses of a farmer. But when the hon. Minister says that cottons and woollens are cheaper, we must take that statement with the reservation already referred to, that although they may be cheaper for the moment they have been on the average much higher than they were under the old tariff. With regard to agricultural implements, so far as the older Provinces are concerned, there has been no considerable importation for many years, and it is natural to suppose that the growth of competition and the improvement of machinery have somewhat reduced the price of these articles. No thanks to the National Policy if we have that reduction here. But can we believe that in Manitoba agricultural implements are cheaper than they would be without this Tariff? Last Session the Government increased the tax on agricultural implements for the express purpose of making them dearer in Manitoba. They increased the duty from 15 to 25 per cent., in order that the farmer of Manitoba should be compelled to pay more for his implements, and in order that the manufacturer of Ontario might obtain higher profits in Manitoba, and have the control of the market. But the farmers know that they have had to bear extra burdens during all these years that this policy has been in force. And I need not delay to discuss that any further. I come to ask what has been done for the farmers in return for bearing these burdens? Has anything been done to enhance the price of their produce? The hon. Minister of Finance states that at present the farmer has a protection of from 8 to 10 cents a bushel on wheat. He says he can prove that, but he did not attempt to do so. He states it oracularly, but he does not undertake to show in what way the farmer gets this protection. The crop in Canada this year is likely to fall short of the demand, and probably some time or other before the next harvest is gathered, there will be a rise in the price of wheat. But most of the farmers have sold their last year's wheat already; most of them sold it when the price of wheat was lower than it has been on the average—and the hon. gentleman is great on averages—during the years of our low tariff, when there was no duty on wheat at all. As much of that wheat as is in existence, and not ground into flour, is in the hands of speculators or millers, and if any rise in price takes place in consequence of the Tariff, it will be the speculator or the miller who will get all the benefit of that rise, and not the farmer. But if the Tariff increases the price of wheat, I would like to know how the farmer of Quebec, who has to import his wheat, likes that. An hon. gentleman from Quebec, who sits behind me, says they will not like it at all. But I have to remind that hon. gentleman and the Quebec farmers that they have a district pledge from the First Minister—given I think, when the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houdé) moved an amendment to the Tariff at its inception—that if at any time the crop of wheat in Canada should fall below the needs of the home consumption, and the Tariff should begin to operate so as to raise the price of wheat, the Government would either reduce or remove that tax. So that we in Ontario, who are wheat-producing farmers, stand face to face with this fact: that we have the pledge given by the First Minister to his Quebec supporters that if at any time that duty should begin to benefit us, it would either be reduced or removed. So much for the effect of his Tariff on wheat. In regard to wool, we are getting some benefits, it is claimed, because the manufacture of woollen goods has been stimulated by the Tariff; but the difficulty is that the kind of wool used for clothing is that known as short staple, which is not largely produced in Canada, while most farmers produce long wool, which is not much used in manufactures; and the Government gave what they pretend to be protection to the wool-growers by putting a duty on the long wool, which the Canadian farmer does produce, but which the Canadian manufacturer does not use, so that it cannot increase the price paid for it by the manufacturer to the farmer. We are told by the Finance Minister that the imports of wool in the last year of the old tariff were about 6½ million lbs., against about 9½ million lbs. last year. In other words, about 3½ million lbs. more untaxed foreign wool has come into competition with native wool during last year than during the last year under the old tariff. If that is encouragement to the wool-growers of this country, I do not know what encouragement is. We all know that the price of wool has averaged lower during all these years of protection than during any similar number of years before; and last year the lowest of all. In my part of Canada, the price of long staple wool of good quality was about 18 cents a pound, and I have yet to see any wool grower who is going to make a fortune at that price. Yet the hon. gentleman says that the farmer has nothing to complain of. He will not complain, I suppose, while the goods made from foreign grown wool and which he uses are taxed, and the wool he produces is not protected. He will not complain, I suppose, because foreign hides and pelts are allowed to come in free to compete with his hides and pelts in the home market, while boots and shoes are protected. He will not complain, I suppose, although according to the figures of the hon. Finance Minister himself, the importation of hides and pelts has increased by $700,000. Nor will it rouse any ill-feeling in the mind of the farmer when he finds that lumber for cabinet-making, such as black walnut, oak, and similar woods, are allowed to be imported duty free from the United States, while he is charged a heavy duty on the furniture made from these woods. I come from a part of the country where these fine woods form a considerable part of the wealth of the farmers, and I can assure the hon. Finance Minister that the farmers there do feel injured and insulted because their claims have been neglected in this way. These woods are allowed to come in free of duty, while the farmers are charged 35 per cent. on the furniture made from them. But the hon. Minister says that the increased cost of living in the country is largely owing to the increased price of farm produce. Well, I have just been pointing out that farm produce as a whole has not increased in average price—neither wheat, barley, oats, peas, nor most of the grain we produce—under the National Policy. One or two articles have increased in price. Beef has; but is that owing to the National Policy? I think not. What has the National Policy ever done for the export trade in beef? The price of butter has increased in certain neighbourhoods, as well as the price of cheese on account of the export trade and not because of the National Policy. It appears then that articles of farm produce whose price has increased during these years, have been articles for which the National Policy has done nothing, while those articles the National Policy pretended to protect have received no benefit whatever. I will pass to the effect on the farmer of the general policy of the Government. I would like to ask what the farmer of Ontario or Quebec has gained by the vast expenditures of public money in the past few years? Has he made anything out of the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway or out of the great expenditure on the Welland Canal? I am not attacking these works or saying they should not have been built, but I am simply asking what benefit the farmers of Ontario or Quebec have got from them. Not a dollar. The opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the enlargement of the canals have simply the effect of bringing new competitors against him in the foreign markets in which he has to sell his grain and other products. It has the effect of bringing the grain of the Western States and of our own western prairies into competition with the grain and other commodities of Ontario in the foreign markets. Does the farmer make anything out of the bounties given to the producers of iron? or out of the bounties to the fishermen? or out of the vastly increased expenditure on militia? I do not think he does, and I conclude that the farmer, though he contributes by far the largest part of the revenue of the country, has obtained very little, if any benefit, from the great expenditure of the Government during these years of prosperity, when they seem to have been trying their best to get rid of the embarrassing surplus they had on their hands. The Government think the farmer is a very long-suffering, quiet, easy-going creature, who may be made to pay everything and expect nothing. Perhaps the Government is right, but I find there is a spirit of organization and protest stirring amongst them. I need not go back more than a few days to give proof of this spirit. When the Provincial Grange of Ontario met in Toronto a few days ago they took into consideration the question of the subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway, then before this House, and although that body was composed of representative men from all parts of the Province and of all shades of politics, they came to a unanimous conclusion and passed a resolution asking the Government not to give that subsidy. That resolution was telegraphed at once to the leader of the Government. What notice do you suppose was taken of it? It was treated with silent contempt; it was not even alluded to by that hon. gentleman as evidence which ought to have any weight whatever on his opinion or on the decision of this House. When the Dominion Grange met two days ago in this city, a body composed of representative men of the whole Dominion, of all shades of politics, an address was delivered by the Master of that Grange, from which I shall quote a few extracts, because they are worth the serious attention of the House.

"The Grange is the only organized body of farmers in the Dominion, and although we are not a political organization, there are many public questions that are of great importance to us, and should receive our serious consideration and united action. Having been trained in different political schools we fall into line and divide our questions material to our interest. But I am sure that the acrimony and bitter partizan spirit exhibited by some of the leading newspapers is shared only by very few farmers of this country. It is the unquestionable right of every farmer to take a deep interest in all public matters and affiliate with which party he may think best, but the public welfare is of more importance than party success. Every farmer should thoroughly understand the questions relating to political economy."

Now we come to some references to the Tariff:

"Money or its equivalent must be raised for national as well as domestic purposes; Governments are sustained and public improvements paid for out of the surplus earnings of the people. The levying of contributions for Government purposes has been a vexed question at all times and with all nations; indirect taxation is only perfected when every individual and every industry bears an equal proportion of the taxes in accordance with their income. Under the present system adopted in this country, men worth $1,000,000 might pay less taxes than the average farmer; and some can make millions while the day labourer's family is in want."

We have striking instances of that.

"However much argument there may be (and I admit there is some) in fostering the industries of a young country like ours, it is very evident that the great leading industry in which we are engaged can be protected only to a very limited extent.

As I have shown, the Government has not even protected that interest to the extent to which it could be protected. He goes on to quote from an American authority:

"The Master of the National Grange of the United States (himself a protectionist) in discussing the tariff before that body, said: 'A high protective tariff which builds up monopolies by imposing burdens on the people at large is high-handed oppression.

How hon. gentlemen opposite have howled at different times when hon. members on this side said extreme protection was legalized robbery and high-handed oppression. Will they venture to treat with equal contempt this statement coming from two such high authorities as the master of the Dominion Grange of Canada, and the master of the American Grange?

"Next to production and taxation, the question of transportation to us, perhaps, is most important. With a water highway, stretching half way across the Dominion, our surplus production ought to find easy access to market. In my opinion it would be wise on the part of the Government to remove the tolls from the canals; an impulse thereby would be given to trade, and all classes would be benefited. Railways are indispensable to the prosperity of the country. Townships, counties and both Provincial and Dominion Governments have given money and lands liberally to secure railway accommodation and competition."

Then he goes on at some length to treat the question of the regulations of railways, urging on the Government that they should adopt a scheme similar to that proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) of a commission, which would see that the railways do not unduly favour one person at the expense of another.

"Powerful corporations have absorbed nearly all the railways in the Dominion, railway companies have great responsibilities and they should receive a fair remuneration for services performed by them, but the public should have a voice as to the value of those services. The price of our produce as well as that of our lands are subject to the control of the railway corporations. The public have rights that the railway companies should be bound to respect and they should not be allowed to ruin or enrich individuals at pleasure by unjust discrimination. All other classes except the farmers are organized and exercise the controlling power that follows associated efforts; while the majority of farmers stand aloof and although numerically strong, they receive but few appointments, wield but little influence and are treated as a nonentity."

I must say that I know this gentleman well, and that he is quite independent of party ties, and his utterances may be taken as impartial. I think the reception given by the Government to the remonstrance of the Provincial Grange, is about the strongest proof that could be given of the correctness of his last assertion in regard to the present Government. But indications show that the farmers are awakening to a sense of their position and that they will organize between now and the next elections; and the result will be to sweep out of existence all the petty rings and shoddy aristocracies, and those who have made themselves the tools and instruments of those rings and aristocracies in this House and the Cabinet. The farmers, at all events a section of them, have asked that their claims be considered in connection with the present change in the Tariff. The farmers of a whole Province and of the territories beyond that Province, have asked that a reduction be made in the Tariff on agricultural implements, and their demand has been treated with the utmost contempt. The hon. Finance Minister is too much occupied considering the question of soap grease, celluloid knife handles and coleothar, what ever that may be, and, as last year, sausage skins, to consider the question of relieving the farmer of part of his burden in Manitoba and the North-West Territories. There are signs, however, though invisible to the hon. gentleman, that he will receive a rude awakening from his opinion that the demands of the farmers of Manitoba and elsewhere are not worthy of consideration. To come to the general paragraphs of the hon. gentleman's speech, what remedy does he propose for the admitted depression of the country? What economy does he propose to exercise? What cautious action does he propose to take in view of the decreasing revenue? For the depression he has no remedy but the old one, to grin and bear it. When my hon. friend who sits in front of me was in office, and told the country he could do nothing to prevent or to relieve the depression which then existed, he was told he was a fly on the wheel. What shall we call the hon. the Finance Minister now? What shall we call him, when he proposes no remedy for the depression which exists to-day? Possibly we can find no better name for the present Government, than the name given to them in a campaign speech by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fairbank). He said that, if the late Government were flies on the wheel, the present Government were skippers in the cheese, and I think the comparison was not very far wrong. If the late Government did not pretend to control the movement of the great wheel of Providence, the great wheel of commercial action, this Government while revelling in all the richness derived from the Treasury cheese, do not pretend to be able, any more than their predecessors, to provide a remedy for the depression which they admit to exist. And as to economy. That is a joke, Mr. Speaker, to talk about economy. That is the last thing the hon. Minister seems to think of, and he expressly tells us that the existence of past surpluses, though they are fast diminishing, justifies him in asking Parliament for an unusually large vote for public works. He tells us the vote for public works will be larger this year than ever before, and he justifies that on the ground of the surplus. There might be some ground for this contention in the days when the surplus was annually increasing, in the days when the surplus grew so fast that the hon. gentleman did not know what to do with it; but now, in the face of a decreasing revenue, now when the surplus is vanishing before his eyes, and he scarcely dares to estimate a surplus at all for the approaching year, why does he go on in this course? Where will he be when the home production of which he speaks has decreased the surplus still further, and the revenue comes down to the point at which it was in 1879—and I see no reason why it should not at a very early day come down to that, for our taxes are no higher than they were then, and, if our people grow poorer, they will import no more than they did then. What will he do then, with the enormous expenditure and the expensive undertakings he will have on hand? This constant frittering away of the surplus has had at first sight the appearance of mere recklessness. But perhaps it has not been caused by pure recklessness. Perhaps it has been done with design. Indeed, it is hard to avoid the suspicion that the surplus was purposely got out of the way, in order that, when depression at last came upon us, as they knew it must, the Government might not be compelled, in view of the surplus remaining on hand, to reduce the high protective taxes to which they are bound hand and foot. I believe there is something in the suspicion that the intention of the Government to stick by their friends the manufacturers through good report and evil report is so strong that they would scarcely hesitate about adopting this means of getting rid of an argument which would otherwise involve a reduction in the Tariff. I admit that, at the present time, it is hard for them to economize. I admit that it is hard for them to see a way of doing without any of the revenue we at present receive. This policy of getting rid of the surplus from year to year, has been effective. Our masters of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and their loyal Minister the Minister of Railways, have ably assisted the Minister of Finance in getting rid of it, and we are now in such a position that we can scarcely do without any of the revenue derived from the Tariff, we are in such a position that we can scarcely see where to economize in our expenditure. Protection to one trade has compelled us to give bounties to another. Dissatisfaction in the gentleman's own ranks, caused by extravagance in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, has led him to try to allay that dissatisfaction by a further expenditure of public money in the Province of Quebec. One extravagance constantly leads to another. The monopoly which has been saddled upon Manitoba calls for some recompense to be given to that Province, and it will have to be a recompense in hard cash or a grant of public lands, or something of value given by the Dominion to that Province as a compensation for the monopoly imposed upon it. The Government is just in the same condition as an involved speculator—when he has got to the end of his tether; they have to throw good money after bad in the hope that they may save some little out of the wreck. He says the Opposition see no daylight in the outlook, and he blames us for that. I think we see daylight enough to show us the dangers that lie ahead of us, and to show us that these dangers are avoidable by the exercise of the most ordinary prudence and common sense on the part of the gentleman who pilots the ship of state. Seeing this, is it not our duty to point out those dangers, and to call for the exercise of that prudence? I think it is our duty to do it, though I fear the cry will be in vain. If the cry is in vain, if our warning is unheeded now, as the warning of my hon. friend the late Finance Minister was unheeded in 1873; I fear the result in the next few years will be as disastrous as it was in the years that followed that warning and its rejection; I fear the country will again find itself saddled with tremendous expenditures, laid upon it by hon. gentlemen opposite, without the means of meeting them. As far as the condition of the country goes at present, I claim that we have cause for anxiety, though not for panic. I do not know that with careful management we would have cause even for strong anxiety. We believe the resources of the country are greater than ever, we believe the common sense and prudence of the people are as great as ever, we believe that everything in the country itself is calculated to pull us through the coming crisis, but to do it safely we require a steady man at the helm. As I have used the comparison of the ship of state, I may as well stick to it. But the pilot of the ship, although the prow of the vessel is among the breakers, has no advice to give us except to crowd on still more sail, and to push on, no matter what rocks may be ahead of us, in the hope that, even if we strike the rocks, the impetus may carry us over into deep water beyond. I earnestly pray that such may be the result, and that the ship may get over safely, though strained and leaky in every seam, as she probably will be. But, when we see dangers and the man at the helm blind to them, have we not cause for fear? Must not that situation that, with ordinary care, need only give us ground for caution, give rise to the most serious apprehension of grave danger. Either the hon. gentleman does not see these dangers, does not know how to avoid them, or, knowing that the course is dangerous and that there are rocks ahead, is compelled by forces unseen to us but felt by him, forces outside of this House and outside of public opinion, to go on in the dangerous course which he has followed so far. When I opened my remarks I made a jocular comparison of the hon. Minister to Wiggins, the Canadian false prophet. Perhaps I was mistaken in comparing him to that great seer, for if the hon. gentleman does not see the dangers of his present position, and does not see whither we are driving, and believes his policy of reckless expenditure and heavy taxation will lead us into a port of safety, he is a more dangerous individual than any Wiggins, he is more dangerous than any dreaming star-gazer. He must be a fanatic, he must be an El Mahdi, he must be the false prophet of a false religion, who is leading his devotees who follow him so blindly to a yet unseen and a yet unmeasured abyss of ruin.

Mr. BENSON. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), in his comprehensive speech, left unnoticed one point to which I wish very briefly to allude. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his criticism of the Budget Speech, said :

"In England, as the hon. gentleman knows, or as he ought to know, care is taken to provide that every man who earns less than say $2.00 a day—less than about £150 a year—should be—except on his free will and proper motion—exempt from taxation; and it is one of the best features of the English system that it is so. Here our taxes are so arranged that they press more heavily on the men who are called upon to support their families out of their daily earnings than on any other class in the community."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman knows, or ought to know, that in England at the present time nearly $100,000,000 is collected annually from Customs duties, and unfortunately these press far more heavily upon the poor than upon the rich. On tea last year about $20,000,000 was collected at 6d. per lb., or about one-third its value. Tobacco produced about $43,000,000, or about three times its value. On coffee there is a duty of 14s. per cwt. when raw, and when kiln dried, ground or roasted, 2d. per lb.; while on cocoa there is 1d. per lb., so that while England taxes those things which she can not possibly produce, she leaves free to competition with the foreigner those articles which the poor man manufactures, every order given to the foreigner being one less to the British workman. While he is paying these heavy taxes and while these manufactures are admitted free, he pays as much on his coffee, tea, tobacco, or cocoa as the Duke of Westminster with his income of $10,000 per day. From the Excise, also, England derives $132,000,000; and surely the hon. member cannot deny that the poor man bears his share of this. So, I say, that although the poor man may escape a little direct taxation, he is still not only taxed but taxed, very heavily. I wish briefly to allude to another subject that has caused me great surprise since I came into this House. All the speakers on the Opposition side of the House seem to take it for granted that England's prosperity and the increase in her trade, which took place about thirty-five years ago, were somehow or other caused by Free Trade. Now the repeal of the corn laws at that time was a step quite consistent with our theory of protection, and quite consistent with the spirit of our National Policy; because, as neither England nor her Colonies could produce sufficient food for her consumption, what she admitted was tantamount to her raw material. But forasmuch as the repeal of the corn laws only cheapened the four pound loaf less than one-half penny, surely we cannot believe that less than one cent on four pounds of bread can make a difference between national prosperity and national adversity. The impetus given to the trade of England was caused by a series of wonderful discoveries and improvements in science and mechanics. For instance, the application of steam power to locomotion caused a rapid interchange of products between one part of the United Kingdom and another. The land was mapped out by the railways until they covered the country like a net work. The construction of these railways caused a great demand for iron, and a very great increase in the consumption of coal. The ocean became a commercial highway. Instead of having to trust to the uncertainty of wind, the power of steam carried British manufactures to foreign countries with celerity and despatch. Then between 1848 and 1850 gold was discovered in California. This caused an immense increase in trade, because at that time nearly the whole of America was supplied with British goods. Greater gold discoveries took place in Australia in 1854, and in New Zealand and other places in 1861. We heard comparatively little of those later gold discoveries, and yet, by the official returns, I find that £30,000,000 worth were discovered in New Zealand alone between 1861 and 1870. I might also allude to the electric telegraph and, as a sequence, our Atlantic cables. Then, in 1870, the application of the compound engine to ocean steamers reduced the consumption of coal to one-third, so that these steamers could make longer voyages, and freight was reduced to something like one-half. Now it would be strange, indeed, if the country having all these advantages did not progress, and England for a long time did progress, and progressed rapidly, notwithstanding Free Trade. So long as she was the workshop of the world she got on splendidly, but now that other nations have begun to manufacture, the whole thing seems to be changed. Had she exercised common sense and protected herself and her colonies from those nations that would not admit her manufactures free, she would have had a reciprocity with a great many of them that would have kept her trade to herself. But instead of that she neglected the substance for the shadow, and would worship mere theory. The consequence is that when she threw her ports open expecting that other nations would follow her example, instead of doing that they began to manufacture for themselves to such an extent that she is now losing her trade. For instance Coventry, that used to be a prosperous city, is now doing nothing; her glory has departed. In Macclesfield all the large mills are closed; and in Spitefields the only trade left is the manufacture of a little umbrella silk of the best quality. But I am glad to see, Mr. Speaker, there is yet left what Mr. Matthew Arnold would call a remnant. This remnant, seeing the error of the majority, are now clamouring for a return to protection under the name of fair trade, and though this agitation may only be in its infancy, though it may be only a cloud the size of a man's hand, yet I believe and trust it will spread and spread and grow and grow until it becomes a tempest which will hurl those theorists from their high places. I might say, in conclusion, that England with all thy faults I love thee still; but this makes me mourn and lament, that she has entrusted her destinies to a set of hot-headed enthusiasts who have led her, and are leading her, astray; and, therefore, instead of looking up to England as a great example we should follow, as hon. members here try to persuade us, we should look upon her as an awful example and avoid her errors and look to the promotion of our own interests while the opportunity is ours.

Mr. VAIL. If I were not one of the representatives of the Maritime Provinces, I would be disposed to allow the Resolutions to pass without saying a word; but if I were to remain silent, my silence might be construed into an admission that everything was satisfactory there, and that the protective policy of the present Government was quite suited to that section of the Dominion. I shall, therefore, ask the attention of the House for a very short time, while I explain why, in my opinion, this protective policy is not suited to a country situated as is the Province from which I come. I may be charged with being somewhat sectional in my opinion, and that my remarks would tend to show that I desire to throw discontent into those Provinces, and that they were not quite satisfied with their position in the Union. But that is not my desire. My desire at present is to point out to the Government of the day where I think they have made mistakes, and why the policy is not suited to our people; I wish to see all parts and sections and Provinces of this Dominion in a happy and prosperous condition. I say this much so that I may not be told hereafter that when I point out that the people of the Maritime Provinces are not fairly dealt with, I may not be accused of doing so in order to create discontent. Before we were confederated—and I say we have been unfairly treated, because of the information given and the statements made by gentlemen before the Union took place—we were told by the present Finance Minister, who was then a leading man in the Province of New Brunswick, that under no circumstances would the taxation of the country be increased beyond 15 per cent., that a 15 per cent. tariff would yield $15,000,000, and that would be ample for the requirements of the Dominion. This statement was followed up by that of the present hon. Minister of Railways, who was then leader of the Government of Nova Scotia. He did not go quite so far as the Finance Minister did at that time; but he led the people of Nova Scotia to suppose that after Confederation was accomplished, although the taxes might be increased to some extent, they would be kept within a reasonable limit, and that the taxation of the country would not amount to very much beyond what the Province was paying at that time. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression, as were a great many others, that as the tariff in old Canada had been reduced from 20 per cent. to 15 per cent., it was very probable after Confederation, having a larger country, it would not be necessary to increase the rate beyond 15 per cent. But I am led to believe that the reduction was only made with a view of bringing into Confederation the smaller Provinces that were then very lightly taxed. In this connection I will trouble the House by reading a small portion of a speech delivered by the present hon. First Minister at Parkhill, in Ontario. I suppose when he had been speaking of the protective policy he had been charged with having at one time been opposed to such a step, because he had reduced the tariff of old Canada from 20 per cent. to 15 per cent. At that meeting the hon. gentleman said, in reference to reducing the tariff prior to Confederation:

"But there was another reason—the Government were anxious to bring Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into Confederation. They found it was absolutely necessary for the good of the country that instead of consisting of several scattered Provinces we should be one great Dominion, and a source of strength instead of weakness to the Empire. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had been accustomed to a much lighter taxation than the people of Canada, and therefore in order to induce them to come in, the duty was settled at 15 per cent. Again he said the duty was reduced, because they wished the people of Nova Scotia to join the Confederation, and because they could reduce the tariff without injuring any industry in our country."

It appears that if such was the opinion of the hon. gentleman at that time; he certainly must have changed his opinion since, if it was now necessary to increase the Tariff for the protection of certain industries in the Dominion. For the information of a number of hon. members who have not visited Nova Scotia and do not know much about our position, I may say we have a coast line of 600 or 700 miles, where the harbours are open and easy of access in winter as well as in summer. Our Province is peopled by those engaged in trade and commerce, by lumbermen, fishermen, shipbuilders, seamen, and by those engaged to a limited extent in the few manufactures we have, and also by a few agriculturists. It will easily be seen by hon. gentlemen that a country of that character does not produce or grow anything that the upper Provinces require, and consequently we are obliged as a maritime people to look outside the Dominion for a market for almost everything we grow, produce or manufacture, I qualify that statement to a certain extent, because a portion of the coal we raise in Nova Scotia finds a market in Quebec or Montreal, and it is just possible that some of the sugar now manufactured in Halifax, finds a market in the Upper Provinces; but, with the exception of those two articles, nothing we produce finds a market in the western Provinces. Even the fish which we should like to send west we are prevented from sending on account of the increased freight as compared with the transportation from ports in the United States. Fish which costs 17 cents per 100 lbs., from Boston or Portland to Western Ontario, costs 28 or 30 cents per 100 lbs., from the Maritime Provinces. It is therefore impossible for our people to compete with the Americans in that market, which would otherwise be open to us in the west. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to show the effect of the Tariff in regard to the taxation in Nova Scotia as compared with the taxation previous to Confederation. The Blue Books are very deceptive in this particular, and are in fact no guide at all as to the taxation which this protective policy has brought on the country. I have prepared a table which I think will show, as nearly as possible, what the people of Nova Scotia now pay as compared with what they paid formerly; and I think the hon. Finance Minister will agree with me that it is a fair comparative statement. In 1866 the population of Nova Scotia was, as near as may be—because we have the population of 1861, and we have the population of 1871, and I have taken a fair increase upon that of 1861—the population of Nova Scotia in 1866 was, I say, 355,000. Goods entered for consumption which we imported in that year amounted to a little over $13,000,000, which would be equal to about $37 per head of the population. In 1862-83 the population was, say, 441,000, and on this number, at $37 per head as in 1866, the value of dutiable goods consumed in Nova Scotia at the present time, would be $16,317,000. Now, Sir, the Province of Nova Scotia only imported of dutiable goods last year to the value of $6,550,887 by the trade returns, and the duty collected, according to the trade returns, amounted to $1,833,470. Now if Nova Scotia paid $1,833,470 on an importation of $6,550,887, the same rate of duty on the goods actually consumed, that is, $16,317,000, would amount to, $4,568,760. To this we must add the amount collected by Excise, $262,231, making a total of $4,830,991. It may be said that the people of Nova Scotia, having used the manufactured goods of the Upper Provinces, have got them at a little less rate. I doubt if that argument holds good. I find that in all cases where importations were made either of dry goods or flour or anything else from the Upper Provinces, they come into the Maritime Provinces just a shade lower than the imported goods. The millers of the Upper Provinces have their prices current from New York every day, and they know exactly what flour can be delivered at in the Maritime Provinces, duty paid, and, of course, they put their flour at about 10 cents per barrel cheaper at Halifax or any other port, so that if the consumer does not pay the whole 50 cents per barrel on flour, he pays 40 cents. So in order that hon. gentlemen opposite may not have any cause to find fault I have taken off 5 per cent. on the difference between our importation last year and our consumption. This difference amounts to $448,305, thus bringing the actual taxation down to $4,382,685, instead of $1,833,470, as shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns. Take this $4,382,685, and compare it with the amount of taxation in Nova Scotia in 1866, which was $1,229,504, and we have a difference of $3,153,182 between the amount paid by Nova Scotia at that time and the amount paid at the present time. This is a statement which if hon. gentlemen opposite will look into, I think they will make up their minds is a fair statement of our taxation. Now, Sir, it is a remarkable thing that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are charged with having changed their views. The Finance Minister himself the other day referred to a speech made by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) a year or two ago, and he undertook to say that there was some inconsistency between the views of that hon. gentleman at that time and the views which he now entertains. Now, I do not think that the hon. gentleman who occupy the Treasury benches at the present time are themselves altogether free from charges of that kind. We will take for instance a gentleman who has been in the Cabinet only two or three years, but who is a man of great weight in the Government, and one whose views ought to be respected by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us see what Senator Macpherson said at one time in reference to the taxation of the country and how it affected the several Provinces of the Dominion. It was at a time when the people engaged in the salt industry in the Upper Province were desirous of getting some assistance from the Government, by way of bounty or otherwise, and on that occasion the hon. gentleman made the following remarks:—

"He believed it to be exceedingly unsound to impose a duty on coal or breadstuffs, or any natural products that were now free. If it had been the object to devise a Tariff that would set one Province against another, that would create and perpetuate sectional jealousies and antipathies, the Government had certainly succeeded. Breadstuffs were to be taxed in order to please the Province of Ontario, but he believed it was great injustice to the agriculturists of Ontario to suppose that they were prepared to accept such a Tariff or that it would be a protection to them. The market where their surplus produce was disposed of fixed the price of the whole, and the duty could not be any positive advantage so far as the price of breadstuffs was concerned. Then the duty would be a great obstruction to trade throughout the country, which should, according to the true principles of commerce, be left as unrestricted as possible. Not only would the Tariff be worthless to Ontario, but it would be most burdensome to other sections—to the fishermen and the great masses of the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as well as Quebec; for it was a well known fact that a large quantity of breadstuffs was yearly taken into the latter Province from the United States. Then, as a part of this great 'National Policy' a duty was imposed on foreign coal as a means of propitiating the people of Nova Scotia. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec were taxed to satisfy Ontario—Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick were taxed to please a minority in Nova Scotia. Nothing could be more calculated to create dissension and disturb the harmonious working of Confederation than this legislation. * * * He believed that a protective duty was unjust and could not be supported on true principles. * * * Was the House ready to subsidise every little enterprise that might be established in this country without reference to the masses of the people? The whole amount of capital invested in the salt interest in Goderich could not exceed $100,000; and if it was the wish of the Government to encourage that interest artificially, it was better to give it a direct subsidy than to increase the cost of the article by a tax on the consumers. The same argument would apply to the coal of Nova Scotia. If it was the intention to encourage monopolists at the expense of the people, then let it be done directly out of the Consolidated Fund, and we would soon know what it cost."

Well, we find that Senator Macpherson has changed his views and is now a member of a Government who seem to think that no policy is so suitable to this country as the high protective policy inaugurated a few years ago. What I am about to read now is the opinion of another gentleman who now happens to be a member of the Government. It will be remembered that when my hon. friend from South Huron made his Budget speech in 1875, he announced that it was the policy of the Government at that time to raise the tariff from 15 per cent. to 17½ per cent.; and after my hon. friend had concluded his speech, the hon. Minister of Railways, then in opposition, immediately arose, and delivered a speech in which he made this observation:

"I fear that the hon. Minister is seeking to introduce the thin edge of the protection wedge, which will eventually work ruin and desolation to the Maritime Provinces. Let the hon. Minister look at the neighboring Republic, and he would find that the policy of that country had swept their flag off the seas and given to others the carrying trade of the world. He (Mr. Cartwright) says we have a surplus of half a million. I say the Government have no right to have a surplus. If they have a surplus they should endeavour to get rid of it, and the best way to do so is that pursued by us and by the Government of Great Britain, by lightening the taxes on the people."

If that was the opinion of Sir Charles Tupper at that time, he has certainly changed his views on the trade question since. Another hon. gentleman who seems to be very much in favor of this protective policy, and who spoke the night before last, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) formerly held different views; and although my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) referred to it, I may just repeat what he said:

"A fifteen per cent. tariff means more than fifteen per cent. protection to manufacturers. There is the cost of transport of goods from the other side of the water, which amounts, on an average, to at least five per cent., so that there is now a protection equal to twenty per cent. That ought to be sufficient for any industry suited to the country, and as to others it would be unwise to attempt to sustain them by fiscal props."

So, it seems that Mr. White, who is supporting the Government in their fiscal policy, has somewhat changed his views on that question. Then, another hon. gentleman who was closely allied to the Government, the ex-High Commissioner, since the introduction of this protective policy, and has stood as a sort of godfather to it. He made speeches on the other side of the water to show that a protective policy was suited to the Dominion of Canada; that, in fact, the great object of a protective policy was to reduce the importations from the United States and to increase the importations from England; and that, therefore, it was a policy that England, at all events, had no reason to find fault with. Well, I happen to have an extract from a speech delivered by that hon. gentleman in the Montreal Chamber of Commerce a short time before he was appointed High Commissioner, in which he said:

"I do not believe it is possible to develop manufactures on any large scale by high duties. Our market is too limited, we have only four millions of people to supply, and it must be perfectly clear that the result of high duties would be to create an artificial industry, which does not rest on its own intrinsic merits. It is to be observed that protection, high duties, enhance the cost of every other article as well as that in which a particular manufacturer may be interested. It renders it more expensive for every manufacturer to manufacture his goods. If everything the boot and shoe maker uses is protected by high duties, it is evident that his goods must be dearer. The result would, consequently, be that the exportation of our surplus goods to foreign countries would become absolutely impossible. We cannot have an export trade if our goods are artificially made dear in this country. We have in the United States a most complete example of that."

Now, Sir, having shown that hon. gentlemen opposite have somewhat changed their views in regard to the protective policy, I desire to show that the Province of Nova Scotia was led to believe that the taxation would not be increased. Certain speeches were made in 1878, and before that time, which led the country to suppose that there was no intention, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, to impose increased taxation on the country, but that their object was to readjust the Tariff without increasing the taxation. The hon. Minister of Finance, in a speech delivered in St. John, N.B., made use of this language:

"I am now going to touch upon a delicate question, and I am well aware that I will be held responsible in Parliament for any expression of opinion that I may now give. If I had been in Parliament I would not have voted for increasing the duty on the non-enumerated articles from 15 per cent. to 17½. The Government supporters have been spreading the report all through the Dominion that the policy of Sir John A. Macdonald and his followers is to increase the taxes of the country. It has been stated that Sir John even named the rate to which he proposed to increase the tariff at 35 per cent. No such idea entered into his head, or any of his followers. The tariff is always governed by the necessities of the country. It requires about $13,000,000 yearly from Customs duties and $5,000,000 from Excise to carry on the ordinary public services of the country. How best and most judiciously to levy this is the question for the Government of the day to consider. I do not think this amount is equitably levied at present, and, therefore, I am in favour of a readjustment of the tariff which will render the tax equitable to all classes of the people throughout the Dominion. But this word readjustment does not suit our opponent. If you support the Opposition, they say, you will vote for increased taxation. This cry that is now raised about increased taxation reminds me of an incident which occurred during the Confederation campaign. A gentleman who was opposed to Confederation went into a house during his canvass and putting a fine boy on the head said: 'You do not wish this boy to go to fight the battles of Canada?' That settled the matter. We want no increased taxation, but we do want the taxes properly imposed."

"He would now come to the question of taxation, which was an important one in the present election. If a supporter of his was met by a Government man, he was told that the Opposition proposed putting a duty on flour, coal, &c., and increasing taxation greatly. When Mr. Burpee made the assertion that he (the speaker) was in favour of a reciprocal tariff with the United States, Mr. Burpee stated what he had no right to say, as he (the speaker) had never made any statement of the kind. Had the Government of which he is a member been in power during the last five years, he was satisfied the average expenditure would not have exceeded $22,500,000, whereas it had reached $24,000,000. It would have been the duty of the Government, before levying additional taxation, to have ascertained what reduction could be made in the expenditure, and had the present Government acted on this principle, they would have only been carrying out their declared policy while in Opposition; but they took no such course, and abandoned another plank in their platform. In fact, instead of decreasing, they largely increased the expenditure, for which they are justly censurable."

That was taken from the speech delivered by the hon. Finance Minister in St. John, N.B., in 1878. Now, in 1878 the hon. Minister of Railways made a speech in this House, and a portion of that speech was published in Nova Scotia. It was printed in capital letters in the organ of the Dominion Government, the Halifax Herald, and sent broadcast over the country to show there was no intention on the part of the then Opposition, if they came into power, of increasing the taxation of the country. He said:

"I trust I have satisfied the House that it is not a question of high or low taxation any further than this, that inasmuch as we governed the country with a small taxation, and inasmuch as we are prepared to govern the country again without those extravagant expenditures made by the present Government since they have been entrusted with power; all we ask is not that the taxation of the people shall be increased because we do not require so much money as the hon. gentleman opposite, as we have shown by our economy in the past, and which we are prepared to practice in the future."

I think that I have shown plainly that the utterances of the hon. gentlemen opposite in 1865, 1866 and 1878 were calculated, at all events, to deceive the people of the Maritime Provinces, if the people of the Upper Provinces were not deceived. I may be told, but you have had an election since and Nova Scotia has returned a majority of supporters of the Government. Well my answer to that, is that, in the first place, the people of Nova Scotia did not believe, they could not be made to believe, we were going to have an election at all, until the House was prorogued, and the Government, even in the speech proroguing Parliament, made a statement that was calculated to deceive the country. They said that they had information that millions of dollars were already on the other side of the line, or in foreign countries to be expended in the Dominion in the erection of factories, but that these people did not feel disposed to invest their capital until this question was settled for another five years, and therefore the Government dissolved the House a year before the regular term expired. The people were taken by surprise. It happened to be a time when business was in a healthy state, everybody's attention seemed to be turned to making money, and it was very difficult to get them to leave their business and turn their attention to politics. Therefore, I do not believe that the test then taken of public opinion was a fair test at all. I may be told, but there have been two elections in Nova Scotia since. There are however reasons why those elections resulted in favor of the Government which it is not necessary now for me to mention. They are well known in the Maritime Provinces. The hon. member for Halifax knows why these elections resulted in the return of gentlemen supporting the Government. I am justified in saying, therefore, that in the present state of things, Nova Scotia has good cause to complain that the people are taxed to this extent. The amount of taxation is not known to the people, and fortunately for them it is not. I may be told, as I was told last year, that I am trying to make out Nova Scotia to be the poorhouse of the Dominion. Not so; Nova Scotia, considering her area, population, and resources, is equal to any Province of the Dominion in wealth and enterprise. Her industries are so varied that it is impossible for this or any other Government to tax her to such an extent that the people will not be still in a moderately prosperous state, because if one industry fails we have another to fall back upon, and I therefore look upon Nova Scotia as one of the safest Provinces in which a man can invest his capital and enter into business. But, I say, if the present Government had put their heads together in order to devise the most effective means by which they could restrict the trade of a Province situated as Nova Scotia is, they could not have done it more effectually than they have in their present trade policy. It may be said that the coal interest of Nova Scotia has been protected to some extent. I admit that, but I am prepared to show that if the coal interest has been protected by a duty on American coal, that duty has tended more to prevent English coal going to Montreal than to keep out American coal. The effect of the increased duty has been to keep out English coal; and Nova Scotia coal, therefore, has come into competition with the English instead of the American coal. I think I will be able to convince the House that the Nova Scotia coal interest has not derived very great advantage from the protective policy. I hold a copy of a letter written by a gentleman who is very well known in Nova Scotia as an authority on coal matters, and who at one time was appointed by the coal owners there to come to Ottawa to interview the Government in connection with the duty on coal. I refer to Mr. J. R. Lithrow, well known all over Nova Scotia, as being largely interested in coal mines. This is a letter which was addressed to the North Sydney Herald. After attempting to show that the 50 cents per ton duty on coal was by no means a protective tariff, after showing that the coal owners would be worse off under a 50 cents duty with our protective policy than under the old trade policy with no duty at all, he proceeds to say:

"But again, along with a moderate revenue duty on coal and coke have come greatly increased duties on colliery plant and materials. For example, wire rope—free for ships—for mines, 25 per cent.; iron which formerly paid 5 per cent. pays 17½ per cent.; castings of all kinds, 17½ per cent., now pay 25 per cent.; rails formerly free, now pay 15 per cent.; engines, boilers, steam pumps, car wheels and axles, and leather belting and hose, formerly paying 17½ per cent., now pay 25 per cent.; bolts, washers and rivets, formerly 17½ now pay 30 per cent.; nuts pay 1 cent per pound and 10 per cent.; horse-shoe nails and hardware generally, formerly 17½ per cent., now pay 30 per cent.; fire brick hitherto free, now pays 20 per cent.; miners powder formerly paid 17½ per cent., now pays 3 cents per lb., equal to 30 per cent.; dynamite and other blasting material pay 5 cent per lb. and 20 per cent.; they formerly paid 17½ per cent.; India rubber and packing for engines, etc., now pay 7½ per cent more than before; picks, shovels, riddles, screws, lamps, olive, linseed, lard and other oils, also paints, pay from 2½ to 7½ per cent more than formerly; screws pay 35 per cent. just double the old duty. In short, anyone acquainted with the wants of a colliery in Nova Scotia will tell you that the new Tariff about doubles the duties payable under the old Tariff, and that the duty now imposed on colliery plant and supplies, average more than the duty levied on coal and coke. If the House of Commons and Senate now in Session could visit the Pictou and Cape Breton collieries and see the deep pits out of which the coal is raised and rivers of water pumped day and night; the great engines, pumps hoisting apparatus, railroads and coal waggons, etc., etc. under and above ground in a well equipped colliery, they would not be surprised, at no money being made out of $1.50 per ton of screened coal, considering the royalty payable to the Province and the from 17½ to 35 per cent. duties levied on the numerous articles in continual use. Sir, when I think of how the National Policy—"

This is a strong supporter of the Government; he has been, and is at the present day. He says:

"Sir, when I think of how the National Policy proposed to foster our mining interests, of how Mr. Tilley proposed to impose such duties as would give to home industry the home market, and then think of what it and he has done for our coal mines I—well, better not swell my feelings lest the Pallistines will rejoice—"

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). May I ask what the date of that letter is?

Mr. VAIL. I will give you the date in a few minutes.

"My conviction is the Cape Breton collieries are much worse off under the new, than they were under the old Tariff. They cannot now get any more for their coal; they cannot now put their coal into Ontario and they have now to pay about twice as much duty as before. Messrs. Redpath and Drummond, I will venture to say, will make more profit within one year under the new Tariff, than all the Cape Breton collieries will under ten years, say, or fifty years protection the new Tariff affords them—"

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Do you want the duty taken off?

Mr. VAIL. Yes, off imported articles.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Off coal?

Mr. VAIL. Not off coal.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He says he would be better without it.

Mr. VAIL. The letter goes on:

"The Tariff and reciprocity disheartens coal owners, and that those who have anything to invest cannot be expected to sacrifice their means in preparations for a trade, which in a year or two may be non est. I know how a permanent coal trade between Ontario and Cape Breton could be established, but I will not add more to this already too long letter."

That is dated Halifax, April 17th, 1879—after the protective policy was introduced—and it was printed in the Halifax Herald. It was said that the great object of the protective policy was to assist our struggling industries. Well, I cannot see, for my own part, that the struggling industries have been helped in the slightest degree. It is true that the protective policy has led to increased manufactures in some parts, and there are more running now than in 1878, but I think, when we find that the cotton stocks, for instance—and that industry has been more benefited than any other industry by this policy—are worth now about 60 per cent. of the par value; and they were, even under the old trade policy of the Government of the member for East York, worth from 80 to par, that it will be easily seen that the cotton industry has not been very much benefited. While on that question, I would refer to a remark made by the member for Cardwell in regard to the prices for cotton. I think it was unfair on the part of that hon. gentleman to compare the prices in the United States with the prices in the Dominion last year. Everyone knows that last year there was a surplus quantity of cotton lying in the manufactories in this country, and that in the Maritime Provinces the agents were offering to sell cotton goods, delivered last autumn, and consider them as being delivered in the spring of this year, in order to get them off their hands. It will thus be seen that the over-production and the quantity they had on hand made a competition which reduced the value of cotton very much lower than it had been, and it was therefore an unfair thing to take the price last year and compare it with the price in the United States. I say the cotton industry was the only industry that could be benefited to any extent by this protective policy, and I have shown you the effects of it. It may be said that we have in the city of Halifax a sugar refinery or two, and a cotton industry, which were started there a little while ago. But, Sir, when I tell the House that the sugar refinery has been in operation for three years, and the stock of the cotton factory and the sugar refinery is owned by the people of Halifax, who have been subjected to $30,000 a year loss of interest for three years, in order to have those two manufactories running there, they will agree with me that they have not been much advantaged to the stockholders.

Mr. TUPPER. How about monopoly?

Mr. VAIL. There is not much monopoly about that.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). What becomes of the sugar nabobs?

Mr. VAIL. I will tell you where a monopoly comes in. The matter was brought to my mind the other night by a remark of the hon. member for Cardwell, when he talked about making the Dominion a slaughter market for the United States. I contend that, in many instances, the Province of Nova Scotia is made the slaughter market for the Upper Provinces, and my hon. friend, the member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) knows this; and I do not think he will contradict me, that it is the rule of one of the manufacturers of Montreal, who manufactures manilla cordage, to give instructions to his agents that they are to sell his cordage in Halifax a quarter per cent. below what Mr. Stairs can sell his cordage for. That is where the monopoly comes in.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. VAIL. What is the cheering about, I should like to know? I suppose the gentlemen will tell me that the people get their cordage cheaper?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. VAIL. But they say that people are not benefited by that, but by the high price and a high Tariff, and that, because they have certain manufactures in the country, and they are taxed for it, it is really a benefit to them. It has been a benefit in this way, to the people of Nova Scotia: The Government increased the duty on cordage last year, and therefore the people have had the price of cordage increased by this protective policy beyond what it was a few years ago.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. VAIL. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out that while the policy of the Government was calculated to increase the price of goods consumed, it is not much advantage after all to the smaller manufacturers in the Maritime Provinces, inasmuch as the older Provinces, with a larger market, could undersell them by a small percentage in certain manufactured goods, and I instanced the article of cordage amongst others. It will be remembered that last year the Government increased the duty on cordage from 15 to, I think, 20 per cent. and of course that was done in the interests of the manufacturers. This year that seems to have been further increased by instructions from the Department of Customs. I have here a copy of an order that was issued on the 1st of February, 1884, and I suppose it is pretty much a copy of the instructions that have been issued from time to time to the collectors in the several Provinces. They have put Manilla rope, when imported from the United States, at from 15 to 15½ and 16 cents per lb.; while it is very well known that manilla rope can be purchased, and has been purchased, recently in the United States, at 10½ cents. I have in my possession a letter written by a gentleman in Halifax the other day, in which he complains of this matter, and he asked me to see the Minister of Customs on the subject. He complains that when he makes a purchase of cordage in the United States at 10½ cents per lb., he is required to enter it in the Custom House at Halifax at 15½ and 16 cents, which was about 5 cents higher than the actual cost. So that, in the first place, the Government increased the duty on cordage, and now they oblige the importers of that article to enter it at 50 per cent. more than its real cost, and that of course enables the manufacturers to put their prices up and take an additional amount of money out of the consumer. It is quite true that the Montreal people have been selling at a small percentage under the price of the manufacturers at Halifax; but after all, when you take into consideration the increased duty, and the increased duty on account of the increased price that the importer is obliged to enter it at, the consumer has to pay a very high price. I wish now to pass on to another subject. I was referring to the coal industry and some other industries in Nova Scotia. I know that when some hon. gentlemen opposite come to reply to me they will say: "Oh, well, if the people of Nova Scotia, especially the fishermen, have been obliged pay an increased price for their goods, they have received an offset in the way of the bounty paid to the fishermen." Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that they ought to be under any obligations to the Government for having granted $150,000 to the fishermen of the Dominion, when in reality the Government was in duty bound to give them the interest on the whole amount of the Fishery Award, which would be about $240,000 or $250,000; so that they are really getting $100,000 less than they are entitled to. I consider that the interest of the Fishery Award really belongs to the fishermen of the Dominion. Now, Sir, if the fishermen did derive some little advantage from that bounty, when I come to tell the House that last year the people of Nova Scotia paid a duty on breadstuffs—and that is largely paid by the fishermen of the Province—of no less than $71,000, it will be evident that the advantage derived from the bounty is very much lessened by this tax. This duty on breadstuffs is largely paid on corn meal, and I think the amount paid on corn and corn meal is $40,000, which is largely paid by the fishermen. Therefore, I say I do not think the fishermen need be under any obligation to the Government for the small amount of their own money that they have received back in the way of a bounty. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in reference to the position of the Provinces, as compared with what it was when they entered the Union. In the first place, I believe it will be admitted by all who are acquainted with the conditions of Union, that when the Lower Provinces entered Confederation they did so on the understanding that the Tariff would be 15 per cent.—probably not any higher; and the amount of money that they were to be paid out of the public funds annually after Confederation, and to be used for Provincial purposes, was based upon that 15 per cent. tariff, and each Province was allowed 80 cents per head on the population. Now, if that be correct—and I hold that it is, because it would be unreasonable to suppose that the smaller Provinces would have been willing to cast in their lot with the larger Provinces had they imagined that they were to give up everything, including the right to tax the people to any sum the Dominion thought proper, for there is no other means of raising a revenue left the Provinces but the right to impose direct taxation. The Lower Provinces have no revenue from licenses to sell liquor or from any other licenses, as the Upper Provinces have; they have no other means in the world of increasing their revenue except by direct taxation. Therefore, they were called upon to give up a great deal, and it is reasonable to suppose that if they had been under the impression that they would be called upon to pay a higher duty than 15 per cent., they would not have been willing to enter Confederation. Now, Sir, the Government have gone on increasing the duty from 15 per cent. to 35, 40, and, in some cases, to 60 per cent. Now, it would appear that the smaller Provinces, which are in very straightened difficulties at the present time, have a fair claim upon the Dominion for an increased subsidy, somewhat in comparison with the increase in the Tariff. I mention this because I see some of the Provinces are intending to ask the Government for better terms, and I hope the Government will take this matter into consideration and give them what they are fairly entitled to. They do not ask anything to which they are not fairly entitled, or to which any other Province would not be fairly entitled under the same circumstances; but at the same time, the Government will agree with me that the smaller Provinces are entitled to something in the shape of additional subsidy as compensation for the increased amount taken from them by the increase in the Tariff. Before you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I referred to what had been said from time to time in Nova Scotia, and to some extent in New Brunswick, in regard to the increase in the Tariff, and I am sure there is one hon. gentleman in the Cabinet who will fully agree with me and will endorse what I have said—I refer to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Perhaps no hon. member in this House is in a better position to point out what the great increase in taxation to Nova Scotia is at the present time, and there was no man prior to Confederation who more eloquently or more loudly pointed out the great risk which Nova Scotia was running in entering the Confederation than that hon. gentleman who is now a member of the Government. He pointed out to the House of Assembly at that time, and to the then leader of the Government, Sir Charles Tupper, that Confederation meant increased taxation, and it was folly for him to intimate that their taxes would not be largely increased, that it must be necessarily so, and he warned the people against taking that step. The present Minister of Railways, in replying to the hon. gentleman said that this cry was raised only to frighten the House of Assembly and the people and induce them to reject the Union Resolutions. If the hon. gentleman will turn back in his memory to those speeches delivered in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly, he must concur in the opinions which I have set forth. I now pass on to another question, and will consider the position of that industry. The object of the protective policy was stated to be, at the time it was inaugurated, to encourage the struggling industries of this country. I think I have shown that, with the exception of the cotton industry, it has not been of much benefit to any other industry. There is a very important industry that I think has been neglected, and it is one which has suffered more than any other from the introduction of the protective policy—I refer to the lumber industry. I was myself not aware of the magnitude of this business until my attention was called to it a short time ago and some figures given to me, which I looked over very carefully revised and extended, to show the position which this industry occupied in comparison with other industries in the Dominion. The following comparative statement will show the exaction of the Tariff, as bearing on the lumbering interests of the Dominion, for the years 1878 and 1883, respectively:—

Articles.	1878.	1883.
Steam engines and boilers, machinery and water wheels, mill saws and files, machinery oil.....	17½ per ct.	25 per ct.
Steel, for shoeing sleds and for hand-spikes and peevies.....	Free.	$5 per ton.
Chains.....	Free.	5 per ct.
Harness and boots.....	17½ per ct.	25 per ct.
Hay.....	10 per ct.	20 per ct.
Woolen clothing.....	17½ per ct.	10c. p. yd. & 25c. p. ad valorem.
Duck, for jumpers and overalls.....	17½ per ct.	2c. p. yd. & 15c. p. ad valorem.
Pork and beef.....	1c. per lb.	1c. per lb.
Oats.....	Free.	10c. per bus.
Cornmeal.....	"	40c. per bbl.
Wheat flour.....	"	50c. per bbl.
Beans.....	"	15c. per bus.
Butter.....	4c. per lb.	4c. per lb.
Lard.....	1c. per lb.	2c. per lb.
Axes.....	17½ per ct.	30 per ct.

It will thus be seen that our present Customs Tariff, with the exception of tea and molasses, bears very heavily on the lumbering industry, while we admit woods of foreign countries free of duty into Canada, in competition with those of our forest. The gross value of the forest for the year ending April 4th, 1881, was $38,541,752.00. This amount was credited among the various Provinces as follows:—

Ontario.....	$16,601,175.00
Quebec.....	10,542,649.00
New Brunswick.....	6,532,826.00
Nova Scotia.....	3,094,132.00
Manitoba.....	885,173.00
Prince Edward Island.....	240,153.00
Territories.....	95,218.00
	$37,991,426.00

The value of the product of this industry, for 1881, is therefore equal to about $9 for every inhabitant of the Dominion, the population by last Census being 4,344,810. The following statement will show the number of saw mills engaged in manufacturing in the various Provinces of the Dominion and the number of hands employed:—

	Lumber Mills.	Shingle Mills.	Stave Mills.	Men Em'p'd.
Ontario .....	1,761	204	27	18,010
Quebec .....	1,729	377	1	13,312
New Brunswick .....	478	85	...	7,494
Nova Scotia .....	1,190	114	3	4,435
Manitoba .....	37	....	...	583
Prince Edward Island .....	165	16	...	459
British Columbia .....	27	5	...	404
Territories .....	3	....	...	44
	5,390	801	31	44,740

It will thus be seen, by the foregoing statement, that 44,740 persons were directly employed, in 1881, in the mills manufacturing the produce of the forest. This does not include the lumbermen in the woods, nor the log drivers on the rivers and streams. If they were added, it will be found that the number of hands directly employed in the lumbering industry is not much short of 80,000 or 90,000, and if we take the number of persons in each household, as shown by the Census returns to be five, the lumbering industry in 1881 was giving a livelihood to about 400,000 of our population. The amount of capital invested in this industry was estimated at $25,059,680, divided among the several Provinces, as follows:—

Provinces.	Capital.
Ontario .....	$11,397,889
Quebec .....	7,673,603
New Brunswick .....	3,058,436
Nova Scotia .....	1,704,133
Manitoba .....	609,350
British Columbia .....	344,350
Prince Edward Island .....	207,919
Territories .....	64,000
	$25,059,680

The following statement gives the total value of the export of the produce of the forest, for the year ending June 1883:—

Ontario .....	$ 9,280,238
Quebec .....	8,015,485
New Brunswick .....	4,724,422
Nova Scotia .....	1,587,041
British Columbia .....	362,871

When it is considered that the sum total of capital invested, in 1881, in all of the industrial establishments in the country, was $165,302,622, and of this sum the lumbering interests contributed $25,059,680, and that its produce exported in 1883 reached 25 per cent. of the sum total of all Canadian products exported to foreign countries, we may conclude that the lumbering industry is one of the most important industries in the Dominion, and is entitled to some consideration in framing a Tariff. Now, that we may fully understand what this protective policy is costing the Dominion, I have taken a few figures from the Trade and Navigation, which will show the amount collected in 1883 as compared with the sum collected in 1878, under our old Tariff. The imports into the Dominion, entered for home consumption, in 1878, under the old Tariff, amounted to $91,199,577; and the importations under that head in 1881, strange to say, amounted to $91,611,604, or very nearly the same amount as in 1878. Now, the duty collected in 1878, under the old Tariff, was $12,795,693. In 1881, the duty collected was $18,500,766, or nearly 50 per cent. more than in 1878, on the same quantity of goods. Now, will anybody tell me that the taxation of the country was not increased when we paid 50 per cent. more than we did in 1878—when we paid $18,000,000 instead of $12,000,000. It would be an insult to the people of this House and to the people of the country, for anybody to tell them that there was no increase. The Minister of Finance told us, the other day, that the amount of the surplus had been pretty large, but, at the same time, that it had been employed in such a way as to do away with the necessity of borrowing money in Great Britain. Now, let us look at the surplus on Consolidated Fund, in 1881, it was $4,132,743; in 1882, it was $6,316,351; in 1883, it was $7,064,492, making in those three years a surplus of over seventeen and a half millions. Will anybody tell me that this surplus could be taken out of the people's pockets and put into the Treasury of this country without increasing the taxation? It is quite impossible; the taxation of the people was increased to that extent exactly—no more, no less. If the Finance Minister could, in some way, have raised that amount of money without taking it from the pockets of the people, I would say that it was all right enough; but I do not think that he or the Government is entitled to a great deal of credit for taking that large amount of money out of the people's pockets, in order that they would not be obliged to go to England to borrow money to pay the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, it never was intended that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built without the money being borrowed. It never was intended that the money should be taken out of the pockets of the people, year by year, to pay the principal of the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why it would be a monstrous thing that this country should be called upon at the present time to pay the principal. It is quite right that the country should be taxed to pay the interest, and what might be a fair amount for sinking fund, to retire the capital amount within a reasonable time. I say that the people of the present generation should only be called on to pay the interest and a fair proportion of the principal, and that coming generations who would be benefited by this expenditure and by the Canadian Pacific Railway, should pay the principal, when they are called upon to do it. That is the proper way; and it is no answer to the people at the present time, when they say that they are taxed to this extent, that the Government want the money for the purpose of expending it on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the objects of the protective policy were, it was stated, to assist our struggling industries, to put money into the Treasury, and to reduce the importations from the United States. It has certainly put some money into the Treasury; it has not been any great advantage to the struggling industries of the country—at all events to the lumbering industry and to a number of others; and it has not had the effect of increasing importations from Great Britain, or reducing the importations from the United States. The importations, from Great Britain, in 1880, I see by the returns, were $34,461,224; in 1883, they had increased to $52,052,465, making a difference of $17,591,241. In 1880, the importations from the United States were $29,345,948; in 1883, the last year for which we have returns, we imported from the United States $56,032,233, making a difference of $26,585,255, or a difference of nearly $9,000,000 in the increase of importations from the United States over the increase of importations from Great Britain. One word with reference to emigration. We were told the other day that the returns which had been given from the United States were unreliable. I do not know whether they are reliable or not, so far as the Upper Provinces are concerned, but I believe they are reliable with regard to Nova Scotia. By the United States Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that the number of emigrants from Ontario and Quebec was 53,449. From Nova Scotia, the number was 9,364. As I said before, I believe these returns are correct as regards Nova Scotia, and for this reason: All the people who go from Nova Scotia to the United States must go by steamer, and I know that their system is such, on board those steamers, that there cannot be much discrepancy between the number that actually go as given by the returns. As soon as an American steamer leaves the wharf, the clerk goes round among the passengers, taking down the name, the age, the sex, the place where they are from, the place to which they are going, whether they are going to return, or whether they are going to remain in the United States. All these particulars are taken as to each passenger. I know this to be the case, because I have seen it myself; and they are very particular in every respect. On two or three occasions, I have myself looked over their lists, to see, for my own satisfaction, how they kept their returns and whether we could rely on them or not. I found that their system was so perfect that there could hardly be a mistake. I believe that the number that went out of Nova Scotia, according to the returns for the year ending on the 30th of June, 1883, was as nearly accurate as possible; and, strange to say, the percentage that left the Province to go to the United States is just about the same as the percentage which is given in the American returns as having left Ontario and Quebec. It appears to me, therefore, that this is rather a proof that the statement there given is as nearly correct as possible. Now, Sir, I have spoken for some time, and although I do not speak very often, I have no doubt the House will be glad to hear me say that I do not intend to trespass on their time very much longer. I was really in hopes that the hon. Finance Minister would have been able to close his speech without stating that hon. gentlemen on this side were only too glad to cry out "blue ruin, and were not able to see daylight, nothing but gloom and darkness everywhere." Well, Sir, we are not disposed to take a gloomy view of things; we hope to see the dawn of better times before a great while. There is no reason why hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, or the Liberal party of this country, should deery the country or feel a desire to say that the country is on the broad way to ruin. The leading men of both sides of politics are, I think, as nearly balanced as possible. I believe, that taking them man for man, the Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada hold just as much property, are just as much interested in the country and desire the prosperity of the country just as much, as the other party. I do not think there can be any question about that. There would be no reason for our attempting to deery the country, and I protest against that argument being used on the other side of the House. I am only speaking for myself, and, as I said in the early part of my speech, I desire to see every part of this Dominion obtain justice, and the Dominion at large in a condition of prosperity. Having said this much, I cannot close without pointing out to hon. gentlemen opposite that if we did make use of this opportunity in order to show that the country is not in a prosperous state, hon. gentlemen on the other side should be the last to complain. Why, Sir, in 1877 and 1878, if there was a $5,000 failure in the country, if there was a prospect of a short crop, if the shipping business was dull, if the coal trade was not in a flourishing state, if people were going out of the country, hon. gentlemen opposite took advantage of the circumstance and proclaimed it from every platform in the country. Their papers were instructed to print these things in double-leaded type, and to scatter them broadcast from one end of this country to the other—for what purpose? Merely that they might occupy the treasury benches after getting the existing Government out. I say, therefore, that they ought to be the last to complain, if we tell the Government what we feel it our duty to tell them. It is a painful duty, but it is, nevertheless, a duty devolving upon us. It is our duty to point out to them where we think they have erred and pursued a mistaken policy, in order to induce them, if possible, to inaugurate a different system of taxation, and one that will do justice to individual Provinces as well as the Dominion at large. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to weary the House any longer, and I conclude with saying now that we find we are face to face with the same difficulties that confronted us in 1878. When the wheat crop has been at least a partial failure, when the shipping business is so dull that steamship companies are hauling up their ships, when the lumber trade is in a worse condition, in my opinion, than it was in 1878, when bank stocks are depreciated in value, when cotton and sugar stocks are not worth more than 60 per cent. of their par value, when the West India trade is exceedingly dull, when people are going out of the country by thousands, all of which is largely due to the trade policy of the Government, coupled with their extravagant expenditure, we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we must speak with bated breath for fear that we shall be heard outside of this House. Why, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite told the people, in 1877 and 1878, if they succeeded to power they would not only keep the people in the country who were already here, but would bring back those who had left for want of employment. They told the people they would not only make the country prosperous, but they would ensure its continuance. I say they have not done so; and I tell them that the protective policy has been a failure in everything except in taking money out of the peoples' pockets, to build railways, which every person was led to suppose would be built with borrowed money.

Mr. STAIRS. Mr. Speaker, being a little interested in some of the remarks of my hon. friend from Digby, who has just sat down, I will, if the House will bear with me, take up a few moments in reply. He commenced his remarks this afternoon by enunciating a very good sentiment indeed. It was, that he desired to see all parts of this Dominion in a happy and prosperous condition. I am sure there is no member in this House who will not agree with him in that desire; and I think I may say that a very large majority of the people of this Dominion, being of that opinion, sent the present Government to power in 1878 and continued them in power in 1882. In my criticisms of what the hon. gentleman has enunciated, I may be a little disjointed, for I have not taken my notes very closely; but I must refer to a few things in his speech that need to be answered. He accused the hon. Finance Minister of saying that, under no circumstances, would the taxation be increased beyond 15 per cent. That, I presume, was prior to 1867. I would like to ask, Sir, who, in the first place, is to blame for the taxation having been increased beyond 15 per cent. I would like to ask if the rate of 15 per cent. was not continued down to 1873 or 1874. I would like to ask if, besides, it is not true that during that time the duties were taken off tea and coffee and if there was not remitted back to the people of Canada a very large portion of the taxation they were paying in 1867. And I would like to ask who is to blame, in the first instance, for the change in the rate of taxation? The Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. Did they not, during the time they were in power, increase the ordinary taxation of the Dominion from 15 to 17½? Did not they put back the taxes upon tea and coffee, thereby taking from the people a large proportion of the money which had been remitted to them by the Government of the right hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman says the people of Nova Scotia are a sea-faring people, and that they can find no market in Canada for their productions at all. I deny that statement altogether. Though they are, to a large extent, a sea-faring people, the hon. gentleman forgot to mention that Nova Scotia has a large manufacturing and mining population, as well, who are benefited to a great extent, as I shall show a little later, by the National Policy. The hon. gentleman was very wrong in belittling the agricultural population of Nova Scotia. Every one acquainted with census statistics knows that the agricultural population of every community, even of those that are generally accounted to be principally manufacturing ones, form a very large proportion of the whole population; and have not the agricultural population of Nova Scotia been benefited to a very large extent by the increased market afforded them in the Province itself, through the increased mining and manufacturing operations carried on there. Is not this the principle way in which an agricultural population is benefited by a protective policy? Does any one suppose the agricultural population of the United States would at present go back on the protective policy which has been in force there for years? Is it not evident that, advantageous as it may be to have a market abroad, it is still better, in every respect, to have a market at home, so that the farmers may be able to sell to advantage at their own doors farm products which cannot properly be exported at all? Until the last few years, it was impossible to export cattle from the United States to England and the Continent, and is it not impossible to export many large classes of agricultural products because they would be damaged by being kept so long a time in transit. The hon. gentleman's statement is not true, that the people of Nova Scotia engaged in manufacturing and mining have no market in Canada? They have a very considerable and increasing market in the Upper Provinces of the Dominion for everything they have to sell, and the people of Nova Scotia will agree with me when I say that this market will continue to increase. The hon. gentleman made a very curious remark when he said Blue Books were very deceiving and were no guide as to the taxation the protective policy has brought upon our Province. I was rather surprised at this, because he referred to those very Blue Books for the figures he presented to this House, to show that the state of Nova Scotia, at the present time, was very bad indeed. I am sorry to say that I could not take down his figures very closely, but the principal thing, as far as I could judge, that he said, was that the present importations of Nova Scotia, the amount that is really used by that Province, exceeds $16,000,000, of which a revenue of $4,000,000 would be collected instead of $1,800,000 as shown by the Trade Returns. I think the figures given in the Blue Books are not so deceiving, by any means, as those the hon. gentleman gave us. There is no doubt that his statements are fallacious, mere assertions, gross work in every respect. In showing the measure of taxation, as he attempted to show it, he made no allowance at all for the amount of $3,000,000 imported yearly, of free goods, into Nova Scotia and the amount of duties that are paid in Nova Scotia for the other Provinces. In answer to his statement that the taxation of Nova Scotia now amounts to $4,000,000, and his implication, therefore, that Nova Scotia is paying a very large proportion indeed towards the revenues of the Dominion, a much greater one than it receives in return, I have only to refer him to the words of the leader of the Opposition, which I will read to the House very briefly. During the Session of 1880, the hon. leader of the Opposition said:

"I have an interesting table of the results as to the collection and distribution of our revenue for the first ten years after Confederation."

A little further down he says:

"In Nova Scotia the receipts (that is the receipts for the first ten years after Confederation) were $19,112,000, and the expenditure $21,175,000, making the deficit $2,063,000. We find, therefore, that Ontario and Quebec have to provide and have provided for the bulk of this vast undivided expenditure resulting from the Confederation of the various Provinces comprising the Dominion. It will be seen from these statistics that some of the smaller Provinces, heavy as their contributions are, are not yet adequate contributors to, on the contrary they are heavy drains on, the revenues of Canada; and it will be further seen that the bulk of the expenditure—I may say every shilling of the expenditure—on the North-West and on the Pacific Railway, is contributed by the Province from which I have the honour to come."

After this the hon. member for Digby need not charge against the Dominion of Canada that Nova Scotia is paying a very much larger proportion of the expenditure of the country than is proportionately its due. But perhaps this is not the whole of the matter. It may be that the leader of the Opposition, in 1880 was not right or it may be that the hon. member for Digby is not right now. They can settle that question between themselves. My own opinion, and I believe it is that of the majority of the House, is that they are both entirely wrong. The hon. gentleman referred, in the course of his remarks, to something that had been said by Mr. Macpherson respecting the duty on flour and coal. I would say, in reply, that since then circumstances have changed. The great majority of the nations of the world have adopted a protective tariff. With the exception of Great Britain and perhaps one or two of the Australian Colonies, there is no really free trade country in existence to-day. With reference to the duty on flour and corn meal, it is clear these duties are in the interests of the whole Dominion. We can see that from the fact that England did not abolish the Corn Laws until it was proved beyond doubt it would be in the interests of the whole country to do so, and I think it was remarked by one hon. gentleman who spoke on the subject that even that measure was a protective one—that England abolished the Corn Laws in order that her manufacturing population might have cheap food. The hon. gentleman said that he might be told that Nova Scotia returned supporters of the present policy. I think that is a very good argument indeed against many of his criticisms of the policy of the present Government. But he went on to qualify it by saying that, in 1882, the people did not know of the elections, that they were taken entirely by surprise. This I deny altogether. I think, in Nova Scotia, as well as in the rest of the Dominion, the people were aware in the early part of 1882, that the elections were coming on, and when the members went back to Nova Scotia, they found that Province pretty well prepared for it, and I think I can prove to the satisfaction even of the hon. gentleman himself, that they were not taken by surprise by the result of the local elections in that year, in which the Liberal Conservative Government had the misfortune to be defeated. In 1878 the Province of Nova Scotia supported the Liberal Conservative party because they enunciated a National Policy, and in 1882 they reaffirmed it. There was no dissatisfaction. Does he mean to say to the members of this House that, if in Nova Scotia there had been that great dissatisfaction with the policy of the present Government, that he pretends exists, it would have been possible for this party to be supported by the majority they now have. And, with respect to the two elections that came on since, he appealed to myself, and said I knew very well why it was that those two elections were carried by the Liberal Conservative party. Well, Mr. Speaker, the only reason I can think of or give is, that I presume the electors in those counties wanted to support the Government of the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, and I think it was a very good reason indeed. He said the amount of taxation was not known to the people and I presume he applied that to the people in the Maritime Provinces. If it is not known, whose fault is it? Whose business is it to tell the people of the different Provinces what is the burden they have to bear? Is it not the duty of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition? I think he is mistaken, however. I think they have, in the last four or five years, very ably put before the people of the different Provinces the amount of taxation which, they say, they are obliged to bear, both by their party leaders and by their press. But I disagree with him in the assertion that it is not known. I say that the people of Nova Scotia and the people of Canada know very well, indeed, what the amount of taxation is which they are labouring under, and they know it is not at all the extravagant sum which it is represented to be by the hon. member and his friends. I come now to his remarks upon the coal duties. He says the coal duty is no advantage to Nova Scotia. I tell him he had better go to some of the mining districts of Nova Scotia, and say there that it is no advantage. If he thinks it is no advantage, I ask him why he does not move in this House to have it taken off. He quoted the letter, as I understood it, of Mr. J. R. Lithgow, in support of his contention that the National Policy had been no benefit to Nova Scotia, or to the coal trade especially. Does he not know very well that Mr. Lithgow, though a strong supporter of the Government, and a supporter, I believe, because he considers, on the whole, that the policy they enunciated is a very much better one, even for his own industry, than that of the hon. gentlemen opposite, was no supporter of the National Policy. What was it the hon. Mr. Lithgow always advocated and wished to have brought about? He wished a straight ad valorem Tariff on all imports into the Dominion, an ad valorem Tariff of 20 or 25 per cent., whatever might be necessary to yield sufficient revenue for the services of the country, on everything—coal, iron, raw material of every kind. He said this would be sufficient protection to all the industries here, and would be the fairest and most just tariff. He even went so far as to argue that this should include liquors and everything, all luxuries, all kinds of goods. I presume, when Mr. Lithgow found that this Tariff could not be adopted, he felt a little sore, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that Mr. Lithgow, even if in every detail he does not agree with the policy of the party in power, is very far from wishing to have the coal duties taken off. I can assure him that, in conversation not long ago with Mr. Lithgow, he expressed most strongly the opinion that it is better for the coal mines of Nova Scotia to keep the duty on at the present time, than to take it off and have it also removed in the United States. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, said cotton is the only industry benefitted in the Dominion by this Tariff. He is entirely mistaken in this. Woollen, sugar refining, iron, all the general manufacturing of the country has been benefitted to as great, or nearly as great, an extent as the cotton manufacture, and he referred to the sugar refinery in Halifax to prove it was the case. He said the shareholders had been taxed for several years to pay the interest on their investment. I was ashamed to hear the hon. gentleman, make that statement, which implied that it was because of the policy of the present Government that this sugar refinery had not prospered. I am sorry and ashamed to confess that it was entirely owing to mismanagement in the first two or three years of its existence that it did not pay very good dividends indeed to its shareholders. He spoke of the Canadian competition in the Lower Provinces, and he did me the honour to allude to an industry with which I am myself connected. I do not like to refer here to an industry with which I am personally connected, as I do not think it good taste to come here and get a little gratuitous advertising by talking about my own business in this House. But some of the assertions of the hon. member were very absurd indeed, and I will show one of them. Speaking of the trade in Halifax he said they had to get an increased duty to enable it to compete with other Canadian factories. Did any hon. gentleman ever hear a more ridiculous statement? Does not everyone here know that the thing is absurd? If the hon. gentleman knows so little about trade as that, he should not take up the time of the House in lecturing them upon the state of Nova Scotia or upon the state of any industry at all. He referred, however, when he resumed after dinner, to something which I think, perhaps, I had better notice. He mentioned a circular which had been issued by the Customs Department, giving the price at which certain kinds of cordage should be entered for duty. I have only, in reply to him on this question, to tell him the Act under which that circular was sent out, was one passed by hon. members opposite when they were in power. In the 31st clause, 10th chapter, of the Acts of 1877—I think this was when the hon. Mr. Burpee was Minister of Customs—it is provided:

"In all cases where any duty is imposed on any goods imported into Canada, ad valorem, or according to the value of such goods, such value shall be understood to be the fair market value thereof, in the principal markets of the country, whence the same were exported directly to Canada; and every appraiser and every collector, when acting as such, shall, by all reasonable ways and means in his power, ascertain the fair market value, as aforesaid, of any goods to be appraised by him, and estimate and appraise the value for duty of such goods, at the fair market value, as aforesaid."

And then, in the 32nd section, it goes on to show how that market value shall be arrived at:

"The fair market value for duty, of goods imported into Canada, shall be the fair market value of such goods in the usual and ordinary commercial acceptance of the term, at the usual and ordinary credit, and not the cash value of such goods, except in cases in which the article imported is, by universal usage, considered and known to be a cash article, and so bond fide paid for in all transactions in relation to such article; and all invoices representing cash value, except in the special cases hereinabove referred to, shall be subject to such additions as to the collector or appraiser of the port at which they are presented, may appear just and reasonable, to bring up the amount to the true and fair market value, as required by this section."

I think it does not lie in the mouth of the hon. member to criticise the action of the Customs Department in issuing that circular, because they were only carrying out the law which those hon. gentleman themselves had passed. Though the law has been amended to a slight extent since then, I believe that in the last edition of the Customs Act it is, in effect, entirely based on the clause I have just read to the House. As to his imputations against Confederation and Protection, I think I need not do more than to quote himself. He implies that a protective policy is a breach of faith with Nova Scotia when it entered Confederation. Now, let us see what the hon. member himself stated in 1867. After speaking somewhat of the condition of affairs in the Maritime Provinces, he said:

"While Canada, being peculiarly situated, requires a protective policy in every sense of the word."

Sir, I think the hon. member has no right to come here, at this period in our history, and claim that a protective policy was not expected in Nova Scotia in 1867. He exclaimed very grandly, indeed, against Confederation, and says he was always known to be opposed to it. I would like to ask him how it is that in the last Session of this Parliament he voted for a sum of $5,000 to paint a picture of the founders of Confederation? To be consistent he ought to have, at least, voted against it. Now, I have some information to give him with reference to the effect of a protective policy on living in Nova Scotia, which, I think, will also be of interest to this House. In the Nova Scotia Legislature, the other day, Mr. Fraser, in the course of his remarks, said:

"He believed that Nova Scotia was a cheap country to live in, that it was, in fact, one of the cheapest countries in America, but what he meant to say was that it was not as cheap as it might be made, and that it was becoming dearer year by year."

The hon. Mr. LeBlanc also stated as follows:—

"He believed that Nova Scotia was the cheapest place on the globe to live in. He had travelled over the globe a good deal, and could assure the House that he knew what he was talking about. While in command of vessels, he had had occasion to buy ships' stores in many parts of the world, and knew that he could buy almost anything cheaper in Nova Scotia than anywhere else."

Now, Sir, you will see that in Nova Scotia the general opinion is that it is a cheap country to live in; a fact, however, which does not at all tally with the statement of the hon. member, in his criticism of the present policy of the Liberal Conservative party. He made a great many strictures on the past conduct and policy of the Minister of Railways and Minister of Finance. I need not make any reply to that, because those hon. gentlemen are well able to take care of themselves. I would say, however, that when they spoke, as he has quoted them, the circumstances were entirely different from those which were in force when they advocated the protective policy which is now in operation. Trade in the United States had altogether changed; the interests of the Dominion required a change in the Tariff, and a large majority of the people in 1878 approved that policy, and returned the present Government to power, simply that they might carry it out. He said that when the Lower Provinces entered Confederation they were under a Tariff of 15 per cent. I have pointed out whose fault it was that the Tariff had to be raised. He said we were receiving only 80 cents per head of the amount thus raised. I presume his argument was, though he did not state it very clearly, that it was unfair that the Lower Provinces should only receive 80 cents per head, a sum based on the Census of 1867 and on the 15 per cent. Tariff then in force, when that Tariff has now been very much raised. I will ask every hon. gentleman in this House if the same argument does not apply to the larger Provinces of the Dominion as well as to the smaller ones? Do they not all receive a subsidy on the same basis—80 cents per head? Have not the smaller Provinces the same resources for local revenue that the larger ones have? I cannot at all see that there is any question between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the smaller Provinces, as to the matter of better terms. They all stand, with reference to the Dominion, upon exactly the same footing; because, if an increased revenue has been collected from these Provinces, there has also been a very much greater expenditure made for the benefit of all. He hopes that if Quebec gets better terms, the smaller Provinces will get better terms also. Of course, we all expect that. If there is any better terms to the larger ones, no doubt all the Provinces will be treated with equal justice. He also said, in his remarks, that the cotton industry was the only one that had been benefitted by the National Policy. He asserted it, but he did not prove it. There was nothing at all in his remarks that went to prove that the cotton industry was the only one benefitted by the National Policy. He made some remarks about the lumber industry, and the additional duty which those who are engaged in that industry have to pay upon the supplies they use, but he did not attempt to prove that this additional duty had any effect whatever upon the present depressed state of the lumber industry. I think, Sir, when he stated that a protective policy puts money into the Treasury without protecting manufactures—which he did in the latter part of his remarks—he said something that, in my opinion, was not very judicious, and was not true. A protective policy, pure and simple, does not produce revenue; to produce revenue, it must be a revenue and not a protective one, though, of course, you can have a revenue and protective Tariff combined. Take the case of the United States Tariff; is it not well known that the United States Tariff is a wonderful combination of these two principles, and that while it produces an enormous revenue there is also a very large protective principle in it? It is well known that just as soon as a Tariff commences to act as a protection for any particular industry or article, it at once ceases to produce a revenue. And, Sir, if the Tariff of the Dominion, at the present time, is producing a large amount of money, as it has during the last few years, that is not incidental to a protective Tariff. The money might have been collected without there being an element of protection in it at all; or you might have had a protective Tariff which would have produced no revenue at all. Suppose you wanted a protective Tariff, pure and simple, you would only have to put up the duties high enough to shut out goods altogether. With regard to the exodus to the United States, I may have to say something afterwards about it, but I desire to refer to it in this connection, as the hon. member for Digby has stated that he believes the entries of the people going from Nova Scotia into the United States are correct. I should like to ask him if he thinks, in all cases when entries are made, the officials deduct those who return? I do not believe it. I have just as good a right to assert that, as the hon. gentleman has to make his statement. I do not think the returns of immigrants to the United States from Nova Scotia are at all correct. The hon. gentleman had a very curious way of proving his assertion. He said the percentage of those who left Nova Scotia was the same as those who left Ontario, and that proved that the Ontario returns were correct. I hold that it does not prove that the Ontario returns are correct, but it proves the Nova Scotia returns are incorrect. I am just as apt to be right as is the hon. gentleman. In concluding his remarks, the hon. gentleman said he saw no reason why the liberal party should deprecate the country. That is another very wise remark—something like the remark with which he commenced his speech. Is not that the very thing which hon. members on this side of the House have been trying to teach his party for the last four or five years; but now that he has taken it in hand, we may hope they will learn it. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) asked why should we deduct the surplus in calculating the taxation of the country. I think the reason is very simple indeed. The surplus revenue of the country is being spent in Canada, on public works, it is being spent on works chargeable to Capital, and is, in effect, nothing but a loan, in a certain sense, from the people of Canada to their capital account, and it is money which can be returned whenever the Government deems fit. It is quite possible for the Government to have, during two or three years, a large surplus, and then may come a time of deficits, and it is perfectly fair to take a balance between the two.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. STAIRS. I believe that policy was enunciated by the hon. gentleman himself, when he was Finance Minister.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. STAIRS. And I believe it is the correct one. The Government have, in my opinion, a perfect right to hold, that money spent on Capital account is not taxation, because whenever they please they can get it returned. I desire to offer one or two remarks on the general question of Confederation, and the effect that the protective policy has had on the Province of Nova Scotia. I think I may refer to this, because it cannot be said that in saying anything favourable to Confederation I am attempting to bolster up a cause of which I was an ardent supporter at the first. I should like to point out a few of the benefits which could not have been secured without Confederation. We have heard, during the last few years, in Nova Scotia and the lower Provinces, a great deal about the Fishery Award. We have heard it said by the Opposition press and by Opposition speakers in Nova Scotia, and probably in the other Maritime Provinces, that were it not for Confederation, those Provinces would have had the spending of that money. I hold, that even if they had had the spending of the money, it would not have been expended to so good advantage to the fishermen as if expended by the Dominion Government. But I believe another point can be made in favour of Confederation, and it is this: Would it have been possible, in the isolated condition in which Nova Scotia was in 1867, to have secured the clause in the Treaty of Washington which resulted in the Fishery Award, and would those Provinces have had sufficient interest to present the case in such a manner as to secure the award? I think it may reasonably be claimed that had the Provinces remained in the isolated condition they occupied in 1876, separated as they were, it would not have been possible to have secured the Fishery Award. Therefore, to that extent, at least, the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces have been benefitted by Confederation, and that is one of the respects in which Confederation has actually benefitted the whole of the sea-faring Provinces of Canada. Furthermore, with respect to some arguments put forth against Confederation in Nova Scotia, during the last few years, I would like to point out that there are a large number of manufacturing industries prosecuted in Nova Scotia which could not have been prosecuted had it remained an independent Province. I will refer to a few of these. In the first place, there are a good many iron works in Nova Scotia. There are the large iron works of Londonderry, and although it has been said they are not prospering at the present day, it is not asserted that they are not prospering because of difficulties in the Tariff or any conditions in Nova Scotia or Canada which make it impossible to manufacture iron at a profit. The difficulty arose altogether from mismanagement at the inception of the enterprise, hundreds, thousands and even millions of dollars having been sunk at its inception, which remain largely unproductive; but it is firmly believed that the industry will yet get on its feet and flourish under the Tariff. Had it not been for Confederation, I am quite sure this large industry would not have been established in Nova Scotia. Iron and steel industries have been started in the neighbourhood of New Glasgow, in which between $200,000 and $300,000 of capital has been invested, and in which, when thoroughly in operation, from 260 to 300 men will be employed. There are glass works which could not have been started without Confederation, because the Nova Scotia market was too small to pay any large industry to carry on operations. I need only refer further to the cotton factories which are possible under Confederation, the sugar refineries, the increased prosperity in our machine shops, and indeed generally throughout the country. We have heard, Mr. Speaker, a great many ills charged against Confederation in Nova Scotia. Most of these are really due to the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty. That was a very serious matter, and it could not have been counterbalanced in any possible way except by the Confederation of the Provinces and the adoption of the National Policy, which Confederation eventually brought about. Have not the coal sales of Nova Scotia increased from about 600,000 tons, in 1878, to 1,200,000 tons, in 1883? I have not the figures, but speaking from memory, these quantities are about correct. Not only have the sales in the Province itself, produced by the stimulating effect of the National Policy on manufacturing industries, increased, but also throughout Quebec (and eventually throughout Ontario) there will be a very large amount sold. If Nova Scotia had continued in an isolated position as an independent Province after the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, and had not the National Policy been put in force in 1879, I feel sure the coal sales of Nova Scotia at the present day would have been very little, if any, larger than they were in 1878. In order to reply to some remarks which have fallen from hon. gentlemen opposite, I have taken the trouble to prepare some statistics, to ascertain how the increase in the population of Nova Scotia compares with the increase in the population of the New England States. The circumstances of those two countries are very much alike; the soil is somewhat alike, and they are, to a very large extent, engaged in the same occupations. The only thing is that in some of the New England States there are large manufacturing interests, and it is those which show an increase over Nova Scotia. The following are the increases of the six New England States, during the various decades, from 1840 to 1850, and in Nova Scotia, in the decades from 1839 to 1851.

Increase from 1839 to 1881, or 42 years, 160 per cent.

