Mr. GARDINER: I heard the remark made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), but I have no records here by which to check the figures, taking it simply as a statement of revenue and expenditure. I should like to point out that it is imposible for anyone to determine whether there has been a loss or a gain through the expenditure on experimental farm work. You cannot simply take the expenditure that is made upon the farms and compare that with the proceeds from what is sold off the farm, because this is not an attempt on the part of the government to run a farm and demonstrate to farmers in the surrounding area that a farm can be run and made a financial success. That is not the intention at all. The intention is rather to carry on research and experimental work, and I would say that the research work carried on which led to the production of Marquis wheat resulted in vastly greater profits to the Dominion of Canada and greater possibilities of paying revenues than could possibly be measured by anything that might be charged up against the farms as a result of any work they did. The experimental farms are there for the purpose of trying to benefit all farmers in Canada and the dominion as a whole. We had in western Canada down to the middle of July last year, for example, one of the finest crops that anyone who has lived in western Canada has ever seen standing in our fields. Looking at that crop one could have asumed that we would harvest one of the greatest crops in bushelage in the history of western Canada. But between the middle and the end of July that crop was practically wiped out of existence over a considerable part of western Canada, all because of the fact that under certain climatic conditions the wheat which we had sown was subject to rust. We got those climatic conditions, and the result was that our wheat crop was practically wiped out over about one-half of the western provinces. If the development during the last twelve years of a rust resistant wheat results in there being sown in western Canada a wheat with the same qualities for milling purposes as, say, Marquis wheat, and which will produce the same volume per acre as Reward or Marquis wheat, no one can estimate either the deficit or the surplus in the operation of the station at Winnipeg which resulted in the production of that wheat. I would not attempt, therefore, to justify or to explain any statement to the effect that nine million dollars had been lost through the operation of our experimental farms.

Mr. SENN: We have been talking about demonstration farms. May I ask for my own information if they are the same as what are known as illustration stations?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that the demonstration farm as it is understood in the province of Quebec is not the same as that operated by the department. We operate demonstration stations which are conducted partly for demonstration purposes and partly for fact finding purposes. Some people call them demonstration farms, while others call them illustration stations.

Mr. SENN: The minister gave us certain figures with reference to the number of demonstration farms in Ontario, but I find in the report of the Department of Agriculture that quite a large number of illustration stations are scattered throughout the dominion. Was he referring to the illustration stations or to the demonstration farms?

Mr. GARDINER: There seems to be some confusion as to the terms; "illustration station" is the proper term.

Mr. COLDWELL: I asked a question just now, but I do not think the minister got it quite clearly. I think he said there were thirty-eight stations listed and that the expenditures would be just over a million dollars. Are the services being maintained at the same level as they were in 1929? I know that one or two additional stations have been started, such as at Delhi and other points in Ontario, but I want to know if the work is being kept up at the same level. The minister mentioned an amount of approximately $2,000,000, some of which was being spent for other purposes, but I am interested in seeing that these illustration stations and experimental farms get the needed support. I agree with the minister when he says it is impossible to estimate the value of the work carried on by these farms and illustration stations, and I disagree entirely with those who suggest that we should economize on these services.

Mr. REID: The fact remains that in British Columbia we have a considerable overlapping of experimental stations. Good results may be obtained from the farms in the prairie provinces, but I have yet to be convinced that good results are being obtained from those located in British Columbia. I suggest to the minister that he consider doing some forestry work in these experimental stations. The forests in British Columbia are rapidly being cut down and I suppose the time will come when there will be no trees. I know it has been said that this is a provincial matter, but I think the dominion could undertake some forestry work in addition to the other work being carried on at these experimental stations.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wonder if the minister could answer the question which I asked before the last speaker rose?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount of work as indicated by the money voted is absolutely the same. Of course, there have been some changes. Some things which were done at that time have been discontinued while some of the things being done now were not done at that time.

Mr. SENN: Before this item is carried I should like to say that certain members indicated to me their intention of speaking on this vote. I have no objection to the item passing if the minister will assure the committee that if at any time an hon. member wishes to discuss this item, an item will be left open to afford that opportunity.

Mr. GARDINER: We have been wandering somewhat afield in connection with this item. As a matter of fact the last matter discussed really comes under the Department of the Interior. I have not placed any obstructions in the way of any hon. member who desired to go a little afield and I shall not do so if the item is passed.

Mr. LENNARD: How do the expenditures this year on the Vineland station compare with those of last year?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that the Vineland station is a provincial horticultural station; we do not operate it.

Mr. LENNARD: Is there no cooperation between the two governments?

Mr. GARDINER: There is cooperation in the work, but nothing is paid by this government in connection with that station except for entomological work which is carried on in a separate building.

Mr. SPENCE: I have listened with a great deal of attention to the observations made by hon. members and by the minister, whom I congratulate upon his ability to handle his case. I remember that when a previous minister was in office, the present hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), I criticized the extravagance of the Department of Agriculture; I claimed that this department was costing the country much more money than the whole thing was worth. Hon. members have risen in their seats to say that economy must not be studied here or must not be studied there, as it suited their own purpose, but I say that economy should be studied everywhere. The estimates for the Department of Agriculture have increased enormously in the last ten or fifteen years. I am not criticizing any particular government, but it seems to me that this department is the place where everyone can get a nice fat job and be able to live on the government. The present minister (Mr. Gardiner) will be lacking in form if he does not see that a lot of his friends are given jobs here and there. The number of employees is steadily increasing. I do not say that the activities of these experimental farms and demonstration stations should cease, but much of the work could be eliminated. We should let the people do some thinking for themselves. We are doing so much thinking for the people to-day that we are making them more stupid all the time. They are not depending upon themselves; they are depending upon the department to tell them how to build a chicken coop or how to do this or that. I contend that the people should do a little more for themselves, they should not be spoon fed all the time. Half the time spent in debating this particular item has been wasted. What we should do is economize. I should like the minister to compare the present cost of his department with what it cost a few years ago and also note the increase in the number of employees. The government is harassing the business world; even the farmers are bothered to death with inspectors who want to know this and that. I hope the minister will exercise a little economy and save the taxpayers some money. The taxpayer is being hit harder all the time. This country has gone wildly extravagant. If some of the people here had to earn the money that they advocate spending, they would not be so generous. The trouble is that most hon. members have not been brought up in the college of hard knocks. I have had to earn every dollar for myself, and I have very little left. I do not criticize the minister any more than anyone else. The minister has been getting his way, but that is what a minister should do. As long as the minister gives nice smooth answers, his estimates will all go through. But our agricultural representatives in the house think of nothing but agriculture; we in the business world get no consideration whatever, nor do people who are living in the urban centres. All the money is going to the farmers, and generally speaking we are not getting real results from it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the hon. member say whether he was in favour of an expenditure of a million dollars for the Toronto tunnel when the matter came up last April?

Mr. SPENCE: I was in favour of it, yes. You have to keep this country up to the standard of other countries. Toronto must be in keeping with similar cities in the United States. We did not get what was asked for in Toronto because this government came into power and threw out the appropriation, but some day we will get it. Do not forget that.

Mr. YOUNG: With one remark of the hon. member opposite (Mr. Spence) I entirely agree; that is that there has been too much spoon feeding in Canada. I suggest that the hon. member make that speech to our Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. SPENCE: Will the hon. gentleman please speak up so that I can hear him as he heard me?

Mr. YOUNG: I said I quite agree with the statement that there is too much spoon feeding in this country, and I suggest that the hon. member make that speech to some of our Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. SPENCE: I would do that too.

Mr. YOUNG: Because if anybody has been spoon fed it is that group.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member will agree with me that he and everybody else in his part of the country have been spoon fed for a long time.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like to explain to my hon. friend that we in western Canada do not know what spoon feeding means in comparison with the way in which he understands the term. If there is in this country anything to which we must pay some attention and spend money on, it is the item which the minister has been discussing this afternoon. There is no item which is of more importance to the whole Dominion of Canada. Rather than cut down on these expenditures I suggest that the amounts should be increased rather than diminished.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to mention that there is in Ontario a district 700 miles wide which has not an experimental station. If we are going to progress in any line of life we must develop specialists. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) knows that medical science would be in the backwoods stage to-day were it not for specialists. We must not cut down on expenditures to get results that are going to help the men back on the land.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not wish to have any misunderstanding. I am not opposing anything to help the farmers, because I have a great admiration for them, but I think we are probably doing more than need be done, and if they were allowed to do some of the thinking for themselves they might be able to do better. They are not so foolish as some hon. members think they are. At any rate I hope they are not.

Mr. FAIR: As a practical farmer who has been out in the west for the last twenty-two years, I can say that the western farmer has come through quite a lot of hard times. Some of our friends here who talk of spoon feeding are the ones who, I believe, know most about it. They need to recognize a little of what the farmers have gone through. It might have been well if, even in those good times when prosperity was supposed to have come around the corner, they had gone out with all their past business experience and tried to make a success on a farm. It has been stated that Ontario is paying forty-five per cent of the taxes of the dominion. I would ask what percentage of the easy money of the dominion Ontario is receiving and has received for the past number of years.

Mr. SPENCE: In what way?

Mr. FAIR: Any way you want to take it. Figure it out for yourself.

An hon. MEMBER: Not social credit, anyway.

Mr. FAIR: I compliment the Minister of Agriculture upon the stand he has taken to-day and his ability to answer questions that have been put to him. I believe he is going in the right direction, because just as soon as you put the farmers out of business you put these hard-headed business men out of business. If you want to kill the goose that lays the golden egg, put the farmer out of business. Quite a number of hon. members who have spoken to-day are receiving their living indirectly off the farmers; and if they want to have something that is not good for them, then let them put the farmer out of business.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I do not like this phrase "we are thinking for the farmer." We should keep in mind that educational facilities are provided for perhaps every other class of business in the Dominion of Canada; we have technical schools and subsidized universities—

An hon. MEMBER: Too much of that.

Mr. DOUGLAS: —but practically nothing was done to put farming upon a scientific basis until this work was taken up by the Department of Agriculture. To say that you are not allowing the farmer to think is nonsense. You cannot provide every farmer with a microscope; you cannot enable him to investigate the properties of mycelium; that must be done by specialists, as in all other business. This talk of thinking for the farmer is nonsense. Most of the farmers are taking the information that has been disseminated among them, learning wisely and profiting thereby. The Minister of Agriculture is to be commended for advancing these proposals with the object of helping the farming population.

Item agreed to.

Live stock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions, $1,490,700.

Mr. BARBER: Will the minister give some information concerning grants to fairs? I notice there is a reduction in the item. Does this reduction apply to fairs, and particularly B class and regional fairs? Is it contemplated to reduce the grants this year?

Mr. GARDINER: Grants to fairs have been on a certain basis for some years: they have been changed from time to time. Last year they were, I think, as high as they have been at any time in the history of Canada. It is not our intention to continue them at the same level as they were last year. For example, in the A class fairs the cut will be $1,000; it will be made $4,000 instead of $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: May I interrupt the minister to say that I think it would serve a useful purpose in the house, which has so many new members, if he would indicate what are classes A and B fairs, so that the members may be thoroughly seized of the whole situation, or at least understand more about the matter than they otherwise could.

Mr. GARDINER: Fairs have been classified into A class fairs and B class fairs in accordance with the work that is carried on by them. For example we have the fairs conducted in cities like Toronto, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton, Brandon, Ottawa, New Westminster and elsewhere. I need not go over them all, but agricultural exhibitions of this kind usually are visited by breeders of stock and persons interested in agriculture generally from all over the dominion and sometimes from outside Canada. These persons, who are principally breeders of stock in a big way, exhibit at these fairs. Most of these exhibitions have means of producing revenue that are not open to the smaller fairs known as B class fairs. Fairs of the B class are held in smaller towns, sometimes even in what we would class as villages. They are a little closer to the farmer who is actually on the land, and they invite the people in that locality to exhibit what they have produced on their land.

The plan that has been followed in giving these grants is to provide a grant of from $2,500 to $5,000 to A class fairs. Last year it was possible for them to earn $5,000; for next year we propose to make it $4,000. The year before last the grant was $2,500, so it will be seen that the grant this year is $1,500 more than it was a year ago last summer and $1,000 less than it was last summer. As I understand the situation, until last year B class fairs always received a general grant of $1,500. Last year that grant was increased to $1,800, and in addition there was $200 for judging, $500 for boys' and girls' exhibits and $500 to provide for expenses in connection with developing regional areas in the vicinity of these fairs, making a total possible maximum grant of some $3,000. This year it is proposed to reduce that maximum to $2,500, which will be higher than in any year prior to last year but $500 less than it was last year.

One reason for the reduction is this: I believe it was thought by those in a position to know that the grant of $500 for boys' and girls' work was probably more than most of these fairs could earn. The experience of the past year has indicated that to be true, so that grant may be reduced to $250.

Mr. BARBER: Where does the other $250 reduction come in?

Mr. GARDINER: The reduction may be made in the general grant, back to $1,500. Grants to winter fairs, which we consider to be at least as beneficial to agriculture as any of the others, will be continued the same as last year.

Mr. THOMPSON: How much prize money is it necessary for a local fair to pay before it is placed in B class?

Mr. GARDINER: Until last year the amount was $3,000. Last year, for new fairs, it was $2,500.

Mr. SENN: Does the prize list have to be $3,000, or is it necessary to have $3,000 actually paid in prize money?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that $3,000 is supposed to be actually paid in prize money.

Mr. BEAUBIER: Is it not the case that the contribution to A class fairs is based upon the amount of prize money donated by the fair itself? In other words, you will not pay them more than $4,000 this year unless the prize money actually arranged for amounts to a certain sum of money?

Mr. GARDINER: These are the maximum amounts.

Mr. McNEVIN: I should like to say that I think in many agricultural districts class B fairs serve an excellent purpose, and we should consider the matter very carefully before cutting down too much on class B fairs.

Mr. GARDINER: We have attempted to be as generous as possible with class B fairs as compared with previous years, with the exception of last year.

I should like to make a general statement to the committee as to our policy in connection with these fairs. Since coming into the department I have found some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to whether certain fairs should be given these grants. Quite different practices are followed in different parts of Canada, and I have asked the head of the branch concerned to visit different parts of the country and look into the matter. Already he has been in the maritimes; he has visited certain organizations in the central part of Canada and has been in Winnipeg, where he met those interested in the promotion of exhibitions. At the moment, however, we are not in a position to arrive at a final decision as to what ought to be done. My desire is to have established for the payment of grants to these different classes of fairs right across Canada a standard to which we can adhere and which will apply in an equitable way to these fairs wherever they may be held, at the same time giving, from an agricultural point of view, the greatest possible service to the people. With that end in view during the coming year we intend to investigate these different fairs right across Canada in order to try to arrive at some system of regulation and some method of paying the grants that will be generally satisfactory. So at the next session we hope to bring down some standard upon which this can be based, and it can be discussed then in the light of the information that has been gathered. At the moment I do not feel that the information I have been able to gather since coming into the department has put me in a position to arrive at a satisfactory decision with regard to this matter; I feel I should know more about it before coming to a definite conclusion.

There are one or two things, however, that I think should be mentioned. We find that there is more overlapping as between the dominion and the provinces in this activity than in perhaps any other, without having accurate information as to what the qther departments are doing. For example we find that in one province we were offering a maximum grant of $3,000 to class B fairs while the province was paying $1,000 to the same fairs. We feel that there should be some cooperation between the provinces and the federal government in arriving at a decision as to what the grant ought to be, and that before we arrive at a decision as to that we should know what is being paid by the various provinces. We pay the same grant all across Canada, but different provinces pay different grants, and we do not think this makes for equality of assistance to the different fairs. So we intend to gather all available information as to what is being done by the provinces and as to what are the needs of these various exhibitions and fairs; then we will bring down with regard to the payment of grants some method or policy which we hope will be satisfactory right across Canada.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to commend the minister for his action in making a general review of the fair situation in Canada. After ten years of exhibition work on the fair circuits of the dominion almost from coast to coast I can say that I do not know of any other place where there is more confusion, at least to the exhibitor than at these fairs, and we must acknowledge that without the exhibitors the fairs could not carry on. One of the greatest handicaps and most discouraging features about the fairs is the lack of uniformity in their prize lists and classifications. For instance some fairs will call for an aged herd, a bull and four females, all over two years of age. This necessitates a man carrying two cows and two two-year olds, and so on. Then the next fair he goes to he will be required to bring perhaps two females and a bull, or perhaps a graded herd which calls for a bull, cow a two year old, a yearling and a calf. When a man goes to the expense of getting a herd of cattle fitted for exhibition—and it is considerable expense —he wants to get all the prize money he can or he is out of pocket. This lack of uniformity in prize lists means that an exhibitor has to carry far more animals than he should have to carry. That is expensive. It acts as a hardship and a discouragement to young breeders in this way, that when an exhibitor carries two or more in one class he is going to exhibit them, and an experienced breeder may take perhaps first, second and third, while the farmer who may have just as good an animal but not in as fit condition, gets only the tail end of the prize money. He has paid freight and the result is that he goes home out of pocket. This discourages the young breeder and he does not continue exhibiting. I know dozens of cases where this has happened. I think exhibitors should be discouraged from carrying more than one animal in each class, and I believe uniformity in prize lists would have that effect.

I am glad the minister has seen fit to undertake this investigation. I wish to take this opportunity of saying that I have no fault to find with the Hon. Robert Weir's administration of the fairs during his term of office. But I do not agree with his policy of regional fairs. In my experience it has not worked out to the advantage of the breeders, or of the fair boards for that matter.

I also wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) upon his administration of this department. From my experience I would say that we never had a better policy in regard to our fair boards and exhibitions than we had under his regime.

Now may I ask the present minister whether it is the intention of the government to encourage the policy of regional fairs?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a difference of opinion as to whether the policy inaugurated in recent years of encouraging regional fairs should be continued. I understand in connection with the development of regional fairs in Quebec there is a policy which has worked out very successfully. In Saskatchewan there are two or three districts in which regional fairs have been established and in which the people consider the system is working well. I understand in the district represented by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) the people are not so well satisfied. As far as I am concerned I have not yet had sufficient experience, or examined sufficiently into the activities in the different regions to enable me to formulate a final opinion. It was recommended to me at the beginning of the preparation of these estimates that if we were going to cut down we might cut down in that direction. But as a result of what I had heard in different parts of Canada I came to the conclusion that it might be a good thing to continue some encouragement at least of the regional fair idea during the coming season, and that our decision on the whole matter should be deferred until we make our final survey in regard to exhibitions and fairs during the ensuing summer.

Mr. STIRLING: I understand the minister to say that he does not propose to cut the amount for regional fairs this year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The cut is to be made partly in the amount allowed for junior farmer work and partly in the general vote?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is correct in part. The way the grant is arranged at present is this: prior to last year the grant to class B fairs was $1,500; last year it was raised to $1,800. Then for regional fairs there was a grant of $500; for boys' and girls' club work, $500, and to assist in paying judges, $200, making a maximum of $3,000. The intention this year is to continue to pay the $500 to boys' and girls' clubs, or such part as the fair may be able to earn, and the grant of $200 towards the judges and the regular grant of $1,500 to all class B fairs. If they undertake the regional work it will be possible for them to get another $300; in that way there is a $300 grant to the fairs for regional purposes. So the total grant they can earn of $1,800 is the same as last year, but in order to earn that they must have the regional feature.

Mr. STIRLING: I understood the minister to say before that for the boys' and girls' work they had not always been able to earn the $500, and therefore a cut of $250 was to be made there. Now I understand that a portion of the cut is to be made in the general grant and a portion of it in the regional.

Mr. GARDINER: I was under a wrong impression in regard to the $500. It is possible to earn the $500 still for the boys' and girls' club work. I should have said that our experience is that very few of them earn it or are warranted in trying to secure it and that on the average they will probably earn only about $250. It is possible for them to earn a maximum of $500 but many of them will not be able to fulfil the conditions necessary to entitle them to that amount.

Mr. STIRLING: I hope the investigation that the minister is going to carry on will cause him to look kindly on this regional grant question. My experience is different from that of the hon. member (Mr. Leader) who spoke just now. I think the assistance towards regional competitions has been of great benefit. It certainly has been in the Okanagan valley in British Columbia. Years ago we used to have small fairs dotted about the valley, but in recent years they have been concentrated in one fair, the North Okanagan Exhibition, held at Armstrong. This change has given great satisfaction. The regional feature of the fair has induced the farming population to come and see what can be done on such land. I want to know whether this treatment is being meted out to all class B fairs. For instance, is the cut equal everywhere, and are there any class B fairs which received grants last year but which will be cut out of the list this year?

Mr. GARDINER: They are all treated alike, and at the present time so far as we know none will be cut out.

Mr. THOMPSON: I have had many years of experience with agricultural fairs. No doubt it is the intention of the department to encourage farmers to produce good stock and good grain, and to bring exhibits to the fair. Of late years however a great evil has grown up in connection with country fairs, namely, the professional exhibitor. Some men will get a few head of cattle in good shape, put them in a truck and take them round the country from one fair to another, thereby taking the prizes from the farmers of those localities. These professional exhibitors come from no one knows where. Others are bringing in poultry from all parts of the country. These professional exhibitors go from one fair to the other, and in many instances they take away a great percentage of the prize money which should have been distributed among the farmers of the localities in which the fairs are held.

Mr. GARDINER: The regional fair idea was devised with the idea of trying to prevent the professional exhibitor from coming into a region and taking the prize money. That was probably the reason for the plan in the first instance. I understand that in the development of regional fairs in Quebec that difficulty has been fairly well eliminated, and any encouragement given to regional fairs is with the objective of bringing about the result the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. McNEVIN: I should like to commend the minister's idea of promoting a survey of fairs, because I believe through such a survey in certain instances the department might question the advisability of large grants. I believe, further, it would illustrate the point that even in smaller centres there may be fairs which would qualify for substantial grants. By the united effort of a large number of citizens in the constituency I have the honour to represent we have developed a successful fair. Although we are a centre of only about 8,000 population I think our fair would rate about fourth or fifth in attendance among fairs throughout the province, and I do not mean only class B fairs; I am including fairs in general, either class A or class B. We are keenly interested in securing a grant so that the fair may be kept up to its present standard. I extend an invitation to all hon. members to attend the Lindsay central exhibition next year.

Mr. DUFFUS: Will the grants being considered this afternoon be subject to any revision when the supplementary estimates are brought down? If not it would certainly be a matter of great discouragement to and serious hardship on fair boards which have already budgeted on the basis of the grant given them last year.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no intention of increasing the amount in the supplementary estimates. This is intended to be the total amount to be voted for this particular purpose. The grants I have indicated are those which would be payable under this vote, and there will be no change after it is passed. I understand some difficulty may be experienced by exhibitions and fairs which have already budgeted, but judging from the correspondence I have had I believe many of them have been waiting for the announcement made on the passing of this estimate.

Mr. MARSHALL: I wish to go a step further in discussing the point I raised a few moments ago. In the year 1935-36 the amount indicated in the estimate for this item was $1,695,062, whereas according to Appropriation Act No. 5, in the dominion statutes for 1935, the appropriation is $1,628,302, or a difference of about $67,000. The reason I raise the point is this: The total grant for agriculture in 1935-36 is shown in the estimates as $7,445,582.14, leading one to believe that the estimates for 1936-37 are about $328,000 less, whereas according to the statute we find that the grant was $7,025,105.94, indicating an actual increase this year, instead of a decrease. Would the minister kindly explain the difference of approximately $67,000.

Mr. GARDINER: The explanation lies in the statutory increase. As I understand the situation, one year ago when the estimates were prepared the intention was to deduct ten per cent from all salaries, a deduction which had been made because of the difficult times through which we were passing. During the year it was decided to deduct only five per cent, leaving an additional five per cent of all salaries to be paid. I believe that accounts for the additional amount.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Most of the fairs in Quebec are known as county fairs; I should like to know what has been given to them. I imagine they would be class B fairs. I do not expect the minister to give definite figures, but I should like to have an approximate or average figure.

Mr. GARDINER: There are county fairs classed as class B fairs. All county fairs classed as class B fairs get the same grant as is received by class B fairs anywhere else. That is, last year it was possible for them to get $3,000; this year it will be possible to get $2,500. But there are in Quebec county fairs which are not class B fairs, and which are looked after by the province. Any grants given those fairs are given by the provincial government.

Mr. McCUAIG: I was particularly interested in the minister's statement that a survey was going to be made during the coming year with regard to grants to fairs because I feel that during the past few years the smaller towns have not been fairly treated. Referring to the fairs in my own county, during the last three or four years we have built buildings costing over $50,000, and yet when an application was made to enter the class B fairs we were told that we were a few hundred dollars short to qualify as class B. Had more money been paid out in prizes, the larger grant received would have more than made up the difference, I feel that it would be better if some sliding scale were adopted whereby the grant would vary in accordance with the class of fair, instead of a lump sum being paid, providing of course the fair comes up to a certain standard, and I would appreciate it if the minister would consider a sliding scale when this survey is being made.

Mr. THOMPSON: What classes of live stock will be eligible for grants under this vote which reads: "Live stock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions"? I should like to know the amounts and how these grants are distributed.

Mr. GARDINER: The term "live stock" there applies to the branch of the department. This has to do with moneys expended in connection with grading and other work in connection with live stock throughout Canada.

Mr. SENN: There is a large reduction in this item, and perhaps the minister would kindly follow the course he took the first day his estimates were up and give us an itemized statement of the whole expenditure contemplated under this vote.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: For advertising and publicity there is no expenditure this year, as against $5,000 last year, a decrease of $5,000. The explanation is the same that I gave on the previous vote. That comes now under the general publicity branch. Communication services, $27,000— a decrease of $3,500; equipment, $74,700—a decrease of $6,000; grants, $544,834—a decrease of $118,391; buildings, $5,000—an increase of $5,000; that is for building an experimental pig testing station; miscellaneous, current expenses, $6,200—a decrease of $6,200; personal services, $518,301—an increase of $11,723, largely made up of statutory increases; professional services, $3,200—an increase of $200; rents, $7,500, the same as last year; supplies and materials, $54,145—a decrease of $15,000; transportation of things, $35,175—a decrease of $5,400; transportation of persons, $214,645—a decrease of $61,794.

Mr. POULIOT: What was the amount paid out in grants to county fairs since 1930? I understand that before 1930 the grant to county fairs was larger than it is now. What was the grant in the fiscal year 1930, and what is it now? Is it the intention of the minister to restore these grants to the former amounts?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as class B fairs are concerned, which I undertsand are the fairs to which my hon. friend refers, the country or county fairs, the general or regular grant was always the same, $1,500, down to last year, when it was increased to $1,800. With additional amounts which brought the total grant which might be earned to $3,000. This year we intend to reduce the total to $2,500, which will be $1,000 more than the general grant was prior to last year. That is for class B.

Mr. SPENCE: In the list of items which the minister read I noticed a substantial increase for personal services. Is that for more employees or something of that nature?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount for personal services is $518,301, as against $506,578. The increase is made up largely of the regular statutory increases, although there may be one or two individual salary increases.

Mr. SENN: The largest reduction was in the item of grants but the total reduction is not by any means accounted for by the reduction in grants to fairs. Will the minister give the committee the other items in which there are reductions?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a net decrease of $118,391. The decrease for field services is $36,000; exhibitions, a decrease of $98,500; general grants, a decrease of $20,569. That makes a total of $155,069. Then there is an increase of $36,678 for market services, which makes the net decrease $118,391.

Mr. SENN: What is meant by general grants? Are they for small associations?

Mr. GARDINER: There are other small organizations of one kind and another to which small grants have been given; in other cases it has been considered that the grants have served their purpose and they have been discontinued.

Mr. SENN: May I ask which ones?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be very difficult to go over them all. They range from $25, $50, $75, $100, up to $200. I can get a list and bring them down if necessary.

Mr. BRUNELLE: The minister referred a short time ago to the country fairs but, as I understood him, his reference was to fairs serving small districts. Sometimes a county fair is much larger than the usual country fair and I should like to know what conditions have to be complied with before a fair is entitled to a regular allowance.

Mr. GARDINER: The question of whether a fair becomes a class B fair depends largely upon the amount of money expended for prizes and other purposes. There are some fairs that do not spend the same amount of money in prizes; these fairs receive no grant from the dominion, but they do receive grants from the provincial governments.

Mr. FAIR: I believe economy should be practised wherever possible, when it is not detrimental to the interests of those concerned. Henry Ford once said that we have lots of time to do everything except to make mistakes. I believe these grants should be kept up to the level of last year, particularly in the west. That part of the country has had six years of pretty tough times; in fact I do not think people in other parts of the country realize just what the people of the west have been through. Along with the rust spoken of by the minister, many of these districts have suffered from hail and other damage. The district which I have the honour to represent suffered from a severe frost which cut the value of crops at least fifty per cent, and reduced the yield by a like amount. In the interest of agriculture and live stock raising, these grants should be kept where they are. I have the honour of representing that great district of Lloydminster where several well known prize winners reside. I also have the honour of representing the district of Dina, in which reside Orlen Bratvold and Burney Nicholson, two young men who came to Toronto and took first prize in the swine judging competition. This achievement of no small character is largely due to the work of the fairs in that particular constituency. I suggest again that these grants be kept up to the 1935 level.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the predecessor of the minister I think it is only right to say that there is nothing new in this survey with respect to these grants being made to fairs. The regional fair policy was established because it seemed to be the one that appealed most to the various provinces. Whether or not it has worked out as satisfactorily as was expected, I am not expressing any view. At the time it was inaugurated it carried the judgment of those who were most interested in the matter.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Thursday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, when I adjourned the debate last night on Bill No. 2, I did so because I thought many hon. members from western Canada would want to speak on the bill when they realized the importance of it to the people of that section of the country. This bill does not ask for a change in railway rates; it asks only to have a full application of the Crowsnest rates westward as well as eastward. When in 1897 the Crowsnest rate was first brought into effect commodities shipped eastward from western Canada were given a stated rate under the Crowsnest pass agreement. At that time the rate for grain and flour was set at three cents below the regular rate of that time, and the agreement was that the rate would remain in effect for all time.

Later, during the war, that rate was suspended. In 1925 it was again put into effect by a government headed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Some people have argued that if we were to pass the bill we would affect the whole freight rate structure of Canada. That is not so. When by order in council in 1925 the government instructed the board of railway commissioners to look into this matter they asked that freight rates be equalized in the different parts of Canada. I have in my hand order in council P.C. 886 which at that time dealt with the Crowsnest pass agreement. I am going to read only that part of it which affects the bill. Speaking of the Crowsnest pass agreement, by order in council the government of that day said:

> The committee observe that the agreement in question was made at a time when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was the only company having a through line of railway extending through the prairie provinces and British Columbia, and before the creation of the board for the control of railway rates under the provisions of the Railway Act of 1903, and subsequent acts. And further, that the underlying purpose of the rate control inaugurated by the Railway Act of 1903 was to do away as far as possible with all unjust discriminations and undue preferences, and to secure a fair and reasonable rate structure, which, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions would be equal in its application to all persons and localities.
> The committee are of the opinion that the policy of equalization of freight rates should be recognized to the fullest possible extent as being the only means of dealing equitably with all parts of Canada, and as being the method best calculated to facilitate the interchange of commodities between the various portions of the dominion, as well as the encouragement of industry and agriculture, and the development of export trade.

Then, in another paragraph I find the following:

> The committee are further of the opinion that as the production and export of grain and flour forms one of the chief assets of the dominion, and in order to encourage the further development of the great grain growing provinces in the west, on which development the future of Canada in large measure depends, it is desirable that the maximum cost of the transportation of these products should be determined and known, and therefore are of opinion that the maximum established for rates on grain and flour, as at present in force under the Crowsnest pass agreement, should not be exceeded.

The Crowsnest pass agreement in effect to-day between western points and Fort William and Port Arthur is a rate that carries grain, whether for export or for domestic purposes, to Fort William and Port Arthur. For many years I have been shipping grain from western Canada, and I can bill any kind of grain to my order at Fort William or Port Arthur, and there take delivery of the grain myself, or deliver it to anyone to whom I see fit. At the time this order in council was passed the government intended that the maximum rate should apply west, as well as east, and therefore if their intention had been carried out by the board of railway commissioners of that day rates on all grain and flour to British Columbia ports would have been the Crowsnest pass rates, whether for export or for domestic purposes. However, the board of railway commissioners of that day did not carry out the intention of the government. Let me read from a speech delivered by the then and now leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), on this point:

> I would say to the house and the country that if this government remains in office it will not take the view of the order in council which my right hon. friend takes—

Upon that occasion he was replying to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen.

> —but will regard that order in council as a direction to the railway commission as to how it expects this policy to be worked out, and will see that the policy is worked out in accordance with the terms of the order in council. The order in council sets out the government policy. It is a direction to the railway commission to equalize rates. That direction indicates how this government expects this policy of equalization to be worked out. And I would remind hon. members that there remains, as the commission itself well knows, an appeal from the commission to the governor in council with respect to matters of railway rates. This government has stated what its policy is with respect to the equalization of rates, and unless that policy is carried out in accordance with its intention—if this government is in office when the question comes up—and I have not the least doubt it will be—it will take care to see that the policy is carried out in the spirit and intent of the letter as expressed in the order in council itself.

The intention expressed in the order in council was that the Crowsnest pass rates should be extended to British Columbia ports—the same Crowsnest rates that were given to Fort William and Port Arthur. Therefore I claim that for the past ten years a right belonging to the people of the western provinces has been denied them by a ruling of the board of railway commissioners. This is a very important matter at this time, now that the trade treaty with the United States is in operation. Under that treaty it will be found that feed grains are allowed into the United States under a duty of ten per cent ad valorem. This means that feed grain shipped to Vancouver, Victoria, New Westminster or Prince Rupert can go into the United States, to Oregon, Washington and California, where there is a very large market for it. If this amendment is adopted it will mean that anyone will be able to take delivery of grain at terminal elevators in the western ports. It does not mean that this rate will be applied to shipments to local points, but it does mean that at the terminal elevators on the coast anyone may take delivery of grain shipped under the Crowsnest pass rate.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, in this amendment we are not asking for any change at all in the rate structure. No one can raise a quid pro quo in this regard, because this is a right we had under the Crowsnest pass agreement, and it is a right for which every western man in the house should stand up and fight, because it means an expanding market for the grain we produce on the prairies. I hope that when other western men in this chamber have spoken to the bill the government will seriously consider amending the act in this regard. It may be necessary, first of all, to send the bill to the railway committee, where all the facts may be gone into. Our position is that we have only a portion of the Crowsnest rate westward, only that portion for export, but that eastward we have the full Crowsnest rate that is spoken of in this order in council. By this bill my hon. friend is endeavouring to give back to us in western Canada a right which we have been denied for the past ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I did not wish to interrupt him during the course of his remarks. Do I gather from what he has said that he considers that rates on feed grain are any different now from what they were?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The tariff rates, not the railway rates.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about the customs tariff.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I believe the rate on feed grain is now ten per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been ten per cent ad valorem for years. If the hon. gentleman will look at page six of the document tabled to-day he will see that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I was not aware of that fact, but it does not alter the argument at all.

There is something else I did not say that has been brought to my attention by the remark of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett). There was a change in freight rates on grain to western ports, but that change has never been made effective by the board of railway commissioners. It was simply a voluntary change made by the railway companies, and they can alter that rate whenever they see fit to do so. So far no legislation has been passed and no order of the board has been issued putting that rate into effect. Therefore the rate is still 41½ cents per hundred pounds as against the export rate of 20½ cents.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope the hon. gentleman will not charge me with desiring to interrupt, but that is hardly correct. Any railway company may reduce its rates, and those rates become effective on reduction. The company cannot increase its rates, however, without the consent of the board.

Mr. O. B. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) say that this bill would not disturb the present rate structure in any shape or form. I can substantiate what the hon. gentleman has said with regard to the alteration in rates which has not been submitted to the board of railway commissioners for approval. The rate is thirty-seven cents as against the regular rate of 48½ cents from Lloydminster, say, which is approximately the dividing line in connection with rates. As has been stated by the sponsor of this bill, the export rate from Edmonton or Calgary, is 20½ cents, while the domestic rate is 41½ cents. So it will be seen that there is a very considerable discrimination against British Columbia. It is stated, of course, that this 20½ cent rate, from the point of view of the railways, is for the purpose of subsidizing export trade.

There is also another feature of the transportation of grain for export; that is, that there always must be sufficient traffic from all points on the line so that if they have cars of fruit or the odd car of live stock, enough traffic will be available to provide full tonnage for their trains so they will not have to order out crews from any terminals to transport trains loaded with only half tonnage. If it should become necessary to alter the rate structure generally the railways might be compelled to curtail some services in order to make up the loss. The curtailment of these services, together with the possible abandonment of branch lines, would impose quite a handicap upon various parts of the community. It has been said that the rail service would be replaced by truck service, but experience has shown that where branch lines have been abandoned rates on commodities have more than doubled. The Grain and Feed Review of Minneapolis cites this instance:

> ...the grain rate by rail to Sioux City and the east was three cents per hundred from the farthest point on the line.

This line which had been abandoned was fifty miles long.

Now the rate is ten cents a bushel to Sioux City. Coal was laid down in the farthest town for twenty cents a ton, while at present truckers are offering to deliver coal to close-in points at $2 a ton.

There are other services maintained by the railways, such as their colonization departments, free of cost to the general public. At times they send their engineers to different business ventures of the country and give their services free. Special rates of course are given to meet competition, and I believe that with the increase in traffic which we are experiencing at the present time and which will possibly continue to increase, competition will compel the railways to reduce rates to a proper basis. The subsidy on wheat to British Columbia in order that export traffic in grain may be maintained is really paying a dividend to consumers in foreign countries so that they may consume our grain. If the people of this country had their revenue increased so that their consuming power would be greater our difficulties with the rate system would not be so acute. So I have no hesitation whatever in favouring this bill from the social credit point of view.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I am in favour of this proposal of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). He discussed the problem chiefly from the point of view of British Columbia; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) presented very ably the case for the prairie farmers. We regard this as a measure of justice not only to the people of British Columbia, but to the people who are producing grain on the prairies. This year it has become particularly apparent that the need for legislation of this kind is urgent. There were potential consumers of low grade grain in British Columbia, and on the prairies, for owing to rust and other climatic conditions, there were hundreds of thousands of tons of low grade grain. It seemed to us that it was an unsound principle that rates to the western coast for export should be considerably lower than to the Canadian consumer in British Columbia. Moreover I point out that a subsidy to the foreign consumer of our grain is in reality a subsidy to our competitors. By getting our low grade cereals carried to them cheaply, foreign producers of live stock, poultry and eggs, etcetera, may be enabled to produce at a lower cost than can people who live in certain parts of Canada. We have the same difficulty in relation to the farmers of Ontario, who are unable to get the freight rates which the distances would warrant in this province, as these rates are also on an export basis.

It seems to me that this whole problem is one on which the parliament of Canada should give a decision. I know it is sometimes said that this house should not interfere with the freight rate structure. May I point out that the Dominion of Canada is to a very large extent the result of transportation agreements made in days gone by. I bear in mind that British Columbia, as a condition of entering confederation, stipulated that transportation facilities should be provided to link that province with the rest of Canada. In the west we feel that we have paid, perhaps dearly, for the railways. Millions of acres of our western land were alienated in order to bonus various railway companies. Now the producers on the plains are asking for a measure of consideration from the body which alienated their natural resources years ago, and I am glad that the hon. member for New Westminster has brought in this proposal from the point of view rather of the British Columbia consumer than that of the western producer. This bill is in line with the agreement that was made with British Columbia as a condition of confederation, and we should adopt it not only from the point of view of British Columbia, not only from that of the prairie provinces but for the welfare and unity of the whole of this Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): I would have no desire to speak on this measure at this time except for one fact. Ten years ago in the house I recall some of my friends from British Columbia proposing a resolution asking that help be given to the poultry keepers of that province, and they made a strong argument for their case, pointing out among other things that poultry keepers there were handicapped by a climate somewhat harsher than that enjoyed by some of their competitors in Georgia, Florida and other southern states. To me their argument was not convincing, because I well knew that nature had provided poultry with protection against cold weather, but as far as I knew nature had not provided any ventilating apparatus for poultry kept in hot climates. Therefore I was regretfully obliged to tell them that I could not support their appeal for higher protection on eggs and poultry products. Naturally I had to look further into the question and see whether there was something else that might be a handicap to feeders of poultry and other live stock in the great western maritime province. I formed the opinion at that time, and expressed it, that if they were able to buy their supplies wholesale and get them laid down at a lower freight rate than they were then paying this would help them a good deal more than if they were to secure some artificial protection. As I say, hon. members who at that time were representing British Columbia made a very eloquent appeal for that industry, and some went so far as to say that the poultry industry was dying and that unless it got this additional protection it could not last much longer. But figures given by other hon. gentlemen in the same debate showed that British Columbia was turning out a tremendous production of eggs right along, an increase of something like one hundred per cent in a few years; my memory is not certain as to the precise figure, but poultry production had been increasing very greatly.

I advocated then, as I say, that freight rates should be reduced. I went further and assured my friends from British Columbia that if they should introduce either a resolution, or better perhaps a bill, providing for lowering freight rates on grain and feed stuffs going into that province from the prairies I should be glad to lend them what support I could, sitting at that time on the government side of the house, as I am now, and they sitting on the opposition side. I recall very distinctly that on the occasion of that debate I was reproached by the then right hon. leader of the opposition, who made the statement that one of the leading ministers on this side had said that no reduction of freight rates could be given. It is true that the minister had said there was not likely to be any general reduction in freight rates. But this was not a general reduction we were pleading for; it was a specific reduction to do away with what many looked upon as an economic injustice to a large group of people in Canada. It may be that I do not attach quite so much importance to it from the standpoint of the prairie farmer as some of those do who have spoken before me, because the total amount of grain that would go from Saskatchewan or Manitoba to the western coast to be used in domestic consumption would not be very large; the percentage of the whole crop that was shipped in that way would not be great. We realize that the railroads of this country made a very reasonable bargain with the government of the day when they arranged for the Crowsnest pass agreement, but that was at a time when very little grain was being consumed locally by way of feed stuffs, very little being used for stock within the dominion. When the Crowsnest pass arrangement was negotiated nearly forty years ago, localities that are now asking for cheaper rates on grain were not producing live stock to anything like the extent they do now, and in most cases they were probably producing a large percentage of the food required within their own borders, so that domestic freight rates were not nearly so important as they have since become.

A few years after the discussion to which I referred in my opening remarks I enjoyed the pleasure of a trip in part of British Columbia, through the Fraser valley. By the kind invitation of the organized boards of trade of that great valley, conveyed to members for the three prairie provinces through the courtesy and kindness of the hon. member for what was then, I think, the constituency of Fraser Valley, I took part in a trip up and down through that district for about three days. I and those who went with me had an opportunity to visit poultry farms, dairy farms, general farms and farms where they made a specialty of growing rose bushes and many other special products of that great province. On many occasions in the course of that visit, speaking to farmers who were engaged in the dairy business, particularly, in the poultry business, I asked what their greatest handicaps were. I do not need to tell the house that none of them complained of the wonderful climate they enjoyed in British Columbia. That was one thing upon which they were unanimous: they were under no handicap as far as climate was concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: And the girls.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, I had better say nothing about them. The farmers of British Columbia were under no handicaps as far as the growth of fodder was concerned. We could see the cattle wading in clover up to their knees. They had abundance of feed of that kind. The climate was mild, even in the winter time. But when it came to feed grain the farmers there had their difficulties because very often they were not able to buy in carloads or in large quantities, and so they were particularly susceptible to being compelled to pay too dearly for what they had to buy, regardless altogether of the freight rate. But it was so easy at times to lay a good deal of the blame on the excessive freight rate which they had to pay.

I would go further after asking that question, and inquire what other difficulties they had. Whether it was a coincidence I do not know, but I remember that no one quoted any other particular difficulty they had in feeding chickens and in feeding dairy cows than the high cost of grain and the difficulty of getting it at a low enough rate. In the past five years, reading the proceedings of the house, I have been interested to see that that difficulty still remained, and at a time when grain was very cheap in the prairie provinces. Perhaps it would not hurt if I gave the average price of No. 1 northern wheat at Fort William during some of the last few years. I find that from January to July in the year 1931-32—that is the crop that was harvested in 1931—No. 1 northern wheat at Fort William was worth an average of 60 cents in January; 63 cents in February; 63 cents in March; 62·6 cents in April; 62·9 cents in May; 55·1 cents in June, and 54·7 cents in July of 1932. There were three or four years about that period when prices averaged somewhere about the figures I have quoted. If ever there was a time when feeders of dairy cows or of poultry in British Columbia should have been able to get feed of good quality, and lots of it, cheap, those were the years, for remember the prices I have quoted were the prices of No. 1 northern wheat landed in Fort William. But I noticed from the discussions in the house that the poultry keepers and feeders of British Columbia still had the same complaint. It is true the government of that day, through the then Minister of Railways and the railways themselves, negotiated an agreement which provided some remedy for the people of British Columbia who had to buy their feed. I am quite sure that they appreciated this, but I am afraid it does not go far enough. Not only does it not go far enough in terms of money, but just so long as an injustice of this kind is being perpetuated, just so long will people feel they are not getting fair play or fair treatment, and that will do perhaps more harm than the partial remedy that has been given them will help financially.

I have another reason for speaking in favour of this bill, and it is that I believe in many parts of Canada to-day we are suffering from unfair railway rates. No particular institution is to blame for that state of affairs—neither the board of railway commissioners nor the railways themselves, nor governments present or past. Railway rates are in a somewhat chaotic condition. I do not think they were ever made at all; like Topsy, they "just growed;" they grew into a state of confusion. No railway man is going to try to disentangle them; no minister of railways is going to try to rearrange them so long as this can possibly be avoided. But not until changes are made which will be more equitable to parts of the dominion which are now penalized, until imaginary miles are taken out in one place and real miles inserted in another, until freight rates are given somewhat on the basis of ton miles, will injustices be done away with in certain sections of the country.

I know that my advocacy to-night of even the measure introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is not going to go very far towards the end we have in mind, but every bit along that line helps. I am satisfied that if the railroad companies and the railway commissioners see that the Canadian people are determined to rectify what apparently is an injustice in so far as it compels them to pay more money for the service given than is asked from the people of foreign countries for the same service, these organizations will help to bring about what we ask.

Some will say that this will cause a great loss to the railway companies and that they are in trouble enough at the present time. I know they have been having their share of trouble. Various matters contribute to their difficulties, to the lack of revenues which they have been securing from their operations, but I am quite sure that the greatest handicap they have suffered under in the last few years is lack of tonnage because freight was not moving. In 1929, if my memory serves me aright, 137,000,000 tons of pay freight were moved by the railroads in the dominion. Two years ago only 67,000,000 tons of pay freight were moved. It is easy for anyone to see why the railroad companies are in difficulties, why railroad men are idle, why after having worked overtime and long hours day and night to keep up with the demands of the traffic, so many of them are laid off, and why to-day many railroad employees can hardly be said to hold a steady job even after twenty or twenty-five years seniority in some of the running trades. I am in favour of the principle of this bill; I am in favour of its details. I am not quite sure that it provides for all grain products in the matter of feed. I am afraid it is lacking in that respect, but as the bill stands, applying to grain and flour as it does, I want to support it.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I did not equip myself with the necessary details to speak authoritatively on this bill to-night, but so far as the principle of it is concerned some glaring inequalities have come to my attention, and for that reason alone I should like to draw two or three facts to the attention of hon. members.

An hon. member speaking a few moments ago spoke of the equalization of freight rates. Apparently, even though we recognize that the agricultural products of western Canada constitute the bulk of the wealth produced in the west, we find that because of their geographical position our western people are discriminated against. There is a great deal more to be said about the equalization of freight rates, and the day will come when it will be recognized that as a matter of justice we shall have to equalize our freight rates.

One point that particularly struck me was that so far as eastern Canada is concerned there is a single freight rate, and we call that the rate to eastern Canada, but when we ship grain westward we find that there are two rates, an export and a domestic rate. The other evening when an hon. member was speaking another hon. gentleman interrupted to suggest that the railway companies were carrying grain at what they call the export rate to pay their out-of-pocket expenses. Of course, it is all very well not to lose money in doing business but the difference between what is called the export rate and the domestic rate is so great that surely we in western Canada should not be expected to bear entirely the burden of this discrimination. Not very long ago, simply because of drought conditions in the western states of the United States there appeared in the Canadian tariff books a feed grain rate to that republic to enable feed grain to be shipped to those drought areas. As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I am not equipped with the necessary details to give comparisons of freight rates this evening, but I do know that feed grain rate was very favourable and it was established simply to help those people who had suffered from drought conditions.

It is admitted in the house that when we in western Canada ship our grain it is mostly for export; that not a very large quantity is consumed locally. That being the case we must take it for granted that the bulk of the grain of western Canada is being exported, and we find that British Columbia is really being discriminated against because of this difference between domestic and export rates. I can see no reason why those two rates should exist.

I find by the explanatory note that subsection 5 of section 325, to be amended, reads in part as follows:

—and to change and alter rates as changing conditions or cost of transportation may from time to time require, shall not be limited or in any manner affected by the provisions of any act of the parliament of Canada.

Note those words: "Change and alter rates as changing conditions or cost of transportation may from time to time require." A great deal of domestic grain is to-day consumed in British Columbia because of the growth of the poultry industry in that province, and I submit for the consideration of hon. members that apart entirely from the benefit which has been derived by western farmers we should consider the needs of this ever-growing industry in British Columbia.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fairness I can see no reason why the people of the west should be discriminated against by having two rates apply to them when only one rate applies to eastern Canada, and as a Canadian I would simply say that on grounds of fairness and equality I am entirely in support of this bill.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to-night to say just a few words on this bill. In the first place I should like to congratulate its sponsor (Mr. Reid) upon the excellence of the arguments which he advanced. His arguments were clear; they were logical; they were forceful, and they were thorough.

One point which impressed me more than anything else was the fact that his argument had a ring of sincerity, and behind it all there seemed to be the feeling which he was expressing on behalf of the people of British Columbia, that they were suffering a real injustice.

It has been said that the House of Commons, constituted as it is, is not the proper place to discuss the whole complex matter of the freight rate structure, and I believe we are all agreed on that. But may I suggest that it was not the board of railway commissioners that settled the Crowsnest pass agreement. That particular part of the freight rate structure was settled by the house, and it seems to me that if what the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) said to-night is correct—and I have no doubt of its correctness—it was ordered that any discrimination between east and west should be removed. The hon. gentleman went on further to say that grain could be moved to Fort William and Port Arthur and further east and sold there for domestic consumption, and that the rate on such grain for domestic consumption would be the same as the export rate. As I understand the law and the rules and regulations and orders in council that have been passed, it was intended that the same thing should apply to grain and flour moving westward. Now if that be true, what is the situation? This simply means that the domestic rate on grain and flour moving to our western ports should be the same as the export rate.

The hon. member for New Westminster the other evening gave to the house the export and domestic rates, and there does seem to be a very great discrimination. If parliament did order a certain rate, and the board of railway commissioners does not see fit to put that rate into effect, I suggest that parliament or perhaps the government has a duty to perform. I remember very well, as a former member of the house, speaking on the question of discrimination in freight rates. When the Crowsnest pass agreement was introduced it applied not only to the original lines of railway existing at the time but to all other railways constructed thereafter. It so happened that in western Canada on certain lines of railway there had been a discrimination of about two cents per hundred pounds on grain moving eastward, and the law of this country directed that the board should see that all these discriminations were removed. These discriminations were not removed immediately. From western Canada we sent east some of our ablest lawyers who argued this case time and time again. Some of us came to parliament and we found that this discrimination still existed. I remember that I advanced in the house the best argument of which I was capable against these discriminations. I even went so far as to say that if the board of railway commissioners did not see fit to carry out the laws over which they had jurisdiction, then we should see that the board was removed. The hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien), who spoke in the house the other night, was a member of the board at that time. If he were in his place this evening I would have pleasure in stating that he was one of those who believed that the discrimination should be removed. The fight was carried on to such an extent that the board of railway commissioners removed the discrimination.

If I am correct, and if the hon. member for Moose Jaw is correct in stating that there exists to-day a discrimination which is not intended under the law, I submit it is the duty of the board of railway commissioners to see that the discrimination is removed. One of the curses of this country has been the restrictions placed upon trade. Restriction of trade may be caused by too high a tariff; it may be caused by a manipulation of the tariff; it may be caused by manipulation of exchange or in various other ways. There is still one further way in which it may be caused, and that is by an unfair railway rate structure. I believe that to be true in the case of gasoline; I believe it to be true of the commodities which are the subject matter of this bill. If it is true, then we as a parliament have a duty to perform. If there are injustices, we should see that they are removed. What is this House of Commons for; what is this parliament for, except to make laws in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole? The people of British Columbia feel that they are suffering under a heavy handicap because they cannot get their poultry and stock feed at a price which seems to be fair. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) said the other night, our wheat can be shipped to Vancouver, then to Japan and reshipped back again to Vancouver for twenty-five cents per ton less than it costs to ship it to Vancouver under the domestic rate. I believe I have remembered the figures correctly. If they are right, surely something is wrong with our freight tariff. I rise to support this bill because I believe an injustice exists. My further observation is that we as a parliament should see that any injustice which does exist is removed.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, this bill refers to a matter now on appeal to the governor in council. A case covering rates on the commodities mentioned in the bill was presented to the board of railway commissioners in January, 1935. A decision was rendered and I think the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), on behalf of certain British Columbia interests took the appeal himself to the governor in council. That being so, I think it would be manifestly unfair for me to express any opinion as to the merits or demerits of the subject matter of the bill. I can assure my hon. friend that this appeal will be heard at the earliest possible date, probably shortly after the completion of this session. At that time the evidence heard by the commission will be studied, the representations of my hon. friend will be weighed against representations which may be made by other interested parties, and I am sure that a fair decision will be reached. As I say, it would under these circumstances, be quite improper for me to express an opinion of the bill, but I do not think it would be out of order for me to say something about rate making.

It has been stated two or three times during the debate that parliament is not the proper place to discuss railway rates as these matters are very technical. I know I am not qualified to discuss them and I doubt whether any hon. member is qualified to discuss the pros and cons of this intricate problem. This debate seems to indicate that the impression of everyone is that rates should be lower. That is quite natural and I would be much surprised if anyone other than the Minister of Railways stood up in the house and suggested that it might be a good thing to have higher rates. However speeches of this kind give the people an idea that the railroads are being very unfair.

I might mention one or two matters which perhaps will show the other side of the question. A good deal was said about domestic and export rates on grain to Fort William being the same. Why Fort William? I would point out that Fort William is located 1,000 miles from the seaboard; it is 600 feet above sea level and is by no means an export port. It being nine o'clock I move the adjournment of this debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Hudson Bay railway and terminals—
Construction and betterments (including E. B. Jost at $2,375), $217,500.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give us some information as to what this money was spent on and the particulars of the $87,000 decrease?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): This is a capital vote for work at Churchill. It is intended to spend this year $84,500 on completing the capital work at the port and $133,000 on capital account on the railway. I may say that the port at Churchill has been under construction for a number of years and is now nearing completion. The reason why the vote for the terminal is much less than last year is the fact that we expect to complete this year all work on capital account.

In connection with the railway I may say that it is nearing completion. Of course the difficulty has been to find an equilibrium between the railway road bed and the icy conditions met in that northern country. Not nearly as much work remains to be done this year. There are several culverts to be filled and a certain amount of track lifting to be done in the swampy sections. There again, however, we are coming to a time when capital expenditures on the railway will be practically at an end, and when both the port and the railway will be in an operating state.

Mr. STIRLING: There is $84,000 to be spent on the terminal; what capital work remains yet to be done?

Mr. HOWE: I believe I made a mistake in giving my explanation; $84,500 is on the railway, and $133,000 on the terminal.

Mr. STIRLING: Of what does that consist?

Mr. HOWE: On the terminal there are dredging operations to complete the dredging of the basin, at a cost of $50,000 and an amount of $3,000 for the reconditioning of floating plants used in dredging operations. Then there is $7,000 for improvements to the roof of the freight shed. Probably I should say that the freight shed was built to Canadian National railway standards, but it was found that the high winds at Churchill rendered this type of construction unsuitable, and we plan to rebuild the roof to withstand weather conditions found at that point. Then, there is a building to house two Plymouth locomotives; this will cost $4,000; general supplies and equipment, $25,000; one-half of head office expense, $12,000; one-half of local office, $14,000; one-half of machine shop operating cost, $13,500; and settlement for land expropriated, $4,500, making a total of $133,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the dredging have to be carried on perpetually? Does the river bring down much silt?

Mr. HOWE: No; it is not anticipated that any further dredging will be required after this year.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give us the number of ships that have used the port this year, together with information as to their cargoes? Last year they carried a good deal of merchandise other than grain; did they do that again this year? What wheat is there in the terminals?

Mr. HOWE: We had eight boats last year, and they exported a total of 2,407,000 bushels. One incoming boat had 2,582 tons of cargo made up of general cargo, window glass, barbed wire, steel balls, and bunker coal.

Mr. DONNELLY: Were any cattle shipped through that port last year?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the insurance rate on boats coming into Hudson bay as compared with the rate to Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: It is roughly four times as much.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the minister give me the figures?

Mr. HOWE: A ship and cargo from Churchill pays a total insurance of $7,875, and from Montreal the same cargo pays $1,812.50.

Mr. DONNELLY: What reduction in insurance has been made since the port has been opened?

Mr. HOWE: In 1931 the insurance was two per cent, and it is now cut to one per cent. In the same time from Montreal it has practically remained stationary at a quarter of one per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would further aids to navigation assist in lowering these rates?

Mr. DONNELLY: What are the prospects for freight shipping out of Hudson bay next year? I noticed in the paper a few days ago that greater shipments out of Hudson bay were expected during the coming season.

Mr. HOWE: We have 2,300,000 bushels in the elevator now, but it is a little early to determine shipments. We anticipate a better year. Of course this depends to some extent upon rates on the great lakes. The rate from Churchill really compares with that from Fort William to Europe.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister give me the freight rates on grain going from Hudson bay to Liverpool as compared with rates from Fort William to Liverpool?

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member mean for last season?

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: It was two shillings and four pence halfpenny last season. The first season it was three shillings and nine pence. Last season however it was down to the amount I have mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: About seven cents a bushel.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is roughly correct. In the same period it was one shilling and six pence halfpenny from Montreal. To that must be added the rate to Fort William which last year would average about four and a half cents a bushel.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is the Department of Railways and Canals considering any arrangement whereby they would be able to cut insurance rates on vessels coming into Hudson bay?

Mr. HOWE: That is governed by experience, more than anything else. As boats use the bay more and more, and as experience remains favourable there is no doubt rates will come down automatically. Unfortunately in the second year of operation the Bright Fan sank in the straits, an event which has had a marked effect in delaying a reduction of rates.

Mr. DONNELLY: What company insures? Is it Lloyd's?

Mr. HOWE: I believe it is Lloyd's, chiefly.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is British shipping insured with Lloyd's?

Mr. HOWE: I think Lloyd's is the chief agency; there may be others.

Mr. BENNETT: Private companies, including Lloyd's, the Alliance insurance company and many others, insure them.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I might say that the rates are set by the Joint Hull Conference. That is an independent body, just as we have rate making bodies on this side, which checks and sets the rates which the insurance companies apply.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do we still have aeroplanes on the Hudson bay route to look for ice and broadcast conditions?

Mr. HOWE: No; we have not the aeroplanes but in the straits we have an icebreaker which keeps track of the ice. We also have a complete system of direction finding stations so that after a ship gets into the straits it is quite independent of compass readings. It can secure its position from shore stations at any point.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us the length of the season last year and whether any trouble was experienced with regard to ice, icebergs or anything of that kind?

Mr. HOWE: I might say that the low insurance rate, under which ships prefer to operate, commences August 10 and extends to about October 10. Last year all ships operated within that season. That is a matter fixed by the insurance companies; if it were not for that the season could be somewhat longer.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Could the minister tell us whether the government is giving any consideration with regard to the storage rate on grain stored during the winter in the terminal there?

Mr. HOWE: No; I think under the circumstances the rates are fair. Of course this is a little different from a regular elevator on a regular grain route. The charge there is 1¼ cents for elevation, and then we follow the same principle as is followed in Montreal, in having a higher rate during the season of open navigation than during the closed season. I believe the rate is one-twenty-fifth cent per day during the open season and one-ninetieth cent per day in the closed season, with a maximum of one cent for the period.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister spoke of the great variation in insurance rates as between the two rates. I have seen in the press statements—whether they are authoritative I do not know—by captains who say that the Hudson bay route is just as safe as the St. Lawrence one. Has the minister any evidence which would go to substantiate those statements that have appeared from time to time in the press?

Mr. HOWE: I have spent a good deal of time at Churchill, perhaps more than any of my officials and more than any other hon. member, and on several occasions I have talked with captains who have brought in ships. There is no doubt that ordinarily the trip is a very safe one. The Hudson straits are about seventy-five miles wide at the narrowest point, and they are very deep, so except for ice danger, which is more or less eliminated by keeping the icebreaker there, the trip is a very safe one. On the other hand it is an out of the way route; it is a new route, and it is perhaps from an insurance point of view subject to risks to which other routes are not. For instance, some question has been raised and I think there is still some question whether the Bright Fan met with an accident or whether there was some intent behind that loss. That sort of thing, of course, is more liable to happen there than on a route more frequently used. There were some strange features in connection with the Bright Fan, but I just mention that as a case in point from the insurance point of view. I have no doubt in the world, however, that after another season or two have gone by the rate will come down, provided nothing else happens in the meantime.

Mr. STIRLING: How does fog compare on the two routes for the ninety days during which navigation is open?

Mr. HOWE: I know of no particular fog condition at Churchill during the season. Of course we do have fogs in the St. Lawrence to some extent.

Mr. YOUNG: We have heard a good deal in this country about infant industries and their need for protection. Owing to the very high insurance rate on this route I should like to ask whether the government has considered the advisability of itself carrying the insurance on ships using the Hudson bay route until that route is more firmly established.

Mr. HOWE: Well, I cannot say whether that has been considered; certainly it has not since I have assumed office, but I doubt whether it would be advisable. This route has been constructed and I believe over a period of years it will develop naturally. I might remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the first grain elevator in Vancouver was completed in 1916 but that it did not handle its first substantial grain movement until 1923. I believe that as the transportation situation on the great lakes improves and as rates go up there will be a decided differential from certain points in northern Saskatchewan through Churchill that will send more and more grain there. I believe that if this route is allowed to develop naturally, with such reasonable help as may be given it, it will build itself into a port over a reasonable period of time.

Mr. DONNELLY: We have built this line of railway and western Canadians have great faith in this route; we still think it will be a success. During the last few days we have heard a good deal about subsidies to steamship lines running to China, to Hawaii, to New Zealand, across the Atlantic and in every direction, and I do not see why we should not give a little subsidy in order to develop our own route, by helping to lower insurance rates so that they will be more comparable with rates out of Montreal and other Canadian ports. If this is done I think it will encourage navigation to that port; we will put into more complete use the facilities we have provided there, and Churchill will probably come into its own much more quickly than otherwise would be the case. I think the government should seriously consider the advisability of helping with these rates, just as the government helps steamship lines crossing the Atlantic and Pacific.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to ask a question with regard to the other costs entering into the movement of grain by the Hudson bay route, particularly with regard to stevedoring. It may not be fair to expect the minister to have all the figures under his hand, but I should like to know how the cost of loading grain at Churchill compares with the cost at Montreal and other ports. I should like to know also how the service is organized, whether the government is responsible for the loading or if the ships coming in make their own arrangements.

Mr. HOWE: Ordinarily the loading is a responsibility of the boat in any port, and the boat makes its own arrangements. The grain that has been loaded at Churchill has been loaded by Louis Wolfe and Company, who are the principal stevedoring agents in Montreal for account of the steamship company. They naturally do not bring all their stevedores there from Montreal, but the superintendent is there and from the men at the port he is furnished with sufficient labour to do the work as and when required. We simply turn the men over to Louis Wolfe and Company and charge them the ordinary rate of pay of the men plus thirty-five per cent to cover transportation in and out and other charges that we have to pay against those men. The results have been fairly satisfactory. The cost of loading grain in Vancouver is $2 a thousand bushels; at Churchill it is $4 a thousand; it is also $4 a thousand in the port of New York, so that really stevedoring charges at Churchill are not sufficiently high to interfere very much with the traffic.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That I understand is in addition to the part of the loading that the elevator does. That is simply the stevedoring?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It looks like a particularly high rate for levelling a thousand bushels of wheat in the hold of a ship. When that wheat comes down at great pressure from a height I would think it could be stevedored for a good deal less than that. I wonder whether the minister would not look into that further during the coming season and see if that cost cannot be brought down. When wheat comes down a spout fast enough it will spread itself almost to every corner of the hold, and very little levelling is required. I am advised that very little labour is used in levelling those cargoes, and for a ship taking 250,000 bushels at $4 a thousand, this means a lot of money, almost as much perhaps as the insurance.

Mr. HOWE: It seems to me that my hon. friend is thinking of trimming on the great lakes rather than at an ocean port. There is much more to the matter than merely levelling the grain off. An ocean boat has between decks, often two sets of between decks, and the grain has to be shovelled back under those decks absolutely tight against the deck. Then shifting boards are put in and elaborate arrangements have to be made, as the cargo is finished, for settling of the cargo. In addition to that the top section has to be bagged before the boats leave the dock at Churchill; a certain amount has to be bagged to prevent shifting on the voyage. There is much more labour than my hon. friend would have us believe in trimming a wheat cargo in an ocean going ship, especially at Churchill.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My information is that a good deal of the grain is not bagged at all; that very little is. The sea is so calm that in practice very little is bagged. I am saying that not from my own knowledge but from information given me by those who have made trips and who have watched the loading of the boats. They tell me that bags have to be carried in case of necessity but that they are used very little on the Churchill route. The men who tell me that are reliable men. I would like that point looked into during the coming season.

Mr. SPENCE: There is some information I think the house and the country should have. What is the cost of the Hudson Bay railway and terminal up to date; what is the cost of maintaining the Hudson Bay railway while navigation is closed; and how long does navigation remain closed·

Mr. HOWE: The total cost to date is about $52,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That includes the elevator.

Mr. HOWE: Including the elevator, the railroad, the work at Port Nelson that was abandoned—

Mr. STIRLING: Including the railroad from the Pas?

Mr. HOWE: Including the railroad from the Pas, every expense connected with the Hudson bay part of the work of every kind, about $53,000,000.

Mr. SPENCE: The other question is: What does it cost to maintain the railway during the time that navigation is closed. and how long is navigation open? We get different information from different sources, there is uncertainty. The minister should be able now to let us know just how long navigation is open, and what time of year it opens and closes.

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member mean: how long do ships use the port, or how long is it free of ice?

Mr. SPENCE: How long is navigation open? I suppose it is free of ice then.

Mr. BENNETT: This cannot be said to be a political matter, because both parties have participated in the construction of this route and the terminals. But there are a few matters that perhaps the newer members of the house would like to be informed on.

The total cost is about $53,000,000. We have there, as I understand the situation, an elevator, wharves and docks, a station building that we put there, on which the roof is now to be placed, some facilities for taking care of the dredging, and a few buildings. That is, I understand, the entire expenditure on what you might call the equipment of the port.

Now I should like to know this: In 1934 what was the movement out? I do not carry this information in my head, but members of the committee I am sure would like to know the number of ships that came in with cargo and the number that went out with cargo. In the season of 1935, the port was opened in June and closed in October, but it is effectively open for only sixty days because of insurance rates, I understand. The insurance is effective from about August 10 to October 10. That insurance rate has been reduced by the board that deals with it in Great Britain. During the years 1933, 1934 and part of 1935 constant pressure was being exerted upon the board by the high commissioner and his office for reduction of rates. But the loss of one ship, as pointed out by the minister, had the effect of preventing any further reduction being made. The board has declined to make further reduction, I understand, until in the light of further experience they are able to determine that this rate is not too risky from the underwriters' standpoint. I think there were two ships lost, were there not? That is my memory, and the loss of those ships involved the underwriters in the payment of such sums that they declined to reduce the rate further. That is, as it stands at the moment on balance, the number of ships that went in there and went out, with the price they paid to the underwriters for their insurance, has not recouped the underwriters for the losses paid on the two ships referred to. That I think was taken up with the board in England and they were able to produce figures demonstrating that at the present time they stand a substantial loss.

No cattle were shipped out of the port last year. I think there was a cargo that went out in 1934—

Mr. HOWE: That is correct, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: —but none went out in 1935. I think the minister realizes that we are all deeply interested in knowing just what the position of matters at that port is. The first question may be as to the physical condition and the expenditures being made this year to maintain those facilities in their integrity. The next question is the extent to which the port has been used and incidentally the question as to the use of the elevator and terminal facilities for storage purposes. My memory is that the Continental Grain Company use the elevator, which has a capacity of about two and a half million bushels. The Continental Grain Company used it as a storage depot during the winter of 1934 and shipped the cargoes out in 1935. The number of ships that went to Churchill can be determined roughly by dividing the quantity of grain stored by about two hundred and fifty thousand or two hundred and forty thousand. The information that, I think, the committee would like to have is: What use is presently being made of the elevator? I am told that it did not draw to itself any quantity of grain during the harvest season of last year. At the time we left office the crop was being harvested, and it would be later in the year that the elevator would be filled up—I do not know whether it is full or not—at least partly filled up with grain. Is that the property of the Continental Grain Company? Is it their storage?

Mr. HOWE: I think it is all Saskatchewan pool grain.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the first time the pool have endeavoured to use the elevator to any considerable extent. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. HOWE: If you will excuse me, the pool have always supplied the grain.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was loaded by somebody else. The Continental Grain Company had the cargoes there. The minister spoke a moment ago of the stevedores' charges. As I understand the matter, the ship only takes the cargo there, as in all other ports, at the ship's tank. The charter party calls for the cargo being delivered to the ship's tank, and in this case the ship is put up against the dock and the elevator begins to put the grain down the hatches. But because there is no permanent business at the port the grain stevedores come from the port of Montreal, stay at Churchill during the season and then go back to Montreal again I think that is correct.

Mr. HOWE: That applies only to one man, the stevedore foreman.

Mr. BENNETT: I should say, stevedore. And the staff does not reside permanently at Churchill?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: During the winter the elevator has to have a watchman, and the property is looked after by a number of people who are constantly employed, and who are employees of either the government or the national railway?

Mr. HOWE: Roughly there are twenty-one men at the terminal. Of course the government operates the railway, so they are employees of the government in any case. I think they are chiefly on the terminal.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is the operation of the railway, entrusted to the Canadian National, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, for government account.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course. But we do not operate the railway. The Canadian National operates on our account.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And it involved us in a loss last year of a fairly substantial sum of money; I do not know what it was. The hon. gentleman has it beside him, probably.

Mr. HOWE: The loss on the railway last year was $244,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that just the operating loss?

Mr. HOWE: The operating loss.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not include any interest on investment?

Mr. HOWE: No, purely operating.

Mr. BENNETT: As far as the elevator is concerned, I forget what we put into that. The hon. gentleman will remember better than I what it was.

Mr. HOWE: Elevator and galleries and power plant, $2,200,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the income from the elevator last year?

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty is that there is another income vote on this. We are on the capital vote. I think I have the information here.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the question might as well be answered, so that we may get the whole matter at once.

Mr. HOWE: There was revenue of about $102,000 and expenditure of $116,000, a loss of about $13,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is on the elevator?

Mr. HOWE: On the elevator, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: How many bushels of grain are in the elevator this winter?

Mr. HOWE: Two million four hundred thousand or a trifle more.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. STIRLING: Is the railway completely closed from some date in the fall to some date in the spring?

Mr. HOWE: No; the railway is kept in operation all winter. One train each month goes through to Churchill, and there is a weekly service, I think, to mile 233. I may say that there is very little snow trouble there. The high winds blow the snow clear of the track.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it is generally recognized that all through the ages new trade routes had great difficulty in getting established, because they had to compete with older established routes. In addition to that the Hudson Bay railway has had no great pressure upon it because in the last four or five years the crops have been light and the peak load did not demand it at that particular time. Hence the wheat and cattle pool were the only bodies that made any effort to use the route in spite of the extortionate insurance rates that have been charged since its inception.

I do not know what insurance rates were charged on the Panama canal at the outset, but I remember it was with great misgivings that the first few boats went through the Panama. Probably the minister has some information as to how long it took to start wheat rolling through that canal and how many cargoes went through in the first, second, third and fourth years. I remember quite well there was no very pronounced flow of wheat until after the Crowsnest rates were extended to the Pacific, and then the quantity of wheat carried via the Panama increased very rapidly.

If we should have a similar experience in reducing insurance rates on the northern route I have no doubt that the Hudson Bay railway would be very much more used than it is. I wonder whether the minister could tell us if the freight rate is also charged on the excess mileage that it takes to get to Churchill over and above what it should have taken had we gone directly there. Does the minister know? The Hudson Bay railway was built through an engineering blunder with the idea of going to Nelson, an impossible port, and was diverted to Churchill, occasioning about forty or fifty miles more mileage than if it had gone directly to Churchill in the beginning. If the freight rate is charged on that excess forty or fifty miles it is an unjust charge against that wheat. Why should farmers pay the freight on a joy ride of forty miles rendered necessary by somebody's blunder in going to Nelson first? The minister may have information to answer some of the questions, particularly with regard to the excess mileage occasioned by going the zigzag way to Churchill, as to any excess insurance rates that may have been charged during the early days of the use of the Panama canal, and as to the total cargoes that went through the canal in the first three years after it opened.

Mr. HOWE: My understanding of the freight rates is that the rate from Winnipeg to Port Arthur and that from the port at Churchill have been equalized. They are roughly the same distance; I do not think the difference is a matter of forty or fifty miles. I think this was done in a more or less arbitrary way. The Crowsnest pass rates apply from the Pas in the case of Churchill and from Winnipeg in the case of Port Arthur So I do not think there is any detrimental effect from the fact that the railroad does not go in an absolutely straight line.

My recollection is that the elevator in Vancouver was completed in 1916, and that except for one test cargo no grain moved from there until 1922, when I think two cargoes were loaded. Then in 1923 the elevator handled 53 million bushels, so it came into its own very quickly after some seven years.

Mr. SPENCE: I hope the minister does not think I wish to embarrass him at all but I did not get an answer to my first question. I did get some information from my leader as to the insurance in effect from August until October. Is navigation open in this port for only two months! I should also like to know how much it costs to maintain the port during the months when navigation is closed. I was wondering whether it is a paying investment.

Mr. HOWE: I think the answer to the last question is no.

Mr. SPENCE: How long is navigation open there?

Mr. HOWE: Insurance rates permit boats to operate there at the minimum rate for two months, from August 10 to October 10, and if it were not for the insurance I suppose boats might navigate there for probably another month. It is quite possible that the insurance rates will gradually be extended to cover at least two and a half months or possibly three. So far as the cost of maintaining Churchill in the winter is concerned, there were twenty-one men kept there in the winter season, and their wages, plus a little food, was the total cost during the winter. There is nothing spent there in the winter.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister said that he thought we would probably have to wait for the port to develop naturally, but many of us think the department might do a great deal to popularize the port. There is a feeling among many people in western Canada that attempts are constantly being made in one way or another to see that the port does not become particularly popular. We have a very large investment there, as has been shown by the figures produced to-night, and it costs the country a great deal of money to meet the deficits. I would ask what steps the department has considered or is considering to popularize this port at home and abroad. We have our Canadian trade commissioners in Great Britain and Europe, and as I say many people believe that the port could be used much more than it is being used at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: So far as the grain movement goes, I doubt whether anything can change the situation very much. It is well known that a fraction of a cent will change the routing of grain; every exporter of grain in the world is alive to the fact that Churchill is there, and I think perhaps they have their eyes on it. I fancy the day will come sooner than we expect when it will be worth while to make a great effort to get a real movement of wheat through that port. I hope to see the day when 25 million bushels will go out during the season, and when that day comes the railway will pay a fair return on its capital investment. I hope I shall live until then, but this department can hardly expedite that day. I think it will come naturally.

Mr. COLDWELL: What has been the experience in shipping cattle through that port? Cattle have been shipped, and I know at least one young man who accompanied a shipment of cattle across to Great Britain.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; four hundred cattle were sent across. It is a very good route for cattle but the difficulty is that it is quite expensive to fit a boat for cattle. In the St. Lawrence a boat, with one fitting, can make six trips in the season, but at Churchill the maximum is two trips a season, and the return hardly pays for fitting up the boat. That, I understand, is the difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister can hardly be asked to say what has been done for the purpose of endeavouring to popularize the port because when he came into office the port had been closed for a year. But the former Minister of Railways, being pressed very strongly by many members from western Canada, undertook last year to endeavour to promote traffic through the port. Unfortunately he was told what I fancy we all know that the government cannot tell people how they shall ship their commodities, and the people who owned the grain preferred to ship it via the St. Lawrence route to sending it to Churchill. The only grain that was shipped from Churchill, if my memory serves me aright, was the grain that was stored there during the winter. There was a little more added to that, and last year I think eight ships took out a couple of million bushels in all. I speak subject to correction.

Mr. HOWE: We moved four million bushels last year.

Mr. BENNETT: Four million bushels last year?

Mr. HOWE: A year ago last season.

Mr. BENNETT: But in 1935.

Mr. HOWE: We moved four million bushels in 1934 and two and a half million bushels in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wanted to make perfectly clear. I said that the amount shipped in 1935 was substantially the quantity of grain that was stored in the terminal during the winter, somewhere around two or two and a half million bushels. The former Minister of Railways endeavoured to secure a greater movement of grain through the port, hoping to get a continuous movement during the sixty days from August to October, but it was not an easy thing to interest people in the matter, and to the extent to which they claimed the right to ship their grain as they saw fit, his efforts were, of course, of little avail. The people who buy the grain in the west for shipment overseas determine the route they will send it by. As the minister said, sometimes a difference of one-eighth of a cent a bushel determines the route, and they ship accordingly. It has been extremely difficult, as the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said a moment ago, to interest shippers in a new route having regard to the fact that the cargo itself, which is the property of the persons who acquire it in the west or wherever they do acquire it, carries a higher insurance rate than it should carry according to the views of those interested in the port. Then the unfortunate loss of the ship I have mentioned had a bad effect upon our efforts to reduce the insurance rate. Sir Halford Mackinder was greatly interested in the subject, being chairman at the time of the board that was dealing with these matters, and I fancy that the minister must have seen the reports regarding the efforts that were made to lower the rate. But finally the board definitely decided that it would not lower the rate below two per cent until there had been a larger experience so that it could be determined by actual movement of traffic whether a lower rate was warranted. That is the position as I understand it at the moment.

Mr. DUNNING: There was only one ship lost.

Mr. BENNETT: Were there not two?

Mr. DUNNING: Only one.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the name of the other ship? There was some trouble, I think.

Mr. DUNNING: The ship lost was the Bright Fan.

Mr. YOUNG: I have no doubt many hon. members were surprised to hear that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) had visited Churchill so frequently. Living at Port Arthur I suppose it was a great treat to him each time he saw the port. I see in front of me two former Ministers of Railways in previous Liberal governments. One has been moved to Finance and the other one is taking care of so many departments I do not intend to mention them all. I would suggest to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar), who should be very familiar with Churchill, that he consult with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) on this insurance question. Rightly or wrongly, there is a feeling throughout the country, particularly in western Canada, that not as much has been done to popularize this route as might have been done.

I have listened to the remarks of hon. gentlemen to-night and I am impressed with what has been said about new routes. When we have expended a total of $53,000,000 on establishing a new route I think we should go as far as posible in all directions to see that the route is used. It seems to me that high insurance rates stand in the way of this route being used more extensively than at present and I suggest that the government give serious consideration to the question of taking over for the time being this underwriting. I appeal to the Minister of the Interior, who knows the port very well, that he press this matter before the government. In my judgment high insurance rates constitute one of the difficulties hindering the use of this route. I make one more appeal; if anything more can be done by the government to popularize this route, it should be done. Instead of taking out 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, some day I am sure we shall be taking out a much larger amount. I believe we can advance that day by doing everything possible to make this route known throughout the world.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) has been good enough to refer to me as a former Minister of Railways who was interested in the development of this port. My experience as Minister of Railways was rather limited due to the fact that the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Mr. Bennett) put out of business, not only the government of that day, but me as well. I am interested in the development of the Hudson bay route because all of this railway lies within the riding I represent at the present time. It is a fact well known to all hon. gentlemen, and certainly to those from western Canada, that the building of the Hudson Bay railway, the development of the port at Churchill and the route across to Europe have constituted a matter of vital concern and interest to the people of western Canada for a great many years. I can recall having made many speeches on this subject when I was in the house many years ago.

I know there are in eastern Canada many critics of this development, and I was interested in the question asked by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) as to the total cost up to the present time of the whole development. It is true that this has cost $53,000,000, but it is only fair to say that included in that amount is the money that was expended on the development of Port Nelson. When the late Mr. Cochrane was Minister of Railways over twenty years ago, the government of that day undertook the completion of the road and fixed upon Port Nelson as the terminus. Notwithstanding any criticism that may have been made of it I do not think any mistake was made when the terminus was moved from Port Nelson to Churchill. Port Nelson had an open roadstead and would never have made a successful port, but several millions of dollars were spent before it was finally abandoned. Churchill has one of the best natural harbours in the world, being completely protected from storms of all kinds. I was there on July 1 last and at that time the river and bay were clear. There was some drift ice along the shore, but nothing which an icebreaker could not get through. Although the port is at the present time open for navigation for only about two months in the year, this is because of high insurance rates, and my settled conviction is that the day will come, and before many years, when the port will be used for three and a half or four months in the year. I think all the available data—and there is a good deal of it—goes to substantiate that view.

Reference has been made to the Bright Fan incident, but I think I am correct in saying that the inquiry into the sinking of that ship disclosed that it was at least sixty miles off its course and that practically everyone, including the captain, was intoxicated when the accident took place. I know my predecessor from Churchill constituency expressed the view in the house that the Bright Fan had been deliberately sunk, but whether that is true I cannot say. We all know the effect of an incident of that kind upon underwriters. I have no doubt they hold that as a black mark against the development of the route. Personally, I find myself a good deal in sympathy with the view expressed by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), and I assure the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) that I shall not forget the admonition he has given me to-night. If I cannot prevail upon the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe), who is I know wholly sympathetic to the development of the route, and if I cannot touch the stony heart of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), it will not be for lack of carrying out the injunction he has given me.

Item agreed to.

Welland ship canal—construction and betterments, $60,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this the only amount in the estimates for the Welland ship canal?

Mr. HOWE: This is for construction, but there is another item for operations.

Mr. STIRLING: What is this money to be spent on?

Mr. HOWE: It is to be used for flattening slopes. When the canal was constructed the slopes were put in at an angle which was known to be nearly the limit and it was a matter of trial and error as to whether they would stand. In two or three places it was found that they would not stand and some flattening process is necessary. The vote this year is for $60,000, but I may say that $23,000 is the unexpended balance of last year. In other words $23,000 of the $60,000 is a revote.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the total cost of the Welland ship canal?

Mr. HOWE: It is $132,000,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What progress is being made in filling in the old canal?

Mr. HOWE: It is all filled in through the city of St. Catharines. We have no filling operations in progress at the present time.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the revenue from the canal?

Mr. HOWE: There are no tolls on the Welland canal.

Mr. YOUNG: And no revenue?

Mr. HOWE: There is certain water power revenue.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the cost of maintenance?

Mr. HOWE: Operation and maintenance cost is about $600,000 per year.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is anything included in the estimate brought down for levelling the balance of the former Welland ship canal? A portion of the dewatered canal is not levelled. Is there any estimate covering that work, or is this only the original estimate which is to be supplemented later?

Mr. HOWE: No work of the kind described by the hon. member is contemplated now or in the future.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): How many American vessels from American ports go through the Welland canal?

Mr. HOWE: We do not seem to have that information at the moment, but I shall be very glad to get it and present it to the committee. Speaking from memory I would say that the tonnage is about fifty-fifty American and Canadian. Of course there is a certain amount of tonnage of other nations, the chief of which would be Norwegian tonnage.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the operation and maintenance cost of the Welland ship canal?

Mr. HOWE: $600,000 per year.

Mr. LOCKHART: Did I understand the minister to say that in future no provision would be made for levelling the balance of the dewatered canal?

Mr. HOWE: I said that there was no provision for the immediate future; there will be nothing done next year, anyway. Perhaps beyond that we would be open to suggestions, but my officers tell me there is no work there which seems to be needed at the moment.

Mr. TUCKER: Why is it that while vessels using the Panama canal have to pay tolls we carry a great amount of American traffic through the Welland canal free of tolls?

Mr. HOWE: That is purely a matter of government policy. Of course the matter is restricted in some ways. We have treaty obligations with the United States which require that tolls for Canadian and American shipping must be equal. Tied to that are treaty relations with favoured nation countries, which provide that their shipping must be on a basis equal to that of the United States. Possibly the only countries not covered are Germany and Holland, and if we put them on a different basis we would be in trouble.

The matter of tolls for passing through the Welland canal is connected with government policy. Until 1904 tolls were charged, but at that time an order in council was passed which provided that as a matter of government policy no tolls should be charged on the canal. I have not gone into the matter very carefully, but I am not sure that the time is not near when we might examine the situation once more and decide whether tolls should be imposed. I am simply making that observation, without having looked into the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: When the minister is looking into the matter he might find it interesting to get the state papers of the United States and read the story of the construction of the Soo canal. We did endeavour to give a preference to our own ships. We were giving them a rebate when they came to Montreal, coming through the Soo canal with cargoes bound for Montreal. The Americans protested and ultimately, as will be recalled, they built the American Soo canal. As the matter now stands, the reason the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier removed the tolls in 1904—and I believe the minister had the correct date—was that they imposed an additional burden upon the grain growers of the west; that is the real reason. As every ship, whether American or Canadian, or one of a country enjoying favoured nation treatment, had to pay a toll, it followed that that meant just an additional burden upon ships which brought cargoes from the west to Montreal. If it was a Canadian ship it meant that freight charges were enhanced, as happened in connection with other ships as well.

The real reason of this arrangement, one which some people thought was misunderstood philanthropy, was really an effort on our part to lessen the charges on the movement of wheat from Fort William and Port Arthur to Montreal, destined for export to the markets of the world. I recall that I was pressed very strongly to deal with this matter of tolls, and I am sure the minister has probabaly had representations made to him in the same sense. We must remember however that, to begin with, there are treaty obligations with the United States, and we cannot discriminate against their ships. Then there are favoured nations, who stand in exactly the same position, and lastly there is the economic feature of the matter namely, the additional cost per bushel which would be involved in the movement of grain for export from the head of the lakes to Montreal.

Mr. TUCKER: Do United States ships going through the Panama canal pay the same tolls as do ships of other nations?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Except coastwise.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will recall that President Wilson had one of the greatest struggles of his career in carrying into effect that promise of the United States, under the old treaty that preceded the present one, by which there was to be equality of tolls. The debates of congress indicate on the one hand the violent opposition to the president's action, and on the other his grim determination to maintain inviolate the honour of his country as expressed in the treaty, and he succeeded in doing so.

Mr. HOWE: I think the question has been answered by others more competent than I am. It is my understanding that all ships pay tolls.

Mr. KINLEY: Has Canada made any commitments with regard to the St. Lawrence waterway?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. HOWE: I think that comes under a separate vote.

Mr. KINLEY: The Welland canal is part of the St. Lawrence waterway, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: I do not think I can produce the correspondence in that connection and I doubt whether I can answer my hon. friend's question. I would not attempt to answer it.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will not think I am interfering, the fact of the matter is that this has not transpired since the minister has been in the department, so perhaps it is my duty to say something. The fact is that Canada and the United States entered into an agreement, one of the terms of which was that it must be ratified by the United States senate before being submitted to the Canadian parliament. The United States senate declined to ratify the treaty made by the president; therefore Canada has made no commitments, and no commitments can be made of any kind, nature, form or description unless and until the treaty has been ratified by the senate of the United States. Then it will depend upon Canada's ratification, this country having the last word in determining whether or not it shall accept the terms of the treaty.

Item agreed to.

Canals—Improvements, $270,100.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be good enough to explain this vote, particularly the decrease?

Mr. HOWE: This vote covers the replacement of structures which, in the course of years, have become unstable, obsolete or beyond repair; the replacement of equipment which is worn out; the enlargement or realignment of navigation channels, where such improvements are warranted; the substitution of more permanent construction on works where the maintenance of the existing structures involves abnormal costs and general improvements necessary for the proper protection of canal property or that will give a reasonable return for the amount expended. The items are as follows:

One pair of lock gates, lock No. 24, Rapide Plat canal, $4,000.

Earthfill dam across old Galops canal above old lock No. 26 at Cardinal, $1,500—Total, $5,500.

Completion of control dam and highway bridge at Hogsback lock station, $70,000.

Construction of a new and modern swing bridge at Beckett's Landing, where provincial highway No. 16 crosses the canal, $35,000—Total, $105,000.

Trent canal—

Drilling, dredging and blasting Bobcaygeon, $20,500.

Reconditioning portage road culvert, $14,000.

Completion of replacement of the fixed span crossing the canal at village of Lakefield, $2,000.

Completion of the reconditioning of the Queensville road bridge, Holland river division, before turning over span to the county authorities, $1,500.

Completion of reconstruction of Koshlong lake dam, $2,000.

Restoration of concrete structures, Ontario-Rice lake section, including backfilling of certain sections of river walls at Campbellford, $35,000.

Concrete cut-off wall at lock No. 14, $15,000.

Wallace point bridge, Otonabee river; contribution of one-half of cost of replacement of the damaged river pier, the work to be done by municipal authorities, $4,500.

Rebuilding and repairs, reservoir dams, $3,000.

Miscellaneous surveys, investigations, etc., $2,000—Total, $99,500.

Welland canals—

Welland ship canals—

Reconstruction of part of Port Colborne breakwater, $15,000.

Alterations to discharge culverts, Twin Flight locks Nos. 4 and 5, $25,000.

Alterations to valve stop-logs, $6,000.

Hand rails on top chords of ten vertical lift bridges, $3,000.

Sanitary conveniences at thirteen bridges, $2,500.

Feeder canal—
Protection of aprons, weirs Nos. 1 and 2, Dunnville dam, $4,500.
New ferry scow for Port Maitland, ferry, $4,100.

We are building the swing bridge at Beckett's Landing in cooperation with the province; it is our duty, because of the navigable feature, to provide the bridge, and the province does the rest of the work. In connection with the Queensville road bridge, this has been an item of expense to us, and we have worked out with the province an agreement under which we put the bridge in shape and they take it over for future maintenance.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the minister tell us the amount of freight transported on the Trent canal during the past year?

Mr. HOWE: It is mostly a tourist route. Last year there were about 12,000 lockages, showing a fair business in smaller craft. There was quite a substantial revenue from this canal by way of water powers, so the situation is not as bad as it seems. It is an old, historic route, and the revenue from water powers was about $100,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give us similar information with regard to the Rideau canal? Is there any revenue from it?

Mr. HOWE: The revenue is about $10,000 per annum.

Mr. STIRLING: There is tonnage carried on that canal?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, or you might call it poundage.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under this item is there any provision for repairs to the Newmarket canal?

Mr. HOWE: No, nothing at all.

Mr. LOCKHART: According to my hurried figuring maintenance of the Welland ship canal is to cost between $50,000 and $60,000 this year. How does that compare with the amount spent in maintenance and repairs last year?

Mr. HOWE: Maintenance is practically the same.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway—
Amount to provide for difference between expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1937, not exceeding, $336,500.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain this item?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: This is the deficit item, the expected loss for operating the railway during next season.

Mr. KINLEY: Which is the bigger item, the revenue or the deficit?

Mr. HOWE: The revenue is a trifle bigger, I think.

Item agreed to.

Canals and harbours—
Operation and maintenance, $2,145,100.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this the item which includes the operation of the Welland ship canal?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct; all of the canals.

Mr. STIRLING: That is about $600,000, I think.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the balance?

Mr. HOWE: There are grain elevators there.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another item. Could the minister give particulars of the item of $2,145,100?

Mr. HOWE: We have the Hudson Bay terminal at Churchill, $79,000; that is the terminal exclusive of the elevator, operation and maintenance. There are also:

Murray canal, operation, $13,300.
Ontario-St. Lawrence canals—
Headquarters, $43,000.
Cornwall canal, $148,500.
Williamsburg, $86,250.
Quebec canals, $665,475.
Headquarters, $34,000.
Carillon-Grenville, $58,000.
Chambly, $47,000.
Dredging fleet, $34,800.
Hungry Bay and St. Barbe dykes, $5,000.
Lachine, $335,000.
St. Anne's lock, $10,375.
St. Ours lock, $9,300.
Soulanges canal, $132,000.
Rideau canal proper, $132,200.
Dredge vessels, $27,000.
St. Peter's canal, $11,000.
Sault Ste. Marie canal, $55,000.
Trent canal, $201,500.
Welland canals, $682,625.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there anything to show what the revenue is from all those canals and power privileges?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The last full year we have is 1934-35:

Murray canal, $254.
St. Lawrence canals—
Ontario, $28,000.
Quebec—
Beauharnois, $59,516.
Carillon-Grenville, $1,627.

St. Lawrence canals—Conc.
Quebec—Conc.
Chambly, $1,243.
Lachine, $187,113.
St. Anne's lock, $385.
Soulanges, $4,257.
Rideau canal, $10,133.
St. Peter's canal, $168.
Sault Ste. Marie canal, $217.
Trent canal, $6,067.
Welland canal, $175,104.
Miscellaneous, $3.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the $6,067 receipts from the Trent canal include the power income?

Mr. HOWE: No; I think there is something over $90,000 revenue there. I suppose we had not collected the power account; the figure given is the collections at that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister mentioned the Rideau canal. Has the Tay canal been totally abandoned and everything pertaining to it washed out?

Mr. HOWE: No; it is operating.

Mr. MacNICOL: As far as Perth?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, right at Perth.

Mr. MacNICOL: I read in an article some time ago that the basin at Perth was filled up.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give a short statement in regard to the Beauharnois canal? Is it owned by the dominion government? Has it now been turned over?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps my right hon. friend would help me out. I think we own the canal as far as navigation goes.

Mr. STIRLING: Do you receive revenue from it?

Mr. HOWE: We received some revenue, yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Was some expenditure incurred by us?

Mr. HOWE: No expenditure was incurred by us. We have some little supervision there, I think we appropriate about $5,000 for that this year.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Does the dredging of the delta mouth of the Cowichan river at Duncan come under this vote?

Mr. HOWE: No, under Public Works.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister mentioned a revenue of $254 from the Murray canal. What is the revenue received for?

Mr. HOWE: The ground rental, I am told. That is, we own the property there. We rent certain of it.

An hon. MEMBER: Are any harbours included in this item?

Mr. HOWE: No; there are no harbours in this.

Item agreed to.

Elevators — Operation and maintenance, $327,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: What elevators are referred to?

Mr. HOWE: The Churchill elevator, the Port Colborne elevator, and the Prescott elevator. The total vote for Churchill is $124,000; for Port Colborne, $100,000, and for the Prescott elevator, $103,000. I may say that on balance those elevators show a profit. This is the vote to cover the operations.

Mr. DONNELLY: These are operated by the government?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The only elevators to which this item refers are the three that the minister has mentioned?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It has no reference to any of the government-owned elevators at any terminal at the head of the lakes or at any other port in Canada except Churchill?

Mr. HOWE: The elevators at the head of the lakes and the Ontario elevators are under the Department of Trade and Commerce and the harbour elevators are under the various harbour commissioners. We shall have a vote for those later.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the fact that there is some rearrangement of the activities of the commissions at Vancouver, a situation is developing by reason of which elevators that are now leased, I think, and whose lease falls in shortly will again be offered for leasing. When that matter is considered, I have a suggestion to make, in view of certain representations that have come to me recently regarding those elevators. I suppose that would be more properly considered under the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. HOWE: No; the elevators at Vancouver are the property of the Vancouver harbour commission.

Mr. BENNETT: Not those dealt with by the minister now?

Mr. HOWE: No; it is the Department of Marine. By the national harbour board when it is constituted, which we hope will be very shortly.

Mr. STIRLING: In the case of the expenditures the minister has just read, taking Prescott as a typical one, I think he said that the expenditures were $103,000.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Can he give us an idea how that is disbursed?

Mr. HOWE: The largest item of course is labour. We do not seem to have the details, but that expenditure would be broken down to about fifty per cent labour and about thirty per cent power and the rest, I suppose, would be maintenance and charges of that sort.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the quantity of grain that went through the Prescott elevator during the past year, the revenue from it, and the cost of operation?

Mr. HOWE: The quantity handled during the current year at Prescott is 8,750,000 bushels. In 1934-35 they handled 6,545,000 bushels and the revenue was $69,542.75. The elevator in that year showed an operating loss of $16,774. It will be turned into a substantial profit this year, I should say.

Mr. HANSON: What department is handling the elevator at Prince Rupert? Is it under the Department of Trade and Commerce or under the Minister of Railways and Canals?

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister said that the operation of Churchill elevator was more costly than the operation of the elevator at Port Colborne. May I ask a question—

Mr. HOWE: I might explain to my hon. friend that we have cheap power available at Port Colborne, and cheap power is quite an item in the operation of an elevator. At Churchill we must generate our own power from coal in our own power plant. The cost of coal represents, I think, the main difference.

Mr. LOCKHART: I quite appreciate that point as applied to two months or less than two months, but what is the quantity of grain that went through the elevator at Churchill as compared with what went through Port Colborne? Power is generated there for only a very short time, and the cost seems to be out of balance with the quantity of grain that went through.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HOWE: In 1934-35 Port Colborne handled 14,380,000 bushels. Churchill in that year handled 3,964,000 bushels. The nature of the operation at Port Colborne is the cheapest of any known elevator where it unloads from a boat and discharges to a boat. An elevator at an ocean terminal is quite different. It receives cars; there is a cleaning operation involved, and there is also an extensive gallery equipment for loading boats requiring quite a large operating staff. An elevator such as that at Churchill is the most expensive type. I think my hon. friend, in trying to compare the two, is comparing two very unequal things, and the charges are quite easily accounted for.

Item agreed to.

Mr. HOWE: The only other item has to do with the Canadian National Steamships, and the report is not yet available.

Mr. BENNETT: And the freight rates item.

Mr. HOWE: We have to wait until the reports come in.

Mr. STIRLING: There is the tourist item.

Mr. BENNETT: A number of members desire to discuss that item and I think it had better stand.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, February 24, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice, for Mr. Mackenzie King) moved:

That the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the year ended December 31, 1935, be referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to repeal chapter 19 of 25-26 George V, an act to establish an economic council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to explain the purpose of this bill. It is to put the axe of parliamentary control to a dry branch of the dead tree of so-called social legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. What I have to say will contain nothing of blame towards your honour; I wish only to direct your attention to the following facts. Early in February I sent a first draft of the bill on the bureau of translations to the clerk of this house, and after I saw the news in one of the local newspapers that the government was opposed to the bill as it was first drafted, the bill was redrafted. Therefore the English and French copies of the bill sent to your honour on Thursday of last week were entirely different from the first draft that was sent to the clerk of the house. What surprised me, therefore, was that your honour's decision was not based on the copies that were forwarded to you but on the altogether different copy that was sent to the clerk a long time before. I would therefore ask your honour kindly to reconsider this matter and render your decision upon the copies of the bill that were sent to you.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall look into the matter just drawn to the attention of the house by the hon. member.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—OVERHEAD COST

Mr. FAIR:

How many cents of each dollar spent on direct relief in 1935 were used up in overhead?

Mr. ROGERS: It should be pointed out that the cost of administration of relief, in so far as the detailed distribution is concerned, is borne by municipal and provincial authorities and their cost of distribution is not a matter of record with the Department of Labour.

It would doubtless be difficult for the provinces and municipalities to make a statement as to their actual cost of administration since most municipal and provincial departments dealing with direct relief, also deal with other matters of an allied nature, which, however, do not come within the category of relief.

In so far as the federal Department of Labour is concerned, the amount paid out to provinces, municipalities, and other departments of the government, etc., under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, The Relief Act, 1932, The Relief Act, 1933, The Relief Act, 1934, and The Relief Act, 1935, to January 31, 1936, was $193,448,739 and the cost of administration to the Department of Labour including salaries, printing and stationery, telegraphs and telephone, travelling expenses, and, in fact, all expenses of administration was $480,112 or slightly less than one-quarter of one per cent.

The amount of the dominion contribution for direct relief including the grants-in-aid was $105,738,928, but as the same staff handles all classes of accounts it is not possible to give the actual cost of direct relief administration by the Department of Labour, the percentage given above, viz. slightly less than one-quarter of one per cent, would however be approximately correct.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury):

1. What payments were made for expenses of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for the year 1935, in the province of New Brunswick?
2. How many cases under the act have been completely settled in New Brunswick?

1. $27,658.03.
2. To February 1, 1936: 158 cases settled by board of review; 150 cases settled by official receivers as a result of formal proposals; and 83 cases settled by official receivers without formal proposals.

UBALD VÉZINA

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. On what date was Mr. Ubald Vézina, of Beauport, engaged as plumber for the Marine department at Quebec?
2. On what date was he dismissed?
3. What were the reasons for such dismissal?

Mr. HOWE:

1. October 10, 1930.
2. February 13, 1936.
3. Political partisanship.

PETITE RIVIÈRE, QUE., HARBOUR

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. To whom was the contract awarded for the construction of a fishing harbour at Petite-Rivière, Gaspé county?
2. What are the unit prices asked for in connection with each item of such contract?
3. What was the total price of each item?
4. What was the total price of the undertaking?

Mr. LAPOINTE (for Mr. Cardin):

1. Contract not yet awarded.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

MICHAEL BÉDARD

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. Was one Michael Bedard, of Boischâtel, employed as chauffeur in the Department of Public Works?
2. If so, on what date did he enter the employ of the said department at Quebec?
3. Was he dismissed? If so, on what date and what were the reasons for such dismissal?

Mr. LAPOINTE (for Mr. Cardin):

1. Yes, engaged as fireman-labourer.
2. December 15, 1916.
3. (a) Yes, (b) for political partisanship, (c) February 11, 1936.

DOMINION HOUSING ACT

Mr. HEAPS:

1. What are the names of individuals, firms or corporations whose applications for loans under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, have been approved of?
2. What is the amount of each such loan?

Mr. DUNNING:

1 and 2. It is not considered to be in the public interest to publish the names of individual borrowers under the Dominion Housing Act.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD—PROFIT

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. What profit, if any, was made by the Canadian Farm Loan Board on operation during each of the years 1934 and 1935?
2. How were these profits disposed of?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. $59,392.14 for fiscal year ended March 31, 1935. Accounts for present fiscal year not closed.
2. Transferred to reserve account.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—$80,000,000 LOAN

Mr. MARSHALL:

What were the costs, in detail, incurred by the government in recent loan floated for $80,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: All costs of the issue of $80,000,000 Canadian National Railway Company bonds were borne by the company.

QUEBEC POSTAL DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. What is the name of the superintendent of the Quebec postal district?
2. How long has he held such office?
3. How old is he?
4. If he is over 65 years of age, why does not the department superannuate him?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I suggest that the hon. member amend his question by eliminating No. 4, as it involves a statement of government policy. Subject to that I have the answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo):

1. What were the funded debt issues, inscribed amounts, of the national debt of Canada; together with yearly totals, as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?
2. What were the net sums received by the dominion government against the inscribed amounts of the funded debt issues as in question 1; together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?
3. Where sold foreign, what loss or gain developed as a result of exchange on each of the issues above; (questions 1 and 2); together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?
4. What were the unfunded debt transactions, obligation figures, together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available.
5. What were the net sums received in sale or other adjustment of the unfunded debt transactions; together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?
6. Where sold foreign, what loss or gain developed as a result of exchange on each of the issues above; (questions 4 and 5); together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?

Mr. DUNNING: In asking that this question be made an order for return, I point out to the hon. member that, so far as it relates to the new issues each year since 1908, and the proceeds in the markets in which the issues were made, the information asked for can be given. The loss or gain on exchange transactions is not available, as it is impossible to separate exchange on transfers of loan proceeds from other exchange transactions of the government. I also point out that there is a very great deal of work and of expense involved in getting out this information. Perhaps the hon. member might allow it to stand over for to-day and consider whether the information he desires could not be obtained in a less expensive manner.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Might I have a conference with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in connection with it?

Mr. DUNNING: With pleasure.

Question stands.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CLEARING HOUSE SETTLEMENTS—AVERAGE BALANCES AND PAYMENTS

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo):

1. What is the average total, average weekly, of daily balances, outstanding between the three largest Canadian banks in clearing house settlements, in each of the cities of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver for the six months' period from 1st July to 31st December, 1935, inclusive?

2. What is the average payment, averaged weekly, in clearing house settlements between the three largest Canadian banks in each of the cities of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver for the six months' period from 1st July to 31st December, 1935, inclusive?

Mr. EULER: It may be found impossible to answer the first part of this question. In the meantime I ask that it stand as an order for return.

HALIFAX COUNTY POSTMASTERS

Mr. ISNOR:

1. How many postmasters were changed in Halifax county, Nova Scotia, during the period between August 1, 1930, and September 30, 1935?

2. What were the names of such postmasters, their locations, and who recommended the changes?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I understand that the hon. member who is asking this question wants to make some amendment in the dates. I suggest that subject to those changes this be made an order for return.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

C. S. MORIN

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents, appertaining to the dismissal from the staff at the Sorel shipyards of Mr. C. S. Morin, on or about December 2, 1935, together with a statement giving the alleged reasons for his dismissal.

MICHEL BÉDARD

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents respecting the dismissal of Michel Bédard, as chauffeur in the employ of the public works department at Quebec, covering the period from October 1, 1935, to date.

UBALD VÉZINA

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents respecting the dismissal of Ubald Vézina, of Beauport, a plumber employed by the marine department at Quebec, covering the period from October 1, 1935, to date.

SHAUGHNESSY HOSPITAL, VANCOUVER

Mr. STEVENS:

For a return showing:—

1. The names of the officers and all members of the staff of whatever rank of the Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver; together with the date of the appointment of each person; the amount of salary in each case at time of appointment and salary for the fiscal year 1935-36; and the hours of duty in each case.

2. The name, title, rank, and duties of the officer in charge.

3. The number of patients admitted to the said hospital during the years 1930-35 inclusive; and the total number of hospital-days spent by patients in each of the years 1930-35 inclusive.

4. The total cost of operation, maintenance, and upkeep of the said hospital in each of the years 1930-35 inclusive.

FRASER RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. BARBER:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, recommendations, orders in council and other documents, in any relation to the approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act of plans and specifications for the construction of a bridge over the Fraser river at New Westminster, British Columbia.

HALIFAX HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, orders in council appointing royal commission, report if any of the said royal commission, copy of the evidence taken by the said royal commission, and all other documents and papers appertaining thereto, in connection with an item appearing in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1937, as vote No. 227 and reading as folows:—

"To reimburse Peter R. Jack and Chas. A. Ackhurst, one time harbour commissioners at Halifax, for expenses incurred by them in connection with the inquiry into the administration of the Halifax Harbour Commission in 1930, $3,855.10."

Also a statement covering the expenditures, made by the Halifax Harbour Commissioners, which were involved in the investigation or formed the basis of the appointment of the said royal commission presided over by the late Mr. Justice Orde, giving particulars of the amount involved and the firms to whom the said expenditures were paid.

Also a statement indicating the disposition of the matter following the death of the late Mr. Justice Orde.

Also a copy of all letters, telegrams, or other correspondence or documents passing between any member of the government or official of the government and the said Peter R. Jack or the said Chas. A. Ackhurst, or their counsel during the years 1930 up to February 19, 1936.

Mr. HOWE: I have no objection to producing the papers asked for, but I am advised by the officers of the department that it will take three or four months of the full time of one stenographer to do the typing.

Mr. STEVENS: I might make a suggestion which would probably lighten the task very much. Where the motion refers to a copy of the evidence, which I presume would represent most of the copying, it would be quite satisfactory if a copy of the evidence were laid on the table without going to the trouble or expense of making a special copy of it for the purposes of this return.

Mr. HOWE: I am told that the chief difficulty is the last paragraph. There is an immense file of correspondence. Possibly the time could be shortened if my hon. friend would drop into the office and we could discuss what is wanted.

Motion agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES ON GRAIN

DEBATE AND RULING OF MR. SPEAKER ON POINT OF ORDER RAISED BY MR. POWER ON THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20

On the motion of Mr. Perley (Qu'Appelle):

That, in the opinion of this house, the domestic freight rate on grain and grain products moving from any point in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, to a point in any of the said provinces, or from any point, to another point, in any of the said provinces, be adjusted or reduced to at least not more than three cents per hundred pounds over the existing export rates.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before we proceed with this order I might draw the attention of the house to the fact that on Thursday last when this motion was called a point of order was raised; I ventured to suggest a certain opinion, and the matter was postponed until to-day. If any hon. member would like to express his views or discuss the point of order I am ready to hear him before I give a final ruling.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): The statement was made that there is a very material difference between the subject matter of this motion and the subject matter of the bill presented by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I looked into the question rather carefully, and I can see very little difference. It seems to me that if the bill presented by the hon. member for New Westminster were to pass there would be nothing left to debate on the subject matter of this motion. I think that the mover will agree that the question to be discussed here is that of the domestic rates on grain moving westward. As far as the interprovincial movement is concerned, it does not seem to me that there is anything to engage particularly the attention of the house. The export rate on grain to Fort William from any point is known; it is the Crowsnest rate. So far as grain moving between the provinces in that direction is concerned the rate is in no case higher than the Fort William rate. So that I think when boiled down it simply means that whereas the hon. member for New Westminster moved that the domestic rate on grain moving westward be equalized with the export rate, this motion provides that the rate on grain moving westward shall be set three cents higher than the export rate. It seems to me that these bills very closely duplicate each other, and that the ruling of Mr. Speaker as first given is entirely correct.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if this were a matter of legal argument one might understand the observations of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe), but it is a question of reading words. All that is necessary is to read the bill and the resolution. I shall take the bill first. It deals with traffic "moving westwardly from Fort William, and from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William, to Vancouver, British Columbia and to ports on the Pacific coast." It deals specifically with traffic from Fort William, or points on all lines of railway west of Fort William, to Vancouver, British Columbia, and to all ports on the Pacific coast. The resolution deals with an entirely separate and distinct matter. If the minister would only take the trouble to read the resolution he would not have been guilty of making the observations he has made this afternoon, because he will find that there is no similarity between them at all, and not a scintilla of evidence to support that view. Let us look at the resolution: "That, in the opinion of this house, the domestic freight rate on grain and grain products moving from any point"—not Fort William—"in the provinces of"—not Ontario; not Fort William, but "Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia"—that is, traffic moving from those four provinces westward—"to a point"—not Vancouver or Pacific points—"in any of the said provinces,"—that is interprovincial trade —"or from any point, to another point, in any of the said provinces," be adjusted or reduced to at least not more than three cents differential. Now, all one has to do is to read, and I am sure if that is read by the Minister of Railways he will not suggest that these two things are the same.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Vancouver is not mentioned in the resolution, but surely it is included.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But "any point" includes British Columbia and Vancouver. I am of the opinion that the ruling as indicated a few days ago by Mr. Speaker is the proper determination of the point of order, not only because the question raised by the hon. member for New Westminster was there first, but because it is a more effective way to come to an effective result. In other words it would be more effective to have a bill than an academic resolution, or, if you like, a pious wish.

Mr. HEAPS: As a matter of information may I ask which was on the order paper first, the bill or the resolution?

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution was on the order paper first.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I sent the resolution to the clerk of the house early in the new year. I notice the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) spoke of interprovincial shipment, and suggested that it does not matter very much, but may I say that that is an important part of the argument I wish to adduce. I would point out further that the bill introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster provides for equalization, whereas the resolution provides for an adjustment of the differential down to within three cents.

Mr. REID: In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) may I point out that no person can put a bill on the order paper until the house meets. The bill standing in my name would have been on the order paper as soon as the dissolution of the last parliament, but I could not do it then.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was not.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to have the question answered, if I may, because the question is important whether a bill which comes in subsequently to a resolution has priority, or whether preference should be given the resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not think it is important, because the bill has been discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May says at page 272:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the house, whether it be a bill or an adjourned debate upon a motion.

Therefore a bill cannot be anticipated by any general resolution which has not yet been so considered. That is the entire point for your consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): May I reply to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who called attention to the fact that the bill deals with traffic from Fort William and Port Arthur in Ontario and all points west—

Mr. REID: And it is grain traffic.

Mr. CAHAN: But the resolution deals with domestic traffic between points in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. Certainly there are two distinct classes of traffic dealt with by the bill and the resolution respectively. They are not identical by any means. The right hon. leader of the opposition has stated that the test is this: despite the passage of the bill, the resolution would still have effect if adopted?

Mr. HOWE: I should like to ask the mover of the resolution this question: Has any part of his argument to do with anything but domestic rates on grain from the prairies to the Pacific coast?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Yes, the interprovincial rates.

Mr. HOWE: There is no movement of interprovincial grain, except to the coast.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Yes, there is all sorts of movement from one point in a province to another point. They are shipping grain from the northern part of Saskatchewan to the southern part for feed purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other member wish to speak to the point of order?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (East Kootenay): I should like to make my position clear, in the event of there being an appeal from Mr. Speaker's ruling. I do not know what his ruling will be, but I anticipate he will rule that the resolution is out of order. I am inclined to agree that that view is correct, because while the language in the bill is not the same as that used in the resolution, I find that the bill does use the expression—> —from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William to Fort William or Port Arthur, and to all such traffic moving westwardly from Fort William, and from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William, to Vancouver, British Columbia and to ports on the Pacific coast, over all lines now or hereafter constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament.

To appreciate the significance of those words we must remember that it was some few years ago that the act which made the Crowsnest rates effective was amended to enlarge the original act to apply in large degree to the prairie provinces. The bill of the hon. member for New Westminster seeks to enlarge the original legislation so that it will encompass the British Columbia coast. At the same time, as I read the bill it would apply just as well to all lines in the prairie provinces. The bill may not be worded as clearly as it could be, but that is a condition which could be dealt with in committee of the whole. I see no difference between the meaning of the bill and the meaning of the resolution, with the exception that the resolution makes a reservation of three cents, and the bill does not. That, again, is a matter which could very well be considered in committee of the whole. If your honour rules the bill out of order I am seeking to make clear my reason for supporting your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: On Thursday I began to give a decision in this matter which, to-day, I shall complete as follows:

The adjournment of the debate last Thursday on the second reading of Bill No. 2, an act to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain), meant that the question shall again be considered at a future sitting when the order for public bills will be reached. This is what is called, in parliamentary procedure, appointing a matter for consideration by the house. May, page 272, gives many precedents showing that the discussion of an appointed matter cannot be anticipated by a motion. The bill proposes to extend to the westward traffic, from Fort William to Vancouver and the Pacific coast, the rates on grain and flour agreed to in the Crowsnest pass agreement embodied in its essence as follows in the annual statutes of 1897:

> That there shall be a reduction in the company's present rates and tolls on grain and flour from all points on its main line, branches or connections west of Fort William to Fort William and Port Arthur and all points east, of three cents per one hundred pounds.

The order adjourning the debate had been passed by the house when Mr. Perley, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, moved that domestic freight rates on grain products, from and to any point in the province of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, be reduced to at least not more than three cents per hundred pounds over the existing export rates.

There is sufficient similarity in the bill and the motion to confine them to one debate. The domestic rates dealt with in the motion are included in the rates and tolls on grain and flour mentioned in the Crowsnest agreement. The question centralizes on grain rates in western Canada, and debate thereon could not be allowed last Thursday a few minutes after the house had adjourned it to a future sitting. The difference in details between the two propositions may be dealt with by moving amendments when the bill is in committee of the whole, but it is not sufficient to justify a duplication of the debate. It is a well known principle that the same question cannot be raised twice in the same session.

The main object sought both by the bill and the motion is the reduction of rates on grain and its products moving westwardly in the prairie provinces and British Columbia. They are both intended to put an end to an alleged unfairness in the present rates, and the whole debate, which will be centred on that grievance, must take place on the bill and not on the motion.

As Campion says, in applying the anticipation rule, preference is given to the discussion which leads to the most effective results, and this has established a descending scale. A bill has the right of way and cannot be sidetracked by a motion.

I cannot follow any other course than to decide that the discussion of Mr. Perley's motion is blocked by the adjournment of the debate on Bill No. 2, and for that reason, I have to declare that the motion cannot now be debated and must be struck off the order paper.

This decision does not prevent the subject matter of Mr. Perley's motion from being discussed when the bill is under discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: Your honour has not dealt with the fact that the resolution had priority on the order paper. I appeal from the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Speaker having declared that the motion of Mr. Perley (Qu'Appelle) is out of order, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) appeals from the decision of the Chair. Is it the pleasure of the house that the decision of the Speaker be sustained?

And the yeas and nays having been called, the ruling was sustained, on division.

BANKS AND BANKING

PROPOSED NATIONAL OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF BANK OF CANADA AND CHARTERED BANKS

On the motion of Mr. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar):

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government be requested to submit for the consideration of this house such legislation as may be necessary for the national ownership and control of the central Bank of Canada and the chartered banks.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before this motion is proceeded with, I suggest to the hon. member that it might be advisable for him to amend his motion, as otherwise I am afraid I shall be bound to declare it out of order as I did the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) the other day, on the ground that in my opinion if this motion were carried it would involve the expenditure of public money.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the motion stand until I have had an opportunity of considering the point.

Motion stands.

COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH

CONCENTRATION OF ECONOMIC POWER—PROPOSED PUBLIC OR COOPERATIVE OPERATION OF UNDERTAKINGS FAILING TO FUNCTION IN THE GENERAL INTEREST

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

Whereas, the concentration of economic power in the hands of a comparatively small and irresponsible group has failed to provide security and a decent standard of living for large numbers of our people;

Therefore be it resolved, that; in the opinion of this house, industrial, commercial and financial organizations and undertakings that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities and operated as public services or cooperative enterprises.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I note you mentioned my name as seconder. I thank you for the compliment, but my name is not attached to the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) to the remarks I made on the motion that was presented to the house just before this one, as they will apply to this motion, I am afraid, if it is not amended.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) is seconding the motion, not the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) as called from the Chair. Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that objection is being taken to this resolution? If so I would point out that on several previous occasions in this house a resolution of this kind has been introduced without any question whatever. The resolution lays no specific burden upon the government in any way whatsoever. From my standpoint it would be extremely unlikely to add any burden; in fact, I think it would relieve the government of a great many of the burdens it now carries. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if anything can be properly brought before the house, a resolution of this kind is in order.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I may say on behalf of the government that we have no objection to this resolution being discussed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may proceed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Speaking to the resolution, for several years I have introduced a resolution urging a new economic and social set-up, which I have called the cooperative commonwealth, and the need for it is more pressing to-day than ever, especially in view of the disturbed international situation. Again, we have a new house and many of the members have not heard the point of view of our group.

Last year I was able to summon the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), then Prime Minister, as my star witness to the failure of capitalism, and had the legislation of his government implemented the promises of his earlier radio addresses the situation in the house and throughout the country might have been very different to-day. This year I propose to use rather freely the report of the royal commission on price spreads, and although my friend from East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) did not see his way to second this resolution I gladly accord him recognition of the great benefit he conferred upon the country by taking the initiative in urging that investigation. The present government, of course, is not responsible for the report. Several of the Liberal members of the committee made reservations, one wrote a dissenting report. However, I would point out that the government is decidedly responsible for solving the problems revealed by the report and by the evidence.

That economic power is concentrated in the hands of a comparatively small group is generally conceded, except perhaps by the members of that group. I should like to call attention to a very fine case put forward in a recent book called Social Planning for Canada, with particular reference to the chapter dealing with the structure of Canadian industry. I quote:

There were once more than forty banks in Canada. There are now ten. Of these, the three largest do 70 per cent of the business. The four largest 80 per cent and, though they compete strenuously in service, they present a united front on interest rates.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member be good enough to tell us who is the author of that book?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am referring to a book entitled Social Planning for Canada, published by the research committee of the League for Social Reconstruction. I am glad the hon. member gave me an opportunity to state the authorship of this book. The price spreads report states at pages 25 and 26 that of the non-financial corporations, the total assets of 100 of the largest companies increased during the period 1923 to 1933 from $5,095,651,000 to $7,324,323,000, or 43·7 per cent. Excluding five transportation companies, the increase was 83·6 per cent. Then, as I have tried to point out from time to time in this house, we have a system of interlocking directorates. As one writer puts it, our business leaders spread their tentacles over every phase of human life. We are born in their hospitals, we are buried in their cemeteries. In the interval it is they who decide what we shall eat, what we shall drink, what we shall wear, what we shall see, what we shall hear and what we shall smoke.

In my resolution I state that this oligarchy is irresponsible. I do not use that word to mean that it is crazy, although it often acts in a way which in my judgment would show that it is in reality blind to its own ultimate interests. I use the word in the sense that it is not responsible to any duly constituted authority. Industry to-day is self governed. Let me quote from page 13 of the price spreads report, as follows:

Referring to the evidence——that a few great corporations are predominant in the industries that have been investigated; also that this power, all the more dangerous because it is impersonal, can be wielded in such a way that competition within the industry is blocked, the welfare of the producer disregarded, and the interests of the investor ignored.

And again:

—the corporate form of business, not only often gives freedom from legal liability, but also facilitates the evasion of moral responsibility for inequitable and uneconomic practices.

I think we are all aware, as is stated in the report, that to a large extent the greatest expansion in our corporations has occurred during this present century. With regard to the ownership and control of corporations the report states that the development of the corporation with its multiple shareholders has made it possible for an individual to own without controlling, and to control without owning. This means that control over the physical assets of the instruments of production and distribution is passing from the property owner to the managerial groups. This is altogether a new and rather menacing development in our industrial, commercial and financial life. The report then goes on to show the various methods by which this condition has been arrived at. We have the minority control attained by means of the proxy system. Every hon. member knows that at annual meetings it is next to impossible for a small shareholder to obtain any redress or even to get information which it may be necessary he should have. One very significant statement in the report is that very few directors own more than one per cent of the voting stock of the companies they direct. We talk about democracy in politics, but I submit that there is an absolute negation of democracy in our industrial life when only a few directors have any great stock ownership in the companies which they control. The report summarizes the various devices by which minority control is maintained. I should like to quote from the report very briefly in order to bring the whole picture before the house. There is the holding company which owns a controlling interest in the voting securities and in this connection the report reads:

The holding company may also be used to recapitalize the financial structure of one or more enterprises through a substitution of its securities for securities of subsidiary companies.

The report states that almost invariably this is a form of stock watering. It states that the holding company may also be used to pyramid the voting control to give its organizers, with a minimum amount of investment, control over the subsidiary. Without going into the matter in too great detail, I might mention also the devices of non-voting stock and the voting trust. The report concludes by stating:

These facts support the view that the real motive of many consolidations was financial gain to the professional promoter and investment dealer.

And again:

In general, the refinancing schemes were so constructed as to afford the public the privilege of subscribing the requisite amount of cash while endowing the promoters with unhampered control of the new companies.

The whole matter is summarized in these words:

This summary of earnings histories points to the following conclusions:—

(1) That the refinancing operations were attended by gross over-valuation of assets and consequent over-capitalization.

(2) That the so-called bonds, preferred shares and class "A" shares had in many instances no real equity junior to them; in other words, that the receivers of the common stock gave no real consideration to the company for the issue of these shares.

Certain references to corporate practices were made in the evidence but time does not permit my going into the evidence in detail.

Several illustrations of corporate practice were given. The first case was that of the Robert Simpson Company, and in this connection the report states:

> In creating the security-structure an additional burden of fixed cost of $1,000,000 per annum, was placed on the operating company.

The report refers to two appraisals of the fixed assets of the Canadian Appraisal Company, by virtue of which over $8,000,000 was written into the capital. These are not my words, these are not vague speculations, they are conclusions arrived at by the commission from the evidence. There was the Burns case involving a write-up of assets for the purpose of establishing a nominal asset value to cover the value of new securities, in other words, stock watering. The report states that this represents a distinctly doubtful case of an investment house misstating the income figures. The report questions the propriety of a refinancing, utilizing these practices at the height of a business boom. It says, referring to this practice:

> One of the most flagrant which we have encountered. We wish to condemn without reservation or equivocation such financial malpractice as it illustrates.

If a man steals a loaf of bread he is liable to be sent to gaol, but it is quite possible that a man may steal from the public a million dollars and be regarded as one of the pillars of society. I submit that it is the responsibility of this government to place upon the criminal code such provisions as will enable the public to punish those who have so defrauded society and to seek the restitution of their ill gotten gains.

Another instance was given, that of Canadian Canners, and the reorganization of the company's plant, revaluation and appreciation —at least $6,000,000, equivalent to over 50 per cent of the outstanding capital stock. This is what is said, and I would call this to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if he would do me the courtesy of caring for any of these matters. May I ask that he be prepared to consider rather carefully some of these statements, which it seems to me affect fundamentally the administration of justice in this country. With regard to Canadian Canners, the report speaks of an inaccurate statement—a very mild term—of the company's financial position. It declares:

> An inaccurate statement of the company's financial position was shown by the balance sheet presented to the shareholders in 1932; this was signed by the company's auditors, only subject to certain vital qualifications. The profits as shown did not in fact exist.

We have all heard of men who were carried off to gaol for selling some little article under false pretences; we know of men who have been imprisoned for having forged a cheque for a few dollars; and yet here are men in responsible positions, belonging to an organization that is supposed to be above reproach, responsible for the signing of statements in which we are told that the profits as shown did not in fact exist. Take this summary of the situation—again I quote from the report:

> Vendors and promoters allot shares to themselves for services and properties contributed to the company at a figure grossly in excess of any possible intrinsic value. . . . . The courts will force a man who has paid $99 for a $100 par share to contribute the other dollar; they seldom do anything about the man who has contributed a table worth possibly $10 at the absurd valuation of $20,000.

This is not a matter that affects only the individuals immediately concerned; it is a load on the whole consuming, the whole general public, who directly or indirectly must pay a tax because of such practices. In any case, I submit that it is the public that pays. One law for the rich and one for the poor; that has again and again been denied in this house; but I submit that we do not need to go outside the covers of this report for the most adequate evidence that that in fact really obtains.

A few years ago we had a very careful investigation, two or three in fact, into the Beauharnois scandal; but these investigations led to no punishment whatever. They led to no restitution to the public of properties that had been obtained in a scandalous manner, and now we are being besieged by second bondholders who are urging that they have been left holding the bag.

To no small extent does this irresponsible oligarchy control government policy. To the truth of our statement the statute books give the most eloquent testimony. It was only the other day that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) asserted very emphatically that it was not true that property rights took priority over human welfare. I have not time to argue the point in detail, but I suggest that all anyone has to do is to look over our statute books and over Hansard to see the reception which various resolutions and bills have met with, to my knowledge at any rate, in the last fifteen years. You have only to do that to find that property rights are very well guarded indeed but that in a great many instances human rights are callously disregarded.

The situation in Canada is not the result of socialistic experiment. Any of us who advocate anything new along this line are told that it would plunge the country into chaos. I say that the situation we face today is decidedly not the result of any socialistic experiments; it is the result of years of capitalist domination. The big business men of this country have had a free hand. I think it is really a curious thing that to-day these big business men come along and tell us that we must not experiment, and try to blame the public for a situation for which they themselves are very largely responsible.

I have tried to point out that we have a small oligarchy that controls the economic situation. I think that is clear from the evidence, and I go further and assert that this system has failed to provide security and a decent standard of living for large numbers of our people. What about the primary producer? I give the results of an investigation that I myself made on the basis of the census figures of 1931. In the census year there were 728,623 farms in Canada and the average income per farm would be slightly less than $700. This figure would include cash income and value of products raised on the farm for consumption by the farm population. The value of the farm income, which was already small enough in 1930, had been reduced by one-quarter by 1932. It means that the average farmer to-day receives an income of only around $500 a year. Is that a satisfactory condition for our agricultural producers? The report states:

> It is clear that the fundamental problem of the primary producer is finding profitable markets. The difficulty is not that he cannot produce enough goods. Nor is it that, having regard to potential demand and consumption, he produces too much; neither is it that his products are not needed and desired. It is simply that they cannot be sold at a price sufficiently high to maintain a reasonable standard of living for the producer nor, paradoxically, bought at a price sufficiently low to permit necessary consumption by all in need.... At the same time, free competition in the international market is checked on every hand by tariffs, quotas, exchange, restrictions and embargoes. The primary producer is therefore denied the possible benefits of free competition in the buying markets of the world; is exposed to all the rigours of free competition in production at home; and finally, is subjected to exploitation by outright monopoly or imperfect competition among the domestic purchasers of his product. ... Between the farmer and the consumer there is an immense gap bridged by a chain of middlemen each of whom exacts a proportion of the consumer's dollar. In many instances the amount received by the farmer for his product is only a fraction of that realized by this array of middlemen.

I should like to ask what the Liberal government propose to do about this situation. As a matter of fact very few members of the government are in their seats at present; I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) and a few others. I should like to ask them what the government propose to do about this situation which bears so hardly upon the producer. I turn to the Minister of Labour; what about labour? Let me point out to the minister that two-thirds of the working population of Canada are wage-earners; that is, 2,565,000 out of the whole working population of 3,923,000. If agriculture, in which over 1,000,000 people are engaged, chiefly as proprietors, were eliminated the proportion would be increased to nearly five-sixths. The report points out that each employer starts his negotiation of the labour contract with the bargaining advantage of a mass buyer.

I am not going to plead the cause of trade unionism here, but what about the conditions of labour in Canada to-day? Take the needle trades. I ran hurriedly over the various industries as to which we have evidence in this report. In the needle trades I find that in some Quebec country home-work contract shops the workers receive only five cents per hour. Wage rates are very low; hours are very long. I quote this phrase:

> Frank exploitation of labour's weakness has been common.... There are frequent and continuous violations of the laws about employment conditions, hours and wages. Female operatives were sometimes forced to work at such high pressure for continuous hours that the result on health and morals was deplorable.

This is the conclusion:

> That labour and wage conditions in this branch—

That is, the needle trades.

> —of Canada's industrial activity are such as to merit the most emphatic condemnation. They should not be tolerated in any state that claims to call itself civilized.

I would suggest that the Minister of Labour has a pretty big job on his hands when that statement is made in the report of the price spreads committee, with regard to conditions in this country.

> The worker in the clothing industry can expect neither comfort nor security; in many cases, he can, indeed, expect only hopeless poverty.

What about the rights of citizenship? We have always taken it for granted that we did not need any laws on our statute books to protect certain rights of citizenship; we thought they were inherent, but these people have no rights, not even the common right of earning a decent livelihood. And what about those employed in the leather and boot industry? In 1931 the average annual wage was $764, while female workers earned from thirteen to twenty-six cents per hour. Then there is furniture; I am just taking casual sentences. The average weekly earnings in each furniture factory ranged from $3.64 to $14.42, and averaged about $10. So it is with baking, with flour milling. In connection with meat packing, I have underlined this sentence:

> The lowest average weekly wages found were $15.89, paid in the Hull plant of Canada Packers. In this plant 39·2 per cent of the employees were paid below the legal minimum for women in Ontario.

Here is another sentence, with regard to fruit and vegetable canning:

> —both male and female time workers were paid as low as ten cents an hour.

Then we have the tobacco industry, to which I think so much publicity was given that I need not say very much about it to-day. The report states:

> The most striking fact revealed by our evidence on the tobacco industry is the combination of low wages and high profits.

We all know from the press how low were those wages and how exorbitantly high were those profits. Then what about textiles? I quote:

> —the average wage rate for all male workers was ten cents per hour—

The report was speaking of M. E. Binz Company, Limited. Then a word with regard to the food chains:

> —In the Quebec division three companies had fifty per cent or more of the male grocery clerks receiving less than $10 per week, but three companies had also twenty-five per cent or more of their female employees in this class—hours of labour of employees of food chains are longer than any worker should be asked to endure—

Let me call that sentence to the attention of the Minister of Labour and ask him what he proposes to do about it. I have spoken about the situation of the producer and the situation of the labour man. What is the situation of the small business man? In approximately one-third of the retail business of this country the personal factor has largely disappeared; that is the social side.

> Economically, the unwarranted expansion in recent years in distributive, as in industrial organizations, has not contributed to the general welfare—

What about the consumer? Well, frankly the consumer—and let me point out that we are all consumers—has been cheated all along the line.

> —such practices include: false and misleading advertising and marking; misleading statements as to quality of products, including designation of grades of goods likely to confuse or deceive rather than inform the consumer—short weight and unjust scales—

Again I ask the Minister of Justice what his department is going to do with regard to wholesale cheating of this kind. Surely that is just as much a criminal offence as anything we have prohibited by statute. Then let us look at the milling interests; although the Minister of Finance is not present I think perhaps he ought to give this house some indication as to what can be done in that industry. In this report the statement is made that the public and not the industry has been bearing the burden of its cost. Take bread; there has been an increase in the spread between flour and bread prices from 2·33 cents per pound in 1916 to 5·13 cents per pound in 1930, which is equal to 4·2 cents per one and one-half pound loaf. Whether we look at it from the standpoint of the producer, the business man, the labour man or the consumer, here we have a situation that is very unsatisfactory, to say the least.

What can be done about that situation? Last year the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) attempted to do something. Most of his legislation seems in a fair way to be put on the scrap heap. What are the Liberals going to do? They are now the government in power. The older economic theories of the Liberals, I think, were fairly well expressed by Mr. E. J. Young, who formerly represented the constituency of Weyburn. What did he say with regard to monopolies:

> The only effective way to deal with monopolistic organizations is to expose them to merciless competition, which will force them to efficiency or to bankruptcy—

Surely the Liberals ought to understand that it is owing to merciless competition that we have arrived at the state in which we find ourselves to-day. It is by merciless competition that the big fellows have been able to drive the little fellows to the wall.

With regard to export trade—and I think this is a matter that the Liberals will have to consider seriously—this is what Mr. Young said:

> In order to dispose of our exports, we must sell them at prices the people of other countries can pay.
> To do this, it is necessary to keep our production costs down to a point that will enable us to compete in the markets of the world, with other countries producing similar products.

Are we then to reduce our production costs by driving labour still lower? I ask the Liberals in all seriousness, is that their only solution? I am glad to think that the great Liberal party is gradually getting away from that old laissez-faire policy.

Here are some lines that I found not long ago in the Manchester Guardian. The poem —if it can be called such—was entitled, Lancashire:

.... then came steam
Machines that marched the floor with the measured precision of the planetary system,
And towns that sprawled in muddles of beastliness:
Had hands tender as a lover's for yarn and hard as Cain's for the children they enslaved.
See the woman weaving in that steam-heated shed?
There's a kid coming.
But the Act says she mustn't go on weaving after....
Oh, it does, does it?
And the Act says the humidity mustn't exceed....
Oh, it does, does it?
Mustn't exceed warm tea. She's stood eight hours:
Is she tired? Oh boy?
They've found how to save the cotton trade;
London chap, he found it. He spent a whole day in Manchester.
Lancashire must reduce her costs and recover the export trade.

Exactly the position stated in the dissenting report of the former member for Weyburn. The lines go on:

Lancashire must—Oh, my God.
I know an economist lives in a library and studies trade.
It's the best place. Inside a library you see all trade, and outside you only see part, the part that hurts,
Demand he said, is satisfied from the cheapest supply.
Productive energies which no longer conform to this condition should be transferred to alternative activities.
What sheltered lives these long words lead! Never been soaked with sweat or cold with fear. Never been parts of men, like short words.
Productive energies which no longer—that's me and my mill. Are you getting it?

That is the attitude of finance. I am not accusing the Liberals of callous disregard of human suffering, but I say to them that in view of the deplorable conditions that exist to-day, whatever their theories, this country expects them to take some immediate action to solve these outstanding problems. I think most of them, and I hope most hon. members of this house, will agree with the conclusions of the price spreads commission in this report:

The depression has, furthermore, demonstrated that the strong and the organized are attaining an ever increasing position of dominance in our economic life; that economic power is becoming concentrated. With this concentration, old theories of economic control are proving inadequate.

. . . Unregulated competition no longer guarantees efficiency and maximum production at fair prices. Competition degenerates sometimes into economic warfare where victory may go to the strong, rather than to the efficient. Forces of economic readjustment are often not self-correcting, but cumulative in their efforts. Orderly readjustments may develop into disorderly crises.

I congratulate the Liberals upon having put into the speech from the throne the statement that appears there with regard to the necessity of state intervention under certain circumstances. That is all to the good.

It is most unfortunate that there was no one on the price spreads commission who stressed public ownership and operation. Indeed the commission definitely expressed a prejudice against it. But they did say:

Under present conditions, then, the question is not intervention or non-intervention, but merely the nature and extent of intervention.

I wish we could have had that clearly recognized; we would have had much more illuminating discussions on the hustings in the last election. The report extending over some pages covers various forms of state control, I have time only to enumerate them: (a) Protection of private economic activity; (b) promotion of private economic activity; (c) the encouragement of monopoly; (d) licensing; (e) protection of the public; (f) prohibition of monopoly; (g) government acceptance of monopoly; (h) government toleration of monopolistic or quasi-monopolistic industrial combinations, such as cartels, and, (i) public ownership and operation. It is this last which is treated so very slightly in the commission's report, but which we believe ought to form a line of policy for this country. This is what the report said:

The extreme example of government intervention is where the government engages directly in the ownership and operation of business enterprise. Government ownership and operation of postal services, schools, and roads provide some of the oldest examples. In violation of extreme individualistic theories, governments nearly everywhere have taken these enterprises out of private hands, sometimes simply because private enterprise could not profitably supply satisfactory service, sometimes because it did not operate to produce maximum social welfare. Public ownership for a variety of reasons—to provide a competitive check on private enterprise, to supplement ineffective regulations of monopoly, to control consumption, to provide revenue—has continued to expand until a world survey of such ownership to-day would include every type of economic activity. In Canada governments are directly engaged in such businesses as railways, steamships, street railways, telegraphs, telephones, radio, electric light and power, water, gas, stockyards, grain elevators, public markets, liquor sales, banking, and insurance.

Under these circumstances I submit that we of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party are quite within our rights and indeed in the line of progress in urging that the government itself should take over many of these enterprises. The question is not individual enterprise versus bureaucratic monopoly, but rather whether the inevitable monopoly shall be irresponsible and inefficient as at present, or fascist in type, or democratic. We plead for democratic control in industry. I know that in Canada there is some difficulty in working out our policy owing to the division of powers under the British North America Act as between the provincial and the federal authorities, but I submit that we as a federal parliament could do a great deal more under the British North America Act than we are doing at present. Hon. members will remember the clause by which complete control is given the dominion over——such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces. (92, 10c.)

I think the hon. member for East Kootenay is right in saying that very much more could be done than is being done under that act. Then I urge further, and I trust that some of my colleagues will develop this point, that within the framework of state control there should be the fullest opportunities for cooperative enterprises, both consumers' and producers' cooperatives: I should like also to have emphasized that it is not the goods that we need socialized, but the capacity to produce.

Under a cooperative commonwealth, instead of profits for a few we would give service to the many, to the whole community. We would seek to establish democracy in our every day living. Remember that five-sixths of the non-agricultural working population consists of wage earners. To-day they have no control of the very means by which they live. Can that condition be called democracy?

Especially in view of the international situation, caused we believe to a great extent by the economic forces at work in the world, we urge that it is desirable that we substitute for our highly competitive system one based on cooperation. I wish every hon. member could be induced to read a recent book by H. N. Brailsford entitled, Property or Peace. I firmly believe a fundamental change in our economic system is the only way to bring about lasting peace. Permanent peace can be assured only when the underlying principles of cooperation replace those of competition.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I find it a little more difficult this session to oppose the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Within a year or two my hon. friend will be fully converted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would ask the hon. member to wait until he has heard what I am going to say. I find it somewhat more difficult to speak on this occasion than I did on occasions in the past four years upon which similar resolutions were moved, and at which times I sat in the far corner of the chamber to the right of Mr. Speaker. My difficulty arises not because of the resolution itself—it is just as communistic as was each of the four preceding ones—but because this session I am sitting close to the hon. member and when I look into his gentle eyes, when I observe his kindly smile, his sympathetic countenance, I know that although in my opinion he preaches communism again in this resolution, he is not a communist.

To place my argument on solid ground I shall begin by reading the four resolutions introduced at earlier sessions. Although they have changed somewhat in wording, I would say the import of each is the same. Leaving out the preambles, I refer first to the 1932 resolution, which was couched in these terms:

Should immediately take measures looking to the setting up of a cooperative commonwealth in which all natural resources and socially necessary machinery of production will be used in the interests of the people and not for the benefit of the few.

In 1933 the same words were used. Then, in 1934 the resolution was as follows:

That in the opinion of this house it is desirable that the present system be superseded by one based on the principle of cooperative production and distribution in which human needs should be the first consideration.

Then, in 1935, last year, these were the words of the resolution:

It (the capitalistic system) should be superseded by a cooperative commonwealth in which the profit motive has been subordinated to that of public service and ruthless competition replaced by collective ownership under democratic control.

Then, the resolution now before the house is:

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house industrial, commercial and financial organizations and undertakings that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities and operated as public services or cooperative enterprises.

I wish to compliment the hon. gentleman, because I notice a definite change in his attitude. He gets milder and milder every time he places resolutions of this nature on the order paper, and when a moment ago he interrupted by stating that finally I would find myself "fully converted," or words to that effect, I might have replied that if he continued to get milder he might finally find himself in the Liberal-Conservative party. All the communistic end of his advocacy will be eliminated.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Congratulations.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to refer to one or two points with which the hon. member dealt. In general his observations referred to the price spreads report and were not directed particularly to the resolution before the house. Something was said about mergers. I am just as much opposed to unwarranted mergers as is the hon. member. An occasional merger may be effected for the benefit of business, but I agree with him that the rank and file of mergers are a menace to the country. I have a clear recollection that the greatest merger in the world is found in soviet Russia, where everything is under the control of the state and there is no private individuality in business.

With the hon. member's observations about stocks I find myself largely in agreement. Many of the stock speculations which took place in the last few years were an outrage on the rights and privileges of ordinary people, and if the hon. member moved a resolution to rectify those abuses I would be pleased to support him. I could give many illustrations of the dire effects of stock speculation in the last few years, and I am one who believes that those speculations had much to do with bringing about the depression.

I agree with the hon. member's observations about the farmers, to the effect that their incomes are too low. On the other hand I disagree with his statements about industry. I know of many industries which during the last four or five years have been operating without a profit and, on the contrary, have suffered great losses. I know presidents and managers, men who own their own plants, who have not drawn a dollar in the last four or five years, whereas on the other hand they have spent large sums of money to keep their men employed.

Subject to the hon. gentleman's correction I shall classify the planks of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation platform as set out in the resolutions quoted and in the speeches made upon their presentation to the house. I would classify them under five headings: (1) The socialization of finance including banks, trust companies, insurance companies and financial institutions; (2) the socialization of the companies or services having to do with travel and transportation, such as railways, shipping companies, automobile companies and air travel companies; (3) the socialization of word communication services, either by wire, through the use of telephones and telegraphs, or by wireless.

May I digress at this point to make some observations about telephones. A few days ago I read a news item in the press indicating that the socialization of telephones in Alberta had not been satisfactory, and that consideration is being given to disposing of the system by placing it in private hands. There are other social services which would have been better under the control of private interests, and which will likely cease to be public services and return to private hands.

I continue with the headings: (4) Socialization of natural resources such as timber, water power, mines, lands and fishing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has never advocated the socialization of farm lands, in the sense of the government taking them over. We have always held that it is desirable that a person working on his own land should be made secure in his tenure of that land.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to know that the hon. member's platform has gotten away from the socialization of land.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has never gotten away from it.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I quote from the speech of the hon. member when speaking to a similar resolution in this house on February 1, 1933:

> Last year the United Farmers of Alberta, in order that there should be no doubt about their ultimate objective, stated their position in very clear terms, adopting the following short definition of a cooperative commonwealth:
> "A community freed from the domination of irresponsible financial and economic power, in which all social means of production and distribution, including land, are socially owned and controlled either by voluntarily organized groups of producers and consumers."

Apparently socialization of the land has now been eliminated from the hon. member's platform.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the hon. member does not wish to misrepresent me. He has quoted a resolution of the United Farmers of Alberta passed in convention before the organization which I represent came into existence, and I was quoting it in this house at that time as indicating the desire of a great many farm bodies for action along this line.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will accept the hon. member's explanation. The fifth division of socialization is that mentioned in my hon. friend's resolution, the socialization of industry and commercial services, which would mean, I assume, large factories, flour mills, milk and bread companies and wholesale commercial organizations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did the hon. member read the rest of the resolution, may I ask?

Mr. MacNICOL: It says, such as are failing to function. I could mention many organizations that are failing to function, but it would not be fair for me to do so because they are failing to function not because they are not manufacturing properly, but because of the dire distress of the times, and these companies would be very glad to sell to the government or anybody else that would take them over.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The resolution says "failing to function in the general interest."

Mr. MacNICOL: I have divided up in that way the five main groups of the objectives of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as set forth in the various resolutions and in the speeches made at the time of their presentation, and I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is nothing more or less than communism minus violence. I again quote the hon. gentleman's words and will ask him to correct me if I misinterpret him. In the same speech that he delivered in this house on February 1, 1933, speaking to the motion then before the house, he said:

> Let me say that we must distinguish clearly between the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and communism. It is quite true that both believe in a changed social order, in a new economic system. The communists are convinced that this can be brought about only by violence. They think it cannot be done in any other way. We believe that it may come in Canada by peaceful methods.

Then there was an interruption, and my hon. friend continued:

> Mr. Woodsworth: It may very well be that force may prove inevitable.

I certainly do not for a moment think that the hon. gentleman would either advocate or countenance force in any way whatsoever, but if such a changed system comes about by violence, it is communism one hundred per cent.

Now I want to quote to the house what the communists themselves say, and may I point out that in reading over their platform I find many words and phrases identical with the words and phrases used in the various speeches to which I have alluded. I have in my hand a book written by M. J. Olgin, Why Communism?—Plain Talks on Vital Problems, which says this of communism at page 14:

> We propose, in brief, that all resources, all land and buildings, all manufacturing establishments, mines, railroads and other means of transportation and communication, should be, not private property, but the common property of all those who work. We propose that production be made to serve the needs of those who work. . . . . We hold with science that production and distribution of goods can be planned to avoid anything resembling the crisis in capitalist society. Planned economy on the basis of common ownership without any class division is called communism.

> When we communists speak of a society organized on the basis of planned production and distribution we mean something entirely different. What we have in mind is very simple. It is clear-cut. Take over from the private owners all natural resources, all mines, factories, plants, railroads, ships. Turn all this into national property administered by the workers under a soviet state. Do away with production for profit. . . . . Make it your purpose to increase production. Employ the best services of scientists to improve your machinery and your methods of work. . . . . The output of industry is sure to increase. . . . . Increase production still more by further improving machinery and methods according to the latest data of science. . . . . Under a system of communism nothing would go to the private owners of land and capital because there would be no such owners, and everything would go to the working people because everybody would be a worker.

I have left out many sentences and have just quoted the platform of communism.

In another book issued by the communists, the Program of the Communist International, is a further elaboration of their platform, pages 38, 39, 40, 41, as follows:

> 1. The starting point of this great economic revolution is the expropriation of the landlords and capitalists.
> 2. The confiscation and proletarian nationalization of all large private capitalist undertakings (factories, works, mines and electric power stations) and the transference of all state and municipal enterprises to the soviets.
> 3. The confiscation and proletarian nationalization of private capitalist railway, waterway, automobile and air transport services.

4. The confiscation and proletarian nationalization of private capitalist communication services (telegraphs, telephones and wireless).

5. The confiscation and proletarian nationalization of all large landed estates in town and country (private, church, monastery and other lands) and the transference of state and municipal landed property including forests, minerals, lakes, rivers, etcetera.

6. The confiscation of all property utilized in production belonging to large landed estates, such as: buildings, machinery and other inventory, cattle, enterprises for the manufacture of agricultural products (large flour mills, cheese plants, dairy farms, fruit and vegetable drying plants, etcetera).

7. The proletarian nationalization of private banks (the entire gold reserve, all securities, deposits, etcetera. . .)

8. The nationalization of wholesale trade—

It will be noted that that is in the resolution now before the house—commercial organizations:

—and large retail trading enterprises (warehouses, elevators, stores, stocks, etcetera).

9. The repudiation of state debts to foreign and home capitalists.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he has read the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation manifesto?

Mr. MacNICOL: I have already developed it under five different headings.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman should quote the communist manifesto.

Mr. MacNICOL: I gave it a few minutes ago and you can give the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation manifesto if you find it any different from what I have given.

Let me go a little farther in a comparison of communism and C.C.F.-ism. I have here a newspaper clipping dated at London, Ontario, July 20, 1935. It is headed United Front Backs C.C.F. The subheading reads:

Endorsation Given London Candidate for Federal House.

E. O. Hall, C.C.F. candidate in London for the federal election, last night received the endorsation of a United Front conference.

The United Front has been described and pronounced as a communist organization. Later on I shall give a complete list of these organizations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to say that the national and provincial councils of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have distinctly repudiated the proffers of the so-called United Front?

Mr. MacNICOL: I have read that, but the fact remains that your committee in London accepted the backing of the United Front.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no knowledge of that, and I do not believe it is true.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the newspaper quotation. If the hon. member does not believe it, he can obtain the clipping and then have one of his supporters repudiate it when he speaks. I quote from the Toronto Daily Star of September 31, 1935. This report refers to a meeting in East Hamilton, at which reference was made to a handbill which had been distributed there. The report reads:

In discussing the C.C.F. party I would only refer you to the handbill printed in Hamilton by the East Hamilton Communist Association which urges support of the C.C.F. candidate in that constituency. Its heading reads, "Boost a C.C.F. and communist government."

I might add that I had a communist candidate opposing me in my riding, but he finally retired and gave his support to the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation candidate. I quote now from the Toronto Telegram of October 7, 1935. This article refers to a meeting held at Long Branch, and reads:

Reds Welcome to C.C.F.—Candidate Tells Meeting

Major Fred Fish Says Left-wing Groups can join. W. Douglas, Secretary of the Ontario Builders' Association, stated at a C.C.F. mass meeting here last night.

"A communist is a socialist, and the C.C.F. advocates socialism," he stated. "All oppose capitalism and the power of the buccaneers and pirates of industry. There is no great line of differentiation between the three. The tactics they use are slightly different, but at heart they have one thing in common, ...

They whisper that the C.C.F. are linked with the communists. Why shouldn't they be"? demanded Mr. Douglas. "At heart I am a communist and proud of the fact."

"Any left-wing group wishing to come in with us on our terms, which advocates the principles we do, is welcome as far as I'm concerned," Major Fred Fish, candidate for West York, stated.

A large meeting was held in Maple Leaf Gardens, Toronto, on July 5, and the Mail and Empire of July 6 has this to say:

Reds and C.C.F. Join in Protest

A feature of the meeting was the apparent friendliness between the C.C.F. group and the communist members. Reference was made to this by the chairman, A. A. McLeod, president of League Against War and Facism, who expressed pleasure at the presence of so many members of the communist party in the hall. He referred to A. E. Smith as "that distinguished and beloved leader of the movement."

I might mention that the organization referred to here is a communist organization. During the elections I listened to a Co-operative Commonwealth Federation speaker, speaking from the back end of a truck to a number of men working on a roadway in my constituency. With a sweep of his hand he said, "You see all these big plants around here? You elect a C.C.F. government and you will own all these plants." He was referring to half a dozen large plants in that vicinity, in one of which I worked for many years. Those plants could not be taken without violence.

I should like to make one more quotation from the Mail and Empire of December 21, 1935. It reads:

. . . . The Worker, which carries pictures of Mr. and Mrs. Tim Buck and other bolshevist leaders. On the front page of this sheet appears the slogan, "For a united labour slate of C.C.F. and communists."

Apparently these various organizations believe they have the support of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

I should like to place on Hansard a list of the various communist organizations. Many young men and women in Toronto and other centres attend meetings of these organizations without knowing that they are communistic. They thus hear the attacks on capitalism and everything else for which capitalism stands. First, I should like to list those with headquarters in the United States, many of which have branches in Canada. They are:

The Workers' Party
National Student League
Student League for Industrial Democracy
American Student Union
American League Against War and Fascism
American Civil Liberties Union
Brooklyn College Units
The United Front
United Student Movement
Socialist Student League
Friends of the Soviet Union

In Canada we have had:

The Christian Social Order
Free Bread League
National Unemployment Workers' Association
Canadian Labour Defence League
United Front
Workers' Unity League

All these organizations are communistic. I contend that too much communism is being taught by these organizations for the good of this or any other country. The people of Canada are not communistic; they will not have communism, but communism is being taught in this subterranean way. I exonerate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre from any intentions of violence in any manner or form. I should like to remind him that in the great revolutions, such as the French and Russian revolutions, the reformers were quickly overthrown. I believe the hon. member is a sincere reformer; in fact he advocates some reforms with which I can agree. I should like to quote from the program of the Communist International. This program advocates the overthrow of the capitalistic system, and it states:

To achieve this the communist party must secure predominant influence in the broad mass proletarian organizations (soviets, trade unions, factory councils, cooperative societies, sport organizations, cultural organizations, etc.) It is particularly important for the purpose of winning over the majority of the proletariat, to capture the trade unions, which are genuine mass working class organizations closely bound up with the everyday struggles of the working class. To work in reactionary trade unions and skillfully to capture them, to win the confidence of the broad masses of the industrially organized workers, to change and "remove from their posts" the reformist leaders, represent important tasks in the preparatory period.

To a certain extent my hon. friend is a reformist leader. If this program is to be inflicted on this country it can be done only by revolution and violence to which I am opposed. It can be done only in a way similar to the way it was done in Russia and France. Every hon. member knows what happened in France. Mirabeau was an honest reformer, and I believe Danton was honest. Unfortunately Mirabeau died and Danton was guillotined. In his wake came Robespierre, who during four months of the terror sent approximately thirteen or fourteen hundred capitalists and others to the guillotine.

When once a revolution has started, it is impossible to stop it until it has practically run its course. The same thing happened in Russia. I admit that Kerensky, the first reformer, was an honest man, but when the revolution got under way he was removed and in his stead came the red terror which, as my hon. friend knows, sent many thousands to their doom before it had run its course. While I do not believe that any such thing as a red revolution is possible in any British community, I am nevertheless one of those who oppose the continual talking about revolution; I am one of those who oppose exciting the people in that regard.

The communists themselves do not think for a moment that they can be stopped, for in their book Why Communism? they have outlined quite clearly the course to follow. On page 32 they say:

We communists say that there is one way to abolish the capitalist state, and that is to smash it by force. To make communism possible the workers must take hold of the state machinery of capitalism and destroy it.

Violence, of course, is what differentiates C.C.F'ism from communism. I quote again from page 34:

> There is no more unity between the employer and employee than there is between the robber and the robbed. There is a clash of interests. There is an eternal antagonism.

I certainly do not endorse any such doctrine. In my time I have had a good deal to do with both manufacturers and working men, and I have seldom met the type mentioned in this book. The rank and file of employers are honest men who do their best for their employees, and in this regard I was greatly pleased the other day to read in one of the Toronto newspapers an account of a very estimable man who had been employed by the Bertram Engineering Works at Dundas, Ontario for seventy years—Mr. George Turnbull. I went to Hamilton myself to talk to workmen there. I had the great honour of going through the plant with the president, Mr. Bertram, and I want to say here publicly that it gladdened my heart to see the attitude of the men towards the president of that great company. They spoke of him and looked to him as a friend, and this old gentleman, Mr. Turnbull, told me that throughout that long period of seventy years during which he had worked for the company he had always been treated with the greatest respect, I do not agree with the idea that manufacturers and business men are robbers in any general way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say—

Mr. MacNICOL: I must ask the hon. gentleman not to interrupt me here; I have only a few minutes left and there are some other things I should like to say. Let me quote from page 39:

> The Communists were instrumental in organizing the unemployment councils which, together with other workers, fought for every crumb of bread for every employed.

Well, this country has been slowed up by interference on the part of such councils; they have caused no end of harm to the workers, and as a worker of twenty-five years' experience I certainly do not welcome communistic unemployment councils. At page 51 I read:

> We communists say it is the duty of the workers to fight against capitalist terror, against manifestations of fascism, against the oppression of other nations. We say it is in their interests to fight. We appeal to the class interests of the workers and the exploited masses of the population. Stand guard. Offer resistance to capitalist terror. Fight for your right to organize, to assemble, to strike. Break the capitalist dictatorial rules directed against you. Do not submit. Strike back. In unity is your strength.

The encouragement thus held out to men, to dissuade them from assisting honest industry in carrying out its honest purpose, which is to provide employment and if at all possible some return for capital, is a doctrine which should not be advocated in the country or in this house. At page 59:

> A time comes when there is demoralization above, a growing revolt below; the morale of the army is also undermined. The old structure of society is tottering. There are actual insurrections; the army wavers. Panic seizes the rulers. A general uprising begins.

That is the method that is always followed, in the advocating of uprisings. My time is nearly up but there are two more quotations which I wish to read so as to give the house an idea of what the communists think of religion. I am often amazed at the attitude of some clergymen—and I have the highest regard for the clergy; indeed, I often said to myself if I had my life to live over I would be one myself, but I would not be in politics. Of course, every man must decide for himself and I have no reflection to cast on any clergyman who goes into politics; that is his business, not mine. But in the revelations that came out before the congressional commission at Washington in its investigation into communism it appeared that the communists were very strong against religion and all that it stands for. In that connection I would quote two paragraphs from this book. But before I proceed to do so, I must express my surprise at the attitude of certain men in our universities. I am not so much surprised at certain professors, because they usually talk to young men and young women, though of course not many of them advocate unsound theories. I have the highest regard for the majority of them, but we have a few political professors—

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

Mr. MacNICOL: I have no reference to anyone in this house, because hon. gentlemen were invited to come into it. But I have in mind those who in the universities are teaching the rising generation many things along communistic lines which they should not be taught. At page 53 of the Program of the Communist International I read:

> One of the most important tasks of the cultural revolution affecting the wide masses, is the task of systematically and unswervingly combating religion—the opium of the people.

The proletarian government must withdraw all state support from the church, which is the agency of the former ruling class; it must prevent all church interference in state-organized educational affairs, and ruthlessly suppress the counter-revolutionary activity of the ecclesiastical organizations.

Then on page 67:

The mighty social power of the imperialist state, with its auxiliary apparatus—schools, press, theatre and church—is primarily reflected in the existence of confessional and reformist tendencies among the working class, which represent the main obstacles on the road towards the proletarian social revolution. The confessional, religiously tinged tendency among the working class, finds expression in the confessional trade unions, which frequently are directly connected with corresponding bourgeois political organizations and are affiliated to one or other of the church organizations of the dominant class (Catholic trade unions, Young Men's Christian Association, Jewish Zionist organizations, etc.). All these tendencies, being the most striking product of the ideological captivity of certain strata of the proletariat, in most cases, bear a romantic feudal tinge. By sanctifying all the abominations of the capitalist regime with the holy water of religion, and by terrorizing their flock with the spectre of punishment in the world to come, the leaders of these organizations serve as the most reactionary units of the class enemy in the camp of the proletariat.

Now I care not what its denomination may be, the church that is honest in its convictions —and I believe they all have been—has done a great work throughout history, and when I find an organization designed to destroy the church in all countries I am opposed to it. As I said at the outset, I do not believe that my friends to the left are communists, nor do I believe they would advocate violence. On the other hand let me repeat that they cannot continue to talk as they have been talking, stirring up the masses in this country, without causing trouble.

I know a great many things are wrong, and I will support anything that will help make them right. The hon. gentleman mentioned a number of changes that I would support, but revolution is not the way to bring about reform, nor can it be brought about through the destruction of the capitalistic system. I may tell my hon. friends that it is not the capitalistic system that has caused the trouble; it is the violations of the capitalistic system, and these can be wiped out by law. I have no fault to find with the true principles of the capitalistic system; time does not permit me to enumerate them, but they are worthy. I would be prepared to go a long way in order to stop the practices referred to by the hon. gentleman, those violations of the capitalistic system, but I am not prepared to destroy the whole system because some rascals have exploited the public when they should not have been allowed to do so.

I am glad to know that there has been some measure of reform attained in connection with many of the vile stock-market practices to which the hon. gentleman referred. I am ready to support unemployment insurance; I have supported it, and I believe it should be introduced in this ocuntry. I suppose I should not mention it to-day, but I hope that when the supreme court gives its judgment it will be in favour of the principle of unemployment insurance. I would break up the dishonest trusts mentioned by the hon. gentleman. There may be an occasional trust that is financially sound, but I would break up the great trusts that are throttling the workers, and return them to their component parts. I would lower interest rates; they have been too high, but that is not the fault of the capitalistic system. That is something that has been permitted by law, but the law can eradicate that. Then I would do something to save the homes of the workers in the cities, just as we have taken steps to save the farms. I would shorten hours; I would improve working conditions and I would abolish sweat shops. These were permitted under the capitalistic system, but they constitute a violation of that system that never should have been permitted. I would also protect the interests of small business men, to whom the hon. gentleman referred. I agree with him when he says small business has been throttled, but it can be protected by law.

The hon. gentleman mentioned something about the consumers. In England I have read they have a consumers' council, and any one who buys goods for which he thinks he has been overcharged can go before the public prosecutor representing the consumers' council and register his complaint. I would go so far as to advocate something of that nature in this country, so that people who feel that they have been gypped can appeal to a public prosecutor, who will take steps to prosecute whoever has gypped them. I have no doubt that may people are gypped on prices.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would make every effort possible to provide work for the working men. In my time I have had a lot to do with work. I have heard men talk about labour who I know have never had a thing to do with labour. I have had to do with many thousands of working men in my time, and I am only too willing to do everything possible to raise their standards, alleviate their trials and provide work for them. Many men who talk about labour and industry cannot, from their background, have much practical knowledge of what they are dealing with, except possibly from reading. I talk about labour after having served in industry from the bottom to the top, having had to do with many thousands, of working men over a good many years, so I believe I should be able to say something about it.

That is all I have to say for the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I stand by the capitalistic system. I agree, however, that many of its principles have been grossly violated, and I will support any legal measures to eliminate those violations and bring capitalism back to where it was and where it should be, operating in the best interests of all the people.

Mr. POOLE: May I ask the hon. member a question? If he believes so much in the capitalistic system, I should like to ask him why we cannot distribute the goods that we produce.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will answer that question. After the resolution dealing with this matter was debated in this house last session I went home. I went to have a tire on my car repaired; I did not feel disposed to buy a new one, and the garage man said to me, "You did not support the resolution of Mr. Woodsworth in reference to distribution, taking from the rich and giving it to the others." I said, "Never mind repairing my tire; take a new tire off that rack and put it on my car free of charge. You want to distribute other people's goods. I want that new tire put on my car free of charge." He said, "Oh, no, I cannot do that." I said, "You are advocating that grain be taken out of the granaries of the farmers and given freely to those who need food," just as I heard someone advocate the other day that coal should be taken from those who have it and given to those who have none. So I said, "You just take that tire off the rack and put it on my car free of charge; if you believe what you preach you will do it." I do not know the business of my hon. friend who asked me the question, but if he believes in that principle and deals in coal or grain, let him take his coal or grain or whatever it may be and distribute it without charge.

Mr. POOLE: That does not answer my question, and I challenge any member of the government to answer it.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that this is a thought-provoking resolution, and in some ways it was well presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The only feature one might deplore in that presentation is the fact that at times a certain amount of bitterness appeared to be displayed, and I do not believe that is conducive to a really national and constructive spirit in dealing with the very important problems which have to be faced at the moment.

I well remember that during the last campaign our good friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had a great big motto. They depicted the fifty big shots of this dominion, and with hatred and bitterness they tried to spread all through the north, if not through the whole of Canada, the thought that the so-called wealthy men were being absolutely unfair not only to the people but also to the country that had allowed them to amass their wealth. I do not think that sort of thing helps the national situation. I also remember that my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation opponent, who by the way was a personal friend of mine, strongly criticized me because I had the audacity to meet and shake hands for the first time with Mr. Noah Timmins, the genial head of the Hollinger mines. That was the first time I met Mr. Timmins; it was also the last time, because since then he has gone to his reward. At that time I did not think that criticism was worthy of the cooperative commonwealth party.

We should realize that we must be fair not only to all sections of our people but also to the so-called big interests for some of them certainly play the game. Just at this point I should like to allude to a booklet that was issued by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, again dealing with the so-called fifty big shots. I must tell my hon. friend the leader of that party that personally I have never had an opportunity of meeting any of these big shots, but judging by the booklet members of his party must have fraternized with them a good deal for they want to create the impression that they know them. In this booklet, which is entitled Who Owns Canada, at page 12 the fifty big shots are enumerated, with their names, their places of birth, their ages, their professions, their religious denominations, their education, their bank directorships and the total assets of the corporations with which they are connected. If my addition is not in error, according to this statement these fifty big shots control some $97,000,000,000 of wealth. It seems incredible that any such statement should be made by a party supposed to be working for universal suffrage and hoping to be given the political leadership of this country.

Everyone who is familiar with the economic affairs of this dominion or who follows the publications of the bureau of statistics realizes that our national wealth does not amount to $25,000,000,000 but in this booklet just for the sake of exaggeration these fifty big shots are said to command $97,000,000,000. Such statements are absolutely unfair, and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has overstepped the mark in bringing out that old war horse during the last by-election campaign in Assiniboia, accusing the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of being in the pay of the Standard Oil and under the guidance of the so-called big shots when he went to Washington during the great war. That statement is libellous and they know it. A discussion of this nature is bound to do some good as long as we keep within the confines of truth, but wild statements such as these will not bring about a realization of all our dreams and a solution of our deep and multiple problems. Everyone wants prosperity and happiness; we want to do away with sharp practices, dishonesty and all the other evils that were revealed by the price spreads commission, and the present government has fully grasped the situation and is going to take action to correct the shortcomings shown by that commission as far as our commerce, finance and industry are concerned.

It is not my intention to single out any industry, but an allusion was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the sorry plight of the retail trade. I can speak of that with knowledge because I happen to belong to that calling. No doubt we have sinned ourselves. Take my own case; when we turned our business into a limited company we had $65,000 on our own books as credit extended to our customers. Most of them are honest. On the other hand in many cases customers do not want to pay for goods they have received. I must state here that we saw that none of our customers ever went hungry. Sharp practices are not confined to any class of the population. It is an impressive ceremony when we open every sitting of the house with the Lord's prayer. I believe in the full application of that divine prayer lies the solution of all our problems. In a former session the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) mentioned the great lessons to be learned from the sermon on the mount, and the great fundamental principles that were then enunciated are just as alive to-day as they were then. It is doubtless true that the wealthy people of this country have sinned against the present social order, but it might do some good to look at matters fairly and recognize that the so-called other classes of people have at times sinned also.

I have listened many times to hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group building up a case on behalf of a cooperative commonwealth federation by singling out a particular case of misery and want, but I also could build up a case, showing that some of the misery is not always caused by the present social order. During last Easter recess I happened to be at my home on Good Friday and a settler whom I have known for a number of years came to me and said, "Joe, I have already received $30 direct relief in April, but it is all gone and I need $30 more to carry me through the month, because I have a wife and seven children. I telephoned the relief officer and he gave this man another $30. This was Good Friday. On Saturay night this father of a family was in gaol; every cent of that money given to help his wife and children was spent by himself for liquor. It is all very well to make a case against the so-called big shots and to single them out, but we have to live under the present order. I know I am on dangerous ground when making such a statement, and it might not be very popular, but duty compels me to tell the truth. All classes of our people have to some extent sinned and in some degree are responsible for the present situation.

My hon. friends want to bring about a new order. During the last election campaign I was interrupted by a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation adherent. I said to him, "What are you going to do while you are building up your new order? You want to destroy the present capitalistic system and put in a better one." He said, "Yes, we are going to have a working man's government." But when a man is elected to parliament, whether he is a minister or a professional man or a farmer or a mechanic, no matter what occupation he may have been engaged in, he has to leave it for months if not for a number of years while he occupies his seat in the House of Commons, so surely in this chamber we are all, in the full sense of the term, working men. We all want to see the present anomalies and injustices—and they are very numerous—done away with. I do not hold any brief for the capitalistic system or for any individual capitalists, but this system is not the result of pure hazard; it has not been built up over night it has developed out of the experience of human beings during the centuries, yes, for thousands of years. It reflects the aspirations, the passions, the vices, the infirmities and, indeed all the qualities of humankind. No one doubts that it needs reform, but no one will dare to say that nationalization of all our social and economic and industrial activity is the simple formula that will solve all our problems. These problems are not peculiar to Canada; they affect the whole civilized world.

Let me refer for a moment to one line of activity that is supposed to be nationalized in Ontario. I do not say this in a disparaging way. Is nationalization always fair to the people? I say no. Ontario has had public ownership of hydro for nearly thirty years, but in northern Ontario, although we have contributed a large share to the provincial treasury to help the hydro commission in the southern section of the province, we have to depend upon private capital and private enterprise for the development of the great water powers of our northern section, and even to-day new mines do not get their power from the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission but the risk has to be taken by private enterprise. We in northern Ontario have paid to some extent—and we are supposed to be glad to do so—towards the millions of dollars supplied by the provincial treasury to bonus rural lines to the well-to-do farmers and to furnish power to the industries in the southern section of the province. I mention this in order that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may see that even nationalization is not always fair to all sections of the population.

The same state of affairs is shown by the present radio situation. When the bill for national control of radio was brought in I voted for it with both hands because I believed then and believe now that great national service should belong to the people. Perhaps I was selfish to some extent, because I realized that in the larger centres of population like Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, etcetera, they were getting good radio service under private ownership, and I am sorry to say now that under nationalization of the radio—and that service will be extended to everyone—the people of northern Ontario and Quebec, although they have to pay $2 a year for a licence, are even yet not getting the service to which we are absolutely entitled.

Governments have all the infirmities and vices of human beings and very few of their good qualities. History teaches that lesson to whoever wants to read it. Some public services, such as the Department of Justice, are clearly subjects for national control; no one would think of having the administration of justice left to private initiative and enterprise. The same applies to the post office, public health and national defence. But surely it was never intended under British institutions, with the mentality of the British nations, that the government should take control of all industrial and economic activity and the supply of all social wants; such a situation would be absolutely impracticable and is foreign to the thought of the Canadian people. We all remember what happened in England, the great revolution brought about following the middle of the last century by the invention of steam power. Can anyone visualize what would have happened if when the steam engine was invented, the British parliament had nationalized its development and had invested hundreds of millions of pounds so as to develop that new invention? Further, can anyone visualize what would have happened and what attitude the government would have taken when some time later the internal combustion engine and electric motive power were invented? Do hon. members think for one moment that the government would have been elastic enough, after having invested hundreds of millions of dollars in the steam engine, to throw that money away, scrap all its antiquated machinery and take on the development of the later invention, as private enterprise has done? No, because such matters are governmentally and humanly impossible. I suggest these are points worth remembering when we are discussing matters of this kind.

I well remember that during the session of 1934, in a discussion of the bullion tax mentioned in the budget, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose in his place and suggested that we should nationalize gold mining in Canada. I asked him some questions when, later on, I spoke on the budget debate. First I asked him what gold mining he was going to nationalize, those on a dividend basis or those not on a dividend basis. What about new ventures? What about prospecting? What about new finds? I remember well what happened in Ontario in the great silver camp at Cobalt years ago when the provincial government decided to try to control one of the silver mines. That effort was one of the greatest failures we have known, and I believe the principle applying in that instance would apply to any government going beyond its proper activities.

The work of a government is not creative; in my opinion its duties and powers are legislative. Can any hon. member visualize governments, wherever they may be, in the provinces or here at Ottawa, inventing developments of steam engines or radio? Can anyone visualize a government creating and bringing up to its present perfection the great automotive industry in Canada? No; the primary duty of a government is to take accomplished facts, and on those facts to build up and to legislate for the happiness and prosperity of the nation it governs. The minute we establish a bureaucracy—and I am using the word in its full sense—and the moment we have full authority in all matters, economic, industrial, social and financial, then what will become of the individualism of the British people? I say that we shall become merely automatons.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has often pointed to the great prosperity of Russia. He must know the horrible price the Russians have paid for that measure of prosperity. The trouble has been that some of their reforms have been made too quickly; the people of that country have been too impatient, too ruthless. When I hear of a bacteriologist dealing with bacteria and germs in carrying out his experiments and learn that those germs are killed by the millions and billions I do not worry very much and I am inclined to believe they rather like it. When I hear that a biologist is experimenting on dogs and sheep and learn that those animals have lost their lives in the process of experimentation then I begin to worry a great deal. But when I see new experiments on new social systems, when I find that those performing the experiments, those using the knives of vivisection, are using them not on dogs or sheep or germs, but on human beings, and when I see the state of affairs in Spain, Germany and Russia, where hundreds of thousands of human lives have been lost in these new social experiments, I begin to shiver, and highly protest against such experiences.

In beginning my observations to-day I said some good could come from a discussion of this subject. In these times no one is in a position to stand on a pinnacle and say: Because I am wealthy and because this world has been good to me I am away from all the backwaters and the turmoil of the depression. That man must come down into the valley and see what the people are suffering, what are their aspirations, what they expect. The same principle applies to the people living in the valley. To some extent and in some way all of us must realize that we have a duty to perform towards ourselves and towards the state. Unfortunately however those great problems will never be solved by extreme radicalism, advanced socialism or communism, because, as the previous speaker (Mr. MacNicol) has said, no matter how much the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation tries to divorce itself from the communist party it cannot do so. I watched the operations of that party in the Kirkland lake section during the last campaign, and I came to the one logical conclusion, namely, that socialization has only one result and that result is a state of communism.

As I stated before, the time is not ripe, and I hope will never be, to have socialism in Canada. Some great duties have to be performed. Only a few days ago I listened with a great deal of interest to a good speech delivered by Sir Edward Beatty in which he stated that the business men of Canada must be ready and willing to sacrifice, to realize fully their duty and obligations; they must listen to the murmurs of the people, attempt to cooperate with them to the greatest extent and come down from their high estate.

During the last five years every section of our population has been seriously affected by the depression. During the first two years, however, some people thought they were specially privileged. But the longer the depression lasted the more pronounced was the decrease in the number of privileged ones. The question before us is not so much that of the destruction of personal initiative nor that of the equalization of wealth, but rather one of a better distribution of wealth and the application of those economic and Christian principles whereby we may do away with poverty. No one can be spared from the strenuousness of the present times. There used to be a time when it was considered that poverty was a necessity, but to-day under a capitalistic system and due to human inventiveness poverty could be destroyed throughout the world. What we want to do is to bring it to the point where the so-called common people will have full rights of citizenship and access to the good things in life, with drastic changes in our present distribution system.

I have no time this afternoon to propound certain theories that I have in mind, but again I appeal to the house that in a discussion of a resolution such as this we must try to remain within the truth, and not endeavour to set one section of the country against another. I believe the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation wants to be fair, but is he acting like a true Canadian when he tries to impute to every wealthy man in Canada an unfair attitude towards those less fortunate? That is not always the case. A few days ago the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) referred to reforms which had been accomplished by one of the larger corporations of the city of Montreal. He indicated that they had made amendments to their method of procedure with effects beneficial not only to their own customers but to themselves.

I can well remember when three years ago in northern Ontario we had a lumbermen's and bushmen's strike. On that occasion I went to the manager of a big corporation and said, "You are not playing the game with the men who are working for you; you are not giving them fair wages; you are not giving them decent living quarters; you are selling your goods at too high a price, and I must remind you that you are not in the retail trade, but in the lumber business. You should sell your goods to your working men at least at cost." A year ago last fall we had some trouble again in the Cochrane and Iroquois Falls section. I went to one point at which a strike had been called and to which strike breakers had been sent. Upon that occasion I found that the men had been given a decent living; that they had a reading room; that they were satisfied with the food, and that they had an opportunity at least once a week to state through their own organizations their grievances before the heads of the company. You could not take those men away. Some of them had been working for that company for two years, were absolutely satisfied with their lot and would not go on strike.

This is not the time for those corporations to make enormous profits, but it is time for those men in elevated positions to come down from their high pedestals and attempt to understand the Canadian people and find out what their aspirations may be. I must repeat however that the solution will never, never be found in rash measures. It will never be found in a policy which makes automatons of the Canadian people. Can we visualize the advancement of the British empire if government had been supreme in matters of private interest? It is true that at the present time we have sufficient machinery to do the work we require to do, and if we apply it properly, do away with all sharp practices. The hon. member for East Kootenay stated that the price spreads inquiry disclosed that some concerns were selling their products on short weights. There are laws as old as the hills on the statute books of Canada and on those of all civilized countries stating that giving short weight is contrary to law. It is a criminal offence, and there is certainly nothing new about it. We are not so much in need of new laws to place on our statute books, so far as that point is concerned, as of the fuller application of the laws we have. Certainly we have sufficient machinery to make these people act fairly, and we must deal with them more drastically and make them more aware of their duty to the public.

May I repeat that I believe some thanks ought to be given to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for affording this opportunity to members of parliament to deal with problems facing us at the present time. Faced with these great problems some people would tell us that we should not even smile, but we must smile, Mr. Speaker, even in times of stress because we are struggling towards something better. These are times to cultivate courage and fortitude. Even during the war humanity found it possible to go forward. There is no doubt that we have been suffering along with the other peoples of the world, but we are seized of the exact situation and are endeavouring to go to the root of the trouble. We must not be impatient, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must remember that if a new socialistic state were erected in Canada to-morrow he would still have our present day problems on his hands and they cannot be solved overnight or by a miracle. Spain became impatient a few years ago and turned to a socialistic experiment. So did France over a century ago when the slogan was equality, liberty and fraternity. What kind of fraternity had they? The fraternity of the guillotine. What kind of equality had they? The equality of the graveyard, and conscription in the army. And so far as freedom is concerned their armies had to face the rest of Europe. About the same thing happened in Russia.

I listened very attentively to the address of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. He said that if he were in power he would not socialize the land, but, Mr. Speaker, if you socialize industry, the financial institutions and the economic life of the country, there is only one thing that the farmers will get, and that is the nationalization of the land; you cannot get away from it. That is what happened in Russia, and that point is worth considering.

I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He has done a lot of good in many ways; he has blazed the trail in some directions. but sometimes one can overstep the mark and undo the good work that has been done in the past. I have no advice to give him because he has had a larger experience than I have, but I would say that to pit one class against another is not conducive to a healthy national situation in our country. Rather do I believe in the adherence of mutual respect and closer co-operation on the part of all classes and all walks of life, young and old, wealthy and poor, because the goal to reach, although hard, is worthy of attainment.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, reading over the resolution standing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), I find it says:

> That, in the opinion of this house, industrial, commercial and financial organizations and undertakings that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities and operated as public services or cooperative enterprises.

I do not see anything very alarming in that wording. I am always interested in the eloquence of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bradette) but I would suggest that he do not exercise himself unduly over the radicalism of this resolution. It seems to me a very sensible and certainly not too radical resolution, and I want to address myself more particularly to the latter portion of it relating to cooperative enterprises.

These resolutions spring upon one, and I am more and more coming to the conclusion that the only way to be able to speak to them is to have a lot of speeches already prepared and put away in cold storage. I have not got around to doing that, and so I cannot make in any sense a prepared speech. But increasingly I am coming to believe in the cooperative approach to the solution of many of our Canadian problems.

For a long time we have heard with a great deal of interest of the success of cooperative producers' societies in Denmark and Sweden, and of cooperative consumers' societies in Great Britain, but it is only recently that we have found in Canada examples that promise to have the strength and inspiration of the Danish and British experiments. We have in this country a very interesting organization called the Cooperative Union, which seeks to bind together all the consumer cooperatives and to carry on educational work among them. In their publication of January this year I find this statement on the front page, which puts the aim of the cooperative movement better than I could unaided:

> We must seek to show that all our institutions, no matter how splendid and no matter how proud we may be of having played a part in their creation, are merely a means to an end. The end is the freeing of men and women from economic and social thraldom.

That is putting it very well. Everyone must admit that our economic system has caused economic and social slavery, and I do not think anyone in the house would care to defend the conditions we have at the moment when we see on the one hand great wealth, and on the other extreme poverty which is causing decay and degradation. Even those who are most keen for the capitalistic system—and I am not one of them—must pause before they eulogize it as it has been working out these last few years.

Now I want to speak for a moment on the cooperative movement in Denmark and of their educational system launched by such well known men as Grundtvig and Kold. Only last week a leader in the Folk School movement, Doctor Peter Mannicke, visited this city. I am sorry to say that in the capital of Canada he had an audience of little more than two hundred people to hear his inspirational address. Nevertheless the Danes have done tremendous things in awakening the spirit of their people to unselfish and idealistic living. Our new governor general made a speech at Upper Canada College in Toronto the day before yesterday, in which he used these words, "A college should not only turn out gentlemen but aristocrats," and he defined an aristocrat as one who seeks to give more to life than he takes from it. The Danes have been doing that for a long time. They have been turning out aristocrats until to-day they might almost be said to be a nation of aristocrats in the sense that they seek to give to life more than they take from it. And the bread they have cast upon the waters has returned to them one hundredfold. They have built up their country to the point where it evokes our admiration.

The story of Denmark is quite familiar, but I think it would not hurt to take a moment to say that they have in that country 1,388 cooperative dairies, representing ninety per cent of the farms and eighty-six per cent of the cows, and the turnover in 1932 was $116,000,000. They own and control sixty-one cooperative bacon factories representing seventy per cent of the farms and seventy-five per cent of the hogs, and in 1932 the turnover was $95,000,000. They have 700 cooperative egg-collecting stations, representing twenty per cent of the farms and twenty-five per cent of the hens, and the turnover in 1932 was $3,500,000. One could go all the way through and mention their cooperative efforts in other commodities, their credit associations and their units of consumer cooperatives.

Mr. DUNNING: That splendid work in Denmark could not be described as socialistic, could it? It is cooperative effort on a capitalistic plan.

Miss MACPHAIL: Shall I read the resolution again? The last three words of it refer to cooperative enterprises.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought the hon. member was referring to Denmark.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think cooperation that functions in the interests of the people so organized, is not capitalistic in the sense in which I defined capitalism.

Mr. DUNNING: It certainly is not socialistic.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think it is another approach to socialism even if it is not state dominated. It is socialistic in the sense that it serves the people rather than creates profits for the benefit of the few.

Mr. DUNNING: It certainly serves two—

Miss MACPHAIL: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is a very fine speaker and possibly later on, he will make his speech to which I shall enjoy listening.

Sweden has given us an example which I believe will interest hon. members. During the campaign I noticed an article which I was glad to cut out because during a time like that we are glad to read anything that is at all sane. This reads:

> A considerable measure of public ownership, plus highly developed cooperative organizations, have combined to save Sweden from the worst effects of the economic crisis which is devastating purely capitalistic countries. An experiment in a managed currency, and a strong trades unionist movement, are other factors.

The article then goes on to show how the activities of these organizations had saved the people of Sweden from the worst results of the world depression. The power of the cooperative movement was shown by one instance. A great salt manufacturing establishment in Great Britain had never paid union wages to its workers in spite of the fact that the workers had striven very hard to get such wages through organization and other methods. They finally communicated their difficulty to the Swedish Cooperative Wholesale Society, which happened to be the largest customer of the salt manufacturing establishment. The cooperative society told the manufacturing plant that if it did not agree to pay union wages to its workers they would cancel all their present orders and would give no future ones. The result was that union wages were paid. This shows that economic power is the greatest power, and this is something that all radicals should remember To give some comfort to the Minister of Finance, I might say that Sweden is now contemplating state trading in gasoline, oil and coffee.

We have heard much of the cooperatives in Great Britain. Most of us know the story of the early pioneers who started in an almost insignificant and undignified manner. To-day there is a membership of something like 7,000,000 people, a little better than one-half of the families in Great Britain belonging to cooperative societies of one kind or another. When cooperation becomes as extensive as that one can see its power. In addition to retail and wholesale consumer activities, the cooperatives in Great Britain have subsidiary activities such as banking, insurance, shipping, printing and publishing, newspapers and so on.

Mr. DUNNING: True cooperation.

Miss MACPHAIL: Just about as far as anything could be from some of the organizations with which the Minister of Finance has lately been associated. I had feared that Canadians did not possess the right mentality or outlook for cooperation similar to that practised by the British or the Scandinavian people. However, I came across a very interesting book outlining the cooperative activities being carried on in the constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough. I should like to have heard the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) eulogize this experiment rather than myself. Some years ago I met Doctor M. M. Coady who, with two other associates, was the originator of this great educational and cooperative movement. The university of St. Francis Xavier has turned itself into a great leader of the people in the eastern section of Nova Scotia. This university has not considered itself as a place where a few people could go to receive the advantages of the accumulated learning of the ages; it has considered itself a school which should give leadership to all the countryside, towns and villages as well as the open country. Reverend J. J. Tompkins, Professor A. B. MacDonald and Doctor M. M. Coady were the three people who had most to do with the organization of this great experiment in adult education and cooperation. I should like to read a short statement by Doctor Gustav Francis Beck of the Carnegie Foundation. Speaking before the school for the blind in Halifax, Doctor Beck said:

> You have a set-up in this province in Antigonish at St. Francis Xavier University, which in my opinion, is the boldest and most constructive attempt to conquer the depression, that is going on anywhere in the world.... In eastern Nova Scotia is one of the most amazing example of adult education ever undertaken anywhere.

That statement should make the people of Antigonish and of Nova Scotia very proud. This cooperative movement was not launched hurriedly. For five years an intensive educational campaign was carried on. Mass meetings were addressed by Doctor Coady, followed by Professor MacDonald who specialized in organization. Small study groups of from five to fifteen people were formed and these were helped by the extension department of the university. A local leader was chosen who conducted the meetings which were held week by week, but every four weeks someone from the university would come and address a meeting of the study groups in some central place. This work was carried on for a considerable time before cooperatives were finally formed. By that time the people had some idea of the obstacles which would have to be overcome. They had the longer view of cooperation and were not expecting great results to occur immediately. After much study there have been set up in that district nineteen lobster factories and fish plants. They started with three which were increased to twelve, then to seventeen and then to nineteen. They have eighteen stores and buying clubs. The credit unions number forty-five. The study groups number 940 with a steady and regular attendance of 8,460. Four hundred and fifty general meetings were held with an attendance of 27,000. Before that there was at Sydney Mines a great cooperative known as the British Canadian cooperative. It began in 1907 with a capital of $343, and had in 1929 a turnover of $1,750,000. It now owns a store with four branches, a bakery, a pasteurized milk plant, and a tailoring establishment, and undoubtedly this furnished the inspiration that led to the setting-up of a number of consumers' cooperatives. But they did some other rather remarkable things, among them these: They pooled their orders for fertilizers, with a saving of $75,000 in three seasons, and from the head of the lakes they chartered a ship with flour and feed, whereby they believe they saved $8,000. But the point I want to make is that they did not embark on the whole enterprise with the idea that it was only a material undertaking; what they set out to do was to study the needs of the people and the way in which those needs could be met. In this experiment at Antigonish, led by the university of St. Francis Xavier, they have kept the people and the needs of the people foremost, everything else having revolved round that central idea.

I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I believe that is his ideal. While hon. members may not agree with him—and sometimes I do not—I have never doubted that what he does seek to do is to serve the people in the best possible way. He hopes that to them will come happier days, and ultimately a time when all the people will have access to the learning and to the amenities that are now the privilege of the few.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who introduced the resolution were here I would compliment him upon the moderation with which on this occasion he discussed it, and also the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who followed him in much the same vein, though his views were diametrically opposed to those of the mover. I should like also to compliment the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) who continued the debate on a very high plane. It would be out of place, of course, for me to attempt in any way to read a lesson to the house, but while the hon. member for Cochrane was speaking it did occur to me that, since every hon member, regardless of party, has a sincere wish to deal with these difficulties and evils which have crept into our social system, if we could carry on our debates giving each other credit for sincerity and a desire to cooperate for the good of all the people of this country, perhaps we might escape the sometimes justifiable criticism that some of the newspapers direct against hon. members because of little bickerings which occasionally take place in this chamber.

The adoption of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would in my opinion have very far-reaching effects; in fact I do not think my hon. friend would deny that it would be preliminary to, if not the first instalment of, the creation or introduction of the new social order which he has been advocating for a good many years. The resolution states that concentration of economic power has failed to provide security and decent standards of living for many of our people. I take it that in these words he has meant to express both cause and effect, and that the reason why many people are not able to maintain a decent standard of living is this concentration of economic power. Then the hon. member proposes, as a cure, that where financial, industrial or commercial organizations fail to function in the public interest they should be taken over by the government and operated as public services or cooperative enterprises.

I imagine that there is no member of the house who will not admit that there are great concentrations of capital in this country; nor, I think, will anyone say that in some instances at least, although not in so many as a number of hon. gentlemen have stated, this economic power or concentration of capital is not sometimes applied, contrary to the public interest. But I cannot follow my hon. friend when he goes so far as to suggest that the proper remedy is to socialize these enterprises and industries. After all, the whole issue contained in the resolution, in its essence, is how we shall deal with the evils which have been spoken of and which are admitted, I think, by practically everyone; whether they shall be corrected by way of the introduction of the socialistic state, which is what this ultimately means, or whether we shall employ some other remedy such as the correction of our present system where we find it to be wrong.

Without discussing the principle at the moment I would say that if the resolution were adopted and we were to act on it there surely would be a good many practical difficulties in working out the scheme. In the first place I imagine there would be decided differences of opinion as to when any organization might be regarded as not functioning in the public interest. But let us suppose we did agree that a certain organization was not functioning in the public interest, just where would we start if we attempted to apply the remedy proposed here? We will say, for example, that it is decided and agreed that a great departmental store in Toronto or Montreal or elsewhere is not functioning in the public interest. Under the resolution the government would have to step in, take over the whole business and conduct it, not temporarily but permanently. Or we will say that a great industrial organization, perhaps a steel company, or a coal company in the maritimes or in western Canada, or one of the chartered banks or perhaps a chain of stores, is declared to be conducted in a way contrary to the public interest. We then would be obliged to take over these isolated enterprises and operate them, as I said before, not temporarily but permanently, as public enterprises. It seems to me that would be entirely impractical. I think someone once said that a state cannot exist half slave and half free, and the ultimate result of taking over isolated businesses of this kind would be either that they would revert to private ownership or all would have to be socialized. I do not think there would be any escape from that. I dread to think of many of the lame ducks that probably would fall under the control and operation of the government.

The hon. member made no suggestion as to how the acquisition of these concerns would be financed. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) would have some questions to ask as to just where the money would come from, but I should like to know from my hon. friend whether in fact these enterprises when taken over by the government would be paid for. I recall that during last session, when my hon. friends of the Coperative Commonwealth Federation were advocating their cause, I spoke to one member of that group, a gentleman for whom I have a very high regard, and said, "You are now asking the people of this country to place you in power. It is therefore fair to ask you what you propose to do in carrying out your policy and just exactly how you would begin." "Well," he said, "we would begin by nationalizing the essential industries of the country." I did not press him to state what he regarded as being the essential industries of the country, but I did say, "Would it be your intention to pay for these industries?" "Yes," he said, "we would pay for them and then we would tax it out of them again." So much with regard to the financing of this proposition.

I would have a certain sympathy for the resolution if it did not go as far as it does, and that is the chief criticism I have to direct against it. I can conceive of a situation where to take over the operation of an essential industry, employing perhaps hundreds or thousands of men, which industry was using its powers to crush its working men or to take undue profits out of the consumers, might be worthy of consideration by a government. If in the exercise of its powers such an industry decided to close its shop or to have a lockout on the premises I can imagine it might be in the public interest and in the interest of the employees of that concern that the government should temporarily take over and operate such a business, but only until such time as an investigation could be held and the matter satisfactorily adjusted.

Something has been said about public ownership. After all, though all may not agree with me, I believe that what we call cooperation, cooperative societies and other organizations under public ownership, are a development of the socialistic principle, and I see nothing wrong in designating it in that way. My views as to public ownership are pretty well known in the house. On many occasions I have stated my belief in the value and propriety of public ownership with regard to great public utilities. I have always been of opinion that those great public services upon which depend the prosperity and convenience of great masses of the people and which lend themselves very readily to the purposes of monopoly, should be controlled if not owned by the people themselves. In this country we have made considerable progress in the way of public ownership. In the municipalities, especially in Ontario, the people usually own their gas and electric light plants, waterworks, street railways; in the provincial field we have the hydro; we have liquor stores and certain other enterprises, and in the dominion we have gone into public ownership on a rather large scale which I need not specify. And I do not anticipate for a moment that we shall stand still in that connection; I believe still further progress may be made.

While there is criticism, especially at this time, in connection with some great public enterprises which I need not mention, and abuses have arisen in connection with them and the principle of public ownership is blamed for the partial failure, that is no proof that the principle itself is wrong. There are those who seem to think that public ownership is a cure for all the abuses that may exist under private ownership. I am not a believer in that. Those who say that public ownership is a perfect system are only deceiving themselves and perhaps others. My mind is still quite open with regard to further development of the public ownership principle. In recent years—perhaps not during this session, and I am rather surprised at that—we have heard a good deal about the benefits of individualism, the term "rugged," usually being added, and it is praised as a very desirable thing. People say that governments should keep their hands out of business; that what business wants is less orders from governments and more orders from customers. To some extent I believe in that principle. Personal liberty is very precious; surely everyone must agree that a reasonable degree of personal liberty is one of the greatest possessions of the people of any civilized democracy, and it is something we shall not lightly give up, even for the satisfying of a theory. But in saying that I would also say that in some cases government intervention in business is an absolute necessity and duty.

What form should this intervention take? My hon. friend and his party suggest that it should take the form of the establishment of a socialistic state. Others believe that public ownership should be confined pretty well to the operation of public utilities, and that so far as other business is concerned, business which can best be carried on by personal attention and personal initiative and the element of profit if you like, we ought to confine ourselves to the correction of abuses which arise under private ownership rather than seek a complete change in our social order. That is my thought. But I emphasize again that there are occasions—and they exist to-day I believe—when it becomes the duty of government to intervene if a great business organization takes advantage of its power to oppress its workers or exploit the consumer. And if we have not statutes which enable the government to intervene—I do not know whether we have or not—it becomes the duty of government to enact such laws so that it can cope with the situation.

That is really all I have to say on the matter. Conditions may change with the progress of time, but I still believe it is worth while not to upset the system under which we live, but to make an earnest effort to correct the abuses by action of parliament. It may be that some day the views of my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will meet with public approval in Canada. I go so far as to say that they will grow in strength if governments do not recognize that it is their duty to make earnest and successful efforts to cope with the evils of which my hon. friend complains. This government has every intention of meeting its obligations in that regard. I do not think the people of this country are ready to go to the extent of the measures proposed by my hon. friend, though I believe he proposes them in all sincerity. For the reasons I have given I would say that the government cannot accept the resolution.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In rising to speak to this resolution may I say first that I appreciate the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) in his endeavour to cooperate with all parties in a constructive program. I wish also to commend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Woods-worth) for his efforts towards the betterment of human society. Whether his views are in accord with our own way of thinking is a different matter, but constructive criticism at all times makes for the good of mankind, which is what we are after. However I do not think a debate on C.C.F.-ism versus Conservatism or Socialism is a very constructive attitude to take in the house. We are all of opinion I am sure that conditions should be rectified, and it is for that purpose that I stand here now to offer a suggestion or two on this question of the socialization of industry. Personally I am, and I think my party are, adverse to the socialization of industry. We see no advantage in that.

Turning to the resolution, it begins by saying:

> Whereas, the concentration of economic power in the hands of a comparatively small and irresponsible group has failed to provide security and a decent standard of living for large numbers of our people;

So far I believe the resolution is quite correct. Through concentration of economic power we have arrived at the disastrous condition that we find ourselves in to-day, and if we concentrate our efforts on that one point I think it would improve our chances of success and be for the betterment of all. Then there is the remaining part:

> That, in the opinion of this house, industrial, commercial and financial organizations—

I should like to omit financial organizations for a moment in my argument—> —and undertakings that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities and operated as public services or cooperative enterprises.

That part I do not agree with; I think it is wrong. I admire the courage of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; it takes courage to stand up and express your ideas, whether right or wrong. But we do not agree with the socialization of industry for various reasons. The suggestion conveyed is that industry is at fault. The function of industry is to produce, and I think if we look over our industrial system we find that production is not at fault. I think all hon. members will agree with me when I say that we are producing an abundance of goods; the fault does not lie there. The very fact that in the west we have a large number of cattle which we cannot consume and must ship to the United States to be consumed there shows emphatically that we are not suffering from lack of production of stock in the west; there can be no doubt about that.

Then, we are not suffering from lack of production of coal; we have plenty of it in the west. We are not suffering for want of many commodities which we produce in western Canada. What we are suffering from is the fact that we cannot exchange those products for articles produced in the east. I believe the greatest concern in connection with industrial control lies in manufacturing; that is one of the industrial matters with which we are most seriously concerned. If we look at the industrial field we find no lack of goods produced; in fact some industries are so well equipped with modern machinery that they have to close down because they cannot get rid of the goods they are producing. Production is efficient, and we cannot say that the fault lies with production. Whatever the fault may be I think it does not lie there. Only a few days ago in this city of Ottawa I was in one of the dairies where they had introduced a new machine which would displace eight men. So we see that by the introduction of modern machinery it is possible to produce much more than we are producing, and therein does not lie the difficulty.

The fault does not lie with our people here in Canada, although many of the unemployed were told last year that they would not work if they were given an opportunity. I beg to differ with that statement, because I believe the majority of people unemployed are not of that calibre; they have endeavoured to their utmost to gain employment. So, if lack of manpower is a factor, then we have no difficulty in that regard. That, however, is not the difficulty. Speaking of unemployment I am reminded that not many days ago a job was advertised over in Hull, and so many people applied for it that it was necessary to call out the police to keep the crowds back. In a short time the job was filled, and such a large crowd had assembled that the police had to be used to keep the people away. Under those conditions you cannot say that the unemployed would not work if they had the opportunity. The fault does not lie there.

I believe, sir, the difficulty with which we are faced to-day is one of distribution. Having heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am convinced that he is sincere in his endeavours to ameliorate these conditions to the best of his ability. That is his problem, and I wish him well in his work. I repeat, however, that the difficulty arises in connection with the distribution of the goods. If the government can devise a way to distribute those goods—and they are going to endeavour to do so—then, to a great extent, they have solved the difficulty. In fact, if they can work out a method whereby they can distribute the goods we produce I believe I may state definitely that they have solved the difficulty. The very fact that we are shipping goods out of Canada when we have hundreds of people in this district suffering from starvation and requiring food and shelter is significant that our difficulty does not lie abroad; it is right here in our own country. That is where we must cultivate our market, before we look to outside markets. Does it not seem ridiculous to attempt to obtain foreign markets for our wheat when there are people in this city who do not consume as much wheat as they could consume?

Only last Saturday a young fellow came to my door, and he was not a bum, by any manner of means. He did not have a place to sleep, or anything to eat. Thinking he might be one of those whom I had heard described, namely, one of the men who would not work if given the opportunity, I called the mayor of this city and asked him about the case of this young man. He told me that there were several cases like that, cases of young men who were very much in need. He suggested that I telephone the Union Mission and, taking his advice, I telephoned as directed. I learned that the story the young man had told me was true. We arranged to get a bed for him that night, and he told me that he would be only too willing to go out to work. This type of men should be cared for and should not be forced to accept charity, when we have in Canada many men who, while they do not, from the standpoint of either manual or mental labour, earn the money they receive, yet receive large dividends. I am not blaming them for that. I do however blame the system under which that condition of affairs can exist.

The distribution of goods is the one evil with which we have to contend; it is an evil which does not lie with the producers. It is not the fault of the producers that distribution is not effective. The only purpose of a producing plant is to produce goods. If the producers received a fair commission for their work I do not think, as the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) has said, they would begrudge a portion of the profits going to the suffering people. Whether he be a rich or a poor man, if he were at all intelligent he would not endeavour to rob the common people, a procedure which in the long run would not be to his advantage. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, we cannot expect to carry on in a country which is half slaves and half free men and we must admit, sir, that the unemployed people are practically slaves. I do not know in what other way they could be described. In that regard, therefore, the minister and I are in full accord when we agree that we cannot carry on a government in this or any other country unless we change that system, and change it right away. I am sure he has a very strenuous task on his hands.

I said a moment ago that the producers were not to blame. I believe it would be safe to say that the producers do not own the goods they produce. That statement may sound a little absurd on the surface, but in the majority of cases the producers are producing goods on borrowed money, and if they cannot sell those goods to consumers they must go bankrupt. I believe that is sufficiently clear, and it is also clear that they do not even own the goods they produce. They did not intend to own them. They could not eat all the goods they produced; they could not wear all the shoes they produced, and in the final analysis those goods belong to the people; the consumers own them. Unless those consumers are provided with purchasing power—and I do not care in what form you have it—unless they are provided with purchasing power, I cannot see how we shall solve the difficulty. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government, or any other body, can put that power into the hands of the people, possibly through public works or through developments in industry, they have solved the difficulty. They have promised the people of Canada at least to some extent to alleviate their distress, and if they can do that they will be going a long way. However they must put that purchasing power into the hands of the people so that they may buy goods from those who produce them for consumption.

Now we come to the question of distribution. I think no one will deny my statement that there are a great many abuses in our system of distribution, and that once we solve some of these abuses of the distributing system in our capitalistic organization or, as the resolution has so aptly put it, "economic power," then we have got to the bottom of our difficulty. The great trouble that I see is lack of a proper demonstration of government control. I believe it would be foolish for the government to go into business, from the standpoint of government business.

Electricity has been mentioned to-day, and that brings to my mind a government-owned electrical power plant in the United States, the Tennessee Valley Power Association, which by efficient management can sell electricity for industrial purposes for eight mills per kilowatt hour. That is getting the rate down to a point at which people can use electricity.

In the west we pay ten cents per kilowatt power; in addition there is a little meter on the wall and when a man comes to read it we are charged $1.50 for that, in addition to a few other charges. Yet this organization in the United States can sell the electricity it produces at eight mills per kilowatt hour for industrial purposes. In the west we have many electrical appliances that we could use if we could only get power more cheaply, but the cost is so high that when we go from one room to another in our homes we have to turn out the light. I know that people down east do not have that problem, and if we were provided with purchasing power so that we could use that electricity for lighting, vacuum cleaners, stoves and engines, we would be using ten times as much as we are to-day. But we cannot use it because we have not the ability in the form of purchasing power.

I am told that in some industrial plants in Montreal which used to employ a great deal of help they have introduced machines for rolling cigarettes, for instance, and that they can roll 700,000 per day. That is quite right. At the same time this displaces hundreds of workers. But the producers are not to be blamed for introducing such a machine; it is something commendable to introduce a new type of machine which will displace labour. That is the purpose of a machine, and the only purpose as I see it. But when such a machine displaces large numbers of people, to whom does the profit which that machine makes belong? Is the producer going to throw those people out on the street and say to them, "I am a millionaire running this factory, and I am making a profit of one million dollars a year. But now I am going to instal a machine that will make my profit two million dollars a year and that will throw out of work hundreds of men." That is a mistake of policy, not a mistake from the producer's standpoint, and the government should be strong enough and willing enough to go to the producer and say: You cannot do that because it is the wrong system. You must take the earning power of that machine and distribute it among those workmen that it displaces. In some way or other producers should be made to compensate their workmen who are thrown out of work as a result of the introduction of these new machines. Can we simply allow these men to be thrown out on the streets and say to them: You are charity-seekers; you are bums? It is no fault of theirs that they are thrown out of employment, and the government has a responsibility towards them. I do not care if the government look after them through public works or through the development of industry, although I would ask: What is the use of developing industry further when our industrial plants are now producing more than we can use? We have to sell our goods in foreign markets, while the very commodities we ship out of the country we need right here in Canada. That does not seem like good business to me. The trouble is lack of government control.

Look at the automobile industry, not the producing end of it, because everyone will agree that many more automobiles are produced than can be sold. There is no reason why the factories should not run day and night, if necessary, but at the present time they are producing many more automobiles than we can possibly use. Let us, however, consider that industry in relation to the tariff. We shall never solve our difficulties by a higher or lower tariff for the simple reason that the government does not control tariffs. There again we have lack of government control. In the west last year we paid $1,244 for a master Chevrolet sedan. What do we pay this year? There has been a reduction in the tariff since last year, but we pay $1,244. Since I came to Ottawa I went into the Chevrolet rooms on Sparks street, and I asked the price of the same car in this city. The price is a little lower than in the west, and I asked the agent what the same car cost here last year. He said, "The same price. There was a reduction of from two to fifteen dollars after the new tariff came into effect, but you will remember that last year we raised the price in the fall twenty dollars." There, again, is lack of government control.

I think of that industry at Sherbrooke which the government is investigating, and quite properly so. I do not say that the government should take over that industry, but we saw what happened when the government intervened. The plant had been closed down throwing hundreds out of work, but as soon as the government announced that there was to be an investigation the plant was opened up again. The owners knew that government pressure was going to be applied. But I doubt whether the whole trouble has been removed; that remains to be seen. I hope the government does the right thing, and if upon investigation it is found that conditions need rectifying I hope it will see that they are rectified immediately.

Last year we had what is called the Stevens investigation, which found many abuses existing in the industrial system. Yet the government to my knowledge has done nothing to rectify those abuses. The government, of course, does not need to go into an automobile industry and say how much air shall be put into a tire or how many bolts shall be used in an automobile or dictate the proper way of putting a burr on a wheel. That is technical work that technicians are hired for. But it is the business of the government when they find that abuses exist in the tobacco industry, for instance, or in other industries that were investigated by the Stevens commission, which cost the country hundreds of thousands of dollars, to see that those abuses are rectified.