We find, Sir, from these figures, that in three of the New England States the increase has been less than in Nova Scotia during the corresponding periods, and in three others of these States it has been more. I find that the average increase in the six New England States, from 1840 to 1850, was 22 per cent., against 63 in Nova Scotia, from 1839 to 1850. From 1850 to 1860, it was 14·9, against 19·8 from 1851 to 1861, in Nova Scotia. From 1860 to 1870, it was 11·4, against 17·2, in Nova Scotia, for the corresponding period. From 1870 to 1880, it was 14·8, against 13·6 in Nova Scotia, or only 1 per cent. less in Nova Scotia than in the New England States, for the last decade. These figures show, I think, that the state affairs in Nova Scotia must have been, on the whole, very prosperous. They show that this Province—situated as it is, the most easterly of the Provinces of the Dominion, and almost the most easterly part of North America, and subject to that strong westward tendency which has characterized, not only the Dominion, but the United States, Europe, and all parts of the world—has been able to hold its own, as compared with the New England States, and I think it is something of which we may justly be proud. In conclusion, I wish to point out that those of the New England States in which the increase has been greater than Nova Scotia, are the very ones which have been benefitted to the greatest extent by a protective policy.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Before this House goes into Committee on the Resolutions, I wish to offer two or three remarks. I have been thinking, during the discussion of this question this Session, and during a similar discussion last year, that if a stranger had been in the gallery and had heard the speeches, and especially those of the other side, he would have come to the conclusion that this great nation of ours was almost exclusively a nation of manufacturers; that we had here and there a few miners, a few engaged in lumbering, a few engaged in fishing, occasionally a farmer or two, a few professional men, and once in a while a poor labourer. As far as I can see, the whole object seems to be to prove that the manufacturing industry of the country is the one great industry, the only great source of revenue, the one great source of wealth to the country. Now, in order to set this matter on a proper basis, allow me to submit a comparison of our various branches of export—for that, I hold, is the true test—and let us see how they compare. During the past year, we exported of the produce of the mine, $3,106,- 880; fisheries, $8,856,920; products of the forest, $26,648,441; of agricultural products, that is, animals and their products, cereals, and all other agricultural produce, $50,680,437, while of manufactured goods we only exported $4,114,424. Not only so, Mr. Speaker, but we have been led to suppose that these manufactures have been enormously increased, so that we could not only supply the wants of our population, but that they must have been a source of great increase to the revenue and of wealth to the people. Allow me to give a comparison of the export of manufactures in the year 1878, the year before the National Policy was first introduced, and the year 1883, which has just closed. In 1878, before we had the National Policy at all, and when our manufacturing industries were supposed to be languishing, and just on the point of expiring, we exported $1,681,759, while last year, after four years of the working of the National Policy, they fell off to $4,114,424, or a difference in favour of 1878 of $267,335. That is a startling fact, but yet it is the natural result of the National Policy—it is just the result which the opponents of that policy predicted would flow from its introduction. The fact of the matter is, that just as soon as a nation introduces protection into its manufacturing and other industries, it cuts those manufactures off from all the markets of the world. The fact is that when you introduce the policy of protection, when you protect one industry you must protect them all in order to do them anything like justice, and the natural result is that the increased cost of production handicaps the manufacturers and places them at a disadvantage when competing with less highly protected countries. We see that natural result in the state in which our manufactures are to-day. Now, Sir, let me briefly draw the attention of the House to the way in which this protective policy affects the different classes of the community. A protective policy, to be just, ought to treat all classes alike. If it does not, if it favours one class at the expense of another, it is not just; and this is precisely what this precious National Policy of ours does. Let us see how it affects other classes. So far as the miner is concerned, it does not add anything to his wealth; in fact, it decreases it. I need not tell you that if you increase the price of every thing the miner has to buy without providing a better market for his produce, you have done him an injury financially; and this is exactly what the National Policy has done. It has increased not only the cost of the material he has to work with, but the price of the clothes he wears, and almost everything else he needs. So far has this been the case, that at the last Session of this House, the hon. Finance Minister was forced to bring in a policy of bonusing one class of miners in the Province. As regards the great national industry of our fisheries, the same rule holds good. Unless you can do something to increase the quantities or the price of the products of his toil, you injure the fisherman to that extent; still more do you injure him if you increase the price of everything he has to purchase, and this is exactly what the National Policy does. It does the same with regard to the lumberman. There is not a single article which enters into the lumber industry that this National Policy has not increased the price of. But we shall be told that it has increased the price of the lumberman's product, lumber and timber. What folly! Why, Sir, where is the market for our grain and lumber products to be found? Why, is it not in the United States and in Great Britain? And how can the taxation of all that the lumberman has to purchase increase the price of his products in these markets? Then so far as the farmer is concerned, the same thing holds good. I know that we were told that the National Policy was going to increase the profits of the farmer by securing a better price for everything he has to sell; but it has not had that result. On the other hand, it has had the result of increasing the price of everything the farmer has to buy.

We were told that it would diminish the imports into the country, and that that would benefit the farmer, because it would give him a home market. But, Sir, if there is one fact better established than another, it is that when any country has a surplus to sell, the price of that surplus in the market to which the country takes it, fixes the price of the portion left in the country; and let us see how the National Policy has benefitted the farmers in the matter of imports. In 1878, before we had the National Policy, we imported 3,755,400 bushels of wheat; in 1883, after four years' experience of the National Policy, our imports of wheat had risen to 4,954,174 bushels. In 1878, the country imported 275,359 bushels of barley, and in 1883 it imported only 16,465 bushels. We all know that we export an enormous quantity of barley, from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 bushels every year. We do import a few bushels. Before the National Policy was inaugurated, we imported this free, and when it was brought into the country, it was either for the speculation of carrying it through the country, in order to make money by selling it to the Americans again, or it was bought as damaged barley and our farmers had the benefit of it, and sold their own produce at a higher price, and so made a profit. Then, with regard to oats, in 1878 we imported 766,184 bushels, and in 1883 we imported 222,635 bushels. This is an article of which there is not generally a large import; but last year, I understand there was quite a failure in the oat crop in New Brunswick, and I think in Nova Scotia too, and the farmers there were forced to import pretty largely; and will any man tell me how these farmers were benefitted by having to pay a duty of 10 cents a bushel on what they imported. Another great source of profit to the farmers of the Dominion, at one time, was the production of wool. In 1878 we imported 4,608,825 lbs. In 1883 the importation of wool had risen to the enormous amount of 9,803,419 lbs. In 1878 we exported 2,479,484 lbs. of wool, and in 1883 our exports had fallen to 1,375,572 lbs. In the matter of wool, the National Policy is a positive injury to our farmers. In fact, the whole system, so far as wool is concerned, is a sort of mockery to the farmers of the Dominion. What did the Government do under pretence of protecting the farmer? They laid a duty on coarse wools, the wools that we do not want to import a single pound of, but want to export, and they made free the wool that was coming into the country to compete with ours; so that the farmers, instead of having the benefit of the home market, find that the competition of the foreign wool has more than doubled. The fact of the matter is, that the National Policy injures all classes in the country except the manufacturers, by raising the price of everything they have to buy. Now, Sir, allow me to draw your attention to a class of goods that the farmers have to buy very largely—that is, agricultural implements. Last year, the House is aware, the Tariff on agricultural implements was raised from 25 to 35 per cent. The great object of this, we were told, was to give our own manufacturers the benefit of the home market. Well, we find that in 1883 we imported 1,528 threshing machines and reapers, of which 134 were imported into Ontario, at a value of $20,443, and 1,093 into Manitoba, at a value of $141,516. Of ploughs and cultivators, we imported $127,919 worth, of which $12,280 worth were imported into Ontario, and $108,367 worth into Manitoba. The total value of agricultural implements imported during the year amounted to $581,959. We see how enormously the importation had increased even over the preceding year. We see, also, that this enormous increase to the tax on agricultural implements did not give our manufacturers even the control of our own market. In 1878 we imported mowing, reaping and threshing machines to the value of $63,175; in 1882 the amount had risen to $131,112; in 1883 to $581,959. Why is it that in the face of this enormous Tariff our people have been forced to buy all these implements in a foreign market? The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), the other evening, said that there were three stages in the history of protection to manufacturers; the first was, when the manufacturers who engaged in business when the system was introduced made enormous profits; the second was, when others were induced by this prosperity to rush into the business; and the third stage was when the market was overdone, when there was no longer a market. But for the buyer, the consumer, the farmer, the great mass of the people, there is only one stage, and that is when they buy an inferior article at an enhanced price. But we are told competition is going to regulate all that. There cannot be a greater fallacy imagined. As the hon. member for Brant said the other evening, there are three stages, and the last is when the country will become full of manufactured goods and the market will be overcrowded. In this country we are very little over 4,000,000 consumers; our market is very limited, and just as soon as you inaugurate a protective policy you cut out the manufacturers from the other markets of the world, our own market becomes overstocked, and what is the result? Hon. gentlemen opposite say you will get cheaper goods. Do not imagine anything of the kind. That is just the time the rings come in, and combinations are formed to keep up prices. The banks, which furnish the money for producing these goods, must carry these manufactured goods for the producer. They dare not allow them to be thrown on the market, because the result would be loss, loss and ruin, not only to the manufacturer, but to the banks themselves. They are, therefore, obliged to carry the manufacturer over the hard times; and what is the result? The result is a stringency in the money market. The money that ought to be engaged in profitable pursuits is looked up in these heavy stocks, and the manufacturers must stop producing until these stocks have had time to become considerably reduced. That is the direct result, and with the exception, for a short time, in exceptional cases, the consumer never gets any benefit. But they will tell us these manufactured goods and these manufactured implements are as cheap now as they were before Protection was first introduced. Supposing that were the case, what has that to do with the question? The simple question is, how do these manufactured goods, which we are forced to buy, compare in price with the manufactured goods of other parts of the world, which we would be allowed to buy if it were not for this protective system. That is the thing we have to consider. We were told that it was the producer who was going to pay the Tariff on the articles we imported. There cannot be a greater fallacy than that. The fact of the matter is, no nation, no people, will import goods unless it needs them. If it needs them and lays on a tax, and then imports them, it is clear the people must pay the Tariff. How is it with the agricultural implements? The larger part, as I said before, have gone into the North-West; and here I wish to remark that not only have you to take the productions of our own factories at an enhanced price, but an inferior article at an enhanced price, because the moment you protect our manufacturers you destroy the stimulant to excellence in production. The manufacturer has no motive in improving his goods, because he knows the consumer is compelled to buy them at his own price. That has just been the result in this country, and the simple reason why we import these manufactured goods of other countries is, that our people have found that the best is the cheapest, even though they have to pay the duty on it. If there is any hon. gentleman opposite who thinks this is not the proper view, who still holds to the old foggy notions that the producer pays the duty, let him go into the North-West and settle on a farm. One of the first articles he will have to buy is a self-binding reaper, and let him, instead of buying it from the agent, go to Mr. McCormick's, in Chicago, where these implements come from in the North West; let him pay say $200 for one, and when he comes to the Custom House at the border let him, on the demand of the Custom House officer, pay over $70 for Customs duties, and he will have a pretty strong sense that the consumer pays the duty. Then as far as the other articles are concerned, let him just examine into the matter of clothing; let any hon. gentleman go into our dry goods stores and tell the storekeeper he wishes to buy a suit of clothes and ask him what he would recommend; whether Scotch or Canadian tweed, and he will find, when the clothes are placed before him on the counter, that if he will take the matter of colour, quality and finish into account, the Canadian tweed is as dear as the Scotch. I know it from experience, because I have had to buy both tweeds myself. Yet we are told that the protective Tariff does not enhance the price of goods to the consumer. As far as ploughs and other articles are concerned, I have shown that an immense number are being imported into the country, notwithstanding the high Tariff. The same law prevails there that prevails in other cases, that the best is the cheapest, and our people are beginning to understand this. I have never been in the North-West, but I have been told by those who have been, that through the country, go almost where you will in the central portions of it, you can find stacks of Canadian ploughs piled up almost everywhere, and no settler in that country will buy a Canadian plough, unless he is a greenhorn; and, if he does, it is not very long before he is obliged to buy one of United States manufacture. In the part of the country I live in, in almost every farm, you will find the South Bend, Indiana, plough. The fact is, as I said before, that the same law holds good here—the Canadian maker, not having the stimulus of competition to stimulate him in producing a good article, has produced an inferior one, expecting that he will be able to compel the Canadian farmer to use his plough. There is one other matter that I wish just to touch on; that is, the plea that the National Policy helps the farmer, by laying a tax on the grain that comes into competition with him. I have shown that it has not had that effect. The only class of grain of which the import has decreased much under the National Policy is Indian corn. It seems that we must always have a certain quantity of that imported into the country for distilling purposes; but there was another industry that was rising up just at the time that Protection was introduced; that was the feeding of American corn to Canadian stock. I, as a Canadian farmer, and many others whom I knew, engaged in that. We found that we could import the American corn, in the winter of 1878-79, and I and my neighbours bought large quantities of it and fed it to stock, and sold the stock for the Old Country market, and we could get it laid down, ground, for $1 per hundred; and we made beef of it, we fed it to cattle, they were exported to the Old Country, and we made a profit off it; and who will say that the country was not richer by the operation? The introduction of the National Policy completely put an end to that industry. After the Tariff was laid upon the corn, it was found impossible to feed it with a profit, and this last year we had the misfortune in the west to have our corn killed by the frost, and almost all of us had to buy less or more corn to feed our hogs; but, instead of getting it, ground, for $1 a hundred, as in 1878-79, we had to pay from $1.30 to $1.35 a hundred for it, unground. On this matter of feeding corn to cattle for fattening purposes, to send them out of the country, allow me to ask what is it that enables the farmer in Great Britain to pay at least four times the rent that a farmer in America can pay for his land, and the enormous taxes they have to pay there besides? It is simply the fact that they have been wise enough to make Great Britain the feeding ground for the coarse grains of the world, and the soil has, in consequence, been enriched to that extent that they are able to pay from three to four times the rent a farmer in this country can afford to pay. Now, Sir, as far as Protection affects the operatives, we were told, I think it was by the right hon. the Premier in that speech at Parkhill, or some other where, that has been quoted to-night, that, if Protection was inaugurated, the operative would get a fair day's wage for a fair day's work and would always be employed. Well, that prophecy has been falsified. For a time, when everything was flourishing, when the markets of the world were prosperous, when manufacturing was being carried on briskly, it is true that the operative had comparatively good times. But how is it now, when over-production has been brought about? It is only a month or two since two of the best friends of the Government, in the city of London, offered as a reason for deferring the collection of the taxes till next spring, that there were from 1,200 to 1,400 mechanics unemployed in that city. I believe they stated what was true, and I have means of knowing that the number has been increased since—that there are more unemployed now than there were then. And that is a solitary instance; it is the same all over the country, where manufacturing is being carried on. And what have they to live upon now? They can only fall back on their earnings in the times past, and how long will these last them? The result will be that they will have to engage in some other occupation, or to move off to some other country where they can get employment in their own line of business. Since this debate began, a great deal has been said about the unpatriotic course followed by the Opposition, because they refuse to state the condition of the country in a better light than in truth they could, and we have been told by speakers on the other side that it is our duty, as patriots, to do everything we can to keep up the credit and the character of the country. I admit it; but I question whether it is the part of any honest man to speak the thing that it is not true for the sake of bragging up the country. The statement has been made, and made confidently, that we have the best half of this continent, and great fault has been found with the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), because, sometime in his life, he ventured to question whether we had the best half of the continent or not; whether, even, the nation on the other side of the line had not a little better half than we had. I am not going to say which has the best half. I have not been over both halves of the continent, so as to be in a position to say which is the best. But it has struck me as strange, as we both started about the same time in the race, and both countries began to be populated at about the same time, how it is today that we stand in regard to population only as about one to eleven. How can we account for the fact, if we have the best half of the country, and started about the same time, and during the Revolution we know that we drained away an immense number of the best inhabitants of that country—I refer to the United Empire Loyalists—and yet, in this year of grace, 1884, how is it that we find that in this country we are only a little over 4,000,000, while that country has 55,000,000 of inhabitants? It cannot be blamed because of Reform rule. It cannot be said it is because our friends opposite have not had the management of the country. Why, if my memory serves me right, they have had the management of the country almost continuously, from the time it was a country until the present. There was a time when the Baldwin-LaFontaine Government held power, there was a time when the Hincks-Morin Government held power, but from 1854, when the right hon. gentleman who now controls the Government took office, thirty years ago, down to the present time, except one short period of two years, when the Macdonald-Sicote Government held office, and five years, when Mr. Mackenzie's Government held office, during those thirty years, with these short interregnums, those hon. gentlemen opposite have had control of the country. I would like to know how they reconcile the position of the country with that fact. Now, Sir, before concluding, I wish just to state my firm conviction that it is a matter of impossibility, except in very exceptional cases, and for a very short time, for any one nation to tax another. We were told, when this policy was introduced, that we were going to tax the people of the United States. Well, Sir, the wise Disposer of all events has established a law that has made it, as I said before, except in certain exceptional cases, and for a short time, utterly impossible for one nation to tax another. Do you suppose that at the end of the great war on the other side, if the Americans could have taxed the people of Canada, they would not have compelled them to pay the greater portion of their debt? The fact of the matter is, the laws of trade are as inexorable as the laws of morals, or the laws of physics, and one of these laws is that we cannot tax the people of another country, that the people who impose the taxes are the people who have to pay the taxes. Sir, I believe that the world, sooner or later, will waken up to these facts; I believe, Sir, that the world is already waking up to them. On the other side, we see an agitation going on for a revenue Tariff, and for reducing their enormous duties, and it will not be long before that agitation reaches other countries. Sir, we may not live to see it, but I believe the time is not far distant when all the barriers to trade will be broken down, when every man will be allowed to do the best he can, to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. We know that so long as we maintain a cumbrous, clumsy policy of raising a revenue from Customs duties, so long as we maintain all along the border line an army of Customs officers, at an enormous expense, so long as we keep on with this policy which is trying to blind the people, by pretending that we are not taxing them, when we are picking their pockets all the time by Customs duties—so long as we continue that system, we will have to impose enormous taxes in order, not only to pay the expenses of the Government, but to support that large army of Customs officers in every town and city of the Dominion. Sir, I believe the time is not far distant when the people will be wiser, when they will adopt a more sensible policy. It may not be in our day, but I believe it will yet come when the expenses of the Government will be defrayed by money collected directly from the people by the tax collector; and not only that, Sir, but I believe it will be collected from the people in a way that is just—that a man will have to pay taxes in proportion to the property he owns and the income he possesses. It will be collected in such a way that the poor man, the labouring man, will not have to pay almost as much as the independently rich man, as he has to-day under our present system. It may be that it will be a good while before that system is inaugurated, but come it will. I have not lost hope in humanity, nor have I lost faith in Providence, and I believe the time is not far distant when these results will be accomplished, when the world will become wise enough to do away with this cumbrous and costly system that is robbing the poor, and will adopt a wiser fiscal policy.

Mr. TAYLOR. We listened this afternoon, for some two or three hours, to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), trying to prove that the farmers of Canada were not satisfied with the National Policy. We have also listened to the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), trying to prove that the National Policy is not acceptable to the farmers of this country. Now, let us appeal to the farmers of this country, and see what they will say in respect to this National Policy. Let us go to the Ridings which those hon. gentlemen represent. We will ask Mr. John Clunas, farmer, and Justice of the Peace, at South Dorchester, in the county of Elgin, and see what he will say in reply to the question: "Has the imposition of a duty upon corn proved beneficial to the farmers of this country?" and his reply is:

"That the effect is good on all kinds of coarse grain—on oats, rye, corn, peas and barley. These cereals are all better prices now."

In reply to the question as to whether the cost of agricultural implements has increased, he says:

"Think the cost has not increased. There is an increase of manufactories, which causes competition in reapers, mowers, seed drills, threshing machines, ploughs, and in fact all implements."

And in winding up he says:

"Taking things as a whole, on the protective Tariff since the National Policy came into operation, I think it has done good to the whole Dominion of Canada."

That is the testimony of a gentleman who, I have no doubt, is a warm supporter of the hon. member for West Elgin, from the fact that these questions were sent out by the members representing these counties to leading men in their Ridings asking for these answers. Again, we find that Mr. Cline, Reeve of South Dorchester, county of Elgin, answers this same question in this way:

"The price of oats had been greatly benefitted; rye about the same as before; corn and barley, very materially benefitted; peas not grown on account of the bugs."

I presume the bugs up in that country are the same as they are in this section, a small insect that bores a hole into the pea; and I fancy there are other kinds of bores besides the bugs.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Humbugs.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, in reply to the question as to the cost of farm implements, he says:

"The cost of farm implements is about the same, but they are of better quality; reaper, mowers, drills, &c."

Then, in answer to another question, he says:

"There would have been hundreds of men driven from Canada in search of employment if it had not been for the Tariff, and, furthermore, it has been the means of bringing Canadians back from the United States, and a great many Americans as well."

Now, Sir, here is Mr. Wesley Bunting, farmer, Strathroy, county of Middlesex, and in reply to the first question he says, respecting taking the duty off corn:

"It would not, as it would make a slaughter market of Canada.
 "It has raised the price of our peas from 80 cts. to $1.12½ per bushel; oats have also risen from 25 to 40 cents per bushel.
 "It does not pay to grow rye or corn, as this section is better adapted for wheat.
 "The effect has raised wheat from 90 cts. to $1.28; we do not grow spring wheat."

I could cite a great many others to the same effect.

An hon. MEMBER. Read something from the other side.

Mr. TAYLOR. I fancy these are all supporters of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. The argument made by those hon. gentlemen goes to prove that the National Policy has had an injurious effect upon the prices of grain in this country. The hon. member for West Elgin said it did not help wheat, it did not help barley, it did not help oats, it did not help peas, or any of the farm products of the country. I am not surprised at hon. gentlemen opposite trying to divert attention from the real cause of the injury to part of the cereals raised in this country. I refer more particularly to barley. Barley is the grain principally exported from Canada. The hon. gentleman who spoke last, made the statement that we exported from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 bushels of barley; he is pretty nearly correct, so far as these figures go. I am one of those who believe in the law of cause and effect; that is, if you see a certain effect produced you can define the cause. We cannot charge the National Policy with having worked injuriously in regard to the price of barley; but we can find out what was the cause. I make this statement, and I make it without fear of successful contradiction by hon. gentlemen opposite, that if anything has had a depressing effect on the price of barley it has been the action of the Ontario Government. Previous to 1882, the Brewers' and Maltsters' Association of the United States, which wields as much power as any other association across the lines, was in the habit of sending agents through the different States and to all the principal exporting points in Canada, to make enquiries as to the coming barley crop. After visiting all the grain markets, and looking over the country generally, they returned to the United States and compared notes, and on the result of their visit depended, to a certain extent, the price of barley for that season. In 1882, the paternal Government of Ontario stated to the Brewers' and Maltsters' Association: You need not come here, we will furnish you with all the information through our Bureau of Statistics. And what did that Bureau say? In the report for May, 1882, it announced that there were 248,617 acres sown with barley, that the probable yield, at 28 bushels to the acre, would be 2,545,059 bushels. But in November, just when the crop was commencing to move, the Bureau stated that the probable yield would be 24,284,407 bushels in Ontario. What was the effect of this report going over to the brewers and maltsters of the United States. They said: They have 24,000,000 bushels in Canada. They require about 6,000,000 for their own use and there will be 18,000,000 to come over here, twice as much as they ever sent before. We will lay back and let the crop come forward and will buy it when it arrives at Oswego and other ports on this side. That was the effect it had on the American brewers and maltsters. I was in the business and shipped to Oswego. The brewers would not readily buy, owing to what were considered confidential reports issued by the Ontario Government. How did the crop turn out? The quantity received in the United States, on which duty was paid, from all ports of the Dominion, in the shape of barley and malt, was 11,094,470 bushels. We malted in Canada, for brewing purposes, about 1,000,000 bushels. According to the Ontario Bureau of Statistics we require for seed 1,500,000 bushels. Then I have an estimate for feeding purposes, which I claim to be a liberal one, for every farmer knows that very little barley is fed, as the farmer preserves his seed and sells the balance. I put down, however, 2,500,000 bushels as the quantity fed. These quantities give a total of 16,094,470 bushels, leaving a deficit of 8,189,937 bushels, as compared with the quantity reported by the Ontario Bureau of Statistics. After having done that in 1882, one would imagine that in the interests of the farmers of Ontario, and in the interests of the Province at large, the Bureau would have acted more fairly in 1883. In its May report for 1883 it was stated that the crop would reach 20,613,496 bushels; but in their November report they announced that the crop would produce 18,620,360 bushels, or an average of 24.87 per acre. The Americans said: Canada will have 18,000,000 bushels; deduct from that the quantity which will be required by the Dominion, and there will be 12,000,000 exported. And I am prepared to say that when the returns come in on 1st June, it will be found that the Dominion will not have exported 6,000,000 instead of 12,000,000. What is the effect on the American market? The buyers say they will have more than last year; they wait till it arrives and then proceed to buy at low prices. The action of the Ontario Government, which I believe was done purposely, was taken with the object of depreciating values in the barley market and leading the people to believe that the National Policy worked injuriously against the barley interest; indeed I know the principal argument used in the Lennox election was that the National Policy had produced injurious effects on the barley trade. I see no reason why those figures should have been published by the Ontario Government, except with the object of injuring the National Policy, and in doing that they have injured the farmers of Ontario and the country generally.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. IRVINE. Of course, I may say at the outset, that I did not intend to take any part in this debate. I have not made any notes or looked at any Blue Books; but as a practical man, as a labouring man, as a man not in the habit of clothing my remarks in very nice language, I would beg to offer a few observations on what has been already said. It strikes me as a very remarkable circumstance, from my standpoint, that you can prove anything in the world from the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen have undertaken to prove that it will increase the exports, increase the imports, benefit the manufacturers, benefit the mechanics, the labourers and the farmers, and indeed every man in the country. It has astonished me very much that hon. gentlemen have tried to make it appear that, above all things, it has benefited the farmer. This has been especially the case with the lawyers and professional men, who understand the business of the farmer best. It surprised me very much to hear the statement read by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. When I hear such statements read, I wonder whether the man is sane or not who has given those answers. Any hon. member who stands up in this House, where men are supposed to be informed, and urges that we may be benefitted by a protective duty, even when we have a surplus to export, indulges in a wonderful stretch of imagination. I do not understand how that can be. Of course, he read a letter from a gentleman in some part of Canada, stating that the price of oats had been raised from 27 to 40 cents. If it did so at one time, it certainly has gone back on its good name, for I can tell him that at the present time, in New Brunswick, in my own part of the country, and I am not sure but it is nearly the same in Ontario, oats are selling to-day for 27 cents. Last year they sold for 50 cents a bushel, and I would ask why it is that the National Policy made them sell high last year and low this year? Surely, it must be a most marvellous policy. If the Finance Minister has devised a plan to have them high one year, why does he not keep them up to that pitch; he should give it another turn of the screw, in order to keep it up as high one year as another. I have had several letters this year from farmers, pointing out to me that oats have gone down from 50 to 27 cents, and imploring me to go to the Finance Minister and ask him to try to give his National Policy a little turn, so as to bring oats up to the old figure again. But how it benefits that crop, when we export nearly 4,000,000 bushels, and mostly to the United States, is something that, for the life of me I cannot conceive. I remember last year, the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. Mitchell) telling the House how this policy burdened the lumbermen, and saying that their axes, their chains, their oats, &c., were heavily taxed under that policy. I heard another hon. member, a lumberman, the member for Gloucester, reply to him, and he said that the National Policy had not oppressed the lumbermen—that it had put no more duty on pork than formerly. Then the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wigle) got up and said: "See how the farmer is benefitted by the duty on pork." So this wonderful policy has benefited the farmer by putting a duty on pork; it has benefited the lumberman by not putting a duty on pork; and, according to the hon. member for Northumberland, it burthened and oppressed the lumbermen. I may say, with regard to the farmers, that in my part of the country they are selling their hay for $5 a ton. I cannot say whether the National Policy is to blame, but that is a very low price; and I wish the hon. gentleman would fix his policy so that it would increase the price of that article too. It is very well known how the farmers of this country are treated, with reference to the price of wool. It is well known that we are manufacturing foreign wool, and that this policy, instead of being a blessing to the farmers of this country, is—I was going to say a curse, but perhaps that would be putting it too strong. However, I wish hon. gentlemen, if they wish to speak of the benefits of the National Policy, would talk about some other class than farmers. We are satisfied to live under our grinding taxation, and pay our share. We want to live in peace, we will help to build the railway, we will help the manufacturers of the country, but we do not wish to be stultified by our being told continually that this policy is doing something for us; for the fact is, that it is burdening us with taxes which we would wish to see removed.

Mr. MOFFAT. The hon. gentleman has not given us an opportunity of having the opinions of farmers in his own county other than himself, but I will read the opinion of a gentleman in the adjoining county of York, who says:

"I think it would not be in the interests of the farmers to admit any produce free, because it would tend to lower the price of their own products. It (the National Policy) has the effect of keeping oats higher, as the lumbermen do not use meal as much as formerly. I think I am in a position to know about a good many of the questions asked, and the information given is by comparing the prices as they are now, and even before. I have been in business about ten years as merchant and general dealer."

That, I think, is a sufficient answer to his statement. The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) is evidently a gentleman of patience. He is quite willing to wait for future generations to have better times. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) has spoken of something which he evidently knows little about, when he asserts that the National Policy has acted against the lumber trade. We know that the price of lumber is low, that it has been low for some time, but what is the cause? The cause is over-speculation, and people attempting to do business which they do not control. That is the great cause of the depression in the lumber trade. I believe we are on the eve of a reaction and that the prospects are now better than they have been for years.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On Resolution 1 (page 653),

Mr. BOWELL moved that the item: "Fibre, vegetable, for manufacturing purposes," be struck out. He said: This leaves the article in the free list.

Motion agreed to.

On Resolution 2,

2. Resolved that it is expedient to provide that the following articles shall be subject to and charged with the rates of duty set opposite to each, respectively, from and after the date of the passage of this Resolution, viz:—

1. Acid, Acetic, twenty-five cents per Imperial gallon ..... 25 cts p. I. G.

Mr. BOWELL. Acetic acid is now charged 20 cents per gallon. It is proposed to increase it to 25 cents, for the reason that it is brought in very strong and afterwards diluted, and made into vinegar at a very cheap rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you propose to deal separately with acetic acid, brought in merely for manufacturing purposes?

Mr. BOWELL. No; we treat it all in the same way. We could not very well make the distinction, as the hon. gentleman will see.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I merely wanted to know if the point had been considered as to how it would affect those particular manufacturers who employ acetic acid.

Mr. BOWELL. The question was considered from various standpoints. One was to accept the standard vinegar —No. 6; but it was found that this would necessitate the purchase of a large number of instruments and would require a great deal of instruction to be given to the Customs officers throughout the country, unless the article was transferred to the test of Inland Revenue officers and the ports restricted at which it could be imported, which would be a great disadvantage to the importers. It was thought better just to increase the duty on the article or whatever purpose imported.

2. Caplins, unfinished Leghorn hats, twenty per cent. ad valorem ..... 20 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. The duty on this article, of which Leghorn hats are made, has been 25 per cent. It is now reduced to 20 per cent., which gives a protection of 5 per cent. to the hat maker.

3. Celluloid, moulded into sizes for handles of knives and forks, not bored nor otherwise manufactured, ten per cent. ad valorem .... 10 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. This is a reduction. The article now pays 20 per cent.

4. Carpeting, matting and mats of hemp, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem ..... 25 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. This change is made merely from a customs standpoint. Matting of hemp has been imported and entered as jute, which pays 25 per cent., and we propose to make them both pay the same rate of duty.

Mr. VAIL. Does this apply to all kinds of carpeting?

Mr. BOWELL. Not at all; only to matting and mats of hemp. Woollen carpets pay a much higher duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is just possible that importers might raise a question about the punctuation.

Mr. BOWELL. I will call the attention of the Law Clerk to the matter, so as to have that guarded against. It will be seen, however, that the item reads "carpeting, matting, and mats of hemp."

5. Jeans and coutilles, when imported by corset makers, for use in their factories, twenty per cent. ad valorem ..... 20 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. This is a reduction. Under the Tariff at present, these articles are included in the 27½ per cent. list. It is thought inadvisable to keep them at so high a rate of duty when they are imported for corset making. It is a reduction of 7½ per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. The general public has to pay 27½ per cent., while those who import for this particular trade are to pay only 20 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman knows that on several occasions he has had to alter his Tariff in particulars in which he has one rate for an article when imported for one purpose, and another rate for the general public. He has found that importations have been made under the guise of the particular purpose, but have gone into general consumption; and he has found that the importations for the particular purpose have swollen abnormally. It is a very objectionable mode to have two rates of duty for the same article. What is the amount of duty that he expects to receive from this lower rate?

Mr. BOWELL. That will depend on the number of corsets manufactured in the country. I fully realize the objection made by the hon. gentleman. If it were possible to meet these cases, it would be better to have but one rate of duty; but it is impossible to pass any law to prevent men from making false entries. The sole object of this change is to enable the corset makers to manufacture the article in this country so as to compete with the imported article.

6. Printed or dyed cottons, not elsewhere specified, twenty-seven and a-half per cent. ad valorem ..... 27½ per cent.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BOWELL. The jeans and coutilles, and the printed or dyed cottons, are all at present in the 27½ per cent. list. We have separated them, leaving the printed or dyed cottons, which are about to be manufactured at Magog, in that list, and have placed the jeans and coutilles at 20 per cent. when imported for the manufacture of corsets.

7. Cotton, 42 inches wide and over, when imported by manufacturers of enamelled cloth, for use in their factories, fifteen per cent. ad valorem ..... 15 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. For what other purpose is this imported besides this?

Mr. BOWELL. For various other purposes. Goods of this width are not manufactured in this country.

Mr. BLAKE. Why should it be imported at a lower rate if not manufactured in this country. The principle of production does not apply here. Why should two rates be struck?

Mr. BOWELL. For revenue; you have to consider both points in framing a Tariff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman give us an idea as to the quantity the hon. gentleman supposes will be imported of this particular article on which he proposes to alter the duty?

Mr. BOWELL. There is very little imported and the amount will depend upon the success of this new enterprise which is being started, I think, in the city of Kingston. The promoters of this new factory represented to the Government that, in order to place them in a better position, the duty upon 42 inch width cotton, when imported for the purpose of manufacturing enamelled cloth, should be lowered, so as to enable them to go on with their work. For that reason this change was made.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the ad valorem equivalent to the present specific and ad valorem?

Mr. BOWELL. I will take a note of it and answer the hon. gentleman on Concurrence.

8. Cotton Warp, No. 60 and finer, 15 per cent. ad valorem ..... 15 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. This is for the encouragement of manufacturers of hosiery. There is no warp manufactured in the country finer than 60.

9. Earthenware, decorated, printed or sponged, and all earthenware not elsewhere specified, thirty per cent. ad valorem ..... 30 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. This is not a change in the Tariff but only in the wording. A dispute arose in Montreal as to whether certain classes of earthenware were 20 or 30 per cent. The Department ruled this particular kind of ware as common "C C" ware and the importers contended it was not. They paid their duty under protest and entered an action to recover the difference between 20 and 30. The court decided our ruling was correct, and in order to prevent any difficulty, in the future we now propose to change the wording of the Tariff, so as to bring it within the decision of the court and the intention of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to make a brief statement with reference to the operation of the duty on these goods. I have more than once called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the practical operation of the Tariff upon the cheaper earthenware goods, in consequence of the imposition of duty on packages as well as on the goods themselves. I think the duty is an extremely objectionable one, for various reasons. In the first place, because it is laid at a lower rate ad valorem upon the highest class of china, than upon the lowest class of goods, the cheap earthenware. The class of goods which is used by the wealthier classes is admitted at a lower rate ad valorem than the class of crockery required by the poor, and the objection is still greater when you consider the inevitable incidence of the Tariff on the latter description. This article is very cheap in the market of production, but is, however, very bulky, and the cost of packing and of freight forms a large proportion of the laid down cost. And as the cost of packing and of freight is the same in bulk, it is less in proportion to the value for the higher priced than the lower priced goods. The practical operation of the Tariff is therefore to add an imposition of a very high rate upon an article which, under the circumstances of the country and the article itself, is one which has to bear an immense advance upon the cost of production before it reaches the people here. Now, as far as I can understand, the only works of any kind in this country are the works at St. Johns, of which it is said the gross product is somewhere from $70,000 to $80,000 a year, while our importation of white granite and "C. C." ware—this is "C. C." ware, the hon. gentleman says—for 1882, the entries for home consumption amounted to $388,000 and those of china and porcelain to $189,000, and for 1883 white granite, and "C. C." ware were entered to the amount of $423,000 and of china and porcelain to the amount of $175,000. The unreasonableness of making this charge of a duty upon the packages is shown in detail by considering what the result is to importers, and of course, necessarily to consumers, who have got to pay for the loss. A flour barrel, containing an average value of $3 of these low classed goods, costs 35 cents in the market of the production of the article. The duty charged upon that is 10½ cents, so the cost to the importer of his barrel, irrespective of the contents, is 45½ cents; he sells it for 12½ cents, after unpacking; the loss therefore, in that particular, being 32½ cents. Then, with reference to boxes, the same observation generally applies; and, as to crates and hogsheads, their cost is about 17s. sterling, or $4.12½. The duty charged is $1.37½. So the cost of the crate or hogshead laid down is $5.50, while, after being unpacked and repacked, they sell at $1. The result is that the laying of the duty on these packages, in a case which, I believe, is almost exceptional, because other goods packed, as a rule, are not charged duty on the packages—

Mr. BOWELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLAKE. No; not on the packages.

Mr. BOWELL. Unless the package forms part of the value of the article it contains.

Mr. BLAKE. The practical result, I believe, is that this is almost the only class of goods in which the duty is laid upon the packages.

Mr. FARROW. In salt it is charged duty.

Mr. BLAKE. I say there may be some; I do not say all, exclusively, but almost all. And largely, in the neighbouring Republic, the duty has been taken off packages. Now I wish to give three or four examples of the practical operation of the duty, and of the other charges upon goods of this description, as indicating what the advance is to lay down these goods. I have before me an invoice of last year of eleven crates of white granite, the cost of the goods being £72 6s. 5d. The packages of these goods, which are a cheap class of goods, cost £9 7s., or an addition of 13 per cent. on the goods. The duty was £24 9s. 6d., which, though nominally 30 per cent. on the article, was really 33 per cent. on the article, the excess being occasioned by the duty being laid on the package. The inland cartage and freight, £5 8s. 9d., and £9 18s. 3d., and wharfage 8s. 8d., made 22 per cent. on the value of the article; and, adding cartage and breakage at 11s and £2 12s. 6d., a total is reached of £53 15s. 6d., or 74 per cent. of the value of the article, to lay it down in Montreal. I bring that before the Committee, because I want to point out, by a practical example, what a very large sum necessarily, even irrespective of duty, is added from the character of this article, its fragility and its bulk, to the cost in the market of production; how much in advance the people of the country have to pay beyond the people who live in the country where it is produced; and I show you that, with the duty and with these various charges that are added, an addition is made, in this cheap class of goods, of no less than 74 per cent. to lay it down at Montreal. Now, for protective purposes, I do not believe any such duty is required. I want to make this clear to the Committee, that the duty, under the circumstances in which the Canadian manufacturer stands, is an enormous duty as a protective duty; while, as a mere revenue duty, we ought to have a lower rate, because, under any circumstances, even if you add no duty at all, this article is, from the necessities of the case, costing enormously more than it ought to cost to the people of the country. If you will allow me, I will compare the charges at the St. Johns factory, as given to me, for the same number of crates and for freight. Freight and package, St. Johns to Montreal, $3.25 per crate, which for the eleven crates is $35.75; cartage, $2.75; or a total of $38.50, being £7 14s., as against £50 3s. 8d. That is, £7 14s. represent the charges to bring the goods from the factory at St. Johns to Montreal, packing, freight, and cartage, while the same items and duty represent to the importer from England £50 3s. 8d., being a difference or advantage of £42 10s., which is 60 per cent. on the £72 6s. 5d., the cost of the article. So that, in this cheap article, by reason of the comparative cheapness of wood in this country and consequently the comparative cheapness of the packing, and by reason of the saving of the freight, and by reason of the duty, an advantage, from a protective point of view, is given of no less than 60 per cent. to the Canadian manufacturer. I do not suppose that it will be contended that 60 per cent. advantage is an adequate or reasonable advantage, that it is other than an exorbitant advantage. So I think I have established that, from a protective point of view, the duty is unnecessarily heavy, while I think it will be clear from the other circumstances that, from a revenue point of view, this is not an article which ought to be taxed so high, because, as I have said, it is an unequal tax in its practical bearing, and because, adding the other necessary charges incident to the importation, an enormous advance is made beyond the cost in the market of production. Then, by another invoice which I have, white granite (bests) costs £145 18s. 8d., the packages £22 19s., or 15 per cent. upon the goods; the inland charges and freight were £30 19s. 4d., or 21 per cent. advance; the duty £51 7s., which is 34 per cent. upon the goods, by reason of the duty being laid on the package; cartage, £1 7s.; breakage, £7 5s. 11d.; wharfage, £1 5s., so that we have a total of £115 3s. 3d., an advance, to lay down in Montreal, of over 80 per cent. Then, I have another invoice of twenty-five crates of white granite (thirds). The invoice price is £96 2s. 4d., packages £11 5s., or 22 per cent.; inland and ocean freight, £23 18s. 8d., or 24 per cent.; wharfage, £1 1s.; breakage, £4 16s. 1d.; duty £35 3s. 1d., or 37 per cent., making a total of £86 3s. 10d., or a cost to lay down of 90 per cent. advance, that being the very lowest class of goods. So with another invoice which I have, of the third quality of white granites, used by labourers, in which the invoice price is £218 6s. 2d.; packages, £41 14s. 10d., or 19 per cent.; inland charges and freight, £23 6s. 8d., and £42 6s., or 30 per cent.; duty, £76 2s., over 34 per cent.; freight and cartage to Toronto, for this is a Toronto invoice, £13 2s. 6d., making a total of £196 12s., or an advance of 90 per cent. upon the cost in the market of production. Now, Sir, I have said that not merely was the cost of the class of goods which are used by the masses and the poorest of the community enormous, but also that by the combined operation of a lower rate of duty on the packages, and of the cost of packing and transport of this particular class of goods, the duty was practically a very unequal duty, in that the result was that the person who was wealthy enough to afford to buy his china or porcelain, instead of cheap crockery, bought it very much cheaper. I wish to elucidate that proposition by two practical examples of invoices of china. The first is an invoice of £111 3s. 6d., and the package was £5 7s. 6d., or under 5 per cent.; inland charges, £4 7s. 4d., and the freight, £6 14s. 5d., aggregating £11 1s. 9d., being about 10 per cent. of the value of the goods; cartage, 7s.; duty, £29 2s. 6d., being under 26½ per cent. of the value of the goods; breakage, £5 11s. 2d., the total being an advance of about 46 per cent., as against 80 to 90 per cent. in the cheaper goods. Now, here is an invoice of a hogshhead of china of a comparatively thick description, for farmers' use. The invoice was £24 4s. 6d.; the package, £1 5s., or 5 per cent.; inland charges, 19s. 8d.; freight, 18s. 4d., or 7½ per cent.; the breakage was £1 4s. 3d.; wharfage, 1s. 6d.; being a total of £4 8s. 9d.; duty, £6 7s. 5d., or 26½ per cent. The aggregate charge is £10 16s. 2d., being a cost to lay down of under 45 per cent. Now these are practical results of the present operation of the trade and of this duty, from which it is made quite clear that upon the value of the goods you charge—those which are required by the poorest of the people—a practical duty of from 33 to 37 per cent., say 35 per cent., while you charge on the china and porcelain that is used by the richer classes, something like 26½ per cent., and that in a class of goods, as I have pointed out, in which naturally there is an unequal incidence, in which naturally those who are poor and are obliged to buy the cheapest goods, are charged more than the rich, because the cost of the package and the cost of freight are so enormously disproportionate, with reference to the value in the one class and in the other class. We know the result is that the lay-down cost, when duty and charges are added, is twice as much per cent. upon the value of the earthenware and the lower grade of goods, as it is upon the higher goods, or nearly 90 per cent. in the one case and 45 or 46 per cent. in the other. It does seem to me that the duty on this class of goods calls for revision, that it ought to be lower, and that a duty of 20 per cent. instead of 30 per cent., or the omission of the duty on packages, and the making it 25 per cent., would be much more in accordance with the general view which is taken. I am not now suggesting—of course it would not be reasonable to propose to the Committee a reversal of the Tariff policy of the Government, with reference to some one article, that Tariff policy either considered with reference to revenue, or considered with reference to Protection. I am not engaged in any such attempt; I am simply endeavouring to point out, that in accordance with the general principles of this Tariff as to revenue, and in accordance with the general principles of this Tariff with reference to Protection, this particular duty, laid, as it is, both upon goods and upon packages, is an oppressive and exorbitant duty; that a duty which gives, when you combine with the duty the other advantages as to package and freight, of which I have spoken—an advantage of something like 60 per cent. to the Canadian manufacturer, is too high for protective purposes; and a duty which adds to the lay-down cost such an enormous sum as this does, and so increases the cost to the people of the country, is too high for revenue purposes, properly considered. A duty that operates so unequally as between the rich and the poor, the finer and the lower class of goods, is also a duty which is imperfect and which ought to be changed.

Mr. BOWELL. The case is not so bad as the hon. gentleman has made it. In the first place, he objects to the duty of 25 per cent. on china, and 30 per cent. on the "C.C." or common ware which is manufactured in this country.

Mr. BLAKE.

The principles of the Tariff apply to this particular article as to all others of a similar character. China is not manufactured in this country, nor is it likely to be; hence it is admitted at a lower duty for revenue purposes than that which is and can be manufactured, and has been for a number of years. That is the only reason, and it is a good reason, from a protective standpoint, and also in view of our object in maintaining in existence a number of manufacturing which have been built up and are still growing in the town of St. Johns, in the Province of Quebec. I understood the hon. gentleman to say there are but one or two factories in that town.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I said except the factories in that town.

Mr. BOWELL. It is a very important industry in that particular part of the Province, and there are, no doubt, at the present time, under this Tariff, some six or seven factories of various kinds, some of them engaged in the manufacture of the better classes of ware, that is, the "C.C." stone ware, or what is called the flint, or strong ware made from flint, down to the common Rockingham ware. Any attempt to reduce the Tariff at the present time, considering the fact that they have to import from other countries nearly every article out of which this common ware is made, would result in closing these establishments. The flint has to be imported from England and from France; the wood to which the hon. gentleman refers, and which he says is very cheap in this country and not so cheap in England, is not a material that is used in the manufacture.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not speak of wood for the packages.

Mr. BOWELL. Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. But when you consider the fact that nearly all the articles out of which this ware is manufactured are imported, you will understand that the manufacturers have not as high a protection as has been represented by the figures laid before us. Now, the question of packages is not a new one. When the hon. gentleman was assisting in the Government of this country, neither he nor the Finance Minister of that day thought it advisable to change the rate of duty which was imposed upon packages. It has remained on the Statute Book ever since Confederation, or nearly so. The hon. gentleman is not correct in stating that it applies to this particular article. The packages are chargeable in all cases separately, except where the package is a part and parcel of that which it contains. If the hon. gentleman turns to the Tariff Act, he will find that there is very little difference between the provisions of that clause as it stands upon the Statute Book and what has been the rule for the last ten or fifteen years. Whether the principle of imposing a duty on the packages be correct or not, is a matter which should properly come up when discussion takes place on the Customs Act and the Tariff Act proper. But the hon. gentleman forgot to state, when he made the assertion, that this common ware was sold to the people of this country, at a much higher rate than in the country of its production, that the packages are also made in a foreign country, and that the rate of duty imposed on those packages is not on the value here, but on the value of the article, in the market in which it is manufactured and sold. So that if a person in England purchases in Staffordshire, or wherever the ware may be made, and the packages be sent to any other part of the Kingdom, the consumer has to pay as if it was sent to this country, less, of course the duty. Hence the purchaser, except he goes to the factory, stands relatively, adding the duty and the difference between the freight on goods sent from Staffordshire to any part of the United Kingdom, and from Staffordshire to Canada, in the same position as the purchaser here. I do not suppose hon. gentlemen opposite propose to annihilate the distance or that they could by any Tariff or means reduce the value of the article in that particular respect. We have found it necessary, as far as we could possibly do so, to take off the duty on almost every article which enters into the manufacture of this particular kind of ware; and notwithstanding that fact, and the high duty of 30 per cent. and the amount which is added by charging the duty on the packages, as in all other cases, this being not an exception, it is no more protection than that particular industry requires, if we desire to keep it in existence in this country. When we come to compare the prices of this particular kind of ware in Canada, it will be found to be as cheap if not cheaper than it was seven or eight years ago. You can go to the potteries in St. Johns and purchase a much better article than you could purchase a number of years ago, and obtain it equally as cheap, notwithstanding this duty; and with this protection, and with the policy that has been pursued, and with the production of this ware at a cheaper rate from better material—just as in proportion as we have a better class of article, and in proportion to the quantity produced in our factories, so in proportion will the article be lowered in price to the consumer. At the present time, consumers are not paying any more than they did a number of years ago, when there was a lower Tariff in operation and a much less quantity manufactured in the country.

Mr. HESSON. In regard to this trade I desire to offer a remark or two. The leader of the Opposition in his calculations, appeared to omit the fact that there was a rebate on all of this class of goods imported from the old country, running from 15 to 25 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. HESSON. Did you take that into account?

Mr. BLAKE. Why, of course, I did.

Mr. HESSON. The importation of these goods covers a certain amount of unfinished goods, articles of luxury, which come into this market, and are actually finished by hand. At one place, to my certain knowledge, which I visited, there was a large amount of unfinished ware, burnt, burnt and completely finished. That comes in in the same package.

Mr. BLAKE. That is china?

Mr. HESSON. It is finished to a considerable extent here. That should be taken into consideration, in calculations respecting the importation of common ware, and so reduce to some extent the expense. If it is the means of giving employment to our people, that fact should also be taken into consideration. The question of levying duty on the packages is one which has always, to my mind, been a difficult problem to solve, and if we could get rid of the package question entirely it would be in the interest of the whole country. I must say, however, that if it would conflict with the industries established under the National Policy, I believe the general wish of the public would be that the Minister acted properly in maintaining the duty on packages. If you consider the question of packages, it might be extended further, so as to cover flour barrels belonging to foreign importations, as such barrels are of foreign manufacture and compete with the industries of this country. But it is a question, of course, which has to be considered as a tax upon the people; and objection should not come from the leader of the Opposition, who appears rather to favour the reduction of taxation whether it affects the industries of the country or not. He does not appear to realize the fact that the wish of the people is to protect our various industries. The hon. gentleman has not come to learn that yet; I presume the people will teach him by-and-by. The hon. Minister should be maintained in the position he occupies, as against that of the hon. gentleman, which was, that it was desirable, in the interest of the country to obtain cheap goods for a time, though in the end they might be dear. If we were paying, at the present time, a little more for common qualities of ware, it might be possible within two or three years to cheapen the price, as was the case with cotton goods, which hon. gentlemen said would be very much increased by the National Policy, as well as woollen goods. I think it is just possible, within two or three years, by a little encouragement of our own industries, to give employment to our people and obtain cheap goods as well. I hope the hon. Minister will pursue his policy in the interests of the industries established, and not take measures which might cripple them; it matters not in what Province of the Dominion they may be established.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman in his meanderings, which it would be rather a difficult thing to do; and I suppose we are here to discuss the question of crockery and common ware. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. gentleman say this was an article of luxury. So far as my experience goes, it is an article of common use and necessity, and the particular ware to which the observations of the leader of the Opposition were directed, is in general use throughout the country. I think the Minister of Customs is mistaken in one statement, and that is that the particular kind of crockery in question is cheaper now than it was seven or eight years ago. That does not accord with my own experience. It is dearer, and decidedly dearer. With regard to the question of duty on packages, the hon. Minister failed to seize the point, or, at least, to reply to the position taken by the leader of the Opposition, with respect to this particular kind of package, used for the packing of this common ware. As the leader of the Opposition said, these packages are very costly in comparison to their contents, and for this reason the duty upon them becomes peculiarly oppressive. I am just as well aware as is the hon. Minister that, so far as the principle of imposing duty on packages is concerned, he and his colleagues are not responsible for it. That principle, which I consider a very faulty one, was established some time ago. But the contention of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and a perfectly reasonable one as I think, was that owing to the great cost of the packages used in packing this ware in connection with the duty itself, the enhancement of the price of something which goes into common use in this country is made very great. Nothing which the Minister of Customs said was, to my mind, at all a satisfactory or effective reply to the position taken by the leader of the Opposition, that the duty is excessive. It seems to me that this is carrying the principle of Protection to such an excess as to make it unreasonable. If, in order to establish and make prosperous an industry, we have to grant it a protection of 60 or 70 per cent., I think we had better turn our efforts in some other direction.

Mr. ORTON. Though I quite agree with the general ideas expressed by the Minister of Customs, in reference to the importance of protecting this particular industry, I also agree with the leader of the Opposition in the remarks he made as to the inconsistency which appears to exist in the mode in which duties are imposed, when we find such an excess of protection given to one class of industry and a very deficient protection given to another. The article of flour has been mentioned. The duty on flour is a specific duty of 50 cents per barrel. There is no duty on the package or barrel, and when we recollect that it requires four and a-half, or four and three-quarters bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, if the Tariff were consistent, there would be at least 65 cents per barrel on flour. When we consider this fact in connection with the fact that our railways discriminate in favour of the American manufacturers of flour,

I think it would be proper to draw the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that the millers of this country do not receive the protection which they should; and I say further, in connection with this question, that the Canadian farmer does not receive the protection which he should receive upon his wheat. During the six months ending the 31st December, the amount of flour imported into this country was 224,946 barrels, of the value of $1,069,000—

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to a point of order. We are discussing the question of crockery, not flour.

Mr. ORTON. I thought packages was the question.

Mr. BLAKE. Packages of crockery?

Mr. ORTON. I wish to discuss the duty on packages—the duty on barrels containing flour.

Mr. BLAKE. The question is, Mr. Chairman, is flour crockery.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a "flowery land" at any rate.

Mr. ORTON. I have no desire to be out of order, but if I understood the remarks of the leader of the Opposition, they pertained chiefly to the duties imposed on packages.

Mr. BLAKE. Packages of crockery.

Mr. ORTON. Then the hon. gentleman was very much out of order during the latter portion of his remarks.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman is quite in order. The question before the Committee is certainly the question of packages—the duties on packages of crockery—and the argument on the other side was that there was an excessive duty on this particular article, as compared with others. My hon. friend behind me has followed up the same argument. He says the duties on crockery are excessive, and he compared it with the duty on the package in which flour is contained. He goes on to argue in the same line of argument as the leader of the Opposition, by comparing the duty on the packages on this article with the duty on the packages on another article.

Mr. ORTON. I wish to carry on the same argument that my hon. friend did, and to show, from the fact that no duty is imposed on the packages on which flour is contained, that the Government are hardly giving fair play to the milling industry, and further, to the wheat raising industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. ORTON. I still maintain that the leader of the Opposition went on to argue, during his remarks, that the duty placed on packages was a great injustice to the consumers of cheap crockeryware, and his chief argument was with reference to the duty on packages. I am replying to that argument, and I maintain that it is still perfectly in order for me to point out the injustice that is done by this defect. All I wish to say, in conclusion, is that in six months we imported the large quantity of 224,000 barrels of flour, amounting to something like 1,000,000 bushels of wheat, and that it was not only an injustice to the milling industry, but the wheat producers of this country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am sorry, if I was out of order in attempting to speak before, but as the hon. gentleman tried to sit down three or four times, as I thought, and did not quite succeed, I must excuse myself to the House, on the ground that I was under a wrong impression. I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman through his argument, but I wish to allude to one suggestion he threw out, that the farmers are not sufficiently protected. I wish to enter my protest against that idea. I think if there is one class above another who are prosperous and doing well in this country, it is the farmers; and coming, as I do, from a consuming part of the country—from a lumbering and fishing country—I wish to protest against what I imagined to be the drift of the hon. gentleman's remarks, in calling the attention of the House to the fact that the farmers were not, as he contended, sufficiently protected. I hope I did not understand my hon. friend to desire that a duty should be imposed on packages of flour.

Mr. ORTON. Yes; I desire to see a duty placed on every barrel brought into this country from a foreign country.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I must distinctly dissent from the proposition put forward by my hon. friend. Sir, there was only one justification for imposing a duty on bread-stuffs, which enter so largely into the consumption of this country, particularly the poorer classes. I admit that it is a policy which was forced upon us from necessity; it is a policy which went to build up our country, to protect us from being flooded by foreign manufactures. It was necessary to adopt a policy which would keep our people at home and protect our industries. But there is a limitation to it, and we should not run Protection to the ground; and I think the course suggested by my hon. friend should not be adopted, or any course that would put any addition on the duty which would weigh upon the poor man and the labourer—a duty which, I think myself, should never have been put on, if possible to avoid it I do not hesitate to express that opinion. I shall say no more on this point. The proposition is too ridiculous to require refutation, and, therefore, I think it is unnecessary to occupy the time of the House any longer about it. I am just going to make a remark on one or two points that struck me in relation to this debate. I entirely agree with the proposition put forward by the hon. member for West Durham, in reference to the packages of crockery. Everybody acquainted with the import trade of this country knows that the value of the packages in which this common ware is imported, bears no proportion to the value of the article imported. I can understand that there may be a certain class of packages which, after they are brought into this country, may be used for some other purpose after the contents are removed, so that they have an intrinsic value nearly equal to their original cost. In that case, a duty should be imposed on the packages. I think it is in such cases that the Minister of Customs should exercise his discretion in submitting a measure of this kind to Parliament. But every one knows that one of these crockery crates, after the crockery is removed, has comparatively no value, and becomes almost a nuisance to the importer. In that particular item, I think the Minister should revise the class of duties which are now under the consideration of the House. There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and to which I called attention last Session, when the Minister of Customs was consolidating and revising the Customs laws of this country. On that occasion I endeavoured to get some of the incongruities and inconsistencies in the Statute remedied; but I found that the hon. gentleman was quite impervious to the suggestions I made. He had made up his mind, and when he does it is pretty hard to change it except by necessity or force. I told him that I had been informed by a gentleman largely engaged in the crockery trade, in Montreal, that there were certain classes of packages in his trade, upon which he paid duty, and certain other classes upon which he did not pay duty. I will give the illustration now that I did then. I said that if you import a case of lamp burners and chimnies, you will have to pay duty upon the packages which contain the chimneys of the lamps, but the packages which contain the burners, which are metal, are not charged duty; and I pointed out that that being the case, a discrimination was made in favour of the hardware men and against the crockery men of the country. I think that ought to be remedied. I feel that it is useless for us to attempt to get this Tariff materially altered. I do not want to see anything done that will interfere with the policy of protecting our industries; but I do not want to see that policy run into the ground, and our industries protected too much. Where there is discrimination against one trade, I desire to see that discrimination removed; and I think I have shown that discrimination does exist in regard to these packages. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, and I do not know that I would have said anything but for the suggestion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington, in favour of further taxing the food of the poor man.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. Minister of Customs, in answering my observation, made use of one of the arguments frequently made use of when attacks are made on a Tariff of this description. He declared that goods were cheaper now than they were seven or eight years ago. My hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), denies the accuracy of that proposition. I have not myself enquired into the matter, and cannot raise my voice on one hand or the other; but this I will say, that the hon. gentleman can make no pretence of establishing the proposition, that any lowering in the price of these goods is due to this Tariff. I have given the amount of the importations in 1882 and 1883, which is an increasing amount—about five times as great as the amount of the domestic production. To state, under these circumstances, that the Tariff has caused a reduction in the price of the imported goods, at a time when every cent of the protection, direct and incidental, is necessary to keep the factory alive—that is, that the goods cannot be sold cheaper and live—is, it seems to me, absurd. An addition of 70 per cent. has been made in the duty on these goods, and the result has been to increase the price proportionately, unless by some occult manner, the cheaper the English goods become the higher the duty is raised. But the hon. gentleman says it is not so, because the English maker has to pay part of the cost. He says that he has to pay the cost of the package, too. He has to pay for a package, but there is the difference. In the first place, it is a package of a different description, and in the second place, it is worth more. He pays the cost of a wooden package in England—a barrel, a box, a crate, or a hogshoad, and that barrel box, or crate is worth more in England than here. In many cases, in England, it is returned to the factory and the loss is simply the return freight; or if not returned, it is saleable at a higher rate, and consequently the cost of the package does not, to anything like the extent to which it falls upon the consumer here, fall upon the consumer in England. Of course, if a crate cost 17s. and you pay $1.35 duty, making that crate cost in Montreal $5.50, and the importer is to realize only $1 on it, that balance of $4.50, with profits upon it, must be borne by the consumer here. But if, on the other hand, the English retail merchant, purchasing from Staffordshire, is able to send his crate back to be filled again, or is able to sell it at something approximating the original cost, this item becomes an insignificant one. Here, however, the importer does not realize even the duty he pays, so that the carriage and prime cost is all loss to the consumer, besides the duty. No effort has been made to refute the proposition that the duty imposed is grossly unequal, as between the rich and the poor, and inequality occurs in a case in which the necessary incidents of the trade are such as to produce an inequality even if there was no duty; so that such inequality is exaggerated instead of being mitigated by the incidence of the Tariff. Nor is any proof brought forward in contradiction to the proposition I have advanced, viz., that for protective purposes, having regard to the advantages the Canadian manufacturer has in the saving of the freight on this bulky article, in the cheaper packing of an article of this description in this wooden country of ours—the advantage he obtains from the duty, freight and package is so enormous that it amounts to a protection of about 60 per cent. on the lowest class of goods. As to the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson), who informs us that these articles are luxuries; I always supposed they were necessities, and I invite the hon. gentleman to discuss that subject with his constituents, of whatever rank in wealth, when next he visits Perth, and ascertain from them whether they do not regard the crockery they use in their drawing room, dining room and chambers as rather a necessity than a luxury. The hon. gentleman says we must look to other considerations. Why, he says, there is a large quantity of this crockery that comes out to this country, and it is actually decorated here; crests are put upon it and it is hand-painted; and, he says, the poor man who is charged this enormous additional advance on the cost of his goods is to be consoled and gratified by the reflection that the wealthy man who has his crest put upon his goods, has it done in Canada.

Mr. McLELAN. I have seldom heard a stronger argument, whether in this House or elsewhere, in favour of the protection and encouragement of the manufacture of goods in this country, than that delivered by the hon. gentleman. He has proved to us, by figures, that it is impossible for a poor man ever to obtain cheap crockery in this country unless it be manufactured here.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. McLELAN. Unless we can encourage the manufacturers in this country, until they are masters of their business. The hon. gentleman has shown by figures that there is an enormous percentage of cost upon this article, on account of the packages; that the prices charged by English manufacturers for packages are far in excess of what they charge in the case of any other description of goods sent to this country. He has shown that the cost of the crate is a large percentage, that the wharfage, and the freight, and the breakage of the articles forms another large percentage, and adding all these together, he gets about 60 per cent. additional cost, inclusive of the duty. This condition of things will always exist. You can never get clear of that percentage of cost as long as you are importing the article from England. The hon. gentleman has told us: You can get it from the St. Johns manufactory; that that which has cost £9 or £10 sterling, in package, from England, will only cost $2 or $3 in St. Johns, and the freight and charges in Canada are comparatively trifling, so that if we want cheap crockery for the poor man, we must have it manufactured in this country. The hon. gentleman said that the Minister of Customs declared manufacturers would not be able to live if we reduced the duty. We are not changing the duty. Everyone who has had experience in manufacturing knows that, for the first year or two, the operations are not very successful.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long is this factory established?

Mr. McLELAN. For two or three years. If the manufacturer be able to maintain himself for the first two or three years, he becomes gradually master of his business and gradually manufactures cheaper, so that, by giving this protection for a few years, we shall, in the end, obtain for the poor man cheap crockery. There was a cotton factory started in the city of Halifax twelve months ago. One of the directors told me that when they first ran, it cost them for the first few months about 40 cents per pound to manufacture a pound of it into cloth, but they had at last become masters of the position, to such an extent that they were now able to manufacture that same pound of cotton wool for 6½ cents. From this, it will be seen that if you uphold the manufacturers for a time, you will get the cheapest crockery; whereas if you do not, we will never get rid of these 50 or 60 per cent. extra charges.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is certainly ten or twelve years since these factories are in operation. I have seen very good ware on exhibition in several parts of the country, certainly eight or nine years ago; and as for the question of time, our American friends have been trying for a hundred years to protect their iron industry, and their present Tariff averages 60 to 80 per cent. on this industry. So that, if this be an indication of the time it will take to raise these infant industries to a self-supporting condition, the poor man will have a long time to wait for his cheap crockery. We are constantly told that things are cheaper. Perhaps they are; perhaps they are not. I notice the hon. Finance Minister was exceedingly shy about giving any facts or proofs of the cheapness he alleged to exist, nor has the hon. gentleman opposite condescended to give any proof of that statement. But, Sir, what is the fact? We know this, that the whole nature of manufactures all the world over is and ought to be to go on making things cheaper, by reason of the various inventions that are coming to maturity from time to time. We ought to get manufactured goods cheaper all the time, and we would have them cheaper in this country if it was not for this Tariff and for the excessive misgovernment which we have in this country now.

Mr. HESSON. I would like to correct a misapprehension conveyed by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake), when he said I would have to meet my constituents on the question of this crockery imported into this country being a luxury. Now, I consider that a certain quality of it is a necessity in every household, and my remarks did not imply that it was a luxury; but I spoke of that quality which is brought into the country which the hon. gentleman spoke of as a common crockery, unfinished, which is finished in this country by hand painting, upon which you could have the family crest—if you were distinguished by such a mark—and I said that was a luxury. I said nothing about the cost to the country; but, after all this, I come back to the actual facts of the case, and what are they? A package costs about £1 sterling in the old country. On an average, it contains about 100 dozen of cups and saucers. The duty on that would be about $1.25 or $1.50, at the outside, which would be about 1½ cents per dozen. I have been in business for thirty odd years myself, and I have yet to learn that the first head of a household has had occasion to complain because of the extensive cost of the necessities, as my hon. friend would say, of crockery ware. Now, the finer wares may be costly. They will be costly, because there is no competition, and there is not likely to be, in the manufacture of these in this country; but I still hold that the principles which govern the legislation of the country to-day, and the Tariff, and the policy of the Government, is that of Protection; and, viewing it in that interest, I cannot see any occasion for the Minister consenting to alter this policy, whereas it may have an influence, or possibly produce the disaster that would arise by any change of that policy, to certain industries that are established, with that principle in force at present. I feel that that is a matter of very vital importance to the men who have invested their capital in it, and the tax does not press very heavily even on the poorest family, because they do not buy a great many dozens of crockery in the year, for the housewives of Canada are prudent, and try to save their crockery, as they do other things which are common necessities of a household. It is not a very extravagant tax, and my remarks were intended to show that that class of goods covered the unfinished ware brought into this country and finished here, and that gave employment to the people of Canada, and that finish was paid for by those who could afford to pay for it.

Mr. McLELLAN.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to the observation of the Minister of Marine, it seems to amount to this: that the greater the natural advantages of manufacture in this country are, the greater the natural advantages that the domestic manufacturer has over the foreign producer of the goods, the more circumstances favour him, the more it is essential that you should add to these advantages by a high Customs wall besides. I pointed out advantages which circumstances gave the manufacturer, that have been alluded to in the course of the debate on the Tariff, and that were alluded to in the course of a discussion the other day, when a quotation was made from a speech of an hon. gentleman, who pointed out very properly that a 15 per cent. Tariff did not mean a 15 per cent. Tariff for protective purposes, but a 20 per cent. Tariff, because there was 5 per cent. on the average to be added for freight. Well, 5 per cent. on the average, of course, means less than 5 per cent. on some goods and more than 5 per cent. on other goods. I pointed out that there was an enormous proportion of these goods, and I gave the freight which gives that advantage to the domestic manufacturer. I pointed out also that, this being a wooden country, he had another advantage in reference to his packages; I pointed out the combined effect of these two advantages, and I argued that this ought to be taken into account when you deal with this Tariff from a protective point of view—that you must take the natural advantage he has and the artificial advantage you propose to add to it, and I pointed out that this was equal to an advance of 60 per cent., and I declared, and I repeat, that that is an exorbitant advantage.

Mr. ORTON. I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) to pass without notice. He charged me with making ridiculous remarks in this House, and with being the enemy of the poor man. Although I shall not characterize his remarks on this and other occasions as being ridiculous, because it is unparliamentary to do so, I may say, in regard to who is and who is not the friend of the poor man, I think the man is a friend who speaks in defence of those who consume the crockery ware which is imported, and which we are discussing to-night, which produces the wealth which sets in operation our manufactories, and gives employment to the labouring man and the poor man, who are the consumers of the fish, even which the fishermen of the Lower Provinces catch and send into our country. Where can you find a better friend of the poor man than the man who tries to advocate the interest of the farmers of this country?

Mr. FARROW. I think myself that there is a great deal of truth on both sides of the question. I am glad it has brought out one confession from the opposite party. They have a great deal to say about the poor man's interests just now. They had not always that story to tell. When they taxed the tea that was worth $1 a pound, at the same rate as they taxed the 25 cent tea, then where were the poor man's interests? I suppose, if they got into power to-morrow, or ten years from now, or, as my friend here said, last year, fifty-four years from now, they will be able to redeem their ways, and will follow, after another plan, that they will give the poor man some advantage. I think I know a little about this crockery business, too, and I agree with the hon. member for West Durham to a certain extent. I really do think that this duty is pressing a little on the poor man, and I must confess, from my own knowledge, having begun to sell crockery about the year 1858, and continued for a good many years looking after it, that I did happen to go into a store the other day—I am pretty well acquainted with most kinds of store goods—and I really thought, and I still think, that there is a little advanced price on this kind of ware that the hon. member for West Durham is speaking about. There is another thing strikes me, which I would like to mention. Is this country adapted for the production of this kind of ware? It is not a luxury; it is in the poor man's house, and in the rich man's house also. The hon. Minister of Customs said that certain articles that entered into the manufacture of this ware had to be imported from the old country, and ground up and prepared in order to manufacture it. I did not know that before; therefore, I came to the conclusion that this country was not specially adapted for the production of this kind of ware. If we think it is pressing upon the poor man rather more than upon the rich man, let us do as the judges do in the Courts of Justice—give them the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to make one observation in reply to the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) who is very smiling this evening, and whom I always listen to with great satisfaction—at a distance—and feel that he occupies, perhaps, a good deal of time in the House, quite as much as I do myself. I would say this in reply to the hon. gentleman's remark about the people of our section of the country being indebted to the far west for the consumption of their fish. Sir, a very small percentage of the fish we catch in our Province finds a market in the hon. gentleman's county, and where they consume one barrel of our fish we consume, at least, ten barrels of their flour. When I felt it my duty to call attention to the fact that, in addition to the heavy duty already imposed on the article of flour, and suggesting that the duty put on these packages in which flour is carried is adding to the duty upon the farmer's bread, I think I was quite in my place in doing so, and I was only performing that duty which I am called upon to perform as one of their representatives. Look at the relative position of the two sections of the country. My hon. friend's county is a farming community. He is the mouthpiece of the farmers of this country, and he attends to their interests pretty well. I am not finding fault with him, from his standpoint, for attempting to increase the duties on agricultural products, but I do find fault with his attempt to increase the duty on packages. I call that rubbing it in rather too stiff, and running Protection into the ground. In my county, one of the first counties in the Province from which I come, we have no Protection of any kind; while my hon. friend's constituency is largely composed of farmers, who have protection upon almost everything they raise out of the ground. And if I stand here to-day as a protectionist, representing a county that gets no benefit from Protection, I do it upon the broad principle that it is not alone for the county that I have the honour to represent that I sit here as a legislator. While looking out for their interests when I can do so, I come here to legislate for the country at large, for the Dominion of Canada, to adopt and sustain a policy that will protect Canada against foreign importations that would make a slaughter market of our country; and it is because of that apparent inconsistency in the course I pursue and in the votes I give, in sustaining a protective policy that does not specially benefit my locality, that I feel it necessary to make this explanation. Sir, I hold that while we have a duty to our respective counties, we have a greater duty to our country. And standing in the position of a representative of a county which gets no protective advantages, which has its pork taxed, its flour taxed, and which, from the standpoint of my hon. friend would also have its barrels taxed—I say it will be inconsistent for this House to run Protection into the ground by adopting the policy which my hon. friend advocates. After the pledge I got the other day—though, I admit, it is a very doubtful one—from the hon. Finance Minister, who, I am sorry to see, is not in the House, in reference to corn meal, I do not intend to say anything further about it; but I do wish to say, in the presence of the Ministry, that in that article of corn meal, which enters largely into the consumption of the labouring classes, the fishermen and lumbermen of our country, I do hope that those hon. gentlemen will not be so inconsistent as to continue the duty on corn meal, an article that cannot be grown, and is not generally produced in our country.

Mr. ORTON. It can be grown.

Mr. MITCHELL. If it can be, it is not grown, and it cannot be grown to advantage. The remark is very apropos in illustrating the observations of my hon. friend, who always speaks common sense when he gets up. There are certain industries that cannot be profitably pursued in this country, and the growth of corn is one of them; just as in many manufactures the business cannot be profitably pursued. In regard to Protection, my view is this: That everything that can be profitably prosecuted in this country in which there is an inherent profit, shall be afforded a reasonable protection; while everything that cannot be so produced by reasonable protection, I would oppose a protective duty upon it, at the expense of certain classes in the country. And I hold that in the article of corn meal, which is an article largely consumed by the poorer classes of the community, the Government of the day ought to take off that duty, even although it would bring corn meal into competition with the coarser grains which are grown by our farmers at large. The farmers are pretty well protected in this country; they get a great deal of consideration from this House, and the men who live down by the sea—and I am glad to find my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Stairs) endorsed the sentiments which I have uttered—the men who live down by the sea, who have no Protection, should have some consideration at the hands of gentlemen who direct the affairs of this country. I am glad I have had an opportunity of stating these views thus publicly, notwithstanding I may differ from my hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), whose good opinion I esteem so highly.

Mr. MILLS. It is pretty obvious that some heterodox views are creeping into the political orthodox economy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have had remarks from several hon. gentlemen on that side of the House on this subject, and amongst others the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, complaining of the tax upon various articles, and asking that these taxes should be removed, in the interests of the poorer classes of our population. Now, Sir, those were not the views that were put forward by the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches during the past five or six years. They told us the taxes were paid by the foreigners; that the tax on the corn meal, the tax on the flour—

Mr. MITCHELL. I never told you that.

Mr. MILLS—and the tax on all those various articles was borne by the foreigners, by those who produced those articles, and from whom the people of this country purchased them. Why, Sir, we have been told, over and over again, that the people across the border were imposing taxes upon the products of this country sent across the line, and that we ought to imitate them and impose taxes on their products, and collect taxes from them as they had collected taxes from us. Now, Sir, one hon. gentleman has told us about the inequality of the tax on tea—that the cheap tea and the dear tea were taxed alike; that, in fact the poorer classes of the population, whom he assumed, used the very cheap article of tea, paid an undue amount of tax. Well, Sir, I supposed from the line of argument adopted by those hon. gentlemen, that it was the Chinese who paid the tax, and that it was a matter of no consequence to us, whether we impose a tax upon Chinamen who send abroad a cheap article of tea, or a tax upon Chinamen who send abroad a dear article of tea. What difference does it make to us? Why not remove these taxes, if they are not borne by our population. If what the hon. Minister of Customs has told us this evening, that the more taxes that are imposed on these foreign productions the cheaper these goods are to the consumer, be true, why should not all these taxes be removed, and why should not the Minister impose additional taxes upon these foreign people, who are so foolish as to send to this country their goods to our market?

Mr. ORTON. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister of Customs has told us this evening that these goods are cheaper than they ever were before. An hon. gentleman has said he does not want to see this country made a slaughter market. We were told some time ago that it was being made a slaughter market.

An hon. MEMBER. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS. I am discussing the observations made by the Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken. They have told us that the tax on these packages was removed, and I am calling attention to the fact that the taxes on these packages they have hitherto told us were borne by the foreigners from whom we purchased the goods—

Mr. BOWELL. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman told us this evening that you could get these goods cheaper to-day than ever before. How can you get them cheaper unless some person pays these taxes? How is it possible that the price of goods can be lowered to the consumer unless some other party than the consumer pays the taxes? That is the view the hon. Minister has been putting forward, the view which hon. gentlemen opposite have all along put forward, although they took precious good care, when a reshipment took place, that the taxes should be remitted to the party whom they say never pays them.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). This question will soon right itself. I happen to have some little knowledge as to the preparation of the ordinary crockery which has been spoken of to-night. I am quite satisfied, and I can assert it as a fact, that in our North-West Territory we have thousands of square acres of finer clay than that which we now import from Glasgow and New Jersey for manufacturing purposes in Quebec and elsewhere. I know this, because I am practically in the business, and have men engaged at St. Johns and Quebec. I saw thousands of acres of better material on the Saskatchewan and Bow Rivers than that which we are importing from those two points to day.

Mr. BLAKE. How much more would it cost to import the material from Saskatchewan and Bow River than from Glasgow.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will make the calculation and hand it to the hon. gentleman in detail.

10. India rubber, vulcanized handles for knives and forks, ten per cent. ad valorem ..... 10 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In this item we provide that India rubber, vulcanized handles shall pay 10 per cent. and in the next we provide that iron forks shall pay 10 per cent. I can understand well enough that the hon. gentleman may desire to encourage particular industries, but I do not understand that an industry for the putting together of imported handles and forks is one worthy of a subsidy. I call the Minister's attention to the fact for this reason: I was informed in former years that in the United States such practices were frequent and that articles were, by some arrangements, brought here in pieces and put together. I hope the hon. gentleman will not encourage such practices. The object of this, I suppose, is to benefit some industry that is to be established.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not to encourage an industry that is to be established. There is already an establishment in

Mr. MILLS.

Montreal, and this induced the Government to reduce the duty upon handles, which are used in the manufacture of the completed article. There is not sufficient business to warrant the importation of machinery required to manufacture iron forks; and it is proposed to allow the forks to come in in the rough, just as they come from the mould or the press, the polishing and finishing to be done here.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the duty upon the completed fork?

Mr. BOWELL. Twenty-five per cent. Twenty per cent. when they come in in the rough.

11. Iron, cast-iron forks, not handled, ground or otherwise further manufactured, ten per cent. ad valorem ..... 10 per cent.
12. Labels for fish cans, and other uses, printed or painted, a specific duty of six cents per pound, and twenty per cent. ad valorem..... 20 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. The reason for making this change is to prevent the undervaluations which are continually made in the entry of these goods, and it was deemed advisable to place upon those articles a mixed rate, so much per pound and an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent., instead of the 30 per cent., in which class these goods are now. Upon a more close calculation it was found that 6 cents per pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem was not in many cases as high a duty as the 30 per cent. they now bear; I would therefore move that the item be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

12. Labels for fruit, vegetables, meat, fish, and confectionery; also tickets and advertising bills and folders, a specific duty of ten cents per pound and twenty per cent. ad valorem ..... } 10 cents per lb. and 20 per cent.

Motion agreed to, and item amended.

13. Pins manufactured from wire of any metal, thirty per cent. ad valorem..... 30 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. The Finance Minister, in his Budget Speech, explained this matter. At present brass pins are 30 per cent.; steel pins, 20 per cent., and iron, of which there are but few, 25 per cent. The object is to secure uniformity, and to encourage this industry, of which there is an establishment at Galt.

Progress reported, Committee to sit again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 12:45 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 7th March, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell), from the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, presented the second report of the said Committee, recommending that Messrs. Bouchard and LaSalle be appointed as additional translators of the official report of the Debates of this House, for the work of the present Session remaining to be done, and that they be paid pro rata at the rate of $800.

LAW OF EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Mr. Speaker, I find, on a reference to the Order Paper of to-day, that Bill (No. 3) to further amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases, has disappeared from the Notice Paper. I propose submitting a motion to the House to restore it to the Order Paper again. The Bill has had extraordinary vicissitudes so far in the House. When I moved the second reading of the Bill a motion was made that it be read in six months, but a majority of 47 voted in favour of the second reading. The Bill was read the second time and referred to a Select Committee, with the approval of the First Minister. The Select Committee examined the Bill and reported it to the House without amendment. In due course I moved that you leave the Chair and that the Bill be referred to Committee of the Whole. A motion was made that you do not leave the Chair then, but that you do so in six months. That motion was defeated by a majority of five. The Bill was referred to Committee of the Whole and the Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. On a subsequent day the Bill was referred to Committee of the Whole without discussion, and the first clause was passed while we were in Committee of the Whole. The first clause was the important clause, and affirms the principle that the accused in certain cases shall be competent to testify in his own behalf. After the clause was adopted by the Committee a motion was made by the hon. member for Quebec Center (Mr. Bossé) that the Committee do rise, and that motion was carried by a majority of seven. Now, as I do not believe that that was a fair expression of the views of the members of this House, I propose asking that the Bill be restored to the Order Paper. I have no objection of course to a fair, open, and manly opposition to the Bill. If the principle of the Bill does not commend itself to the judgment of this House then the House should throw it out upon the motion for the second reading. But I object very strongly to the kind of political assassination that has found its way into Parliament within the last five years by which a Bill, though it has had its second reading, been approved by a Select Committee, and gone into Committee of the Whole, has been assassinated in Committee of the Whole, in the dark, without any person being responsible for the assassination, and without the public knowing who the assassins really are. Now I propose that the Bill be restored to its proper place on the Order Paper. I do not desire to reopen the discussion on this Bill. I would not make any observations now, after those I have made, were it not for the course taken some nights ago by the Secretary of State. I am ready to admit that the Secretary of State led the only argument that can properly be called an argument against the Bill. I would have answered him there and then, but the Secretary of State, for reasons best known to himself, took care not to oppose it until I had made my reply, and according to the rules of the House I could not speak again.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend will allow me to tell him that I was absent when he replied, and did not know that the debate was over. I came in and made my remarks after I had returned from the corridor where some parties wished to see me; and I apologised to the hon. member for doing so.

Mr. CAMERON. Whatever the reason the effect of it was that I was prevented from replying to the Secretary of State there and then, because he spoke after I had made my reply. Now in the Secretary of State's remarks upon that occasion he prided himself upon being an admirer of the English system of jurisprudence in respect to Criminal Law; and he said it was a system that had worked well, that it could not well be improved, and that so far as he was concerned he desired to adhere to it. In reply to that statement of the hon. gentleman all I have to say is this: The hon. gentleman must well know that the Criminal Law in England has undergone many and important changes during the last fifty years. He must know that there is hardly a Session of the Imperial Parliament in which changes, improvements, and modifications of the Criminal Law, are not made. Changes have been made of an important character since the time that it was a capital felony to commit the offence of sheep stealing; when it was a capital felony to commit the crime of larceny; when it was a capital felony to forge a £5 note; and when a very able and eminent English Judge stated that to repeal the law making forgery a capital felony would strike a fatal blow at the commercial and business prosperity of the country. Now I very much fear that the Secretary of State's turn of mind in somewhat like that of the eminent Judge to which I have referred. The hon. gentleman must know quite well that changes in the law of England have been made on this very subject within the last ten years, and that changes are now contemplated further than I propose to go in this Bill. He must know that in England, as well as in Canada, the principle of the Bill has been recognized over and over again, and I do not propose to adopt any new principle in the legislation with respect to our Criminal Laws. The Secretary of State must know that under the Plimsoll Act in England, by which certain acts on the part of owners of vessels are made criminal, the accused is a competent witness in his own behalf. He must know that, according to our laws in Canada, in cases of assault the accused is a competent witness, and under the Election Law both in England and Canada the accused is a competent witness in his own behalf. The hon. gentleman must know perfectly well that England in this respect has been marching on during the last ten or fifteen years, and just as experience matures and ripens the judgment of thoughtful men, especially law reformers, that experience is crystalized into Acts of Parliament, and the law has been changed from time to time in criminal matters just as circumstances require. The hon. gentleman must know that in 1873 at the instance of the Imperial Government a commission was appointed, composed of some of the most able members of the Long Robe, to examine and investigate into the whole question of the criminal code in England. He must know that that Commission, after a thorough and exhaustive enquiry into the whole question made a voluminous report, and in that report among other things the Commissioners recommended that the distinction between misdemeanor and felony be abolished altogether and that the accused in every case, whether in the nature of a felony or of a misdemeanor, be made a competent witness in his own behalf, and in addition that his wife be made a competent witness to confirm his story. The accused was made liable to examination and cross-examination as any other witness with the sole exception that the cross-examination should not go to the credibility of the witness. The hon. gentleman must know that, based upon that report, the Attorney-General of England in 1873 introduced into the Imperial Parliament a Bill, one clause of which enabled the accused party to give evidence in his own behalf. It was introduced on the responsibility of the Imperial Government by the Attorney-General. It received the second reading in the House of Commons and the principle was affirmed. It was referred to a Select Committee but no further steps were taken with respect to it that Session on account of the large amount of public business on hand. It was again introduced by the Attorney-General in 1880 and met with the same fate; and I find by the public press that during the present Session of the Imperial Parliament, the Attorney-General has again introduced the Bill. To show the hon. gentleman that public opinion in England in this respect is marching onward, while the hon. gentleman is disposed to stand still, I propose to trouble the House by reading an extract from the London Globe with regard to that Bill. That newspaper says:

"A Bill of which the Attorney-General gave notice yesterday will, if passed, overturn one of the most fundamental principles of our Criminal Law. This is the proposal that prisoners on their trial shall be permitted to give evidence as if they were defendants in a civil action—a proposal that has constantly been made throughout an entire generation of lawyers, and as constantly opposed. It cannot be said, therefore, that the question has not been fully before the country, and that ample opportunity has not been afforded for the adequate formation of opinion. That the law of evidence with regard to this matter is in an unsatisfactory state is sufficiently certain. The recent attempt made by eminent counsel to bring a prisoner's story indirectly, and without liability to cross-examination, before a jury, at any rate reduced the existing rule to a state of logical absurdity. Either the aid of counsel must be regarded as being often a positive disadvantage to an innocent prisoner by closing his mouth, or else such aid must be a no less positive advantage to a guilty one, by enabling his story to be brought forward by an expert, and without such sanctions as an oath or affirmation implies. Of course the principal objection taken to the examination and cross-examination of a prisoner on oath is founded on the indefensible scenes with which the French criminal reports have made us familiar. But to this it may be safely answered that such scenes are the result of far other circumstances—of an inferior class of judges and magistrates, and of the practice, absolutely foreign to English ideas, of assuming the guilt of a prisoner unless he can prove his innocence in the teeth of every test capable of application. There is absolutely no fear that in this country the innocent would be put at a disadvantage by the liberty of being able to tell their own stories on oath in their own way. The principal danger of our system is that suffered by the public—the escape of the guilty, who too often get off by the simple expedient of holding their tongues. Whatever may be the details of the Attorney-General's bill, which may or may not be worthy of approval, its principle is certainly gaining ground among those who are familiar with the working of our Criminal Law.