What happened in connection with the tobacco industry shows what will happen when these industrialists know that the government will investigate unfair conditions and act upon the results of that investigation if there is anything found to be wrong in the industry. The hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) on his own initiative went into different industries and pointed out unsatisfactory conditions. The owners of those industries knew there was a latent force behind his warning when he pointed to conditions that should be rectified, and they rectified some of the conditions themselves, but they did not rectify the giving of a bonus of $65,000 to men already in receipt of salaries of $25,000 and $30,000 a year. There again is a wrong principle, a principle that should be corrected.

I repeat: We do not want the government to take over every business in the country, because no government controlled industry will do as well as will a privately controlled industry. A man who puts his own capital into a business is going to see that he gets a good manager, good mechanics and good machinery, and he is going to take proper care of the upkeep of his plant. We have had some experience of government owned business, and we know it is not as efficiently conducted as is privately owned business. Suppose that some of these industrial plants refuse to operate in the most efficient manner. Then it might be necessary for the government to take control of them for a time at least, but only in case of necessity. Some people may say that these industries are not making excess profits. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) said that they were not making such huge profits; that the industrialists were not all millionaires. That might be very true, but nevertheless we know that in this present century, under our present system, there is a great deal of depression and men are suffering from lack of sufficient food and clothing. No one is satisfied with conditions as they are at present.

Dealing further with this question of profits, I should like to quote from a newspaper article dated Ottawa, December 20. This article states that the dividends paid by Canadian textile firms totalled 116 per cent. These were profits and I contend that 116 per cent profit is entirely too high. This does not infer that the business is not profitable, just the reverse. It is stated that the highest wages paid by this industry were $15.71. This is the fault of the system; it is not the fault of the producing plant. It might be the fault of the management, and this might be an instance where government control could be applied very efficiently. It is stated also that the profits of six companies were $2,580,000 more than they were in 1929. Here is another instance where government control could be applied most effectively. It has been stated that our plants are not modernly equipped, but I noticed an article the other day headed "Canadian steel marches on." I venture to say that nowhere in the world can you find an industry better equipped than this one. I am told that this industry uses ninety-three per cent of Canadian materials, a fine record.

Prohibit entirely, if you will, goods coming into the country; make your tariff walls as high as you like; this does not bother me. If you want to protect your market, well and good, but do not erect tariff walls to protect the men who are already exploiting the people. When a condition like this is found to exist, it should be rectified. Have your tariff walls to protect your markets, not your financiers. This again is a question of policy. The other day at the Chateau Laurier I listened to a very intelligent speech—excuse me, I should not say "intelligent" as it was the most uneducational speech to which I have ever listened. I think the gentleman who made the speech had an "honourable" before his name, but I do not think it was very honourable of him to refer to the Premier of Alberta in the terms in which he did. I think everyone respects the Premier of Alberta for both his religious and economic beliefs and I do not think it is fair to refer in a derogatory manner to a man who is 3,000 miles away and cannot speak for himself. If he had been there I am sure he would have made the speaker feel like a fool. This man attacked the Premier of Alberta because of his efforts to better the conditions of the people while right beside him sat a gentleman who is about to alter the policy of one of the greatest financial institutions in the Dominion of Canada. The speaker did not say a word about him because he was sitting right beside him. What is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander.

I should like to read from a little booklet entitled: Stevens' Booklet or The Book That Bennett Banned—Complete Text of Stevens'

Talk. Our main difficulty lies in the control of policy and not in the control of production. Our problem is the merging of these large distributing and financial corporations. These octopuses have got hold of our distributing system and are choking the very life blood out of us while we sit back and let them do it. One paragraph in this booklet is entitled: Powerful Groups Dictate Price, and reads:

> At the same time, by this process of merging, there have been erected powerfully strong groups which are able to dictate prices to the person who sells, whether it is the farmer selling to a packer or a tomato grower to a canner, or a boot and shoe or clothing manufacturer to a big distributor, with the result that the producer of foods is forced to sell his goods not on the market where merit and value will prevail, but where the price is dictated by the person who buys.
> I can say this, I think, with absolute confidence, generally speaking, that because of the domination of certain retail institutions in this country, the price is fixed at the ultimate end, when it goes to the consumer. They say, we want an article that will sell at $16.50 or $40, or $50, or $10 as the case may be. We want an article that will sell at that price.
> That is their start, and when they take overhead, and their overhead has been enormously increased, wages and this, that and the other thing in distribution until they get clear.
> Then they say, "That is what is left for you, Mr. Farmer, or Mr. Manufacturer; do what you can with it."

One of our greatest difficulties is the control of policy. This has nothing to do with manufacturing. Our industries are efficient and if we continue to permit the men who produce to sell all the goods they produce, they will make more profit and be able to sell at a fair price because of their increased turnover. I should like to make one more quotation from this booklet. There is a paragraph entitled A Bull-dozing American Buyer, which reads:

> In 1930 they paid 33 cents a pound for this flue-cured tobacco in western Ontario, which was a profitable figure.
> In 1931 they brought a man up from the United States called Lea, who had been used to buying tobacco from negroes in the south, and was a typical bull-dozing American buyer. They brought him up and put him in charge of buying in Canada, and in the fall of 1931 they just cut rates that they paid the grower down sharply from 32 cents and 33 cents to 19 cents.

That was a case of interfering with the policy of a company; it had nothing to do with the manufacturing of that product; the policy was changed to take it out of the producer and put it into the hands of the profiteers. That is the wrong attitude to take and I cannot see where we can make any headway unless we get away from such antiquated ideas.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

There are many dangers in the nationalization of industry and some of the arguments heard to-day are valuable in that they show a way to avoid these dangers. We want constructive, not destructive criticism. The resolution refers to the concentration of economic power. When administration is consolidated with producing and distributing you have an amalgamation which it will be very difficult to break. Unless the government intends to go into business they will have to be very careful; they may have to take over all these different industries and do the best they can with them. They may have to take them over at a great loss, just as they had to do with the railways, unless precautions are taken against the conservation of these economic powers. When the government takes away the power of an individual to look after his own plant and substitutes someone who is working for a salary and who is not concerned with whether or not the business prospers, then it is looking for trouble. Political pull will also enter into the question, and we all know that such practices are being carried on and probably will be continued as long as we live. When we have distribution, producing and everything else concentrated in the hands of the government, there will be a possibility of all kinds of deception, more so than if it controlled merely the policies of these industries.

The other evening I noticed a newspaper article entitled Term in Prison for Operators of Pepper Pool. We read that two promoters have been sentenced to a year while a third has been given nine months. That is one way of exercising control. There is no use, when you find an offender against a policy, having the judge give him a calling down or something of that sort. You must do something such as they did in France in connection with the Stavisky swindle; they made the swindlers pay back the money that had been stolen. I suggest to the government, so far as controlling policy is concerned, that whenever such revelations are made as were made by the Stevens commission they should say to the guilty parties: You have abused the privileges we have given you and you shall therefore pay back to the public the money that you have unfairly taken from them. And if a year or two in gaol on top of that were added to the punishment, I do not think it would be long before we would have industries producing and distributing in a very efficient manner. That, I believe, is our solution.

Mr. BENNETT: May I say to the hon. gentleman that the city of Calgary, some time ago, was buying power at five and a half mills per kilowatt hour.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Where I live we pay ten cents per kilowatt hour.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to support wholeheartedly the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), that in the opinion of this house industrial, commercial and financial organizations and undertakings that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities and operated as public services or co-operative enterprises.

Before dealing directly with the resolution I should like to break a lance or two with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who made some observations this afternoon. That hon. gentleman gave a long list of organizations which he declared to be communist bodies, without substantiating that assertion. I tried to ask him a question but he was too busy quoting to answer me. I should like to ask him, through you, Mr. Speaker, what authority he had for saying that these were communist organizations.

Mr. MacNICOL: All of the eleven or more I named have been declared by Mr. M. J. Olgin to be communistic organizations with headquarters in the United States. M. J. Olgin is the author of the book from which I was quoting, and he is one of the chief communists in the United States. So far as the organizations in Canada are concerned, they have been pronounced communistic in consequence of investigations carried on in the courts of Ontario.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I asked for the authority and I have yet to receive it. An investigation by a court in Ontario declaring that they were unlawful bodies does not say that they were communist controlled or dominated. Some of these organizations were never heard of before. I have in mind two—one the Christian Social Order and the other the League against War and Fascism—two organizations which I doubt that my hon. friend, if he were outside the protection of the house, would dare to describe on a public platform as belonging to the communists.

Mr. MacNICOL: The League against War and Fascism is one of the organizations named by M. J. Olgin, a prominent communist in the United States, and the other was declared, after court investigation in Toronto, to be communist.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I repeat: I should be glad to have the hon. gentleman make his assertion outside the protection of this house.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not afraid to make these accusations outside the portals of the house.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I think these organizations would be more than likely to sue the hon. gentleman for libel. His only basis for the statement was that these organizations were opposed to capitalism and everything that capitalism stood for. I do not know anything about them, but the mere fact that they are opposed to capitalism and all that capitalism stands for hardly makes them communistic. I have under my hand a copy of the first address made over the radio by the previous Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett). It was delivered a year ago last January, and I am sure there can be no objection to my reading a part of it. I do not read it in any derogatory sense, because I believe these speeches will go down in Canadian history among some of the great classics of Canadian oratory. I quote:

> This economic system of ours is something that most of us have never stopped to think very much about. Before the war there was no great occasion to. After the war, when the system was rushing uncontrollably toward the 1929 abyss, I imagine there were not many who were much concerned. Now, alas, we have reason enough to worry; and still more reason, therefore, to do our best to end the cause of all this worry and trouble and to free our minds for happier things. It is a tragedy of these times that men and women, boys and girls, whose minds should be given to constructive pursuits, find themselves handicapped and harassed by the uncertainties of life, and prevented, by the anxieties of this present situation, from giving their best to the things which are most worth while.... If you examined this capitalist system, you would appreciate more fully some of the facts which underlie the transcendent fact that times have changed, that old conditions are no more, that something new has come into our social and economic life, and that this new element, this new force, insistently demands recognition. And I am compelled to add, you would realize more clearly the folly of some men who try to ignore this irresistible truth.

If all those who are opposed to capitalism are to be classed as communists, then I am afraid the right hon. the leader of the opposition must come under that scathing indictment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He would come under section 98.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the amended section.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The hon. member for Davenport also went to a great deal of trouble to point out that certain movements were anti-religious, a fact which he decried. I do not think he was trying to draw the illogical inference that those of us who support this movement are anti-religious, but nevertheless the connection is very subtle and as the statement goes out to the country the inference will be drawn that, socialism and communism being, as the hon. gentleman says, the same thing, though an elementary knowledge of economics will show that they are not, then the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation must be anti-religious. May I point out—and I think I have some small knowledge of this subject—that Christianity and capitalism have not gone together, and that being a Christian does not necessarily mean being a capitalist.

Mr. DUFF: You would not get very far with Christianity without the capitalist.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The world had Christianity long before it had capitalists, and it will have Christianity long after some of the gentlemen opposite supporting capitalism have passed away.

Mr. DUFF: We are all capitalists.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I appreciate the orderly reception from across the floor; it jibes very well with the general conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. DUFF: Speak for yourself, John.

Mr. DOUGLAS: In order to show that Christianity and capitalism have not gone hand in hand, I wish to quote from the Pope's encyclical Quadragesimo Anno at page 32:

> In the first place, then, it is patent that in our days not alone is wealth accumulated, but immense power and despotic economic domination is concentrated in the hands of a few, and that those few are frequently not the owners, but only the trustees and directors of invested funds, who administer them at their good pleasure.
> This power becomes particularly irresistible when exercised by those who, because they hold and control money, are able also to govern credit and determine its allotment, for that reason supplying so to speak, the life blood to the entire economic body, and grasping, as it were, in their hands the very soul of production, so that no one dare breathe against their will.
> This accumulation of power, the characteristic note of the modern economic order, is a natural result of limitless free competition which permits the survival of those only who are the strongest, which often means those who fight most relentlessly, who pay least heed to the dictates of conscience.
> This concentration of power has led to a three-fold struggle for domination. First, there is the struggle for dictatorship in the economic sphere itself; then, the fierce battle to acquire control of the state, so that its resources and authority may be abused in the economic struggles. Finally, the clash between states themselves.

And this, Mr. Speaker, I suggest ultimately means war. I quote one more statement, on page 35:

> If these changes continue it may well come about that gradually the tenets of mitigated socialism will no longer be different from the program of those who seek to reform human society according to Christian principles.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Amen.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The hon. gentleman says amen. I am sure it is not meant irreverently, but when the head of one of the greatest churches on the face of the earth makes a statement like that I hope the hon. gentleman who said amen means it much more than the tone of his voice would imply. I would direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the statement of another great church, the Toronto general conference of the United Church of Canada, made in 1933:

> It is our belief that the application of the principles of Jesus to the economic conditions would mean the end of the capitalistic system; by the capitalistic system we mean that order of things under which capital, which is a vital factor in the economic field and represents the part of the economic product used as a means to further production, is owned and administered by individuals and special groups with a view to their own profit.
> Our contention is that capital, especially in those large scale forms that are essential to the life of the whole people, should be owned and operated instead, not for private gain, but in the services of the general good.

If all those who are opposed to capitalism, the present concentration of wealth and the exploitation of the masses, are said to be anti-religious, the two statements I have just read certainly ought to offset that theory. Strange to say, the other day I received a copy of the Saskatchewan Liberal, which is always worthy of perusal, and in one corner I find a quotation from one of the greatest preachers on the north American continent. I refer to Reverend Doctor Harry Emerson Fosdick, of New York, who says:

> If our capitalism can so adjust itself to the new circumstances that it can achieve such devotion to economic processes to the welfare of all the pepole, even the least of them, then capitalism can go on. If not, there is nothing on earth that can save it, and nothing in heaven that will try to.

I submit that to you, Mr. Speaker, as the statement of a Christian gentleman who could not be called either a communist or an atheist.

The hon. member for Davenport was kind enough to say some very nice things about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre

(Mr. Woodsworth). He said that he believed in the sincerity of the hon. member, as I think we all do. Then he went on to say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was a reformer, and that in all social and physical revolutions the great danger had been the reformers. I want to repudiate that statement. In every time of social transition the danger has been not the reformer but the reactionary. The hon. gentleman chose rather an unfortunate historical analogy.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to put words into my mouth. He is quoting statements which I did not make at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What was the statement? I should be glad to have it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure Hansard has recorded it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: In that case we shall have to leave it to Hansard. My notes say that the hon. gentleman pointed out that the reformers, especially in the case of the French revolution, were the ones who led to slaughter and bloodshed. I would suggest that the French revolution was rather an unfortunate analogy to adopt. It was not the reformers who caused what later became a blood bath; it was the reactionaries, who held off a necessary and inevitable period of change so long that when the thing blew up the reformers could not control it and the revolutionaries took complete control.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I said.

Mr. DOUGLAS: But it was not the reformers who were to blame; it was the reactionaries. When his ministers came to Louis XVI and asked him to make necessary constitutional changes he said, "No. After me the deluge." But the deluge came in his time and Louis lost his head, not that he used it much while he had it but he was never the same after he lost it. So I say that instead of using that analogy to frighten us, the government should feel that unless changes are made all the time, in keeping with the times, even those of us who desire reforms may be pushed aside by others more violent and less responsible.

If I remember correctly the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) also paid a very fine compliment to our leader, but he said that we were in too much of a hurry.

Mr. BRADETTE: I said that you were too impatient. That is quite different.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Very well; I accept the correction; the hon. gentleman said that we wanted things done too quickly; that we must be prepared to wait. I am quite sure that there are thousands of people throughout Canada to-night who, if they were in receipt of a federal indemnity, would be quite patient too and quite prepared to wait a long time for social changes. But there are people who are seeing the years slip by, who are becoming more hopeless and whose future is becoming blacker and more uncertain. Can one wonder that they are impatient; can one wonder that they look to the House of Commons to do something more than merely say that we are too impatient because we want these changes brought about?

The resolution says that there is a concentration of economic power, which is the underlying cause of much of our economic distress to-day. It is hardly necessary to place before the house a great many figures. We hear so many figures cited here that they become almost meaningless, but I should like to place before the house one or two statements made by responsible and well known men. I have, for example, a statement made by Sir Andrew MacPhail in his little book Essays on Politics:

> We are told that we are living under British institutions, but in reality we are not. We are living under the government of an interested class, who find a party in power and keep it there until it becomes too corrupt to be kept any longer, when it seizes upon the other party and proceeds to corrupt it.

I have also a statement by Professor W. E. Munro, professor of history at Harvard, in his article Money Power in Politics:

> Only a small part of what we call government is conducted in the open. Of itself a government initiates nothing, it merely responds more or less tardily to the urgings that are put upon it by industrial organized groups, who have definite interests to serve and who are aggressive in supporting them. Those interested groups work within the ranks of party organizations. Indeed the chief function of the party system is to furnish a cover for the political activities of groups which desire to keep their true objectives invisible.

I quote from a gentleman who will be well known to hon. members opposite, Mr. David Lloyd George:

> Unless representative government is to be entirely discredited a new system must be adopted. At present the president of the Bank of England wields a power that makes kings and premiers mere pigmies. He works with the hidden hand of Wall Street whose secret diplomacy in Europe and elsewhere makes an open mockery of the nations' representatives. Up to the present the owners of the vested interests have been so powerful in both the old parties that those clearing the road have failed to cut through the toughest and sturdiest obstacles.

Then from a man who ought to know the picture from the inside, a former president of the United States, Mr. Woodrow Wilson, who said:

A comparatively small group of men control the water power, railroads, banks, prices, and the larger credits of the country. There is hardly a part of the United States of America where men are not aware that secret private interests have been running the government. It is now a government, by, for and of, big business, with its completely subservient employees in the White House. Yes, and invisible government has erected itself above the forms of democracy.

One more quotation, from a very unusual source, an editorial in the Bankers' Magazine of August 26, 1924. This remarkable statement says:

Capital must protect itself in every possible manner through combination and legislation. Debts must be collected, bonds and mortgages must be foreclosed as rapidly as possible. When through process of law, the common people have lost their homes they will be more tractable and more easily governed through the influence of the strong arm of government, applied by a central power of wealth under the control of leading financiers. A people without homes will not quarrel with leaders. History repeats itself in regular cycles. This truth is well known among our principal men now engaged in forming an imperialism of capital to govern the world.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would ask the hon. member his authority for these words. Who is the author of that quotation?

Mr. DOUGLAS: I have already stated it —an editorial in the Bankers' Magazine, of August 26, 1924.

Mr. DUNNING: What Bankers' Magazine?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The United States, printed in Idaho.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Reprinted in the Idaho Leader.

Mr. DUNNING: And repudiated a dozen times.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Not a word of truth in it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: It goes on:

By thus dividing the voters through the political party system we can get them to expend their energies in fighting over questions of no importance to us except as teachers of the common herd. Thus by discreet action—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is it in order for the hon. gentleman to read an alleged extract from a paper which does not exist and for which he can give no authority?

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman takes full responsibility and states his authority I think he has the right.

Mr. DUNNING: The paper does not exist and never did.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement was never published.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I read this statement in all good faith. If the statement is fictitious I am quite prepared to withdraw it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: —but I am Scotch enough that someone will have to show me the facts. I have before had to follow figments of the imagination of some hon. gentlemen opposite and have not found them altogether reliable.

Mr. DUFF: It is a poor sample of Scotch; you need some soda.

Mr. DOUGLAS: As the resolution points out, I believe the underlying difficulty of our time has come from the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few. The last speaker made the mistake, along with some others, of believing we are advocating the taking over of all property. Economists from the beginning of the study of that science have recognized that there are two classes of property: public property and private property. It is easy to define the difference, public property being any property the control of which enables one person to exploit others; private property being any property which a man may have for personal use and the like of which other persons may have by giving similar money or wealth in exchange for it. We may take as a typical example of one class any natural resources, or the banking system, or the transportation system; these are public things; they are public goods because we cannot each have one. They are goods by which, if a few persons control them, they thereby control the means of livelihood of the rest of the nation; "the man who controls the means by which I make a living, controls me," said one economist, and that is still true. Private goods, on the other hand, are goods which any of us may own. I may own a motor car; any hon. member may own one if he has sufficient funds to purchase it. But my having that private property does not in any way interfere with the liberty of any other individual. In considering the resolution of the hon. member we must keep this difference clearly in mind. When we talk about public ownership we have in mind these public goods which lend themselves to monopolistic control.

I can illustrate in no better way what we are facing to-day than by outlining something that was written a number of years ago but has proved a very accurate prophecy of our economic set up. I refer to the parable written by Bellamy called The Water Tank, in which he pointed out that we might imagine our economic system as being like a vast water tank to which all the people of the country were bringing water, the water they bring being either the goods they produce or the services they render. But that tank is owned by a certain group, call them capitalists or any name you please. Those who bring their pails of goods or services to the tank must accept the price that is given to them by the owners. Say it is one dollar or one unit of any kind of money. They put their goods into this tank. But when they want to take goods back out of the tank they are compelled to pay what these men like to charge them. Say it is two dollars. Someone says that the spread is too great.

I submit that figures bear out the statement that for the past number of years producers and labourers have never received enough for what they have put into the economic system to enable them to buy the same amount from it. Take any commodity; take wool for example; in the southern part of Saskatchewan this fall we were selling wool at five to eight cents a pound. It takes five pounds of wool to make a suit of clothes; it is granted that it has to go through many processes, but the spread between five pounds of wool at five to eight cents a pound and twenty-five dollars for a suit of clothes or fifty cents for a pair of wool socks is too great. Farmers were selling feed wheat at twenty-five cents a bushel before the price was fixed, but in buying cereals people were paying as much as ten times that amount. Pork was selling in Saskatchewan a year and a half ago at six cents a pound, but bacon wrapped up in cellophane sold in the cities at forty to forty-five cents a pound.

The same is true of wages. I have figures appearing in Social Planning for Canada which indicate that in 1929 the average wage in the manufacturing industry in Canada was $1,045. The textile industry employing 105,594 workers recorded an average wage of $818. In coal mining the average wage was $869.76, and in the tobacco industry $644.11. Agricultural labourers' wages averaged $627 for male workers and $465 for female workers. Income statistics for 1931—and ninety-six per cent filed returns—show that nearly 2,000,000 male Canadian wage earners averaged $927 per year, while 528,000 female workers reported $560 per year. I submit that even in the very best of times, and even with production so geared up, much better than it is to-day, at no time was the worker who was putting in services or the primary producer who was putting in goods getting enough for what he was putting into the economic system to enable him to buy the same amount back.

What was the result? There could be only one. If you had twice as much, or even only fifty per cent as much more going into a tank as you have coming out of it there can be only one result, and that is that the tank will run over. That is exactly what we find throughout the civilized world to-day; the economic tank is running over. Apparently there is an abundance of goods, not more than we can consume but certainly more than we are able to consume because of lack of purchasing power. All round that tank stand people who have poured the goods in. The people who produced the goods and services are doing without those goods and services because they never got enough for putting the goods or the service in to buy them back again. And so the farmers who grow grain are seeing their cattle die for want of feed; the men who work in factories making shoes see their children going without shoes or obtaining them from a relief office.

Wherein lies the solution? Some have offered as a solution that we ought to push the tank over and let the water run out. Whenever I hear that solution suggested I understand why it was that the monkeys passed the resolution of censure on Darwin because he had said that man came from a monkey, and the monkeys contended that was an insult to their intelligence. The idea of destroying goods is contrary to all common sense and all the ethics of civilization.

The other suggestion made particularly by hon. members opposite is that we ought to have freer trade. I am in favour of freer trade—but wherein lies the solution? No matter how many tanks of goods and services we exchange, if the people who produce those goods and services are not getting enough to buy them back you are bound to have a surplus in the economic tank. We believe the solution is this: The solution lies in these people owning and controlling the tank. Remember that when I speak about the tank I am talking about public goods, not private goods. I am talking of those industries, the control of which would mean the control of the economic livelihood of the common people.

The hon. member who spoke before me said that he did not agree with the socialization of industry. I say that there is no other way by which we can give back to the people anything in exchange for what they have put into the tank. They cannot buy it back unless they control the tank. It is not enough to get tickets to buy the water back out of the tank. You may give plenty of tickets, but unless those tickets have some relation to what is in the tank they would not be worth the paper they were printed on. There must be a relationship between the goods put in and the tickets put up to buy the goods. In other words there must be managed currency. Every unit of money that comes out must correspond to the unit of goods in the tank to be purchased. However we may go into this matter in greater detail when the banking system is being discussed at a later date.

We have drawn this distinction between public goods and private goods. In the realm of public goods the resolution suggests that where such public goods are not functioning in the general interest and where they are being used to exploit the masses they shall be taken over and operated cooperatively by the people in a system of public ownership, with a view always to giving back to the producer and labourer enough to buy back what they have created.

In reference to private goods we have never suggested public ownership; I must make that clear. The last speaker said something about the fact that we cannot control all business, and if I am misinterpreting what he said, he will correct me, I reply that we are not suggesting the control of business. There is no reason why the government should run a little shoe store here or an ice cream parlour there. They are not monopolistic. Only where a monopoly exists do we say that there should be government ownership. When we come to consideration of private goods we say that consumers' and producers' cooperatives ought to be encouraged with a view to making it possible for the people who produce goods and those who consume them to have something to say about the price that they shall either receive for producing or pay for consuming. We submit that is not economically unsound and we maintain that instead of criticizing this resolution by throwing names at it, and instead of merely waving it aside by stating that it is anti-religious, or communistic or going to hurt individualism, hon. members should realize that to-day we are faced with the greatest tragedy in human history. There are millions of people in the civilized world with no gainful employment, and yet there is a great abundance of goods not being consumed, despite the fact that there are people with the capacity to consume those goods. The machinery of production is not being utilized. We have suggested a solution. We invite constructive criticism, but we suggest that those who criticize what we have placed before the house should suggest an alternative to our resolution.

For these reasons I ask hon. members to support the resolution which states that the industrial, commercial and financial organizations and undertakings that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities and operated as public services or cooperative enterprises.

Mr. SLAGHT: I wonder if before the hon. gentleman concludes, having admitted that he is an authority on church matters and, as I understood him, on Scotch—or the Scotch —and on water dams, he would make clear to the house whether under his plan he proposes to take over and operate the churches as a cooperative enterprise?

Mr. DOUGLAS: I shall be very glad to answer the hon. member's question. I thought he would have been able to follow me, as what I was saying was not at all involved. I mentioned that there were two kinds of goods, and that the public goods are the only ones we propose to take over. Public goods are those which lend themselves to monopoly; private goods are goods which any person may have. I was not aware that there was any monopoly of churches. If the hon. member has been to one recently he will be quite aware of the fact that anyone may go to one and anyone may start one.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of hon. members for, I hope, a few moments, to enter into the discussion of this resolution. I trust hon. members will bear with me. No doubt I shall find it as difficult as I believe other hon. members have found it to speak in this chamber; we realize the House of Commons is a difficult place in which to register one's opinions. I envy the ability of hon. members opposite to marshal their facts in such an admirable fashion, and I sincerely wish I had the ability to do so. I envy them for the manner in which they can quote the classics and such like to bear out the ideas they express, whether they are their own or somebody else's, but through you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the house that I represent the riding of Brant which I will be modest enough to say is one of the good agricultural counties of Ontario. I myself as a working farmer feel that I am fairly representative of the majority of the people who live in that particular constituency, and I wish to take this opportunity of stating how I think my people would look upon this resolution if the house saw fit to adopt it.

In the first place I would say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has practically eliminated the farmers from his splendid scheme. It is my opinion and that of the people I represent that if you have an economic program that does not take account of the problems of the farmers it is headed for disaster, and so far as I am concerned I intend to stay and fight to the last ditch for the sons and grandsons of those great old pioneers who came out here and built homes for themselves in the stubborn forest. The resolution is proved unsound from the very fact that it leaves out of account about one-half of the population of the country.

I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail). She has been long enough in this chamber to be astute enough to overlook what I regard as the important part of this resolution, and she fixed her attention upon the last two words of the motion, to substitute the cooperative method of doing business for the competitive. She absolutely left out of consideration the important part of the resolution; I do not know why. No doubt she has her reasons, and I am not going to criticize her for that. Indeed I commend her for it, and I am heartily in accord with what she has said in regard to cooperation. I have been a co-operator myself; I have invested a considerable amount of my hard earned savings on the farm in furthering the cause, and some of it has not come back, but nevertheless I was very glad to do it for the cause, and I still have faith that cooperative enterprise is something we should encourage.

I have noticed that these private members' resolutions allow one a great deal of latitude, and that is why I thought I should like to take this opportunity of getting my feet on the ground and, taking my place as Liberals who have represented the riding of Brant always have done, try to make some contribution to the national life of this country.

The first thing we should do before we propose to apply a remedy to the conditions complained of in this resolution, which sets out the disabilities under which we are suffering, is to endeavour to discover the cause of those conditions. Let us find out where the trouble lies that has brought about that state of affairs which makes necessary so drastic a resolution as this. In my estimation there have been two reasons, and the process has been going on for a long time. I think it could be simmered down to this, that our present conditions are largely due to economic nationalism, which has obstructed the ordinary channels of trade; and, second, to the fact that government has lent itself to extravagance. You will quite understand, Mr. Speaker, that farmers are not blessed with an abundance of this world's goods, and any money we can save is saved only by our being frugal and paying our way as we go. I contend that if governments had followed the same principle on which the prosperous farmers in old Ontario or even in the county of Brant have worked, and had lived within their means, we would not have had the conditions that are facing us to-day. After all, wealth is the result and product of labour, and you cannot have hundreds of thousands of men unemployed in this dominion without the national wealth being impaired in consequence. When these men are not working they are not producing wealth.

The farmer is in rather a peculiar position. I think it was said by one of our labour men that labour is not a commodity but is a consumer. Well now, a farmer is not a commodity; he is a producer and a consumer too, and because of the fact that he is in this dual position economically, he has a dual responsibility. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made the statement that the average farm income is five hundred dollars. The reason the farmer is receiving only five hundred dollars is that when he sells his products on the open markets of the world, those markets name the price, and there is also deducted from the price that the farmer receives all the overhead charges of extravagant government, high taxes, and all the rest of it that goes into our economic life. The farmer takes that reduced purchasing power and goes out into the restricted markets of this country to buy the necessities for his family, and reflected in the price of everything he buys are those high taxes, high duties, and the high costs of extravagant government. Think of the immense debt upon the people of this country and the obligations we have to meet. A large portion of the wealth that we produce has to go to help meet those obligations, high taxes, and extravagant governments, and that is very largely responsible for the condition of affairs we have to-day.

I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that if he cannot bring forward a system that will embrace all elements of society, farmers, industrialists and everyone else, in its economic structure, any other system is economically unsound and will not get the support of the great bulk of the people whom I have the honour to represent. We have a lot of people unemployed in this country, and some hon. gentleman has said that things would be better if we could only get these men back in employment and earning a living.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) give the assurance to parliament that the government is determined to correct some of these evils. True I believe there are corrections to be made, but I also believe each one of us as an individual citizen must make his individual contribution. People are too much inclined to come to the government for assistance. We have corporations coming to the government and asking to be relieved of this and that; others want relief from unfortunate investments. The result is that as a government we are spending too much money, and the farmer, being in this dual position that I mentioned a moment ago, finds his purchasing power destroyed and himself unable to buy the things he would like to buy, in addition to meeting his necessary obligations.

I had occasion to look through the parliamentary directory the other day, and I noticed that not many of the members in the southeast corner of the house are farmers. Most of them are school teachers and they have enjoyed the high standard of living which has been brought about by the system of special privileges and which has, as it were, alienated a larger portion of our people to the industrial centres. The wealth has been taken away from the wealth creators of this country; their purchasing power has been so impaired that they are not in a position to buy the things they would like to buy such as electricity, bathroom equipment, radios and all the rest of those conveniences that are considered necessary in the city. I hope I may be pardoned for being a little personal, but I want to say that I am a grandson of an old pioneer who came from Scotland. I notice the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has enough Scotch in him to be proud of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Nationality; I insist that that should be clear.

Mr. WOOD: He is the first Scotchman I have ever seen who was not proud of the fact. I was going on to say that these gentlemen enjoy those conveniences which they claim are necessities of life, but which we look upon as being luxuries. If the purchasing power of the farmer can be restored; if he is able to sell his goods and have some money to spend, he will keep the workers in the factories employed. As I started to say, I am a grandson of one of the old pioneers and still living on the homestead. I have no radio in my home; I have no furnace and I have to take a bath in a wash dish when I want one during the cold weather. But I am happy under those conditions and I would not substitute my ideals of Canadian citizenship for anything of which I have heard from the opposite side of the house. I believe the old capitalistic system can be put in its proper place by applying good common sense, and there seems to be so little at the present time.

I would say to the government, of which I have the honour to be a supporter: Give back to the money lenders of the country the money that belongs to them and let them seek a reward for their money in the development of industry. Let them supply the products of industry to the consumer at a lower price, but do not allow them to hide behind a protective tariff and pay their workmen a lower rate than that to which they are entitled for the product of their labour. We must have a fair exchange of services. We think we can bring about a happy condition of affairs without attempting to tear down the economic life that we have developed.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The hon. gentleman opposite said that we should live within our means, both individually and as a government. Is that correct?

Mr. WOOD: Yes, but of course there are exceptions to every rule. I know exactly what the hon. member is going to say.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is just like saying that if a frog had wings he would not bump himself when he jumps. During the war how could we—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Speaker, under our present financial system how could we have conducted the war without going into debt? How could we have conducted it by living within our means? That is a question I should like to ask.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is a very bad place to offer $25 without having it in hand. Last year I offered $25 of good Canadian currency to the then Postmaster General, Mr. Sauvé, in order to purchase a certain island, but he refused it. Perhaps he was from Missouri. I want to tell my hon. friends that they should not make any offers without having gold in hand, and gold is hard to get at the present time. I have just received from the Department of Finance some very interesting statistics. These show the amount of currency that we have in Canada. Reports are published monthly in the official gazette of Canada, and I recommend to my hon. friends in the leftist corner the reading of that gazette as well as the acts concerning finance, banks and all that. They will also find the reports of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) most fascinating and instructive.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. gentleman is dealing with ancient history. We left that quite a long time ago.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand the hon. gentleman is the leader of the group in the far corner. If they read all these things to obtain learning for themselves they did not share their knowledge with their constituents. I am sorry for their constituents because of that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How can we tell the hon. gentleman anything when he will not listen?

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry; I was busy answering some letters of my constituents. I pity the constituents of my hon. friends who listened to them and believed them during the election. What I intend to read will prove very dull to those who have read it already, but it might be useful to put it on Hansard as a record. I intend to give the amounts in the current and savings accounts of the chartered banks during the past six years. I shall not impose upon the house by giving the figures for each month, but I shall give the figures for January and June of each year. These figures will give the house some idea of the money at the disposal of the public in the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. member be good enough to relate this particular subject to the motion under discussion?

Mr. POULIOT: I am always glad to answer the hon. member for whom I have a soft spot in my heart.

Mr. DUNNING: You could relate almost anything to this resolution.

Mr. POULIOT: Most of the discussion has been in connection with the capitalistic system. Every man who has a cent in the bank is a capitalist. Every man who buys a victory or a dominion bond is a capitalist, and these bonds are purchased with money from the banks. It will be most interesting to see what amount is available in the deposits in our banks. This will give my hon. friend an opportunity to attain his end and achieve the object of his resolution. Perhaps he is still in favour of nationalizing the banks. I asked him some questions but he did not tell as much as our hon. friends in the leftist corner have told their constituents. However, I will read this statement; it is official, having been published in the official gazette, and I am sure it will interest my hon. friend in the highest degree:

Date	Current accounts	Savings accounts
Jan. 31, 1929..	$674,000,000	$1,525,000,000
July 31, 1929..	692,000,000	1,453,000,000
Jan. 31, 1930..	644,000,000	1,439,000,000
July 31, 1930..	605,000,000	1,402,000,000
Jan. 31, 1931..	556,000,000	1,428,000,000
July 31, 1931..	561,000,000	1,451,000,000
Jan. 30, 1932..	506,000,000	1,368,000,000
July 31, 1932..	462,000,000	1,363,000,000
Jan. 31, 1933..	445,000,000	1,382,000,000
July 31, 1933..	501,000,000	1,379,000,000
Jan. 31, 1934..	475,000,000	1,350,000,000
July 31, 1934..	504,000,000	1,360,000,000
Jan. 31, 1935..	529,000,000	1,412,000,000

That is the last one I have received. Well, it is the old story. In the first year there was a little over $2,000,000,000 in the banks and now it is approximately $2,000,000,000. It has been going up and down a little for several reasons; for one thing, credit was tight for a certain time. At any rate, we have now $2,000,000,000 in the banks. How many accounts there are, I have not yet ascertained, but I shall try to get the information as soon as possible.

I ask every hon. member to look at that tabulation, which will appear in Hansard tomorrow. It will show that there is practically as much money in the banks now as there was in 1929, when theories such as those advanced by hon. gentlemen in the leftist corner would not have been accepted by the people, because at that time the people were not in despair. People are inclined to believe such theories, though they are without foundation, because they are at present in despair and they say: We will try anything. That is a great mistake.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that why they put the present party in power, because they were willing to try anything?

Mr. POULIOT: Will the hon. gentleman please repeat that? I did not hear his remark.

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friend said that the people were willing to make any experiment.

Mr. POULIOT: Before making experiments we must come down to brass tacks and face facts. That is why I commend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) so highly for what he has done, and I am very much surprised that it has not appeared in the speech from the throne. I refer to the classification of the unemployed according to trades. That is what he is going to do and it is a most important policy of the government. We are at rock bottom and we have to make an inventory of things so that we may be able to build from that foundation upwards. I repeat, we are bound to face facts, and we do not care about theories until we are familiar with the facts which it is our duty to study. We have every opportunity to study those facts through the different organizations and different departments, and I for one do not accept offhand the theories of any economist in any other country. Why? Because those people enunciate such theories on the basis of facts that are different from those we have to deal with in Canada. We must study the real life of Canada to see what can be done, and this may take a long time. No one can reach the moon or give it to anyone; that is absurd. We have to face the situation as it actually exists and remind the people that these are hard times. We must ask everyone who has any constructive suggestions to make to bring them forward.

No one can promise more than he can give. This is not a time to disappoint the people by telling them that we can do more than we know can possibly be done; we cannot say: We will do this and that, whether we can or not. We must first study the situation very carefully and then build on the rock bottom. The policy of the late government was far from being successful. They ruined the country with experiments and this government has to build on those ruins left by its predecessor. Every time a member asked questions of the late government there was an unsatisfactory answer; in the last parliament it was impossible to get information. The invariable answer that came from the lips of the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and of every one of his colleagues was: Wait and see; the government has nothing to tell. Whenever the question was asked as to what was the policy of that government, the house was told to wait and see—words full of wisdom.

Well, times have changed; this party has to do something for the welfare of the Canadian people, and it is expected that when it does propose something it will do exactly as it promises. I pity from the bottom of my heart the good people of Alberta for the experiment they are now making. One might just as well give the moon; one might just as well give the planetary system to each of the constituents of hon. gentlemen in the leftist corner.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friends laugh; I am sure they were laughing to themselves when they spoke to their own people. It is a pity they have not whiskers behind which they could laugh more heartily. But, sir, the facts are there and we must face them. If they are ready to cooperate with their colleagues in the house on both sides and study the situation as it is, well and good. Believe me, sir, we on this side are ready to consider any suggestions that may come from hon. gentlemen in the far corner, provided those suggestions have some basis. I have, however, never believed in castles in the air. They look very fine; sometimes we see them in a mirage and walk very far to find them, but when we get there we find nothing at all.

Well, sir, I shall let the figures speak for me, and hon. gentlemen opposite will see that they are official. This is the money of the Canadian people, their savings, in the banks. Money is not burned or destroyed, except when it is replaced; a man may lose his money, but it goes into the pockets of another man. There is very little difference in the amount of money in the banks now. Why does it not circulate as it did previously? The first requisite for prosperity is not the creation of money or inflation, but the circulation of money. That is an elementary truth. Why do not the people spend their money now? They are starting to do so, but during the last five years they have been sitting on their money because they had no confidence in the former administration and were waiting for better times.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to ask how much money the unemployed were sitting on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am ready to answer anyone, but I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman to speak more distinctly because of the poor acoustics of this chamber.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am sorry if the hon. gentleman did not hear me. I should like to ask how much money the million unemployed have been sitting on for the last few years.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not a teacher, as my hon. friend may be, but for the moment I shall become a teacher and explain the matter to him very plainly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I suggest—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I will answer one first, and then the other.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask what relation this talk by the hon. member has to the resolution now before the house. Apparently he is taking the opportunity—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that apparently he is taking the opportunity to address himself to the group to my left and not to the resolution under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is older than the other hon. member I shall answer him first. Whenever he and his associates bring in plans to this house they bring them in without telling us how they may be carried out. Is this to be done by God? Is he God? I do not believe so. If his plans are to be put into operation this must be done by money and the money will have to come from the banks or else the government will have to bring about inflation for that purpose. If I can show that the plan of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will never succeed because the people lack the confidence to subscribe to it, will he be satisfied? It is all right to suggest to the government that something should be done, but who is to pay for it? What taxes would be imposed upon the Canadian people for that purpose?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I ask that my question be answered, as to how much money the unemployed have been sitting on.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry I have not two tongues; I have one and I try to make the best of it. I am explaining the situation to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. When he and his group have proposed anything in the house they have never suggested to the government a way to pay for it. The cost must come from the pockets of the Canadian people. That is what the hon. gentleman told me last year in regard to his former scheme. I asked how it was to be paid for and he said that it would be paid for by the Canadian people who had money in the bank. It would not be paid for by the unemployed of whom the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Landeryou) speaks, who have to be supported by the state. I hope I have answered the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but if he would like any further explanations I am ready to give them to him at any time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I simply ask that the hon. gentleman try to preserve order in the house and that, as is usual, he confine himself to the matter under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: I will say nothing unpleasant of my hon. friend, but I remember that he is an apostle of free speech and one day, when he rose to a point of order, he objected to my answering him. However, that is enough of that.

Now I should like to answer the question of the hon. member for East Calgary, and I shall try to put the answer in a way that he will understand. Money has been idle because the people have not had confidence. I come from a rural district. In my constituency there are people who have $1,000, $2,000, $5,000 or $10,000 to spend on certain improvements to their houses, for the construction of barns or for the purchase of something for one of the family. They did not spend their money during the past five years because they were waiting for better times; they were sitting on their money for fear of the future. That is why money has been idle. Now my hon. friends come along and tell the people, "We will give you $25 a month." This has not been done yet. Mr. Aberhart has been in power for quite a long time now; he came into office last August and said, "I will realize my objective within eighteen months." But his assets are frozen now. If he tries his schemes in February or March they will be frozen too and the people will have to wait a little longer.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend has something to ask I shall answer him in due course; I am ready to answer anyone. One reason why people are not spending money now is because they fear the schemes of the hon. gentlemen in the leftist corner. They are not sure what will happen to the banks; they are not sure what will become of their money, so they are sitting on it. So the plans of my hon. friends in the leftist corner—and at this time I include the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation also—are most dangerous; they represent one reason why money is not now circulating. They inspire fear in those who have a small amount of money, for when they speak against capitalism they speak against the ownership of $100, $500, $1,000, $2,000 or $5,000 by men who have saved that money through hard work and who are not going to throw it into the air or into the water.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I rise to a point of order. Is everything that can be said in defence of this group to be called out of order?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: First of all we want to know whether everything we have to say is going to be called out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Say it first.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not see why $25 was ever dragged into this discussion to-night, because we did not say anything about it.

Mr. POULIOT: I have spoken of the $25, and probably the hon. gentleman objects to it because he has not shown it to me.

An hon. MEMBER: Is this destructive ridicule or Liberal cooperation?

Mr. POULIOT: Ridicule is apparent at times, and it is enough to show the true nature of the thing in order to have it recognized as ridiculous by all those who know the inside of it. That is why I regret so much that the plan advocated by the hon. gentleman has been believed in by so many people of the good province of Alberta. I am ready to answer any question that is put by the hon. gentleman.

Well, sir, to sum up, there are facts that cannot be ignored, and there is the history of the world which shows that in certain times false prophets have appeared; the Bible mentions that and it is a very good book. They have been believed for some time, but as Barnum said, one can deceive some of the people some of the time, but it is impossible to deceive all of the people all of the time.

Mr. JAQUES: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he say that there were two billions of money lying idle in the Canadian banks?

Mr. POULIOT: I will give the figure to the hon. gentleman, and if he wants to ask any other questions he is welcome. This is the last report I have received of the chartered banks; it is for July 31, 1935. My hon. friend can probably find later ones in the official statistics in the library. On July 31, 1935, the total of current accounts was $553,000,000 and of savings accounts, $1,427,000,000, which makes approximately $2,000,000,000.

Mr. JAQUES: The point is: It is lying idle.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. JAQUES: I thought that was what the hon. gentleman said. The reason it is lying idle is that people are afraid to invest it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. POULIOT: I may tell my hon. friend one thing, that the current accounts are accounts that do not bear interest; that is something which is known to everyone except some professors or teachers. This money goes from account to account. If my hon. friend gives me a cheque for $25 from Mr. Aberhart on a bank in Alberta and I put it into my bank it is just a matter of cross entries in books and the total in the banks will remain the same, provided Mr. Aberhart's cheque is good. On the other hand you see there is $1,427,000,000 in the savings accounts.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not desire to enter the debate, but I am sure it has been noticeable to you, sir, that of late when any speaker sits down some one rises to ask a question. It is against the rules of the house for the member questioned to take the occasion to make a second speech. I have no particular reference to my hon. friend; I think it has occurred with reference to every speaker to-day, that after he has concluded his speech and therefore exhausted his right to speak he is asked questions and is placed in the position of breaking the rules of the house by making a second speech and sometimes a third and a fourth. I am afraid that the decorum of the house suffers, and I respectfully ask a ruling.

Mr. POULIOT: This time it was the sixth.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is well taken. In future I hope hon. members will observe the rule; those who have spoken once in the debate may not speak again, but several hon. members have spoken a second and third time.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I did not intend to participate in this debate to-night, but I feel that since the resolution was introduced by the leader of this group, and we have wandered somewhat afield from the intent and purpose of the resolution I should like to say a few words. The resolution has been described as communistic in its nature. I look down the avenues of time and turn over the pages of history and I am reminded of how not far from where I was born and just over a century ago a man who became one of the greatest leaders of his time, Benjamin Disraeli, sought election to the British House of Commons for the city of Taunton. At that time terms were applied to him very similar to those that are applied from time to time to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). But calling names does not refute an argument or destroy an idea, and although to-night there has been some amusement at the expense of hon. members to my left, let me point out that while I disagree with their thesis and their policy, nevertheless they are here because a large section of the Canadian people are dissatisfied with things as they are. That is the reason for their presence and ours in the house.

A short time ago a speaker said that if one had a constructive suggestion to offer in connection with the matter now before us it should be offered. This afternoon the hon member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) referred to the social experiments taking place in Sweden and the Scandinavian countries. From time to time too we hear a great deal about Russia. Russia is sometimes thrown at us in derision. But we of British birth and British ideals are closely akin to the Scandinavian peoples. The Russian experiment is perhaps peculiar to the type of people who inhabit eastern and central Europe, but the Scandinavian activities are of interest to the people of our dominion and of the British commonwealth of nations because the people of Scandinavia are so nearly akin to ourselves.

I have in my hand a clipping which appeared in the London Economist a short time ago. Sir Walter Layton, the editor, who was for a considerable time the economic adviser of the League of Nations, in making a recent survey of Canadian conditions said:

> The question many people in Canada ask to-day is why the economic life of the country which has such vast and varied resources, cannot be so organized as to provide reasonable sustenance for 10,500,000 people when Sweden another country in northern latitudes with a much smaller area and little first class land, manages to support 7,500,000 people without condemning any large portion of them to serious privation.

To-day as I listened to some hon. members, another reference to Sweden, which I shall quote, came to my mind:

> The Swedes do not recoil in alarm when some stump speaker shouts, apropos of a measure under debate, "That's socialism!"

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I suggest that the hon. member in quoting must state his authority.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quoting from the New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. DUNNING: An editorial?

Mr. COLDWELL: No; an article by Lewis Gamnett in which he reviews a new book.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): What date?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not the date. It continues:

> They know that every community welfare measure since the first public park was opened and the first toll road was taken over by the state and made free has been greeted with that identical retort by spokesmen for licensed greed. The Swedes settle back calmly and ask: "Does it work?"

It seems to me that the question we have to ask about the system under which we are living is, first of all: Does it work? Then, if a proposal is placed before us we should ask ourselves if it is probable that the proposals would work in the country in which we live, and if it has worked elsewhere. If it has, then I venture to say that it is worthy of study. I have often thought that we could learn much from other countries if we would study what they do rather more intimately than has been our custom. I hope that if the present administration is unsuccessful in meeting the urgent and pressing needs of the Canadian people it will look into conditions existing in other countries and as far as possible endeavour to find in those countries lessons which may be applied to the country in which we live for the benefit and general good of our citizens. If the administration will do that, it will have made a great contribution not only to Canadian affairs but to world affairs also.

To-day in the reading room of the House of Commons I happened to pick up the December issue of the Economic Journal, a publication edited by John Maynard Keynes, the great Liberal economist of Great Britain. True, John Maynard Keynes may be a little to the left of some other Liberal economists, but I believe he is regarded as the outstanding progressively Liberal economist in Great Britain. In that magazine we find an instructive and somewhat difficult article written by Professor Durbin on the theory of value. The article concludes with these words, which I should like to quote:

> What is urgently required in economic theory to-day is the extension and variation of our institutional postulates in order that economists may formulate and solve the problems of rational calculus in an integrated economy.

That may be a difficult sentence, but put into the plainest of English it means simply that what we need to do is so to organize and plan our economic life that we may make intelligent and measured progress. That is our problem.

Mr. MARTIN: Are we to conclude from the hon. member's observation that he regards Mr. Keynes as the authority behind the resolution?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not suggested anything of the kind. I have simply given the author of the quotation, to show that the magazine from which I have quoted is one of repute and edited by a man well known to all of us. I am not contending that Mr. Keynes even takes the responsibility for articles appearing in the magazine.

We have a growing consensus of opinion in the world that we cannot continue to drift, but that intelligence must be brought to bear upon the economic and social problems with which we are confronted; that through the use of that intelligence we must find the solution for the difficulties with which we are surrounded. Sometimes I feel vexed when I hear people refusing to discuss such problems. I do not contend that everything I believe is absolutely correct or sound, nor do I believe that ideas held by other men are unsound and incorrect. I believe however that out of the clash of ideas may come policies which could be moulded to assist the Canadian people, and the people of the world generally, in finding a way out of the morass of despair into which we have fallen.

Several times to-day the problem of new machinery and inventions has been mentioned. Some say that this is the cause of all our difficulties. I say that the difficulty lies in the fact that we have not organized our economy to the point at which we may utilize the machinery of production in industry, on the farms and elsewhere in order that those machines may be a blessing instead of a curse. Again to-day on several occasions we have heard interjected into the debate some observations on money. That is a problem sufficiently large to be discussed separately. Again and again we hear the cry go up: It cannot be done! Again and again we hear about constitutional difficulties in the way of making progress. A few days ago I happened to read the comments of a well known American concerning those who place constitutional and other difficulties in the way. I refer to Rexford Guy Tugwell, one of the advisers to the present President of the United States. His words are:

> The mediaeval dialectician who argues about the most constitutional method of dealing with a volcano is a greater menace to society than the worst type of agitator.

I do not believe in chaos; I do not believe in violence; I do not believe in disorder, and because I do not believe in those things I am anxious to see the government and the people of Canada grapple with these great problems and meet them in such a manner that we shall avoid the difficulties that might otherwise come to the nation in which we live. May I point this out, that not forever are men and women in middle life and beyond going to be denied the means to live in a land where there is abundance; and still less are those thousands of young men and women growing up in our midst going to stand by and be denied the opportunity to live, to marry, to settle down, to build homes, to lead natural, normal lives, without making striking and effective protests. And Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the government, even if it thinks some of the suggestions we are making from this corner of the house, some of the suggestions that are contained in the resolution put forward to-day are unsound, at least to consider them, and if after mature consideration it believes them to be so unsound as to be impossible of achievement, then I say to the government that it is its duty to bring down alternative proposals that will meet the situation which confronts us.

The Scandinavian countries can teach us many lessons. We heard this afternoon of their great cooperative institutions. I would add that in Sweden, for example, instead of the government taking over bankrupt industries, bankrupt facilities mismanaged by big business, as we and other nations have had to do from time to time, it has taken over and organized some of those great profitable industries which have become monopolistic in their nature and which therefore ought to be a matter of public concern. It has organized those industries in order that the proceeds from them may assist the government of Sweden in financing its general activities—liquor, tobacco, and now it is proposing to take over gasoline and coffee. Things that have become monopolistic in that nation, yielding high returns to the groups that control them are taken over by the government in order that they may be utilized and controlled for the good of the people of Sweden.

During the whole of this depressed period, from 1931 to 1936—and the monthly reports of the Midland Bank of England will justify this statement—the value of the Swedish kronen internally has varied less than two per cent, whereas throughout the rest of the world internal and external currencies have been fluctuating from low depths to higher points and back again from time to time. About a year ago in the monthly report of the Midland Bank I saw a graph depicting the fluctuation of Swedish internal exchange from 99·5 to 101·5 per cent of the par level, almost a straight line, while in Britain the value of the internal pound has gone up to tall peaks and then down into deep valleys. Why? Because in 1931 the social democrats and the farmers of Sweden, representing the people and controlling parliament—and quite recently I may say they were returned with a larger support than ever—intervened to control the economic situation and took over the intelligent supervision of the Swedish financial system. They called in those economists from the universities who are sometimes treated elsewhere with derision and said to them: It is your job to stabilize the purchasing power of the people of Sweden. And they did that very thing. In spite of the fact that during the period to which I just referred Ivor Kruger, Swedish multimillionaire, committed suicide, shaking the financial world to its foundation, the fluctuation in Sweden was less than two per cent.

May I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), for whose ability I have the greatest respect, that he inquire into just exactly what was done in the little kingdom of Sweden, and why it is that unemployment there has been reduced from a comparatively high figure in 1931 and 1932 to less than one per cent of the population at the end of 1935. The last figure I saw for the kingdom of Sweden was that out of a population of some seven and a half millions of people only forty-three thousand were unemployed. That is a tremendous achievement. We are a country in many respects similar to Sweden. We are an exporting country; so is Sweden. It is true that we export different commodities. We export wheat; they export lumber. We failed to find a market for our lumber from the maritime provinces and British Columbia until a comparatively short time ago, but Sweden by means of trade relationships which she instituted, largely through the control of the country's economic structure, was enabled to trade to the advantage of her people.

I was going to quote from recent statistics in relation to Sweden, but I shall not do so to-night because the debate has already proceeded for a long time. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that if we are going to speak we should try to lay before the House of Commons something which is constructive, something which, while not perhaps, in the eyes of the government, applicable to the present situation, may yet induce the government to consider and present proposals of a different nature, designed to grapple with the conditions that surround us.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, the greatest condemnation of the present economic system lies in the fact that it has failed to provide economic security for the great mass of Canadian citizens. I do not believe we can solve the problem by socializing the means of production. People to-day are not interested so much in who owns the means of production as in who is going to own the commodities produced. I feel that we should socialize the products of the machines, not by confiscation or socializing the means of production, but by placing sufficient purchasing power in the hands of the people to equate the selling price of the goods and services for sale. I believe that in doing that we shall solve the problem of adequately distributing the goods that are produced and the services that we can render. If in any economic system production is not reflected adequately by purchasing power in the hands of the people, then it is a stupid system. We must provide through the paying of just wages to those who render services to production; we must provide through the paying of just prices to those who create or produce the raw material necessary to the creation of wealth; we must provide as a supplement to the wages, salaries and commissions paid a national dividend and thus assure to the people by placing in their hands sufficient purchasing power the ownership of the goods that we can produce in such large quantities.

A complete analysis of our economic system will disclose the fact that its true purpose is to provide goods and services for the people as they require them, when they require them and where they require them. We should analyze our economic system and try to understand its component parts or factors. I should say that the two main factors are production and distribution or consumption. Under production there are a number of factors. In order to produce, a country must have favourable laws of nature. Canada is blessed with favourable laws of nature. Canada also has natural resources in abundance from coast to coast. We must have also a knowledge of the scientific methods of production. This is even more important than labour. If you took the modern machinery that we have in Canada to the heart of Africa, if you had on the one hand the negro labourer and on the other, blocks of gold, you would not be able to turn out the goods as we do in this country. This cannot be done because that important factor is missing. In Canada we have a knowledge of the scientific methods of production. Then we must have labour, whether it be solar or human energy. In this country we use machine power more than we use man power. Another factor necessary in production is this thing called money. People are wondering where it is all coming from, but no matter where it comes from we must have it in our system, so that we may pay wages, salaries and commissions and thus establish the cost values of the goods produced.

I should like hon. members to carry their minds back to the period of 1914-18 when Canada enjoyed such prosperity, when our economic system was going full blast within the framework of the existing financial system. During that period there was made available to the producers plenty of credit or money. Fear had vanished from the financial world; they were not afraid to invest their money in creating wealth because they knew there was an effective demand or market for it in the war. Millions were poured into production to create wealth; they were unafraid that purchasing power would not be sufficient to pay for it. They knew that the entire Dominion of Canada stood behind the promise to pay for the goods produced. Our economic system was speeded up with money actually reflecting our collective ability to produce and deliver goods.

If we analyze our system of distribution we realize that here also there are many other factors. Transportation and communication in this country is possibly second to none in any place in the world. We have an elaborate system of distribution in our warehouses and storage tanks, and in our method of selling goods at retail. We have a wonderful system of weights and measures. To facilitate the distribution of goods we must place in the hands of the people sufficient money to complete the economic cycle; we must place in the hands of the people sufficient money with which to purchase the goods we have produced. We realize more and more to-day that this is the factor that is missing; we have not sufficient purchasing power in the hands of the people to buy the goods produced. If we are going to solve this problem we must place in their hands that purchasing power.

When we go into a store and see goods piled on the shelves we do not feel that there is a shortage of the measures of weight or of distance. We know that as long as the goods are there the man selling them is not going to say that he is out of yards or out of pounds. People do not run out of yards, a measure of distance, or out of pounds, a measure of weight, as long as there are goods piled up on their shelves. But how many people go into the stores and look at the goods there just as they would go into a museum and look at the articles displayed there, which they would like to buy if only they had the money. I contend that it is just as foolish for people to say that they have no money to buy the wealth which can be produced in such large quantities as it is to say that there is a shortage of yards or pounds. Surely we can find some means of providing for the producers sufficient credit that they can go ahead and turn our natural resources into consumable goods in sufficient quantity to saturate the markets of this country, and create a surplus that can be shipped out in exchange for goods not naturally produced here. Surely we can find some way of placing in the hands of the people sufficient purchasing power to ensure that they can own the goods that are produced or imported in exchange for our surplus values. That is a problem we have to solve, the problem of distribution. I suggest that there is no better way of solving this problem than to finance consumption, the same as we financed the destruction of goods during the war. Millions of dollars were poured out during the war to finance the destruction of goods. I say that we should pour money into the creation of wealth and into the hands of the people in order that they may consume goods. Until we do that we shall fail to solve our economic problem.

This question of money is continuously being brought up. Where is all the money coming from? We have been told that money must be based upon the intrinsic value of gold and silver, or it must be based upon some other source like financial credit. But I say that money is nothing more or less than a system of figures to give us the information necessary to carry on our economic system. Not necessarily must money be based upon the intrinsic value of gold and silver; but it should actually reflect our collective ability to produce and distribute wealth. If we had a block of gold as big as this desk in front of me, I would not know nor would any other member know how much money we had until we had weighed that gold and multiplied it by the value placed upon it by international financiers and government officials working in cooperation with them. And then you would have a figure by means of which you might calculate how much money you had. The only way you can find out how much money you have in a piece of gold is to weigh it and multiply it by the value placed upon it, whether it be $26 or $50 an ounce. I suggest that money, whether it is stamped upon a piece of gold or a piece of silver or a piece of paper, is only a figure after all, and we should not use this system of figures to figure the common people out of everything they produce. I say that our monetary system should be actually based upon our ability to create wealth and should reflect any increase in that ability to create and distribute wealth and render services.

The period of the war to which I referred was a period during which an enormous debt was piled up, but I believe we can produce and distribute wealth under a monetary system that would not create debt. This can be done. From time to time, as legislation is brought down and motions made in the house, we shall do our utmost to point out to hon. members that we have a financial system that will adequately take care of the economic system, and I trust that we shall be given consideration as we do this from time to time.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the very few minutes that remain this evening I should like to refer to one or two matters that have come up in the course of the debate. First of all, I suggest that unless these discussions are going to range over the whole field of economics it is desirable that the Speaker should rather rigidly restrict the speeches to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend seriously suggesting that in connection with resolutions of this type it is possible at all to restrict private members in their discussion? This is a very important matter and I ask the question in all seriousness.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do suggest that. That is why I objected to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) quoting some bank statements which were all very well in their place—I had no objection to their being placed on Hansard—but had no immediate relevancy to the resolution before the house.

Mr. DUNNING: The resolution proposes to take over the financial institutions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But amounts of money in the banks have no particular relevancy to the resolution. In the same way, I do not know that the doctrines of social credit to which we have just listened have any particular relevancy to the resolution before us. I respectively submit that we are going to get into a bad tangle if on private members' resolutions, specific in character, we are allowed to wander over the whole field. At the same time, it seems to me that we ought to accord some consideration to the newer members of the house who are not very familiar with the rules. I know some have spoken when they were rather out of order; but though I have no particular sympathy with the specific doctrines of some of the members to my left, I felt rather sorry that some hon. gentlemen should attempt to take advantage of their ignorance of the rules of the house. With regard to a matter of this kind, I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), in his usual restrained and courteous manner, put the matter very well when he pleaded that we should give fair treatment to whatever resolution might be brought forward.

I can assure newer members of the house that as I think most of the older members have come to believe, we in this particular group are quite serious about these resolutions we bring forward. They may or may not be right, but we believe them to be right and have been advocating them now for a number of years across the country. I am glad that apparently we have reached the stage at which personal abuse will not be resorted to as a means of meeting an argument. I was rather sorry that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) should have seen fit to take up the time of the house trying to connect the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party with the communists. I have been quite frank to admit that the communist stood for quite a new social order, but—

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend does not intend to finish to-night?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; but, as the hon. member for Davenport recognizes, our method of attaining our end is different. It seems unfortunate that communist tactics and program should be emphasized in a debate in which we have come forward with an altogether different proposal.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 25, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That Messieurs Baker, Bertrand (Prescott), Fafard, Howard, Howden, Landeryou, MacInnis, MacMillan, Macphail (Miss), McLean (Simcoe), Mills, O'Neill, Purdy, Rhéaume, Roberge, Sinclair, Spence, Taylor (Norfolk), Tustin, Veniot, be appointed to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant, as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel myself reluctantly compelled to rise for the purpose of directing attention to what I conceive to be a serious breach of the privileges of this house. The privileges of the house are the right of every member of the house and of no particular group or party in the house. Yesterday Hansard at page 443 indicates that you, Mr. Speaker, when a resolution moved by Mr. Woodsworth was before the chamber, said:

> Mr. Speaker: I would draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) to the remarks I made on the motion that was presented to the house just before this one, as they will apply to this motion, I am afraid, if it is not amended.

Whereupon Mr. Woodsworth made certain observations, and then the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said this, at page 443:

> Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I may say on behalf of the government that we have no objection to this resolution being discussed.
> Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman may proceed.

In order that there may be no question as to difference between Canadian and British procedure, there being in the latter case no appeal from the ruling of the Speaker, I direct attention to our own handbook, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 32, paragraph 103, under standing order 12:

> The Speaker presides over the deliberations of the house, and enforces the observance of all rules for preserving order in its proceedings; he puts every question and declares the determination of the house. As "mouth of the house" he communicates its resolutions to others, conveys its thanks and expresses its censures, its reprimands or its admonitions.

Then there is further reference to his power, that need not here be read. Then paragraph 104:

> The presiding officer, though entitled on all occasions to be treated with the greatest attention and respect by the individual members, because the power, and dignity, and honour of the assembly, are officially embodied in his person, is yet but the servant of the house. He is selected and appointed to the trust of presiding officer, in the confidence and upon the supposition of the conformity of his will to that of the assembly.

I then turn to standing order 54, which dates back to December 20, 1867, at page 141:

> Whenever the Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the house is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the house thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the rule or authority which is applicable to the case.

That was done by your honour yesterday. Then paragraph 462:

> "For the Speaker is not placed in the chair merely to read every bit of paper which any member puts in his hands in the form of a question; but it is his duty to make himself perfectly acquainted with the orders of the house and its ancient practice, and to endeavour to carry those orders and that practice into execution."

And paragraph:

> 463. If, on reading the motion, the Speaker detects an irregularity, he will at once apprise the house of the fact without waiting to have a point of order raised.

One further quotation is pertinent: "the Speaker decides questions of order only when they actually arise, not in anticipation. He is bound to call attention immediately to any irregularity, and not to wait for the interposition of a member. His decision is subject to appeal to the house."

I have indicated Mr. Speaker, what the privileges of the house are. If the representative of a majority in the house can thus make known the will of the government to the Speaker, and the Speaker then indicate to a member that he may proceed, regardless of his previous indication of his views as to the right of that member to proceed, then indeed the position of each individual member in the minority is little less than that of a slave, a slave to the will of the majority communicated to the Speaker. That cannot possibly be the intention of parliament as its privileges have been defined. I bring this matter to the attention of the house because in the opinion of the oldest member of the assembly with whom I have been able to communicate there never has been such an incident as that which happened yesterday. The anxiety displayed by certain hon. gentlemen that the Minister of Justice should be heard, endeavouring to catch the Speaker's eye, was unfortunately apparent to us all. As one of the minority I protest against this violation of the privileges of parliament. I claim my rights as a member of this assembly, as defined since 1867, and I complain very bitterly that any government, because it has behind it a powerful majority, should thus endeavour, regardless of the Speaker's view, to determine what are the rules of order in this house. The rules have been settled almost from time immemorial; they are embodied in forms and orders, and it is the duty of the Speaker to translate those orders into action and to indicate to the members of this assembly when they are or are not in order. I am not discussing the point of order, because it would be improper to do so. I am contenting myself with pointing out this violation of the privileges of parliament, and this endeavour on the part of the majority to control the action of the Chair in determining what construction shall be placed on the rules and procedure governing the conduct of business in this chamber.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, of course it is clear that the onslaught of my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett), though apparently directed to me, is rather directed to Mr. Speaker. May I say immediately that by persisting in these attacks day after day my right hon. friend does not do justice to himself, especially when it is in connection with a matter as frivolous as the one he has raised to-day.

Let me simply point out the facts: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) moved a resolution which at this time I shall not read. As was his right, Mr. Speaker called attention to the fact that possibly the resolution might be out of order and possibly it should be amended. He said:

> I would draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) to the remarks I made on the motion that was presented to the house just before this one, as they will apply to this motion, I am afraid, if it is not amended.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre protested in these words:

> Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that objection is being taken to this resolution?

Then he continued to point out that if objection were taken to a discussion of the resolution it would be a hardship on him. I merely rose in my place and said:

> Mr. Speaker, I may say on behalf of the government that we have no objection to this resolution being discussed.

That was because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was asking whether there was any objection being raised from any quarter to a discussion of the resolution. I said we had no objection to it—and this is the tremendous violation of the privileges of the right hon. gentleman opposite. Well, those of us who sat for the last five years know how my right hon. friend directed the debate, and the way he instructed the Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid the hon. member will have to—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of personal privilege I have a right to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: And I propose to do so. The Minister of Justice has said that I instructed the Speaker. That is an inaccurate, improper and incorrect statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I see. May I add that the persecution of my right hon. friend over the Speaker will not have much effect in Canada.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, with your permission may I say that I have been a member of this house for many years, but I do not recall any incident such as happened yesterday. As a matter of fact I believe the rules provide that when Mr. Speaker gives a ruling there is only one way to change it, and that is by an appeal against his ruling. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) occupies a strong position in this house, and surely he knows the rules as well as any hon. member.

I submit the ruling given yesterday by Mr. Speaker in connection with the resolution offered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was in practically the same words as that given in connection with the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). There was practically no difference between the two. The ruling regarding the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar seems to have been satisfactory to the government, and therefore no difficulty was raised when it was declared out of order. But immediately after, when the resolution offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was called and Mr. Speaker gave the same ruling, I submit the Minister of Justice should have allowed the ruling to stand, and I believe it would have been within the competence of any hon. member to rise at that time and move that the ruling of Mr. Speaker be sustained. My hon. friend yesterday not only did not accept the ruling but did so in brief and curt words. He did not rise in his place and say, "Well, Mr. Speaker, I am ready to submit to your ruling, but I suggest to you that this is a case in which you might allow the debate to proceed, and so far as I am concerned I shall raise no objection."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I will ask my right hon. friend to let my words be read.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think it was consistent with the decorum and dignity of this house to dispose of a matter of this kind in the way it was disposed of yesterday. I say again to my hon. friend that I know of no way in which Mr. Speaker's ruling can be set aside, except by appeal, even if it be the desire of so powerful a member—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was not a ruling.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It was a ruling by Mr. Speaker. These are his words:

> I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the remarks I made on the motion that was presented to the house just before this one, as they will apply to this motion, I am afraid, if it is not amended.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): "I am afraid."

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: In other words, he considered it out of order. In connection with the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, he said:

Before this motion is proceeded with, I suggest to the hon. member that it might be advisable for him to amend his motion, as otherwise I am afraid I shall be bound to declare it out of order, as I did the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg the other day, on the ground that in my opinion if this motion were carried it would involve the expenditure of public money.

Then he rose in connection with the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and gave the same ruling. In other words he considered it to be out of order, too. I am not concerned with the question whether it was or was not out of order. That has nothing to do with the matter at issue. I submit however that this is a most extraordinary procedure to take. I know of no other instance in which it has happened, and I suggest that the action taken by the Minister of Justice was not in accordance with the rules of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Thank you for the lecture, Sir George.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

PROPOSED BILL TO REPEAL 24-25 GEORGE V, 1934, CHAPTER 25—RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been asked by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to render my decision on a point of order raised on the bill "An Act Respecting the Bureau for Translations" upon the copies of the bill that he sent to me at the sitting of Friday, the 20th instant.

I have now the said copies of the bill before me. I find that the bill is out of order because its adoption would mean the transfer of the authority under which the translators' salaries are to be paid. I therefore rule that the bill is out of order.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty' government in the

[Sir George Perley.]

Dominion of Canada and the government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset say a few words with respect to the procedure the government proposes to adopt in asking the approval of this house of the Canada-United States trade agreement which was signed on November 15 last and of the legislation necessary to give it legal effect.

As hon. members will observe, the resolution to which I am speaking at the moment asks the approval of the house, in general terms, of the agreement. The resolution is designed to obtain the opinion of the house as a preliminary proceeding prior to the discussion of the details of the agreement. It is proposed, once the resolution is adopted, immediately to refer to the committee of ways and means, the agreement itself so that there may be a full discussion of its provisions with respect to the tariff changes incidental thereto before the house is asked to pass the legislation necessary to give its terms legal effect. It is in the committee of ways and means that taxes are increased; repealed or otherwise amended.

In the votes and proceedings of Friday last hon. members will doubtless have seen notice of the following motion which has since appeared upon the order paper:

Resolved, that the amendments in the customs tariff required to give effect to the trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington, November 15, 1935, hereto appended, be agreed to so that the said trade agreement may be sanctioned.

The notice given in that form implied that certain amendments would have to be made to the Customs Tariff Act in connection with the schedules of the agreement. That is not the case. No amendments to the Customs Tariff Act are required with respect to the schedules. I therefore had substituted the following notice which appears in the votes and proceedings of yesterday:

That the fiscal treatment accorded to goods, the produce or manufacture of the United States of America, by the trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington, November 15, 1935, be agreed to so that there may be introduced a bill giving the said trade agreement the force of law in Canada.

Under that motion, which will follow the adoption of the resolution that is now before the house, if the resolution is adopted, the agreement itself will, as I have said, be considered in committee of ways and means so that there may be the fullest discussion of the several items in the schedules which set forth the rates of duty. After discussion in committee of ways and means, and the report thereon, leave will be asked for the introduction of a bill respecting the trade agreement between Canada and the United States. The bill will contain the following as its second clause:

> The trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America set out in the schedule to this act is hereby approved and shall have the force of law notwithstanding the provisions of any law in force in Canada.

I am presenting to the house these three distinct steps in order to remove any doubt as to the authority which parliament has over the agreement, and in order to make clear the extent to which parliament will have discussed in advance the details of the agreement before being asked, under the bill which will be introduced to approve of it in its entirety.

Hon. members will recall that when we were discussing the Canada-United Kingdom agreement strong exception was taken by the opposition of the day to the order of procedure then adopted by the government. The objection was taken on the ground that the house was asked to approve the agreement by a bill which was introduced and passed through all its stages without previous discussion in committee of ways and means of the changes in the customs tariff necessitated by the agreement. The first, second and third readings of the bill were completed before there was any discussion in committee of the whole house of the schedules to the agreement, which involved increases in the tariff as well as in some cases decreases. That was, as I said at the time, an irregular procedure. It was not the procedure adopted by the parliament at Westminster with respect to the approval of the agreement in Great Britain. In the first instance, the agreement was referred at Westminster to the committee of ways and means, and after discussion in the committee a bill was introduced giving effect to the agreement. The reverse procedure was however, adopted here. To avoid a repetition of anything of the kind, the procedure which I have indicated will be followed in the present instance. That, too, I hope, will remove any doubt in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who the other day said a word about parliament being obliged to approve the agreement before hon. members had had a chance of discussing its terms. Members will see that, so far as the approval that is now being asked is to be given, it is subject to the legislation that will be necessary to give the agreement legal effect, and that legislation the house will not be asked to pass until it has discussed very fully, in committee of the whole, the essential provisions and schedules of the agreement.

May I also at the outset clear up another possible misunderstanding in the minds of some, namely, that the government has proceeded to put the agreement into force without having received in the first instance the approval of parliament. To appearances that might seem to be the case; in reality it is not so. The agreement is not yet in force. What is in force are certain schedules attached to the agreement, and they are in force pending the approval of the agreement; pending the agreement itself becoming law. If this house should decide that the agreement shall not become law then immediately such advantages as have been accruing to the country under the provisions of the agreement since January 1 will immediately cease. It is true that under the agreement, since January 1 of this year, Canada has had the advantage of lower tariff rates with respect to many commodities going from this country into the United States, and similarly this country has granted to the United States the benefit of its intermediate tariff and also certain special concessions in force at the present time. It has been possible for the government to gain for this country the immediate advantage of entry of its commodities at a lower rate of duty into the United States and to grant reduction in rates of duty in the United States pending the final enactment of the bill because of legislation passed in the last parliament which gave to the governor in council express power to reduce duties where the country was obtaining from some other country reciprocal concessions and advantages. May I quote the exact section which governs in this matter? Under the authority of section 11 of the Customs Tariff the governor in council may "make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for concessions granted by any such country or countries." That legislation was introduced by my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition in 1931 when he held the office of Prime Minister. The legislation received at that time the approval of all parties in the house. I want to stress that feature. It was an enactment which met with no opposition on the part of the opposition of the day or indeed from hon. members of any of the groups then in the house. The house unanimously approved the power then sought for the governor in council in the particulars which I have mentioned. The law as enacted in 1931 referred to reductions of duties by way of compensation. Later on in the same session the government brought down legislation to have the word "concessions" substituted for the words "reductions on Canadian products." Section 11 of chapter 30 of the statutes of 1931, reads as follows:

> The governor in council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for reductions on Canadian products granted by any such country or countries.

In 1935 this section was amended by the following resolution in the budget:

> Resolved, that the aforesaid customs tariff be further amended by deleting from section 11 thereof the words "reductions on Canadian products" and by substituting in lieu thereof the word "concessions."

The part of the agreement which is in force at the present time is in force, therefore, not because of any power which the present governor in council has taken to itself with respect to the reduction of duties, but rather because of legislation which was enacted in a previous parliament and approved by all parties in the house, and which gave to the government of the day the power to reduce duties where there were corresponding concessions being made by another country.

There is one other feature I should like to mention by way of comparison between the present agreement between Canada and the United States and the Canada-United Kingdom agreement. All changes in the tariff under the Canada-United States agreement are in the nature of reductions; under the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, a very large proportion were in the nature of increases in the tariff. Additional taxes were being imposed which was the reason why the then opposition took strong exception to the government of the day approving the agreement and passing the act itself in advance of tariff schedules being considered in the committee of ways and means. Under the present agreement there is no increase in duties; existing duties are lowered. Parliament, as I have said, has given full authority to the governor in council to take action of this kind whenever the opportunity presents itself. No exception can be taken to this agreement on the score that parliament has had no say with respect to the new rates of duty which became effective on January 1.

May I say a word or two as to the attitude of the different political parties in this country with respect to the negotiation of reciprocal agreements with the United States. I shall not traverse much of the ground of the past, but simply indicate what has been historically the attitude of the parties and the actual agreements that have been negotiated, or concerning which there have been attempts at negotiation.

As hon. members know, prior to confederation there existed between Canada and the United States a reciprocal agreement of an extensive character. This agreement was in force from 1854 until 1866. Since confederation no previous government has apparently found it possible, however successfully negotiated, to bring a reciprocal trade agreement between Canada and the United States to the stage where it has become part of the law of the land. Since confederation agreements have been successfully negotiated including the present, on three occasions. It is significant, may I point out in passing, that in each instance it was when a Liberal administration was in office in Canada. In 1874 an agreement was negotiated by the government of Alexander Mackenzie. That agreement was signed by George Brown, on behalf of Canada, and Hamilton Fish, on the part of the United States. The agreement was defeated by the Senate of the United States.

The next agreement to be negotiated successfully was in 1911, when a reciprocal agreement was negotiated under the administration of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That agreement was not in the form of a treaty; it was to be effected by legislation to be passed concurrently by the two countries. The United States enacted the necessary legislation, but, as hon. members will recall only too well, when the legislation was under discussion in this house the opposition from the Conservative benches of the day became so strong that Sir Wilfrid Laurier decided to ask for the dissolution of parliament and go to the country on the issue of a reciprocal agreement with the United States. When the matter came before the country in a general election the issue ceased to be discussed primarily on its merits as a great economic question and was treated as a political question. It was said that an agreement of the kind would lead to political union with the United States; the cry of annexation was raised and an appeal was made to the patriotism of the people. It was stated that an agreement of the kind would mean the end of the development of Canada as a nation, that our trade would all go north and south, and that if once we entered into a trade agreement with the United States on the extensive scale of the one proposed at the time, sooner or later we would break away from the empire. No one was stronger in his opposition to that agreement than the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He argued, with all the power and eloquence at his command, all the points of which I have made mention.

I should like to point out wherein fortunately we are differently situated at the present time as regards this trade agreement. This is the third agreement, again one which has been negotiated by a Liberal government. There is no possibility of a repetition of what occurred in 1874 when the agreement of that time was defeated by the Senate of the United States. This agreement has been negotiated under special powers given to the president by the congress of the United States. Congressional authority has conferred on the president power to make reciprocal agreements within certain prescribed limits with other countries, and to proclaim such agreements without further reference to congress. So far as the difficulty which presented itself in 1911 is concerned, I do not think it will present itself at the present time. Fortunately at the moment we are just over a general election rather than entering into one. The question of a reciprocal agreement with the United States was an important issue in the last election. I might point out further that it was an issue upon which the respective political parties of the country were not divided; for once they were happily united. My right hon. friend, then the leader of the Conservative party, not only stated that he was in favour of a reciprocal agreement with the United States, but presented to the country the basis upon which he thought that agreement should be entered into.

Mr. BENNETT: Not entered into, negotiated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend corrects me and says, "not entered into, negotiated." I accept the correction. I do not know whether my right hon. friend suggests that he had never intended to enter into an agreement; I always thought that he had. At any rate, the basis on which the negotiation was to take place was laid down and to all appearances the country, the electorate, were led to understand that the Conservative party was committed to the negotiation of a reciprocal agreement with the United States.

So far as the Liberal party is concerned, there never could be any doubt as to what our position would be were we returned to power. From the days of confederation down to the present the Liberal party has consistently stood for, fought for, and been prepared to give up power in a struggle for a reciprocal agreement that would be to the mutual advantage of both the United States and Canada. It would take a long time to run over the controversy of those years, but it is significant, as one tries to get a hurried view of the situation, to discover that, for the most part, when the Conservatives were in office they were never able to effect an agreement with the United States, largely because they were unwilling to make an agreement broad enough to include the possible export from the United States into this country of manufactured or semi-manufactured goods. They sought to have the agreement kept almost exclusively to natural products.

So far as Liberal administrations have been concerned, while conceding up to a point a measure of protection to certain industries, they have felt that in any agreement with the United States there should be an opportunity afforded of goods being brought into Canada, for purposes of competition if need be, goods not in the shape of natural products only but also in the shape of manufactured and semi-manufactured articles. At any rate, that seems to have been the reason why, from the Conservative point of view, no agreement was ever reached by that party. It will be recalled that, when the national policy was introduced, it was introduced not as a permanent policy of protection but as a measure of retaliation against the United States; and it was intended—it was so stated at least at the time—subsequently to repeal or to change it, provided better trade relations could be effected between the two countries. Once having been introduced as a measure of retaliation, it was retained as a matter of Conservative policy and has operated ever since to prevent an agreement going into force between Canada and the United States.

There is one other possible reason why at this moment the opportunity has been more favourable to effecting an agreement than at any other time. From confederation up to the present day there have been only two occasions on which it has happened that there were in office in the United States and Canada at the same time governments which stood avowedly for lower tariffs. The previous occasion was in 1896, at the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government came into office. Grover Cleveland's government was in office in the United States, and for eight months at that time there were two administrations, one at Washington and one at Ottawa, each of which was favourable to lower tariffs as between the two countries. Unfortunately, an election in the United States occurred after Sir Wilfrid Laurier's assumption of office. There was not, therefore, the opportunity in 1896 for the new Liberal administration in Canada, coming into office, as this administration came into office after a general election, of seeking immediately to negotiate a trade agreement with a government in the United States holding views very similar to its own as to the mutual advantages of trade. When the present Liberal administration came into power, we were fortunate enough to find in office in the United States a low tariff administration, an administration that had claimed from the outset that it was desirous of entering into reciprocal agreements with other countries, and had made it quite clear that of the number Canada was one of the most important. That, I think, was a fortunate circumstance—it was an exceptional opportunity for favourable negotiation—and I believe the agreement we have to-day is in considerable measure the result of that circumstance.

I come now to the circumstances related immediately to the agreement which is before us; and which is based, I want to say very frankly, upon much that was ascertained by my right hon. friend opposite when he was in office. In considering the present agreement, it is necessary to keep in mind that it was negotiated under the special powers given to the President of the United States to enter into agreements with other countries on a reciprocal basis. Those special powers were distinctly limited, so that any agreement that could be made at this time would necessarily be limited in its scope. It was within the framework of the powers given the president by congress that the previous administration sought to negotiate an agreement; it was within that same framework that the present administration successfully negotiated the agreement into which it has entered.

The president is empowered to make an agreement, but it cannot be for a period longer than three years; that is the first limitation. Let me pause here to say a word which I hope will help to dispose of an objection which possibly may be raised by my right hon. friend. It is the one he put forward at the time of the reciprocal agreement of 1911. At that time my right hon. friend took the position that inasmuch as there was not a term of years and, by implication, a long term of years, fixed for the agreement, there was a strong reason why we should not enter into it at all. He claimed that channels of trade developed over a period of years and that it was not right that this country should enter into an agreement which might be abrogated on short notice at the will of either country which was a party to it.

My right hon. friend knew, when he began to negotiate in 1934, that he could not enter into an agreement for a longer period than three years, with the possibility of its continuance with the approval of both parties subject to six months' notice. He had apparently overcome his objection to making any agreement unless it could be for a long term of years. I recall that at the time of the Canada-United Kingdom negotiations my right hon. friend put forward the same argument—that the agreement ought to be made for many years, and the longer the better. On this occasion he appears to have been content to enter into negotiations for an agreement for three years in the hope, let us say, that it might be extended for a longer period if it proved satisfactory in the interval. I wish to make it quite clear that we cannot now encounter, as an objection to this agreement, the objection raised so strenuously by the Conservative opposition of a former day, that the agreement is not definitely fixed for a long period. I am perfectly sure, recalling the discussions that took place at the time of the negotiation of the 1911 agreement, that if the government of the day had entered into an agreement for a period of years the Conservative opposition would have said that we had made a great mistake, that we should never have entered into an agreement fixed for a term of years, but that we should have left our government free to cancel the agreement in accordance with what might seem to be wise in the circumstances as the years went by. With respect to his recent negotiations, I shall assume throughout that my right hon. friend was in earnest in being prepared to negotiate on the lines upon which he professed to be ready to negotiate. I therefore conclude that we are at present in accord on the wisdom as respects duration of entering into an agreement for a period albeit of only three years.

The next limitation placed upon the president was that in the reduction of duties no duties could be reduced by more than fifty per cent. Naturally that again restricted materially the scope of any agreement which might be reached. I know there are many who feel that some items in the United States tariff which have been reduced by fifty per cent or by a lesser amount, should have been reduced by a larger per cent than fifty. It was not possible to go that far no matter how strongly we might have pressed and also assuming that the government of the United States had thought it wise and advisable so to do. The president's powers were restricted to, at most, the reduction of existing duties by fifty per cent.

There was a third restriction on the president, namely, that no commodity which under the existing tariff was dutiable could be placed on the free list. There was also a fourth limitation with respect to negotiating with the United States at this time. This restriction was not imposed by congress but arose out of a matter of domestic policy on the part of the government of the United States, namely that any agreement must necessarily be based upon the exchange of most favoured nation treatment as between the countries signing it. That was on the part of the United States a sine qua non of any agreement that could be entered into. Such was the framework of negotiation, and it was within that framework that my right hon. friend was prepared to proceed. It was within that framework that we were obliged to proceed. The possible scope, the important considerations, the other possibilities involved, all become pretty clear once it is realized just what the limitations and restrictions were.

The act under which the president was given power to negotiate is known as the Trade Agreement Act, and became effective on June 12, 1934. I think I should read the first part of that act, because I believe it throws new light upon the importance of negotiating trade agreements at this time. It stresses the depression as a factor which is important to countries considering the expanding of their trade. Here may I say, what I should like to emphasize throughout, that depression, rightly understood, means nothing more or less than absence of trade; and may I state the reverse as being equally true, that trade—plenty of trade—means the end of depression. That fact, I believe, is coming to be increasingly appreciated after some four or five years of economic nationalism during which efforts at promoting trade have been circumscribed and restricted rather than expanded.

The act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which constitutes the Trade Agreement Act of 1934, reads as follows:

> For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—
> (1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and
> (2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 per centum any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists.

Other limitations are then set forth. What I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members is that what is said there with respect to the advantages of a reciprocal agreement so far as the United States is concerned, might be said in identical words with respect to the advantages to Canada of a reciprocal agreement with other countries where the advantages gained are mutual.

May I here remind the house of the efforts that have been made by the Liberal party, since the defeat of the reciprocity agreement of 1911, to have, if at all possible, some reciprocal agreement entered into with the United States. As I have mentioned, the agreement of 1911 was in the nature of an arrangement to be effected through concurrent legislation. The United States had passed the necessary legislation. It allowed that legislation to remain on its statute books. So long as it remained on the statute books of the United States, that legislation was available to this country at any time we chose to take advantage of it. From 1911 on throughout the remainder of his life, Sir Wilfrid Laurier urged upon the government of the day—the Conservative government of the day—not to let that opportunity go by. Despite the defeat they had inflicted upon his own administration at the polls in 1911, he urged the then government to take a broader view and to make a reciprocal agreement. He pointed out that, unless advantage were taken of the opportunity, it was inevitable that sooner or later a change would come in the attitude of the United States. He warned that existing rates of duty would be raised, and that it would then become more difficult than ever for Canada to enter into an arrangement with the United States. I ask hon. members to keep this in mind, because it has an all important bearing upon the wisdom of approving this agreement. If this agreement is not entered into at this time we may be as sure as that night follows day, that in the course of a very short time the opportunities which exist to-day for favourable trading will so far as the United States is concerned be made much more difficult. It has happened at all times that where advantage has not been taken of a favorable opportunity, a reaction has set in, and the other extreme has been encountered.

As I say, from 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier urged and the Liberal opposition after Sir Wilfrid's day continued to urge that advantage should be taken of the opportunity to effect a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. But the appeal passed unheeded and we fell upon difficult years. What was the result? The result was that we had the Fordney-McCumber tariff, and later the Hawley-Smoot tariff, each of which raised the barriers against Canada to a higher point than they had ever been before. In 1923 the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding introduced in the Customs Tariff Act a standing offer to the United States, after their offer to Canada had been repealed, by a provision which gave to the governor in council power to reduce duties on certain commodities provided the United States would enter into reciprocal arrangements with Canada with respect to any of the commodities mentioned. That offer remained on our statutes for years. It remained there, I think, until my right hon. friend in 1931 substituted what I have read to-day as the power given to his government or any succeeding government to reduce duties in a still broader way. Throughout, the attitude of the Liberal party has been that of urging that every effort should be made to further reciprocal trade under such opportunities as might be afforded. In our last parliament the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) in three succeeding sessions presented a resolution urging upon the government to enter into a reciprocal agreement with the United States. On each of those occasions my right hon. friend, then Prime Minister, said that negotiations were proceeding, and asked us not to discuss the matter further for fear we might prejudice the possibility of the government securing on the best terms possible an agreement with the United States. Knowing that everyone in this country who really had at heart the development of the nation was desirous of seeing trade developed, the Liberal opposition of the day met my right hon. friend's request and refrained from discussion in order to give him every opportunity to make all the progress he could. And here may I say, if this agreement is not all that some would like it to be, one of the real reasons unquestionably is the fact that my right hon. friend did not seize the earliest opportunity to make an agreement with the United Sates. He allowed one year after another to go by. We well know that even before Mr. Roosevelt was in office, during his election campaign, he made it perfectly clear that he was most anxious to have the United States enter into reciprocal trade agreements with other counries. Stressing as he did throughout his campaign a policy of neighbourliness, it was obvious that he was looking to the possibility of increasing trade and, with it, friendly relations between the United States and ourselves as her immediate neighbour. But my right hon. friend let those years go by, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925; those years slipped away—

Mr. BENNETT: They went by certainly, and my right hon. friend was there; those were his years.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): And 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929 as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my right hon. friend for his correction. There is nothing too small for him to pick up. It was quite obvious that I meant to say 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935; that those years slipped by while the president's offer was being made to Canada, and when it would have been possible, I believe, to make an agreement on much better terms than were possible later on.

Mr. CAHAN: The president's offer was not made until June, 1934.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But my hon. friend knows that negotiations should have been started before.

Mr. BENNETT: And they were.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's leader says that they were. Which is right? The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) says that they could not have been.

Mr. CAHAN: No, I beg your pardon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. CAHAN: Oh well—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He says "Well."

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, if I should repeat it the right hon. gentleman would misinterpret and misconstrue it. That is his attitude of mind to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I thank my hon. friend for resorting to that last remark to get himself out of a hole. However, I do not want to enter into any controversy with my hon. friends opposite on what must be obvious to everyone, namely, that from the time hon. gentlemen came into office they had a chance to begin negotiations with the United States and did not do it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What about 1921 to 1930?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every effort was made. We were not successful for the reasons I have just mentioned. The Republican party was in office in the United States and had put up the tariff to heights unknown before, and had done so largely as a result of the fact that the Conservative party in Canada had defeated the reciprocity agreement and had not when in office subsequently taken advantage over a period of years of the offer which continued to be made by the United States to effect a reciprocal agreement with Canada.

As everyone knows, in the matter of international negotiations it is much easier to work out the terms of an agreement when there is plenty of time for negotiation than when the time available becomes increasingly limited. If the Liberal party had been in office two years sooner, as it should have been, and would have been had my right hon. friend gone to the country when the country was demanding he should, we would have been able to make a more favourable agreement than was possible at the end of last year. As the matter stood, the present agreement was reached within two months of the reassembling of congress and within a year of the date on which a presidential election is to take place. As all who are familiar with public affairs in the United States are aware, it is extremely difficult for the government of the United States or the president to give on the eve of the reassembling of congress the consideration to such matters that at another time it might be possible for him to give. Also in the year of a presidential election all such matters become frought with fresh difficulties. Fortunately, however, there remained time enough for us to make a very good agreement, but as I say the path was made more difficult for us by the fact that my hon. friends held on to office long after they should have, and during the whole of which time they took good care to see that no agreement was entered into with the United States.

May I mention another handicap? It has been said that the Canada-United Kingdom agreement was not an obstacle to negotiation; that my right hon. friend proved that it was possible to enter into an agreement with the United States notwithstanding the existence of the Canada-United Kingdom agreement. Let me say that the present administration, when it began the negotiation of this agreement, made it a matter of policy that nothing would be done in the agreement with the United States which would in any way affect any of the provisions of the Canada-United Kingdom agreements. No matter what it would cost us and notwithstanding that we did not like many of its provisions, we were prepared to take that position and we took it and held to it throughout. And although every effort was made to have us consider the matter otherwise, to fix margins, peg rates of duty in this agreement as was done in the Canada-United Kingdom agreement we took as strongly the position that we would not agree to restrict in any way our complete freedom of action with respect to any arrangements or agreements we might have or hereafter might wish to make with Great Britain or other parts of the empire. Had my right hon. friend and his government followed that plan in connection with the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, we in Canada would be in a better position to-day to make agreements with other countries. But as hon. members know, provisions were inserted in the Canada-United Kingdom agreement under which fixed margins had to be preserved. These fixed margins have prevented reductions in duties to other countries, and to that extent have limited the powers of the government in the negotiation of other agreements. My right hon. friend said the other day that there were some things not in the Canada-United States agreement which he thought should have been. Had there been no empire agreements, some of those things which he finds missing might have been included, but we were prevented as he knows from negotiating with respect to anthracite coal, Indian corn, canned fruits, dried currants, raisins and other commodities. These are only some of the principal products on which our obligations to empire countries precluded more extensive concessions being granted to the United States in exchange for which we might have obtained a still more comprehensive agreement. To preserve the agreements made with other parts of the empire by my right hon. friend, in which duties were pegged at certain levels, we had immediately to say, "On these things we cannot negotiate further," although in some cases it obviously would have been in the interests of our consumers and producers alike for us to have been able so to do.

Now I come to something which seems to me pretty effectively precludes my right hon.

friend from taking exception to the lines on which we have proceeded, assuming he was in earnest in the negotiations he was conducting with the United States. A few days ago my right hon. friend placed on Hansard at full length a note dated November 14, 1934, from the Canadian Minister in Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States. The note sets forth what my right hon. friend, speaking as the leader of the government of which he was the head, and in the name of the Conservative party in Canada, purported to be their position as he saw it with respect to trade between Canada and the United States, and the basis upon which he was prepared to negotiate.

I wish to read a few extracts from that communication to hon. members so that they may see how much we had reason to believe that in our efforts to effect an agreement we would meet not with the opposition of my right hon. friend but with his hearty approval and cooperation. I rather expected that, at a time like this and respecting an agreement of such importance, my right hon. friend would have adopted towards the present administration something of the attitude which the Liberal party in opposition took towards his government when we accorded it the fullest freedom to make an agreement with the United States and did what we could to assist it in securing the most favourable terms. However he has not taken that attitude. The note begins as follows:

> Sir, the government of Canada for many months have been giving careful consideration to the means whereby the exchange of commodities between Canada and the United States might be increased, and I have been instructed to present a statement of their views for the information of the government of the United States. The government of Canada believe that the time has come for definite action and that the declared desire of both governments to improve conditions of trade between the two countries should now be carried into effect by the negotiation of a comprehensive trade agreement.
> You will recall that when the Prime Minister of Canada visited Washington in April, 1933, at the invitation of the President of the United States, the development of trade between the two countries was sympathetically discussed. On April 29, 1933, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bennett issued a joint statement at the end of their conversations, which concluded as follows:
> "We have also discussed the problems peculiar to the United States and Canada. We have agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between our two countries, and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent, but also the general improvement of world conditions."

They were taking the large view—not merely the mutual benefits to be derived, but a general improvement in world conditions. Then, a little farther on in the note I find this:

> On February 22, 1934, the Department of State issued to the press a statement concerning trade negotiations with Canada, which reads as follows:
> "The trade between the United States and Canada is larger in normal times than that between any other two countries in the world, and it is natural that both countries should desire to restore the reciprocal flow of commodities to normal proportions. We hope to be in a position at an early date to take steps looking to the conclusion of a trade agreement with Canada which will further the interests of both countries. We hope thus to bring into practical application the 'good neighbour' policy between these two great countries which have so much in common."

That is the end of the quotation. Then the note continues:

> A few days later, on March 2nd, the president requested the congress to enact legislation conferring on him authority to enter into trade agreements, in a message which concluded with the following words:
> "I hope for early action. The many immediate situations in the field of international trade that to-day await our attention can be met effectively and with the least possible delay."
> The legislation in question became law on June 12.

That made clear the feelings of the government of the day, and indicated not only that an agreement was desirable but that no time should be lost; that there should be immediate action. Further on I find this:

> It is hardly necessary to stress the importance to both the United States and Canada of their mutual trade.

And elsewhere:

> The relative importance of the market of each country to the other, and the persistence of trading on a substantial scale throughout the changing phases of the business cycle, as revealed by the trade returns, demonstrate the inherent advantage of this interchange of commodities, and the tremendous potentialities of expansion under favourable conditions. But no useful purpose can be served by calculating the relative shares retained by each country in a total world trade that for four years has been steadily shrinking, until in 1933 it fell in value to approximately one-third of the level of 1929. If peace and prosperity are to be established on an enduring basis, it is essential to increase the absolute volume of world trade. No better beginning can be made than by taking steps to increase without delay the volume of trade between two countries which offer the most notable opportunity.

Could any language be stronger than that as to the wisdom of a reciprocal agreement within the framework I have indicated for the purpose of furthering the trade of the two countries? I shall read this further paragraph:

> It should be realized that certain formidable obstacles to the lowering of tariff barriers now prevailing in other parts of the world are not present between the United States and Canada. The opportunities of a new continent have resulted in a parallel economic and social development almost without precedent.

I am putting these matters on record, because I believe they will serve to answer my right hon. friend, by his own words, when he rises to speak against the agreement which is now before us for approval. He will find in his own words the answer to the arguments which he will seek to urge against this agreement. He continues:

Standards of living and working conditions are similar on both sides of the international boundary. The measures of protection which each government has imposed against the products of the other country have not been determined by a desire to exclude the products of cheap labour. In these difficult times, countries seeking to maintain high domestic standards of living have a common interest in expanding trade with each other. For the past year, also, the Canadian dollar has been close to parity with the United States dollar, and the disturbing effects of exchange instability have in large part disappeared. Even if the desired general revival of international trade should still be delayed for a considerable period, there is much to be said in favour of an immediate attempt to increase the volume of commerce between these two neighbouring countries, whose traditions and ideals of social and economic progress are so alike.

And a little further on:

The government of Canada is prepared to join the government of the United States in a declaration that their common objective is the attainment of the freest possible exchange of natural products between the two countries. It is recognized that this objective cannot be attained in the immediate future, as important interests in both countries would be disturbed unduly by the sudden removal of existing tariffs on all natural products. The government of Canada would therefore favour, as the first step, the reductions included in the proposals set out in the next paragraph, to be succeeded by progressive mutual reductions in the duties on natural products, leading to the attainment of the declared objective.

The note goes on to set forth the basis on which an agreement will be entered into, and here it will be observed that it is the only basis, as I have pointed out, on which any government in Canada could have entered into an agreement with the government of the United States. The powers which the president had were circumscribed. The policy of the United States was to make an agreement only on an exchange of most favoured nation treatment. When we come to consider what was actually done, and what could actually be done today, it will be seen that the basis set out in this note was the only possible basis.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the right hon. gentleman mention again the date of that note?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is dated November 14, 1934. It was in June, 1934, that the president had been given power to negotiate as I have indicated. This note was the outcome of careful consideration and compilation by the officials of the public service after investigation on their part and in collaboration with the ministers of the day. The note goes on to say—I ask the house to note this:

I am authorized to put forward the following outline as a suitable basis for the negotiation of a trade agreement:

(a) A mutual undertaking to maintain during the lifetime of the agreement the unrestricted free entry of commodities now on the free list of either country.

That was the first step, and that has been done in the agreement which the present administration has effected. The note continues:

(b) The mutual concession of tariff treatment as favourable as that accorded to any other foreign country; this means that Canada would extend to the United States its intermediate tariff involving reductions from the present rates of duty on some 700 items, including both natural and manufactured products, together with a number of further reductions below the intermediate tariff rates through the extension to the United States of concessions made by Canada in trade conventions with foreign countries.

This again has been done in the agreement reached by this government with the United States—the exchange of most favoured nation treatment as between the two countries, with certain additional concessions. Then follows (c):

(c) The reduction by 50 per cent of the existing United States rates of duty, as authorized by the Tariff Act of 1934, on a specified number of natural products, including inter alia, lumber, fish, potatoes, milk and cream, and live cattle; a number of other agricultural products, and several minerals both metallic and non-metallic.

What is set forth in that clause has not been accomplished in full, but it has been accomplished in very large part. I shall have more to say on this point later. It is to be remembered this was a basis only for negotiation and represented undoubtedly a maximum demand. The note represented the proposals which were to be the subject of negotiation. Then (d):

(d) The reduction of the existing rates of duty by the United States on a number of partly or wholly manufactured products of Canada, including some processed natural products and certain products in which hydro-electric power comprises an important element in the cost of production.

That objective has been secured in the agreement reached by the present administration. Then (e):

(e) The reduction of the existing rates of duty by Canada on a number of natural and partly or wholly manufactured products of the United States.

That was Canada's concession to the United States as proposed by my right hon. friend opposite. We have followed him again in that, and have made concessions in accordance with this particular clause. This ends the part of the note dealing with the basis of negotiations. The note goes on to say:

In view of the declared policy of the governments of the United States and Canada to improve existing trade relations, and of the progress already made in both countries in the necessary preparatory studies, there would appear to be no barrier to the immediate initiation of negotiations and their speedy conclusion.

That was on November 14, 1934. Remember that the general elections in Canada did not take place until the month of October, 1935, nearly one year after, but my right hon. friend through his minister in the United States said to the government of the United States in the month of November, 1934:

In view of the declared policy of the governments of the United States and Canada to improve existing trade relations, and of the progress already made in both countries in the necessary preparatory studies, there would appear to be no barrier to the immediate initiation of negotiations and their speedy conclusion.

I agree with that statement. I do not think there should have been any barrier to immediate negotiations and to their speedy conclusion. But why did that barrier come into existence? There can be only one answer, and that is that my right hon. friend himself did not proceed with the negotiations as he should have proceeded with them, and would have proceeded with them, had he been anxious to effect an agreement.

How did the United States government receive the proposals of my right hon. friend? I shall not read the entire note from the Secretary of State of the United States to the Canadian minister, but I shall quote from it. It is dated Washington, December 7, 1934, and makes clear that the United States shared the view expressed by the then Canadian government that it should be possible to make an agreement in a short time. It indicates in order that there might be no mistake as to how far the United States might be able to go, one additional point which the United States government felt they should bring to the immediate attention of my right hon. friend before they negotiated further. We shall see later how my right hon. friend viewed the point thus raised. The note is signed by the Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull:

I have given careful consideration to your note. I fully subscribe to the views which you express in regard to the importance to each of our countries of its trade with the other, and I am happy to note the willingness of your government to undertake negotiations looking to an increase in trade in both directions. It is not necessary to comment in detail on your statements respecting the balance of payments as between our countries. As you are aware, international balances are settled on many fronts, and it would be a serious setback to world trade if countries undertook to achieve balances with individual countries.

This would seem to indicate that my right hon. friend had been seeking an agreement on a balance of trade as between the United States and Canada alone. That may account for some delay in the negotiations. Obviously the view expressed by Mr. Hull is the correct one, and the only correct one, namely, that in international exchange trade balances are settled, not on one front, but on many fronts. Mr. Hull goes on to say:

I believe that a point has now been reached when an exchange of views on this subject with Canada should be undertaken, and I am, therefore, gratified to learn that your government is of the same mind. Whatever the desirability of the freest possible exchange of natural products, and indeed other products, between the United States and Canada as an ultimate goal, the United States government must in any negotiations undertaken at this time restrict itself to measures authorized by the Trade Agreements Act, 1934, of which I enclose a copy.

The outline which you suggest as a possible basis for discussions has been noted. You mention several specific products upon which your government proposes to seek reductions in existing rates of duty in this country. In communicating to you the willingness of the government of the United States to enter upon negotiations with your government looking to a trade agreement calculated to increase trade in both directions, I must, of course, make it clear that in advance of negotiations this government can not make any commitment as to whether it will be possible to agree to a reduction in the rates of duty on particular products, each of which must be carefully studied in the light of existing economic conditions before any decision can be reached. This is the procedure which has been adopted and followed in connection with the trade agreement negotiations with other governments. Correspondingly, it is understood that your government will wish to give the same study to individual products upon which this government may request reductions in the Canadian rates of duty.

I suggest that to the proposed outline of discussions there be added the question of methods determining the value of merchandise for duty purposes in either country, a matter which I consider of importance in the proposed negotiations.

In that communication the Secretary of State of the United States made it perfectly clear that there was one clause in the proposed basis of negotiation, as put forward by my right hon. friend, to which the United States could not agree in its entirety, namely, that they should give to the extent that was indicated a reduction of duty on certain specific commodities. They were prepared, however, to take into account existing conditions and circumstances and to see how far they could go in the matter. They stressed also the importance of including in the discussion the method of determining the value of merchandise for duty purposes, the administration of customs laws, artificial restrictions upon imports, and powers taken by the governor in council with respect to customs regulations which were particularly objectionable to the United States, as they had been to other countries.

How did my right hon. friend proceed from that stage? The following is the reply which was sent on January 4, 1935:

I have the honour to acknowledge your note of the 27th December, 1934, in which you advise me of the willingness of your government to enter upon negotiations with the government of Canada looking to a trade agreement calculated to increase trade between our two countries, and to assure you that my government, who have noted the suggestion that the question of methods of determining the value of merchandise for duty purposes be added to the proposed bases for discussion set forth in my note of the 14th November, are ready to commence negotiations immediately with a view to the conclusion of a commercial agreement with the government of the United States of America.

That was the situation on January 4, 1935, before the previous parliament had held its last session. I submit that at that time my right hon. friend knew entirely the framework within which the agreement was to be made, how far it would be possible for him to go, and if he was prepared to carry on negotiations, about how far it would be possible for the United States to go. But have we a record of any further communications? Nothing further was given to this parliament or to the country until we were in the midst of a general election. Over and over again during the last session we asked my right hon. friend what progress he was making in the negotiations. We sought to discuss tariff matters; resolutions were introduced favouring reductions in the duties on farm implements, on machinery for mining and on the instruments of production in the other basic industries such as fishing, lumbering and the like. Each time a resolution of the kind was introduced my right hon. friend asked us to allow it to be dropped, not to proceed further with it because it might prejudice his negotiations with the United States. In that way we were prevented from discussing the matter throughout the session. Until after parliament was dissolved no word of any agreement was forthcoming. No doubt when my right hon. friend speaks he will give us the reasons for all these delays. What I want to ask is this: Why did my right hon. friend find it necessary to wait until the country was in the midst of a general election to publish the document setting out the basis of negotiation? The correspondence was handed out to the press by my right hon. friend in the month of September.

Mr. BENNETT: It was tabled here in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This statement was brought out publicly only in the press.

Mr. BENNETT: It was publicly given to the house when the house was in session. It was laid on the table.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was given to the press in its entirety only in the month of September.

Mr. BENNETT: It was laid on the table of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A great deal was made of it by my right hon. friend during the course of his campaign. Throughout its course, he continually drew attention to it. The impression that he sought to leave with the country was this: Here is what I am standing for; I am seeing that you will get amongst others the things that I have mentioned here; negotiations are under way, and the only hope you have is to return the present administration and let me get these things for you as a consequence of having commenced the negotiations. Fortunately, both parties had been on record in the past with respect to their willingness to negotiate agreements with the United States. The public believed that if further negotiations were to be carried on with any hope of success, it was better to trust them to a party that had stood consistently for better trade relations with the United States, than to one that had defeated the reciprocity agreement that had been reached with the United States in 1911 and had made no headway in negotiating an agreement while it was itself in office.

When the present administration came into office our position was perfectly clear. My right hon. friend asks, "Why all the haste? Why was everything done so quickly? What you did do was either what had been done before, in which event it is very good, or if not, it is very bad." In other words, "What I did was good, but what you do is bad." Perhaps we should have expected such an attitude, but I submit that it is not much of an argument. In negotiating with the United States my right hon. friend had to rely upon members of the public service for the information necessary to guide him and his colleagues. As all hon. members must know, agreements of this proportion have to be studied and worked out with the utmost care. It is true that negotiations are carried on in part by principals, but for the most part the actual work of accumulation and compilation of data, of making comparisons and estimating values is performed by members of the public service. I think this country owes a very special debt to those officers of the Department of Finance, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of External Affairs who had to do with negotiations while my right hon. friend was in office and since we have been in office. I am sure he will be the first to say that they rendered exceptional service in seeing that the whole situation was surveyed from every possible angle, and that they brought to the attention of the ministers every consideration of which account would have to be taken. More than that, they succeeded in effecting the happiest of relations with their opposite members in the departments at Washington, an important factor in the successful completion of the agreement.

May I say at once that we sought an agreement which would be fair and square, and which would be helpful to both countries. We were not seeking, and I do not believe my right hon. friend was seeking, to get the better of the United States. I do not believe the United States was trying to get the better of us. I think that both countries had come to the conclusion that, in this period of depression when things were going from bad to worse in our respective countries and other parts of the world, the sooner we all adopted a different attitude of mind and decided that, instead of seeing how far we could keep away from each other, we should see how close together we could come in the matter of trade on a mutually helpful basis, the better it would be for all concerned. In the working out of this agreement, I believe the officials of both governments were sincerely anxious to find what would be a fair equivalent each way. I think exactly the same is true of the ministers of both governments. The government of the United States and the government of this country were actuated by one and the same motive, namely, to make an agreement which would be equally beneficial to both countries.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

May I point out a special reason why such should have been the attitude? This agreement is only for a period of three years. It is necessarily restricted to three years; but it may be continued indefinitely if, in the intervening three years, it proves to be mutually beneficial. Could anything destroy the agreement more effectively than that it should be shown in the course of the next three years that one country had got considerably the better of the other? Would not the effect of an agreement reached in that way be to destroy the possibility of its continuance beyond the period of three years. We believe that what has been done is a step in the right direction, a step which during the next three years will prove its wisdom so conclusively that, when that period has expired, the agreement will not only be continued indefinitely, but will be materially expanded to the increased mutual advantage of the two countries.

When we came into office it was obvious that, if an agreement was to be effected no time was to be lost. My right hon. friend sought, in the debate on the address, to make it appear that there had been undue haste in this matter. One of the reasons I have taken the trouble to read what I have read to-day is to make clear to hon. members and to the country that every conceivable angle of the situation had been canvassed by members of the permanent service while my right hon. friend was in office. Their knowledge of the facts was available to the new administration. I cannot make that too clear. I want to express, indeed I have expressed, my appreciation of all that had been done in a preliminary way, and that helped to make it possible for the new administration to obtain, at a moment's notice, all the necessary information.

The elections were held on October 14 and we came into office on the 23rd. On the 24th I called on the Hon. Mr. Armour, the United States minister, and told him that our government felt that the most important question we had before us was the negotiation of a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. I asked if he would be kind enough to arrange a meeting between the President of the United States and myself at the earliest possible moment so that we might discuss, with regard to a trade agreement, such features as it might be necessary to have considered in that way.

Let me stress this point—I have overlooked it up to the moment but I want to emphasize it now. This government came back with a mandate from the people of Canada to put through a reciprocal agreement at the earliest possible moment. So far as asking the approval of this house is concerned, I regard that in some respects as an almost unnecessary step; the country itself has given so overwhelming an expression of approval of its confidence in a reciprocal agreement with the United States to be negotiated by a Liberal administration. The necessity for such was emphasized from every platform. As my right hon. friend has pointed out, I said more than once that if we were returned to power, the country might expect to see an agreement effected before the year was out. Why did I say that? Because I had before me the basis of the agreement as presented by my right hon. friend; and I knew very well if an administration were in earnest, if it were anxious to effect an agreement with the United States, and if that country were as it had said, equally desirous of achieving that end, that, with the knowledge which would be immediately available to us, it would be possible to work out an agreement in a very short period of time. I assured the country, if it returned us to power, that it could expect us to take the matter up immediately. The country believed what I said, and it has not been disappointed in its expectations.

Immediately after I had seen Mr. Armour, as I explained the other day, members of the cabinet went into conference with members of the service from the different departments who had been dealing with the matter. We canvassed the situation back and forth. We carefully considered how far we would be justified in granting certain concessions to the United States, what our demands should be, and what we would consistently stand for —the basis on which alone we would conclude an agreement. We were in a different position from my right hon. friend in one very important particular. We had said to the electorate throughout the campaign that in our opinion the duties in this country on implements of production were far too high. We said that if returned to office we would reduce those duties substantially. When we sought to negotiate an agreement with the United States we were prepared to offer, for concessions on their part, a reduction in those duties, as we were pledged to do, on instruments of production in the great basic industries of the country. To that extent we were in a much more favourable position than my right hon. friend in seeking to negotiate; we could negotiate for better terms than he would have found it possible to secure. I might mention other things, but I cannot go into certain matters which are more or less confidential. The one referred to, however, was known generally, and it was a factor which helped very much in the negotiation of the present agreement.

After discussing the matter fully with my colleagues in the cabinet, and after arranging to see the president, I went to Washington for that purpose. I think it is advisable to put on the record the communications given out at the time, because they help to tell the story in no uncertain terms. My right hon. friend said it was a matter of going south for my health, but I believe that anyone who read this statement at the time it was released will appreciate the significance of it.

On November 5 I handed to the press the following statement:

> I have thought it advisable, before entering upon the duties of the dominion-provincial conference, which will be held at the end of the present month, to take a short trip to the south. . . . . My intention is to go south via Washington so as to have an opportunity of visiting the Canadian legation and of calling upon the President of the United States. In arranging my plans, I sought to ascertain through Mr. Armour, the American minister at Ottawa, a time which would be convenient to the president for my call upon him. Mr. Armour has since conveyed to me an invitation from Mr. Roosevelt to be his guest at the White House during a part of my stay at Washington. I plan, accordingly, upon arrival in Washington on Thursday noon, to go to the Canadian legation. I have accepted the president's very kind invitation to be his guest at the White House on the day following, and to spend there the night of Friday, the eighth. On Saturday I shall resume my stay at the Canadian legation. In these particulars my visit to the White House will be similar to that of Mr. Bennett when, as Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, he visited the Canadian legation in April of 1933 and in the course of that visit was the guest, at the White House, of the President of the United States.

I ask anyone at all familiar wth political matters and with the methods of proceeding in international negotiation, whether, reading that statement, it would not appear that the purpose of that visit was to discuss matters of trade with the President of the United States, just as my right hon. friend had done on a previous occasion. I was making it perfectly plain to this country that the government had before it the question of a reciprocal agreement with the United States, and that my visit to the president was unquestionably and primarily for the purpose of discussing the matter of trade relations between the two countries.

When my right hon. friend paid his visit to the president, a joint statement was issued from the White House after their interview as to the main subject of their conversation. The joint statement was to the effect that they had been exploring means of improving trade between the two countries and were in agreement upon the objectives and the methods to be adopted. After my visit to the president, a statement was similarly given out at Washington on behalf of the president and myself, a joint statement indicating the nature of the matters discussed during the course of that visit. It was released at Washington on November 9:

The President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada have considered the question of increased trade which has been discussed for some time by representatives of the two nations. There is complete agreement on the objective of a greatly increased flow of trade for the benefit of both countries and substantial progress has been made towards this end. It is recognized that such an increase would be beneficially felt in all activities, because trade is but another word for increased employment, transportation and consumption.

So, again, there was no effort at concealment. As a matter of fact, on that occasion there was present at Washington, both before and after this visit with the president, a large number of the permanent officials of the departments that I have mentioned. Everyone knew or ought to have known that a trade agreement or something equally important was being negotiated at the time. The presence of these officials along with myself, and the interviews with the secretary of state, the president, and others made that perfectly clear.

A final decision was reached, after conference with the president on matters that up till that time had remained unadjusted between us, on the main features of the agreement subject, of course, on the president's part to further conference with his colleagues, and on my part to further conference with my colleagues. Negotiations then proceeded to the extent of drafting the agreement in a form ready for approval. On the night of November 9 I gave out the following statement, which indicated the further progress that had been made:

In view of the conversations which I have had with the President and the Secretary of State respecting a trade agreement between the United States and Canada, I have thought it advisable not to continue my journey to the south, without first returning to Ottawa to acquaint my colleagues with the substance of these conversations.

I have accordingly asked the members of the government to meet me in Ottawa on Monday, and have arranged to leave Washington to-night, so as to be in the Canadian capital in time to be present at the armistice day ceremonies which take place on parliament hill on Monday morning. I shall probably leave Ottawa again on the day following, to complete the short vacation in the south to which I have been looking forward.

There again I think it must have been evident to any one who could read between the lines that my purpose in coming back to Ottawa was to bring to the attention of my colleagues the matters which had been discussed at Washington with the president and the members of the cabinet there, and that I would return to Washington again.

On November 11, after having had an opportunity of discussion with the cabinet and of communicating further with the president by direct telephone from Ottawa to Washington and having ascertained that matters which had been subject to further consideration there had been duly settled in accordance with what was acceptable to us, I was able to inform the president that the agreement had been approved by the Canadian government, and to make the following statement to members of the press:

I am glad, on this armistice day, to be able to inform you that the governments of Canada and the United States have reached a definite trade agreement. The terms of the agreement were approved by the government of Canada at a meeting held this morning, prior to the proceedings on parliament hill. The formal text is now being prepared for signature. The agreement will be made public simultaneously in Canada and the United States on the date of signature. It is expected that it will be possible to have the agreement in readiness for signature in the course of a few days.

Then followed the strenuous work of getting the agreement into final form for signature. The agreement was formally signed at Washington on November 15.

I think I should place on record what was said at Washington on November 15 when the agreement was signed. These statements help to bear out what I have said about the agreement having been framed, not with the view of one country scoring as against the other, but rather with that of both seeking to further their mutual advantage, and of doing something which might be of some advantage to the world as a whole in its present plight.

When the agreement was signed on November the fifteenth in the office of the president at the White House, Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, the president, made the following statement:

The trade agreement which has just been signed between the United States and Canada places the trade relations between the two countries on a basis of mutual agreement for the first time since 1866. I am happy to have a part in removing this anomaly in the relations between two countries which are united by so many bonds of friendship and common heritage.

The signing of this agreement marks the reversal of the trend of the last two decades towards undue and unnecessary trade barriers between our two countries. I am confident that this constructive step will contribute greatly to the economic recovery of both the United States and Canada.

Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States, then made the following statement:

The United States and Canada are neighbours with a common frontier of 5,000 miles. It is manifest that innumerable opportunities for mutually profitable trade between these friends and next door neighbours must exist. During 1929 the United States was selling to Canada about $900,000,000 of commodities, a substantial proportion of which was farm products, and was purchasing over $500,000,000 in return. Since 1929, our exports to Canada have slumped to about $300,000,000 or a loss of some $600,000,000. This loss has resulted in large measure from shortsighted tariff policies.

Notwithstanding its increase in population, the world to-day is producing and consuming substantially less than it did in 1929 and prior years. This trade agreement will make possible the profitable sale of much of our surplus production as it will also result in the re-employment of a large number of American wage earners now idle.

The people of our two countries have common interests and common aspirations, socially, morally and materially. The progress of each depends more and more upon the progress of the other.

The problems of commerce and peace facing all nations to-day are acute. While many other parts of the world are devoting their primary efforts either to war or to the feverish building of vast armaments, with consequent neglect of the dislocated and collapsed business conditions, with resultant unemployment and widespread distress, it is for the western hemisphere to point the way to a more far-seeing, constructive basis for prosperity and for peace.

The trade agreement between our two countries will, I hope, mark the beginning of a new epoch in the affairs of our respective peoples. It will mean the common advancement of their economic and their cultural life. Underlying this agreement are the twin policies of the good neighbour and mutually profitable trade.

While many other parts of the world are slipping in the direction of economic suicide, the trade agreement between our two countries marks an outstanding step in the direction of economic sanity. It seeks to stimulate sound and healthy trade relationships and thereby to restore employment to the unemployed and a wholesale prosperity to the peoples of both countries.

It sets an example of what must be done to establish a solid foundation upon which to rebuild a suitable structure of world peace.

To these two statements, one by the president and one by Mr. Secretary Hull, I made the following reply:

The kindly words and sentiments to which you, Mr. President, have just given expression, will be warmly welcomed by His Majesty the King, in whose name I have had the honour to sign the trade agreement which has just been concluded betwen the United States and Canada.

They will, I know, be deeply appreciated by the people of Canada.

May I say, Mr. Secretary, that I very cordially endorse all that you have said of the mutual advantages likely to flow to our respective countries from the terms of the agreement.

On behalf of Canada, I heartily reciprocate the sentiments of international good will you have so generously expressed.

I believe with you that the signature of this agreement is witness of the joint intention of the governments of the United States and Canada to give rapid effect to our policies in a practical manner. At last our formal trade relations have been brought into harmony with the underlying realities of public and private friendship between our two peoples. The agreement will, I am confident, confer substantial benefits alike on the producers and consumers of both countries, while safeguarding with great care every essential interest. I feel sure that its value will be shown beyond question by a marked increase in commerce within the next few months. This undoubtedly will help both countries to make more rapid progress toward complete economic recovery.

Nor will this agreement benefit North America alone. All the world will gain from greater trade on this continent.

Nor will its benefits be confined to trade. To an anxious and troubled world we hope that there will be opened to the nations, by the force of our example, vistas of a surer path to progress and a more lasting road to peace.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in that exchange of views, made openly before the peoples of both countries, we have all that is needed in the way of argument to support the wisdom and the soundness of the agreement into which we have entered.

I have still to give the house the main features of the agreement itself. As I indicated at the outset, the purpose of asking approval in this preliminary way is to enable hon. members to have before them, before we enter into a discussion of details, a general view of the situation and the broad aspects of the agreement.

From now on I must ask the indulgence of the house while I place before hon. members the outstanding features of the agreement. Seeing that these involve to some extent the enumeration of rates and figures, I hope the house will permit me to do as the Minister of Finance does when he presents his budget, and quote exactly the statements I wish to give. As far as the agreement itself is concerned, hon. members have had it before them; I shall not do more than indicate what the fifteen clauses contain.

There is first the preamble. Then article I sets forth that there shall be mutual exchange of unconditional and unrestricted most-favoured-nation treatment.

Article II provides for most favoured nation treatment in regard to import and export restrictions; in the event of quantitative restrictions, quotas, etcetera, a quantity of restricted goods equivalent to the proportion enjoyed in a previous representative period shall be allocated to the exporting country.

In Article III Canada fixes maximum rates of duty on imports from the United States in relation to items enumerated in schedule I to the agreement.

In article IV the United States fixes maximum rates of duty on imports from Canada in relation to items enumerated in schedule II to the agreement.

Under Article V each country may impose on imports from the other a tax equivalent to any internal tax levied on domestic products of like nature.

Article VI provides that internal taxes on imported articles shall be no higher than those levied on like articles of national origin or any other foreign origin.

Article VII provides that no quantitative control shall be applied by either country with respect to the goods of the other, except as specifically provided for in schedules I and II; that regulations for control of markets applied to domestic products shall apply equally to goods imported from the other; that all changes must await thirty days' notice, after which, though no agreement has been reached, such change may be made; and that when such action is taken, the other country may, within fifteen days, give thirty days' notice of terminating the entire agreement.

In article VIII each country promises fair and equitable treatment to goods of the other in the event of a national monopoly over any product.

Under article IX, if either country adopts control of exchange, the other will be granted an allotment based on a previous representative period. Sympathetic consideration will be given any representations of the other in this respect.

Under article X, in the event of a wide variations in exchange rates between the two countries, either may propose modification of the agreement, and failing agreement within thirty days, may terminate the agreement in its entirety on thirty days' notice.

Under article XI, in the event of either country enacting any measure deemed as nullifying or impairing objectives of the agreement, provision is made for friendly negotiation and consideration by a joint committee of experts.

Article XII provides that the agreement shall not preclude the regulation of exports and imports of gold and silver; regulation of trade in arms; and regulation based on the following grounds: moral or humanitarian protection of human, animal or plant life, prison made goods, enforcement of police or revenue laws, and unfair or fraudulent practices.

Article XIII provides that only the most favoured nation clause of the agreement applies to the Philippines, Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and Guam. None of the concessions apply to the Panama Canal Zone, and the agreement is not to apply to concessions between (1) United States, Cuba, Philippines, the Panama Canal Zone and (2) British empire countries.

Under Article XIV, any concession may be withdrawn or subjected to quantitative restriction if through extension to a third country such country obtains the major benefit, and undue increase in importation from such country takes place. Then there is a provision as to how that difficulty may be settled.

The last article of the agreement provides that the agreement shall be ratified by His Majesty and proclaimed by the President of the United States. The agreement was proclaimed by the president on November 29. The following articles of the agreement came into force on January 1, 1936: article I, most favoured nation treatment; article III, concessions made by Canada to the United States in schedule No. I, article IV, concessions made by the United States to Canada in schedule No. 2. The entire agreement shall come into force on the day of exchange of proclamation and ratification at Ottawa. It shall remain in force until December 31, 1938, subject to the provisions of articles VII, X and XIV, the so-called escape clauses. The agreement shall thereafter be subject to termination on six months' notice.

Accompanying the agreement was a note given to the Secretary of State of the United States by the Canadian charge d'affaires at Washington declaring the Canadian government's intention to amend the Customs Act in certain particulars, as follows:

1. To change the method of determining values for duty purposes to eliminate arbitrary executive interference: (a) value for duty will not include advance for selling cost or profit greater than ordinarily prevails in country of export; (b) discounts shall not operate to increase value for duty purposes beyond ordinary price prevailing at time and place of shipment in ordinary trade; (c) in case of fixed values for duty purposes established under section 43 of the Customs Act there shall be an appeal to the tariff board; (d)

"class or kind made or produced in Canada" shall mean "in commercial quantities," and adequate notice shall be given of proposal to transfer any goods into this category.

2. Pending legislation, fixed valuations under section 43 of the Customs Act are abolished on twenty specified articles.

3. Canada is to allow Canadian visitors to the United States to bring back incidental purchases up to $100 in value under regulations "substantially equivalent" to those now in effect in the United States with respect to Canada.

This is a summary of the main provisions of the agreement. In estimating the advantages of the agreement to Canada, there is one feature which does not altogether appear on its face, namely, that as the United States enters into agreements with other countries granting to such other countries most favoured nation treatment in the United States, automatically Canada gets in the United States market the benefits accorded to those other countries. In other words, the agreement, as far as the advantages Canada will obtain from it are concerned, will become increasingly beneficial to this country, because, with each new agreement entered into by the United States, we get the advantage of what is conceded by them to the other country by way of most favoured nation treatment.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman will of course admit that the same principle applies in the other direction, that goods coming from any of those twenty-three nations to Canada will receive the same treatment as goods coming from the United States into Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, certainly, exchange of most favoured nation treatment is mutual. Since the agreement was signed the United States has entered into trade treaties with Honduras, The Netherlands, and Switzerland, I believe that there are some eleven other countries with which the United States are now negotiating agreements, and in the event of satisfactory agreements being arrived at, Canada will of course benefit as I have indicated.

May I point out another feature which is all important in connection with this agreement? If no agreement were entered into, there would be no guarantee that Canada would continue to enjoy the opportunities which she now has in the American market under existing rates. The United States came to have last year, for the first time, a two-column tariff. Formerly it was a general tariff the same as against all nations but now there is another tariff, which gives more favourable rates, and of that tariff Canada has had the benefit. That benefit was extended last year when my right hon. friend was in office, because negotiations were still continuing, but if this agreement is not approved Canada will cease to have the benefit of those more favourable tariff rates and will again come under the general tariff. Moreover there is to-day no guarantee that on goods which are at present admissible into the United States from Canada free, duties may not be imposed. One of the main features of this agreement is that it assures for the next three years a continuance of the favourable opportunities which we already have in the United States market and the prevention thereby of new impositions against this country.

As I have indicated, prior to May 1, 1935, the United States had a single column tariff, but when the trade agreement with Belgium came into operation there was inaugurated a new commercial policy on the part of the United States, namely the beginning of a two column tariff. Eventually all countries will be divided into two classes so far as United States imports are concerned, those with which the United States has trade agreements incorporating the most favoured nation clause, which will receive the lower rate, and all other countries failing to conclude an agreement with the United States which will pay the higher rates.

In embarking upon this new policy the United States government announced that the more favourable schedule of duties would be extended temporarily to all countries. This was done in order to promote friendly relations with other countries and to encourage them to conclude agreements with the United States. Meanwhile, negotiations towards such an end had been opened with a number of countries and the intention of the United States government to undertake such negotiations with others had been announced.

It was made known that Canadian exports to the United States would enjoy the benefits of the most favoured nation treatment until October 1, 1935, since negotiations with Canada had already begun. Later, when no agreement had been completed by that date, the concession was extended to January 1, 1936. Failing an agreement by the 1st January, 1936, there was every probability that Canada would have been removed from the favoured list and would thereby have ceased to enjoy the lower rates of duty. Already Germany had denounced the most favoured nation clause of her agreement with the United States and had suffered this fate.

At the present time the difference between the two schedules of rates, the most favoured nation and the general, in the United States tariff is not great; but it is the expressed intention of the United States government to endeavour to conclude bilateral treaties with all countries with whom she has any significant amount of trade. If such a course is followed, the disparity between the two tariff schedules will increase in a cumulative fashion. Therefore, if Canada had not concluded an agreement with the United States, while the latter continued such a policy, Canadians would have had to contend with obstacles in the United States tariff that would have become increasingly onerous as time went on.

It should, at the same time, be remembered that the policy of this country toward the United States left Canada, on a number of scores, open to attack by the people in United States adversely affected thereby. We had come to think of the general tariff as one maintained practically against goods of the United States, for the latter was the only country with which Canada had an important exchange of trade, against which the general schedule was levied. The general rate applied also to goods from Russia, but trade with that country had been largely prohibited by embargoes in any case. Thus, there was considerable weight in the United States contention that we were discriminating against them and the complaints being made at Washington were adding greatly to the pressure being put upon the United States government to retaliate against this country.

The privilege enjoyed by citizens of the United States returning to that country to bring with them goods for their own use to the value of $100, duty free, has always met with opposition from those who feel themselves adversely affected by this provision. In recent years this opposition has grown due in part to the general feeling, mentioned above, that Canada has discriminated in one way or another against the United States, but more especially because this country has consistently refused to grant any similar privilege to Canadians returning from the United States. An increasing demand was being made that this privilege no longer be given to citizens of the United States returning from Canada, and a strong lobby in Washington were pressing for action to this effect. If Canada had persisted in her refusal to reciprocate on this point it is most probable that we should have lost a trade worth several million dollars yearly.

In regard to direct shipment may I say that prior to the entry into effect of the trade agreement, the Canadian tariff provided that imports enjoying the lower rates of the intermediate tariff must not pass in transit through countries to which the intermediate rates were not extended. Similarly, goods entering Canada under British preferential rates must not pass through a non-British country, if they were to secure full benefit of British preferential treatment. The United States had for some time asked for the complete abolition of these direct shipment provisions, which they contended were grossly discriminatory against United States ports and transportation facilities and against which they had threatened retaliatory action for some years. Representative White had twice introduced a bill of this nature and on January 7, 1935, representative McCormack introduced a similar measure. The good offices of the United States Department of State had succeeded in delaying the enactment of such legislation by holding out the promise that the question would be dealt with whenever a commercial agreement with Canada was concluded.

Canadian transportation officials have for some years made representations to the government of this country pointing out the serious nature of this threat and appealing for the abrogation of the direct shipment regulations in the case of United States so far as the intermediate tariff was concerned. The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has pointed out the importance of the carrying trade which this country does for the United States. According to his figures goods from foreign countries shipped in transit through Canada to the United States were valued at over $65,000,000 during the fiscal year of 1931; while all Canadian imports, both empire and non-empire, shipped in transit via the United States amounted to less than $9,000,000.

It should be noted that a simple exchange of most favoured nation treatment would have automatically extended to the United States the transshipment privileges which they derived from the trade agreement. The provisions for direct shipment in connection with British preferential rates are not affected in any way.

Apart from the handicaps previously mentioned which Canada would have experienced in United States markets had she failed to secure most favoured nation treatment from that country, there was the further danger of a number of items of which Canada is the chief supplier being transferred from the free list in the United States tariff. The most important commodity falling under this head is that of newsprint.

While newsprint still remained on the free list it was by no means certain that it would continue to do so. It has been proven that newsprint can be produced on a commercial basis from the type of pine which the southern states can supply in large quantities. For some time these interested states have demanded a high protective rate on this commodity, in order to stimulate domestic production. Their demand was assuming such proportions that the government at Washington was finding it increasingly difficult not to take action. The serious nature of this threat to the Canadian export trade will be seen once the figures of the trade are looked into.

I have here a statement showing an analysis of concessions granted to Canada, based on United States imports from Canada in the year 1929. Unless the house insists I shall not read it, but with the permission of hon. members I should like to place it on Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: As I have to speak, I should like to know what is in it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will have it sent at once to my right hon. friend.

ANALYSIS OF CONCESSIONS GRANTED TO CANADA BASED ON UNITED STATES IMPORTS FROM CANADA—CALENDAR YEAR, 1929

Total imports		$503,000,000
†Deduct non-commercial items	$ 38,000,000
Commercial items		465,000,000
Deduct items of Canada is not principal supplier	78,000,000
Canada principal supplier		387,000,000
Free of duty (present laws)		253,000,000
Bound by Swedish agreement	16,000,000
Bound by Canadian agreement	221,000,000
Not bound	16,000,000
Dutiable (present laws)		135,000,000
Duties reduced	79,000,000
Duties bound	9,000,000
Duties unchanged	47,000,000

†Non-commercial items include—

Household personal effects	$ 4,229,000
Articles temporarily imported	1,811,000
Articles returned	16,295,000

Items of which Canada is principal supplier (Total value of items on which U.S. policy would permit negotiations.)		$387,000,000
Items directly affected		308,000,000
Free entry assured	221,000,000
Items subject of reductions	79,000,000*
Present low rates assured	8,000,000
Items indirectly affected—(upwards of)		16,000,000

Wood pulp (certain kinds of which Canada is not principal supplier) continued free entry assured by Swedish treaty.

Also a number of less important items.

This list will increase as United States signs other bilateral trade treaties.

*Imports from Canada of articles on which duties were reduced were, in 1929, 94 per cent of the total imports of these commodities from all countries.

In the following summary, the figures of Canada's exports are based on United States import figures, since Canadian figures of exports do not, in certain cases, correspond to the headings of the United States tariff.

May I now give an outline of the principal agricultural concessions granted to Canada:

Live Cattle

Reduction in duty ranging from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent. Most important class, weighing 700 pounds or more, reduction from three cents to two cents per pound up to 155,799 head of cattle. Almost all of this quota will be allocated to Canada. Resultant average saving in duty will amount to around $9 per head of cattle. Exports 1929, $9,900,000; in 1934 they had fallen to $4,000.

Calves

Of less than 175 pounds each, duty lowered from two and one-half cents to one and one-half cents per pound. Quota 51,933.

Dairy Cows

Reduction in duty from three cents to one and one-half cents per pound. Quota 20,000 head per year.

Cream

Reductions in duty from 56$\frac{6}{10}$ cents to 35 cents per gallon. Quota 1,500,000 gallons per year. Exports 1929, $5,000,000 of 1934, negligible.

Seed Potatoes

March to November reduction in duty from 75 cents to 45 cents per hundredweight

Other three months reduction to 60 cents per hundredweight. Quota 750,000 bushels, which is three times current export.

Turnips

Reduction from 25 cents to 12½ cents per hundredweight. Exports in 1929, nearly $1,000,000.

Clover and Grass Seed

Fifty per cent reduction on these items. Exports 1929, $2,000,000; 1934, very small.

Maple Sugar

Reduction from six cents to four cents per pound. Exports in 1929, $2,500,000; 1934, less than $500,000.

Hay

Reduction from $5 to $3 per ton.

Horses

Reduction from $30 to $20.

Live Poultry and Dressed Chickens

Reduction 50 per cent and 40 per cent respectively.

Cheddar Cheese

Reduction 29 per cent. Exports 1929, nearly $2,000,000; 1934, $140,000.

Apples, Strawberries, Cherries, Peas, Frozen or Canned Blueberries

Duties reduced.

Grains

Ten per cent ad valorem rate bound on feed wheat and by-products of grain.

May I point out that in no case where it has not been possible to get concessions from the United States is any Canadian industry in a worse position than it was before. It is really in a better position by virtue of the fact that there will be in all probability a reduction on some of the implements or instruments of production used in that industry and also a lessened cost of living, and as well an increased demand for commodities as a consequence of improved conditions resulting from increased trade.

The principal concessions on fishery products granted to Canada were:

Halibut

Reduction from 2 to 1 cent per pound. Exports: 1929, $676,000; 1934, $261,000.

Salmon (Fresh or Frozen) and Swordfish

Reduction from 2 to 1½ cents per pound. Exports: 1929, $659,000; 1934, $719,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is swordfish not frozen?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Salmon, fresh or frozen, and swordfish.

Mr. BENNETT: Swordfish must not be frozen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not an authority on swordfish.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the schedule.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not cross swords with my hon. friend on that. To continue:

Salmon (Pickled or Salted)

Reduction 25 to 20 per cent ad valorem.

Smoked Herring

Reduction from 1¼ to ⅝ cents per pound.

Eels

Reduction from 1 to ½ cent per pound.

Razor Clams (Canned)

Reduction from 23 per cent ad valorem to 15 per cent.

Lobsters and other Shell Fish

Bound on free list. Exports: 1929, over $3,000,000; 1934, approximately $2,250,000.

Sea Herring and Smelts (Frozen or Fresh)

Bound on free list. Exports: 1929, $1,250,000; 1934, $893,000.

The principal concessions on forest products granted to Canada are:

Lumber and Timber—Fir, Pine, Spruce, Hemlock and Larch

Reduction in duty from $4 to $2. Quota for Douglas fir and western helmlock, 250,000,000 feet per year. No quantitative limitation on other species. Export in 1929, $38,000,000; 1934, less than $6,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that 250,000,000 feet each for hemlock and fir, or for the two together?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For Douglas fir and western hemlock.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be the two together?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wanted to be sure about.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To continue:

Maple, Birch and Beech Flooring

Reduction from 8 per cent ad valorem to 4 per cent. Exports: 1929, $259,000; 1934, $28,000.

Pulpboard (in Rolls) for use in the manufacture of Wall Board

Reduction from 30 per cent ad valorem to 15 per cent and from 10 per cent to 5 per cent.

Shingles

Bound on free list. Quota 25 per cent United States consumption. Exports: 1929 nearly $7,000,000; 1934, $3,500,000.

Logs, Posts, Ties, Poles, Pickets et cetera

Bound on free list. Exports: 1929, $12,000,000; 1934, less than $2,250,000.

Now I will give the principal concessions on mineral products granted to Canada:

Ferro Manganese

Reduction from 1⅞ cents to one cent per pound manganese content (as a result of concession in the agreement and of a reduction in the Brazilian agreement on manganese ore). Exports: 1929, $3,600,000, 1934, $250,000.

Ferro Silicon

Reduction from 2 cents to 1½ cents per pound metallic content. Exports: 1929, $1,193,000; 1934, $188,000.

Lime (n.o.p.)

Reduction from 10 cents to 7 cents per hundredweight. Exports: 1929, approximately $300,000; 1934, $74,000.

Feldspar (Crude)

Reduction from 50 cents to 35 cents per long ton. Exports: 1929, approximately $250,000; 1934, $66,000.

Basic Refractory Material

Reduction from 30 per cent to 27½ per cent ad valorem. Exports: 1929, $200,000; 1934, $167,000.

Gypsum, Asbestos (unmanufactured); Cobalt and Cobalt Ore, Nickel Ore, Matte and Oxide; Crude Artificial Abrasives (n.o.p.).

Bound on free list. Exports: 1929, approximately $16,000,000; 1934, approximately $8,000,000.

I will now give the principal concessions granted to Canada on manufactured goods. A large number of manufactured goods is included in the products on which the United States duties are lowered, the most important being those in which hydro-electric power constitutes an important factor in the cost of production:

Acetic Acid

Reduction from 2 cents to 1¼ cents per pound. Exports: 1934, $1,846,000.

Ferro Alloys and Synthetic Resins and Acetylene Black

Reductions in duties ranging from 25 to 50 per cent.

Patent and Harness Leathers

From 15 per cent and 12½ per cent respectively to 10 per cent. Exports: 1929, over $2,000,000; 1934, negligible.

Pipe Organs

Reduction from 35 per cent to 25 per cent.

Electric Cooking Stoves and Ranges

Reduction from 35 per cent to 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sporting Goods

Reductions ranging from 25 to 50 per cent.

Whiskey (Over Four Years Old)

Reductions from $5 to $2.50 per proof gallon. This is a most important concession. That is not only Scotch whiskey, as my right hon. friend supposed, but all whiskey.

Newsprint paper and those classes of wood pulp of which Canada has been the chief supplier to the United States are bound to the free list. That is one of the most important concessions. Our exports under this head in 1929 were $167,000,000, and in 1934 approximately $89,000,000.

I wish to deal now with the concessions granted to the United States on the basis of Canadian imports. Here it will be noticed that the concessions which have been granted to the United States in most cases involve a very substantial benefit to our Canadian producers as well as consumers because they are on commodities with respect to which there has been for some time past a demand for reduction in duty.

The total imports to which these items have reference amounted in 1930 to $847,000,000, and in 1935 to $304,000,000. There are eighty-six reductions in duties; seventy-nine are bound to the present rates, and fifteen are bound to the free list. There are concessions altogether with regard to 180 different commodities.

Mr. BENNETT: That is outside of the general and intermediate tariff?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. What I wish to point out in connection with the concessions made is that where concessions have been granted by Canada they are for the most part with respect to a number of individual items, while the concessions granted by the United States to Canada are for the most part on categories rather than on individual items. While, therefore, the number of concessions granted by the United States to Canada is less on a numerical calculation, they may mean more in reality since the concessions are granted on categories of articles rather than on individual articles.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the right hon. gentleman stated a moment ago that these concessions affected an importation of some $800,000,000 in 1929, and I was wondering whether that figure was correct. It seems extraordinarily large.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Our total imports in 1930 were $847,000,000, and in 1935 they had fallen to $304,000,000. What I should have added—I omitted it to save time—was the valuation of the articles that will be affected by the reduction. The eighty-six reductions in duty would have affected imports in 1930 amounting to $123,000,000, and in 1935 to $23,000,000. The seventy-nine bound to the present rates would have affected imports amounting to $66,000,000 in 1930, and $21,000,000 in 1935. The fifteen bound to the free list would have affected imports amounting to $62,000,000 in 1930 and $32,000,000 in 1935. In other words, the 180 commodities on which concessions have been granted would have affected imports to the amount of $251,000,000 in 1930, and to the amount of $76,000,000 in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the calendar or the fiscal year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will be the fiscal year.

The figures regarding the value of Canadian imports under various heads are in many cases open to question as a result of the complexity of the Canadian tariff. The figures below, for fiscal years, which were supplied by the bureau of statistics are quoted only to give an approximate idea of the relative value of these items in Canadian import trade.

Agricultural Machinery and Implements

Reductions in most classes from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent ad valorem. All tractors free. Imports: 1930, over $14,000,000.

Industrial Machinery

Reduction from 35 per cent to 25 per cent, 20 per cent, 15 per cent, 10 per cent, 5 per cent ad valorem, in the various classes. Certain sub-items of this group placed on free list. Imports: 1930, $35,800,000.

Mining Machinery

Reduction from 25 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $1,900,000.

Logging Machinery

Reduction from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. Imports: 1930, $1,400,000.

Certain Types of Textile Machinery

Reduction from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. Imports: 1930, $4,900,000.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Electric Dynamos, Generators, Motors and Parts

Reduction from 37½ per cent to 30 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $6,500,000.

Radios and Parts

Reduction from 30 per cent to 25 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $10,400,000.

Telephone and Telegraph Apparatus

Reduction from 30 per cent to 25 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930: $3,200,000.

Electric Refrigerators

Reduction from 40 per cent to 30 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, nearly $2,000,000.

Washing Machines

Reduction from 35 per cent to 25 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $1,600,000.

Miscellaneous Manufactures of Iron and Steel

Reduction from 35 per cent to 25 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $20,500,000.

Electro Plated Ware

Reduction from 45 per cent to 30 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $2,600,000.

Enamel Hollow Ware, Cooking and Heating Apparatus, Kitchen Ware

Various reductions.

Dressed Lumber including Flooring

Reduction from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. Rough lumber and lumber dressed on one side—bound on free list. Combined imports: 1930, $11,100,000.

Manufactures of Wood (n.o.p.)

Reduction from 25 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $3,600,000.

Miscellaneous Manufactures of Paper

Reduction from 35 per cent to 30 per cent ad valorem. Imports: 1930, $3,100,000.

Paper (n.o.p.)

Reduction from 35 per cent to 30 per cent. Imports: 1930, $2,000,000.

Fertilizers, Certain Types of Glass, Building Brick and Stone, Motorcycles, Certain Classes of Toys and Musical Instruments

Various reductions.

Magazines

Former duty up to 15 cents per copy. Placed on free list.

In passing I should like to refer briefly to magazines. Speaking on a previous occasion, my right hon. friend referred to the sacrifice being made by placing magazines and some other commodities on the free list. According to the basis upon which he himself was prepared to negotiate, magazines would have been on the free list.

Mr. BENNETT: How would that be?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By giving the intermediate tariff under most favoured nation treatment. Magazines are protected only under the general tariff; under the intermediate tariff, they come into this country free of duty.

The point of controversy or discussion between us would seem to narrow down to what my right hon. friend said the other day with respect to this being a balanced agreement. I do not think there can be much room for controversy or difference apart from this because he was prepared to exchange commodities on the bases that have been indicated. It is simply a question of whether the concessions granted on the one side counterbalance in a reasonable way the concessions granted on the other. As I have pointed out, in making the agreement we have been looking to the future, careful to see that no advantage was gained by the United States over our own country.

In granting the intermediate tariff Canada extends to the United States reductions in duty on some 700 items, but the intermediate tariff has been designed to afford Canadian industries protection against other countries, most of which have lower standards of living than has the United States. Consequently, in according the United States the intermediate tariff we are granting that country the minimum which she might expect from the conclusion of a trade agreement with Canada. That the late government fully recognized. This may be seen by the Canadian note of November 14, 1934.

On our part we will benefit to an increasing extent from such further reductions in duty as the United States may grant in trade agreements which she is negotiating with other countries; and, in time, these additional concessions which Canada will receive by virtue of the most favoured nation clause will fully balance the benefits which the United States has derived from being accorded the intermediate tariff of Canada.

In addition to granting the United States the intermediate tariff we have reduced the duty on eighty-six items in the Canadian tariff below the intermediate rates at present in force. Canada, on her part, has received reductions in respect to sixty-three items of the United States tariff, in addition to the binding of twenty-one items on the free list.

It might as I have said appear that numerically Canada has given concessions on a greater number of items than those on which she has received concessions. It must be remembered, however, that the great bulk of Canadian exports falls within a few categories of goods embracing a large trade and affecting only a limited number of classifications of the United States tariff. United States exports, on the other hand, cover a wide range of products of a diversified nature, which are enumerated in greater detail in Canadian tariff schedules than in the corresponding schedules of the United States tariff.

In the case of nickel and aluminum it was felt that any changes in existing duties would have been economically unjustified at the present time as tending to upset large investments of capital for the conversion of these metals, while so far as copper is concerned surplus stocks in the United States precluded any concessions respecting this product.

Of the other products not covered by the trade agreement the most important are codfish and table potatoes, and in the case of both these products low prices and depressed conditions in the industries concerned in the United States made it impossible for the government of that country to consider the granting of concessions on these products at the present time.

Assurance of the continuance of the moderate rates of duty under which low grade wheat and byproducts of grain have been exported in considerable volume to the United States was the only direct concession that the government were able to secure for the grain growers of Canada. Both countries are normally heavy exporters of grains and high duties have been maintained against imports of grains in order to assure United States producers against drastic falls in price levels. To have reduced the duties on grain at this stage would have taken this assurance away from United States growers without conferring corresponding benefits to Canadian producers, because even with reductions of 50 per cent in existing duties, we would still have been excluded from the United States market, at least until such time as the United States is placed on an import basis with respect to grains. When that time comes the whole position can be reconsidered and an outlet sought in that country for a part of our surplus production of grains.

A summary of the concessions granted to Canada shows that on the basis of the 1929 trade, Canada has secured:

Assurance of the continued free entry of goods, amounting in value at that time to $221,000,000.

Reductions in duties, $79,000,000.

Bindings at existing rates of duty, $8,000,000.

The total value of trade directly affected by the agreement, on the basis of 1929 volume amounts to $308,000,000.

There is a further large item which amounted in 1929 to $16,000,000, representing certain kinds of pulpwood, the continued free entry of which is assured by virtue of the trade agreement concluded between the United States and Sweden. Thus, the total volume of Canadian exports to the United States affected by the agreement is, on the basis of the 1929 figure, upwards of $325,000,000.

I have before me further proof of the benefits derived by Canada from United States concessions in connection with the binding on the United States free list of certain items, and in connection with the most favoured nation clause. However, I think I shall leave these for discussion until we are dealing with the trade agreement in greater detail.

The binding on the United States free list of twenty-one items of importance to Canadian trade is one of the most valuable features of the agreement. On many of these products there has been an intermittent agitation by interested parties for the imposition of a duty. The trade agreement gives assurance to Canadian exporters of these products that their trade will not be interfered with during the period of the agreement. In the case of newsprint especially, this should give a stimulus to the reorganization of the whole industry on a sounder footing. In 1934, Canadian exports of newsprint paper to United States were valued at over $60,000,000.

I should like to conclude by making the following references to the benefits to be derived by Canadian industry. There will be a benefit through the increased buying power of the Canadian public, with a consequent stimulus to Canadian industry. Markets in the United States will be opened to Canadian industry which had not that opportunity before. There will be cheaper means of production through reduced rates on machinery and implements of production, Canadian industry thus being placed on a more favourable competitive basis.

While granting the intermediate tariff to the United States will involve reductions in duties on United States products in the case of about 700 of the 1,400 items of the Canadian tariff, in very few cases can the reductions be said to be harmful. Here adjustments can later be made. It should be remembered that Canadian industries will retain, as regards the United States, the same measure of protection as has been obtained against the industries of nearly all foreign countries, including those countries which are not only highly industrialized but with standards of living vastly below those prevailing in the United States.

The items on which Canada granted reductions in the rates below the intermediate tariff were carefully selected so as to give the maximum benefit to the Canadian consumer and user of machinery without causing injury to Canadian industry.

Canada retains entire freedom to adjust the rates of the intermediate tariff in respect to all items not included in schedule I of the agreement. This schedule comprises 180 items or less than 13 per cent of the total number of items in the Canadian tariff; in the case of 86 items, provision is made for reductions in existing intermediate rates of duty; and in the case of 94 items, for the maintenance of existing intermediate rates of duty. During the three years' duration of the agreement, Canada may not increase the intermediate rates of these items.

The anti-dumping provisions of the Canadian tariff are still in effect and so far as values for duty are concerned the commitments have been made to the United States chiefly with a view to eliminating arbitrary executive interference with the normal course of trade. Full safeguards have been retained for dealing with abnormal situations and for protecting Canadian industries against the dumping by other countries of goods which are sold below fair market value in the country of origin, or below cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit.

There will be other and ampler opportunities for detailed exposition and discussion of individual rates of duty affected by the agreement, both on the resolution inviting the house to consider the agreement and on the bill giving its provisions the force of law in Canada. At this time, I desire only to refer in general terms to some of its larger effects on the Canadian economy. Basic primary industries, dependent upon accessible export markets for the profitable sale of a large part of their production, are once more enabled to enter the United States and guaranteed against a tariff increase on their products. By the very agreement that ensures them export markets, their production costs are appreciably lowered by the elimination or reduction of the duties on their implements of production. Similarly the ordinary inarticulate consumer, whose interests have been shamefully neglected, has already found out in lower prices and a wider range of choice what the agreement with the United States will mean to him: increased purchasing power of primary producers, stimulated business for distributors and transport trades, lower costs of production generally and an increase in real wages through a reduction in many items of the household budget,—these are some of the ways in which the agreement is already making itself felt, and justifying our decision to spend every effort on achieving it.

Let me add this in conclusion. While these are immediate benefits of a material kind, I do not think one can emphasize too strongly what it will mean, not only to the United States and Canada but to other countries as well, that a step has been taken on the part of these two nations in the direction of promoting trade on a mutually beneficial basis, at a time when the world has gone well-nigh mad as a result of pursuing the fallacies of economic nationalism. We have seen already how appreciatively this agreement has been referred to by the British press; we have seen that the example set by Canada and the United States in this regard may be followed shortly by a similar arrangement between Great Britain and that country. The French press has referred in appreciative terms of what it sees in this agreement as indicating a better day for the world in the matter of international trade. Other countries have made like favourable comments. I think we are quite justified in the belief that we on this continent have at last broken the hard crust of economic nationalism and have opened the way to a more extensive trade which will be of advantage to producers and consumers alike, which will assist our railways, will bring about an increase in purchasing power, and which may help very materially to lift our country out of the depression from which it has been suffering for so many years and to restore an era of prosperity and of better relations with other lands.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I do not suppose that my hon. friends opposite would be prepared to concede to me the same degree of sincerity as they claim for themselves. If I say that I greatly regret that I cannot support this resolution, and that I regret this very sincerely, I state but the simple truth, and I shall give the reasons that have induced me to arrive at that conclusion.

I might point out, at the outset of my observations, which I shall endeavour to make brief, that the resolution is in terms of the exact one that was moved by myself in dealing with the United Kingdom agreement. The words are exactly the same, and those who are concerned, if they will look at Hansard of that day, will find that the then Minister of Finance, at the conclusion of my remarks, moved the house into committee of ways and means in order that the details of the changes in the schedules might be considered. I do not know that any discussion of the procedure adopted will serve any useful purpose, but those who may be interested will find the record in Hansard of that day; and the opportunity thus afforded by the then Minister of Finance, in moving the house into committee of ways and means, of discussing the various schedules was quite as clear as the procedure that is now being followed. But surely the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) is in error when he assumes that the adoption of this resolution does not in every detail mean the approval of the agreement; for all one has to do is to look at the language employed in the resolution itself, and there cannot then be the slightest doubt that those who approve that resolution accept, sanction and approve the agreement itself in every detail.

I should not like in any acrimonious sense to comment upon the observation of the right hon. gentleman as to the contrast between the action taken by myself now and that which he took in 1932. Will any of us ever forget his denunciation of that agreement as the work of a Tory conspiracy—a Tory conspiracy headed by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, now Prime Minister of England, and aided and abetted by the Prime Ministers of all the overseas dominions? Those who care to read Hansard of that day and see the record of the long delays that ensued by reason of the discussion will readily realize the sense of irony which apparently the right hon. gentleman was aware of when he spoke of the assistance he gave in the passing of those agreements.

I am sorry, sir, that I must also deal, somewhat differently from the way in which the right hon. gentleman dealt with it, with the history of the parties in connection with reciprocity. Those who are familiar with the reciprocity agreement of 1854, which expired by notice in 1866, will possibly recall that when the 1878-79 budget was delivered by the Conservative party, through Sir Leonard Tilley, a provision was inserted in that budget that afforded the opportunity at all times to enter into an agreement with the United States for reciprocal treatment of natural products. In 1874 the Hon. George Brown negotiated an agreement, which by the way was never signed, but which in draft form was sent to the United States and never heard of again.

From that time on there was a constant effort to renew a reciprocity agreement. In the early nineties the United States embarked upon a policy of reciprocity and entered into reciprocity agreements with many countries. The Liberal party in 1887 declared for a form of commercial union which in 1891 culminated in an election on unrestricted reciprocity and brought forward the letter of the Hon. Edward Blake, in which he protested so strongly against the policy of his party that the matter is perhaps in the memories of most members of the house. In 1892, after the election, there went to Washington three Canadian delegates or plenipotentiaries to discuss and deal with the problem of reciprocity. They failed, because the United States was not prepared to grant to the government of that day or to any other government reciprocity in regard to natural products unless a substantial list of manufactured goods was also included in the agreement. So from 1892 on the negotiations resulted in nothing. In 1896 a Liberal government came into office. A Democratic government was in power in the United States, and as I shall presently show, the Democratic party has been the enemy of reciprocity and not its supporter in days gone by. I shall read from an authoritative source on that point. When in 1896 the Liberal government came into power and the Democratic government was in office there was not, for reasons given by the right hon. the Prime Minister, any opportunity afforded to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to negotiate or discuss reciprocity on any reasonable basis. With the advent to power, however, of a Republican administration the appointment of a commission headed by Lord Herschell was secured, and as members of that commission we had Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Louis Davies, and many other illustrious Canadians. Our old friend the former member for Labelle, Mr. Bourassa, was one of the joint secretaries of that commission. They sat for months and held meetings at Quebec, but in the end they failed—and I shall give the language of the historian in that regard—and when it was all over, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier had finally concluded that failure was the only result that could follow from his efforts, he used these words:

> There will be no more pilgrimages to Washington. We are turning our hopes to the old motherland.

Those are the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when failure resulted from the operations of the joint high commission. He then turned his attention to the motherland, and in 1907, as those who are familiar with the proceedings of the imperial conference of that day will remember, he made strong, increasingly strong efforts to secure a preference for Canadian goods in the British market. Mr. Deakin of Australia was foremost in his advocacy of that policy. But Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Lloyd George pointed out that it was impossible of realization, and so after that conference Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the government of that day once more turned their attention to the United States of America.

Therefore it is fair to say that from confederation down to 1911 there had been a constant effort on the part of all parties in Canada to secure a measure of reciprocal trade with the United States of America. So far had that effort gone that the Liberal party in 1887 and in 1891 had actually urged unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. Many letters and communications have been published since from Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Goldwin Smith, and letters from Goldwin Smith reciting the views held by Sir Richard Cartwright and Sir Wilfrid at that time. The acute differences within the Liberal party showed that there were at that time many people in public life who shared the views of the Hon. Edward Blake.

In 1911, under circumstances that need not now be gone into fully, instead of Canada seeking an agreement with the United States, the United States in truth sought one with Canada. That agreement included some natural products. It also included a substantial number of manufactured products. In addition to that it provided, not that these matters should be carried into effect by agreement, but rather that this should be done by joint action, that is by the congress of the United States enacting its tariff act and the Dominion of Canada enacting an exactly similar act. A number of items were dealt with favourably or preferentially by both countries, but it must not be overlooked that that agreement could be terminated by a change in tariff incidence of a single item. That was one of the reasons strongly urged against the agreement. Further, as the right hon. gentleman has said, many of us objected to it because of its uncertainty, its instability, and the direct effect it had upon the development of north and south, as against east and west routes upon which we had expended such vast sums of money and created so many lines of transportation.

At any rate the Conservative party opposed that agreement. But it was not alone in that regard. Distinguished Liberals throughout Canada—many of them, thousands of them—joined with the Conservative party of that day. Unless they had done so, undoubtedly the agreement would not have been defeated.

As I pointed out then, the uncertainty was such that a change in a single item wrecked the whole, and it was competent for either parliament on the one hand or congress on the other, by changing a single item in that list, thus to terminate the agreement. I need hardly point out that the war followed in 1914, and it would have been impossible during the war to maintain that arrangement in the terms in which it stood. Therefore, so far as we are concerned there was a period of time, 1912 and 1913, when the agreement might have remained in force; but whatever party was in power in Canada could not possibly have maintained the agreement during the period of the war. I think that is common ground, admitted by every fair and impartial observer or student of our political history.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: I said, "fair and impartial." It must be remembered that I made a great distinction. I have not talked with any fair and impartial man of the Liberal faith who suggests for a moment that the reciprocity agreement of 1911 could have been maintained in this country during the war. And what is more, it could not. All you have to do is to read it and you will realize why it could not. All you have to do is to give it the most casual reading and you will realize that it could not have been maintained. Be that as it may, during the long years from 1914 to 1918 it was impossible to discuss matters of that kind.

But President Wilson having come into office, without asking any concessions from us except in two minor matters to which I shall presently refer, gave us free access to the United States market. We had free access to that market for years. We built up a vast trade between Canada and the United States. We established a channel of trade; we made it increasingly deep; and then all of a sudden, without notice, that channel was blocked and that trade destroyed. I have said in the house, and I repeat, that I saw many Canadians in western Canada, engaged in the ranching business, ruined. I remember one great rancher who reckoned his wealth in millions who was completely and absolutely ruined because he had made his preparations for the United States market. For, mark you, the cattle business cannot be built up in a year or two years. If you go into the business of raising cattle to-day you must prepare to ship them and to market them two and three and even four years hence. It followed therefore that, plans having been made upon the basis of the Underwood tariff, Canadians in western Canada, finding suddenly that they were confronted with a tariff wall over which they could not send their commodities except at a great loss, were compelled to go into bankruptcy and were in fact ruined. I shall not deal further with that history beyond saying that if any hon. members are interested and will turn to the Cambridge History of the British Empire, volume six, they will find there the record of these tariff matters.

There is another document to which I shall refer. It is the diplomatic memoirs of the late General Foster, who at one time was Secretary of State of the United States and who had more to do with the negotiation and discussion of matters affecting reciprocal trade between the United States and other countries of the world than had any other statesman of his time. He was minister to many countries. He ultimately, as I said, became Secretary of State of the United States. He met our delegates in 1892; he met the joint commission in 1898, and he dealt with many of these matters as I have indicated.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, when the debate on this bill was adjourned last Friday I was making a few comments. I stated that this question is now before the governor in council, and obviously any partisan position on my part would be quite out of order. However it does not seem to be out of order for me to bring out a few points in reference to the subject. A considerable point was made of the fact that export and domestic rates to Fort William are equal. But it may be pointed out that Fort William is not a seaport, therefore not comparable with Vancouver. Montreal on the other hand is a seaport and railway rates to that port present a differential between domestic and export. Similarly Saint John and Halifax are sea ports and there is a decided differential between domestic and export rates to those cities. So while much was made of the argument that the situation in the west differs from that in the east I think the facts do not support that view.

Coming back to Vancouver, we find three rates on grain on Canadian railways; an export rate, which is the Crowsnest rate applied to the movement westward, a domestic rate which applies on high grade wheat, that is wheat of milling quality, and which is about double the export rate, and a third rate for low grade wheat and grains of that sort. This latter rate was put into effect voluntarily by the railways two or three years ago. On the United States side of the line they formerly had three rates; an export rate, a domestic wheat rate and a rate for coarse grains, but two years ago there was a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I think the judgment of the commission was appealed to the supreme court. The result was that these three rates were combined into one rate, but I point out that the combined rate which applies on all three movements is practically equal to our domestic rate. In other words the Interstate Commerce Commission have never been able to take the view that our own board of railway commissioners have taken, that the Rocky mountains should be ignored in making rates. I think the people of British Columbia who feel that they are suffering an injustice under the domestic rates on grain westbound would do well to keep in mind that they have a distinct advantage both in their export rate and in their feed grain rate, and that the domestic rate is the one that applies south of the border for all movements.

The question then comes as to whether after all any great injury is done to the Pacific coast on account of the existing differential. True, if the rates were equalized as the bill in question suggests, Pacific coast consumers would enjoy a somewhat lower rate on feed grain for the poultry and dairy industries, and on high grade wheat that is consumed at the coast. On the other hand a very important grain for its dairy and poultry industries is corn, and I may remind them that most of the corn that enters Canada comes either from the Argentine or from Africa, and that Vancouver enjoys the cheapest rates for carriage of corn of any part of the country except the Atlantic seaboard ports. Alberta imports a great deal of corn through Vancouver, and we have had no great objection from Alberta to the fact that the domestic rate which applies on Alberta wheat to Vancouver applies also on corn coming in through Vancouver and consumed in Alberta.

In spite of the handicaps of which we have been told, the poultry business on the Pacific coast is perhaps in as prosperous condition as at any other point in Canada. In fact I think one carload of eggs moves from Vancouver into the Montreal market each week, indicating that the egg business at least must be on quite an efficient basis to make such a movement possible. I mention these points to show that there is another side to the freight rate picture than that presented to us by some hon. members from British Columbia. I have not examined the evidence given before the railway board in the case now on appeal. That case will be heard by the governor in council, whatever happens to this bill. It seems to me therefore that the mover of the bill has served all proper objects in bringing this discussion before the house, and I would suggest that at this time he might consider withdrawing his bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made an observation the other evening as to the effort made by the late government to induce the railway companies to consider the situation in connection with rates on feed grains with the shippers or with the authorities of the province of British Columbia. I hardly think the language he suggested is the language that was used, but we did suggest a conference, and as a result an agreement was arrived at which I understood was regarded at the time as being fairly satisfactory. But after listening to British Columbia members during this debate, I gather that they are not very well satisfied with what took place, and regard the relief given as utterly inadequate. I merely mention this lest it might be thought that by silence I acquiesced in the statement as to the language used made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, which is hardly the fact.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with care to the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) in regard to this bill. He made a statement about corn, intimating that corn is used for cow feed in the western part of the country. I can assure him that we do not use corn to feed cattle in our district. But we have been using considerable corn for feeding poultry, and it was the opinion of a large number of members from western Canada some time ago that we might well substitute barley for corn and thereby increase the market for barley from Manitoba and other parts of the west. That is one reason why the poultry people of our section have been asking for a lower rate on feed grain, namely, in order that we might give preference to the Canadian product. I do not think I need deal further with the remarks of the Minister of Railways.

But to deal with the bill, the unfortunate part of this freight rates matter is that it has been dragged into the political arena, and some persons in British Columbia have taken it upon themselves to try to convince the people that they are the only real advocates of lower freight rates on feed grain to our province. I think I am safe in saying that every session for the last ten or fifteen years this matter has been up in the house, and such men as the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and others who have been here for some years will bear out the statement that irrespective of party we have endeavoured to secure for the Pacific coast and the producers of our section of British Columbia a lower rate for feed grain. I am not going to review the whole situation, since this bill was up before us in 1925. An appeal was made to the government which was in power prior to 1930; that appeal was dismissed and no further action taken.

Just as my leader has said, the only action taken was back in 1933 at which time there was an appeal to the privy council, and through an order in council which was issued certain directions were made. I have before me the report of the appeal of the Canadian Freight Association, No. 1848, order No. 51669, Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and at page 33 I find these words:

> These rates, among other matters, were then the subject of an appeal from the board's judgment to His Excellency the Governor in Council, which was dismissed by order in council P.C. 349, dated February 25, 1933, in which it is stated:—
> "One of the most important subjects involved in the said appeals was grain shipped from prairie points to points in British Columbia for use for feeding purposes, it being alleged that by a reduction in the rates of the lower grades of grain not only would an outlet be provided for a large quantity of grain which was not marketable under present conditions, but the development of the dairy and poultry industries of British Columbia would be greatly assisted.
> As a result of negotiations which took place with members of the governments of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba during the period of the recent interprovincial conference, the representatives of the railway companies intimated that in order to assist in the movement of the lower grades of grain for the purposes outlined above, they would be prepared to put into effect tentatively substantial reductions in rates on the grades of grain involved. This offer has since been accepted by the governments of the said provinces as satisfactory to them.

Under that the rate was reduced from 41½ cents to 30 cents. British Columbia has sent representatives to appear before the railway commission, and has spent a considerable amount of money in paying these men, but despite those payments the only results which were ever secured were obtained at the time the late government held office. Credit for those results I believe must go to the Hon. R. J. Manion, then Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member say that is the only result that was ever secured? Does he not remember 1922, when the Rocky mountains were removed from the western rate structure?

Mr. BARBER: I am talking about domestic rates at the present time. The farmers of the Fraser valley did not benefit from that, but I admit that the port of Vancouver did. We are pleased to have had that, but we are now discussing a question of domestic rates. May I now refer to the appeal. I believe the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) made application for the appeal. I find in the report this statement:

> Mr. T. Reid, M.P., made application dated May 30, 1934, on behalf of the Fraser Valley Surrey Farmers' Cooperative Association, for an order of the board directing the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways to establish the same rates on feed grains and mill feeds from prairie provinces to points in British Columbia for domestic consumption as are now in effect on grain and grain products from the prairie provinces to points in British Columbia for export.

In addition to the hon. member's application communications asking for reduction in the rates were received from the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association, the corporation of the district of Surrey, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. McInnis), the Chilliwack board of trade, through myself, the Vegreville chamber of commerce and the council of the city of Vancouver. These applications were in favour of the reduction. Then we had others which were not so favourable. There was the corporation of Delta which had forwarded a communication opposing any reduction in rates on feed grain and mill feed from the prairie provinces to British Columbia owing to the fact that a considerable amount of grain was produced in the province, and that therefore the grain growers there would suffer. At that time, in 1933, they pointed out that in British Columbia a total of 6,161,000 bushels of grain was produced, of which there were 1,717,000 bushels of wheat, 4,507,000 bushels of oats and 307,000 bushels of barley. Then we had further objections along similar lines from the Delta Farmers' Institute. Further, Mr. W. W. Southin of Ladysmith, British Columbia, stated that he had been in the poultry business for twenty years and he communicated with the board, opposing any reduction in the rate. The gentleman representing the province of Alberta advocated that the differential should be reduced to three cents over other rates. These are the points the board had to consider.

The hon. member for New Westminster, while representing an association of farmers also represented the province. I find these words in the report:

On July 24, the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia, advised that Mr. Reid, M.P., would represent that province in this matter.

The hon. member was retained by the province. The board claims that no new arguments were advanced, and at this point I should like to refer to one or two arguments the hon. member has raised. I believe he mentioned them on the occasion upon which he spoke a few nights ago, and they are worthy of some consideration at this time. The hon. member made a statement with reference to the shipment of grain to Japan, and return, for about twenty-five cents less than the rate to British Columbia. So that there may be no misunderstanding I shall quote the hon. member's statement before the board of railway commissioners.

In this connection, Mr. Reid stated (p. 1486): "There was a time last year when I believe we could have brought good Canadian wheat back from Japan to the Fraser valley at about twenty-five cents a ton less than the cost of inferior grades brought from a distance of 642 miles." The distance named is the Calgary-Vancouver mileage. The rate on what is termed inferior grades, namely, feed grain as described in the C.F.A. tariff No. 145, is 30 cents, or $6 per ton. The export grain rate is 20 cents or $4 per ton. Mr. Reid stated the average ocean rate, Vancouver to Yokohama, in that year was 6½ cents per bushel, or about $2 per ton, so that the cost to Yokohama would be $6 per ton—

Or exactly the same as it cost to land the grain in Vancouver. That is not taking into consideration that there might be another $2 on the return trip from Yokohama to Vancouver. Hon. members will see that in the argument advanced the other day the computation was not quite correct.

I believe the minister referred to the United States rate. The United States rates in the state of Washington, considered from the standpoint of our domestic rate, were a little lower, but in comparison with the new rate under tariff 145 the Canadian rate is still lower. I could go through these arguments for some time, but I will summarize briefly by stating that a man presenting the case for the farmers' association and representing the attorney general of a province should have had some new evidence before he appeared before the board. One argument he advanced was that the personnel of the board had been changed. It would appear however that the evidence was the same as had been filed, and that nothing new had been presented.

As I stated a short time ago the difficulty has been that this matter has been injected into the political arena. My first experience was in 1930 when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) who, I am sorry to say, is not now in his seat, came to my district and there secured a nomination from the farmer party and the Liberal party, no doubt expecting that if he could secure all the Liberal and farmer votes his opponent would have a very small chance of being elected. His main plank in that campaign was freight rates. He said, "I have served you well, and I am coming to you now and asking you to elect me as your representative that I may still continue to serve you." Cartoons were circulated throughout the district showing that Chinese and Japanese were having our grain delivered to them at a rate of twenty cents while the poor farmer in the Fraser valley had to pay 41½ cents. Well, Mr. Speaker, I find that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard did serve British Columbia about the year 1925 and perhaps part of 1926. Members here at the time very kindly handed over to him their files and all the information they had in order that he might carry on in the interests of our province. But he did not work for nothing, for I find according to a record which has been supplied me from Victoria, that at the conclusion of his services he presented a bill to the province for $89,307.49. His bill was carefully reviewed and he was allowed $62,723.23. When the farmers of my district found out that he had been well paid for his services they came to the conclusion that there was nothing more coming to him.

I do not blame the hon. member for New Westminster, but he also appeared here and was retained by the provincial government, and I find that the hon. gentleman was paid $380 for his trip to Ottawa. A question was placed on the order paper in the provincial legislature and I find, according to the votes and proceedings of the British Columbia legislature for February 22 of last year, that the following questions were answered by the premier:

1. Is Mr. Thos. Reid, M.P., retained by the province as provincial representative in connection with freight rates or marketing questions, or either?

The answer to that question was "Yes." This further question was asked:

Has he been paid any sums; and, if yes, how much and on what basis?

The answer to that question was:

$380; procuring information, compiling data, stenographic services, telegrams, travelling and hotel expenses.

The hon. member for New Westminster came to Ottawa and as far as I could find out he delivered the same speech that he gave in the House of Commons, and he expected to get results from that.

The minister has suggested that the hon. member should very kindly withdraw this bill. I say to the minister and to the house that the people of the Fraser valley and of British Columbia expect some action from the government on this question. In the last four or five years during which this bill has been before the house it was supported to a man by the Liberal party. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) supported it; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) supported it; the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) supported it; indeed, every member who then sat on this side of the house supported the bill. They endorsed the principle that the Crowsnest rates should be extended through to the coast. Therefore, if the hon. member for New Westminster said in his riding, "If you will elect me and return the Liberal party to power you will receive the benefit of the extension of the Crowsnest pass agreement and an equalization of freight rates," I say he was warranted in making that statement because of the action of the Liberal party in the house, and I say, that the people of our district and of British Columbia are not going to stand for any suggestion that the bill be withdrawn.

The minister says that an appeal is pending before the privy council. The appeal before the privy council is of a wholly different nature. It is an appeal on the question of feed grains, another matter entirely; but this is an extension of the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is mistaken. It is an appeal on the domestic rate.

Mr. BARBER: I understood from the papers that it was as I indicated. At any rate the minister can very easily remedy that, instead of waiting like the government did in 1930 until the privy council disappeared and the appeal along with it. The minister could recommend the passing of an order in council dismissing the appeal and accept this legislation as a government measure, and that is what the people of our province expect.

In conclusion I want to say to the hon. member for New Westminster that the poultrymen generally throughout British Columbia are not worrying to-day so much about freight rates as over what is going to happen to their industry under this Canada-United States trade agreement, which I shall have an opportunity I hope of discussing in the near future. In the meantime they are looking to the government and to the party that supported this legislation for the last four or five years to come through now and make this bill law.

Mr. G. W. McDONALD (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak very briefly on the motion now before the house. It means a great deal to the people in our part of the country. We have been passing through very severe droughts during the last five or six years, and have had to bring in a great deal of seed and feed grain. I know the railways give a very favourable rate on seed grain, and they reduce the rate by one-third on all feed grain, but the fact still remains that after cutting off one-third of the rate they have collected as much on the domestic rate as is being paid on the export rate. In the last few days, we have heard a great deal about the export rate and the domestic rate. My opinion is that the railways are giving a very favourable export rate for the purpose of encouraging the sale of our grain abroad. But would it not be just as laudable to encourage the consumption of grain within our own provinces?

I am rather in sympathy with the resolution moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I know that the hon. member who previously occupied the seat I now occupy in the house moved that a duty be imposed on corn for the purpose of encouraging the home consumption of barley. It might be said that we would not use very much barley, but much more grain has been brought into our part of the country during the last six years than we have shipped out, and we have had to pay the domestic rate on the grain brought in. It is quite true that the farmers have been treated pretty liberally, the government paying two-thirds and the railway the other third, but altogether the railway possibly collected more money on the domestic rate than they would have collected if the grain had been shipped out. It is pretty hard to make the ordinary member of the house who is not an expert on freight rates, and still harder to make the average farmer understand why we should have two rates for carrying the same commodity over the same distance, and in many cases the domestic rate is higher even for a shorter distance. We would like to have an opportunity to appear before the board of railway commissioners. I desire to put it on record that the people whom I represent wish to see the domestic rate done away with, and I believe there is some justice in that view.

Before this bill is withdrawn I would suggest that the government at least promise the hon. member for New Westminster that something will be done in the matter of freight rates because there is really not much use in referring the matter to the board of railway commissioners as, judging by past experience, we pretty well know beforehand, what sort of an answer we are going to get from them. The people of Manitoba, and I think the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta, believe this equalization of freight rates would be a very fine thing for the western provinces and for the railways themselves, because it must be remembered that raising the tariff does not always bring in a higher revenue, nor does raising the railway rates bring a higher revenue to the railways. Put the rates on the same basis and the railways will not be the losers; they will be the gainers.

Mr. THOMAS REID: (Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively to the various speeches which have been delivered in connection with this bill which has been introduced into the House of Commons now for the fifth time. Before dealing with the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe), I should like first to deal with some of the remarks made by certain hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber). We have to-night witnessed the spectacle of a certain type of politician who during an election weeps crocodile tears for the people of his district and then when he enters the house evades giving the support he should give. On every occasion when I introduced this bill he stated that it was too bad that this matter was being dragged into politics, but he himself went around during the last election saying that reductions were necessary.

Mr. BARBER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Freight rates were never made an issue in my campaign until the hon. member injected it at the eleventh hour. I never made freight rates an issue during the election.

Mr. REID: I have never made in the house a statement that I have not been ready to substantiate to the limit, and I am ready to stand behind the statement I have just made. It is touching the hon. member pretty hard; the truth is evidently pinching him. He has always endeavoured to drag this matter down to the low depths of that political stuff which we sometimes come across in the backwoods.

Mr. BARBER: It could not be brought down any lower than the hon. member has brought it.

Mr. REID: The hon. member referred to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) receiving some $70,000 or $80,000 when the hon. member for New Westminster only received $380.

Mr. BARBER: And he made only one trip.

Mr. REID: I am glad the hon. member brought up this matter. I should like to point out—I want all the lawyers in the house to take note—that I believe I got better results for $380 than were obtained at the time the $70,000 or $80,000 was spent. I got two of the commissioners to support me, just a little more than was achieved in the previous appeals.

While we are on this subject we might as well clean up some other matters. During the last election I did not state that the Liberal government would put the Crowsnest pass agreement into effect. During the election I stated, as I have stated in the House of Commons, that if I was elected this would be the first bill introduced in the house, and there it is. I stated that I would keep on fighting until British Columbia got some measure of equality. Those are the statements I made from the beginning to the end of the campaign, and I repeat them here to-night. They are the very statements I made to the former Minister of Railways, Mr. Manion. The hon. member referred to the poultrymen not worrying. He will probably have something to say about the trade agreement. He is the type of individual who claims that the trade agreement signed by this country and the United States is the cause of the low prices being received for eggs because of the great influx of eggs from across the line.

Mr. BARBER: I deny that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BARBER: On a point of order—

Mr. REID: Let the hon. member take his medicine.

Mr. BARBER: On a point of order; the statement made by the hon. gentleman is not correct. Before I left home I made no such statement with regard to the treaty. This remark is to be compared with many others the hon. member is making to-night.

Mr. REID: There were other remarks to the same effect, that the poultrymen were being hurt because this country had signed a treaty with the United States allowing the importation of eggs in great numbers. The week before I left for Ottawa I took the trouble to find out what was being done in the state of Washington. I discovered that eggs were selling for from three to four cents a dozen more than in British Columbia; that no eggs had come into the province and that if any did come in, they would have to be stamped—

Mr. BARBER: What about baby chicks?

Mr. REID: —yet the hon. gentleman makes remarks like those to which we listened a few minutes ago.

Mr. BENNETT: What has all this to do with the railway bill?

Mr. REID: I will take this up later on with the hon. member for Fraser Valley. He really had the temerity to deal with the remarks I made before the board. He stated that I had brought forth no new argument. Well, I wrote to him asking him to give me some help, as will be found in the records of the board of railway commissioners. I received no assistance; I was allowed to put up the fight practically all by myself, and without boasting, that fight was some fight.

Mr. BARBER: I was not retained by the province.

Mr. REID: The two railway companies should have had the hon. member for Fraser Valley in their employ. I made the statement then that we were able to buy good Canadian wheat and bring it from Japan at a lower cost than it could be brought from the prairie provinces. The railways could not overcome that argument because I had the shipping bills to prove my case. I was able to prove every point of my case, yet the hon. member ridicules a statement I made which the railway lawyers could not or did not care to dispute very seriously. I do not intend to use up all my time in refuting the hon. member for Fraser Valley because he stands refuted without any further statements from me.

I should like to deal now with some of the remarks made the other evening by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien), whom I was rather surprised to see entering the debate to oppose this bill. The hon. member is a former member of the board of railway commissioners, and I should like to deal with some of the remarks he made in connection with the bill. He stated that the rate was an export rate and that it was intended to help Canadian producers. What about the domestic producers? What about the producers of butter, cream, poultry and eggs in British Columbia? Are they not to be helped? I contend that it would be far better to help the domestic producer of bacon, eggs, poultry and other agricultural products rather than to ship our grain, including barley, to Europe and elsewhere and then have to meet in hams and bacon on the old country and other markets the competition of people who are able to procure good Canadian grain at fifty per cent less than the domestic producer has to pay. If export markets have been restricted during the last few years it is strange that no change has taken place in our policy in an endeavour to encourage domestic markets. Producers of poultry, eggs, butter, hams, bacon and so on should be given a better chance to compete, and with some degree of fairness and equity, against foreign competitors.

Then the hon. member said that we must distinguish between a paying and a losing rate. As I have previously stated, the railways have no expert capable of giving the cost of hauling grain. I challenge the hon. member for Outremont, as I did the lawyers before the board, to deny that the export rate to British Columbia is a paying one. If the railway companies can haul seventy or eighty million bushels of wheat at a paying rate, why then should the people of British Columbia be called upon to pay twice that rate? I asked them to produce figures to disprove my statement that it was a paying rate, but for some reason or another they did not do so. I then reversed the argument. I said: Assuming for a moment, which I do not, that it is a losing rate, is it fair that the people of British Columbia should be called upon to pay the deficit so that their foreign competitors may obtain grain at fifty per cent of the cost which we in British Columbia have to pay? I submit that it is most unfair. The statement was made before the board that they were accused of flattening out the Rockies. Well, a large proportion of our people to-day are still under the impression that when going into British Columbia you have to go up one side of a mountain and down the other, but I would point out that as a matter of fact we have in our province the finest railway grade in the whole of Canada. The grade is one-half of one per cent over the Canadian National, and that railway can take sixty cars either into British Columbia or from that province into the prairies, whereas its competitor, the Canadian Pacific railway, is faced with an averaged grade of 2·2 per cent, a very heavy grade indeed, so that it can take only twenty-five cars as its limit.

If I might offer one suggestion in connection with a reorganization of the railways it would be this. If we are looking for economy and efficiency, I submit that in carrying freight, to the Pacific coast at least, the Minister of Railways should urge that it be carried by the railway that can carry it, and that is the Canadian National. As I say, they have a grade of one-half of one per cent and can take into Vancouver or New Westminster three times as many cars as the Canadian Pacific railway can. As a matter of fact, they could take more, but owing to an arrangement with labour or the conductors they have agreed to take no more than sixty at one time.

Can hon. members visualize what happens with grain going into British Columbia, a whole trainload of say sixty cars, with one engine and one crew? Maybe forty or fifty cars in that trainload are carrying freight at 20½ cents per hundred pounds, while the back portion of the train, consisting of cars of goods for consumption in British Columbia is charged 41½ cents. Is there any equity or justice in that? There is not. We have a case that cannot be successfully disputed, and in the few minutes that remain to me I will indicate the reasons why I hope and believe that the present Liberal administration will do far more than the last government did; for invariably their argument has been that the House of Commons is not the place to fight freight rates. They have contended that we should go before the board of railway commissioners. I am now going to read order in council, P.C No. 886, of June 5, 1925, issued by the last Liberal administration under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), giving directions to the board of railway commissioners to equalize freight rates. I think hon. members will agree with me, when I read this order in council, that its language is as plain as any could possibly be to the layman. But we all know what lawyers are and how they can twist words. That is no reflection on you, Mr. Speaker.

It will be remembered that in 1925 the Liberal administration of the day dealt with this matter in the House of Commons; it was not the board of railway commissioners that dealt with it. It is true that administration omitted to put into the amendment to the Railway Act the same provision with respect to grain going west as was made in connection with grain going east to Fort William; but having regard to that error, this is the direction the government of that day gave to the board, and I make the positive assertion that the board disobeyed the order of parliament. This is the order, and I would ask laymen at least among hon. members to pay particular attention to it; I should be afraid to ask lawyers to construe it, for I have had some experience with them:

> The committee are of the opinion that the policy of equalization of freight rates should be recognized to the fullest possible extent as being the only means of dealing equitably with all parts of Canada and as being the method best calculated to facilitate the interchange of commodities between the various portions of the dominion, as well as the encouragement of industry and agriculture and the development of export trade.

I will not read the whole of it; I will come to what I consider the meat of this order, so far as the adjustment of freight rates is concerned:

> The committee are further of the opinion that as the production and export of grain and flour forms one of the chief assets of the dominion, and in order to encourage the further development of the great grain growing provinces of the west, on which development the future of Canada in large measure depends, it is desirable that the maximum cost of the transportation of these products should be determined and known, and therefore are of opinion that the maximum established for rates on grain and flour, as at present in force under the Crowsnest pass agreement, should not be exceeded.

Now there is omission No. 1; the board did not obey that order, and they do not yet know what it costs to haul grain. Then further down:

> The committee therefore advise that the board be directed to make a thorough investigation of the rate structure of railways and railway companies subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rate structure, which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities.

I do not know what plainer language could be written into an order than that—equal to all persons and localities, and as I have pointed out, over the Canadian National road into British Columbia we have the lowest grade on any portion of the railway system in Canada. That cannot be too often repeated. But even if it did cost the Canadian Pacific a little more, which I doubt, to build a railway into British Columbia—and

I know that they have in some parts a grade of 2·2—let me tell hon. members what that railway has received in return. It got a cash subsidy of $25,000,000; constructed railway including service, $38,000,000; cash in exchange for subsidy lands, $10,000,000, and 18,206,985 acres of selected lands valued at the time of earning at $27,310,000, making a total value of subsidies from the people of this country of $100,000,000. Inasmuch as they have been paid for constructing this line, why should they claim in perpetuity that they should receive more because their grade is 2·2? If they have been paid, why should there not be an equalization and why should they not give us in British Columbia the same benefit as they extend to other provinces?

I want to deal for a moment with one or two statements made by the Minister of Railways, and I am coming to his argument last. He said that in the United States there is no grade such as the Canadian National has—well, he did not mention the Canadian National. I would point out that in the United States there are heavier grades than the Canadian Pacific has to contend with, because the land in Canada slopes downward to the north pole, Edmonton being 1,800 feet lower than Calgary, and Calgary 1,800 feet lower than Seattle. The further south you go the higher the grade.

Mr. HOWE: I was speaking of grades of grain.

Mr. REID: I am sorry I misunderstood the minister; I thought he was speaking of grades on railways. To speak for a moment on rates, it is true that in the United States they have only one rate, but I doubt very much the minister's statement that it is equal to or comparable with our domestic rate. I have not the time to go into that, but I put the figures on record last session for the information of the then Minister of Railway, Mr. Manion, and I have them under my hand. I would point out to the minister that while they have only one rate from the wheat fields to the state of Washington, they carry all grain, bran, flour, shorts, or wheat at that rate, and it is lower, whereas in Canada, on grain going west, there is a temporary rate that applies only to feed grain, but on fifty per cent of the requirements of the poultry men and dairy men we are still called upon to pay 41½ cents.

The minister has appealed to me to withdraw the bill for the time being. This is a matter that is giving me a great deal of concern at the moment. I am not unmindful that, after all what I am after is results, not for myself but for the people of British Columbia; and as I pointed out, I intend to keep fighting this cause, because we have justice on our side. Not always does a person get results because he has justice on his side, but I believe we have a case that cannot be successfully refuted; certainly it has not been so far.

I am also not unmindful that in 1931, when I came to my first session of parliament, the position was almost the same. There was an appeal then before the governor in council, and I, coming into the house for the first time, placed a resolution on the order paper. The then prime minister, now leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) rose and stated, truly, I think, that his government had not yet had time to hear that appeal, and he asked me at that time if I would withdraw the resolution, promising, so he stated, that just as soon as parliament was prorogued they would give the matter attention. I, being in those days younger and more innocent, agreed to this. When I came back the following year the situation was exactly the same; nothing had been done. I was wondering, when the new minister of railways was making the same suggestion, whether I was going to be caught a second time, because "once bitten, twice shy." However, as the appeal to the governor in council at this time on behalf of the province has been lodged by myself I am inclined to do this, but I warn the minister and the government now that I am looking for some practical results, and I shall not be content if the suggestion by the minister is being made merely by way of a sop. This is the beginning of a new parliament. I expect far more results from it than I did from the last, because, as I stated, Mr. Speaker, invariably the party to your left have taken the stand that the matter is one for the board of railway commissioners, and I have pointed out that an appeal to that board is absolutely useless if we are to expect any results. So I have come to the highest court in the land, the court of the common people, to plead on behalf of British Columbia, and if I withdraw the bill for the time being it is with a view to getting action from the present government, and with the warning, not a threat, that if something further is not done they will certainly have a battle on their hands.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call to the attention of the house that the request of the hon. member for leave to withdraw his bill will require unanimous consent. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have unanimous leave to withdraw his bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Motion (Mr. Reid) for second reading, negatived.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Civil government—External Affairs—
Salaries, including the appointment of L. C. Christie as counsellor at $6,000 per annum, $100,000; contingencies, $69,500.

Mr. CAHAN: On this item I should like to ask the prime minister when the white paper, so called, is to be brought down.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I had expected to be able to lay the white paper on the table of the house to-day. It is being translated into French, and I wish to table the French copy at the same time as the English. I think I can promise to give my hon. friend the white paper to-morrow, I hope, in both languages.

Mr. CAHAN: I also asked the other day that certain orders in council with respect to the enforcement of sanctions against Italy should be laid on the table. I have read the proclamations or copies of them which the Prime Minister laid on the table, and I find that some at least of these orders in council were passed under the provisions of the Treaties of Peace Act, 1919; at least it so recited in the proclamations. I call attention to the fact that under the Treaties of Peace Act, 1919, orders in council made pursuant to that act must be placed before parliament in the most expeditious manner as soon as parliament is assembled. So I think the right hon. gentleman will find that he will be derelict in his duty if he does not produce these orders in council forthwith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the orders in council will be found included in the white paper. It is quite true that a few days have elapsed since the opening of parliament, but I hope my hon. friend will realize that there have been a good many matters to which the government has had to give attention upon first coming into office. If in anything we have been a day or two late, I am sorry.

Mr. CAHAN: Will another opportunity be given to discuss the contents and other matters relevant to the white paper and the imposition of sanctions against Italy? I think this item should stand until the white paper is published so that we may have an opportunity to discuss that matter when the relevant estimate is before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I suggest to my hon. friend that the relevant estimate would be the one referring to Geneva and to the League of Nations? Certainly there will be ample opportunity on that item to discuss the white paper and all matters incidental thereto. This item is simply for salaries of the Department of External Affairs and it indicates no increases over those presented under the regime of my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) other than such as may be of a statutory nature.

Mr. BENNETT: And Mr. Christie.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And Mr. Christie, yes.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—battlefields memorials, $84,950.

Mr. CHURCH: What policy has the government regarding memorials on battlefields in Ontario? Large amounts have been voted for memorials around the city of Quebec. I do not object to that because they are valuable, but if one province has been overlooked since confederation it is Ontario and its historic places. Take the Niagara district, rich in history. Little or nothing has been done except for the erection of a few cairns here and there. Starting at the Niagara river at lake Ontario, what have you? Old Fort Mississauga, a heap of ruins. Near the steamboat landing is old Fort George, and the place where the first parliament of this country met at Newark, now Niagara. Further up the river are Queenston Heights and Lundy's Lane. But this district has been altogether overlooked. We need to take a lesson from the people of the United States in regard to preserving these historic places. Lord Macaulay in his History of England said in regard to memorials of the siege of Londonderry in the north of Ireland, as follows:

> The humble tombs of the . . . captains have been carefully sought out, repaired, and embellished. It is impossible not to respect the sentiment which indicates itself by these tokens. It is a sentiment which belongs to the higher and purer part of human nature, and which adds not a little to the strength of states. A people which takes no pride in the noble achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered. . . .

The battlefields of the war of 1812 are heaps of ruins, while just across the river at Fort Niagara in the state of New York, a district visited by millions of people, we see what the United States government have done to the old fort on that side. Ontario is entitled to better treatment in this matter. I have every confidence in the new minister, because I know he frequently visits this district and the city from which I come. I raised this question in the house when I first came here in 1922 but there has been no improvement. On the United States side they have spent large sums of money at Fort Niagara and rebuilt the fort, and spent a lot of money on the memorials there.

There is a decrease of $1,839 in this vote. I venture to say that hardly a five cent piece has been spent in Ontario except for a few little cairns or slabs at about $1.75 a yard with a little inscription on them. That is not fair. In that same Niagara district there is Ridgeway where battles were fought in 1866, and in 1867 the Fenian raid. In the city I come from we celebrated last year the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the city. Its first mayor was the grandfather of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who did much for responsible government in this country and reasserted the principles of magna charta, and the Prime Minister attended that centennial and did honour to the memory of William Lyon Mackenzie. I hope the day will come when there will be adequate memorials in Ontario, marking the events of the war of 1812, and in the prairie provinces for the Northwest rebellion and other historic events. I do not object to the money that has been spent on the battlefields around Quebec, but other parts of the country should have similar treatment. I hope the new minister will give this his consideration.

We are looking for tourists. When they come to Ontario, many pass through Fort Erie where an important battle was fought, and they see on the battleground there an ancient building covered with chewing tobacco advertisements. At Chattanooga in the south, in the valley of the Cumberland where Grant made his reputation there are about forty-six monuments on that battlefield about thirty miles long, where each of the states built a monument about the size of our Brock's monument. In the village of Chippawa what have we? I saw something in the newspaper recently about Laura Secord, and the shabby treatment of her portrait. In the village of Chippawa where the power canal has been diverted there is a little bit of a cottage on the south side of the street where she lived, but hardly anything showing that is where Laura Secord lived. The old home in the village of Queenston is nowhere, and at Queenston where William Lyon Mackenzie had a printing newspaper office, and where the first printing press was set up in upper Canada the building is a mass of ruins. You would almost think you were in Belgium during the war.

Last summer was the fiftieth anniversary of the Northwest rebellion. There are only a few left of the old boys who went to the northwest at that time, I think less than a score in Toronto of the Queen's Own, the Grenadiers and the Governor General's Bodyguard commanded by the late Colonel Denison. These men went out to the northwest in 1885 to prevent this country from being dislocated and dismembered, and to avenge the death of that great patriot, Thomas Scott. There was a meeting last summer in Winnipeg, but they could not get sufficient public support to send about two hundred men from Halifax, Montreal and Toronto to visit the old places. The battlefields of Cut Knife, Batoche and others should be marked out and preserved. These battlefields in our own country should be marked as well as the battlefields overseas. We are behind the times. We had many millions to spend on railways but apparently almost nothing for this purpose. I commend the work which the department has been doing; they have certainly done good work, but there should be equality of treatment for all the provinces.

I believe in a principle for confederation in the words of the old Cornish battle cry: Each for all and all for each. That should be the confederation battle cry for this parliament. Parliament is supposed to be a club where a member can express his views, whatever they may be. In my opinion the rising generation should be given a practical demonstration of the sentiment of preserving these historic places of interest throughout our country, I suggest that something of a practical nature should be done to commemorate Laura Secord, and that something should be done to restore the home where she lived in the village of Chippawa and at Queenston, and that section of the Niagara district, and to restore the ruins of the various historic places of the war of 1812-1814. We should have something to commemorate those people who did so much in the early days towards building up our country. I hope the minister, who has been in our section quite a number of times and has always been welcomed there, will see that something is done in the Niagara district in connection with this matter.

I commend the good work done by the battlefields commission at Quebec. The late Colonel Denison of Toronto was one of the first commissioners and was appointed by the Laurier government. In my opinion the work which was done in Quebec should be extended to all the other provinces of confederation, where there are historic places connected with the early history of this country.

Mr. McIVOR: I am sure hon. members are in favour of honouring the battlefields, but so far as I am concerned may I say that I am more interested in the men who were spared to come back, some of whom have not enough to eat, or enough to wear, or a decent job. I am sorry we could not hear the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) but when he turns his back upon one to speak, it is difficult to hear Undoubtedly we want to honour the battlefields, but it is more important that we have bread and butter and decent jobs for those men who risked their lives and who, upon coming back, cannot get the bare necessities of life.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understand the Vimy memorial will be unveiled this summer.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would the minister make a short statement as to what the plans may be?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amount of $25,000 is included in the present vote for the unveiling of the Vimy memorial on July 26. The departmental committee which has been working upon this has not yet concluded its arrangements, but it is intended to invite certain guests to go from England to France. I agree with the hon. member that the voluntary commission in Canada has done one of the most wonderful works accomplished by any public-spirited body in our history. This is the last of eight memorials now built in France. Canada has spent something more than $2,253,000 upon the building of these memorials, and I think it is only fit that when the last and greatest memorial of any kind in France is unveiled on July 26 we should have the cooperation of all parties in this chamber. My department would welcome suggestions from my right hon. friend or from any hon. member who may have suggestions as to the specific details of the dedication.

Mr. BENNETT: Has this anything to do with the vote concerning the memorial on the square here in Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, this memorial has to do with the European war, and the vote will disappear after this year. I believe an amount of $4,000 or $5,000 will be given to the Imperial War Graves Commission for the protection and preservation of these sites.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. BENNETT: We have already completed our payment of the endowment for the purpose of maintaining the graves?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the book of remembrance of members of the Canadian forces, and Canadians in the forces of the British Empire who lost their lives in the great war, $8,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is an increase of $2,500 to provide for a lithographic reproduction of the book of remembrance, so that it, as well as the original book in the memorial chamber, may be available to the public. It is anticipated that the artist's contract will be completed in 1937, and the idea is to have a lithographic reproduction of the original book.

Mr. HEAPS: Some hon. members are not familiar with the work involved in the preparation of the book and do not know what the total cost is to be. Would the minister give that information?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total cost of the book was $35,000. I believe it was carried out by James Purves, and I believe there is an advisory committee who up to the present time are satisfied with the progress of the work and the artistic nature of the work carried out.

Mr. REID: We should be very proud of our peace memorial in Ottawa. Any person who enters the chamber must feel impressed. Would there be any possibility of producing a book which could be secured at small cost by those of the public who visit the peace tower?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is being considered at the present time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Can the minister state how many names there will be in the book? I understood him to say that it would be finally completed next year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; the contract was entered into in 1932, and the estimated duration of the work was placed at five years. The work is up to date, and in round figures I believe there will be about 68,000 names.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Expenses connected with the dominion observatory at Ottawa, $46,800.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister give particulars?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of the Interior): The increase is due to the fact that one additional member has been taken on the staff, and also some new equipment is required in the seismographical work. During the past year considerable damage was caused to the seismographical instruments.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: By the earthquake?

Mr. BENNETT: I guess it was about the time of the election.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, I think it was due to the election.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister state what work is performed in the observatory in Ottawa?

Mr. CRERAR: I freely confess that this work, which is of a highly scientific nature, is a little beyond the range of my knowledge or experience. I may say however that the work has to do with measurements as to the positions of stars, and the relation of those measurements to measurement of time. Communications by radio are maintained with other observatories, and as a result we are able to have very accurate time. For instance, in Ottawa we have six hundred electrical clocks, three of which are in this chamber. It is important to have the correct time, otherwise the hon. member for Winnipeg North might lose some time in one of the speeches he makes to the house. Then, the observatory studies sun spots and their effect on climatic conditions and plant life. Recent theories of the physicists indicate that sun spots have a material bearing on mundane matters, and we in Canada wish to make our contribution to the study of these problems. Then, the seismographical branch does an important work; when earthquakes take place we are able to do our share towards ascertaining where they may be. Then, there is the abstruse problem of getting an accurate method of measuring gravity. What particular relation this has to the ordinary affairs of the country I am unable to say, but I believe it is of considerable importance.

Mr. MacNICOL: I could see the minister's lips moving all right, and I noticed that hon. members sitting around him were apparently enjoying what he was saying, but we could not hear a word of it over here. He likely gave a fair explanation of what this expenditure is for, but surely to goodness hon. members are entitled to hear what the minister has to say, and for my part I did not hear a word of it.

Mr. CRERAR: I am really very sorry if my hon. friend did not hear me.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, it is no fault of my ears.

Mr. CRERAR: I am quite willing to take all the blame for the inability of my hon. friend to hear me, but if he will read Hansard to-morrow he will get a general idea of the work that is carried on in the observatory. I might remind hon. gentlemen that the observatory has been established for over thirty years.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister has shown a profound knowledge of all that is going on at the observatory. Although I noticed that at times he referred to his notes, still in spite of that he evidently knew something about gravity and the Einstein theory as well, and I observed how particular he was about stargazing. I suppose he was looking at his political stars more than at anything else.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Are the telescope and other mechanical devices at the observatory up to date as compared with the way in which similar work is done in other countries? I should like to know whether our observatory is able to perform the functions it ought to in assisting in general observations throughout the world.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the equipment at the observatory at Ottawa is reasonably adequate for the work it is doing. As my hon. friend probably knows, in the Victoria observatory we have the second largest telescope in the world, although that will not be the case when the new telescope is presently installed at Mount Wilson observatory.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does that mean that the work of this observatory is not as effective as it used to be and that it is giving place to the one at Victoria?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. SPENCE: Will the minister give us a detailed statement of how this money is going to be spent, how many employees there are, and so on? How many men are hanging around doing nothing?

Mr. CRERAR: I can assure the hon. gentleman that there are none hanging around doing nothing. There are seventeen of the staff of the observatory at Ottawa paid out of this vote.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not know what they can be working at.

Mr. STEWART: The minister said that in the interests of efficiency an additional employee had been taken on. May I ask what are his duties and when he was taken on?

Mr. CRERAR: The addition to the staff at the observatory is a young lady who was loaned in the first place from the statistical branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. She has been at the observatory for a considerable time and is now being permanently transferred from the statistics branch to the observatory. I understand that she is highly efficient.

Item agreed to.

Dominion astrophysical observatory—
Expenses connected with the dominion astrophysical observatory at Victoria, B.C., $20,000.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Will the minister tell the committee who succeeded Doctor Plaskett at Victoria observatory and also explain the decrease in this vote? I understood the minister to say a moment ago that we had the second largest telescope in the world at Victoria, and one would think that this might necessitate a larger personnel.

Mr. CRERAR: Doctor Harper succeeded Doctor Plaskett. He was Doctor Plaskett's assistant at the observatory.

Mr. PLUNKETT: What is the reason for the decrease in this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: As my hon. friend will have observed the decrease is not very large, being $1,203. It is due to the fact that the new employees who have been taken on the staff have come in at the minimum salaries.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

To provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian Affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, education, etc., and a grant of $100,000 approved by parliament in session of 1926-27, $4,241,100.

Mr. BENNETT: It is desirable that the minister should make as complete a statement as he can with respect to this whole Indian problem. I confess that during the last few years I have become considerably interested in it, and if the minister will take it up in detail and give us some idea of the present situation I think that would be appreciated by the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I confess that my knowledge of the whole Indian problem in Canada is not as intimate as I could wish, but I might say in a general way that the Indian population in Canada to-day is about 112,000, and is increasing. The fact that it is increasing makes the Indian problem deserving of the attention of public authorities with a view to studying the best methods for bringing education to the Indians, making them self-supporting, and generally improving their situation. Undoubtedly a very large number of Indians are on relief at the moment. I am speaking from memory, but I think I am correct when I say that about one-third of the Indian population of Canada has been on relief for the last two or three years. The rather superficial study that I have been able to give to Indian problems since I took charge of the department has inclined me to the view that the administration is rather expensive; that it costs a considerable amount of money and probably might be improved in some respects. I hope to study this problem before I come again to submit estimates to the committee, if it is my good fortune to do so.