There is an extract from the London Globe with respect to the Bill of the Attorney-General of England, on this subject, which is clearly in point, and is a strong expression of public opinion in favour of the Bill. The Herald of Montreal, commenting on this extract, says:

"It will be noticed that the proposal emanates from the Government, the Bill being a Government measure. If, under this system, the criminal be unduly favoured, the fault will lie with the jury. It seems to be only reasonable and fair that a prisoner's lips should not be sealed while all the world can be called as witnesses for or against him. If he wishes to testify let him testify. With the Judge, the Crown lawyers and the jurors to test the truth of his statements, there is but a slight chance for him to impose false evidence upon the Court; while, as regards the public, who will read his evidence, he will have in that quarter thousands of Judges and jurors more critical and severe than those who will try him according to the rules of evidence. The principle of Mr. Cameron's Bill, now before our Parliament, is already recognized in assault cases in our Courts, and it may be extended with satisfactory results to the cause of justice."

I will say no more on that point to which the hon. gentleman referred, and expressing his strong admiration of the English system of jurisprudence in criminal cases; I have said sufficient to satisfy any reasonable man that the statement made by the hon. gentleman, although sound in one sense, is not true in fact, and that there have been gigantic strides made in England in the last few years and that a movement to go still further than I propose to go has been initiated under the responsibility of the Imperial Government. The hon. gentleman opposed the Bill on another ground. He said our laws worked satisfactory, that no one had petitioned in favour of the change proposed, and on that ground he would hesitate to favour changes in the direction proposed. If that were true, it is no argument against the principle of a Bill. Parliament does not wait until the public at large present petitions to the House and ask for certain legislation. It is our duty as members of a free Parliament, if we think the public interests would be better served by making a change in either our criminal or civil law, to do so. And I say as a matter of fact it is not true. I say that since the Bill was introduced a large number of the public journals of the country have pronounced unmistakably in favour of the Bill. I say that since the introduction of the Bill the first or second day of this Session, I have received communications from a number of those who are engaged in the administration of the criminal laws of the land all pointing in one direction and that is in favour of the principle of the Bill. I will mention the names of some of the gentlemen who have corresponded with me this year and last year, with reference to this measure. I had a communication from Judge Davis of Middlesex, from Judge Sinclair of Hamilton, and from Judge Toms of Huron, and I say to the hon. gentleman that there are no County Court Judges in the whole of Ontario, perhaps, who are, in my opinion, better capable of forming an opinion upon this subject than the Judges to whom I have referred. I have had a communication from the County Attorney of Toronto, pressing strongly that this Bill should become law. Further, I had a communication the other day from one of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, a Judge, who, when he was at the bar, occupied a pre-eminent position—as an able criminal lawyer—I refer to the present Judge Armour, who wrote me a few days ago to the following effect:

"I have perused your Bill to permit accused parties to give evidence in their own behalf. I am entirely in favour of all accused parties being entitled to give evidence in their own behalf, just as in civil actions."

Now, I think I have shown that in that respect the ground upon which the hon. gentleman bases his opposition to the Bill is wholly without foundation. Further, he will find in a newspaper, published in the town of Cornwall, since the discussion in the House some weeks ago, an article which it would be well for the Secretary of State to peruse. I will read an extract or two from that article in order to direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the subject, and as a practical illustration of the advisability of passing this Bill. A man's practical experience in a matter of that kind is worth much more than any amount of theorizing:

"Two young men, both pretty drunk, quarrelled coming home from a party. They had a scuffle in which they both fell and lost their caps. One of the lads picked up a cap and ran off with it. After a while he came back to the scene of the row bareheaded, and proceeded to search for his cap. On being asked what he had done with the cap he had taken away, he declared that he knew nothing about it. The owner of the lost cap had his antagonist arrested for felony, and he was tried and found guilty. During the whole trial his mouth was closed. The jury had not the opportunity of hearing his version of the case.

"Now if the man who had lost his cap had sued the other for trover—which was under the circumstances the proper course to take—the defendant, to save himself from paying a few dollars, could have gone into the witness box and told his own story; but when his liberty, his character and his prospects in life were at stake, his mouth was cruelly closed by the law. We are quite certain that if the jury had been afforded the opportunity of hearing from his own lips and in his own way what he had to say, they would never have dreamt of finding him guilty of intent to steal.

"This is one case among many which shows the anomalous condition of the law which permits a man that he may escape the payment of, it may be a just debt, to give evidence in his own behalf, but which permits a prisoner, innocent of the crime of which he stands accused, from testifying to circumstances and facts of which, in the very nature of the case, he alone can have any knowledge."

Now, Sir, that appears to me to be a very strong case in favour of my position. I will now give the hon. gentleman the opinion of the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench of Ontario upon this point. The hon. gentleman knows that under the provisions of 32 and 33 Victoria, a man can be indicted for not providing his family with necessary food. Under the provisions of that statute about a year ago, a man by the name of Bissell was indicted at Toronto for not providing his wife with necessary food. The prosecutrix, the wife, entered the witness box and established a case to prove that her husband had neglected to provide her with sufficient food. Her evidence was objected to, but it was received by the presiding Judge and upon her evidence the husband was found guilty. The case was reserved for the consideration of the Superior Court, and the sole point in the appeal was whether the conviction could be sustained, as the prosecutrix gave evidence in her own behalf and against her husband. The Court gave an exhaustive judgment, and decided that the wife was not a competent witness in her own behalf, because the law did not make her so, unless in cases of assault. Chief Justice Hagarty stated in delivering judgment :

" I am unable to satisfy myself that any of these authorities were not warranted by holding this case to fall within the exceptions to the general rule. As a matter of opinion it might be wiser to allow the evidence. But as Lord Blackburn said on this same point, that is a matter for the Legislature and not for us."

That case is reported in vol. 1, Ontario reports, page 514, and at 521. The result was that the conviction was quashed, and the husband though he was found guilty by the jury, escaped the punishment he deserved. The hon. gentleman says this is my Bill; but it is no more my Bill than it is the Bill of a number of other hon. members of the House. I say to the Secretary of State that the first lawyers on his own side of the House, the first lawyers at the criminal bar, have pronounced in favour of the Bill. It was referred to a Select Committee last Session and upon that Committee were the names of Mr. McCarthy, Mr. Davies, Mr. Robertson of Hamilton, Mr. Weldon and Mr. Cameron of Victoria, Mr. Girouard, Mr. Casgrain and Mr. Amyot. The report of the Committee was unanimous, and the present Bill is the exact Bill which was reported by that Committee. The hon. gentleman goes further, and he objects to the Bill because, he says it is opening up the road to the introduction of the French system of criminal jurisprudence, that is, to the examination of the accused. If the hon. gentleman had read the Bill presented by me, and given it the slightest consideration, he would have found that there is not the least similarity between the principle of the Bill which I submitted to the House, and the rule which prevails in the administration of criminal justice in France. Under this Bill no man is compellable to give evidence. He is competent as a witness, and if he finds that his interest will be served by his giving evidence, he can go into the witness box, and he can call his wife to confirm his story. In France the rule is entirely different, for there they go upon the assumption that every accused person is guilty until he himself establishes his innocence. A prisoner is examined and cross-examined and brow beaten in order to elicit such facts as will enable the public prosecutor to submit a bill of indictment. The object is not so much to ascertain whether a man is guilty, but to ascertain whether or not they can squeeze out of a man's own mouth such facts as would justify the prosecutor in submitting a bill to the Courts. I will read on that subject what the Law Journal of England says :

" The writer in the Law Journal hardly seems to appreciate this when he remarks that ' as to French criminal procedure we observe that the interrogation of the prisoner is only a part of it, and that part might be adopted without adopting the whole.' It is, however, just this part of the French criminal procedure which excites the most repugnance in England, and that for the reason that, as applied in France, its aim seems to be less the discovery of the truth than the conviction of the prisoner. We do not hold it as by any means an indisputable proposition that an innocent man ought to prefer, or would be likely to prefer, telling his whole story to a French Judge, to having his mouth closed as in an English criminal court. Before a Judge who starts apparently from an assumption of a prisoner's guilt, and continually interrupts his examination to utter ejaculations of horror over the enormity of his crime, or to exhort him feelingly to make a confession of it, the vindication of innocence is not by any means a necessity. Truth may, as it is said, resemble a torch which shines the brighter the more it is shaken, but then the shaking must be done fairly, and this is exactly the essential condition which French tribunals appear to neglect.

Now, Sir, that is the opinion of the editor of the Law Journal on the French system. It a most unfair system that a man must be assumed to be guilty until he can establish his innocence, and that he should be liable to be cross-examined and re-examined and brow-beaten by a Judge without the aid of counsel to assist him before he is put on his trial. That is not the principle of my Bill at all. Under it the prisoner will be at liberty to go into the witness box and tell his story, or to remain out and keep his mouth closed. The hon. Secretary of State is entirely mistaken as to the principle I have introduced into my Bill. The Law

Journal further says with respect to the general question of the admissibility of the evidence of an accused party :

" The primary object of a criminal prosecution is to elicit the whole truth about a crime. If a prisoner is innocent it can do him no harm to be examined: it cannot diminish his chances of escape; and, if guilty, it is good that those chances should be diminished."

On the same subject the Pall Mall Gazette observes :

" Innocence, as a rule, has more to gain than to lose, as guilt has certainly more to lose than to gain, by telling its own story, and having that story sifted by direct interrogation; and the cause of truth would undoubtedly gain by allowing in both cases the story to be told."

Now, I have answered the objection raised by the hon. gentleman, and I think I have answered it successfully. He admits that it is quite proper in assault cases to allow the accused party to be examined. He says :

" Two men meet; a few angry words pass, and a blow is struck; why not allow the parties who came face to face, with the result that an assault is committed, to come and let each tell his own story."

That is exactly what I say. The only difference between the hon. gentleman and myself is that I say so and support the Bill; he says so and opposes the Bill. I say that if his argument is good in reference to assault cases, it cannot be bad in reference to other misdemeanors, unless he can show a distinction in principle between the different classes of misdemeanors tried in our courts. I will ask him if he can point out why a prisoner in assault, which may be serious, is competent to give evidence, and not in other misdemeanors, such as libel, obstructing the Queen's highway, not repairing the Queen's highway, a public nuisance, or a man not providing for his family. These are all cases which may be tried in our Criminal Courts, although of a quasi civil character; and yet in every one of these cases, under the law as it now stands, the man who perhaps knows most about the transaction under trial is obliged to keep his mouth closed, and the hon. Secretary of State wants to keep it closed. Now, I say that this Bill ought to become law. Hon. gentlemen may vote it down; but mark my words, this Bill will become law before the hon. gentleman is two years older, and I should not wonder if he himself should be found voting for that Bill. If he does not do so now, he will before long. I move

That the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider further Bill No. 3, to provide for the further amendment of the Law of Evidence in Criminal cases.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I do not propose to follow my hon. friend in the discussion which he has gone into upon this question. But if I heard him rightly, he said that this Bill was in the exact words of a Bill reported by a Committee of which I was a member. I recollect being on a Committee to which a Bill of my hon. friend, and one or two other Criminal Law amendment Bills, were referred, but I certainly never, either in the Committee or in the House, supported the principle of this particular Bill. For myself, from my experience in such matters, I am opposed to this Bill. I think it would do infinitely more harm than good. I merely wish to put myself right by showing that I am not in a position of inconsistency.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend has taken me to task for the argument I used in opposition to this Bill when it was before the House; and I do not think he is any more accurate in his remarks at this time than he was then. I do not intend to repeat the arguments which I advanced when the discussion of this Bill came up at its proper time. I think they were good then, and I think they are good still. I only want to say to my hon. friend that if I do not, as he says, know a great deal, I happen to know something about this question. When the hon. gentleman mixed up my argument as to the practice pursued in France, and tried to find my argument at fault, he was mistaken. The hon. gentleman does not know what is done in France. Since the Bill was disposed of the other day in the Committee of the Whole, he has read an article which I have read also; but the conclusions which my hon. friend has drawn against me are not drawn in that article. I said that this Bill went further than the procedure before the French tribunal; I say the same thing still, and I am right, I said that it went further than the French practice, because in France there is no examination of a prisoner under oath—there is not the danger of false swearing. The hon. gentleman has given the House to understand that in France the prisoner's evidence is taken on a preliminary examination for finding out whether an indictment should be laid against him. Such is not the case. The accused in France does not give evidence. He is questioned, not only on the preliminary examination, but also in open court, with this difference, as I have just said, that he is not a witness under oath. If there is one thing that perhaps would assist the administration of criminal justice in this connection, it would be the examination, in a restricted manner, of the accused. It would be to ask a statement from the accused the moment he appears before the magistrate, before he has seen counsel and before he has prepared his line of defence. Then he could be asked to state the truth as to the occurrence, to explain what he did with himself or with the articles found in his possession, or any other point bearing upon the accusation laid against him. I would be in favour of having him thus questioned before a magistrate in open court, but not in secret, as in France. The English procedure forbids this. I would not go so far as to say I would introduce such legislation myself, but if there is one occasion in which a statement of the accused could assist in the administration of criminal justice, it would be when for the first time he was brought before the magistrate. He might then be questioned, not by a constable, nor in secret, not in any way that might be abused, but by the magistrate in open court. If this Bill should pass, notwithstanding the opinions expressed and read by my hon. friend, you will be sowing nothing but temptation for perjury, and you will reap a crop of perjury such as will astonish the world. The hon. gentleman said it was the same as in the case of assault. But I maintain that a man would not be likely to perjure himself in the case of a petty assault, whereas the temptation might be irresistible in cases involving a long and infamous punishment; moreover, in cases of assault very often there are only two parties, the man who strikes another and the one who is assaulted. Then the two are brought before the Police Magistrate and both make their statement. It was only the hon. member for Quebec West who went so far as to say that, to be logical, he would like to see this Bill applied to all cases of felony as well as misdemeanor. This at least is logical. But the hon. promoter of the Bill does not want to go so far. He maintains that, having only reference to cases of misdemeanor, this Bill would not have great importance, that it would be just a step beyond that taken in simple cases of assault and battery. This is a statement from which I entirely dissent. The list of misdemeanors comprises some of the most important offences. It comprises commercial frauds, the obtaining of money under false pretences, and quite a number of others equally great, many of which are punished more severely than some felonies are; and in England, it is in fact proposed to take away this line of demarcation between felonies and misdemeanors, because really the boundary line between misdemeanors and felonies is hardly to be found. There are some felonies which are much less grave in character than misdemeanors. The hon. gentleman's allusion from the French system is not correct. It has been said and often repeated in controversies between English jurists and those who contend that the French system is the best, that the accused under the French system is presumed to be guilty until he is proved to be innocent, whereas in England he is supposed to be innocent until found guilty. This statement is not correct. The same principle holds in France as in England, and the same object is sought to find out whether the charge is true. In both countries the charge made upon oath by the complainant is presumed to be true; the only difference is that in France the accused is asked to repel the charge by his own statement, whereas in England the prisoner is protected against compromising declaration extracted through intimidation or ignorance. I hold firmly to the old rules of evidence which I have read in the old books of criminal legislation. We ought to have respect for those authorities founded on a wise and deep study of human nature. But we ought not, because we are in a new century, to believe that all the legislation made before counts for nothing, and that progress necessarily means we should change what has the sanction of ages. I hold also that Parliament has not been sufficiently informed on this matter, either by the authority of grand juries or that of Judges. There has not yet been a sufficient expression of public opinion from those who have the right to guide public opinion in these matters, to warrant our passing this measure. I do not object to the hon. gentleman bringing the Bill before the House, because by so doing it is bound to be ventilated. It will go before the country when the Judges and the grand jurors who have the administration of justice in their hands, and the public press which is always open to discussion in cases of this kind, will ventilate this question thoroughly, and after public opinion has had time to be formed concerning it Parliament may take action if necessary.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION BILL.

Mr. HESSON. I desire to call attention to the fact that, in the division on Bill No. 6, my name has been omitted, inadvertently I presume, from the division. I voted for the Bill, known as Mr. Charlton's Bill, and my name does not appear either in the Votes and Proceedings or in Hansard. I wish to have my name recorded as voting for the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I am afraid that, if this were allowed at this period of time, it would lead to very great difficulties. I can vouch for the statement of the hon. member, as I observed that he rose to vote, and I also noticed that his name had not been called by the Assistant Clerk, so his statement is correct within the knowledge of the House; but it is a very serious question, after an interval of time, to alter a division list.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is the reason why, if any doubt exist as to whether a member's name has been recorded or not, it is asked that the division list be read at the time, and I believe it is not the practice to alter it afterwards on any consideration. Now that the explanation is made, it will be recorded in Hansard.

REPORT OF THE MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to ask—I see the Minister of Agriculture is not in his place, but perhaps an answer might be given in the course of the day—when the report, which is important this year, of the Minister of Agriculture and Immigration will be brought down, and when we are to get that volume of the Census which is missing?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is not well, and perhaps will not be here to-day.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I desire to address a few remarks to you; and I trust that the House will not consider that the debate upon the statement made by my hon. friend the Finance Minister has been unduly prolonged. Such is not the case. The debate is much shorter than is usual, up to this stage, and I do not suppose it will be continued very much longer. I desire to speak very briefly to-day, and I presume there will be but few who will desire to follow in discussing the question now before the House. I noticed, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance made his Financial Statement this season, that he was much less confident in his tone than upon former occasions. He had the air of a man who was fighting with difficulties and swimming against the stream, and certainly the circumstances under which that statement was made were less favourable and less assuring to that gentleman and to his supporters than had been the case for a number of years previous. He met the country with the fact that his surplus, that had been boasted of so much, was being rapidly reduced. He met the country unable to deny that a considerable degree of depression existed. He met the country also with the prospect staring him in the face that the public debt of Canada, already unduly large, was soon to be largely increased by a measure that had but a few days before passed this Chamber. The hon. gentleman attempted at first to deny that a period of depression existed; and, after having proceeded to prove that no depression existed in the country, he then proceeded to claim that, in any event, the depression that did exist was not as severe as the depression existing in the country in the year 1878. Well, I should hope that the depression was not as severe. Certainly, if a depression as severe as that of 1878 existed at this time, it would be a matter for marvel. The depression existing from 1874 to 1878 was due to causes more intense, more widespread, than any depression that may exist to-day. The character of that depression I shall take the liberty briefly to allude to. I will take liberty to call your attention to the fact that the depression from 1874 to 1878—a depression more widely spread, a depression more intense, than any commercial depression that has afflicted any country in this century—was caused by circumstances entirely beyond the control or the influence of the Government of Canada. That depression was due primarily to the great civil war that devastated the United States, that prostrated its industries, and was followed by a period of wild and reckless speculation, a period when the circulating medium of that country was a debased one, and was constantly fluctuating in value, a period characterized by railway inflation and followed by a collapse more general and more severe than any commercial collapse of this century. In consequence of that depression the finances and the business of Canada were depressed. Any depression existing in the United States must react upon this country, whose commercial relations are so intimate with the country to the south of us, and, in addition to the effect produced by the depression in the United States which reacted upon us, we had unfortunately during that period of years a succession of short harvests. We had one harvest, the harvest of 1876, that was a disastrous one, a harvest when we failed for almost the first time in the history of the country to raise the bread we used ourselves and were under the necessity of importing to the amount of several millions of dollars of bread stuffs. In consequence of this long continued depression in the United States, in consequence of short harvests—and I will show you presently how short they were—there was a severe period of depression in Canada; and I would be willing to admit that the claim made by the hon. gentleman, that the depression existing in this country now was less severe than that which existed in 1878, was true, because the depression, if it do exist at this moment, is due not to a protracted series of commercial calamities, but to a partial failure of one crop, and that partial failure following four years of good harvests. That being the case, the check to our commercial prosperity, if check has been received at all, ought to have been a very slight one indeed.

Now, with regard to the causes of the prosperity that have been enjoyed by the country for the three or four years preceding the present year, I wish to have a few words to say. And I will call your attention to the fact that prosperity was returning, that the return of prosperity was rendered certain by a measure not adopted in this country, was rendered certain not by the passing of the Tariff Bill of March, 1879, but was rendered certain by the return of the United States to specie payment on the 1st day of January, 1879, an event that preceded by some months the adoption of the National Policy. The effect, Sir, of the resumption of specie payment in the United States was very marked. That country has laboured, as I said a moment ago, under the evils of a depreciated currency for many years. From 1862 to 1878, for a period of seventeen years, the currency of the United States had been a depreciated one, and that depreciation, taking the mean highest and lowest premiums of each month of the year during seventeen years, averaged 36½ per cent. Now, in consequence of that depreciation the finances were deranged; in consequence of that depreciation business partook largely the nature of gambling; in consequence of that depreciation of the currency nameless evils that it is unnecessary for me to mention, befell the commercial classes in the United States, and the return to specie payment on the 1st of January, 1879. I assert again, marked the return of prosperity to the United States, a return of prosperity in which we were sure to share, and this return of prosperity, let me reiterate again, had already commenced before the Government of the day had placed the present Tariff upon the Statute-Book. It was contemporary with the inauguration of the National Policy.

It has been claimed that it was necessary to increase the taxation of this country; it has been claimed that a necessity rested upon my hon. friend the Finance Minister to advance the rate of duty. Now, I hold that the views entertained by my hon. friend at my right, the Finance Minister under the previous Administration, were perfectly correct; I hold, Sir, that he was quite correct in maintaining that during that period of temporary depression it was unnecessary to advance the duties and to increase the taxation of this country. His assertion that upon the return of better times the revenue under the Tariff of 1878 would prove to be ample, I think was well founded and warranted by the facts. I find strong corroboration of this view in the financial history of the United States. I find that that country without a change in a singular particular of its Tariff, had a revenue which increased in two years, from 1873 to 1880, by the sum of $56,000,000, or 43 per cent.; and I find that the revenue of that country increased in four years, from 1878 to 1882, by the sum of $90,000,000, or 77 per cent. Now, Sir, if the revival of business in the United States led to an increase in the revenue of that country of 43 per cent. in two years, it is fair to presume that a corresponding revival of business in Canada would also lead to an increase in the revenue of this country, amply sufficient to meet the wants of an economical Government such as that of the predecessors of the gentlemen now in power. Credit has been taken by those gentlemen for the large amount of revenue they have derived from the Tariff; credit has been taken by them for the fact that, though the expenditure has been upon an extravagant scale, we have still had a surplus. Well, Sir, a large revenue pre-supposes large importations, and large importations can only be had as a result of increased exports. Unless we have large exports we cannot have large imports, and unless we have large imports we will not have a superabundant revenue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a Tariff is nothing more or less than a schedule of taxes. It may increase and it may diminish incidental taxation, according to the character of the measure, but incidental taxation under any Tariff must, to a greater or less extent exist. A Tariff may be so devised, also, as to enrich a few individuals, it may enrich a few manufacturing corporations, and it may benefit a few interests, but the revenue derived by a Tariff from the people must be paid by the masses, and that revenue, whether it is great or small, simply amounts to taxation; it is nothing more or less, and the millions contributed, the millions that swell the coffers of the Government, represent the contribution of the people in the shape of taxes; and the benefits derived by the imposition of that Tariff, if there are any benefits, are derived by the arrangement of the measure in such a way as to benefit certain interests at the expense of the great mass of the people. That, Sir, is the character of any Tariff. A Tariff is a schedule of taxes, whether it is designed for revenue purposes or whether it is designed for protection—in any event and in all cases, it simply means the taxation of the people.

I have alluded to the fact that prosperity had returned to the United States, which prosperity was reacting upon us when the hon. gentlemen now in power came into office. But, Sir, there is another and a more potent reason for the prosperity the country has enjoyed, and that is the fact that for a series of years the products of the soil have been remarkably abundant. We have been blessed with a series of abundant harvests; and I wish, Mr. Speaker, to invite your careful consideration to a comparison of the exports of this country for two periods, each of five years in length, the first from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, and the second from 1879 to 1883. A careful comparison of the exports of the country for these two periods will show most clearly what is the reason the country has enjoyed an exceptional prosperity in the last four or five years. Before entering upon this, however, I desire to call the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to this point. I desire to remark that that hon. gentleman, in comparing the exports of foreign produce from Canada for the years 1876 to 1879 and from the latter period to 1883, whether conscious of the fact or not, would lead those who were listening to him, and were taking his statements unhesitatingly, into a misconception and into an error. It will be borne in mind that the importations of grain in Canada before the imposition of duties, were invariably made as entries for consumption. If grain was imported to this country, millions of bushels of it, designed for transmission through our canals to Europe, that grain was entered as for consumption; it appeared upon the Custom house books as grain entered for consumption. But, when the law was altered and duties were imposed upon grain, then only that grain was entered for consumption that was actually intended for consumption and paid duties, while that not intended for consumption was entered, as in transit, and passed through the country, consequently, any comparison between the importations during those two periods, must be an utterly fallacious one, because the mode of entry in the one case represented all as entered for consumption, while the mode of entry in the other case represents only that—and a very small fraction of the whole—which was really intended for consumption; consequently, the hon. gentleman's comparison, in that respect, is one that requires explanation, in order to be understood by the country.

I would ask the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to these figures I am about to give. I am about to give a carefully prepared statement and comparison of the exports of this country for a period of five years from 1874 to 1878, and another period of five years from 1879 to 1883. I wish to make that comparison, Sir, first, with grain, flour and meal; next, with butter and cheese; next, with animals and their produce, excepting butter and cheese; next, with malt, hay, green fruits, and potatoes; and next, with the products of our fisheries. In order to arrive at the actual exportation of grains I have not been governed by the statements made in the Trade and Navigation Returns of the exports of the produce of Canada, but I have been at the pains to take the total imports into the country and deduct them from the total exports, and the balance gives accurately the actual net export of these articles. I have done this with grain only; in the matter of butter and cheese, and animals and their produce, the tables are more accurate, and it was not necessary to take this trouble. I find that the net exports of cereals from 1874 to 1878 was $49,592,000. The net export from 1879 to 1883 was $82,267,000. The gross excess of the second period over the first period was $32,665,000. The annual average of first period was $9,918,000. Annual average of second period, $16,455,400. Annual average, excess of second period over first, $6,537,400. Annual percentage of increase, second period over first, 65 per cent. If the exports of the country in the most important line increased 65 per cent. during a period of five years over a corresponding period of five years preceding, that certainly would warrant the statement that great prosperity ought to have attended such a state of things. But this is the result with respect to grain, flour and meal alone. Let us take butter and cheese. The exports from 1874 to 1878, the first period, amounted to $31,852,413; from 1879 to 1883, the second period, $38,520,687. The gross excess of the second period over the first was $6,668,274. The annual average excess was $1,336,091. I now come to consider animals and their produce, the produce of Canada, and I find in making up the statement that the tables for the year 1874-75 and 76 give the total exports only, and in making up the statement the difference between the entire import and the import entered for consumption, amounting in the three years to $2,689,575 is deducted from the exports. The exports from 1874 to 1878, excluding butter and cheese, amounted to $34,535,112; from 1879 to 1883, $55,286,655. The gross excess of the second period over the first was $20,691,544. The annual average excess was $4,132,500. In malt, hay, hops, potatoes, and green fruit there was a very remarkable increase. The exports of those articles for the first period, 1874 to 1878, were of the value of $5,248,000; for the second period, 1879 to 1883, $16,695,236. The gross increase of the second period over the first was $11,347,000. The annual average was $2,219,000. We will next take the fisheries' exports. From 1874 to 1878 the value was $26,671,000; from 1879 to 1883, $37,397,000. The gross increase of the second period over the first was $10,726,000. The average annual increase was $2,165,000. Summarizing these statements we have the following:—

Cereals net.....	$ 49,592,000
Butter and cheese .....	31,852,000
Animals and their produce, excluding butter and cheese .....	34,595,000
Malt, hay, hops, green, fruits and potatoes.....	5,248,000
Fisheries.....	26,671,000
	$147,958,000

Exports 1879 to 1883.

Cereals net.....	$82,217,000
Butter and cheese .....	38,520,000
Animals and their produce, excluding butter and cheese .....	55,286,000
Malt, hay, hops, green fruits and potatoes...	16,695,000
Fisheries.....	37,397,000
	$230,165,000

Gross Excess 2nd period over first period, $82,217,000, or 55 per cent.
Annual increase $16,441,000, or $4 per capita.

With a statement such as this, with the fact shown that the exports of these articles of Canadian produce exceeded by $82,000,000, exceeded by 55 per cent., the exports for the first years, do we need to search further for the cause of prosperity in this country? Do we need to ascertain whether the National Policy has created it; or whether prosperity in some other country has created it? In those facts which I have adduced I have indicated a sufficient and simple cause for any degree of prosperity which may have existed in this country. And that degree of prosperity, so far from having been created by the National Policy, so far from having been increased by the National Policy, has been reduced by the National Policy. It has been reduced to the extent of the unnecessary taxation imposed by that measure upon this country. If that measure drew from the pockets of the people of Canada $20,000,000 more than was sufficient to meet the wants of the Government, then the prosperity which the country enjoyed during the period from 1879 to 1883 was reduced by the National Policy the exact amount of unnecessary taxation imposed on the people.

The Finance Minister in the course of his speech expressed himself as unable to comprehend the statement made by the leader of the Opposition that $20,000,000 additional taxation from Customs meant $30,000,000 imposed on the people.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At least.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will endeavour to enlighten the hon. Minister on this point, and I think I may be able to show him that the leader of the Opposition in making that statement was quite within the mark. A duty imposed upon an article enhances its cost. An article costing $1, placed in the hands of a wholesale merchant will be sold, if his profits are 20 per cent., for $1.20. It next goes into the hands of the retail dealer; if his profits are 25 per cent., the article when it reaches the consumer will cost $1.50. Upon this basis a taxation of $20,000,000 in the shape of Customs duties adds that amount to the cost of the goods in the wholesale dealers hands. A profit of 20 per cent. places the goods in the hands of the retail merchant at a cost of $24,000,000. If his profit is 25 per cent., the goods reach the consumer at a cost of $30,000,000, thus a 20 per cent. taxation by Customs duty represents an increased cost amounting to 30 per cent. to the consumer, 25 per cent. duty represents 37½ per cent. cost added to the consumer, and 30 per cent. duty represents 45 per cent. added cost to the people. It is for this reason that the present mode of raising taxation is so wasteful. Direct taxation takes from the pockets of the consumers what the Government actually receives; but this mode takes from the consumer $1.50 in order that the Government may secure $1. And for this reason the heavier the taxation imposed by the Tariff, beyond the absolute and bare necessities of the country, the greater the outrage perpetrated on the country, because for every additional dollar of unnecessary taxation imposed the taxpayer pays a dollar and a half. But that is not all. In addition to the taxes paid by the taxpayer directly, there is the incidental taxation. Upon every article upon which the Government imposes a duty, and that is manufactured to any extent in the country, the domestic production is enhanced in value, and while the consumer is paying with one hand into the Treasury, he is paying with the other hand into the pockets of the manufacturers, who in consequence of the duty may or may not ask more than the article is worth, but who certainly ask more than it could be bought for in the open market, with open competition.

It is claimed by my hon. friend the hon. Finance Minister that goods are cheaper now, than in 1878. Well, Sir, I suppose the hon. gentleman is sufficiently familiar with the history of manufactures to be aware, that the constant tendency is to cheapen the cost of production. That progress has been a very rapid one. It is said that 100 operatives to-day will produce more goods, working sixty hours a week, than 300 would have produced twenty years ago working seventy-two hours a week, and by perfecting machinery and introducing improvements in the mode of manipulating the raw staples, the cost of producing the goods continues to diminish. But the question is not whether goods are absolutely cheaper than they were in 1878, but whether they are relatively cheaper. The question is whether the goods are made dearer by this policy, than they would be at this moment, under a seventeen and a-half per cent. tariff.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, we stand on that ground.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman gave his whole case away when he tells us, that when wages go down in the United States or Great Britain, our employers must reduce their wages to stand competition. Why? If they have a wide margin between their prices, the price of the article brought in with the duty added, if they can produce goods as cheap as they are sold in the United States, weighed down as they are by the amount of the duty, why is the competition so keen that they must reduce their wages when there is a reduction in England or the United States? If goods are produced in Canada as cheaply as in the United States, if the duty is 20 per cent., the manufacturer is selling that 20 per cent. less than the imported article.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is the competition at home.

Mr. CHARLTON. The testimony of importers is, that except in rare cases where there is a glut of the market, the prices of goods is barely below the cost of the articles abroad and the duty added. Reason and common sense show that this would be the case; and in the whole history of protection in this country, or the United States or in any other country, that rule will be found to work invariably, except in the exceptional cases where a temporary glut of the market, may force manufacturers to put their goods on the market at less than ordinary prices. Then the hon. gentleman claims that his Tariff has been the means of increasing the production of textile fabrics in Canada to the extent of $20,000,000 per annum; that it has added 15,000 to the operative class of this country. Well, Sir, I think his estimate is too high. I think his estimate as to the position and the increase in the manufacture of textile fabrics since 1878 is too high, and I shall examine later on, whether the National Policy is to be credited with any considerable portion of the actual increase in that manufacture.

Let us now examine some statistics with reference to the manufacture of cotton. The largest increase in textiles has been in the article of cotton—I presume the hon. gentleman will himself admit that more than one-half the increase has been in that line. It is the only industry which has been so far fostered by the Tariff as to be overdone—as to have reached what is sometimes called the second stage of protection. I have here a statement from Mr. Stevenson, of the firm of D. Morrice & Co., who, I believe, furnished the hon. gentleman with his statistics with reference to cotton. By this statement the increase of hands engaged in the manufacture of cotton is claimed to be about 7,900, and the increase of goods manufactured about $7,800,000. Well, if that is true, there has been no such increase as an addition of 15,000 to the operatives in Canada engaged in the production of textiles, and no such increase as $20,000,000 in the production of these articles. This gentleman in his first statement informed us that the average wages of operatives in the cotton mills was $108 per annum. In his second statement made a few days later, which I suppose we are bound to go by, he gives us the following figures: Capital invested in cotton mills of Canada, $3,850,000; yards produced in 1883, 115,000,000; hands employed, 10,200; expenditure, $3,560,000. Part of that expenditure consists of a charge of $1,200,000 for raw cotton; $225,000 for supplies; the same amount for chemicals, etc.; $215,000 for fuel; $125,000 for wear and tear; $50,000 for insurance; $600,000 for interest on capital; $1,960,000 for wages, $100,000 for salaries of managers, clerks, &c.; $250,000 for the loss between the payments of cash and the sale of productions on time. The profits amounted to $1,810,000, a rate equal to 22 per cent. on the capital invested, besides $600,000 allowed for interest, which is 7 per cent more, making 29 per cent. as the dividends and earnings of these mills for 1883. But if we examine this statement we shall find that the charge for raw cotton is too high. The amount is $4,200,000, while the Custom returns give the amount imported as $2,912,000 worth, or 27,451,349 pounds. This perhaps will be claimed as the cost of the articles at the point where it was purchased. If that is the case it would be fair to add freight, and if we add $1.50 per hundred pounds—which is an enormous rate—to the cost as given by the returns, we have a total cost of raw cotton for those mills amounting to $5,384,537, leaving an overcharge of $875,463. Adding that to the admitted earnings, and the charge for interest on capital of $500,000, and we have by this statement of Mr. Stevenson, a result of 37.4-10 per cent., as the dividends of the cotton mills of Canada in 1883. And we have another statement—a statement that the wages of the operatives in 1879, were $245 per annum, while this item for the year 1883 was $194, showing that under the operation of this Tariff, while the cotton manufacturers have made 37 per cent. dividends in that year, and that upon a statement allowing an enormous amount for the wages of overseers, &c., operatives' wages have been reduced $51 per annum. This shows that while the manufacturers have derived large profits by the operation of the Tariff, the operatives have not been benefited.

Now, if it be true, as my hon. friend claims, that the increased production of textile fabrics under the operation of the Tariff, is $20,000,000 per year, and that the result of the tariff has been to employ 15,000 more operatives, if the goods produced by these 15,000 operatives have been enhanced in price by 20 per cent., which is undoubtedly too low an estimate, it follows that these goods have cost $4,000,000 more to the consumers of Canada than they would have cost if they had been imported free of duty; while the operatives have received a total amount of wages of $3,000,000; showing that the people of this country have paid for the increased production of textile fabrics in 1883, $1,000,000 more than the total sum received in wages by the people employed in producing those goods. I have in my hands a very interesting table compiled by Mr. William M. Springer, in Washington, treating of this same subject. This statement is designed to show the incidental taxation imposed on the people of the United States in consequence of the increased cost of home products by reason of the tariff. In this statement Mr. Springer includes chemical products, earthenware and glassware, iron, steel, and all metal manufactured goods, wood and woodenware, sugar and molasses, tobacco, cotton and cotton goods, hemp, jute, and flax goods, wool and woollens, silk and silk goods, books, papers, &c. He shows that the value of the total imports of these articles in the year 1882 was $433,173,335 under their high protective tariff.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They do not seem disposed to reduce it.

Mr. CHARLTON. They have a Bill introduced for reducing it, which is a great step in the right direction. Mr. Springer shows that the duty paid on these imports was $194,464,758, that the domestic production was $2,440,502,649; that the number of hands employed was 1,327,881; that the wages paid to those hands amounted to $163,606,049; and that the increased cost of the goods produced by these operatives in consequence of the high tariff was $556,933,637; in other words, while $163,600,000 was paid in wages to the operatives, the consumers of the United States were called upon to pay an increased cost of $556,900,000 for the goods produced by them, thereby incurring a waste, if you count the wages of the operatives as clear gain, of about $100,000,000 per annum. We are doing the same thing in this country only on a smaller scale.

My hon. friend, in the course of his speech, seemed to be apprehensive upon the subject of the surplus. He told us that the importations were reduced in consequence of the increased manufactures; he told us that they were likely to be further reduced, and he led us to believe that he feared a further reduction of the revenue—that he feared, in fact, that his surplus would be entirely obliterated, and that he might, before many months, be called upon to actually face a deficit.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Who said it?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think the hon. Finance Minister told us—I took down his words—that the importations were reduced in consequence of increased manufactures.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Exactly.

Mr. CHARLTON. And that in consequence of reduced importations there would be a reduced revenue.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That was entirely with reference to this year and next year—I did not go further.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman may not have seen the full effect of his plausible argument; but if his policy works according to his expectations, this will be exactly the result—that reduced importations, in consequence of increased manufactures, will increase the needs of the Government and the danger of a deficit. At all events, the hon. gentleman's surplus is shrinking, and is likely to disappear. But I wish to call his attention now to some other figures, to show that he is mistaken as to the fact, and that the importations of cottons, woollens, iron and steel—all goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada—are increasing, and are very much larger to-day than they were when his policy was inaugurated in 1879. Under the operation of the Tariff of my hon. friend from South Huron, a Tariff of 17½ per cent., the manufactures of this country were rapidly reducing the importations. The importations of cotton goods sunk from $11,341,000 in 1874 to $7,104,900 in 1878, a decrease of $4,237,000, or 37 per cent. The importations of woollens in 1874 were $11,160,000, and they fell to $8,855,000 in 1878, a decrease of $2,305,000, or 20 per cent. This is the record with regard to those two articles under the Tariff policy of the hon. gentleman's predecessor. In 1879 the hon. gentleman brought down his Tariff, and the National Policy was adopted. Now, let us carefully enquire what has been the effect of that policy on our manufacturing interests. In 1879, we imported $6,551,000 of cotton goods, and in 1883, $10,044,000; in 1879 we imported $7,063,000 of woollen goods, and in 1883 we imported $10,004,000. The increase in the importations of woollens and cottons from 1879 to 1883 was $6,434,000, an increase of 47 per cent. against a decrease almost as great during the period my hon. friend from South Huron occupied the position of Finance Minister. We find, also, that in 1879 the importations of iron and steel and manufactures of the same were $3,147,000, and that they increased to $12,209,000 in 1883, not including the importations of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The importations of woollens, cotton, iron and steel, and the manufactures of the same during the period of the hon. gentleman's policy, have increased by $10,500,000, or 48 per cent., and yet he tells the country that the importations of manufactured goods are decreasing. Now, the total importations of manufactured goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada amounted, in 1874, to $68,959,000; in 1878 they had fallen to $44,583,000, a diminution of $24,376,000, or 35 per cent. That is the record of my hon. friend at my right. In 1879, the year in which the National Policy was inaugurated, the imports of manufactured goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada amounted to $39,600,000, and in 1883 they amounted to $71,250,000, an increase of $31,650,000, or 79 per cent. That is the policy that is diminishing the importation of manufactured goods into this country. If we turn to the United States we shall find the same state of things existing in that country. In 1878 the United States importations of woollens, cottons, iron and steel, linen and flax, and silks, amounted to $87,293,000, and in 1883 to $189,374,000, or an increase, in five years, of $102,081,000, or 116 per cent.; and the lowest rate of duty imposed on any of these articles was 33 per cent. and the highest, 61 per cent. In 1883, five years later, the United States imported of the same articles $189,374,000, an increase of $107,000,000 in five years, or 116 per cent., and that increase has taken place under a protective Tariff designed to exclude these goods from the country, designed to keep the United States markets for American manufacturers. The same experience we have undergone, though not to the same extent, as the increase in our importations has been 79 per cent., instead of 116 per cent.; so that the hon. gentleman's assertion that his policy is diminishing importations into this country, has to be taken with a considerable quantity of salt. It has, in fact, to be completely rejected. His policy does not give us the entire control of our own markets, it does not exclude foreign goods from Canada, it does not give our manufacturers the control of the Canada markets, but it shows that under our former revenue Tariff of 17½ per cent., our manufacturing interests advanced much more rapidly towards securing the control of the markets of Canada than they are doing under the policy of my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker, I would enquire whether the manufacturing industries of Canada are due to the National Policy? When hon. gentlemen opposite speak on this subject, they would almost lead people to believe that we had no manufactories in this country before the National Policy was inaugurated; that the entire manufacturing system of Canada is due to the inauguration of the National Policy. I presume the right hon. gentleman will not make that assertion. When the question is asked, he is discreetly silent on the subject. I must say that the manufactures of this country, under a 15 per cent. revenue Tariff, and afterwards under a 17½ per cent. revenue Tariff attained a very great degree of development. I assert that the progress of our manufacturing industries was both healthy and rapid, that they stood upon a firm and healthy basis in the year 1879 when the Tariff was changed, and that they did not require a change of Tariff but a revival of times. I assert that our manufacturing industries were sure to have made rapid progress and to have attained a great degree of development under the Tariff under which they grew up, under which they attained the proportion they did in 1879. The production of manufactures in Canada in 1871 was $211,000,000, and despite the hard times that came after the commercial revulsion 1874, and continued to 1878, the manufacturing industries of Canada made progress and development. When the hon. gentleman opposite changed the fiscal policy, great fortunes had already been accumulated by manufacturers. J. & R. Molson had accumulated a fortune of $1,000,000; J. G. Worts had amassed $1,000,000; E. & C. Gurney, $750,000; and these gentlemen had commenced without a dollar twenty-five years before. E. K. Green has made $500,000 and A. H. Galt, $500,000, and scores of other manufacturers who had started with little or nothing, had gained fortunes ranging from $150,000 to $200,000, besides those I have mentioned. We had the entire control of the boot and shoe business of the country; the importations in this line were but a mere bagatelle, consisting of a class of work, the demand for which was so light that our manufacturers would not be bothered supplying it. We had full control of the market for agricultural implements and of the foundry business, and our sewing machine manufacturers were so prosperous that they were anxious to have reciprocity with the United States, in order to be able to send their goods to the United States market. The cotton industry and the woollen industry were also established on a prosperous and firm basis. During the period from 1874 to 1878, the depression existing among the manufactures of the United States, where they enjoyed the full blessings of an ultra protective system, was much greater than that which existed among the manufactures in the Dominion of Canada. In 1877 a return was given of forty-eight manufacturing establishments of New England, with a capital of $52,320,000. Of those, sixteen paid no dividends whatever; nine paid dividends of less than 6 per cent.; six paid dividends of 6 per cent.; and seven only paid dividends of 10 per cent., and upwards. If we contrast that with the condition of things in Canada, we will find that of twenty large concerns established in this Dominion, in various lines, but two reported no dividends, two reported satisfactory dividends, one reported reduced dividend as compared with former years, six reported dividends of from 6 to 8 per cent., two reported dividends of 10 per cent., and six reported dividends of 20 per cent., and upwards. Now this shows a remarkable contrast between Canada and the New England States, in this respect, that sixteen establishments in New England out of forty-eight paid no dividends, while in Canada only two out of twenty paid none. The highest rate in New England was 10 per cent. and in Canada 20 per cent., and upwards, in the year 1877; and I assert that our manufacturing interest was in a most prosperous condition, was established on a firmer basis in Canada than in the United States, either in the year 1877 or any year following the commercial depression in 1874. We had a smaller proportion of men, women and children out of employment. It was estimated that 2,000,000 men in the United States were out of employment in that period, but there was nothing like that proportion out of employment in this country, and a fair comparison of the then manufacturing industries in the two countries will show any candid, dispassionate man that under a revenue Tariff, Canadian manufacturing industries were paying better dividends and stood on a better basis than those in the United States under a high protective Tariff. The Tariff introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite has actually injured many of our manufacturing interests; it has injured our agricultural implement manufactories. In my Riding, there is one of these manufactories, and the proprietor told me that the increased cost of producing mowers, in consequence of the increased duty on raw material is $2 per machine, and another extensive manufacturer informs me that the increased cost of material is so great that in order to place his goods on the market at the price which ruled before the National Policy was adopted, he has to reduce the weight of castings in his goods, and really to reduce their worth and quality. Our foundries were well established before this policy came into operation, and this policy has been detrimental to their interests, by imposing a duty on iron and coal. The lumber interest has received no benefit from it whatever, and my hon. friend has inflicted, as he himself admits, an injury on the cotton trade. He tells us the cotton trade is overdone; that there are too many mills.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Did not the hon. gentleman say they were paying 30 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; last year, down to June 30th, 1883. I take the hon. gentleman's own statement that the cotton interest has been overdone and that no doubt hon. gentlemen would accuse him of having injured the cotton trade. It is undoubtedly overdone. The forcing process which enabled the manufacturers to pay large dividends has induced too many to go into the trade. The cotton industry would have been better off to-day had it gone on under the operation of a Tariff such as that which preceded this one, when dividends were made of from 10 to 15 per cent., when the inducements were not so great and there was no prospect of 50 per cent. dividends. The cotton industry of Canada to-day, and for years following, would be on a more healthy basis under the operation of that Tariff than under the forcing process of the right hon. gentleman. Well, Sir, it is a feature of the claims made on behalf of this National Policy, that it claims everything—it claims the credit for all prosperity that exists in the country, it claims credit for everything that would have naturally resulted from the return of good times. No man can suppose that the manufacturing interests of this country, that had grown up under a revenue Tariff, would have remained stationary after good times had returned. No man can suppose that, after 1879, when the harvests of this country improved, when the business of the United States improved, and we received higher prices for our lumber, and for our barley, and for the productions which we sell to that country; no man can suppose that, when prosperity pervaded the whole commercial world, the manufacturing interests of Canada would have stood still, and would have made no progress. It is my humble belief that they would have made, on the whole, greater progress than they have made under this policy. I believe that our manufactures of agricultural implements, our foundry interests, our sewing machine manufactures, would have been much better off; I believe that the development of the cotton industry would have been as great as it should have been for the good of the country; and I believe that the progress of the woollen industry would have been equally great. I believe that this National Policy, while imposing great burdens upon the people, in the shape of unnecessary taxation, has resulted in harm to one great interest, and has left the others in no better condition, in my humble belief, than they would have been without it. It is not necessary to arrange for 37 per cent dividends. A state of things such as that is sure to result ultimately in injury to the interests which receive such undue protection. I have no doubt that our cotton manufacturers realize that already. No doubt those who have invested in this industry regret that so many have gone into the business and that the business has received that development which it has, and wish that its growth had been less rapid and more healthy than it has been. These results were reached in the United States in various interests. They were reached in the United States in the iron interest; they were reached in the United States in the paper interest; they were reached in the United States in the cotton interest. Those results were not reached in the United States as rapidly as in Canada, because it is a greater theatre, a greater field of operations. What was reached here in three or four years required a decade at least before it was reached there, but the result here has been the same as the result there, and has been attained more rapidly. To-day, $100,000,000, invested in blast furnaces in the United States, is a useless investment; to-day, they have more paper mills than they need in the United States, and they have more cotton factories than are required; and this is the result of their having paid enormous dividends, so that people were induced to rush into those industries, in the expectation of suddenly making fortunes.

So much for the Tariff. I have but one more point on that question to allude to, and that will be my hon. friend's assertions with reference to agricultural protection, which I shall reach in a few moments. I wish, however, to allude to a few points made the other afternoon by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Cardwell. He told us that, under the operation of the National Policy, the tonnage of Montreal had increased. Now, the increase of the tonnage of Montreal simply proves this. It arises from two causes. It arises from the increased importation of manufactures, which the policy of my hon. friend was to prevent; it arises also from the increased exportation of the productions of the soil, which my hon. friend's policy was to prevent, because we were to have a home market for all that. So the increase of tonnage of Montreal only shows that his policy is inoperative in the respects in which he promised it should be operative. The hon. member for Cardwell also pointed to the fact that there had been an increase in the savings banks deposits in this country. As I have already shown, we have had unusually good crops, we have had an active trade, we have had an increase of $80,000,000 in our exportations to counterbalance the $20,000,000 of useless taxation, leaving a net gain to the country of $60,000,000, showing that the hon. gentleman's policy has not succeeded in utterly depressing the advance of this country. Notwithstanding the burdens he has imposed, notwithstanding the incubus which his Tariff creates, notwithstanding a faulty fiscal system, the country has progressed and become wealthier, and the savings banks deposits have increased, not as much as they would have increased under another policy, it is true, but, in spite of the hon. gentleman's policy, they have nevertheless increased fairly, and the country has made some progress, in consequence of the exceptionally favourable position it has been placed in with regard to abundant harvests. He next referred to the exodus question, and he introduced an argument in that connection which I could not see the application of. He laboured to show us that the migration from the older States of the American Union had been large. Undoubtedly it has. If it had been from the United States to our own North-West, then the two cases would have been parallel ones. What we are talking about is not an exodus from Canada to the Canadian North-West, and I repeat that the argument of the hon. gentleman was totally inapplicable, because the people moving from the older States to the newer States still continue to be citizens of the American Union—still contribute to its revenue, its greatness and its strength—while our exodus consists of people who leave this country, desert their native land, and go to the United States instead of going to our North-West. Consequently, the argument had no application whatever. The hon. gentleman said we were not ashamed to cite the figures of the American immigration agents. Well, Sir, our friends opposite were not ashamed to cite them once. They were not ashamed to cite the self-same returns which they characterize now as totally unreliable. They founded arguments upon those returns from 1874 to 1878. They accused my hon. friend, on these returns, of having introduced a policy which was ruining Canada, of being unable to retain in Canada the thousands upon thousands who were deserting this country. The statistics which my hon. friends opposite adopted and vouched for from 1874 to 1878, were made by the same man that the hon. member now denounces as being entirely unreliable. Why? Because they do not tell the story he would wish them to tell. Because they tell us that, though a hundred and thirty thousand people emigrated under the régime of my hon. friend from East York, over four hundred thousand have emigrated since. While referring to this exodus question, I may say that an attempt has been made to place my friend to the right in a false position, by speaking of him as having used these statistics when he did not use them at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not one.

Mr. CHARLTON. He took returns from various municipalities in Canada, and compared the population at one period with the population at another period; he took the census of the school population, he took the children attending schools, he took the population in the municipalities, and from the data supplied by these returns, he made his estimates, without any reference whatever to the statistics of the United States officials. The hon. member for Cardwell also stated that the Government, in every change it had made in the land regulations, had made a change for the better. I am willing to allow that there is a degree of truth in that, because the regulations at first were so utterly and villainously bad that they could not be made worse, and, when a clamour arose in the North-West and could be no longer resisted, the Government made some slight concession to public opinion; so the regulations have been slightly modified from time to time, and modified for the better. He told us that any company can now get a charter in the North-West for a railway in any direction, except across that belt of 15 miles. That is the very direction for which they want charters, the very part of the country over which they want to run; that is the wall which prevents their having communication with their neighbours in the south, and prevents their having railway connection and competition by competing lines. So long as that 15-mile belt interposes itself between the people of the North-West and the American competing roads, so long the complete and entire monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway is maintained.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Lake Nipissing and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 56) to empower the bondholders of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company to vote at meetings of the Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was about to enter for a few moments into the consideration of the question of agricultural protection. The Finance Minister, last year, was very modest in his claims as to the amount of the benefit that had been derived by the farmers of this country from protection. He claimed, I think, that the grower of wheat at that time received an advantage of 2 cents per bushel in consequence of the duty on grain; and this, if my memory serves me, was the only direct advantage the hon. gentleman claimed as accruing to the agricultural population from the operation of the duty. I took occasion, very soon afterwards, to demonstrate that the hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken as to any advantage that the farmers derived from the duty on grain. I demonstrated; that, so far from the farmers at that time receiving an advantage of 2 cents per bushel in the price of wheat, on the contrary, wheat in all American markets was higher at that moment than it was in corresponding Canadian markets. I showed that wheat, No. 2 Spring, in Chicago, was at that time as high as in Toronto. That oats, barley, peas and rye were higher in American than in corresponding Canadian markets, and that the same was true with regard to butter and cheese; in short, no advantage whatever accrued to the farmers of Canada at that time from the imposition of the duties upon grain. We have always admitted, Mr. Speaker, that a duty upon grain imported for consumption would affect the price of the article. We have always maintained, also, that on any grain of which we raised a surplus for exportation, the duty could not affect the price. This being true, it follows as a matter of course, that a duty imposed upon Indian corn affects the price of that article, because we imported largely in excess of exportation for consumption. But the interference of the Government, by levying a duty on Indian corn, is an interference that results in injury to the farmers. We import Indian corn simply because that grain is much cheaper than our coarse grains. Our farmers sell a corresponding quantity of barley, rye, oats and peas, at relatively higher prices than they pay for the corn, and the result is large profits to the farmers of the country. I estimated, in 1876, that the importation of 6,300,000 bushels of corn and its equivalent in corn meal, resulted in a gain to Canada of $1,400,000. By the importation of that corn, at an average price of 51 cents per bushel we were able to sell our entire surplus of peas and oats and 1,700,000 bushels of barley, which would otherwise have been consumed in the country, in the place of 6,300,000 bushels of corn imported. We actually made, after making fair allowance for transportation charges on the corn coming in and the coarse grains going out, a profit of $1,400,000. That is the reason, and the simple reason, why this country imports Indian corn. We might feed with our own coarse grains, but that feed would be dearer than the corn, and it is of course better to feed with cheap grain if it answers the purpose just as well. We have always maintained that the duty on wheat could not affect the price, except during a year when we failed to raise an amount sufficient for our own consumption, and the whole course of quotations since this policy was inaugurated—and I have made it a study to follow them, so that at public meetings I could show the operations, or rather the want of operations of the grain duties—shows that the price of wheat and all other grains, except corn, has been higher in American than in relative Canadian markets. It is now asserted that we have a short crop, that we have not raised wheat enough during the past year for our own consumption. If that is the case, then the duty will operate to raise the price of wheat, if we import it for consumption. The hon. gentleman claims that the duty now affords our farmers an advantage of from 8 to 10 cents per bushel on wheat. Why does it not afford an advantage of 15 cents the amount of the duty? The hon. gentleman did not make that claim for an obvious reason. The duty on flour is 50 cents per barrel, equivalent to 10 cents per bushel on wheat. He has arranged the Tariff so as to discriminate against the miller, for while the Tariff pretends to give a protection of 15 cents, it affords a protection of but 10 cents. But the hon. gentleman is mistaken in his opinion, that the farmers are deriving an advantage of 8 or 10 cents per bushel on wheat in consequence of the duty. The truth is, the farmers are deriving no such advantage. I have compiled the quotations for March 5th, as contained in the newspapers, and I find the following result:

QUOTATIONS, 5th MARCH, 1884.

No. 1 Spring Wheat.

Toronto..... $1.10. Buffalo, Duluth..... $1.14

No. 2 Spring.

Toronto..... $1.08. Buffalo..... $1.11
Chicago..... 92 cents each.

No. 2 Red Winter.

Toronto..... $1.06. Toledo..... $1.01
Oswego white and red, $1 to $1.12.

Barley.

Toronto No. 1..... 67 cents. Oswego No 1..... 85 cents.

Rye.

Toronto..... 60 cents. Oswego..... 67 cents in bond.
Chicago..... 58½ cents.

Oats.

Toronto..... 36 cts. per 34 lbs. Chicago, 32½ cts. per 32 lbs.
Toledo..... 35½ cts. per 32 lbs. Oswego..... 43 cts. per 32 lbs.
Buffalo..... 42 cts. per 32 lbs.

Peas.

Toronto No. 2..... 74 cts. Oswego..... 85 cts.

We find from these quotations that the difference in price for No. 2 spring wheat between Chicago and Toronto is 16 cts. That is very little, if any more, than the freight charges. So that at this moment, as between those two points, the Canadian farmer is not enjoying any advantage from higher prices at Toronto as compared with Chicago. The margin on No. 2 red, between Toledo and Toronto is 5 cents, which is less than the freight. The margin on wheat between Buffalo or Oswego and Toronto is the other way. The margin on barley is in favour of Oswego by 18 cents; rye by 7 cents in bond, oats by 7 cents, and peas by 21 cents. This shows conclusively that the farmers of this country are not at this moment receiving any appreciable advantage from the duty on grain. Wheat may be a fraction higher than it would be without the duty, but the price cannot be more than 2 or 3 cents higher than otherwise it would be. It may be that the difference will be greater. In spring it may be greater, when the stock is exhausted in the country, when the farmers' granaries are empty, when the wheat has all passed into the hands of the millers, then it may be higher by the amount of the duty on flour. The increase in the price of wheat will then come just at the time when the farmers will not be benefited.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The last two or three months it has been so.

Mr. CHARLTON. The quotations shows that it has not been so. They show that the farmer is not deriving any appreciable benefit, and I say that he will not derive any appreciable benefit at the time when he has any wheat to sell. The quotations show that other grains are higher in American markets than here; they show that agricultural protection is one of the most transparent humbugs ever palmed off on a confiding public.

An hon. MEMBER. What did you think about it in 1878?

Mr. CHARLTON. I never advocated so palpable an absurdity as a duty on agricultural products, or asserted that the farmers could be benefited by protection on the grain they raise in this country.

So much for agricultural protection. I shall now refer briefly in conclusion to a few leading facts in connection with the financial policy of my hon. friend. Sir, I think I may reasonably assert that all the promises made by that hon. gentleman, with regard to the advantages afforded by agricultural protection, have been dissipated into thin air. So far as the duties are concerned, it cannot be shown, it never has been shown, that the farmers have derived the slightest advantage from his protective duties. Then I may remind the hon. gentleman that some few years ago, while my hon. friends at my right held portfolios, he asserted that $23,000,000 was as much as should be expended annually by this country, and yet the hon. gentleman in the face of that declaration, has carried up the expenditure of Canada to $31,000,000. The hon. gentleman promised to cure the evil of an adverse balance of trade, and in the face of that promise we have an adverse balance of trade last year of $18,000,000, and this year of nearly double that amount. Last year he contracted for seven years' prosperity; he assured us that we were sure of seven years' good times, and yet the policy which was to secure that prosperity, when the slightest stress is placed upon it, shows signs of failure. He has succeeded, in four short years, by the legitimate operation of the protective policy, in overdoing one of the great industries of this country, so that it is in danger of disaster. He was to create a home market for the farmers, which was to absorb all the productions of the soil, and yet in the face of that promise we have an increased exportation of food, of grain, of flour and meal, by a sum of $32,000,000, since the hon. gentleman came into office. We have increased it 55 per cent. in the face of the promise that he was to afford the farmers a home market for their productions. He was to exclude foreign goods by his policy, and yet, despite his promise, we have actually gone on increasing the importations of goods susceptible of manufacture in this country to the extent of 79 per cent., as compared with the importations of 1879. He was to raise wages, yet in the face of that pledge it was shown by the gentleman who furnished him statistics in regard to cotton manufacture, that the wages of cotton operatives have fallen from $245 a year, in 1879, to $194 in 1883. He was to give us good times. I remember well, when the hon. member assured us in this House, that good times had come to stay. Well, Sir, I think the hon. gentleman assumed rather more power than belonged to any mortal man in this matter. I think he arrogated to himself a degree of influence which no man in this House or out of it possesses. Yes, Sir; good times were come to stay. He looked abroad and saw the reparation of the waste of war, the settlement of commercial difficulties in the United States, after a long period of depression, which affected them as well as us—he saw these damages repaired; he saw commerce and manufactures resuming their wonted course, and, looking complacently at us, he said: Behold the effect of the National Policy! He saw our fields waving with abundant harvests, our farmers gathering in crops larger than were known for years, and then, with the same degree of complacency, he pointed to the National Policy. In fact, the hon. gentleman arrogated to himself blessings which are dispensed by Providence alone, and I fear Providence may yet punish the hon. gentleman for his presumption, by showing him how weak and poor a creature man is at best, and how shortsighted are all his assumptions of wisdom and power. We have evidence of this in the fact that this vaunted policy cannot stand the slightest strain—that it can stand an infinitely less strain than did the policy of my hon. friends beside me, when they occupied the Treasury benches during the five years, from 1873 to 1878. It is a policy whose inherent weakness is that it increases waste by useless taxation, and by large incidental taxation. It taxes everyone directly more than is required, and indirectly its taxes are twice those which are taken from the people directly. And Sir, when a succession of good harvests is interrupted, when the $40,000,000 which are to be added to the public debt of Canada, in consequence of the so called loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, in consequence of the additional subsidy to be granted to that road, and when the necessity for heavier taxation arises, as it will inevitably arise, when the full proportions and the actual character of the monopolies which have been created by this Government have been made apparent to this country, then the people will remember, if they do not now remember, that the taxation of the people of Canada from Customs and Excise, in the last year of the late Administration, was only $1.34 per head, while it is now $6.65 per head, or an increase of more than 50 per cent. They will then remember that these hon. gentlemen managed the affairs of the country during a great commercial crisis, during a long period of severe depression, which existed over the whole world—they will remember that they managed the affairs of this country with prudence, that they strongly maintained that economy which should be maintained by every Government; that they went out of office having increased the expenditure but slightly since they came in, and they will remember their ingratitude in 1878, for having withheld their confidence from the only Government who managed the affairs of this country with honesty for a generation.

Mr. DUNDAS. I had not intended to make any remarks on this question, at this time, but for some of the statements of the last speaker. I thought, Sir, that every person who reads the newspapers, knew that the price of wheat in Canada has very materially been advanced by means of the protective duty which has been imposed. If the hon. gentleman who has just sat down had read the Globe to-day, and had taken its report of the price of wheat in Chicago and in Toronto, and had intelligently instituted a comparison, I think he would have seen that the statement which he made was incorrect—that the farmers derive no benefit from the imposition of the duty. The Globe of to-day states that the price of spring wheat No. 2, in Chicago, yesterday was 91½ cents, against $1.08 in Toronto, for same grade, leaving a difference of about 16½ cents a bushel in favour of Toronto. Now, the freight from Chicago to Toronto, I think, is about 7 cents a bushel. This would leave the difference in favour of Toronto at about 9½ cents a bushel. If it were not for that duty, why would the price of wheat be higher in Toronto to-day than the price in Chicago, plus the freight from the latter place? It is entirely due to the duty which has been imposed. I am not going to discuss the question at present whether it is better for the country that the price of wheat should be high or low. The farmers of Ontario who have wheat to sell, of course, desire to have the price as high as possible, while those who consume wheat desire to have it cheap. But I think I can establish, not by the isolated case of to-day, but by taking the price of wheat at those points for the last eight or nine years, and striking an average, that the price of wheat has been advanced in Canada by the protection which has been afforded since 1879. I have the figures in detail, showing the average price of wheat in Toronto and in Chicago, each alternate week for the last eight years. I shall not go into the details, but have struck an average, and will give the House the result. In 1875, the average price of No. 2 spring wheat was $1.01½ in Toronto, and $1.02½ in Chicago; in 1876, it was $1.03½ in Toronto, and $1.02½ in Chicago; in 1877, $1.32 in Toronto, and $1.22 in Chicago; in 1878, 96½ in Toronto, and 97 cents in Chicago, and in 1879, until the 15th of March, the date of the imposition of the duty, 84 cents in Toronto, and 87 cents in Chicago. Taking the average for those five years, we find that the average in Toronto was $1.03½ and in Chicago $1.02½, or 1 cent more in Toronto than in Chicago. Now let us see what the average was during the five years next succeeding the imposition of the duty. In 1879, that is, from the date of the imposition of the duty to the end of the year, the average price was $1.02½ in Toronto, and $1.02½ in Chicago; in 1880, it was $1.17½ in Toronto, and $1.05 in Chicago; in 1881, $1.23 in Toronto, and $1.14½ in Chicago; in 1882, $1.20½ in Toronto, and $1.15 in Chicago, and in 1883, $1.08½ in Toronto, and $1.01½ in Chicago. If I had gone over the first two months of this year, I could have shown that the difference during that time was still greater. Now, striking an average of those five years, we find that the average price was $1.14½ in Toronto, against $1.07½ in Chicago. Thus we find that during the five years next preceding the imposition of the duty, the difference was 1 cent a bushel in favour of Toronto, while during the five years next succeeding the imposition of the duty the difference was 7½ cents in favour of Toronto. Now, what makes this difference? It is nothing else than the duty which keeps American wheat out. But it may be asked, why is the difference not greater than 7½ cents when the duty on wheat is 15 cents a bushel? Simply for the reason that flour, upon which the duty is lower than on wheat, is imported instead. As I said before, I do not wish to argue the point as to whether a high or a low price of wheat is for the benefit of the country; but the point I want to make, and to emphasize, is, that but for the imposition of the duty on wheat, the average price of wheat in Toronto, for the last five years, would have been from 7 to 8 cents a bushel less than it has been. I do not think you will find a farmer in Ontario, no matter what his politics are, who desires to have the duty taken off wheat to-day, and when I say that, I know what I am saying; I believe that the grangers, a majority of whom support hon. gentlemen opposite, are every day sending petitions to this Parliament, praying that the duty may not be taken off wheat.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Until it is taken off flour also.

Mr. DUNDAS. I quite concede that it would be fairer for the millers as well as for the farmers if the duty on wheat and flour were equalized, by making the duty on flour proportional to the duty on wheat, which would be about 75 cents a barrel. But I would rather leave the Tariff as it is, than have the duty on wheat reduced. I have desired to make this statement to settle this question once for all, but more particularly because of a remark made by a paper which is supposed to be impartial in politics; I refer to the Monetary Times. I saw a statement in that paper a few weeks ago, to the effect that the imposition of the duty on wheat could in no wise affect the price in Canada, inasmuch as that the price in Canada was regulated by the price in Liverpool. That would be the case, provided we had to look to that port for a market; but, as is known by every person in the trade, this year at least, we have a market at home for all and more than all the wheat that has been produced within the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS. According to the observations made by the hon. Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Cardwell, and other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House, we on this side have been guilty of the atrocious offence of telling the truth in regard to the actual condition and circumstances of the country. There is no doubt that it is not always easy to interest the public in questions of trade and commerce, or in a discussion of the general principles of policy which ought to govern the country in questions of this kind. But the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, knew how advantageous it was to take advantage of the depressed condition of the country, in order to attack with success its fiscal policy, and it seems to me that at present we have a favourable condition of things for a consideration of the policy of the Administration upon its merits. While the great majority of our people are prosperous, while trade is healthy, while the profits of the farmers are good and the prices are fair, it is not easy to interest them in questions which are really of very considerable importance to them, and it is only when the affairs of the country are straitened, when trade is depressed, that they are able to fully appreciate, and are willing to consider the important questions such as those relating to the fiscal policy of the Administration. We know what arguments were addressed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, the present Prime Minister, many years ago, and by those who were associated with him in the discussion of this question. The hon. gentleman, in 1878, proposed a resolution, in which he declared there were thousands of people leaving Canada because of their inability to obtain employment here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The resolution did not say so.

Mr. MILLS. The resolution did say that there were thousands of people leaving Canada because of their inability to obtain employment nearer home, and the hon. gentleman proposed to increase the taxation of this country for the purpose of keeping out foreign products and for the purpose of enabling the people of Canada to engage in manufactures and find a home market for the products of those industrial establishments. We heard nothing then of the unpatriotic character of a course of this sort, nor did we complain. We contested the accuracy of those statements, we contest their accuracy still; but now, when the condition of the country has been changed, when the promises then made have not been fulfilled, when the predictions then made in reference to the effects of this policy have not been verified, we hear hon. gentlemen opposite complain of hon. gentlemen on this side who repeat, as to the present conditions of things, those very statements made by the hon. First Minister in the resolution he then proposed. He then stated that thousands of people were leaving Canada because of their inability to obtain employment. But to-day the number out of employment is at least three times as great as when the hon. gentleman declared, and we say incorrectly declared, this to be the condition that then existed. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that we are unpatriotic, that we are seeking to decry the country, that we are seeking to prevent capital coming here as an investment, and that we are seeking to keep away immigration from the country. Well, if we look at the present condition of things in the towns and cities of this country, I think no great damage would be done at the present time if a large number of immigrants did not come here, under the existing circumstances. I believe at present we have a very large number of people who are out of employment, who are perfectly willing to work, but the work is not to be had; and it does seem to me that, under these circumstances, even if the charge were true, and we were successful in keeping away labourers from Canada at present, we should do no great damage to the country. Now, the hon. Minister of Finance, in his Budget Speech this Session, repeated the same statements that he made when he introduced his policy in 1879. He then said, as his leader said before, that Canada was, in 1878, and under the Administration of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), made a sacrifice market; yet he tells us to-day that although Canada was then a sacrifice market to such an extent that the manufacturers in this country were unable to sell their products in competition with the products brought in from abroad, we are to-day in a much more prosperous condition and our people are supplied with the goods which they consume at a cheaper rate than ever before; in fact, the hon. gentleman has been all along saying that bad as the sacrifice market was, or that good as it was for the people of this country to get their goods at a low price, they get their goods to-day at still lower prices than they did then, when the prices were ruinous to the Canadian manufacturers. Those ruinous prices of that day have no such ruinous effect now, and although prices are lower now and wages are higher, those engaged in manufacturing pursuits are reaping handsome profits which they could not reap in a better market, and when their goods commanded higher prices. In the first place, I have never been able to understand the proposition which the Finance Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite put forward on that occasion, and have repeated from time to time ever since. I can understand how the people might be injured by getting less for a commodity than it is worth, but how they were injured by buying their goods at less than their actual value—by getting too much for their money, I cannot understand, nor has the hon. Finance Minister ever yet explained it to the country. If the American manufacturers sent their goods to Canada and sold them for less than they were worth, I can understand how the American manufacturers might be injured—I can understand how they might sustain a loss, but I have never been able to understand how the people of Canada were injured in consequence of that policy. Then we were told by these hon. gentlemen that the American manufacturers and others were sending their goods in here and making Canada a slaughter market. Well, if you will look back at the condition of the country at that time, you will find that the importations into Canada were nearly $40,000,000 less than they were a few years before, and these gentlemen have never yet told us how it is, if the $128,000,000 worth of foreign products coming into Canada do not displace the Canadian manufacturers, how these manufacturers could have injured them when the importations were less by $40,000,000. They said the country was prosperous in 1873. Then we were importing $128,000,000 worth of goods. The hon. Finance Minister told us that we had every reason to believe that the country would continue to prosper, year after year, not by the restriction of its trade, but by increased importations and increased exportations. In 1877 these hon. gentlemen told us, and they have repeated the same thing from time to time since, that we were to be helped by high taxation; that we were to impose high taxes for the purpose of making this country prosperous. Well, at that very time the United States had a system of high taxation, and Free Trade policy prevailed in England, as it does to-day, and yet, where there was a policy of Free Trade and where there was a policy of high taxation there was alike depression. And, when we find all over the civilized world the condition of trade depressed, irrespective of the fiscal policy of the Government, I think we have in this condition of things a very good evidence that the depressed condition of commerce throughout the world in no degree arose from the fiscal policy of the Administration. At all events, it was the bounden duty of those gentlemen, before they adopted the change they proposed, to show us that a better condition of things would arise from the policy which they proposed. We asked them again and again, at that time, if Canada was to be helped by a policy of high taxes, how it was that a system of high taxation had not prevented depression in the United States. Those hon. gentlemen have never undertaken to show how that could be. They recommended this policy, but they did not show that it was a proper remedy for the condition of things that then existed. When we look at the circumstance of Canada, we have no difficulty in pointing out the causes of the depression which prevailed. We know that, in consequence of the depression in the United States and in England, we were unable to find a market for our lumber. The thousands of men who were employed in our lumber woods ceased to obtain employment. There was not the usual quantity of lumber cut; there was not the usual amount exported. The people of the United States who were engaged in manufacturing pursuits, who bought our lumber for the purpose of making new mills and cottages, for the purpose of extending their manufacturing establishments and giving shelter to their employes, discontinued their operations. Many of those manufacturing establishments were closed. These people were thrown out of employment. Those who were engaged as operatives in those establishments were obliged to leave the cities and migrate beyond the Mississippi River and engage in agricultural pursuits, so that we ceased to have a market for our lumber, and, in all those districts of Canada where the population were depending upon this particular branch of industry, we know that the trade of the country was depressed, and that a depressed condition of industry prevailed. But, in the western section of Ontario, where the population is largely dependent upon agriculture, where the crops were fairly good, and the markets were in their usual condition, the depression was not felt; and it is well known to almost every resident of the country west of Toronto that we felt no depression, except for a few months in the autumn, or the latter part of the year 1879. When the Finance Minister, the other day, asked us whether the trade of the country or the condition of the country was not more depressed in every part of the country in 1878 than it was at the present time, I said it was not. I know that that is the case. I know, at the present time, that the people of the western portion of Ontario feel the commercial depression, the industrial depression, during the present year to a larger extent than they have during the past twenty years; and I have no doubt whatever that the importations of the country and the amount of revenue collected during the remaining portion of this year, will show that that is the case. Now, when we know that depression existed everywhere, it is perfectly obvious that it was absurd to attribute that depression to the fiscal policy of the Administration. As I have already said, the lumber market in the valley of the Ottawa and other portions of Canada was depressed. Those who usually depended upon the cutting of lumber for employment were without employment, and those who supplied them with their goods did not find their usual market. Everyone in this city knows that Sussex street was during that period deserted, that those who furnished the lumbermen with their boots and shoes and their clothing were unable to sell those goods, and they were unable to sell them for the very reason that the lumbermen had ceased to employ those parties for the purpose of cutting their logs in the lumber woods. Well, this was precisely the condition of things in other branches of industry. When we examined Mr. Frost and others who were engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements, and in supplying the farmers in the valley of the Ottawa, they told us that the farmers here were unable to pay them. They said: We have our hay and oats in our barns, but we have not our usual market; we sold those products to those who were engaged in the lumber trade, but the trade being dull, they are not required. Well, what was required to change this condition of things? Was it additional taxes upon the population? Not at all. It was revival of the trade, and when we called the lumbermen together and asked them what remedy they proposed to remove the condition of things of which they complained, they said they had no remedy; they proposed nothing; they wished for a revival of the lumber trade, and they were obliged to wait until times became prosperous again in the United States and the United Kingdom. Then those hon. gentlemen, although they told us of the depression that existed and the remedy they proposed, failed to look at the parties who were suffering and whose business was depressed. Now, we had at that time facilities for obtaining information which do not exist at the present time. The Insolvent Act was in operation; there were official assignees in every part of the country; when persons who engaged in business failed, we could apply to the official assignees to ascertain who they were, what their avocations were, and the amount for which they failed, and we obtained returns from every portion of Canada, from British Columbia to Halifax. What do those returns show? They show that those who were engaged in commercial business were those who were suffering; it was not the manufacturing class. The First Minister, in the resolution which he proposed to Parliament, declared that it was the manufacturing classes who were suffering, and that the policy proposed was a policy in their interest; that was necessary in order to revive trade, in order to get rid of the depression that then existed. But when we look at the facts, we find that was not the case. We find that very few manufacturers failed. Now, I have taken the trouble of going over the returns we then obtained, and I will read some of these figures to the House. I find that fourteen dealers in coal failed for $317,000; sixteen commission merchants, for $427,000; one engaged in the sale of crockery, for $36,000; 125 engaged in the sale of dry goods, for $4,800,000; twenty druggists, for $80,000; twelve dealers in fancy dry goods, for $167,000; 122 grocers, for $1,500,000; thirty-two hardware merchants, for $3,000,000; 327 general merchants, for $2,200,000; forty merchant tailors, for $536,000; twenty-eight jewellers for $430,000; four leather merchants, for $489,000; two paper merchants, for $108,000; one sugar importer, for $128,000; one general importer, for $160,000, making 745 failures for $15,000,000, in round numbers. Now, Sir, when we look at the class of manufacturers, we find that they were in a comparatively prosperous condition; that among the cotton manufacturers, one failed for $7,000; that among the woolen manufacturers, three failed for $30,000; that among the sewing machine manufacturers, one failed for $99,000, and that those who failed for the largest amounts, the carriage makers, the foundrymen and the boot and shoe makers, were those who had little or no competition from abroad. Eleven foundrymen failed for $324,000; thirty carriage makers, for $210,000; sixty-five boot and shoe makers, for $840,000, and of all the manufacturers of Canada together, in a single year, the failures amounted to less than one-twelfth the amount of failures of the mercantile classes. Now, Mr. Speaker, when the Government proposes a remedy for the depressed condition of things, for what class should their remedy provide? Certainly for those who were suffering. Now, the fiscal policy of the hon. gentlemen, from 1878 until to-day, is a policy to provide for those who are comparatively prosperous. There was, perhaps, no class in Canada that, during the period of depression, weathered the storm with more success than the manufacturing class. And why? Because their business had adjusted itself to the circumstances of the country, had grown out of the wants and interests of the population, and had received no artificial stimulus, or none to a perceptible extent. It had grown with sufficient rapidity to meet the wants of the country, and the result was, that when a period of depression came, it was enabled to live quite as well as any other branch of industry in which the population of this country was engaged. When we look at the circumstances of the country, we see why it was that the mercantile classes suffered during that period of depression. Their sales had largely fallen off. The population of the country consumed, of imported goods, during the years of prosperity, or of inflation, $128,000,000, while in 1878 they consumed $91,000,000 worth. The number of merchants had not diminished. Those who were engaged in carrying on the trade of the country and in distributing those products, were the same in number as before; but when the business of the country, including home products as well as imported goods, had fallen off more than 50 per cent., it is perfectly obvious that this would injuriously affect a very large class of the population. A man may fairly live on the profits of a trade of $10,000 a year, but may be driven into bankruptcy if you take off 30 per cent. of his sales, and precisely so it was during this period of depression. The sales made by the merchants had largely fallen off, and the result was that a large number of them had not sufficient profits to enable them to continue in business. This being the case, what then was required in order to get rid of this condition of things? Clearly to lighten their burdens. But what did gentlemen opposite say? Why Sir, the Government came down with the proposition to impose additional burdens upon the mercantile class—those who were barely able to keep their heads above water. The more they suffered the greater the burdens the Government imposed upon them. The Government took from those who had not and gave to those who had in abundance. They proposed to help the class who did not suffer at the expense of those who felt, in a serious and marked degree, the depression which prevailed. Now, Sir, when a protective policy prevailed for many years in the United Kingdom, I do not remember a single instance—I say no such instance existed—where, during a period of depression, a Government proposed to relieve the mercantile class from that depression from which they were suffering by the imposition of additional taxes upon them. I say the proper remedy, under these circumstances, no matter what may be the views of this House or the country as to the fiscal policy that ought to be pursued, at other times—the proper remedy was to lighten the burdens of taxation, had this been possible, instead of imposing additional taxes upon the population. What do we find here as the result? Why, Sir, when the hon. gentleman, who is at present the Finance Minister, proposed additional burdens on the population of this country, we find that the number of failures during the first year of his policy was greater, and the amount the aggregate amount larger than in previous years. The amount in 1879 reached nearly $30,000,000, a sum larger by several millions than in any other year during that depression.

Mr. HESSON. It was the wind up of your bad policy.