There are further problems in connection with education. In this connection we sometimes run into a rather delicate situation. It is sometimes found that two or three denominations are carrying on their good work in one community, and this ocacsionally creates a problem. There is as well the question of hospitalization. If we are to discharge our obligations to the Indians in this connection, this matter will stand a very considerable amount of study. There is the problem of bringing the Indians to a better understanding of the methods of the white man and his way of living. At times I do not think we have acted wisely in this respect. In western Canada and in some parts of Ontario there are Indians who are making substantial progress towards becoming self-supporting. This is being achieved mainly through agriculture, but in the more remote parts of the country trapping and fishing, the traditional occupations of the Indian, are practically his only means of support. Our Indians are scatterred from Halifax to Vancouver and from the international boundary to the Arctic circle and one realizes the magnitude of the problem when this vast area is considered. I do not know that there is much more that I can add to this statement.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Has the minister investigated the complaints I forwarded him in connection with the Indians around Duncan, on Vancouver Island? It is claimed that their habitations have not been repaired for many years, and some of these are definitely in an unsanitary condition. It is stated also that they are being fined for fishing within their own reserve.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not had an opportunity to look closely into the matters which the hon. gentleman has brought to my notice. However I assure him that they are not being overlooked.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I thank the minister for his evident intention to look thoroughly into this matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to hear the minister say that he is going to look carefully into the whole question of the administration of the Department of Indian Affairs. On checking over the public accounts for 1935 I notice that there is a great variation in the cost of different services rendered to the Indians. I assume that the item for hospitalization refers only to Indians. There seems to be a considerable variation in the salaries paid to the doctors on the different reserves, as well as a difference in the salaries of teachers and other officials. I notice also that in every case there is a considerable amount of supplies. Upon looking over these items I can see a good deal in the old saying: Lo, the poor Indian. According to the 1935 figures, we spent approximately $4,000,000 on the Indians. According to the present estimates before the house—and I assume the same ratio would apply in 1935—the Indians are receiving about $250,000 in grants while salaries amount to a little over $800,000. There seems to be a great field here for the well known ability of the minister to bring about a real reform in the management of this department. I shall be very glad to support any recommendation he desires to make in an effort to see that the Indians get more of what is voted while the general cost is equalized.

Mr. CRERAR: I appreciate the reference the hon. member for Davenport has made to my ability and I shall certainly endeavour to exercise it in the administration of this department. I think I am correct in saying that twenty-five years ago the cost of administration in Nova Scotia—I do not take this province for any particular reason, but mention it merely because the figures happen to stick in my memory—was around $10,000 or $12,000 a year. To-day it is almost ten times that amount. Hon. members will note that this general vote covers salaries, supplies, relief —I have stated already that approximately one-third of the Indians have been on relief for the last two or three years—medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, and education. I am informed that forty-five per cent of the total vote is used for educational purposes. I think there is some room for improvement and I hope to be able to indicate this to the committee should it be my good fortune to be dealing with these estimates next year.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister has not told the committee the number of Indians who come under this item.

Mr. CRERAR: A little earlier I stated that the total number of Indians in Canada was approximately 112,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Would all the 112,000 come within the purview of the government?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the number increasing or decreasing?

Mr. CRERAR: It is increasing. Practically the whole 112,000, I am informed, are under the care of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that the Indian population is increasing is in itself prima facie evidence that the Indians are being well looked after. Prior to a few years ago the Indian agents were not always medical men, nor are they yet; but an effort was made during the last regime to provide that if possible they should have some medical training. The result is, I believe, that this is the first time a report has been made to the house of an increase in the Indian population. My memory is that it was shrinking a few years ago; but during the last few years an effort has been made, whenever vacancies have occurred, to appoint as Indian agent, if possible, a medical man. As a result the children have been better cared for; tuberculosis has been brought under control; disease has diminished, and the habits of life of the Indians have improved.

I cannot speak of the Indians in the maritime provinces. The report I received with respect to them on one occasion was rather alarming, and a special effort was made to have some specific relief afforded them. They were in a rather bad way. In Quebec, apart from the large bands, there are small bands scattered over many sections of the province, and in Ontario, apart from the large reserves, there are numbers of bands of Indians. When we get into western Canada we find that usually they have excellent reserves. At Macleod the Bloods have a very fine reserve from which they receive substantial revenues. The Blackfoot Indians have sold large quantities of their land, sometimes by public auction and sometimes not, and considerable sums of money have gone into their endowment fund. They have been greatly improved in their status during the last few years, for they have been fairly well to do. The Stony Indians, west of Calgary, are in a bad way. They are hunters and fishermen and during the last few years have suffered acutely. A good deal of money has been expended in improving facilities at Morley, and perhaps they are better off than they were a while ago. So far as British Columbia is concerned, reports from that province indicate that many of the Indians are in a pretty bad way, and a special effort was made to look after many of them.

I have been astounded at the enormous sums of money we have had to spend to accomplish the results. The year before last the situation was very acute, and when you realize that $4,000,000 has been spent on about 112,000 Indians, who themselves possess adequate resources in the way of reserves, I can only say that the closest supervision ought to be exercised over administration. I believe in many cases they get rations, and they have treaty money distributed to them under the terms of surrender they made to their interests in lands and the taking up of reserves. They have a certain sum in the way of treaty money, and then they have the interest on their own funds. I understand that they utilize their own funds for the construction of buildings.

One of the most difficult problems is that connected with education; I believe it is the outstanding problem in that regard. My memory is that the cost per head in connection with these institutions is what absorbs a very substantial part of this appropriation. That is a matter which perhaps can be carefully considered during the recess, but there are grave and delicate difficulties, as the hon. gentleman has said, by reason of the possibility of differences arising with respect to the religious denominations that should look after particular bands of Indians.

In the far north, most distressing tales came down two years ago of the condition of the Indians, and I hope that during this very hard winter they have not experienced the hardship they did that year; for in the western provinces, where the cold has been intense, the condition of the Indians in the last few weeks has been very trying. I think the relief measures afforded them have been as nearly adequate as possible.

Canada, I believe, has discharged its obligations to its wards about as well as has any country in the world, but during the last ten years there has been a decided increase in expenditures. The Indians have been receiving medical attention and care which they never had before, and with the rations they have received they have been in a much better position, very much better as a matter of fact, than have many other sections of our population. I realize the minister's difficulty, and it is only fair to say that he is not responsible for expenditures that have occurred during the last fiscal year; he is responsible only for the sums he is asking for and for the work that will be done during the next fiscal year under existing conditions. But what is the $100,000 for?

Mr. CRERAR: That, I am informed, is a special vote given British Columbia under some legislation passed in 1926-27.

Mr. BENNETT: I was trying to ascertain what it was for; I did not know whether it was for the extinguishment of rights in Kitsilano or not. Perhaps the minister recalls that.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that it is in lieu of treaty money. Treaty money is not paid to Indians in British Columbia and this $100,000 is in lieu thereof. I might say, to augment what my right hon. friend has said, that this winter has proved a rather severe one with the Indians, and expenditures for supplies in the way of rations, clothing and feed for stock have been higher than they have been in the past few years. That of course is unavoidable considering weather conditions that have prevailed in western Canada for several months.

In reply to the hon. member for North Winnipeg I might give the details of this vote. The administration cost is $622,000, a very slight reduction from last year. That includes administrative services and Indian agents throughout the country. Education is of course the big item—this year $1,691,000.

Mr. BAKER: Does the minister think we are getting results for that amount of money?

Mr. CRERAR: Frankly, I am not in a position to pass fair judgment on that question, but I may say that that is a reduction of $280,000 from the previous year. It was with some regret that I asked for this reduction. The representations made to me by those having to do with the education of the Indians were all to the effect that the vote should be increased and not decreased, but at any rate that is what it is for the present year. The medical services absorb $861,500. Then aids to Indians in various ways, implements of production, all the aids to get the Indians established—and we have not succeeded—

Mr. BENNETT: Continue their establishment, I should say.

Mr. CRERAR: —in our efforts yet—accounts for $931,000. That includes houses and repairs to houses and all that sort of thing. Then there is a small vote for irrigation and roads and surveys amounting to $34,000. That, roughly, is the break-up of the item of $4,241,100.

Mr. HEAPS: How many children are being educated in the Indian schools?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that there are about 16,000 Indian youngsters receiving education at the present time in one form or another.

Mr. McCANN: Is there any attempt on behalf of the department to carry the education beyond the primary schools?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed there is an effort, in this way, that an additional grant of $25,000 is given for the benefit of those Indian pupils who show exceptional capacity.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Is any attempt being made to train Indian girls as nurses in the hospitals in order that they may look after the sick of their own people?

Mr. CRERAR: That is being done. I am not at the moment prepared to give the number, but several Indian girls have qualified as trained nurses and are being used, mostly in the Indian hospitals.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether the amount of $1,691,000 is too high or too low for educational facilities for Indian boys and girls, but it seems to me that the government is spending over $100 per annum for the education of each Indian child. That works out at considerably more than is being spent on education in the ordinary schools of the country. I think in our ordinary public schools this works out at about $50 or $60 per year. Can the minister explain why there is that great difference between the cost of educating a child in the ordinary city or town or village as compared with that of the Indian who is being educated in somewhat different surroundings?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. The explanation is very simple. By far the greater number of Indian schools are residential schools. These youngsters come in from the reservations. They live in the school; they are fed and housed and educated there. Of course that type of education is much more expensive than that which obtains in, for instance, a city school.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Can the minister give us a little information with respect to medical attention, more particularly as to any special work that is being done? How many doctors, for instance, are employed in this work in Saskatchewan, and what progress are they making with respect to stamping out tuberculosis, prevalent among the Indians?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall have to give the information later to the hon. member as to the number of doctors employed in the Indian service in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I mean, in special work.

Mr. CRERAR: I could not say as to that. I may be able to get that information. On the other question raised by the hon. member as to tuberculosis, that is a real problem so far as the Indian population is concerned. Already I have had some correspondence with one or two of the provinces that are making efforts to stamp out tuberculosis among the white population in order to see whether the work they are doing cannot be related to the Indian population as well. That is a problem which must be studied. I recall that in one of the schools in an Alberta reserve we have no facility for segregating children who have tuberculosis in the incipient stages; at any rate the segregation of those children from the others is done in a very haphazard fashion. At the moment that problem is engaging my attention.

Mr. DONNELLY: What percentage of the schedule of medical fees is paid for surgical operations, or is the full schedule paid?

Mr. CRERAR: Where special surgical work has to be done the fee paid to the doctor performing the operation is based upon what the workmen's compensation boards in various provinces allow for similar operations, or in some cases the fees are taxed by the department of health. I think I can assure the hon. member that the department is doing everything it reasonably can to protect the public interest in that regard. That was one of the matters I went into very early in my experience in the department.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Has it been found possible to police the reserves with Indians rather than white policemen?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the policing of some of the reserves in some of the minor work is being done in certain cases by Indians. That is a question which requires some study and, of course, some care. On the general principle of the matter I should say that to as great a degree as possible the Indians should be made self-supporting in the matter of policing, as in everything else.

Mr. WOOD: Are the band funds or the endowment funds included in that appropriation of four millions odd?

Mr. CRERAR: This is an appropriation by parliament for the maintenance of this work in all its varied aspects for the coming year, and it does not include expenditures from the band funds.

Mr. SENN: Are all the funds for educational purposes voted by parliament, or do some of the funds come from funds of the bands that are held in trust by the government?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand none of the band funds is used anywhere for educational purposes. Sometimes the increment of these funds is used for building houses and for improvements on the reserves, but not for education.

Mr. WALSH: Are there any special classes on the reservation such as are established under our regular school system for retarded children, or any vocational schools or technical classes or anything of a specialized nature?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that many of the schools teach some handicrafts, but I do not know of any special classes for, shall I say, Indian children of low intelligence. There are none of those schools.

Mr. WALSH: Are all the teachers engaged by the government qualified teachers?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the teachers are practically all qualified teachers. There may be one or two who have been teaching for many years who are not qualified, but they are practically all qualified teachers.

Mr. WALSH: If there are any unqualified teachers does the minister not think, in view of the condition that prevails in the teaching profession at present, this is an opportune time to replace them by certified teachers?

Mr. CRERAR: There are a few missionary teachers who have devoted practically all their lives to welfare work among the Indians, and they are continuing in the spheres in which they have lived and carried on their work. The others, as I have intimated, are qualified teachers.

Mr. WALSH: What is the average salary paid to teachers engaged by the government for this work?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think I could give the average. That would involve a mathematical computation which at the moment I am not in a position to have made. These salaries range from $800 up to $1,000 per annum and perhaps in a few cases beyond that.

Mr. SENN: I wish to draw to the attention of the minister what I consider to be rather an injustice on a certain reservation in Ontario. A number of Indian children are attending secondary schools, and the cost of their instruction in those schools is paid, I understand, on an attendance basis. In the same reservation are two or three clergymen who have children who are desirous of attending high school. But unfortunately the high school is in another county; the band is not willing to pay for their tuition; the Indian department up to the present has not been willing to do so, and because that particular locality does not pay any taxes to the county it is not willing to pay for their tuition. The result is that the children are unable to attend high school, as the father who is a missionary is unable to pay. I think I brought the matter to the attention of the department once before, without any result. I would ask the minister to give it his serious consideration, because a hardship is being worked on the children of missionaries who are endeavouring to carry on in that reservation.

Mr. CRERAR: This is the first intimation I have had of the problem to which my hon. friend refers. I shall be very glad to get the facts of the matter and, if there is any injustice, see whether it cannot be corrected. I understand the hon. member is referring to children of the missionaries?

Mr. SENN: The children of white missionaries. They are not receiving any tuition simply because the band funds are not available, the government grant is not available and the county in which they reside is not willing to pay for their tuition.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask how many children are involved?

Mr. SENN: Only two that I have knowledge of. There are two missionaries in that reservation. The matter was brought to my attention some two or three years ago. I cannot say now just how many children there might be, two or three anyway.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be glad to have my officials look into that matter and give me a report on it.

Mr. GREEN: What is the approximate number of whites engaged in this work with the Indians, and what are the types of work?

Mr. CRERAR: I assume the hon. member means in the total administration in Canada?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: Between 900 and 1,000 regular employees, I am informed. That includes teachers.

Mr. GREEN: And the types of work they do?

Mr. CRERAR: They vary. Some are doctors, some nurses, some school teachers, some farm instructors, some Indian agents supervising the reserve they have charge of, and I daresay there are several other categories if I could think of them.

Mr. BROOKS: Is there any system of compulsory education for Indian children? I notice that a good many Indian families wander about the country during the school year and the children do not seem to be at school.

Mr. CRERAR: My deputy informs me that the Indian Act provides for a measure of compulsion in regard to the education of Indian children, to what extent I regret I am not at the moment able to say. But the fact that the Indian population in Canada is roughly 112,000, and that more than 16,000 Indian children are attending school, is, I think, a pretty fair indication that their educational needs are not suffering badly.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Is any sum provided in this vote for the new Indian school at Lebret and the new Indian hospital at Fort Qu'Appelle? Could the minister also tell us the cost of the new school at Lebret and also of the Indian hospital at Fort Qu'Appelle, for both the erection of the buildings and the furnishings? Further, I should like to know what accommodation there is at the new Indian school at Lebret and at the hospital at Fort Qu'Appelle.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the school cost approximately $200,000 and the hospital building approximately $100,000. In addition to that sum a further amount will be required for the hospital to equip it with beds and blankets and the sort of things that are required in a hospital.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): What accommodation is there for pupils in new Indian schools at Lebret, Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: Accommodation for 250 children.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): How many are there now?

Mr. CRERAR: The new school is not opened yet.

Mr. WOOD: I was not expecting that this vote would be considered to-night. I am sorry I have not before me the information I should have liked to present concerning the Six Nations Indians who happen to reside in the constituency I have the honour to represent. Of the 112,000 Indians in Canada 5,000 live in the reserve adjacent to the city of Brantford, and in the constituency of Brant. In my view they should not be classed with the average Indian of the dominion, when we learn that about thirty-three per cent of the Indians are on relief. From a conversation I had recently with the superintendent at Brantford I learned that of the 5,000 Indians in the Six Nations reserve only eighty-one are on relief. That would seem to indicate that they are capable in the discharge of their duties and are able to take care of themselves. For those reasons they have advanced more than many others of the aborigines of the dominion.

I believe that until about three years ago they administered their own educational system, but for some reason or another that privilege was taken away from them. I have not been able to ascertain the reason. The department gave the excuse that they had appropriated the whole of the education of Indians on reserves, and that because of that they must take away from the Indians the administration of their schools. In passing may I observe that the Indians built their own schools from their own band funds, and prior to that time had contributed about half of the cost of their own education. They enjoy a reasonable amount of autonomy due to the fact that they elect their own council, and it seems to me it was most unfortunate that the Indians were deprived of a degree of autonomy which, by virtue of their advance, we had the right to encourage them to go further; we ought to give them more autonomy and more control over their affairs, in so far as they are able to manage them.

In that way we shall make good citizens of them.

In the few moments I shall speak—and I shall not take too long—may I state that the Indians on the Six Nations reserve are in a somewhat different position from that of the average of the aborigines of Canada, because they compare very favourably with our United Empire Loyalists. An agreement was made between Captain Joseph Brant and the British government whereby he would extend his loyalty towards the British at the time of the American revolution. The loyalists were granted certain concessions if they would remain true to the British crown. They came to Canada and were granted a piece of land extending six miles on either side of the Grand river, from its mouth to its source. They did not need all that land and for that reason they sold a portion of it. The money was set aside and was held in trust in Canada as a trust fund for the maintenance of the Indians. This was a good business proposition, and I believe we have every reason to commend the Indians for their astuteness in having a bank account. I only wish the government had as good a bank account as have those Indians, because if that were so we would be in a much better position than we are in to-day. The matter upon which I am speaking has been a perennial subject. I believe my predecessor, Mr. Smoke, described conditions possibly better than I am in a position to do, because I know he has made a study of the subject. At the present time I am going through eighty-six pages of legal phraseology. So far I have gone only about half way through, but it has been my endeavour to learn the history of the Six Nations Indians.

Mr. BENNETT: Read Mr. Smoke's speech and you will get the story.

Mr. WOOD: Yes, and I commend Mr. Smoke for his approach to the subject. Unfortunately I have not been able to get all the facts in the short time I have had at my disposal, but to the best of my ability I have endeavoured to do so in my own way. For that reason I shall not go into detail, because I do not wish to misplace the ancient characters, or to put them in a wrong light.

It seems, however, that about one hundred years ago a scheme known as the Grand river navigation project was devised. It was incorporated in 1832. Trustees were empowered to enter upon the crown lands, or the lands belonging to the Six Nations Indians, after making compensation. The funds belonging to these Indians were at that time held by trustees. In 1832 the Hon. J. H. Dunn, then Receiver General of Upper Canada, had charge of the public moneys of the then province. He was an active exponent of the policy of canal construction, and held the office of president of the Welland Canal Company. The Grand River Navigation Company acted more or less as a subsidiary and was to supply the water to the Welland canal. By virtue of that arrangement the two companies worked together.

Mr. Dunn filled the further position of trustee of the Six Nations Indians. He appears to have taken a most active part in their money affairs. On April 3, 1834, an order in council was passed stating the Indians desired that their moneys invested in British funds should be transferred to Canada to be invested in provincial debentures or other government securities. I shall not go into details as to the ramifications of the charters or supplementary letters patent, in view of the various changes in the financial structure, but briefly I would state that they did get a promise from Sir John Colborne, the then Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, to assist them in an endeavour to form a company to permit trade in western Ontario via the Grand river. He was successful in getting sufficient interest among men who had money to invest to organize the company.

As time went on the Buffalo and Goderich line was built, which was another change that took place in the transportation system, thus impairing the possibilities of the Grand River Navigation Company. The competition of the railway would largely impair the possibilities of the canal. These men found that they were going to be left in a precarious position. For some reason, of which at the present time I am not aware, they wished to withdraw their obligations and pledge to Sir John Colborne and, to make a long story short, those who were responsible substituted the Indian funds to purchase stock, and put those funds into a precarious investment.

The association of the Receiver General with the Grand River Navigation Company placed the government in a rather unfortunate position, for it meant that they were investing funds which they held in trust for the Indians in a company in which some of them were personally interested. You will see, Mr. Chairman, that the security of the funds of the Six Nations Indians was thus jeopardized, and the Indians in consequence feel that they have been more or less exploited through this scheme of organizing a joint stock company and investing it in their funds which were held in trust for them by the government of the day. Whether the powers of a trust company had been defined at that time or not, it is not lawful, as I understand the matter, for a trustee to invest in a joint stock company funds committed to his care.

It might be said that all this happened one hundred years ago and that we have no obligation to-day. While there may not be a legal obligation—and I cannot speak as to that—undoubtedly there is a moral obligation, and that moral obligation was incurred through the filching from the coffers of the Indians of this $160,000 of trust funds which belonged to the Six Nations. I do not say that this was done with dishonest intent; it might have been done with the intention of serving a good purpose, but the unfortunate point is that the money was held in trust for the Indians and the government had no right to invest it in a joint stock company.

Mr. CRERAR: When did that happen, may I ask?

Mr. WOOD: It happened somewhere around 1834, and thirteen instalment payments on the stock were called for down to August, 1841. About £25,000 had been paid from the Indian funds through disposing of British consols in which the Indians' funds were invested at that particular time. All the interest on these British consols which should have been paid to the Indians each year was absorbed in paying up these instalments on the stock as fast as the instalments were called for. The payment from the Indian funds began in 1834. I might just quote from the order in council of January 16, 1840:

> The council beg to state, for the information of Your Excellency, that the investment of the money of the Six Nations Indians, in the stock of the Grand River Navigation Company, took place by authority of Sr John Colborne, upon the recommendation of the trustees of the Six Nations.

And he was president of the Grand River Navigation Company. I leave the house to deduce the motive. The order in council continues:

> Their Excellencies Sir Francis Head and Sir George Arthur alike objected to the investment, but before the assumption of the government by Sir Francis Head the chief part of the money had been already invested, liable to forfeiture, in case the further stock should not be paid in.

These Indians are advanced. They are conscious of the unfairness of misappropriating their funds, and I think they are quite within their rights in their demand. I live within two miles of these Indians; I know their habits and the progress they have made. They have advanced, and many of them can take their places among the citizens of this dominion in the various professions and other walks of life. Many of their young women are qualified school teachers, and many of their young boys and girls are attending secondary and high schools in the community. I am speaking only of the Six Nations Indians because those are the ones I know, and I would urge upon the Department of Indian Affairs the granting to the Indians of more autonomy in keeping with the progress they have made.

I think a great mistake was made when control of their schools was taken away from them. This was a discouragement to them. I do not know what the purpose was, but it happened somewhere around 1932. I know it is nauseating to the Indians who are interested in their own welfare to have some school teacher hired from the outside come in and teach their children when they have young lady teachers of their own quite capable of performing those duties. What the motive was I do not know, but to me it savours of a little bit of politics. There may have been some good friends who wanted certain things done.

Let me mention the case of a young Indian just north of Brantford who asked for his enfranchisement. He had received a very good education and then became enfranchised, and by virtue of his enfranchisement he was upon assuming Canadian citizenship to all intents and purposes a white man. He was a good Conservative, and he was appointed to an Indian school. He had a splendid son, a brilliant chap, who I believe has won his B.A. degree, and the son was engaged last summer to take one of the other schools. I believe it would be wise for us to give back to the Indians the right to administer their own schools. They do not take kindly to our administration of them. They are honest, industrious citizens, interested in their own welfare, and they do not take kindly to the government selecting people, just because they happen to be of a certain political complexion, to come in and teach in their schools, particularly when they have young people of their own who are qualified to teach in those schools.

In conclusion, I would ask the Department of Indian Affairs to give serious consideration to this claim of the Six Nations Indians to the sum of $160,000 of their funds that was taken away from them by the action of the receiver general, in a breach of trust. I believe the Indians will be very glad to receive the interest upon that sum and to assume greater obligations providing they are granted more autonomy and are given a more important voice in the administration of their own affairs.

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid that the claim of the Six Nations Indians, a claim that originated over a hundred years ago, to $160,000, with accumulated interest, is one that the government could not entertain. I do not know the merits or demerits of the claim that the hon. member for Brant has put forward. Since this question originated 102 years ago or thereabouts, the federal government as we know it to-day cannot be responsible for the matter. If my memory of history is correct, this happened during the time when Upper Canada was still being governed as a crown colony. The hon. member spoke to me some little time ago about this question, but I have not had an opportunity of going into it. I am afraid I cannot hold out any hope that we will meet a claim, which originated over 100 years ago for $160,000 with interest to date. I am afraid that a serious consideration of such a proposal would send my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to the hospital.

There are some 6,000 Indians in the reserve to which my hon. friend refers. From information I have been able to obtain, I understand they have done remarkably well. There is a question whether the Indian Act, which after all is the act under which matters pertaining to the Indian population of Canada are administered, comes into conflict with the suggestion he makes. At the moment I cannot pass any critical judgment on his request. My information is that the majority of the teachers in the schools on the Brant reserve are of Indian origin. My hon. friend shakes his head. Perhaps my information is incorrect, but I understand that at any rate a number of the teachers have been trained from Indians who have been pupils in the years immediately past. It is desirable as a general rule that the Indians should be made as independent as possible of outside assistance. No one would have greater pleasure than I if the Indians throughout Canada could attain a position whereby they would be not only self-supporting but able to look after such matters as education and other things as their white brothers do.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): I am very much interested in these Indian reserves and I was pleased to hear the minister so sympathetic toward and so willing to investigate the Indian problem. I have known many Indians for many years and at times I have been ashamed of their treatment by the Indian agents. More attention should be given to the employment of these agents. Only those who have a certain sympathy for the Indian, who would not have a disposition to exploit them, who would desire to help them, should be employed in this capacity. I recall having employed an Indian guide who was a fine type of man, but I found out that his relatives were being treated very unfairly by the Indian agent.

Mr. SENN: I listened with considerable interest to what the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) had to say about the funds which were invested in the Grand River Navigation Company. A part of this reservation is in my own riding and I know the Indians feel very strongly on the matter. I do not intend to carry this matter any further as the minister has given his answer. I was also interested in the allegation of the hon. member that political interference was present in the appointment of teachers on the reservations. I have had many interviews with the Indians about this very matter. Prior to the change which took place in 1932, as described by the hon. gentleman, there was considerable jealousy and quarrelling among the Indians as to who should teach in their schools. At that time the appointment was made by the Indian council and it often became a matter of politics within the reservation. From time to time the personnel of the council would change, and teachers were changed to suit the opinions of those newly elected. I believe this was one of the reasons why the change was made giving the Indian department the appointment of teachers.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: What amount in this item will be used for the construction of dwellings? Will this cover repairs to dwellings and the construction of new buildings? What amount is to be spent in the village of Caughnawaga for this purpose? This village is just across from Verdun on the main highway to the United States by way of Malone and I think it is important that it should present a good appearance. I should like to know what amount is to be spent.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not the amount for Caughnawaga. The total amount for dwellings is $19,350, but the hon. member will bear in mind that that covers the whole vote.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole of Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: The whole of Canada. I am not at the moment in a position to say what portion of the vote will be applied to Caughnawaga.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be exclusive of band funds.

Mr. CRERAR: That is exclusive of band funds.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Would that be for new dwellings?

Mr. POTTIER: How many Indians are there in Nova Scotia?

Mr. CRERAR: Approximately 2,000.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. member for Verdun spoke of the reserve at Caughnawaga.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member is no longer there.

Mr. DUPUIS: No; I was disfranchised by the previous administration and forced to move eastward. Nevertheless I take an interest in Caughnawaga and I notice that the leader of the opposition has still a weakness for it. I daresay he recalls his last visit there. In that reserve, which is one of the largest in Quebec, the Indians have a territory of approximately 11,000 acres of good farm land which is practically without cultivation except by white people who rent the farms. Very often we have requests from these white people, who are on the reserve with the permission of the Department of Indian Affairs, to investigate complaints they make to the effect that they are not being well treated. In some instances these white men are barely tolerated on the reserve, and not being able to get work they are on relief. They have not the means of supporting themselves and they are in a peculiar position. Though they live on the reserve, the Department of Indian Affairs is not obliged to make provision for them, and the provincial government, under the relief laws, is not bound to support them. They are therefore left without support.

It is a matter of importance for the department to come to the rescue of these white men in view of the fact that the department itself allows them to live there. A considerable quantity of land there has been abandoned, and I suggest to the government that it would be wise to look into the situation and see whether it would not be better to allow these Indians to sell this very important piece of land, either by auction or otherwise. It is important inasmuch as it is near so large a centre as Montreal, and the Indians are not inclined to cultivate it. They are rather inclined to specialize in hazardous work, such as employment in connection with the Dominion Bridge Company or other steel works. This is their only occupation, and if the Department of Indian Affairs were allowed to sell this large area the amount derived from its sale could be used for the benefit of the Indians themselves and would assist the department in the administration of the reserve.

I make this suggestion to the department in good faith, hoping that they will take action. As the hon. member for Brant stated, the Indians of Caughnawaga generally speaking are likely to attain the same level as the so-called civilized white man, and I think if they were given more freedom, if they could inspire the government with a little more confidence and were allowed to sell their land on certain conditions, within a few years this large area of good land could be disposed of, one farm after another, so that the people in the surrounding district might use it for farming purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: How many Indians are there?

Mr. DUPUIS: Around 3,800.

Mr. CRERAR: Less than that; a little under 3,000.

Mr. DUPUIS: As matters stand now, it would cost the Department of Indians Affairs a considerable sum to take care of these Indians properly from the point of view of education and hygiene. For the most part the village is built on rock, so that the construction of sewers and a water system would cost a great deal; the department would have to spend too much. For this reason, indicated by the officials of the department when I investigated the matter, the inhabitants are unable to follow the rules of hygiene, and the doctors themselves say that in Caughnawaga some of the diseases that are prevalent on the reserve are undermining the health of the population. I believe the population of this particular reserve is diminishing, owing to the fact that at present the department is unable to give the Indians the legitimate attention they should receive.

If the government would accept this suggestion and allow the Indians to sell their farms, retaining the proceeds at their disposal, the majority of the Indians would follow the ordinary pursuits of life, while those who preferred to retain their status could be more easily taken care of.

Another aspect of the question which interests me is hospitalization. If it is as it was when I was member for Laprairie-Napierville, they have an old building as their hospital which is far too small for the needs of the reserve. If the department were to spend the amount required for that purpose the cost would be considerable, because I think it would have to erect a new building. I do not want to embarrass the minister. I make this suggestion only with the hope that the department will study the necessity of applying this policy. But may I know from the minister how much money has been voted this year for Caughnawaga, and especially how much is going to be applied for the hospital and for education?

Mr. CRERAR: So far as disposing of a part of the reserve for farming purposes to white men, as the hon. member suggested, is concerned, it is necessary in all cases to get the approval of the band to the surrender of any of their property. I am not entirely familiar with conditions surrounding such a surrender in Quebec, but I understand that the point arises that if a surrender is made it has to be made to the crown.

Mr. DUPUIS: I think the provincial government, if the question were stated seriously, could enter into an agreement whereby if the land is to be abandoned by the Department of Indian Affairs it would not revert to the crown as represented by the provincial government, but the Quebec government could come to an agreement allowing the Department of Indian Affairs to sell that land. I know this question involves some difficulties which were not solved in the past, but I discussed this matter with the provincial government some years ago, and if my memory serves me aright, I believe a solution of the problem can be found.

Mr. CRERAR: The consent of the Indians would be required to any transaction of that kind. With regard to the other point that my hon. friend mentioned, namely, the presence of white people on the reserves, that presents a rather difficult problem. It has occasionally happened that a white man has married an Indian woman of the reserve. He may die, and then the Indian woman, who has taken the status of her husband, may with her children return to the reserve. Under the Indian Act they are no longer Indians, but of course they are living on the Indian reserve, and the practice, I am informed, has been to supply them with relief where that is necessary. This is one of the problems that arise perhaps inevitably in the administration of Indian affairs. I shall be very glad to keep in mind the observations made by my hon. friend. I am sorry to say that I am not in a position to state just how far we shall be able to go in meeting his wishes.

Mr. SENN: Referring again to the question of money that was invested by the crown some years ago in the Grand River Navigation Company and which belonged to the Six Nations Indians, I discussed this matter at one time with a former Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Charles Stewart. He told me at that time that in lieu of this, the government had been granting some ten thousand dollars annually for the upkeep of the roads on this reservation. Is that item of ten thousand dollars included in this item?

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry that at the moment I cannot give a definite answer to my hon. friend's question. My deputy tells me that some special grants are given to this reserve. Whether or not one is given in consideration of a claim which they believe they have against the crown, and to which the hon. member for Brant has referred, I cannot say.

Mr. SENN: I should not like the minister to have the impression that I said "in consideration of this claim"; the amount was rather as a satisfaction to them in lieu of the claim itself. I know this money has been expended, and very well expended, on the reservation for the past few years in the building of roads, although the roads are not nearly completed, and I suggest to the minister that the grant should be continued if possible.

Mr. CRERAR: We shall have that under consideration.

Mr. LOCKHART: Do I understand the minister to say that compulsory education is definitely established on the Indian reserves as well as in other public school systems in Ontario or the dominion? I could not catch his answer because of interruptions. I am referring to compulsory education.

Mr. CRERAR: According to the information I have, it was intended under the Indian Act that educational facilities should be made available to Indian children as far as possible, and that where they were available the Indian children should take advantage of them. In that sense there is a limit to compulsion. But my hon. friend probably knows that in attempting to enforce compulsory education, even in ordinary white communities, certain difficulties are encountered. In Indian communities those difficulties are not less; perhaps they are increased.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is the adolescent age still applicable to Indian children the same as it is in other communities? The adolescent age is sixteen years.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): May I ask whether there is any allocation of that nineteen thousand dollars plus for the building and repair of houses in the Cowichan reserve?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say at the moment. If the Cowichan reserve deserves some of the appropriation it is probably getting it.

Mr. BRADETTE: There are two problems I want to bring to the attention of the Indian department. One is connected with the extension of the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway from Cochrane to Moosonee. That has created a new situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. BRADETTE: I was asking the indulgence of the house. But I am satisfied to let the matter go.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 26, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT

PROPOSED CLOSING OF RELIEF CAMPS AND MEASURES FOR REEMPLOYMENT

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): With the consent of the house, I wish to make a brief statement on a matter of public importance. In doing so may I refer to a question put to me on February 17th by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, in which he asked what alternative the government had for relief camps. I assured my hon. friend at that time that the measures by which we proposed to close the camps during the present year would be announced in due course. The statement I now propose to give to the house is designed not only to answer that question but to implement the previously announced intention of the government to arrange for the closing of the relief camps at the earliest possible date.

It has been announced that relief camps as now organized and conducted will be discontinued during the present year. As an emergency measure these camps may have been justified, but as a permanent feature of social organization in Canada they cannot be supported on grounds either of social utility or of governmental economy. This does not imply criticism of the administration of these camps under the Department of National Defence. In their organization and administration the Department of National Defence performed a difficult task with commendable efficiency as a peace time service of national importance. To continue these relief camps, however, on their present basis, would be to institutionalize them and to encourage an attitude of hopelessness on the part of those for whom they were designed to make provision in a period of economic extremity.

The intention to abolish relief camps has been confirmed by the findings and recommendations of the committee appointed to report to the Minister of Labour on existing conditions in these camps.

The government recognizes that in closing these camps every effort must be made to provide employment for those now on the strength of the camps who are employable. Preliminary arrangements have already been made for setting up machinery which will absorb, from time to time, those on the strength of the camps into gainful and useful employment. It is anticipated that these arrangements will permit the closing of relief camps, as such, not later than July 1 of the present year. No new projects will be undertaken. The present strength of the camps will not be increased. There will be no new admissions.

In seeking ways and means to provide employment the government has recognized the desirability of affording, so far as may be possible, alternative employment suitable to the training and experience of those now in camps. As a result of negotiations with the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway through the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe), arrangements have been made whereby 10,000 men will be employed on deferred maintenance work on the trackage of these companies during the coming summer. This work will be in addition to the usual maintenance work of the railways. It will be undertaken on a co-operative basis, provision for which will be proposed in the emergency supplementary estimates. Men taken from the relief camps by the railroads will be in private employment and on a basis of work and wages. Relief camps will be closed progressively to permit of the transfer of camp strength to employment on the railways et cetera, as soon as weather conditions permit.

While the relief camps remain open, projects will be continued under the Department of National Defence, working in closer co-operation with and carrying out the policy of the Department of Labour. The decision to carry on under the present organization is a natural outcome of the policy of abolishing the relief camps. It would be costly and undesirable to build up a large organization, under the Department of Labour, which will of necessity be shortlived.

It is proposed to encourage a greater measure of cooperation between the provinces and the dominion in the working out of a more intensive application of the farm placement scheme, a scheme which has to date been followed quite extensively by some of the western provinces with very satisfactory results. Forest conservation, easier access to mining areas and other development projects would be other outlets for employment, and it is anticipated that these opportunities I have suggested for employment will absorb the bulk of men in the camps who are fitted for this class of work.

It is expected that through the instrumentality of the proposed national employment commission, working in cooperation with business and industrial undertakings, additional avenues of employment will be found. A greater degree of cooperation will be sought in the national interest between the government and those agencies which have the power and understanding to meet the problem.

It has been decided by the government that the present allowance of twenty cents per day shall be increased to $15 a month, as from March 1st. All other allowances, such as food, clothing, medical care, tobacco, et cetera, will remain the same as at present. This monthly allowance of $15 will be paid out as follows: $7.50 in cash, the other $7.50 being set aside until such time as the man leaves the camp, when he will receive non-negotiable vouchers payable at the rate of $4 a week at any post office, for the total balance standing to his credit. This ensures that if a man leaves a camp of his own free will, he will at least have some means of support while he is seeking industrial re-establishment.

Returns are now being received from all camps which will indicate the age and occupational classification of the camps' population and will be used as a guide in planning for re-employment of those who are employable. The government feels that it has a special responsibility at this time, in first seeking to find employment for those men who are in the camps, if the plan to close the camps is to be carried out successfully. Once this has been done, continuous efforts will be put forth to secure employment for all those who are employable. The unemployables will have to continue to be, as at present, charges of the provincial and municipal governments.

QUESTIONS

STEAM TRAWLERS

Mr. KINLEY:

1. What amount was collected from the operators of otter or steam trawlers by virtue of order in council—P.C. 2196—dated October 31, 1929?

2. Who paid the amounts and how much in each particular case?

3. Was the said order in council declared invalid or ultra vires?

4. Were any payments herein above referred to refunded? If so, to whom and how much?

5. What was the final disposition of the matter by the courts and the government?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $5,856.36.

2. Leonard Fisheries, Limited.

3. Yes.

4. Yes. To the Bank of Montreal, for Leonard Fisheries, Limited. The total amount.

5. Answered by Nos. 3 and 4.

FARM LOANS—LABELLE COUNTY

Mr. LALONDE:

1. How many farmers of the county of Labelle applied during the year 1935 for a loan under the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act?

2. In how many cases was the loan application granted and the loan made?

3. What are the names and addresses of the persons who secured a loan in this manner?

4. What was the amount of each such loan?

5. In how many cases was the loan application refused?

6. What was the total amount involved in the loan applications that were refused?

Mr. DUNNING:

1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. The following answers are furnished by the Canadian Farm Loan Board: Records of the Canadian Farm Loan Board are not kept by counties and the information asked for is not now available. Moreover, the transactions between the board and borrowers are regarded as confidential and it is not considered in the public interest that information revealing the names of persons who have obtained loans should be given.

PATROL BOAT ULNA

Mr. VENIOT:

1. When was the patrol boat Ulna leased by the preventive service, and under what terms?

2. What reports, if any, were submitted as to the fitness of the Ulna for the preventive service and by whom submitted?

3. Was the Ulna purchased for use of the preventive service? If so, when, from whom, and at what price?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. The Ulna was chartered under an agreement entered into on the 30th April, 1931, by the Department of National Revenue. The charter became operative from the 4th June, 1931, and expired December 31, 1931. The fee was $6,000 per month, the owners to provide crew, all supplies and keep the vessel seaworthy; the department to supply master and wireless operator.

2. Before charter. Reports were obtained from Lloyd's surveyors and Charles Stephen, Engineer Lieut.-Commander, R.N. (retd.), technical adviser, customs-excise preventive service, who is an associate member Engineering Institute of Canada, associate member Canadian Society Civil Engineers, member of the Corporation of Professional Engineers, Quebec, P.Q., and member of the American Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers.

Before purchase. Reports were obtained from the master who had been in charge of the boat during the charter period—Skipper Lieutenant J. P. Fraser; Engineer Lieut.-Commander Stephen, technical adviser, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and Lloyd's surveyor.

3. Yes. The Ulna was purchased in May, 1932, by the R.C.M. Police for preventive service work, from the Margaree Steamship Company Limited, of Sydney, N.S., for the sum of $55,000 completely equipped, with linen, bedding, cooking and kitchen utensils, crockery and everything in condition to proceed to sea with a crew of seventeen men.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. STEVENS:

1. How many nations were members of the League of Nations in the year 1925?

2. How many nations were members of the League of Nations as at December 31, 1935?

3. How many of these present members are in arrears in their annual payments for the upkeep of the League of Nations?

4. What is the total amount of arrears of these nations?

5. How many nations have withdrawn from the league because of dissatisfaction with the decisions or methods of the league?

6. How many nations have paid their annual dues regularly and in full?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. 55.

2. 58.

3. 21 as of September 1, 1935.

4. 19,347,987.30 gold francs as of September 1, 1935, constituting approximately 5 per cent of the total assessments to 1935.

5. Three nations; namely, Brazil, Germany and Japan may be said to have withdrawn because of disagreement with the decisions or methods of the league.

6. Thirty-six nations may be said to have paid their annual dues regularly and in full. In addition Chile on July 31, 1935, liquidated arrears which had accumulated since 1930. Arrears due from four other nations were for one year or less.

CANADIAN RADIO BROADCASTING COMMISSION

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Who paid for the broadcasts of l'Union Nationale Libérale through the facilities of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission?
2. Was any commission allowed to any person on these political broadcasts?
3. If so, what was the amount of such commission?
4. To whom was such commission paid?

Mr. HOWE: The following information has been supplied by the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission—

1. Ivanhoe Hogue, Vickers & Benson, Limited, H. A. Baribeau. Some local broadcasts were paid for in cash.
2. Yes.
3. $1,303.21.
4. Commissions were allowed to: Ivanhoe Hogue, $1,299.22; Vickers & Benson, Ltd., $3.99.

SUPREME COURT BUILDING

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did the government make any inquiry respecting the sanitary conditions of the building where the judges of the supreme court hold their sittings?
2. If so, on what date and what were the results of such inquiry?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Upon the request of the Registrar, Supreme Court of Canada, officials of the Department of National Health were instructed to make an inspection of this building.

2. Said instructions were given on 27th November, 1935. A report of such inspection was made on or about 10th December, 1935, and was submitted to the Department of Public Works for consideration.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RELIEF CAMPS

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. How many were in relief camps during the years (a) 1935; (b) 1934?

2. What was the total cost of operating these camps during (a) 1935; (b) 1934?

3. What did it cost per person, per month, to operate each camp during (a) 1935; (b) 1934?

4. What is the average length of residence in these camps?

FUNDED DEBT

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo):

1. What were the funded debt issues, inscribed amounts, of the national debt of Canada; together with yearly totals, as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?

2. What were the net sums received by the dominion government against the inscribed amounts of the funded debt issues as in question 1; together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?

3. Where sold foreign, what loss or gain developed as a result of exchange on each of the issues above; (questions 1 and 2); together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?

4. What were the unfunded debt transactions, obligation figures, together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available.

5. What were the net sums received in sale or other adjustment of the unfunded debt transactions; together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?

6. Where sold foreign, what loss or gain developed as a result of exchange on each of the issues above; (questions 4 and 5); together with yearly totals as from and including the year 1908 to the latest figures available?

Mr. DUNNING: Order for return, subject to the remarks I made the other day.

FARM LOANS

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce):

1. How many farmers of the province of Quebec applied for a loan since the farm loan act became law, giving the number of such applications for each year separately?

2. How many inspections were carried out for which the farm loan board received $10, in connection with each such inspection, giving the number for each year separately?

3. In how many cases was the inspection carried out without the $10 being paid, giving the number for each year separately?

4. In how many cases was the loan application granted and the loan made, giving the number for each year separately?

5. What was the amount of the loan made in each case and in each year?

6. In how many cases did the farm loan board require two inspections, giving the number for each year separately?

7. In each case where a loan was made, on what date was the loan application presented and on what date was said loan granted and documents completed, giving the figures for each year separately?

Mr. DUNNING: To answer questions 6 and 7 would involve the examination of thousands of accounts. I wondered if the hon. member would be satisfied if we passed this as an order for a return with a reservation with respect to questions 6 and 7 because of the tremendous amount of work they would involve.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Are there any Post Office Department regulations respecting the dismissal of postmasters?

2. If so, since when have such regulations been in existence?

3. Were such regulations approved by the governor in council, and if so, when?

4. What section of the Post Office Act authorizes the Postmaster General to enact such regulations?

5. Have such regulations always been followed literally since their enactment?

6. Were such regulations amended when the Civil Service Act was amended in 1932 by the addition of section 57a, exempting from the application of the Civil Service Act "the position of postmaster of any revenue post office where the revenue does not exceed three thousand dollars per annum"?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. REID:

1. What was the total number of officers or men taken on the force of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police during the calendar years 1932 to 1935?

2. What was the number of men taken on from each province, respectively?

3. What was the number of men taken on from each of the principal cities in Canada?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BOUCHETTE, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. PERRAS:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence and other documents respecting the appointment of Miss L. O. Dessurault to the post office at the village of Bouchette and the renewal of the said appointment on October 15, 1935, for a period of four years.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all Post Office Department regulations respecting dismissals of postmasters and a copy of all orders in council, if any, approving such regulations.

BANKS AND BANKING

PROPOSED NATIONAL OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF BANK OF CANADA AND CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of national ownership and control of the central Bank of Canada and the chartered banks.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I have the honour to move has been presented for the consideration of the house in order that the members may have an opportunity of discussing this problem which to some degree has been uppermost in the minds of the people of Canada for a very long time. In view, too, of the varied opinions that are held throughout the country it seemed well that at the beginning of the session ideas referring to our financial and banking system should be presented for consideration. I have in mind the reference contained in the speech from the throne, which reads as follows:

The control of credit, and the issue of currency, being public matters of direct concern to every citizen, it is intended, at the present session, to ask parliament to make such changes in the ownership and control of the Bank of Canada, as may be necessary to give to the government a predominant interest in the ownership as well as effective control of the bank

Reading that, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that it was somewhat vague in character, and it appeared to indicate a certain degree of uncertainty even on the part of the government as to the exact policy that should be pursued. I remember, also the statement by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made in the house on April 26, 1932, when a somewhat similar proposal was made. At that time he said that he did not think serious consideration could be given to such a proposal. However, almost four years have elapsed during which period conditions in the world and, in particular, in Canada have changed considerably and perchance the opinion then held by the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been changed because of the changed conditions with which we are surrounded. I remember, too, the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the central bank bill of 1934. On that occasion members of our group supported the bill because they believed it was a step forward in the direction in which they wished to go. It should be borne in mind also that a motion almost similar to this was moved by Mr. William Irvine in the house on February 4, 1935. At that time very little support was forthcoming from the house generally or from hon. gentlemen opposite. I recollect that only one Liberal member, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan) voted in favour of that particular resolution. I am not unmindful of the fact that in the recent election campaign a leaflet was issued in the interests of the Liberal party. That leaflet was more suggestive of action along this line, and I should like to quote from it as follows:

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with problems of international commerce and exchange.

I realize the importance of that election statement, and particularly the statement that credit is a public matter. I am under no delusion that that means social credit or has anything to do with that particular proposal, because we know there is a distinct difference. Hon. gentlemen to my right are on record as being in favour of a privately owned central bank and we know precisely where they stand. Hon. gentlemen to my left are in a somewhat similar position. I remember reading a pronouncement to that effect by the leader of the social credit group in Alberta when he assured various financial interests that it was not the intention of his government to interfere with the private ownership of anything. I should like to read to the house two questions contained in a manual issued last summer by the leader of that group. There is a section devoted to questions and answers in which he replies to an imaginary questioner as follows:

> It is not the intention of social credit to confiscate or take away anything from those who already have it.

In reply to a subsequent question, "Does social credit involve socialization, nationalization, confiscation or expropriation?" Mr. Aberhart replied as follows:

> No. Social credit stands for controlled individual ownership. It holds to the decentralization of power and supports the rewarding of individual effort to the full possible enjoyment of the good things of life.

We have no criticism to make of the latter part of that particular answer. The answer to the question propounded is a direct negative; neither by purchase, nor by expropriation with compensation, as we believe is desirable and feasible, nor by outright confiscation, as some urge, will anything be nationalized. Therefore my appeal for support of this resolution must be addressed primarily to hon. gentlemen who occupy Liberal seats in the present House of Commons, but I shall welcome support from hon. gentlemen who sit to my left and to my right if, after further consideration, they believe the time has come when something of this nature should be undertaken. Public attention is focused and has been focused upon that strange paradox of which we have heard several times already during the course of debates in this house. I refer to the paradox of poverty and want in the midst of actual and potential plenty. People ask why this should be so. They put their hands into their pockets and find they have no money. Consequently they believe it is a shortage of money and purchasing power that is really at the root of the problem which we face to-day. Therefore they constantly demand more money and an increase in their purchasing power. Political parties have risen which have promised definitely to put money and purchasing power in certain forms into the hands of the people.

For a few moments I should like to discuss what money really is in order that we may get a picture of what actually needs to be done. The use of money came into existence centuries ago when men found it highly inconvenient to make exchanges of actual things with one another. A man found it very difficult to exchange a horse for a sword or a cow for a leather jacket, and consequently there came into existence certain tokens of exchange. We know this from our own Canadian history in connection with the trading between the Hudson's Bay Company factors and the Indians. At first many of these tokens had no intrinsic value, but as civilization advanced and became more stable we find that particular tokens which in themselves had an intrinsic value were utilized as money. These tokens took the form of precious stones, gold, silver, spices and so on. Not only did they become tokens of exchange, but, as time went on, they became measures of other commodities in terms of themselves. Thus in the process of human evolution money took on a distinctly new form and shape. The ancient law givers realized the danger of allowing the control of those things which were then used as the media of exchange to become concentrated into a few hands and become monopolistic in their nature. If we look to the oldest law we have in the English language, a law which was translated into our language from a more ancient tongue, we shall find that this is so. I refer of course to the laws to be found in the Bible. Turning to the twenty-fifth chapter of the book of Leviticus one will find there that the primitive but wise lawgiver, Moses, said to the children of Israel: Lend not your money unto usury; take no increase of the other fellow. And, moreover, in another part of Holy Writ it will be found that they were obliged to cancel certain debts from time to time, some at the end of seven years and some at the end of fifty years.

To-day we are inclined to smile at those ancient laws, but they were written because those who at that time were charged with the responsibility of mapping out the future for semi-primitive peoples realized that if the power of money once fell under the control of a few people then indeed society would suffer from that particular kind of monopoly.

Mr. REID: Is it not a fact that the same Moses told the people that when they borrowed a measure of corn they should pay it back brimming over?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is quite true; but let me point out that that suggestion had a significance which was somewhat different from the one which at this time I am discussing. I am discussing the possibility of the medium of exchange—not the lending by one producer to another of something which he needed temporarily—in itself becoming a continuous loan yielding interest; hence the command to cancel debts at the end of given periods of time. And if we turn to British history, from which we derive so much, we find that the first Edwards, one after the other, endeavoured to prevent the accumulation of wealth into a few hands and the lending of it at interest. They decreed that those who transgressed that law should be imprisoned, outlawed and even executed. Going back too to the history of the pronouncements of ancient teachers of the old church, we find also that throughout the early ages the saints of the church stood firmly opposed to the institution of usury in the midst of society; and that too, I may add, was afterwards the attitude of Martin Luther, the great German reformer.

In spite of all this, money became a commodity, and as the years went by, like any other commodity, it became subject to the law of supply and demand. In recent times, because of the rise of monopolistic industry and finance, we have seen the law of supply and demand break down. There are those who would like to go back to the more primitive way of doing things; but once we set our feet on the road it is difficult to turn back, and consequently we must bear in mind the fact that monopolistic industry and monopolistic finance have given to those who control money and the institutions which exchange and lend a greater power than was known to any of the ancient kings in olden days.

As I said a short time ago, money is a measure, and for a long time it was a fairly stable measure; but recently instability has been a mark of our financial system. Expressed in terms of other commodities for which it is exchanged, it has become a measure such as we would not tolerate under any other circumstances. We could not do business, for example, if at one time the yard measure were 18 inches, at another time 24 inches, at another time 36 inches, and at still another time 72 inches; yet we have seen the measure of our trading relations one with another fluctuate to as wide a degree as that in recent times. I well remember that in the province from which I come—thinking for a moment in terms of wheat—when wheat was $2 a bushel the farmer who borrowed $10,000 knew that that was equal to 5,000 bushels of wheat. But when, ten or fifteen years later, he came to repay the loan, he found that he had to repay not 5,000 bushels of wheat, which the $10,000 originally represented, but at a price of 25 cents a bushel, 40,000 bushels of wheat. We see the same situation in connection with eggs, butter, tobacco, tomatoes and various other commodities, the terms of which are understood in other parts of the dominion. Thus debts contracted at one level become an intolerable burden at another level.

We would not for one moment tolerate in our homes an unreliable electric meter to measure the power we use there; and yet in our economic structure we have been tolerating for a long time a measure of goods and of services which has fluctuated very seriously. Conversely, if loans made when money is cheap have to be paid back on another basis, then that is equally unjust both to those who lend and to those who repay. We have therefore to consider this problem of banking, finance and money in exact relationship to the property system within which it operates, and the proceeds of which it seeks to measure. Its stability is thus of primary importance in every phase of our economic life. The problem of purchasing power cannot, in my opinion, be considered apart from the general economic structure. In discussing this problem to-day I remember that monopolistic industry can defeat even the very best measures of government designed to control monopolistic finance.

When I speak of money I am using the term in a varied sense. In civilized society there are many kinds of money—first the nickel, copper, silver and paper money which we carry around in our pockets and with which we are all familiar. But that after all is little more than the small change of the present financial system. The authorities tell us that approximately ninety per cent of the payments made within civilized society are made by means of cheques and not wholly, but largely, from credits established within the banking institutions. The banks therefore have a tremendous power in that regard.

People sometimes ask: What do you mean by credit? May I say, before I explain what I mean by credit, that I am not one of those who believe that when a credit is created there is nothing behind it but the fountain pen which enters into the ledger the amount of money for which that credit stands. During my experience in another capacity I well remember how on more than one occasion I had to participate in the borrowing of money for an organization with which I was connected. How was that loan made? A bylaw was passed authorizing the mayor and the city treasurer to make a loan with one of our banking institutions. The bylaw being in order, the mayor and the city treasurer went to the banking institution, deposited a copy of the bylaw, signed a note promising to pay back, let us say in thirty or sixty days with interest at seven per cent, the sum of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars. If that bank did no more business that day than make that one particular loan its statement at the close of that particular day would show that, because of the making of that loan, the institution had fifty or one hundred thousand dollars, as the case may be, more on deposit than when its doors opened for business in the morning. Not one dollar would have been taken from any customer's account or from elsewhere. Of course there are those who say that that has been created out of thin air. No; the bank within the banking and financial system set up a contingent liability against that particular form of loan, and some time, somehow, the loan will have to be retired with something tangible. When loans are made freely, they raise the general level of prices, and if carried to an unusual degree may result in an inflationary movement within the society where such credits are established. This does not mean that the credit does not represent anything tangible. It does. It represents goods and services that already are available or will be available to the people and the society within which the loan is made. For the contingent liability will ultimately be reconciled, in the case of the example that I gave a few moments ago, by the levy of taxes, or in the business world, by collecting the amount with which to retire it through the price level. And since bankers are human—and this is a point that I wish to emphasize because it has a very important bearing upon the resolution—since bankers are only human they make loans when they appear to be both safe and profitable. Consequently, when business is on the upswing they tend to make more loans, and by and by they actually encourage the boom that ultimately develops. I saw rather an interesting item in to-day's paper on that particular point. It is a report in the Montreal Gazette of a statement made yesterday by Governor Towers before the shareholders of the Bank of Canada. He said this in part:

> While a policy of cheap and abundant money was the orthodox contribution of a banking system toward recovery—
> Toward the upward rise of business:
> —such a policy, if pursued too far, might bring about an unmanageable situation when revival developed.

And that is one of the principal contentions that I would make in support of the present resolution. If we are going to control the upward swing of business so that speculation does not become rife and a boom develop which when bursting will have serious effects, we must exercise a larger measure of control than we now do over our banking and financial institutions generally, and the central bank in particular.

Then we find this, that as shelves become full manufacturing slows up; as manufacturing slows up, unemployment develops; the demand for capital goods also grows less; we have less purchasing power in the hands of the people, and consequently we face immediately a depression within what is sometimes called the business cycle. We suggest that the reverse should be the procedure, that when a boom is developing the central bank and financial policy should tend to prevent that boom, and when on the other hand there is a recession from the peak setting in, our financial policy should be to prevent the development of depression. We must bear in mind also that when the depression develops the bankers advise us, the governing bodies, to balance our budgets and to further restrict purchasing power, because the banker believes that he must get into a liquid position. He calls in his loans; he refuses to make more, and so on. And governments attempt, as I said a moment ago, to balance their budgets. This is sometimes called sound business principles, and so they are sound business principles in relation to the making of private profit, because the banker protects himself, it is true at the expense of society sometimes; nevertheless in a society which is wholly or even largely competitive it is a case of every man for himself.

Of course we used to be told that there was a direct relationship between the matters I have been discussing and the gold basis. That is no longer substantially correct. We have been told—and we have been following that advice quite recently—that what we had to inculcate in order to make our money secure was a measure of confidence. Some wag said over the air a short time ago—I happened to hear him—that confidence was the ability to forget what happened last time and the courage to ignore what will happen next time. There is a great deal in that little quip. Bank policy, therefore, is in strict conformity with the general economic development in the times in which we live. If business is to receive the necessary assistance when it needs it the control of our financial institutions will have to be divorced from the selfish interests of those who control the banking and financial system. I do not use the word "selfish" in any wrong sense. I mean the looking after of the self-interest of the individual or institution concerned. We have seen how in times of boom money becomes easy to obtain, how in times of depression it becomes scarce. This reminds me that if we had a janitor looking after a block who turned on the heat in the summer time and the cooling system in the winter we should be inclined to change the janitor. That. to some extent, is an illustration of what has been going on in the financial world.

What we require is neither inflation nor deflation. I sometimes think many of the gentlemen who defend the present system and its operations are in reality, without realizing it, deflationists, and to my mind deflation and inflation are both evils. We must aim at equilibrium in our economic relationships and throughout our business institutions, but private institutions can scarcely be expected to act, sometimes against evident self interest, quite unselfishly in relation to monetary and financial policy. Quite recently, in the United States and elsewhere, we have heard the word "reflation" used to describe the bringing back to a reasonable level of prices, business and so on, but whether we call it "reflation" or "equilibrium" we must achieve the latter objective as soon as we can or society will perish.

The other afternoon I discussed what had taken place in Sweden, and again I should like to direct the attention of the house to the banking experiments that have been carried on in that country during the past several years. It has been said and undoubtedly will be said again that changes in the fiancial situation in Canada cannot be brought about because of our relationship to the great world all around us, but in the kingdom of Sweden in 1931, when they were driven off the gold standard, an attempt was made to do that very thing. Economists whose advice was sought by the government for the bankers were told that no matter what happened to the value of the kronen outside Sweden, an attempt should be made to stabilize the level of the unit of exchange within the country. They did that to a very remarkable degree, tying up their internal price level, their internal monetary unit, to actual goods, services and commodities and allowing the unit outside the country to swing into line and remain in line with foreign currency. So externally Sweden became a member of what is known as the sterling group, trading with Great Britain and measuring the value of her external unit in terms of British pounds, but internally Sweden has been able to maintain a price level which, as I said the other evening, has fluctuated only 1·9 per cent since 1931.

As potential production increases the purchasing power of the people ought to rise, and the real problem we have to consider not only in Canada but, in fact, in every country throughout the world is how to distribute more goods and services as they become available through the introduction of machinery and the increased productivity of human labour. The statement has been made so frequently in the house that I hesitate to repeat it, but to-day our trouble is one not of scarcity but of actual plenty in some respects, and of potential plenty in others. Consequently it will be the business of this parliament and the parliaments of all other countries in which there are democratic institutions to seek ways and means of bringing into line our consumptive capacity and our productive possibilities, and the nearer we can approach that point the nearer we shall be to a solution of the economic and social difficulties with which we are surrounded. Those who suggest that, unrelated to goods or to uncontrolled goods and services, vast quantities of non-recoverable purchasing power should be placed into the hands of the people, might make confusion worse confounded, because after all money is a title to something and unless you can deliver the goods or guarantee their delivery you have no right to issue a title to goods which you do not control.

I have heard it said that we should consider Canada as a great corporation in which every citizen has a share and from which every citizen ought to draw a dividend. That is a splendid idea, but I have heard the same people go on to say that we are going to leave the banks and financial institutions, the oil fields and the other great monopolistic industries and institutions in the hands of those who now own and control them. In other words they say we are going to consider Canada as a great corporation from which every citizen ought to draw a dividend, but it will be a corporation without assets, and a corporation without assets cannot conceivably pay dividends.

My time is almost up, Mr. Speaker, but I want to urge the house to discuss this resolution on a high plane. Irrespective of our party affiliations let us, if we can, endeavour to meet the situation which has been created in the last few years and which will continue to be with us unless we take definite and intelligent steps to meet these problems in the near future. People are not going to remain content with the present condition for long.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, when I came into the house this afternoon I did not expect to find this motion on the order paper; it has been so changed that, by the rules of the house, I thought it would be moved to the bottom of the order paper instead of being left in its present position. However, I feel it my duty to define my own position in regard to this matter.

If this resolution read, "That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of national ownership and control of the Bank of Canada," and stopped there, I would vote in favour of it. In view of the fact that some measure along these lines is foreshadowed in the speech from the throne I have no intention of moving any amendment to the resolution offered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), because undoubtedly the government has that matter under consideration, and as a private Liberal member I do not wish to anticipate the action or intention of the government in that regard. So far as I am personally concerned, however, I am one hundred per cent in favour of a one hundred per cent ownership and control of the Bank of Canada by the Canadian people, through our government.

To some extent the suggestion was made that the remarks I addressed to the house a few days ago indicated that I was favourable to some scheme of inflation. If we controlled our central bank we could issue currency and control credit in terms of the interests of the people, and not in terms of private bankers' profits. From time to time the bankers regulate their business by largely extending credit when there is a business boom at one time, and curtailing it when there is depression at another. In other words the Canadian Macmillan report found there were times when the bank should be extending credit but that at such times it would not be in its own financial interests to do so. The report indicated that private banks could not be expected to take steps which would not be in their own interests. On the other hand at times when there may be a tendency to deflate, a government bank might and should throw its influence and its power towards arresting a deflation movement, whereas a private bank could not be expected to do so, because such action would not be in its own interests. Therefore if a central bank is to discharge its proper duties, namely more or less to control the price level and to prevent extreme depressions and extreme booms, the only way it can be expected to do so is to have it under government ownership and control.

The other day I endeavoured to point out over ninety per cent of the purchasing power of the country operates through the medium of cheques on bank accounts. That is the principal medium of exchange. By virtue of their control over those deposits the banks actually have within their control what used to be regarded as something within the sole province of the government, namely the right to create or destroy currency, or purchasing power. That is, in the earlier days before we had a banking system such as we have to-day the government decided the amount of currency it should issue. To-day, owing to the development of our banking system, by making loans or by buying government bonds the bank creates deposits which, in turn, are chequed from bank to bank, back and forth, thus in effect creating purchasing power at will. We will suppose that a government bond worth $1,000,000 is bought by a bank. That money is either deposited in the bank which purchased the bond or it is chequed out for some purpose to other people who redeposit it in other banks. Whether it actually goes into the bank which made the loan or into other banks, it increases their amount on deposit, and they in turn figure that they may make loans on the basis of those increased deposits. Therefore every time a loan is made or a bond is purchased there is an increase in the cash reserves of the bank or banks of the country, and at the same time an increase in the assets of the banks, viz the bond purchased or the loan owing.

Under our present system there is no limit to the extent to which the banks may increase their loans or may purchase bonds, with the exception of the limitation as to what the banks consider governments or individuals can repay. If governments or individuals borrow more than they can repay, the value of their credit goes down accordingly. I believe every hon. member understands that. If any hon. member thinks I could possibly repay $100—and perhaps he might be optimistic if he thought that—and I promised to repay $200, he would say, "Well, your note for $200 is really worth only $100." That is what I believe is meant by inflation. That is, the credit which a government or individual can put out at any time is limited by the amount the government or individual can hope to repay within a given time.

The point which it seems to me has not received sufficient consideration is this: Under our present system a government may go to a bank for money or credit. They actually issue credit against the bonds of the government. There is no limit to that, except the amount that they think the government can repay. In other words, if the banks believed that the dominion government could actually carry a debt of six billion, ten billion or fifteen billion dollars, there is nothing in the world to prevent them from lending the government any of those sums. They have the machinery to do it. It would not depend upon the savings in the bank; it does not depend upon gold, but depends entirely upon whether they believe the people of Canada can repay that money. If that is so; if the banks of Canada, with the machinery at their disposal, can create credit or can actually lend credit against the bonds of the government to any extent they believe to be safe, and to the extent they believe the government can repay, I put this to hon. members: If it is all right for private banks to create and lend credit to governments against government bonds, what is wrong with a central bank, owned and controlled by the government, actually extending the credit, instead of leaving that operation in the hands of a private institution? Thereby we would save that tremendous drain of interest which to-day is ruining society. I pointed to figures a few days ago which indicated that the public institutions of Canada between the years 1919 and 1932 had actually gone into debt at the rate of $1,000,000 every day. I showed that the debt had been increasing at that rate. I believe most people would say that because it had been done through ordinary banking institutions it was not inflation. The point I put is this: If we were to take over the ownership and control of our central bank, and instead of increasing our debt by $1,000,000 every day we were actually to issue credit of $1,000,000 each day, through the central bank, and use it to retire the public debt, would we have a state of inflation? In other words,—

Mr. BENNETT: That's the stuff.

Mr. DUNNING: At last we have found it.

Mr. TUCKER: In other words, if the Bank of Montreal or any other bank can issue that credit against the bonds of this country, why could not the Bank of Canada issue credit against those bonds, and issue it on a non-interest bearing basis? I have considered the matter for many months, and I cannot see why an institution which happens to be owned and controlled by a government could not do the same as a private institution. If it is all right for private institutions to increase the debt of Canada by $1,000,000 every day, I ask hon. members if it would be inflation were the public bank actually to lend $1,000,000 worth of credit every day on a non-interest bearing basis to retire the debt to private interests, which bears interest. That is not increasing in any shape or form the dead weight debt of the country. I suggest it might be done at the rate of $1,000,000 every day, the same rate as we have been going into debt in the past; if it were done at that rate inside of a little more than twenty-four years the public institutions of Canada, dominion, provincial, municipal and public corporations, would actually owe the same principal debt, but it would be on a non-interest bearing basis. Figuring the interest on the debt at about four and one-half per cent, it would mean that at that time we would be saving over $370,000,000 per year in interest, an amount that we are paying to-day.

In my judgment that is the flaw in our present system. I still contend that the banks do create and lend credit against bonds and loans. If you have the public institution creating that credit, and you put it on a non-interest bearing basis, you relieve yourself of the payment of that interest. But to-day you have this situation that private institutions created by the government are creating credit. The banks lend it to governments, and then the governments endeavour to meet the interest which they have to pay on that credit by collecting taxes from the people. That is what is happening. The people are in effect paying money for nothing. It is taken from the masses of the people and concentrated in the hands of a few financial institutions. It simply means that you are draining from the masses of the people over a million dollars every day of the year for the payment of interest; you are piling it up in the hands of the big financial institutions, and the result is that just that much actual purchasing power is being drained from the country. It is not surprising, therefore, that we have the unemployment we see to-day. But if we could save that million dollars a day, once we got our debt on the basis I have suggested, and it is worthy of consideration, we would be able to look after our unemployed and our old people and many other things that are necessary to restore economic security to our people.

That, in short, Mr. Speaker, is the view I think of at least fifty per cent of the Liberal voters in this country. They believe that it should be given a trial. I mentioned the other day that the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), as Prime Minister, used the public credit of this country to the extent of $35,000,000, and that public credit is only costing us one per cent to-day. There were no dire results from his use of that public credit to the extent of $35,000,000, and I suggest that we should continue to develop that system of using our public credit, doing it through our own publicly owned and controlled central bank. If some hon. members think it would be better for the publicly owned and controlled central bank to charge a small rate of interest, the profits to go back to the people, there would be nothing wrong in that.

I would point out that governments to-day are taking practically all the credit that banks see fit to extend, and the result is that private individuals and corporations seeking credit cannot get it, because banks are able to make all the profit they want out of lending credit to public institutions. What chance has anybody who wishes to engage in business to borrow money at a reasonable rate of interest when the banks can lend to governments at five and six per cent? But if the governments did their own business of that nature through their own publicly owned and controlled central bank, private individuals and corporations would be able to get credit from the banks and financial institutions, which would be ready to lend, as they claim they do to-day, the private savings of the people at interest, and interest would be on a lower basis because public institutions would not then be competing with private institutions for credit or loans.

I noticed a moment ago, when I suggested this idea which I am venturing to put before this house, a certain tendency to regard it as somewhat fantastic. But let me point out to hon. gentlemen that according to the last Canada Year Book fifty-four per cent of the entire taxation of this dominion to-day goes towards the payment of interest on the dominion debt and forty-four per cent of the entire income of the federal government goes towards the payment of interest on the debt. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) can sit up night and day trying to effect economies in his estimates, but that is only nibbling around the edge of this great problem that confronts us when a large bulk of the taxation that is wrung out of the people has to go towards the payment of interest on our debt. When I hear people talk about economy, saving a few thousand dollars here and a few thousand there, and then see the government having to bring down supplementary estimates by which in the end they have to spend the amount saved by these economies, I say, Mr. Speaker, that such cutting down of the estimates by a few thousand dollars here or there is not dealing at all effectively with the thing that is gnawing at the very vitals of this nation to-day and preventing us from doing the things we should do for our unemployed, for our farmers, for our sick, and our aged. The place where we are spending our money to-day is in the payment of interest on our debts; for as I said before, fifty per cent of the entire taxation of the dominion goes towards the payment of interest on the public debt. I suggest that in these days, when people are studying how to save a little bit out of the taxes that are being raised, the place to which they should direct their attention is the place where fifty-four per cent of our entire taxation is going and if there is any scheme that will save fifty-four per cent of the taxation of this dominion being paid over into the hands of financial institutions, I submit that it should receive very careful study and consideration.

I submit further that great economists and able financiers all over the world have come to the conclusion that we must get away from the error that brought down the Roman empire. After all, the Roman empire was in somewhat the same position that we are in to-day. There was a tremendous amount of unemployment. The people had flocked to the city of Rome the centre of the Roman empire and congregated in it and the large cities; the cry arose for more bread and more circuses, and the only way the government could see by which to meet the problem of these people who were crying for bread and entertainment was the imposition of more and more taxation upon the people. The result was that the time came when the people of the Roman empire figured that the benefits of belonging to Imperial Rome were not as great as its burdens, and then when the barbarians descended upon the Roman empire it fell. Our situation is somewhat the same, but there is this difference: with the development of our present banking institutions we do not need to tie ourselves down to gold or metal money. We do not need to tie ourselves down to any metallic substance. We can assume control of our Central Bank and through it issue and control currency and credit in terms of the needs of the people and not have to base it upon gold, silver or anything else of that nature. Looking at the economic situation we see that to do the business of this country requires so much purchasing power. We can issue that purchasing power through having control of the central bank and through our banking system. I suggest to you that the banking system of this country should be changed in accordance with the development which has taken place within the last forty and certainly within the last fifty years. There are older hon. members who can remember that forty or fifty years ago nearly all the business in the province of Ontario was done with money; especially in the country districts the idea of doing business by cheques was practically unknown. It is more important that something substantial of this nature should be done to meet our present situation than to try to save a few thousand dollars here or try to cut down expenses by a few thousand dollars there, which economies may tend to aggravate the present unemployment situation.

I appeal to my fellow Liberals to give sympathetic consideration to the suggestion that we take over the ownership of our central bank and make the use of it I have indicated. I know some people say that the idea of government borrowing from it is not feasible, but all I can say is that we will not ruin the country by trying it out. If it works, we can extend it further; if it does not work, we can drop it. We have made much more expensive experiments in the past. I contend we should have control of our central bank. We could then cautiously and carefully make use of its powers to create credit against the bonds of the country. We could cautiously retire our present debt now in private hands. If the idea works, we can extend it. If that is done I submit that inside of a very few years there will be no one worrying about socialism. If this idea is put into effect every man will have economic security and the liberty and freedom to which he is entitled under our British parliamentary institutions. Once more a necessary step will have been taken by organized humanity to march forward to higher levels of human achievement.

The resolution now before the house suggests that we should take over the private banking institutions and endeavour to run them. I do not believe that at the present time we are prepared to take any such step. If the latter part of the motion were deleted and it referred only to the national ownership and control of the central bank of Canada, I would be prepared to vote for the resolution.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the house is of great importance, and while it is not my intention to wander through the mazes of the theories of money and credit I want to make my position clear should this resolution come to a vote. I shall not take up more than two or three minutes of the time of the house.

The Liberal party is quite clearly on record as being opposed to the present set up of the central bank of Canada, and I agree entirely with that attitude. I think I can say, with equal accuracy, that the position of the Liberal party is well known as being in favour of a nationally owned and controlled bank. I see before me my genial friend, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), and I am quite sure he will not disagree with that statement. During the campaign my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke in the city which I have the honour to represent. When he made the pronouncement that we would establish a nationally owned and nationally controlled bank he received a tremendous outburst of applause, the greatest outburst of the continued applause he received during his whole speech. If this resolution stopped where the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) suggests it should stop, I would be prepared to support it wholeheartedly. The time may come when it may be deemed advisable to take over even the privately owned banks. That time, however, is not the present, but I am prepared to support that part of the resolution which concerns the national ownership and control of the central bank of Canada.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of this resolution because I believe it is high time we should apply ourselves to a scientific study of the economic conditions under which we are living. Banking to-day is not conducted scientifically, but there are many features about the art of banking which could be scientifically understood. Banking has reached its present status entirely by an empirical process. The bankers themselves did not realize what they were stumbling upon when they undertook to take care of the money of the merchants. If we go back into the ages when tokens were exchanged we can realize how it became necessary that there should be some small medium of exchange having in itself an intrinsic value to take the place of the leather tokens then in use. This medium of exchange became of such a nature that it was necessary that it be cared for and stored, and it naturally gravitated into the strong rooms of the goldsmiths. Although all the earliest bankers were not necessarily goldsmiths, in England this was almost entirely the case. Childs and Company and the other private bankers which disappeared in the nineties when the joint stock banks were consolidating or amalgamating or fusing were originally goldsmiths. In taking charge of the money of the merchants and in issuing receipts for it, the early bankers soon discovered that the money did not go out in the same proportions as it came in, that the receipts which they gave remained current among the merchants of England and even on the continent for several months. This was the beginning of our present day system of bank notes and cheques. The goldsmiths, scenting an opportunity of making money, began to issue receipts against gold which did not exist. As the practice of banking became more select and respectable, it was discovered that for every hundred units of coin placed in their hands, they had to reserve a percentage as till money. In the nineties that percentage ranged around 23 to 26 per cent. During the intervening years it has gradually fallen until to-day 10·6 per cent represents the amount of till money which must be retained against every $100 of coinage held by the banker. This means then that the banker has in his hands approximately $90 which he is not likely to be called on immediately to repay; and realizing that, he scents the possibility of making money. But he must be careful, because this money is a trust committed to him by the business people of the country; and so, out of trial and error, out of experiment and understanding, he has determined upon a percentage which is loaned at call, a percentage which is loaned on short discounts, a percentage which is loaned on long discounts, and a percentage which is actually loaned out on almost permanent investment.

In the article Commercial Banks and Credit, in a book entitled What Everybody Wants to Know about Money, by G. D. H. Cole, I find, taking the London clearing banks' averages of weekly figures, the following percentages of deposits: In 1925, cash and balances with the Bank of England were 11·8 per cent; 1933, a decrease to 10·6 per cent. Money at call and on short notice, in 1925, was 7 per cent, and in 1933 it had decreased to 5 per cent. In 1925 bills discounted represented 13·6 per cent; and in 1933 it had increased to 17·8 per cent. Investments in 1925 represented 17·2 per cent; and in 1933 it had increased to 27·3 per cent. Advances—peculiar to British banking—in 1925 were 51·5 per cent, and in 1933, 39·9 per cent.

It will be seen that in the course of time, with a better understanding of business and the continued and increasing use of the cheque, the disposition of the banker has tended and now is to invest definitely and not on short call, for he realizes that he has at his disposal approximately ninety per cent of the money deposited with him. The range of $90 in each $100 is spread over these various loans, and I would point out that by careful and judicious lending, in terms from short to long, the banker is able to carry the load. But if any one of his loans fails to come through on due date he must immediately hedge his bet; he must immediately attempt to cover up by calling in loans from the other terms; and it so happens that when a catastrophe overtakes the country, bankers, here, there and everywhere, are placed in the position of calling in their loans—first call money, then three months' bills, then six months' obligations, and so on. Every person who has received money from the bank is compelled to scratch in the corners to repay his debt.

I make the definite assertion, therefore, that the banks are the first institutions in our economy to encourage a depression and for the very same reason they are the last institutions in our economy to ease it and to encourage a boom. That is only natural from their very position. They find themselves unable to exceed loans beyond the amount of their actual deposits. It has been said in this house that if they receive $100 they are in a position to loan $900. Theoretically that is true, but actually and practically it is impossible because the banker must be at all times ready to return the money to the depositor and he fears that he may be caught betraying his trust.

But what do we discover in this matter of loaning out money which belongs to the people of the country? The banker has developed towards that money the attitude of regarding it as his own property and he earns interest on it in the loan, and so encourages us to apotheosize interest and usury on loans. The banker is not justified in charging interest on loans. That may sound strange, Mr. Speaker, but I say that if we are going to use the money and the credit of the country to lend out for the purpose of helping industry in certain directions, it should be done on the basis of insurance cost to make sure that that money shall be returned, and not on the basis of interest on the money loaned. We must have that money back and it must pay insurance that it shall come back. That feature can be accomplished only by a government, and I charge this government to take into consideration the fact that in developing credit for the purpose of encouraging the industries of the country it can be done in precisely that way. We should then do away altogether with the idea of banks encouraging loans to their own friends.

It is not difficult, going over the history of banking, to see how frequently this has been done or how much the wealthy patrons of a bank can obtain at reasonable rates of interest, while business men with indisputable security are finding it hard to get proper loans at decent rates. Loans should be divided into classifications, insured according to the risks in any particular classification, and that can be done only by a government. Consequently, in the consideration of this resolution, I urge that the government realize the importance of undertaking the whole system of credit and finance scientifically, studying it from the economic standpoint and instituting such changes as would make it possible for the government to own and control the chartered banks as well as the Central bank.

It is high time that the government inserted itself into the whole financial system of the country; there is ample reason for this to be done. It has been refused up to the present, but it will not be long before the government realizes that this is its only hope of salvation. Every private company and every public company, when it is incorporated, should allot to the government some proportional equivalent of its paid up and authorized capital. If I have a large tract of land and intend to dispose of it in lots or in small acreage, I cannot do so unless I first give to the government for roads and highways some portion of my property. If a man dies and leaves an estate, part of that estate is immediately claimed by the government. If a man buys foreign goods, those goods cannot come into the country until some duty on them is paid to the government. There is no part of our public or industrial life from which the government is not taking something as its share. But in the matter of finance nothing has yet been attempted, and whenever it is talked about the cry is raised, "hands off finance." But we shall have to come to it.

For these reasons, and because I feel that only in this way can we bring to the people a sense of the real responsibility which we have as people, I am prepared to vote for this resolution.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): I have listened with great interest to the speech which has just been delivered by the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). In one of his previous addresses he said that environment had a great deal of influence on the opinions of the people; and probably because I sit on the same side of the house as he does, although I do not share his political views, and because I hold some ideas closely related to what he has just expressed, I find myself almost in accord with what he has just stated. I was a little surprised that my hon. friends the member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) did not agree with the resolution, because after all it says only that the government should "consider the advisability" of national ownership.

I have great faith in the present government. I am certain that they will be ready to consider the advisability of controlling our central bank as well as the other banks. I am not in principle in favour of public ownership, and I take the accomplishments of the Canadian National Railways as a sufficient warning. But I think we need credit, and it is essential that credit restrictions should be ended. By refusing or by granting a loan a bank has almost daily the great responsibility of either keeping a man or an industry functioning or bringing bankruptcy to the door of that man or that industry. I realize that currency and credit are very important and complicated matters, but I think we all know enough to realize that easier and better credit would do a great deal to help our financial recovery. Our bank reserves are increasing; bank deposits are increasing, and I must say that at the same rate bankers' free advice to the public is increasing. Good enterprises have been forced out of business for lack of credit. If bank loans were more freely given out they would help in all spheres of our life towards the financial recovery of Canada, because the amount of credit has been at all times and in every country a controlling and dominating factor. Since the banks have the privilege of creating money through the facilities that the government has given them they should do more to help to accelerate our business and our trade. Bankers should not have so much say in the framing of our monetary law. After all the business of banking is not such a wonder, not really such a mystery; as I have heard it said, it is only a bookkeeping system whereby the privileges of the government and the deposits of the people are at the service of the bankers.

I do not believe in the slogan "share the wealth." I think it would kill initiative. Initiative is the creator of hope, of ambition and of happiness. But when we come to deal with a question as important as that of credit we ought to know who is to be the master in our country. Many of our great leaders have stated that the bankers should not have so much to say in the preparation of our monetary or fiscal laws and measures. It is the government of the country that should dictate those laws and measures in the interest of the people.

I intend to say no more than that I am in favour of the present motion, because it only asks the government to study the question whether our banks, the central bank and the chartered banks, should be owned and controlled by the government. While the government is studying these laws something should be done to lower the banks' rate of interest from seven per cent to five or possibly four per cent. I believe the banks in the meantime should discharge their enormous responsibility in a worthy manner; that they should do their share to promote our commercial recovery, and that they should set an example of true and practical patriotism by giving a freer line of credit to our traders and to the directors or heads of our commercial institutions.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): In speeches on this motion to-day there have been statements made which certainly need correction. In particular the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated that he was not one of those who believed that credit flowed simply from the point of a fountain pen. In order that there may not be any belief that certain people in the house have any idea of supporting such a view I should like to place on the records of Hansard the social credit definition of what real credit is. I have as my authority The A B C of Social Credit. This is what it says with reference to that particular subject:

> Real Wealth—Real Credit—Financial Credit
> And yet with the facts staring us in the face, the preconceived idea that money is something tangible still persists. Some of us, like the most uncivilized savages, have made of it the fetish before which we pay our vain oblations. Money is not God, nor is it even a commodity. You cannot eat it, wear it, or live in it. Yet it remains a mental fixation with some of us that money itself is wealth. Money is not wealth. It can be considered as wealth only in so far as it can be exchanged for such goods or objects as we may desire. (A bag of gold in the desert would little avail us.) The real wealth of any nation is its ability to produce and deliver goods (including services) as, when, and where required. Similarly the real credit of a nation is the belief in that ability, whereas the financial credit of a nation is quite simply the estimate of that ability expressed in monetary form, or as it is called, "monetized."

That is how we define credit, so I would not want it to be said that certain people hold the view that credit merely flows from the point of a fountain pen. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) say that the people of Canada who supported the Liberal party in connection with that particular plank of their platform certainly expected that party to deal with the central bank just as has been suggested in this resolution; I know the people at large had that in mind. I should like to add that if the resolution also contained these words, "With the object of controlling the credit and currency policy of Canada" instead of referring to private banks, it would become a different proposition and would be exactly in line with the remarks made by the hon. member for Rosthern. If it is the intention of the government to introduce at a later date legislation which will have that end in view, I am quite prepared not to support the motion and to wait until the government carry out the promises they made to the people of Canada during the last election campaign.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, we are continually reminded that we should talk less and say more; if we did so we would not have so many empty seats in this chamber.

I am not prepared absolutely to support this motion because it suggests that the government should take over the control of all money. If that should be done we would not keep very much money in our pockets or in our houses, and I am not prepared to go as far as that. I like to have just a little bit of money that I can call my own. If the mover would cut the tail off this resolution I would support it because, as the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) has said, we campaigned on the issue of a national bank, nationally owned and controlled, and as far as I am concerned I am prepared to put into effect the platform on which we went to the country.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word or two in connection with this resolution. The hon. member (Mr. Coldwell) who moved it would give the impression that the group to which I belong are not in favour of public ownership; much stress was laid on that point. I should like to remind the house that our leader in Alberta said that if they could not get the cooperation of the banks they would establish their own state credit house, so there should be no misunderstanding in that regard.

I was wondering why we should spend our time discussing a resolution of this nature when the government are pledged to bring down legislation in regard to banking. It seems to me that it would be far better to dispose of this resolution as quickly as possible—indeed, it never should have come up—and then wait for the government to bring down the bill which we can discuss on its merits.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) say that fifty per cent of those who supported the Liberal party at the last election had done so because of the statement that the Liberal government would take over and control the Bank of Canada. I believe that if the people of this country had possessed confidence and faith in the Liberal party there would not have been any social crediters here now, or socialists either for that matter. If the Liberals had kept pace with the progressive changes that have taken place in every walk of life there would have been no third and fourth parties sitting in the house. We are here because of the protests of our constituents in regard to these matters.

It is evident that Canada cannot carry on indefinitely as it has been carrying on for the past number of years. The other day in the house a question was asked and answered as to how much interest this country has paid on its debt since confederation. The debt was given as $2,895,124,262.99; the interest paid amounts to $2,823,245,404.93, so that our present debt just about equals the amount of interest that has been paid. If any hon. member cares to look up the Canada Year Book he will find that in almost every year since confederation, when the debt stood at $75,722,624, there has been an increase in our national debt. I wonder how many of us who run businesses could carry on a business on that basis. We would soon be looking for the leakage; we would have to change our method of doing business if we went into debt more and more, year after year. So the time has come, in fact it is overdue, when this country will have to make drastic changes in its financial system, and I for one am anxiously waiting for the government to bring down the bill in connection with the control and ownership of the national bank. I think that is what we should be discussing to-day.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion that it would be well for me, as the representative of a portion of this dominion, to place myself on record as to how I stand in regard to a publicly owned and controlled bank. I can do this with the greatest of ease because I was elected to support the present government, which stands for a publicly owned and controlled bank. I do not think we need to discuss that; we may leave it safely in the hands of the present government. Faced with a resolution worded as the one before us we are placed in a rather awkward position. Why did not the hon. member who introduced the resolution limit it to our national bank? Why did he bring in the private banks? I hold no brief for the private banks; I have done business with them for many years and have always found them good people with whom to do business. I have always paid them what I owed, and for that reason I had no difficulty with them. But with respect to a Canadian bank, a national bank for Canada, I would recommend that the government or anybody interested in the institution invite private interests and private bankers of Canada to keep their fingers out of this particular pie. Let us have a real nationally owned and nationally controlled bank. That is what I believe the Liberal party stands for. Therefore I cannot support the resolution in its present form, but I stand four-square for a nationally controlled and nationally owned Canadian bank.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house in a discussion of a resolution which, I imagine, hon. members would not expect me to view with favour. I need not discuss at length the first part of the resolution, because the speech from the throne gave ample indication of the fact that the government is and has been considering the question of ownership and control of the Bank of Canada. From the interest displayed by hon. members in all sections of the house in all monetary and financial matters it is quite apparent to me that no government could avoid considering the matter, even if that were its desire; and this government does not wish to avoid considering it. I am sitting at the feet of many Gamaliels with respect to matters of finance, currency and economics, and I shall give such consideration as I am capable of to the Hansard report which will contain the various ideas submitted for lifting this country out of its difficulties.

Mr. MacNICOL: But do not adopt them.

Mr. DUNNING: As yet I have not heard anything new. That is not a criticism of the ideas expressed, but is merely an illustration of the old saying that there is nothing new under the sun. Since means of exchange were first devised between man and man, situations have arisen which have developed the kind of suggestion we have heard to-day and on previous occasions this session. I hope the mover of the resolution (Mr. Coldwell) will not misunderstand me when I compliment him upon his manner of presentation. If I may be permitted to say so, it was a happy change from the type of argument we have heard from that corner of the house to the effect that those who agree with the speaker and with the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are friends of humanity, and that all others are its enemies. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) got away from that type of argument, and addressed himself to the subject matter of his resolution.

I shall not attempt to go into all the intricacies of finance, but shall content myself by saying that I do not believe it would be in the interest of the people of Canada for the state to take over and operate the chartered banks of our country. I shall state briefly my reasons for that belief.

Apart from all considerations of a financial nature in the operation of financial institutions, I believe that the institutions of parliament and government have quite enough on their hands successfully to handle that which the constitution of Canada commits to their care, without trying to run all the business of the country from this chamber. Moreover, I do not believe that the machinery which has been developed through the years to enable people intelligently and properly to govern themselves in a representative assembly of this kind is the kind of machinery most effective for conducting the ordinary operation of any kind of business. One needs only to listen in this chamber to the multitude of counsel with respect to any matter in order to understand how impossible and impractical it is for this to be an executive body. In fact, sir, we recognize that in our very institutions; we recognize it in the principles of cabinet government and the manner in which our British system relates that government to the legislative body, in the responsibilities which it places upon one and the checks it places upon the other. We see it in the provision demonstrated here every day whereby a proposal to expend public money or to tax the people must emanate from a minister of the crown, and be preceded by a message from His Excellency the Governor General. What is that but a check? It is a deliberately devised check, and one needs only to attend the sessions of legislatures in countries which do not have that kind of check, or one similar, to realize the very grave difficulties of attempting to charge a legislative body with any degree of executive responsibility.

"Oh," but you say—and I know the mover would say, and sincerely—"it would not be our intention to have parliament run the chartered banks; there would be a board." Yes, sir; that is the condition created as a result of the state going into business. Parliament creates a board to run this, and another board to run that, and so we have a series of bureaucracies operating the business of the country. I am not one who believes that private business is perfect. Like every other human instrument it is just as perfect as the individuals composing it; even parliament suffers from that limitation. Bureaucracy is subject to just the limitations of the individuals composing it. But, sir, it is subject to something more than that. A bureaucracy operating within a democracy, a series of boards operating the business of the country, have a tremendous self-perpetuating power. Think it over; they have a tremendous self-perpetuating power. One only needs to read the current history of countries which have developed this bureaucratic system which is advocated in the resolution now before the house in order to make a choice between maintaining to the utmost degree the kind of freedom which we enjoy in Canada, and bureaucratic control.

Mr. HEAPS: Has not parliament some control of the banks at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, but this resolution intends that the government shall operate the banks or that they shall be operated through government instrumentality. Of course it is the function, indeed, it is the duty of this parliament, properly to control all business and see to it that laws are put on the statute books and administered by the courts to ensure that business, and indeed our whole population, either as individuals or in their corporate capacity, shall keep in order and treat each other fairly. It is our business to make laws to ensure fair treatment as between man and man, as between institution and institution, as between individuals and institutions. But I submit, sir, that we should be losing something which is most precious in our national life if we so far sacrificed the kind of freedom to which I have just been referring in favour of setting up bureaucracies to run our chartered banks and our other business institutions. I do not know where we would stop if once we started that, and I am quite sure that the final result would be much worse than anything through which we have passed.

I do not wish to be misunderstood or misinterpreted as I am afraid my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was about to misinterpret me. I do not wish to be understood as indicating that any individual or any institution in this country should be free to do as he or it likes—far from it. It is our business to regulate by statute law the relationship between man and man, between industry and industry, and individual and industry, and that in all conscience, Mr. Speaker, is a big enough task. It is for that reason that I am against this resolution or any other similar resolution proposing to take over, without regard to anything else but the establishment of a socialistic state, the operation of business within Canada. We have gone far already in this country, and we may be compelled to go further, but for my part the going further will be slow.

As I said at the outset, I am opposed to the resolution in its present form, but in so far as it relates to the Bank of Canada the government is giving consideration to that question; and it will continue to do so.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak on this resolution, but before the question is put to the house I should like to make clear where I stand on monetary reform.

I am in accord with the resolution up to a certain point, and that is where it declares for the national ownership and control of the Bank of Canada, and if the resolution stopped there I would be prepared to vote in favour of it.

I am not prepared at the present time to quarrel with the mover of the resolution (Mr. Coldwell) as to whether or not it should be adopted in its entirety, nor am I in a position to quarrel with him to-day as to whether or not we should adopt a socialistic state in this country. But I do not believe it would be in the interests of this country to adopt a socialistic state at the present time, and if I had the power in my own hands to establish a socialistic state right now I would not do so.

I do submit, however, Mr. Speaker, that the issuance of currency and credit should be absolutely in the hands and in the control of parliament. I submit also that we shall never have, and never can have, any prosperity that is permanent in its nature so long as private individuals control the currency and credit of the country. You cannot have prosperity under those conditions. At the present time the taxation that is necessary to meet the interest on our bonded indebtedness and sinking fund takes almost fifty per cent of the money that we collect in taxation. How are you going to continue if you go on borrowing the money from private individuals owning and controlling the currency and credit of the country? How are you ever going to get out of debt? How are you ever going to do the things that are required by the people of this country as long as you have to pay tribute to private individuals to use something that belongs to the people? You can never have any permanent prosperity under that system.

As I said at the outset, I did not intend to speak on this resolution; I just wanted to make my position clear. Much time has been taken up discussing things that will all be the subject of discussion when the budget is brought down, and when the budget is brought down I am as firmly convinced as it is possible for any man to be that the Liberal party will bring down legislation that will bring about national ownership and control of the Bank of Canada. I firmly believe that, and I was elected because of the belief of the people of my constituency that the Liberal party had promised something of that kind. When the time comes, if the Liberal party are not prepared to bring in such legislation, then I am afraid I shall have to vote against the party, much as I should hate to do so. That is all I have to say at this time, Mr. Speaker, but when the question comes up of the national ownership and control of the Bank of Canada I shall have a good deal to say about monetary reform.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply very briefly to some of the points that have been raised.

First I want to thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and hon. members opposite for the reception which this resolution has received to-day. Whatever disposition may be made of it, it has I think served a useful purpose in arousing a discussion and a frank statement by the Minister of Finance. I quite agree with him that an institution like parliament cannot be charged with the responsibility of running a bank or any industrial or business institution. It is unfitted to cope with such a task, but may I point out that no one suggests that. Those of us who hold the view that we have consciously to plan and integrate our economic life believe that subject to the statutes and powers laid down by the representatives of the people through the institution of parliament, those who are best able to plan and control the various financial and industrial institutions should be charged with that authority and that responsibility. The late government selected as governor of the Bank of Canada a man who is competent and skilled in the banking business, an able banking official. He understood the machinery he was to operate. I think it is along these lines that society will travel.

The cry against the number of bureaucracies running the country is generally raised whenever a measure of this description is proposed. Some years ago I looked up the speeches of Cobden, Bright and John Morley, who in their day and generation served Great Britain and society well. Again and again through those speeches I found that fear in connection with the proposed control of the bitter difficulties under which the people of Great Britain were suffering at the hands of the newly created industrialists. That particular cry does not frighten me at all. One of the criticisms levelled against the present situation is that we are governed by bureaucracies unseen and independent and, as the leader of our group sometimes terms them, irresponsible. They are irresponsible in the sense that they are not responsible to anyone but their own shareholders. I believe our financial bureaucracy is the greatest of them all and one which is perhaps responsible to a larger measure than any other for the conditions facing us to-day. The minister said that we might be compelled to carry out some of these proposals in the near future. I think we shall be, but I would like to believe that the people of this nation and of the world are becoming intelligent enough to be able to anticipate compulsion so that compulsion will not be necessary. Compulsion is always disagreeable and sometimes changes brought about by compulsion act in a manner which many of us deplore.

So many hon. members have said that if the resolution stopped with suggesting public ownership and control of the central bank they would vote for the motion, but I may say that the reference to the chartered banks was designedly included in the resolution. Even if we have a government owned institution, even though our central bank may exercise, as such institutions undoubtedly do in certain other countries, a measure of control, I believe the actual lending and other operations of the system will remain in the hands of the chartered banks. To the chartered banks will be left the actual decision as to what loans shall be made, as to what industrial enterprise is to be supported, as to what speculative business is to be carried on. I am not denouncing the bankers, but the fact remains that they are human and are looking out for their own welfare and profit and at times the preservation of the great interests with which they are themselves connected. I paid particular attention to the last hon. member who spoke (Mr. O'Neill), who said that he believed there would be no prosperity as long as private individuals controlled our currency and credit. As long as the chartered banks remain in the hands of private individuals, so long will prosperity be deferred because, as I said a few moments ago, these bankers make the actual decisions regarding loans and credit.

Motion (Mr. Coldwell) negatived on division.

RIVIERE-DU-LOUP HARBOUR

PROPOSED WORKS TO FACILITATE TRANSPORT OF COAL BY WATER

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved:

Whereas the city of Rivière-du-Loup is the most important centre in the eastern part of the province of Quebec;

And whereas, the harbour of said city is free from ice in winter, and navigation is possible at all times of the year;

And whereas, the said city is a divisional point of the national railways and the terminus of the Témiscouata railway, which links the said city to the province of New Brunswick, and to that part of the national railways known in the past as the transcontinental;

And whereas, the national railways are still in possession of the branch line of Rivière-du-Loup station to the Rivière-du-Loup wharf;

And whereas, the transport by water of coal from Nova Scotia to Rivière-du-Loup would be much more economical and would permit of its distribution at a lower cost in eastern Quebec, in the northern part of New Brunswick and the state of Maine;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should appoint experts to study the matter from every angle and report to the government as soon as possible.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in order to be very brief, because I have learned that action is preferable to speeches, I would refer the house to Hansard of April 27, 1931. Hon. members will find there a debate on a similar motion and also a very good reason why they should adopt this one. That motion was voted down by the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and fourteen or fifteen of his ministers who voted against it. Therefore, it must be a very good measure and I recommend it highly to the house. I shall not say any more, as I am sure that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Howe), who is also Minister of Marine, will accept this resolution.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this resolution is somewhat of an upset to one who thought he knew the geography of Canada very well. In view of the representations of the hon. member, I feel the department will be justified in having a report made of this matter. I shall endeavour to do this as soon as it can be done without the use of ice-breakers.

Motion (Mr. Pouliot) agreed to.

PACIFIC COAST SHIPPING

DESIRABILITY OF ENCOURAGING EMPLOYMENT OF WHITE SEAMEN IN PREFERENCE TO ORIENTALS

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved:

Whereas, great numbers of Canadian seamen on the Pacific coast of British Columbia are out of employment and in many cases destitute;

And whereas, owners of ships and vessels of Canadian registry on the Pacific coast of British Columbia give employment in large measure to seamen, cooks and engineers of oriental origin;

And whereas, other countries give greater consideration to the employment of their own nationals on ships and vessels belonging to their own country;

And whereas, the Canadian government grant large sums of money to the owners of ships and vessels by way of subsidies;

And whereas, it is desirable that every encouragement be given for the employment of officers, seamen, cooks and engineers of white Canadian citizenship in preference to those of oriental origin on all Canadian owned and registered ships and vessels;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government take such steps as will provide for employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive sums of money from the public treasury of Canada.

He said: I did not expect this resolution to be called to-day, and so perhaps I am not as fully prepared to discuss it as I should otherwise be; but inasmuch as I have introduced it now for the third time perhaps it will not be necessary for me to make as extended remarks as I have made on previous occasions.

The resolution is sufficiently self-explanatory, but before I get through I shall ask the courtesy of the house to allow a slight amendment, because the resolution as it stands does not go as far as it should. The resolution asks that the government shall take:

Such steps as will provide for employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive sums of money from the public treasury of Canada.

I am going to ask that the words "of Canadian ownership and registry" be deleted. That would mean that all steamship companies receiving subsidies from the Canadian treasury would be required to employ greater numbers of white Canadian seamen. I am going to propose this amendment because, looking into the matter more closely, I find that operating in this country are large steamship companies whose vessels are registered in London, so that if I did not delete the words "of Canadian ownership and registry" the result would be that only those shipping companies whose vessels were registered in Canada would come within the terms of the resolution.

The first recital of the resolution is:

Whereas great numbers of Canadian seamen on the Pacific coast of British Columbia are out of employment ...

I do not think any hon. member will dispute that.

And whereas owners of ships and vessels of Canadian registry on the Pacific coast of British Columbia give employment in large measure to seamen, cooks and engineers of oriental origin ...

I realize that there are perhaps hon. members who do not see eye to eye with me in regard to the employment of white Canadian seamen as against orientals. I am not asking that no orientals be employed, because I know that on ships operating between China and the Pacific coast it may be necessary that some orientals be employed to take care of oriental passengers. But here we find the country paying out, as it did in 1931, some $900,000 by way of subsidy to a steamship company which employs at least 480 orientals on each steamer and with only the nucleus of a white crew in charge.

I submit that it is just about time we took more serious note of the situation. I think every hon. member will agree with me that it is only fair for us to begin to look after our own people first. Practically every other nation in the world has some stipulation with respect to its own nationals. It will be found that on ships subsidized by the United States the companies are called upon to have 100 per cent American crews; and the governments of Norway, Japan, China, Australia and other countries insist upon the employment of their own nationals on their own ships. These countries pay greater attention to that point than we do.

The steamship companies in Canada declare that they cannot get along without all these orientals, but I would point out that from 1921 to 1930 no such large subsidies were given to these companies as we gave from 1930 to 1935, and they operated just the same. I am not forgetting also that we have more than 2,000 white Canadian seamen idle on the Pacific coast, and it is galling and very ill-becoming for high officials in this land to say, as some of them have done, that our own seamen are not as good as those from other countries. I take particular exception to that statement. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) not long ago pointed out that, at one time in this history of Canada, Canadian ships sailed the seven seas, but to-day we have practically none. Most countries to-day are learning that it was unwise not to pay some attention to shipping and maritime craft. If we are to be guided by those nations that are now taking cognizance of that fact, where shall we find the men to man ships in the future if we are to give preference to people born in countries across the Pacific?

When I introduced this resolution on a former occasion the then Minister of Trade and Commerce argued that the men employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on these large ships were British subjects from Hongkong. Well, anyone who has taken a little time to look into the exact situation in Hongkong will hardly make that statement very seriously. For the information of the house I might perhaps indicate how these people are engaged.

There is on board these ships a No. 1 man, a Chinaman, who on his arrival at Hongkong picks up a crew. Hongkong is a large city and it has only a small white population. I understand that there is practically no barrier in the city between the oriental population and Europeans, and for the No. 1 man to hire men in that seaport and then have the argument advanced that because they are hired in Hongkong they become British subjects is to carry the point altogether too far. As a matter of fact, when the vessel docks guards are put around it to see that these men do not leave the ship.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has truly said, these men are engaged because their labour is cheap; but when the steamship company says that it cannot discontinue the hiring of orientals because otherwise the cost would be too great, I dispute that statement. If they had 100 per cent white crews on these vessels I doubt whether they would engage 480 men plus officers, as we find on each of the two steamers plying between the Pacific coast and China.