Mr. MILLS. I do not hear the hon. gentleman. Now, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen are telling the country that the manufacturing industries of Canada are due to the fiscal policy they adopted. Why, what are the facts? Take the case of the cotton industry. When my hon. friend for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) came into office in 1873, we find that the number of pounds of raw cotton manufactured in Canada was 1,700,000; and when he retired from office, the number of pounds manufactured in Canada was 9,000,000, a four-fold increase during five years. It seems to me that was a very rapid growth of a manufacturing industry; it was a growth quite rapid enough for a prosperous period, and any additional stimulus was, under the circumstances, a very hazardous experiment. Now, let us look at the condition of things which existed in Canada in 1878, with regard to manufactures. In the case of agricultural implements, we manufactured upwards of 95 per cent. of those that were purchased by the population of this country; of boots and shoes, 99.1 per cent.—almost the whole consumption of the country. The people of Canada purchased, per capita, \$4.63 worth of boots and shoes of domestic manufacture, and  $\frac{1}{10}$  of 1 cent per capita of those that were manufactured abroad. Well, Sir, it is not necessary to argue that the boot and shoe manufactures could not be helped by additional taxes. Then, in the case of cabinet ware—upwards of 99 per cent. was manufactured in Canada. In the case of carriages, 99 per cent.; in the manufactures of machinery, 93 per cent.; in the case of saddles and harness, 98 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; in the case of woollen goods, 84 per cent.; in stone and marble cutting, 97 per cent.; in merchant tailoring, 95 per cent.; in the manufacture of paper, 82 per cent.; in the manufacture of brooms and brushes, 95 per cent.; in the manufacture of cheese, 93 per cent.; in the manufacture of ropes and twine, 94.1 per cent.; in the manufacture of rubber, 81 per cent. So we find that all those industries which I have mentioned were in a prosperous condition, and so far from being driven out of the Canadian market by goods brought in from abroad and slaughtered, they had nearly the entire Canadian market to themselves. If you look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, you find the difference between consumption and importation, in years of prosperity and depression, is about 30 per cent., so it is perfectly obvious that if we manufacture all the goods required during years of prosperity there would be a considerable industrial disturbance in years of depression, and it has never been of advantage to this country and never will be—unless we can find foreign markets for our surplus products—to press forward our manufactures more rapidly than they were being developed under the moderate Tariff which formerly existed. Hon. gentleman opposite told the country that if they came into power they would remedy the condition of things which prevailed. I have already pointed out the cause of the depression. It was the want of our usual foreign market. One country dealing with another is very like a merchant dealing with his customers, and his prosperity largely depends upon their good fortune and success. It is impossible, in these modern times, when exchanges of commodities are largely carried on between countries, that one country can remain prosperous while the industry of other countries is very greatly depressed. If Canada suffered from depression between 1874 and 1880, it was not due to any want of wisdom in the conduct of its public affairs; it was due entirely to circumstances over which the Government had no control, the condition of things which prevailed elsewhere, and so soon as trade abroad revived, so soon as we had a good foreign market for the products of our forests, soil and fisheries, the trade of this country revived, our industries revived, the products of labour were increased and the purchasing power of the country was correspondingly increased. The hon. Finance Minister told us, in 1879, as he has told us every year since, that one important object to be obtained by this policy was the exclusion of foreign products. I always supposed that it was an advantage to a community to purchase whatever they could obtain by the products of labour cheaper than they could produce it by that labour. If we can produce, with a smaller amount of capital and labour, certain goods elsewhere and obtain for them a larger amount of other commodities than a similar amount of labour and capital would produce here, it is an advantage to us to engage in the exchange. It is on that principle that the industries and trade of a country are promoted and it is on that principle that trade is carried on between one country and another. If hon. gentlemen opposite were correct in the views they entertained, then the public works in which they engaged are certainly a very great calamity. The effect of railways and canals is to cheapen transportation and do away with the natural protection which exists between distant points. It seems a most extraordinary state of mind, first, to assume that those public works are of consequence and advantage to the community, and then to impose duties and place impediments in the way of their free use. That is what we are engaged in doing at this moment. Then, the hon. gentlemen told us, as they did in 1879, and have done every year since, that they were going to put an end to our foreign trade; they were going to destroy all those branches of industry or trade in articles which could be produced in this country. They were going to put an end to the importation of cottons, woollen goods, the cheaper kinds of porcelain; they were going to engage in the production of steel and iron—they were going to do all these things for the purpose of diminishing the imports, for they said our imports are far too large. In my opinion if we produced exports with which to pay for imports, we were as well employed as if we had obtained those particular branches of industry, and produced the articles imported. If we import more than we consume and cannot pay for the goods, it is a very bad business for those who trust us; but is not a bad thing for us, materially, whatever it may be morally. If we purchase several millions worth of goods abroad, while we do not produce anything to pay for them, it is perfectly obvious that those who trust us are not liable to trust us very long. I have never yet been able to understand how hon. gentlemen opposite believe we can carry on a prosperous trade and export millions more than we import. What do the Trade and Navigation Returns show? They show that the years of the greatest depression are the years in which the exports are relatively larger, and the years of the greatest prosperity are the years in which our imports are largely in excess of our exports. Why? Because they are years of our greatest profits. The merchant who ships 50,000 bushels of grain in Montreal, for \$50,000, and sends it to Liverpool and sells it at a profit in Liverpool, must bring back more than \$50,000 worth of goods. If he makes a profit of \$5,000, he will bring back \$55,000 worth of goods; if the ship founders at sea, he will have exported \$50,000 and imported nothing. According to the calculations of the Finance Minister, that would indicate a prosperous condition of the country. Again, what the Government promised has not been fulfilled. Better prices have not been obtained for our products. They vary from year to year, as they did before. The relative prices, as compared with the United States, are the same as they were before the duties were imposed. None of the promises in that respect have been fulfilled. Then we do not find that the people have a home market, as was promised them. Their products are sent abroad, as they were before. Wheat, cattle, sheep, horses, the products of the mine and of the fisheries are sent abroad now, as they were before this policy was adopted. We do not find towns turning into cities, villages into towns, and hamlets into villages. We do not find these manufacturing establishments within sight of every farmer in Canada, as these gentlemen promised we would find. None of these promises have been fulfilled. These hon. gentlemen told us that the late Government were responsible for the depression which existed, and that they were flies on the wheel because they could not remedy it. Yet we find, in spite of this National Policy, in spite of all the efforts these gentlemen put forward, that the condition of depression is again returning; that trade is stagnant, that labourers are out of employment; and we find what we did not find before, manufacturing establishments closed all over the country. The condition of things is one not at all to be desired. They told us, too, that no man would have to leave Canada in order to obtain employment. At the present time thousands are obliged to leave to obtain employment. These gentlemen said, when, according to the American returns, only 23,000 were leaving Canada, that it was because they could not obtain employment. Put us in power, they said, and we will remedy these things. The present Minister of Railways told us that men were not fit to occupy the Treasury benches who could not produce such a condition of things as would prevent the young men of Canada leaving the country and expatriating themselves in the United States. What is the condition of things now? Why, Sir, the emigration has reached the enormous number of 117,000 in a single year. The number of people who leave Canada now is at least three times as great as during the period of the Administration of the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). During the whole period of the late Administration, there were 120,437 people left Canada, according to the returns of the Bureau of Statistics in Washington. During 1881, under hon. gentlemen opposite, there were 117,000 left Canada, or within 3,000 as many in a single year as during the whole five years of the late Administration, according to the same authority. And, Sir, I have no doubt that that authority is very nearly accurate. I know it has been questioned by the Minister of Agriculture, but I trust that before this Session ends we will have an opportunity of discussing that question, when I think it will be conclusively shown that the statistics given by the Bureau at Washington are very nearly accurate, and that the statistics put before the country by the Minister of Agriculture are altogether wrong and misleading. Now, if these gentlemen are capable of fulfilling the promises which they made in 1878, and which they have repeated yearly from that time to this, the time has come when it is important that those should be redeemed. We know, Sir, that they have not been redeemed. We know that the condition of prosperity which has prevailed in this country, so far as it has prevailed, has not been on account of the policy of the Administration, but in spite of it. Hon. gentlemen told us, that if they were in power they would put an end to emigration. It has increased threefold. They told us that they would secure constant employment for the labouring classes. We know that thousands are out of employment at this moment. They declared that they would secure to capital a profitable investment. We know that there are millions invested at this day which are yielding no return to the owners. They said they would assist the agricultural classes, by securing to them better prices than prevailed before. We find that the prices, as compared with those of the United States, are to-day no better, and in some respects worse, than they were before this policy was adopted. I say, then, that in every one of these particulars the policy of the Administration has failed. Pledges that were given have not been redeemed, and the promises of economy which they gave have been wholly departed from. Why, Sir, when you look at the amount of money now required to carry on the Government of the country, and compare it with that which was required before, you see that many millions more are required at the present time to conduct the Government than was required in 1878. In every one of these particulars these hon. gentlemen have failed to fulfil the pledges which they have given to the country. They have failed to prevent that depression which they said could be prevented. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs called the members of the late Administration flies on the wheel. They said they were helpless—that they could do nothing to relieve the depressed condition of the industries of the country. They themselves are admitting, day by day, since this House has met, that they are flies on the wheel. They admit that they cannot help the manufacturing classes. They admit that they cannot help the labouring classes. They admit that they can do nothing to give to the agriculturalists better prices for their products than they had before. They cannot do one of those things which they promised they would accomplish, if permitted to obtain control of the affairs of this country. Now, it seems to me, in looking at our financial circumstances, that we are in a very critical condition at this moment. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have largely increased the burdens of the people. They have largely increased the annual expenditure of the Government, and prosperous times have favoured them with large amounts of revenue. We have every prospect, at this moment, of serious commercial depression. We have every prospect of a large falling off in the revenue of the country, and we have now threatening us a deficit which these hon. gentlemen declared ought not to occur under a Government, if the affairs of the country were efficiently administered. In my opinion, Sir, the taxation of the country ought to be imposed wholly with reference to the public interest and the public necessities. I have never said that a 15 per cent. Tariff was too small, or that a 20 per cent Tariff was too large. I say that the amount of Customs and Excise duties which we impose, should depend wholly on the necessities of the Government. If a 15 per cent. revenue is sufficient, no more taxation should be imposed; if 25 per cent. is required to conduct the affairs of the country and meet the obligations of the Government, when its affairs are economically administered, I am quite ready to impose a 25 per cent. Tariff. Whatever taxation is required to meet the public necessities, I am free to admit, the Government ought to impose. But beyond that they should not go. The present Administration, as its extravagant expenditures show, and as its large surplus shows, imposed burthens on the people altogether beyond the requirements of the State. These are not the only burthens the people have to bear. The Government have imposed taxes with special reference to taking out of the pockets of the people of this country a large amount that finds its way into the public Treasury. My hon. friend from South Huron has pointed that out very clearly. Why, Sir, foreign goods could not come in here at all, were it not that the people are paying an amount of taxes far beyond the amount that finds its way into the public Treasury. Look at the millions of cotton and woollen goods imported into this country; how do they find a market? By a corresponding increase in the price of the home article; otherwise, they could not be sold here at all, unless, indeed, they were sold at a loss. The revenue which the Government has derived during the last five years has been wholly dependent upon a corresponding increase in the price of the goods produced in this country; so that the people of Canada have paid taxes to the extent of many millions beyond those which are represented in the Public Accounts as finding their way into the public Treasury. In my opinion, Sir, the Government ought to impose the taxes in such a way as to make them press as lightly upon the trade and commerce of the country as possible. They should impose them in such a way as to distribute them over the country, so that each will pay, as nearly as may be, in proportion to his wealth, and that the people of the different Provinces will bear their fair proportions of the public burdens. We know that this is not done. We know that some portions of the population are paying taxes from which other portions are exempt. What is meant by the tax on breadstuffs? Is that not a tax on one section of this country that is not borne by another section? Are not the people of the Maritime Provinces subjected to a tax that the people in other parts of the Dominion are not called on to bear? What has been the statement of an hon. gentleman to-night? That the people of Canada, this year, have produced less breadstuffs than they require, and that the duties imposed by the Government have increased the price; so that the people who are obliged to buy their bread have to pay, not merely the ordinary market price, but also a tax to the Government, from which other portions of the Dominion are exempt. I say that this is a grossly unjust method of taxation. Our whole fiscal system ought to be revised; and it seems to me, looking at the present condition of the country, that the time has come when we, on this side of the House, may fairly discuss this question with the hope that the public will seriously consider the character of our fiscal policy, and the mischievous consequences which flow from that policy upon the entire country.

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention to the speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, and by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who spoke this afternoon. I have listened to both of those hon. gentlemen with attention, yet with disappointment. I did expect that we should have had some variety, at least, in their speeches—that we should not have had the same old stories that have been repeated hereout year after year, ever since this National Policy has been debated on the floors of Parliament. I did expect that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whose voice we have not heard here for some months, would have given us something new. I did expect that the hon. member for North Norfolk, who, in 1876 or 1877, delivered the most eloquent protectionist speech that has been delivered in Parliament, and who ever since has been delivering long and elaborate Free Trade arguments, and has to-night pronounced a protective policy to be a transparent humbug—I did suppose that a gentleman with such varied accomplishments would have given us something new. But neither hon. gentlemen has offered us anything but the same old stories which have been so often repeated. I have little to complain of in the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk; but in the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell, I have this to complain of—and I think the country will complain of it—that not once, but a number of times during his comparatively short speech, he has announced to the world that people are crowding out of this country for the want of employment. Sir, let me just say one word in respect to that. He tells us that he took his figures from the same authority from which they were taken for the years from 1874 to 1878, and that he finds that five times as many have gone out during the time the present Government have occupied the Treasury Benches as went out during the period of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MILLS. No, no.

Mr. McLELAN. Well, it was three times as many, which is a sufficiently bad announcement to have made to the world. He should have explained that that same authority which he quotes gives ten times as many people from Canada as passing westward now as passed westward during the time his friends occupied the Treasury benches. We have opened up communication with our North-West, and there is a continual tide of immigrants passing through the American territory to and from that country, and that same authority places a large percentage of them as emigrants leaving the country. And yet the hon. gentleman does not fail to stand up here and announce, with all the weight and responsibility which his position gives him, that three times as many people are crowding out of the country as crowded out of it in 1878.

Mr. MILLS. It is true, nevertheless.

Mr. HESSON. It is not so.

Mr. McLELAN. I think, Sir, that the reason I have given—that there is a great intercourse going on between old Canada and the North-West, and that we have to travel 1,100 miles through United States territory to reach that country—is the reason why Americans have an opportunity of misrepresenting the number of emigrants that pass out of the country. The hon. member for Bothwell compliments his Government upon having been able to ascertain the condition of the country by means of a bankrupt law, and states that they could ascertain, through the official assignee, from day to day, how many people failed. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues failed to lift a hand to remedy the evils which they found spreading over the country. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman would have us to believe at one moment that the country was in the greatest state of prosperity, and that very few of the manufacturers were failing. It was only the merchants that were going, day after day, failing for millions. The merchants were all in bankruptcy and ruin. And why? Because, he said, they had no customers. I would ask why were there no customers, why were there no people to buy from the merchants, if the country was in a prosperous condition and if the people were not going out of it in large numbers. Either one or two things must be true: either the customers were not in the country or the people were too poor to give their custom to the merchants. The hon. gentleman can take which ever horn of the dilemma he chooses. Either the people were not in the country to give their custom to the merchants, or they were so impoverished by idleness that they could not purchase, and the merchants therefore had to go into bankruptcy. I believe the latter to be the true reason. The hon. gentleman talks of taxation. Why, if you take the great mass of the labouring people and keep them idle week after week, month after month, year after year, as they were during the Administration of hon. gentleman opposite, they are more heavily taxed than they can be by any fiscal policy. No heavier taxation can be imposed on any people than enforced idleness, and that idleness resulted in such poverty that the people at large were unable to purchase goods and the merchants had to go into bankruptcy. Then the system of official assignees came into existence and they gave their returns to hon. gentlemen opposite, who did not lift a finger to remedy the evil. The hon. member for Norfolk pretends to account for everything in the past and everything in the present, and attempts to forecast the future. Both hon. gentlemen indulge in forecasts and they predict a future of ruin and depression throughout the country. I say such a course is unfair to this country, which is so prosperous. I care not what the hon. gentleman may say as to the depression they pretend is existing. They may proclaim ruin from day to day, as they have been doing; but I know that the voice that will come up from the country at large is that the country is in a healthy and sound condition. The hon. member for Norfolk has told us that the depression of 1878—and you will note that hon. gentlemen opposite do not agree altogether amongst themselves—the hon. member for Norfolk says there was depression up to 1878, very severe depression, but the hon. member for Bothwell, on the other hand, would have us believe that the manufacturers of everything were then in a flourishing condition, and there was not much depression, except that a multitude of merchants were failing for want of customers. The hon. member for Norfolk says the depression was brought upon us by the condition of things existing in the United States; that that condition of things acted upon the trade and manufactures of Canada, and produced that state of depression which he acknowledges did exist, and which the whole country deplored in 1879. The war no doubt had something to do with it. During the war, the prices of various manufactured goods in the United States were so high that they were not imported into the Dominion to any very large extent. After the war, and when the multitude of people there had returned, under a high protective policy, to the manufacturing of goods, they overdid it, and finding that they had large surplus stocks on hands, they made of Canada the slaughter market to which the hon. member for Bothwell has referred, and flooded this country with their goods. First, under the protective policy, there was a great demand for labour in the United States; a large number of our young men were drawn to the United States and employed in the various factories, and when those factories over-produced, their over-production was sent into the Dominion, and the consequence was that many of our manufacturers had to suspend, or their establishments were entirely destroyed. But the hon. member for North Norfolk says that prosperity was returning to us in 1878 when the late Government went out of office. If we go back to the Hansard of 1879-80, we find it on record that those hon. gentlemen, even up to 1879-80, claimed that the country was in no better condition than in 1878. Hon. members of this House, who were then present, will recollect that in the strongest and most positive manner they denied, up to 1831, that there was any change, for improvement, in the condition of the country at large. The improved condition, however, became so manifest, that in 1831-82, they took other lines of argument, and admitted the general prosperity of the country. But the hon. member for North Norfolk undertakes to account for that prosperity by the exports, in consequence of our having an increased export during the last four years. Now, admitting that we had an increased export during the four years, admitting that, from 1879 up to the present time, there has been a larger export than from 1874 to 1878, still, you will find, if you will go back to the condition of things under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, who then occupied the Treasury benches, that the imports largely exceeded the exports; you will find that all the money coming from the exports of the country, during those four years, was spent in purchasing manufactured goods abroad, and that the imports largely exceeded the exports, from 1874 to 1878. Now, the honourable member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), in some of his speeches, when he was sitting on this side of the House, and conducting the financial affairs of the country, told us, that you will always find the imports of Canada exceeding the imports by a certain proportion. Well, now, if we had an increased export from 1879 to 1883, our imports under his policy would have just so much greater exceeded that export, and what would have been the advantage to the manufacturers of this country, if all the money that came to us, all the money value of our exports, had been expended in Great Britain and in the United States in the purchase of manufactured goods, brought into the Dominion of Canada? The working people of this country, the manufacturers of this country, the labourers of this country, who are dependent upon the manufacture of goods for their daily subsistence, would have been in no better position if all that money had been expended in the United States and Great Britain. The excess of exports would not have benefitted, to any appreciable extent, the labouring classes of the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, take the position given by the hon. the ex-Finance Minister, that our imports under his Administration will always exceed the exports in a certain ratio, and make a comparison of four years—the four years that the hon. gentleman administered under his policy, and four years under the National Policy, and see the result. The hon. gentleman complains of the Finance Minister taking averages, and tells us that he is great upon averages. Now, I ask the House to take the aggregate—to take the aggregate of four years of exports of 1874 to 1878, and I find that we exported in those four years—

Mr. DAVIES. Which four years does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. McLELAN. The four years from 1874 to 1878. We exported in that period, in round numbers, $314,000,000, and we imported $402,000,000. In the four years, from 1880 to 1883, inclusive, we exported $386,500,000. If we had imported at the same rate as they did, we should have imported $490,000,000, but we only imported $399,000,000 in that period. For the sake of comparison, and to make the comparison fair, you should deduct the imports into Manitoba and the North-West Territories. During the period that the hon. gentlemen occupied the Treasury benches, there was very little comparatively imported into Manitoba and the North-West Territories, but, since the opening up of that country, under the present Administration, the importations have been very large into Manitoba and into the North-West Territories. Taking for four years, it amounts to nearly $20,000,000. Deduct the four years previous, and you have $18,000,000. Take that from the imports of $399,000,000, for comparison, and you have net $381,000,000 of imports into the old Provinces of Canada. As compared with what we should have imported, if we imported at the same rate as they did, we have a saving of $109,000,000. That is, that, if we take our exports as the basis, and had imported at the same rate they did, from 1874 to 1878, we should have imported $109,000,000 more than we have imported. And so we would; but we are not to suppose that the people of this country have used less goods than they did from 1874 to 1878. We are not to suppose that there have been fewer customers to merchants. Fewer merchants have failed, and therefore the inference is that there have been more customers to sustain those merchants, and more people to consume the goods; and if it is not to be supposed that we have consumed $109,000,000 worth of goods less in proportion, than we did in the period from 1874 to 1878. The goods under this policy have been manufactured in the country, and the $109,000,000, as shown by this result, have given employment to the labouring class of this country, and that employment has sustained the merchants and prevented the bankruptcies to which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred. I ought to make a reference to the passing blow which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) gave to a certain class of the manufactures of Canada. He referred to agricultural implements, and he could not pass by the subject without asserting that the manufacturers of agricultural implements are manufacturing an inferior article to what they did previous to this policy. Did he not say that they had to put less of valuable material into the construction of it? He announced to the world that the manufacturers of agricultural implements had to put less of costly and necessary material into the construction of their goods, in order to compete with the United States. The hon. member for Bothwell, as well as the hon. member for North Norfolk, has referred to the taxation of the country, and I notice that both hon. gentlemen, when they speak of the taxation, and when they approach financial matters, always refer to and quote, with all due and becoming and party respect, the words of the member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). And, listening to them, I was led to think that the words of the member for South Huron have now a peculiar significance in this House and to the country. Ordinarily, a man comes into the House, and we find him among a particular party, we give no more than individual weight to his utterances in that party; but, when we find a party gathering together and selecting a leader, we give attention to the utterances of that leader; when we find a party going out into the country and seeking a man, and saying to the world that that man is necessary to the existence of our party in the House of Parliament, as the exponent of our views and as our mouth-piece in that party, we give to his utterances all the weight and responsibility of being the policy of that party. Therefore we should give weight to the utterances of the hon.

member for South Huron as being the sought-after and the accepted mouth-piece of the party. I suppose some may be curious to know why, with the great abilities of the hon. member for West Durham, and with the financial abilities of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), it was necessary to sacrifice the very-able and worthy man who last year represented the constituency of South Huron, in order to obtain the presence of this gentleman in this House. I think I have found the reason. A few evenings ago, it will be remembered, the hon. member for King's, N.S., (Mr. Woodworth) was speaking and the hon. member for West Durham, in reply, was asked to repeat something the hon. member for King's had said, and the hon. member for West Durham said: "I cannot utter the words, I cannot foul my mouth with them." And so, Mr. Speaker, it just occurred to me that the Opposition wanted a mouth-piece in this House who could give vent to all the pent-up feelings of the party, and they knew no one who could do that better than the hon. member for South Huron. They could look over the record of his speeches here, and see how he had poured out the vials of his wrath upon the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches. They knew from the speeches he had delivered, how he could assail the manufacturers of this country, how he could denounce them as "legalized robbers," and therefore, as they were warring against the manufactures of this country, they could get no better mouth-piece than that hon. gentleman. They remembered how he could insult whole races of people, how he could refer to the Scotchmen as inheriting the instincts of cattle-stealing; and when they wanted to insult a whole race, they could not find a better man. They knew, too, how he had insulted the whole country in declaring that it was through want of intelligence in the people that the present Government had been returned to power in 1878.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Certainly, and I stick to it.

Mr. McLELAN. They knew that he was capable of uttering language which has become somewhat historic, language which has been reported even in England and has become known to the Liberal party there—though perhaps they do not appreciate it. Sir, I hold in my hand a newspaper, the Pall Mall Gazette, containing an article with reference to the hon. gentleman; and the House will understand that this paper is edited by a great English Liberal leader who, of course, follows the history of the Liberal leaders upon this side of the water. And what does he say of this hon. gentleman? I will read, for the information of the House, what the Liberal paper mentioned has culled out of a few, only, of the speeches delivered by that hon. gentleman in Canada:

"The following compact vocabulary of descriptive epithets has been compiled from the speeches made by Sir Richard Cartwright during the electoral campaign of 1878 in Canada:

"Rascal, thief, blackguard, villain, abandoned man, slanderer, infamous person, liar, scoundrel, public criminal, creature, cheat, robber of Canada—"

I suppose this is applied to the manufacturers.

"squanderer, burglar, fool, fraud, putrid, infamous, infernal, diabolical, devilish, dastardly, cunning, empty-headed, foolhardy, suicidal, abominable, wretched, thievish, fraudulent, lying, mercenary, foolish."

"These adjectives and substantives, applied to his political opponents by a Canadian Minister of the Crown, should give our statesmen pause before they complain of the violence of the abuse to which they are subjected by the Irish and Conservative Opposition of our day."

So, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knew what they were securing, and the gentleman who represented South Huron last year had to be sacrificed in order that the present member might find a place here. I listened to him, in his reply to the Budget Speech, with a good deal of curiosity, to see how he would fulfil the expectations of his party. I must say that for the first half of his speech he proceeded in the customary tone in which debates are conducted in this House, and I thought to myself, as I looked on the other side, that there would be disappointment, that the hon. gentleman would not come up to the expectations which had been entertained of him. But I saw, by the countenances of those who were sitting around him, that they had perfect confidence in his ability. I observed that as the hon. gentleman warmed to his work, as he began to denounce the people of this country, and as he attempted to account for the change of Government in 1878, by saying that it was due to the betrayal of the then leader of the Government by his countrymen, in whose honesty and intelligence he had trusted—when, I say, he warmed to his work and poured out the vials of his wrath upon the members of the Government and their supporters, I saw that there was no change in him, and that Richard was himself again. An hon. gentleman beside me quoted "The Ethiopian cannot change his skin, nor the tiger his stripes;" and, as the hon. gentleman emptied, one after another, the vials of his wrath on the Government and the country, I, too, felt like quoting the words of a more modern writer, applying them entirely in a political sense:

"Tell me, screaming scold, who was it cursed thee with such humours and ill-luck?"

"Was it some sullen bear dry-nursed thee, or she-dragon gave thee suck?"

But I am satisfied that the party felt they had the worth of their money before he sat down. It was like the story of the old Quaker who employed the boy. There was an old Quaker who was a little tender-mouthed, and who feared to foul his mouth with any kind of abuse. In a controversy with a man, he wanted to give expression to his feelings and desired to find an instrument. In the wide range of human characters there is no difficulty in finding a man for anything you want done. The scale runs so high there is no deed to be done for kin, humanity or country, however daring and noble, but there is a man ready to execute it; and it descends so low that there is no act, however mean and contemptible, and no crime against people or country, however damnable, but there can be found some-one to do it. So the Quaker was not at a loss. He selected a boy, who seemed to be an outcast, and, going up to him he said: "Art thee a profane lad?" The boy said: "What?" "Cans't thou say bad words; cans't thou slander and swear?" The lad said: "Give me a chance, and you will find I am some on the swear." So the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) had his chance to abuse the Government, and hon. gentlemen opposite thought he gave them the worth of their money, as the old Quaker did as regards the lad. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman is profane. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman is "some on the swear," or that he would violate any of the Commandments, but the people of the country whom he has denounced as degenerate, that race of people represented by the hon. member for East York, whom he accused of want of honesty and faithfulness, will say that he has been guilty, in a political sense, at least, of violating the Commandment: "Thou shall not bear false witness." But the hon. gentleman says that we have been unfaithful, because we have increased the expenditure, and he goes back to 1867. I have never yet heard the hon. gentleman make a financial speech but he has gone back to 1867, and pointed out that the expenditure which was then $13,000,000 has ran up to $23,000,000, $25,000,000 and $30,000,000. Is it a crime that the country grows and prospers and requires more expenditure, and that we are able to meet it without inordinate taxation? Why, the hon. gentleman would have the country warped and standing still, with an expenditure of $13,000,000. If the hon. gentleman had been born in China he would have been famous as a gardener, as a cultivator of dwarfed vegetables and trees. He would not have this country grow. To use an Americanism, if the hon. gentleman had been born a polywog, he would have become a frog, except for the satisfaction of being better able to croak over the ills and misfortunes of other people. I need not elaborate this question of the expenditure of the country. If the hon. gentleman will come down to particulars, if he will point out to the House, wherein large unnecessary expenditure have been made, then it will be in place to discuss the subject. But with the growing prosperity of this country, with the improvements that have been made, with the demands that have been made on the public Treasury, in consequence of the undertakings entered into during the hon. gentleman's administration, we have also the fact that the country has been prosperous, and that all these expenditures have been met from the increased revenue, without taxing inordinately the people. Before I pass away from this, let me refer to just one point. The hon. gentleman wanted to alarm the country by saying we were taxed nearly double per head as compared with the people of the United States. The hon. gentleman did not stop to explain that in the gross amount which is taken as the taxation of this country there was included all the revenues from Public Works, Railways and Canals, while in the United States there are no such items entering into the taxation. Moreover, the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House, and we suppose it was entire forgetfulness on his part, that the taxation in the United States with which he made the comparison does not include the State taxation, while the taxation here in Canada includes the Provincial taxation, all the Provincial revenues coming from the Federal Government and being a part of that taxation. In the United States, every State, to a large extent, produces its own revenues and taxes its own people for those revenues. The total State taxation in the United States, independent of the Federal taxation, the large sum collected through Customs and Excise is $52,019,959 for State; for county purposes, $69,606,571; and for divisions less than counties, $180,740,000, or a total of $302,200,694, or $6 per head; while the indebtedness of the States is proportionately large. So that, if the hon. gentleman had wished to make a correct comparison he would have omitted from the Canadian taxation the several sums I have named, and added to that of the United States the taxation that was devoted to State purposes. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) attempted to elaborate the argument that the farmers do not benefit under this National Policy; that the farmers have not been benefitted by the introduction of this policy. The hon. gentleman who replied to the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I think, gave a pretty conclusive answer in that respect. Take all the men who are employed in the manufactures of this country, in the mining operations, both in the east and the west, add them all together, and you will have a large population that, during the last four years, received employment under the National Policy and because of the National Policy. I estimate, Sir, that that number from 25,000 to 35,000 people, and if you take those who are dependent upon the earnings of these men you have a population approaching 150,000 or 200,000 who are supported and kept in this country because of the National Policy, and the additional employment which is given to the people under that policy. Now, Sir, how can that great body of people be kept here and employed without the farmers being benefitted? These hon. gentlemen have been desiring for years that we should have reciprocity with the United States, and the only reason they have for it or can have for it, is that our farmers shall be able to supply and feed the people who are manufacturing in the Eastern States. Now, Sir, we have a large number of these people at home, and if you take up American statistics and find how much of agricultural produce it takes to sustain a man a year you will be astonished at the result. I will give some of the figures taken from the statistical tables of the Bureau of statistics of Massachusetts :

Quantities of Farm Produce that would be consumed annually by 200,000 persons, manufacturers and their families.

BY EACH PERSON.		TOTALS.
214 lbs. Flour and Meal,	barrels,	218,000
19 3-10 lbs. Butter,	pounds,	3,860,000
5 9-10 lbs. Cheese,	"	1,180,000
12 9-10 lbs. Lard,	"	2,440,000
7 1-10 qts. Beans,	bushels,	44,375
3 9-10 bush. Potatoes,	"	780,000
51 qts. Milk,	gallons,	2,530,000
5 doz. Eggs,	dozens,	1,000,000
6 3-10 lbs. Poultry,	pounds,	1,240,000
58 8-10 lbs. Beef, fresh and salt,	{ pounds or barrels }	11,760,000
7 lbs. Veal,	"	1,400,000
10 lbs. Mutton,	"	2,000,000
or on an average of 50 lbs. per, head Sheep and Lambs,		40,000
38 3-10 lbs. Pork, fresh, salt and Ham.....		7,666

These figures give some of the agricultural products consumed by a manufacturing population of 200,000, the dependents and those who are actually employed in manufactures. With this large body of people to be maintained [and supported by the farmers, it cannot possibly be but that the agricultural population are benefited by the employment of mechanics and artisans. Hon. gentlemen say that people are going out of the country, but if you do not employ them in manufacturing in the country, how are you going to retain the great body of the people who do not take to agriculture or the professions. The member for North Norfolk referred to the cotton industry, and in fact all who speak on that side of the House seem to bend their energies and direct all their powers against the cotton industry. The growth of that industry has been very great in this country, and if they could persuade the people of this country that it is in an unsound condition, or that the manufactures are charging increased prices, they think they have accomplished what suits their party purposes. I remember a year or two ago the leader of the Opposition paid us a visit down in Nova Scotia. He came down there to arouse the people of that Province against the National Policy. I remember that his whole political baggage was an old woman's cotton gown, and a poor man's shirt, and that shirt had seven yards in it. And the way that he held up that old woman's gown and flaunted that shirt was such that if there had been any argument with it, a cotton riot would have been created. But there was no cotton riot. He did not persuade those poor men and women that they were taxed and ground to death, because of the increased duty on the cotton which went into that shirt and into that gown. The hon. gentleman repeated his argument on that cotton shirt so often that every boy in all the villages he visited took to parodying the song of the shirt :

"The hon. member taking the stand and talking of taxes of gusset and seam and band ;

"Taxes on gusset and band and tail, making a sad and doleful wail."

But with all his ability, the hon. gentleman did not succeed in creating a cotton riot or in persuading the Government to reduce the duty on cotton. The manufacturers were protected, they had confidence in the Government which stood behind them, they invested more largely of their capital and they are now able to manufacture cotton goods as cheaply, more cheaply than they can be imported. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk gave away the whole case. In fact it generally happens that these hon. gentlemen drop something which has the effect of destroying their whole case. The hon. member stated that the tendency of manufacturers was to cheapen goods, because, he says, of the perfection to which machinery has come. Well, our manufacturers knowing that the Government would stand behind them, and warrant them in investing a large amount of capital in the most perfect machinery, went forward and made that investment and succeeded in their investment, But, you may get the most perfect possible machinery, but until you have acquired some experience and ability to manage it, you must run it at a loss. The most perfect machinery requires protection for a time. The machinery of human life is as perfect in an infant as in a full grown man, but the infant must have protection and care until he has acquired experience and development. And so these manufacturers, even though they have the most perfect machinery, must have some protection and care until they have acquired that ability and knowledge necessary to manage that machinery. But they have had that protection and have acquired that skill that enables them now to manufacture cotton at the lowest possible price. Now I come to the question, if you do not encourage these manufactures, if you do not give employment to your own people in this country, how are you going to keep them from going abroad? Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we are driving the people abroad by the heavy load of taxation that we are placing upon them. But if you place the greater load of idleness upon them, if you have no employment for them, there is ten times the inducement for them to leave the country that there is when there is employment and remunerative wages to be had. Now, it is claimed that a reduction of wages has taken place in this country. I find, from some returns that have been made to the Department of Agriculture, with reference to the cotton manufactures, that there has not been a reduction, but an increase—that the average wages of men, women and children employed in a number of the cotton manufactories of the country, in 1883, was $30 a head more than the average wages paid in 1881, and within $20 of the average wages of the cotton operatives in the United States; and I say that, if we are able to maintain that condition of affairs, we shall not only keep our own people at home, but attract back from the United States some of our people who have gone there. The hon. gentleman stated that the people were all leaving and going to the United States. If you take up the Census of the United States for 1880, before the operation of the National Policy could have any effect on this country, you find that nearly one-half of the cotton operatives of the United States were Canadians—that out of 78,000 cotton operatives in the United States, 36,000 were born in Canada; and I say that if so many people left us previous to the inauguration of this policy to seek employment, there is hope that, by giving employment in our own country, we shall not only be able to retain our own young men, but induce some of those to return. Now, the United States Census Commissioners, in attempting to account for the large foreign immigration, say :

"In those States where the foreign element is large, the general causes are apparent. In the north-eastern States, the moving cause is the manufactures of various kinds, and the mining of iron and coal. The immigrants are mainly Irish, German and French Canadians, with some Welsh."

So that, the moving cause of Canadians leaving the country for the United States has been the manufactures, which have been fostered and have grown up under their protective policy. Another reason has been the opening of the prairie lands in the west. Now, however, when we have a policy which will give employment to our young men and young women in our own country, and when we have the North-West opened up—and I believe that in two years more we shall have speedy communication with that country through our territory, in consequence of the Bill that was passed here the other day, and was so stoutly opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite—our own people will be retained in Canada. The hon. member for South Huron told us that he believed that 100,000 people had gone into the North-West and settled there. Well, but for the opening up of that country and the wonderful progress that has been made in constructing railways across the prairies, I think it is safe to say that 50,000 of those people would have gone to the United States, and would have been lost to this country; and if we have been able, by almost any sacrifice of money, to save that number of people to the Dominion of Canada, to contribute to its stability and progress, I say we have accomplished a wonderful advantage to the public at large. The hon. gentleman has announced to the world that 700,000 Canadians are living in the United States; he says that the Census of 1880 shows it. Well, if that is true, these people must have left before the inauguration of this policy. But did the hon. gentleman turn to our own Census? Did he tell the House and the country that there is a larger percentage of American-born people living in Canada than the percentage of Canadians living in the United States, according to the population? With this policy, I believe, we shall be able, not only to hold our own people, but to offer such attractions to the people of the United States besides, that we may reasonably expect a large increase to our population from that country. In referring to the North-West, let me call the attention of the House, for a moment, to the enormous quantity of goods that are imported into that country, from the United States—and why? There, communication is easy and direct with the United States, and the distance is so great between the manufacturing centres of Canada and that district, that it is almost impossible for them to trade with us; but when the Pacific Railway will be opened in two years, it will have an influence upon the manufactures of this country which it is impossible for any man to estimate, not only in the money it will bring us, but in the very fact that when these people are trading with us, when they are passing over this railway running through our own country, on our own soil, they will come to realize and feel they are a part and parcel of the Dominion of Canada, which they cannot now. To get to that North-West, you have to travel 1,100 miles through a foreign country. A man from the North-West, coming down to Canada, travelling through the United States, feels, when he reaches here, that he is in almost a foreign country. I know how it was with us in the Maritime Provinces, before we had direct communication with this part of Canada, in the winter. I know that when we came up here to attend Parliament we had to go first to New York or Boston, and there take the railways to get here, and when we came we felt almost that we were in a foreign country. Not until the Intercolonial Railway was opened, and we had direct communication with the western part of Canada by that railway, did we begin to feel that we were one with this great Canadian people. Having that means of communication, under this policy there has been, as the hon. member for Digby represented, an enormous and growing trade between the people of the Maritime Provinces and the people of old Canada. In 1866, before we were Confederated, we did a large portion of our trade with the United States, and we then, when we were not more than two-thirds of the population that we now are, imported from the United States, under a very low tariff, about double the quantity of goods we import now, with our increased population. With all the facilities that we have for trading with the United States, surrounded by water, with the facility of getting our produce carried from almost every port weekly to the United States, we do not import as much from the United States as we export to them. Notwithstanding that the hon. leader of the Opposition went down to the Maritime Provinces and counselled us to trade with the Americans—I say counselled us, but I do not use that possessory phrase—that phrase so suggestive of entire ownership—I do not say “our counsel” told us to trade with the United States, because we did not accept his advice and did not take his counsel. We found it more to our interest to trade with the people of the west; and I say that, with the increasing population that we have, the imports from the United States during the past year were only $2,974,936, while the imports of the comparatively handful of people in Manitoba and the North-West Territories from the United States amounted to $8,592,112 and their exports to the United States only amounted to $102,000, while from Nova Scotia we exported to the United States to the value of $3,814,223. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that those people feel a lack of interest with the people of Canada, such as they would have if they had more direct means of communication and better facilities of trading with them. I believe that if we are ever to be bound together, as one people, it will not be by a political chord alone, but there must be also bonds of commercial and industrial union, which will hold the people of this Confederation together. If you take up a war map of the United States, in 1862, you will find that the people who were bound together by a natural means of communication or by great lines of railway held together, you will find that the cleavage between the different States thus connected in that great contest, was just where the commercial and industrial interests of the people were closely united. So, I say, that if the people of Canada are to be held together, they must tighten the bonds of trade and industry. The immediate prospects of the North-West being opened to us, unfolds a future of which any man may be hopeful and proud. The hon. Minister of Agriculture referred to the large immigration during the past year and the year preceding, and to the prospect of immigration this year, and we know there is employment for all the immigrants, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite may say. Look to the future the great North-West is opening to us. Our young men will find farms there ready and better than those in the United States, and others employment in our factories, and lying alongside 50,000,000 of people that must, in their migration, run over and lap into our country; there is a future before us of which we may be hopeful and proud. The generation is now born that will see in this Dominion more than 20,000,000 of Canadians, the most contented, happy and prosperous of any people the sun shall then shine on or the British flag wave over.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot say that I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, but if the rest of his statistics are as accurate as the statement he was good enough to make to the House, respecting certain epithets read by him and alleged by him to have been used by me with reference to the members of the present Ministry and their supporters, all I can say is, that his friends may be proud of their champion.

Mr. McLELAN. I quoted from a Liberal paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Some few years ago I had occasion to order a list to be prepared of the various names, epithets, adjectives and substantives that had been used against me by the hon. gentleman's colleagues and the hon. gentleman's press. The hon. gentleman, Sir, has only made one mistake—some people might think it one of some little importance—he has alleged that I used to those hon. gentlemen the epithets which they used to me. That is all the difference. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has given you a partial list; and, as I like accuracy, I will supply the remainder of the list. Mr. Speaker, in the three months preceding the 21st January, 1878, the organs of that hon. gentleman, and the colleagues of that hon. gentleman, were good enough to describe me in the following fashion—as a man who was unjust, unfair, ungenerous, unprincipled, unkind, ungrateful, ill-tempered, ill-mannered, vindictive, reckless, implacable, indecent, foul-mouthed, brawling, discourteous, cowardly, obstinate, self-willed, conceited, brazen-faced, sophisticated, deceitful, cunning, pedantic, slanderous, artful, outrageous, churlish, silly, weak, changeable, vacillating, insolent, impertinent, brutal, braggart, despicable, revolting, idiotic, malevolent, ignorant, contemptible, cruel, cantankerous, presuming, crafty, pharisaical, flippant, affected, vulgar and base. They further compared me, as the hon. gentleman likes accuracy, to Nero, to Caligula, and to Mr. Micawber; to Herod, to Pontius Pilate, to Judas Iscariot, and to Lagree; to Belial, to Beelzebub, to Jonah, and to General Starvation; to Moloch, to Machiavelli, to Junius, to Wilkes, to Judge Jeffreys, and to a mastodon; to a bangman, a jail-bird, an ostrich, a misanthrope, and a pre-Adamite Tory; also to a fossil Tory, a demagogue, a champion bully, and Benedict Arnold; to a hypocrite, a felon, a malefactor, and Janus; to an apostate, a traitor, a bungler, and a rotten stick; to Timon, to Caliban, to Shylock, to a doctrinaire, to a sloth, an irredeemable ruffian, a scavenger, an aristocrat and a lunatic. And, within the same few months, it was recommended that, when I next addressed a public meeting, I should be received with a few brickbats, I should be tarred and feathered, I should be tossed in a blanket, and made to run the gauntlet. Now, the hon. gentleman, next time that he wishes to make a list, not of epithets used by me, but of epithets used to me, can add to the list those, and he will have a tolerably correct account. And, if the hon. gentleman wants to know who used them, some dozen of them were supplied by the Premier of this Dominion, and a pretty large proportion of the remainder by their illustrious colleague in the Upper House, the hon. Mr. Macpherson. The remainder were supplied from the resources of the Mail newspaper; and, thinking that it might save these gentlemen a lot of trouble when I re-entered public life, I kindly made them a list, in order that in future they may have their vocabulary ready at their hands. Now, it gave me great pleasure to hear the Minister of Marine express the natural, the proper, the very righteous indignation that he felt at the thought that it was possible that I, or any other man, could use such language to political opponents. Sir, the hon. Minister knew whereof he spoke. Did he ever hear of words like these:

"But the picture, dark as it is, has something blacker still. I see there, standing in the background, the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia privately handing over to this same engineer a contract for the whole work. I see him shroud it in darkness and bury it for months in the grave of secrecy. And now the Provincial Secretary comes forward and tells us it was so hidden to serve the public interest; to enable Sandford Fleming—"

Did he ever hear of Sandford Fleming, I wonder?

"to enable Sandford Fleming, after he had taken the contract, to make better terms with the old contractors; to grind a few more dollars out of them. Public interest, indeed! Mr. Sandford Fleming's interest alone. Sir, I know not what term to apply to such conduct in a Government. I know not what to call it—I shall not venture an opinion; but in private life it is called extorting money under false pretences, and our laws make it indictable knavery."

Did the hon. gentleman ever hear that sentence before, or the following?

"They have heard of men riding in public conveyances with a loose mantle about them and a pair of false hands folded in front to full suspicion, while the real hands were finding their way into their fellow-travellers' pockets, and they now think that, when the hon. gentleman put on the mantle of Herbert Huntingdon and the old Reformers, the hands he put to the plough were not real—that the real hands were hidden, that they might the better get deep to the armpits in the public chest, and they wait, they long for the opportunity to sweep him from his position. Therefore, Sir, there was no necessity to bring this case here to excite public opinion. But, Mr. Speaker, if having brought it here for investigation in the discharge of a public duty, what if the people should, on an examination of it, decide that the public interests have been bartered away and betrayed—that the man whom they once believed in as the apostle of retrenchment has become the great high priest of jobbery and corruption? Who then shall restrain limits to their just indignation as they take him, loaded down though he may be with the share of the offerings that fall to the priest, and impale him upon the horns of the altar at which he ministers."

Did the hon. gentleman ever hear those eloquent words? Did he ever utter those eloquent words? Is it or is it not the truth that he applied those words to the present Minister of Railways, his present colleague and former opponent? I put that question to him once before, two or three years ago. I am sorry to say that the hon. gentleman waited a long time to reply, but he did not deny, and I do not think he apologized to the Minister of Railways, either, for having used them. Probably the hon. gentleman had very good reason for using them, and I am perfectly willing to believe that he then, at any rate, was more accurate in his description and in his estimate, and in the terms he used about the hon. gentleman, than in any of the statistics or other remarks that he has made to-night. And, although I am not quite so sure of the fact, I am informed that the hon. gentleman, when contesting Colchester, when Mr. Jones, of Halifax, and Mr. Longley, were opposing him, put what I may call a final climax to the language I have just been reading to you, by describing Mr. Jones and Mr. Longley as two unbaptized, buttonless vagabonds from Halifax.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

11 Soap powders, a specific duty of 3 cents per pound..... 3 cts. per pound.

Mr. BLAKE. The Minister of Customs last night promised some further explanation of that item.

Mr. BOWELL. The explanation is simply this: The question was asked why soap powder was made 3 cents per pound, while soap itself was only 1½ cents. The reason is, that soap powder is worth about double the amount of soap per pound, so that it equalizes them in that particular.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon. gentleman give us an idea of what the equivalent ad valorem is?

Mr. BOWELL. It is between 25 and 30 per cent.—perhaps a medium, 27½ per cent.

15. Steel, ingots, bars, sheets under three-sixteenths of an inch thick, whole or cut to shape, but not further manufactured, and $3 per ton of rolled round wire rods in coils, not elsewhere specified, three dollars per ton of 2,000 lbs. and 10 per cent. 2,000 pounds, and ten per cent. ad valorem. cent.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Last Session Parliament imposed a duty of $5 a ton upon these articles. Steel, ingots, bars, and sheets under three sixteenths of an inch, are as at present. This large rate that was imposed last year varied from 3 to 13 per cent. upon various qualities of steel imported, and it was found by parties engaged in the manufacture of steel that they were three or four different kinds of pig iron, and one especially, with a large quantity of manganese pays a duty of $2 per ton. Therefore parties manufacturing it have very little margin left except upon certain qualities of it, and in order to give them something like the duty that is collected on iron, this amendment was proposed of 10 per cent., and $3 per ton. This gives an average of from 13 to 18 per cent. That is about the scale. It varies under these propositions. There are now two manufactories of steel, one in New Glasgow, N.S., and the other in London, Ont.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At what do you estimate the value of steel, roughly, per ton?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It varies from $30 up to $200 per ton. There is a great difference in the value of it. Therefore, by the specific duty it may be 3 per cent. upon the high quality of steel and 13 per cent. upon the lower quality. But this now makes an average of from 13 to 18 per cent., according to the quality of steel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it was $5 before, was it not?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; that made the duties, as I say, on the lower grade of steel, 13 per cent., and on the higher, 3 per cent., and the parties paying $2 per ton on the iron they manufacture had very little margin left. Therefore, this will place it much upon the same principle as iron. Iron pays a duty of 12½ per cent., in a certain form, and up to 17½ per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I observed a statement to-day that the price of some kinds of cast steel had been largely advanced. Does the hon. gentleman know anything of that?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; I have not heard.

Mr. BLAKE. Then does the hon. gentleman anticipate a reduction of revenue from this?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; it will be borne in mind that the importation of raw material gives $2 a ton. We get something on that. It will go on, probably, to $20,000. The hon. member will see that it depends largely upon the quantity manufactured. Parties say that if they have such encouragement as will enable them to extend their operations, they will manufacture largely in the Dominion of Canada. Some of it will be made from scrap iron, but steel is largely made from a particular description of iron, imported in the form of pigs, paying $2 per ton.

Mr. BLAKE. What does the hon. gentleman expect the output to be?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It will be very considerably increased by the imposition of this duty. The statistics of last year do not give it a fair basis of an estimate for the future, because the duty was only imposed in July, and there has been a very large importation since. But, in the previous year, we had 16,419 tons of this description imported, and it is expected, with this encouragement, that the manufacture will be largely increased. But there are certain descriptions of steel that they will not manufacture, and that we leave on the free list.

Mr. TUPPER. I may state that the capacity of the works in New Glasgow is about 7,500 tons.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I expect the whole will be about 8,000 tons, according to the views of the importers. At London they will manufacture what is called crucible steel, which is of a higher description and more valuable than that manufactured in New Glasgow. While the quality may not be as great in value, it will probably be quite equal to that of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BLAKE. About what tonnage is expected in London?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The country this year is full of steel, and the demand will probably be less this year than it will the year following. The produce in Canada will probably be from 8,000 to 10,000 tons.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper just said there would be 7,500 tons in New Glasgow. How much does that leave for London?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not think there will be as much, according to the statement of the party who has charge of the industry there, because it is crucible iron, and they do not make as many tons.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman any idea of the expected London tonnage?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think we may reasonably expect one-half of the 8,000—a half in both.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Pictou has stated 7,500 tons for New Glasgow?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is their capacity; they will be able to produce that.

Mr. BLAKE. Then it is not the output?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It cannot be the output next year, but that is the capacity. Our expectation, is 8,000 tons from both.

Mr. BLAKE. I am anxious to divide it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am not allowing next year 7,000 tons for New Glasgow.

Mr. BLAKE. I was anxious to understand what the hon. gentleman was allowing, that is all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We can only make an estimate from the information we have. The information given us is, that one-half of the quantity, within a year or two, will be produced in those two establishments; but as to the exact proportion between the two, I cannot give it. I estimate that a large amount will be produced at New Glasgow, because it is a different kind of steel.

Mr. BLAKE. The calculation is an easy one. The hon. gentleman has stated that there are two establishments in which this is to be produced. I quite agree with him that the matter is in some degree one of speculation, but we must have some information as to what will be the effect of the proposition, and what portion of the product will be produced at each establishment. He has told us that probably the year after this there will be produced 8,000 tons, or one-half the present importation, and that is from two establishments. What I desired to know was, how much he expected to be produced by one and how much by the other.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think it will be in the proportion of 5,000 to 3,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Am I correct in supposing that the hon. gentleman expects to get 8,000 tons manufactured here, from which he is now receiving, at $5 per ton, $40,000, and that 16,000 tons of iron will be brought in to be manufactured into steel, and that there will be a loss of $24,000 to the revenue? That may possibly be made up from increased duty on the remainder—perhaps it will. That is a point which will depend entirely on the value of the steel imported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but pro tanto $24,000 will be lost to the revenue under this change, if 8,000 tons of steel are manufactured in Canada.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. My statement was a comparison of the duty as at present. I do not expect a very large increase as the result of the change. If the manufacturers here increase the quantity, the revenue, of course, will not be increased.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman does not dispute my proposition, that by the manufacture of 8,000 tons of steel, $24,000 will necessarily be lost to the revenue. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman what number of people are likely to be employed in those two factories, producing 8,000 tons of steel?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not know. I know that about forty are employed at New Glasgow at present; I do not know how many at the other establishment. The New Glasgow works have limited their operations, at present, as there is so much steel in the country; but I am not able to say how many people would be employed to manufacture 8,000 tons of steel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That, according to the hon. gentleman's theory, would be an important element, when we shall lose $24,000 of revenue by the proposed change.

Mr. TUPPER. I understand that between forty and fifty men are now employed at New Glasgow, but the works are not running up to their full capacity. When they are doing so, 160 men, I am informed, are required to produce 7,500 tons a year.

Mr. BLAKE. But the Minister does not expect more than two-thirds of the 8,000 tons to be produced at New Glasgow.

Mr. McDUGALD. I do not see that the proposed duty is open to much objection. In looking over the imports for the last two fiscal years, I find that of ingots, bars, sheets and coils imported into Canada, for the year ending 30th June, 1883, there were 18,385 tons, costing $67.20 per ton; and for the year ending 30th June, 1882, there were 16,419 tons, costing $54.56 per ton. A duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem and $3 per ton specific, gives a protection of 14½ per cent. on the value for the last year, and 15½ per cent. for the former year; or an average, taking the two years, of 15 per cent. As to the form of the duty being mixed and ad valorem, I think it suits the interests of the industry fairly, from a protection standpoint. It provides protection for certain grades of steel manufactured, and in order to manufacture the higher grades we require more experience, and require a larger market, and there can be no objection to increasing the duty on those qualities. As to the quantity which can be produced in the establishment at New Glasgow, I took the opportunity, about two months ago, of visiting that establishment, which is very well equipped, and in which over $200,000 capital are employed. At that time there were about forty hands at work, and I think at the present there are about sixty. They have turned out 500 tons of steel in pigs, and reduced 40 tons to a finished condition, to meet the various requirements of the trade. They are not producing a large quantity, because they want to ascertain the state of the market and know what is needed. Everyone acquainted with the trade is aware that steel deteriorates after it has been made for any length of time. As to the capacity of those works, they are equipped to turn out 25 tons per day, or over 7,500 tons a year, and in order to run to their full extent 300 men will have to be employed. These are the statements which I have from the manager of the works, and I believe they are correct.

16. Steel, rolled round wire rods, under half an inch in diameter, when imported by wire manufacturers, for use in their factories, five per cent. ad valorem ..... 5 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This article, when imported at present, pays a duty of 10 per cent. Under this proposition, when it is imported for manufacturers of wire, the duty will be reduced to 5 per cent. The article of wire pays 15 per cent. duty. There are two modes by which the industry can be encouraged: either by increasing the duty on wire, or by reducing the duty on wire rods, which is the raw material. As wire fencing is coming into very general use all over the country, and especially in the North-West, and as wire is being introduced into many manufactures, it is considered desirable that the duty on wire should not be increased, and it is therefore proposed to give parties engaged in the industry a reduction in the duty on wire rods.

17. Steel, needles, viz:—Cylinder needles, hand frame needles and latch needles, thirty per cent. ad valorem ..... 30 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is a new industry, established in Ontario, for the manufacture of cylinder needles, of which we have samples. They are flat needles, with an eye of a peculiar make. It is considered desirable to give this industry protection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the duty at present?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It comes in the unenumerated list, 30 per cent.

Mr. TUPPER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then 10 per cent. is added.

Mr. BLAKE. Where is the factory?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. At Guelph, I believe.

Mr. BLAKE. About what is the production?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not a large item. With respect to the item on pins, which was passed last night, I may say that the machinery now in operation cost $15,000. The manufactory is either at Brantford or Galt. I think this manufactory is in Paris.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says the importation is insignificant.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not much.

Mr. BLAKE. Is this factory a combination?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. BLAKE. About how much is the importation?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot say. Of course this party expects to increase the production, if he gets the protection, and of course it not being enumerated, I cannot tell the value.

Mr. BLAKE. But I presume, when the hon. gentleman made a proposition in reference to alteration of this kind, for protective purposes, he would obtain some information as to the probable result. He says the manufacturer expects to increase the production, but the production may be beyond the demands of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to have added to this section the words "clock springs, corset steels, and shoe shackles." I have here a letter from a personal, though not a political friend of mine—a gentleman with whom, I think, the leader of the Opposition is acquainted, as he is the President of the Reform Association of our county, and opposed me at my election, and opposed the National Policy. He is a gentleman of means, who has been searching for an investment for the last two or three years. Here is his letter; and I am sure the Finance Minister will pay attention to it, and I hope, place his goods in the same position as those in the present list:

"GARRAQUE, Ont., March 3, 1884.

"Geo. Taylor, Esq., M. P., Ottawa:

"DEAR SIR,—Your kind favour of the 28th ultimo to hand. In reply, would say that we are in a position to more than supply the trade of the Dominion in the goods we make. That is one of our difficulties; for in the States, corset steels, clock springs, shoe shanks, metal skirt trimmings, each constitute a separate industry and forms, by itself, a large business. Here, in Canada, with our comparatively small population, the consumption would not warrant an investment in the necessary machinery and plant for making one or two of the above-named articles. And we have, therefore, to stand any chance of their paying, to combine several specialties. This we are doing, and shall have invested in the business, for this purpose, in the neighbourhood of $12,000. A good deal of our special machinery and skill we have had to import from the States, as it could not be obtained here.

"Since writing you before, we see that, instead of a specific duty of $5 per ton on the steel we use, there is now to be a specific duty of $3 per ton, and an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. This change would seriously embarrass us if applied to the steel we use.

"What we really need, and hope will be conceded, is, that the steel in sheets and coils that we use for manufacturing corset steels, shoe shanks and clock springs, be admitted free, and that the duty on the three manufactured articles named, be placed at 30 per cent. all around.

"We regret that we had not written you earlier on this matter, but we were under the impression, till a day or two before, that the Budget would not be brought down for a couple of weeks thereafter. The obtaining of these concessions, however, is of such vital importance to the successful conducting of our business, that we trust the Minister of Customs will see his way clear to grant us what we ask.

"Thanking you for the trouble you are taking on our account,

"We are, very truly yours,

"A. BRINDEN & GOWAN."

This establishment is now under way and they are manufacturing clock springs. It is the only industry of the kind in Canada, and these goods now pay only a duty of 10 per cent. I hope the Finance Minister will give this industry the same chance as others of a similar kind.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman must appeal to the Government if he wants an addition to the duty, as he cannot move an addition of this description to the clause.

SUGARS, SYRUPS AND MOLASSES:—

- Sugar, when imported direct, without transshipment, from the country of growth and production, above number fourteen, Dutch standard, a specific duty of one cent per pound, and thirty-two and a half 1c. per lb. and per cent. ad valorem ..... 32½ per cent.
18. Equal to number nine, and not above number fourteen Dutch standard, a specific duty of three-fourths of a cent per pound, and twenty-seven and a half ¾c. per lb. and per cent. ad valorem ..... 27½ per cent.
- Below number nine Dutch standard, a specific duty of one-half cent per pound, and twenty-seven and one-half ¾c. per lb. and per cent. ad valorem ..... 27½ per cent.
19. Melado, and concentrated Melado, three-eighths of one cent per pound, and twenty-seven and one-half ¾c. per lb. & per cent. ad valorem ..... 27½ per cent.
- On all the above Sugars, Melado, and concentrated Melado, when not imported direct, without transshipment, from the country of growth and production:—
- Above number fourteen Dutch standard,—
- a specific duty of one cent per pound, 1 ct. per lb. and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem ..... and 35 p. ct.
20. Equal to number nine, and not above number fourteen Dutch standard, a specific duty of three-fourths of one cent per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem and 30 p. c.
- Below number nine Dutch standard, a specific duty of one-half cent per pound, ½ ct. per lb. and thirty per cent. ad valorem ..... and 30 p. ct.
21. Melado, and concentrated Melado, a specific duty of three-eighths of one cent per pound, ¾ ct. per lb. and thirty per cent. ad valorem ..... and 30 p. ct.
22. Concentrated Cane Juice, Concentrated Molasses, Concentrated Beet Root Juice, and Concrete, whether imported direct or not, a specific duty of three-eighths of a cent per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem ..... and 30 p. ct.
23. Syrups, Cane Juice, Refined Syrup, Sugar House Syrup or Sugar House Molasses, Syrup of Sugar, Syrup of Molasses, or Sorghum, whether imported direct or not,—
- a specific duty of five-eighths of a cent ⅝ ct. per lb. per pound, and thirty per cent. ad valorem and 30 p. ct.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What are the changes here?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There are a good many resolutions here, that one principle is involved with reference to nearly all classes and descriptions of sugars. Under the present Tariff, sugar imported from the country of production, pays a duty of 30 per cent., not including the charges which are found to be, for the last year or two especially, very varied in their character. The result has been owing to the establishment of agencies in Canada, by the growers of sugar in the East Indies and China, and parties undertaking to deliver sugar to the refiners in Canada at a certain price, duty paid. Then the different Customs Departments make up a statement of charges, and these vary in the different ports and under different circumstances, from 6 to 23 per cent. This has caused a great deal of difficulty and dissatisfaction, and it has operated, in many respects, very unfairly, because it is difficult to ascertain at all ports where the entry is made, whether the charges are excessive or reasonable. The Customs Department have a great deal of difficulty in harmonizing these matters, and the Government, after being in conference with the parties on this subject, decided to make the dutiable value of the sugar free on board—to reduce the duty from 30 per cent. to 27 per cent., and this applies to all classes and descriptions of sugar. The fair, legitimate charges vary from 6 to 14 per cent., and taking the average charges at 10 per cent., it is supposed that 2½ per cent. reduction will yield about the same revenue. For instance, sugar is worth, say $3 at present, and a 10 per cent. reduction of the duty collected would be $2.70 per 100 lbs. At 30 per cent., that would yield 81 cents per 100 lbs.; but if you take 27½ per cent., with the charges free on board, that would yield 82½ per cent. per 100 lbs., or 1½ per cent. more than the present Tariff gives, and so on with other prices of sugar: it will produce a little more revenue than under the present Tariff. The Government also propose that the duty on molasses, when imported from the country of production, shall be 15 per cent. for all purposes. At present it is 15 per cent. for domestic purposes, and 25 per cent. for refining purposes. This will, of course, be applicable to all parties engaged in refining sugar; but it gives additional employment to the refiners of the country, and increases our trade with the West Indies, which it is thought, in the interests of the country, that we should extend as far as possible. It is estimated that what we lose on molasses can be made up by the additional 1 cent or ½ cent a pound on sugar, and therefore the change will not affect the general revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman intend to take any other means of ascertaining the saccharine value than the Dutch standard?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not at present; as I say that is under the consideration of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that it was found in the United States, some years ago, when they allowed sugar to be imported on the Dutch standard, that grave frauds were perpetrated on the revenue by some high qualities of sugar being left dark for the express purpose of being brought in at the lower rate of duty. It seems to me that that danger exists in our own country as well as in the United States.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman says, and that is the argument in favour of the polariscope. But as the duty in the United States was specific, and not specific and ad valorem, as ours is, the fraud may have occurred to a greater extent than it has in Canada. Of course there is the possibility of attempts being made, and sometimes successfully, to undervalue the sugar; but, as I stated a few nights ago, the Department of Customs appreciate the importance of having uniformity in that respect, and intended to have a thoroughly efficient staff organized for sugar alone. There are a good many arguments to be urged in favour of adopting the polariscope test, but I do not think the country will lose much by waiting a few months, until we can have the benefit of the experience of the United States.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman will remember that last year he gave, as a reason why the duty on tobacco was reduced, that the reduction was forced upon us because the Americans had reduced the duty on tobacco. I understand that their sugar Tariff has also been materially reduced. How is it that we can maintain our high Tariff when they have reduced theirs so much in the article of sugar, and we could not do it in the article of tobacco?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. For this reason: that they reduced their duty on tobacco very far below our rate; and if we maintained more than 4 cents a pound, as at present, there would be a large amount of smuggling; but the duty we collect on sugar to-day is very much below the duty imposed in the United States, and there is no danger of smuggling.

Mr. PATERSON. That is precisely what I wanted to get the hon. Finance Minister to say. He has been claiming, all along, that our refiners have been receiving no undue advantages; but now we find that they have been bringing in their sugar at a rate much below the rate imposed in the United States. If that is true, what protection had our refiners over the Americans?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It did not make a bit of difference what protection they had, for the drawback was absolutely in excess of what was paid by them, and it gave them an advantage over our refiners.

Mr. PATERSON. It makes a difference, when you put a duty on the drawback.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. But not in English and Scotch sugars, in regard to which there is no exception.

Mr. PATERSON. I understood the hon. gentleman to say, the other day, that the Tariff has been raised only 5 per cent. above what it was under the old Tariff. If he looks at the table before us, I think he will find that the sugars above No. 14 are paying more than 5 per cent. above sugars of the refining grades. I think the difference is something like  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; and the hon. Minister will observe that the Tariff is working in such a way that there is continually coming in large quantities of the lower grades of refined sugars and lessened quantities of sugars above No. 14. He will see that the import trade, with regard to sugars above No. 14, is about crushed out altogether. The comparative statement for 1882 and 1883 does not show this so much as a comparison between the six months ending December 31st, 1882, and the six months ending December 31st, 1883. During the former period, 1,950,000 lbs. were imported above No. 14, and during the latter only 1,297,000 lbs. Well, in the last six months of 1882, there was imported of sugar between No. 9 and No. 14, that paid  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a cent and 30 per cent., 35,000,000 lbs., while in the six months of this year we have only imported to the extent of 20,000,000 lbs. of this class. In the six months, ending 1883, all sugars below No. 9, paying  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent and 30 per cent. were imported to the extent of 37,000,000 lbs., while during the last six months the importation reached 60,000,000 lbs., so that the decreased importation of sugars between No. 9 and No. 14 was 15,000,000 lbs., and the class below No. 9 has increased in importation by 22,000,000 lbs., thus showing that the trade is running in that direction, that the refiners are getting their sugars in at lower prices than they did before. Whether they have found that they can use the lower grades to better advantage or not, I cannot say, but it must have an effect on the hon. gentleman's Tariff. If there is 22,000,000 lbs. more come in under the  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent per lb. and 15,000,000 less under the  $\frac{3}{4}$  cent per lb., it must make a very considerable difference in the revenue; and if, in addition, you take the importations that pay only  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a cent and 30 per cent. you will find the wonderful increase from 2,782,000 to 9,228,000 lbs. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he knows what proportion of the refined sugar can be turned out from these two different grades, as between Nos. 9 to 14 and below No. 9.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman has asked a good many questions and made a good many statements, some of which I shall feel called upon to reply to. In the first place, he speaks of the large and very considerable increase in the importation of sugar below No. 9, as compared with previous years. During the last year, the hon. gentleman will observe the increased imports of sugar from the West Indies was 10,000,000 lbs. over the average of the three previous years, but he will also observe that our trade with Brazil has also increased, and that Brazilian sugar, with some from the East Indies, and some from China, is a sugar below No. 9, because it has less saccharine value than the sugar from Cuba, Porto Rico and the British West Indies.

Mr. PATERSON. Is that a well established fact?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes. There is another thing, we have an increased number of refiners, and they find, no doubt, at present, we have as many refiners in Canada to day, if they worked the year round, as would refine all the sugar we require. Therefore, by importing a cheap class of sugar,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

it gives additional employment to the people, and it is in the interests of the refiners to do more of the work here, and therefore import their sugar at a lower saccharine value than they did a year or two ago. The hon. gentleman will understand that the melado sugar to which he has referred will be probably hit little, because in proportion to its value, the charges on melado are higher than on the better descriptions of sugar, but practically as far as refined sugar is concerned, all above No. 14 stand on the same basis as before.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman attributes the increase in the importation wholly to the low grades having less saccharine matter in them.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Partly in some. If you import melado or a raw sugar, whose saccharine value is but 75 per cent., that will not produce the same quantity of refined as 95 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON. Has the hon. Minister any means of determining how much of this increased import is due to increased consumption, and how much to loss in refining?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot say at present.

Mr. PATERSON. What is the average rate paid by the refiners, per pound, under our duty, and the average that the importer has to pay on sugar above No. 14?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The one above No. 14 is 1 cent per pound and 35 per cent., and the others pay  $\frac{1}{4}$  and  $\frac{1}{2}$  a cent and 30 per cent. The hon. gentleman can work that calculation out; it depends on the value of the sugar and the number.

Mr. PATERSON. I make it to be $1.50 per 100 lbs. for the refining sugars and $2.50 on the imported sugars.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That may be so. The imported sugars vary very much. If you take the whole imports of sugar—I am speaking from memory—I think about 150,000,000 lbs. of sugar is the import, and that is without counting melado. I think the whole revenue was $2,400,000. If it was $1.50 per hundred, it would be $2,250,000.

Mr. PATERSON. I noticed to day, if I worked it out right, in working out the molasses entries at 25 per cent. for refining, that I reckoned the duty had amounted to 30 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Are there some extra charges on packages, or how would that come about?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. members must have taken—

Mr. PATERSON. Must have made a mistake?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY—molasses that are not imported direct.

Mr. PATERSON. When imported direct from the country of growth or production, they are 25 per cent. In working it out, I found there had been 30 per cent. collected, if my calculation was correct, and I did not know how it had come, or whether it was a mistake in my calculations or a mistake in the trade returns.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Last year, the quantity of molasses imported was 41,137 gallons, of which the value, according to the returns, was $10,938, and the duty collected, $3,303. That is over 25 per cent. When not imported direct, it is 30 per cent. When imported direct for refining purposes, it is 25 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON. I have not got exactly the same figures as the hon. gentleman. I am speaking of molasses used for refining purposes, for the manufacture of sugar, when imported direct from the country of growth or production. There are 247,494 gallons, at a value of $63,628, and the duty collected is $19,299, which I make to be a little over 30 per cent., and it is put down as a 25 per cent. article. I did not know how it came. And so, with regard to what is imported not direct, and subject to the 30 per cent. duty, the amount of duty figures out to 33 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There must be some mistake about that.

Mr. BOWELL. A large quantity of this sugar has been imported and entered for consumption at 15 per cent.; afterwards, it has been disposed of to the refiners, and the extra 10 per cent. paid upon it, and, in making the entries in the returns that have been sent from the different ports, these were mixed up, so that I am not at all surprised that the hon. gentleman has been misled. As soon as my attention was called to it, instructions were given that in future these returns should be made, and the statistics given in such a way as not to be misleading. This is the cause of the difficulty.

Mr. VAIL. We know that a considerable portion of the sugar imported, especially from China and the East Indies, is imported in bags. Would not that add a great deal to the cost of the sugar imported on board, in addition to the sugar imported in wooden packages?

Mr. BOWELL. No; it has no effect on the present Tariff as it exists, because the package, no matter whether it is a bag or a hogshead or a barrel, is not dutiable, not being added to the value of the article for duty. The principal reason for changing the mode of collecting the revenue at the present moment arises from the fact that we had reason to believe, in fact we had the best evidence to show, that exporters had deducted from the value of the sugar and added to the value of the packages; so that, while the importer could make the declaration of the actual value to him of the cargo, the revenue lost, because under the Tariff, the packages were not dutiable, that is the principal reason why the change has been proposed in the mode of collecting the duty.

Mr. VAIL. Does not the Customs Act require the duty to be charged on the package?

Mr. BOWELL. If he refers to the Tariff, and not to the Customs Act, he will find that this is a special exemption.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. One of the difficulties the Department has experienced is this: A party purchasing a cargo of sugar in China, when entering it for duty, suppose it is contained in 10,000 bags, deducts from the invoice price the value of those bags. The difficulty has been for us, so far removed from China, to ascertain the real value of these bags, and they have made it appear double for the purpose of escaping the legitimate payment of duty. That is one of the reasons for the change, to obviate that, so that, if it is attempted in future, it shall not be successful.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has said that the anticipated slight increase of duty on sugars under these rates will about balance the anticipated reduction on molasses.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Does he anticipate that there will be a larger import of molasses to the displacement of a certain amount of raw sugar for refining purposes, to any considerable extent?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Take the year 1881-82; the values altogether, imported from the country of produce, and imported from the United States, were $70,000, and $44,301 of duty was collected. I think the probabilities are that that may be doubled, and therefore the duty that we will receive from the sugar that is produced from the molasses will not yield us quite as large a return as if that sugar had been imported in the raw state and refined; but the estimate is that what we lose on the one in that case, we shall have an equivalent for in the other.

Mr. BLAKE. That is to say, that the calculation that the increase on the sugar will balance the loss on the molasses includes an anticipated doubling of the quantity of molasses to the displacement of sugar.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. As to the statement of the Minister of Customs that the package is not included, I find at the bottom of Item 25, the following:—

“The value upon which the ad valorem duty shall be levied and collected shall be the value free on board, as provided by section 77 of the Customs Act.”

And section 77 of the Customs Act, provides that the value shall include the value of the packages, and so forth.

Mr. BOWELL. That is applicable to the Tariff as now proposed. The hon. gentleman asked me a question as to the bag—

Mr. VAIL. As to what you propose to do.

Mr. BOWELL. Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, and he is quite right.

Mr. BLAKE. Then it is intended that clause 77 shall apply, and that the value of the bags shall be included?

Mr. BOWELL. The bags and all other packages, including hogsheads, barrels, export duty, in short all other charges which the merchant pays for the sugar free on board, will be the value of the article for duty; hence the Finance Minister has proposed in these Resolutions to reduce the ad valorem duty from 30 to 27½, and from 35 to 32½, as the case may be. The specific duty remains as it was.

Mr. VAIL. Can the Minister of Customs tell me how many bags, to contain a ton of sugar, would cost, more than a cask that would contain a ton of sugar? My object is to learn what advantages the refiners are going to obtain by importing their sugar from China instead of from the West Indies. Of course, if the packages are cheaper from China, and the sugar is cheaper besides, by this ad valorem duty, it would be likely to result in favour of the refiner, and somewhat discriminate against the West India sugar, which is imported in casks.

Mr. BOWELL. Bags, hogsheads, and barrels are charged at such a variety of prices that the Government decided to make this change. Some of the bags are entered at a cost of 50 cents, holding about 200 lbs, while other bags of a larger kind are entered at 25 cents. Some hogsheads are entered at 9s. sterling, which, I believe, is about their proper value in the market; but, on examination of the invoices, we found some of them are charged as high as 16s., and even 18s. And just so with the bags. As I explained a moment ago, while the invoice of the consignment to the merchant shows the actual cost free on board, and that as he pays the full value to the shipper, yet the revenue is defrauded to the amount of the extra charge which is placed on the packages, and deducted from the value of the sugar.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman expects to find a considerable reduction in the price of barrels and hogsheads.

Mr. BOWELL. It will not make any difference as far as the revenue is concerned, what they charge under the present proposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Supposing the production of sugar from molasses should largely increase, how will your revenue stand?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It will not make much difference. The hon. gentleman will see that there is a limit to the operations in molasses, because the very moment the residue of the syrup, after taking out the sugar, becomes considerable, it will depreciate in value, and there will be no object for parties manufacturing from molasses, if beyond the limit at which they can sell the waste.

Mr. PATERSON. I suppose, under this clause, the specific duty will be levied on the shipping weight and not on the landing weight?

Mr. BOWELL. It must be on the landing weight. We can only charge on the weight which comes into the country. If the sugar was partially destroyed on the voyage, the Customs Act would make allowance for it.

- 24. Molasses, other, when imported direct, without transhipment, from the country of growth and production,—fifteen per cent. ad valorem, on the value thereof free on board ..... 15 per cent.
- 25. Molasses when not so imported, twenty per cent. ad valorem..... 20 per cent.

The value upon which the ad valorem duty shall be levied and collected upon all the above-named sugars, melado, syrups, molasses, &c., shall be the value thereof free on board, as provided by section 77 of the Customs Act, 1883.

Mr. TUPPER. I would like to ask where the different refining factories are, which will be benefitted by such a change?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The only boiling establishment we have at present is in Halifax. But it is open for every sugar refinery in the country to use molasses.

Mr. TUPPER. Are there any syrup factories besides the one in Halifax?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, the Redpaths and Drummonds have been refining from molasses this last year and the year before. These are the only two that have been doing anything up to the present time, but under this provision no doubt some others will take advantage of it.

M. BLAKE. I suppose any existing refiners can adapt their operations to the use of molasses as the raw material?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is open to all of them.

Mr. PATERSON. What proportion of refined sugar can be taken from molasses?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Some of the refiners simply boil the molasses and make a syrup. In 1882, there were 630,000 gallons of molasses used in the manufacture of sugar or syrups, and the duty collected was $44,000.

Mr. PATERSON. The Finance Minister has evidently had the fact brought to his attention that molasses for refining purposes, whether because it is included in the Tariff or from some other cause, has almost ceased to be used. I presume he is now giving facilities to use molasses. I suppose the 25 per cent. duty that was on it before, made it more costly as a raw material for the refiner, than melados and sugars below No. 9. Now, it is about 15 per cent. I do not know whether he had some information that would give us some idea how the 15 per cent. would compare with the product of 50 per cent. upon melados.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is but a small percentage of sugar in molasses. Last year the refinery at Halifax had to close; the rate of duty that was imposed left no margin whatever. Upon a careful examination of the amount of duty that is collected on molasses in the United States, for the same purposes, and comparing it with the revenue of our sugar refiners, we came to the conclusion that they had not sufficient margin, and therefore it was considered but right and fair to place them in a position that they could carry on that industry with a small profit.

Mr. PATERSON. The proportion is about 15 to 50 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is nothing like the value.

Mr. PATERSON. The calculation is that there is only 15 per cent., where there is 50 per cent. in the other.

Mr. MILLS. The observation of the Minister shows that he proposes to give some people an inferior quality of sugar under this Tariff to that which they have received before. The proposition is to manufacture sugar from molasses to a larger extent than heretofore, and the hon. gentleman knows that the lower grades of sugar and molasses contain a very much larger percentage of glucose or grape sugar than the richer grades. The hon. gentleman knows that sugar manufactured from the better classes of raw sugar contain a larger quantity of cane sugar than those refined from lower grades, and we know that difference amounts to as much as 20 per cent. and that there are some varieties of refined sugar which do not contain more than 80 per cent. of cane sugar, the balance being grape sugar and glucose, and the same tendency applies to sugars produced from molasses. If he will look at the report which Prof. Edwards made to the Department some years ago, the hon. gentleman will find that verified. Every time sugar is refined, a certain percentage of cane sugar is converted into grape sugar and into glucose; and what is now proposed will give the country an inferior grade of sugar to that which it received before.

Mr. STAIRS. I do not think the remarks of the hon. gentleman exactly apply. I do not think it follows that in sugar made from molasses there is an increased quantity of grape sugar in the product. The grape sugar will not crystallize to such an extent, and therefore most of it will go into syrup and be sold as such. The refinery at Halifax, which is principally affected by the change, is intended more to manufacture and refine manufactured syrups and sell them, than to manufacture crystallized sugar from the molasses which are imported. It was put up for that purpose originally, to import from the West Indies some grades of molasses not available for grocery purposes, being I presume, too dark and in some respects inferior, and convert them into a saleable syrup. They found they could not compete with molasses from the West Indies, which were imported at 15 per cent., whereas they paid 25 per cent. It may be that they may make a little crystallized sugar; but, even if they do, the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell do not apply entirely. He may be correct, that there is a larger proportion of grape sugar in sugar so manufactured, but this will not crystallize but will merge into the molasses and will be sold as such.

Mr. TUPPER. I hope the hon. gentleman does not object to the reduction.

- 26. Zinc, chloride, salts and sulphate of, five per cent. ad valorem..... 5 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Dry zinc, at the present time, used for the manufacture of paints, pays 5 per cent., and those who are importing these articles wish to manufacture that very description of dry zinc. These are some of the color manufacturers. What they say is, and there is much force in it, that the raw material from which they would manufacture dry zinc pays a higher rate of duty than the manufactured article.

Mr. BLAKE. What does it pay?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is in the unenumerated list, and pays 20 per cent.

On Resolution 3 (page 653),

Mr. BOWELL. I desire to add the following words in the third line from the bottom of this Resolution: "and on dyed cottons, jeans, coutilles, cambrics, silicias and casbans." This is the repealing clause, and we found, on looking at the Tariff Act, that there might be a doubt as to whether that portion of the old Tariff would be repealed without adding these words to the Resolution. The effect is to repeal that portion of the Tariff now in existence which exempts these articles from the 27½ per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not see how the hon. gentleman will accomplish his object by this means. He has not dealt with cambrics, silicias or casbans at all. Jeans and coutilles are dealt with for particular purposes, and it will not do to repeal the existing Tariff, which will apply generally.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Under the original Tariff, coutilles, jeans and casbans, and those two or three other articles named were in the 20 per cent. list. We transferred the coutilles and jeans, leaving them at 20 per cent., except when imported for specific purposes; and in that regard it was necessary to introduce some amendment. Last year we passed Resolutions on this subject, and I am told they did not appear in the Tariff Act. They were to come into operation on 1st January, and therefore it is necessary to move the Resolution again. It is necessary to introduce this Resolution and place all the articles at 27½ per cent., except coutilles and jeans, for corset purposes.

Mr. BLAKE. The House initiated a measure for legislation. The Resolution was simply one to be embodied in Act of Parliament, and if the House did not go any further and the Session terminated, I apprehend there is no lawful authority to collect one dollar.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There has been very little collected.

Mr. BLAKE. I dare say it was a very little one, but the offense is the same.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the effect of the change with regard to mill irons and mill cranks, and wrought forgings for mills and locomotives

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Great difficulty has arisen with regard to what is wrought forging and what is not, and many parties have entered as these forgings, articles which are really not of that description, in order that they might get them in at 20 per cent. By this change they are placed at 25 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How is it with regard to those jeans, coutilles, &c. Do they come in at 20 per cent. and the others at 27½?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They were calculated before at 20 per cent., without reference to the purposes for which they were to be used. Now, in order to come in at 20 per cent., they must be imported for these two specific purposes.

Mr. BLAKE. Why are they raised this Session?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Because they are manufactured largely in this country. The corset industry employs thousands of people to-day, and it became a question of whether we would subject what is the raw material to them to an additional duty of 7½ per cent., when the duty imposed on the manufactured article was 30 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that the reason for the general principle on which the hon. gentleman proposes to relatively reduce the rate of duty for these corset makers, is that these articles are their raw material. But I did not understand, until just now, that it was really proposed to advance the duties on jeans and coutilles. Is that also in reference to the silicias and cambrics?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I had thought that what the hon. gentleman was doing was merely carrying out the Resolution of the House in favor of 27½ per cent., arrived at last Session.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, with reference to printed or dyed cottons. But in the list, last year, I think there was an exception of four or five articles.

Mr. BLAKE. In his Tariff proposition last year, the hon gentleman included these jeans, coutilles, cambrics, silicias and casbans, either expressly or by implication. A considerable deputation from the dry goods trade visited the hon. gentleman, and he made an alteration in his proposal and decided that he would not embrace these articles in the proposed increase of duty, but would embrace only the printed or dyed cottons. He now proposes, without any notice whatever, to reverse the policy of last Session and to raise the duty on these articles from 20 to 27½ per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The deputation came to me last year with reference to jeans and coutilles, not with reference to the other articles. But they were in the list, and I declined to remove them. At that time the manufacturers wished all these articles to be placed in the 27½ per cent. list. I gave the representatives from the corset makers an assurance that the duty would not be increased on jeans and coutilles, these being the only two articles in which they were interested. After we had gone into Committee, last year, I should have asked that the other three articles should be put into the 27½ per cent. list; but we allowed them to remain until this year, with this understanding, that jeans and coutilles should be admitted at 20 per cent. when imported for this purpose. But it was found that by placing these at 20 per cent., it would be necessary to insert these words, so that the trade would understand.

Mr. BLAKE. So that, when printed or dyed cottons is inserted, the trade will understand these other articles?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. What increased revenue from this change does the hon. gentleman expect?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No increase. If anything, there will be a loss, because there are, in the Valleyfield factory, some 200 looms at work.

Mr. BLAKE. This is an increase of taxation intended to effect a diminution of revenue?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is an increased tariff for the purpose of encouraging industries and getting the articles as cheap as before.

On Resolution 4 (page 653),

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. As I stated the other night, importers are subject to great loss if they cannot get in the whole of their invoices. For instance, if a man imports large plates of glass in a case which are included in one invoice, unless 75 per cent. is destroyed, he can get no allowance made. Therefore, it is proposed to change to 25 per cent. of the whole invoice.

Resolutions to be reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 12:50 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 10th March, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SOULANGES CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, a certified copy of the judgment and decision of the said Court in the election appeal relating to the Electoral District of Soulanges, Province of Quebec, in which appeal Georges Raoul Leontad Guichard Humbert Saveuse De Beaujeu was appellant, and Stanislas Filiatrault was respondent, by which the judgment of the Superior Court for Lower Canada voiding the election on the 27th October, 1832, for the said district, was confirmed and the appeal dismissed.

FERRIES.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) introduced Bill (No. 115) respecting ferries.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. PATTERSON. The object of the Bill is to take away from the Dominion Government and fix in the hands of the municipality directly interested in the ferry, the power now centralized in the Dominion Government.

Bill read the first time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to say that I observe a member in another place has made the statement or insinuation that I had some concern with, or knowledge of, an article which was published in a daily newspaper, headed "Is it a crisis?" I wish to give that statement or insinuation the most distinct and unqualified denial.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Vaudreuil and Prescott Railway Company.—(Mr. McMillan, Vaudreuil.)

Bill (No. 33) to empower the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, limited, to construct and work a line of railway between Medicine Hat and the Company's mines on the Belly River, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

THE SCOTT ACT IN CUMBERLAND COUNTY, NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, The reason of the delay until February 6th, 1884, of the issue of the Proclamation bringing in force the Scott Act in the county of Cumberland, Nova Scotia?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There has been no delay in the Proclamation. The election was held on the 25th of October, 1883. The returning officer reported the result of the election on the 15th of November, 1883. The papers were submitted to the Privy Council according to law on the 24th January, 1884, and the Order in Council was passed on the 5th of February, and received in the Department on the 13th of February. Parties were informed on the 14th of February, and the Order in Council was published in the Canada Gazette on the 16th of February, 1884.

PUBLIC DEBT OF CANADA ON 1st JANUARY 1884.

Mr. CHARLTON enquired, The net amount of the public debt of Canada on 1st January, 1884?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The amount of the public debt on the date mentioned by the hon. member was $106,578,402.

PIER AT CRANE ISLAND.

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether the Government awarded a contract, in or about December last, for the completion of the work on the wharf at Crane Island? Who are the other parties who tendered? And what are the amounts of the several tenders?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation). In answer to the hon. member, I must say that, in fact a contract has been given out, at about the time referred to in his question, to complete the works of the pier at Crane Island. The contractors are Messrs. T. E. Normand and Pierre Duclos, junior. The contract was given to them for the amount of $8,250. The other tenders received are those of Mr. Wilfrid Vézina, Messrs Isidore Samson and Aubin Lachaine, Mr. Alexander Guérard, Mr. Etienne Dussault, Messrs. S. Aikman and W. Wardle, Messrs. Charlton and Gagnon and Mr. John S. Thorn. The amount of these various tenders are $10,000, $10,337.50, $10,700, $11,000, $12,000, $12,800 and $14,800. The lowest tender that of Messrs. Normand and Duclos, for $8,250 has been accepted.

IMMIGRATION AGENT AND QUARANTINE OFFICER IN VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria), enquired, What occasioned the delay in making the appointments of immigration agent and quarantine officer in Vancouver Island, after the Estimates were passed by Parliament, to take effect from 1st July, 1883?

Mr. BOWELL. The appointment was delayed until the return of the then Minister of Justice, who was in British Columbia. Immediately after his return the appointment was made.

STONE FOR THE NEW DEPARTMENTAL BUILDING

Mr. WELDON enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to use the stone from the Curryville Quarry in the county of Albert N.B.; in the construction of the new Departmental Building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A condition of the contract is that the stone in question may be used or other stone of equal quality. That matter has not yet been decided.