The statement has been made that if orientals are not employed our trade with China might be impaired. But let us look at the situation in Australia. They do not allow orientals to unload a cargo there, and there is a barrier in the language test to keep out orientals; yet the trade returns as between Australia and Japan and China will show that Australia has done more trade in the past few years than we have. For the benefit of the members of the house I might point out that last year subsidies were paid as follows: British Canadian Steamships, on the China service, $118,000; on the Silver-Java-Pacific line to South Africa, $84,000. Those payments to the company were made to encourage the movement of lumber, and when I made the statement in the house that I believed money was being handed out without very much consideration the then Minister of Trade and Commerce took it upon himself to send my speech to almost every lumberman on the Pacific coast. They in turn chided me for making such remarks, but may I point out that although the Silver-Java line were receiving $84,000 yearly to encourage the lumber industry they were actually charging three dollars a thousand more for lumber than the rate at which it could have been taken by other ships, and, due to the question having been brought up in the house and the department going into the matter, that steamship company then lowered their rates three dollars a thousand.

Then take the Canadian Australasian line, $200,000. By the regulations of the department two-thirds of the crew must be British. On the China and Japan service we gave last year a grant of some $690,000, and it is remarkable that in the agreement entered into between that company and the trade and commerce department the clause relating to seamen, officers and crew has been entirely left out, or, shall I say, rubbed out. In most of the others, if not all, there is some clause with regard to the hiring of officers and engineers. For instance, in connection with the subsidy to the British Canadian Steamships there is a clause relating to officers and engineers. A majority of all officers and engineers of the Silver-Java line have to be British. As regards the Canadian Pacific line between China and Japan there is no such clause at all. The steamers Niagara, Makura and Marama, of the Canadian Australasian line, which receives $200,000, must carry a crew two-thirds British. Of other lines receiving subsidies, some have clauses with regard to the hiring of seamen and others have not.

I think this resolution should commend itself to every hon. member and to the country. In plain language it is just about time we began to look after our own people. The reason the word "white" is inserted is, as I explained at the outset of my speech, that when men are hired from Hongkong the statement is made that they are British subjects. Some nationals on other steamship lines belonging to other countries are called upon to produce their birth certificates. It would be interesting if some clause were put into our agreements requiring that Chinese who are engaged at Hongkong shall produce their birth certificates, that is if they have one at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether these people from Hongkong would be Canadian citizens? They would be British subjects, but not Canadian citizens.

Mr. REID: No. I have had that question put to me many times. The argument has been used in the house about Chinese from Hongkong being British subjects. I have seriously disputed that statement. As I pointed out, Hongkong is a large city, predominantly Chinese, with a European quarter, but how could any man say that a Chinese, simply by being hired in the European quarter, became a British subject? I believe that is pretty far-fetched, and I have disputed seriously and will continue to dispute the statement that the orientals in these ships are British subjects.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In any case they would not be Canadian citizens.

Mr. REID: They would not be Canadian citizens. In my resolution I am asking that every preference be given to Canadian citizens. I hope hon. members this year can lend support to the motion. I know very often there is talk of brotherhood and of not raising racial barriers; yet I think it is inherent in us that we first of all have a little charity towards our own people. They should come first, in my opinion, especially during these troublesome times when over two thousand of our own Canadian fellow citizens are walking the streets in the cities of New Westminster and Vancouver.

I do not want to labour the matter at length nor to wander in great detail into figures. This matter came before the house last year and was referred to a committee. During the time the matter was being discussed in the committee, legal representatives of the Canadian Pacific railway, I think, and other steamship companies appeared before that committee and wanted to make representations on behalf of their companies. This I objected to at that time unless representatives from the seamen's union were also allowed to come before the committee so that it might hear the two sides and in fuller detail. Immediately that suggestion was made the representatives of the companies withdrew their request. If the house has any doubts on this matter, or if the minister is not prepared to accept the resolution as it stands on the order paper, I should like to see the matter again gone into before that committee, and every opportunity given to the steamship companies to lay their views before it, with the proviso, however, that the seamen be brought before the committee so that they can combat or refute statements made by the shipping companies and so that every piece of information regarding the matter shall be placed before the members.

I have not taken time to go into the total numbers engaged in all those ships, but it runs into many thousands. As I have pointed out, it is just about time that we became sea-minded. We are becoming air-minded. We have two great coasts, the Atlantic and the Pacific, and yet we are forgetting entirely the encouragement of those men whose calling is to go down to the sea in ships. There is an inscription above the door of this building:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates
> Her gates both east and west

It cannot be very wholesome so long as we allow companies subsidized by this country to hire hundreds of orientals in Hongkong who in large measure displace our own good Canadian seamen.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Not knowing this matter was coming up, I am not so well prepared, so perhaps I shall not be so brief. I will support this resolution if representatives of the seamen's union will have an opportunity of bringing other abuses before the committee. While we at the head of the lakes have not so much water, we have a number of difficulties, three of which I should like to have considered: First, when a young man is employed on a boat quite often he does not get a round trip. He is a long way from home and he has to ride the rails back. I could speak at length on that point, but it is not necessary. Second, the wages paid on our Canadian boats are not in keeping with the needs of our men nor with the wages paid by other companies. Third, when our seamen have to pass examinations for promotion, we suggest that at the head of the lakes examinations be held or transportation be paid for those seeking promotion.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in saying a few words on this resolution moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), I should like to commence by stating that I have two objections to it, though I do not wish to convey the idea that I am opposed to the sense of the resolution itself.

My first objection is that it goes too far; my second objection, which may sound rather paradoxical, is that it does not go far enough. I think it goes too far when it designates by colour the kind of Canadian citizens who are to be employed, and it does not go far enough when it does not suggest the condition under which these Canadian citizens are to work on ships in receipt of assistance from the government of Canada. I remember that when I was much younger than I am to-day I spent a few years in the United States, where I noticed that the negro was not in the same position, as far as citizenship was concerned, as were the white residents of that country. I took great pride to myself, being a Canadian and of course living within the British empire, because in Canada all citizens were treated the same regardless of race or colour. I hope

I was not wrong. I should like to believe that I was right; that colour was not to be considered a factor in Canadian citizenship. I suggest that it is not enough to state that Canadian citizens should be employed in greater numbers; I support the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) in that view, but we should remember, when we stipulate that these employees shall be white, we exclude not only people from the orient but also the descendants of people who came to Canada to escape from slavery, who thought they would be secure here, who expected to be on a level with the rest of the community. We are excluding these as well when we use the term "white" in this resolution. We also exclude the Indians, who certainly are Canadians if anyone in this country is a Canadian.

Then in my opinion the resolution does not go far enough when it does not provide that before the government of Canada gives any assistance by way of subsidy or otherwise, it should be satisfied that wages and working conditions on the ships subsidized are satisfactory for white men. Believing this would strengthen the resolution, I am going to move an amendment which I hope my hon. friend will see his way clear to accept. The amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), reads:

That the motion be amended by striking out the word "white" in the third last line of the motion, and by adding the following words to the motion:

And be it further resolved that all subsidies or monetary assistance by the government of Canada be withheld until such time as the government is satisfied that trade union rates of wages and working conditions prevail for all ranks on such ships.

The substantial part of the motion would then read:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government taks such steps as will provide for the employment of greater numbers of Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive sums of money from the public treasury of Canada;

And be it further resolved that all subsidies or monetary assistance by the government of Canada be withheld until such time as the government is satisfied that trade union rates of wages and working conditions prevail for all ranks on such ships.

Mr. CAHAN: Have the suggestions made by the mover (Mr. Reid) of the resolution, as to the amendments he desired, been incorporated in the text of the original resolution?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not as yet received from the mover the text of his amendments.

Mr. REID: I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker; as I pointed out the resolution came up unexpectedly this afternoon and I did not have time to put into writing the changes I wish made in the motion now before the house.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 27, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Barber be substituted for that of Mr. Baker on the joint committee of both houses on the parliamentary restaurant.

Mr. BAKER: I think there is an error. The motion is to substitute the name Baker for Barber. They have sufficient bakers up in the restaurant now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am simply carrying out the instructions of the whip.

Motion agreed to.

ITALO-ETHIOPIAN WAR

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table a white paper in English and in French, containing the documents relating to the Italo-Ethiopian conflict.

COPYRIGHT ACT

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Speaker, the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers and the Performing Right Society of England, with which are affiliated similar societies in eighteen European countries, organized the Canadian Performing Right Society, and to it assigned their alleged control by ownership and copyright of two million pieces of music. Under the amended Copyright Act of 1931 this society is authorized to issue licences and to collect fees for the performance of any one of these two million pieces of music in a public place. The purpose of this bill is to curb the activities of the society in so far as their fees are deemed to be excessive, and to require the society to furnish to licencees a list of the two million pieces of music of which this society claims ownership either by control or by copyright. One thing to be emphasized is the fact, in accordance with the report of the royal commissioner, that Canadian authors, composers and publishers do not participate in the benefits of the Canadian Performing Right Society.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

LAC SEUL CLEARING PROJECT

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River):

1. What is the total cost of the Lac Seul clearing project from the beginning of the project until the end of December, 1935?
2. How many men day's work was provided?
3. Of the total amount, what percentage was paid in wages: (a) what was the amount for camps and camp equipment; (b) what was the amount of the costs of administration and supervision?
4. How many acres were cleared?
5. How many cords of merchantable pulpwood were salvaged?
6. How many feet B.M. of timber?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. $863,237.60.

2. 549,736.

3. Allowances to supervisory staffs and labourers, 23·8 per cent. Wages to skilled labour at prevailing rates, 8·08 per cent. (a) $110,175.28. (b) $195,041.04.

4. 659·7.

5. 2,254.

6. 576,950 feet b.m. in addition to lumber produced for the erection of camp buildings, docks, wharves. etc.

HOSPITAL APPOINTMENTS—NURSES

Mr. BEAUBIER:

1. Are nurses with overseas service during the Great war entitled to preference in making appointments to hospitals under the control of the federal government?

2. Has a matron or nurse recently been appointed to the staff of the Deer Lodge hospital, Winnipeg?
3. If so: (a) was she a registered nurse; (b) had she service overseas in the Great war?

Mr. POWER:

1. Yes, provided the candidate is qualified under the provisions of the Civil Service Act and is physically and otherwise suitable to carry out the duties of the position.
2. Yes. (1) One matron (by promotion); (2) One nurse.
3. (1) (a) Yes; (b) Yes.
(2) (a) Yes; (b) No.

DOMINION HOUSING ACT—LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. HEAPS:

1. What was the total amount of loans granted to each of the provinces under the Dominion Housing Act, 1919?
2. What was the amount paid back by each province as at December 31, 1935?
3. What was the amount in default by each province in principal and interest at above date?
4. What was the amount due by each province as at December 31, 1935?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Prince Edward Island	$ 50,000 00
Nova Scotia	1,537,000 00

FARM MORTGAGE LOANS

Mr. PURDY:

1. Have steps been taken to implement the second resolution appearing on page 35 of the report of the dominion-provincial conference, 1935, particularly with respect to: (a) "that the interest upon such loans as have been made, and may be made in the future, be reduced to a rate of 4 per cent per annum"; and (b) "that conditions be relaxed enough to make it possible for farmers to avail themselves of these loans when their security is sufficient"?

2. If not, will such steps be taken?

Mr. DUNNING: Where legislation is required, the intention of the government is made known by the introduction of the relevant bills. The matters referred to are under consideration.

CHAMPLAIN COUNTY AND SETTLEMENT RELIEF

Mr. BRUNELLE:

How many settlers of Champlain county took up land under the act that ensured them a grant of $600?

Mr. ROGERS: Under relief legislation the dominion government has entered into an agreement with the province of Quebec, under the terms of which the dominion, province, and municipality contribute each a sum not exceeding $200 towards the settling on the land of any family which is on relief, or which would otherwise be in receipt of relief. Provision is made for an additional contribution of $33.33 for subsistence expenditures during the third year of settlement by each party to the agreement if the family is not self-supporting at the end of the two-year period.

Selection of settlers is made by a committee which includes representatives of the federal government, the province, and the colonization departments of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. This committee has selected for settlement 976 families with 5,029 dependents, of which number one settler with four dependents is from Champlain county.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LORETTEVILLE HURON INDIANS

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. What members of the Huron tribe at Loretteville are in receipt of direct relief, and what was the amount which each person received from January 1 to December 31, 1935?

2. Does the store designated "Bon Marché," of Quebec, sell to the Department of Indian Affairs, goods supplied to the Hurons of Loretteville?

3. Who are the owners of such store?

Mr. CRERAR: Return tabled herewith.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. What is the personnel of the Canadian Farm Loan Board?

2. What salaries do they receive?

3. When were they appointed?

4. For what period do they hold office?

5. How may this tenure of office be termir ated?

6. How many applications have been made for loans: (a) by provinces; (b) total?

7. How many applications have been granted: (a) by provinces; (b) total?

8. What is the total amount of money already loaned by the board: (a) by provinces; (b) total?

9. Are applicants required to forward a deposit?

10. If so, how long is this deposit held?

11. How many inspectors are employed by the board: (a) by provinces; (b) total?
12. What are their salaries?
13. What travelling expenses are they allowed?
14. How long has the board been operating?
15. What has been the total cost each month for administration since its formation?

MOTOR VEHICLE ACCIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, last session this parliament devoted a day to discussing what action could be taken by parliament to prevent the great loss of life and injuries from motor car accidents at level crossings and other places. During 1935 there were 3,087 injured and 50 killed by motor cars in Toronto alone. In view of this great loss of life I ask the government to consider the appointment of a committee, either of this house or a joint committee of both houses, to inquire into this question as was done in England. This committee could make a study and survey and suggest legislation in an effort to abate what constitutes one of the greatest menaces to life in Canada. I do not expect an answer to-day, but I do ask the government to consider taking up this matter as I do not want to move it at another time by means of a substantive motion.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall be pleased to consider the suggestion of my hon. friend. As he knows, highway traffic is under provincial control and the only part which this parliament might play in the prevention of this evil would be perhaps by an amendment to the criminal code. I do not know whether the criminal code is in need of any such amendment, but I shall consider the suggestion of my hon. friend.

TRACTOR PARTS—TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement to the house on the subject of the tariff status of tractor parts. I am informed that this is the season for importing tractor parts and that it is particularly important in western Canada at the moment for importers to know exactly what tariff treatment these parts will receive.

There is an item in the customs tariff, No. 409m, dealing with complete parts. If an article is classified as coming under that item it is entitled to entry duty free. The selection of articles that can be entered under that item is therefore important. The department classifies as complete parts such articles as cylinder head gaskets, manifold gaskets, oil pan gaskets and other special gaskets which are obviously designed for use only as parts of a traction engine. The department also deals similarly with washers, so called, of special shape which are specially designed for use as parts of tractors and which do not lend themselves to other use. However, bolts, nuts, washers, rivets and screws and other articles of general hardware which are more or less of a standard type and are adapted for uses other than as parts of tractors cannot be classified under the provision in tariff item 409m for "complete parts," in view of a decision of the former board of customs in which the provisions in the tariff for "complete parts" are defined. In this regard I should like to place on Hansard a list of these articles that the department classifies as "complete parts." This list is as follows:

L 59 M	Washer
K SP 1182	Gasket
K 4 P 9	Gasket
1603 D	Gasket
K 5 P 1334	Gasket
K 5 P 4545	Gasket
61000	Gasket
PR 1-16	Washer
S 5 P 251	"U" bolt
AS 2 D 485	Bolt
S 5 P 152	Washer
1627	Nut
R 5 P 3087	Washer
F 179	Washer
1693	Screw
MA 1317	Nut
K 5 P 5520	Gasket
K 5 P 685	Gasket
K 5 P 3363	Gasket
K 5 P 2564	Gasket
K 5 P 372	Gasket
K 5 P 2912	Gasket
B 1959	Gasket
K 5 P 5477	Gasket
K 5 P 1306	Gasket
K 4 P 1753	Gasket
K 4 P 4376	Gasket
K 5 P 4439	Gasket
K 2033	Gasket
K 5 P 3734	Gasket
K 5 P 264	Gasket
K 5 P 420	Gasket
K 5 P 3713	Gasket
K 5 P 679	Gasket
B 1960	Gasket
K 5 P 2596	Gasket
1724	Nut
1664	Set screw
1637	Screw
PR1-7	Nut
PR1-5	Gasket
1566	Screw
1662	Nut
1638	Screw
S 5 P 3564	Bolt
A 5 P 3531	Bolt

The department does not classify as "complete parts" the following articles:

S 156	Plain rivet
MA 1005	Lockwasher
1248	Nut
S 157	Bolt and nut
MA 972	Packing material
1086	Cap screw
S 713	Rivet (large)
1777	Wing nut
1592	Wing nut
S 5 P 959	Cap screw

The letters and numbers quoted are those identifying the parts imported by a well-known company in western Canada.

In regard to ball and roller bearings, the ruling of the department in the past has been that in view of the provisions of another item in the tariff, ball and roller bearings are dutiable irrespective of whether or not they are adapted for non-tractor use. The department has reconsidered this ruling within the last few days and we have come to the conclusion that a ruling more in line wtih the true intent and meaning of the customs tariff would be the following:

Complete ball or roller bearings for use as parts of traction engines, including farm tractors, may be dealt with under the tariff provision for "complete parts," when it is established to the satisfaction of the customs officer concerned that the imported bearings are specially designed for use as parts of traction engines, and are not adapted for other uses.

The department is prepared to make this ruling and collectors are being advised accordingly. I think the situation that has developed, particularly in western Canada, in regard to the importation of all these parts is now satisfactorily met by the rulings of the department.

UNEMPLOYMENT

PROVISION OF WORK AND WAGES FOR MARRIED UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Hon J. EARL LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the actions of the government as outlined yesterday by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in connection with the providing of employment for unemployed single men now in the relief camps, I should like to ask if the government contemplates taking any action other than the negotiation of trade treaties to provide work and wages for the married unemployed now on relief in the respective municipalities throughout Canada?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I sought to make it clear that the action taken in respect of single, homeless men in relief camps was taken because the government had a special responsibility with regard to these men. I sought also to make it clear that we were not disregarding our responsibility in relation to other unemployed persons. Legislation will be brought down during this session and subsequently which will fully disclose our policies with regard to this whole question.

JAPANESE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, as Minister of External Affairs, if, because of possible international consequences, he is prepared or inclined to make a statement to the house with reference to occurrences yesterday in Japan.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my hon. friend that yesterday the government received from the Canadian minister in Tokyo two dispatches giving a very brief account of the tragic occurrence reported in the press. Nothing has been received from Japan since which has not appeared in the press.

PERFORMING RIGHT SOCIETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. K. ESLING (West Kootenay): I should like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) if he could supply each member of this house with a copy of the report of His Honour Judge Parker, the royal commissioner who investigated the activities of the Canadian Performing Right Society?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) was kind enough to notify me of the question he intended to ask. Therefore with the permission of the house I shall table one copy in English and one copy in French of the report of His Honour Judge Parker, appointed to investigate the activities of the Canadian Performing Right Society and other societies having to do with copyrights.

Mr. NEILL: Could not the minister furnish each hon. member with a copy?

Mr. RINFRET: I understand that a copy will be given to each hon. member.

BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) if each member of the house will be supplied with a copy of the speech made by the governor of the Bank of Canada at the last meeting of the shareholders of the bank?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I know of no objection to furnishing copies of this speech, and I shall see what can be done to comply with my hon. friend's request.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

PROTECTION OF MASTERS AND SEAMEN BY MARKING VESSELS WITH LOAD LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I noticed a few days ago from an associated press report that under legislation adopted by the seventy-fourth congress of the United States all vessels plying on the great lakes of 150 gross tons and over must be marked with a loading line. I understand that this legislation is somewhat similar to the English legislation in connection with the Plimsoll line. Is the government of Canada prepared to grant the same protection to Canadian masters and seamen on the great lakes?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): The Canada Shipping Act, which has not yet been proclaimed, contains provisions as to load line; but I may say to my hon. friend that so far as the great lakes are concerned these load lines have no particular significance at the moment inasmuch as the depth of water in the canals limits the load much more definitely than load lines could do for commercial traffic.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should still like the minister to answer my question whether our legislation with regard to this matter cannot be at least as good as that of the United States.

PACIFIC COAST SHIPPING

DESIRABILITY OF ENCOURAGING EMPLOYMENT OF WHITE SEAMEN IN PREFERENCE TO ORIENTALS

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 26, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Reid, to provide employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive sums of money from the public treasury; and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. MacInnis.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The motion submitted by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), with the amendment thereto proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), deserves perhaps a few words of comment, although, as the house knows, when the estimates of subsidies for the Atlantic and Pacific services were under consideration last week the question was discussed to some extent. For that reason I need not go into the matter very fully. I might, however, compliment the mover of the resolution and the hon. gentleman who proposed the amendment upon the zeal which they quite properly show with regard to the employment of Canadians on these vessels.

Perhaps I should refer to one or two misconceptions which I think crept into the debate. I think there was some thought in the minds of hon. members that, with regard to the Australian service, orientals were also employed on those ships. I am informed that only white men are employed on them; and in connection with this line, the Union Steamship line which we subsidize and of which the Canadian Pacific Railway is half owner, I am informed that recently twenty-four Japanese oilers and firemen were discharged and it was later discovered that these men were not only naturalized Canadians but were actually receiving union rates of pay.

After the debate the other evening and some of the objections raised in the house with respect to oriental labour, I got into communication with the manager of the steamship line and among other things received the following pertinent information—I will not go into it at any length to-day. He states that in order to replace oriental labour with white labour it would require the expenditure of nearly $800,000 additional; and as the proposed subsidy is only $600,000, it must be quite obvious that unless that subsidy were increased there would be no purpose whatsoever in the steamship company accepting any subsidy. The house would therefore have to decide whether, if it is the desire that all white labour should be employed, we should increase our subsidy to the extent of the added expenditure. To some that may not be very material; they may place above the necessities for economy the desirability of paying higher wages and employing white men.

Further, I am informed that it would require about a quarter of a million dollars to make such alterations in these vessels as would be necessary for the accommodation of white people employed.

One other point made by the management of the line was rather, I admit, a surprise to me. It is of very considerable importance when the merits of the question are being discussed. It is that on the boats in the China and Japan services sixty per cent of the passengers are orientals. I was surprised to hear that the percentage was so large, and the significant fact that suggests itself is that if the personnel of the passenger list comprises orientals to the extent of sixty per cent—my hon. friends from British Columbia will admit this, I think—it would be somewhat difficult to get white men to serve these passengers.

I am not going further into the merits of the question, for this reason: in order that complete information may be obtained—and possibly some of these claims that have been made may be refuted—I move, in amendment to the amendment, the following, seconded by Mr. Elliott:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

"the question of the employment of Canadian citizens on ships and vessels the owners of which receive moneys from the public treasury of Canada be referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations."

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister be good enough to allow the insertion of the words "or charterers" after the word "owners"? A good many boats are chartered.

Mr. EULER: I have no objection.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Euler) agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

MOTION TO EXCLUDE FROM CANADA CERTAIN CLASSES OF IMMIGRANTS

The house resumed from Thursday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacInnis to exclude from the country all persons belonging to those groups to whom we do not grant the full rights and privileges of citizenship.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): In closing the discussion on the resolution standing in my name, which was debated on Thursday last, I have not very much more to say, except to take up certain points raised by some or possibly all of those who spoke against the resolution.

I shall first deal with the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). The hon. member was, I think, rather spiteful in his remarks on this resolution. He was not in his usual good humour. I do not think that his temper has been improved since he was taken over by the Liberal party. Very possibly his chagrin on this occasion was caused by the fact that, in the language of the street, he is on the spot, that the days of his whispering campaigns are over and that now he will have to face the issue squarely. He accused me of raising a dead issue, an issue which, he said, has been dead for thirty-three years. If that is so, why did he drag up the dead bones during the last election? Why did he rush from the city of Ottawa to his constituency of Comox-Alberni to advertise in an early address that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had stated that he was in favour of votes for orientals? Surely if the issue was dead he could have left it dead, without having to bring it up at that time and for his own special purposes.

He asks us, why not go to the source, that is to the provincial legislature? If the provincial legislature is the source, why was the issue raised in a federal election? I have here a copy of the Comox Argus of August 15, 1935. It gives a report of a speech made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to a small audience on August 12. I find that on this occasion, he dragged in this dead issue, something that has been, to use his own words, "dead for thirty-three years." He is reported to have said:

Neither would he agree to advocate votes for orientals at the dictates of Woodsworth. When he first went to Ottawa he had worked hard to stem the stream of Chinese and Japs coming into British Columbia, and had succeeded in stopping the Chinese entirely and reducing the Japs very greatly.

Unaided he did these things. This was the mighty Neill, speaking to his people in Comox-Alberni. Now notice this:

What would happen if they got the vote? They would vote solidly for the man or party who promised them more privileges and a larger quota of immigration.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: So that the hon. gentleman was not only saying that we were in favour of votes for orientals; he also insisted we were in favour of more oriental immigration. Now he has the chance to vote for exclusion, and we will see if he will do it;

we will find out if he is as good as his word, if he will support what he said when he was on the hustings in Comox-Alberni.

Mr. REID: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Vancouver East is giving the impression that any one who votes against this resolution is voting for the entry of orientals. I make the statement that he is not putting the matter fairly and squarely before the house, because this resolution—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: The resolution speaks for itself. It is phrased very well indeed, and if my hon. friends do not like it, as far as I know there is nothing to do but to lump it. They brought this upon themselves. I did not want to do it. We did not go out of our way to bring this up. They used the issue to serve their purpose, and now that it has served their purpose they want to bury it. Well, we are not going to allow them to bury it; we are going to give it decent burial if it gets one at all.

The hon. member also drew to the attention of the house a statement I made on February 12 when I was speaking in another debate. He read this:

> Note that, sir,—the Liberal party is opposed to giving the orientals the vote. What a wonderful help such a statement will be in their negotiations with Japan to improve trade relations between the two countries.

I stated that in order to show the inconsistency of Liberal propaganda during the last election. I regret that the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is not in his seat at the moment. One of the principal planks in his election campaign was that of better trade relations with the orient; and yet while he was using that as a plank in his platform, he was going through the country vilifying those orientals who are already in the Dominion of Canada. I was trying to show the inconsistency of it. However I am not going to take up any more time with the member for Comox-Alberni.

As to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), I wish to thank him for the way he approached this resolution when it was last before the house; and when he says that he was in no way connected with the advertising and the literature that I read in the house except that his photograph appeared along with the others, I accept what he said in the terms in which it was said. He states that he does not agree with the preamble. The preamble of the resolution is as follows:

> Whereas it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada that there should be in the country groups to whom, because of race or religious beliefs, we do not extend all the right of citizenship;

That is quite clear, I think. It says it is detrimental, it is not in the best interests of this country, that we should have in the country groups of people whom, because of race or religion—and I would say, any other reason—we cannot admit into the full privileges of citizenship. If we are to have people come to this country, for what purpose are we going to have them here? Are we going to have them come so that they may be made citizens of this country, and to bring their children up as citizens, or are we allowing them in for some other purpose? Are we going to try to bring in here a sort of inferior or slave class? I do not know. My friend from New Westminster says he is not in favour of the preamble, but I am in favour of it: I am opposed to bringing people in here who will be in an inferior position to the rest of the community, because that inferior position makes them a constant menace to the people whom I represent. That is the reason I take that position.

The hon. gentleman stated that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation seemed to be losing a lot of sleep over the oriental franchise. Let me tell him that those who have lost the sleep must be those who spent their good money on campaign advertising in connection with this matter. We did not spend any money to advertise our position; we did not need to do it, the Liberal party did it for us. Let me say again that we have not raised this question in any shape or form, neither in the house nor outside the house. As a general principle we believe that every individual is entitled to certain rights and privileges in this country and from that position we cannot back down whether it brings us votes or whether it drives votes away. I am not so sure that my Liberal friends will be so keen on bringing up this question again at the next election, because during the past four years the people of British Columbia have been educated and the force of this movement has been largely spent.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that he found it very difficult to understand my real objective. In order that he may have no doubt whatever as to what my real objective is I am going to read the resolution again in its entirety, and I may tell him that my real objective is exactly what is stated by the resolution:

Whereas it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada that there should be in the country groups to whom, because of race or religious beliefs, we do not extend all the right of citizenship;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take the necessary measures to exclude from the country all persons belonging to those groups to whom we do not grant the full rights and privileges of citizenship.

I brought forward this resolution because I considered this matter extremely dangerous to the peace of the province of British Columbia, perhaps not so much now as later on, when we may have a larger population of those concerned in this matter, when they will be more vocal than they are at present and more ready to defend themselves. For that reason I do not wish to add to a problem that is already sufficiently serious by bringing into this country further immigrants from the countries concerned. Even if this resolution passes the house I do not expect that the government will immediately exclude any or all of those mentioned in the resolution by way of legislation. I assume that the Prime Minister, with his usual care in these matters, will take up the matter in the proper way and point out to the countries concerned the danger involved in allowing more of their nationals to come into this country before we have properly dealt with those already here. If it is done in that way I do not think we should have any great difficulty in dealing with the situation as far as it can be dealt with in that manner. I rather regretted the attitude taken by the Prime Minister the other evening in his statement as to the probable consequences of this resolution in the countries concerned. He said:

Like my hon. friend I deplore very much anything that is calculated to stir up racial feeling, but fortunately so far as political propaganda is concerned it is more or less localized. What my hon. friend forgets at the moment is that people in the orient who have never heard of our political discussions will read his resolution in the morning as a resolution that is being discussed in the House of Commons of Canada, and that makes it a very serious question indeed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Prime Minister is not so much concerned about the racial feelings raised within the Dominion of Canada; that is of no great concern to him. But this might raise feelings outside Canada, and that is of very great concern in his mind because, forsooth, it might interfere with trade. I am not unmindful of these dangers, either; I know we should try to minimize them as much as possible, and I stated on the public platform that the Liberal members in and around Vancouver who were so loud in their discussion of this question would not raise their voice about it when they came down to Ottawa, because it would interfere with trade. During the last session of the legislature at Victoria a resolution was placed on the order paper by a friend of the government, not a member of the party in power but a friend of the government, with the idea that it might embarrass the opposition. The resolution was to the effect that it was not in the best interests of the province of British Columbia that the franchise should be extended to orientals. That resolution was not allowed to be debated in the legislature; it was withdrawn, for the reason that they were afraid it might interfere with trade. But the things that were not allowed to be discussed in the legislature and which they would not like discussed in the House of Commons, they are quite willing to discuss on the hustings because they feel that such discussion will not reach the ears of the statesmen in those other countries concerned. Surely that is not statesmanship of a very high order.

Referring to the possible consequences of this resolution the Prime Minister also suggested that the happenings in this country were not of any very great import. Let me read what the right hon. gentleman said in 1924 when this question, in another form, was before this house. I quote from Hansard for 1924, volume 5 at page 4355:

I do not think one need argue the point as to the importance of encouraging Japanese students to come to our universities in order to become acquainted with our standards in matters of civic life; methods of government, and the like, and to return to the orient with those ideas. That, really, is the most effective kind of missionary effort—to let the oriental see the civilization we have, and if, in any particular, we are ahead, to let him carry those ideas back to his people.

Now I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman if those Japanese students and others who were living in British Columbia during the last election campaign would be likely to take back to Japan a high opinion of our standards in matters of civic life. How would the standards appear? Would they be anything after which the Japanese should pattern their civic affairs? I doubt it very much.

I hope that I have impressed the house with the seriousness of this question. I have indicated that it is a question that should be settled, as far as it can be settled, and that it cannot be settled on the hustings; this is the proper place to debate and settle it. My right hon. friend I think asked at the close of the debate last Thursday if I was going to withdraw the resolution. I am not going to withdraw it, because I have no guarantee that those who raised this issue in 1935 will not raise it again when the next election campaign comes along, and that is not in the best interests of the people of this country. Let me say again that the resolution means exactly what it says. Anyone voting against it votes for the principle that we should let people come into this country to stay permanently to whom we cannot grant the rights and privileges of citizenship. He will also vote for the continued coming of these people into the country. The issue is quite clear; I do not think anyone voting on the resolution need be at all in the dark as to what it means.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I know I should not be in order in pursuing the debate any further, and such is not my intention. Perhaps the house, however, will allow me to renew the appeal, if I may so call it, which I made to my hon. friend the other evening, not to divide the house at this time on a question which is one of oriental exclusion. When I made the appeal I did to my hon. friend a week ago, I stressed how important it is that, as far as the orient is concerned, there should not be added to the difficulties of the present any further problem which might serve to embarrass British peoples and peoples the world over. I believe what has happened in Japan since I last spoke is evidence of the seriousness of conditions in the orient at the present time, and of how sensitive shall I say, some of the citizens of the orient are with respect to what they regard as their rights. It would, I believe, be most unfortunate for Canada and for the present world situation should this parliament be forced to vote on a question of oriental exclusion.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am at a loss as to what the right hon. gentleman would have me do. All he has stated so far is that I should withdraw the resolution because of the serious situation that prevails—possibly not that altogether; I do not wish to put any wrong construction on what he has said. I assure him and this house that I take just as serious a view of the situation as any hon. member does. But what has he to say for the future as far as this country is concerned? What is he going to do; can he give me any assurance of that? If he can I assure him without any hesitation whatever that I will withdraw the resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: If the right hon. gentleman wants to have the resolution remain as it is on the order paper without any further discussion for a day or two. I shall be glad—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question has to be disposed of.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to repeal the Economic Council of Canada Act, 1935.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my remarks on this bill will be very short. May I suggest to hon. members that they glance at the explanatory notes on the bill? There are two main reasons for this bill. First, neither this government nor the previous government have attempted to form an economic council. Secondly, there was an item of $20,000 in the estimates last year to cover the expenses under this act, but in the estimates for the coming fiscal year there is not a cent provided for that purpose. I therefore conclude that the government has thought it very wise not to take advantage of this legislation. The people of this country are strongly against it. Either the government or the cabinet is strong and good, or it is not. If the government is not so good, there must be a change. Well, Mr. Speaker, the change occurred on October 14 last, and now this legislation is completely useless. It is like a fifth wheel on a coach, turning idly, and it is just as well to dispense with it. I shall not deal with the matter further; I shall let the bill speak for itself. It is not a money bill; it is simply a lesson in economy. I hope the bill will meet with the approval of hon. members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems strange that the introduction of a bill to repeal a measure concerning an important policy which was adopted only recently should be left to a private member on the government side. I think we should have some statement from the government in this connection. Last year I was in favour of the establishment of this economic council; I believed it was a move in the right direction. I do not know how the opposition feels towards this bill, but I want to register my protest against what to me seems to be a retrograde step.

Mr. POULIOT: Apparently the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has never read the rules of the house. He is always fighting for freedom; he is always claiming he is persecuted by someone, but when a member submits a bill to the house on his own initiative he protests against it. Where is the logic in that action? It is the most absurd performance ever given by the hon. member. He is always fighting for his privileges. Last year when the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) objected to one of his bills he protested with tears in his eyes and thunder in his voice; he claimed he was being persecuted. I know the word "shameful" is not parliamentary, but if it were I would surely use it. I do not use it. I regret that the hon. member has outlived his usefulness in this house as a defender of the people's rights.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In response to the outburst to which we have just listened, may I say that I urged the other day that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) should have the opportunity of bringing this bill before the house. I think he will recall that. I feel strongly as to the rights of any hon.

member to bring a bill before the house. He has that right and I for one urged that he be allowed the full exercise of it. My remarks were not directed in any sense against the hon. member for Témiscouata; I was addressing them to the government. I stated that it seemed strange to me that a bill of this kind should pass its second reading without a statement being made by the government as to their attitude on this important matter of public policy.

Mr. EULER: Silence gives consent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I assume that silence gives consent. That only emphasizes the point I was trying to make, that it was not to be expected that the government would pass over a matter of important public policy presented by a private member, who is quite within his rights, without making a statement as to the policy underlying the whole matter. I think the hon. member for Témiscouata quite misunderstood my position, as I am afraid he does pretty often.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to say one thing to the hon. member. We are just sweeping out the statute books, and this is a piece of dust we are getting rid of.

Mr. HEAPS: If my memory serves me correctly, this piece of legislation had the support of the opposition of last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HEAPS: My impression is that it passed without division; there was no opposition recorded to the bill. Those who should be defending the bill are the present opposition who really were responsible for it in the first place. I was in favour of this legislation, because I believed that the setting up in Canada of an economic council would serve a very useful purpose provided the right men and women were chosen as members of the council. I think we should have some statement from the minister under whose jurisdiction this would come as to whether he is in favour of repealing a statute of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The measure comes under the Prime Minister. The act provides for the appointment of an economic council to advise the Prime Minister. I am quite satisfied with my own council; I do not think I need an economic council to tell the present government what is necessary in the way of legislation. The government at all times is in a position to command the services of any members of the public service. It seems to me wholly superfluous to have on the statute book a law which obligates the government to bring together a number of the members of the public service and constitute them into an advisory council, when members of the public service have enough to do in their own departments if they are doing their work properly. It is prodigal to add to public expenditures to the extent necessitated by this act. I think the government made its attitude toward the legislation clear when we did not place in the estimates an appropriation for the legislation, and I do not think it is necessary for us to say anything more about it. It is superfluous legislation, and our attitude towards it when the late government introduced the measure was that it was superfluous. However, being a part of the new deal which was being tried out it was allowed to pass. The public has since expressed its view with respect to much of the late government's legislation and made clear its attitude towards some of these measures. The present government does not feel it in the public interest to continue the legislation.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. POULIOT moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH

CONCENTRATION OF ECONOMIC POWER—PROPOSED PUBLIC OR COOPERATIVE OPERATION OF UNDERTAKINGS FAILING TO FUNCTION IN THE GENERAL INTEREST

The house resumed from Monday, February 24, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Woodsworth:

> Whereas, the concentration of economic power in the hands of a comparatively small and irresponsible group has failed to provide security and a decent standard of living for large numbers of our people;
> Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, industrial, commercial and financial organizations and undertakings that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities and operated as public services or cooperative enterprises.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): When the house adjourned on Monday evening I was about to reply to some of the observations which had been made by various members with reference to my motion. I was rather deploring the fact that a motion dealing with a new economic set-up could not be introduced without a great deal of irrelevant talk. Again this year, as in some previous years, we have had the question of Russia dragged in. I fail to understand why a member in any section of the house cannot introduce a definite matter that seems to us to be of public concern without having someone rise and talk about Russia, as if this resolution in itself has anything to do with Russia. I am quite prepared to discuss Russia or Scandinavia or Japan on the proper occasion, but I do not think it is necessary to drag such questions into this discussion. I am glad to say that on this particular occasion none of us have been accused of atheism or free love or anything of that kind. I think we ought to learn in this house to discuss matters on their merits.

Again let me point out that a great many members have a very decided prejudice against the economic doctrine generally known as socialism. They have a right to their opinions, but the word socialism is not introduced in this resolution. Personally I have no quarrel with that word; it is a very convenient term that can often be set over against the individualism that now prevails. But the trouble is that there have been so many kinds of socialism in the past that the word lends itself to a great deal of confusion. We have had the socialism of Marx; there has been the socialism of some of the other European countries; we have had the socialism of Hitler, nazi socialism as it is called, the socialism of the bolsheviks and the socialism of the Scandinavian countries; and in England for many years we have seen the socialism of the British Labour party and other varieties such as fabianism and Christian socialism. So that when one uses a general term of that sort he is apt to lend himself to a certain measure of confusion. I have tried to avoid that and have not even mentioned the word.

We in the organization I represent have called ourselves the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. A cooperative commonwealth is our objective and we seek to attain it by orderly methods, and in this we distinguish ourselves very sharply from a great many of the types of socialism that have frequently been proclaimed. It seems to me therefore hardly fair for anyone to use the word, in relation to us, in a derogatory sense. I have been long enough in this house to know that at least some hon. members do not wish to be unfair. I think it is hardly fair to attempt to rouse prejudices when we have not put up the proposition which hon. gentlemen are trying to knock down.

For example, it has been asserted that we desire to have government ownership of all farms. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has never advocated that—never. Other people say, "You are backing away from your position." Not at all; we have never advocated it. It is true that a number of our opponents have said that we have advocated it, and it has been the practice of certain hon. members—

Mr. WOOD: If it is a good thing, why is it not good for the farms?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is another matter; it is entirely irrelevant. The point I emphasize is that we have never advocated public ownership of farms. A great many people then get up and say that we are receding from our position. I want to make the point quite clear.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend believe in private property at all?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is still another question; let me dispose of one question at a time, if you please. I want to emphasize the fact that we have never stood for the public ownership of farms. A good many members have followed the practice of keeping files from newspapers that are antagonistic to the ideals of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; then they come into the house and read clippings from newspapers that are opposed to us, taking it for granted that our position is as represented by these quotations. I repeat that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has never proposed the public ownership of farms, and that point ought not to be raised here.

Now I come to the question asked me by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Wood). In outlining our policy—and I think he will agree that we have the right to determine our own policy—we have considered that the farmers were not exploiters but that they were among the worst exploited class, and that so long as they were carrying on individual farming operations and were content to do so, there was absolutely no reason why there should be any public ownership of farms. It is altogether different when we come to the banks, which we believe have exploited the people—banks, which are great corporations tending to create a monopoly. Under these circumstances what we have advocated is that when institutions rise to a position of monopoly or near monopoly it is right that the state should take them over. That is our position. We say that when the very means by which we live are in the hands of other people it is high time for the state to interfere. In connection with the farms, the individual farmer owns his own tools. To that extent he is free. I should say with regard to the farmers' problems that we have advocated public control of marketing operations, and public ownership of abattoirs, stockyards, elevators and things of that kind because we believe that in this direction the farmer is exploited. But we are not advocating public ownership of farm lands, and we do not think it necessary to do so. If the time should come when in western Canada, for example, the mortgage companies take over large tracts of land and operate them as great company farms, it might very well be that we should then consider it was time for the state to intervene and take over farm lands.

Mr. DUNNING: And take the loss?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They might have to take the loss. That is another matter. I come to a question by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). He asks whether we believe in private ownership or not.

Mr. DUNNING: Private property.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Private property. It all depends upon what is meant by private property. The word property, as its Latin derivation suggests, means personal things, something that one can own and enjoy personally. We do not want to take away any of those things, personal belongings, such as a man's piano, his radio, his home, his car; those are personal things, they ought to be privately held. We want to increase that type of personal property. We want to make it possible for everyone to have that kind of personal property and to have it much more abundantly than at present. But our lawyer friends have managed to build up an institution which they call a corporation, and they have endowed it with nearly all the attributes of a person, including the right to own property. The corporation is a purely artificial creation—a collective method of controlling productive machinery. Under these circumstances we think that the time has come when we may well ask whether those great corporations that have been built up are serving the needs of the people. If they are not serving the people they can be broken up again. By doing away with their control over these big undertakings we are not doing away with what should strictly be called "private property." I submit that the Canadian Pacific Railway is in a very different position from the little farmer. Had it not been, the late government would hardly have gone to the extent of endorsing its bonds in the amount of $60,000,000. No government endorses the note of a private individual, a private farmer or business man. It was taken for granted that this transportation system is of the nature of a public utility. Our position is that when any institution reaches that position it is to the advantage of this country that it be not left in private hands, but rather that it be administered either as a public utility or as a cooperative enterprise.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just a minute. I wish I could get through my speech without too many interruptions; however, if the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) wishes to ask a question, I will answer it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was just going to ask the hon. member if he would limit the size of the private farm that is permitted under the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation program to ten thousand acres, or what size?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have not discussed that matter at all, because, as the hon. member for Davenport knows, the control of land is within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and we have left that problem to be dealt with by the various provinces concerned. We have not gone into details; we are simply stating general principles. There was a gentleman across the floor who wanted to speak, I think.

Mr. EVANS: Is it not true that during the provincial election in Saskatchewan two years ago your party advocated the use lease system in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The question comes from Saskatchewan: is it true that two years ago the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Saskatchewan advocated the use title system, I think was the term used. Yes; there was a meeting of the provincial council of Saskatchewan and they decided that the farmers in that province were so hopelessly insolvent that the best way to meet their difficulties was to permit any overburdened farmer voluntarily to come to the government and ask the government to take over his farm, reducing the value to something in line with what the farm was able to produce, giving the farmer a certain amount to cover his equity, and issuing interest free bonds to those who held the mortgage. That was their plan at that time in Saskatchewan. No other provincial organization has adopted that plan. It was entirely a provincial matter, and perhaps the proposition is not an altogether unreasonable one. I remember being in Saskatchewan at the time and talking to a very well established farmer, who was not overburdened with debt, but he said that if the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation came into power in Saskatchewan he would be the first, as an independent owner of a farm, to make application to have his farm taken over in that way. The question was fundamentally whether the present Torrens title, permitting a man to become hopelessly mortgaged, was the best way of carrying on farms in Saskatchewan, or whether an alternative system could be set up under which one could voluntarily ask to be placed.

May I once again call attention to the terms of this resolution. Even my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) seemed to fail to grasp just what it stated. The resolution reads: that in the opinion of the house, industrial, commercial and financial organizations that are failing to function in the general interest should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities. I spent a good deal of time in quoting from the price spreads committee report to show that a great many of these institutions were, according to the evidence given before the committee, failing to function in the general interest, and it was because of that failure that I thought they should be taken over by public authority. That was a perfectly logical conclusion to which to come.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Will the hon. gentleman give us the names of a number of these financial organizations or undertakings that are failing to function properly?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest to the hon. member that he read the price spreads report. I should like to commend the government upon their action with regard to the mills at Sherbrooke, and especially the statement of their position which appeared in the press at the time. I think I am right in saying that the ground was taken that if some private concern failed to provide for the needs of the workmen employed and generally to function in the interests of the public, consideration might very well be given to the question whether it might be necessary for the government to take it over. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce took very much the same position in his speech the other day, and I think the speech from the throne suggested that there might come a situation which would require state interference.

Mr. MacNICOL: Take that particular instance: would the hon. member advocate that the government take over the mills at Sherbrooke.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: And operate them?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, decidedly. They would have to. If they are failing to function in the public interest and if the company would not come to time, I should say, let the government take them over and either close them or operate them in the public interest. The government could very easily set up a commission.

An hon. MEMBER: They might close anyway.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They might close. At any rate all that was necessary was a firm stand on the part of the government to bring that company to time.

In this country, as we all know, there is some little difficulty in carrying out any proposal of this kind because of the division of jurisdiction as between the dominion government and the provincial governments. I sought to safeguard that point by saying they should be taken over by the appropriate public authorities. I can understand that under our constitution some undertakings would have to be operated by the provinces; others by the municipalities. For instance, if we wanted to carry on the milling business or the distribution of gasoline it might very well be that this could be done by the provincial authorities. If we wanted to carry on bakeries, run street cars or anything of that kind obviously those matters could be best handled by the municipal authorities. On the other hand there are certain matters such as railroads, matters of general nation-wide public importance, that can be handled more readily by the dominion government.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this parliament is the body that would handle these different undertakings. Already in Canada we have gone a long way in the direction of administration by commissions. I think probably that is the line along which we had best advance, by commissions responsible to the government but which will not be interfered with in the day to day operations. I would add this, that I hope we may come to the point where our commissions will not be so largely political appointments and, further, when on the commissions there will be representatives of both the managers and the employees of the undertakings concerned. In a general way, however, we will have to develop a whole series of administrative boards that will carry forward the detailed operations of socialized production and distribution.

I believe there are two ways in which operations along this line can be carried forward. The first is organization as a public service, as we now operate the Canadian National Railways, as the province of Ontario now operates the hydro electric system, and as the city of Toronto now operates its tramways. There are a great many institutions that lend themselves to that sort of operation, in fact they demand a very centralized control. But there is another class of undertaking that might very well be given over to cooperative enterprise. The other day one gentleman said to me that he could not quite see how the cooperative institutions, of which my hon. friend from Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) spoke the other day, fitted into our scheme. They fit into it precisely and naturally. We do not want to build up a great bureaucracy; there are a great many things that can be and should be done by cooperative enterprise. I am very happy indeed to point to those developments in Nova Scotia to which the hon. member for Grey-Bruce referred, by which some of the poor farmers, and especially the poor fishermen, whose plight was almost desperate a few years ago, are gradually making progress by taking over their own affairs and merchandising some of their own goods. That is an example of the producers' cooperative. We all have been heartily in sympathy with the idea of the pools in western Canada. I do not want to discuss the merits of the pools to-day; they have failed in some respects, but in my judgment their failure was due very largely to causes outside their control as also outside the control of the regular grain trade.

I should like to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that we believe in cooperative enterprises. We may have to start a good many of them and have some of them fail before we learn the best way to carry them on. We are also heartily in sympathy with consumers' cooperatives along the line of the Rochdale system, which has been such a magnificent success in England and the Scandinavian countries; we think it might well be carried on here. The practical difficulty is that the big departmental and chain stores have got in, as it were, on the ground floor, and have developed to such an extent that it is very difficult for a consumers' cooperative to get on its feet. But we of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believe in these consumers' organizations. They constitute an integral part of our particular class of socialism.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

A question that is often brought up—I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) referred to it the other day—is this question of liberty. I have a good deal of sympathy with the Liberal idea of personal liberty; I think I was brought up more or less to regard that as one of the most cherished possession of the British people, but I do say that under the circumstances now existing personal liberty is being gradually whittled down until there is not a great deal of it left. I want to quote once more the figure I mentioned the other evening, that outside of the agricultural workers five-sixths of the workers in Canada are working for wages; that is, as the saying is they are not "on their own." They are simply hired men, as it were, fortunate indeed if they can get a job but having very little indeed to say with regard to their wages, hours or the conditions under which they work; having nothing to say with regard to how the product produced under collective arrangements shall be sold, and having no claim on the profits that may be made. Under these circumstances we cannot talk very much of a man's liberty. It is true that he can still go to vote, though there seems to be a tendency towards depriving those who are not working of the voting privilege. But supposing a man can vote; that is a very small area of liberty. If somebody else owns the very means by which I live I am not a free man. The manager of a big concern, as the price spreads committee pointed out, is in the position of a mass buyer. He negotiates with and buys labour with somewhat of the advantage of a mass buyer, which is relatively a fortunate position for him but a very unfortunate position for the individual workingman.

To a limited extent trade unions have asserted their right to collective bargaining. On the railroads that right is recognized as it is in a few factories, but generally speaking it is not recognized across this country. Failing that we find the individual workman in a very bad position indeed. As I stated on Monday, under existing circumstances the labour man and the farmer or primary producer are exploited, the small business man is being crowded to the wall and the consumer—and we are all consumers—is being cheated, and has no effective protection. It seems to me clearly demonstrated that a great many of our big institutions are not working in the public interest.

We are told again and again that the choice is between individual enterprise on the one hand and bureaucratic monopoly on the other.

That is not a fair way of putting it. As I have said, five-sixths of the people are not carrying on under the principle of individual enterprise; only one-sixth of the workers are doing that. That is one aspect of the case. On the other hand we are not advocating a bureaucratic monopoly. We want to release the energies of the people; we want to restore them to freedom, if indeed they ever had it. We want to see that they get freedom not merely in the sphere of politics but also in economic sphere, which is an altogether different matter. Without going into the political question to any extent I feel very strongly that the old Liberal party made a big step forward when it insisted on liberty in the political sphere, but I believe if they do not now go forward to advocate this other kind of liberty their party will become a thing of the past, just as the old laissez-faire economic doctrine on which Liberalism was built is already gone at least as a workable policy. Even the Minister of Trade and Commerce admits that state interference has become more or less necessary.

Mr. MacNICOL: Take for instance the iron and steel industry, which represents approximately $100,000,000 or less in this country and employs many thousands of men; how would the hon. member operate it if taken over, if not under a bureaucracy?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said a few minutes ago it might be operated by a commission. To-day it is under the control of a private group; it is not operated by the employees but by a little bureaucracy, a bureaucracy that is absolutely irresponsible.

Mr. MacNICOL: To-day it is operated under the law of supply and demand.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I suggest that my hon. friend read the report of the price spreads commission, which clearly states that the law of supply and demand does not operate freely to-day. I do not say that supply and demand is not a factor, but monopolies, trusts, combines and international cartels have been built up; we have tariffs and quotas, exchange difficulties and all the rest, so that the old law of supply and demand under free competition has ceased to be a controlling instrument.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am anxious to get the background of the hon. gentleman's opinion. If the government took over the iron and steel industry and it were operated under a bureaucracy, how would he protect that great industry from being overstaffed, most as we all know every government department is overstaffed? Then the iron and steel industry could not compete with the world, if it were overstaffed as a bureaucracy operated by the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have said I do not want bureaucracy; I want free operation under something in the nature of a commission. There is a great deal of patronage in our big business institutions, just as there is altogether too much patronage in the government service. I am one of those who have pleaded that we get away from patronage in the government service, but personally I do not think there is any more favoritism in the management for example of the Winnipeg municipal hydro electric than there is in the Winnipeg Electric, a private concern. I doubt if there is any more favoritism on the Canadian National Railways than there is on the Canadian Pacific. During the war, when we felt it was a life and death struggle, we took over a number of industries. Organizations and agencies were taken over on a very large scale in Great Britain; if they could be managed economically and efficiently during the war there is no particular reason why they could not be so managed under our democratic system, if only we have a little higher ideal of public service. To-day we have monopoly on every hand. I think it is conceded that the old condition, individual shopkeepers and producers and bankers, is largely a thing of the past. We have monopoly or a state of things verging on monopoly in nearly all our industries and in our financial concerns, and in a great many lines of commerce. There is competition in certain respects, but the competitors get together very readily under agreements in various forms. So it is not a question of individual enterprise versus monopoly. The question is whether this inevitable monopoly will be irresponsible, as it is to-day, and inefficient, as I claim it is to-day, and as I think the evidence before the price spreads commission amply bears out. Or will this monopoly be fascist in type? There is danger of that. As time goes on and these institutions get into trouble they come to the government asking for protection, for loans, for special privileges; they are apt to come and say: It is a matter of great public concern that we should continue to prosper. The result is that big business is closely tied up with the government. We do not want fascism in this country, I do not think there is one hon. member who would deliberately say he wants fascism here on the lines they have it in Germany, but if we tie up business and government we are making an approach to that sort of thing.

There was great danger of that in connection with the new deal in the United States, and that is why some of us had to give only qualified support to the proposals of the late government; we thought their measures were moves in the right direction, but on the other hand we felt that there were certain dangers which had to be carefully guarded against. I have said that the practical alternatives before us are: Is this inevitable monopoly to be (a) irresponsible and inefficient, or (b) fascist in type, or (c) democratic? We of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation urge that it should be democratic in type, under the control of government, federal, provincial or municipal, or under the control of cooperative institutions, which are perhaps the very highest examples of democracy in industry. I need not say anything more at present about that cooperative ideal. I think it is right, it is desirable, because the consumer himself determines what he wants. I should like to see it encouraged. In Ontario last year the Liberal government passed legislation which made it fairly difficult for consumers' cooperatives to carry on. In practice those of us who have been keenly interested in free consumers' cooperative organizations have found that the forces of capitalism are so strong that they tend to crush such organizations. Furthermore the whole motive in business to-day is that of profit. Our belief is that the motive of profit must give way to the ideal of service, that the ideal behind business ought not to be primarily to make profit, as is now the case, and increasingly profit for a small group, but primarily to give service.

Mr. WILSON: You want the millennium.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Someone behind sneers, "Oh, you want the millennium." Well, I want something better than we have to-day. I am talking in a very practical way—

Mr. MacNICOL: You are not talking business.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, thank heaven; I am not talking business. Someone sneers, "You are not talking business." I get disgusted with two classes of people in this house, one of which is composed of a large number who because they have legal training are always throwing it at the rest of us who are not lawyers that we cannot understand things because we have not had that great advantage of legal training. I am willing to concede the advantage of knowledge of the law, but I do not think the lawyers in the house have a monopoly of brains. The other thing that annoys me is that certain people who have engaged in business, and have spent most of their time and energies in carrying on their own business, along their own lines—

Mr. MacNICOL: And giving men employment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —when anyone suggests any change whatever, immediately say: Oh well, you don't know anything about business.

An hon. MEMBER: Neither you do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be, from my hon. friend's standpoint. But I am putting forward a reasonable proposition, a type of organization actually in operation to some extent in many parts of the world. The stupidest kind of people are those who always look to the past and think we cannot do anything better than follow the old lines. I am not one who wants to jump at every new thing that may be advanced, but I point out that one of the great laws of life is that we must change to meet new conditions, or die. Change or die is not only one of the great laws of nature, but of business as well. Even my hon. friend from Davenport to succeed in business doubtless found he had to modify his methods from time to time. I submit that the whole basis of business in this country will have to be materially modified if we are to succeed as a nation. I think in this house at least we ought to get away from the petty shopkeeping and small workshop idea and look at things from the larger national viewpoint. Only in this way can we adequately discuss general policies. Undoubtedly a great many of these gentlemen who criticize know a great deal more about the details of business than I do, but I rather resent being told so frequently that those of us who have spent the greater part of our lives studying social and economic questions are not in a position to advance a proposal that on the face of it at least seems reasonable.

There is just one other consideration I should like to advance—I wish I could have had a chance to develop it further in the time at my disposal—and that is with reference to the international situation. I am urging this resolution not merely for the welfare of Canada. I am profoundly convinced that it is only as we get away from the competitive principle in our international affairs that we are going to gain permanent peace. In the days after this capitalist system had been set up, we found that a few people were able to accumulate a very considerable stock of goods in excess of that which they could dispose of under the circumstances in their immediate locality, and so, quite naturally, other markets were looked for. I am not blaming any individual for that; I am simply tracing the natural development of affairs. Then as production grew, a greater expansion of markets was necessary to dispose of it, and so we developed our foreign trade. At that time I have no doubt that the policy of expanding trade—free trade, in a word—was fundamentally right from the standpoint of business. The Liberals in England came into a position of great prominence at that time, and if I had been living then I would have voted Liberal, as some of my people did, because conditions then were ripe for freer trade. The development went on and on until a good many other nations got into the same position, of seeking foreign markets, and once that point was reached, friction was constantly arising. In the last fifty years there has been friction on a good many occasions between European nations as each sought new markets in countries less developed. The continent of Africa was gradually carved up amongst the nations of Europe until to-day it resembles a patchwork quilt.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I must thank you, Mr. Speaker, for reminding me. At some future time I should like to develop further this external side of the matter. I will close by reasserting our position. I do not believe that we can have permanent peace in the world until we arrive at some other method of doing business than by international competition, which, after all, is simply an extension of the competitive principle on which for a good many years we have been operating within our own country.

Motion negatived on division.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

HOUSE OF COMMONS—CLERK OF SESSIONAL PAPERS

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa East):

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents, relative to the recent appointment by the civil service commission of the clerk of sessional papers of the House of Commons.

SMALL PROPERTY HOLDERS

PROPOSED STUDY OF THEIR FINANCIAL SITUATION LOOKING TO EQUITABLE TREATMENT

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) (Translation) moved:

Whereas small property holders in the cities are in a most critical financial situation;

And whereas during the past five years the depression has borne more heavily on this class of citizens than on any other by reason of the unemployed who are dependent on public bodies;

And whereas they contribute substantial sums to the public treasury in the form of taxation;

And whereas the agricultural class is now benefiting by government measures;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the problem of these small property holders should be the subject of study in order to determine whether it is not opportune and equitable that they should receive the full consideration to which they are entitled.

Mr. Speaker, the problem dealth with in this resolution is not a new one, although it has acquired with time a far greater degree of acutence. I deemed it proper last year to insert in the Order paper of the house a similar resolution to the one now under consideration, with the intention of placing before the government of the day the sad financial plight of small property holders in villages, cities and, more particularly, in Montreal, and with the object also of making practical and useful suggestions to meet the difficulties created by the crisis. The correspondence which reached me at the time, together with that which I am now receiving, with reference to this resolution, have impressed me with the fact that the evil is greater and more general than I first thought.

Last year, a delegation composed of government followers, judging that the question involved was an important one, travelled from Montreal to Ottawa in order to interview the hon. Mr. Duranleau, then Minister of Marine. The latter replied to the delegation that he highly appreciated the step they had taken and that it was quite possible, even most probable, that before the end of the session the government would introduce a bill in order to come to the rescue of small property holders, the only class in the community which the government had forgotten.

This was as early as February 14; just after the Prime Minister had stated that the elections would come as a thief in the night and that government measures should be proceeded with as quickly as possible. The opposition, knowing the people's strong desire to be consulted at the polls with the shortest delay possible, did not object too strongly to the government's proposal to discontinue at this stage of the session, the study of private legislation so as to give precedence to government measures.

What happened? Well, we found out later. The government totally and deliberately disregarded the plea of small property holders and left them to their plight. However, members who sat in the last house will recall that instead of quickly despatching state affairs, senators and members were sent home for five weeks, that the house did not sit one single Wednesday evening during last session, that every holiday was observed, that the house adjourned in the middle of the week to allow the people's representatives to attend a cinema performance! And while the government was conducting the affairs of this country at a cost of $7,000 per half-day, celebrating and taking holidays, a large proportion of the population was on relief, famished treckers were wearing out their soles tramping from ocean to ocean, small property holders, having known but sacrifices without any compensation whatsoever from the government, were being, one after the other, despoiled of their property.

In 1932, for motives which I am not called upon to discuss at present, small property holders in the province of Quebec were deprived of all compensation in connection with the rents due by the unemployed, while in all other parts of the country it was just the reverse. Twelve months were required to ascertain whether the term "shelter" contained in the act included lodging for the unemployed; in short, it meant heavy losses for these small property holders who were compelled to meet their fixed charges. Though their rights were recognized later on, no payment was made of the amounts due to them for services rendered in 1932 to the publicly-assisted unemployed.

Most of these property holders had acquired their houses with savings that represented a lifetime of toil and self-sacrifice during a period when the cost of labour and of materials set the prices. The purchasing price at that time represented the true value of the properties; they could not have been acquired for less. They had not been paid double their value as in the case of farmers who during the war bought at inflated prices, land that has since dropped to its normal value. It was not lack of foresight on their part. That is an important point.

In the case of farmers, the crisis exerts its effects which are reflected in a decrease of prices on farm products, as compared with war-time prices and that is all.

In the case of small property owners, however, it is otherwise: they did not buy at inflated prices, and, ever since the height of depression, their property has from a revenue viewpoint, lost fifty per cent of its true value.

They have provided a shelter—and continue to do so—for poor unemployed people who are dependent on the state. Notwithstanding the fifty per cent decrease in value of their property, the municipal valuation has not been reduced; taxes of all kinds pile up on them. Municipal taxes have gone up; water, business and snow-removal taxes have doubled; and there are in addition special taxes, super-taxes, dominion and municipal sales taxes, etc.

[M. Deslauriers.]

Many of them have lost their positions and find themselves in the ridiculous situation of having to seek relief—which is denied them because they are property holders—while being compelled to give charity to people dependent on governments.

Every week, these small property holders are, one after another, despoiled by loan companies. If I am rightly informed, one company alone, known as the "Industrial" has, for its share, despoiled 3,000 of them. I know for a fact that rackets exist in Montreal accumulating wealth by preying on these small property holders, they were established by New York and Chicago racketeers. I could right now name one or two of these organizations; I shall give in a few minutes the result of their operations in a case which was brought to my attention. For instance, there is the Continental Guaranty Corporation and the Industrial Loan Investment, companies that advertise by means of the radio. I think, sir, it would be most appropriate for the government to appoint a commission of inquiry to look into their operations.

The government has in the past come to the assistance of the farmers.

I find no fault in this connection, I might even state that this class of the community has perhaps not received all the solicitude and consideration due to it. If, on the one hand we must admit that farmers deserve consideration, on the other hand, the class of citizens known as small property holders in cities are just as deserving of the government's sympathy. We should not remain unrelentingly indifferent towards the latter, but rather, recognizing the fact that they are taxpayers like all other citizens of Canada we should render them all possible assistance and prevent loan companies, such as those I have just mentioned, from exploiting them.

The Liberal party's policy will contribute, no doubt, to restore equality between all classes, providing the provinces and the dominion cooperate and providing certain provincial and federal laws are amended or repealed. For instance, drastic conditions in contracts, such as defesance clauses, should be prohibited; the term "responsible by mortgage" should be sufficient, if more study and consideration were given to transactions.

Australia, Belgium and the United States have passed excellent laws in connection with their small property holders. A glance at their legislation might perhaps help the government to legislate in the same sense.

I believe that measures could be enacted, especially in times of crises, so as to come to the rescue of small property holders certain terms included in contracts, such as "personally responsible" should disappear. In times such as these, when credit is lacking, city and country people have been victimized by this term "personally responsible," which has despoiled them of their furniture for the sake of a few hundred dollars which they borrowed and could not repay.

The government is in duty bound to study the possibility of long term loans at three or four per cent interest and of extending to small property holders in cities the privileges granted to the farming community. We have but to consult the history of France, at the period when the credit foncier was established in that country, to understand the eminently patriotic role that this group of French citizens played at a time when the peasant class was threatened with ruin. We could draw very profitable conclusions to the advantage of the small property holders and even of the farming classes, from the study of that page of history.

By mutual agreement with the provinces, it would be proper to establish a five year obligatory moratorium and, finally, to facilitate long term loans, at three per cent in order that these small property holders might borrow the necessary money to pay off arrears of interest and taxes.

I stated a moment ago that I believed that the co-operation of the provinces was absolutely necessary. I am quite certain that the hon. Minister of Labour and Public Works of my province could amend the labour legislation of Quebec and liberalize it in such a way as to provide employment for the man who, because he has reached forty-five years of age or more, finds it impossible to obtain work, and to legalize the stipulations of the contract in order that these workers may have a chance to earn a livelihood and not be looked upon as prematurely old at forty-five.

I stated, sir, a few moments ago, that rackets existed in the city of Montreal to the detriment of these poor workers who have spent all their hard-earned savings. I have before me correspondence referring to the Continental Guaranty Corporation. I shall read it, as I have been given permission to submit it to the house and make use of it as I thought fit:

Dear Sir,—

Enclosed you will find a few documents relating to our conversation of Sunday last. You may, without fear, make use of them as evidenced in support of your resolution.

They refer to the case of a property holder who contracted a loan of a few hundred dollars and finally lost his property.

The following is a statement of account:

Re: S.C. No. B-133320 ...

Lawyers will understand what that means.

... Continental Guaranty Corporation of Canada, Limited vs Romeo Garneau & T. Brossard.

Judgment on September 8, 1934, for the sum of	$ 204 51
With annual interest at 12 per cent from February 12, 1934, to May 8, 1935	30 70
Judgment and subsequent costs including registration of judgment, sale fees, etc., approximately	175 00
Sheriff's costs, including sale and 2½ per cent on sale price, approximately	280 00
Municipal taxes owing to Ville St. Pierre, for the years beginning June 1, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935, including interest, approximately	1,250 00
Repairs, including material only, paint, plumbing, etc., approximately	75 00
Total	$2,015 21

That is the method followed by these racketeers; they have substituted themselves to the city of Montreal or to some other municipality in order that their claims may become privileged and take precedence over the first mortgage. Moreover, their rate of interest is such as to make it impossible for small property holders to meet the liabilities they have contracted towards them. Then comes the sheriff's sale. Since the mortgagee, owing to hard times, cannot borrow the money required, the sheriff sells the property. Now, the Continental Guaranty Corporation has established a subsidiary company called the Yarbrooke Co., which purchases the property from the sheriff, and the same day sends the following notice to the owner of the property in question:

Mr. Roméo Garneau,
Montreal.

Re: Properties in Ville St. Pierre

Dear Sir,—

As agreed orally, we shall accept in final settlement of account, principal interests and costs, the sum of $2,000 cash, providing payment is made by May 16, next.

Thus, $2,000 is demanded of this person who does not own $100!

We shall transfer to you the two properties purchased from the sheriff, one situated on 5th avenue, and the other on Camille street, Ville St. Pierre, free and clear of all charges and mortgages.

After that date, the offer becomes nul and void.

Yours truly,

Handfield & Handfield.

The latter are the lawyers for the Yarbrooke company.

I had no intention, sir, of causing any financial embarrassment to the government in submitting this question. My object was to expose the true situation of a class of people which are all the more entitled to consideration at the hands of the public authorities, because for human and charitable reasons, they have taken the risk of losing their properties. Because they have rendered a service to the unemployed who were dependent on government relief, I think it is unreasonable to deny them consideration.

I trust that the facts to which I have directed the government's attention will be seriously considered, that this class of the community, perhaps the most useful to our country from a social and economic angle, will be protected, and that the government, in any arrangement it may make in co-operation with the provinces will see that the small property holders are placed on a level with all the other citizens who make up the Canadian community.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. gentleman (Mr. Deslauriers), who represents one of the industrial ridings in Montreal, upon having the courage to bring this industrial question to the attention of the house at this time. As I too, represent an industrial riding, I feel I should say a few words in connection with this resolution. On three occasions last session I directed the attention of the house to the untold suffering and misery of the industrial worker of this country. He is suffering such privations as I have never seen before. Industrial workers in part of my own riding, in that of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) and in other parts of Toronto are suffering because of economic conditions over which they have no control. The industrial worker is just becoming a proletarian and the time has come when protection should be given to him all along the line and to all the people of Canada and not only to some. During the campaign I remember seeing throughout Ontario liberal billboards announcing that if the people voted for so-and-so unemployment would be ended; that if they voted for so-and-so work would be provided for the worker. Attempts have been made by the creation of commissions to end unemployment, but the poor industrial worker still suffers.

Forty-seven per cent of the Canadian people are engaged in industry. Six or seven years ago parliament, not satisfied with incorporating bona fide loan companies and banks, permitted the incorporation of a number of shark loan companies. These companies are flourishing in almost every riding in the city of Toronto. As the former member for Battle River, Mr. Spencer, told the house last year, these shark loan companies are charging as much in some cases as thirty-five and forty per cent on second mortgages. Quite rightly parliament has given some assistance to the farmers in the prairie and other provinces and to fishermen under the farm loan board, but similar assistance should be given to the industrial workers. The western farmer ate the sour grapes of free trade for twenty-five or thirty years while the grain exchanges, the middleman, transportation and elevator companies were robbing him of a fair price for his crop. Then the depression came along and he found himself suffering untold privation. I am sorry for him; I helped plead his cause, but I must also plead the cause of the industrial worker, as I said three times in the house in 1935, and asked for equality of treatment for the industrial worker also.

In the days of Laurier and Macdonald practically every man was a property owner. A man might own only a small store, a little mill or a shack, a cow or something else, but he was a property owner. He had a little garden on the back of his lot and while he might be working only three or four days in the week, he was as much a property owner as was the man who had large holdings. He was a citizen of the country and he had his property rights. Now it is gone. Those rights have been taken away, and one of the principal duties facing parliament at the present time is to pass some measure that will help in some way to solve the problem of unemployment and distributivism in Canada.

The government has so far brought forward no definite plan looking to that end; neither in the speech from the throne nor in any proposal that has so far been suggested do we find anything in that direction. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) read a speech yesterday in regard to the relief camps, which was out of order; according to the rules of the house he should not have made the speech he did except on the orders of the day. But the rules apparently are for some and not for others and they are badly in need of overhauling. At any rate, so far the government has brought down no definite plan to solve unemployment.

At the opening of parliament I handed a question to the clerk of the house but it never appeared on the order paper. I wanted to know what plans the government had this spring for providing useful employment for the great body of the unemployed, but that question, as I say, never found its way to the order paper. This was not through any fault of the clerk's, for he is a most able, capable and zealous and painstaking and popular officer. But why was not that question placed on the order paper? I know of no rule of the house that prevents a member of parliament from placing a proper question on the order paper. What does the government think private members are here for? Are we to sit here and listen to ministers introducing academic measures for dealing with the unemployment problem, leaving industrial workers in the meanwhile to starve or to go to the poorhouse or to be placed on relief?

In the district represented partly by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) and Greenwood (Mr. Massey) and also embracing the part of Toronto represented by myself, there are 300 industries, large and small, in which Canadian workers, and their fathers and grandfathers before them, have been employed and some have lived during all that time on the same property. Sixty-five per cent of the people in that area at one time owned their own homes, but hon. members would be surprised to know how many of them have lost everything. Mortgage companies can afford to put up skyscrapers, but when they come to deal with the industrial worker who is in straitened circumstances there is no hesitancy about sending him a lawyer's letter and foreclosing; and if he tries to get some assistance from one of the shark loan companies incorporated by parliament he finds himself faced with a demand for interest rates of 25, 30 and 40 per cent. If he is unable to meet his liabilities he loses everything—his piano, bed, chairs and every other article of furniture, all under chattel mortgage at 10, 12, 15 and 20 per cent.

What is going to become of the industrial worker? Where is he going to end up? Unless the two old parties open their minds to new ideas and their ranks to men with new ideas, then I say that by 1940 or 1945 we shall have a socialist government in this country. I say that advisedly; I said it in the last parliament and I say it again. The two old parties in the house must wake up to the realities of the present day problems just as the parties in England have done. Consider what the National government accomplished over there. They provided a measure of protection for the working population and built homes for them, balanced their budget and adopted a tariff that brought jobs and a housing policy.

With regard to the principle of the resolution, parliament has established a system of protection for the farmers under the farm loan act. If a farmer gets into difficulties there is a farm loan board to which he can turn and have some arrangement made with his creditors along new and more satisfactory lines. An effort is made to obviate foreclosure. That is quite proper; it affords a long overdue measure of protection for the farmer.

At the last session the plight of the fishermen was under consideration. Our fisheries constitute one of the greatest industries in Canada, but the fishermen have had a very hard time of it. The Bennett government of that day, 1935, introduced legislation for the relief of the fishermen, and when the bill was before the house I took occasion to plead the cause of the industrial worker. I supported the bill, because there was a farm loan board to which the farmers could appeal and I thought it only fair that the fishermen and industrial workers should also be given some consideration. I should like to read some of the remarks I made at that time:

> The time is not far distant in this country when we shall have to set up for the industrial workers a board similar to those set up under this fishermen's loan act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act so that the retail storekeeper, the individual worker, and those engaged in industries will have some means of protection. A retail grocer who fails and whose little shop is gone or an industrial worker who gets out of work or is only on part time should be dealt with in the same manner as the poor fisherman or farmer; he should be able to secure similar protection. There is no reason why forty-six per cent of the people who are engaged in industry should not have the same form of protection as is given under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the fishermen's loan act and so on. There should be created for these people a similar board to establish long term mortgage credits even up to twenty-five years for the small retail grocer or the small industrial worker who is out of work or may be on part time as many of them are. Sooner or later we shall have to extend this very wise and commendable feature of this legislation. I would like to see some kind of board set up for the industries to which I have referred and some credit established either through banks, insurance companies, loan companies, mortgage companies or through parliament or partly through one and partly the other, for the protection and relief of the small industrial worker and the small storekeeper on the same basis as these other acts I have mentioned. We should have protection not only for the fishermen and for the farmers but for everyone; we want a system of protection that will take care of all the people. Those small industrial people who have lost their all by foreclosure or unemployment or high taxes are in the same plight as are the fishermen and the farmers, and the principle of this bill should be extended to them.

Speaking for an industrial province, I say that the industrial workers of this country are no longer going to stand for handing out protection to some and not to others. Under the provisions of this bill we are paying through the new fisheries board, taxes, mortgages, lien notes, security to the bank, hypothecation of the plant and equipment of the fishermen. The same principle of protection should be extended either through parliament or the banks or a board similar to the farm loan board to the industrial workers so that they will have a fair show under protection as we have it to-day to hold and retain their properties and their equities and their small business ventures.

The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Deslauriers) is a physician and on that account he knows, better than most members do, what the industrial worker's condition is; no one knows more than the physician does what the worker suffers. I suggest, therefore, that he might urge upon the government the consideration of what has been done in England and the United States in the interests of the working classes. Steps have been taken in those countries to save the workers from foreclosure. Along the lake shore in the riding of York West there will be no vacant houses on the first of May. I plead with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), because I think something should be done in regard to this matter. No one wants to pay additional taxes, but it would not cost very much to bring in a measure of relief for our industrial workers, as the government can borrow at a low rate of interest to prevent foreclosures on industrial workers, the same as for farmers and fishermen.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution is a government member, and it is the duty of the government as long as they are the government of the day to solve these unemployment problems. At the last election appeals were made throughout Canada to the industrial worker to vote for the Liberal party. In my riding bill-boards contained advertisements: "Vote for Snelgrove and end unemployment"; "Beat Bennett and bad times"; "Beat Unemployment: Vote Liberal"; and all that kind of thing. As I said, "End unemployment; vote for so-and-so" appeared throughout Ontario. Where does the Liberal party stand in the house with relation to this problem of the industrial worker?

I was referring before six o'clock to the two old political parties in this country: they have to open their ranks to new men and their minds to new ideas, as the people of the old country have done. The old country has done something for the industrial worker. We in Ontario and in fact throughout Canada are in this respect almost as backward as the inhabitants of England were at the time of the industrial revolution one hundred years ago. If hon. members read Green's History of England, to which I was referring in a debate on this problem on January 30 of last year, and examine the condition of the industrial workers in England at that time, they will be interested to find that the Liberal party of the day were opposed to reform. As I said in this honourable house on March 21 of last year during the debate on unemployment, when I was urging the party to which I belonged to take up the problem of the industrial worker—and I again mentioned the matter in the debate on the farm loan board and the fisheries board:

> The Liberal party of this country to-day represents the last stand of economic liberalism in Canada. It relies on these social measures being declared unconstitutional. It is the party that for nine years had a chance to do something along these lines, but only dilly-dallied. It is the same party which in England opposed the factory acts and free schools, and the liberation of the trade unions. To-day it concentrates its attention in Canada on the tariff and on wider markets when wider markets are not available. The Liberal party in Canada is an advocate of social reform, pensions, doles, social insurance—all these are in its platform for the higher life, but they refuse to give to this house a plan or platform to grapple with the cause and effects of the social revolution and with those economic factors which deprive men of the bread of their own production and the fruits of their own toil. I believe that free trade and the error of the Liberal party's policies have been to the detriment of agriculture and of industry in Canada. Many children are in factories to-day who should be in school, and most of the young offenders who come before our courts are underprivileged children many of them from poverty stricken homes, who from birth have never had a proper chance.

The Conservative party was the founder of protection in Canada, and it believed in preserving the home market. Its policy was: Our own markets for our own products, and our own work for our own workmen. Would that we had that policy to-day in this country; the industrial worker would then not be suffering as he is. We are apt to forget the home market in considering the agricultural and industrial problems of this country. My plea is on behalf of the industrial worker.

This resolution goes on to criticize agriculture. I do not approve of that at all. It says:

Whereas the agricultural class is now benefiting by government measures—

So it should. But I plead for protection for all of the people all the time, not some of the people some of the time, not only for the agricultural worker and the fisherman but all along the line, protection for them in their markets, for the primary producer and the consumer as well, but also for the industrial worker in the main centres of population. The resolution correctly refers to the fact that we have had five years of depression and to the suffering which has been caused to small property holders in the cities, and these small property holders are suffering. It goes on to ask that:

—the problem of these small property holders should be the subject of study in order to determine whether it is not opportune and equitable that they should receive the full consideration to which they are entitled.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, that they are entitled to the same protection that agriculture and fishermen have. Forty-seven per cent of the population is engaged in industrial pursuits, and these people are suffering untold privations, misery, and conditions of hardship. We should have lower bank rates in this country? The federal power can borrow money at one per cent if it wants to. They are doing this in the United States, in England, all the world over. Yet banks start with seven per cent and charge not only that rate but—well, we do not know what the charges beyond that are in some cases. Then we find mortgage companies demanding seven and eight per cent in addition to the charges for foreclosure after people have lost their homes. We find shark loan companies that put on a chattel mortgage as well as high class first and second mortgages. Industrial workers who are out of work are losing their homes very rapidly. Some of these men are returned soldiers. I know dozens of them in my own riding who have lost their properties, and some of these men are at Christie Street hospital serving out a life sentence passed upon them by this country, for which they fought at the hazard of their lives. They have to spend the rest of their days under a life sentence for defending Canada, on the top floor of Christie Street hospital while we sit here in parliament, two hundred and forty-five men, doing nothing.

My hon. friend the member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) the other day asked a minister —we have discussed so many departments that I have forgotten which one it was, but I think it was the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar)—about the Ottawa observatory; they had an earthquake, and the hon. member for Parkdale inquired: Were there any people hanging around this department in the observatory doing nothing? Well, there are two hundred and forty-five members of parliament hanging around here and what are they doing to end these conditions? We have heard much in Ontario in the past about "follow your leader." I can only say that if the two old parties are going to be content with that kind of program the day is coming for the same sort of earthquake reckoning that obtained years ago in the old country with regard to their two old parties. We must open our ranks to new men and our minds to new ideas.

Regarding these industrial workers who are losing their homes, let us consider the effect of modern machinery on the employment of these men. Every new process seems to put men out of work. Our artisans are becoming machine minders, and women can mind machines as well as can men, with the result that this is becoming a country of machine minders. Thus there is a rise in female employment and a disastrous fall in the number of men at work. It is apparent to anyone that the very object of machines is to put men out of work. That is the reason they are invented and installed and they succeed in their purpose admirably. Where is liberty while all this is going on. Our greatest care as a people should be the welfare of man and that of our workers' children.

As I have stated, I know that many men who have owned homes and have had them taken from them are returned soldiers. Some are on part time; some are off the pay roll altogether. As Theodore Roosevelt said, "A man who is good enough to shed his blood for his country is good enough to receive a square deal afterwards." More than that no man is entitled to. Less than that no man shall have. And yet we find these men, these industrial workers, have lost their homes; some are soldiers, and a few are on the top floor of Christie Street hospital, and nobody is to blame but the parliament of Canada. I am not blaming the present government; all governments since the war must face responsibility for that condition of the industrial workers of this kind, but the late government decided to help industrial workers. And we make speeches in the house about foreign affairs; we, who have no fleet and practically no army left except the girl guides and the boy scouts, can waste months and months on such matters as that. If hon. members want to get a bird's-eye view of Canada's navy they should go down and look at the boat in the canal in front of the Chateau Laurier; it has steam up now and a few planks on the deck.

A few years ago the government created a basic industry known as the "ambassador" cure for unemployment; they were sending ambassadors all over the seven seas. That is about the extent of their contribution to this question, except that my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who aspires to create an economic commission. Let me tell him on behalf of the industrial workers of Ontario that ten years ago I asked the government of which he is a member if they would appoint an economic commission to study unemployment. The reply they then made was that this was not a matter for the federal government. The then Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) tried to have my question ruled out of order, although it was the very same question that was asked in the British House of Commons the other day by the leader of the Labour party in the old country, and the British government this spring is providing work for a great body of unemployed. That question, through no fault of the able, learned and popular clerk of the house, was not placed on the order paper. I agree with some of the members who have been criticizing the rules, that the rules are certainly not what they should be.

But I will say this on behalf of the industrial worker. In the campaign which preceded the by-election in the riding of East Toronto in 1934 many leading Liberals took part. Among others my good friend the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), Mr. Ralston and even the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar) all came to my riding to tell the industrial workers what the Liberal party would do to end unemployment. I can say to the government that the industrial workers of this country are no longer going to stand idly by and see their property, that was owned by their fathers and their grandfathers, taken away from them through no fault of their own by the insurance and mortgage companies. These insurance companies have squandered millions of dollars of trust money all over the world in useless common stock. If the new members of the house want to find out what these companies are doing let them read the six hundred page report of the superintendent of insurance. There they will find that these companies have invested millions of dollars in stocks that to-day are practically without value. They have lost hundreds of millions of dollars in south sea bubbles throughout the world, but they have not a dollar to loan at low interest rates to the industrial workers of Canada.

What has been done in other countries? In the United States the New York Life loaned $25,000,000 to help pull the Roosevelt government out of the mire. That company did not depend upon the government to do everything, but they would not do that in Canada. In the United States they are loaning $25,000,000 on Gravesend beach in Brooklyn, creating employment for carpenters, bricklayers and other workmen of Manhattan island; the railways are cooperating by providing steam suburban service to take the workers to the country. That is not however being done in Canada. I do not ask the government to do everything; all I ask is fair play and equality of treatment for the industrial workers of Canada. Very few of the new members of the house have seen fit to plead the cause of the industrial workers, who are oppressed by intolerable conditions. In the United States and England the governments are taking steps to get these people out of the slums into the country, where they can build homes and own a few acres of land.

I am not here to criticize the government unduly; I am ready to support any plan it may bring forward to remedy these conditions, because after all is said and done I realize that these hon. gentlemen have been placed on the treasury benches by the people of this country and they are a government of Canadians, but they should see the handwriting on the wall. Parliament has been in session now for almost four weeks but we have done nothing to give relief to the unemployed. On my right we have the overflow from the opposite side, and I venture to say that any fifteen of these hon. gentlemen I might pick out could create for the government a policy in this regard, but instead we waste time talking about foreign affairs while domestic politics are forgotten. Constructive statesmanship is lacking; people have lost their faith and confidence in the government because no plans have been brought forward to improve the present situation. The industrial workers were greatly disappointed the other day to read the statement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who rose in his place and read a long treatise on relief camps to be closed after the fashion of a college professor. The government intend to close the relief camps. What are they going to do with the industrial workers now in those camps? Will they drive them into the gaol as vagrants?

Let me remind the government that many of the young men in these camps are high school and university graduates. The fathers of many of them are on relief; some of them had good jobs with industrial concerns, but it is a long time since they have had any work to do. There may be three or four sons in the family; the eldest says, "I cannot loaf and sponge any longer," so he takes to the road and probably rides the rods out to the coast. We have two railways that can hand out hundreds of thousands of passes every week, but when these poor young fellows are caught riding the rods they are locked up in the gaols throughout the country though their only crime is that they have not been able to get jobs. I have never failed to show ordinary Christian charity towards hon. gentlemen opposite; under our parliamentary system they are now the government of the day, and the responsibility is upon them to solve the great economic problems facing this country.

I thoroughly agree with the principle contained in this resolution. All I want to see in Canada is equality of treatment for the industrial workers who have had to do without protection for five years and who have lost their property. The other fifty per cent of the population, the farmers and fishermen, have had protection, and I was glad to see them get it. I think the late government should be congratulated upon having had the courage to give these people, through subsidies, subventions, bonuses, stabilization funds and so on, the relief to which they are entitled. I only ask the government to take up this question and make a study of it, as the mover of the resolution (Mr. Deslauriers) has proposed. I believe if they do that they will do something which in years to come will be remembered to the credit of the Liberal party and of twentieth century Liberalism in this country.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I consider that the house owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) for having so clearly and forcibly described the plight of the small property holders. The hon. member, in so eloquently submitting this resolution to our consideration, had no other thought in mind than the unfortunate situation of these small property holders, particularly those of his electoral division. It is therefore only right that some of us should rise to congratulate him.

In my humble opinion, this question which relates to mortgage debts and municipal taxes, comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial rather than of the central authority. However, I trust that, as a result of this debate, the provincial legislature will take up this question and enact the needed legislation.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I think the house owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) for having brought to the attention of this assembly what he has called the plight of the small proprietors. No doubt, as I have just said in French, when he spoke so eloquently and well he had in mind particularly the electors of his division of St. Mary, but this problem touches everyone in every county, and relates not only to the small proprietors but also to the large proprietors, because all have been affected. In my humble opinion, since this question is so closely connected with taxes and mortgages, it should come before the provincial legislatures, and I hope that as a result of this debate our wise provincial legislators will see to it that something is done to help these poor small proprietors. My experience in municipal problems and administration has extended over twenty-five years and it has been my privilege to come into contact almost daily with proprietors of all classes, especially the small proprietors.

I believe these proprietors can be divided into two categories, one being the man and woman who have invested all their life savings in a small home, and the other the small owner who has bought a house larger than his own needs and rents the rest of it in order to obtain a small revenue. When the depression came this class was hit hard. In the first place many of these owners lost their jobs or positions, and those who had tenants saw their tenants lose their jobs or positions, so that there was no more revenue either from wages or rents. These poor people had to go to the banks or the notaries and borrow money, and many had to sell everything they had including their life insurance policies and afterwards go on relief. When relief began nothing was done for these small proprietors. Those who were distributing relief had the idea that before anyone could be given relief he had to dispose of everything he owned. So these men found themselves penniless and forced into the army, already too large, of paupers or seekers of relief.

In Quebec the provincial government wisely passed a moratorium act by means of which proprietors in hard circumstances could go to a judge of the superior court and so long as taxes and interest were paid they could secure an extension of the mortgage. Consequently this problem became largely one of taxes. So the provincial authorities passed another law compelling the sale of all properties on which taxes were more than two years in arrears. At first sight that looks like a hardship, but it is not, because the same law carries the provision that these proprietors have the right to go before a judge of the superior court and, upon showing their position, if they are unable to pay they get permission to fund the taxes and pay them over a period of five years. Although the Quebec government consists principally of lawyers, and so much has been said about the legal profession to-day, the provincial government saw to it that the lawyers who prepared the papers to secure these extensions were not allowed to charge a fee higher than five dollars. Let me say this for the legal profession; I know of many cases where lawyers prepared these cases and went before the courts on behalf of poor people without charging any fees at all.

Another curse we have in our province is the money lenders. They advertise in the papers and over the radio and many people are caught, thinking they can get out of their difficulties by obtaining an easy loan. The procedure is something like this: The would-be borrower comes to see the lender and explains his position. The first thing the lender does is to ascertain from the corporation of the municipality in which the property is situated what is due on it for taxes, and then he arranges with the borrower as to the amount to be lent. The loan is made and the tax receipts are registered for preference over mortgages, so that at the end of the term if the loan is not repaid the lender has a chance to get the property for almost nothing. Further, I understand that a borrower from these loan companies on being granted a loan of say $100 is first charged a fee of $10 for searches and other matters; then he has to pay, I am told, seven per cent on the whole $100, so that for a loan of nominally $100 all he gets is $83, and if I calculate aright the interest works out at something over twenty per cent per annum. If that is not usury I would like to know what it is. No wonder the hon. member for St. Mary has brought this question before the house; it surprises me that it has not been before the house or the provincial legislature before.

How can this be cured? I am not able to give a complete answer. But if the dominion government were to go into the matter something could probably be done along the lines of the farm loan board. I have every sympathy for the small proprietor, in fact every proprietor, but the small proprietor is looked upon as the back-bone of the nation. I wish there might be a more extensive distribution of landed property, because the man who owns some real estate feels he has a stake in the community and is watchful to see that no undue extravagance takes place. However I believe this problem is more one for the provinces. I feel fairly sure that the mover of the resolution had no intention to embarrass the government, and although I am heartily in favour of the motion still I think the matter should go to the provincial legislature.

I have noticed that when speaking to a motion members are allowed to speak of other matters, so seeing that this is the first time I have spoken in the house I crave indulgence for a minute because I want to thank whoever made the seating arrangements for placing me where I am. Thanks to the seat I occupy in this chamber, I have the pleasure not only of seeing the government in front of me but of having on my right a member from Manitoba, in front of me a member from Nova Scotia, and on his right a member from Ontario. This is very interesting from the point of view of the exchange of ideas. Moreover, I have on my left the pleasure of being close to the representatives of the Conservative party, a situation which is very interesting indeed; I find that there is not such a very great difference between us. Also I say in all sincerity that I believe this is the most interesting side of the house because it comprises men of all hues: radical Liberals, orthodox Liberals, Conservatives, Cooperative Commonwealth Federationists, Reconstructionists, and Social Crediters. And on top of all that there is one more reason why this is the most interesting side, that is because it contains the entire feminine representation of the country.

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I am very much embarrassed by my hon. friend speaking of me in such glowing terms. That is all.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first duty is to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) on the eloquent and convincing manner in which he has introduced his resolution; and as he has used the French language, I shall, both as a courtesy to him and in order to maintain the usages of the house which provide for the conducting of the debate in either of the two official languages, reply to him in the French language.

I also wish to congratulate my good friend, the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Mallette), who, in his first speech, was able to interest the house. He deserved all the applause he received, showed that we have made in him a precious acquisition and that he will be a powerful support to us in the future debates of this house.

As to the resolution itself, I may say that the government looks upon it with much sympathy and is disposed to accept it, since it is a resolution calling for a study of the problem. The grounds it states are in themselves a conclusive argument. All are aware that the financial situation of the small property owners in cities is most critical, and more especially those who represent city divisions—like the hon. member for St. Mary and myself—are well acquainted with the extremely critical situation of a large number of the small property holders. I also agree with the sponsor of this resolution that, for the last five years, this class of citizens have felt the crisis if not more at least as much as any other class of the community. It is therefore but natural that our attention should be drawn to the lot of this particular class, with whom I greatly sympathize. But I may be pardoned if I state that the question is primarily a municipal one. The small property holders, in fact property owners in general, are the chief ratepayers of our cities. A large proportion of city revenues are drawn from their properties, and in so far as we may seek to consider property owners as a distinct class, we have to do so first from a municipal viewpoint. It is equally from a municipal point of view that they are interested in the various enterprises of our cities, in police and fire protection as well as in all other municipal services.

Secondly, the responsibility of property holders, from the viewpoint of civil rights is a provincial matter, and I think that those who are interested in the welfare of property owners should first apply to the legislatures of the various provinces. In fact, the sponsor of the resolution as well as those who followed him, have indicated in their remarks that they relied on provincial legislatures to remedy part of the ills which they have pointed out. Mention was made, for instance, of the moratorium granted in connection with mortgage debts. It is, therefore, proper to settle in the course of this debate that, if the dominion government—and, I am sure, parliament as well—is disposed to embrace the cause of small property holders, one must not expect it to invade a domain outside of its prorogative and where it cannot produce effective action.

We have had proof of this in the course of last session. There are excellent measures which may be discussed and adopted, but unless there is certainty that they come under the jurisdiction of the dominion government, it would be most unwise to legislate, as we would be exposing ourselves to the possibility of having to duplicate the proceedings already taken and which consist in submitting to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of the dominion government's jurisdiction.

In our own sphere, sir, I think that the dominion government and parliament deal especially with the larger classes of society, such as the farming, labouring and business classes. The federal government has large departments that look after agriculture, commerce and labour, and I desire to point out that it is from the general point of view that it is possible for us to act. I wish to point out to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr Deslauriers) that the fact of being a property holder is not in itself a federal qualification.

A labourer may also be a property holder, a business man may equally be a property holder; and although we legislate as regards the labouring classes, the business men and farmers, it is the provincial legislatures or the municipalities that deal with property owners as such.

Times are hard and all governments must work together, but the desire to cooperate must necessarily stop at certain limits. With reference to the unemployment problem, it is quite possible for the dominion government —and this would indirectly help property holders—to increase, as was done recently, federal subsidies to the provinces and municipalities and permitting the application of the subsidies to rentals and other charges which indirectly interest property holders. In the levying of taxes as well, the Minister of Finance may make allowances for small holdings, by increasing their exemptions while calling upon the wealthier citizens to contribute more to the revenues of the state.

Likewise and in the same spirit, parliament, last year, studied the question of housing. I was a member of the housing committee and I wish to state that in the course of the few weeks we devoted to the question, no political consideration ever cropped up; quite the contrary all the members of the committee were inspired by purely social motives. We particularly stressed the fact that, if the federal government helped in the construction of homes, it should not forget the present property holders. In the desire to supply our cities with better homes for their population, we must not lose sight of the fact that there are in those cities property holders who should not be ruined by the state's competition. The legislation at present embodied in our statutes authorizes the lending of large sums for the construction of wholesome homes in our cities. I again wish to emphasize the fact and I could quote many authorities on the subject, that, however excellent the principle of the measure, we must always bear in mind that the state must not compete against private property holders, however laudable may be the object. This was a reserve we made when this measure was enacted last year, and that is also a feature that this government intends to respect in the interpretation and application of the act.

I have before me a resolution from a committee dealing with municipal affairs of the city of Montreal, dated June 5, 1935, in which it is precisely requested that the government should not be too hasty in applying this housing act, because, it is pointed out, the government or the state must not compete against small property holders in such a sphere. It is, therefore obvious that, while the question is first a municipal and provincial one, it may from a certain standpoint become a federal one; that is why I congratulate the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) for having submitted this resolution to the house. I am aware that this is a very serious problem in our large cities, and had I simply been the member for St. James, I would nevertheless have risen to support the resolution of my hon. friend for St. Mary. I am pleased to inform him, on behalf of the government—while bearing in mind the reservation I have just mentioned—that as his resolution calls only for a study of the problem of small property holders, the government has no objection, in so far as it is concerned, to accept this motion. It goes without saying that the government is desirous that these small property holders be given, as my hon. friend stated himself, every consideration to which they are entitled.

Mr. Speaker, I desired to speak on this motion in the language of the mover (Mr. Deslauriers) out of courtesy to him and in order to uphold that very good usage which permits the conducting of the debates of this house in both languages. I do not desire to repeat my argument. I have made a qualification in accepting the motion, namely, that I believe the responsibility for the welfare of the small property holder is primarily —municipal and provincial. Inasmuch as the motion calls for a study of its subject matter, and as there can be no objection to giving effect to such a pious wish, I am quite willing on behalf of the government to accept the motion and to congratulate again the mover.

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, during the session of 1934 I rose to present to the house the needs and claims of the small property holders of the city of Montreal. They requested me, during the last election campaign, again to intercede with the federal authorities on their behalf. Like all members who preceded me in this debate, I admit that this question primarily concerns the provincial authorities, but I might also point out that the Dominion government should not abstain from dealing with the purely practical side of this problem. May I sir, congratulate the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Mallette) who, this evening, has presented the claims of small property owners for the relief they need. The majority of small property holders, in Montreal, belong to the working classes; they have followed the advice of the economists, who have followed the recommendations made to them from public platforms and even from the pulpit, to be thrifty and invest their savings in fully secured investments. The small property holders of Montreal and of every city of Canada have been creators of wealth; they have accumulated savings from their small earnings, not only for their own ends but in the interest of the whole community which they have served by contributing to our large cities a considerable portion of the taxes levied, etc. They have supplied work to the working classes and paid them high wages, thus raising the purchasing power of the workmen and greatly increasing the revenue of merchants in all our cities.

In the course of last year's session, the principle of assisting all classes of society was recognized by the house, and this principle, it must be admitted, has always formed part of the Liberal party's policy. We now have rural credit. Why then not facilitate loans at reduced interest to our small property holders and why not establish in this country a system of real-estate loans? This, sir, is a suggestion I make, to the house, as representative of Hochelaga. I also belong to this class of property holders who, to-day, claims consideration from the public authorities.

Since the question of more intimate cooperation between the federal and provincial authorities has been mooted for some time past, as our Secretary of State, the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), has stated, why should this matter not be again considered in the course of future negotiations between provincial and federal authorities.

I would not go so far as to advocate in this house that the Canadian government follow in all respects the policy of Mr. Roosevelt towards small property holders; but let us bear in mind that, thanks to the Home Loan Banks, to the institution which he has created, Mr. Roosevelt, in issuing bonds at reduced rates of interest was successful so far in saving the properties of small holders; more than 880,000 small American property holders have benefited from this protection.

With reference to the measures enacted by the United States government, which I mentioned a moment ago, some have been declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of the republic, but to conclude from this that our government, through fear of these decisions of the United States Supreme Court, should entirely neglect those who at present need relief is a far cry.

The member for Hochelaga, like all those who have preceded him in this debate, recognize that the federal government cannot be held responsible for the present depression, but for heaven's sake, let us spare those who have economized, let us lend a hand to those who have brought wealth to our cities, let us relieve those who have built homes to insure the future of their wives and children; let us prevent by legal means, I say, these home builders, these small property holders, from being suddenly despoiled of the fruit of their thrift.

Certain loan companies, sir, shamelessly exploit the small property owners of our cities. These people seize properties without any compunction and what is amazing—I have myself ascertained the fact in my own constituency—these people, after taking possession of a property, find it always possible through their organizations to compete with small neighbouring property holders, who have bled themselves to meet their obligations, by lowering the rental of the houses they seized.

I wish to state to the house that like the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) I am not very enthusiastic over the coming into effect of the housing bill, so highly praised in the house of late. There is not such a scarcity of houses in Montreal, and if two households occupy the same home, it is not because the number of houses is limited, but because the workmen living in that manner cannot afford to rent a separate home; they simply have not the money to pay the landlord. Such conditions are due to the present depression.

I have nothing further to add; but may I, sir, thank the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) who, like myself, represents a working-class constituency composed of small property owners, for having followed the claims previously submitted to the house on behalf of the more humble dwellers of our large and small towns throughout the Dominion.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate, but I have been moved to do so by what has been said by other hon. members. I rise to endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman who introduced the motion (Mr. Deslauriers) and I wish to congratulate him upon bringing it before us. Since I have been a member of the house the urban centres have received very little consideration from any government. I see no reason why industrial workers in these centres should not receive the assistance which they need so badly. I am glad the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) has said that he is willing to accept this resolution, but I do not agree with him when he says that this matter is a provincial responsibility. I think the federal government has some responsibility for the urban as well as for the rural centres. Assistance has been given to rural Canada by way of farm loan boards and the farmers' creditors act and many other pieces of legislation, so surely something can be done to help those in the urban centres who are in such distress. I could picture to hon. members many instances of distress which I have seen in my own city, but I do not believe in doing that as it is bad advertising for Canada. My hon. friends to my left indulge in that sort of thing but I never do. Such tactics do not bring good results and there is no use talking about anything that does not bring such results.

I know of working men who for the last twenty years have lived economically and saved every cent, but who have lost everything in the last five years. If the present state of affairs continues, the city of Toronto will be the largest landowner in that centre. Taxation is high because of relief costs and interest rates should have been reduced long ago. These conditions have proved a handicap to the thrifty man in the city who is trying to get along. They have also affected the builder who has constructed a few houses for rental purposes. Even though he has all his houses rented, in many instances they are rented to people on relief. Such a man finds it difficult to collect his rents and sometimes he loses one house after another in an effort to save what is left. There are many instances where a man has endeavoured to purchase a home worth from $3,000 to $5,000; he may have managed to pay everything up to about $1,000 or $1,500, and then he loses the whole thing. This is what is happening in Toronto, and I assume the same thing is occurring in all the urban centres of this country. I appeal to the government to set up a committee of some sort to try to discover means of assisting the people mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the mover of the resolution. I hope the government will give this matter every consideration because it is absolutely essential that something be done.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from the third largest city in Canada and representing a portion of that city which is composed very largely of home owners of the class and description mentioned in the resolution under discussion tonight, I would be doing something less than my full duty to the great majority of my constituents if I did not rise to my feet to say just a word or two respecting the seriousness of their situation and the earnestness with which they are looking to the legislators of Canada for some measure of consideration. They are looking to the federal and provincial governments for assistance and the efforts to be made on their behalf need not necessarily conflict. Therefore I think it is a responsibility of mine to lay before the house very briefly the opinion which my constituents hold and the opinion which I, their representative, hold, knowing their conditions to be what they are.

During the last five or six years I believe this class of citizen of the cities of Canada has done more in the way of burden bearing than has any other class in the dominion. Not only have they been forced during these trying times to maintain their homes on very much reduced incomes, but, as tax collections will prove, they have had to carry the burdens of their less fortunate brothers. Therefore, whenever their plight is raised in the house the good resolution which I made when I came here for the first time a couple of weeks ago has to go by the board like most of the other good resolutions which I have made from time to time. That resolution was to hear and not to speak. But on behalf of those people whose problems I know and sympathize with, and whose problems I believe every hon. member sympathizes with, I feel compelled, when such problems come before the house, to rise and speak as briefly and sincerely as I can. The present resolution is in my opinion one that deals with a problem which, in the words of the motion itself, should be the subject of study. The resolution does not go very far, and with that I have no quarrel at the moment; but the problem of the people I represent is one that should be investigated. The motion proposes a short step in the direction in which I hope the government will shortly move. I rose simply to record my own humble opinion that a great need exists.