EASTERN EXTENSION—INTERCOLONIAL RY.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury), in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Government of New Brunswick, relating to a claim made by the latter Government for the balance they claim is due them on that portion of the Intercolonial Railway, known as the Eastern Extension, since May, 1876; also, all Minutes of Council passed since that date, said: This claim is a long standing one. It was brought before the last Parliament and the Parliament previous, on both of which occasions I stated the grounds upon which it was based, and it was hoped that long before this it would have been paid. However, nothing has been done in that direction, and as there is no provision made in the Estimates this year for it, I felt it my duty to bring the matter before Parliament once more. In doing so I shall briefly explain the origin and the equitable character of the claim. It will be remembered by some members of the House, no doubt, that prior to Confederation arrangements were being made between old Canada and New Brunswick and Nova Scotia for the building of the Intercolonial Railway, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick agreeing to pay three and a-half twelfths each and old Canada five-twelfths of the amount; and the British Government engaged to guarantee the interest on a loan of £3,000,000 sterling for the construction of that work. There was some difficulty, however, in carrying out those arrangements. I think the circumstance of the Government of Canada going out of power at that time prevented the execution of the arrangement being carried out. In the meantime the Governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick made a contract with an English company to construct a work from what is known as the Shediac road to Truro, a portion of which was in New Brunswick and a portion in Nova Scotia. The portion in New Brunswick is about 37 miles in length, and is what is mentioned in this resolution as the Eastern Extension Railway. When negotiations were going on for the construction of this railway by a company called the International Company, who were to do the work through a contracting firm known as Clarke, Puncheon & Co., it was understood that this railway would become a portion of the Intercolonial Railway when it was constructed. That arrangement was made with the British Government, in proof of which I will just read one clause from a correspondence between the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies and E. W. Watkin, Esq., on behalf of the Company:

"I am directed by His Grace to inform you in reply, that if the Lower Provinces shall, at their own expense, commence the construction of a railway on a line approved by Her Majesty's Government between Truro and the Bend, and if subsequently the proposed loan of £3,000,000 shall be raised under the Imperial guarantee in virtue of the offer contained in the above memoranda, the railway between Truro and the Bend, and the works constructed thereupon by the Lower Provinces, shall (as far as Her Majesty's Government is concerned) be considered to form part of the railway on which the loan of £3,000,000 is to be expended, and that His Grace sees no reason for requiring any change in that part of the memoranda which declares that five-twelfths of the loan shall be chargeable against Canada, three and a-half twelfths against Nova Scotia, and three and a-half twelfths against New Brunswick."

This shows that arrangements had been made that this part of the road, known as the Eastern Extension, should form part of the Intercolonial Railway. However, these arrangements were not carried out, on account of the Confederation of the old Provinces being accomplished and an Intercolonial Railway agreed upon by them. The Canadian authorities did not, however, think proper to adopt this portion of the road as a portion of the Intercolonial Railway in the first instance. I presume it was considered by the Canadian Government that the price asked for this portion of the road—the thirty-seven miles passing through New Brunswick—was more than they could pay, basing their figures on the cost of the Intercolonial Railway, about $24,000 per mile; and they made an offer to the New Brunswick Government that they would pay them $894,000, which is $24,000 a mile, the presumed cost of the Intercolonial Railway. But it afterwards turned out that the Intercolonial Railway cost a very much larger sum, which entirely changed the basis of the calculation. Now, to show that the Canadian Government refused to pay the amount demanded by the Government of New Brunswick, I will read from a report of the Privy Council of Canada, approved of by His Excellency on the 26th of April, 1869:

"The Committee of Council have given their attentive consideration to the memorial of certain Senators and members of the House of Commons from New Brunswick, praying that the General Government may assume the section of railway between the European and North American Railway in New Brunswick and the Nova Scotian border, generally known as the Eastern Extension, to form portion of the Intercolonial line.

"The Committee are of opinion, under all the circumstances connected with the construction of that line, that while the General Government are in no way bound to accept it as part of the Intercolonial road, yet as the construction of the latter road parallel to it, in a strip of country thinly populated and averaging about 20 miles wide, must necessarily, under the Eastern Extension, be almost valueless, and a source of loss and embarrassment to New Brunswick to the extent of their investment in it, it would be advisable to adopt the Eastern Extension as part of the Intercolonial Railway, on the following terms and conditions:—

"First, that the entire line from the European and North American Railway to the Nova Scotian border, including the western abutment of the bridge over the Missisquoi, to be finished to the satisfaction of the Intercolonial Railway Commissioners, and a perfect title given therefor, including the lands acquired and held for the purpose of the railway.

"Second, that the price to be paid for it be $894,000, being at the rate of $24,000 per mile.

"Third, that the Government of Canada be not held liable for any claim, whether from contractors or others, directly or indirectly connected with the said work or its contemplated extension to Truro.

"Fourth, that the offer of the above terms be accepted within sixty days from this date, and if not, that the Commissioners be authorized to proceed with the construction of the direct line, so as not to impede the construction of the whole road."

The fact is that the New Brunswick Government were told, in so many terms, that the Dominion Government would give them $24,000 a mile for the road, which was the price it was estimated the Intercolonial would cost. The New Brunswick Government were informed that if within three months they would accept that offer, the matter would be closed, but if not the Dominion Government would build another road parallel to the Eastern Extension, which would destroy the value of their road. Under these circumstances the New Brunswick Government were, in a measure, compelled to accept the offer, and lost by the transaction $150,000. They received from the Dominion Government $894,000, but out of this they had to pay the contractors $644,000, besides the $100,000 already paid them, leaving a deficit of $150,000, which the New Brunswick Government had to provide. Though compelled to accept this offer, they never ceased to agitate for an equitable adjustment of this affair. In 1874 this claim was formulated with several others, and a deputation was sent to Ottawa—I think two or three deputations, at different times, have been sent to Ottawa previously to have it adjusted. The hon. member for Kent, being a member of the Local Government, was, I think, on one or two of those deputations. Again, in 1878, a deputation consisting of the leader of the Local Government and one or two other members of the Government, were sent here during the Session of Parliament. They called together the Senators and Members from New Brunswick on both sides of politics and left them to deal with the Dominion Government. A Committee was named, and as one of that Committee, I brought the matter before the House—then led by Mr. Mackenzie—and asked for papers that the claim might be fairly formulated and all information be had on the subject. However, it was late in the Session, the papers were very voluminous, and they were not printed. The Elections came on next spring and the Liberal Government was defeated, and the claim was not adjusted. In the meantime, when the Attorney General returned to New Brunswick, he laid the matter before his Government, and in the Speech from the Throne, put these words in the mouth of the Lieutenant Governor. They put forward their claims in these terms:

"I have caused renewed representations to be made to the Government at Ottawa, concerning the claim of the Province to the sum of $150,000, in respect of the Eastern Extension Railway. This matter was brought under the consideration of the Dominion Government in the month of December, 1874, and no conclusion having been reached, I deemed it advisable to send members of my Government to Ottawa, early in the present Session of Parliament, to endeavour to obtain through the co-operation of the Senators and members of the House of Commons, respecting the Province, a settlement of this and other matters. I am glad to be able to say that, with few exceptions, the members representing the Province, cordially co-operated with the members of my Government. The Provincial investment in the Eastern Extension Railway was made for a work undertaken for the Province in 1863, as a part of the Intercolonial Railway, and in view of a previous assurance of the Imperial Government that New Brunswick should not be prejudiced by commencing that portion of the work in anticipation of a final arrangement for the construction of the whole line, and that the Imperial guarantee them, when given as it was subsequently by the Imperial Government and accepted by Canada, should cover this portion of the road. The road was subsequently adopted by the Imperial Government as a part of the Intercolonial Railway. But this Province has, thus far, received from Canada only $250,000 out of the $400,000 put into the road by the Province. There can be no doubt of the right of the Province to receive the sum of 150,000 on this account with interest."

This puts the case in a nutshell; I would almost be willing to rest the case upon that statement. However, the claim has not yet been settled nor is there any provision for it this year in the Estimates. What I wish to point out to the House is this: that the Province of New Brunswick paid $150,000 for that portion of the Intercolonial more than she has received, that the basis upon which that sum was arrived at was a basis of $24,000 a mile which it was then expected would be the cost of the Intercolonial Railway, but the Intercolonial Railway has cost something like $40,000 per mile. You will see that this road has cost the Dominion very much less than it would have cost had the Dominion built it to the extent of some $500,000 or $600,000. There is another consideration which I would urge upon the Government, and that is the fact that New Brunswick is a sparsely settled country, that we have a large amount of wilderness land, much of which would be good agricultural land if settled, and that we have to expend a large amount of money in roads and bridges, and in railroads. I hold in my hand a statement from the New Brunswick Government of the amount of money paid for railroads since we went into Confederation. That amount is already $3,363,000 in round numbers. We also gave a company for building a road which will probably form part of the Intercolonial Railway, and should have been in the first instance, 1,617,772 acres of land. Reckoning this at $1 an acre, which will be a very low value, the total that we have expended in building railways since Confederation amounts to $1,981,000. Then there is a law upon our Statute-Book giving a bonus of $3,000 a mile for 250 miles of railway. There are contracts let for the whole of this amount, which will add $750,000 more, making $5,731,000 in all, besides $300,000 paid by municipalities. I think the Government should consider the fact that New Brunswick has already since Confederation paid about $6,000,000 of money for railways to open up and develop the country, that two of these roads which have been subsidized by the Local Government are really Dominion roads, and will form a portion of the Dominion road; that three or four more are feeders of the Intercolonial, and important feeders, when they are built, which will add to the value of the Dominion road; we also should consider them in view of the facts that we have taken a new departure in regard to railways, and have been subsidizing local roads; we also have been reconsidering old claims of contractors on the Intercolonial Railway, which were previously denied and left to arbitration, and paid, of less merit than the one in question. I hope these considerations will induce the Government and the House to consider this claim favourably, and without any further delay pay New Brunswick this $150,000 and interest to date.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The papers in this case have most of them, I understand, been already sent down.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then the motion will be for those that have not been sent down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, those that have not been sent down. I am sorry the Minister of Railways is unfortunately confined to his room to-day from indisposition, so that I cannot say anything with regard to the question the hon. gentleman has raised. There is no objection to the motion.

Motion, amended by the insertion of the words "not already laid before the House," agreed to.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST MAJOR GENERAL LUARD.

Mr. MULOCK, in moving for copies of all letters of complaint respecting the conduct of Major-General Luard at Cobourg, or elsewhere, sent by Lieut.-Col. A. T. Williams, M.P., or any person or persons, to the Government or any member thereof, together with copies of all replies thereto, and of all documents and other correspondence in the possession of the Government relating to such matters, said: In making this motion, perhaps it will be right that I should state a few matters and circumstances which, I think, suggest to me, if they do not make it my duty, to call the attention of the House to the subject matter of this motion. As is known to all members of this House, at one time in the history of this country we depended largely upon the Imperial forces for our colonial defence. With Confederation a change of policy was adopted and we have seen the Imperial forces gradually withdrawn from Canada, and, in lieu thereof, we have endeavoured to build up a citizen soldiery of our own. As part of that system, the Act respecting the militia of Canada provided that the chief command of the active militia of Canada shall vest from time to time in an officer holding rank in Her Majesty's Regular Army, and whose position there is not lower than that of colonel. From time to time, we have had discharging that high office, men, to all appearance, and as far as their record went, thoroughly qualified to discharge those duties; and, without tracing the various changes which have taken place—for commanding officers have come, and commanding officers have gone—we at last had come to our shores a gentleman whose military record spoke for itself. However, when he arrived here, it appears that he found amongst the militia of Canada a man his superior in military knowledge, and, without wasting time in tracing his career in command of our forces here, I will come down to one eventful day which culminated in the correspondence taking place which is asked for by this motion. On the 20th September, 1883, the third military district was encamped at Cobourg. Major-General Luard, who was then commanding officer, was present in his official capacity to inspect the troops. The inspection took place, after which the officers met in mess as part of the military ceremonies, and at this mess Major-General Luard was present, by invitation. At that mess was present, also, a gentleman occupying a distinguished place in this House. He was there, according to the newspapers, in his official capacity as Lieut.-Colonel of the 46th Battalion—I refer to the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Williams). He had been present on parade as colonel, and was present at that mess, and it is said that the Major-General was guilty of offences during his official visit to the camp at Cobourg which justified a correspondence upon the subject being opened by the hon. member for East Durham, and which, in the opinion of the editor of the Port Hope Times, justified the removal of Major-General Luard from the high position he was filling. I do not propose to enter into a consideration of the facts, but simply to call attention to the procedure adopted. It is impossible on ex parte statements to determine whether one view or another may be correct, and it therefore appears to me unjust that criticisms adverse to any person should be indulged in on the strength of mere newspaper statements. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is said that on the 27th September a letter was sent from the town of Port Hope to the Secretary of State for Canada, written by the hon. member for East Durham—not written by him as colonel of the 46th Battalion, but written by him as a member of this House—and in that letter he endorsed certain statements which appeared in the Port Hope Times, of the 27th September, 1883. Without reading all the article I will read only those statements of fact in the article, which were endorsed by the letter of the hon. member for East Durham to the acting Secretary of State. The newspaper report proceeds as follows:—

"The inspection concluded, the Major-General assumed command of the brigade and put it through various field movements, in the course of which he displayed those peculiarities of temperament for which he is noted, showing plainly his inability to grasp or comprehend that spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice which animates our citizen soldiers, and strongly impressing upon the minds of those with whom he came in contact the unfavourable opinion of him which prevails so universally throughout military circles in the Dominion. The conduct of the General, on the whole, during inspection, was unworthy of an officer occupying his position, and was in direct disobedience to the Queen's Regulations, which govern him as well as the humblest private in the ranks. He failed to show that thorough knowledge, which he evidently desired others to imagine he possessed, for he was frequently shown to be incorrect when attempting to reprimand officers commanding corps, and by his insulting and boisterous tone, he seemed to desire to weaken their authority, and lessen their self-respect in the presence of their respective commands. Some of the officers to whom he used most unbecoming and profane language, were men who were quite as well up in the details of their drill, and the knowledge of their duties as he has shown himself to be. He also made an insulting assault upon some of the officers who had assembled behind his saluting flag after the inspection parade, his language being described by the crowd of civilians standing near as most indecent, and exhibiting on his part a want of that knowledge which a man occupying the position ought to possess."

And then passing over some criticisms on that subject, I come on to another alleged statement of fact :

"On the termination of the field movements Major-General Luard was tendered an invitation to luncheon by the commandant and the officers commanding corps, which he accepted, and he was entertained in the Brigade Officers' mess tent. Here, also, he exhibited himself at a decided disadvantage, sneering at and insulting the members of the House of Commons generally, and taking advantage of his being in uniform to make attacks which were unworthy of any one occupying a much more humble position, and which, we are glad to learn, were spiritedly resented. The greatest indignation was felt by the majority of those present, it having been thought that, while he was the guest of the officers, he would at least refrain from insulting them."

In the editorial columns of that same paper, on the same day, is an article referring to the news item I have just read, and which article contains this statement :

"If the militia of Canada is to be maintained, it is of paramount necessity that Major-General Luard shall be removed from his position in this country, and some other officer more cognizant of the genius of our people, and more abreast of the age, substituted for him. His usefulness is gone, and he should not be allowed to go to remain."

Then, after referring to reports in other papers, the same editor goes on to state—referring to the alleged occurrences at mess:—

"What really occurred was this: An officer at the table was speaking to Colonel Williams in a spirit of pleasant banter of the small value which had been placed upon the patriotic efforts of members of the House of Commons at the late meeting of the Dominion Rifle Association; and Colonel Williams replied, deprecating the remark which had then been made. General Luard then, in a loud tone of voice, and in a very offensive manner, made an attack on the members of the House of Commons, which Colonel Williams indignantly resented, and said that he was satisfied the members of the House of Commons would place even a smaller value upon the opinion of the highest military authority in the country on such a matter, and that it was to their constituents that they looked for appreciation of the value of their services. The conversation was joined in by others at the table, and the General continued his offensive manner of tone."

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I understand that the hon. member for East Durham, in his capacity as a member of this House, did on the 27th of September, the date of the issue of that paper, direct a communication to the Secretary of State for Canada, in which letter he made this statement :

"I have the honour, as a member of the House of Commons, to transmit to you a copy—"

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is not in order. The hon. gentleman cannot quote a paper that is not before the House.

Mr. BLAKE. He is bringing it before the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well. I will speak from my information, and say that in the letter in question the hon. member for East Durham endorsed the statements contained in the report and editorial which I have just read, as being a correct statement of what occurred, and called the attention of the proper authorities to the matters complained of. I am told that the newspaper containing these vague statements was, on the 9th of October, sent to the Major-General for his remarks on the statements therein contained, and that on the same day he replied asking that if any charges were to be made against him they should be formulated specifically, that he might have an opportunity of replying. I understand no charges were formulated; and that about the 15th of October the Major-General again directed a communication to the Secretary of State, asking that the charges made should be formulated or withdrawn, and saying that it was unreasonable to expect him to defend himself against vague statements contained in the newspapers made in the loose manner in which these were made—and I think every member of the House will admit that they were made in a loose manner. This was on the 15th of October. I am told that no reply was sent by any member of the Government to the letter of Major-General Luard demanding that the charges should be formulated, that months rolled by, and that these charges were held over that gentleman's head and were neither substantiated nor withdrawn. I am further told that during this period the Major-General was in expectation of, and had reasonable right to expect, promotion in the regular army. But the fact of those charges, vague as they were, hanging over him, to some extent prejudiced his claim to such promotion. He was exceedingly desirous of having those charges investigated or withdrawn in order that not only his character as a soldier might be cleared, but that he might have the proper reward of a soldier, if entitled to it, in the regular army. From 15th October to 15th January, three months, I am told he received no reply whatever to his application, although those charges were still hanging over him and his promotion was in doubt; and on 15th January, two days before the House assembled, he called the attention of the Government to the fact that Parliament was about to assemble, that in all probability charges would be made in Parliament, and it was only fair to him that he should have them formulated in a proper manner. He received no reply to that letter, and on the next day, 16th January, he directed another letter in similar language to the Government; still he received no reply; but worn out at last and failing in health, in consequence perhaps—I do not say it is a fact—but perhaps in consequence of the irritation, the anxiety, occasioned by the position in which he was held in spite of himself, negotiations were opened up to induce his withdrawal from the force entirely. Later on it was announced in the press that he had applied for leave of absence, and it is a fair inference to draw that that leave of absence was intended to be made permanent; on that point, however, I have no knowledge whatever. But I wish to direct the attention of the House, in the first place, to the position taken by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Williams) and the line he adopted. It may be that he has taken a proper course—I do not intend at this stage of the discussion to express an opinion on that point; but as he is at present in his seat he will no doubt be able to justify the course he has taken. He is a military man, he has served years in the force, he knows what discipline is, what duty is, and no doubt he will be able to explain how as a military man he can at the same time be a member of Parliament, and how he can assert his position as a member of Parliament in a way different from that which he would have to assert it as an officer. It would seem to me not in harmony with military rules that in reference to matters forming the ground work of a charge in a military court he, being a soldier and on duty, should be able to make a complaint, except in his capacity of an officer. It does appear to me that if an officer is on duty, if he is at mess, that mess being a part of the military service, it is irregular that he should take advantage of his position as an officer and, when mess is over and his uniform thrown off, should withdraw from his tent and become a reporter. I do not say that the hon. member for East Durham did report those matters, but I find in certain correspondence it is intimated that the hon. member for East Durham did give information to the editor of the Port Hope Times, which was subsequently incorporated into the report which I have read. I dwell upon this point, in order that, if it is not correct, the hon. member for East Durham may have full opportunity to contradict it. I do not suppose, I will not believe, that he so far forgot his duty as a soldier as to withdraw from mess and afterwards be guilty of what would seem to be a breach of discipline, by inspiring an article against his superior officer. I think too much of the hon. member as a gentleman, to charge him with having done any such act; at the same time, as is well known, it is intimated in the correspondence to which I have referred, that he did adopt this course, I think it proper prominently to call attention to the matter, so that he may as prominently clear up his position on this point. There is, however, one point about which there is no doubt: that he did communicate, as a member of this House, claiming in his letter, the privileges of a member of the House, and laid the charges before a tribunal in a way that an officer of Her Majesty's active militia in Canada should not have done. It seems to me most important for the welfare of the militia force of Canada that this point should be established: We have in this House many members occupying high positions in the military force of Canada, and are they as members of the House to have different rights and privileges accorded them because they are members of the House from those which are enjoyed by other members of the force? Is our force to be demoralized, I may say, by the circumstance that men are serving in the ranks and yet not amenable to their superior officers? I find in the ordinary regulations applicable to complaints that where an officer has a complaint to lay against his superior officer there is a course prescribed, and that course is not the course pursued by the hon. member for East Durham. If an officer complains that his superior officer has been unjust to him or has done anything which would form the foundation for a military enquiry, he must proceed, as I read the Regulations, through his next immediate superior officer, and it is the duty of that officer to place the complaint in the hands of the proper authorities. Why was not that course pursued here? It does not follow, I think, that because General Luard happened to occupy the highest military position in Canada, that the course adopted by the hon. gentleman should have been pursued. It would rather appear that the hon. member for East Durham desired to take advantage of his position and his influence as a member of Parliament rather than to present his claim in the ordinary way that an officer, being a member of Parliament, I submit should have been bound to have followed. I do not propose at this stage to criticise what is said to have been done, because we have no state of facts admitted on all sides. I do not know if it will be regular for me to say what I have in my mind at this moment—that our military service does sustain frequently, I think, a good deal of injury and loss of efficiency by criticisms being made which are not founded on any admitted or proved state of facts; but I can fairly call the attention of the House, for the benefit of the service, to this proposition, whether a member of Parliament holding a commission in the active militia of Canada, has any privileges or rights other than those which he would have as an officer or private were he not such a member. With these remarks I beg to move the motion which I have read.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have the pleasure of seconding the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I, too, Sir, want some light on this mysterious subject. The hon. gentleman has read from a newspaper which I had intended to quote from, and I will proceed to read from the Toronto Mail:

"Major-General Luard is rapidly becoming an impossible man for the position he holds. He appears to be a survival of one of the very worst features of the military service of England—that which permitted in field officers a license of language and bearing quite intolerable among civilized society, on the ground, apparently, that a dash of profanity and the swagger of a freebooter added a valorous air to men who had few other qualities to command respect. The idea that men in subordinate positions can be governed readily by the free use of profanity and abuse is one not wholly departed from among us. It still prevails among the 'bosses' of gangs of railway navvies, and amongst some, at least, of the general officers of Her Majesty's service. We believe neither Her Majesty nor the military authorities are very kindly disposed to encourage the indulgence of bad temper towards troops; and possibly General Luard's valuable services may have been obtained all the more easily when his faults of temper were so well known.

Mr. MULOCK,

"We publish elsewhere, from the Port Hope Times, an account of the affair which took place at Cobourg. We have good grounds for believing that the account is correct, and was, if at all, on the side of moderation, in describing General Luard's language and manners, if the peculiar exhibition can be called manners at all. We may say here, that we have on previous occasions exhibited all possible friendliness to General Luard, in the belief, or the hope, that he was doing some good, in his way, in creating a stronger sense of the serious nature of militia duty. But recent occurrences, and the general tenor of his conduct put it out of the question that he can be defended. We go so far as to say that it is quite impossible that he should be much longer retained.

"It is very obvious that the Major-General does not know the country nor the people. It is clear he has no adequate understanding of his duties. It is certain that he lacks all sympathy with the sacrifices made by the militia service, officers and men, in keeping together as an organization. He is entirely wanting in tact and kindness. And we have left ourselves but one thing to say of him, and that we will not say because he wears Her Majesty's uniform, and is bound to be, by the traditions of the service, a gentleman. If the rules in this respect have been relaxed, they could hardly have had any effect on Major-General Luard, whose appointment dates from the previous generation.

"It is very obvious that General Luard and Canada must part company. We have no desire at all to dictate; but we mean just what we say. Public opinion and militia opinion, and parliamentary opinion, are all pretty much the same. The Minister of Militia, of course, occupies a delicate position in such a matter. If he does not take the matter in hand at once, it will be due to him and to the militia service that members of Parliament should next Session make action imperative. This is all we need say at present. We are expressing what we believe to be public and professional opinion. If it does not bring about, in the manner we have mentioned, the change we have named, then let us hear no more about it, and let General Luard rant and swagger as he will."

If this statement be correct, and I am assured by an officer and member of Parliament who was present, that it is substantially correct, it proves the existence of a strange condition of things in connection with our militia force, worthy of the attention of the military authorities of the House and the country. But there is in it an element of compensation which proves the truth of Emerson's theory. A great French writer tells us that there is something in the misfortunes of our dearest friends which is not displeasing to an ungenerous mind. I never realized so fully the profound philosophy and wonderful wisdom of the maxim of Rochefoucauld, as I do to-day. It will be within the recollection of many members of this House, that a few years ago, when I ventured to say, that in my opinion, an old colleague of ours and an old militia officer, one who had devoted much time and attention to the service, with that courage and zeal which, I am happy to say, animates the officers and men of the entire militia force of Canada—when I ventured to say that this old colleague, this gallant officer, and this kindly and genial gentleman, had been treated with unnecessary cruelty and harshness in being reprimanded in general orders, for an offence of which nearly every commanding officer who wishes to preserve the discipline of his company had been guilty, the House will recollect that the honourable and gallant Colonel, whose trials and tribulations form the subject matter of this motion, rebuked me for the course I pursued on that occasion. He pointed out the political and military ethics which governed the situation. He told me, in a very pleasant and patronizing manner, that while my votes were always right my speeches and opinions were often wrong, and that a closer and more logical connection between the two would be more conducive to political and military discipline. He pointed out that obedience was the very essence of the military system, a blind, unhesitating, unquestioning obedience, on the part of the inferior to the superior authority. I bowed with submission to this great military authority, waiting patiently for time, the avenger, to solve this problem. Well, the whirligig of time brought its revenge sooner than I expected, and the bitter cup of contumely and humiliation which was placed to the lips of Colonels Walter Ross and Campbell, has been drained to the dregs by the gallant Colonel. All the circumstances surrounding this case were of a very mysterious character, and I am not surprised at the curiosity manifested by the hon. member for West York. I, too, share in that feeling, and I should like to have more light thrown on the dark subject. The gallant Colonel occupies an exceptional position in this House and in the country. He is popular with the members, with the people and with the soldiery. He was regarded as the Bayard of the militia force, and as being literally without fear or reproach. "We knew him but to love him, we named him but to praise." It was thought by many that in the event of so great a calamity overtaking the country as the loss of the Minister of Militia, that he would be his fitting successor. In the event of that great strategist going down in some great battle, some deadly conflict, in defence of his country, it was felt that the cause would not be wholly lost so long as the gallant Colonel survived. This it is which makes all the attendant circumstances so strange and mysterious. It had been ordained by fate and the hon. Minister of Militia, that great military movements should take place on the western frontier. Primarily these Fall manoeuvres were intended to promote the organization and increase the discipline of that region, and in the next place, to give our neighbours across the border an idea of our military strength and powers. The theatre was prepared in which this great military spectacle was to take place, and the camp was pitched in the vicinity of the pleasant town of Cobourg. We all know the great interest which such an event excites in a district. It would be a gala day throughout the entire region. All the beauty and the chivalry of the western counties would be gathered to witness this great military display. The pomp and pride and circumstances of glorious war would be increased by the presence of fair women and brave men. The strains of martial music would add to the enthusiasm. Mounted on his war steed, the gallant Colonel would watch the world with noble horsemanship. As he rode to and fro along that glittering line, we can fancy him singing that old soldier's song:

"There's not a trade a-going
Worth knowing, or showing,
Like that to glory going,
Says the bould Soger Boy."

Popular with his soldiery, popular with his constituency, envied by the men and admired by the women, his cup of felicity seemed filled to overflowing. But all is vanity, says the preacher. Black care rides behind every horseman. Every arrangement had been accurately made, every military movement carefully considered. He had reckoned with his host, with his gallant regiment, but alas he had reckoned without the Major-General. That fierce old warrior had distinguished himself on many a battle field. When the forts of Canton were attacked, it is said he led the stormers. He was schooled in all the traditions of ancient and modern warfare. He was versed in all the modes of European slaughter! But gallant soldier as he certainly was, he had the weakness of our common humanity—he had not a soul above buttons! As he rode grimly and sternly along that glittering line he marked much that was amiss, and muttered many military maledictions. He saw not the cowed and craven glances of the scourged soldiery of Europe, but the bold looks and the dauntless bearing of the free men of the forest, and the form of the man who had made for themselves fair homes in the wilderness, who were ready to die at any moment for their Queen and country, and who would hold the land as bravely as they had won it. But the brave old soldier could not understand the difference between an irregular and a regular force, or between the volunteers and the regular troops, and so he clothed himself with curses, as with a garment. He swore at everything, in the heavens above, at the earth beneath, and at the water under the earth. He made an insulting assault upon an officer. He swore at all sorts and conditions of men. We have been told on good authority, that our army swore terribly in Flanders, but we thought that the sweetness and light, the culture and civilization of the nineteenth century, had produced their legitimate results. We thought that a service which had given us such men as Havelock and Headly Vicars, men who combined the most earnest and fervent piety with the most dauntless daring, eliminated all such coarse and vulgar elements. When Mr. Bret Harte, the American humourist, visited this city, he told us a tale of the early settlement and gold fever in California. Among the adventurers who first visited the country was a western teamster. From the first he was considered a first-class swearer, but by dint of practice, he attained the position of boss blasphemer of the Pacific Coast. One day his team became entangled in a ravine, and he entered upon a protracted course of swearing. Like the Major-General, he swore at everything in the heavens above, the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth. An excellent clergyman who was passing, ventured to remonstrate with him on this horrid blasphemy. The teamster turned on him with surprise and indignation: "So you call that swearing, do you? I never thought you devil-dodgers had any practical ability. If you want to enjoy first-class swearing, you should hear me exhort my impenitent mule." I fear the feelings of the gallant Colonel must have been like those of the excellent clergyman. Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to ask what would you have done under like circumstances—you Sir, who represent in the Chair which you so eminently adorn, all the ideas which preside over the development of the human intellect, the idea of industry in your commercial, of justice in your legal, of war in your military, of the mystic in your religious, and of the State in your representative capacity. What would you have done, if while the gallant regiment was drawn up under the bleak shades of that magnificent but gloomy pile where justice presents her malevolent rather than her benevolent aspects. Where the intelligent remnant, to borrow the expression of Mathew Arnold, are kept in durance vile by the malignant and mechanical majority. What would you have done, if while you were meditating some great military movement a military termagant was to tell you that your military manoeuvres were on a par with your commercial capacity, your legal attainments and your knowledge of constitutional customs and parliamentary practice? I venture to say that the blood of the descendant of him who slew the "Red Comyn" would have mounted to fever heat, and that "Maksicear" would have been the order of the day. The logical sequence of the battle is the banquet. When the cruel war is over the warriors rest upon their laurels, and pass the wine cup, after the fashion of the heroes of Homer. The Viking of Heaven was of all hollow where the heroes would drink perpetual mead out of skulls of their enemies. The sweetness and light of the modern culture has made the military mess of the modern Valhalli. That eminent writer on military subjects has given us many a pleasant picture of "Our Mess." The histories of Charles O'Malley, Jack Hinton, Harry Lorrequer, Con Cregan, Maurice Tierney, and Tom Burke of Ours, will last as long as the Commentaries of Cæsar and the works of Jomimi, without violating the miseries of the mess-table, that the gay young Canadian soldiers passed the wine cup and sang pleasant songs and told many a tale of love and war, as has been the fashion with warriors from the beginning. "Why soldiers, why should we be melancholy, boys, whose business 'tis to die." But, alas! there is a skeleton to every feast, and a grim and bony old skeleton was the Major-General. He broke out in a fresh place, he grumbled, and growled at everything. He laid his mailed hand on the ark of our constitutional covenant. Horrible to relate, he sneered at the members of Parliament and at the House of Commons. It appears there is nothing sacred to a Major-General. This is not the first time that great soldiers expressed their scorn and contempt for the institutions of a free people. Oliver Cromwell purged the English House of Commons. At the time of the coup d'état of Napoleon III. General Espeness drove out at the point of the bayonet the members of the French Assembly. Murat, at the instance of Napoleon I., outraged the representation of the French people. And under the very shadow of our Parliament buildings, that great soldier and Polish patriot, Colonel Gzowski, at a military banquet, and surrounded by his warriors, expressed in language of superb disdain, his supreme and profound contempt for the representatives of the Canadian people. Allow me to ask what we have done to merit such maledictions? We have done our best to promote the efficiency of the militia service. We have always voted the Estimates; we have listened with pleasure and patience to long and eloquent speeches of the Minister of Militia; we have never smiled, more than was absolutely necessary, at anything which appeared supremely ridiculous; we have never insinuated that it was possible that the hide of the lion would cover the form of a more ignoble animal, and we have given the best and bravest, the flower of the House of Commons, to the service of our country. As Hasdrubal devoted, so we have consecrated you to the service of your native land. We have taken both your money and your life; we have doomed you to deadly dinner lugubrations, luncheons and ghastly dinner parties. In addition to this, we have staked all on the hazard of the deadly dice; we have given the hon. member for Argenteuil the power behind the Throne, to the dogs of war; we have given our best beloved, the hon. Minister of Customs, to the service of Velone; we have given our gayest cavalier, our most splendid horseman, the hon. member for Beauharnois, to the cavalry service; we offered up our best shot and most perfect marksman, the hon. member for West Elgin; we have given Cols. Ouimet, Bergin, O'Brien, Tyrwhitt, Coursol and Thompson, in fact all our best and bravest, the flower of the House, yet those cormorants are not satisfied. Like the daughter of the Horse Leech, they constantly cry: Give, give. It is manifest that a great breach of the privilege of the House has been committed, and that condign punishment should follow. When that most excellent City Father, Alderman Heney, animated by his zeal for the cause of temperance, which is only exceeded by that of the hon. Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for King's, when attempting to pluck a brand from the burning, not wisely, but too well, was brought to the Bar of the House and subjected to great torture. Other illustrious culprits have expiated their sins by suffering appropriate punishment. Now, what shall we do with the Major-General? Shall we demand him from the Imperial authorities? Shall we give him a soldier's death and shoot him in the great square as Rossel and the French Communist Generals were shot in Satoria; or shall we put him to death by parliamentary practice and cause him to be pierced by the short rapier of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The punishment would be too mild for the offence. I would cause him to be placed at the Bar of this House and force him to listen to a series of lectures on Canadian warfare as compared with that of the older civilizations, pointing out that the introduction of our system might prevent the difficulties and disasters which occurred in the movements and management of European armies. I fancy the punishment would be adequate to the offence. We can understand how the gallant Colonel made his moan to the Minister of Militia. You might remember an occurrence which took place in the reign of Louis XIV. A French Marshall, more distinguished for his courtly than his military achievements, took forcible possession of a box at the theatre belonging to a French gentleman. The gentleman made his complaint to the King—Sire, I do not complain of the Duke of Richelieu, who took Monarcier; I do not complain of the Marshall de Saxe, who won many battles for Your Majesty; I do not complain of the Duke de Luxemburg, who has captured many cities for his King, but I do complain of the Marshall de Villars, who took my box at the theatre, and who took nothing else.

Mr. WRIGHT.

We can fancy the gallant Colonel making his complaint to the Minister of Justice; I do not complain of Lord Dufferin or the Marquis of Lorne, who, by the admirable administration of the affairs of this country, won the respect and esteem of all classes in the community; I do not complain of Lord Wolseley, who led the expedition to the Red River and who always behaved, while in Canada, not only as a gallant soldier, but as a kindly and genial gentleman; I do not complain of Generals McDougall, Smith, and Ross, although strict disciplinarians have always been remembered as true friends of the Canadian soldiery, but I do complain of the Major-General commanding Her Majesty's Canadian Militia, who insulted me in my military and political capacity; who, while in Canada, only captured Major Scott's towel and never captured anything else. Last Session the hon. member for Quebec, animated with that love for art, and that regard for the good, the true, and the beautiful, which so eminently distinguishes him, made a very eloquent speech, in which he suggested that some great artist should be commissioned to paint an historical picture, which would hand down to posterity lineaments of the Fathers of Confederation. I would suggest that some Canadian artist or some or Horace Vernet should be requested to paint a companion picture—the first would mark the inauguration, and the second the military progress, of the Canadian people. The scene might be laid in the vicinity of the Parliament Buildings. A military mystery would be in process of elucidation. A hollow square would be formed, of the bronzed veterans and the household troops. The Minister of Militia, mounted on his white charger, surrounded by a brilliant staff, would gaze with the air of Von Moltke on the scene. Suddenly a banner would be seen approaching. Is it the starry flag, under which the boys in blue are marching? Is it the sunburst of O'Donovan Rossa? He charges fiercely on the foe and returns covered with glory. Voltaire tells us that Frederick the Great ran away from the battlefield and hid himself in a mill, and covered himself with glory and with flour. There is a military maxim that "to the victors belong the spoil." When in the plenitude of the military power of Rome great battles were won by the soldiers of the Republic, when the victors were awarded a triumph, they paraded their trophies, captives and treasures, through the streets of the Imperial city. This maxim may be true of the military, but it is not true of political warfare. When, a few years ago, we won the great political battle; when we stormed the Liberal intrenchments; when the dust and smoke of the great conflict had cleared away, we looked down on a very pleasant political picture—the broad expanse of the El Dorado of the new Jerusalem of the North-West greeted our vision; but, alas, it was like the banquet which was spread before the Governor of Barataria, but which his Excellency was forbidden to taste. It was like the glimpse which Plato gives us of the lost Island of Atlantis. Our bugles sung truce, and everything of power, patronage and advantage was transferred from the victors to the vanquished. It was the grandest act of self-abnegation and self-sacrifice in the history of constitutional government. And to-day, when we have removed that sacrifice, we are told, as Mirabeau was, of the great treason of the Conservative party. Everything of wealth and power has enured to the advantage of our political opponents. To them, the princely palaces; to us, the prospective poor-houses. To them, the sparkling wines and costly viands; to us, the Spartans' fare. We have the proud satisfaction of thinking that these sacrifices have been made in the interest of our common country, and that our motives have been of the purest and most exalted character. The hon. Minister of Militia has had his own troubles in connection with these military matters. When he entered upon the duties of his office, he succeeded many able strategists and great tacticians. The hon. member for Digby and other great warriors preceded him. But young men are heroes of history, and he was forced to strike out a path for himself. He remembered that war was a conflict of ideas. On one side, he represented four millions of people, imbued with aristocratic and monarchical ideas; on the other side, fifty millions of the fiercest Democrats the world has ever seen. The odds were great, but he remembered that small nations, trained in warlike habits of military discipline often conquered large ones as illustrated the battles of Plataea and Arbela. He resolved to load the dice to make assurance doubly secure. He recollected the part which the order of Knighthood had taken in the past. The plutonic that stayed the progress of heathen Prussia, the Knights of St. John and the Templars, were the bulwarks of Christendom, and stemmed the tide of Mahometan invasion; so he determined to meet the democratic with the aristocratic idea. On the one side, the simple Knights of Labour, on the other the Knights of St. Michael and St. George. We can imagine the present and the past Minister of Finance. The Knight of St. John and Des de Chalon riding at the head of their men at arms, and the one presenting his brazen and the other his silver shield to the foe. In all seriousness, I would say that the hon. Minister of Militia has done much to improve the militia force. He has pitched great camps, he has founded military institutions, he has made most eloquent speeches, which, like the bugle-call that sounds the charge, has awakened every generous, noble and manly sentiment. He has done everything in his power to promote the best interests of the militia. I have a profound respect for the officers and men of the militia force in Canada. I think them to be as gallant gentlemen and as brave soldiers as the sun ever shone on. In my own county we have military organizations which are kept up under the most difficult and trying circumstances. They maintain discipline, however; their Rifle Association sends their men to Wimbledon, where they behave in a most creditable manner. Some time ago, I was asked to attend a military festival in one of the isolated townships. It was in the very heart of the forest. As we proceeded to the place of meeting, the night was dark and the mountain tops were aflame with the forest fires, where the rapid river ran like a stream of lava. It was like a scene in Milton's "Paradise Lost." I was much impressed, as the soldiery were trooping to the place of rendezvous; some had marched a distance of twenty miles; they were composed of the very flower of our county, and every man had his tale of difficulty and hardship to tell; but all were animated by a spirit of fervent loyalty to their Queen and undying love for the land beyond the sea. It is of such men the militia of Canada is composed. What is true of my own county is, I have no doubt, true, and to a greater extent, of the other counties. Treat these men well everywhere, and they will do anything; treat them like dogs, and they will turn and rend you.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, there is, perhaps, no question which will come before this House in which the people of Canada are more interested than one affecting the Militia of the country. If we are to maintain the country which our forefathers conquered, and which was preserved by them in several battles, at Chateaugay, Lundy's Lane, Queenston Heights, and Stoney Creek, we must see that the spirit that animated our forefathers is properly and scientifically directed. What to us is this immense country, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific; what are these lines of railroads which we are building, those immense prairies, if the spirit which animated our forefathers does not remain in the breasts of their undegenerate sons, and we are not willing to defend this country with our lives? As I know that spirit animates the whole population of the country, it is the duty of the representatives of our country, to see that that spirit, when the time comes, receives a scientific direction. In the light of this, this correspondence which has been moved for by my hon. friend from York

(Mr. Mulock) becomes of interest to us, and, perhaps, it will be expedient to give an account of this eventful day, the 20th September, in which the accusations have been hurled, some on one side and some on the other, some against the gallant General who commanded on that occasion, some against the Lieut.-Colonel who commanded the gallant regiment, and other officers on that day. My present intention is to show that the gallant General who commanded on that day, an officer loaned to us by the Imperial authorities, performed his duty, and solely his duty. His history in the past shows him to be a gallant soldier, and the experience which he has had in England shows that he, at least, ought to be well qualified for the situation. He is an officer who graduated from one of the best military institutions in Europe; he took his commission from Sandhurst. By gallant experience in the Crimea and in China, he showed that he was a soldier, and one of the right stuff; perhaps, as the accounts in the papers which I have had the opportunity of seeing show he was one of the most gallant soldiers amongst the most gallant troops in the world, because you will recollect that the troops in the Crimea were composed half of French and half of English, and he gallantly distinguished himself there. His experience in England shows that he ought to be particularly useful in the direction of a volunteer force in this country. He not only had this experience in the Crimea, and China, and India, and in several foreign countries, but he was Assistant Inspector-General of Militia in England, and when temporarily on half pay he was Adjutant of one of the militia regiments in England. No one that I ever heard of found any complaint with the gallant General when he was serving his Queen and country in all these different parts of the world. It is only when he comes to Canada that complaint is found against him, and particularly about his bearing on the 20th September last. What are the facts of the case? He goes to the camp at Cobourg, and finds troops which he had found two years ago to be pretty fair, but which had relaxed in discipline so that they were not what they had been two years before. He finds, too, that some of the companies consist of only four men, and one of the complaints made against the gallant officer is on account of his swaggering and bullying style. He rides up to this person who is marching forward with four men. He was astonished. He asked what it was. The officer replies: I am Captain so-and-so, and this is company so-and-so. Captain, he says, where is your company? He points past a Sergeant and Corporal, and shows one man to the right there. The General stops and views the company, looks at them and sees that the fire which, as my hon. friend says, animates the whole militia of the Province, is in that single company. He pays a great deal of attention to them, and, after reviewing them, he orders them to form fours right, and dismisses them. The company was formed into line and marched off. Then comes the wonderful display of bravery which occurred on that day, and which the General was found fault with for criticising too severely. There was a field day, and the gallant 46th, commanded by my friend, Lieut.-Colonel Williams, was one of the most distinguished regiments on the field. They had been ordered to attack the position of the enemy, as reported by the Port Hope Times, they were marching in echelon battalions, firing as they advanced. There was a gallant Colonel of the Cobourg Cavalry—I think it was—who was placed too far to the left, and the polish which was on the helmet and pipe clay of the halberd did not receive sufficient attention; he was too far from the admiring crowd surrounding the flag-staff, and he thought his cavalry was not showing off to the best advantage, so he galloped up between two lines for the purpose of getting near the flag-staff. It may have been some military stroke of genius which raised the Colonel, and certainly the genius of the Lieut.-Colonel of the 46th came in there. He not only had been posted thoroughly in modern tactics, but had evidently been reading the description of ancient battles. He had been reading, likely, Aytoun's description of the battle of Killioranky, and the moment the troops came in front of him he took advantage of the position and ordered his men to cease firing and to fling themselves flat on the ground. After the Cobourg cavalry passed by, there was no troops to be seen. As I said, the genius of the officer came in there. Down they crouched, like the Highlanders on the hills at the battle of Killiecrankie—

"Down they crouched amidst the Bracken
Till the Lowland troops drew near,
Panting like the hounds in summer
Till they scent the stately deer."

After the cavalry got passed, and when the enemy appeared in view, you ought to have seen these gentlemen start from their lair. Didn't they rush upon the enemy with a cry which the 18th Royal Irish might envy? And at the head of them was the Lieut.-Colonel, his sword flashing in the air. I will not go on describing the battle, as, perhaps, I would not be capable of describing it properly. Now, let us come to the luncheon of the evening. The General states that among the delinquencies of my hon. friend from East Durham (Lieut.-Colonel Williams) was the fact that he arrived late at lunch. That is an unpardonable offence for an officer. When his superior officer was at luncheon with him he ought, at least, to have arrived in time. Another unpardonable offence was that the conversation turned in the direction of the House of Commons, and, as my hon. friend from Ottawa County (Mr. Wright) has related, there was a gallant Colonel, an Aide-de-camp of the Queen, presiding over this distinguished company, who made some disparaging remarks against the House of Commons on military matters. We all know how that hon. gentleman comes to be an authority upon military matters. We have the military history of that gentleman—how he distinguished himself in several strategical manoeuvres along the Grand Trunk Railway here, and how, after a distinguished career in which, as an hon. gentleman suggests, he shed the blood of his sires, he finally arrived at a position to make him capable of performing the high and onerous duty of a responsible officer in the Canadian militia, and was at length advanced to the high position of Aide-de-camp to Her Majesty the Queen, an honour for which, I am sure, the whole Canadian militia, and the whole Canadian people, feel deeply grateful to Her Majesty. He had stated at this assembly that the opinion of the House of Commons—I do not know, but in fact on every other question as well as on military questions—was not worth ten cents. Thereupon Lieut.-Col. Williams disputed that Col. Gzowski was an authority, or if he made any such statement it should be taken without any criticism upon it. The gallant gentleman who commands the Forces of the country knows that the first duty of a soldier is obedience; he had been taught it, as the hon. member for Ottawa says, by the remarks of the gallant Minister of War, and by the gallant Colonel here in the former debate upon Col. Ross. He said political questions should be laid aside, and that the hon. members of this House should remember that the first duty of every soldier is obedience. This was a great breach of discipline on Col. Williams' part, who dared to defy this high authority, the Aide-de-camp to the Queen, who dared to take the part of the House of Commons upon the question. The Major-General being an old soldier, and knowing nothing about politics, followed his line of duty; his business was to see that the opinions of an Aide-de-camp to the Queen were respected, and he very properly corrected Col. Williams, and said to him that as Col. Gzowski had expressed an opinion upon that subject, that was sufficient for him, and that no political discussion should take place at the mess; that the very fact of Col. Gzowski having expressed an opinion was enough for him and ought to be enough for Col. Williams. Col. Williams took advantage of his position as a member of Parliament to make a complaint to the Government. He says the Major-General said that was not the duty of a member of Parliament nor of a gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps I am giving a wrong interpretation to it; the Secretary of State will be more correctly informed as to the statement. The General stated that he remained at Cobourg for a day or two afterwards, and that if Col. Williams was offended there was open to him the course as between one gentleman and another—he was there: or that, as a junior officer, he could take the course which is provided by the rules and regulations of the Army, and if he chose to take that course, he had the military channels, through which to make his complaint. Lieut.-Colonel Williams did not take this course. He did not go over to see the Major-General and make the requisite explanation to him, but he took the course of sending a complaint directly to Ottawa, which ought to have been sent through the Major-General's hands. The Major-General justly complains of such a course as that. He says it is extraordinary conduct; that if in the privacy of social gatherings a gentleman, because he happens to be a member of Parliament, is permitted afterwards to bring to the notice of Government what occurred at that gathering, the question will naturally arise whether, in any society where a member of Parliament is present, he might not make similar complaints. But I will give you the exact words of the Major-General:

"Extraordinary conduct. If, in the privacy of social gatherings, a member of Parliament is surrounded with privileges which permit of his afterwards bringing to the notice of Government what has taken place, will it be possible for gentlemen to meet in society with confidence so long as a member of Parliament is present."

The gallant General says afterwards:

"Most certainly I would not attend any meeting at which a gentleman was present who availed himself of any such privileges as that."

Now, I think it is pretty hard lines if an old gentleman—a kindly old gentleman, I believe he is, in private life, a gallant soldier who has distinguished himself in several engagements, who has served in every part of the Empire—should come here and have fault found with him, and for what? Because at a little conversation at luncheon he rebuked a Lieut.-Colonel who happened to be a member of Parliament because he differed from Col. Gzowski, an Aide-de-camp to the Queen. It is hard that an old gentleman who has so distinguished himself should be so persecuted that he should have to ask for leave of absence for the purpose of withdrawing from this country. Now I say that there has been no General who has ever commanded the forces in Canada, so far as I can learn, who has done more to discipline the Force than Major-General Luard. Instead of adopting the swaggering, bullying tone that the hon. member for Ottawa talks about, he comes up and talks to you in your face, as a soldier should do. He speaks out sternly to them and tells them to do this or that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I must correct the hon. gentleman. I gave my authority. I know nothing of the circumstances myself. The hon. gentleman did not give his authority, but he read from an article where he was accused of doing that.

Mr. HAGGART. I read from the Mail newspaper. Perhaps he speaks in a commanding tone, to which the officers are unaccustomed. Perhaps he does not understand the genius of the people. Are we a lot of Yankees to whom he should say: Will you be kind and condescending enough to do this, and that and I will be under a great compliment to you? No, he is an officer and a soldier, and the general opinion throughout Militia circles over the whole country is that he has done more efficient service for the Force than any officer who preceded him. The trouble which he has taken and the boldness he has displayed as an officer and a soldier in doing his duty to his Government and his Queen, in speaking out boldly, and where anything was wrong saying it was wrong, encouraging those who wanted encouragement and rebuking those who were unsoldierlike, are matters which will cause him to be long remembered in this country; and the people will always give credit to the soldier who does his duty, who sees that the officers and men under his command are kept up to the regulations, and who uses every possible means to make the Militia efficient, so that they may be ready when required. They will remember him, and remember that he did his duty, when they have forgotten commanding officers who have preceded him, and whose principal duty seemed to be to tell his troops that this was the finest regiment he ever reviewed and that no troops he ever saw in his life excelled them. It is a most difficult duty, at any rate, that the General Commanding Officer of the Canadian Militia has to perform. Our Militia contains some as efficient and able officers as are to be found in any Force in the world. All of us have read the speeches delivered by a certain gallant Colonel who commands a regiment which we have here at the opening and closing of the House, and which we are all proud of, and we gather outside to watch their martial bearing when they come along, marching to the beat of the drum. Then there is another Colonel. He was over in Europe a few years ago, and had an opportunity of witnessing reviews of the troops of the different military nations of the continent. When he returned he paid his regiment the compliment, that the European troops were very similar to his own. We have another gallant Colonel in this city who commands another gallant regiment. He has leisure time enough to devote himself to a high course of study in strategy and the campaigns of the Duke of Wellington. Then we have a celebrated Colonel who is Aide-de-camp to Her Majesty—Colonel Gzowski. So we can all see the difficulty that a plain soldier like General Luard experienced in coming here to direct such a scientific corps as that which we have in this country. Let me make a comparison between the state of efficiency of the Militia of this country and that of our Navy. A few moments ago I observed Commander Fortin in his seat. Let us see how men in the navy have learnt that the first duty is obedience; when an order comes from a superior they at once obey it. On one of the little excursions down the river St. Lawrence, Commander Fortin, of the Canadian Navy, was on board. While going down the river the men had a line run out aft for the purpose of catching fish. They hooked a porpoise. On hauling it on board the steamer Commander Fortin said it was a shark. The men all thought it was a porpoise; but the Commander said it was a shark, and ever from that day to this, wherever the broad pennant of the Canadian Navy floats, a porpoise is known as a shark. I draw attention to this incident to show the value of obedience. That is the way Col. Williams should have looked at the matter at luncheon. Colonel Williams was there as Lieutenant-Colonel of the gallant 46th. Whatever might be said, his first duty was obedience. Col. Gzowski might have been right or might have been wrong, but Colonel Williams should not have ventured an opinion on the subject. That is what I call true military discipline. I have nothing more to say on this interesting subject further than this: an old General has gone from us. He has a good military record in the Imperial service; the people with whom he is acquainted will remember his kindness; the Militia Force will acknowledge that he was a soldier and did his duty; and after all this political fuss has past away, he will be remembered by the Militia Force for his kindness and for his soldier-like qualities and for having impressed on the Militia Force that the chief duty of a soldier is to obey his commanding officer.

Mr. MACMASTER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that this subject has come before the House. Evidently it was the intention of the hon. member for East Durham that after the end required to be subserved for the Service had been attained, the matter should be allowed to drop. Nevertheless, it has been the desire of some hon. members to bring it before the House, and as it has been so brought, it becomes our duty to discuss it in a temperate spirit. A great deal in the way of joke and jest has been said in regard to this subject. I do not object to anything of that kind, but the question has a serious side to it, and although it is always very pleasing to hear a speech by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright), and it is presumed in this House that when he speaks the occasion is the best show of the season, yet there may be other considerations than extending sympathy to the hon. member for East Durham, on which comment may be fairly made. I regret, on this occasion, he ventured to trot out a dead horse and rake up some imaginary grievances he had in connection with another officer of Militia. I do not wish to say anything which might appear disparaging to the gallant Major-General with regard to this matter. In fact, if the Major-General had heard the speeches delivered in this House, he might have truly said: Save me from my friends. There is quite enough in the record of the Major-General to enable the House to look upon the matter now before it in a thoroughly impartial spirit. I regret, however, that the hon. member for Ottawa County while discussing this subject should have interjected two other subjects thoroughly alien to it. One was the subject which occupied the attention of the House a few days ago, and on which, with great liberality, we undertook to dispense on certain terms a large sum of money. I came to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman had intended to speak on that subject, and that because he had no opportunity, or for some other reason, he did not speak in that debate and that, therefore, he has thought it proper to interpolate his remarks in this discussion. The other was the reference he made to the interest he had in a gallant Militia officer who, he thought, had not been fairly treated in this House. The hon. gentleman said that he did not think that his opportunity of repaying the hon. member for East Durham would come so soon, and it would therefore appear the hon. member was quietly watching for some opportunity to bring to the notice of the House something which might be amusing to hon. members and by which he might, at the same time, get even with—I believe that was the expression he used—the hon. member for Durham.

Mr. WRIGHT. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I never used such an expression. Those words are the hon. gentleman's own words.

Mr. MACMASTER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not use the identical expression, but substantially he took the position that his friend had been injured in a previous discussion, and that he did not think that an opportunity would have come so soon of giving the hon. member for East Durham a quid pro quo. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is in that view of the case, a little of the element of revenge—something which is not quite like the hon. member for Ottawa County. I think I may apply to him, on this occasion, the language of a poet of whom he is no doubt an ardent admirer—I mean Lord Byron:—

“Sweet is revenge—especially to women,
Pillage to soldiers, prize-money to seamen.”

Though revenge is sweet I did not think that it would prove quite so attractive to the hon. member for Ottawa County, that he should rub it to such an extent into the gallant Colonel who represents East Durham. But we all know so well the excellent qualities of the hon. member for Ottawa, we are all so greatly pleased to hear him address this House with so much ability and pleasantry, that we could thoroughly understand that good feeling was underlying his remarks, and that the hon. member for East Durham has no warmer friend or greater admirer than the hon. member for Ottawa County. Now, what is this all about? The hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) said truly that the hon. member for East Durham was a gallant officer and knew his duty as a military man. But how did this discussion originate. We find that on a certain day a tragic event took place in the Town of Cobourg. I will not attempt to describe that event, as my hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Haggart) has described it much better than I could. The day was an eventful day—a historic day—the 20th of September, the anniversary of the battle of the Alma. It is no wonder that the Major-General imagined that he should carry out his military ideas with greater stringency than on ordinary occasions. From one end of the country to the other we find that the press, which represents the feeling and the experience of the country—experience which was based not merely on the inspection held that day in Cobourg, but the inspections held at all the other camps—represented that the Major-General on that occasion lost his temper, and used language which certainly could be called profane; that he damned and jeered at the officers, and otherwise so deported himself, whether rightly or wrongly according to military laws, as utterly to destroy the otherwise good effects of his Major-Generalship. We find that in the mess-room he engaged himself in a dispute with certain officers with regard to the speeches of the members of the House of Commons on military subjects. I think, to say the least of it, that is a subject which he should have avoided. However, in that discussion he came in conflict with Col. Williams, who resented the attack he made on the members of the House of Commons. I think in this connection I may be permitted to give the testimony of a paper, the Port Hope Guide which said:

“Col. Williams is deserving of praise for the manly stand taken by him.”

The press from one end of the country to the other justified Col. Williams for the stand he took on that occasion in defence of members of the House of Commons, and in resenting what cannot be characterised otherwise than as a gratuitous insult to members of this House. I do not think however it is one which is worthy of further notice from this House. I do not think it is necessary that Major-General Luard should be brought to the bar of the House, but I say that the attack was an indiscreet one, and should not have been made.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACMASTER. I closed my former remarks by the enquiry, what was the whole discussion about? What was it that the hon. member for East Durham did to justify the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock), in bringing this matter to the attention of the House? Now, it turns out, that the hon. member for East Durham, brought to the notice of the Government certain occurrences of a public nature in connection with the public inspection of the Volunteer Militia Force at the town of Cobourg. In so bringing the matter to the notice of the Government, the hon. gentleman transmitted a copy of a newspaper, circumstantially setting out certain things which were alleged by way of misconduct against the Major-General. Col. Williams did not make specific charges—it was not for him to make charges against an officer of the Imperial Service; he did not assume the responsibility of making such charges; but he simply called the attention of the Government and of the Governor General to certain matters which had become of public notoriety in connection with the officer commanding the Militia Force of this country. That was all the hon. gentleman did. The Major-General at once constituted the hon. member for East Durham a complainant, a prosecutor, and he demanded that he should specify his charges. Sir, these charges were specified in the public press of the country. The paper containing them was communicated to the Secretary of State, and, with Col. Williams' letter, was communicated to the Major-General commanding the Forces. After these charges were so communicated, what course did the Major-General take? He did not meet the public issue, he did not meet what was the substance of the communication of the hon. member for East Durham—not that he had a personal grievance, but that the Force was being injured and demoralized by the course of conduct pursued by the Major-General. The Major-General responded, and endeavoured to turn the whole affair into a personal quarrel, a personal difficulty, a personal contest, between Col. Williams and himself. He evaded the main issue, that the Service was being demoralized, and he wished to engage in what practically amounted to a private quarrel with Col. Williams. Well, the hon. member for East Durham replied. He said: This is no affair of mine; I have nothing to do with this matter personally; I speak as a member of the Canadian Militia, as a man interested in the public affairs of this country, and I represent to the Government of this country that the Militia Force is being disorganized by a want of discipline, by displays of temper, lack of judgment, and lack of tact on the part of the chief officer commanding the Forces in this country. That was the position taken by the hon. member for East Durham. He had no quarrel with the Major-General; he had no cause for quarrel with him. There were only two possible causes of a quarrel. The first was: Did the Major-General make any charge against him in connection with his services as an officer? Not at all; because the Major-General, in a letter addressed, a few days afterwards, to the Globe newspaper, of Toronto, spoke as follows in reference to Col. Williams:

Mr. MACMASTER.

“I hope a difference of opinion on a matter which need not be introduced into this note, may not interfere with the friendly feelings I entertain towards this valuable Militia officer.”

So we have the Major-General's testimony that Col. Williams is a “valuable Militia officer.” Neither was there any personal quarrel between the hon. member for East Durham and the Major-General, in connection with the affront that was offered to the House of Commons. Why? Because at the mess at which the difference of opinion occurred, the hon. member for East Durham had resented, and resented properly, and with becoming dignity, the reproach that was there offered to the House of Commons by the Major-General, in placing the opinions of this House on Militia matters at the low value of ten cents. I think the Major-General should not have endorsed that remark if he was a prudent man. He is absent to night, although he is not without able representatives on the floor of this House; and I do not wish to do the slightest injustice to that officer, who holds a high position in the Service of the Mother Country; but I do say that to comment on the remarks of hon. members in this House and to place them at the low value of ten cents, was something that a gentleman holding the high Commission of Major-General in the Imperial Army should have refrained from making. The Major-General, in reply to the statements made by Col. Williams, set up two or three matters that had nothing in the world to do with the public consideration of this question. One of the petty matters which he set up was that Col. Williams had been too late for lunch. Well, we all appreciate that Col. Williams, in being a minute and a-half late in coming to lunch, committed a very grave offence. But the Major-General, in his answer to Col. Williams, cast a grave reflection on the members of the House of Commons. This was a second reflection. Have the members of this House any regard for their own dignity? Have they any self respect? I submit the following statements, and let hon. members consider for themselves. The Major-General says :

"To me it appears that Lieut.-Col. Williams has taken advantage of his privileges, in the capacity of a member of Parliament, to bring to notice an article relating to himself in his capacity as an officer of Militia."

Now, that statement is inadvertently incorrect. What Col. Williams did bring to the notice of the Government was, not an article relating to himself, but a matter in which the public press of the country had commented adversely on the public conduct of the Major-General. So that the Major-General's attempt to make it appear that Col. Williams had referred to himself, is a complete displacement of the controversy between those two gentlemen.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a point of order. I would like to know what the hon. gentleman is reading from. Is it something which is before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not read from any document without placing it on the Table of the House.

Mr. MACMASTER. I shall be delighted to place it on the Table of the House. The Major-General says :

"That his conduct, which seems to be extraordinary, and naturally leads to the question, if, in the privacy of a social gathering, a member of Parliament is surrounded by privileges which permit of his afterwards bringing to the notice of the Government what has taken place, will it be impossible for gentlemen to meet in society with confidence, so long as a member of Parliament is present."

The Major-General makes an insinuation against members of Parliament. He might have had, according to his own view, a cause for quarrel with the hon. member for East Durham, but he went beyond that. He does not even say this is not applicable to members of Parliament in general, but he pointedly and broadly makes the insinuation that members of Parliament may not, with confidence, be met in the social relations of life, by reason of their privileges as such. I do not think any member of Parliament ever claimed any such privilege. The hon. member for East Durham, in bringing this matter to the notice of the Government, did not claim that privilege. What he did was to voice the universal sentiment of this country, expressed from one end to the other, not in the press of any political party in particular, but in the press of both of the great political parties of this country, that the Major-General, notwithstanding his distinguished military services—and I am willing to admit there was a conscientiousness in his devotion to his duties—he so performed those duties as to completely destroy the efficacy of his endeavours in the interests of the Militia of our country. We find, further, that the Major-General said :

"I remained at Cobourg until the following day, and Col. Williams might, if offended with me, have found me, and I would have been glad to have afforded him explanation, either as between one gentleman and another, or as between two officers, the junior offended with the senior."

What is the meaning of these words? Was the hon. member for East Durham, whose record for twenty years in connection with the Militia Force of this country is entirely beyond cavil, was my hon. friend who came to this country not yesterday, but who grew up with and has been for years connected with the Volunteer Force and obtained a distinguished position as Colonel of a battalion—was he to know for what cause Major-General remained over from one day to another at a hotel in the town of Cobourg? Later, a communication is made by the General stating that he was there. For what purpose? To give the explanation that one private gentleman might give to another—he intimates, therefore, that an explanation should be given—or to give a further explanation—which might be interpreted in another sense if we were to strain the words in this connection—that one military gentleman might give to another, the junior offended with the senior. Is this an appeal to "the Christless code that must have life for a blow?" I hope I shall not have to come to the conclusion that the Imperial officer, representing all that is great and illustrious in the army of the Mother Country, did loiter twenty-four hours about the town of Cobourg, until the hon. member for East Durham, who did not know the cause of his remaining there, should send him a challenge to meet in mortal combat. Surely the suppressed belligerent tone, the unexplained conduct of the Major-General, are not to be commended by the members of this House. But if that be the construction to be put on the document, I ask every hon. member of this House, I ask my hon. military friend from Muskoka, who has, I have no doubt, been "out" several times himself—I ask him if it is not a violation of the law regulating the discipline of the Army and Navy, for an officer to insinuate or suggest anything in the nature of a duel. Had the Major-General thrown off this cloud of mystery involved in his remaining around Cobourg, had he communicated, as gentlemen and officers do with one another, his desire for blood, his wish to meet the hon. member for East Durham in mortal conflict, I am sure that the hon. gentleman, who has so frequently whipped into line the majority in this House, would not have failed on that occasion. But Mr. Speaker, what have hon. members to do with this private difficulty? The hon. member for Ottawa, with that happiness that always characterizes him in debate, has given us the pleasant side of this discussion and has thrown in a large subsidy of truth under the cover of comicality. He is always right. This is not a joke, for the King can do no wrong. But we see involved, on the serious side of this discussion—what? The honour of Parliament, which no man would be more ready to maintain than the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright). We see more; we see involved in it the honour of our Militia Force, which has not hesitated to come to the front when real and serious duty is to be performed. What was the history of this country in 1866, when a foreign invasion was on our shores? Who were first at the front, giving their services and lives in the defence of their country? I appeal to every hon. member whether the 13th Battalion of Hamilton and the "Queen's Own," from Toronto were not ahead of the regular Forces of the Empire by twenty-four hours, and the first to engage with the enemy. From one end of the country to the other, irrespective of nationality or politics, for in the defence of our country we have no politics, the Militia Forces of this country, under the guidance and the instruction and the leadership of the patriotic men who have undertaken to bring them to efficiency, have always been ready to render that duty to the country which they owe to it, and to conduct themselves in a manner worthy the traditions of British arms. I do not think that the officers and men of this Force should be wantonly jeered at—I will not use the strong term, insulted—I think there should have been moderation in the remarks of the Major-General. The Queen's Regulations require that officers commanding forces should demean themselves with civility and respect toward those forces, and it is no part of the duty of the General commanding to walk up to officers commanding regiments, or even to officers commanding companies, and to "damn" or jeer at them. That conduct may have suited under the old regime, but it has no part of the present regime. What say the Queen's Regulations:

"Courtesy among military men is indispensable to discipline. Commanding officers should not only bear this in mind, but they should inculcate the principle in those they command."

I leave it to you, whether the epithets actually used—of course I have no personal knowledge of the matter, but I take it for granted that what all say must be true—I leave it to you whether language of the character attributed to the Major-General was of a character to improve the discipline of the Militia. I detract in no respect from the honourable services of the Major-General in war. No doubt he rendered noble services to his country before coming here, but we are not here to pass judgment on that. We concede all that, but what we are called to pass judgment on is, whether his acts or deeds were of such a character as to injure our military forces. Only that and nothing more. Anything more we may concede, but with that alone we have to deal. On that point, unfortunately, there is a consensus of opinion, from Halifax to Port Moody. The Major-General, through an infirmity of temper, has not so conducted himself as to promote the efficiency of our Forces. That much must be conceded. It is to that that the hon. member for East Durham wished to call the attention of the proper authorities, and it is to that I would point. I do not know if it was the duty of the Canadian Government to institute an enquiry. I believe that the Major-General commanding is an Imperial officer. Perhaps it was beyond the power of this Government to institute an enquiry, but whether they instituted an enquiry or not, my hon. friend says that the Major-General has left this country on leave of absence without trial. I am not aware whether we have the right to try him or not, but this I conceive, that the Government of this country had the right, when they found there was a general opinion among our Volunteer Forces, that his usefulness had practically ended, to make such representations as would lead to his retirement. There is nothing I can see that is more regrettable than for a man to retire under a cloud. The hon. member for East Durham, like the true and hon. gentleman that he is, did not press this matter as a persecutor. He let it stand, and left the universal testimony prevailing in this country to bring conviction to the officer commanding the Forces, and in due time General Luard asked leave and received leave to retire and did retire, and I believe is not to return. I am sure every hon. gentleman wishes the Major-General success in his future career. We wish that he may be transferred to those scenes where his temper may not be irritated by the frail performances of patriotic men, who give their service to this their native or their adopted country for very small considerations; who at great personal inconvenience, from year to year, come out to do that drill which many other laggards avoid; who are ready at all times to render their services to their country; and that he may be transferred to a sphere with which he is no doubt more familiar, for which he is more qualified, and where he may engage in that active service in which, I have no doubt, he will attain, and I hope he will attain, that distinction which awaits all gallant officers of Her Majesty's Service. Mr. Speaker, as I said, it is regrettable that this subject came up for discussion, and I do not intend to detain the House longer in the remarks I intended to address to it. Having come up, it was necessary to refer to it to a limited extent. I hope I have said nothing—I am sure I did not desire to say anything—to reflect in terms, beyond what the necessities of the case required upon the conduct of the Major-General; but, when the conduct of my hon. friend from East Durham was put in the balance, when it was represented in this House that the controversy now engaging its attention was not the question of the conduct of the Major-General, but, as was sarcastically said, the trials and tribulations of the hon. member for East Durham, then it becomes hon. members of this House to investigate the question, to weigh it carefully and calmly, and to see where the blame should be apportioned. I see on one side a gentleman who is retiring from the service, who is retiring to the Mother Country for reasons it is unnecessary to discuss further, and on the other side the hon. member for East Durham who has been an officer for over twenty years in the Militia Force of this country, who rendered not merely holiday service but active service, whose character as a military officer is recognized by the Major-General himself, who had no personal part or lot in this quarrel, and who is entitled to the vindication of the hon. members of this House. When that vindication came—not by persecution, not by prosecuting to trial the Major-General who had become his temporary opponent in this matter, when the result came about that naturally flowed from the proceedings I have referred to—what did Col. Williams do? He withdrew his letter, not his charge. Like a true gentleman, he said: The end being attained, I have no desire to press or harass any individual, and I therefore will let the matter rest. The bringing up of this matter is no act of his; it originates elsewhere. I do not pretend to characterize the propriety or impropriety of bringing it up before this House; I only say I regret it should have been brought up; but whether hon. gentlemen may regret it or not, this must be perfectly apparent, that my hon. friend from East Durham, whether you regard him in his military character or in his character as a member of this House, has but echoed the universal sentiment of the people of this country with regard to this subject. Furthermore, I think I have only to appeal to the hon. members of this House, to those who are familiar with my hon. friend, year in and year out, not only to those who know that he enjoys the confidence of the great political party with which he is connected, and who know that he enjoys the confidence of the chiefs of that party, but to our hon. friends opposite, with whom he has had to come in contact frequently, in order to secure their and our testimony to one common verdict, that it is impossible to conceive of any set of circumstances in which my hon. friend from East Durham would be untrue to himself or untrue to the grand old name of gentleman.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hastings). It is only my intention to say a few words upon the subject now before the House, as I am suffering from a very severe bronchial affection, which renders it not only painful for me to speak, but an effort to make myself heard; but I think, as we are told that Major-General Luard has left this country to reside in England, it is only due to the people of Canada that his successor, whoever he may be, should be made aware of what the people here, and particularly the volunteers, expect at his hands, and that at least a little more courtesy should be extended to them than was done by that officer. When the Imperial troops were withdrawn from this country many years ago, and we were left to our own resources, we were told we had plenty of loyal and brave and hardy young men who would form themselves into a Volunteer Force and afford to us the same protection that we had received from the Imperial troops, and who would defend our homes and our borders from those who were hostile to us. This announcement had scarcely more than been made by the Imperial Government, the fiat had only gone forth, when we found hundreds and thousands, not only of young men willing to defend their country, but of middle-aged men and those who had already seen service, who were prepared to band themselves together as one man into a Volunteer Force, and who not only manned the companies but officered them, and completed the battalions and the batteries, and have given to us that of which we have just reason to feel proud, not only one of the most efficient Volunteer Forces, but one of the most excellent Volunteer systems that exist in any part of the globe. Well do I remember, in the section of country in which I live, when the 15th Argyle Light Infantry was organized, of which I was a member, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Campbell, an excellent officer, and a brother of our Minister of Justice, how quickly the men responded to the call and filled up the ranks. We had good men volunteering as officers, and we had more than our complement of men, so that there was not a place left in the ranks for those who were anxious to become members of the battalion. I was placed on that occasion in the very anomalous position of being promoted from the position of Ensign to that of Sergeant, not through any dereliction of duty on my part, but because a gentleman was desirous of becoming a Lieutenant of our company, and our Lieutenant very kindly suggested to me that, if I would take the Sergeancy of the company, he would take the Ensigney. I did not know much about military matters in those days, and I conceded to his request, but it was not long before I learned that there was a great distinction between an officer and a non-commissioned officer; and, did I not salute my Ensign in due and ancient form, the probabilities are, that I would have gone to the guard-house. We have in the County of Hastings two excellent battalions, the 49th, which was commanded by Lieut.-Col. Brown, who sat for many years in this House, and was an old and tried officer—and by the way, I might say, it was by certain deeds of heroism and valour that my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Bowell) succeeded in earning the distinction he now enjoys of commanding that battalion as Lieut.-Col.—and the 15th Argyle Light Infantry commanded by Col. Lazier, a very excellent and indefatigable officer. And I would say en passant to my friend, the hon. Minister of Militia, that I hope when the Estimates come down he will not forget us, as we are very sadly in need of a drill shed in our county. Now, Sir, amid the very hard knocks and, I may say, exposure to the broiling sun in learning the goose step as a member of the awkward squad myself, and subsequently in drilling the members of that squad, and perfecting myself as far as I could in military knowledge, I eventually succeeded in obtaining the position of Captain of my company. Subsequently I went down and passed my examination before the Military Board at Kingston, securing first and second class certificates, and though not now an active member of the Volunteer Force, I feel very proud of those certificates. Now, it is a very significant and well known fact that until the time that General Luard took command of the Forces in Canada we never heard a word of dissatisfaction or discontent of any kind, there were no complaints. The men were proud of their battalions, they endeavoured to attain efficiency in drill, and looked forward with a great deal of pleasure to inspection day. They expected on that occasion, to make as presentable an appearance as possible, after the very limited time placed at their disposal for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of their drill. But we find that instead of receiving encouragement and a kindly word at the hands of the inspecting officer, they were very often treated, not only unkindly but harshly, and even insultingly. Now, a commanding officer may be a strict disciplinarian, he may pride himself upon being, even, a martinet; he may be imperious, haughty and proud, but he should not forget that this is, comparatively, a new country; that we are to a great extent novices in military matters, and we expect to be treated, if not as gentlemen, certainly as men, and not as menials or serfs. Now who are the volunteers in this country? Who comprise the Volunteer Force of Canada? Why, Sir, we ourselves, our sons, our brothers, and our nephews—and I was going to say, in the words of the opera, "our sisters, our cousins, and our aunts," because I believe they are as loyal and as patriotic as we are. How often do you see the sons of the officers of battalions holding positions in the ranks? The ranks are filled up by the sons of professional men, by the artisan, the mechanic and the labouring man—all anxious to do their duty, and to secure what distinction they can, and to take their chances for promotion. Now, from the time that the grand old United Empire Loyalists, true to their allegiance, and standing by the good old flag, despite privations and conditions, were driven from the neighbouring Republic to the wilds and wildernesses of Canada, who hewed out for themselves and their families a home in the forest, amid great hardships and trials, and gave to us as a heritage—this great Dominion of ours—down to 1812-14, to 1837-38, and to 1866, when our young men left their desks and counting houses and their places of business, and many of our loyal young men, even, who were occupying positions of trust and emolument in the United States, came forward to defend our borders. From that time down, even to this present day, a spirit of loyalty has animated the breasts of every Canadian and of every Canadian volunteer. It is our duty to do all we can for the purpose of encouraging our Volunteer Force. We should not put any obstacle in their way, we should not check their enthusiasm, but we should endeavour to do what we can to make them proud of themselves, proud of their battalion, and proud of their country. We may hope that the time will come when war will be no more upon this earth, when the desire for territorial aggrandizement and for the acquisition of a few additional acres of land—when a dispute about the navigation of a certain river or the menace or insult to a subject—will be submitted to the arbitration and award of some of the great nations; and when, Sir, instead of depleting our exchequers, and decimating our population, and making thousands of widows and orphans, the sword will be turned into the pruning hook, and all our superfluous population will be sent to our great North-West, where there are thousands of acres of arable and tillable land awaiting cultivation and ready to receive them and supply them with homes. But until that time does come, I am satisfied that should our country require the services of our noble volunteers, when the bugle shall sound they will be ready to answer to the roll call, and to defend not only our rights, but our homes and our firesides, with their lives, if necessary. I trust that the gentleman who is sent out here as the successor of Major-General Luard will be one, not only suitable for the military interests of the country, but that he will also be congenial to the feelings of the volunteers.

Mr. COURSOL. I would not have said a word upon this occasion were it not for an expression that was used by the mover of this motion. In alluding to the member for East Durham, he said he was sorry the gallant Colonel had acted as a sort of reporter, and that in doing so his conduct was not such as it ought to have been, either for a gentleman or for an officer.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to correct the hon. member; I used no such language. I say that it was intimated in the correspondence, which I was forbidden to read, that the hon. member for East Durham had communicated to the press certain information that had been embodied in the report; but I added, as my own opinion, that I believed he was too much of a gentleman to do any such thing.

Mr. COURSOL. I am very glad to hear the correction. I heard the word reporter used, and I thought it was used in that sense. I am sorry, Sir, that General Luard is now on his way to England; I am sorry he has left our shores before this discussion came on, as I would have been pleased had he been present in the gallery this evening. He would have heard the highest eulogiums passed on his services, he would have heard hon. gentlemen mention his name in terms of the highest praise on account of his military attainments and his brave conduct on the field of battle. But, Sir, as a brave man himself, he would also, doubtless, have heard without offence, some severe criticisms made on his conduct as General commanding the volunteers of Canada. Now, Sir, there is a fact which cannot be denied, either in this House or out of it, nor yet by the press, and that is, that the whole Volunteer Force of Canada, and nearly the entire press, agree in stating that General Luard was not the right man to command our Volunteer Forces. General Luard,

I know, is a gentleman of high military attainments, who has distinguished himself no less on the field of battle than as a soldier in time of peace, and I would by no means detract one iota from his high reputation in this regard. General Luard was not the first man who had those duties to perform. Other Generals, equally distinguished with himself, have occupied the same position, but never before did the Volunteer Force complain of such language and such conduct; never before did commanding officers dare to insult the Volunteer Force, or insult its officers, who were gentlemen, their equal in every respect. General Williams, the hero of Kars, had charge of the Force for a long time, and during a most memorable event, that of the Trent affair, and everyone praised his conduct towards the volunteers. General Windham had command of the volunteers also. General Ross, Sir Patrick McDougald, General Sydney Smythe and others had the same duties to perform, and no complaints were made. They were strict disciplinarians, and yet at the same time they had the esteem of the entire Volunteer Force of the country. And why did not General Luard have it? Because his manners were not becoming, because on many occasions he forgot himself; he spoke of the volunteers as if they were men coming from the Soudan, as if they were men who were forced to do their duty and take the shilling every day. He did not know enough to make a distinction between citizen soldiers and ordinary men, who seek to be enrolled for the pay they receive. I know well this, that if General Luard was commanding the Militia in England, the proud sons of Albion would not bear such language for one moment; he would not dare to speak in England as he spoke to the volunteers in Canada, and I hope this is the last time England will send an officer who will treat the volunteers of this country as he has done. What did Col. Williams do on this occasion in question? He was at the mess dinner which was presided over by General Luard. The General used expressions which should not have been used before subalterns. If they had been used before officers of the same rank, and not in uniform, he would have had to retract his words. What business had he to insult members of the House of Commons; and why should Col. Williams, because he defended the honour of this House, be called a reporter, when the General, after all, was under the orders of the Government and of the Minister of Militia. The General had no occasion to do so, he had no right to do so, and in adopting the course which Col. Williams took upon that occasion, he acted properly. If the complaints had been lodged before a proper tribunal, it might perhaps have been better. We all remember the "towel" case. Correspondence took place in the papers. An officer of high rank and very highly esteemed, was treated as if he were a common private in the ranks. On that occasion the whole press of Canada supported Major Mudge. No redress was obtained. There was no court to which to go. Was redress to be sought at the Horse Guards in England? No. On this occasion in question, the General treated the officers in a way which he had no right to do. No doubt he was strict, and he should be strict on all occasions; but at the same time there is a proper way of using expressions, and he should not have used the language as he did use it. The General has now gone; I wish him God speed, and I hope his great services and high education as a military man and undoubted courage will find a suitable field. Let him do as did General Gordon, a man known for zeal, urbanity, power and great courage; let General Luard also be sent to the Soudan by the British Government, and he may talk to Osman Digma and the soldiers there as he pleases, and I hope he will be covered with glory, but never come back again to this country.

Mr. GUILLET. As representing the Riding in which Cobourg, where this camp was held, is situated, and knowing Mr. Coursol.

something of the circumstances which transpired at the camp, especially during inspection, I desire to offer a few remarks. I may say at the outset that knowing the circumstances as I did, I felt very much surprised indeed to observe the manner in which this subject has been discussed by the mover and seconder of the resolution and those who have supported it. I am sure if they had understood the circumstances they would not have indulged in so much ridicule and burlesque in discussing this matter, which is a serious one, and the use of such language under the circumstances cannot but tend to very seriously impair and injure the Militia Force. Throughout the country there was a strong feeling that on this, as well as on many other occasions, the language used by the Major-General was of the most offensive kind and deserving of severe condemnation. I was not present during the parade, but upon all hands the opinion was expressed by our leading citizens that language most offensive was used, and such as could not fail to do serious injury to the Force. I think it ill becomes hon. members of the House, when the press have noised abroad the character of the proceedings in question, as they have done, to treat the matter with ridicule and contempt. I believe it is our duty to seriously consider matters affecting our Volunteer Militia which have become so prominent, for it must be remembered that $1,000,000 are annually expended in maintaining the Force, which is of great value to the country, which represents the military spirit of the country, and which has within it to-day elements for the performance of as noble and daring deeds as have characterized the lives of those who preceded them in the Militia Force of Canada. I think it is unjust, therefore, when the country so liberally supports a Militia Force that we should treat matters connected with it with ridicule, instead of with that seriousness which they deserve. General Luard, on the occasion in question, was specially offensive to the Force. There were, perhaps, reasons why his feelings were aroused. He probably felt, as a strict disciplinarian, as an officer who desired the Militia to be like the regulars, and looked at it from the standpoint of an officer commanding regulars rather than from one commanding Militia. I believe the Force representing the district on that occasion was not so efficient as it has been on other occasions. It is a season of the year when it was difficult for officers to fill their companies. The harvest was backward, and there was great difficulty in obtaining men sufficient to fill the ranks. The Adjutant-General, in reporting in regard to the camp, states that seven-tenths of the men were recruits. They were in camp only eleven days, and only nine days before inspection, and of those nine days one was the Sabbath, and of the remaining eight, only five were available for drill. One of the days was devoted to target practice and another given to the reception of the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise, while on another day a heavy rain prevailed. There were really, therefore, but five days devoted to drill on that occasion, and we can well understand that neither the officers nor the men were in such a shape as to perform the brigade drill with such credit and efficiency as might be expected by the commanding officer. Officers and men were at least entitled to the greatest kindness and consideration, and the most generous construction should have been placed upon their conduct. Instead of that, we find that they were treated with insults, they were brow-beaten and addressed in such language as should not be used even towards menials and which, I doubt, if the Major-General would use towards his own flunkey. On calling the men out of the ranks, he spoke to them as if they were disgracing themselves, and in one case, when an officer was rebuking the men, he turned sharply upon him and said that he should have shown them a better example. In another case, the Adjutant of one of the battalions was taking a point and the men had formed up upon that point —had moved beyond it, and had gathered around the horse. The Major-General asked the Adjutant what he was doing, and told him to move out of that. The Adjutant's horse did not respond to the spur immediately, and the Major-General said to him, with an oath, "If you cannot ride out of that, get off and walk." One hon. member has spoken as if it were a trifling matter that this officer should use profane language, even to the extent of following the example of the army in Flanders; but the Queen's Regulations require officers to refrain from using profane or offensive language towards their men. Such language as the Major-General used was not justifiable, even in a Major-General, though he may have led a storming party against Chinese braves and captured a Chinese fort. That fact should not overawe the Canadian Militia, and compel them to submit to insult at his hands. The universal opinion was that the men were treated in the most unbecoming manner on that occasion. As an evidence of the feeling evinced on that occasion, it was observable that an invitation, which was given by the Superintendent of the Cobourg and Peterborough Railway to the officers of the camp, to attend an excursion, out of compliment to the Major-General, was only accepted by some twelve or fifteen of the 120 or 150 officers who were in camp. I think it is not fair towards the hon. member for East Durham to assume, as has been done on this occasion, that he had actually inspired the article which appeared in the Port Hope Times upon which the complaint is based. I am personally aware that the correspondent of the Times was present in the field throughout the whole camp, getting such information as would interest the readers of that paper. As it was a matter of universal notoriety that the General used offensive language in the mess towards Col. Williams, and another person who was there, it cannot be assumed for a moment that the information was given by the hon. member for East Durham; but, on the contrary, it is only fair to assume that the paper received this information by the regular channels for obtaining news. I am aware that there was another member of the House of Commons present as a civilian, and therefore I think it was unbecoming in the Major-General to have used this language, knowing that he was in the presence of members of the House of Commons, who were in fact representing the political party who supported the Government, who employed him—a Government who enjoyed the confidence of the House of Commons. Under these circumstances, I think it was the duty of Col. Williams to call attention to the matter, in order that such conduct might be resented, and that it should not be repeated. I have made these remarks in justice to Col. Williams, and in order to set the matter right before the House, if possible. We have had distinguished English officers in command of the Force heretofore, and there has been no disposition to complain of their treatment, so that the conduct of Major-General Luard appears to have been entirely exceptional, as far as our own experience goes.

Mr. MASSUE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this incident pass without making a few remarks. In 1875, our volunteers were suddenly called to the frontier to defend our country from a threatened invasion. If we had then had at the head of our military forces an officer of the same stamp as General Luard, who would have upbraided our volunteers as they have been upbraided lately, I think that those volunteers—who nobly did their duty at that time—would have been so thoroughly disgusted with these proceedings, that they would have resigned in a body, and I think that they would have been right in doing so.

Mr. LANDRY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as I belong to the volunteer militia of this country, I think I ought not to let this occasion pass without saying a few words on the motion which is now in your hands. We have, on various occasions, had official dealings with Major-General Luard.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder, louder.