Motion (Mr. Deslauriers) agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT

PROPOSED PROGRAM OF PUBLIC WORKS AT TRADE UNION RATES OF PAY

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the federal government should assume full responsibility for dealing with unemployment as a national problem;

That the government should consider the adoption of an extensive program of socially useful public works and services such as housing, reforestation and public health service;

That those employed in such works and services should receive a living wage at least equal to trade union rates of pay;

That pending such provision the unemployed should receive more adequate maintenance, which we suggest might be provided by a steeply graded super-tax on incomes over $10,000.

He said: In advancing this resolution I have in mind a criticism frequently levelled against members of this group, that they do not give sufficient attention to so called practical considerations. In my opinion the resolution contains several practical suggestions which are worthy of consideration by members of the house and which should be explored to the limit of their possibilities. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not offer it as a panacea for all our economic ills or as the final answer to the riddle of unemployment. I trust, however, that the resolution will be accepted as a basis of useful discussion leading, in some degree at least, to an amelioration of the consequences arising from widespread unemployment.

As I view the present unemployment situation in Canada, it reveals conditions of almost revolutionary significance; and in the face of these conditions the most practical thing the most practical man can do is to consider the inward meaning of these conditions and their trends and to devise a definite and courageous course of action. We have reached the stage where we must think less of unemployment and more of employment, where we must think less of merely feeding starving people and more of their restoration to useful activity and self respect. The first and most significant fact staring us in the face at this time is that in December last there were in Canada 1,206,429 persons in receipt of some form of relief. In February, 1935, there were 1,054,821, and in February, 1934, there were 1,154,822. These figures include all dependents and all farmers receiving aid in the dried out areas; but it is estimated by those who have reasonably accurate knowledge of the situation that this number includes some 400,000 wholly unemployed wage earners; and if we were to add to this number those temporarily or seasonally unemployed the total would probably be 600,000.

This figure means that something like twenty-three per cent of the wage earning population of Canada are now without gainful employment. It has been shown by our official statistics that in ninety of the largest towns in this country an average of 16·7 per cent of the population is on relief, and the percentage runs as high as 47 per cent in some areas. These are staggering figures, but I do not intend to juggle statistics merely for the purpose of painting a gloomy picture. I think the facts we should keep clearly before us are that in this large number of people on relief there are from twenty-three to twenty-eight per cent of our Canadian workers, and that this condition has persisted for a number of years and is not likely to be quickly removed unless we employ drastic remedies.

It is easy to overlook the fact that this condition of prolonged unemployment has disastrous cumulative effects. As the days go by, without some definite policy with regard to this problem, more and more people are reaching the end of their resources and are being relentlessly forced into the bread line. As the days go by more and more of those now on relief are finding their means of coping with the situation becoming exhausted and they are being forced into a more and more hopeless position, losing thereby what is most important, their recuperative powers, and facing conditions which definitely undermine their physical and moral stamina.

In determining our approach to this problem we should not overlook the fact that since 1930 in Canada there has been expended from the federal, provincial and municipal treasuries a sum in excess of $500,000,000. This also is a staggering figure, especially when we consider that we must add to it very considerably before the need disappears. What we must face in the house at this time is not only the fact that this vast sum has placed an intolerable burden upon the provinces and municipalities, bringing many to the verge of bankruptcy, but that the money has not been expended in such a manner as to achieve the most effective results. As regards liquidating the situation, we are in a worse plight than when we started. All we have done is to provide a bare minimum of food and shelter for those in destitute circumstances; and because we have done this and nothing else we are aggravating certain phases of the problem and assuming heavy commitments of a more or less permanent character which the taxpayers must bear.

Members of the house, I feel, are compelled to agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) that we have suffered and paid a heavy price for lack of a properly coordinated plan. It is true that in 1930 no one could have foreseen the extent of this crisis, but we are in a position to-day more accurately to gauge the results achieved under the policies of the past four or five years and to reckon the cost of these or alternative policies with regard to the future, for this problem will certainly remain with us in substantial proportions for some years to come. It should be emphasized, I think, that the financial cost of unemployment in Canada is as nothing compared with the social cost of unemployment stated in terms of human life and welfare. This feature cannot be ignored. Nevertheless for strictly business considerations, if for no other considerations, we should abandon the patchwork system of temporary expedients, and instead of subsidizing unemployment we should start to subsidize, more definitely, employment.

Before dealing with the suggestions contained in the resolution I should like to deal briefly with the attitude taken towards this problem by many members of the house during previous debates. I infer from their remarks that they consider the unemployed themselves should show a great deal more initiative and resourcefulness. I wonder at this, when we as a nation through our legislative bodies have certainly not shown any great degree of initiative or resourcefulness in dealing with the fundamental causes of the problem. Many seem disinclined to think about the problem at all. In spite of what has been revealed about conditions in relation to unemployment they seem to suggest that the government has squandered millions of dollars to keep these people in idleness; that those on relief could get jobs if they wanted to, and that relief satisfies the majority of them anyway, so why worry? They suggest that the unemployed might be returned to pioneer conditions and left to "rustle" a living somehow.

This policy was suggested to me in a very blunt and pointed way at a conference not so long ago by a prominent representative of business interests in this country. He remonstrated with me for advocating measures that were not at all radical or revolutionary but were designed to spread more equitably the available opportunities of employment. He said, "The sooner we get back to the good old days of 'root, hog or die,' the better." That was a very blunt restatement of the doctrine of rugged, or if you like, of ragged individualism and the survival of the fittest. Nevertheless there are many who still hold this view and urge that we put the brakes on all manner of social legislation at this time. I feel that those who would condone this policy of drift or of rugged individualism as applied to the unemployed have surely overlooked the changes that have occurred in the Canadian social and economic structure and the manner in which these changes have affected the great majority of wage earners in Canada.

It was only a few decades ago that the great majority of Canadian workers were farmers, lumbermen, shoemakers, blacksmiths, or were engaged in other trades where they worked on their own account with their own tools and with a greater degree of self-reliance than is possible to-day. Many individuals in those days scorned to work for hire. Those who did work for wages consisted mainly of lumberjacks, seamen, a few farm labourers and domestic servants, and probably those who were employed by the fur-trading companies. When one contrasts this with the situation that exists in Canada in 1935 and 1936 one will find that the wage earning class or the working class, including those who receive what are politely called salaries, amounts to over three-fifths of the working population of this country.

In the early stages of Canadian development the workers lived mainly in small towns and villages and usually had a small piece of land or a wood-lot on which they could gain a living, so that seasonal unemployment was a misfortune but not actually a calamity. There was not the modern form of specialized production. They were not confined, as present workers are, to specialized labour. They usually could do anything or go anywhere as demanded by the rough work of a pioneer community. These conditions developed in them an adaptability and a dependence on their own resources in marked contrast to the capabilities of the modern wage earner who has been forced to specialize perhaps with the same kind of tool or machine for half a lifetime.

This process of modern industrialism with its mass production technique has had on Canadian life an impact which has been condensed into a short period as compared with similar developments in European countries. As machines displaced labour, only those in the wealthier class could afford to own and control the tools, the machinery of production. As these developments took place, Canadian workers were alienated from all access to the sources of wealth production. Hence we have ownership of the vital instruments of production in the hands of a comparatively small owning class, and the great majority of our people have been obliged to hire themselves out by the day or week to work in those enterprises controlled by a few. This means that a comparatively large proportion of the Canadian people have nothing to exchange for the commodities required to satisfy their material wants except their own labour power, and they must market this on the labour market. They can secure a livelihood only as they are engaged in co-ordinated groups as and when required by the owners of the machines, and because of the trend of events over which they have no control they are left more and more helpless and without opportunity to apply individual initiative or resourcefulness during this period of economic instability.

A century ago not more than one out of five of the occupied population in this country worked for hire or received a salary. To-day the wage earning group has changed from twenty in a hundred to sixty or seventy in a hundred. In this as well as in other countries the wage earners have risen from this comparatively small minority of twenty per cent to become a powerful and unorganized majority consisting of seventy per cent of the whole population that might be gainfully employed. At the same time the percentage of our population engaged in farming has fallen proportionately from fifty to about twenty-five per cent. The percentage of our population living in towns of 5,000 or over has risen from twelve and a half per cent to approximately forty-five per cent.

Also, according to the latest statistics, seventy-eight per cent of dwellings in rural districts are occupied by owners, but in urban centres only forty-five per cent are shown to be dwelling in homes for which they may claim ownership. It should be noted that many of these homes are so heavily mortgaged, as witness the evidence presented in the debate on the previous resolution, that ownership confers upon these people merely the doubtful privilege of paying taxes and repair bills. At the same time we are aware that the average wage in Canada has never risen above $1,000 per annum. Nearly half the population over seventy years of age are eligible for old age pensions. It is quite accurate therefore to say that there is in Canada a large propertyless working class numbering perhaps over two millions, or sixty per cent of our working population. In the United States statistics give the proportion as seventy-three per cent, and it is reasonable to assume that developments in Canada follow the same trend. This is a natural development under capitalism.

More and more the workers are being alienated from access to the means of work. So I ask some previous speakers: What are our unemployed to do? Why should they be exhorted to "rustle," as these hon. gentlemen suggest? To live they must eat; to eat they must work; to work they must secure employment. They can secure work only from those who own the means of work. To-day the supply of labour is greater than the demand. This leads us in this group to the conclusion that security for the worker will not be established until the nation owns and controls the means of work. I mention this point at this stage, however, to emphasize the fact that to-day the workers are in a greater degree than before dependent upon private enterprise. The worker is helpless unless he can gain access to the land or tools through which he may employ his labour power and gain a livelihood, and for this reason I feel that the house cannot escape responsibility for widening the opportunities for the worker who finds himself in this plight.

Another feature of the situation that cannot be overlooked is that we are rapidly tending towards a condition of chronic or permanent unemployment, and that whatever may be done to bring about a revival of export trade and thereby stimulate our productive activity, these measures will not and cannot possibly provide for the re-absorption into industry of all our unemployed in Canada. Due to technical advances in industry there is little hope that we can substantially reduce our unemployment simply by the methods to which I have referred. To get a proper understanding of the situation I think we should study very carefully the statistics of unemployment prior to the beginning of this depression, namely, during the period from 1920 to 1929. It was interesting to note an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Citizen only the other day as to the manner in which employment in the United States is keeping pace with the recovery that is evident there. The editorial states:

> The singular fact regarding "recovery" in the United States is that the gain in production is not being accompanied by a corresponding gain in employment. While the nation is three-quarters of the way towards bringing production to its pre-depression level it has gone only a little more than a third of the way towards bringing employment to its 1929 level.
> No one knows for sure how many unemployed there are in the United States, but the generally accepted total to-day is ten million. This represents a drop of some four millions from the depression's worst, or a gain in employment of forty per cent as compared with a gain in production of seventy-five per cent.
> Unless progress through the remaining twenty-five per cent cuts down unemployment at an infinitely greater rate than did progress through the first seventy-five per cent, it follows that even when the United States is producing on the old pre-depression scale again, the unemployed will still number in the neighbourhood of five million.

The official report, Recent Economic Changes, shows a decline in the number of persons employed in the United States from 25,105,000 in the period from 1918 to 1920 to 23,420,000 in the period from 1924 to 1926. This was accompanied by an eighteen per cent increase in total output. In other words our peak of employment on this continent was reached in 1918; the peak of production was reached in 1929. Prior to 1929 we have adequate evidence as to unemployment caused by technological advance in industry, and while it is true that a large percentage of those now unemployed in Canada have been brought to their present plight because of general economic conditions it is also true that included in that percentage is an increasing number of workers displaced by technological progress in industry. It is interesting to note that an official report further states:

> The elimination—or the release—of human labour as a result of technical progress is by no means peculiar to very recent times. It is, indeed, one of the essential processes in the course of economic and social development. But for the spread of machinery it would scarcely have been possible to raise the standard of living of the world. The nineteenth century was truly an age of miracles in the realm of technical progress. But so long as the liberation of workers from certain branches of production is more than balanced by the creation of new branches and the expansion of production as a whole, there is no such thing as a problem of technological unemployment.

Even if the balance is temporarily disturbed the results may be considered as part of the price nations have to pay if they wish to progress. The novel feature in the industrial development of the United States after the war was that the counter-balancing mechanism broke down right in the middle of a boom period, and the expansion of production created no extra demand for labour.

It is clearly shown that the annual increase in output per head of wage earners in industry during the period 1923 to 1929 developed at the rate of 4·8 per cent. It is also shown that any increase in production was not serving to absorb the workers released by technological progress. It is also interesting to note that in four years the oil refineries increased output eighty-four per cent, and laid off five per cent of their men while doing so. The tobacco manufacturing output climbed fifty-three per cent during the same period while thirteen per cent fewer men were used in the process. In Iron Age we find this interesting statement, which is confirmed by the findings of Stuart Chase:

If the productivity of industry through mechanization continues to increase in the next twenty-five years in the same way and at the same rate as during the last twenty-five, only 45 men will be needed for the work which to-day requires 70 and that formerly required 100. In the automobile industry 30 workers were doing in 1925 as much work as 100 workers in 1914. What are we going to do with the 25 men out of 70 that are displaced in the next twenty-five years? And there may be far more than 25 displaced, as the curve of technology is an accelerating one.

I think that is a question for which we should endeavour to discover an answer in Canada to-day. There are other factors to consider, such as unemployment resulting from mergers. It is well said that under every merger you find a human bargain basement. As a result of the mergers that have taken place in Canada more men than ever in the $3,000, $4,000 and $5,000 a year class are seeking employment at lower rates of pay.

Another factor to which I think we should give earnest consideration is the fact that efficiency experts, undertaking what is sometimes called the rationalization of industry, are steadily eliminating men. This happens whether men are swinging picks in the coal mines, sorting potatoes, picking fruit or doing many other things. The time-study brigade are eliminating motions, and with the motions they are eliminating men. Not only in motions but also in shop arrangement, routing, lighting, ventilating and management generally is this process being carried on. It is true that this brings about better conditions but almost always it results in fewer men being employed. The statement is made by prominent economists that even if we could restore our trade and industrial conditions to the productive level of 1929 there still would be no work in Canada for approximately fifty per cent of those now unemployed. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the trend now developing in the growth of our productive forces indicates that we are fastening upon Canada a condition of permanent or chronic unemployment, and in my opinion it is intolerable that we should even contemplate a condition of permanent unemployment in a country so richly endowed with natural resources as Canada.

The first suggestion I have to make is that the federal government should assume full responsibility for dealing with unemployment and unemployment measures. I feel that this step is essential if we are to achieve a national and properly coordinated plan to deal with the problem. There must be not only federal responsibility but also federal direction and control. I feel that to all intents and purposes the federal government is now assuming almost entirely the financial responsibility for this problem. Why should not the present administration go but a step further and assume a larger measure of management? I understand that as a result of the conference with the provincial governments the way has been cleared of constitutional difficulties, and I submit that the situation is of sufficient gravity to demand the mobilization of all our national resources. We would attempt such measures if a similar number of Canadian citizens were threatened with death through war conditions. To-day they are threatened with conditions equally dire, that may be termed famine conditions. They are forced into slums. The statistics of juvenile crime are mounting year by year. Our educational institutions are turning out thousands of young people every year to waste their trained faculties in a hopeless search for employment. Many of those on relief are at the peak of their physical and mental powers but know they will never work again, while many of our young men have not yet learned what work is. It has been aptly said that unemployment is doing to the bodies and souls of the present generation what the war did to the bodies and souls of those of another generation. It is not only the increase in the burden of relief costs but the demoralization, the pauperization of men that demands some change in our relief policy, a more enlightened and humane procedure than the mere payment of relief.

There is a woeful lack of uniformity in the present scheme. In British Columbia I find from personal observation that the monthly payments to the average family of five range from $16 a month in some districts to from $35 to $38 in others. Some work for the relief, many do not; policies differ in different municipalities. Some receive a degree of medical attention and care; in other districts this need is absolutely disregarded. In some districts definite provision is made for rent, fuel and clothing; in others, particularly the unorganized districts, no provision whatever is made for these needs. All through we find the supplementary activities of social welfare agencies related to the general relief scheme in a haphazard and ineffective way. This spells waste and inefficiency and not only tends to breed distress in many quarters but produces a very unwholesome atmosphere. Any effectiveness of unemployment relief as now operating is largely lost because of this general mismanagement, which I contend is due to lack of coordination on a national basis.

The need for national coordination is shown very clearly in the operation of the Employment Service of Canada. In 1919 parliament passed the Employment Offices Coordination Act, the purpose of which was to establish in Canada an employment service patterned after the system of labour exchanges which was then operating in Great Britain, and which has operated with a reasonable degree of success there since that time. The federal government defrays I think fifty per cent of the cost of the maintenance of this service. The personnel is largely furnished by the provincial governments. The results however have been in my opinion wholly unsatisfactory, largely by reason of the loss of confidence that has developed, among employing interests as well as among the unemployed, in the efficiency of this service.

I have some knowledge of the purpose of this legislation, and it was clearly in mind at that time that this service should become a genuine placement service; that it should be manned by people expert in determining vocational aptitudes and in the scientific placement of workers. It was also intended that this service should bring about definite cooperation between organized interests throughout the country and the government. Provision was made for the establishment of an employment service council to act in an advisory capacity to the Minister of Labour. This council was to be representative of all organized interests; agriculture, labour, ex-service men, the national council of women, manufacturing interests and so on. I understand that the last time this council was summoned was in 1930, prior to which date it met infrequently. Provision was made also for the establishment of local employment service councils affiliated with the local offices of the employment service. There seems to have been some disinclination on the part of officials to accept the cooperation of the organized interests in the various communities, with the result that the service has largely failed to command general cooperation in these communities. To a large extent the offices serve merely for the mechanical registration of those who may apply for work and the occasional inquiry for workers by employers.

Because of lack of coordination in this and other respects we are far behind Great Britain and other countries in our technique. I have not time to make any detailed comparison with the United Kingdom except to say that there the wage earner to-day is assisted and guided by the government practically throughout his whole life by the following methods: Maternity grants to workers; free medical treatment and hospitalization, not only to the worker but to his dependents; illness allowances; financial assistance to parents whose children, between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years, are continuing school; unemployment insurance benefits for those workers coming under the act and unemployment assistance to those who do not; free juvenile and other courses of training and instruction; the payment of pensions to widows of insured workers and allowances to their children; and finally old age pensions to any non-contributory persons arriving at the age of seventy years, and old age pensions to contributors upon reaching the age of sixty-five years. In many respects they are in advance of the methods employed in Canada. I realize that it may not be possible to do in this country all that has been done in Great Britain; neverhteless we should profit by the excellent results achieved in the mother country.

I suggest that we should now institute socially useful public projects, and in this way provide employment for those now unemployed. In discussing this matter in a previous debate the minister quoted a statement issued by the imperial ministry to the effect that public works have not been found effective. I would refer him to the reports of the International Labour Office in which a very careful study has been made in this regard, and the conclusion reached that in many respects public works have served to stimulate employment. One conclusion reached was stated in these terms:

Even when the problem is examined in very great detail the old truth is confirmed that to give employment on schemes in which wages form a high proportion of the total cost is the best way to provide more employment.

Much has been done by the housing measures in Great Britain. I need not remind the minister of all that has been accomplished under the housing scheme in Great Britain; the Labour Gazette for January, 1936, gives a complete report.

It is interesting also to note what has been accomplished in Sweden. It is stated there by reliable authorities that the big loan expenditure largely devoted to this purpose and incurred during the financial years 1933 and 1934 appears to have met with success, since production is greater than in 1928 and unemployment is less than at any time since the early months of 1932. The index of production has gone up mainly in consumers' goods.

It goes without saying that in public works projects the workers engaged should be paid the going rates of wages. To do otherwise would have a most deplorable effect on wage levels and would react disastrously on the success of any such scheme. The "work for relief" policy which has been in force in many sections of the country has been most pernicious in its effects. It has created a wrong attitude on the part of those affected and has actually worked a hardship on men who, without any increase over and above the relief payments, have been put to the expense of buying protective work clothing and food necessary for the satisfactory performance of manual work. I suggest that housing, reforestation and development of health services would provide employment on the basis that I have suggested without any undue outlay for material or equipment or any undue capital outlay in relation to the total cost of the projects. These projects are at least to a degree self-liquidating, and they would at the same time meet a serious social need. I suggest that they could be financed by opening up fields of taxation not yet developed, but I shall not deal with that at length except to say that in principle it seems to me just that those who have been able to secure large profits during a period of depression should now be called upon to make some further contribution to the welfare of those who have suffered the most during this period of depression.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) suggested in a previous debate that we should exercise prudence in determining the limits of government expenditure and government borrowing in regard to these projects. I am not suggesting in this resolution that we should spend our way into prosperity, but I am indicating to the minister, who is well versed in sociological and political problems, that if prudence should dictate the limits of public expenditure, then prudence should also determine the limits beyond which we should not require our unemployed, those now in distress, to endure their present misery. The minister is well aware as are other members of the house that conditions developing in Canada to-day because of unemployment are largely destructive of our democracy. We must consider matters of public expenditure sanely and rationally. It is the wiser part to anticipate the demands of the future than to attempt to devise policy when we are confronted with the clamorous cry of those who are experiencing the pangs of hunger. I suggest that the government may accept this resolution in principle at least because it is well within the range of government policy as already outlined.

Many will suggest that we must go very carefully lest we court or bring about a major disaster. I often wonder, Mr. Speaker, what such persons would consider as a major disaster. We have over one million people so destitute of this world's goods that they must apply for relief. If we had over one million people in an army we would consider it a very large army, or if we had one million people sick, suffering from some epidemic, we would turn almost the whole country into a hospital. I say that our unemployment to-day is in every sense of the word a major disaster and should be dealt with on that basis as a great national emergency, requiring a definite course of action and a complete and unified mobilization of all our national resources. I would earnestly appeal to the Minister of Labour and the members of the government generally to accept the resolution as indicating steps which may safely be taken at this time towards at least the amelioration of the evident distress, and which will lead more definitely than our policy of the past towards the restoration of at any rate some of our people to a larger measure of independence, freedom and comfort.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion I am fully aware that the subject has already been comprehensively dealt with by the mover (Mr. MacNeil) and also on a resolution of a similar nature which has been before the house, but as, according to the speech from the throne unemployment still remains one of our most urgent national problems, I do not believe any discussion that may take place on this resolution is a waste of time. I shall, however, in my remarks try to avoid any repetition of facts and points that have already been taken up. I do not believe we can over-emphasize the absolute necessity of dealing with this problem in the immediate future. It would be superfluous for me to endeavour to describe the deplorable conditions of the unemployed as we find them to-day. Many cases of a serious nature have been placed before us, and I am sure that each and every member of the house is well aware of the conditions of the unemployed.

There is, however, one feature of the unemployment situation which I feel we are sometimes prone to forget. The greatest punishment which the unemployed are receiving under present conditions is not the lack of the physical necessities of life, but a far greater punishment, I believe, which they are undergoing at all times is the mental torture which they are called upon to endure. I sometimes think it is only those who have gone through the experience themselves who can fully realize the mental torment which the unemployed must experience to-day. I am sure, however, that we realize their humiliation at being compelled to accept the dole. I believe the condition of our youth to-day is most serious. No one but the young man or the young woman himself or herself knows the mental torture and agony they must endure when they realize that there is no hope for them. Is it any wonder that they are tempted to take their lives? Undoubtedly at this very moment there are young people throughout our land who are debating whether or not to end it all. I believe their agony would not be so great if they felt that their unfortunate circumstances were due to a famine or some other visitation of a like nature, but the fact is that they see the actual physical possibilities and realize that they are living under conditions which really need not be tolerated. We all know there is no lack of the physical necessities in this world. We know that providence has been kind enough to bestow on this earth a superabundance of all things.

However, what do we find? Man to-day, instead of making use of all these blessings as he should, is deliberately destroying them. According to a report in World Events, the commission for relief declares that during 1934 the following foodstuffs were destroyed: One million cars of grain, 267,000 cars of coffee, 560,000 hundredweight of sugar, 50,000 hundredweight of rice and 50,000 hundredweight of meat. When I was a child my mother taught me that it was a sin to destroy even as much as a crust of bread, a gift with which God had blessed us. This wholesale destruction of the blessings that have been bestowed upon us is a crime. Who knows but that providence may withhold its blessings.

Mr. CAHAN: Where did this enormous destruction take place?

Mr. KUHL: That is a summary of the destruction that is supposed to have taken place throughout the world.

Mr. CAHAN: Did any part of it occur in Canada?

Mr. KUHL: Not that I know of. Is it any wonder that people are asking why this should be, why they should not be permitted to enjoy these blessings? I contend it is ridiculous for anyone to-day to maintain that we are living in an age of scarcity. The mover of the resolution has given us plenty of evidence as to the extent to which goods can be produced to-day. Are not all human beings entitled to the blessings which have been bestowed upon man? We call ourselves Christians, but if I know anything about Christianity, it is not Christianity to act as we have been acting. Unless we remove this blot from civilization we will lower ourselves to the point where we shall have to admit that we are hypocrites, we shall have to consider ourselves as nothing less than heathens.

After five or six years of experimenting with palliatives, I believe the time has come when we should begin to formulate a permanent solution of the unemployment situation. As the mover of the resolution points out, unemployment is a permanent problem and is on the increase. The best brains in the country are endeavouring to-day to eliminate employment; when a manufacturer says that he is reducing costs he means that he is eliminating labour. We know that industry never can absorb all the people in need of active employment. The object of the resolution is to provide employment. I agree with the mover that the construction of public works is right and proper and we all know that a great deal can be done in this connection, but I do not agree with the idea of constructing public works just for the sake of creating work.

I believe we have arrived in our economic and industrial history at a stage at which we shall have to change our ideas with respect to many matters. Many statements are taken as axiomatic which are not so. It is a fallacious argument to maintain that the economic system is failing because it does not provide employment. The purpose of an economic system is not to provide work, but to provide and distribute goods and services up to the consuming capacity of the public. Considered from this point of view, the perfect economic system would be one which necessitated no employment at all; it would be one by which all the goods and services required by individuals would be dropped into their laps just as a banana drops from the tree or the sunshine pours down in the morning.

I am not suggesting that provision of employment is not desirable, but provision of employment is not fundamental to an economic system. To illustrate a little further what I mean by this, I should like to give a definition of "work." When considered from the economic standpoint "work" is really a very ambiguous term. If we define "work" as being an involuntary or forced activity, we have still to distinguish between activity forced upon man by nature and activity forced upon man by other men. There is the work forced on man by nature—the work God referred to when He told Adam that, outside of Paradise, nature would yield him bread only in the sweat of his brow. There are the slave owners and bankers, for example, who from their high thrones declare that man shall not eat, not without nature's consent but without their consent. Work forced upon man by nature is natural and dignified and necessary, whereas work forced upon man by men is artificial, unnecessary and degrading.

Ever since the history of man began he has been endeavouring to free himself from both kinds of work. Freedom from servile labour may be defined as liberty; freedom from nature forced labour may be defined as progress. Man has always striven individually for liberty and collectively for progress. Collectively man has attained a degree of progress beyond his wildest dreams and many statistics have been quoted to substantiate that fact. But tragically enough, just at the very moment when the state of progress warrants a wider extension of individual liberty than any community has ever enjoyed, the world is faced with the threat, backed by the sovereign power of private credit control, of an ever increasing number of individuals being forced into artificial, man-made servitude. That is exactly the position we find ourselves in to-day. The condition of progress to-day warrants a leisure state, that is, a condition of economically guaranteed voluntary activity. The leisure state with all its cultural possibilities lies at our very door. Of course I quite realize that it is somewhat ironical to speak of a leisure state when what most people are looking for is bread and butter. However, that is the possibility which our present economic system holds out to us when it is accompanied by a proper monetary policy.

I believe that we are faced with two alternatives. Unquestionably in the very near future we are going to be compelled either to introduce a leisure state or to participate in another world war, and I believe the determining factor is going to be our financial policy. I do not at this time desire to enter into a discourse on financial policy, but I would say this: The solution not only of unemployment but of all our problems lies, I believe, entirely in policy. I disagree with my hon. friends to the immediate right in this. The solution lies not in ownership but in policy; and if we adopt a monetary policy which will make financially possible what is physically possible our problems can be solved.

I would conclude with a few quotations from Major Douglas to show the gravity of the situation which we are facing to-day. In giving evidence before the committee on agriculture of the legislature of Alberta Major Douglas was asked this question:

Q. Is there any way to stop the erratic retreat in living standards except by changing our present method of distribution of goods and services created?

A. Yes, and it constitutes the greatest danger with which the world is faced at the present time. There is no difficulty whatever in providing the world with a rationing system if you establish everywhere a complete dictatorship, leaving all powers in the hands of the dictator. Unless steps are taken within a comparatively short time to readjust the financial system so that it will work, the financial system as we know it will be swept away and we shall all be faced everywhere with some form of dictatorship, either fascist or what is called communist, which is, I think, in the strict sense, not communist at all but another form of dictatorship. It is possible to deal with the material basis of the present problem; it is possible to provide for the general public a higher standard of living, through the agencies of a dictatorship; but that involves a surrender of all those things for which the Anglo-Saxon race has fought for a thousand years.

He elucidated this by an answer to a further question:

Q. Major Douglas, you said this afternoon, "without surrendering the things we have fought for, for a thousand years." What are those things?

A. The things that we have fought for for a thousand years, I should say, are, broadly speaking, the right to express our opinions upon any subject whatever, the right to see that we have control of such matters as education in its broadest form, the right to see that we are not plunged into adventures, national or otherwise, which are being pursued for reasons with which we could not agree and over which we have no control, and the right to see that we are not hindered in the attainment of legitimate desires which can be attained without preventing our neighbour from also attaining the same result. That is a very cursory view of the situation, but it is undoubtedly summed up in the word "liberty."

Let me give one more quotation from Major Douglas. Giving evidence before the same committee of the Alberta legislature, he said:

> And just as I told them in Ottawa in 1923 exactly what was going to happen in 1928, so I tell you now in 1934 that before 1940, if you have not changed this financial system, it will change and probably eliminate you.

I think that gives us a definite idea of the possibilities of the very near future. In view of the fact that the prediction which Major Douglas made in 1923 has been literally fulfilled and we are still endeavouring to extricate ourselves from the conditions which he predicted, who is there but will say that if our monetary policy is not changed we shall find ourselves in the condition to which he refers and that this will take place before 1940? I am heartily in sympathy with the principle of the resolution as a means to assist the unemployment situation through the transitionary period, but I feel that the permanent solution lies in one of monetary policy alone.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): May I have a few minutes to speak to this motion and humbly make a suggestion to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers)? I think we are all very anxious to settle the problem of unemployment, and I take the liberty of telling hon. members who sit at the other end of the chamber that our anxiety to solve the problem is limited only by financial incapacity. I have heard from persons who, I must say, are sincere, many queer expressions of opinion such as these: We must act at once; we must meet the needs of millions; we must get them off relief; we must diagnose the trouble; then we must find the remedy, and then we must apply it. We should have some practical suggestions to make if we are going to take up the time of the house, and if we have some practical suggestions we should make them to our Minister of Labour.

To solve the problem of unemployment the only remedy at the present time, in my opinion, is more taxes and more expenditures, and I repeat that our financial capacity is limited. I think the business of the government is or should be conducted like the private business of any person. When we want to buy a horse or a house or a farm, the first thing we do is to look in our pocket or find out at the bank if we have the money to buy that horse or that farm or that house. If we have not the money we do not buy it; that is all, and the question of unemployment is on about the same footing. There are certain things that the government can do and there are certain things that neither it nor the country can do. We ought to give the government time to make a survey and find out the difficulties and troubles in which we have been placed by the last administration in order that the government may bring forth the most practical remedy.

Allowing for an increase in our population, which fact accounts for an increase in the number of unemployed, I contend that the system which has been followed during the last five years has proved to be a failure. More people are working at the present time than were employed in the last few years, and yet there are more people on relief. Since 1930 we have spent, mostly on relief works, the enormous sum of approximately $238,000,000. Perhaps those works were useful, and for that reason I am not going to say anything about them. But since 1930 we have spent another enormous sum amounting to $296,000,000 for direct relief pure and simple. Our country is large and rich and our population is rather small. Now, sir, if we must continue to feed and clothe and shelter so many people, and at such expense, naturally we shall have also logically to admit that our country is not so rich; that it has not such large resources and that it does not provide so many opportunities to our young people. But I make haste to state that I believe our country is both large and rich.

Older countries may not have the possibilities we have of settling their unemployed on the land and they may have to solve their problem solely by giving charity. But that is not the case with Canada. We have plenty of land, agricultural land, and I think it provides the way to solve partly at least our problem of unemployment. I believe even in prosperous years it would be sound political economy for the government to facilitate the development of our natural resources first instead of doing so much for the advancement of industries, the development of which is sometimes premature. There are many people in the cities who are waiting in vain for work which they cannot find in industries.

I have a plan or an idea which I submit to the Minister of Labour. We should make a survey of all the agricultural districts of our country—perhaps it has been made—and then we should divide those districts into lots or homesteads. Possibly I should preface the outline of my plan with certain remarks concerning colonization. People from the cities will not stay on farms which are covered with timber or brush; they will lose heart at the end of the first year when they see how little they have accomplished. The plan which I wish to submit to the house consists particularly of taking from the cities those people who have already had some experience on farms and putting them on the land. All the colonization plans that I have known of in the past were faulty because they gave the settler the impression that he could live for four or five years on that homestead or new land with subsidies or moneys that were to be given him by the government, instead of looking to the productivity of the land to supply him a living.

Having surveyed our agricultural districts and divided them into lots, we ought to take our unemployed or a portion of them from the cities and make them work to improve those lands, cut the brush or clear the land or possibly make some other improvements. I will not discuss the degree of improvement that should be made; if necessary we should conscript some unemployed for work on these farms and pay them decent wages. The settlers would then go on these farms which would almost the first year be productive. I can imagine the great development of our country we would have made in the last four or five years if only part of the money that has been spent for direct relief had been spent on the improvement of these raw lands. This would also have made it possible for people from the city, who have known better days, to go on those partly improved farms, come to like farm life and make their permanent residence there. I do not think I am mistaken when I say that Mussolini has opened up one or two provinces by following this system, and to-day those provinces are a source of wealth for Italy. We have given protection to industries ever since Sir John A. Macdonald inaugurated his national policy. Why not encourage a movement such as this? After all, farming is an industry. We have been protecting our industries because they were called infant industries. I believe some of them at the present time are elephants, and white elephants at that.

By following this suggestion I think three advantages would become evident. We would provide for some of our unemployed, for the time being, work for which they would be paid reasonable wages; we would promote the back-to-the-land movement and we would provide permanent places of abode for a great many people now unemployed. I believe more people on the farms would mean more taxes with which to pay our national debt. These people would buy a great variety of articles and in doing so would encourage our industries. These same people, if they stay in the cities, will only cause us to spend a great deal of money for relief; they will do nothing good for themselves, for their families or for their country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I submit that our national wealth, confidence, courage and cooperation are the four levers that will help most gradually to solve our problems of unemployment. Our natural wealth, consisting partly of agricultural land, will provide work for a while and later permanent homes for many of our unemployed. The people of Canada have clearly manifested their confidence in the present administration. Our people have inherited that virtue of courage which was displayed so nobly by our ancestors on many occasions; courage in the mass of the people will respond to courage on the part of our leaders, and that cooperation which, I believe, was mentioned in the speech from the throne, if put into practice by all concerned—our party leaders, the heads of our provincial governments, the heads of our industries and the workers themselves—will soon put this country on the path of progress and happiness.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I feel like occupying a very brief space of time in which to express a few words of commendation for the subject matter of the resolution, with one or two minor exceptions, and particularly for the manner in which the mover presented his case. I have rarely heard in the house a more moderate, more carefully reasoned speech, so full of material appropriate to the subject, and whatever may be our individual opinions about various matters, nothing but good can come from a presentation of a subject in the manner in which the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) presented his case, from a discussion on such a high plane and from a similar degree of intelligent study and earnest consideration of the questions involved.

I should like to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brunelle) who has just taken his seat that I think his observations might very well be added to the resolution as an additional suggestion for the solution of the problem. There was food for thought in his remarks. He did suggest, and quite properly, that we should consider the cost in this matter, and I gathered that his inference was that the mover of the resolution and others who might support it were a little reckless in their suggestions for expenditures without considering costs. I recall that a day or two ago another hon. gentleman made an excellent speech in which he directed particular attention to the fact that any expenditure that might be made in a certain way, similar to this, would have to come out of the pockets of the taxpayers. In that he was quite correct, but I would invite those who stress the danger of incurring costs to consider this: In the first place, are we now spending wisely? In making that query I am not casting reflections on the activities of the government for the past five or six years; I am speaking rather to this country as a whole, to this parliament, to the provincial legislatures, to the municipalities and to all those who are responsible for dealing with these great questions of unemployment and relief. I think we might well pause and ask ourselves if we have been spending wisely.

It may be that it could be argued that the emergency seemed to call for certain measures of prompt relief, and so forth, but now or at some other time we must stop to take stock and see whether we have spent wisely. The hon. member for Champlain, who has just taken his seat, suggested that we had spent some $238,000,000 on relief works and some $296,000,000 for direct relief. I am quoting his figures, which I have not verified but which I accept as correct, so in round figures we have spent about $530,000,000 for relief. If we could turn back five years and start out with the object of spending $500,000,000, could we act more wisely? I think most of us would say that we could, and I think we can say that without casting reflections on anyone. So it is not out of place to pause and invite consideration of some other method of dealing with the problem. Indeed I think the government is to be commended for the excellent statement made yesterday by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), and I hasten to take this opportunity to compliment him upon it. That is a wise move, a very wise move; I invite the Minister of Labour to consider further the principle he has therein enunciated and the possibility of applying it to some other lines of activity. I commend him and I commend the government for their action; I think it is a sane and practical step. But that does not alter the fact that this resolution also offers some wise suggestions, and I wish to spend a few moments in a brief analysis of it.

May I preface my observations with an invitation to the government to give earnest consideration to this resolution. It is not necessary to accept it in toto, but it contains some good suggestions and I think it deserves favourable and thoughtful and sympathetic consideration. In the first place I would suggest that when we invite the government to take full responsibility, a suggestion with which I fully agree, we ought to make certain exceptions. I suggest, for instance, that we should leave with the municipalities and the provinces the responsibility for normal charitable work. I am not speaking of unemployment as we generally understand it, and I suggest that we must define that term more carefully; I am speaking of the normal needs of people in all our communities. I suggest that we take the average, say for the five-year period from 1926 to 1930 inclusive and use that as measuring the cost of caring for the aged and sick and indigent persons that unfortunately we have with us at all times.

The next suggestion that should be made is that if the federal government assume full responsibility, which by the way they are largely doing now, either by guaranteeing loans or actual participation, then there should be some prohibition of the provinces enlarging their expenditure to fill up the gap made by the dominion government taking over the whole cost of relief. In other words there should be an understanding with the provinces that they are not just going to make a Roman holiday with the contributions that may be entailed by that suggestion. With those two provisions I would favour the federal government taking over unemployment relief. By that I mean the relief arising out of modern industrial and economic conditions; a narrower and more precise definition could be found. But some protection of that kind must be provided before the principle suggested in the resolution is accepted.

Then I commend very earnestly the excellent presentation made by the mover of the resolution in relation to mechanization. Perhaps I may be pardoned a personal reference; in the election of 1930 when unemployment was just commencing—it had been under way some nine months—I was asked this question in a public meeting: Did I believe that the party I was then associated with could provide for employment of all the unemployed? And I answered: No, I did not think they could, for some time at least. And the reason I made that answer at that time was that we had as a country given no serious study to the problem of displacement of men by machines. There was sporadic study by individual economists; some interested sociologists were giving dissertations about the matter, but no authorities had fastened their teeth into the problem of how to take care of those displaced in industry by mechanization, and we have not yet started such a study; nor have they in the United States. I am not able to speak with the same assurance in regard to all the European countries, but I doubt whether any country in the world has yet definitely fixed upon a solution of that problem. The hon. member who moved the resolution very properly called attention to that, and I think we certainly should give earnest consideration to it, because, as he pointed out, the curve of displacement by mechanization is rising at an annually increasing ratio. I do not know where we shall arrive if we continue to drift as we have been doing in this and other countries in regard to providing for those so displaced.

There are those among my friends of the Social Credit group who argue that the very essence of this vast problem is found in the credit structure and the financial and monetary system. There is a measure of truth in that. As I have intimated before, I am perhaps not prepared to go the full length with them, but do not let us brush these hon. members and their particular pet theories, if you like, aside in a sweeping manner as if there was nothing in them, as I have noticed a number of hon. members speaking in the house this session are rather inclined to do. I believe there is a germ of truth in what my hon. friends are bringing so forcibly to the attention of the country. I repeat, I do not go along with them fully in their theories and the mechanics of their system, but in the sphere of credit and monetary control is to be in part at least a solution of that phase of the question.

But in the resolution there are two very practical proposals which I desire to emphasize and support; that is in regard to housing and reforestation. It is twenty-two or twenty-three years ago that I first brought to the attention of the house the hopeless manner in which we are dealing with the great forest wealth of Canada. If time permitted I could tell hon. members how in British Columbia since I went there forty-two years ago I have watched the vast areas of primeval forest of the richest and most prolific kind being swept away and nothing but devastation and a wilderness left in its place. I have travelled across this continent some two or three hundred times,—I have lost track of the number—but coming from Fort William right to and beyond the city of Quebec one sees year after year these vast areas where the timber has been swept away, and what little soil there was is gradually being washed into the streams, and it will never be possible to reforest a great deal of that area. Again I would request hon. members to pause and ask themselves: What about fifty years from now in regard to the forest wealth of Canada?

Mr. MacIVOR: If I may ask the hon. gentleman a question, does he know that we have in Ontario vast areas where the timber is too old to make ties? When ties are cut from it they are condemned by the railways.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but that does not alter my point at all. There is in British Columbia, too, a great deal of timber that is what they call ripe and that should be harvested, but there is a vast difference between harvesting timber in a sane and scientific way and slaughtering the wealth of the forests as we have been doing during the last forty years. Despite what the interjection would imply, the fact remains that we are doing next to nothing in the way of reforestation. I am not going to enlarge upon that subject because it would take too long, but I want to say this, that there is a splendid opportunity for the investment—the investment, I repeat—of public moneys and the giving of work in a fine occupation which, as the mover of the resolution so aptly said, would be something that was self-liquidating, not next year or within five or ten years from now, but in thirty or forty or fifty years. There will be many a person in Canada in the years to come who will look back over this period of the last ten or fifteen or twenty years, and ask what on earth the people of this period were doing that they did not engage more earnestly in this great reforestation scheme. I invite the Minister of Labour and his colleagues earnestly to consider the suggestion of reforestation as one of the methods of solving this problem of unemployment intelligently.

The other matter to which I wish particularly to call attention is that of housing, and here again I shall be brief. If we launched now upon a national housing program, including slum clearance, the erection of workmen's houses, farm houses, and general housing such as already is involved in the act passed last session, I believe this would take us ten years and even then we would not have caught up with the normal decent requirements of the housing situation in Canada. I do not know why this is—I am not necessarily just referring to this house—but as Canadians we seem to fail to see the opportunity that rests in housing for providing a measure of relief in regard to this unemployment problem. Furthermore, there is no class of occupation in which money may be invested which results in more work for labour than building and housing; you can carry it right down to the production of the logs, cement, bricks and so forth. Everything you put into a building, everything you touch, every dollar that goes into it, ultimately will find its way to labour, and so I say that there is a great possibility there, and I would strongly urge upon the government a real forward movement in housing. Let us not just play with the thing. The bill passed last session had its merits, but it does not touch the problem. We need a really earnest concentration of effort by parliament upon this problem of housing, which I believe, together with a few other activities such as the one mentioned by the minister yesterday, reforestation, the suggestion made in regard to settlement, and a few other movements of that kind, would rapidly absorb the unemployed of this country.

Would it be too trite a suggestion if I were to remind the house of this? There are only three major activities that underlie, shall I say, the interchange of human labour—the providing of food, the providing of clothing, and the providing of shelter. Anything beyond that is, if not a luxury, something more than an absolute necessity, but those three are absolutely necessary, and it is by an interchange of labour in providing those necessities that we lay the foundation of society. The business of parliament, of course, is to see that the balance is held fairly, and that is where the theories of the control of credit enter in and form such an important factor. Parliament must see that the balance is held fairly between those who control credit and wealth and those who need these things to which I have referred as absolute necessities, and I commend that phase of the question to my friends on the treasury benches.

The next suggestion in the resolution is for a living wage. No one will criticize that. I think we all realize that the providing of work at just enough for sustenance is not a solution of the problem because what is scarce to-day in this country is purchasing power. The agriculturist, through the low price he receives for his products, has not sufficient purchasing power to do more than barely keep body and soul together. He cannot purchase the implements, the clothing, the furniture that he would like to have and should have to-day. The very essence of democracy in my opinion is this, that the primary producer, particularly the farmer—and you can carry it on down to the fisherman, the lumberman and the miner—shall be paid for his effort sufficient for a decent livelihood. That I think is the very essence of democracy.

The second point is equally important, and that is that those workers who are engaged in the actual production or transportation or distribution of these things should be paid a wage which will enable them to live decently. Those two factors are essential if we are to have a healthy democracy. And, Mr. Speaker, this resolution suggests that these employees should receive a living wage.

I am not going to go further into the question at this time, but I believe that if these matters are given earnest attention, and if the will to do them, the will to accomplish, is behind them, much may be accomplished. May I say with all kindness and all humility that we should drop perhaps the habit over the years we have formed in the house of looking backwards and forwards across the floor, and because someone here or someone over there makes a suggestion, of someone over there or someone here sneering at what is proposed, for it does seem to me, that we as adult and supposedly sane individuals act very often like a bunch of children when we are dealing with the well-being and the welfare and the bodies and souls, as one hon. member has put it, of human beings. Too often we treat these problems as if they were legitimate subjects to be bandied backwards and forwards on a partisan basis. I am accusing nobody, but I do say out of a long experience that we—and I include myself—are too prone to view these matters from that angle.

I suggest that the resolution in its principle and in its spirit, not in all its details, might be approved by the house and might form, shall I say, the basis for a coordinated effort on the part of parliament to do something towards a solution of this terrible problem of unemployment.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity to speak to this motion. It is important because again we have an opportunity of discussing one of the scars on our present system, and we find the suggestion made to-night that we apply a little more ointment. I was surprised to hear the suggestion made in the house to-night that we conscript the youth of this country and place them on the farm, and further that we should encourage people to go back to the land. There has been developing in the west over a period of years a situation which has caused much concern to the provincial governments in their efforts to help stay on the land people who have been farming there for twenty and thirty years.

This resolution suggests that we have a problem of unemployment. Unemployment is the reflex from a certain economic condition; in itself it is the cause of nothing. We have been in the habit of saying that we cannot find employment for our people and we suggest or infer that there is some particular virtue in employment. What has happened during the past five years? The Dominion of Canada has spent approximately $592,000,000 in connection with unemployment relief, and our problem is greater to-day than it ever was. Every time this question is raised in the house there comes up the predominant problem of money. Parliament is governed in its ability to do anything by its ability to extract taxation from the people. As time goes on this ability will become less; that is inevitable. We tried out a scheme of public works but found that it was costing too much for materials and was not meeting the requirements. Various suggestions have been made as to what can be done, but I say that this situation will continue while we continue to focus our attention upon unemployment as a problem. What is the economic system for? Is it to find employment? If it is, then this problem should have been solved long ago. An economic system should produce the maximum amount of goods and distribute them to all; its purpose should not be to find employment. Employment is incidental to production. The very fact that we have so much unemployment in this country and throughout the world proves that we are wealthy. We have accomplished that which man down through the ages has endeavoured to accomplish.

To anyone who dispassionately surveys the trend of events, it becomes more and more evident that government is nothing more than an administrative body to carry out the will of finance rather than the will of the people. We speak of democracy in one breath and then we speak of conscription in the next. What purpose is there in trying to keep afloat a ship that should have long since been sunk? Democracy is a splendid ideal for which Anglo-Saxons have fought down through the years, but I am convinced that more fighting must be done before we can enjoy a practical democracy which means, in its broadest terms, not just the freedom to vote, not just the right to walk the streets unmolested, not just the right to worship as we may or work as we will, but freedom from all restrictions that would otherwise impose the will of others upon us. Democracy is the freedom of the individual to pursue happiness and culture free from all influences detrimental to these objectives. To-day we are passing through a period strange to any age, strange because our environment is changing, not because people have desired these changes but because science has thrust them upon us.

Parliament is supposed to be composed of a body of men who have received instructions from the people of Canada to bring about certain results. The result demanded by the people at the last election was prosperity. It was not the business of the people to go into details as to how this prosperity should be brought about; it was the duty of the government to make use of those experts who know just what to do. It was the duty of the government to introduce legislation to bring about this end. The people demanded that the government bring down legislation or have laws enacted, which, when given effect to, would make available to the Canadian people the wealth of Canada, whether it be produced by hand, brain or solar energy. However, this is not being done, not because all the people who have been sent here are insincere but because the individuals who go to make up a government persist in moving along orthodox lines. Any hon. member who may be more enlightened than the rest, who may feel the responsibilities placed upon him by the people he represents and who dares to give expression to his views may soon be reminded that he belongs to a party and must act in the interests of the party. In so doing he elevates partyism and submerges the principles for which he was elected. The people of Canada asked the government, in language that was unmistakable, to bring about prosperity, to remove any or all of those barriers that stood in the way.

I recognize the difficulty that any government faces to-day. I realize the necessity for a transitional policy. I say "transitional" because I know we are having thrust upon us new conditions to which we must adapt ourselves, but in the meantime the greater portion of our citizens are suffering privation and want in the midst of plenty and potential plenty. Many schemes have been tried out and many volumes have been written suggesting to the various governing bodies just what they should do. We have built up in six years a system of camps as a means of looking after one portion of our problem. These camps were tolerated only because we felt they were of a temporary nature. However, they have now taken on the nature of a permanency. Their purpose in the first place was to provide a cheap means of feeding those who had been displaced by better industrial processes, coupled with a declining market for export goods and the ever diminishing demand for labour. There are those who believe sincerely that our only hope lies in a greater export market. No doubt it would help for a time if those markets were obtainable, but I do not believe they are. I look at the world to-day and I see its tremendous ability to produce an abundance plus the policy of every nation of self sufficiency. Surely our experience has taught us that the methods by which we obtained markets in the days that are gone are no longer available. We must realize that our problem is internal; that the only value of an export market is the means of exchanging our surpluses for the goods which are not common to the production of Canada. But this connot be done until we have monetary reform. Until we recognize that money in the final analysis is nothing but a ticket; until such time as we place in the hands of the people the tickets or tokens equal to our total price values, the complexities of this administration will be increased and the poverty of the Canadian people will become deeper and more widespread.

We have expressed so much concern for the economic rash. We are endeavouring to suppress it but we must know that there is no cure that way. You cannot feed your people when you must borrow to do so. By borrowing, you force the people of the future to carry a heavier load and mortgage the future. There is no cure that way. The disease goes much deeper than the skin; it is concerned with the vital processes of the body politic and to avoid substituting a more lingering horror it is necessary to restore these vital processes to health and balance functioning. The first act of the government should be to recognize the needs of the people and accede to their demands. First, they should find out what can be done, and then proceed to do it. Before this can be done we shall have to eliminate many traditional dogmas. I might add that the dogmas to which I refer do not belong particularly to the government benches.

Probably one of the greatest fallacies of the present generation is one most commonly expressed: I want work! This is repeated by governments when they say: We have an unemployment problem; we must put our people to work, the usual excuse being: We must give the taxpayers some return for the money they are spending. The people are thus led to believe that work has a particular virtue and that it will cure everything if we will just accept enough of it. The implication is that the sole purpose of an economic system is to find employment, while money is spoken of with reverence as though it had a quality superior to all things mortal or immortal. This is further emphasized as we review the attempts of governments to do something when the very thing without which we can do nothing is locked up in the tabernacle and the high priest demands that all who would use must first of all genuflect, and all must agree to be enslaved for all time. And if you protest you lose your respectability and are termed a radical, and you are referred to in a tone that suggests dishonour.

Is it the purpose of the government to find employment? And having created it, do they believe that all will be well with the people? If this be true then it is high time we scrapped the machine and hanged on the highest tree every scientist living to-day, because he is detrimental; he is unemploying men at a rapid rate. He is responsible for this national or international calamity; he is responsible for all the misery and poverty in the land, because government policy is one which dovetails into that philosophy that belongs to the dark ages—Men must work to live. The golden age of the world was before the advent of the machine, those glorious days when men worked from the cradle to the grave and when dying gasped out, "Thank God I avoided starvation."

After all, it is not long since the ignorant of the jungle and of the plain burned and slew men who practised white magic; it is not long since we burned Joan of Arc at the stake as a witch because she showed a courage that was unusual; it is not long since the people thought the world was flat, and just a few short years ago a large group were insisting that those crazy Wright brothers be placed in some mental institution because they were trying to build some infernal contraption to fly. But did you ever hear of a people, or I should say a government, who told men that they could not eat their fill because there was too much? This sounds very much like that Irishman who said, "Don't come down that ladder because I have taken it away."

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 2, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has substituted the name of Mr. Barber for that of Mr. Baker to act on the part of the House of Commons as a member of the joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

And that the clerk of the house do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

PENITENTIARIES COMMISSION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table a copy of the order in council appointing a royal commission to inquire into and report on the penal system of Canada.

POST OFFICE ACT

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Post Office Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker, I think the best way to explain the object of the bill will be for me to read the explanatory note. It is as follows:

The object of this bill is to abolish the obsolete and unsatisfactory system of awarding by tender contracts for the transportation of mail. Moreover, everyone knows that the principle of awarding mail contracts by tender and to the lowest tenderer has been more often disregarded than observed. It is sought by this bill to establish a more open and honest practice and at the same time allow the Postmaster General properly to remunerate the mail carriers who perform the important function of transporting the mail of Canada.

As the house will have observed, the object of the bill is to do away with the present system of awarding mail contracts by tender. The bill proposes, instead of the old system, to establish a system of awarding contracts at the discretion of the Postmaster General when the contract does not exceed $1,000, and at the discretion of the governor general in council when the contract is over $1,000, without tender and at a flat rate.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Civil Service Act (vacancies, outside service, priority to returned soldiers).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker, this bill has four objects in view. The first is to place the outside civil service outside the control of the civil service commission. Secondly, the bill proposes that it shall be obligatory for the civil service commission to consult the heads of departments before making appointments or promotions in order that the last word in making appointments and promotions may be with heads of departments, and not with the commission. Thirdly, the bill proposes to restrict to Canadian veterans the preference granted to veterans by the Civil Service Act. Lastly, the bill proposes that it shall be obligatory for the civil service commission, whenever they desire to appoint to a position in the civil service a candidate who has not resided five years in Canada, to bring the appointment before the cabinet. At the present time there is a blanket order in council and a regulation of the civil service commission which authorize the commission in certain cases to appoint to the civil service a person who has not had the necessary five years' residence in Canada. The bill proposes that in future it will be necessary for the civil service commission, whenever they feel the necessity of overriding the Civil Service Act in that respect, to come before the government and state the special reasons which necessitate such an appointment.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PERFORMING RIGHT SOCIETY

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) a question, and while I am on my feet I desire to extend to him our heartiest congratulations upon the occasion of his birthday and to wish him many happy returns of the day. The question I wanted to ask was whether the government intends during the present session to take any action on the report of Mr. Justice Parker with respect of the Canadian Performing Right Society.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I wish to thank my hon. friends for the very kind tribute they are paying me to-day; it will make it less difficult for me to bear the burdens of the coming years.

I am also pleased to be able to gratify the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier) with a favourable reply to his question. It is the intention of the government, through the Secretary of State, to introduce a bill based upon the report of His Honour Judge Parker, and I may have more to say in that regard when we reach the bill which has been proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), and which is already on the order paper. In reply to another hon. gentleman who has made a private request, I may say that I have extended the order prolonging the period during which no litigation shall take place in recovering performing rights. I refer to the order passed in connection with the inquiry made by His Honour Judge Parker. That order has been extended until April 30 of this year, and notice will be duly published in the Canada Gazette.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty's government in the Dominion of Canada and the government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think it perhaps desirable to correct some misapprehensions of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as indicated in his address the other day, before I deal more specifically with the provisions of the agreement which is now before the house for consideration. I do not desire to do this at any great length, nor would I bother the house were it not for the fact that, by not dealing with them, it might seem that I had accepted them as being a correct statement of the situation.

It is not correct to say that the Liberal party during all its existence has supported reciprocity, nor is it correct to say that the Conservative party has in any sense opposed it. I find, by reference to the statutes of 1868, that in the first statute dealing with such matters and enacted by this parliament provision was made whereby a standing offer to the United States was embodied in the statute, dealing with natural products; and later on, in 1879, when the national policy was introduced, provision was definitely made by which a statutory offer was extended to the United States. In order that there may be no misunderstanding with respect to that, it might perhaps be desirable to read the resolution upon which the statute was founded. It was resolution No. 5 and was submitted to the house by Sir Leonard Tilley on March 14, 1879:

That it is expedient to provide that any or all of the following articles, that is to say:—Animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meat (fresh, salted or smoked), may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this act, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation, when imported into Canada.

Upon that resolution a statute was founded, and in 1911, when the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding was introducing his reciprocity resolutions and moving the house into committee of ways and means, he quoted that resolution as indicating the attitude of the Conservative party with respect to the matter of reciprocity.

I also take sharp issue with the Prime Minister when he contends that the so-called national policy was introduced as a retaliatory measure against the United States. I have only to refer to what was said by the Minister of Finance in introducing the budget on March 14, 1879, at pages 411 and 415 of Hansard of that day, to correct any possible misunderstanding. Discussing the question of giving more favourable treatment to goods from Great Britain than to goods from foreign countries, he said:

I think this house will not object if, in the propositions before me, they touch more heavily the imports from foreign countries than from our fatherland.... But the government couple with the proposal, in order to show that we approach this question with no unfriendly spirit, a resolution that will be laid on the table containing a proposition to this effect: That, as to articles named, which are the natural products of the country, including lumber, if the United States take off the duties in part or in whole, we are prepared to meet them with equal concessions. The government believe in a reciprocity tariff, yet may discuss free trade or protection, but the question of to-day is—Shall we have a reciprocity tariff, or a one-sided tariff? The government propose to do more.

And then Sir Charles Tupper said:

I believe within two years from the adoption of the national policy—not a policy of hostility to the United States, but one of following the system they had adopted to foster their industries—they will give us a free market for coal in the United States.

Further, Sir Leonard Tilley made clear the object to be attained by the tariff then introduced:

But if we undertake, as the present government have undertaken, to readjust and reorganize, and I may say, make an entirely new tariff, having for its object not only the realization of $2,000,000 more revenue than will he collected this year, but, in addition to providing for that deficiency, to adjust that policy, or that tariff with a view of making what has been, and is to-day, declared the policy of the majority of this house—I mean the protection of the industries of the country—the magnitude of the undertaking will be the better appreciated.

These were the declarations made by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways of that day, Sir Leonard Tilley and Sir Charles Tupper, at the time the national policy became a part of the policy of this country, or at least the policy of the Conservative party, as it has been ever since.

I need hardly go further than to point out that every proposed reciprocity agreement that reached the point, shall I say, not of being signed but of a consensus between the parties was brought forward while the Republican party was in office in the United States. In 1874, when George Brown negotiated with the United States, the Republican party was in office; in 1911 when the agreement was negotiated Mr. Taft was president —a Republican president. The recent agreement was of course negotiated with a Democratic president. I mention this because it is desirable that there should be no misunderstanding with respect to the matter; for in the following years the United States expressed unwillingness to enter into agreements, as indicated a day or two ago; for in 1892 they declined to grant the concessions asked for by the government of that day, and in 1898, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier set up his joint high commission under the presidency of Lord Herschell, they sat for nearly a solid year without results, and it was at that time that Sir Wilfrid Laurier made it perfectly clear that he did not propose longer to concern himself with an effort to negotiate a treaty with the United States. He said:

There will be no more pilgrimages to Washington. We are turning our hopes to the old motherland.

And what is more, not only did Sir Wilfrid say that but that is what he practised, and though in 1887 and 1891 the elections were contested on commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, that was subsequently abandoned by the Liberal party. In consequence of the attitude taken by Mr. Blake and many others at that time, not only did he not go to the United States asking for further concessions after the joint high commission's failure, but he said he would not do it; and in 1911 it was not the action of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government that brought about the negotiations terminating in the proposals of 1911. I think it might be well to clear that up, because Mr. Fielding, in his letter to Mr. Knox, dwelt upon that point as one of some importance. He made it perfectly clear at that time that the initiative had come from the president of the day and not from himself or his government. The letter addressed to Mr. Knox—I will not read the whole of it, but it is important to keep it in mind—was dated at Washington on January 21, 1911:

Dear Mr. Secretary,—

The negotiations initiated by the president several months ago through your communication to his excellency the British ambassador respecting a reciprocal tariff arrangement between the United States and Canada, and since carried on directly between representatives of these two countries have now, we are happy to say, reached a stage which gives reasonable assurance of a conclusion satisfactory to both countries.

Then follows this, after two intervening paragraphs:

The governments of the two countries having made this agreement from the conviction that, if confirmed by the necessary legislative authorities, it will benefit the people on both sides of the border line, we may reasonably hope and expect that the arrangement, if so confirmed, will remain in operation for a considerable period. Only this expectation on the part of both governments would justify the time and labour that have been employed in the maturing of the proposed measures. Nevertheless, it is distinctly understood that we do not attempt to bind for the future the action of the United States Congress, or the Parliament of Canada, but that each of these authorities shall be absolutely free to make any change of tariff policy or of any other matter covered by the present arrangement that may be deemed expedient. We look for the continuance of the arrangement, not because either party is bound to it, but because of our conviction that the more liberal trade policy thus to be established will be viewed by the people of the United States and Canada as one which will strengthen the friendly relations now happily prevailing and promote the commercial interests of both countries.

That was a declaration by Mr. Fielding of the circumstances under which these negotiations were carried on. They failed because the Canadian people were not prepared to adopt them. The United States congress did approve them; but it must be within the memory of every member of this house that upon the very first opportunity afforded to the people of the United States to pass upon them they defeated them; the Republican administration was defeated at the polls and succeeded by the administration of Mr. Wilson. So that on the one hand you have the Canadian people rejecting the proposals, and on the other hand you have the United States people rejecting them at the first opportunity that was offered them so to do. That, I think, makes the record clear so far as that point is concerned, and there can be no misunderstanding, it seems to me, with respect to that part of the matter.

Let us now correct another misapprehension on the part of the right hon. gentleman, that is with respect to what took place after this government came into office. I wonder if for the moment the right hon. gentleman forgot that in June of 1930 the Hawley-Smoot tariff was enacted,—enacted despite the fact that in his place as prime minister he had asked this house and the country not to provoke them lest they do something more severe than that which they had done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never did anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it is in Hansard. I can read it. Will somebody get me Hansard?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the whole of it. You misread it last time.

Mr. BENNETT: And that the British preference should not be increased lest peradventure that might provoke the United States to further action. Those were the statements made by the right hon. gentleman in this house in 1930, about which there can be no possible doubt.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not.

Mr. BENNETT: They have been read too often for there to be any misunderstanding as to what they are.

That being so, let us analyze the next step with reference to it. There was in power in Washington in 1930 a Republican administration, and when the late government came into office it found Mr. Hoover the president of the United States, whose congress had just enacted the Hawley-Smoot tariff. But at the same time provision had been made whereby, in the event of its being concluded that an unfair tariff advantage was being given to the United States, application might be made to the tariff board for the purpose of securing if possible a report that the tariff was excessive, in which event the president was authorized to make a proclamation to reduce the tariff not beyond fifty per cent of what the existing tariff was. Many cases were heard by the tariff commission; amongst others, the tariff item with respect to maple sugar. When our minister went to the United States in 1931 he found, as I have said, a Republican administration in office, and his first effort, as the records of the department will show, was to bring to the attention of the American government the anomalies of their tariff as they affected cattle, hoping that an opportunity might be afforded before the tariff commission to deal with this matter in accordance with the provisions of the law to which I have referred. I personally know, as every member of this house probably knows from reading, that the president of the United States was not in accord with some of the provisions of the Hawley-Smoot tariff. He made it perfectly clear in public statements that he did not agree with them and that he was not unsympathetic to the suggestions made that we should endeavour to bring the matter before the tariff board. In fact an application was filed, but no action followed. During the whole of the period of office of President Hoover, namely during the year 1930, the remainder of the year after the late government came into office, the whole of the year 1931, the whole of the year 1932, and until March, 1933, the Hawley-Smoot tariff stood in its entirety and Mr. Hoover remained the president of the United States. And yet the right hon. gentleman asked the other day what the government was doing in 1931 and 1932 and 1933. Now I would ask him what he was doing from 1921 until 1930, dealing with Republican administrations under the same conditions. There need be no misapprehension, therefore, as to what the facts were, when the high tariffs of the Hawley-Smoot schedule still prevailed until 1933. But bear in mind, sir, they still continue; for there has been no legislation in the United States since 1933 dealing with the position of tariffs except through treaties or agreements made with various countries to which I shall presently refer.

Now that is important. There was not a change of government in the United States until March, 1933, and just as soon as that government came into office, as the records of the department of the Secretary of State will show, we pressed that there should be an adjustment of the tariff relations between the two countries. But the president, unwilling to open up the tariff schedules in congress, and unwilling as he was under the conditions that then prevailed to risk the possibility, nay the certainty of the United States senate rejecting any tariff treaty that might be made, did what? He proposed legislation dealing with monetary problems, dealing with many other problems, with agriculture, many matters of the kind, and he then intimated that he proposed to have introduced into congress a measure affecting tariff questions, giving him executive authority to deal with those matters as he thought best, with such limitations as might be imposed upon his powers. In 1933 the measure was withdrawn; it was fiercely resisted, and it did not come into effect. Therefore the year 1933 went by with no legislation, but on June 12, 1934, the president signed the bill, which then became a statute, whereby executive power was conferred upon him by congress to make trade agreements with countries, subject first to there not being a greater reduction than fifty per cent, second that the period should be fixed at three years, and third that there should be no change from dutiable to free goods and, e converso, from free to dutiable; he had no such power. The last condition was that before he took this executive action he had to issue a proclamation indicating that he proposed to deal with whatever country was being dealt with, in order that those who might be interested should have an opportunity to present their objections, if they had any, to such an arrangement being made.

That was in June, 1934, and the records of the department will show that from the date that the act came into force, continuously until action was taken, there was constant communication between the department of state and the Canadian legation at Washington in an effort to have action taken in accordance with the provisions of the statute to which I have referred. It was ascertained very early, in fact it was known before, that it was a cardinal principle of any negotiations being entered into at all that the United States should receive from Canada or from any other country with which an agreement was made, an undertaking that the tariff concessions granted to the United States would be as great as those granted to any other country in the world, except in their own case with respect to their peninsular possessions and Cuba, with which country they had a special treaty arrangement. On our part we made it clear as a government that it was absolutely a sine qua non to the carrying on of negotiations at all that the entire British preferences were to be untouched and that any negotiations carried on should be carried on not only subject to the provisions of those agreements but subject also to their future modification or extension.

That being so we embodied in a document our proposals for negotiation. At first the right hon. gentleman read the words as though he thought those were proposals, though I am frank to say that when attention was directed to it he modified his statement and said those were proposals for negotiation. So the proposals for negotiation were embodied in a note dated November, 1934, to which a reply was received in December and again the records of the department will show that efforts were being made constantly to induce action to be taken. But there was a reason why the president found it difficult to deal with some of these matters, a reason, I doubt not, that is in the minds of many members of the house at this moment. It was the fact that during the election campaign the president had made certain statements at Baltimore with respect to what he proposed to do in connection with agricultural commodities, and this was being constantly thrust upon his attention by those who were deeply interested in the maintenance of existing tariff legislation in connection with agricultural products. What were those words? On October 26, 1933, speaking during the election campaign at Baltimore, the president said:

[Mr. Bennett.]

My distinguished opponent is declaring in his speeches that I have proposed to injure or destroy the farmers' markets by reducing the tariff on products of the farm. That is silly. Of course I have made no such proposal, nor can any speech or statement I have made be so construed. I said in my Sioux City speech, in discussing the Hawley-Smoot tariff act of 1930:

"Of course, the excessive, outrageously excessive rates in that bill must come down, but we should not lower them beyond the point indicated."

The point indicated was that no tariff duty should be lowered to a point where our natural industries would be injured....

Of course, it is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products.... I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

That statement was being constantly presented to the attention of the president, and it made it increasingly difficult for the government of Canada, dealing with the question of negotiations on farm products, to make progress. Finally, however, in January, 1935, a proclamation was issued; interested parties were heard and the negotiations continued. Those negotiations were difficult by reason of the statement made by the president in connection with agricultural products; they were difficult because the very moment it was suggested that it was proposed to negotiate, a great body of public opinion crystallized against any such action being taken. Finally we did get certain preliminary discussions concluded. The matter of cattle, which was dealt with in a slightly different way than it is in the agreement now before us, lumber, whiskey and so on—all these matters were early determined without difficulty, but when it came down to the question of what concessions the Dominion of Canada was to receive for the concessions that were sought the difficulty began. When I say to this house, as I presently shall, that we could not possibly agree to give the concessions that are given by this agreement for the slight concessions we were offered, I but state the simple truth, and I shall give the reasons why. In order that there may be no difficulty as to what was said by my right hon. friend in his speech in this house on April 9, 1929—speaking from memory I said 1930, but it was 1929—I quote from Hansard for that year:

Having that knowledge before us—

The right hon. gentleman was speaking of the knowledge they had of the situation.

—I ask hon. gentlemen irrespective of party: In the condition of prosperity which Canada is to-day enjoying would it be desirable on the part of the administration to take any action with respect to the tariff in Canada at the present time which by those across the line who may be interested in seeking to raise the tariff in that country could be regarded as provocative? I say that with the knowledge which we have before us at the present time, were we to do what hon. gentlemen opposite by their amendment apparently wish us to do, namely raise the tariff, we would be creating in the minds of the American people the very sentiment which would cause them to raise their tariff higher perhaps than it was ever their intention to raise it. We do not intend to take any action of that provocative character....

Well, they have an explanation now, which perhaps will help to correct it.

I wish to repeat—and I do not think this can be made too clear—that so far as the United States tariff is concerned that is a matter which the government of that country must settle for itself in accordance with its own interest. And the United States will be the first to recognize, if in any action they take our trade with them is adversely affected, that it is our right and our duty, and should be and will be our policy to see to it that we make such arrangements with respect to our tariff as will further our interests in our own way.

Having said this much may I again make clear, what I wish above all else to make clear, not only in this connection but in all others, living as we do beside the United States as near neighbours, it is in the interests alike of the United States and of this country, and in the larger interests of the British Empire, that so far as we can, with respect to all our relations, we each conduct our affairs in a spirit which will help to advance mutual interest, and which will help to avoid steps that may lead in the opposite direction.

I read the whole of that passage in order that it may not be said that I left out any part of it. Then there was a further question with respect to the matter of the British preference, which need not be mentioned now. I want to go a step further, however, because this affords me an opportunity of making this statement. We have to thank the action taken by this parliament in 1930 and the empire agreements for being able to make any contract at all with the United States. I say that, Mr. Speaker, not from hearsay; I have it direct from the government of the United States, that it was because we enacted the tariffs of 1930 and the agreements of 1932 that they were willing or desirous to negotiate with us at all, and that looks reasonable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my right hon. friend produce the documents?

Mr. BENNETT: I said I had it from a member of the government. Obviously I cannot mention names, for the reason the right hon. gentleman mentioned the other day, but he can verify that if he will make the necessary application, and I will give him the name privately if he so desires.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think my right hon. friend should make mention of any statement unless he is able to give names.

Mr. BENNETT: What nonsense! I think the right hon. gentleman will agree that one may often have to make reference to what governments have said without referring to the person who made the statement. The government said it. And it is perfectly clear that but for the fact that Canada through this parliament in 1930 responded to the action of the United States by enacting the tariffs they did to protect this country fittingly against the adverse barriers that were raised against us, and enacted the British trade agreements, we should have had no proposals for any kind of reciprocity agreement at all. That I think is beyond question.

Let us go a step further. There continued until the end during the period of time that we were in office a constant endeavour to negotiate an agreement—I say, a constant endeavour. But during the election campaign I said on every platform what I repeat here, that I would not become a party to making any agreement with any country, not even the motherland, that gave anyone a preference over Canadians in the Canadian market. That is the position I took and always will take with respect to this country; and when I point out what the effect of this agreement is upon Canada and Canadian trade the house will understand why the government of that day was not prepared to enter into the agreement that has been entered into by hon. gentlemen opposite. We could have made an agreement such as is now before the house—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why didn't you?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman says, "Why didn't you?" Because I prefer my country to office and power. I can understand, sir, the smiles of some, the laughs and jeers of others, because before I conclude this statement I shall show that it is upon the very principles I enunciated that we oppose this agreement. We oppose it because it sacrifices Canada, because it is detrimental to the interests of this dominion, because it gives everything we have to give and gets little in return. That is why we object to it. That is why in 1899 Sir Wilfrid Laurier made the statement he did.

I said the other day that I would, and I am sorry I hurried on without doing it, give the American record of these proceedings. I now quote from what Mr. Foster said as to the attitude, not of this government but of the government led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in days past with respect to these matters. He realized how difficult it was to make a bargain; he realized what the effect of it would be, and he declined in 1898 to enter into an agreement. I shall read from what Mr. Foster said as to the circumstances under which he took that action. In his Diplomatic Memoirs, at the beginning of volume II, General Foster, who became Secretary of State of the United States, said:

> I have referred in previous chapters to the interest manifested by President Arthur in the development of commercial reciprocity, and to the steps taken by his administration to inaugurate and carry forward such a system of exchange with foreign countries. His defeat in the national convention of his party in 1884, followed by the election of President Cleveland, who was opposed to the system, resulted in the failure of the three treaties which had been negotiated with Mexico, with Spain for Cuba and Porto Rico, and with San Domingo.
> But the return of the Republicans to power in the election of President Harrison in 1888 revived the reciprocity projects. Special arrangements or treaties for the favoured exchange of products with other nations were not an entirely new measure. During the presidency of Jackson a treaty made with France (1831) contained commercial reciprocity provisions. In 1843 President Tyler instructed our minister to Prussia, Mr. Wheaton, to negotiate with the Germanic Customs Union, or Zollverin, "a commercial treaty, which, while it will open new advantages to the agricultural interests of the United States and a more free and expanded field for commercial operations, will affect injuriously no existing interest in the union."

Then follows a statement of other measures, until he arrives at the time when in 1892 there was passed a tariff act containing provisions for reciprocity only one of which could in any circumstances have reference to Canada. He points out the difficulty of negotiating that, how in fact he did negotiate with the West Indies; Jamaica was the last to come in, and finally representatives of the Leeward Islands and others arrived in Washington to make treaties. There was difficulty with Jamaica until the very end. He proceeds to point out the difficulty they had with Germany, and then comes this significant statement, that the Liberal party had come into office in Canada and desired to negotiate an agreement. The Conservatives had sent down delegates three in number in 1892, and letters were received from various men in Canada who were friends of General Foster, pointing out that this was being used for political reasons, and that he should not negotiate with those Conservatives, although he must do his duty. Then Goldwin Smith went to Washington, and his letter is set out in this volume. Then this follows:

> Since the reciprocity conference at Washington in 1892, the Liberal party had been quite active in Canadian politics, and had finally succeeded in driving the Conservatives from power. The Liberals have encouraged expectations that, once in control of the government, they would pursue a more enlightened and neighbourly policy towards the United States, but these expectations were doomed to disappointment. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, now Prime Minister, and Sir Louis Davies, another member of the new Liberal cabinet, accompanied the Canadian experts to Washington, and they and I attended the meeting of the experts.
> After the labours of the latter had been concluded, I held several unofficial conferences with Messrs. Laurier and Davies, and sought to bring them to some agreement for the better protection of the seals; but they were unwilling to take up this subject alone, and insisted that we should enter upon a consideration of various other matters, prominent among which was the old question of commercial reciprocity.

Then he refers to the appointment of the joint high commission. The members on the part of the United States were Senators Fairbanks and Gray, Congressmen Dingley, John W. Foster, John A. Kasson, and T. J. Coolidge; and on the part of Great Britain Lord Herschell, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Richard Cartwright, Sir Louis H. Davies, and Hon. John Charlton, M.P., and on the part of Newfoundland, Sir James Winter.

After referring to the various meetings, and the failure of the commission, and having already placed on record the statement of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1899 as to what he felt about the failure, I quote these words from page 188:

> It would be tedious if I should attempt to give even a brief résumé of the weeks and months of laborious examination and discussion of the various subjects submitted to the commission. On several of them a practical agreement was reached. On the sealing question the general principle of settlement was agreed to, and doubtless the details could have been arranged. On reciprocity little progress was made. Notwithstanding the professions of the Liberals when out of power and in the heat of a political campaign, in the commission they assumed much the same position as the Conservative delegates who came to Washington in 1892.

Then he went on:

> .... The commission adjourned at Washington February 20, 1899, never again to be reassembled.

What was the reason Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his associates in 1898 took the view they did? It is a matter of record; it was because they were asked to give too much for what they could secure in return. And when we come to this bargain that has been made by the right hon. gentleman I shall point out that had the principles which governed Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1898 prevailed, it would have been impossible to make any such agreement as that now before the house.

Having placed this upon Hansard, as I should have done a few minutes before, I desire to continue with respect to the negotiations. The right hon. gentleman has stated the conditions under which he entered into the negotiations; the limited powers of the president, the power to grant not more than fifty per cent reduction in the tariffs of the United States; the limitation as to time. And by the way, in that particular the right hon. gentleman did me an injustice. My objection in 1911 was to the fact that there was no time specified, but that it could be, as Mr. Fielding points out in his letter, terminated at the sweet will of either party without notice. But this agreement is for three years certain, a fixed period. It may be continued, and can be terminated only on six months' notice. I omitted to read one item from General Foster with respect to that; Germany raised the same question in dealing with her problems. She entered into an agreement with the United States and found it so unsatisfactory that she complained bitterly because when a new government came into office the agreement that had been made under a previous administration was no longer in force. And he says:

> The most pronounced of these protests came from Germany while the bill was pending, in which the minister in Washington stated that the German agricultural and manufacturing circles entertained the belief above mentioned.

That is, that this was an unfair thing to do, to terminate the agreement they made. General Foster adds this very pregnant observation:

> One of the inconveniences of our Republican form of government, with its recurring elections, is that it brings about sudden and radical changes of administration, so that it is difficult to maintain a uniform or permanent foreign commercial policy.

And then he refers to difficulties in connection with the senate approving any act of that kind. Hence it was that we asked that at least some period of time should be specified, because, by reason of circumstances to which I have referred, I have seen many men in western Canada engaged in the cattle business who have been ruined, as I said the other day, because they had no time to change their arrangements with respect to their herds before the provisions of the Underwood bill were ended.

One step further. Not only did Germany apply, but other countries did as well. This is one of the reasons why at one time we considered ten years when negotiating the British-Canadian agreement. It was thought three years would be a fairer time, and three years was the term provided by the act of congress, commonly known as the trade agreements act. But congress was not prepared to grant to the president power by executive action beyond the period of three years, and then subject to the conditions I have mentioned. Further, they were insistent that the agreements should not last longer than three years, and if they did they should be subject to termination upon six months' notice.

I mention this because it becomes important to remember, in the light of what later transpired. And may I here point out this: It was said the other day by the right hon. gentleman opposite that until his death Sir Wilfrid Laurier kept on urging that there should be an acceptance of what might be called the standing offer by the government of the United States. Surely my right hon. friend has not forgotten that the Underwood tariff was passed in 1913, and that under that tariff we enjoyed free entry to the United States on practically all items that we were receiving free entry on under the reciprocity agreement, and we got this without giving anything, except one thing. We passed an order in council saying that wheat, wheat flour and semolina should have free entry into Canada because the United States had said that those three articles should freely enter their country to enable similar articles from their country to enter Canadian markets. Does anyone suggest—and I am sure my right hon. friend is not fair to his great leader—that the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier was advocating that we should accept an agreement that was not as favourable to Canada as was the Underwood tariff? Does anyone suggest that? And Sir Wilfrid Laurier died in 1919, the Underwood tariff continuing until 1921, when the emergency tariff was passed in the United States. So that from 1913 to 1921 we had the Underwood tariff, with free access to the United States market for our cattle, for our fish, for our lumber, but with certain limitations with respect to certain kinds of lumber. The fact is, however, that we had access to the United States market on terms and conditions much more favourable than under the Taft-Fielding agreement, with respect to lumber, one of the great items of trade. The same may be said with respect to other items.

I do not desire to do more than direct the attention of the members of the house to the provisions of the Underwood tariff, because it is one of the most important of the many tariffs which have been passed in the United States. It represented in action the views of President Wilson, when he was a candidate. The Underwood tariff gave our cattle, our meat, our lumber and our fish, about which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) used to speak, access to the markets of the United States.

But in 1921, when the new Republican party returned to office they enacted an emergency tariff which at once placed duties against many of these articles. As I said the other day, the cattle industry, for instance, is one which can flourish only if preparations are made for a term of years. You cannot market cattle with any degree of success under a short agreement; it takes one, two, three or perhaps four years to secure the best results. Out in western Canada when the emergency tariff was passed by the Republican congress of the United States, nullifying and destroying the Underwood tariff, it brought disaster and ruin to the larger cattle dealers of this country, a disaster from which they never recovered.

I think if hon. members will pause for a moment and consider they will realize that without paying anything in exchange, in 1913 President Wilson gave to Canada largely all, and in some instances more advantages than were obtained under the Taft-Fielding agreement of 1911, and that was only two years later. This indicates the uncertainty to which General Foster refers in connection with matters of this kind.

Here there was a country offering to do something for us. As Mr. Fielding said in the debate, we could not change a single item without voiding the whole. Sir Robert Borden asked him if it was indivisible, and he replied, "Yes, on all things." I will give one item, Portland cement, which carried eleven cents in the Fielding-Knox tariff agreement. The present rate is eight cents. It was reduced, and to reduce it would have meant an abrogation of the agreement. The same applies with respect to lumber; we received more favourable treatment with respect to lumber under the Underwood tariff than we did under the Fielding-Knox proposals. So that we have Sir Wilfrid Laurier making suggestions unsuccessfully, immediately after the reductions under the measure of 1911, that it should be availed of. But I have not been able to find any time after 1913, when the Underwood tariff came into being, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier suggested, publicly at least, that we should go back to a higher tariff structure for the purpose of enabling Canadians to trade. Of course there were in the Fielding-Knox agreement items that were lower in tariff incidence than were the items in the Underwood tariff. But in the important items which affected us, cattle, fish and lumber, such was not the case. I mention that in passing.

Let us see what the real situation was that confronted the late government when they reached a point at which they had to decide whether they would or would not make an agreement on the proposals submitted. First, the Prime Minister has correctly stated the limitations upon the powers of the president. Those limitations were of such a character that if we got everything that he could give us we would get concessions of only fifty per cent on the tariff charges then made against us. I shall presently point out that if we got fifty per cent on every item in the tariff we would still be paying, in some instances, a higher tariff than that which prevailed under the Fordney-McCumber rates. That is a fact to keep in mind. I shall give one illustration of this as I proceed. This is the position as I saw it, as my colleagues saw it, as the government saw it and as they instructed their minister to see it: First, the Dominion of Canada is a country with a population of less than eleven million people, inhabiting half a continent in the north temperate zone; on the other hand we find one hundred and twenty-seven million people who are inhabitants of a country with practically every variety of climate known to man. On the one hand, there was a new country without accumulated wealth undertaking a great development, a country that had built railroads on a great scale and that must look to increasing traffic if they were to maintain their economic position among the great nations of the world. On the other hand, there was a vast country, the richest in the world, a country of great reserve power represented by the accumulation of wealth. I shall not take time to refer to those conditions described by Mr. Blake or Sir Richard Cartwright as long ago as 1879, but here we were, a hardy, sturdy people, endeavouring to build a nation on the northern half of this continent, in the north temperate zone alongside a country of 127,000,000 of people inhabiting half a continent and with every variety of product being produced and every variety of climate that the world knows. Ah, more; for we were buying from them $28.86 worth per head during the year before while they were buying from us $2.23 per head.

Mr. BRADETTE: That means nothing—multiply it by ten.

Mr. BENNETT: It may not mean anything to hon. gentlemen opposite but it means a great deal to those who think seriously, and

I will tell you why. The net result was that it made an unfavourable balance of trade against this country of hundreds of millions of dollars, and that is an important thing to keep in mind.

I will go a step further and give the figures for 1934 with respect to trade balances, because I regard them as being of the utmost importance. What was our position? We have a commodity balance, which is a visible balance, and we have an invisible balance of interest, insurance and freights; and these together constitute the relations of one country to the other with respect to trade. In 1934, according to an estimate made by United States authorities, and which agree in the main with the figures supplied by our own bureau of statistics, the United States had a $70,000,000 credit on the commodity exchange between the two countries; and mark you, in 1934 it had been reduced to $70,000,000 by the most painful efforts that a government ever had to undertake. We either had to reduce that $200,000,000 which it once was to a lower figure or else we had to default; there was no question as to that. That was the position with which we were faced.

On our tourist traffic we had a favourable balance in 1934 of $74,000,000; in other words, this tourist industry in 1934 overcame the adverse commodity or trading balance against this country and there was an excess of $4,000,000 in our favour. We had reduced, on the one hand, the trading balance against us by every means within our power, and on the other hand we had stimulated the development of tourist traffic by every means at our disposal.

On immigration, remittances and charities, once more the balance was against us to the amount of $3,000,000.

Then, we come to shipping and freight: On freight passing through the United States and coming into this country they had a claim against us of $6,000,000. On miscellaneous items they had a further charge against us of $6,000,000. On total goods and services there was another balance of $5,000,000 in favour of the United States.

With respect to interest payments in 1934 they amounted to $51,000,000 against us. When I come to direct earnings on investments, that is, the income received by Canadians as against the income paid to people in the United States by people in Canada, there was a balance in favour of the United States of $48,000,000. Bank transactions in their favour amounted to $4,000,000.

Then we did what we have not been accustomed to do in years gone by. By reason of the action taken by this parliament, gold was no longer being treated for purely monetary purposes, and so we treated our exports of gold to the United States as a commodity, and that gave us a favourable balance against the United States of $87,000,000. Then the silver balance and the currency balance was against us to the amount of $2,000,000. So that at the end of 1934, despite the most heroic struggles from 1930 to 1934 that a people have ever made to meet the situation that had developed by reason of the circumstances to which I have referred, the United States had a balance against this dominion of $19,000,000.

We pointed out in the note that we sent to them that this disparity should be dealt with in some way, and we had a right to ask them not only to treat us on an equality basis, but if they desired to give us an opportunity for fair treatment, shall I say, we should have the maximum benefits that could come to us under the limited powers which the president possessed. Confronted with that adverse balance which we had to meet there were other matters which we had to think of. Let us see what they were. Let us look them fairly in the eye.

When we were negotiating for an agreement we were not ignorant of the fact that the exports of this country, exclusive of our domestic requirements, were a matter of transcendent importance not only to our monetary system but with respect to our whole economic structure and life. It may not generally be known, but the fact is that the population of Canada has shifted to the extent that one half of our people are now living in cities and towns. That happened for the first time at the time of the census of 1931, and the trend has increased since. There are more and more people now in cities and towns looking for employment in factories, mills and industrial plants of various kinds than ever before. According to the bureau of statistics, in the year 1934, 82$\frac{9}{10}$ per cent in value of all our agricultural production was used at home, and only 17$\frac{1}{10}$ per cent of our entire agricultural production found a market abroad. That includes everything. Let us go a step further; let us look at manufactures.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BENNETT: I would prefer not just now. After I am through, if it would serve any useful purpose, if the hon. member desires to ask a question I shall be glad to answer it, but I am not here to be cross-examined.

What percentage of our manufactured goods, think you, is consumed in this country by our own population living in towns, cities and villages and working in mills, factories and industrial plants, and by people living on the farms, consuming our manufactures? No less than eighty-six per cent of the total.

Mr. EULER: For what year?

Mr. BENNETT: For the year 1934, and I take that year because it is the year we were negotiating, the last year for which I could get the complete figures. The figure was eighty-six per cent of the total, leaving for export abroad only fourteen per cent of our manufactured products, $17\frac{1}{10}$ per cent of our agricultural products, and a substantial quantity of raw materials. The net result of all that was to place the Dominion of Canada in the position where it ranked fifth among the exporting countries of the world.

Confronted with that position, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and any hon. member of this house, what was the duty of those speaking for the Dominion of Canada and seeking to negotiate an agreement with a country of the richness and the variety of products and climate of the United States of America? We conceived it to be our duty to make a proposal on the basis of broad and generous treatment provided we got broad and generous treatment in return, and I have no hesitation in saying that for the concessions granted we had a right to receive from the United States of America over a fifty per cent reduction in every tariff item. What do we give under this agreement? First, there is the intermediate tariff involving substantially 700 items. No one has yet stated in this house how much that means in revenue, but the officials estimate—they did in my time—that for the fiscal year 1934-35 it would mean $5,000,000 as a minimum. Secondly, we granted most favoured nation treatment under this agreement. That means that no concession can be made to any country in the world except within the British empire of terms more favourable than those granted to the United States. The estimate of that loss of revenue is somewhere between $800,000 and $1,000,000. So that the total is approximately $6,000,000—

Mr. DUNNING: That is about right.

Mr. BENNETT: —without taking into consideration the added volume of trade.

Mr. EULER: That would be provided the importations were of the same amount.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. Now, making allowance for that, an American authority estimates that the loss will be $9,000,000. I can only give you the figures he has arrived at, and I shall presently show you how he reached that conclusion. Let us go a step further. We promise under the agreement to make further reductions in the rate of duty on United States products coming into Canada, with respect to sixty-eight items. I was surprised the other day when I read the white paper to find a long list of goods on which the United States gave us a reduction in tariff, and then I compared it with the list of goods on which we gave the United States a reduction; and in the one instance, in the white paper, you will observe that the percentages are carried out into the fourth column, whereas in the one dealing with Canada there are no percentages stated.

I took the trouble to work them out, and what do you think they are? The percentages, between the general tariff and the intermediate tariff, applied to the items appearing on page 35 and the following pages, are roughly these, without going into them in great detail. I will merely indicate the percentages in sequence: 50 per cent; 100 per cent; 20 per cent; $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; 50 per cent; 100 per cent; 100 per cent; 100 per cent; 100 per cent; 100 per cent; 50 per cent; 50 per cent; 50 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: How can you reduce anything 100 per cent?

Mr. BENNETT: By wiping it out, by making it free.

Mr. DUNNING: Why not say so?

Mr. BENNETT: I thought, from what has happened, the hon. gentleman did not have any more appreciation of it than that. On page 37 I find items of 100 per cent, 100 per cent, 100 per cent, and then you go to 50 per cent, $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent, $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent, then as low as $8\frac{1}{3}$ per cent, then 25 per cent—a series of 25 per cent, a long series—then $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent, 100 per cent, 50 per cent, 50 per cent, $66\frac{2}{3}$ per cent, 20 per cent, and so on and so on. I need not go through it all. The singular thing was this. Why was it necessary to make a statement of percentages of reduction given by the United States without showing the corresponding action taken in the dominion? Why do we have to work it out for ourselves?

Mr. DUNNING: The word "free" is much clearer to the average understanding.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course; but I am asking why it does not show the percentages.

Why hide the percentage if it is necessary in the one instance? Because in the one instance the President of the United States was prevented by congress from going beyond 50 per cent; that was the maximum. But here there was no such limitation imposed, and you have all these items indicated. Look them over, study them, and ask yourselves whether in your opinion this country is receiving fair and adequate consideration for what it is giving, when you compare these rates with those that are accorded to us. How is it possible to say that it is a fair bargain that limits the concession received to not more than fifty per cent, while granting reductions at rates from one hundred per cent down to eight and a half per cent, on very large numbers of items to which I shall presently refer, items of the first importance to this dominion? The other day I found a motion on the order paper dealing with the problem of market gardens and matters of that kind—a motion placed there by an hon. member. Under this agreement we have made very extensive concessions in respect of the matters to which I refer.

Then we place on the list of free goods about twenty items that are now dutiable. In No. 5 we undertake not to increase the existing rate of duty on seventy-seven items, and we promise to maintain on the free list some fifteen items. It is only fair to state that with relation to that matter, the United States has bound itself not to increase certain free items during the term of the agreement, as we also have done. Then there comes the other concession we make—the abolition of direct shipment advantages in so far as all favoured nation treaties are concerned. If that were limited to ports on the sea, on river or on lake, the argument might be made, as the right hon. gentleman made it the other day; but the letter written by the charge d'affaires at Washington to the United States government extends that promise at least to customs entry ports. I know of no such similar concession in this country. Certainly none of the favoured nation treaties contains any such clause, and I shall presently refer to them. Then there is the cancellation of values under section 43 and the revision of values for duty purposes, under No. 8; and under No. 9 there is the $100 tourist exemption.

I am going to analyze these briefly, because in view of what the Prime Minister said the other day with respect to the consideration of the various items in committee it becomes unnecessary for me to do more than direct attention to them in a broad and general way. First of all let us determine to what extent we have free items in our schedules. That is a matter of importance—the number of them. In our tariff items over 1,200 in number, so I am informed, we have 336 free items under all tariffs; under the British preferential tariff the number is 368, or 32 more, and under the intermediate only there are 4. The free items in the United States number only 214. I put it to the house whether or not, having regard to trade balances and matters of that character, this can be regarded as a fair deal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if, in what he is saying, he is considering the interests of the consumer?

Mr. BENNETT: I am considering the interests of Canada as a whole; for unless the interest of the whole is considered the consumers have no interest to consider. Let us go a step further.

Mr. DUNNING: We are all consumers.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, we are all consumers, but there must be production antecedent to consumption. That is always worth keeping in mind.

I come next to what I am sure most members of this house are thinking very seriously about; that is, with whom is this treaty made? I am one of those who have always been more or less alarmed and concerned about the favoured nation clauses in our treaties. I confess I found it difficult to negotiate with France when by our granting a concession to France on a suggested item some other country would get the benefit of it and France would not get it at all. That was true of many items that were discussed in connection with the French treaty, and the French withdrew from their position when they saw that not they but somebody else would profit by it. As far as we are concerned the position is a very simple one. We have said that we are to receive from the United States the benefits that may accrue from any treaty they make with any other country in the world. That is, we will get benefits from the United States agreement with Sweden because special concessions were given to Sweden with respect to certain types of pulp. We will get benefits, not only from the group with which the first treaty was made, but benefits, possibly small, from some other countries. For the moment I content myself with pointing out that at the present time the treaties of the United States are with some eleven countries, and eleven only. Some of these were negotiated before and some since the agreement that we now have before us for consideration. Before looking at their provisions possibly I should take our own country and deal with the position which we occupy so far as favoured nation treaties are concerned with other countries of the world. There are some twenty-eight of them.

With respect to the British empire the position is extremely simple. The following countries enjoy the British preferential tariff: the United Kingdom, Union of South Africa, Ascension, Australia, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Bermuda, British Guiana, British Honduras, British India, British North Borneo, British West Indies, Brunei, Cameroons, Cayman Islands, Ceylon, Channel Islands, Cyprus, Falkland Islands, Fiji, Gambia, Gold Coast, Irish Free State, Isle of Man, Kenya Colony and Protectorate, Malay States, federated and unfederated, Mauritius and dependencies thereof, Newfoundland, New Guinea, New Zealand, Nigeria colony and protectorate, Nyassaland protectorate, Rhodesia, Northern and Southern, St. Helena, Western Samoa, Sarawak, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somaliland protectorate, Straits Settlements, Swaziland, Tanganyika Territory, Togoland, British sphere of; Tonga or Friendly Islands, Uganda protectorate.

British countries entitled to most favoured nation treatment in addition to any possible advantages under the British preference are: the United Kingdom, Australia, Irish Free State, South Africa and New Zealand. Countries that enjoy the intermediate tariff—all of which I may say was done through the late administration—are: Australia, Brazil Germany and Hongkong. They enjoy the intermediate tariff in exchange for their lowest tariff. Then countries that enjoy most favoured nation treatment—this is very important: Argentine Republic, Belgium, Luxembourg, colonies and possessions; Bolivia, Columbia, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Esthonia, Finland, France, colonies and possessions; Guatemala, Haiti, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Latvia, Lithuania, Netherlands and possessions; Norway, Panama, Portugal, Roumania, Serb, Croat and Slovene kingdom; Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United States of America, and Venezuela. All these countries enjoy in our market every advantage we conceded to the United States of America. That is, whatever concessions we give to the United States or have given to any of these countries, they enjoy in this market, and to the extent to which there may be any reduction, that reduction inures to the benefit of the countries I have named, and e converso, with every country that has made a treaty with the United States we also have the right to enjoy similar benefits. I have the names of these countries here: there are eleven of them, and they are as follows:

Cuba, agreement made August 24, 1934, effective September 3, 1934.

Brazil, agreement made February 2, 1935, effective January 1, 1936.

Belgium, agreement made February 27, 1935, effective May 1, 1935.

Haiti, agreement made March 25, 1935, effective June 3, 1935.

Sweden, agreement made May 25, 1935, effective August 5, 1935.

Columbia, agreement made September 13, 1935. Not yet in force.

Canada, agreement made November 15, 1935, effective January 1, 1936.

Honduras, agreement made December 18, 1935, effective March 2, 1936.

Kingdom of the Netherlands, agreement made December 20, 1935, effective February 1, 1936.

Switzerland, agreement made January 9, 1936, effective February 15, 1936.

These eleven countries are the countries from which we receive most favoured nation treatment. But all the other countries that I have mentioned have the right in the market of the Dominion of Canada to the same advantages that we have granted the United States of America. I point that out in order that hon. gentlemen may themselves determine what the true significance of that is.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend will permit me, I am sure, to point out that he unintentionally misstated his point when he said that we received most favoured nation treatment in those countries. What he meant to say of course, was that we receive treatment in the United States equal to that which the products of those countries receive.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. I thank the hon. gentleman. In order to make it quite clear—I was trying to make it a little too short—we receive in the United States markets every benefit that, under the treaties made with the countries I have named, accrues to them.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, the lowest possible level of tariff granted to them, we also receive in the United States markets. So much with respect to the favoured nation treatment.

With respect to the reductions of rate of duty on United States products, I have already pointed out that there are some sixty-eight items, and I have referred to the placing on the free list of twenty dutiable items. I am going to do no more than merely mention that, because they will be dealt with in committee; many of our friends will have much to say there. There is also an undertaking not to increase existing rates of duty on seventy-seven items. That means that we have bound ourselves not to increase the duties, either intermediate or general, during the term of this agreement on those seventy-seven items, and the United States have bound themselves also, with respect to the limited number that you see in the list, to do the same. We also agree to maintain fifteen items on the free list.

I come now to a question that I consider to be of very great importance, that of direct shipment. I mention this because it has significance of a double character. It will be recalled that this did not have its origin, so far as I have been able to understand, with the Conservative or Union government. Article XXIV of the treaty that was made with France in 1922 provided:

> The nationals of each of the high contracting parties shall enjoy on the territory of the other the treatment granted to the nationals of the most favoured nation. They shall not be subjected there to any duties, rates or taxes, under any denomination whatever, other or higher than those imposed on the nationals of any foreign country.

That was the agreement made with France in 1922, in connection with which my learned and honourable friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was one of the negotiators, together with Mr. Fielding and Lord Harding, the British ambassador to France. The proclamation bringing the agreement into force provided that goods under the treaty were to be transported by direct shipment. Article XIV provided:

> To enjoy the benefit of the tariff advantages provided for in the foregoing articles products originating in and coming from France, the French colonies, possessions and protectorates shall be conveyed without transhipment from a port of those territories or from a port of a country enjoying the benefit of the preferential or intermediate tariff into a sea or river port of Canada.

Thus it will be observed that by this article it is provided that goods passing through a country enjoying the intermediate tariff shall receive favoured nation treatment. I need hardly point out that in all the treaties that have been negotiated up to the present—and this we did point out with as much clarity as possible—we proceeded on the assumption that the United States was under the general tariff. I am not in a position at the moment to state what will be the result in the various countries with whom we have treaties, now that they find themselves no longer under their special treaties, meeting the conditions provided thereby, but are faced with a new set of conditions under which the nearby United States of America enjoys the same benefits and in some instances even greater benefits than were enjoyed by those nations under their treaties.

That is a matter of great and even tremendous importance. We have built up our ports on that assumption; we have spent millions of dollars on that understanding. We have spent it at Saint John, Halifax, Quebec and Montreal, on the assumption that in all the treaties we made by which we granted favoured nation treatment to various countries of the world, it would be provided that they would ship their goods direct to this country through a lake, river or sea port. You will recall, sir, the discussions that took place in this house in that regard. In 1922, however, under the French treaty, we provided that these goods would still receive favoured nation treatment if, in transit, they passed through a country enjoying the intermediate tariff. At that time the United States did not enjoy that tariff. It now does, with the result that goods from the orient can come to Seattle, proceed from Seattle on a through bill of lading to any part of Canada, and enjoy favoured nation treatment. Equally that is true with respect to goods that originate in Poland or any other countries that enjoy the intermediate tariff or better. Those who know the subsidies that are being paid to foreign shipping companies to enable them to carry on the business of their nationals will readily understand how much easier it is for them, operating as they do under a subsidized service, to bring their goods to New York or Boston and ship them from there on a through bill of lading, than it is to follow the practice that has prevailed heretofore.

But it has another effect, one to which I feel sure the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues have not given consideration. It is one that I certainly could not overcome in my own mind in 1935 and which I am yet unable to overcome. It is this: What will be the effect on our railways? I will take one item. There are large numbers of branch factories in Canada, many of which have been here a long time. The parent factories are in the United States of America; many of them are situated around the city of Chicago, in the states of Wisconsin and Minnesota. The depreciation of the Canadian properties, extending over a long period of years, has reduced the balance sheet value of those properties to a very substantial degree. I can only give you this, that men are being released from employment in some of those branch factories to-day because it is cheaper to produce the goods in the central western United States and ship them to Canada by rail from those centres, thereby destroying to that extent the traffic the Canadian railways were enjoying. I mention that because it is not a possibility, it is an actuality, and when the proper time comes, when the items are before the committee, I shall give the figures with respect to some of these items. I said the other day that the freight rates with respect to some of these items, from the United States factories to the Canadian west, is only one-third the freight rate through Canada to the west, and that the effect will be—not will be, but now is, in some instances—that with the large depreciation values that have been set up for the branch factories that have been here for many years, they are producing goods for western Canada at the parent plants and shipping them to Canada, to the detriment of employment in this country as well as to the detriment of our transportation systems.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if he has any figures as to the amount of traffic over our railways into the United States compared with the amount of traffic over United States railways into Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; a moment ago I tried to give the right hon. gentleman the freight and shipping figures. The United States in 1934 received from us $21,000,000 for freight and shipping and we received from them $15,000,000, leaving a balance against us of some $6,000,000.