Mr. LANDRY. (Translation.) I believe those who are asking me to speak louder do not understand a word of French. I say we have on several occasions had official dealings with Major-General Luard whose conduct is criticised to day. He has come twice in the Lévis camp to review our battalions, and I must say that on both these occasions, we, the volunteers of the district of Quebec, could only congratulate ourselves with the dealing we had with the General. Under those circumstances, I think I am in as good a position as anybody to speak pertinently on this subject. I am not actuated by any personal animosity towards the General; I have no personal abuse to avenge on him, and consequently the opinion I can express is free from any party spirit and from any ill-feeling whatever. Well, considering the energetic stand taken by several members of this House, by the press generally, and by all those who take some interest in militia matters, I think that the Government was justified, I may say, in adopting the policy which has been followed, and which has caused the Major-General to leave the country. It may be considered that there are two men in a military officer: the soldier, and the man who has to deal with the military authorities and with the military forces of the country. If we consider in General Luard the soldier proper, I think we have nothing to say against him, but if we consider him in his dealings with the officers of our volunteer force, in his dealings with the volunteers of the country themselves, we can reproach him with failings of a serious character. The manner with which he has acted towards our volunteers, especially here in Ottawa, a few years ago, at a shooting match, indicates that this man had no knowledge whatever of the wants of our country; that from the very outset to the end, he has not had the least idea of the requirements of the service. He was here in rather intimate connection with a body of men whose good-will, as their title shows, is the only agent which calls them to arms. Our militia system is not the same as that of other countries, and here we have under arms and in camps only those whose good-will has called and assembled them. The General ought to have taken this element into account, and governed him-self accordingly. Failing to do that, he has shown his utter want of tact, and he has gathered the storm which to day breaks upon his head. He has not understood our military system, and it is because he has not understood it that he deserves to day the general reprobation of the country. I think that, in justice to me and to all those who take an interest in the advancement of the militia of the country, I ought to raise my own voice in support of those who have already uttered complaints, and to approve of the action of the Government. This discussion concerning the General's conduct will, I trust, have a good effect. If it does not heal the wounds that he has left after him, his departure will at least be a lesson to whoever shall succeed him, and I would fain believe that in the future we will never have occasion to make such complaints as have been made to day, for his successor will have, besides the ability attributed to him, the experience of the past services of the man who has just left our country.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have listened with great attention to the course of this debate, and have heard, with some amusement, the remarks which were made by some hon. gentlemen. I think, however, amidst all this amusement and merriment, some things have taken place which are not in accordance with the sense of dignity and honour which should actuate hon. members of this House. The hon. gentleman who made this motion commenced his speech by attempting to read some correspondence—something which was contrary to the rules of debate—but if I am not mistaken, an hon. gentleman who spoke from this side of the House, read, without interruption, precisely the same letter which the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) was debarred from reading. I will retract what I have said on this point if I am mistaken, but I believe it is the fact. The whole case has been argued as though there was any evidence upon which to base an attack upon the Major-General. Now, Sir, I say that there is not a word of evidence brought against that gentleman, which would be admitted as evidence in any court of justice or in any court of enquiry. The whole attack is based on newspaper correspondence and reports, and there is not an hon. gentleman in this House who does not know, from his own personal experience, what amount of credit is generally to be attached to newspaper reports of that description. I know nothing about the Port Hope Times, which appears to have originated this whole report, but when the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Wright) in the course of a speech which we all admired for its ingenuity and for the skilful way in which he dragged in all sorts of irrelevant matter, which had as much to do with the question as the war in Egypt, spoke of charges such charges, if charges they were, were based on an extract he read from the Mail newspaper. Now, the Conservative party have to accept the Mail as an exponent of their views; but all I have to say is that, if the person who wrote that article in the Mail respecting General Luard, which is merely a re-hash of what appeared in another paper, and was not based on any evidence whatever—I say that if the person who wrote that article had no more regard for veracity, to say nothing of generosity or justice, than the same paper has in the remarks it makes concerning hon. gentlemen in this House who are opposed to it in politics, then I say that very little confidence ought to be placed in its statements. Sir, the whole thing rests on no evidence whatever, and the newspaper statements may go just for what they are worth. There has not been a single statement made, except a second-hand statement made by the hon. member for East Durham, to justify the charge made against the Major-General; and the whole thing is a mere fabric, built up on general rumour, which, I venture to say, is not in accordance with the real facts of the case. I think that one thing must be evident to hon. members of this House, and that is, that this discussion should not have been allowed to proceed until the papers were before us. We have had bits of evidence and bits of correspondence commented upon, as the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) commented; and the hon. member, with his brief in his hand, was allowed to read extracts and to quote papers which this House has not seen, and is not able to judge of. Some hon. members have asserted that there was a general consensus of opinion against General Luard among the militia officers of Canada. I, as an officer of that Force and a member of this House, deny that assertion. I say nothing of what happened at Cobourg; I was not there, and have no means of informing myself as to what took place, and I certainly am not going to believe, as a fact, what is a mere matter of opinion, or what is read by any member in this House. But I say that there were gentlemen present at that occurrence whose word is certainly better than the statements of those who speak merely from hearsay, and they declare that the statements made in that paper were very grossly exaggerated and misrepresented. We have heard hon. gentlemen speak about insults to this House. If there was any insult, it was not offered by General Luard, but by another gentleman. There is no evidence, whatever, to show that General Luard made any remark that was derogatory to any of the members of this House. The hon. member for Glengarry took the trouble to point out to us how very fair and proper was the conduct of the hon. member for East Durham. Now, I am not going to cast any reflection on the conduct of the hon. member for East Durham; I would be the last man in this House to do so; but I would like to ask this House, if it is fair that a gentleman should lie under the imputation that General Luard has lain under ever since the month of September last, in regard to this matter, without being able to learn, until a recent period, from the Government, whether the charges against him were to be pressed or not. I am surprised that the hon. Minister of Militia has not yet had a word to say in regard to this matter. I am surprised that that hon. Minister, to whom we ought to be able to entrust all matters of this kind with perfect confidence—that he will, at all hazards and under all circumstances, maintain the honour and the discipline and the dignity of the Force—has not uttered a single word on this subject. I say we have a right to expect that he would not have sat in his seat while one member after another rose up and traduced the character of a man holding a high office under him. I think he ought to have put a stop to this discussion, or, at any rate, to have stated that he would not allow gentlemen to stand up, and, on mere hearsay evidence, traduce the character of a gentleman holding the high position of General Luard. Now, I have attended two camps at which General Luard was present; and there was nothing in his conduct, on either occasion, that did not call forth the best wishes for him on the part of every officer and man there. He was careful and strict in his inspection, but not a single word escaped from him that any one could object to. I say more than this. When General Luard took command of the force, its discipline was at the lowest ebb. We had had so much butter and taffey rubbed on the Force that it was hardly possible for any man to say anything in criticism of it; but when General Luard came to this country, he brought to light existing abuses, and in that way did a great deal of good to the Force. Although we are proud of our Force, we must not blind our eyes to its defects. One speaker quoted a remark that the Major-General did not understand the genius of the people of this country. I have heard that remark before, and I think it means just this: that when a man does not understand the genius of the country, it is because he has found fault where there was good reason for doing so. I was going on to say that when General Luard came to this country, he found the discipline of the Force in a very bad state, and I am satisfied every officer of the Force knows it, and will admit it; but he went to work to redress the evils he found, and the result is that the Force stands to-day in a much better position, as regards discipline, than it did when he took command. I do not say that General Luard has not faults of temper, and may not occasionally have used expressions which gave offence; I do not know that he did, for I never heard him use such expressions, but to show the sort of treatment to which he has been exposed, even by officers of the Force under his command, I will just read an extract from a letter which, I hope, has before this attracted the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia. An officer at London, a Col. Cole, was found fault with by General Luard, because of the condition of his regiment, and what did he do? Instead of even taking the course pursued by the hon. member for East Durham, and bringing the matter before the attention of the authorities, he took the favourite course in this country and wrote a letter to a newspaper. And what did he say? From this letter, hon. gentlemen can judge of the sort of attacks to which General Luard is liable; and they can also judge how the condition of the Force can be maintained if this sort of thing is tolerated. This officer, in his letter, finds fault with Col. Jackson, the Deputy-Adjutant General of the district. He could have no fault to find with the manner of the Major-General, because he never saw him, and goes on to say:

"Mr. Luard recommends my removal from the command of my regiment. In answer, I would say that Luard's recommendation troubles me but very little. I do not understand why this fraud should pitch into me and my regiment, for I never gave him any reason; and further, I never spoke to him. In conclusion, I consider there is no necessity of importing cranks that call themselves military men."

That is the sort of attacks made in the newspapers on General Luard. Even supposing there was nothing in this officer's conduct to justify his removal from his command, what sort of a regiment is that whose commanding officer writes in terms like that of his superior? This is just a sample of the way in which General Luard had been treated by a portion of the press of this country. I totally deny, as a matter of fact, that there is general consensus of opinion, to the effect that his conduct of the Force has been other than what it ought to have been. On the contrary, I say that there was very good room for fault-finding, and that public opinion is agreed that in the main the General's comments were justifiable, and his strictures deserved. I should be altogether wanting in my duty to this House and to the Militia Force if I were to allow the remarks made concerning General Luard to pass without answer. From the facts, as I know and heard, of my own knowledge, I deny that there is any ground for the statement made reflecting on his conduct. I believe the evidence on which they are made is altogether exaggerated, and I ask this House whether it is consistent with their sense of justice, that a gentleman should have been allowed to remain in this country so long, with this charge pending against him, and no opportunity afforded him for reply. I ask if it is just that hon. members should arise, one after another, and make remarks respecting that officer which they know they cannot make with any proper sense of justice. The hon. member for Glengarry said the Major-General, in asking for specific charges, made a mistake. What else could the General do? Was he to ask the Government to make an enquiry on this vague statement? This charge was made; up to the month of January he was given no opportunity to reply, and then, just as he leaves this country, he is told that the charge is withdrawn. I hope the hon. Minister of Militia will give a satisfactory explanation to this House. I call on him to explain to this House how it happened that the officer commanding the Forces of this country was allowed to remain in the humiliating position in which he was placed. So far as any one can judge from the general appearance of the case, it seems hard measure to mete out to a man, that no opportunity should be given him to meet attacks; that his mouth shall be shut and his hands tied, while he is made the subject of attack in the newspaper press, and then after he has left this country that hon. members should rise and reiterate those charges. I appeal to the sense of justice—I will not say generosity—of hon. members, to say whether that is the way an Imperial officer, or any officer, or any man ought to be treated here, by those who stand in the position of representatives of the people and supporters of the Government. I hope the sense of the House, apart from all personal argument, will be that they have hardly treated General Luard; I hope they will agree with me that, standing in the position he did, it is hardly reasonable to make this attack on him, and I am very glad to have this opportunity of standing up in his defence and justifying him, as I believe he deserves to be justified.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I quite agree with the opinion of the hon. gentleman who has preceded me, that it would have been far more satisfactory had the papers in connection with this matter been brought down before the matter was so thoroughly discussed. If they had, the hon. gentleman would have known upon what false premises he has been arguing. The hon. gentleman would lead the House to believe that no correspondence had taken place since the letter addressed to the Secretary of State by General Luard, in which he asked that certain charges should be formulated. Such is not the case. I have always been ready to attend any court of enquiry, and expressed my readiness so to do, in my last letter dated December 6th. As regards the evidence to sustain the charges, which the hon. gentleman says has never been brought forward, I took particular pains, before making the charges, to have evidence on which I could perfectly rely, and went to some expense to gather evidence, which I found was far stronger than I anticipated. I will not be dragged by the unfair remarks of the hon. member for North York, nor by the flippancy of the hon. member for Ottawa, or the badinage of the hon. member for Lanark, into a personal discussion of this question. I feel, from the position I am placed, that I am not in a position to do so, but, under all the circumstances, I deem it my duty to make a brief statement of my position, which is this: In view of the early retirement of General Luard to England, I agreed to withdraw the letter of complaint which I had filed against him, and I feel it would be unbecoming in me now to enter into any discussion of the merits of the case. I regret to find that some of the papers have fallen into the hands of hon. members; and that my hon. friend from North York, who, I had hoped, would have approached the discussion of this question with a calm, judicial spirit, adopted rather the style of an attorney, and spoke closely to the brief placed in his hands by General Luard, which is simply a copy of the letters from the General, and which I regret to have to state are in his own handwriting. My own correspondence I carefully kept back from the House, as I felt I was in honour bound to, knowing that when it was brought down hon. members and the public would be able to judge the merits of the case, and, as far as I am concerned, that my position would be thoroughly sustained. The hon. member for Muskoka seems to think that the proper course for me to pursue was to lodge my complaint with the hon. Minister of Militia. As far as I was concerned, I had no personal grievance, no personal feeling, but my constituents had a claim on me; if they felt that the public interest was in any way being injured, they had a right to appeal to me, and it was my duty to forward their desire to the Government. Under the circumstances, I did forward a letter to the Secretary of State, asking that an enquiry be made. I took this view thinking that the Major-General was hardly a Departmental officer and was hardly amenable to the Minister of Militia, and I considered that I was pursuing the right course in forwarding the matter to the Secretary of State, asking him to make such enquiry as might be deemed proper, and assuring him of my earnest desire and intention to back up what I said. I shall not deal with the matter at any further length, but shall wait until the correspondence comes down, when my position will be found to be fully justified.

Mr. CARON. Mr. Speaker, before the motion which is now in your hands is submitted to the House, I may be allowed to say a few words in reference to the matter which has been occupying the attention of the House for some time. Even before my hon. friend the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) rose and expressed his ardent desire to hear a word from the Minister of Militia, it was my intention before the discussion closed to say a few words. I agree with the hon. member, so far as to believe that the discussion which has taken place to-day might possibly more properly have been put off until the papers had been laid upon the Table of the House, but I cannot regret the discussion which has taken place. I consider that the Militia Force of Canada has no reason to regret the discussion which has taken place to-day. I consider that the Militia Force of Canada has made some very valuable recruits to-day. My hon. friend the member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright), the hospitable King of the Gatineau, who does not often take an interest in discussions affecting the Militia Force of Canada, has thought fit to-day to assume a new rôle, and to interest the House, as he always does, with one of his speeches, so brimful of humour, so brimful of wit, and so brimful, I may say, of interesting historical allusions, which are always welcome to the members of this honourable House. Other members have also taken up the discussion, and, from the expressions which has taken place, I think that the expressions used in speaking of the Militia Force of Canada are such that the Militia Force of Canada can well be convinced that, among hon. members of this honourable House, this force is appreciated, as it deservedly should be appreciated. My hon. friend the member for Muskoka, to my astonishment, has taken up the cudgels in a manner in which he does not generally take up questions which come before this honourable House. He surprised me somewhat, Mr. Speaker, in stating that he was away in England when all the circumstances which affect this case took place at Cobourg, and still the hon. gentleman says that he, absent, away in England, is not ready or prepared to take the statements of hon. gentlemen who were present at that occurrence, and who have laid their own statements, from their personal knowledge, before this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He said he had statements from other parties who were present, contradicting the others.

Mr. CARON. That may be, but I have statements from hon. members of this House who were also present, and have laid their statements before the House, and I consider that these statements, coming from hon. gentlemen who were present, were more reliable than other statements that have been transmitted to us through three or four people who have received them from one another. Now, the occurrence which led to this protracted discussion, is very much to be regretted. I regret very much indeed that anything like what took place at Cobourg should have taken place, but I think that every member of the Volunteer Force of Canada who knows the hon. member for East Durham, an hon. gentleman who for so many years has given so much of his time and consecrated so much of his energy to the maintaining of a battalion in the state of efficiency in which the battalion he now commands is, will say that, if the hon. gentleman thought fit to make a complaint to the Government, he must have done it believing that what he was doing was in the interest of the Militia Force of Canada, and that he was acting, as he always does, in the circumstances alluded to, as a member of this House who was trying to maintain what he believed to be the dignity of his colleagues, of hon. members who were not present. Now, my hon. friend the member for Muskoka has charged me with not having put an end to this discussion immediately. Evidently, the hon. gentleman does not know that the charge was not made to my Department or to me as Minister of Militia. The charge was made by the hon. member for East Durham, as a member of the House of Commons, and, as such, was not a charge that could properly come under me as head of the Department of Militia. In submitting his charge, he very properly submitted it to the Secretary of State. And let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that, if the matter was not disposed of immediately, my hon. friend the member for Muskoka forgets that a long correspondence took place between General Luard and the hon. member for East Durham, and that correspondence was continued almost up to the period of time when General Luard left the country. I may also state that my hon. friend the member for East Durham was called away and was absent from Canada after the matter had been submitted to the Government, and, naturally, during his absence, it was necessary that the proceedings should be suspended until he returned. Naturally, the matter could not be disposed of, as hon. members will easily understand, until the correspondence was closed; and when, or shortly after, the correspondence was closed, my hon. friend the member for East Durham withdrew the charges which he had laid against the General. The hon. gentleman has made his own statement. He has shown us under what circumstances he considered it his duty to withdraw these charges, and, under these circumstances, it was quite impossible for the Government to dispose of the matter sooner than it was disposed of. I believe if the hon. member for Muskoka had waited, as he advised us all to do, before discussing this matter, until the papers had been laid upon the Table of Parliament, if he had followed the advice he was giving us, he would have seen that no time was lost in disposing of the matter. I repeat that I regret extremely, not only in this circumstance but in other circumstances, the difficulties which have arisen between the General and the Militia Force of Canada. It is not, as I believe, a fitting opportunity to-day to take up these matters, but let me say that, in Canada, we require in command of the Militia Force a gentleman who not only will be a strict disciplinarian, as every British officer who is sent out from England is supposed to be, but who also, in dealing with and meeting the members of the Militia Force, will have the suaviter in modo which, I believe, is certainly as indispensable to a commanding officer as the other qualifications which hon. gentlemen have spoken of as pertaining to a commanding officer. Now, Sir, I regret sincerely that any trouble of that kind should have occurred. Before sitting down, I wish to answer a remark made by my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster), who stated that the General commanding the Militia Force of Canada was an Imperial officer. Mr. Speaker, the General commanding the Militia Force of Canada is an Imperial officer in so far as belongs to the Imperial army, but when he comes out to Canada he is an officer under the control and in the employment of the Canadian Government. I have always approved of the system which is followed in Canada of getting an experienced officer from the old country, until we in Canada can have men sufficiently experienced to take command of the Militia Force, but I believe it would be a great mistake if an officer, on coming here from England, imagined himself independent of the Government of Canada, and as merely an Imperial officer coming from England. These are the remarks I wished to make before the discussion closed.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad the remarks of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) have at last called the Minister of Militia to his feet, and induced him to give the explanations on this subject which he really ought to have given long ago, as that hon. gentleman pointed out. I think the debate on the resolution of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) has gone entirely beyond the record. That motion asked for papers and correspondence in connection with one definite charge made against Major-General Luard, as to his misconduct on a particular occasion; but the discussion has ranged over the conduct of Major-General Luard during the whole time he has been here, and has been made up of attacks and defences of the general policy he has pursued towards the Militia of Canada. That having been the case, it is perhaps impossible to go on to consider the particular case before us without saying something on the general question. It has been practically admitted by all, that General Luard's mistakes, General Luard's errors, General Luard's alleged misconduct, have been due chiefly to faults of temper. Nobody has charged that he was not an efficient soldier, that he was not actuated by the highest desire to improve the efficiency of the Canadian Militia. The only charge has been that on an occasion when he saw things in a shape that appeared to him to be unsoldierly, he has given vent to his opinion in language that was considered by those who made the charge as scarcely gentlemanly, and scarcely proper to be addressed to Canadian volunteers. I cannot speak on this from any personal knowledge, as I have not been for some years connected with the Force; however, I think, from all I can hear, from testimony brought forward in the House by independent gentlemen connected with the Force, and from other quarters, that there is a general agreement that General Luard's severity and strictness did something, at least, for the Militia Force. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Muskoka, when he says that some years ago, when General Luard first took charge of the Militia discipline was at a low ebb—in fact I do not know that even yet it has reached that point that volunteer discipline should reach. I am inclined to think that when an officer, who has had experience in volunteer matters, as General Luard had long before he came here, found so much to object to in the state of militia discipline, there must have been some cause for it. We find that this dissatisfaction has not been general, but it has been confined to special cases, and I think it probable that in those cases there was something to find fault with. But I have no doubt that some of the expressions alleged to have been used by him were rather too strong, and not conducive to the interests of the Service. Yet I think that, none the less for that, it is highly improper for us to make this motion an occasion for a general attack upon General Luard, who has now left the country, as it is understood, not to return again to occupy the same position. A man who is now practically out of the employ of this Government, I think, should not be attacked for his past conduct in this indiscriminating way without, as the hon. member for Muskoka has pointed out, the production of any evidence whatever. Speaking of this particular case, I must say that the offence against the dignity of this House charged against General Luard, is a very grave one. If he did really, on that occasion, express himself in contemptuous language in regard to the members of this House, it was something which ought not to have been passed over. The Minister of Militia has pointed out that the member for East Durham made the charge which he did make, in order to sustain the dignity of this House, as well as to further the interests of the Militia Force. Sir, if the offence was as grave as he conceived it to be at the time, if he was not mistaken, as to the import of the General's language, the offence was one affecting the dignity of this House, especially after it became public. If it had been kept within the walls of the mess room in which this mess room dispute occurred, I do not know that the dignity of this House would have been injured in the slightest degree; but, since those who were present on that occasion chose to make the affair public, and to spread abroad over the country that General Luard had attacked the dignity of this House, then I think the matter was a serious one, and should be examined, either by the Militia Department or by this House. If all the facts can be established and the charges turn out to be as grave as they appeared to have been to the hon. member for East Durham when he made them, then I say General Luard ought not to be allowed to slip out of the country in the quiet way he has done, and to take leave of absence on the understanding that he is not to return here. If he has insulted this House he should either be made to apologize to this House, or should be dismissed, instead of being allowed to retire. The Minister of Militia has pointed out that he is an officer fully under the control of this Government. He is an officer under the control of his own Department, he is a departmental officer, and could have been dismissed at any time on the recommendation of the Minister of Militia. I think it was his duty, when these charges were made, to have had them investigated, and either have secured an apology from the General to the House of Commons, or from the gentleman making the charges to General Luard, according as the facts might turn out to demand upon enquiry, I say the hon. Minister has been guilty of a grave dereliction of his duty in allowing a charge of this kind to have been made to a member of the Cabinet, made in the press throughout the country, repeated until everybody has taken sides on it one way or the other, and then allowing the correspondence in connection with it to be withdrawn and letting the whole matter fall to the ground.

Mr. CARON. The charge was not made to my Department at all.

Mr. CASEY. Well, it should have been made to him as Minister of Militia, and when he knew the charges were made he should have insisted upon their being laid before him as the proper person, and he should have taken cognizance of the case and prosecuted it. I have no doubt that the hon. member for East Durham must have spoken to the Minister of Militia about the matter, or communicated with him in some way about it. It is scarcely possible that such an affair should have taken place without some communication between these two hon. gentlemen. It may have been on the advice of the Minister of Militia that the charges were made to the Secretary of State instead of to his own Department—I do not know how that may have been. The hon. member for East Durham shakes his head. I conclude, then, that he simply followed his own idea in writing to the Secretary of State instead of to the Minister of Militia. He was undoubtedly mistaken in taking that course, because the Militia Department was the one to which he should have made his complaints, especially as he himself was an officer of the Militia. But the Minister of Militia says the charges were made to the Secretary of State, because the hon. member for East Durham acted in his capacity as a member of the House, and not in his capacity as an officer of the Service. I do not see what difference this could make. If he acted as a member of the House, his proper course was to bring it up in Parliament and ask that an enquiry be instituted. If he acted as an officer, his only proper course was to make complaint through the proper military channel. But it seems the charge was made to the Secretary of State. No doubt the Government followed the usual course in matters of this kind, and referred the complaint to the proper Department. No doubt the complaint was referred to the Minister of Militia, although it was not at first lodged in his Department; no doubt he was cognizant of the matter ultimately and directly. And the responsibility, therefore, comes back to him and rests upon him quite as fully as if the complaint had been made to his Department in the first instance. It appears this was not an ordinary complaint, a letter of complaint written by a member of the House, to call attention to a matter of public interest. It was a case carefully worked up by the member for East Durham, who said he had gone round with a solicitor and worked up the case and found it was stronger than he had anticipated. The case, he says, was sent to the Government. Now what has become of the case? The Minister of Militia said the correspondence was allowed to be withdrawn, and the hon. member for East Durham makes a similar statement, because forsooth, the General was about to leave the country. I do not quite understand what is meant by the withdrawal of the correspondence. If it means that the letters and correspondence by the hon. member for East Durham and General Luard were given back to them, it is a very improper conclusion to a charge of this nature. It should have been forced to some issue. If the hon. member for East Durham has withdrawn all the charges against General Luard, it is a perfect justification of the General. If that is the meaning of the withdrawal of the correspondence, it should be clearly stated to the House, and the General should not be allowed to rest under the imputation that the charges are still hanging over him, unsettled. From the silence of the two hon. gentlemen, who alone can answer this question, I am still left in doubt. We must therefore judge from the general tone of their remarks, though not from their express words, that the charges are not withdrawn but are still insisted on by the hon. member for East Durham, but that he does not care to have an investigation, and the reason he gives is the approaching departure of the General. I do not think that is any reason whatever. The General should either leave here as a dismissed official, dismissed because of improper conduct, or he should leave here with his character unstained. I do not pretend to say how far the hon. member's idea of General Luard's meaning may have been borne out by the General's intention on that occasion. The hon. member for East Durham may have been mistaken as to the words used by General Luard. I do not know how far this might have been borne out by evidence. No evidence has been taken, and the General has been allowed to leave the country quietly, neither cleared of the charges nor convicted of them. That is a state of things most damaging to the Service and unworthy of the dignity of this House. The hon. Minister of Militia expressed surprise that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) did not believe the evidence given to us to-night, by hon. members who were present on the occasion referred to. I do not remember that any hon. gentleman has spoken who was present on that occasion, except the hon. member for East Durham himself, and he carefully abstained from making any further statement about the matter, simply saying that the whole of the charges were contained in the correspondence. We have no information from hon. members or anyone as to what took place on that occasion, except from the letter so irregularly read by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart). I, too, felt curious at that time, and feel curious to know how the letter got into the possession of the hon. member. The hon. member for East Durham said that none of his letters fall into the hands of any member. If they were obtained from the Government, it was a very strange proceeding. If the letter was placed in the hands of the hon. member by General Luard, it is a different matter; but the House should be informed by the hon. member as to how he got possession of it. Both the Minister of Militia and the member for East Durham, have referred to what we shall see when the correspondence comes down; but if the correspondence has been withdrawn, how can it be brought down? Does the hon. Minister mean there is still correspondence in the Department?

Mr. CARON. I have already stated that it did not come before my Department.

Mr. CASEY. The Secretary of State is present in the House, and I hope he will pay attention to the question. I wish to ask him if there is any correspondence on this question in his Department; if the correspondence making and answering the charges is in his Department, and can be brought down?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman will receive his answer when the Government informs him whether the correspondence can be brought down or not.

Mr. CASEY. That is not a proper answer to the question. The question is one which should be answered now. The question is, whether correspondence exists and can be brought down. The Minister of Militia has led us to infer that when it comes down we shall see so and-so, and the hon. member for East Durham says the same. Now, the Secretary of State refuses to say whether there is any correspondence, and whether it is going to be brought down. The question should be answered now, as it might prevent useless and prolonged discussion.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman has no right to put such a question. We are discussing a demand to bring down papers. Let the discussion be concluded, and let the answer be given to the hon. gentleman. I do not want to be catechised here; the hon. gentleman has no right to do so.

Mr. CASEY. If Ministers are not here to be catechised, what are they here for? I say they are here to be catechised respecting the business of their Departments; that is what they are paid for. If the Secretary of State, who is very new to the position, feels so much more dignity than any other Minister, and refuses to answer questions, it is no use to ask them. The Minister in whose possession the correspondence must be, if it still exists, refuses to say whether there is any or not, and the Minister of Militia leads the House to infer that it does exist, and will be brought down.

Mr. CARON. I did not tell the hon. gentleman it would be brought down.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman said that "when the correspondence came down"—he did not say, "if it came down"—the hon. member for Muskoka would find so-and-so. If that does not imply that it will come down, I do not know the meaning of language. Leaving him to settle with the Secretary of State as to the propriety of making such disclosures beforehand, I will go on to some other points. I wish to say, before closing my remarks, that we had a matter, not exactly of a similar kind to this, but a question in this House, two or three years ago, in which the conduct of General Luard came up for discussion. On that occasion, General Luard was not charged with being too strict, as he is now charged, but with being too lenient, although that charge was scarcely borne out by the facts. A case had arisen concerning the conduct of a Colonel commanding a battalion (Col. W. Ross), one of as high standing as the gentleman whose case is now under discussion. The General reported on that Colonel's conduct, with regard to the establishment of a canteen, which was complained of by a political supporter of the Minister of the Militia, that the Colonel's conduct was correct, and was in consonance with the Militia Regulations. The Minister of Militia, considering that his supporter, the Conservative member for the county of Prince Edward, had a better knowledge of Militia affairs than the General, induced the General to amend the report in such a way as to have a Gazette censure passed upon the Colonel. That was a case of difference of opinion, and a Colonel of as high a position as the member for East Durham was, in fact, censured for an act which the Major-General, the fountain of discipline for the Dominion of Canada, declared to be exactly in accordance with usage and the Regulations, and the hon. member for East Durham sustained the Government on that occasion. Now, I think the hon. gentleman has scarcely put himself in the strongest position, when he takes the means he has taken of attacking this Major-General; for, whatever the General's faults and failings might be, he deserves at least the courtesy of a proper court of enquiry into his conduct before this matter was blazoned all over the country. I hope, Sir, the Minister of Militia will yet get his hands on this mysterious correspondence; which he does not admit his knowledge of at present, that he will get it before his Department, if not before the House, and will see that a proper enquiry is made into that question, that the matter is cleared up, whether for the benefit of General Luard or for the gentleman who has made these charges. It is absolutely necessary for the dignity of the House and the efficiency of the service that the matter be cleared up. I am not pronouncing any opinion on the matter, because I am as ignorant of the facts as every other hon. member must be until we see the papers; we are all ignorant of the facts, and cannot pronounce an opinion, but I think the mat ter should be cleared up, out of regard to our own dignity, at all events.

Mr. CARON. I rise to a personal explanation. The hon. gentleman referred to the case of Col. Ross, and he has stated the facts differently from what they were. He has stated—whether he has forgotten the correspondence which was brought down, or whether he made the statement for the purposes of this case—

Mr. CASEY. Order. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman insinuates the possibility of my making these statements wrongfully for the purpose of this debate.

Mr. CARON. I did not say wrongfully, but I said for the purposes of this case. The hon. gentleman has forgotten the case of Col. Ross. In that case the Major-General in his report, states that Col. Ross has been guilty of a gross breach of discipline, and the hon. gentleman has stated here to-night that the General, in his report, stated that Col. Ross has done exactly what he should have done under the Militia Regulations. Now, the hon. gentleman must have forgotten completely the facts of the case, else he would not have made that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not think that there are such words in the report, as the hon. gentleman has stated.

Mr. CARON. Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat has discussed the points with me before, and he must remember that the Major-General stated most explicitly that Col. Ross was guilty of a gross breach of discipline.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The General recommended a different course of things from the Minister, and the Minister over-ruled the General.

Mr. CARON. That is another question.

Mr. CASEY. To the best of my recollection, and my recollection is pretty fair, and is, I think, likely to be as near right as the hon. gentleman's—my recollection is, that the first report of the Major-General was entirely favourable to Col. Ross; that he reported that Col. Ross, in demolishing the canteen which had been erected contrary to his orders, had acted within his rights as a Colonel commanding in the camp. That is my distinct recollection, and before the debate is over, or at all events before very long, I shall hunt up the report, and I fancy the Minister will find he has embarrassed himself somewhat by asserting so positively that the General had reported that there was "a gross breach of discipline." I recollect, also, that subsequently an amended report was procured from the General, which came much nearer the hon. Minister position than in the first instance, and that probably is the one the hon. Minister refers to.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I wish to say one word in reference to an insinuation which was made, perhaps not willingly, by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. The hon. gentleman was pleased to say that correspondence of a more or less private or confidential character should not have been brought before this House. I can state here, that so far as I am informed, and I believe I am well informed, the hon. member for East Durham has never communicated those papers since they were sent to the Department. I can vouch for the Department, for myself, and my officers, and I say that they have not been communicated to anybody. Any person who has communicated this information to members of this House or other people, has done an act which I shall not characterize. It might be military, perhaps, but certainly it would not be civil.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not propose to discuss the merits of this question as regards my hon. friend from East Durham and the General. A good deal has been said to night about General Luard's conduct by officers of the Force. Now, I happen to have come in contact, as no doubt other hon. members have, with a number of militia officers who have been inspected at various times by General Luard, and I desire to say here, in justice to that officer, that I have heard from many distinguished officers of the Militia Force, that whether or not General Luard may have been a little over-zealous at times in the discharge of his duty, when the corps inspected by him were in a really efficient state, General Luard was always ready to bear testimony to that fact, and always spoke very handsomely, when he could honestly and fairly speak handsomely, of the discipline of the regiments who paraded before him. I think it is but justice to General Luard to say that I have heard that from many officers high in command. No doubt there have been complaints made that when the regiments whom he inspected were not in the state of discipline he expected them to be, the General expressed himself with much freedom, as I dare say the hon. gentlemen opposite know that very high officers in the British service are rather apt to express themselves. I dare say that even the most illustrious officers in the British Service would be found—and nobody knows it better than the First Minister—to have expressed themselves very strongly both as to regiments of regular troops, and as to regiments of volunteer troops. Whenever the discipline of these regiments did not come quite up to the standard they expected—and I think we would do well to remember in this debate, in which, as I understand, we have no evidence before us, that it would be rather unfair to allow General Luard to leave this country apparently under a cloud. If the Government thought there was anything in his conduct which deserved censure, it would have been the duty of the Government to express their views, no doubt, to Her Majesty's Government. But it is not our duty to assail that gentleman without much better evidence than has been, so far as I have heard the debate, submitted to the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it would be quite improper to assail General Luard or anybody else without sufficient evidence; but let us consider for a moment who has brought up this subject and how it has been brought up. It has not been brought up by the Government as a charge against General Luard. No charge has been made against him. It has been brought by the hon. member for North York. Whether he brought it up on his own mere motion, or as representing General Luard, he has not told us. Neither has he told us why he has made this motion, for what purpose he wants these papers, if it is for the purpose of following up the matter, or if it is not, why he made the motion. It is a very inconvenient thing, and it is considered exceptional in England for discussions to be made about army discipline or the discipline of the Militia. The hon. gentleman, in making this motion, evidently did not want the information, for he has seen the papers which he has moved for; and therefore he must have made up his mind, when he gave this notice, that he would have to follow it up, or cui bono? For what purpose has the motion been made? Does the hon. gentleman mean to move for a Committee of enquiry on General Luard, or on the gentleman who made the charge against General Luard? We would like to know. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will object to be catechised in the matter, perhaps he will object to answer why he made this motion; at whose instance he made it; where he got these papers; and for what purpose he got them. I think we ought to know all this. But I gather that the hon. gentleman got the papers from General Luard, or some friend of General Luard, through whom they were sent to the hon. gentleman. I think either one or the other must have been the case. Now, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that if so, it is exceedingly unfortunate for General Luard; for whether his conduct at this mess meeting was liable to censure or not—whether he was altogether right, or whether my hon. friend from East Durham was too sensitive—one thing is clear, and I can state in my place that I know that General Luard has made the gravest possible mistake in giving these papers to any person in the world. General Luard has been treated with the greatest consideration and the greatest forbearance; and it was at my own special instance, and for the purpose of preventing probably serious consequences to General Luard, that I asked my hon. friend who sits behind me, in view of the probable consequences to a gentleman of his rank, and in the interest of the Militia Service, to withdraw the charge; because, Mr. Speaker, the question could not rest. It would involve an enquiry into all the numerous and various complaints that were made against General Luard; and some of them, I had occasion to know, were such as would probably involve consequences which would have been the reverse of pleasant to that officer—not in any way affecting his honour or his status as a gentleman, but as affecting altogether the question of the possibility of his continuing in his command; and he has committed a grave error, so grave that I can only attribute it to a very great want of judgment on the part of General Luard, or to his being very badly advised, in inviting, if he did invite, this discussion, or in inducing the hon. gentleman, if he did induce him, to bring down these papers. I have no hesitation in saying, Sir, that it is a very grave mistake on the part of General Luard, and I am sorry to say that perhaps he will find it so. Now, Sir, there is one statement made by the gentleman who moved this motion that is erroneous. Of course, he spoke from his general acquaintance with the subject. He stated that General Luard's promotion was stopped, that his position was affected by the statement made by Colonel Williams. That is quite a mistake, as I happen to know from General Luard himself. General Luard, in the course of the coming summer, was to get his Lieut.-Generalship—in the ordinary course, he was certain to be made a Lieut.-General—and then he was going to leave Canada. In no way did it affect his position, or his promotion, or his rank at the Horse Guards, or anywhere else, because he was obliged ex necessitate to go the moment he got the Lieut.-Generalship; and therefore he has not suffered anything in the world from the fact that Col. Williams made this charge. Well, Sir, General Luard ought, in my opinion, to have been well satisfied at the result. I may go so far as to say that those papers were all purposely withdrawn. There was an understanding to that effect; and if General Luard induced or authorized any hon. gentleman to use those papers after that understanding was come to, he committed a very grave breach of an arrangement which was entered into in his own interest, for the purpose of preventing his having any subsequent inconvenience from this matter, which, unfortunately, got into the newspapers. The whole action that was taken since that complaint was made, was taken with a view of putting an end to these various contents and charges, some of perhaps some force, some of no force; but they were accumulated; but the whole effort was to prevent any injury to that gallant gentleman, to prevent any unseemly or unfortunate discussion like the one that is going on to-day, and to allow him quietly to go away, as he was certain to go, in the course of the summer, without injury to himself or to the Militia, and without any scandal or discussion; and if the object which I had in view in inducing my hon. friend to withdraw the charge has been frustrated, it is altogether due to the injudicious and more than injudicious conduct of General Luard, contrary to the distinct understanding, in putting these papers into the hands of the hon. gentleman who has made this motion, or anybody else.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). For my part, after hearing the discussion, I think the thanks of this House are due to the hon. member for North York for having brought forward his motion, and I compliment him very sincerely on the dignified and impartial manner in which he made his statement. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House, as it has been already too long occupied with this question, but there are one or two points that I want to take up. I wish to add my humble testimony to what has been said by the hon. member for Muskoka with regard to the estimation in which General Luard is held by the Militia Service throughout the Dominion. I have taken care to communicate with many military men on the subject, and I fully agree with the hon. and gallant Knight from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the men who complain of censure deserved to be censured and that they were so thin-skinned because they were militia officers and perhaps held other rank, which they considered should exempt them from criticism. As regards the complaint of the hon. member for East Durham, that complaint affected the standing of General Luard towards the Militia. It was a complaint which affected the Militia of this country, and on that account it ought not to have been withdrawn, and the Government had no right to allow it to be withdrawn. With regard to the remark of the hon. First Minister, as to General Luard having committed a breach of the understanding, he was no contracting party to any understanding; I am not aware that General Luard ever furnished any papers to any member of this House, but I know that he was no consenting party to any understanding as to the withdrawal of the charges by the hon. member for East Durham. General Luard has left the country and I do not know whether he will return, but I know it is not fair nor just that he should be made a butt of here by hon. gentlemen and not a word to be said in his defence. I cannot listen to this when I know he has not, for some time back, received that treatment he ought to have received even from the Government of the Dominion. There is a general opinion throughout the country that he has not received that treatment from the Militia Department and the Government that a man, holding the position which he held was entitled to receive. There is also a feeling that the criticisms thrown out against him have emanated from men who are smarting under well-deserved censure, and believing that the discussion here to night will be read in England by the military authorities and will seriously affect the standing of General Luard at home, I feel it to be my duty to rise in my place and add my humble mite to whatever has been said in favour of that gentleman who, in the discharge of his duties in Canada, has done good service in the training of our Militia. He found the Militia in a very inefficient state and succeeded in raising the standard to a great extent. Every Militia officer who has not a personal grievance against the General, will add his testimony to what I say. If it were merely a personal charge between Colonel Williams, as a member of Parliament, and General Luard, we ought to know it. I protest against the idea that because a gentleman may by accident be a member of Parliament, he is to plume himself on that and on what shall affect the honour and dignity of the House. That can only be affected by the manner in which we carry on the business of the country in this House, and no hon. gentleman need be uneasy about the dignity of the House, as far as any remarks falling from any person at an after-dinner speech at a military mess may affect it. It would have been much fairer to General Luard if Col. Williams had persisted in urging his charge and having an investigation. It is extraordinary that six months should be allowed to go by and no investigation held, and that this old military gentleman should have been allowed to go home with a stain on his character. It is very well to say that the matter would have been quieted and allowed to drop if the hon. member for North York had not brought up his motion. The hon. member did perfectly right, for these charges have been circulating during the last six months throughout the country; they found their way into the English press, and have been considerably detrimental to General Luard. In justice to that gallant officer, I add my testimony to that of the hon. member for Muskoka, in saying that General Luard deserves the thanks of the Canadian Militia for the services he has rendered them, and he has their thanks.

Mr. HESSON. It is of more importance to us that we should have the good feeling of the Volunteer Force of the country, and I know from personal knowledge that the members of the Force, from my own part of the country, were not pleased because General Luard, though a very good officer, was a gentleman better fitted to command paid soldiers than to command the volunteers of Canada. If he were to continue in that position for any time, the effect would be only to injure the position of the Force. I do not think the General's disposition was suited to the Volunteer Force of this country. I do not think he was brought up to understand the difference that existed between a man who shouldered his musket as a part of his duty, and another who shouldered it simply for pay. I know offence was given to men, very excellent men, in my own county, officers of a battalion with which I was once identified, and they expressed very unkind feelings as to the manner in which they had been treated when brought into contact with him, and I have come to the conclusion that he was unfit for the position, and I think it is well he has been removed, and I trust he will never be brought back to fill this position.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I think that this question has assumed a very wide circumference indeed, and that hon. gentlemen have taken a latitude inconsistent with the Rules of Parliament. I intend to move a slight addition to the motion of my hon. friend from North York, and I would not have made any remarks at all—nor do I intend to make any at length—had it not been for some observations made recently. The conduct of General Luard seems to have come into question here in a very positive form, and I think that if any of the hon. members who have spoken on this question had confined themselves as closely to the motion as the mover did, without censuring the conduct of anyone in particular but moving for these papers, so wide a range would not have been taken in this discussion. The hon. member for Muskoka, in particular, I think, was an offender in this respect. He, however, gave the answer to himself before he sat down, for he told the House he was not here and knew nothing about the question. If he had been here, he would have known that a great ripple had been made in military circles, which had extended to the whole Commonwealth of Canada, in regard to the conduct of General Luard, not only at Cobourg, but at other places. I am not saying this for the purpose of censuring the General, nor do I intend to censure him, but I say that it is known to everybody, if not to the hon. member for Muskoka, that the newspapers of the day, not only the Mail which he has attacked, but the Globe newspaper, its rival, the organ of the Reform party—the Globe came out in strong terms censuring the conduct of General Luard. If the hon. member for Muskoka had been as cognizant of this affair as he ought to have been, before he spoke and inveighed against the hon. member for East Durham, he certainly would not have used the strong expressions he did. I find the Globe newspaper, its make being followed by the lesser lights of the same party. On the 24th of September, the Globe spoke in this wise:—

"On Thursday, the brigade was inspected by Major-General Luard commanding the Militia Force in Canada. On riding to the saluting base, preparatory to the march past, he there discovered several Staff officers, including the Camp Quarter-Master, the Paymaster, the Surgeon besides regimental Surgeons, who were not mounted. He demanded who they were, and on receiving the required information, peremptorily ordered these gentlemen off the field. During the field evolutions which took place, if the slightest irregularity occurred, the General seemed to become beside himself. In the inspection, not only did he scrutinize, with eagle eye, the brigade by battalions, but he ordered the battalions to be broken up into their respective companies, and inspected each one separately. There is no doubt he made many criticisms which were deserved, and offered innumerable suggestions which were invaluable, but the effect of these was almost entirely destroyed by the manner in which they were made. The slightest deviation of uniformity was everywhere made the subject of a military philippic. A folded overcoat strapped on upside down was in several cases a sufficient pretext for an onslaught on both officers and privates. Riding up to one company, he singled out on an unfortunate young soldier, whose countenance was bronzed by constant exposure, and denounced him as dirty and disgraceful. Turning to the officer in command, one of the most respected in the regiment, he politely informed him that he (the officer) did not look any too clean himself, and could not expect his men to be tidy with such an exemplar.

"THE LUNCHEON.

"When the review was over—"

An hon. MEMBER. This is good.

Mr. WOODWORTH. This is good. Yes; it is from the Koran.

"When the review was over, the General was gracious enough to accept an invitation to luncheon with the brigade and regimental Staff. During a conversation which took place thereat, in which Colonel Williams, of the 46th—"

That gallant 46th, that has been so often alluded to in this House—

"and the General were the chief participants, the former was given the lie direct by the latter."

This is the Globe.

"A painful lull in the conversation ensued,—"

I should think it would be painful—

"and shortly afterwards the General, accompanied by his A. D. C., arose and beat a hasty retreat. Colonel Williams will call the attention of the House to the question of the General's conduct. It is also rumoured that an arrangement has been made by influential members of the Militia, who also hold seats in Parliament, to agitate for his immediate recall by the Imperial authorities."

Well, Sir, afterward the Globe newspaper, in an editorial in the following issue, among other things, said the following:—

"A few things seem to be forgotten by General Luard,—"

This is under the head of "General Luard again."

"(1) That the volunteers of Canada are not regular soldiers. (2) That they give their time and services gratuitously. (3) That there is not an officer in the Force whose connection therewith does not involve—in keeping up bands, uniforms, and other expenses—sacrifices, alike in money and in time. If these things are borne in mind by inspecting Generals in Canada, their criticism will be more apt to be marked by moderation, justice and common sense."

Now, some hon. gentlemen, and especially the hon. member for Muskoka, have inveighed in very strong terms about this matter being brought up, about Major-General Luard being discussed at all, and the Mail newspaper has been attacked amid the plaudits of hon. gentlemen opposite, who did not seem to know—although the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knew, as a journalist, right well, for I think he had a hand in it—that the Reform newspapers universally condemned the man before he was heard here in Parliament at all. And who is to be thanked, as the First Minister has said, for bringing this matter up? Is it any hon. member on this side of the House? No; it was brought up on that side of the House; but, I must say, in justice to the member for North York (Mr. Mulock), in that calm and judicial manner which became a scholar and a gentleman. He brought it up fairly and impartially, as he had a right to do as a member of this House; but it has been taken up without moderation, and sometimes without very good sense by some hon. members. Hon. members inveighed here as if it was a shuttlecock to be thrown about between parties, when Canada has been saturated from one end to the other with newspaper articles on the conduct of General Luard, and I do not think it behoves any gentleman in this House to attempt to make this a party question at all. It has been said that the Militia has been insulted. I do not know whether it has or has not. I am not a militiaman or a militia officer. If it has been insulted, let the blame rest upon the proper shoulders. It has been said that this Parliament has been insulted by this gentleman corroborating the remarks of Col. Gzowski as to the opinions of this Parliament being not worth ten cents. I do not think we hold our seats amenable to any Polish officer, or any officer, no matter how high, and I think, in England, any officer who inveighed against the Ministry of Gladstone, or the Parliament of England, and said that the members of that Ministry, or the members of that Parliament, did not understand their business, and that their opinions on military affairs were not worth ten cents whoever he was, would stand a very poor chance of promotion. We are not officers here, but we represent independent constituencies; and, if we have no information at hand on military subjects, we have the means of information and can inform ourselves, and we do that before we speak to any question in this House, and I think, without reference to party at all, that the esprit de corps of members of this House has been offended by both those gentlemen who have spoken in such terms. I move, in amendment to the motion—and I believe my hon. friend will accept the amendment, because it is in keeping with his statements here—that the words “and all other papers and correspondence containing complaints against Major-General Luard” be added to the motion already made.

Mr. McNEILL. I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, to say anything on this question at all. Not only had I not intended to say anything, but I had made up my mind not to say anything. However, after some remarks which have fallen during the course of this discussion, and especially from my hon. friend who has last spoken, I think it would be scarcely right if I held in my hand a letter which I have received from the Colonel commanding the battalion in my county, without reading, at all events, a portion of it to the House. I do it in order that it should be seen that the statement made that there is a consensus of opinion among the Militia hostile to General Luard, and that his conduct in his position has been detrimental to the Volunteer Force, is incorrect, and that there is no such consensus of opinion. This is a letter from Col. Cooper, a man who is, I may say, a gentleman respected by everyone who knows him, a man of high education, and a man of very sober judgment. This is what he says of General Luard:

“Time and again have I seen attacks made on the Major-General in the press, which I would have liked to reply to had I not been an officer under command of the party attacked. Personally, I have only seen in Major-General Luard the signs of a soldier, desirous that everything should be done to make our Volunteer Force efficient. Wherever he has found fault, it has, so far as I am aware, been deserved, and the fault has seldom been as to the men, but more as to their equipment, and at times so as to remind those in command of their duty to the Force. Where praise has been all deserved, it has been bestowed, but not in such a way as to be fulsome. I can imagine that some, who think that the only use to be made of volunteering is to secure a little recreation and show and no work, may at times have been severely rebuked for remissness. And it may be that the expressions used have been severe. Of this I know nothing but from hearsay, and in this I place little dependence, as I know that the actions of the Major-General were grossly misrepresented in the Campbell affair at London, in 1881. I think I may safely say that the officers of my battalion, speaking from their own experience, will agree with me in saying that Major-General Luard has endeavoured to do more for the comfort and efficiency of the Force than some of his predecessors, and that so far as they have come in contact with him, they have nothing to complain of.

“If inefficiency can only be removed by harshness, it may be necessary to use it. Any harshness I have known in Major-General Luard, if so hard a term of harshness can fairly be used, with anything within my knowledge, has only tended to remove inefficiency and strengthen the Force. I can understand that even the reviving of efficiency may give some offence which possibly for a time would, in some localities, produce ill-felling. A popular officer, utterly unfit, however, for the position, may succeed in a section in bringing out for a time a good body of men who might, but for him, have remained at home. Such instances, no doubt, Major-General Luard has found, and if he has offended such a one the result to the Force might, by some, be considered injurious there.

Mr. WOODWORTH.

“I have heard the Major-General speak to an officer, finding a good deal of fault as to the appearance, etc., of the men of his company, for which neither the officer nor the men were responsible, but the fault lay with others in furnishing improper, or failing to provide proper equipment. But he would at the same time be careful to state that this fault was found, not with the officer or his men, but to show to each and all what was really requisite, to what they should aspire, and as a reminder to them to use their exertions in the right direction.

“I wish I could have expressed my feeling at less length, but I have always felt indignant at the attacks made so frequently on one who is, in a great measure, prevented from defending himself.”

Now, Sir, I think it was only right and proper that that letter from Col. Cooper should be read, in order that hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House might know that there is not that consensus of opinion that has been referred to. I think, Sir, there are three old British rules of fair fighting, that have been to a great extent transgressed here to-night. There is an old rule, that you should not strike a man when he is down; there is another rule, that you should not strike a man below the belt; there is a third rule, that you should not strike a man when his back is turned, and I think those three rules have been transgressed here to-night. As to striking a man below the belt, I refer to the fact of accusations being brought against General Luard upon a matter which is not before the House at all, and which should be dealt with only by those in possession of the facts. As far as striking a man when he is down is concerned, I think that sufficiently explains itself. I think that to any body composed of English gentlemen, and of French gentlemen, who are quite as gallant as English gentlemen, those three rules are rules that will commend themselves. I wish to say that so far as Col. Williams is concerned, and so far as Major-General Luard is concerned, I have had the pleasure of knowing them both, and I believe they are both courteous and kind-hearted gentlemen, and I believe, upon this occasion, they are probably, both of them, to a certain extent right, and both of them, to a certain extent, wrong. I think it is a great pity that this matter has been brought before this House. I think, perhaps, it is more to be regretted for the reason that the hon. gentleman from Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) has stated what I am quite sure, if he had been better informed, he would not have stated—that Major-General Luard had treated the volunteers of Canada in a different manner to that in which he would have treated the volunteers of Britain. If that hon. gentleman were to go to England and introduce himself there as a Canadian, he would find that the fact of his being a Canadian would be a passport to the hearts of the people of England; and I am quite sure that so far from any British officer doing, as he fancies General Luard has done, any officer coming here from England would feel that he was bound to treat the volunteers of Canada with even greater consideration and greater respect than he would treat the Militia or volunteers of England.

Mr. OUIMET. This discussion reminds me of something that occurred when I commenced my law practice. One day I was applying to a Judge of the Queen's Bench to grant bail to a client of mine. I had the record in my hands, and I tried to show, to the best of my ability, that my client was not guilty. After examining the record, the Judge quietly remarked to me: “Mr. Ouimet, your client may not be guilty, but certainly he has been very unfortunate.” Well, Mr. Speaker, if General Luard is not guilty, he has certainly been very unfortunate; and as bail has been granted to him, as it was to my client, and if we do not hear any more of him, as we did not hear any more of my client, then I think it would be a very pleasant thing for us all. As to General Luard's efficiency as an officer of the British army, I have nothing to say; but I think he has shown himself very deficient as an officer entrusted with the command of our Militia. He has very often insulted—and I use the word advisedly—gentlemen commanding corps, who, to my personal knowledge, did not deserve it. I do not say that he meant to insult them, but he was very unfortunate in his expressions. Having been myself Commandant of a volunteer battalion in Montreal, I once had occasion to send a communication to the Department, through the Brigade Officer in Montreal. It was written in French. I supposed it was my right to write in French on a military matter as well as on any other matter. A few days afterwards, I received the communication back again, with a marginal note, written in pencil: "Do translate that into English." I thought that the command was military, but it was certainly not very civil. I might cite other instances. One day I asked for an armoury for the use of my regiment. We all know that the Militia in this country, and more especially in Montreal, are not well provided with drill sheds. My regiment was quartered in a public hall, open to the winds and to the public, and wanted an armoury in which to keep the equipments and accoutrements under lock and key. Well, I received an answer from the General, stating that he was very much astonished that the friends of the battalion, who were the only parties, in his opinion, who could be received in that drill shed, were capable of stealing the accoutrements. Well, I found that the friends of the battalion were the general public. Well, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that here in this House we are all very honest men, but we have heard of caps and other things being stolen from the corridors, and yet it was never supposed that the friends of hon. members, who were introduced into the corridors, were capable of committing petty larceny. I might relate another instance. I was present last fall when the gallant 5th Royal Scots were inspected in Montreal by General Luard. They were thoroughly equipped; they wore the traditional plaid and kilt, and I suppose these cost the officers of the regiment several thousand dollars, nearer $10,000 than $5,000. It was late in October, or the beginning of November; it was a rainy day and cold, and I thought it was very creditable to see the regiment turn out as they did, and I certainly thought they did splendidly. The only remark made by the General to the regiment was this. He said—I will not repeat the word he placed at the head of the sentence—"Just think of a regiment going into service with such accoutrements." That was the only compliment paid to the battalion, and he then left. In my opinion, it was not becoming an inspecting officer to use such a disagreeable and unpleasant expression to a regiment which certainly did credit, not only to the Canadian Militia, but more especially to the Scotchmen who reside in Montreal. I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, but I desire to say, in conclusion, that the General was certainly very unfortunate, and yet it was very fortunate that he left under such good circumstances, and if he has something to complain of, it is that his friends were indiscreet in raising such a discussion here, which may bring back to him some unpleasant reminiscences of Canada.

Mr. VAIL. I did intend, Mr. Speaker, to have offered some remarks on this subject; but after the statement made by the First Minister, I feel I ought not to say anything beyond this: That it is very unfortunate for General Luard that this matter has been brought up; that it is very unfortunate also for Col. Williams, the hon. member for East Durham, and it is, I am afraid, rather unfortunate for the Militia as well. I think it was unwise on the part of Col. Williams to have allowed this matter to get into the press. I do not know who is responsible for the circulation of it; but I received two Port Hope papers marked, each referring to this case and giving an account of the whole matter. I was sorry to see it, of course. I happened to be in England in 1882, and found some of the articles copied into English papers, and I was several times spoken to on the subject and asked if the reports were true. One gentleman, high in authority, asked me particularly about it there, and said he was very sorry to see the report, as he was a great friend of the General, and he asked me whether the reports were correct or not. I replied that I knew nothing about the matter, except the reports in the newspapers. I asked him not to place too much confidence in the newspaper reports, and said if there was anything in the charge it would be investigated by the Government and he would learn more about it from official sources. All I have to say in regard to General Luard is, that I have known him for a long time. During some three or four years he was Military Secretary at Halifax. He was known to be a thorough soldier, a man who stood high in the service, and who attained very nearly the highest position in his profession; and I am very much astonished to see this statement made in regard to his conduct, because every one who is acquainted with him intimately, knows him to be a gentleman. I am sorry the First Minister was not able to rise in his place and assure the House that the charges had been made, perhaps, without giving the matter proper consideration, and that after all, there was not much in them and that the General had left the Dominion with his character unstained.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the debate is closed, I desire to offer a few remarks in reply. In making the motion, I think I can safely say I did not venture to offer an opinion on any alleged state of facts. I did not criticise adversely or favourably the action of the gentlemen concerned in this matter; but from a sense of duty, to which I will refer further on, I made this motion. Why I made it, I will state, and I will take the responsibility of it. Before, however, passing to that branch of the case, I will refer to some remarks by some hon. gentleman directed towards a gentleman not a member of the House, and which were not, in my opinion, material to a discussion of this question; I refer to the references made to Col. Gzowski. Other hon. members are as fully entitled to their opinion as I am to mine, and I simply state my opinion, in order that it cannot be said there was no member to be found in this House who would stand up and utter a word in his defence when his name was referred to in not flattering language. I think that he is entitled to the thanks of this country for the service he has rendered in certain directions in developing an interest in military matters. He may not, as is the case with General Luard, have succeeded in pleasing all classes; but still I think we will all be willing to admit that he has been animated by a sincere and disinterested desire to do good to the cause he had at heart. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) has stated that the hon. member for East Durham was not desirous of shielding himself behind his position as a member of the House. I am sorry that I cannot agree with him in that statement. When I made the motion, I endeavoured to make clear two distinct propositions, not taking the responsibility of stating that the facts existed on which the propositions could be proved, but giving the facts, if facts they were, and asking and hoping for a denial. I first of all called the attention of the hon. member for East Durham to the tenor of certain observations, both in the press and in the correspondence, a portion of which I have, and how I got it I will explain for the benefit of the First Minister and the House. I say that correspondence pointed to this state of affairs: That after mess, after the officers had retired from parade, when the troops were disbanded, and each man had returned to his calling as a citizen, then it is intimated that the hon. member for East Durham gave information to the Port Hope Times, and inspired the article which subsequently formed the foundation of his communication to the Secretary of State. I stated that pointedly, and invited a contradiction. The hon. member for East Durham has not contradicted it; he has not denied that he had connection with the publication of that article; and sitting in his place in this House, if he does not deny it, I must, I think, be fairly entitled to assume that he had a hand in the inspiration of the article. And if he does not now deny it, I will take the liberty of reading to the House what the Military Law upon such conduct is. Since the hon. member for East Durham has not now denied his connection with that article, I think I am fairly entitled to assume that he had a part in inspiring it. I shall now read from the Regulations and Orders for the Militia of Canada, 1883, page 48, section 170 :

"If officers, non-commissioned officers or men, whether on actual service or otherwise, have any complaint or accusation to bring against a superior or other officer, such complaint must be forwarded to the complainant's commanding officer, who will transmit the same, with his remarks, through the Deputy Adjutant-General commanding the district, for consideration at Headquarters if necessary. It cannot be permitted that they shall bring accusations against superior officers or comrades before the tribunal of public opinion, either by speech or letters inserted in any newspaper; such a proceeding would be in glaring violation of the rules of military discipline and in contempt of authority."

I also refer to a higher authority, that is to the Queen's Regulations, which are in substance part of the Regulations applicable to the Active Militia of Canada, section 6, subsection 46 :

"The practice of making anonymous complaints or publishing anything through the medium of the press, calculated to act injuriously on the interests of the Service, or to excite discontent in the army, is strictly prohibited."

I merely say, in passing, that to my mind it is not wise and proper for the efficiency of the Service for any person connected with the Volunteer Service to resort to the medium of the press in order by means of anonymous communications to ventilate his grievances. If he has a grievance, the discipline of the Service provides a remedy. His duty is to transmit his complaint through the next superior officer. The next superior officer to the hon. gentleman was the Deputy Adjutant-General for the district. He should have directed his complaint to the Deputy Adjutant-General of the district, and he would have seen that it was transmitted to the proper tribunal. If that tribunal was the Secretary of State, there it would have gone; if the Minister of Militia, there it would have gone, and he would have discharged his duty if he had adopted the clear course marked out by the Regulations for the Militia of Canada. It is said that the hon. gentleman is not shielding himself behind his position as a member of this House. If not, what is he doing; if not, why does he not adopt the regular course provided by the Regulations? I say that under the military law he has no privilege, which is not possessed by any private in the Service, which could justify his communication. I refer to a high authority on this point, to the case of a member of Parliament serving in the army, who was under arrest. His Majesty King George III communicated to Parliament that for a breach of military duty a certain member of Parliament was under arrest, and he asked, whether, under the circumstances, Parliament deemed it proper to consider the matter. The reply was that Parliament thanked His Majesty for his careful consideration for the privileges of its members, but did not deem it proper to interfere. I refer to Clode, on the Military Forces of the Crown, vol. 1, page 177, where this, the case of Major Stanhope is referred to. I have not brought this motion forward for any mere sentimental reason. I have not brought it forward as the First Minister intimated, at the instigation of anybody. I brought it forward on my own motion and responsibility,—on my duty to the House and as a citizen, and as one interested in the efficiency of the Service. Sir, the hon. gentleman asked me how I became possessed of this correspondence—for, no doubt, he referred to me. He did not refer to hon. members on his own side of the House, who are equally in possession of this correspondence, but I will tell him how I became possessed of it. I placed this notice on the notice paper when I saw in the newspapers that General Luard had been retired, or was about to retire, or was asking for leave of absence. If the motion had been allowed to come up when it was first reached, I would not have had the advantage of the correspondence. The motion was enlarged at the request of the Government, and an hon. member chose to forward to me by letter—a gentleman to whom I had never spoken, a gentleman who is a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite—this correspondence, stating that he had intended to make a motion himself, but as I had a notice on the paper, he forwarded the correspondence. As soon as I received it, I placed it in the hands of the hon. member for East Durham and told him that I had that information upon which to base my remarks, and he could take such a course as he saw proper. If the First Minister desires to have the name of his own supporter who sent the correspondence to me, I am prepared to give it. I have not the honour of the acquaintance of General Luard, and I have not had any request to make this motion. I repeat, that I make this motion in the general interest of the public and in no other interest. I think it is in the interest of our Service that we should have it clearly established, first, whether a member of this House, in the ranks as a soldier, has any rights and privileges different from those of another soldier, except during the time he is discharging his duties as a member of this House. If the hon. member for East Durham felt that the dignity of the House was offended, what was his course? His course was when the House met, to have moved in the House, and then to have availed himself of his position and privilege as a member of this House. But he did not do so. Instead of that, he allows this charge to hang over the head of a man of whom I can only say I do not know whether he is innocent or guilty. It is true, they may have succeeded in destroying his reputation, but unfair as that is to him, it is trifling in comparison with interfering with the efficiency of the Militia Service of Canada. I have moved in this matter because I have seen, in the first place, a man who strikes me from observation as having been unjustly treated—charged and yet not charged—no definite accusation, no opportunity of trial—struck below the belt, driven and exiled from the country which invited him here. What an example is that to the Militia of Canada! Is there a soldier in the Service who deserves that treatment. Whatever the faults the General may have been, there is not a man, from a Colonel down to the lowest in the Service, who would desire to have the whole Governmental power of Canada united in expelling from Canada, on an unproven charge, a vague charge, a man who is sent here at our request, a man having the record of Major-General Luard. Why, Sir, his greatest opponents did not treat him like that. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) told us of his record; that he had entered the Service in early life; that he had risen from a low position to be what he is, an ornament to the Service; that in the Crimea, in India, and China, he has fought for his country. I believe I can add to that record, that he served even against the barbarians, and that even the Zulus gave him a chance for his life, treatment denied him in free Canada. Surely I am entitled to make this motion without being addressed as I have been addressed by the First Minister. I simply then say, in conclusion, that I make the motion in the interest of the Service, and also in the interest of a man, who in my opinion has not had a trial.

Motion, as amended, agreed to,

THE CREDIT OF CANADA.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton), in the absence of Mr. MITCHELL, moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada of any of its members, and Sir John Rose, or between either of them, and Messrs. Baring & Glynn, the Financial Agents of he Dominion, or either of them, in the year 1875, in relation to the conduct of Mr. Potter, the President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, in decrying the credit of Canada; also the credit of the Province of Quebec, in relation to the effort of the latter to effect a loan in London, or the credit of that Province for the construction of railways therein. Also, copies of letters, correspondence, or communications, written by Mr. Potter, or by him as President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, reflecting upon or discrediting the credit of Canada, or the Province of Quebec, or written by any officer of the said Company in the year aforesaid, which led to the writing the letter or letters to Sir John Rose, before referred to, by any member of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING FACILITIES FOR AGRICULTURISTS.

Mr. ORTON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the following Resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a Bill to extend better banking facilities to the agriculturists of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the hon. gentleman has a Bill on the order paper on this subject, for which the House has appointed a day for the second reading. I think there is a rule by which, when an hon. member has made a motion with reference to a measure, and the House has already appointed a day for its discussion, it shall have to be proceeded with in that form. I think we shall have to get rid of the Bill before we can go on with the resolution. I suggested this difficulty to the hon. gentleman when he was introducing his Bill.

Mr. ORTON. I may not have been heard, but when the matter was under discussion, I asked leave to withdraw the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might now be allowed to have the order discharged, and then we could go on regularly.

Mr. SPEAKER. The order for the second reading of the Bill has not been discharged. I am not, at present, prepared to give a decision in the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is now half-past eleven, and I move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. BLAKE. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has followed the suggestion of the First Minister, to get this matter in the Banking and Commerce Committee, among the gold.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:30 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 11th March, 1884.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say a word on a question of privilege. I find in an issue of the Chicago Inter Ocean, a copy of which I hold in my hand, the following special telegram:—

"OTTAWA, Ont., March 5th.

"A resolution to test the members views on prohibition, was brought up in the House to-night by Prof. Foster of New Brunswick. He gave a lengthy speech, so it was impossible to reach a vote, much to the disgust of the temperance people, and the motion was therefore put at the foot of the order paper, which makes it doubtful its coming up again this Session. It is stated openly that Foster arranged to do this with the Government, as the Ministers were in a quandary how to act, with the prohibitionists on one side, and the licensed victuallers on the other."

I had the curiosity, after receiving this from a very earnest and warm friend asking what I meant by such action, to look through the files of the newspapers in the reading room, and I found the majority probably of the papers belonging, I am bound to say, to one political party alone, represented either that I was ordered by the Government, or asked by the Government, or of my own will and purpose did deliberately engage to talk out and kill the Resolution. Now, Sir, I wish simply to state this: the manner and the matter of my speech are legitimate subjects for criticism but my motives I hold are my own property, and I have a right to explain them to the House. With respect to these statements I may say that as regards fact and intention they are absolutely without foundation; they are utterly, entirely and completely false.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend "The Seamen's Act, 1863," and "The Act respecting Certificates to Masters and Mates of ships, 1874," as to apply certain provisions thereof to Canadian foreign-going ships over one hundred tons register, instead of over one hundred and fifty tons register.

He said: The explanation of this Resolution is this: Under the Act which was first passed only vessels of over 150 tons were required to have certified master and mates. An Act was passed last year respecting coasting vessels, in which the limit was placed at 100 tons. This proposition is framed with a view to bring the two Acts into harmony.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON. Will the hon. gentleman explain the difference between the Acts in force and the present Bill?

Mr. McLELAN. At present if they are for the West Indies or other foreign ports, the Acts apply to those between 100 and 150 tons. The Act of 1873 applies only to vessels of 150 tons engaged in the coasting trade; but last year's Act respecting coasting vessels limited it to 100 tons. This Resolution is intended simply to harmonize the two.

Mr. VAIL. When do you propose to bring the Bill in force?

Mr. McLELAN. On the first of July.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 116) to amend An Act respecting certificates to Masters and Mates of Ships, and the Seamen's Act, 1873.

Bill read the first time.

ENQUIRIES INTO SHIPWRECKS.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend "The Act respecting enquiries and investigations into shipwrecks and other matters," as to the power of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in certain cases reported to him under it.

He said: The chief amendment made by this Act is to provide, that instead of the decision at these enquiries being announced in open Court, the report of the officer shall be made to the Minister of Marine, so that the Minister may have an opportunity of amending it in any way, or ordering a further investigation into any particular points.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman does not propose, I suppose, that the report shall be altered by his authority. He may over-rule it but the two reports are to stand, just as in the case of a court-martial.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, that is the case.

Mr. WELDON. How would the party be able to appeal when he does not know what the decision of the court below is?

Mr. McLELAN. The decision in all cases will be announced immediately, and an appeal could be made as in other cases.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee).

Mr. WELDON. Under the present law a master or mate, who is punished by the withdrawal or suspension of his certificate, has an appeal to the Minister of Marine; but under the proposed amendment the report is not published, but sent to the Minister of Marine, who then and there gives in reality the primary decision. This would therefore appear to deprive the parties of the right to appeal.

Mr. McLELAN. No; it is not intended to do away with the appeal, but we think it is well that the Minister of Marine should have some intimation of the decision of the Court has reached before it is announced in public. The decision of the Court will stand as the decision of the Court. The amendment is for the purpose of obviating the unpleasantness which sometimes arises in having the decision announced publicly when that decision may be amended or referred back for the purpose of having further evidence on particular points—evidence which might affect the decision of the officer as well as the decision of the Minister. Some points of the evidence might appear weak, and it might be desirable to strengthen them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The analogy drawn by the hon. member for West Durham to the court-martial is a very apposite one. The court-martial acts and communicates its action to the Commander-in-chief, but it is not promulgated in any way, and for a very obvious reason among many, that the Court may have acted illegally, and the Deputy-Adjutant General may send the matter back on account perhaps of some irregularity. But I quite agree with the point taken by my hon. friend opposite, that it would be very improper that the Minister should in any way alter the report of the Court below. That is quite clear; and it is also clear that before making up his mind before declaring his judgment either in support of, or adversely to the report of the Court below, the party should have an opportunity of expressing his opinion; because human nature is human nature, and if the Minister of Marine once gave his approval of the judgment of the Court below, that would be deciding without the chance of an appeal. I think this can be provided for in the Bill which my hon. friend proposes to found on his Resolution.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Mr. McLEAN introduced Bill (No. 117) to amend the Act respecting enquiries and investigations into shipwrecks and other matters, as to the power of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in certain cases reported to him under it.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. McLELAN.

CO-OPERATIVE LIFE INSURANCE.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Consolidated Insurance Act, 1877, with respect to companies transacting the business of Life Assurance under the title of "Co-operative Life Insurance Companies," "Mutual Benefit Associations," and the like.

He said: Perhaps I shall best explain the nature of the Bill and the necessity for it by reading a memorandum which has been placed in my hands by the Inspector of Insurance:

"Associations of the nature described in this Bill have been declared to be Life Insurance Companies by several decisions of the Courts in the United States; and, according to the opinion of our Department of Justice, come within the scope of our Life Insurance Statute, and cannot therefore legally do business in Canada without a license and without making the deposit of $50,000.

"In their original form, these were institutions of a fraternal or benevolent character, merely collecting assessments on the death of a member to pay funeral expenses, or a beneficiary gift to the family. Thus having no capital or accumulated funds, nor needing a reserve to be kept in hand, they would clearly be unable to comply with the Statute by making a deposit. It appears, therefore, to be necessary to apply special legislation to them (as has been done in most of the States of the Union), and the present Bill proposes in effect to exempt them from the operation of the Life Insurance Act under certain conditions, and thus to legalize the action of the numerous benevolent associations which are at present under the ban of the law.

"Although the origin of these associations was as above stated, numerous companies have been started on the same system for the purposes of profit, and come into competition with the regular life companies, asserting that they can give insurance at a cheaper rate and thus appealing successfully to a large class of the population. Whether such a system can be permanently carried on or not (which need not be discussed) it is clear that it opens a road for an immense amount of fraud; because, as the profits and charges for commissions and expenses are made on each assessment, the more numerous the deaths the greater will be the returns, and hence arises a temptation to increase the number of deaths by insuring bad lives and by other fraudulent artifices. This has been repeatedly done as in the notorious 'graveyard' insurances in the State of Pennsylvania and elsewhere, immense gains having accrued to the managers before the inevitable collapse came. There seems no safeguards against this except

"(1.) A directorate which shall be known to the people and whose characters may be judged of. This is attempted to be secured by requiring the Company to be incorporated within Canada.

"(2.) By requiring a full statement of their business and accounts annually or oftener. If these accounts are satisfactory, the Minister of Finance is empowered to exempt the Company from the operation of the Insurance Act, and to continue such exemption so long as the Company appears to be honestly and satisfactorily managed.

"The publication of these accounts in the Annual Report of the Superintendent of Insurance will insure all the publicity necessary to enable the public to judge the quality of the Company.

"The Government herein accept no responsibility except that of refusing the exemption when a Company appears to be badly mismanaged or tainted with fraud; and the necessity of retaining this power of refusal may be illustrated by the fact stated by the Commissioner of Pennsylvania, that out of 236 such companies organized under a Statute of 1876 it was found in 1881 that 171 of these had been dissolved by the courts; 7 had voluntarily ceased business; 21 had failed to report to him, having probably become disorganized, and only 37 had reported to his Department.

"With regard to foreign companies, the Bill does not affect them, but leaves them as at present to enter Canada by complying with the Life Assurance Act. This is no hardship upon them, because if they are really benevolent or fraternal associations they can readily obtain incorporation for their Canadian branches; and if they are companies worked merely for the sake of profit, it is not too much to require that they shall make the deposit of $50,000 as a guarantee of good faith, and be otherwise subjected to the same stringent rule of supervision as the regular life companies with whom they are competing."

As stated here, it has been decided that these companies are operating contrary to law. No action has been taken in any of the Provinces that I know of, but communication has been had with the Government, urging that some step should be taken to authorize them to do business, and this measure is proposed for that purpose. It requires from these benevolent societies no deposit, but it requires that they should be incorporated, that they should have offices for the transaction of business, and that they should transmit to the inspector of insurance, once a year, or as often as the Government requires, a statement of their business and organization.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does it cover both American and Canadian companies?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It covers American companies, if by their branches they are incorporated—not otherwise.

Motion agreed to; Resolution considered in Committee, reported, and read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 118) to modify the application of the Consolidated Insurance Act 1877.

Bill read the first time.

SALE AND DELIVERY OF COAL.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that all contracts for the sale and delivery of coal shall be made for such sale and delivery by weight, and that all sales of coal shall be by weight.

He said: The object was to make the sale of coal uniform throughout the Dominion. In the Western Provinces it was sold by weight, but in some places in the Lower Provinces it was sold by measure. If necessary the Act could be amended and power given to inspect these measures; the representatives of the trade generally were of opinion that the weight system was the most acceptable and just. A man was surer of getting his money's value by weight than by measure. The ton would be the short ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What penalty, if any, for infraction of the Act do you propose?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will propose that in the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Resolution considered in Committee, reported, and read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Mr. COSTIGAN introduced Bill (No. 119) respecting the sale of Coal.

Bill read the first time.

OFFENCES AGAINST WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend "The Weights and Measures Act of 1879," so as to provide better for the prevention and punishment of offences against it.

He said this amendment was intended to provide for the better enforcement of the Act by extending the penalties to the amendments of the original Act.

Motion agreed to; Resolution considered in Committee, reported, and read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Mr. COSTIGAN introduced Bill (No. 120) to amend the Weights and Measures Act of 1879.

Bill read the first time.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, 1882, by reducing the fees payable on the renewal of Engineers' Licenses.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to a matter which may as well be treated of in this connection with this proposition of his as at any other time. If my memory serves me right, the Inspection Act does provide that the Minister of Marine or officers appointed by him should see that steam vessels, particularly those which are in the habit of taking passengers on excursions, are not overloaded. The law, I believe, is good enough, but I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that that law is habitually violated in almost every port in our inland waters. Every gentleman who has any experience in these matters, will, I think, bear me out in saying that it is a very frequent thing indeed to see steamers going out of port very seriously overloaded, so overloaded that, if any accident, either by fire or otherwise, should occur, an enormous proportion of the excursionists must perish. Now, I desire, without impeding the progress of the measure, to take the opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister to that notorious fact. This is the proper time for precautions to be taken to prevent any accident occurring during the summer. On the whole, we have been free from such accidents in Canada, but the hon. gentleman will know that, in England and other places, an enormous loss of life has over and over again resulted from the carelessness or greediness of owners of steamboats in over-crowding their vessels; and as our vessels are usually made of wood, not of iron, any accident, and particularly any accident from fire, would be exceedingly difficult to guard against. I have seen vessels so overloaded that, when a slight accident caused the people to go to one side, the vessel would almost roll over on her beam ends; and I can answer, from my own experience, for this fact, that the number of boats and life-preservers kept on those vessels was utterly and entirely inadequate to give the passengers the least chance of safety. I do not want, as I have said, to delay the progress of the measure, but I take the opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister to the facts of the case, and to the necessity for greater vigilance on the part of the officers whose duty it should be to guard against such danger to human life.

Mr. MACMILLAN (Middlesex). I am very happy that the member for South Huron has called the attention of the Minister to this important matter; but, when the hon. gentleman says that accidents of that kind do not occur in the inland waters of Canada, he must have forgotten the melancholy fact of the accident which occurred two or three years ago in the neighbourhood of the city of London.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I said only a few.

Mr. MACMILLAN. When, on a small stream, a rivulet you might almost say, from 160 to 180 people were drowned, in consequence of the unfortunate circumstance of the vessel being overloaded. I am not aware of the contents of the hon. Minister's Bill, but I would strongly urge that the greatest care should be taken in this way, and that it should be made criminal, not only for the owners, but for all parties connected with it, that anything of the kind should be allowed as the overloading of these vessels.

Mr. McLELAN. Since the accident to which the hon. gentleman refers, I have had passed through the House a Bill providing for the inspection of the hulls of steamboats as well as the boilers and engines, and the inspectors of the hulls and the inspectors of the boilers and engines have to come together and to decide the number of passengers which a vessel should be entitled to carry. The law is, perhaps, stringent enough, and I am aware of the necessity for having it carried out. The law has only been in operation a year, and perhaps we have not quite got up to the standard of vigilance, but we have been impressing on the inspectors the necessity of vigilance in this matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say the law is quite sufficient, if it were enforced. As I mentioned in my remarks, it is not the law itself that I think is defective, but the enforcement of the law, and my object in calling the hon. Minister's attention to it, was that further pains should be taken in enforcing the law.

Mr. DAWSON. There have been a great many accidents in the waters of Lake Huron and Lake Superior. I think it would be very desirable that some Government officer should have authority to prevent vessels that were overloaded from going out, and that vessels should have certain marks upon them for good weather and for the fall. A good many of these losses which occurred on Lake Huron and Lake Superior, arose from overloading in the fall of the year, and I think, if the Custom House officers, for instance, at the ports had authority to prevent the vessels going out overloaded, that would be a step in the right direction, at all events.

Mr. BERGIN. I am not aware to what extent the Minister proposes to reduce the fees payable by engineers. Perhaps he will be good enough to let us know.

Mr. McLELAN. The Act passed in 1882, provided that engineers having obtained a first-class, should be exempt from fees, and that engineers holding second class certificates should be examined annually, and should pay annually a fee of $5. It was supposed that the second-class engineers would not remain in that class very long, but would pass up into first-class engineers as rapidly as possible, and the law was so framed to induce them to pass from the second to the first-class and become first-class engineers, and the fee was kept at $5. It is found in practice that there are not many boats of sufficient capacity and power of engines to afford facilities to many of the second-class engineers to qualify for first, and become exempt from payment of the annual $5 charge. It is proposed to reduce the fee for second-class engineers from $5 to $2.

Mr. BERGIN. So far as the explanation of the Minister goes, as to the position of those who have not been able to obtain certificates as first-class engineers, it is very satisfactory, but I regret that he has not seen his way—and I would press him now—to reduce the fee from $2 to $1. At first sight, it may appear that $2 is not a very large sum for these men to pay, but it means a day's pay for each one of them. We know that, each year, owing to the competition with railways and other causes, the number of men employed as second-class engineers is diminishing, and the majority of these men are obliged to go to an additional expense in presenting themselves before the Board of Examiners. These men, as a rule, are subjected to great expense in going up for examination to Toronto and Montreal, and this is a matter of serious consequence to them and their families. The men employed as engineers have no other means of livelihood, as a rule. They are employed only about seven months of the year, and during the other five months they are idle; in other words, they consume during the winter what they earn during the summer. I think the Minister would be doing an act of justice to these men in reducing the fee from $2 to $1.

Mr. COCKBURN. I think, also, it ought to be reduced to $1. That was the old rate charged.

Mr. McLELAN. I would suggest that this matter would be more conveniently considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKBURN. When that time comes, I hope the Minister will have his mind made up to reduce the fee to $1. With reference to the unsafety of a class of vessels, I may say that this trouble will be much obviated by a system of hull inspection. Unless a boat is properly constructed, it is very easy to keel it over when it is loaded in a certain way. That was the cause of the accident at London. That vessel was not a steamer, and if there had then been a hull inspector to supervise the construction of steamers, I am satisfied no such craft would ever have passed. It is the shape of a boat rather than its size that makes it unsteady, and the danger arising from bad construction of vessels will be obviated by the hull inspector.

Resolution reported, and read the first and second times and concurred in.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No 121) to amend "The Steamboat Inspection Act, 1882," by reducing the fees payable on renewal of Engineers' Licenses.

Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST GRIEVANCES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman brought down the information asked for regarding the North-West grievances?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yesterday.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. Minister of Agriculture is in his place perhaps he can answer when the second volume of the Census is to be ready, and when his report is coming down.

Mr. POPE. I hope the report will be down this week. I promised the second volume of the Census before this time, and expected it would have been ready, but I could not get it sooner.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose it is the printers' fault.

Mr. POPE. It is the same old story. It has been in the printers' hands for a long time, but it is a kind of work that printers cannot do very fast. A great deal of the time they have only been able to get out 16 pages a day, and that means 16 pages a week. I mean to say that we get from them the proof of 16 pages, and these have to be revised by us and sent back. As a rule we only get one of those proofs a week. That rate has continued for three or four months, and now they have promised that we will get two or three proofs per week for the rest of the time. If we get three proofs, two weeks will carry us through; if we do not get more than two, it will take three weeks.

IMPERFECT RETURNS.

Mr. CHARLTON. When a return in reference to timber leases was laid on the Table yesterday, I thought I would have the pleasure of complimenting my right hon. friend for great promptitude; but I find in looking it over that it is a return to a motion made last year, an Order of the House of the 15th March, 1883. I begin to fear that the return to the motion made on the 24th of January, this Session, will not be laid upon the Table of the House in time to be available this Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have got a great many extra hands in the Departments for the purpose of making all these innumerable returns that were ordered. The inquiring mind of the House is so great that it is almost impossible to satisfy it. We are putting forth the most active exertions.

Mr. CHARLTON. I may also remind the right hon. gentleman that notwithstanding the ample time that has been taken, this return that is laid on the Table is quite worthless. It gives the names of the applicants, but the most essential information called for, the names of the lessees, is not given at all. We have a list of leases and the numbers given, but not one name.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose the return is prepared to meet what was asked for.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; the return asked for the names of the lessees, and for the places where the limits granted were situated. It does not give either of these items.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Give me a little slip of what you want and I will send for it.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the Resolutions adopted in Committee on Ways and Means (p. 735) be reported and read the first time.

Motion agreed to; and Resolution reported and read the first time.

On motion for second reading,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before these Resolutions are read the second time and concurred in, I desire to say a few words in respect to them. Up to the present time we have hardly had any opportunity of discussing them collectively; we have not had the information which was necessary to enable us to discuss them intelligently, and it was only after the discussion which took place in Committee, that we have been at all able to understand the whole drift and bearing of these Resolutions. Now, I do not think that we have had sufficient information on various important points; but at the same time I propose to deal with these on the information that the hon. Minister of Finance has supplied to us. I will deal with them, as far as it is possible to deal with them in accordance with the statements he made in Committee. The first statement the Minister made, if I understood him correctly, is that we need expect no additional revenue, or no additional revenue of any moment, from these alterations in the Tariff. He also said, which in a sense was correct enough, that the changes in themselves were not of any very great importance. No doubt they are not of any very great importance as compared with those sweeping changes which the hon. gentleman made in the Tariff a few years ago, or indeed with the changes he made on several subsequent occasions. But at the same time, Mr. Speaker, it is rather noteworthy that these changes so trifling and so insignificant do nevertheless, when they come to be added together, appear to involve the addition of considerable burdens on the people of this country. No revenue, I presume, will go into the Treasury, therein, no doubt, the Minister was correct; but it by no means follows that no additional burdens are going to be placed on the people. I cannot pledge myself at all to the accuracy of the results which I have deduced from the Minister's statement. I am obliged to take these as he gave them, and presume, for the sake of argument, that they are approximately correct; but, as I have said, they do not give us the full information which I desire on these points. I believe that if we choose fairly to compute the additional burdens imposed on the people by these Resolutions, they will be found not to be less than $300,000 a year; they may amount to a considerably larger sum. That will depend almost entirely on the extent to which the various manufacturers whom the hon. gentleman desires to encourage, avail themselves of the provisions of this measure. Well, Sir, I cannot agree with the Minister in thinking that a measure which will involve at least an additional $300,000 to the burdens of the people, and that may possibly involve a considerably larger sum, is altogether a trifling addition just now. Moreover, I find that the number of hands likely to receive employment in those various industries, if I may judge from the hon. gentleman's statements and from such information as I have been able to obtain, is likely to be very small. I shall give the House briefly, but in detail, the results that I have worked out; but I beg to state that I do not hold myself at all responsible for them because they are based on the statements of the hon. Minister himself, so far as I understand them. First of all, let us take the duties on steel. The hon. Minister of Finance said those duties were about $5 per ton, and he is so reported. If I understand correctly the bearing of his measure, he is going to add $3 per ton or thereabouts on the average to these duties, so that the duties on steel from being $5 per ton, are going to become $8 per ton. And as we imported last year, according to his own statement, about 16,000 tons of steel of the classes affected by this measure, it is clear that we shall pay directly about $48,000 more for the steel consumed in this country; although it is true that no part of this will go into the Treasury, because, as the hon. Minister explained, the additional duty will just about equal the amount which will be lost by the manufacture of 8,000 tons, that being the quantity that he expects will be manufactured in future under the operation of this Tariff. $48,000 increase on an article like steel, which is a raw material for many other manufactures, does not represent the whole loss to the consumer. At least 25 per cent. must be added to represent the true loss to the consumer. Therefore, we would get on this one article an addition to the burdens of the people, without paying anything into the Treasury, amounting to about $60,000. In return for that burden the hon. Minister computes, and his estimate was corroborated by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), that he will be able to give employment to about 150 hands; another hon. gentleman named a larger number, but 160 hands appears, from what little enquiry I have been able to make, a sufficient number to produce the quantity of steel to which the Minister referred. So, Sir, we arrive as to the duties on steel at this result: that the consumer will be charged $60,000 a year, and 160 hands will receive employment. Then we come to the duties on prints of various kinds. The hon. Minister proposes, with an exception in favour of the corset makers, to alter the duty from 20 per cent. to 27½ per cent. Here again, if I understand him correctly, he is of opinion that no loss will accrue to the revenue and no gain. Now, if that be the case, it is clear that the print makers will be obliged to manufacture about one-fourth of the print import. The print import last year was of the value of $1,645,000, and therefore it follows that we would have a production of about $400,000 worth per year. That may be increased; if it be increased, of course the calculations would require correction; but I will suppose, for the sake of argument, that the hon. Minister is correct, that the increased production will not interfere with the revenue, but only that amount will be produced which will be compensated for by adding 7½ per cent. Now here, Sir, is the position in which the consumer would be placed: 7½ per cent. on $1,645,000 worth would give about $128,000, and adding as before, as we ought to add, I think, $32,000, which is equivalent to 25 per cent, the ultimate cost to the consumer would hardly be less than $160,000 a year. I do not exactly know how many hands will be employed in producing this quantity of goods, and the Minister could not tell us; but on looking at the United States Census returns, I find that about 250 people will be quite able, if the production be as much per head here as there, to produce this $400,000 worth of goods; and, consequently it will follow that under this apparently trifling addition we will give employment to about 250 hands, and the people will be taxed or burdened, which ever term the Minister chooses to employ, to the extent of $160,000 a year. Then we come to a third rather curious proposition, to which I will call the attention of the House; that is, clauses 10 and 11, by which the hon. Minister provided that knife and fork handles, and knife-blades and forks unpolished, may be brought into this country at a nominal duty of 10 per cent. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that this can hardly be called a manufacture. Here we have the articles already practically manufactured; they are brought into this country; the forks, and perhaps the knife-blades may receive some polishing and they will then be fastened together. A very small number of hands, indeed, are able to produce an enormous value under such a system as this. I have not been able, nor apparently was the Minister able, to obtain accurate statistics as to the quantity which might be imported, but I took occasion to obtain such information as I could from gentlemen connected with the trade, and they are of the opinion that, looking at the fact that those articles are very largely used, it will be quite possible, even within a year or two, for the manufacturers (so-called) who are going to indulge in this particular occupation, to import over $100,000 worth of these goods. They also pointed out, which is clear enough, that a tax of 10 per cent. on separate portions is by no means equal to a tax of 10 per cent. on the finished article; that if you bring in knife handles and forks and unfinished blades, at a duty of 10 per cent., it will in all probability only represent 3 or 4 per cent. on the finished article, so that there would be a much more considerable loss to the revenue than would appear at first sight. Now, here, as I say, the Minister did not appear to have the information, and I cannot pledge myself as to the accuracy of the statement made, but the parties whom I consulted were of opinion that a comparatively small number of hands, probably not more than thirty or forty, perhaps not so many, could do all the work which would remain to be done when these articles were brought in in this particular fashion, and that the probable loss to the revenue, which now receives about 30 per cent. on the amount imported, if I remember rightly, would amount to a considerable sum—scarcely less, perhaps, than $25,000 a year. Then, in the fourth place, we have a provision for encouraging the manufacture of steel wire and certain minor articles. Here we have the same peculiarity again to a certain extent. A tax of 5 per cent. on the steel rods which are to be made into wire, does not by any means represent 5 per cent. on the finished article; I doubt if it represents 2 per cent., and it is quite possible that a large sum will be lost in futuro to the revenue of the country. Everyone knows that in many parts of Ontario at least, and perhaps also in the other older Provinces, there is a growing disposition to use this article for agricultural purposes, and that in Manitoba and the North-West it is almost an article of necessity for the farmer. It is not easy to estimate what the revenue will lose, but everyone knows that in a very short time wooden fences all over the country will become so expensive that people will be obliged to have recourse to steel wire, and I doubt whether the loss to the revenue, supposing the hon. gentleman has allowed for the increased importation, could be put down at much less than $50,000 a year. And after all is said and done, it appears very doubtful whether this particular industry is likely to give employment to more than from 120 to 150 hands. Now, Sir, if the revenue has to be reduced, if the hon. gentleman is going to lose in presenti or in futuro, it seems to me it would be better to do it for the benefit of the agriculturists by reducing the duty on wire, than to keep it up to the present standard, and compel the agriculturist to pay a duty which will not go into the Treasury of the country at all, but into the pockets of two or three manufacturers. But it is in connection with the duty on steel that I wish particularly to call the attention of the Minister and the attention of the House to the injury which will be inflicted on a great number of other manufacturers. As everybody knows this steel is a raw material used very largely by important classes of manufacturers. The agriculture implement manufacturers use it very largely, the sewing machine manufacturers also use it, so do cabinet-makers, and carriage-makers, and I might go on with a great variety of trades all of whom will be more or less affected by the additional duty on steel imposed in the way the hon. gentleman means to impose it. Now, it is clear that if he is going to help one class he is also going to injure others, and if he puts an additional duty on steel, which, as he admits, and as I contend, will bring no revenue into the Treasury, one of three things must inevitably happen, either the manufacturers must reduce their profits, or they must reduce the wages of their workmen, or they must raise the price of the goods they have to sell. One of these three things must occur, and I do not see that the hon. gentleman can possible escape from that result. Now, Sir, I am taking his own arguments, and his own figures, and I find that there is likely to be imposed on the people an additional burthen of about $300,000 at least, under these alterations in the Tariff of Ways and Means. I find that apparently we will not be able to employ more than 560 to 600 hands in return for that additional burthen of $300,000. That means that everyone of these hands will cost this country, will cost the consumers of this country, to all intents and purposes, $520 a year. Supposing this kind of thing goes on for ten years, the hon. gentleman will see that by attempting to found these special industries the sum of $3,000,000 will be lost to the country; and I invite him to carry that calculation out on a little larger scale. What he does for one he will be expected to do for the others; and if it costs $300,000 a year to create industries which employ 500 to 600 hands, it follows ex necessitate that if he adds 15,000 or 16,000 hands to our population by employing them in similar manufactures, it would involve a loss to the country of about $8,000,000. I think, Sir, that is paying altogether too dear for the establishment of these small industries. I am not now discussing the abstract idea of protection, but I am pointing out the cost which would probably be involved in establishing these small industries to which I have referred, and which the hon. gentleman expects to encourage by this Tariff. I will not point out to him, though I might do so, what would be the result of attempting to encourage the 600,000 agriculturists of this Dominion in a similar fashion—I say I will not deal with this matter, though it is a question which might profitably be worked out by some other gentleman. I think it is time the hon. gentleman should stay his fostering hand. I think he should give us some idea of what the policy of the Government is going to be in respect to this matter. So far as I can understand from his explanation the other evening, the hon. gentleman has practically come to this conclusion, that whenever any man—I will not say any friend of his—proposes to spend a certain amount of money—$100,000 or $200,000—or even $10,000 or $20,000 in establishing a particular industry, the hon. gentleman appears quite ready to give him the protection he asks without much further enquiry. We could not find, though we cross-examined him in some detail, that he had made any careful estimate in most of these cases of what the cost would be. We could not find that he had gone into any very careful calculations as to the effects upon other trades, and that is a point which I call attention to, as he desires to protect all other manufacturers. In the case, for instance, of the duties on steel, he cannot give these gentlemen what they desire without imposing an additional burthen on a number of other trades, which, I have no doubt, he desires to protect and foster. It was said by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) the other night, that this was protection being run into the ground, and I think myself it is. I think that if the hon. gentleman goes on much further in this way he will protect everybody to such an extent that it will be impossible for a great number of people to stay in this country; and I repeat, that one of the causes, and a very important cause of the emigration from this country, which we all deplore, is the extent to which Canada is being constantly, by just such acts as these, made a dear country to live in, by which the price of all necessary articles are being raised to all classes of the community. If I have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, if I have misquoted him, if I have made any mistake in these calculations, the hon. gentleman can take this opportunity of setting me right. I do not pretend to say that all these calculations are correct, but I say that they are the result which appear to me to follow from the position taken by the hon. gentleman, that he was not going to increase our taxes, but that this arrangement was only made by him for the purpose of fostering these particular manufactures. If he does not add to our revenue, and does not take from our revenue, then I say that apparently these results will follow. I think the hon. Minister would do well to point out if I have been in error, and if I have not, I think he would do well to point out how it can be worth while for the people of this country to submit to an additional taxation of $300,000 a year for the purpose of getting, at the outside, five or six hundred additional hands.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I think, Mr. Speaker, that the narrow style of criticism in which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is wont to indulge, is best evidenced by the fact which we have seen to-day, that when alluding to the discussion which took place in Committee a few nights ago, he based part of his argument against the steel duties upon my statement that 160 men would be the number which the steel works at New Glasgow, in the County of Pictou, would be able to employ when working at their full capacity. Now, the hon. gentleman, if he listened attentively to the discussion brought out by the cross examination, as he styles it, of the hon. Finance Minister, ought to have remembered, and ought to have stated to this House, that my colleague, the senior member for Pictou, corrected the statement I made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So I did.

Mr. TUPPER. Not to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, I did to-day.

Mr. TUPPER. Well, I failed to hear it, and I do not think the hon. gentleman went so far as to state accurately the number which that hon. gentleman gave to the House, upon the information of the manager of the steel works, that would be employed by that company, if it were fully occupied, because that number, instead of being 160, which was the only number that came across the House to my ears to-day, was 300. I only state that to show that the desire of the hon. gentleman is not to fairly discuss this subject, but simply out of pure party spirit—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. TUPPER. I think this is not unparliamentary language; but if it is, I have no intention of infringing the rules of the House. What I mean is that the spirit which actuates the hon. gentleman is a very narrow spirit, and not such as ought to actuate an hon. member of this House; because, in criticising a matter of this kind, all the facts should be placed before the House. Now, I do not suppose that any person in this country, or any member of this House, believed that when the hon. Finance Minister brought this matter before the House it would be possible to please the hon. gentleman or any of his friends. I do not for one suppose that the hon. Finance Minister, in carrying forward the National Policy and suiting it more and more to the requirements of the people, is ever to reach that happy state when he will command the confidence and support of hon. gentlemen opposite. I should be sorry if the hon. Minister's policy ever tended in that direction, for the simple reason that I would fear that he was retrograding and going back to the views which these hon. gentlemen wish to have enforced. Now, this change is entirely consistent with the policy announced by this Government at the polls and in this House. That policy is well and thoroughly understood in this country; and the whole case of the hon. gentleman opposite depends upon setting class against class, and interest against interest; and this is evidenced to-day by the fact that the hon. gentleman now seeks to show that when the steel industries are assisted and encouraged, some other industry must suffer. That is nothing new. We have heard that argument over and over again from these hon. gentlemen, in regard to every feature of the National Policy; but the people of this country did not believe that that criticism was correct. The people of this country are willing that every industry that is undertaken in this country and which will benefit the country, and is calculated to thrive under a fostering protection, should receive that protection; and I believe that the Liberal-Conservative party to-day, have shown that the people of this country from one end to the other, are not bound down by sectional views to ask protection only for an interest which may be peculiar to their section of the country. We have had an evidence of that fact with regard to the flour and coal duties. That matter was discussed everywhere in this country on the same line upon which the hon. gentleman has discussed the question of the steel duties to-day; but the people of this country do not approve of that kind of reasoning. Now, the hon. gentleman endeavoured to show that the consumers were to suffer by the change proposed to be made, and that other manufacturers would suffer by having the price of an article increased when it entered largely into their industries. Well, the same argument applied to coal; but why did the hon. gentleman not candidly confess that in the United States, where the same argument was urged against the steel and iron duties, time has shown that the theory of the hon. gentleman is not borne out by the facts?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. Time has shown that the protection afforded to the steel and iron industries of the United States not only caused them to expand and grow, not only increased the number of people who obtained constant and remunerative employment, not only developed the coal mines of that country to an extraordinary extent, but went hand in hand with the reduction in the price of the articles manufactured.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen do not seem to acquiesce in the statement I have made. I would turn their attention, then, for a few moments, to some figures; because, although we have had figures ad nauseum for several days past, I cannot forbear troubling the House with a few on this question. The hon. gentlemen will remember that Great Britain had complete control of the American iron market in 1796; and it was after that that legislation was adopted with the view of encouraging that industry in the United States. Changes were frequently made, and I would refer to the effect these changes had on the price of the article in question. In considering the iron and steel industries, we must remember that they are so identified with each other that the same argument applies to both—that the protection given to iron should also be given to steel. In 1832 the tariff on iron was reduced in the United States, and in 1842 it was very low indeed; and the hon. gentlemen will find that the price during that time increased with every reduction made. In 1832, for instance, bar iron cost £5, while in 1841 it cost £6 10s. Railway iron increased from £6 15s to £8. In 1828 the duty on bar iron was increased, and the result was that bar iron which was sold at \$118 in 1821, sold at \$114 in 1829, and ultimately sold as low as \$96 $\frac{2}{3}$ , though no corresponding decrease took place in the other iron markets of the world. Again we find that in 1824, the duties were increased on hammered iron, yet the price was not increased one farthing. In 1840-41, however, the duties on iron were reduced, and then nearly all the factories connected with that great industry throughout the Union were closed, nearly 300,000 men thrown out of employment, and great suffering ensued. We know that in consequence of that experience the duties were afterwards replaced, and the result has been that the increase in that industry in the United States has been enormous and the duties have remained. To give the House a better idea of this result, I will call their attention to the development of that trade, which, in the United States, has been extraordinary. The production in 1854, for instance, instance, of pig iron, was 736,218 tons; and in 1882 that production had risen to 5,178,122 tons. In 1882, those industries consumed coal to the value of \$2,210,000. A similar development has been experienced in Germany and France, protection having enabled these countries to give constant employment to an immense number of labourers; and it is also a fact that the prices, under the different tariffs, of the articles consumed, instead of increasing, have decreased. One item of rolled bar iron, which I will mention out of many in the United States, bears out this contention. In 1844, the average price of bar iron was \$85.62; in 1876, it was \$52; in 1877, \$45; in 1878, \$44; in 1879, \$51; in 1880, \$60; in 1881, \$58; in 1882, \$61. I think, therefore, if the hon. gentlemen will take, not only these articles to which I have alluded, but the other articles in reference to which similar prophecies were made—the articles of cotton and the others that we discussed during the last few days—he will find that in every case, so far from the prophecies of the hon. gentlemen opposite having turned out to be correct, the very reverse has been the case. I say therefore, that this industry is one that is likely to thrive; it is one which nature points out as peculiar to Canada, and which is peculiarly suitable to the county and Province from which I come. It is an industry which trusts to the Liberal Conservative party, at least, to which it is now appealing, and which deserves at their hands the same encouragement that other industries have obtained.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Before the motion is adopted I desire to make a few remarks in reply to the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Richard Cartwright). He carried us back, in his speech, to 1879. Hon. gentlemen who were in the House at that time will recollect that not only in the House but out of it, it was stated with reference especially to the duty that was to be imposed on sugar to encourage the refiner in the country that this industry would employ only a certain number of men, that this Tariff would only give employment to a certain number, and that the cost to the country would be equal to about $400 or $500 a year to each of the men employed; and they went so far as to assert that it would be better to send those people to a hotel and pay their expenses there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So it would.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. What is the position to-day? Does the sugar cost the people anything more?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT and other hon. members. Yes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We know well that the sugar to-day, upon the very basis taken the other day by the hon. member, is not only cheaper than it ever was before, but than it would have been if the Tariff of 1877-78 were in operation. That has been clearly established. The hon. gentleman argues on the basis, that if you impose 10 per cent. additional duty on an article, that article will necessarily cost the consumer that much more. But, the facts do not establish that to be the case. We know well that there is scarcely a manufacturer in the country to-day who will not, in order to get his goods into the market here, place them at a lower price than the price at which they could have been imported. The same principle holds good in this case. There are exceptional cases, it is true, but wherever an article is manufactured in the country, and its manufacture produces sufficient competition among the manufacturers in the country, the price is bound to recede; and as I stated in reference to sugar and grey cottons, this has been the effect. Grey cottons to-day are purchased here for less than the price they are sold at in Massachusetts in certain lines. The hon. gentleman calls attention to one item, the item of prints or dyed cottons. I stated distinctly—so much so that the hon. gentleman put some further questions to me—that it would not have been necessary to modify the Tariff, perhaps at all, except as affecting one or two articles, if it had not been that by an omission of the Clerk of the House or in some other quarter, the article of dyed or French cotton was omitted from the Tariff Act of last Session; so that we are therefore simply putting on record what this House agreed to last Session. As it was not in the Tariff Bill, I did not refer to it in any shape or form whatever. Except as far as coutilles and jeans are concerned, there would not be an additional duty, because on those 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. more will be paid than was paid last year and the year previous, except on the portion used by the manufacturers of corsets. With reference to steel, the hon. gentleman omitted to say that the manufacturers of steel pay \$2 per ton on the raw material.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I mentioned that.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. How does he make up the amount?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Easily, by adding $3 per ton.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In whatever way he made the calculation, the hon. gentleman based it on the supposition that the consumer pays the increased duty imposed. That may be at the outset, but I have no doubt that these two establishments, when in full force, will find that they will have to sell—in fact I understand at present they are offering to parties who require it, steel at a price more favourable than the price at which they can import it. If that be the case, and that is the natural result under similar circumstances, the hon. gentleman is not warranted in putting down the additional duty as an additional tax on the people. With reference to knife handles, we import at present knife blades for silvering and plating at 10 per cent., and the celluloid that is brought into the country is simply imported in a pressed form. It then has to be cut to form the handles; there is very little work indeed, and it is imported free of duty when used by piano manufacturers in making keys. This comes in the rough shape, shaped somewhat in the form of two handles. These are cut in two, finished and manufactured, to be placed upon the knife or the fork. The proposition made here is not for all cutlery to come in in the rough state at 10 per cent., but there is a description of cast iron forks which are not made in the country. The parties now manufacturing are making all descriptions of cutlery, and they only ask that cast iron forks, which are not made or likely to be made in the country, which require powerful machinery, which are limited in the quantity of consumption, shall come in in that form, at 10 per cent.; and it forms but a very small proportion of this industry, which has been established for the manufacture of cutlery, in all its forms. Therefore, the amount lost to the revenue in that respect will probably be made up by the additional employes in those cutlery factories, and the duties they pay on the goods consumed. These are the three items to which the hon. gentleman referred. The cotton was not taken into account, because it is simply a renewal of the Resolution which was passed last Session, under which, right or wrong, we have been collecting that duty since the 1st January.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman expect to get revenue out of that? He stated that he expected to encourage the manufacture.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Of what?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of this kind of cottons.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I stated that last year. It was the ground given in the Resolution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You cannot get revenue and encourage manufacture together.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not look upon that as a change at all, because it was simply passing what we passed last year, and supposed was really in the law; but, when we came to look at it, we found it was not in the Act, and I did not refer to that as affecting the revenue in any form, because it was confirming the decision of Parliament on a previous occasion. The hon. gentleman was not here at that time, but the Resolutions were passed. The defect in the hon. gentlemen's line of argument is that they lay down the proposition that whatever duty you impose is paid by the people of the country, and over and above that, he says, are the profits to the parties engaged in the manufacture. Hundreds of illustrations have been before this House during the last five years to show that that is not the case. A gentleman waited on me the other day in reference to an industry he had started, which did not require a very large amount of capital. The Americans at once put down the price, and he had to put down his price, and they drove him to such a low figure that he had to discontinue the manufacture for a time, and then the Americans put up the price, and it cost the people of the country more than when he was carrying on his operations. And that is the case generally. There are some industries where there is not sufficient competition to reduce the price, but the feeling in the country is, and hon. members understand, and men in business understand, that manufacturers here have to sell at less than cost abroad and the duty, in order to get the market. That is the answer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, as I understand the hon. gentleman, this  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. duty is merely carrying out what was intended to be done last year. He also stated that he expected to encourage manufactures. Does he expect, if the manufacture starts, to gain or lose revenue by this operation?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The manufacture is in operation, employing 800 or 900 hands, and I think the increase probably will make up for the manufacture in the country, and the parties who are manufacturing will sell for less, I am satisfied, than it will be imported for, as far as their manufactures are concerned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you do not expect any revenue?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; I stated that.

Mr. CHARLTON. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the print factories of this country are employing 500 to 600 hands?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He said 800 or 900.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I understood so. I understood that at the factory at Valleyfield, I think it is, they are employing 800 or 900 hands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not in that one article surely?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They are engaged in dyed cottons almost exclusively.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unless they produce much less than the average in the United States, that number of hands would produce probably $1,200,000 worth of these articles.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think that is what they told me.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman's argument proceeds on the assumption that the imposition of a duty on goods will not raise the price of the domestic production. I think he is not warranted in making that assertion. I think, on the contrary, the operation of a protective Tariff is invariably to raise the price of the goods upon which the duty is levied, to raise the price of the articles to within a fraction of the cost of the article imported with the duty paid. That is the object of the duty.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The object is to give them the manufacture in the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. If it does not raise the price in that way, it does not effect the object. The hon. gentleman says grey cottons are sold here as cheaply as they are sold in Massachusetts. We have heard that before, and I should have been glad if it had been backed up by proof. I do not believe it. I think the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I am told by importers that the difference is nearly the amount of duty, that there is a difference of at least 20 per cent. between the cost of the American grey cotton and the cost of the product of the Canadian mill. That, in my belief, is true, and I believe his references to other matters in connection with this question are equally erroneous. I believe, when proof is sought for, and when proof is laid upon the Table of this House, it will be seen that the cost of goods is in every instance very essentially increased by the duty. The hon. gentleman from Pictou gave us some statistics with reference to American manufacturers, with regard to the American iron interest. He gave statistics claiming that, during periods of protection, the price of iron had been reduced in that country. I would ask why the importation of iron increased from $3,621,000, in 1882, to $51,000,000, in 1883. I would ask why the importation of cotton the importation of silks, the importation of flax and linen goods, the importation of woollens, have largely increased, have almost quadrupled under the operation of a protective tariff during the last twenty years. The fact that these goods are brought in in largely increased volume from year to year is a sufficient answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman that the price has been reduced under the operation of protection. The experience of the United States demonstrates, from the very commencement, that protection does not protect, and the healthiest advance which has been made by the manufacturers of the United States was made during the period from 1846 to 1860. The woollen interest and the cotton interest made more rapid advances than at any time since, and, when the protective tariff policy came into operation in 1861, the United States almost ceased to be a nation exporting manufactured goods. The year previous to that tariff, the United States exported over $10,000,000 of domestic cottons. That fell almost immediately to a mere bagatelle, and it did not again reach the figure at which it was in 1860 until a year or two ago. The hon. gentleman from Pictou tells us that the number of hands required to produce 7,500 tons of steel will be 300. I find, in the report of the Hansard, he claimed that 160 would be the number required to produce that amount. Well, Sir, if it requires 160 men to produce 7,500 tons of steel at New Glasgow, the production of those works will be only half as great as the production per man in the United States. I find by the Census returns of the United States, that the average production per hand is 90 tons per annum, and that the average value of the production per hand is $5,000 per annum, and the hon. gentleman, in placing the number of hands employed in producing 7,500 tons of steel at 160, is probably placing it 100 per cent. greater than it is.

Mr. TUPPER. I said the manager. I said I was corrected by the managers' statement which my colleague gave to the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. At all events the impression conveyed to the House was that the production of 7,500 tons of steel would require at least 160 hands. On the basis of production in the United States, it would not require any more than 80. He also accused my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) of a desire to set class against class. There is no desire of that kind manifested on this side of the House. There is, however, on the other side of the House, a desire manifested to create a favoured class, and a policy of that kind is a policy designed to set class against class. Where undue and unjust favours are bestowed on any class of the community, that is a policy calculated to incense the other classes of the community, and to set class against class. It is for that reason, among others, that the policy advocated by the hon. gentlemen opposite, is opposed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—because it is an unjust policy of taxing the great mass of the people of this country for the benefit of a few favoured rings; because it is a policy calculated, as my hon. friend has shown, to increase the burdens upon this country of $300,000, without adding anything to the revenue; because it is calculated to increase the burdens of the people by $300,000, for the benefit of a few pet interests, for two or three steel works in the Province of Nova Scotia, perhaps; for the benefit of a few men engaged in the importation of cutlery; for the benefit of one or two print works. That is the essential principle, the essential animus, of the protective policy—a policy designed to benefit the few at the expense of the many. The proposed changes are not of a very serious character it is true, but if they do not largely increase the burdens of the people, they are as objectionable in character, if not in degree, as were the more radical changes formerly made by the Finance Minister. Sir, I think the hon. Finance Minister utterly failed to establish the principles he laid down. He failed utterly to show that the price of goods was not increased by the imposition of a duty. I hold that in order to induce this House to believe that assertion, it would require something more than the mere assertion of a gentleman which is opposed by common sense and by the experience of all who have had anything to do with this matter; and I believe my hon. friend at my right was perfectly correct in the position he took that a duty of $3 upon steel would diminish the importations by 8,000 tons and diminish the revenue by $24,000. And, I believe he was warranted in saying that it would increase the cost of the article produced here to the extent of $3 above the cost of the imported article; and it is fair to add to this increased cost, as it always is, the profit of the wholesale dealer and of the retail dealer, and that would increase the cost by at least 25 per cent. It is fair to say that a duty of 7½ per cent. additional on printed cloths resulted in reducing the importation of that article by one-fourth; and the effect would be that the country would lose the enhanced cost upon one-fourth the quantity of goods manufactured here, while the revenue would be maintained at the expense of increasing the duties 7½ per cent. I believe it was a perfectly fair argument for my hon. friend to say that the total number of hands afforded employment by the operation of these Resolutions would not exceed, at the outset, 600; and their wages at $200 each would amount to $120,000 per annum. In order to secure the disbursement of $120,000 per annum in wages, these Resolutions proposed that the country should suffer to the extent of $300,000. Certainly this is very wasteful process, a very wasteful mode of securing employment for the labour of this country. It would be better to take $120,000 and pay it to these men out of some other source, or tax the people to the extent of that sum for the purpose of giving that amount of employment, than to tax the people $300,000 in order that the labourers of the country might receive $120,000 of that sum. I believe, I repeat, that the position taken by my hon. friend at my right is a perfectly correct one. I believe that his position was not impugned in the slightest degree by the remarks made by either of the gentlemen who followed him. I believe that the reasons advanced by him are unanswerable—certainly they have not been answered in the course of this debate so far.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). We have heard much said about grinding monopolies, about giving advantages to the few at the expense of the many, it would not, therefore, be out of place for me to make a few remarks on these points. I am told that the hon. member for North Norfolk the other day, in addressing this House, said that the manufacturers of the country were producing inferior articles to those produced under the old Tariff and sell them at a greater price. Mr. Speaker, what are the facts? Frost & Wood, of Smith's Falls, in 1875-76, manufactured, if I mistake not, 200 reapers, 500 mowers, 600 or 700 rakes, and about 1,000 or 2,000 ploughs. They are now manufacturing 1,000 reapers, 2,000 mowers, 3,000 horse rakes, and 6,000 plows. It is so with Cosset & Co, of Brockville; with Glen, of Oshawa; with Massey, of Toronto, and with the manufacturing establishments at Brantford. Now, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that reaping machines, mowing machines, horse rakes and ploughs are all of a superior character. As regards the reaping machines, they are from 100 to 400 lbs. lighter than they were manufactured then. They were manufactured out of wrought iron, out of cast iron, but now out of malleable steel, and the best of Swedish iron. I defy the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to contradict this statement—that these machines are 300 pounds lighter than they were, that they are manufactured out of superior material, and that they are sold from $10 to $15 cheaper than they were under the Tariff of the late Government. He cannot contradict that statement. Then are we not getting a superior article, and are we not getting a cheaper article? An hon. gentleman beside me, a farmer, says "Hear, hear!" because he knows the statement I make is correct. If the farmer gets a better machine, a lighter machine, manufactured out of better material, and gets it $10 or $15 cheaper, I ask this House if this policy is injurious to the agricultural community? The hon. gentleman will not contradict my statement that the machines are of a superior quality and are at the same time cheaper. Mr. Speaker, I have just told the House that the number of machines manufactured in this country is five times greater than it was under the old Tariff, and under the old Administration. Now, Sir, where are these machines going? Thousands of them are going to the Province of Quebec, and thousands to the Lower Provinces—to markets that we did not have then and that we have now. Mr. Watson of Ayr, is manufacturing machines this year which he sells at from 5 to 10 per cent. less than last year, and he has shipped a large quantity this year to Russia and different parts of Europe, to British Columbia and the Maritime Provinces, and I am proud to say that when he gets his present establishment now under construction completed, he will have one of the finest agricultural implement establishments in the Dominion. Our machines are going to Russia, Australia, France and even England, and our manufacturers are competing with the manufacturers of the world, and they are prepared to do it. All they ask is encouragement under the Tariff, and to have the home market. What is the duty paid by manufacturers to the Government on different machines? Respers mowers, ploughs and rakes would average about $1 each. Why is there to-day an increased demand, and why are the machines so much superior? Because the material entering into their manufacture is of much higher quality than before. Why can they afford to sell the machines cheaper? Because the manufacturers have better buildings, better machinery, better mechanics and have the home market. These are the reasons, and they are sufficient reasons for the success of the policy. The hon. member for South Huron will not contradict these statements.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly, I do.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Certainly, you cannot contradict them successfully. Will the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) deny that the machines manufactured in his own town are not of a much superior character to what they were in 1876, and that there are two to one manufactured now to one there was then?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). They are the best machines made.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Yes, they are better than were manufactured then. Why do hon. gentlemen opposite continually maintain that those machines are sold dearer to day than under the old Tariff. I can tell the House that they are sold at from $10 to $15 cheaper. I contend that Mr. Glen, of Oshawa, is manufacturing a better machine and selling it at from $10 to $15 cheaper than in 1876; that Mr. Massey of Toronto, is doing the same; that Frost & Wood, Smith's are doing the same, that Mr. Cosset, of Brockville, is doing the same; that manufacturers in the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Paterson) own constituency are doing the same thing. I contend, moreover, that we are making, to-day, in this country, five machines to one manufactured under the old policy that we are successfully competing with manufactures the world over; that we are putting better material into our machines, and under these circumstances it is imprudent and unjust of hon. gentlemen opposite to rise in this House and say the agricultural community are suffering. They are not suffering. They are not suffering in regard to the price they pay for their sugar. Sugar is cheaper now than it was 10 years ago. The cheese manufacturer is not suffering on his bandage-cloth, which is cheaper now than formerly. I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would endeavour to contradict these facts I have stated. Before the debate closes, I shall be able to submit statements under the signature of these parties, showing that my statements are correct. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will take into consideration the amount of benefit and advantage which the different places derive where manufactures are established. They are the means of paying out $2,000 to $5,000 per week to the labouring classes. Does not this money pass into the hands of the merchants, go to pay the taxes and contribute to the support of the country generally; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite are continually saying that we are building up a few at the expense of the many. I say we are benefitting the many and injuring none. We have no desire to injure anyone; we are anxious to do our duty to the country, and we are going to do it no matter whether hon. gentlemen opposite object or not. They say we are going into debt and excessively increasing the burdens of the country. If we are increasing the public debt, we are doing it to build railways, canals and public buildings for the benefit of the country generally. I hope our manufacturers will still continue to grow and prosper, and will still go on and improve their machinery, increase the number of their sales and successfully compete with manufacturers over the wide world.

Mr. WIGLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would say anything on this occasion if it were not that hon. gentlemen opposite constantly run down the National Policy, and claim that the manufactured products of this country are not cheaper than they were before the National Policy was introduced. This is the second time we have heard from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on this subject, and he has challenged any hon. member to show that goods are cheaper now than before the introduction of the National Policy.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. WIGLE. And the hon. gentleman always quotes the trade policy of the United States. What produced the National Policy of the United States? We find that in 1789, they started with a revenue tariff of 8½ per cent.; a year or two afterwards it was increased to 11½ per cent.; in 1792 it was further advanced to 13½ per cent., and in 1816 they commenced their National Policy. What caused them to inaugurate that policy in 1816? It was the war of 1812. They found they were depending on England for the guns with which to fight her, for the powder and shot for the army, for cloth for the clothing of the soldiers, for blankets to cover the troops; and so they settled the war question, and immediately afterwards they inaugurated the National Policy, which averaged 21 per cent. That continued for four years. After the next presidential election in 1820, what did the manufacturers of England do? They rented warehouses at the seat of Government in the United States and brought manufactured goods there to prove that they could not be manufactured cheaper in the United States. What did the people of the United States say? They said if we ever intend to be a great prosperous and independent nation we must bring manufactures to this country. So that our people shall, be benefitted by having the factories established here. They said we do not object to English manufacturers selling goods here, but to our people being compelled to take their farm produce to England, leave the money there and bring back manufactured goods. We have no objection to English manufacturers selling goods to people of the United States, they said, but we intend to impose such high protective duties as shall compel English manufacturers to come to the United States and manufacture their goods and thus our people will spend their money at home. In 1820 the tariff was advanced to 36 per cent. Four years afterwards it was increased to 38 per cent; in 1828 to 42 per cent; 1832 the compromise tariff was introduced, which was on a sliding scale for 10 years, reducing 2 per cent. per annum, which had the effect of diminishing the duties from 42 per cent. to 20 per cent. After the ten years the tariff was increased to 33 per cent, then it was reduced to 24 per cent., and in 1857 it was reduced to a revenue tariff of 19 per cent. In 1861 it was decreased, and in 1872 it was increased, averaging 42 per cent. What is it to day? It averages 40 per cent. on cottons, over 61 per cent. on cloths, over 53 per cent. on carpets, and on leaf tobacco grown in any other country, 35 cents per pound. If the arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite be correct, the consumers of leaf tobacco in the United States must pay 35 cents per pound additional. What is the Tariff to-day in this country? On woollen blankets and cloths, 7½ cents per pound and 20 per cent.; cottons, 35 per cent., and hats, 25 per cent. What produced the National Policy in this country? We had a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States for a period of ten years, from 1856 to 1866. At the time of its abrogation, what did the Americans say? They said we are establishing a protective policy; we think the best course to pursue is not to renew the Reciprocity Treaty, and they would not renew it. Then we had to do that which we thought best for ourselves. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do when they were in power? They sent Hon.

George Brown to Washington at an expense of $6,000 to see if he could not bring about another Reciprocity Treaty. The Americans, however, said to him that he had better return to Canada, that they had a Reciprocity Treaty for ten years and did not want another, that they were very well satisfied with their trade policy, and when they wanted reciprocity with Canada they would let the Dominion know. It was when the hon. gentleman came back that the leader of the Conservative party, though he was in Opposition, asked hon. gentlemen to bring down a protective Tariff, and the Conservative party would assist them in carrying it out. When the ex-Finance Minister was urged to adopt this policy, he stood up in the House and said they were nothing but flies on the wheel of this great nation, and that it would be useless to attempt to do anything of this kind. As I said on a former occasion, they are nothing but flies on the wheel, and they are like all other flies. If you have a sore on your hand, first one fly comes, then another, and another, until it is covered with flies, not for the purpose of trying to heal the sore, but to make it worse. If we have any little sore in the National Policy these gentlemen light upon it, not for the benefit of the country, but to run it down. They told the people of this country that if this National Policy were brought in the people of the United States would retaliate, and that it would be disloyal to the mother country to bring down a Tariff which would put a duty on English goods the same as the duty on American goods. Have the people of the United States retaliated? Why did we bring down this policy? Because the United States had a protective policy averaging about 40 per cent. They had a ten rail fence all around the country in the way of a 40 per cent. tariff; we had a four rail fence in the way of a 17½ per cent. tariff. Their manufacturers could jump over the four rail fence with their shoddy goods and jump back again. But when our manufacturers tried to get over, they found the fence so high that they could not jump. We said, pull down your ten rail fence to our four, or else we will make ours a ten rail fence too. Is not that the way every farmer would act, and yet hon. gentlemen said they would retaliate. Yes, they are retaliating by saying: If you take the duty off our coal we will take the duty off yours. So far as the loyalty of this policy is concerned, protection has been tried over five years, and I will guarantee that the mother country consider us as loyal as hon. gentlemen opposite, and we can stand on the great Liberal Conservative platform, and sing, "God Save the Queen" with as much grace as they can, yes, even a little more, because we are talking in favour of Canada, and these hon. gentlemen are wound up to sing "Yankee Doodle" about half the time. Now, Sir, you will remember that on the 29th of January of this year, there was an election in West Kent. It happened at the same time that election trials were going on in Bothwell and in West Kent. In the town of Wallaceburg, there was a Young Men's Liberal Association, and about four weeks before the election in West Kent, the hon. leader of the Opposition went there in order that the people might be educated as to the bad effects of the National Policy. I have his speech here, and I say it cannot be borne out by the facts, for I have the goods to prove that they are as cheap in Canada to-day, as they are in the United States. I wish to read an extract or two from the hon. gentleman's speech. I shall not take it out of Hansard, but out of the Hansard of West Kent, that is, the Chatham Banner. He said:

"I am told that it is a very different matter to go to a Conservative farmer, if he is an intelligent man, and discuss the beauties of the National Policy. There was a time when he was eager to boast of its achievements and to dilate on the benefits accruing therefrom. But now his ardor is somewhat cooled and he is glad to whip up his horses and get away from the vicinity of his interrogator as speedily as possible. This is a good sign, and shows that men are beginning to see for themselves what they do not like to say—the falsity of the National Policy, the jugglery of the men who promised a period of undisturbed prosperity, and who, having attained to power, fail to red-~~em~~ that pledge, and set about paying the way to retaining it contrary to the expressed will of a majority of the people."

This speech was reported on the 2nd of January, 1884. It happened to be in West Kent on the 29th of January, election day, and I saw the farmers of West Kent whipping up their horses to bring the voters to the polls for Henry Smith, the Conservative candidate, and they put him in by a larger majority than before. That, however, is not the point I wish to refer to. The hon. gentleman was discussing the duties on different goods, and endeavouring to prove to the Young Men's Liberal Association of Wallaceburg that the poor man is paying the burthen of duty, and the rich man is getting off scot free, or nearly so. What does he say:

"We have the item of blankets. A good article costing 6½ cents per pound, is taxed 35 per cent., so that in order to get three you have to pay the price of four, or, if you brought in four it cost you more than the price of the fourth blanket for the duty. Those at 17 pence, 40 per cent.; and the cheaper article in more common use, 70 per cent. The goods in demand by the wealthy pay 35 per cent.; those used by the working classes pay 70 per cent.—a most unrighteous discrimination. Who is it that pays the 70 per cent.? The man who is the least able and who is obliged to buy the poorer classes of goods. Who pays the least? The man whose circumstances enable him to pay the most. In ladies' jackets and mantles, too, they have a kind of sliding scale, illustrated by the following: Goods at 3s. 11d., 5½ per cent.; 4s. 8½., 48 per cent.; 5s. 11d., 42 per cent.; 7s. 3d., 40 per cent.; 9s. 11d., 37 per cent.; 9s. 9d., 30 per cent.; 29s. 9d., 28 per cent. This is the Tariff as it affects woollens. I could go on and give you the cotton instances too, if time permitted. Now, if your Government had put on the Statute Book in words to this effect: Whereas it is desirable that an Act should be passed putting the burden of the taxes upon the poor to the exemption of the rich, therefore be it enacted that the cheaper classes of blankets be taxed 70 per cent. and the best blankets only pay 35 per cent.; and the cheaper classes of cloths pay 50 per cent., and the fine cloths only pay 23 per cent.; that the poorest carpets pay 33 per cent., and the rich goods only 20 per cent.; also that the poorer mantle cloths pay 54 per cent., and the high class cloths only 28 per cent. Suppose that if either Mr. Hawkins or Mr. Smith had voted for such a Bill you would have condemned him when he returned for re-election, for having sanctioned such an unjust and iniquitous measure. And because they knew you would, that is not the way they did it. They say the rich man shall buy a pound of cloth and pay so much; a poor man shall buy a pound and pay the same. But, gentlemen, it is kept in the back ground that the rich man's pound is light and costly goods, while the poor man's is heavier and cheap."

We had the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mill-) there too. I had the pleasure of listening to him, and I think he spoke a great deal better in the country than he does here. It seemed to me the other night that he was not really sure whether he was here representing the views of the majority of the people of Bothwell or not. I have heard the hon. gentleman illustrating this Protective Policy with his hat. He would say, "Gentlemen there is a hat. Suppose we had not the National Policy and I went into the United States, I would have paid \$1 for the hat; I would come over from Detroit to Windsor, and pay 17½ per cent., so that it would cost me \$1.17½. Under this policy, however, I pay \$1 for the hat in the States, I would come over to Windsor and pay 25 per cent. duty, so that the hat would cost \$1.25." Then his friends would cheer the hon. gentleman and say "that is splendid." But the 25 per cent. was not put there to burthen the poor man, but to give our manufacturers the home market for all kinds of goods they manufacture. Now, supposing that hat is made in Canada, and the Canadian maker sells it for \$1.20; another man comes, and makes the same kind for \$1.15; then, No. 3 brings the price down to a dollar; and another man still comes along and says, I will not allow the Americans to get this trade, and I will sell the hat for 90 cts. So home competition brings down the price. But that is not the best of it. Without this National Policy, we would be compelled to get these hats in the United States, from the manufacturers of hats, because they would have all that country to sell their hats in, and would bring the surplus here. Now, without this policy, we would have to pay that dollar. Where would it go to? Every man knows that it would go to the United States. The hatter would pay the dollar to the wholesale man, the wholesale man would pay it to the retail man, the retail man to the laborer, the labourer to the butcher, the butcher to the farmer, the farmer to the blacksmith, and the blacksmith to someone else, and every man whose hands that dollar went through would make from 10 to 25 per cent. and it would benefit thousands of people in the United States. Where would the hat be? In Canada, and in six months it would be worn out, and then we would have neither hat nor money. I have a hat that was bought in London at the rate of \$4.50 a dozen, or three York shillings a piece. That hat can be sold for 50 cents, giving a profit of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent; and the result is than when that hat is worn out, the money is in the country, and the poor man can buy another with it. But the argument of hon. gentlemen is that the poor man has to pay this duty. Now, how is it? The poor man comes into a store where there is a hat for 50 cents, another for 75 cents, another for a dollar, another for \$1.25, all manufactured in Canada. But if he wants a finer hat, he takes a fine wool hat, and pays the duty on it; and I say that if he buys a \$4.00 hat, that is his business, and not the business of the Reform party of this country. The poor man is not compelled to buy that kind of a hat, but if he wants a hat like the one the leader of the Opposition wears, and he pays his three or four dollars for it, that is his business, and not the business of the Reform party. Now, Sir, we will come to the question of a particular kind of cloth. The hon. gentleman, when talking to the people of West Kent, told them that the poor class of people paid 50 per cent. on their cloths, while the rich man paid only 23 per cent. Well, I had occasion to go to a factory in West Kent and I said: "I want a part of a yard of your heaviest cloth." There is the piece of cloth I got (holding it up). It has a pound of wool in it, and I paid 50 cents a yard for it. It cost 30 cents to manufacture it. Now, I would like to know where is the 50 per cent. is paid on that piece of cloth. I will promise the hon. gentleman that if he or any of his supporters behind him—and there are a lot of merchants there—can stand up and show the House that there is 50 per cent. of duty paid on this kind of cloth, I will leave this side of the House and go and support the hon. gentleman. Well, I explained this at a meeting in West Kent. After I got through, an old French gentleman came up to me and said: "Do you see that cloth in these pants?" slapping his hand on his leg; "I grow that sheep, I cut the wool off his back, my wife spins it, and my girl weaves it, and I would like to know how I pay 50 per cent. on that?—What is the difference whether my wife spins it and my girl weaves it, or whether Mr. Taylor spins it and weaves it in his factory? It is all done in West Kent, and I would like these hon. gentlemen to show me how there is a cent of duty paid on it." But it is just like the case of the hat. A poor man goes into a store, and he sees different kinds of cloth there at from 60 cents a yard to a dollar or \$1.25, all manufactured in Canada, but if he must have Scotch goods or goods imported from other countries, then he pays the 23 per cent. the hon. gentleman spoke of. So that it is the rich man that pays 23 per cent. or 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. more than he paid under the Cartwright Tariff of 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ , which is about 35 cents more on a suit of clothes, and the poor man does not pay anything at all. Now, we will carry this argument a little further. If hon. gentlemen's arguments were correct, then if the duty was 75 per cent., the poor man would have to pay 75 per cent. more for his cloth; if the duty was a dollar, the poor man would have to pay a dollar more; and if the cloth were prohibited altogether, then the hon. gentleman would have to go back to Wallaceburg and tell the boys there, "Unless you put us back in power before your last pair of breeches are worn out, you cannot get another pair." Then, of course, he would have to say: "Gentlemen, if I was wrong when I said in Nova Scotia that it took 9 yards to make a shirt, am I wrong now in telling you that it will take 9 yards for a shirt after your pants are all worn out." Well, Sir, when we went to West Kent, we found that the Reform candidate and all the speakers for the Reform party were attacking the National Policy, just as it was attacked here by the leader of the Opposition. They all say the same thing. It puts me in mind of the two little boys who were quarrelling. One says it is so, and the other says it is not so, "Well, I tell you it is so," says the first boy, "because mother says it is so, and when she says it is so, it is so, if it is not so." That is just the way with hon. gentlemen opposite. They say it is so if Mr. Blake says it is so, because when he says it is so, it is so, if it is not so. It happens that West Kent sent to the Ontario Legislature a supporter of the Reform Government, from 1879 to 1883, with a majority of 140. But the party were not satisfied with that majority, and at the general election they sent Attorney-General Mowat, to Chatham to have a grand mass meeting the night before the election. Well, they had a grand mass meeting; the Attorney-General was there, and Mr. Meredith was there to meet him; and the result was that the people of West Kent decided to send to the Ontario House a supporter of Mr. Meredith, with 400 majority. At the last general election for this House, Mr. Smith was elected by only 156 majority. His opponent, Mr. Sampson, was sick in bed, and it was said that if he had been up, he would have been elected. Well, there has since been another election, when the leader of the Opposition went to Wallaceburg, and the hon. member for Bothwell also went into the Riding to educate the people, so that they would be sure to send Mr. Sampson here with a large majority. Instead of Smith coming back with 156 of a majority, after the people heard from all these gentlemen, they sent him back with 283 of a majority. I do not pretend to say that I can argue constitutional law with the leader of the Opposition; I do not pretend to say that I can argue Chancery law with the hon. gentleman; I do not pretend that I have had the experience in public speaking, or the education he has had; but I say that when I am talking about hats, cloths and cottons, I know as much of what I am talking about, as he knows when he is arguing a question of chancery law. In the matter of law, I only have the theory where he has the practice, but in the matter of these goods, he has the theory and I have the practice. Now, he puts me in mind of Henry Ward Beecher. Henry Ward Beecher was a great preacher and a great theorist. He found out by reading and observation—he had read a great many books on farming and he made up his mind he would try the farming business—he found out by reading and observation that dried apples were worth more than green ones, so the first year he planted \$1,500 worth of dried apples. It was a dry summer and the apples did not come up. The next thing he tried was pork. He bought a pig for \$3, fed it with \$25 worth of corn and sold it for \$9; and then he said: I did not mind that so much, for though I lost a little on the corn, but I made on the pig. The hon. gentleman argues the National Policy upon theory, as Mr. Beecher argued farming. I say he cannot show, nor can one of his supporters show, where the poor man pays a single cent of duty on the mass of goods worn by him. The hon. member for North Norfolk said the Finance Minister has stated in this House that grey cottons were as cheap in Canada to-day as in Massachusetts, but he would like someone to show him that they are as cheap. I will give the hon. gentleman practical proof. Here is a piece of cotton (holding it up) manufactured in Canada, a yard wide. It does not take 9 yards of that to make a shirt either. That cotton costs 6 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents a yard, and I defy anyone to show where he can get goods cheaper in the United States. Why cannot cotton be manufactured here as cheap as in the United States? The raw cotton is brought from the United States into Canada free, it is taken into the manufactories and there worked up; it is sold to the wholesale dealer who sells it to the retailer, and why should it not be sold here as cheap as in the United States? Competition is bringing it to a figure as cheap to-day as in the United States. These gentlemen say that the competition would bring the prices down, but did they not also say that the manufacturer makes 40 per cent.? That the rich would get richer and the poor man poorer? Their policy was to make the rich man poorer and then starve the poor man to death. They told us that goods would be dearer. Did they not tell us that when we put 35 per cent. on cotton, that cotton would cost the poor man 2 or 3 cents a yard more? Did they not tell us that nails, that sugar, that everything on which a duty was put, would cost the people more? Did they not tell us that people would have to pay more for agricultural implements? Now the ex-Minister of Finance himself says: You are right when you say they are cheaper than ever before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not.

Mr. WIGLE. The hon. gentleman said "hear, hear, when I said they were cheaper to-day than ever before. He said "hear, hear," when I said competition among the manufacturers brought the prices down. He cannot deny that. If he did not say it, he ought to say it. When the Conservative party were in Opposition, did they stand up here and whine at the Government and say your policy is wrong but we have nothing to propose? No; they stood up and said your revenue Tariff of 17½ per cent., under the circumstances, is not what we want. We want a Protective Policy, and if you do not give it to us, we will go the people, and we went to the people with a platform. But when we ask these gentlemen what their platform is, what their principles are, what do they say? Principles—we have no principles; we are not in power. That is their whole action. When the hon. member for North Norfolk stated that the manufacturers were making 37 per cent., another hon. gentleman on that side said the competition among manufacturers was breaking them all down. I would be glad to know the manufacturers are making a fair profit. I would much rather they made a good profit than see ourselves keeping up manufacturers in other countries. These people do not manufacture goods for nothing for Canada, and why should we ask ours to do so. These gentlemen would rather read from the Blue Books of the United States that manufacturers there were making from 10 to 15 per cent., than read in our Blue Books that our own manufacturers were making a good profit. That is their policy. Our policy is to build up our manufactures, and we hope they will make good profits. Hon. gentlemen opposite, all through their speeches, have said this National Policy has caused so many manufacturers to extend their capital that it is ruining them. But that is their own business, if they choose to put their money into enterprises of this kind. We all take our risk. They go into the business with their eyes open, and if they come out unsuccessful, they cannot blame the Government. We all have the liberty to put our money into manufactures or to keep it out.

It being Six o'clock, the House adjourned.

After Recess.

Mr. WIGLE. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was discussing the National Policy. I was discussing some of the points that were made by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and published in a newspaper printed in the town of Chatham, in West Kent, known as the Chatham Banner, a Reform paper. I find in one portion of the hon. gentleman's speech before the Young Men's Liberal Association in Wallaceburg, he pointed to the Finance Minister of the present Conservative Government, and said: "Gentlemen, what would you think if a Reeve of your township would come before you for re-election, and would claim your support on the ground that he had a surplus of $5,000 from the last year?" He was arguing that the surplus of this Government was a wrong thing, and not a good thing for the country. He asked them what they would do if this Reeve, claiming he had a surplus of $5,000, asked them to elect him on that account. "You would ask him where he got his $5,000, and he would reply that he took it from the pockets of the people. Would you send a man like that back again as your representative in the County Council?" That was not a fair argument. The hon. gentleman ought to have told the young men of that association the truth of the case. He did not tell them that there was a great difference in the way municipal affairs were carried on, and the way Government affairs were carried on. He did not tell them that municipal affairs were carried on by direct taxation. Every man in this country knows that municipal affairs are not carried on in the way the affairs of Government are carried on. They know that applications are put in for money for different parts of the municipality, and on a certain day the assessor has the assessment roll completed, and all the municipal Reeve has to do is to figure up how much is appropriated and see how much the assessment is, and figure out so much on the dollar on the amount the township is assessed, and he need not have a surplus at all. On the other side, the Government have to look to the future, and guess as to imports and exports, and so on; so it is very different. But, when he was putting this as he did, why did he not put it as it was, and say: "Gentlemen, this Finance Minister, the Finance Minister of the Conservative Government, left us this last year with a surplus of $6,000,000; the ex Finance Minister left you with a deficit of $11,000,000 in five years; which would you rather have to represent you, the one who left you with a surplus of $6,000,000, or the other who left you with a deficit of $11,000,000?" That would be the way to put it, if his argument was correct. That is one part of the hon. gentleman's speech. I was just thinking it would be a fine thing for him to go over and make a speech to the American young Liberals against the National Policy there. Would it not be a nice thing for the hon. gentleman to stand up there, and say to the young Liberals in the United States: "Boys, see here, the Government of the United States have put 35 cents a pound duty on leaf tobacco coming from Canada, and so you will have to pay 35 cents a pound more for your tobacco." Why, every little boy would say: "That is not so; I can buy leaf tobacco here for 5 cents a pound ground in the States." Suppose he said the poor man's clothing cost 60 per cent. more because of the tariff on coarse goods from Canada or England, they would say: "No; we have no Canadian or English goods here for the poor man; we manufacture our own goods, we grow our own wool and make our own clothes, and we do not pay a single cent duty." This speech of the hon. gentleman, where he tells the people that the poor man has to pay 50 per cent. on cloth, and 70 per cent. on other goods, 54 per cent. on mantle cloth, and so on, would be a fine pamphlet for an American emigration agent in foreign countries? I imagine I see an American emigration agent in a foreign country saying: "The United States is the place to go to. It is true that we have protection and that they have protection in Canada, but the protection that we have is not the same kind as they have in Canada. In the United States we protect the poor man. He pays nothing for his coarse cloths in the way of duty, but here is the hon. Edward Blake's speech, the leader of the Reform party in Canada, and he says it is the poor man who pays for the protection in Canada. Go to the United States, where the poor man is protected and the rich man has to pay the duty, and not to Canada, where the poor man has to pay all the burdens." Would not that be a nice pamphlet for a Yankee emigration agent? What do we find in the Boston Herald? The Boston Herald says Canada is over-protected, that the high protection has made agricultural implements dearer than before the National Policy; and what do they give? They give the Globe for their authority. There would be another nice little sheet to put in the American emigration pamphlet, to read in foreign countries. Why is it the Americans always copy from the Reform papers? It is because they are always running Canada down, and the average American editor would rather that his people should read that Canada was lagging behind the United States than that she was coming even with the United States, under her policy. It would not do for us all to see alike; I admit that. It is necessary to have an Opposition. There were some ministers of the Gospel once discussing this question, and one said: "It would not do for us all to see alike; if we had all seen alike, if every one had seen with my eyes, every person would have been after my wife." Another said: "Yes, that is so; but, if everyone had seen as I see, no one would have been after her." That is just the same with the Reform party. If everyone saw as hon. gentlemen opposite see, everyone would have gone for a 17½ per cent. revenue Tariff, and we would have had a deficit every year; but, if everyone had seen as the vast majority of the people have seen during the last two general elections, there would not be an hon. gentleman on that side of the House opposing this Government. That would not be right. We want them there. It makes the people in the country feel better, to think there are a few here as an Opposition to any Government. I will tell you what I believe put those gentlemen out of power. It was their Finance Minister, now the ex-Finance Minister; and that puts me in mind of another comparison. A lady applied to a child for something for charitable purposes. "No," she said, "we cannot afford it, our father is poor, he is a merchant, but he took a bad two dollar bill and burst." So with these gentlemen; they took a bad two dollar bill, in the person of the member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), and burst them, and I am afraid they will never get back to power as long as he is their cashier. Under this policy, over 600 organs, made by Bell & Co., have been sold in Europe during last year; and in West Kent we find there was a capital stock of $100,000 taken, and that was on condition that there was to be waggon works started there if the National Policy was adopted and the Conservative party returned to power in 1882. They were returned on the 20th of June, 1882, and on the next day the company commenced hauling the bricks, and in less than four months from that time they were building 70 waggons per week; and while the farmers in that part of the country were paying $60 to $65 before this shop commenced, they are now paying from $49.50 in cash up to $55, on a year's time. That shows the benefit of the National Policy.

Mr. MILLS. But it is closed up.

Mr. WIGLE. Yes; and I will tell you the reason why. They were making seventy waggons per week. The hon. gentleman said the other day that times were not as good in the western part of this Province as they were before the National Policy, and that is true; but he did not tell the reason. In the first place, our wheat was not half a crop in that country; the frost last year killed the wheat. In the next place, that country depends mostly on the corn crop, more especially in Kent and Essex, and the early frost killed the corn, and the result was that we did not have corn to fatten pork, and that is the reason why times were hard there. When corn is killed, that touches the farmer, and as the farmer is the man who buys these waggons, you now have the reason why that factory closed down. We all know that we are in a depressed state at the present time, but we all know this, that we will get out of it with the National Policy a great deal sooner than we would without it. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite have said that the manufacturers of this country had formed a ring, that the manufacturers of cotton had formed a ring, and that after the surplus that they had on hand was worked off, they would run up the price, and we would have to pay whatever they charged. Well, would not that apply to any country? Would it not apply to this country, if we had Free Trade? Do they not form rings in the United States, and do they not form rings in Free Trade England, where there are more factories in any industry than are needed? That is no argument at all. Now, Sir, as I said before six o'clock, we find that the cheap goods are those that the poor man uses. Why has the poor man been able to increase his earnings in the savings bank? It is because, instead of having to pay 17½ per cent. on his shoddy cloths from the United States, he gets them without paying any duty; instead of paying 17½ per cent. on his boots and shoes, he gets them here at home without paying any duty, and so with everything else. He gets his tea free of duty, his coffee free of duty, and the result is that he saves more money and puts more into the Savings Bank than he did before. Now, if these hon. gentlemen say that the National Policy has not cheapened goods, that the poor man has to pay as high as 50 and 75 per cent. for many of the goods he buys, why do not they propose their remedy? Why do they not stand up and say: "Here is a piece of cloth, and we intend to reduce the duty on it. Here is a piece of grey cotton, here is a blanket, and we want the duty taken off." They are not ready to do so. Why do they not bring these things up and then we can discuss them? The hon. gentleman, in talking about blankets, said the poor man paid 70 per cent. on his blankets. I have a letter here from a manufacturer where he says that he will make blankets 60 by 80, with a pound of good pure wool in it, and sell that blanket for 50 cents a pound and a grey blanket for 45 cents a pound. Now here is a pound of good, pure wool in that blanket, 20 cents for the wool and 30 for the manufacturer. Now let the hon. gentleman say where the poor man pays 70 per cent. on that blanket. It applies to every thing else in the same way. Of course, I admit, if we sent to the United States and bought blankets, we would have to pay 70 per cent. on them, but we don't do that. We first find out the price of the article in the foreign country, and then the price in our own country, and if we find it cheaper in our own country, we will not go into the foreign country to buy it. The hon. gentleman from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) said in his speech, that goods were dearer now than before the National Policy. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman certainly don't know what he is talking about when he says that. Every man in this House knows that he can buy boots and shoes cheaper now than at any time since Confederation. Every man knows that he can buy sugars, teas, ready-made clothing, and every thing cheaper than he could before the National Policy. Now, Sir, one of the Reeves in the county I have the honour to represent, who is one of the strongest Reformers in that county, said to me a while ago: "How is it that times are so hard now? We haven't so much money as before. You told us the National Policy would be a good thing for us." I said, well, let me ask you this: "Have you any wheat to sell? It is worth $1 per bushel." He said, no. This gentleman is a farmer, he has 100 acres, and is worth $6,000 or $7,000. He said he had no wheat to sell. I said: "Have you any dressed pork to sell? It is worth $7.50 per hundred." He said, no. I asked him: "Have you any dressed beef to sell? It is worth $8 a hundred." He said, no. I said: "Have you any beans to sell? They are worth $1.75 per bushel." He said, no. "Have you any potatoes to sell? They are worth 60 cents. per bushel." He said, no. "Have you any peas?" No. "Well," I said, "What are you blaming the National Policy for, if you have nothing to sell?" Now, I said to him, I will take you in another way. "Do you want to buy any cotton? It is cheaper than it ever was before." He said, no. I said: "Do you want to buy a suit of clothes cheaper than you could ever buy them before?" He said, no. I said: "What is the reason?" Why, he said, I have no money to buy with. He had nothing to sell, and consequently he had nothing to buy with. When they have poor crops and have no money, some people blame the National Policy for it. But if we have a good crop another year, I guarantee that you will see the National Policy come out on top, and that everything will be all right. Now, Sir, I cannot understand how it is that hon. gentlemen who pretend to have good common sense should stand up here and denounce the National Policy, and say that it makes prices of manufactured goods that the poor man has to buy higher. I say the high duty was put on, not for the purpose of making the poor man pay higher for the goods he buys, but to keep the American shoddy out of this country, and to give our own manufacturers a chance to make their living. Any man ought to see that who has got good common sense. I am surprised to hear these gentlemen talk such nonsense. A gentleman who is well known up west was asking why so many people left this country, and he instanced a man named John Hardy. He said that John Hardy went to the North-West and bought a farm, and stayed there a short time, but he found that he had to pay such a high duty on agricultural implements that he would not stay there any longer, and so he went over into the United States, where he could buy these things cheaper than in Canada. Well, this story was told at an election meeting in favour of the candidate, who was a friend of the hon. gentlemen from Bothwell, and a gentleman came up and told me that he knew all about this poor John Hardy. He said John Hardy did go into the United States and he told him he made the greatest mistake he ever made in his life. He said the reason why he went into the United States was because the Reform papers and the Reform party in this country said that they would never get the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that his land in the North-West would not be worth 5 cents an acre without a Railway. But now, he said, after they had built the railway, he was satisfied that he had made the greatest mistake he ever made in his life, and while he was telling that another gentleman stepped up and said: "Yes, and this same John Hardy is one of the 11,000 Canadians who have returned to live under the old flag once more." It is not necessary for me to say more on this subject. I could bring forward many more facts to strengthen my case; but before I sit down, I desire to read what the American Consul at Port Sarnia said about the protective policy. Consul Pace, in November, 1883, said:

"To say that Canada has not been benefitted by the policy of Protection would be to ignore facts in the outset. At this point is shipped, by a tri-weekly line of steamers, the implements of agriculture and tools of trade which are destined to play an important part in the development of Canada's great north-western possessions. These products of the loom, the anvil, the furnace, the field, the workshop, and the factory are all the products of Canadian industry. Take away the Tariff, and a more convenient market would doubtless be found for the pioneers of the British territory; but the factories and workshops of Ontario, which are now crowded to their fullest capacity, would have to close their doors and discharge their artisans."

That is the report he made to the American Government. No wonder the Americans keep up their National Policy. I have shown different articles manufactured in Canada which I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to say were manufactured cheaper before the National Policy was adopted. I would like them to take cloth, and demonstrate to the people that the poor man really pays 50 per cent. duty on it.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have listened with a good deal of attention and interest to the speech delivered by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He has been trying, by his remarks, to show that under the operation of the National Policy the people of this country, and especially the poorer classes, practically buy goods cheaper than they could do if we had no National Policy. I have been thinking, while listening to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, that there is no necessity why we should continue in existence that policy, when he maintains it is not owing to its existence that the poorer classes obtain goods cheaper, but simply owing to the fact that goods are manufactured here, and have to meet with such keen competition that they are placed in the hands of consumers as low as they would be in the absence of any such policy. If our manufacturers are producing these goods and placing them in the hands of the consumer as low as the hon. gentleman makes out, very much lower than they could be imported for and sold under the operation of the present Tariff, where is the necessity for Protection? What is the use of having it longer continued in force when it is a dead letter? According to his showing, it is impossible to import goods from England or the United States and sell them in competition with goods manufactured here, simply because the goods manufactured here are sold so cheap that imported goods cannot be successfully sold in competition with them. If that be the case, we do not want the National Policy any longer. It has had its day; it is claimed that it has done a great deal of good in creating competition in goods, so that all classes are now getting them as low as they could possibly be purchased in any part of the world. Let us then do away with this thing, and with all the fuss and argument in connection with the matter. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Wigle) exhibited a hat, in order to demonstrate that such an article might be bought at retail for 50 cents each, or $4.50 a dozen. In order to prove that the hat is really good value at that price, the hon. member should have exhibited, also, an imported hat, and allowed a comparison to be made.

Mr. WIGLE. I cannot buy an imported hat at that price.

Mr. McMULLEN. That very hat is manufactured in this country to compete with a hat of the same kind which is imported, and pays a duty of 25 per cent. It must, moreover, be remembered that the same class of hats was manufactured here before the National Policy came into existence. One of these hat manufacturers was at one time a strong Reformer and supported the Mackenzie Administration, and he urged very forcibly on the Government that the duty on hats should be increased. The Government refused to do so; but after the inauguration of the National Policy, the duty was raised from 17½ to 25 per cent, which is equal to 8 cents per hat, or 96 cents per dozen. If the manufacturer produces 100,000 dozen and makes a profit of 96 cents per dozen, is he not wise in his own interest to support the National Policy which is giving him $100,000 extra profit, as compared with a 17½ per cent. Tariff. Before the inauguration of the National Policy, there was strong competition in the trade, but since the 25 per cent. Tariff, these manufacturers have been very successful and have been making lots of money. It is impossible to prove that hats are sold as cheap under the operation of the present Tariff as they would be if there were no National Policy in existence. Anyone acquainted with the trade and who is in the habit of examining stocks, is aware that the imported article and the article of home manufacture are sold in competition every day.

Mr. HESSON. Are not hats as cheap as before the duty was increased?

Mr. McMULLEN. That is an argument constantly used by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is a most fallacious one. The question is not as to whether the article is as cheap as it was before the introduction of the National Policy—that is not the question before the House and the country. The question is this, is the article as cheap as it would have been were not the National Policy in full force? The hon.

gentleman also exhibited some samples of woollen goods and said they were cheaper than formerly. Were not woollen goods manufactured in this country before the National Policy, and were not those manufacturers prosperous? Such was the case. We had manufacturers who were doing a good business, in fact a large trade, before the National Policy was introduced; consequently, it is unfair to make a comparison in that particular line of goods. When the hon gentleman claims that the people of this country can get every class of goods as cheaply now as before the National Policy, I would like to ask him if coal oil has been sold as cheaply for the last two or three years as it sold before. Has there been any combination in that article, and why is it that a number of coal oil factories in this Dominion have shut down, and that year after year they have been paying a percentage. They have been receiving the same profits, while a number of their factories are standing still. How is that? Simply because an understanding has been come to, that a certain amount of oil is required throughout the Dominion, and they have agreed that they will manufacture just about that amount, and that it shall be sold at a certain price. The result is that the consumer can only get it at that price and that there is no competition. I would like to know if that is not the result of the National Policy? Every farmer in this country, every poor man, is a consumer of coal oil, and I ask the hon. gentleman if he does not know as well as I know, that the manufacturers have an understanding by which every man in this country has paid an extra price for his coal oil in years past, that he is now paying an extra price, and that he will continue to pay an extra price so long as this policy lasts. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the article of salt. Does he not know that salt is dearer than it was before, and does he not know that it is an article which every farmer in this country consumes. The Finance Minister, no doubt, was approached by the salt manufacturers of this country, and it was represented to him very strongly that there should be a duty on this particular commodity, that it should have some advantage under the National Policy, and being anxious to foster all kinds of manufactures, he gave them that protection. I believe if he was asked to afford the protection to the manufacturers of gravestones, he would give it. Some years ago you could buy salt for 65 cents per barrel at the wells; now you have to pay $1 or $1.10 at the wells. And why? Just because it is protected, and because the manufacturers have not to place it on the market in competition with the imported salt. That is a fact, and I do not think even the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wigle) will dare to deny that salt is dearer. I could go on to name a number of other articles which have been increased in cost in the same way. Take, for example, the article of stoves. Has there been a combination among the manufacturers in that article? If hon. gentlemen do not know it, every farmer who has to buy a stove knows it. I know that every single stove, according to the original catalogue under which stoves were sold before the introduction of the National Policy, has just been hitched up in proportion to the duty placed upon it. I would like also to refer to the article of furniture, and I would ask if it is not higher than before the National Policy was introduced.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to sit in their seats and say, no; but I can tell them that I have bought furniture myself within the last six months, and paid more for it, to the extent of $20 on a bedroom set, more than I paid for exactly the same set five years before. I asked the parties in Toronto, from whom I purchased, why it was that they asked me so much more for the same article than I paid before. They replied that paints had gone up, that varnish had gone up, that materials of all kinds had gone up under the National Policy; that they had to pay a little more for this and that and the other thing, and that therefore they had to get a better price now than they used to get. That is a fact which cannot be denied. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to come here with one article, such as a hat, but let them take a list of all the articles which enter into the ordinary consumption of the farmer and the mechanic, and see whether the prices have not increased. I say they have increased, though there are some articles, such as tea and coffee, from which the duty has been taken, but what is that in comparison with the numerous articles which enter into public consumption. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the United States had a protective Tariff. It is true they have, and it has been in existence some time; but what are the facts? In the first place, when the United States introduced their National Policy, as the hon. gentlemen call it, they had a population of 30,000,000 people; we have a population of 4,500,000. I say that the idea of surrounding a country like this, with its limited population, with a National Policy, for the purpose of encouraging manufactures, is a most unwise and imprudent course. I say that by increasing the cost of living in the country, you are retarding its settlement and progress. What is the great backbone of this country? What is it that is going to make it a great country? Are we not an agricultural country? We have recently heard bankers and others speaking of hard times; the Finance Minister himself admits that there is a stringency, a certain amount of bad times, and if so what is our hope of relief. Everbody talks about a good crop; but has anybody expressed the hope that the manufacturers of this country will continue to manufacture a large amount of stuff this year? Do we expect the hard times will be relieved by the large amount of cotton goods or sugar manufactured in the country? What do we expect will relieve us? A good harvest. That is what is going to relieve us, if we are going to get relief, and if that is the fact, should not we, in all our legislation, endeavour to build up the agricultural interests. But, in place of that, we are pulling it down. We are increasing its burdens, instead of settling this country and making it a great, rich agricultural country in the first place. I say that before encouraging our manufactures we should first fill up the country, and the only way to do that is to offer every inducement to the people to cultivate their lands and to induce other people to settle here, by showing them that it is the cheapest country on the earth to live in. That is the way, and the only way to do it. In place of that, we have been creating monopolies of every kind—manufacturing monopolies, land company monopolies; and in every shape and way we have been retarding the settlement and the progress of the country, by the course we have been adopting. And what is the result? We find that some of the manufacturers are shutting down, that some of them are working half time, and some are in financial embarrassment. What is the cause of all this? Simply, that we have not population enough, we have not consumers enough. We want to get consumers into the country, and the only way to do that is to offer every inducement to the agriculturists of other countries to settle among us, by showing them that everything they require for everyday use is sold here, at as low a price as in other countries. What is the trouble in the United States? There the farmers are among the poorer classes. I say that the farming community there has been groaning for years under the unjust burdens of their so-called National Policy, and they are beginning to see it at last. At the last general election they saw it, and a strong feeling was expressed in favour of the reduction of the duty, so that the Government has to come down and take less than they have been exacting heretofore from the people of that country. The farmers have been pauperized in what should be a rich agricultural country, by the operation of that policy, and the same thing is taking place here. Now, we have no desire to crush out our manufacturing institutions; we want to see them prosper; we have no desire in the world to throw a stone at them. But we say that we want simply to impose on the people a Tariff that is sufficient to produce a sum necessary to meet the annual expenditure of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not deny that we are collecting some $30,000,000 a year, instead of $23,000,000, as we collected in 1874 or 1875; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that the people are not now more heavily taxed than they were in 1874 or 1875. Well, if not, where does the extra money come from? Has our population increased very much? We have about the same population now that we had then—some 4,500,000 or 5,000,000. Where, then, does this extra money come from? It comes out of the pockets of the people, under the operation of this Tariff. Surely the hon. gentleman opposite will not say that the cost of the goods which we import and consume under the protective Tariff is not increased. Surely he will not say that if a man imports a dollar's worth, and has to pay 25 cents of duty on it, it does not increase the price to him more than if he imported the same dollar's worth and paid only 17½ per cent. duty on it. I think he will hardly make that contention. Well, supposing the 4,500,000 people in this country purchase goods to the extent of $30 worth for every man, woman and child; and supposing that the duty on these goods is increased from 17½ to 25 per cent.; that is an increase of $2.40 or $2.50 on the $30; that would be equal to about $10,000,000 of an increase per year on 4,500,000 people. The hon. Finance Minister admits that he has $6,000,000 of that as a surplus. Now, I would like to know where the other $4,000,000 has gone to. I say that the people have been imposed on to the extent of that $4,000,000, and that has gone into the pockets of those who have manufactured goods in the country. That is the way the Revenue has been increased. Another thing: Last year the hon. Finance Minister placed a measure on the Statute Book that provided that, after the first of January, 1884, the duty on printed goods should be increased 7½ per cent. He told us, at the time he introduced that measure, that we were going to have a print factory established in this Dominion, where prints were going to be manufactured and where the weaving and dyeing was going to be done; that this factory was going to give us a manufactured article as good in quality as the imported article, and that it was therefore highly desirable to grant the protection it asked. The hon. gentleman comes down now and tells us that the people are not going to manufacture these goods at all, but only print them, the manufacturing being done somewhere else; and in order to get them printed in this country, we have to pay an increase duty of 7½ per cent. I was enquiring of a wholesale merchant, a few few days ago, what effect this would have on the print trade of this country, and whether print goods were higher this year than they would have been but for this increase. He said that this year importers had imported largely what they required before the first of the year, and that consequently the increased price would not be felt so seriously this year; but, said he, as soon as the stocks now in are sold out, the natural result will be that we shall have to creep up to the higher figure and charge the higher price. I say that it was a most unwise and imprudent act to increase that duty. If there is any one article that is largely consumed by the poorer classes of this country, that is used for the clothing of women and children, and in many other ways, it is the article of prints; and I say it was unfair and unjust, simply because a few men were anxious to make money by establishing a print factory, that the entire working classes of this Dominion should be subjected to pay an increased price for this article. You may go from one article to another in the same way, and you will find that you will be increasing the duty from year to year, until you will make this an exceedingly expensive country to live in, and those who would otherwise come here will find that out, and will steer their ship in another direction.

Mr. ORTON. Would the hon. gentleman take the duty off wheat to make it a cheap country to live in?

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman who last spoke would lead us to suppose that the county of Kent was carried in the last election largely by the very potent arguments that he used, with regard to the operations of the National Policy. Well, I think there were other causes why hon. gentlemen opposite secured that particular constituency at the last election. If I am rightly informed, a very short time after the hon. gentleman who now sits for that constituency was elected before, and his election was protested, immediate steps were taken by the Government to show their readiness and willingness to erect a very respectable post office in the town of Chatham, as well as to dredge out a river and a number of creeks and streams in that constituency. I think they tried to show their willingness to do anything to satisfy the people of that constituency, if they would only return that hon. gentleman. I fancy that they saw breakers ahead, and thought the best thing to do was to prepare for them; and for that reason a large amount of money was spent there, in the ways I have stated, to secure that constituency, in the event of its being re-opened by the courts. I fancy that this is the principal cause why the same gentleman was sent here to represent that constituency, and not the very potent and eloquent arguments of the hon. gentleman who preceded me. Now, there is another question which I would like to refer to. I was saying a moment ago that if there is any one interest in this country to which we should lend our aid and assistance, and which we should legislate to foster and encourage, it is the farming interest. We have often heard the question of feeding cattle spoken of, and the cost of importing corn from the United States for that purpose. Now, I hold that it is only right that the farmers of this country should be permitted to bring in corn for the purpose of feeding cattle or hogs for export, free of duty, or that they should be allowed a rebate of the duty. I hold that we should do everything in our power in the direction of building up their interest, if we are going to build up the interest of others. I do not know what the existing arrangement is between the Government and the manufacturers of spirits in this country, but I have reason to believe that those who bring in corn here are allowed, when they manufacture it into liquor, something in the way of a reduction or rebate, when that liquor is exported. Is it prudent on the part of the Government to permit men to import corn for the purpose of manufacturing it into liquor and allow them a rebate when sending it to some other part of the world, to be used for the purpose of demoralizing and killing people? Would it not be better and more prudent on the part of the Government to allow the farmer to bring in corn, for the purpose of putting it into beef or pork, and to export that without asking him to pay the duty? I trust the Government will see that it is their duty to permit the farmers of this country to bring in corn for feeding cattle, without compelling them to pay the duty they are now compelled to pay. I am sure that would be a step in the right direction. The hon. gentleman also referred to the fact that the Globe had been quoted by some American journal, with regard to something connected with this National Policy, or the settlement of the country, and charged us with continually decrying our country and endeavouring to injure it. Hon. gentlemen who talk in that way should think first for a moment,

They ought to go back to the year 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877. They ought to turn up the Journals of the House and the Conservative papers of those days before they make such charges. I have seen the Mail myself quoted by an American paper with regard to matters connected with the fiscal policy of this country; and I am sure that if hon. gentlemen would take the Hansard of this House and turn up the arguments then used, they would see that those hon. gentlemen spoke as strongly and as pointedly on questions connected with the policy of the then Government, with regard to this country, and did more to injure the country than has ever been done by the Reform party. The Reform party has the country's good at heart. As I said a few nights ago, the organs of that party have been showing that the Government's course in regard to the North-West has been insane, imprudent and unwise. They remonstrated against the system of monopoly introduced by this Government, and pointed out that the people would not stand it. We have been challenged with regard to that, and we have been charged with trying to create disturbance. But we simply pointed out what the result of the course adopted by the Government would be. The Government were warned by the leader of the Opposition and by several other members of the Opposition, of the result that would follow, and to-day we see the verification of our predictions. We see the North-West in a state of ferment. The hon. gentleman talked about a sore on his hand, and about the flies lighting on it and picking at the sore place; but there is a sore up there, and some of the flies that belong to the same political creed as hon. gentlemen opposite, have been lighting on it, and trying in vain to cover it up. The people there are making known the fact that they will not submit to the tyranny imposed on them; and hon. gentlemen opposite will have all they can do to settle the difficulty. The hon. gentleman referred to the waggon factory in his county. He said it was turning out seventy waggons a day, but when twitted with the fact that it is now closed, he said: Well, if that was the case, we had a frost, the wheat of the country had been injured, the people had been reduced in circumstances by matters over which the Government had no control. But before the introduction of this policy, I heard the hon. First Minister saying that the sun shone upon them, that there was always good times, that everything was pleasant, that the country was always prosperous when they were in power, that under the operation of the National Policy everything was smiling, the country would prosper and every man would make money. Last Session the hon. Finance Minister said he had no doubt of the future of this country. He said that prosperity was dawning upon us in all directions; that were he a young man, he would put out all sail and have nothing to fear, and that prosperity and success would attend his efforts in every shape and form for the next seven years. To-day, however, we find a very different state of things existing. I tell you, Sir, that hon. gentlemen in this House do not know, in many cases, the position of a very large portion of the farming community of this country. A very serious state of affairs exists in this Dominion in some sections, and a very large portion of the farming class of this Dominion is suffering very seriously. Their resources have been largely curtailed—I admit, somewhat by frost—but, on the other hand, I maintain that the greatest distress is owing to the inducements held out to them to enter into speculation. For one or two years we had a stroke of good times, no doubt. This was foolishly taken advantage of to too great an extent, and the farming community now find themselves, in many sections of the country, in a very unpleasant position; so much so, that if we should happen to have a poor crop another year, a very disastrous state of things would ensue. We have to depend entirely upon the farming community of this country for anything to relieve the present state of things, and we should do everything in our power to build up that interest instead of, as I hold we are doing under the operation of the National Policy in this instance, crippling their resources by imposing exactions in excess of what is necessary and of what they can afford to bear. In that way, we are limiting their ability to procure those things which are necessary for themselves and their families. I notice that the hon. member for Cardwell, when speaking on the subject of cottons, said that whereas at the introduction of the National Policy we had seven cotton mills in this country, we now had over twenty, and that only three were obliged to shut down. In regard to this question, I would only say a few words. There has been for some time a monopoly in cotton, a combination was formed for the purpose of keeping up the prices of cotton, as combinations have been formed in other things. That combination lasted for the last three or four years, until quite recently. What has been the result? The result has been the keeping up of prices, and there has not been a wholesale establishment in the Dominion that is not crowded with cotton. These cottons were placed in the hands of those wholesale merchants, and a price list furnished them, below which they were prohibited selling. Within the last few days, however, a break occurred in the monopoly, simply because one of these holders got so straitened financially that he could not find means enough to meet his engagements, and he had to force a very large quantity on the market. A merchant in Toronto bought a very large quantity of this at 12½ cents below the price list, and he placed this in competition with the full priced goods, with the result, of course, of breaking the market, and putting an end to the combination. Now we are getting cheaper cotton; but will anyone say that before this occurred the consumer was getting cotton cheaper than he would have got it, had we not imposed this heavy Tariff?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; and I will prove it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, I am sorry to think that the hon. the Finance Minister appears to be so intentionally blinded to the fact, because any man that will tell me that the cotton, before the breaking of that combination, was sold over the country by the retailer as cheap as it is to-day, tells me what I have seen with my own eyes and know by experience is not the fact.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have a paper, prepared in December last, with the prices, which I am only waiting an opportunity to give to the House, to show the cost of grey cottons, and it gives the number, and the marks, and the character of the goods, in Canada and in the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And in England?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; in the United States. That is the market we are coming in contact with. It shows that per pound in the United States it was 23·36 cents, while in Canada it was 22·36 cents per pound. I will use it presently. These are the facts.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have stood behind the counter for the last quarter of a century, and have had experience in buying and selling goods. The hon. gentleman who addressed the House before me, in reply to the leader of the Opposition, said he had the theory but the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Wigle), had the practical experience. Well, the hon. Finance Minister has the theory, but I have had the practice.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Here are the figures.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have imported the goods and sold them here. I would like to have before me and lay on the Table of this House, samples of the goods sold a month ago and sold now. I would like to have samples of the goods sold a month ago for 10 cents and sold to-day for 10 cents and 10½ cents. If the Finance Minister can show me that 11 cents is not more than 10½ cents, I will believe it, but he cannot do so. I say factory cottons to-day, owing to the breaking of that monopoly or of that combination, are sold cheaper than before it, and I say it is the result in everything else; because, wherever combination exists, the price is higher than where it does not exist; there is no doubt about it. I think I have gone over almost all the notes I made in connection with the hon. gentleman's speech. Had I an opportunity of preparing for the purpose of offering an address on this question, I possibly might have been able to submit more arguments to this House than I have submitted. I am quite sure I could have done so. I am quite sure I could have produced arguments sufficient to persuade any reasonable man that, owing to the operation of this Tariff, people here in the past paid more, are now paying more, and will continue to pay more for the goods they consume, until once the manufacture of goods in this country reaches a point that we will have competition here of a character that will secure the article at the very lowest price; but, as long as ever the manufacture is limited to such an extent as will enable those who do manufacture to enter into these combinations, we never will have the goods at such a price as we would have them, in the absence of such a policy as is now in force. It is not fair; it is unjust and it is unwise that we should in this way limit the resources and curtail the means of the great labouring classes and the farming community in this country. They are the backbone of the country, as I said before, and anything which tends to curtail their resources and to limit their means and cripple them, injures the country. Let us first get the country filled up, and then, if it is thought wise to encourage manufactures, very well; but in the meantime, it is exceedingly unwise to pursue the policy we have.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker, if I occupy the time of the House on this occasion at any length, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat will have to be charged with it. I have taken the trouble to follow him with a few notes, to which I shall refer. My hon. friend from North Wellington said he would give his reasons against the National Policy, and almost the first word he says is: Do away with that policy; it is a great injustice to the country and is doing it an injury. I have tried for the past five or six years to reason with myself whether this policy is not being, each year, more and more perfected, and more deeply impressed on the minds and hearts of the people of Canada. I have thought it was the duty of members of this House, so far as it was possible with human ingenuity, human enquiry, and human power, to devise a policy best adapted to every varied industry and interest in this country. We have men to-day who will stand up, like the member for North Wellington, and denounce this policy still, and say it is an injustice to the people, and ought to be done away with. I will follow my hon. friend for a few moments on the questions he dealt with, and I will endeavour, before I have done with my remarks, to show what I conceive to be the difficulties of the party in Opposition to-day, and what was the difficulty when they were in the Government, from 1874 to 1879. My hon. friend starts upon the proposition of the hat question, submitted by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wigle). He said that hats could be purchased in the United States or elsewhere and laid down in this country at the same price, and that was a fair test, and pay the 25c. duty. Now, I happen to be in the business as well as my hon. friend, and I have been longer behind the counter than my hon. friend, and I profess to know more about the trade than he does. He has still something to learn. I have been more than thirty-five years engaged in the mercantile business in this country, and I know whereof I speak. I have purchased in Canada and in the United States; I have purchased in the Boston market, and in the English market, and in the Scotch market; I have bought in Glasgow, and finally I have found it to my advantage to confine my entire purchases to the Canadian trade, within last few years. We never had hats of good value at as low a price as we have to-day. If my hon. friend would attempt to prove that he can buy a soft hat, fit for the Canadian trade, as cheap in the United States, he would have to purchase the hat at $3.60 per doz., add 25 per cent. to that, and make the cost $4.50 laid down here. He cannot prove that he can purchase any such hats as that in the United States, or in England either. It is a fact that the Canadian hat trade to-day is successful, very largely in consequence of the patronage and the additional protection extended by the Government to encourage that trade, and it is only an illustration of all the other industries which have had some slight encouragement to induce men to put their capital into these industries, and carry them on successfully. The hon. gentleman said, in reply to my question as to the increase in the price at which they could be laid down or sold to-day, that it was not lower than it was under the previous policy. He says the price is not in question. I thought it was the price he was discussing here all the evening, and that the leader of the Opposition had been debating through the country. That hon. gentleman, the other night, said they had no particular antipathy to the manufacturers of Canada, but I have come to the conclusion that they have some hard feelings against the manufacturers of Canada, and against the capitalists who have the courage of their convictions, and who desire to build up Canadian industries in their own country by investing money in them. Well, Sir, my hon. friend finds fault in the matter of coal oil. He said we were obliged to pay a higher price for coal oil. I deny that emphatically, and I appeal to any person who has had to purchase coal oil in the past few years, whether it is not only cheaper but of a superior quality. It has to be submitted to a test now, which it did not undergo when those hon. gentlemen were in power. Coal oil to-day sells in Canada 14 cents a gallon, Imperial measure, cheaper than it was before, and it is about 25 per cent. more in bulk. My hon. friend also had to talk about salt. He could not let the salt interests of the country alone, although he lives close to a county largely interested in that industry. He says salt was originally sold from 60 cents to 65 cents per barrel at the mine. Well, that is true and I am sorry to say that producers were ever obliged to sell at such a price. But when you deduct the value of the barrel, 25 or 27 cents, you can see that it left a little enough margin of profit for the money that was invested in the salt works. Now I appeal to any hon. gentleman in this House if a trade like that is to be crushed out for the sake of getting salt for 40 or 45 cents a barrel? It may be, the farmer is obliged to use more than he formerly did, because he finds it useful as a fertilizer. Then the hon. gentleman touched upon the stove question. I do not know that stoves, as a rule, are more expensive in Canada to-day. But I wish to draw the attention of the House to this fact, that the people of Canada to-day are not satisfied with the same quality of stoves that they used ten or fifteen years ago. There is not a man in the country who does not know that stoves are being made now of a very expensive and very stylish appearance and finish, that were never dreamed of in the old days, when people bought cheap cooking stoves and plain box stoves. You can buy the same class of stoves to-day that you could ten years ago at the same price; but if you wish to buy the finer qualities, parlor and hall stoves of higher style of finish, very likely you will have to pay more for them, and I think the reason is that we have not yet sufficient competition in that line of industry. My hon. friend also had a dig at the furniture manufacturers. He says this policy was designed in the interest of the manufacturers all over the country, and especially in the interests of the manufacturers of furniture. Well, the same remark applies to furniture that I applied to stoves. Every one knows that if you buy a stylish set of furniture, a bedroom, parlor, or drawing-room suit, you have to pay a high price for it; but the old-fashioned style of furniture made in the days when furniture was cheap, can be got to-day cheaper than it was ever made in this country before. The hon. gentleman dealt with the tea and coffee question. He said: "What if there was a little reduction in tea and coffee? That was of no great advantage to the people." Well, Sir, I remember when these hon. gentlemen opposite made a great cry of this question on the hustings. They used to impose a high rate of duty, 6 cents a pound on the poor man's tea, which was worth 40 or 50 cents; while the man who could afford to buy tea worth $1.25 a pound, had to pay no more duty than the poor man. Those hon. gentlemen did not complain then, but they seem to think it is of no consequence now that the duty is taken off tea altogether. Let me point out to you how much advantage the country has realized from the reduction of duties made by the present Government. A very considerable item, and one that comes home closely to every house-keeper in Canada, whether rich or poor, is the reduction of the duty on tea, which amounts to $344,016. Then there was a reduction of the duty on coffee, amounting to $76,313; on tin, amounting to $91,719; stamp tax, $203,000, postage on newspapers, $50,000; reduction on tobacco, $700,000; scrap iron, $1,000; periodicals $14,250; turpentine, wire and other articles, $50,000; making a total reduction of $2,027,298, and that is what the hon. gentleman calls a trifling reduction made by this Government in favour of the people of this country. My hon. friend could not let the National Policy alone, in regard to the amount of revenue realized. He must find fault because we had a surplus. Well, Sir, we are not likely to have as much surplus as we would like to have this year; but the past surpluses have been turned to good account in carrying on the great works of improvement destined to develop every part of this country. The hon. gentlemen opposite were not troubled with surpluses; they were troubled with deficits,—a circumstance that will not be forgotten in the history of this country. My hon. friend also refers to the discontent in the North-West, which he referred to the Government's land policy. Now, he seemed to forget that there was a cause of that agitation, not entirely attributable to the policy of this Government. He seemed to forget that there were men in that country who had nothing else to do but to endeavour to create discontent and indignation against the Administration—men who have gone up there to make money out of the country and have failed, and now they are endeavouring to raise an agitation against the Government. Political lines are being drawn closely in the North-West to-day, and we know that the agitation is based upon political differences rather than upon any real grievances the settlers have to endure. I hold in my hands a letter received from a friend in the North-West, dated at Moose Jaw, on the 28th of February, and these are his remarks:

"The Farmers' (Grit) Union advertised a meeting, and, to draw it mild, it was a fizzle. There were only three persons present, and it was a fine day, so that could not be urged as an excuse. The delegate got disgusted, and left by the first train. When the Mile Belt question and the Reserves, are opened up here, the Grits will not have a leg to stand upon."

I have also a communication from a gentleman well known to some of the hon. members of this House, a member of the Local Government in the North-West, who writes to me as follows:—

"The 'intense agitation,' 'popular excitement,' &c., &c., here, is largely in the minds only of a few would-be agitators. The farmers are pronounced Grits, and mostly bankrupt speculators, who have been stranded high and dry by the 'boom,' and are now struggling as drowning men, to catch at anything that promises to give them a little help. The country as a whole is sound; one good crop would bury all this—except the strong desire to have the Hudson Bay opened. That, I think, must be accomplished, if practicable."

Now, Sir, that is a communication from a member of the Local Government, one of the most intelligent members of that Government.

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. HESSON. Dr. Harrison, of Minnedosa, the gentleman that defeated David Glass, one of your own friends. A man that is likely to make his mark does not go there to create discontent and ill-feeling, but to invest his money and build up that country. Men who go there to live and to better their condition do not engage in agitation, as the Grits are doing there to-day. Let me quote a few lines from another source, the Brandon Sun. That journal says:

"A number of the speakers were always particularly careful to say that it was of a purely no-party complexion, and the principal reason given for this was that, in their treatment of the North-West, one party was as bad as the other. As was pointed out some time ago, the movement is entirely a political one, for it is impossible that it could be anything else. And we said further, that we could not complain of grievances without also complaining of the authors of them."

That is a paper which supports hon. gentlemen opposite and does everything possible, in its own little way, to stir up farmers' grievances and make as much of them as possible. It confesses that this is a political question. Let us trace a little further the cause of discontent. I shall be able to show by a quotation from the ex-Mayor of Brandon, also taken from the Brandon Sun, the kind of information that he has given in his lecturing tours among the farmers of the North-West. He is from my own town, having left there several years ago, where he was considered a good citizen; but it appears to me that he is in the North-West endeavouring, because probably he has not been so successful as he expected, to create discontent, in the hope that possibly he may come to the surface by that excitement. What did that gentleman do in his perigrinations through the country—for he is paid, I presume, to go round to establish farmers' unions and talk up farmers' grievances? Here it is, as stated in the Brandon Sun:

"We find the Dominion Government, in the interest of the Ontario millers, lowering the duty on wheat from 15 to 7½ cents per bushel. The Government compels the farmers of Manitoba to buy their implements from Ontario manufacturers, but does not say to the Ontario millers, buy your wheat in Manitoba, but allows them to buy wheat in American markets, entirely ignoring the interests of the people of this country."

What would you say to such remarks, made by a man who possesses intelligence, who has been Mayor of Brandon, and who has gone among the people, some of whom are, unfortunately, deprived of the privilege of post office accommodation, and only hear once a week or fortnight from the contras. No wonder those farmers got up and said that if the Government are so neglectful of our interests as to propose to reduce the wheat duty from 15 to 7½ cents as there is a short crop in Ontario, we have good cause for agitation. It is with that kind of talk that those gentlemen have agitated the North-West, that they have been able to induce some of our friends to follow them for a time; but, thank God, they are getting their eyes opened, and the day is not far distant when they will leave the ranks and come to the conclusion that this was only another Reform trap to divide the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman who preceded me spoke about distress. He did not, like almost every other gentleman on that side of the House, say the Finance Minister was obliged to apologize when he introduced the Budget. He did not go so far as to make that remark, but he said the country was in very great distress and in as bad a condition as it was when the Liberals were in power. I could not apply a better test than that which has been applied before—the Post Office Savings Bank returns Hon. gentlemen opposite must thank themselves if these statements are reiterated; when they stand up and make declarations which the people of Canada have again and again refuted, among others, that the National Policy was not a curse but a blessing, they will find members on this side of the House prepared to contradict those statements. Let me give these savings bank figures. In 1869 the deposits were $856,814. In 1874, when the Reform party came into power, they had increased to $3,207,051. From 1884 to 1878, the period when the Liberals were in power, the deposits declined to $2,754,484, a decline of $452,567. The Conservative party came into power in 1879. They took up the National Policy and the country began to revive under the wise counsel of the leader of the Government and his colleagues, who so ably assist him. The result was that in 1883 the deposits had increased to $11,976,237, an increase during the five years of $9,221,753. That statement is only up to last year, and we might properly add another $1,000,000 or $1,500,000. It may be said, however, that these deposits might be increased without general advantage to the people, and without showing any great improvement in their condition. In reply, I would point to these facts. In 1874 the number of depositors was 45,329, and the number declined under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite to 40,097. In 1883 the number of depositors was 100,489. I do not think wealthy men, as a rule, are depositors in savings banks; the depositors are working men, and labouring men and small property owners; wealthy men have always some other use for their money than to invest it in this way. They place it in one of the chartered banks for a time, until some speculation opens, and then they withdraw it, and having large sums they can command the trade of the country. Now, Sir, I have to make a few further comments on the policy of that Government. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in the discussion the other day—and I have in my hands the report of his speech in Hansard—in referring to the imports and exports, complained that we had not good harvests from 1874 to 1879, and hence they had lost in the money coming in from the exports of the farm. He took a few of the products of the farm and tried by them to illustrate to this House, that during the five years succeeding their Administration we had been more favoured with good crops than previously, and hence the great success of this Administration. I think, Sir, I shall be able to show another reason for the trouble which fell upon the country from 1874 to 1879, and I must again trouble the House with some figures, which are taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns. The total imports from 1869 to 1874 were $430,810,965, and the exports, $380,651,474, leaving an excess of imports amounting to $100,159,491. Those figures cover the first period of the administration of the Conservative party after Confederation. I have given you the total imports and exports for those years, showing what was the balance of trade, and that, of course is another very important question which we do not agree about in this House. My own impression is that it is always better to have the balance of trade in your favour, if possible. I know it is better to have a balance in the bank in your favour. But, at any rate, in that period of the Conservative Administration, when the affairs of the country were going on prosperously and happily, when there was nothing but rejoicing on every side that the Confederation had become, not only a probability, but a grand success; when industries had been created and every branch of trade was busy, even at that time, we had apparently $100,000,000 of excess of imports over exports. Now, Sir, we come to the period of the Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and I was interested in ascertaining, if possible, whether the want of success in the administration of that Government had arisen entirely from the fact that our exports were smaller during their period of Administration and that the balance of trade being so largely against us, the country was therefore so much the poorer. I find that from 1874 to 1879, we imported $529,256,154 worth of goods, and we exported $403,403,402, the excess of imports over exports being $125,752,782. Well, Sir, this was a little against the hon. gentlemen. It was against them to the extent of $25,000,000 worse than it was during the previous Administration. But it was not there that their folly lay. It was not alone that Providence had not furnished them so large a quantity of farm produce, or farm surplus, to export, as during the previous Administration. I say it was not in that that their whole crime lay—because I charge that it was a crime, or at least a blunder, and a very grave blunder, they made in the importations into this country. Now, Sir, I will give you the figures for the period from 1879 to 1883. In that period the imports were $179,521,507, and the exports $456,916,543, leaving an excess of imports over exports of $22,604,964. Now, Sir, of course this is a very favourable state of affairs. I confess that Providence did smile on the Conservative party in those years, and I confess there is something, which to my mind, would apparently justify the leader of the Opposition and other gentlemen on that side in saying that Providence had favoured us with better harvests, and all that sort of thing. But when I come to enquire into those imports, I will show wherein the difficulty lay, and I must be pardoned by the House for troubling the House with some figures. We find that the imports of free goods during the five years, from 1874 to 1878, were $182,307,627. Now, I say that there was great folly, and I will show you why I consider it so. In those figures we have, unfortunately, a record that stands out very badly for the gentlemen who are charged with the administration of the affairs of this country. We find that they allowed flour to come into the country to the extent of $12,383,485 worth; corn, $15,285,929; other small grains and meal, $3,429,064; and wheat, of all things, $33,995,349—all free of duty. Here was no less than $65,000,000 worth of these articles admitted free, articles in which our honest farmers had to compete with every day against the American producers. Now, Sir, I think these hon. gentlemen were chargeable of folly in that respect, and I say that these hon. gentlemen would perpetuate the same things to-day if they were in power. If they are true and honest to the expressions of opinions which they give in this House and in this country, they would have to stand by that policy to-day and still admit the products of the American farms to come in competition with the hardy farmers of our own country. If I am wrong, I will sit down and allow any hon. gentleman opposite to get up and state that I am wrong. If I am correct what about the protection for farmers, what about the farmers' grievances, which an hon. member opposite was talking about a few minutes ago? We all know, of course, that the farmers are the backbone of the country, and I say is it any wonder that the right arm of our trade was struck such a blow when we find that over $65,000,000 worth—not including all farm products—but merely grain and grain products, came into this country free to compete with our farmers here. I have simply taken those figures, that I feel we have a right to deal with here, and I show by them that the gentlemen on the other side of the House may thank their colleagues for the course they pursued with reference to the imports they allowed of that class of goods. Now, Sir, it is only fair that I should deal with the free imports which have come in under the present Administration. I find that in 1879, before our policy got fairly to work—because it came into force very late in the spring, and consequently there was very little to export before the next season—we had to permit $8,755,839 worth of grain and the products of grain, such as flour and meal, to come in free of duty. But let us take the four following years, and what do we find? During 1880, 1881, 1882 and 1883, there was imported into this country, of the same class of goods, for home consumption, $10,357,000 worth from the United States, upon which this Government imposed a duty of $1,323,838, equivalent to almost 13 per cent. Now, I think I can find a reason in this fact why wheat and other grains were always higher in price at Oswego, New York, Buffalo, and Chicago in previous years, under the Administration of the Reform party than in this country. To the extent of that $1,323,838, the farmers of Canada had a protection during the last four years on grain and the produce of grain, or no less than 13 per cent, or a fraction over 12 per cent. I think that is the answer to be given to these gentlemen, as to the imposition of duty on wheat and corn and flour. Now the total imports of grain and its products during the Conservative Administration, including 1879, amounted to $51,303,477 against $182,307,627 of free goods during the Administration of the Reform party. From this $51,303,477, deduct $10,357,900, the value of the goods that came in under a duty, and you have $40,945,577 worth of grain and the products of grain imported into this country under the Conservative Administration, and which were merely in transit through the country, being in bond while in the country, and afterwards exported. I think that ought to be a sufficient reason to the mind of any person responsible for his own judgment and opinions for the low prices of grain that prevailed in this country from 1874 to 1879, against the high prices that prevailed in the United States. Now, I think I shall be able to prove that, by a reference to an authority which hon. gentleman on the other side will not deny. I am going to quote now from the columns of the Globe the prices of grain at Toronto, as against the prices at Oswego, for several years back. I have chosen Oswego, because I think it more closely assimilates to the port of Toronto than any other American port we can name. My hon. friend from North Norfolk, referring to this matter the other day, made use of these words, which drew my attention to the subject, and induced me to look up the figures. He said:

"We have always maintained that the duty on wheat could not affect the price, except in years that we could not raise sufficient for our own consumption."

Well, we will say that this is one of the years when we have not raised sufficient. I think I will show, from the Trade and Navigation Returns, that we have raised sufficient, and have had an excess for export. Now, I am going to show what have been the prevailing prices of grain at the ports of Toronto and Oswego, and I am going to give the highest price and the best quality of wheat—Michigan White, as it is quoted—in both cases:

	Toronto. Wheat.	Oswego. Wheat.	Differ- ence.
1874—December 30. ....	$0 93	$1 36	43 c.
1875 " 29. ....	0 96	1 55	59
1876 " 30. ....	1 28	1 50	22
1877 " 28. ....	1 25	1 45	20
1878 " 28. ....	0 85	1 09	24

Now, we find that the average difference in favour of Oswego, during that five years, was 33½ cents a bushel. If the National Policy had no effect on the price of grain in this country, we would naturally expect the same state of things to exist to-day. I was led to look further, to see if it did continue to exist—to see if this National Policy not only affected the price of wheat in the years when we had a short crop, but extended to those years when we had a good crop and a surplus to export. I found that the prices at these two places, at the same period of each year, were as follows:

	Toronto Wheat.	Oswego Wheat.	Difference.
			Toronto.	Oswego.
1879 .....	$1 31	$1 40	.....	9
1880 .....	1 16	1 15	1	.....
1881 .....	1 28	1 39	.....	11
1882 .....	0 92	1 07	.....	15
1883 .....	1 16	1 12	4	.....

Now, Sir, during this period we find the price in favour of Toronto, in one case, of 1 cent, and in another case of 4 cents, making a total of 5 cents, which, taken from the 35 cents in favour of Oswego, gives us 30 cents to be divided among the five years. That makes 6 cents per bushel for each year for the five years we have just passed through, against 33 cents in favour of Oswego, from 1874 to 1878. I wish to be distinctly understood, that from 1874 to 1878, the difference in favour of Oswego, as against Toronto, was 33½ cents, whereas, from 1879 to 1883, it was only 6 cents. If the National Policy has not to do with it, what has? I would like hon. gentlemen opposite to explain how it was these differences have existed, and why they are distributed over the period of years so much in favour of my proposition and in favour of the policy of the Government. It has not happened by mere chance, but must have occurred through some action of the Government on trade. Under what other system can hon. gentlemen explain this away? Let us come a little closer to our day, and see if the state of things now is not more favourable than it was at the end of 1883. In the Globe of the 8th March, of this year, the price of wheat is quoted in Toronto at $1.10, and in Oswego at $1.11, or 1 cent per bushel in favour of Oswego. I have given the exact state of the case during the Administration of the Reform party, and I have given you, in contrast, the actual state of the case during the Administration of the Conservative party, and the actual state of the case to-day, and I defy any hon. gentleman to contradict those figures; for in order to be correct, I examined the Montreal Herald and some other papers, and found there might be a difference of 1 or 2 cents between them, one way or the other. I want to go further than that. I want to prove that we have a better market here than they have anywhere on the American side; that in Montreal you have a better price to-day for grain than in the city of New York. The same quality is sold in Montreal for $1.22 which in New York City only brings $1.07; at least, that was the case on the 8th March. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to explain that away, if they can. They cannot find that state of things existing during the period they administered the affairs of the country; no, nor had we then the control of our own home market. We all know the advantage of having a home market for bulky goods, such as grain, which forms so large a portion of our farm products, but under their Administration it was impossible for us to find a market at home. We were driven out of our own market by the $183,307,627 worth of grain and other products that were thrown upon this market during the Administration of the Reform Government. I trace the whole misfortune of Canada to that fact. I trace to it the sad state of the farming interest, which is the backbone of the country, and if paralyzed, every other interest becomes equally paralyzed. So much for the price of grain and the effect of the National Policy. I wish to say a few words on the price of coal, on which the hon. gentleman opposite dealt at some length. They say: You tax the poor man unreasonably by putting a tax on coal, an article that we do not produce, at all events in the western Provinces. I have often had to meet that argument at political meetings, and I have shown that this tax was counterbalanced by the duty we impose on flour going into the Lower Provinces, in order to get a home market there for our own flour. Politicians have often tried to excite the people on this coal question. I will give you a few figures from the Globe, showing the state of the coal market during the Administration of the late Government and this Government, and I will give you the dates in each case, and the price quoted in Toronto:—

	Hard Coal.	Soft Coal.
15th October, 1874.....	$8 00	$7 00
30th December, 1875.....	8 50	7 00
27th December, 1876.....	6 50	7 00
20th December, 1877.....	6 50	6 50
25th December, 1878.....	5 50	5 50

The average price of hard coal for these five years is $7 per ton, and soft coal $6 50. Take the period from 1879 to 1883. Quotations again from the Globe:

	Hard Coal.	Soft Coal.
21st December, 1879.....	$4 75	$6 50
23rd December, 1880.....	7 00	6 50
29th December, 1881.....	7 00	7 00
28th December, 1882.....	6 50	6 50
20th December, 1883.....	7 00	6 50

Average from 1874 to 1883, $6.45 for hard coal against $7.00 during the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. When there was no duty, the soft coal figured up to $6.60 for the average of these five years, a difference of ten cents. In reference to that, I would say that even if it were proved that we had, by the imposition of a duty, created a higher price for coal, it is not illustrated by the figures quoted in Toronto for those past ten years. I have given you my authority, and I think that facts speak louder than any political proposition that can be got up in order to cover up the case that hon. gentlemen try to make, that the poor man is taxed for his coal by this Government. They may say: Well, take the duty off coal, and what would be the result? Would it decline by 50 cents per ton? I am not prepared to admit that. I confess I have serious doubts whether it would decline, except perhaps for a few months at first, because, as soon as the Americans found the duty was off, they would again put up their prices, I suppose, to suit their own trade, as they did in days gone by. I do not say, because there are other hon. members in this House who are better versed in the subject than I am, what the effect of this policy has been on the output of coal in the Lower Provinces. There are gentlemen in this House who could tell better what the effect has been there, and this is a great national question, and is not an Ontario question alone. We have to fight that battle there with the politicians of the country, but there are very few people who are finding fault with the price of coal to-day, who remember what it was under the Administration of that Government. I wish to trouble the House for a few minutes with the prices of agricultural implements in the North-West. Hon. gentlemen have made a very great outcry about that, and have said we were taxing the farmers of the North-West, and it was one of their great grievances. I did not know but that there might be some truth in the matter, and I took the trouble to investigate it. I wrote to the dealers in the North-West, and I have their letters and their prices here, and I shall be happy to give them to hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, and I should like them to go on the records of the House, for reference hereafter, because I think it is of great importance to people who are going to the North-West, to know what they have to expect in that country when they go there; because, if you took the information obtained from some hon. gentlemen—hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, I am glad to say—one would be deterred from going in there for fear one would have to pay a much higher price for agricultural implements than that which existed previous to the additional duty, than that which one would have to pay if one lived in Dakota. Now, I am in possession of the figures here from the dealers in Brandon, and I would like to put some of them on record, and contrast the prices to-day with the prices of 1881-82. I will first take Captain Wastie, the Canadian Pacific Railway Commissioner, in the city of Brandon, probably one of the most intelligent business men in the city of Brandon to-day. Here are the prices he quotes for me for American and Canadian implements. I asked him to furnish a statement to cover the period of the sales in that country, so that I might go back to the time before the additional imposition of a tax on agricultural implements by this House, and ascertain what the effect had been on the prices there. This is his price list:

Now, these are remarkable reductions, and I wish that some notice would be taken of them, because they are very important factors in the outfit of an immigrant going to the North-West, and have to be taken into consideration, and I would like hon. gentlemen to observe what extraordinary reductions have taken place in this case, in the face of an increase of duty. Sir, I think that ought to be a sufficient answer as to the increased cost of agricultural implements by reason of the additional duty. There are the quotations of the dealers in that country, who will be happy to fill the orders of any gentleman visiting the North-West for the purpose of settlement. Before sitting down, I wish to say that if it should ever fall to the lot of Canada to have an Administration led by the hon. member for West Durham, I trust he will have the good sense to change his policy in the interests of Canada. If he should arrive at power, I could desire nothing more favourable to my party than that he should continue his present policy, as I am certain that he would be very soon turned out again and that the Conservative party would come back to power. But I would prefer to see the hon. gentleman opposite accept the facts which are patent to every body in Canada, and to admit that we are in a more prosperous condition on every hand than we were under the Mackenzie Administration. I do not think it would be necessary to appeal to intelligent people to prove that almost every item that enters into the expense of the household is cheaper now, as well as of better quality, than it was in the days of the Mackenzie Government. I might appeal to the old ladies of the country as to the prices of cotton, of woollens, of dress goods, and of almost every article that enters into the consumption of the household, to prove that in almost every instance we now get better quality and at better prices. Mr. Speaker, thanking the House for the indulgence extended to me, I resume my seat.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. We have had two very important admissions made to-night, which show that friends opposite are getting more light. The first admission was that when our people buy articles from another country, on which there is a high duty, they pay that duty themselves; the other is that Providence had a little to do with the success of the National Policy. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) and the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Wigle), both asserted that the National Policy was not intended to benefit the manufacturers by making the consumer pay higher prices, but it was intended to benefit the manufacturer solely, by giving him the control of the home market. Now, Sir, that is just what the National Policy has not done. Instead of giving him the home market, it has, in a great measure, taken the home market from him. In 1878, before the National Policy was inaugurated, we imported immensely less of manufactured goods than we did in 1883, showing conclusively that the National Policy, instead of giving our manufacturers the possession of the home market, had deprived them of a portion of it. In respect to agricultural implements, we have been told to-night that we could get them cheaper to-day than before Protection was inaugurated, and that the National Policy was intended to give manufacturers of these implements the control of the market, and not for the purpose of raising prices. Now, Sir, how lamentably it has failed in giving the possession of the home market is apparent from the fact that in 1878, of agricultural implements, we imported into this country $63,175 worth; while in 1883, after the National Policy had had full swing for four years, we imported $581,859. These things speak louder than all the declamation that hon. gentlemen can indulge in. It is all very well to make these general statements. I notice that our friends opposite always wax eloquent in general statements, but when they come to deal with facts, they find the facts are against them and I suppose that, like the man who was hard up for an argument, they are ready to exclaim: So much the worse for the facts! We have been told that these articles are cheaper now than before we had Protection. That is just the point we dispute. They are not only dearer but they are also, as a general rule, of poorer quality than they were before. Great stress has been laid on agricultural implements. There is no use in wasting time going over the whole class—let us take a few. Let us take the self-binding harvester. You cannot tell whether that is dearer or cheaper, because it was not manufactured in this country before the National Policy was brought into existence. Figures have been read over to us to-night, showing that from $100 to $350 have been paid as the price of that article; but I tell you, from the knowledge I have of its manufacture, that it is not worth half that sum to-day, and that if we had a proper fiscal policy that did not handicap our manufacturers, they could make it, at good profit for less than half the money; and we are paying the other half as a direct result of Protection. The hon. member for South Essex has ridiculed the idea that Protection produces rings. He says that rings will exist whether we have Protection or not. That is just the point where we take issue. Rings are not possible where there is not Protection. It is only Protection that brings them into existence. How can men combine to keep up prices if there are outsiders beyond the ring standing ready to furnish the articles at a lower price? Allusion has been made to-night on both sides of the House to the article of coal oil. Now, I happened, not many years, to live where the refining industry was carried on. Before the Mackenzie Government came into power, you all remember there was a very high tariff on oil, and we were charged from 40 to 50 cents a gallon for refined oil. I paid under that tariff 45 cents a gallon, and the gentleman who sold it stated to me that he favoured me 5 cents, and that his selling price was 50 cents. At that quotations in Liverpool, you found they were selling that oil in England for 18 cents a gallon—all the difference was money that was robbed from the people of this country. A few months afterwards, the Mackenzie Government revised the duty upon oil, and the result was that you could get refined oil of the best quality for 15 cents a gallon, retail.

Mr. FARROW. What year was that?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I do not remember the exact year, but it was before the Mackenzie Government changed the Tariff. The same holds good with all other manufactures. It is only a few weeks since I was coming down to this House, and I was riding on the train with a hardware merchant, who told me that he has now commenced the importation again of American nails into this country. I had to use a great deal of Canadian nails last summer, and I am ready to verify what that gentleman stated. He stated that the difference in the intrinsic value between a keg of American and Canadian nails was $1 in favour of the American, and I believe he was right. I had reason to use a great many during last summer, and I found the Canadian nails were an inferior article and could not be driven into hard wood as well as the American nails, and there was a very large percentage of waste amongst them. He told me, also, that in the matter of spades, he is now beginning to import the American article. Time was when no one who knew anything about a good spade would use any other. But hon. gentlemen opposite so arranged the Tariff as to give the Canadian manufacturers the monopoly of the market, the consequence of which was that the people had to use poorer spades. They are now beginning to pay higher prices in order to get the American article, because it is cheaper in the long run. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Wigle) made merry at the expense of the leader of the Opposition, in regard to some remark he had made about a surplus. I hold the leader of the Opposition was right. The Government having no right to collect a larger amount of revenue from the people than is required to carry on the Government; if they do collect more, it is dishonest in the extreme. He says the hon. gentleman should have gone on and given an illustration. Suppose, he said, the Reeve of a township was to come back for re-election, and boast that he had collected during the year a surplus of $5,000 and claim re-election on that ground. I have been a great many years in County Councils and I never yet met a Reeve simple enough to come back and make such a plea. It is, however, the plea that the Government is now making to the country. The Government are saying in effect: Here are $5,000,000, $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 a year taken out of the pockets of the people; look at our surplus; on this ground we ask the confidence of the people. Allusion has been made, over and over again, to the fact that our manufacturing interests have reached a crisis. It has been shown that we have a very limited market, that Protection has cut us off from the markets of the world, that our export trade is much less now, with all the improved machinery and appliances for the manufacture of goods, than it was before Protection in Canada was thought of. The country feels that we have reached the point of over-production. Last year, when the Finance Minister was making his annual statement, or during the debate, he made the prophecy that there were yet seven years of prosperity before us. The statement was challenged at the time, and it has not taken twelve months to show how egregiously he was mistaken. I do not mean to say that the Government are always to blame for hard times. I believe, as a general rule, they have very little to do with it. I believe that hard times and prosperity are under the control of the people and not under the Government, except to a very limited extent. All the Government can do is to adopt a wise fiscal policy, and to remove obstructions in the way of free trading. But there is another respect in which the Government never can do much. They never can make up for want of industry and for what the people spend in reckless extravagance. I do not say that the Government are altogether to blame for the crisis, because it would come at some time; but what we charge them with is, that it has come three or four years before it was due, and its coming is a direct result of the course of the Government in the matter of Protection. With regard to manufactures, we have been charged with being opposed to, and enemies of, manufacturers. No greater mistake could be made. No one class of the community has a right to rejoice in distress happening to another class. I hold that no one important class in the nation can suffer distress without another class suffering. But we, on this side of the House, hold that this over-production, this stagnation of business, this locking up of capital in unproductive goods, which cannot find a market, are direct results of the protective policy. They brought about stagnation four years before it was due. Instead of the manufacturers being permanently benefitted, I am afraid they have been permanently injured. Hon. gentlemen opposite always assume that our manufacturers were making nothing before Protection was adopted. No greater mistake can be made. Taking man for man, I believe that at the beginning of 1879, before Protection was inaugurated, the manufacturers were better off than they are to-day. I know, at least, that just before Protection was inaugurated, two at least of the old manufacturers of London were able to retire with fortunes. I believe, and I have my information on good authority, that there are not manufacturers in that large manufacturing city who have made anything like competencies since Protection; in fact, scarcely one has retained his own. No doubt manufacturers made large profits when they were able to charge increased prices, owing to the protective duty; but soon the business became overdone. They had the home market, but there were so many producers they could not all make a living, and they could not sell to foreign nations, because they were handicapped in the race; so our manufacturers, I repeat, instead of being permanently benefitted have been permanently injured. Allusion has been made to the iron industry. There is the important fact that dozens and dozens of iron furnaces in the United States have been standing idle since 1876, a circumstance which is a result of Protection. We are going to have a similar experience in this country, I am afraid—manufactories closed up, the capital expended in them completely lost to the country, the Government, by its fiscal policy, being directly chargeable with that result. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Wigle), has repeated the old story of "flies on the wheel." He talks about hon. gentlemen opposite as flies on the wheel, who did nothing to relieve the sufferings of the manufacturers. What better have the hon. gentlemen now in office done? I do not say they are flies on the wheel, but they are vampires, sucking the life-blood out of the people. I repeat that we have no reason to wish manufacturers ill; we have every reason to wish them well, because when they are prosperous other classes will have a share in the prosperity; but what we do object to is, that one class should be set above another and protected at the expense of all, and the Government pick the pockets of the people under the guise of protecting them.

Mr. WATSON. I had not intended taking part in this debate, but as certain allusions have been made to the North-West, I think it is my duty to express my opinions on the subject before the House. The member for Perth (Mr. Hesse) has made some reference to a movement which has been going on in the North-West for the past few months, and as to which, I suppose, most hon. members are well informed by the press, so that it is not necessary for me to say very much about it. I may state, however, that there has been a feeling of discontent in that country, and I think this feeling has been provoked by the present Government in Ottawa. There may have been some meetings at Moose Jaw, such as the hon. gentleman refers to, but it must be remembered that the people at Moose Jaw have not suffered in the same way as the farmers in the older sections of the Province of Manitoba, because at Moose Jaw, at the present time, there is little, if anything, produced, as the country there has only been settled about a year. For that reason, the people there have not suffered to the same extent from the grievances which are complained of in Manitoba. There is one thing against which I have risen to enter my protest, and that is the high duty on agricultural implements, which are necessities of life to the farmers of the North-West. I do not belong to Ontario, and therefore I have no interest in protecting a few manufacturers who reside in the constituencies of hon. gentlemen in that Province. I speak for the farming community, and especially for the farmers of the North-West, and I say that the high Tariff is a great grievance to those people. It has always been the idea that, as the hon. Finance Minister gave this high Protection to enable the implement manufacturers in Ontario to build up that industry, to a certain extent he might see fit to reduce the Tariff on such articles. I find that that Tariff is not only annoying the farmers of the North-West, but the farmers of Ontario. I find that at a meeting of grangers, representing the farmers of Ontario, which was held here last week, a petition was sent to the Finance Minister, asking that the duty on agricultural implements be reduced. If this Tariff bears so heavily on the people of Ontario, it must bear much more heavily on the settlers of the North-West. We require in that country certain kinds of machinery, which have not been made a sufficient length of time in the factories of Ontario to attain the quality which we desire it should attain, and we can buy, in some instances, machinery from the United States much better adapted to a prairie country than the machinery from Ontario. I am glad to see that the manufacturers of Ontario are improving in their machinery, but at the same time, I cannot see that they should require 35 per cent. protection. If the Government are desirous of having that country settled, they should offer all possible inducements to settlers, not only by a liberal land policy, but by placing that country in the position of being able to buy their implements as cheaply, if not more cheaply, than on the other side of the line, and of as good quality. The hon. gentleman stated that a person from Ontario who had gone across the boundary line said that he found that he had to pay the duty, "but thank God the people who left Ontario for the United States were coming back into Manitoba, to the extent of 11,000 last year." For my own part, coming from that Province, I have not seen any such influx of people from Dakota and Minnesota to the North-West. I am sorry to say that the movement has been the other way, though I do not glory in that fact, or take any pride in it. The people of that country are not seeking for grievances as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would wish us to believe. It has been stated that we are disloyal. Now, I do not think that the people of that country are disloyal; I do not think there are more loyal subjects in the Dominion of Canada than there are in the Province of Manitoba to-day; but while they are loyal to the Dominion, as a whole, they feel that they should be loyal to themselves, and they do not consider it being disloyal to agitate or complain of their grievances. As I stated before, this high duty on implements is a great grievance. If we had manufacturers in that country who could produce these implements, they might share in the benefits of this Tariff equally with the manufacturers of Ontario; but that is not the case, and the high Protective Tariff is, I believe, injuring the many for the sake of the few, and especially is this the case in the North-West, where we have no manufacturers. We require, as I stated before, certain machinery which is not so well manufactured in Canada, is not so well adapted to our prairie country, and is not as good value as what we could obtain from the United States, and consequently we have to pay the duty and bring these articles in from the United States. There are different articles of that kind, such as the straw-burning steam engines, for threshing machines; Deering binder, and others. I was told only last Friday, by a large manufacturer in Ontario, who was handling the Deering binder in the North-West, that there was something peculiar about the people of the North-West which he could hardly understand. That, strange to say, he could sell that machine of the American make for $30 more than he could sell the Canadian machine. The reason for that is simply this, that in that country they have to take off a large crop in a very short time, and in order to do that they must have the best machinery that can be made, even if they pay more money for it. For that reason, the people will not stick at $20 or $25 on the price of a machine, when they have to take off their crop, probably, in a few days, for if there should be any flaw or breakage in the machine, owing to the manufacturers not having had experience in making it, it might result in a great loss of their crop. I might state also, that at one time the Province of Manitoba had a special Tariff, and I do not see any reason why it should not have a special Tariff now. It was stated by the First Minister that it was not possible to make a special Tariff for any particular Province, but we know that for a time after Manitoba was taken into the Confederation, the tariff was only 4 per cent. Now, as there are no manufacturers in that Province, and as we have to import all our implements from Ontario or the United States, I think it is unjust to that Province that it should not have a special Tariff. Manitoba is in a peculiar position, inasmuch as she has had to pay more since coming into Confederation, in proportion to what she has received than any other Province. I will take the figures for the last ten years :

Mr. ARMSTRONG.

Manitoba, net revenue.....	$3,858,978
British Columbia .....	2,755,588
Balance in favour of Manitoba.....	$1,103,350
Manitoba.....	$3,858,938
Prince Edward Island.....	535,555
Balance in favour of Manitoba .....	$3,323,383

Disbursements made by Federal Government :

British Columbia.....	$2,793,543 30
Manitoba .....	1,541,448 10
	$1,252,095 20

Contributions of Manitoba in excess of British Columbia.....	$1,103,350 92
Receipts less .....	1,252,095 20
	$2,355,446 12

Manitoba worth more to Canada than British Columbia. Disbursements made by Federal Government :

Prince Edward Island.....	$2,249,920 15
Manitoba .....	1,541,448 10
	$1,708,472 05

Contribution of Manitoba in excess of Prince Edward Island.....	$3,332,383 73
Receipts less .....	1,708,472 05
	$5,041,955 78

Manitoba profit to Canada over Prince Edward Island. Now, I shall give the amounts derived from the revenue for the last ten years, although it is probable that the figures do not place Manitoba in as high a position as she ought to occupy with reference to the first two or three years after she went into Confederation. The following is the proportionate net revenue and the cost of Government in the Provinces named during the last ten years :

	Net Revenue.	Cost of Government.
Nova Scotia.....	$10,611 788.30	$6,198,833.64 or 1/2 profit.
New Brunswick.....	9,053,128 40	6,192,296.25 or 1/2 " "
British Columbia.....	5,559,131.30	2,793,543 30 or 1/2 " "
Prince Edward Island .....	535,559.19	2,249,920.15 or 4/5 loss.
Manitoba.....	3,858,938.92	1,511,448.10 or 2/5 profit.

The amounts per head contributed to the Dominion by the different Provinces for the last ten years were as follows :—

Ontario.....	$ 31.46 ; average per year $ 3.14 1/2
Quebec.....	51.65 " " 5.16 1/2
Nova Scotia.....	34.89 " " 8.48 3/8
New Brunswick.....	42.10 " " 4.21
Manitoba.....	107.62 " " 10.76 1/2
British Columbia.....	172.76 " " 10.27 1/2
Prince Edward Island.....	24.14 " " 2.41 1/2

This shows that each Manitoban contributes to the Dominion twice as much as a Quebecker, two and one-third times as much as a New Brunswicker, three times as much as a Nova Scotian, three and one-fourth times as much as an Ontarian, and four and one-fourth times as much as a Prince Edward Islander. Now, I think that as Manitoba holds that position with reference to the contributions to the revenue of the Dominion, the Government might see fit to make a special Tariff for Manitoba. There is another article besides agricultural implements, that I might mention, with regard to which the Tariff is very heavily felt in Manitoba, that is, canned goods. With reference to this, I may read what Mr. Mackenzie, the President of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, has to say :

"The canned goods industry is perhaps one of the least of the manufacturing industries of the Eastern Provinces, and I refer to it quite as much to show how ready the Government is to listen and to assist any demands made upon it by the eastern people—quite a contrast to its treatment of the demands of Manitoba—as to show how enormous the protection afforded on canned fruits is, and how peculiarly hard it presses on the country, owing to the fact that all fruits, green or canned, have to be brought here. The duty on canned vegetables, up to a year ago, was 20 per cent. ad valorem; on canned fruits, 2 cents per pound. This was not considered enough, and the manufacturers went to the Government and had the duty arranged so that it was calculated to make other manufacturers sick with envy. There is no allowance for quality, poor paying a higher rate than good. Here is the Tariff :

Canned apples, 3 cts. per lb.....	58 per cent.
" gooseberries, 3 " " .....	60 " "
" pears, 3 " " .....	62 1/2 " "
" strawberries, 3 " " .....	84 " "
" peaches, 3 " " .....	74 to 105 " "

CANNED VEGETABLES.

Tomatoes, 2 cts. per lb.....	78 per cent.
Corn, 2 " " .....	80 " "
Peas, 2 " " .....	87 " "

And the weight of the cans to be always included ; jam, 5 cts. per lb., equal to 60 per cent."

Now, I think I have shown that Manitoba suffers very greatly from this high protection, and I had hoped that the hon. Finance Minister would see fit to adopt a special Tariff in order to relieve the people of that country from some of their burdens. A good deal has been said here in the way of comparison between American and Canadian manufactured articles. I do not wish to run down Canadian manufactures, but I think the effect of this higher protection is that Canadian manufacturers are producing an inferior article to what they would if they had outside competition. An hon. member of this House from British Columbia stated to me the other night, that even the Chinamen in British Columbia, who could not read or write, would select American manufactured goods, even at a higher price, in preference to those manufactured in Canada. One article that the Chinamen use out there, is long rubber boots, and he stated a Chinaman would pay $10 for the American make when he would not give $8 for the Canadian ; and he said the same thing was true with regard to shovels. Now, while I believe it is right to build up our manufacturing industries in Canada, I do not think they should be protected to such an extent as to compel Canadians to buy inferior goods. I think a reasonable revenue Tariff ought to be sufficient, and I hope and trust that ere long the present high protection will give place to such, for the North-West will welcome the day when the Tariff is reduced. The hon. member for East Hastings stated that machines that were sold formerly for $100 were now sold for $15 less; and he went on to state that these machines were 300 pounds lighter. I do not see why a machine, which is 300 pounds lighter than it was, should not be manufactured for less money than it was before. I think we ought to manufacture goods to-day cheaper than we did five or ten years ago. There is no reason why a machine which was sold for $100 ten years ago should not be sold to-day for $75, and I do not think it is a fair comparison to contrast the prices at which machinery was bought in Ontario previous to the high Tariff with the prices of to-day, because, as any person who understands the manufacturing of these implements knows, there is more profit in selling machines at $75 to-day than there was ten years ago at $100.

Mr. TEMPLE. I should like to say a few words on the National Policy; but before entering on the subject, I feel called upon to pay a deserved tribute to the memory of the gentleman who preceded me, and who sat in this House for a number of years, Mr. John Pickard, a gentleman who was, I think highly respected by both sides of the House, and who was loved and respected by his country and by the county which he had the honour to represent, and which to-day I have the honour of representing. That gentleman ran his election in 1882, when the National Policy was the chief issue and was returned by a majority of 917 over his opponent, the Hon. John Fraser. He, to the great regret of all, passed away, and on the 29th January, 1884, I ran the election in that county; and as is well known to this House, I replaced Mr. Pickard's majority and had 178 besides over my opponent, which made a difference of over 1,100 votes in favor of the Government, and this was run under the National Policy. I merely state this to show the growth of the feeling that exists in our section of the country, and the difference now compared with what existed when the National Policy was introduced. So much has been heard for the last three or four months about the taxation under the National Policy, that this cry of taxation has been ringing in my ears ever since; but, as far as I can see, we hear nothing of it in our part of the country, except from politicians, during the elections. The whole cry seems to be in Ontario and in the west. Far and wide it is asserted that this policy means ruin and desolation to the country and nothing else; but as far as my county is concerned, it was never in a better condition than it is at present. That is my experience, and it is that of the people, or I would not be here to-day. One of the richest men we have in our county, who opposed me in my election, is putting up to-day one of the largest cotton factories there is in this country. From that fact it is impossible to think otherwise than that he cannot be fully convinced of the views he pretended to hold, or he would not have gone to work to put up this factory. A few days before I left home, I had some conversation with that gentleman, and speaking on the question of cotton goods, of which we have heard so much for the last few days, I said: The Americans are now bringing in cotton to Montreal and overflowing the market and underselling our manufacturers, and I asked him what he was going to do. He replied that he did not see any other course than that the Government should put on more duties. Yet this is a gentleman who holds the same views as hon. gentlemen opposite. We have heard a great deal about farming implements, but in Fredericton, we have an establishment for the manufacture of reaping and mowing machines and all kinds of farming implements; and the gentlemen who own that factory have greatly enlarged their business since the National Policy was introduced. Although previously they had an immense business, still since that time they have more than doubled the capacity of their establishment, and yet are unable to supply the demand. One of those gentlemen is now a member of our Local House and is the gentleman who, in one of his speeches against me during the canvas, said the tree had not yet grown to make a chair to hold a Tory in at Ottawa. I never knew I was a Tory before. We have another establishment, the head of which happens to be a good Conservative; and in this connection I may say that one thing has occurred to me since I have been here—that is, that hon. gentlemen opposite, judging from their despondency and their discouraging views, must have a bad case. I cannot find any other reason for their despondency and gloom. The hon. gentleman to whom I refer has an establishment in the parish of St. Mary's, opposite Fredericton, in which he makes hames and other articles for the lumber trade; and during the last year he has more than doubled the capacity of his factory, without yet being able to begin to make enough goods to supply the wants of the country. He sends his articles as far as Winnipeg, and receives orders from Toronto and all over the country. I mention these instances to show the improvement that exists in trade to-day, owing to the introduction of the National Policy in our section of the country. I cannot understand this overproduction, about which we hear so much. In our section, the factories cannot supply the demands and have to enlarge their capacity every year. I have not heard anyone speaking especially in reference to the Eastern Provinces, but I know our people are well contented with the National Policy and the general policy of the Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness.) Mr. Speaker, it appears to me you have listened to representatives from all the Provinces of the Dominion, and from all sections of all the Provinces of the Dominion, and I feel that it is about time you would hear some person from the old Province of Cape Breton. At this late hour, it would be painful to you, Sir, and not very pleasant to myself, to detain you very much longer in your present position, so it is my intention to be as brief as possible. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure, I may say, to the discussion of this very important question, and I have taken a very considerable interest in the views expressed, from all points of view. My hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) came boldly forth, and advocated direct taxation as the only course to pursue, in order to raise a revenue to meet the necessities of the country. Every hon. gentleman who has spoken on the Opposition side, if I understood him, presented his own views, and the views of each one seemed to be very different from the views expressed by every other person; so that I have come to the conclusion that unless they concentrate their ideas and adopt some common policy, it will be absolutely impossible for them to lead any party to power on the so-called Revenue Tariff policy. I entertain views somewhat different from nearly all that were expressed by all parties. I observe that every person in Opposition claims that the consumer pays the duty, and I observe also that a great many on the Government side admit that the consumer pays the duty, and argue from that standpoint. I occupy the position that the producer pays the duty more frequently than the consumer. I have listened, with a great deal of pleasure, to my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Wigle), who has delivered one of the most practical speeches that I have heard delivered in this Parliament, and, before going further, I beg to endorse every word and sentiment that he expressed to this House. It was not only practical, but it was common sense from beginning to end. Now, I would ask—and I regret that my hon. friend from South Middlesex is not in his seat, because he represents a fine agricultural county, like myself—I would like to ask him, when he is exporting barley to the United States, on which they impose a duty of 15 cents, who pays the duty in that case? He will say, true to his idea of the policy, that it is the consumer in the United States who pays it, but I differ with him. He will find by experience, if he will attempt to place his barley in the American market, that he will pay every cent of that 15 cents duty on his barley. Let him try barley malt, on which they impose a duty of 20 cents a bushel, and he will find, just as surely as he tries the experiment, that the producer in that case will pay every cent of duty that is imposed in the United States. Let him try peas, beans, and other articles on which they impose a duty of 10 cents a bushel, and he will find that he, as exporter from this Dominion into the United States, will pay all the duty, and the American consumer will pay not one cent. Let him try his wheat, and he will find that the producer in Canada will pay every cent of the duty. Let him try butter. If butter is sold on the American side for 25 cents a pound, and on the Canadian side for 25 cents a pound as well, how can he place butter at any profit on the American market, when he has to pay 4 cents duty on it to get there.

An hon. MEMBER. It does not get there at all.

Mr. CAMERON. It does not get there at all, I admit; but, if it does get there at all, the producer in Canada would pay the duty. There are some circumstances which will compel the Canadian producer to send his butter to the United States, even at 4 cents a pound loss, and it is not only to the United States he is compelled to do so. When he has a large quantity on hand, he must sell short to meet bills, and take as much for his butter as he can obtain for it in the markets of the world. Let him try any other article produced by the farmers of this country, and exported to the American market, and every practical farmer in this Dominion must admit that the producer will pay the duty. But the Free Trader says, and with some reason: "Oh, it is all true; when we export to a foreign market, it is true we pay the duty." That seems to be the position taken by all the Free Traders. Well, it is a bad rule that does not cut both ways. If the American exporters find a necessity for exporting their goods into Canada, is it not equally reasonable that they pay the duty? But this reasoning is met in this way. When we import from the United States we pay the duty; and, when we export to the United States, we pay such duty as they impose on such goods as we export; but it is not the case at all. Practically, now, the producers or the middlemen are the importers into foreign countries. For the last twenty-five years, business transactions made as great a revolution as did the slow coaches in former days, when transposed into the iron horse. In former days, we did import goods from foreign countries. Nowadays, the goods of foreign countries are placed in our market by the producers or the middlemen from those countries, in the same way exactly as if the producers or the middlemen in foreign countries transposed themselves into importers into our country. Down by the sea, years ago, we have been taught by experience, that whatever duty the Americans imposed upon goods exported by us, we invariably paid the duty. We tried to export potatoes there; we were met by a 15 cents per bushel tariff, and no farmer in the Province of Nova Scotia, or even in Cape Breton, will ever deny that he, when he reaches the American market, pays all the duty imposed. It is the same with horses and cattle and all the products of the farm, that we are obliged to export to the United States. There is another matter in which we take great interest in the Maritime Provinces, particularly in Cape Breton, and that is the article of coal. We had been shipping coal to the United States under a Tariff of $1.25 a ton, and the result was that the carriers and the miners were reduced to a starving condition. The cost of raising coal and the cost of shipping it were so great that the whole industry collapsed. The duty was reduced to 75 cents a ton, and even then it was found impossible for our miners to place coal in the American market at any profit, and the result was that during the four years that the late Government was in power, starvation and ruin prevailed in the mining sections. When our coal mines in Nova Scotia are in a state of depression, the agricultural interest suffers to an equal extent. On the Island of Cape Breton, with which I am more familiar, during the four years that the late Government was in power, the farmers were appealed to, and not in vain, to contribute to the maintenance of the starving coal miners of that Island. But since the inauguration of the National Policy, no class of people in the Province of Nova Scotia occupy a more comfortable and a more independent position than do the miners of that Island, and as a consequence, the farmers find a ready market for ready cash for all the products of the soil in eastern Nova Scotia. I have no hesitation in saying, and I say it within the hearing of my constituents, that never in the history of the Island were the farmers, the fishermen and the miners in a more prosperous condition than at present, and I attribute it almost wholly to the National Policy. Another mistake is made by hon. gentlemen belonging to the Opposition in this House. They seem to assume that the whole object of the National Policy is to raise the taxes of the people. In this they make a mistake. The object of the National Policy should be, first, to encourage an increase in the products of the soil, the sea, the mine, the factory and the forest; second, to afford facilities for distributing all these productions; third, to place in the hands of the consumer, at home, all necessary and useful goods at the lowest possible economic value; fourth, to induce our own people to remain in the country; fifth, to convince immigrants from other countries that the Dominion of Canada affords room for the sober and industrious to make homes for themselves and families; and lastly, to secure the best foreign markets for our surplus products. These, in my humble opinion, are the objects of the National Policy, nothing more and nothing less. The better way of encouraging the products of the soil is to secure all the home market for our people, and if we can produce a surplus, then it is our duty to secure the best markets abroad for that surplus, and without so doing we fail in our duty as representatives of the people. Again, it is our duty to encourage the products of the sea. The present Government, I have no hesitation in saying, has taken a step in the right direction. No wiser step has ever been taken by the Government of Canada to encourage an increase in products of the sea than that of giving a bounty to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. It has not only encouraged the fishermen to fish for a certain period of time, but it has encouraged them to pay greater attention to the fishing, which will add to their success. By the adoption of that wise policy, we now find that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces have learned that great attention is absolutely necessary to insure a large product from the sea. The policy adopted by this Government has largely tended to encourage them in that direction, and the result is a very large increase in the products of the sea. Again, the Government have wisely and well encouraged the increase of the products of the mine, of the products of the factory, and of the forest, and in this way they have fulfilled the great object of the National Policy. I observe that many hon. gentlemen in the Opposition complain that there is a great deal of emigration from Canada to the United States. To my mind, that only proves that we have not gone far enough.

Mr. BLAKE. We are going further.

Mr. CAMERON. I am glad to see the leader of the Opposition smile. If he could only show me that our emigrants go across to Free Trade England, then his argument would have some force; but when we find that they are going into a country where the industries are more protected than in Canada, to my mind that is an argument in the direction of affording greater protection to the industries of Canada, as they have done in the United States. But when we hear complaints that there is a tide of emigration from certain counties and certain sections of the Dominion, I think it behoves the Government to enquire the reason, for it may be that the evil may be remedied. One of the reasons for this emigration from certain localities in the great Province of Ontario, so far as I could learn from statements in this House, is the fact that they have not facilities for distributing the products of those localities. If there is anything calculated to drive the population from a section of country, it is want of facilities in distributing the produce of that section; and the reason they go to the United States is, that they find in that country greater facilities for distributing the products of the mine, the soil and factory. If you glance at the map of the United States, you see a net work of railways.

Mr. BLAKE. So you will in Ontario.

Mr. CAMERON. Unfortunately you will not in Cape Breton; and in Ontario you will find that in those sections where they have facilities for distribution, there is much less emigration to the United States than from those sections in which they have not those facilities. Now, I wish to say a few words in answer to my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of War, who has now the honour of representing the county of Digby (Mr. Vail). That hon. gentleman said we were promised, in Nova Scotia, before Confederation, that the tax would not be increased beyond 15 per cent. I fail to see what connection this question can have with the National Policy. He has shown also, by some extraordinary calculation, that while we paid $1,200,000 as Customs duties in Nova Scotia prior to Confederation, on a large import, at the present time we pay a very much larger sum on a small import. This again does not prove anything against the National Policy. But the hon. gentleman is like all free traders. If the free trader is allowed to argue against Protection, he is sure to convince every intelligent business man that his theories are not practically correct. He is sure to appeal to the prejudices of the masses against the "bloated monopolists," to dilate on "legalized robbery," and to shed a tear over the miseries of the poor man who pays the taxes. But before concluding, he is sure to expose the fallacy of his reasoning by reference to practical results. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) has, like all his predecessors, fallen into his own trap. After referring to the iniquitous effects of the National Policy, he said:

"The great object of the protective policy was to assist our struggling industries. Well, I cannot see, for my own part, that the struggling industries have been helped in the slightest degree. It is true, that the protective policy has led to increased manufactures in some parts, and there are more running now than in 1878, but I think, when we find that the cotton stocks, for instance—and that industry was to be more benefited than any other industry by this policy—are worth now about 50 per cent. of the par value; and they were, even under the old trade policy of the Government of the member for East York, over par, or at least from 80 to par, that it will be easily seen that the cotton industry has not been very much benefited. While on that question, I would refer to a remark made by the member for Cardwell in regard to the prices for cotton. I think it was unfair on the part of that hon. gentleman to compare the prices in the United States with the prices in the Dominion last year. Everyone knows that last year there was a surplus quantity of cotton lying in the manufactories in this country, and that in the Maritime Provinces the agents were very numerous and were offering to sell cotton goods, delivered last autumn, and consider them as being delivered the spring of this year, in order to get them off their hands; and the consequence was, of course, that the over-production and the quantity they had on hand made a competition which reduced the value of cotton very much lower, and it was therefore an unfair thing to take the price last year and compare it with the price in the United States."

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

In this way when arguing this question of Free Trade, all persons who advocate Free Trade must admit that competition will bring down the prices of all goods manufactured in this country. They must come to the conclusion, as does every sensible man in the Dominion, that demand and supply will always regulate the prices of all goods and place them within the power of the consumer to buy. That being the case, the policy of the Government has been to increase the product of the soil, of the sea, of the factory and of the forest, and by increasing those products it has placed in the hands of the consumers of the Dominion those articles at the lowest possible value. The National Policy, besides encouraging competition at home, has not discouraged the importation of goods from foreign countries. It has not built a Chinese wall which prevents competitors from abroad coming into Canada and competing with the factories at home; and the result is that by the sharp competition which is going on between home manufacturers and manufacturers abroad, goods of all classes are now placed in the hands of consumers at lower prices than they ever were previously known to be in the history of Canada. This is our experience in Cape Breton, and I have not the slightest doubt that every person who will examine this question carefully and look at the practical results of the National Policy, must come to the conclusion that it has the same effect in every section of the Dominion.

Mr. KIRK. It is not my intention to occupy much of the time of the House, at this late hour of the night, and at this late stage of the debate. The question of Free Trade and Protection, or revenue tariff policy and protective policy, has been so fully discussed that I feel that it is not necessary for me to say much upon it. I would not have risen now to say a word, were it not for a remark which fell from the lips of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, whom I am glad to see in his place, on the occasion of his making an hour's speech, which if it did not instruct the House, amused it. That hon. gentleman, speaking in justification, I take it, of his vote on the Pacific Railway question, that is for granting $30,000,000 to assist the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build the railway round the north shore of Lake Superior, stated that the people of Manitoba and the North-West, when they came down to Canada, must feel they came into a foreign country, because they had travelled such a long distance through United States Territory. The hon. gentleman also said that such was the way he and other Nova Scotians felt when they came up here, because we had to travel a long distance through United States Territory. I will read what the hon. gentleman said on that occasion:

"To get to that North-West, you have to travel 1,100 miles through a foreign country. A man from the North-West, coming down to Canada, travelling through the United States, feels, when he reaches here, that he is in almost a foreign country. I know how it was with us in the Maritime Provinces, before we had direct communication with this part of Canada, in the winter. I know that when we came up here to attend Parliament we had to go first to New York or Boston, and there take the railways to get here, and when we came here we felt almost we were in a foreign country. Not until the Intercolonial Railway was opened, and we had direct communication with the western part of Canada by that railway, did we begin to feel that we were part and parcel with this great Canadian people."

There was a feeling of that kind in the bosoms of the greater proportion of the people of Nova Scotia when they came up here. But I deny in toto that this feeling existed in consequence of having to travel through United States territory. I will remind the hon. gentleman why it was that the people of Nova Scotia had that feeling, and in doing so I will take the liberty of reading some choice extracts of speeches which the hon. gentleman himself delivered in the Legislature of Nova Scotia on the question of Confederation, and then I will leave the House to judge whether it was because of travelling through United States territory, the people of Nova Scotia felt they were coming to a foreign country when they came here. In the Nova Scotia Debates, 1866, page 277, I find the hon. gentleman, in a speech, said this—

Mr. PAINT. What has this to do with the subject?

Mr. KIRK. I find that the hon. gentleman in his speech said:

"I oppose this proposition because I believe it wrong in itself; because territorially situated as we are, it will tend to destroy the harmony and good feeling existing among these Provinces, by bringing into conflict their diversified interests; that it will retard the prosperity of this Province, by imposing upon us heavy financial burthens; that it will weaken our connections with the Mother Country and our means of defence, by rendering the people less attached to their form of Government, and ultimately carry us into the arms of the Great Republic."

The hon. gentleman tried, indeed, to scare the people after we became united with Canada, by saying that they would surely fall into the hands of the Republic, and it is no wonder that he was afraid in travelling through the United States. Now, in the same Debates of 1867, after Confederation was carried, on page 27 of the report, I find the hon. gentleman making use of this language:

"We are so situated that a gunboat can shell almost any part of our territory, and not only the treasures of coal and minerals we have within, call for protection, but our commerce, without; our ships on every sea demand it; and yet this scheme which is being forced upon us will leave us only to the protection of Canada. What! leave us only under the protection of Canada? What absurdity. Why, Sir, it could not protect one of our potato shallops. Put one in the harbour and bring to its protection the whole navy of Canada, and there is hardly a fifth rate naval power in the world but would consider it a light task to take possession of the boat and perhaps pelt its defenders to death with the cargo. And then as to the protection of our fisheries against the Americans—it is simply preposterous. They could not prevent a smoked herring in Digby, much less a live codfish or a school of mackerel, sporting along our coast."

Is it any wonder the hon. gentleman was afraid to come to Canada. He felt he was coming into a strange country when he was coming here, and though he did not then have to travel over an American line to get here, he knew how he would feel when he arrived. The hon. gentleman went to the polls in 1867, after making this speech. He made some speeches before the people, and he led them to believe that their burdens would be enormously increased, that the people of Nova Scotia would be unduly taxed in proportion to other parts of the Dominion, and though I have not a report of the speech delivered by himself, I have a letter from a correspondent in his own county, which the hon. gentleman has never answered. The hon. gentleman was running an election, in 1867, and he was elected by a large majority. He was an opponent of Confederation, and the opposition candidate was Mr. A. G. Archibald, a gentleman who had strongly advocated Confederation. The correspondent says, addressing the hon. gentleman:

"Why did you, at a meeting in your own village, when answering A. G. Archibald, draw a map on the wall to show that the proposed Confederation would comprise a 'narrow strip of land,' and that Nova Scotia was at the extreme end and had no natural relationship with the Upper Provinces? Why did you tell us that if we were confederated that we would have to buy largely of Ontario and sell her people nothing in return? Why did you tell us that Ontario would send us her beef, butter, cheese, and all kinds of manufactured goods and take little or nothing from us except the 'hard cash,' and get that as we could?"

I think that statement is pretty nearly correct. Ontario sends us her beef, her manufactured goods, everything she raises, and she takes little or nothing back but hard cash. The correspondent goes on to say:

"Why did you repeat to us, a thousand times, that the raising of our Tariff from 10 per cent. to 15 per cent. would entail upon us a taxation grievous to be borne, and by adroit calculations proved what the additional burden would be to each of us individually? You told us, too, that our revenues were to be taken from us to enlarge the canals of Upper Canada. You told us also that Quebec would rule the Confederation; Quebec, the ignorant, the priest-ridden Province, that spoke a foreign tongue, would make our laws. When you were told that this could not happen, for the Maritime Provinces would combine with Ontario and hold Quebec in check, you said, 'No; the Tories of the Maritime Provinces will bid for the French vote and the Bleus of Quebec will rule us.'"

The hon. gentleman was elected, as I have said, in 1867, and he came here a rabid anti-Confederate, and repeal of the Union was his war cry. He never could submit to such a confederation as had been forced upon us. He said that we had been dragged into the Union against our will, and that therefore he would oppose it and obtain its repeal if possible. But more than that, he charged those who advocated Confederation with corrupt motives. I will read some of his remarks on that point. He said:

"The member for Inverness says all the lawyers—all the leading statesmen—all the professed politicians favour the scheme, and therefore the strong inference is that it is right. I beg to differ with him in his conclusion. When the professional politicians of a country—the men who make a living by politics—agree upon any measure, I cannot regard it as evidence that it will be beneficial to their country. The simple fact that it is to improve the position of those of them who may be successful, may make them unanimous in supporting it, and comparing the list of salaries in Canada with those in Nova Scotia, we find so great a difference that it is not impossible but it has influence here. Let me mention a few of the salaries on that list.

	Canada.	Nova Scotia.
Attorney-General, East and West.....	$10,000	$2,000
Solicitor-General do .....	6,000	800
Contingencies do .....	3,800	000
Provincial Secretary .....	5,000	2,800

From this comparison we might, if so disposed, draw the inference that the unanimity of our professional politicians arises from the fact that Confederation will give them very much larger salaries."

These are the motives he attributed to those gentlemen, who are called to-day the fathers of the Confederation. But had he no motives when, after coming here pledged to obtain a repeal of the Union, he joined with the leading politician whom he had always bitterly opposed, a man whom he felt it would be a contamination to join, a man whom he had described as one who had a pair of false hands in his pockets while with his own hands he was picking other people's pockets, a man whom he had charged with being a high priest of corruption. What was it influenced the hon. gentleman in coming under the very wings of this high priest of corruption? Have we not some reason to suspect that the influences which he charged against those gentlemen who supported Confederation were those which induced him to join with an hon. gentleman whom he had so often reviled on the public platform, as the leading corruptionist in Nova Scotia. Now, Sir, although so much has been said on the question of Free Trade and Protection, while I am on my feet I think I should say a few words on that subject. The policy of Protection was forced upon us, on the ground that it would foster all the industries of this country. Well, I can point out one of the greatest manufacturing industries of the Maritime Provinces that it has not fostered, but absolutely injured, that is, the shipping industry. I remember very well that in 1874, when the Minister of Finance of that day proposed to increase the Tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent., the present Minister of Railways, then as now the member for Cumberland, opposed the proposition, on the ground that it would have the effect of closing down thousands of shipyards in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. FARROW. How many are there?

Mr. KIRK. Well, that question was asked the hon. member for Cumberland at the time he made the statement, and he was told that there were not even hundreds, much less thousands. Well, he said it was going to close them all. But it did not close them all then, and it has not closed them yet, although it came pretty near doing so. The hon. member for Cumberland declared then that the effect of an increase in the Tariff would be the same as it was in the United States, where he pointed out it had had the effect of sweeping the American flag off the ocean. I took the trouble of looking into the condition of the shipping of the United States at that time, and I found that when the United States adopted a protective policy, they had a tonnage of about 6,000,000 afloat on the ocean. To-day they have not 2,000,000. That was the effect of their protective policy, and that was what the hon. member for Cumberland said would be the effect of such a policy as was then introduced by the Minister of Finance. And what do you suppose the Minister of Finance proposed to do at that time. Simply to place a duty of 10 per cent. on materials entering into ship-building, which were then free. The hon. member for Cumberland declared that the effect of that would be to close down hundreds of ship-yards and to destroy the industry altogether. It had not that effect; but I will show what effect it had. Although the Minister of Finance proposed to fix the duty at 10 per cent., the representations of his friends in the House induced him to lower it to 5 per cent. Now, I find, on looking at the Blue Books, that under that policy we built 188,098 tons of shipping in 1875, 165,041 tons in 1876, 127,291 tons in 1877, and 126,160 in 1878, or a total in the four years of 606,596 tons. That was a very large amount, and its value, at $21 a ton, the price at which ships were sold at that time, was about $12,675,616. Now, let us see what the ship-building amounted to since the adoption of the National Policy. I leave out the year 1879, because both policies extended to that year. In 1880 we built 68,756 tons; in 1881, 79,364 tons; in 1882, 68,240 tons, and in 1883, 73,576 tons, or a total, in the four years, of 289,936 tons, or less by 313,660 tons than the quantity built in the four years immediately preceding under the previous policy. In other words, we had more than twice as much ship-building in the four years previous to the adoption of this taxation policy than we had in the four years since. The annual average decreased ship-building during the last four years was 79,162 tons. Now, Sir, we have heard hon. members here talking of the number of additional men who have been employed in the country, in consequence of fostering our manufacturing and coal industries; but we have heard nothing of the men who have been thrown out of employment in consequence of the destruction of the ship-building interest. Now, I do not know and I do not think any man knows the number of extra hands that have been employed since the adoption of the National Policy, in consequence of the increased number of manufactures that have been established. I do know the number of men and boys who have been employed in the coal mines, more than were employed previously.

Mr. PAINT. The hon. member knows very well that ship-building has doubled in his own county during the last two years.

Mr. KIRK. If the hon. gentleman wishes to reply to me, he will have an opportunity after I have finished; but I know nothing of the kind, and even if the ship-building had increased in my county, it would be no proof that the National Policy caused it. In 1878 the number of hands employed in the coal mines of Nova Scotia was 3,135 men and boys, including mechanics, both over the ground and under the ground; while in 1882 there were 4,235 employed all told—mechanics and miners, both men and boys. That is a very small increase; yet the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), told us that the fact of so many more men being employed in the coal mines of Cape Breton has given an impetus to agriculture and to every other industry in the Island, whereas the fact is, that very little more than 1,000 additional men have been employed in the coal industry in the whole Province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how many men were employed in vessels exporting five or six hundred thousand tons more of coal than was exported in 1877-78.

Mr. KIRK. Just as many men as could carry away the coal that was raised by the extra thousand men, and that would not employ a great many. As I said, I do not know how many extra men have been employed in manufactures, but I do not believe there were half as many as has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us see how many have been thrown out of employment in consequence of the falling off in the ship-building industry. I have said that there was an average annual decrease of ships built in the four last years of 79,162 tons, or there were 396 vessels less built, of an average of 200 tons. Now the building of each of these ships would employ ten men, and the sailing of 396 ships would employ 3,960 men more, so that there was that many at least thrown out of employment by this falling off in the ship-building industry. In the Dominion of Canada build ships to sail not so much to sell; now, how many we sailors would be required to run those ships? Allowing ten men to each ship of 200 tons, that would show that 3,960 men had lost employment as sailors in one year, in consequence of the National Policy. Since the introduction of this taxation policy, we find that employment has diminished for ship builders and sailors to the extent of 23,760 men; or, in other words, had the shipping trade been as prosperous during the last four years as it was previously, that number would have been employed in the country. This is how the National Policy has affected the ship building interest of the Dominion. But they may say that is not true. The hon. Finance Minister has said: We gave them drawbacks equal to the amount of duty. We are giving them now bounties, as the United States Government did; but though the United States gave their ship-builders drawbacks and bounties equal to the amount of duties imposed, yet their protective policy has driven their flag from the ocean; our policy has had the very same effect in this Dominion. If we take the value of those ships, as an item of import and an item of manufacture, and they are worthy to be considered in that light, we find that in 1878 we sold and exported \$1,236,145 worth of ships. That is a pretty nice exportation. How many did we export last year? Just \$506,538 worth; or we exported in 1878, more than in 1883, \$729,607 worth. Yet we are told we are fostering all the manufacturing interests of this country. This is one, at least, we have not fostered. It is one we have destroyed, and it is an industry peculiar to the Maritime Provinces. I want to know what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has to say about it, for I believe he has an interest in shipping. But the hon. gentlemen opposite say that in Nova Scotia a large number of men are employed in the coal mines, but after all the number has increased by only 1,100 men and boys. I am ready to admit that the duty placed on coal was some benefit to the coal mines; it was a benefit to this extent, that it kept out the coal that came from the Old Country, and replaced that by ours. It has had that effect and no more; and that quantity has been placed by Mr. Lithgow, in his letter, read to the House the other day by the hon. member for Digby, at 100,000 tons. That the coal mining industry is in a prosperous condition, there can be no question. Cape Breton is in a prosperous condition. Why so? The manner of doing business is changing every year and during the last few years it has changed very materially; and ships now sailing between Europe and America, instead of taking full supplies of bunker coal when they leave port, manage to take only small supplies, and then call at Sydney and take in a further supply there. In this way, the Cape Breton mines are largely benefited. There are other reasons of importance altogether outside of the National Policy that explain this prosperity. When I first came to this Parliament, in 1874, I came, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said, through a portion of the United States, and I found the railways we passed over at that time burned nothing but wood. The Inter-colonial, when it was first opened and for years afterward, burned scarcely anything but wood, but to-day nearly all the railways use coal exclusively. People in their houses use more coal than they used to formerly; the farmers and people in villages and in towns also consume more, and the result is that the miners sell more coal and receive greater benefit thereby than in former days. I do not believe the hon. member for Inverness pretends to say that they get a greater price for their coal, for they do not by any means; and I know that the miners would have been benefited in this way even had the National Policy never existed, though I do not believe such a policy should be dignified by such a name as the National Policy. There are other mining industries in the Dominion of Canada besides coal, which, I am sure, the National Policy has not improved. Take the gold mining industry, a very important industry in Nova Scotia, which employs a great number of men, though not so many as are employed in the coal industry. How does the Tariff affect the gold miners? Will any one tell me that the gold miners are not injured by the National Policy? I say they are. Everyone knows that gold is found in this country in quartz, in hard rocks, and it takes a great deal of labour and material to extract it. Powder and dynamite are used to a very large extent, and the increased duty placed on powder itself affects the gold miner very seriously. The effect of the increased duty on powder was to raise the price 50 cents on a keg of 25 pounds, or \$2 per hundred, which is a serious item in this industry. Then it had the effect of increasing the price of steel, and iron, and machinery, and everything the gold miner uses. A very intelligent gentleman, who was managing a mine in Nova Scotia a year ago, informed me that he had made a minute calculation, and he ascertained that the additional duty placed on mining material cost his company 4 cents for every hole they made and every shot they discharged in loosening the rock, in order to obtain the gold. That is a very heavy tax, and you tell me the mining industry has been benefited in consequence of this taxation policy. I say no, it has been seriously injured. But we are told the farmer is benefited. Now, I do not concede that the farmer is benefited in the slightest degree, but he is very materially injured by the National Policy. The agricultural interest in this country is the largest industry in the Dominion. Although it is the largest, and perhaps as profitable as any, yet there are not more than half the farmers of this Dominion who raise wheat enough for their own families, much less to sell. Take the four Eastern Provinces, and the farmers there do not raise enough flour for their own family use, much less to sell. Therefore, I maintain that the policy which places a duty on wheat does not benefit the man who has none to sell. But if he has to buy, and the policy increases the price of wheat and flour, it affects him injuriously. I am not prepared to say whether it increases the price of wheat or flour, or not. I see hon. gentlemen in this House differ on that point, hon. gentlemen supporting the National Policy differ. One says it increases the price, and others say that it does not. My impression is that it does increase the price of wheat and the price of flour. A Committee was appointed here in 1882 for the purpose of enquiring into the effect of the National Policy upon the agricultural interest, and it took, I suppose, a great deal of pains to ascertain the effect. At any rate, after compiling a great many figures, and making a great many calculations, they came to the conclusion that the effect it had had, during the years it was in operation, was to increase the price of spring wheat  $10\frac{1}{2}$  cents per bushel. That is the report of the Committee of which my hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) was the chairman. If that is correct, it increases the price of the wheat that goes to make a barrel of flour—that is four and a-half bushels, as I understand—45 cents, or a little over, per barrel. If it increases the price of wheat that much, although I scarcely believe it does, though we must accept it as a fact, when the hon. gentleman says so, then, after it is made into flour, it has to compete with flour coming from the United States, upon which 50 cents is paid. Therefore, I maintain that the argument which will prove that the wheat itself is increased in value to the extent of  $10\frac{1}{2}$  cents per bushel, will prove that it will increase the price of the flour after it is put into the barrel. Therefore, we have the barrel of flour, consumed by the farmers as well as other classes of the community, increased more than 45 cents, more than 50 cents, and perhaps more than 60 cents. Now, we have the fishermen, and it is claimed that the fishermen are greatly benefited in consequence of the bounty that has been given. It has been said that, in consequence of this bounty, ship-builders have gone more largely into ship-building than before. Have they? In 1881, there were 79,364 tons; in 1882, 68,240 tons; and last year, only 71,576 tons, and those ships were built without the knowledge of the fact that a bounty was to be given. Therefore, I maintain that the bounty has had yet no effect whatever in increasing the tonnage of shipping, nor had it anything to do at all with the fact that more ships went into the business of fishing last year than the previous year. The reason why more shipping was employed last year in the prosecution of the bank fisheries was, that those who engaged it in the year previous had made a good thing of it. It was a prosperous season, and I am glad to know that last year, too, was a prosperous season, and that is the reason why, in the counties of Cape Breton, the people are so well off this year; not because there was so much more done in mining, but because the fishermen have done so well, and from the fact that the farmers had good crops, thus making good times in Cape Breton. I have no doubt that the increased output of coal had some effect also, but it has no right to the credit of the whole of the good times in Cape Breton. But we are told that the fishermen get a bounty, and therefore they have no reason to complain. The fishermen, it is true, did receive a bounty last year, but they received only that which was their right to receive. They did not receive the bounty in lieu of the increased taxation placed upon them, but in lieu of the money received by the Fishery Award; and I maintain that the fishermen of this Dominion did not receive full justice when they only received \$150,000. They ought to receive \$200,000 per year; that is their proper right, the interest at 5 per cent. on \$4,000,000. Why should they not receive it all? If they are entitled to \$150,000, if they are entitled to a portion, they are entitled to the whole, and why do they not get the whole? But what is the use of giving it to them with one hand if you take it from them with the other? Last year the Tariff was increased; increased duties were placed upon the material which the fishermen used. The duties were doubled on cordage and on cotton duck. It is true that a provision was made that a drawback should be given to fishermen for cotton duck used in boat sails. I have asked for a return, some time ago, which has not yet been brought down, to ascertain what amount was paid back to fishermen for this drawback. I do not believe there was any paid back to fishermen. If there was any benefit obtained by this drawback, it was obtained by the importer, and not by the fishermen at all. I pointed out that that would be the effect of it when the measure was before the House, and I am of opinion now that it has been the effect; but this we will see when the return I asked for comes down. A manufacturer's agent told me last fall that it was such a trifling matter that the importers took no account of it, and the fishermen had to pay the whole of the duty just the same, because the wholesale dealers would not be bothered keeping the accounts. I find the increased duty on cordage is very great. In 1878 the duty on cordage was a little over \$3,000; last year it was over \$25,000. This is paid by fishermen. This is the way the fishing industry is fostered. They give a bounty with one hand of that money which is their due, and they take it out of their pockets with the other—money which does not belong to the Dominion, but which the Dominion takes from them. We are told that there is a very large immigration going on to the North-West, that there is a large immigration to this country, and it is denied that any of our people are leaving this country for the United States. If I am not mistaken, I have heard the hon. member for Inverness, in a speech he made some time ago, say the people of his county were going away to the United States, and he advocated the building of a road to the North-West on the ground that it would give these people a chance to go to the North-West instead of to the United States. Well, Sir, the young people are leaving and we cannot keep them at home.

Mr. DALY. They are coming back, too.

Mr. KIRK. Some of them are coming back, but if the hon. gentleman lived in the country as I do, he would find that they are only coming back to visit their friends, to return again. I scarcely ever saw a young man or woman who stayed a year or two in the United States, come back here to remain.

Mr. DALY. I have seen a great many.

Mr. KIRK. Probably you have, but that is not my experience. I know that the young men and the young women in the country are leaving their parents and going to the United States just as fast as they grow up. I am speaking of my own county—I do not know how it is with the rest of the Dominion, but I believe it is the same all over Nova Scotia, at any rate. In the municipality to which I belong, since the National Policy was adopted, the decrease in the taxable population in 1880-81 has been 17 per cent. What became of these people? Did they go to the North-West? Not one of them; everyone of them went to the United States. In the face of this fact, we all know that it is not true that our people are not emigrating; while it is true that our people are going to the United States—going almost every day. Some of them are coming back, it is true, but not to stay. Now, with regard to the money in the savings banks. I do not know how it is throughout the Dominion, but in my own municipality, more than half the money deposited in the savings bank is sent home by young men and women who have gone to the United States. They mean to come back, perhaps, but they will take their money away with them again. It is not earned in this country; it is earned in the United States, by persons who send it home to their friends to deposit it in the bank for them. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said the leader of the Opposition went down to Nova Scotia and advised the people to trade with the United States. Well, I think I can point to other gentlemen who belonged to Nova Scotia and who advised the people to trade with the United States, long before the leader of the Opposition was in Nova Scotia. I think I can remember when the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was a humble follower of the late lamented Hon. Joseph Howe, that he was ready to clap and cheer him at every word he uttered, and when Mr. Howe advised the people of Nova Scotia to trade with the United States, when he pointed to the fact that the United States were our natural customers and we never could, under any circumstances, do a profitable trade with Canada, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries still remained an abject follower. Now let me read a short extract from the speech delivered by the late Hon. Joseph Howe, of whom the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was, as I said, an humble follower and an ardent admirer. The Hon. Mr. Howe made a speech in Halifax at which I dare say the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was present, and I will venture to say he did not call any of the statements in question. Mr. Howe said:

“I will not detain you long with the story of the flour duty. I would just ask you, is not flour dear enough now at $12? But one pays the market price cheerfully, knowing that it is regulated by supply and demand; but when a man is told that he must pay a shilling more to make him eat Canadian flour, how does he feel? Is not the trade in flour with the United States a natural trade? The man with a shallop of coal goes to the United States, he wants a freight to return with, and you say to him you shall not bring back flour from the United States, but you must turn your shallop up the St. Lawrence and make a twenty-five or thirty days' voyage to Quebec. A trader can only make two or three trips to Quebec in the course of a whole summer, while he can make twenty to the United States, turning his money over and over again. Yet we try to turn water up hill and try to send our fishermen up the St. Lawrence in search of food.”

And the Minister of Marine and Fisheries cheered him to the echo when he made that speech. And again, referring to trade relations with the United States, in the same speech, Mr. Howe said:

“Our neighbours may have their faults and their misfortunes, but then there are 34,000,000 of them, high spirited and energetic, divided from us by the Bay of Fundy as by a street—they on the one side and we on the other. Where will be our market for coal forever? In the United States. Where will be the market for our grindstones? In the United States. Where will be our market for fish and plaster, and our potatoes? Here are five great staples, and there is our market, and yet these men have been saying and doing everything to irritate and annoy that people. True, that Government did refuse to renew the Reciprocity Treaty, but why? She put discriminating duties upon her canals and raised her import duties.”

Now, Sir, this was the advice of the late Hon. Joseph Howe, and he was cheered to the echo, not only by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but by every other loyal Nova Scotian. Everyone in Nova Scotia knows that the natural market of our people is the United States. They require everything we have to sell, and they are ready to buy everything we have to sell. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has told us that we export more to the United States than we import from that country. Well, if it is true, as the hon. member for Inverness says, that the Americans pay the duty on all the goods we buy from them, why do we not put on a higher Tariff, and make the Americans pay it? The very fact that we do not make the Tariff higher, and make the United States pay it instead of paying it ourselves, I think ought to be proof positive that the duty is paid by ourselves, and that the revenue collected is money paid by the people of Canada. I will not detain the House any longer, and I thank the hon. members for their attention.

Resolution 1, read the second time and concurred in.

Resolution 2, read the second time.

On motion for concurrence,

Mr. BLAKE. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House a moment, after the discussion which has taken place in Committee; but I think it right to record my views with respect to the items of crockery and earthenware. I therefore move in amendment thereto, to leave out all the words after “that” and insert the following

The duty of 30 per cent. on common crockery or earthenware is, having regard to the heavy duty paid on packages and breakages, equal to a tax of about 35 per cent., and increases the cost of importing this necessary, over its cost at the potteries, to nearly 90 per cent.; that the duty on china is 25 per cent., and leaves the cost of importing this luxury, over its cost at the potteries, at about 45 per cent., or about one-half the cost of importing crockery.

That the duty of 30 per cent. on common crockery is oppressive and unequal, and that the Resolution be referred back to a Committee of the Whole on Ways and Means, with power to reduce the proposed duty, so that it may not bear more heavily on the purchaser of crockery or earthenware, than the duty on china bears on the purchaser of china.

Amendment negatived on the following division:—

Resolution 2, concurred in.

Resolutions 3 and 4 were severally read the second time and concurred in.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the foregoing Resolutions, with respect to duties of Customs, shall take effect upon and after the 12th of March instant.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, it is not the hon. gentleman's intention to retain the duties he has levied since the first of January on dyed and printed cottons, because if it were his intention he would have to make that duty retroactive, as far as that class is concerned.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is something in that. There has been very little imported, and under the circumstances perhaps, it would be as well to make the refunds.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.