Then there is one other point. Goods coming to Canadian ports on a through bill of lading ensured that our railways got that haul. Goods landing in the United States will mean that our railways will get only the shortest haul that may be possible. The movement west will be carried on over American roads until such time as the goods move up on the Soo line or at Emerson or other points of that sort, to reach the Canadian distribution point in the west. That, of course, is a matter that gives very great concern, for the two reasons I have mentioned: the one having to do with production costs in our market, considering the lower rates of duty, and the position taken by the parent companies with respect to their branch factories, and the other, of course, dealing with the physical question of transportation and the employment of people on the railways and steamships of the country.

There remains also for consideration the question of the removal of the operation of section 43, or, as the right hon. gentleman speaks of it, the removal of arbitrary values. I said, and I repeat, that but for the provisions of section 43 and its application to the value of imports into this country, during the years from 1930 to 1934 at any rate, I do not see how we could have maintained our position. It was perfectly absurd to deal with them by means of ad valorem duty. Some time ago, for instance, I heard —it was not hearsay; the right hon. gentleman will permit me to say that it was from the producer of a commodity—that eighteen cents a yard was the price at which this commodity could be produced in Canada. But our friends from Japan offered to supply the commodity for 12 cents a yard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The same quality?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I am bound to say to my right hon. friend that the two articles were brought into the Department of Finance by the gentleman concerned; I had them tested as to any difference in quality, and they told me there was no substantial difference as far as could be seen by, shall I say, a casual examination on the part of those who were able to express an opinion. But the question of quality comes in only if you are able to induce people to pay a higher price for quality's sake, and in these days of depression there is not much desire to get more than the thing that will serve its purpose; the question of quality is not a material consideration on the part of the buyer. I mention this because it has become very important in connection with one or two matters.

I ask this question: the right hon. gentleman was correct in stating that he has not lost his right to increase the intermediate tariff; shall we then consider this resolution on the basis that there will be no increase in the intermediate tariff, or on the basis that there will be? We have a right to know. Members of this house, when they give approval to this agreement, have the right to know whether the intermediate tariff is to be raised or not, because it changes the agreement; the agreement submitted to us and the agreement that would then be in force would not be the same. The right is there to be exercised. As an instance I will give one item that is very well known. Florists' flowers coming into this country from any country, under the intermediate tariff are free. There is a duty of forty per cent under the general tariff. That looks like a large duty, but there is sales tax to pay; there is duty on coal and on other commodities that enter into the costs of production of flowers. In the county of Peel there is, I believe, an investment of a couple of million dollars in florists' establishments. Florists' flowers from the United States are to be free under the intermediate tariff; is there to be an increase in the intermediate tariff or not? That is the question. We do not know; only the government knows. The government have no right to ask me to vote on this agreement until I know whether or not they propose to modify that intermediate tariff.

There are other items to which reference might be made. Take furniture; the effect has been to reduce the duty from 45 to 27½ per cent.

Mr. EULER: It is 27 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, pardon me. My hon. friend knows. I am not using this illustration because my hon. friend happens to know about it because it is made in his locality. But I put this to the house; the other day I picked up the Congressional Record and I read a speech in which a member for Carolina pointed out that this was going to be a great thing for him; his furniture sales had been seriously cut down, but now he would be able to recover his lost market I want to know. There is a large number of items on which it is clearly apparent that unless some action is taken the result from this agreement will be greatly to decrease employment in Canada. That is clear. But in addition to that it is common ground that very substantial injury will be done to those who have invested their capital in this country. I am not here to argue for a single moment that every vested interest in this country has a right to perpetual—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Pap.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, let hon. gentlemen laugh, but my reading of the history of my country is that we have built up employment for one half of our population by the application of a protective tariff: You can call it pap if you like; all I can say is that successive governments have done it. The government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not behind others in doing it; and having done it, with our eyes open we have created these industries. I have said before in this house that there are some industries in this country that I would never have created, but they are here; they will be here long after I am gone, and the question now is whether they are entitled to fair consideration and fair play. We said we would leave that to the tariff board, and I find that this agreement proposes to leave some factors and some difficult problems to be determined by the tariff board. The former Minister of Finance gave effect to every finding and recommendation made by the tariff board that he received in time to give effect to while he held office, every one of them. It would be presumption for me to express any view with respect to the question of sufficiency or insufficiency of tariff protection, but by taking the action this agreement contemplates, injuries will inevitably result. There is one way to cure them, and that is in many instances to increase the intermediate tariff. I think I am within my rights, as every hon. member of this house is within his rights, in saying that before I stand in my place and vote on this agreement I want to know whether there is to be at this session an increase in the intermediate tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: There might be decreases also.

Mr. BENNETT: There may be decreases; one is not arguing that there may not. The government may reduce every item in the tariff except those with respect to which they are bound to specific duties or free entry, those they cannot alter, either under the United States agreement or any other agreement where similar conditions prevail. But the question is, is there to be any increase in the intermediate tariff? I leave it to any fairminded man in this house whether he does not think he has a right to know whether or not that intermediate tariff structure is to be changed at this session, before he votes to give effect to this resolution. For if it is changed, the resolution he votes on and that which will be in force will not be the same. The bill founded on it will not be the same. If the tariff bill is passed later of course it will modify pro tanto the provisions of the trade agreement we are now considering.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not of the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it will.

Mr. DUNNING: The agreement specifically reserves to this parliament the right to change.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is what I say, and if there is a modification of the rates that now prevail, the agreement that we enact and the agreement which will be in force will not be the same.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, put it this way, in order that there may be no haggling; the situation will not be the same.

Mr. DUNNING: The effect will not be precisely the same.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly the effect will not be precisely the same; that is all I want. And since it will not be precisely the same, has not this house the right to know whether or not there will be a change in the intermediate tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: Then equally the house has a right to know what the government is going to propose next year or the year after that with respect to the intermediate tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: No; in a given session we can deal only with sessional matters.

Mr. DUNNING: And we cannot deal with the budget until it is down.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree, but I say any change that might be made with respect to the intermediate tariff affecting this agreement would not be fair to the house unless the house knows before the agreement is adopted, what the changes are to be. It is simply a matter of fair play.

Now I will give a list of items that I think must be considered by this government. Item 16, eggs: existing general tariff, ten cents; intermediate, five cents. Oats, sixteen cents; down to nine cents. When the item is before the committee I wonder what explanation the government is going to give for wild oats not fit for human consumption getting the reduced rates while oats fit for human consumption are not dealt with. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) should at least make a protest over that. Take wheat, another item that must be considered: it carries to-day thirty cents against the United States; under the intermediate it is twelve cents. Wheat flour, $1.35; intermediate, fifty cents. I can recall in my younger days when the flour went to the maritime provinces, as the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) can tell you, came from Boston in schooners at practically no freight rate at all; it could easily pay fifty cents a barrel duty. Is that to remain? That is a question for consideration. Then, hay: at the present time the rate on hay is $5; under the new tariff it is $1.75. Is that to remain, or not? Under the old tariff the duty on potatoes was seventy-five cents; the new rate is free. Is that to continue? Is Maine to supply potatoes to upper Canada? Is Michigan to supply Windsor her requirements free of duty, or are Canadians to do this? This has to be considered. Then, onions, thirty per cent, with a specific duty, as against thirty per cent. Mushrooms and truffles thirty per cent with a specific duty as against twenty-seven and a half per cent. On fresh fruits the duty is reduced to fifteen per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend approves that. But remember this: There can be destruction of no industry, however small it may be, without injury to the whole economic structure of our country.

Then, let us take advertising. Advertising, when less than twenty per cent, paid two cents a copy. These items are now free. This advertising, I believe, is one of the most insidious of the, shall I say, unseen influences which have to do with the formation of national character. I think it will be found that that is so. That position is true of wall board, wall paper and paper containers, rods, bars, and sheets and plates of brass. Parts of watch movements are reduced to five cents specific duty, instead of ten cents. Then, farm implements are mentioned, in which we are carrying on a large export trade which cannot possibly be maintained, unless the former duty is restored. Then, there are washing machines, machinery, nuts and bolts, middle range automobiles and trucks, manufactures of steel, furniture, linoleum and oil cloth, and several other commodities I might mention, without going into them at length.

I put this question, and ask it very seriously: Are we to be told before we vote upon this agreement whether it is a real one that is to be effective, or whether the intermediate tariff is to be raised so that these various industries and agriculture products which are matters of concern, shall be cared for? Let us ask ourselves one more question with respect to this matter, and it is this: What is the effect of this agreement upon agriculture and agricultural products, including dairy products? Let us answer that. The duty on cream is reduced so that it occupies a position equivalent to eight cents a pound on butter. The old Fordney-McCumber tariff was twenty cents; this is now thirty-five cents, with a quota. I shall refer to this point presently. Name me any agricultural products which benefit by this agreement. Name any agricultural product which in the ultimate analysis benefits by this agreement. Let us take dairy products on the farm. We will pass live stock; as regards live stock undoubtedly there is a benefit, but that is not a fifty per cent benefit—and that is the odd part of the matter —as we shall point out in committee. If we are dealing with these items why could we not get at least a fifty per cent reduction with respect to cattle, and commodities of that nature? Is it worth while entering into an agreement merely for the sake of saying, "We have signed an agreement inside of ninety days; we had been in office only a few days, and see what we did"? Is that for the economic welfare of Canada? That is the real issue which must be considered.

Then, turning again to the tariff we find we have now a quota on lumber. Who introduced quotas? Tell me this: Is there a single quota which Canada has imposed against the United States? If there is, name it. But look at the list of quotas imposed against us. Why should quotas be imposed against us when we did not get even fifty per cent? Let us take fish. What do we get for fish? Look at the Underwood tariff; look at the free fish. Shall it be said that, because of the depressed condition in Gloucester and surrounding territory, where they have trawlers which go out on the open sea and the grand banks, Canadians, without trawlers, endeavouring to compete in United States ports are denied that privilege to the extent of fifty per cent of existing duties. There is a depression here, too, in the fishing industry. The farm, the forest, the sea, the mine—what have we as regards the mines? We have a few articles that have relation to hydro electric power, as was pointed out; and even as to them, what is their relation to the whole? I am asking that question seriously. What are they? Study them, and answer me. What answer can be given?

There is, it is true, a reduction in the duty on liquor, on cattle and on whiskey. There was never any question about the duty on whiskey, because whiskey in the United States has not matured. If we get rid of our whiskey before the date of maturity of theirs we shall have succeeded in benefiting from this agreement. Otherwise, we shall not. We must dispose of our whiskey during the period the United States whiskey is maturing.

What about our parts manufacturers in Canada? I am not going to do more than point out that we have afforded them protection. The assembly plants of this country have utilized the parts produced in Canadian mills and factories, and have utilized them to an enormous extent. I have knowledge of the fact that there have been cancellations of orders for these items. Are we going to pass an intermediate tariff which will give greater protection to these items? These are questions which will have to be dealt with.

What has been done with respect to any of these commodities? For instance, we have bran, shorts and wheat—what about them? Are they free? No. Is the duty reduced to any extent at all? No. It is fixed at ten per cent, where it stood the day before the agreement was signed. Look at the items. Then there are hulled oats, unfit for human consumption, with a duty of eight cents per bushel of thirty-two pounds. There is nothing for oatmeal. Then there is wheat, unfit for human consumption, with a duty of ten per cent ad valorem, the rate at which it stood before. Not a cent of reduction in duty for entry of wheat into the United States of America, although we have reduced our duty on their wheat to the extent I have indicated. On bran, shorts, byproduct feeds obtained in milling wheat or other cereals, the rate is ten per cent ad valorem. On mixed feeds it is ten per cent ad valorem, and on screenings, ten per cent, the same old rate. On cereal breakfast foods, we have in this instance a reduction in duty from twenty per cent ad valorem to fifteen per cent, or a decrease of five per cent. When we come to grass seeds we find a fifty per cent reduction. My point is this: Why did we not hold out for a fifty per cent reduction with respect to all these items if we were going to get a fifty per cent reduction on this or that? Had we not a right to ask for this?

Then there are large numbers of items to which I shall give no more than hasty consideration. First, we have oats and barley. How will the change in the rate on barley affect Prince Edward Island? What about the pelts of silver foxes which come from the island? The silver fox industry is one of the greatest down there, but we find a fifty per cent ad valorem duty on these pelts entering the United States—no reduction. On certain pelts, however, the rate was reduced. On wolves' pelts—and I can understand this—the duty was reduced. But on pelts of silver foxes, an item which touches vitally the economic life of the island, there was no reduction; the fifty per cent rate still remains.

Then we come to other items, a number of which I have mentioned. Did we get a fifty per cent cut on cattle? We did not. We secured a reduction, but it was not fifty per cent, the maximum, which we should have received. We did get something else; we got a quota on them. I put to the house just one question with respect to this situation: Looking at those schedules can it be said that we have received adequate consideration for what we have given? That is the question. The right hon. gentleman put it yesterday fairly. That is the issue. Well, sir, I put this to you and to the house: Does it ever occur to hon. members that during an election any prime minister would be anxious to sign a trade agreement because of the effect which this might have upon the mind of the electorate? If he did not sign it; if the government could not approve proposals that did not give to the Dominion of Canada concessions that were adequate to those which we gave, only one thing can be said, that the temptation to sign any agreement is very strong, and the fact that it was not signed is at least some indication that there was strong conviction that it was not adequate. There is the story.

The right hon. gentleman said something about the future. I put this to him: What more can we give the United States than we have already given them under this agreement? What have we left to negotiate with? There is the position; there is the situation, and I can only say that the government of the day was not prepared to grant the concessions contained in this agreement for what we consider the wholly inadequate advantages accruing under it to the Dominion of Canada, notwithstanding the effect that it might have upon the minds of the electorate.

The right hon. gentleman was right the other day in saying that it was in September that the note was given to the public. The government of the United States did not think it desirable that during negotiations there should be any publication of the note, and so we did not publish it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend was mistaken about having tabled it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman was right it was not tabled in the house. Twice I had the note ready to table, and twice I was advised by the minister that it was undesirable to do so. I was in error in thinking that it had been tabled, and I desire to make that perfectly clear.

Contemporary opinion in one country is not always a guide to the action of another country. Of course, most members of the house have seen the article that appeared in the Independent Journal of Columbia University written by Professor Brebner, in which he speaks of Canada's tariff gamble and says that this is an excellent treaty for defying economic nationalism. He says that Canada has made more concessions increasing her economic vulnerability. I am not going to take time to do more than point out his conclusion, that this would be injurious to Canada. Without going into the matter, I may say that he points out our vulnerability and says in effect that this is a huge gamble; that if it succeeds it is a good thing, and if it does not, it is a very bad thing for the future of this dominion.

I cannot think, Mr. Speaker, that we are warranted in gambling about such a serious matter, and when I look at the observations made by the President of the United States himself and by his Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, I realize that they refer to this agreement as affording a market in the Dominion of Canada for their manufactured products as well as their agricultural products. These words were used by the Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, in a letter to Mr. Costigan: He said that the restrictions with respect to cattle will "assure the most ample protection to our domestic cattle producers." He continues:

> The small concession which we have granted on cattle must be considered, if its real significance is to be appreciated, in the broad light of the entire agreement ... and of the benefits which will derive of this agreement in the shape of hundreds of millions of dollars in increased exports, a large part of which will largely consist of agricultural exports, while the remainder of the increase will be in industrial products, which, through enlarged payrolls and augmented purchasing power will inevitably rebound to the ultimate benefit of our cattle raising and farming sections.

Mr. Henry A. Wallace, the very able Secretary of Agriculture, speaking at Chicago on December 10, said that it was his considered judgment that American agriculture gains from the Canadian reciprocal trade treaty "so far outweigh the losses that the net advantage to our agriculture as a whole is very much worth while." He said that Canadian concessions on meats and meat products duties will open the way "for our farmers to get back a bigger share of the British pork market. The new agreement will permit American pork to go to Canada to replace Canadian pork exported to Great Britain, thus, in effect permitting increased exports of American pork to Great Britain." He claimed important benefits to fruit and vegetable growers through Canadian concessions and said that those benefits would be "substantial gains" for United States grain growers. "Farmers of the United States will unquestionably gain from the increased exportation of manufactured products to Canada," he said. He went on:

> Suppose that exports of these products are increased by $300,000,000—a conservative figure in view of our trade with Canada in the past—and that half of this amount or $150,000,000 goes into payrolls.
> This would mean definite and substantial gains in cash income of farmers. Studies have shown that in the past an increase of $150,000,000 in United States factory payrolls added from four to six million dollars to the income of farmers in each of such states as Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa and Ohio.

The President himself said:

Agriculture, far from being crucified by this agreement, as some have told you, actually gains from it. We export more agricultural products to Canada than we have imported from her. We shall continue to do so, for the very simple reason that the United States with its larger area of agricultural land, its more varied climate and its vastly greater population produces far more of most agricultural products, including animal products, vegetables and fruits, than does Canada. In the case of the few reductions that have been made, quota limitations are set on the amount that may be brought in at the lower rates.

On the other side of the picture we believe, and most unbiased men believe, that the general increase in our trade with Canada, including the exports of our factories, will so add to the purchasing power of hundreds of thousands of wage earners that they will be able to spend far more than they do to-day for the products of our own farms, our own forests and our own fisheries. Greater trade is merely another word for more production and more employment. The proof of this particular pudding is in the eating; the best way to judge the new accord is to observe how it works out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my right hon. friend any observations by ex-President Hoover?

Mr. BENNETT: He did not have anything to do with this matter.

Mr. DUNNING: He had a lot to say.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only going to follow up what I have read by saying this: Varying views will be entertained with respect to the benefits and disadvantages of this agreement. There are those who will argue that the benefits far outweigh the disadvantages. There are Canadians who will argue, as they have done, that the benefits greatly exceed the disadvantages. On the other hand, there will be Canadians who see in this agreement, as I do, not only a balance of disadvantages against benefits but an act on the part of the government that can only—can only, I repeat—result in great injury to Canada unless we avail ourselves of the provisions of the intermediate tariff and at this session increase it with respect to many items to which I have referred. That, I think, is inevitable. On the other hand, in the United States there are those who say that the bargain is bad for the United States, and there are those who say it is highly advantageous; one is a supporter of the administration and the other is opposed to it. But that is not so everywhere. There are men who left office because they felt that the agreement was not satisfactory from the standpoint of the United States. There are Canadians who view it with alarm, and there are Canadians who rejoice at it.

I can only say that each of us must arrive at his own conclusion in the light of the knowledge he possesses of the fundamental economic position of this country. This agreement is predicated upon the assumption that there will be a great increase in purchasing power in Canada within the next few years. I am not one of those who do not believe that we shall gradually improve our condition, but when I heard the right hon. gentleman the other day take 1929 as a basis for comparison, I wondered why he took that year. For in 1929 the Fordney-McCumber tariff was in force and that tariff imposed, against Canadian trade, barriers never before known until the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930. That is a fact which the ordinary figures indicate; they show the trade of this country before and after the enactment of that measure. I can only say that we are placed in a very difficult position. In good faith, desiring to extend Canadian trade in accordance with the traditions of our party, we made as a basis for negotiation proposals that were broad and generous, giving an opportunity to consider every item in the tariff structure of both countries.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend has said that the minimum demand we should have made upon the United States was for a straight fifty per cent reduction in their tariff against us all along the line. I should like to know whether he made that demand and whether the reason why no agreement was reached under his administration was the fact that the United States refused to make that concession.

Mr. BENNETT: That question is simply answered. Mr. Hull, the Secretary of State, as the communications read by the right hon. gentleman the other day show, said that each item would have to be considered. Proposals and counter-proposals were made, and when these proposals, which are now practically the proposals of the United States, were presented to us we said definitely that we could not give them such concessions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not practically the same.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman says that they are not practically the same. It is true that with respect to cattle we had a fifty per cent cut with a limitation on values; this is less than a fifty per cent cut with a quota as to numbers. This, I think, should be a fair answer: The government of the day was not prepared to grant the concessions asked for in return for the concessions which the United States expressed themselves willing to grant.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid the leader of the opposition missed the point of my question. I was not particularly referring to the concessions we were giving to the United States; I was asking about the concessions which were demanded by Canada from the United States. Was the demand made that there should be a straight fifty per cent reduction all along the line so far as the United States tariffs were concerned?

Mr. BENNETT: There were two discussions, one as to an agreement of a limited kind, the other being an agreement in the large sense now before us. And before we could get any further in the matter the demands were such that we said that anything granted would not be adequate compensation for what was asked, not even fifty per cent.

Mr. EULER: Did you ask for fifty per cent?

Mr. BENNETT: The question is not whether we asked for fifty per cent; we said fifty per cent would not be adequate.

Mr. EULER: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that we should not have concluded any agreement unless we received at least a minimum of fifty per cent all along the line, and I am curious to know whether he asked for that concession and whether, it being refused, he did not conclude an agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Let me answer that question in this way: I said that if my hon. friends were going to come here with an agreement they should at least have taken as a minimum the maximum the United States would grant, which was fifty per cent of existing tariff rates. But I said that the concessions asked for were such that at no price were we prepared to grant them. I want to make that clear beyond peradventure. It is not a question of fifty per cent or any other percentage; we made it clear that neither fifty per cent nor sixty per cent would be adequate for the concessions asked from us, because it took away from us everything we had: the whole intermediate tariff, the favoured nation clause, the binding on the free list and the loss of direct shipment, so that for the first time in our history there might be a through bill of lading; it was no longer to river, lake or seaport but to inland customs port.

Mr. EULER: My question was definite.

Mr. BENNETT: And I have answered it as definitely as it is possible to answer it. We could not and would not give to the United States what this agreement gives, in return for anything which it was within the power of the president to grant. Is that clear?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we to understand from the right hon. gentleman's remarks that negotiations were definitely terminated before he went out of office?

Mr. BENNETT: No. They were in this position, that in October it became perfectly clear that we could not succeed in securing an agreement on the basis I have mentioned, the basis of this agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not of this agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: It was substantially what this agreement embodies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that it embodies what the United States asked us to give and we would not give.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend knows that negotiations of the kind are confidential; but when he makes the statement that this agreement is one that he could have made and one that was offered to him at the time, he knows that is not the case.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I repeat that the proposals of the United States were substantially those embodied in the concessions which have been submitted to this house; I say that positively and without question. And what is more, we never did reach a draft agreement; a draft agreement was never prepared. But I will tell you more. Mr. Foster, in his memoirs, points out that during the progress of negotiations with the United States he received intimation that somebody else would do something better; and there is no doubt that during the negotiations, during the last two months that we were in office, there was circulated, throughout official circles in the United States, the idea that if the Liberals got in they would do better than we had done. That was circulated in season and out of season, stated on public platforms by the right hon. gentleman, that they could negotiate agreements where we could not.

Mr. DUNNING: We have.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; but agreements which we would not.

Mr. DUNNING: Which you could not.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one thing I deprecate. I greatly deprecate the attitude of the Prime Minister with respect to this and all other matters. The other day he saved a war in Europe; to-day he has made an agreement at which all the world is sitting up and wondering. I think it ill becomes one occupying the position of Prime Minister to try to make the people believe that wars and rumours of war have been stilled and peace has been secured because he repudiated Mr. Riddell in Geneva, and that the world's economic peace, liberty and happiness depend upon his having made these concessions to the United States; that we got all that we could get, which is enough, because we have restored the balance in the world's economy and all is well in Israel. That, I say, is an attitude of mind which is not conducive to the well-being of the country. It is magnifying oneself to an extent which I think is not warranted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Don't speak of magnifying oneself, please; please don't. Spare us that.

Mr. BENNETT: It makes us a bit ridiculous in some quarters. It has been the subject matter of a good deal of ridicule in different places that these 11,000,000 people, having made a bargain with the United States, have saved the economic peace of the world, and that the repudiation of a representative of ours in Geneva by the then acting Prime Minister saved the world from war, if only the facts were known. That is not conducive to this country being held in that esteem in which it should be regarded among the nations.

Mr. DUNNING: You would describe it in Mr. Thomas's terms.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman, in his solicitude for vested interests, may well speak in that way, but the fact is that he will find it more difficult to deal with the British agreements by reason of the agreement now before the house, much more difficult. Then the smile and jeer that he has for those who toiled with these agreements will probably give way to some sympathetic understanding of what they did for this country when they made them, and his anxiety to serve the interests that he so nobly serves will perhaps give way to a little consideration for the people of this country.

Mr. DUNNING: What does my right hon. friend mean?

Mr. BENNETT: Just what he says.

Mr. DUNNING: What did he say?

Mr. BENNETT: I said that the interests he serves so nobly—

Mr. DUNNING: What are they?

Mr. BENNETT: They are the great interests of this country. Never have they been served better by any Minister of Finance than by the hon. gentleman, as everybody knows and as has come to be very generally understood.

Mr. DUNNING: The great interests of this country?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: The interests of the people of this country?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. DUNNING: Not of the people?

Mr. BENNETT: The interests that have been discussed in the house. The so-called great interests. The St. James' street interests he used to speak about; the milling interests—

Mr. DUNNING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: my hon. friend has just stated in effect that I represent in this house certain special interests; that I serve them here nobly. There is a word which the rules of the house will not allow me to apply to my hon. friend. He knows what it is, and he knows that it would be correctly applied. I demand that he withdraw unconditionally. The statement he has made is absolutely without foundation, and he well knows that.

Mr. BENNETT: Anything that I know, Mr. Speaker, is correctly indicated by what I said. If the hon. gentleman feels offended at what has been said—

Mr. DUNNING: No, sir, not because I feel any offence but because it is contrary to the rules of the house, and is untrue.

Mr. BENNETT: The rules of the house are quite clear, and I have not transgressed them. If we look at the observations of the last five years from his side of the house—

An hon. MEMBER: That is not what we are talking about.

Mr. BENNETT: —we shall find that they were always in use and applied when they were attacking others. Now when an observation is made with respect to himself, my hon. friend becomes very hot and very much worried.

Mr. DUNNING: I have never applied such observations to any hon. member, and my right hon. friend knows I have never applied them to him. He knows how unfair, unjust and untrue they are as applied to me. I insist on an unqualified withdrawal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the right hon. the leader of the opposition withdraw?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I am bound to accept your ruling and withdraw the remark.

Mr. DUNNING: Thank you.

Mr. BENNETT: All I did was to direct attention to the fact that the records of Hansard are filled with similar observations applied to others, including myself.

Mr. DUNNING: Not by me.

Mr. BENNETT: I admit that the hon. gentleman is sui generis in his party. So far as his party is concerned, that has been their stock in trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not true.

Mr. BENNETT: Unquestionably.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Never has any man in Canada been vilified in this house and attacked in every part of Canada more than I; and the people are beginning to know this and understand it. I shall follow it up with some data—

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to me?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to me?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: All right; go on.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say and it is exactly what I mean, Mr. Speaker. Let there be no misunderstanding about it.

In concluding my observations I would say that there are differences of opinion with regard to this agreement both in the United States and Canada. We have the right to know whether this is an agreement that represents the real determination of the government within the rights conferred upon them to modify the intermediate tariffs, and until such time as we receive that information we cannot, I submit, fairly or honestly vote upon this agreement. We are entitled to that information, and I ask that it be given to us or that the consideration of the items in the agreement be dealt with as items in the ways and means committee when the budget is being considered.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, having had to take up so much time in reading so many extracts in dealing with this subject, but no more important matter has ever engaged the attention of parliament, nor is any more important matter likely to engage its attention, than the one now before us. If we ask for the fullest information in order that we may be able intelligently to discuss it I think we ask for what is our right. This is expected of us by the Canadian people, by our several constituents and by those in every part of the country affected by the agreement, and until such time as we know whether the intermediate tariff is to be modified, increased or reduced at this present session of parliament we cannot properly deal with the agreement or give effect to its schedules.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): I am sure that the house will freely acknowledge its indebtedness to both the right hon. gentlemen who have participated in this debate. I should like at the outset to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), first upon the success that attended his efforts in negotiating this trade agreement and then upon the very complete and masterly presentation which he made of the case in favour of this resolution. May I likewise compliment the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) upon the interesting and forceful address which he has just delivered in the house. He has made perfectly clear to hon. members and to the people of Canada his opposition to this trade agreement as it stands, and I think he has also made it perfectly clear that if the Canadian people had elected a Conservative administration Canada would not now have any trade agreement with the United States. May I also add a personal tribute to the Prime Minister for the splendid thought that actuated him in endeavouring to conclude his negotiations with the United States so that he might be able to announce on November 11, Armistice Day, the making of an agreement between Canada and the United States, thereby, Mr. Speaker, setting an example to the rest of the world in that on Armistice Day Canada and the United States were thinking of trade in terms of peace when much of the rest of the world was thinking of war.

It will not be possible for me, in the short space of time at my disposal, to deal with the various items in the schedules attached to the trade agreement, but I should like to state certain fundamental principles and certain reasons why I for one support this agreement We on this side of the house support it for a number of reasons. In the first place it shows a new attitude towards international trade. It recognizes officially that the Liberal party regards trade not as war but as the peaceful exchange of goods based upon mutual advantage. That was recognized by the persons who took part in the signing of the agreement. Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States, made this statement:

> Underlying this agreement are the twin policies of the good neighbour and mutually profitable trade.

When the Prime Minister spoke the other day he made perfectly clear the attitude of the Liberal party. In the course of his remarks he said:

> May I say at once that we sought an agreement which would be fair and square and which would be helpful to both countries.

I submit also, Mr. Speaker, that this agreement will provide freer entry into the United States of a great number of primary products than has been the case heretofore. We have had concessions given to us with regard to agricultural products, fishery products, forest products and mineral products. The right hon. leader of the opposition sought to minimize the extent of these concessions to the primary producers of Canada. In a sense perhaps we ought to feel grateful to him for his remarks, because they will strengthen the hands of President Roosevelt in repelling the attacks that are being made in the United States against this agreement, on the grounds that the United States will be flooded with Canadian products. That is the argument there; we have heard the contrary argument here. Somewhere between the two lies the truth, and the truth is that the agreement is based on fair and square dealing on the basis of mutual advantage. I for one rejoice at the reversal of the trend of policy of the United States. The president of the United States made reference to this change when he said:

> The signing of this agreement marks the reversal of the trend of the last two decades towards undue and unnecessary trade barriers between our two countries. I am confident that this constructive step will contribute greatly to the economic recovery of both the United States and Canada.

The basic wealth of Canada is in its primary production, but that basic wealth is of no value to those who produce it unless it can be made to circulate. We on this side of the house feel that this trade agreement will stimulate the circulation of that basic wealth, with benefit to the body politic.

There is another reason why we support this trade agreement. We feel that it will ease the burden of the primary producer. There are reductions in the duty on implements of production, and it is essential to the welfare of the primary producer that his costs of production should be lowered in every possible way. Indeed there are many of us on this side who would criticize this trade agreement in that it does not go far enough in the reduction of duties.

This agreement also remembers one who was forgotten during the lifetime of the previous administration. I refer to the consumer; the tariff reductions now provided for will reduce the cost of living to the consumers of Canada.

During the course of this debate mention has been made of the Ottawa agreements. I express the hope that never again will this country make an agreement along the lines and principles of the Ottawa agreements. I regard them as a dangerous step in the direction of economic imperialism. They are based upon wrong principles of bargaining and they are restrictive of trade agreements with other countries of the world. The trade agreement with the United Kingdom contained a very dangerous and iniquitous clause; I refer to article 9, which reads:

> His Majesty's government in Canada will invite parliament to pass the legislation necessary to substitute for the duties of customs now leviable on the goods specified in schedule E the duties shown in that schedule, provided that nothing in this article shall preclude His Majesty's government in Canada from reducing the duties specified in the said schedule so long as the margin of British preference shown in that schedule is preserved or from increasing the rates under the intermediate or general tariff set out in the said schedule.

I stress the words, "so long as the margin of British preference shown in that schedule is preserved," and I say that as long as that clause remains in the Ottawa agreements it is impossible, in respect of the articles covered by them, to make with other countries such trade treaties as we should like to make. As an illustration I mention cream separators. In 1930 cream separators entered this country free under all tariffs. Our importations for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, totalled $955,000, of which 71·4 per cent came from the United States, 13·6 per cent from Sweden, six per cent from Denmark, and 3·4 per cent from France, with no importations at all from Great Britain. Then both the intermediate and general tariffs were increased to twenty-five per cent while cream separators continued to come in free under the British preference. In 1935 the total importations fell to $362,788. Only 11·4 per cent of our importations of cream separators came from Great Britain, and a duty of twenty-five per cent was imposed on 88·6 per cent of our imports of cream separators. A monopoly was created in Canada in respect of these articles. Our hands are tied with regard to cream separators; as long as the Ottawa agreements are in effect we cannot make a trade treaty affecting cream separators with any of the countries with which we trade. Further than that, we cannot reduce the duty on cream separators below twenty-five per cent as long as the Ottawa agreements remain in force, because we have guaranteed to the United Kingdom a twenty-five per cent margin of preference. This is an iniquitous clause, which should be repealed when the Ottawa agreements come up for revision.

There are fundamental and important differences between this agreement and the Ottawa agreements. In this agreement we are making a retreat from economic imperialism and breaking the crust of economic nationalism. Both economic imperialism and economic nationalism are wrong policies for this country to follow; the only safe course for Canada to travel in matters of trade is that of internationalism, and we are now travelling on that safe highway in the direction of greater world trade, while the right hon. leader of the opposition and his followers are still mired in the slough of economic nationalism. No country is more dependent upon foreign markets than is Canada; no country is more dependent upon export trade, even though the percentage of our total production that is exported is as the leader of the opposition stated this afternoon. Export trade and foreign markets are of prime importance to the Dominion of Canada.

There is another reason why this trade agreement is preferable to the Ottawa agreements; the latter were restrictive of trade, and they have had the effect of creating an unfriendly sentiment in Great Britain towards Canada. There was a sigh of relief in Great Britain when the previous administration was so overwhelmingly defeated at the polls, just as there was a sigh of relief in this country. On the other hand the United States trade agreement will be productive of trade arrangements with other countries. This country will receive the benefit of all such trade treaties as the United States will make with other countries, and the benefits of all such treaties will inure to Canada. There is no guarantee of any fixed margin of preference in this agreement, and there is nothing to prevent reductions of duties. If I had been asked the question whether we are going to increase the intermediate tariff my answer would have been emphatically in the negative.

Another reason why we favour this trade agreement in preference to the Ottawa agreements is that in this one all the revisions of tariff duties are downward, which was not so in the case of the Ottawa agreements. I am one of those who feel that, when the time comes to consider what shall be done with regard to the Ottawa agreements, there should be a drastic revision of them.

The Liberal party was returned to power by a tremendous majority. The voice of the people spoke with no uncertain sound. That voice expressed discontent with existing conditions and with the policy of the previous administration. If there was any mandate at all in that vote of the Canadian people it was most emphatically a mandate that there should be substantial tariff reductions.

I should like to compliment the Prime Minister upon the campaign that he conducted during the last election. He appealed for the suffrages of the people on fundamental principles and refused to be led into any campaign of competitive promises. The Liberal tariff policy has been clearly laid down. It was laid down in Winnipeg on January 12, 1932, when the Prime Minister stated:

> As time goes on conditions change, and what for yesterday may have been the wisest step, for to-morrow may be a step which, if taken at all, should be taken with great caution. Speaking broadly, however, were we face to face with the electorate to-morrow I should not hesitate to say that, having regard to adjustments here and there, of which account would of necessity have to be taken, the Liberal party if returned to office would restore the tariff structure of this country to levels at least the equivalent of those which existed when we went out of office. What Canada requires above all else to-day is a policy which will be more concerned with encouraging exports than with keeping out imports.

Then in the South Huron by-election the Prime Minister repeated what he said at Winnipeg:

> I want to say at once that the Liberal party in Canada has never at any time had a belief in the efficacy of high tariffs. Our view is that economic conditions not only permit but demand with respect to world trade an immediate substantial general reduction in customs duties, and for the purposes of greater freedom of trade within the British Empire no uncertain increase in the British preference.
> I would repeat to-day what I said at Winnipeg before the opening of the last session of parliament—that the Canadian tariff should be brought immediately to the level of what it was at the time the Liberal party went out of office in 1930; in other words to a level the equivalent of that established by the Dunning budget.

This was not only the declaration of the leader of the Liberal party; it was the policy of the Liberal party as a whole. This policy was put clearly before the people in every part of Canada from coast to coast. One of the reasons why I support this trade agreement strongly is that it is in accord with Liberal policy; it is a step in the right direction. The Canadian people will greet this as a first step, with other steps to follow; they will accept this agreement with the United States as a first instalment in redemption of the pledge given to them by the Liberal party.

Our policy with regard to the tariff is two-fold; we believe in making trade agreements on a reciprocal basis with all countries that are willing to trade with us, and we hope that this trade agreement is the first of many similar ones that will be negotiated by the Canadian government. I should like to see the government commence immediately negotiations with Russia with a view to concluding a trade agreement with that country. I believe we could make with Russia a trade agreement that would be of advantage to that country and decidedly advantageous to Canada. We could buy from Russia oil and coal, and we could sell to her machinery and manufactured goods. Great Britain has made a trade agreement with Russia. There is nothing dangerous in making such an agreement, and we should at once embark upon an investigation of the possibilities of concluding a trade agreement with that country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask the hon. member what party it was that broke off trade relationships with Russia?

Mr. THORSON: I do not think that has anything to do with the present discussion. We in common with others suffered from the insanity of economic nationalism, but it is my hope that we are emerging from that insanity—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. THORSON: —and are now upon the pathway towards a sound economic policy.

I think we could make a trade agreement with Germany. Mr. James Richardson after being there indicated that he had heard many expressions of opinion in that country to the effect that they would be willing to buy Canadian wheat if we were ready to buy German goods. And we could make trade agreements with a number of other countries. I have personal knowledge that the small country of Iceland, from which my parents came, would be very glad indeed to make a trade agreement with Canada. Might I digress for a moment and on behalf of the people of Iceland thank both the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition for their splendid efforts in bringing about on the occasion of the one thousandth anniversary of parliament in Iceland a presentation to that country of a scholarship fund. I am sure that no gift from Canada to the people of Iceland could have been more welcome. Our policy should be one of trade. Our wealth can be increased only by the exchange of goods, and a policy whereby there will be an exchange of goods is essential to a return to prosperity. Any persons or any party who preach that we cannot build up an exchange of goods preach a defeatist policy.

Our tariff policy is not confined to the making of trade treaties. If we can get concessions from other countries, well and good; we accept them gladly. But it is the view of a great number of people in Canada who have suffered from the high tariff policies of the previous administration, that we should make substantial and immediate reductions in the tariff, whether we get corresponding concessions from other countries or not.

Practically the whole of the argument of the right hon. gentleman opposite was directed to his contention that we did not get adequate consideration from the United States in respect of the concessions we gave that country. If I were to have any quarrel with the trade agreement now before us it would be that we have not sufficiently lowered our own tariff. We do not regard the tariff as an instrument to be used exclusively for bargaining purposes. The right hon. gentleman asked: What else have we to bargain with? Heaven knows that a tariff which still reaches over 200 per cent protection, in some instances, leaves ample room for reduction, whether such reduction be brought about as a result of reciprocal trade treaties or as a consequence of unilateral reductions in the tariff.

There are many people in Canada who are not satisfied with the reductions which have already taken place. The Canadian people are demanding a lower tariff, in the interests of both primary producers and consumers. They are not satisfied with the tariff reductions that have already been made. The debate in committee of ways and means will show the outrageous protection still in force; there are numerous commodities on which the people of Canada are undoubtedly demanding substantial tariff reductions. For instance, they want reductions on oil, gasoline, agricultural implements and textiles. There are many of us who feel that we must lower the costs of production and the cost of living. The primary producer has had to accommodate himself to world prices. In this country we cannot continue to bonus every form of production, as we have been attempting to do. Such a course of procedure is artificial and ruinous. We must restore the balance between prices of agricultural products and those of manufactured goods, and that balance can be brought about only by tariff reductions. Industry would not suffer as a result of such reductions. The whole country would gain through increased volume of trade, and the resulting increased purchasing power of the consumer.

One of the curses in Canada lies in the monopolies which have been developed. It is our duty to break up concentrations of wealth and these monopolies and, as best we can, to bring about a fair policy of competition, with no special privileges.

The Canadian people have spoken in an emphatic and distinct voice. They have voiced their discontent; they have given a mandate to the Liberal party, and to-day that party is on trial. As Liberals it is our duty to obey the wishes of our people and to carry out the mandate entrusted to us. I support this resolution as strongly as possible, believing we are beginning a new era of international trade, based upon principles of international good will and mutual advantage, and that we are witnessing the inauguration of a fiscal policy suited to the needs of the Canadian people and designed to promote their welfare.

On motion of Mr. Thorson, the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from several members, notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation in the House of Commons, for the electoral district of Antigonish-Guysborough, in the province of Nova Scotia, consequent upon William Duff, Esquire, the member therefor, having been summoned to the Senate.

COPYRIGHT ACT

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

He said; Mr. Speaker, the suggestion aws that the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) might go home to celebrate his natal anniversary this evening, and as this bill comes under his department it was my intention to let it stand until the next sitting, but inasmuch as the minister is here, I think we might as well proceed.

There is one primary thought which ought to be remembered by members in the consideration of this bill, and that is that the work and achievement and the genius of an author or composer are his own personal property, and it must be protected just as much as a vested right in real estate. The author or composer has a claim to an indefeasible title to anything he produces.

I think the next fact to be considered is that the public must pay for the production of music. Canada was a signatory to the Berne convention and by virtue of that fact our Canadian authors and composers are protected in other countries just as the authors and composers of other countries are protected in Canada. So there are two phases of this copyright act which must be borne in mind.

The operations of the Canadian Performing Right Society became so reckless, shall I say, as to become, well, nothing short of a racket; so much so that complaints were made to the Secretary of State and it was deemed wise to appoint a royal commissioner to make a thorough investigation of this society. I am very glad that the Secretary of State has furnished the members with a copy of the report of His Honour Judge Parker because, Mr. Speaker, there is no use discussing a bill unless the members are fully informed on their topic. The operations of the Canadian Performing Right Society are a matter of vital interest to every community, large and small, in this dominion, and therefore of vital importance to every member who desires to serve his community.

This question goes back to the amendment to the copyright act that was made in 1931, where authority was given to companies controlling copyright to issue licences and collect fees from those who performed music in public. I repeat that when that amendment was made it expressed the unanimous voice of the house because the general intention was that the amendment was for the protection of Canadian authors, composers and publishers. The very name of the society bears that out—the Canadian Performing Right Society. But as a matter of fact we find that Canadian authors and composers do not participate in or benefit by the collection of these licence fees in any way whatsoever.

The Canadian Performing Right Society, as I stated on the first reading of this bill, was the outcome of some genius in the United States or England. In the United States the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers exists, and in England there is the Performing Right Society of England, with which are affiliated similar societies in other countries, all signatories to the Berne convention, and they are all authorized under the authority of their respective countries to issue licences and to collect fees.

Throughout the Dominion of Canada every broadcasting station, every theatre, every radio in a hotel or restaurant and every public hall of any kind, whether it be a fraternity or community hall, every place in which music is played for public purposes, is called upon to pay a licence fee under the amendment to section 10 of the 1931 copyright act. The Canadian Performing Right Society is composed, as I stated on the first reading, of the American company, the English company and some eighteen European companies. They have not very much of a financial set up in Canada, the capital structure consisting of 10,000 no par value shares, and only two shares are held in Canada. The directors are resident three in the United States, one in England, and two provisional directors in Toronto.

Moreover, there is no limit, it seems, to the licence fee they can charge. When they commenced their operations they fixed the minimum charge at $10 per year for every hotel, restaurant, and public hall, but in January, 1935, they arbitrarily raised that minimum from $10 to $30. Now the point is this, that there is nothing to prevent them from raising the rates much higher again. They have already made this arbitrary raise of the minimum from $10 to $30, as I have mentioned, and also in January, 1935, they raised the rate on theatres from a minimum of ten cents a seat to 15 and 20 cents a seat. Many of the larger theatres have not paid that higher rate because they can afford to fight any attempt at extortion, but the little fellows cannot afford to hire lawyers, and through fear and threats pay the fee, whether they believe it to be excessive or not. The theatres in 1934 paid this Canadian Performing Right Society, the company in which there are no Canadians participating at all, the sum of $50,000, and in 1935 the rate to the theatres was raised. The radio broadcasting stations paid to the Canadian Performing Right Society approximately $63,000 in 1934, and in 1935 that was raised approximately to $83,000. The hotel and radio fees were doubled from $25,000 to $50,000 in 1935.

There is also the fact that any other society in Canada can, under section 10 of the copyright act, 1931, go out and levy a similar toll. There is nothing in the world to prevent two or three or four or as many companies as you please from incorporating and collecting these tolls, and their minimum fee may be ten or twenty or thirty dollars. The present company rule entirely by threats, and the fear which they instil in the hearts of the small theatre owners compels them to pay. Only to-day I had a communication from a law firm in regard to the case of a little fellow who had been trying to create some amusement for the people at the beach. With his own hands he spent two and a half months building a hall, and at the end of the season, after the cottagers had left, along came the Canadian Performing Right Society collector, demanding $30, or more money than the boy had taken in. He paid it out of fear and had practically nothing left for his work.

Throughout British Columbia the Canadian Performing Right Society, apparently fearing that this investigation by Judge Parker would result in legislation which would curb their operations, sent men into the field collecting money here, there and everywhere, wherever they could get it. If any fraternal society refused to pay the $30 as required they would come back and take $20 or $10 or anything they could get.

I have introduced this bill in the hope that there will be a full and free discussion on the part of all hon. members so that something may be done to curb what can be nothing but a means of extorting money from the Canadian public.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa East): The main reason I rise on this occasion is that we are concerned with the second reading of this bill; and, according to the practice that prevails in this house, whoever allows the passing of the second reading is regarded as a matter of course as assenting to the principle of the bill.

My stand on this matter goes back fifteen years in the house, and you, Mr. Speaker, and some of the other members, are familiar with my views regarding copyright. This evening I desire to approach this question from one point only, namely, the question of rights. It is well known that we are now a party to the convention of Berne. There are two classes of authors: those who are our own nationals and those who belong to nations which are parties to the Berne convention and are neither Canadians nor Canadian nationals. So far as our own nationals are concerned, we may violate the convention of Berne from the first to the last letter; we may stultify ourselves by proclaiming any arbitrary measure to the detriment of our own nationals, and it is up to our own authors to suffer. But as adherents to the Berne convention we have to respect that international undertaking, and under the terms of that convention copyright exists in every one of the countries that are participants in the convention, and that without any formality whatsoever. As regards all works, whether literary or artistic, no formality need be complied with to secure copyright. The ownership in the copyright may be in the author or it may be in his assignee, and as the hon. gentleman who is proposing the bill (Mr. Esling) has said, the right to the copyright must be respected just as much as is a title to real estate.

Unfortunately in Canada that is not so. Those who in the past have been charged with the elaboration of a copyright act have always and to this moment neglected to protect the copyright holder. The most glaring evidence of that was given before one of the committees of the house when a gentleman from Toronto came to give evidence and declared that he represented the Copyright Protective Association. On examination of that witness it was found that the shareholders and those who composed the Copyright Protective Association were paper makers, dealers in twine, dealers in paste, and dealers in ink and typesetting, but there was not a single owner of a copyright nor was there one author in that corporation. We have neglected to safeguard the rights of authors.

For many years we have been endeavouring to provide remedies and to afford some measure of protection, but the law as it now stands is a fearful testimony to the monumental lack of protection. With reference to these two kinds of authors, we may do as we please with our own nationals; but as regards those who are not Canadian nationals, they retain their right to copyright and have a perfect right to charge whatever they may wish to exact in connection with the performance or reproduction of their works, whether literary or artistic. I protested vigorously in the name of these outside authors when this law was enacted. True, I recognize that there must not be a monopoly; true, these artistic or literary works may be reproduced for the good of the community. But after all the authors have a perfect right to say whether for $5 or $50 or for nothing at all their works may be reproduced.

It may be objected that in the patent law the ownership is taken away after a certain length of time. There may be some difference as between copyright in a piece of music and a patent on a wonderful instrument or an improvement, whether in connection with the telephone, the telegraph, the Marconi system or some of the most recent developments of science. There may be something in that. But there is no particular reason why the rights of composers to fees should be taken away from them and should be given some arbitrary compensation.

Is there any real reason why there should be a corporation called the Performing Right Society? I am not at all concerned with the Performing Right Society. As to whether it exists I am not concerned in the slightest degree. But it will be recognized at once that authors belonging to those nations of Europe and of other parts of the world subscribing to the Berne convention cannot very well supervise the collection of their own fees in Canada, any more than Canadian authors can supervise the collection of royalties in Japan, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy and other countries that are adherents to the convention. Some association must exist for the collection of these fees. I have not gone into the question, but it may be a fact that in the Performing Right Society there are no Canadians who have assigned to that corporation any of their rights. Nevertheless there are authors and copyright holders, assignees of those rights, who have handed over to that corporation the collection of their fees. I am not suggesting for a moment that the Canadian Performing Right Society should have the right to charge something outrageous, but we are faced with this problem: We belong to the convention of Berne or we do not. We have signed that international convention; we are bound to adhere to its tenets, and I submit that we cannot by this means interfere with the rights and the royalties of those authors and composers and assignees thereof who are not nationals. It is all very well to say that there is a racket—probably there is; I am not concerned for the moment whether there is or not—and to say that enormous fees are being charged. But I think that what was shown under past circumstances is well within the memory of any hon. member who has sat in the house for some years.

I did not intend to speak on this matter this evening, but I collected just at random one or two items from a most voluminous collection of documents that I happen to have, and if I am allowed I shall cite one or two of them. It was disclosed before the committee on railways and shipping on June 24, 1931, with reference to Canadian National broadcasting that the total amount paid for talent in 1930 was $95,073.82. This was for the artists who performed the copyrighted works; $95,000 was paid to the performers of those compositions. And when I asked this question in the house on July 2, 1931:

What amount of money was paid by the Canadian National Railway Company to authors and composers of copyrighted music and of other works, as fees or royalties for the use of the said copyrighted music or other works by the said Canadian National Railways broadcasting stations in Canada during the past twelve months?

—the period corresponding to that within which $95,073.82 had been paid for talent—I was answered by the then Minister of Railways that the sum paid in copyrights was the magnificent one of $20.42. The authors obtained $20.42 in order that those who performed those copyrighted works might obtain $95,073.82, and for rentals the additional sum of $60,756.23. I leave it to hon. members to say, first, whether a racket exists, and, second, where the racket does exist; whether the author derives a comparable benefit for the work which he puts on the market.

Going back to the 1931 committee I recall the evidence of Mr. Gitz Rice. If there is any racket let us see where it is. He said, at page 78 of the report of the committee's proceedings on June 30, 1931:

Since I started my profession of song writing I have been very fortunate in writing some of the world war's greatest songs. I have yet to collect the first cent from my own country, Canada, for them.

And further down he says:

The composer always gets the worst of it, no matter where you go.

And he adds:

At the same time the Victor Berliner Company of Montreal, published 250,000 records of McCormack singing "Dear Old Pal of Mine,"—

—written by Mr. Gitz Rice——and never paid me a cent.

It is with those two views in mind that I approach this question. The first one is, as I have said, that under the terms of the convention of Berne we may do as we please with our own people; we may humiliate them to our hearts' satisfaction by not allowing them to get any of the fees and royalties to which they are entitled, but at the same time I say that so long as we are participants in the convention of Berne we cannot arbitrarily determine what the compensation or royalties shall be to those who are not nationals.

In passing I may say that we have placed ourselves through our copyright law in a very bad light so far as European countries are concerned. In the last few years I have received a large number of comments upon our law, and I am afraid that some of them, expressed by leading lawyers and jurisconsults of the continent, would be hardly parliamentary. I have under my hand one from M. François Hepp, who is a Doctor of Law in Paris. What he says is this:

Un texte législatif important, et qui ne peut sembler aux amis du "Droit d'Auteur" que vraiment bizarre (sinon monstrueux), a été voté, le 17 avril 1935, en troisième lecture.

A free translation of that is:

An important legislative text, which may seem to the friends of "Droit d'Auteur" nothing less than peculiar (if not monstrous) was voted on third reading on April 17, 1935, by the Canadian Senate.

That in effect is what leading experts on copyright law say of our present Canadian copyright act.

I suggest that there should be a complete revision of that act, with a view of doing exactly what its title says, making it an act for the protection of copyright and not an act for the protection of everything but copyright. If we go back to the origins of the law —I am not going to trace them—whether common law or statute law, we shall find that in those countries where people were moved by the fairness of the right of the copyright holder, be he composer or author, justice was done to him; also that justice has not been done to our Canadian authors and composers. I shall give but one illustration of the sacredness of copyright, going back to the very earliest times of the colony. I remember reading in the Relations of the Jesuit Fathers that an Indian had his own war song and that nobody else was allowed to sing it; if some one did so it was the right of the one whose copyright had been infringed to engage in warfare and to kill that person if he could. So that copyright goes as far back as the Indians of the earliest days of the colony, and I deplore the fact that even to this day Canadian authors do not enjoy, not the right of life and death over their infringers, but a fair measure of security.

I understand that the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) proposes at a later date to introduce a bill to implement in some respects the report of Judge Parker. This is neither the time nor the place to discuss that report but I am very much afraid that we shall be faced again with the same situation, namely, trying to determine rights in respect of something over which we have no jurisdiction whatever. It may be true that monopolies exist in Canada as regards the collection of these fees, but I pointed out on another occasion that the place to deal with the matter was not on copyright legislation. There is another statute the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and if we must do something by legislation, why not place that provision in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and take it out of the copyright act. No other copyright legislation in the world contains such a provision. The place to have it, if you must have it, is outside the statute altogether.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, again to say that when the matter arises at a later date either in committee or on the third reading, I shall declare my complete opposition to anything which infringes the conditions under which we entered into the convention of Berne. With all deference I say that the government would be well advised to wait until the next convention takes place in Brussels next September. Then, in the light of what takes place there, after a study of the grievances that have been alleged against our own system and after consultation with experts representing the various other countries, a measure can be framed which we can truly call a copyright act, which will contain the essential of copyright, which is the protection of the copyright owner.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should like to ask the hon. member if the Berne agreement protects against reproduction or against reception.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): In the Canadian act there is a provision with reference to radio; I suppose that is what the hon. gentleman means. That applies the provisions of the Berne convention to reproduction by radio.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) has directed attention to evils that were persistently brought to the notice of the previous government. The hon. gentleman is entirely in error when he suggests that the copyright legislation of 1931 first authorized the owners of musical copyrights to license the performing rights in such copyright. That authorization has existed for many years.

The legislation of 1931 was directed to the regulation and control of such associations and companies as had acquired musical copyrights, and were exercising those rights by making utterly unjust demands upon the public for the use of their performing rights. I know the hon. member for East Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) has some very strong views on the matter. From time to time he has presented them before this house and before several of the committees of this house, but neither in the committees nor in the house has he obtained legislative recognition of those views.

During the last session these evils became so apparent that it became necessary for the government to appoint a commission to make a judicial inquiry into the facts in order to ascertain whether and to what extent these allegations of monopoly and unjust price were founded in fact. The amendment of last year, therefore, had in view the appointment of such a commission. That legislation passed, I think, without dissent; certainly, as far as I remember, it passed without dissent from the hon. member for Ottawa East, and at an early date the government did appoint a royal commission to make the inquiry.

I have read cursorily the report of that commission; I know from the newspaper reports that the investigation was a long and exhaustive one. I know the various interests were represented there by some of the ablest counsel that could be procured in Canada, and there these questions were fought out. If the government of which I was formerly a member had remained in office I have no doubt that on the recommendation of the Secretary of State, after an investigation had been held, either by order in council, as authorized under the act, or by legislation, some real effort would have been made to regulate or suppress the evils which had grown up. This is a matter with which the government must deal, I think, as a government, simply because in dealing with it the government must comply with the obligations which this country has undertaken by becoming a party to the Berne convention. That convention was signed by the preceding government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the duty and obligation was placed upon the succeeding government, which was the late government, of seeing to it that the convention was conserved, but also that any evils which had grown up, under the organization of a Canadian company called the Canadian Performing Right Society, Limited, should be mitigated and if possible restrained.

Undoubtedly, I think, under the Berne convention this parliament has a right to deal with radio communication, and under that convention there is no restriction upon our right to enforce criminal and quasi-criminal measures. Under the Berne convention there is no restriction to our right to put an end to price-fixing and extortion such as has been alleged in connection with the Canadian Performing Right Society, Limited. I will not say that this was founded on fact, because I have not had an opportunity of reading the evidence which was heard by the commission; that evidence was returned to the Secretary of State after I left office, and this government must now deal with that matter. We have had an assurance by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) that this government will deal with the matter, and I think we may feel confident that a matter of this kind will be dealt with effectively.

Therefore I would suggest to the hon. member for Kootenay West either that he have this debate adjourned until such time as it can be ascertained whether or not the measures proposed by the government are effective, or that this bill be withdrawn as premature. The evils cannot be dealt with as the hon. member for West Kootenay has attempted to deal with them in this measure; I am quite clear as to that. But that they can be dealt with under the recommendations, or some of the recommendations, made by the commissioner, who sat and heard evidence for months, I believe is possible, and therefore I think it would be far better to leave the government free to deal with these evils.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think even this short debate will have convinced the house that this matter of copyright is a very complex problem. In two successive speeches we have heard the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) contending that there is a racket in the matter of exacting fees in favour of the composers, and the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier), who quoted what he said was a celebrated jurist, contending that it is monstrous that the fees exacted should be so small and of so little benefit to the composers of music. Therefore I think I am safe in concurring in the statement made by my predecessor in office (Mr. Cahan) that strong views are entertained on both sides of the question, and that an effort should be made to reconcile those views and introduce legislation which will assure an even measure of justice.

As to the principle of the bill, I fully agree with the sponsor that it is desirable to give effect by legislation to the results of the inquiry made by Judge Parker. But we cannot dissociate this intention from the provisions of the bill which are known to us, and I completely disagree with him as to the methods by which he proposes that the house should follow up the report made by Judge Parker. I may not have time to go into details to-night, but I think it could easily be proved that in both respects he is completely in disagreement with Judge Parker. Inasmuch as my hon. friend has praised the appointment of a royal commission I believe he will be willing to support the government when a bill is brought down that will embody more completely the recommendations made by Judge Parker.

In passing let me say that although I have on more than one occasion supported the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Chevrier) in his efforts to obtain a good copyright law in this country, I am not in agreement with him on the point that is under discussion just now. This bill, the bill I shall bring in and the inquiry made by Judge Parker deal merely with the activities of the Canadian Performing Right Society, and I contend that this society has placed itself in a position where special measures are absolutely necessary to meet the situation. The society may own copyrights on foreign music, but it is a Canadian organization, very close to a monopoly, and I must say most decidedly, as the minister charged with the administration of copyright, that I consider its activities are distinctly in opposition to the interests of true copyright as I understand it. I believe that if an individual composer of music takes advantage of the present law he can have the fullest protection, but when we have to deal with a monopoly, a society owning thousands or hundreds of thousands of musical compositions, we certainly have to adopt towards such a company special provisions in the act. The hon. member for Ottawa East himself agreed that that might be necessary, but he said: Why not do it by another act? In reply I say that if he is agreeable to have it in another act, why should he oppose having it in this one, because the effect will be the same, the result will be identical, whether we deal with that society by the copyright act or the Combines Investigation Act. All that the Canadian Performing Right Society does is to hold a monopoly on musical compositions and exact fees for the use of them. This is not copyright in the true sense of the word. We have never known how the money collected is distributed to the composers. I am still at a loss to find out how this is done. In dealing with this society we are facing not copyright but a special application of it, and personally I do not think there would be any conflict with the Berne convention in having special sections dealing with this society.

What the former Secretary of State did was to have an act passed in 1931 forcing this society and others of the same character, if they exist, to file a statement of their fees with the Department of the Secretary of State, and if there was opposition or conflict over those fees the act provided for the appointment of a commissioner to make inquiry. That is what was done, and we now have in our hands the report of Judge Parker, appointed a commissioner on March 22, 1935, to investigate the whole situation. I would say to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) that although he professes to follow the work of the commissioner, in both of the sections that he proposes, he has completely missed the point made by Judge Parker. In the first place my hon. friend wants to fix maximum fees for the performance of musical compositions either over the radio or in theatres or otherwise, and if there is anything that is very plain in the report of Judge Parker it is that he said that should be dealt with only on the actual situation. He does admit that the whole matter is in the experimental stage, and his chief proposal is:

> That the copyright act be amended so as to provide for the establishment of an appeal tribunal, to determine disputes arising out of performance in public and to approve of the tariffs of the Canadian Performing Right Society, Limited, from time to time before they become effective.

In other words, far from recommending any permanent fee the recommendation of Judge Parker is that there should be a tribunal that would every year, if there is any discussion as to the fees filed in the Department of the Secretary of State, hear such appeals.

In the second section of my hon. friend's bill he proposes that the society should not only file a list of its musical compositions with the Department of the Secretary of State, but also furnish a copy of such list to hotels and restaurants and other places where such performances may be heard. On that point also he is in complete disagreement with the report of Judge Parker, who at page 33 makes it very plain that he does not think the society may be in a position to file any complete list with the Secretary of State or to supply that list to every performer of the music. I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West that there is some ground for the argument that if you do charge a fee on music the least you can do would be to tell the performer what music that is. The fact that they cannot supply lists shows conclusively that this society is a monopoly of a very special character and that we cannot deal with it in the same way as if it were a true and complete owner of copyrights in the real sense of the word.

The hon. member for Ottawa East has cited a case which is very pathetic, that of the composer of the famous song "Dear Old Pal of Mine." I think we all agree that that song was sung everywhere, not only in this country but in the United States, and that the composer did not have even the slight redress that could be exercised now in favour of a similar case. But I say again that if we had to deal with individual cases I would advocate that the law be made if possible more strict in favour of the composer. But I ask my hon. friend to consider that any bill we introduce must deal with the special case of the Canadian Performing Right Society, and that case cannot be dealt with in the same spirit or regulated in the same way as if we were dealing with individual composers.

I thank the former Secretary of State for the proposal he made, which I am also going to make to the mover of this bill, that he either let his bill stand or else withdraw it until the government through myself present to the house the bill that we have in mind. It is not customary to disclose the contents of a bill before it is given first reading because, like everything else, it is subject to changes. I may say, however, that it is the intention of the government to present a bill which will follow closely the recommendations made by Mr. Justice Parker. The bill will tend to create a tribunal of appeal where, every year at a certain period, performers may appeal from the fees of the Canadian Performing Right Society, and other societies. We wish to observe the principle mentioned to-night by the hon. member for Ottawa East that the owner of the copyright in the first place should file a fee which he believes to be proper. Inasmuch as we have to deal with what I shall again describe as a monopoly, we also want to give to the performer the opportunity of coming before the tribunal each year at a certain date to appeal from the fees fixed or registered in my department by such societies. I think we should preserve both principles, that of the free ownership of a copyright and, at the same time, that of regulating against a monopoly wherever it exists.

Further, it will be necessary to provide for the transition period between the time Mr. Justice Parker was appointed and the time the new bill will be in operation. A bill was passed in 1935 covering the circumstances, whereby no action may be taken in the recovery of fees pending the inquiry. But from the time that Mr. Justice Parker was appointed until the time the new bill will be in effect, and, if we provide for a tribunal, until the time when the appeal would have been heard by that tribunal, it will be necessary to cover the transition period. That will have to be done by the Secretary of State with the consent of parliament. Provision will be made therefor in the incoming bill.

Supported by the Secretary of State of the late administration—and I again thank him for his support because we happen to be of the same mind—I renew my request to have the hon. member's consent to let the bill stand, and not force second reading. If he should do otherwise I would have to vote against it.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It seems to me that protection of copyright lies within the whole field of reproduction, and not that of reception. I hope the government is taking that point into consideration. It seems to me ridiculous that the owner of a radio receiving set should be compelled to pay for everything he receives.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): There is nothing in the act about that.

On motion of Mr. Neill the debate was adjourned.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the house to speak again, as this bill comes under my jurisdiction. I believe the provisions in the bill are self-explanatory and should not prove contentious. The object of the bill is simply to postpone for one year the revision of the existing lists. As hon. members are aware a committee of the house has been agreed upon and will soon be formed to study amendments to the elections act and the Dominion Franchise Act. Many proposals have come from different sources respecting amendments to the electoral law.

In the debate on the address several hon. members referred to changes which should be made in our electoral law. Further references have been made in the press and in private correspondence indicating a strong desire to amend the elections act and the Dominion Franchise Act. Under the circumstances the postponement of the annual revision to take place this year seemed the obvious procedure. There is no desire to cast any reflection upon the existing law. My own experience has been that it has worked very well in more than one particular, and I pay my respects to the former government in its execution of this legislation. I may say that the law has functioned well in the district in which I happened to live during election time, and there is not the least desire to cast any reflections upon the law when, in the name of the government, I propose the postponement of the revision.

I would bring to the attention of the house the fact, in the first place, that a revision is very costly. A question on the order paper has asked for the full costs of preparing the lists for the last general election, a procedure which of course was quite necessary, and for the costs in connection with the revision which took place last May.

So that hon. members may have the facts may I say that when the dominion franchise commissioner placed his estimates before me he had two sets of proposals. If there was to be no revision he was satisfied with a sum of about $16,000, but if there was to be a revision he asked for $350,000. Hon. members will understand that these expenditures are very great. It is my opinion that in the city ridings, at least, the revision would bring very small results. It is not likely that electors would be anxious to attend before a revising officer, because the election is far away, and the incentive for attendance is lacking. I do not believe many hon. members would be in favour of spending a huge sum of money upon a revision at this time. Were we to have a revision we would have to pay a high price for it, and probably get only small results.

The only reason, however, from the administrative point of view, which has governed the submission of the bill is that we are likely to have amendments to the electoral law before the end of the present session. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has pointed out—and his observations have been approved by many hon. members—that it is better to amend the electoral law at the first session of a new parliament than to wait until the closing session. I confidently expect that before the session is over a new electoral law may be considered. The necessity for moving this bill at this time is that, if circumstances had not been foreseen and some provision made, the printing bureau already would be printing forms for the next revision, and by April 1 notice would be given in the Canada Gazette by the dominion franchise officer to the different revising officers throughout the country to prepare for the revision. That is why I ask the house to pass this bill now as an emergency measure. It does not propose to deal with the situation at all in a full way; it is merely to prevent the pending revision taking place and possibly then coming into conflict with some new electoral law and some new form of preparation of the lists. I think the object of the bill is obvious, and I do not think I need say any more at the moment.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Having had experience for five years in dealing with the elections act and the franchise act, and in view of the proposed amendments to both these acts, I certainly agree with the hon. gentleman that the pending revision should be deferred.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise not for the purpose of objection to the principle of this bill because as the government does not expect a general election in the next year I think it is quite proper that we should avoid the expense to the country at large and to the parties responsible for the revision of the list of an annual revision now. There is, however, one situation which I desire to bring to the attention of the government, and that is the possibility of a byelection being held. Under the provisions of the act as it now stands, the list that is in force will continue to be the list until another is prepared, and if revision is done away within the year 1936 there could not be another revision before 1937. It would not be complete until July 1, 1937, and then there would be the printing after that. If we had a byelection at any time within the next six months we would be voting on the line of the list that was made in the year 1935, and so I suggest that the government might well consider putting into this measure a section providing that in case of a byelection being held the governor in council would have power to authorize and direct a revision or an enumeration which would bring up to date the list in that electoral constituency. I think we will all agree that it is desirable that the electoral lists should be up to date, and in these days when people are moving about, particularly from city to city, a list a year old would be very much out of date. That is the only suggestion I have to make, that the government consider inserting in this bill a provision that in the case of a byelection being held the governor in council would have power to order a revision or an enumeration in the constituency concerned.

Mr. RINFRET: If my hon. friend will agree we might take up that point in committee.

Mr. STEWART: That is quite satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Annual revision of lists.

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I had foreseen the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) because I took up that very question with the dominion franchise commissioner when we were preparing this bill. My hon. friend's point I think is well taken. I will agree with him as to that. Byelections, of course, are governed by section 18, which governs all elections, whether byelections or general elections. It reads as follows:

> The lists of electors which shall be made and certified pursuant to this part of this act shall be valid until revised lists, replacing and superseding them, shall have been made and certified pursuant to part III of this act.

My hon. friend is quite right when he says that if this act is passed and nothing further is done in the meantime, any byelection taking place this year will be held on the lists as they actually exist, but on the other hand it did not seem possible to include in this bill a provision such as he suggests unless we created entirely new machinery altogether, because the whole of part III of the bill is based upon the fact that notice is given on the first of April that certain things shall take place on certain dates, and the revision goes on in a certain fixed way. In other words, if we could foresee in advance what byelections are coming, we might say that these sections would apply only in the case of certain counties, but I may say that we have not found it possible to include in the bill a section which would make the act operative only in certain cases, and in order to cover the case of a byelection we would have to revise a long list of sections just to cover that eventuality.

As the government was confident that it might be possible to have a new act passed this session we thought we would in the meantime ask the house to pass this bill as it stands, merely for the purpose of stopping immediately the oncoming revision. I repeat that I see the point that has been made by my hon. friend. Perhaps we might agree that if the amendments to the electoral laws are not available this year, which is in the nature of a possibility, we might still before the end of this session find a way of meeting the special case my hon. friend mentions, but we have not considered the question of a single section foreseeing the eventuality of a byelection because, as I have pointed out, the whole act is framed in a very definite way providing for annual revisions to take place at certain dates and under certain conditions. If the committee will agree to let the bill pass as it stands I will undertake to deal with the special case brought forward by my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART: As I understand the situation, the proceedings in connection with the annual revision will not take place until April 1, which is more than a month away, so no expenditure would be incurred in the meantime. I have not looked into the matter perhaps as carefully as has the Secretary of State, but I am inclined to think it would not be difficult to draft a section or two or three sections which would in themselves provide for the contingency of byelections. We are facing one now. The Speaker announced to-night a vacancy in one of the constituencies, and that he had issued his writ.

Mr. RINFRET: That would be held under the old list.

Mr. STEWART: Exactly, and I think it is undesirable that an election should be held on a list that is a year old. It will be considerably more than a year old when the election is held. All our elections in recent years have been based upon a list that is brought thoroughly up to date through the medium of an enumeration. It seems to me that it could be provided that in case of a byelection enumerators should be appointed and that they should perform the duties set out in section so and so for the purpose of that byelection. I do not think there is any difficulty whatever in drafting an amendment to cover the point which we have in view, and which the Secretary of State admits is important and well taken. It seems to me that we might leave the bill in committee for a day or so until we see whether we cannot work out something of that kind. I do not want to delay the bill at all, and I do not want to cause the incurring of any expense which can be avoided, but the revision would not, in any event, start until April.

Mr. RINFRET: We have had for a number of years one or other of the systems of preparing lists, either that of preparing lists on the eve of an election at the last moment, or this system which provides for a fixed or permanent list revised once a year. I say again that it would require practically a new act to provide for byelections in the manner suggested by the hon. gentleman. I do not see how it would be possible to amend this act in that regard at all; we should have to repeal the whole of part III dealing with the preparation of lists and bring in a new bill altogether. And that might conflict with another measure which is likely to be presented to the house before we prorogue. I would point out that until July any by-election held would have to be staged on the lists as they are, because until that time the new lists would not have been printed, at least not until the first of July, which is the ultimate date of revision. The hon. gentleman's objection was foreseen and we came to the conclusion that the immediate urgency was merely to postpone revision, because there will be time later in the session to consider the question of providing for by-elections.

I have stated and I state again that even if this bill had not been on the order paper the printing bureau would be already printing for the revision and the entire machinery would be set in motion within a few weeks, and that is what we want to stop. We are asking the approval of the house of this bill, which we desire to send to the senate in time to prevent that machinery from being set in motion. Even if my hon. friend insisted on his point, I should still deem it necessary to have this bill passed, with an opportunity, if it were thought desirable, of introducing a bill dealing with byelections. In the meantime, however, I confidently trust that the committee will report this bill in time to make provision for an adequate electoral law during the present session. But if that were not done there would still be time to provide for a bill dealing with byelections.

My hon. friend has made another point, that unless what he suggests is done we shall not have revised lists until 1937. But that is the case under the present act, because the act as it stands at present provides for permanent lists. If we are to deal with by-elections, however, I should be in favour of introducing a bill providing for special revision on the eve of a byelection, but that would be different altogether from the one that now exists. I appreciate the fact that electoral laws are a matter of compromise, but I think we are justified in asking the house to dispose of this point, and we can still consider the question of meeting my hon. friend's views with regard to byelections.

Mr. STEWART: I do not want to seem to be pressing this matter unduly, but the Secretary of State is dealing with general elections rather than with the point I am raising with respect to byelections, and I think he must admit it is not desirable that even a byelection should be held on a list which is a year old. He speaks about introducing legislation aimed at changing the whole of the act. That will probably not be introduced until near the end of the session; it is in many respects a contentious subject. In the meantime we might safeguard the situation; if we are to repeal the provision with respect to annual revision we really ought to make some provision with respect to byelections.

Mr. MacNICOL: I support the suggestion of the hon. member for Leeds. I listened to what the minister said with regard to by-elections, and perhaps I might make a few remarks with regard to a riding in Toronto in which there are approximately 60,000 people. On the lists upon which the election was held in October last I presume that out of that 60,000 there were 40,000 names listed. I am not sure, but that is an estimate. Of these, 9,000 families or persons had moved away. The election was in a riding in which there were a great many apartments; there are many university student rooming houses in the district. When the enumerators went through the riding and found that 9,000 families or persons had moved away, they did not strike the names off, so that when the election was held there were on the list 9,000 names of people who did not vote. On the same list approximately one per cent of the names represented those who had died and it was said that not less than 1,000 names appeared twice on the list, names of people who had moved from one part of the riding to another. A number of names were on the list three times and I heard of one name that appeared four times. The enumerators had gotten the names in the fall of 1934 and they got them again in April, May or June in 1935. In the meantime these people had moved but their names were kept on. If the revision were made immediately before a byelection in Toronto this spring I am of the opinion that it would be found that twenty-five per cent of the names on a list were names that should have been struck off either because the people had moved away, or because the names were repeated or because the voters had died.

Mr. POWER: May I point out that even if the present amendment were not introduced the inconveniences referred to by the two hon. members would exist. Under the act as it is now, without the amendment introduced by the Secretary of State, no new list can be ready until some time after the first of July, and it will be probably the first of August before it is printed. So that no matter what happened, the byelection now pending to which my hon. friend refers would be conducted under the law as it was passed in 1934 and on the list which came into effect on the first of July, 1935. No other list can come into effect until the first of July, 1936, unless some amendment is proposed in this house, so that what my hon. friends are asking for is an amendment to the act of 1934. They are asking for an amendment of that kind right now. The whole act is about to be revamped by the elections committee which will doubtless study the question whether the system of closed lists now in force, which entails the inconveniences that have been pointed out, shall continue to be the system to be followed, or whether it will be advisable in future to revert to the procedure followed under the 1930 act and the acts prior thereto, whereby a revision was made just after the writs were issued.

I understand that a large number of hon. members, having given the so-called closed list a trial and the fixed list a trial, desire to revert to the other system. That cannot be done without an amendment to the act, and what is being pressed to-night simply postpones the revision and leaves the way open for further discussion of the two methods of procedure, whether we are to have a closed list or an open list. I have not the slightest doubt that if the matter is pressed by the members and the committee makes due diligence it will be possible before the end of this session, and in plenty of time to meet the objections of my hon. friends—that is to say before July 1, 1936—to introduce some amendment whereby any election taking place after July 1, 1936, will be governed somewhat along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). So that if this particular amendment passes now, the committee could get to work at once and lay down some system of procedure, even if it were only a preliminary or an emergency measure, which would be in effect for an election prior to the time that a new election act is introduced.

Mr. STEWART: I think if the act were left as it is there would be no complaint in connection with any byelection, because the list would not be too old. But when you come to amend the act and take away the only existing provision and make no provision for a byelection you are sure to have an old list. In the case of the byelection we have in mind I am sure the government would not fix the date of that byelection before July 1 if they felt that the act should remain exactly as it is, and the revision would be complete by that time. But with this amendment they know perfectly well that there will be no revision; that the list will not be brought up to date even though they hold the byelection next fall. Six months may elapse from the date of the vacancy before they issue the writ, and if they took that time there would be under this amendment no new list, and be no revision of the list. Whereas if the act were left as it is, in due time there would be a new list, and the government could see to it that the byelection was held on the new list. On the other hand, if this amendment goes through, and no provision as suggested is made, they are depriving themselves of the power of holding a byelection on a list that is up to date.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As the case stands, any byelection prior to July next will have to be held under this act of 1935, whether we act on this bill or not. Would it solve the difficulty if I made this suggestion—after all, this session, I hope, is not going to last all summer—that when the end of the session comes in May or in June, and if it is apparent to everybody that there will be no change in the election law or in the franchise act as a result of the work of the committee that is going to sit, it would then be time enough to meet the objection of my hon. friends and have an act put upon the statutes to deal with any byelection which may take place after July 1 until next year? Would that solve the difficulty?

Mr. STEWART: If the Minister of Justice on behalf of the government would intimate that that will be done, that will be quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think I may ask the government to do it, if my hon. friend is satisfied.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope the committee did not get the impression that I am opposed to the bill. I am not, and I am strongly in favour of a revision of the franchise act. All I want to be sure of is that this matter will be attended to in the event of a byelection being held in a city riding. I do not think my objections would have the same weight with regard to a byelection held in a rural riding in the next few months, because lists do not change in the latter with anything like the same rapidity that they do in a city riding. But if a byelection were held in Montreal or Toronto within a month or two, it would make a great deal of difference whether the lists were to be revised or not. That is all I had in mind.

Mr. POWER: What my hon. friend is asking is to throw into the discard the principle in the act of 1934 which he supported.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend was one of the most vigorous supporters in the House of Commons of the 1934 act.

Mr. POWER: Indeed I was not.

Mr. MacNICOL: Indeed you were. I concluded that the act was the act of the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. POWER: I think my hon. friend will remember that I had a good deal to do with the 1930 act, but in order to save the 1934 act from the pieces into which it was broken by his side, I endeavoured to help them out.

Mr. SPENCE: And you made a mess of it.

Mr. POWER: I did make it a little better than it would otherwise have been.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair,

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

External Affairs—Washington—
Representation, including salaries and allowance for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwthstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the Prime Minister if there is any likelihood of an appointment being made at Washington in the near future?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration. I cannot say to my right hon. friend just how soon an appointment will be made.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—
Canada's contribution to the expenses of the international commission for air navigation for 1936, $1,650.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister give us some indication as to the nature of this commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The international commission for air navigation was set up in 1919, and prior to the year 1934 the empire financial responsibility was carried wholly by the government of the united kingdom. The various states are divided into five categories as regards the contribution to be paid, the classification being based chiefly upon the relative development of air service in each country. The commission collects information and establishes regulations regarding international air navigation. Our participation in the treaty establishing the commission was one of the grounds on which the privy council held that the control of air navigation in Canada fell within federal rather than provincial jurisdiction.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of wheat advisory committee for 1936, Canada's assessment, $1,955.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May we know what was done by this advisory committee last year? Have the arrangements that were made some time ago fallen through, or what is the state of affairs to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The wheat advisory committee was established by arrangement between the wheat exporting and importing countries under an agreement reached in London in August, 1933. The advisory committee was established to supervise the working out of the agreement. The committee is temporary in character and is composed of representatives of fifteen countries. The small secretariat of the wheat advisory committee, whose salaries and operating expenses account for most of the cost of its maintenance, provides the subscribing governments with periodic surveys of trends in wheat production and marketing conditions which have been of distinct value to the various agencies of government concerned with wheat. This function of furnishing accurate information about the international aspects of wheat marketing problems is quite separate from the committee's first assignment of watching over the working of the provisions of the wheat agreement which were intended to regulate exports and production of the wheat exporting countries. The total amount of the contribution in gold francs is 60,920. The contribution of Canada towards the expenses of the wheat advisory committee is 10,120 gold francs.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any agreement existing between the exporting nations to-day? The popular idea is that when the Argentine seemed to go back on certain agreements the matter was dropped.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The agreement expired last year.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the work of this advisory committee is simply to secure information with regard to trends, is that work quite distinct from the work of that institution in Rome?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that they work together.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to meet loss on exchange, subject to approval of the treasury board, $200,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This must cover all the operations of all the offices abroad?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; they are all External Affairs matters.

Mr. HEAPS: Could we have a more detailed explanation from the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand the matter, there were certain contracts entered into on a gold basis, and where a country's currency is depreciated the depreciation has to be made up by an additional amount. This appropriation is to provide what is necessary for exchange purposes.

Mr. HEAPS: What were the original appropriations for?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very largely for League of Nations affairs. At Geneva there is the office of the Canadian advisory officer, salaries and allowances, the contribution to the League of Nations and allowances to League of Nations delegates. At Paris there are the salaries and allowances for the legation. Then there are small amounts for the international commission on air navigation and the wheat advisory committee. There was paid from the exchange vote from April 1, 1935, to January 31, 1936, the sum of $181,489.59.

Mr. HEAPS: Does this item cover just one year's operations as far as our exchange is concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Out of that total, $143,168.20 had relation to our contribution to the league.

Item agreed to.

Canada's portion of expenditure of the imperial economic committee and imperial shipping committee and the executive council of the imperial agricultural bureau for 1936, $18,690.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask what portion of this amount is for the imperial economic committee, and whether it performs any work such as we had anticipated the lately abolished economic council in Canada would have performed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is chiefly in the nature of market intelligence services.

Item agreed to.

Advertising and publicity in the United Kingdom and Europe, $250,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we should have some information as to how this very large sum is to be spent. Some years ago we had advertising for immigration purposes and trade and commerce expenditures along that line. What do we need this advertising for and just how is this amount spent?

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand the matter, this includes the sum total of all the expenditures of the various departments placed under the control of the high commissioner? Is this the item?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; this is the item. I might give my hon. friend what was spent in 1935-36, in connection with advertising generally. It was practically all in connection with the selling of Canadian agricultural products:

Renewal of advertising contract with Canada's Weekly, £1,500.
Maple Leaf Tour of Canada, for trade journal advertising and printing, £450.
Services of Mr. James Spence, £300.
Advertising and publicity in connection with Canada shops, £2,000.
Contract with Service Newspapers, Limited, £1,620.
Advertising in the Journal of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in Great Britain, £100.
Advertising on commercial van sides, £5,269 17s. 6d.
General press and trade paper advertising, £2,000.
General poster and outdoor advertising, £2,000.
Contract with the Imperial Review published by Mr. Theo. Feilden, £300.
Contract with the Empire Homemakers' Institute, £400.
Artists' fees for sketches, drawings, etc., £100.
Printed matter, £1,000.
Salaries of temporary staff not taking into consideration the contingency of a restoration of 5 per cent, £648 11s.
Sundry items of expenditure paid in London, £4,000.
Salaries and allowances for permanent staff i.e. D. G. Gerahty and D. G. Keith, not taking into consideration the restoration of 5 per cent, £1,523.
Electric sign in Trafalgar square, £5,460.
Electric sign at Mersey Side, Liverpool, £2,400.
Theatre lantern slide advertising, £1,200.
Omnibus and tram car transparency advertising, £1,060.
Theatre program advertising, £1,846.
Mounting window bills and advertising matter for distribution to the retail trade, £1,000.
Cardboard maple leaf display stands as centrepieces for retail windows, £921 17s. 6d.
Miscellaneous expenditure, Ottawa, $500.
Advertising campaign for Canadian bacon, £1,250.
Providing six travelling scholarships in connection with the Maple Leaf Tour, £500.
Payment to the Imperial Institute for the servicing of Canadian films, £200.
Omnibus, tram car and commercial van side advertising (for the six months from September, 1935, to February, 1936), £4,200.
Advertising in connection with Utrecht fair, £300.
Advertising and publicity in connection with the Imperial fruit show, Cardiff, £400.
Contribution to the Fruit Trades' Federation, £300.
Advertising in connection with the British Industries fair, £1,000.
Advertising in connection with the Lyons fair, £300.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This seems to me a very heavy expenditure that brings very little back to Canada. It is a hand-out to a number of people and journals in Great Britain. I think the government ought to consider very carefully whether, in view of other needed expenditures in this country, it is necessary to carry on such an extensive advertising campaign.

Then there is another matter. It is several years since I have been in Great Britain, but I found then—and I think the same thing obtains now—that we have provincial offices scattered throughout London—

Mr. BENNETT: Not so many now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has any serious effort ever been made to concentrate all our publicity? There is no good reason why if each province wants to advertise its own particular lines of goods, we should not concentrate in some way and save the duplication of expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been some saving quite recently. The Ontario office has been closed, and Nova Scotia—

Mr. BENNETT: And I think New Brunswick.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend is right. A couple of offices have been closed. One feature that has to be kept in mind is the fact that the other dominions do this advertising on a very extensive scale; Australia, New Zealand, South Africa are all advertising in similar ways, and if Canada drops out of the field there is the risk of losing what trade comes as a result of advertising I agree, however, that the matter cannot be too carefully supervised.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I take an entirely different view from that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I do not think this item is too high; I think it is about one-tenth of what it should be.

An hon. MEMBER: From what source are you going to shovel up the money?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If we are going to sell our products we must advertise them properly in the old country.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They do not want to sell, they say that there is no market.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is a wrong attitude. As far as advertising agricultural products is concerned we are about twenty-five years behind the times. Every other industry in this country has gone out to create a demand for the commodities they have to sell; in regard to agricultural products we have not done that to the extent we should. If that work can be done in a more extensive way and we can get a proper return for our money, I think this item ought to be increased instead of cut down.

Mr. HEAPS: I listened attentively to the Prime Minister as he gave the various items which comprise this sum of nearly $250,000. As the items were read I was considering what value is obtained for the amounts specified, and I cannot help thinking that a large part of this sum is being absolutely wasted. I have no objection to spending money for proper and fruitful advertising, but the question is whether the money spent in the manner shown is going to bring the results we ought to get for the very large expenditure. I am satisfied from a number of visits I have paid to the old country during recent years that we are not receiving the best value for the money. I should like the Prime Minister or the department responsible for this expenditure to scrutinize it very carefully. When I see about £5,000 for an electric sign in Trafalgar square, where we have Canada house—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I relieve my hon. friend's mind at once in regard to that sign? It has been discontinued.

Mr. HEAPS: I am satisfied that there are other items also where economy could be effected. Some of the journals mentioned are read by hardly anyone. They are like some of the newspapers sent to members of the house; they just come and get the advertising, but the circulation is very small. It is rather unusual for us in this corner to be impressing upon the government the necessity of economy, but on this occasion we cannot help doing so, because when money is being spent we want to see that we get the best possible value. I think that if the Prime Minister would obtain details of the circulation of some of those papers it would clearly appear that there are better ways of spending this money than those that have been indicated this evening.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses of the reference by the governments of Canada and the United States of certain complaints arising out of the operation of the smelter at Trail, B.C., to the tribunal constituted pursuant to the provisions of the convention signed at Ottawa the 15th April, 1935, $25,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well to indicate to the committee that this money is merely being advanced by the government and will be repaid by the people interested. I suppose that is so?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Civil government—Office of the Prime Minister—Salaries, $41,901.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice an increase in this item. Perhaps the Prime Minister could explain the reason for the increase.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an increase of $13,271. May I say that $10,000 of this amount is to enable the office to be organized in a more businesslike manner than obtains at the moment. It is for purposes of administration. May I repeat what I said a year or two ago, namely, that a Prime Minister goes into his office with but one or two secretaries; he is not in the position of other ministers of the crown who enter well organized departments, headed by a deputy minister, and supplied with secretaries of the department and staff as well as personal secretaries. He may find a few stenographic clerks in the office of the Prime Minister, but for the whole administration of his office he is practically dependent upon the services of two or three private secretaries.

I believe my right hon. friend opposite will agree that it is really impossible to carry on the business of the Prime Minister's office without more adequate and effective administrative machinery. Above all else it seems to me what is really needed is effective co-ordination of the work through the instrumentality of a high grade official who would occupy in the Prime Minister's office a position very similar to that of deputy minister in the offices of other ministers. I need not point out that for years past, in addition to the work of his own office, the Prime Minister has been president of the privy council and responsible for the work of the office of the privy council and also for that of the Department of External Affairs, he being as well Secretary of State for External Affairs. The result is that these three offices continuously make their demands upon his time. In addition, the Prime Minister has his duties in parliament, and duties connected therewith. Hon. members know how considerable is the time which he must necessarily give to the work of parliament apart altogether from departmental duties, and obligations as the leader of a political party as well as those of Prime Minister apart altogether from parliament. There is need of some one or more persons in the nature of liaison officers to effect contacts between different departments of government and the Prime Minister as well as between parliament and the Prime Minister. These functions cannot be performed by private secretaries who have other equally important duties. I imagine the amount of correspondence to be dealt with and the number of interviews are far beyond the imagination of most hon. members. The work of correspondence alone has come now to where it has to be organized almost as a separate department of government. Perhaps my right hon. friend opposite would give the committee some indication of what he knows has to be accomplished. I must say to hon. members it will be impossible at all satisfactorily to carry on public work unless the Prime Minister can be supplied with efficient help.

Yesterday we had before us a bill for the appointment of an economic council to advise the Prime Minister. When in opposition I took the stand that an economic council was not what was required in association with the Prime Minister's office; I said that what he required was the services of two or three highly trained experts who could be helpful in preparing material on economic and financial questions, whose services he could command and who could supply him with necessary data when he had to consider any particular subject either for discussion in parliament or in connection with matters of a departmental nature. That I believe is very necessary. This vote is intended to enable a prime minister to retain the services of expert persons to assist in the work of the office. In a general way I believe I have described its purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think any language the Prime Minister can use would be an exaggeration of the condition to which he has referred. I am not certain, but I think he will find that in the five years he has been away the correspondence in the office has doubled. I think that is not too strong a statement to make; in times of depression, particularly, that is true. I can only say that I should think it questionable whether the sum was sufficient for the purposes required. There is not any doubt in the world that whoever happens to be Prime Minister in these days, and is at the same time Secretary of State for External Affairs, as the statute requires, and president of the privy council, which it does not require, but which the Prime Minister more or less should be, in order that he may be familiar with what goes on in the various departments of the public service, has no time for reflection and little or no time to consider carefully, as he should, matters affecting large problems of policy. He must go continuously from one thing to another, without having any opportunity to pause and rest, or even to meditate, except the opportunity he may have as he talks to himself walking up the hill, and has a meeting of the cabinet as it were, or something of that kind. Under those circumstances of course the situation is entirely different. However, apart from such cabinet meetings he gets very little opportunity. I assume that possibly the question of under secretaries and other matters enters into this. It may be that the amount is not adequate for the purposes intended. If the country expects any man to serve it as faithfully as one holding the position of prime minister ought to do, he should be provided with the instrumentalities to enable him to do so. Certainly they have not existed to the extent all of us would like, because of the general view held by the public that there is no necessity to spend money in the office, and that there are enough people around there to look after the job, and all that sort of thing, without pausing for a moment to realize just what is involved.

I congratulate the first minister upon having in the estimates a provision which I hope will have the effect he suggests it will, namely, that of coordinating the efforts of the three departments over which at the present moment the Prime Minister presides. One of my colleagues has suggested that it is his view that it would be in the public interest, in the long run, if the offices of Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs were separated. On the other hand, as it now reads the statute provides that, for reasons that are obvious, the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall be the Prime Minister. I believe that was the view accepted by all overseas dominions, and I think the reasons are quite apparent to all. I assure the committee that from my observations this amount will not be more than adequate to enable sufficient assistance to be provided the Prime Minister in order that he may properly discharge the very onerous duties of his office.

If I may refer to the fact, may I say that with respect to the economic council there seemed to be an entire misunderstanding in what was said last evening. It was intended that the Prime Minister, by referring matters to the economic council, might receive reports which would enable him, after examination, to determine the best course of action to follow. In no sense could the council be said to be set up to take the place of cabinet ministers. They, with the Prime Minister, must take the final action upon questions affecting matters of policy. The council were only to provide information to enable the ministers to determine what action should be taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I thank my right hon. friend for his kindness in giving the committee the information he has with respect to what he knows so well to be the work of the office of the Prime Minister, combined with the other offices he has mentioned. May I say to him that his observations about correspondence, and the work in connection therewith having doubled since I was in office five years ago, are perfectly true. Not only has the correspondence more than doubled, but the intricacy of the questions which have to be dealt with has increased to a degree that I had not believed possible. I must say that in three directions in particular I notice a tremendous increase in the volume of work. One has already been mentioned by the former Prime Minister, the exacting and trying work that arises out of a period of depression. The load in that regard falls very very heavily on a Prime Minister's back. Appeals in this connection are made direct to him from a multitude of directions, and he is responsible for discussing with his colleagues all phases of legislation in connection therewith.

Another question concerning which there has been a great increase in correspondence, and great difficulty in dealing with it, is the whole subject of trade. These communications come directly to the Prime Minister's office in a way they never did formerly.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I guess it is a habit they got from the time I was Minister of Finance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid that a number of departments have got into the habit of waiting for some word from the Prime Minister. I have not said anything about the matter, but there is no doubt about that.

Mr. BENNETT: The willing horse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Much has been said about economic nationalism as it obtains in different countries of the world. That wretched policy has done more I think to add cares and worry to government departments than has all the mass of other things put together because it raises endless questions of the effects of quotas, restrictions, and the like, which are an entirely new phenomenon. At any rate they did not present themselves when I occupied the office of Prime Minister previously. To-day in a multitude of directions correspondence arises from them. They serve to beget endless friction and to arouse all kinds of antagonisms, the effects of these find their way sooner or later to the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. HEAPS: Get rid of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They cannot, I believe, be got rid of too quickly, but to rid the world of them will require time. The world has changed and countries, too, in their relations with each other, and these changes have to be taken into account.

The third change, and perhaps the most serious of all, is the extent to which the time of the Prime Minister, acting more particularly as Secretary of State for External Affairs, is taken up with all important External Affairs matters. I need only mention the correspondence that has come in during the last few months from Geneva, and from London; the correspondence that has developed with respect to the situation as it is in Europe. Whether one were himself Secretary of State for External Affairs or whether that portfolio were held by a separate member of the cabinet, I do not see how the Prime Minister could escape having to go through the despatches which deal with foreign affairs in a world of the character in which we live to-day. I notice there, as well, a tremendous change. Our country is being drawn into international situations to a degree that I myself think is alarming. That is something to which I hope, as we go along, we shall get a chance to give much more thought and attention.

Personally nothing would please me more than to have one of my colleagues administer the Department of External Affairs as a separate department of government, and leave me with the office of Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council. When, however, I have discussed the question with my colleagues, and when I have thought it over myself, it really has seemed that in the long run less difficulty and possible confusion would arise and less time be lost if for a while at least matters were to be carried on as they are. However, so to do will require giving to the Prime Minister the right to obtain from time to time the services of men who have expert knowledge of these questions. What I should say, the public does not appreciate, were I for a moment to think that there could be any criticism of expenditure on this score, is the extent to which the class of questions which governments and parliaments are called upon to deal with to-day, and which the Prime Minister has to deal with, in larger variety perhaps than any other of the ministers, demands special training, knowledge and study. They are not matters on which a private secretary can be expected to inform or advise his chief. They are matters that require careful thought and study and sound and sure advice. The additional amount that has been asked for and which the committee seems prepared to grant in a ready way, is for the purpose of making it possible to obtain from time to time this sort of assistance.

Mr. BENNETT: I just wish to say one word, Mr. Chairman. I do not know any method by which the Prime Minister can escape from reading the dispatches which come to the office of external affairs. I remember Mr. MacDonald telling me that he frequently had to sit up until the early hours of the morning to read the dispatches from the foreign office, for he said it was a rule that he had made, and which he believed his predecessors had followed, that the Prime Minister should read every dispatch that came through the foreign office. Great Britain sends to us cables with respect to matters that affect the welfare of the overseas dominions and even with respect to matters in which they might be only indirectly interested. The result is that when they are decoded and prepared for submission to whoever happens to be minister for external affairs it takes a long time to read them, and one has to discuss them with his colleagues. It frequently happens that two or three matters all of first rate importance come to the attention of the minister in a single day. How on earth a man is going to be able to carry on the burden of first minister when he has at the same time to keep in his mind everything affecting questions raised by cablegrams from various parts of the world, I do not know. For instance, this very Japanese situation which has arisen in the last few days has no doubt resulted in the receipt of cables from London on the one hand, and from Tokyo on the other, and one has to make up one's mind on these matters. It is true that the permanent officials of the department are excellently qualified for the positions which they occupy. One hesitates to say this in the presence of the under-Secretary, but he has had wide experience and an excellent training, and he brings to bear on all these questions an understanding which would not be that of the average man. Nevertheless the fact remains that he is overworked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: How it is possible to carry on that office without extra assistance, I do not know, and I doubt very much whether the sum mentioned will get the expert opinion or advice that the Prime Minister should receive from time to time. Compare conditions to-day with what they were not so very long ago. For instance, in Lord Salisbury's time he used to write very important dispatches with his own hand. It is recorded that the dispatch that was written on the Behring sea matter to Mr. Blaine was written in Lord Salisbury's own hand. He used to write his dispatches at Hatfield over the week-end. Lord Curzon also wrote some of his dispatches.

In these days the system is a very simple one. When a dispatch reaches the minister for foreign affairs it has passed through the hands of highly trained men; in fact, they know much more about the subject, apart altogether from questions of policy, than does their chief. We have not yet developed in this country that reservoir of highly qualified men such as they have in a country like Great Britain. For instance, when they set up their tariff board they simply had to select this man, that man and another man, and they got the most highly trained and the most efficient men in the kingdom. We have not yet done that in this country, and I have always felt that the rewards in mere money are not at all adequate for the services rendered. That was one of the reasons I always had in mind why there should be some other reward than that of mere money. People sometimes speak of it as honours or recognition of merit, but it becomes a very powerful factor in determining the action of permanent public officials. The late Mr. Kipling pointed that out in one of his stories. He pointed out that very frequently in India the struggle between whether it should be a C.I.E. or a C.S.I. had much to do with the zeal and determination with which men threw themselves into their work. That looks like a very small thing, but the fact is that if we are to get that kind of trained public servants who will make a career of their work as they do in Great Britain, we have in every sense to magnify the importance of their position and give them every possible support, attracting, by salaries that are at least in some sense adequate, the best possible men that may be available for that purpose. A new country finds it difficult sometimes to understand that, but it is money well spent, and even in times of depression you have to pay men fairly well or they leave the service and are taken into private enterprise. That has happened and I suppose will continue to happen. It has happened occasionally in Great Britain; it has happened here and will happen in other countries. But certainly, in the office of Prime Minister, I cannot too strongly suggest to the committee that some provision must be made that will enable whoever is there to have at least a little freedom from toil, for meditation and thought, with the assurance that the work will not be neglected and that the best possible brain is giving its attention to providing a solution of the particular problems with which a Prime Minister has to deal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot allow what my right hon. friend has just said to go by without expressing to him my very warm appreciation for having stated what he alone can say with more authority perhaps than anyone else in the house. What I should like to point out to hon. members, because we are considering this matter now in its many aspects, is this: Hon. members see a Prime Minister in the house; they see that he has to be here practically every afternoon and evening, or at least somewhere about the buildings. They forget, however, that the time thus spent does not represent his work at all; his work has to be done apart from the time he spends in the House of Commons in the afternoon and at night. Members perhaps forget that a meeting of the cabinet has to be held every day, and that Saturdays, which are more or less free days to others, are really the only days on which the cabinet can find opportunity for maturing policies, reviewing legislation and the like. These many demands leave only the forenoons for the Prime Minister to do the real work of his office, and departments for which he is responsible, the class of work to which the leader of the opposition has just referred. Unless a man in the responsible position of Prime Minister can have at his side those on whose ability he can completely rely, he cannot begin to do his duty either to the House of Commons or to the country. I thank my right hon. friend again for his assistance in helping to have this understood.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As one who a few minutes ago urged that some of the advertising abroad be cut down, may I say that I heartily appreciate the position as outlined by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. As a private member, I do not think that the office can be too fully organized or that we can take too great pains in securing a large number of trained men for positions of this character. I have sometimes thought that the Department of External Affairs, in the last year or two, has been called upon altogether too much to do all sorts of odd jobs, as for example on various commissions. We ought to have a very much larger number of men with wide economic training who would be capable of handling economic and international affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for what he has just said.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Entomology, including investigations and inspections relating to destructive insects and pests, $400,100.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentlemen who were going to discuss this matter are nct here to-night. It is one regarding which they are particularly desirous to have information. I think the item might stand.

Item stands.

Publicity and extension, $70,400.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the reason for the increase?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The increase is due to transfers that have been made from other branches. When we were going through other branches, particularly experimental farms, we referred to a matter of $19,000 representing a transfer from that branch in connection with publicity. The transfers are these:

From experimental branch, $19,088.
From dairy branch, $2,040.
From live stock branch, $10,000.
From entomological branch, $1,000.
From fruit branch, $3,500.
From health of animals branch, $100.

This makes up a total of $35,728, which is the greater part of the increase.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the publicity of this department? I confess that during my little experience I found it difficult to ascertain how every department could have a publicity bureau of its own, and I could never find out why it was not possible to correlate the efforts and direct them under one head as is now done with our advertising in Great Britain. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. GARDINER: The publicity of the department is largely a matter of getting out publications that indicate to farmers in different parts of Canada what is being done in these various branches. Periodicals are sent here and there throughout Canada giving information with regard to the findings of the different branches in their research work and in other connections.

Mr. BENNETT: The real difficulty which I found—and I was not able in the limited time at my disposal to deal with it, for the reasons I have given—was the competition between departments to secure information and give it to the public. The competition between the bureau of statistics, for instance, and the Department of National Revenue with respect to what the revenue was for the preceding month is always, to me, rather interesting. It is really a difference between Trade and Commerce on the one hand and National Revenue on the other, and the minister knows better than I the difficulties in connection with the competition between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. When I saw the increase in this item I wondered why there should be an increase in publicity and extension, because the mere increase in the publication of reports simply means the waste in many instances of additional sums for paper and ink, because the extent to which they are read is, I am sorry to say, very limited.

Mr. SPENCE: Not read at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, there is in every country, in almost every community, somebody who is interested, as the Minister has said, in reading these reports. But the indiscriminate circulation of them was limited a few years ago by reason of action taken by the departments themselves. The real difficulty I have is in ascertaining just why there should be an increase in the item.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is one other aspect of it upon which perhaps the minister could give us some light. I have often wondered why there could not be a little closer cooperation between the dominion department and the provincial departments. It does seem as though the provincial authorities are much nearer the ordinary farmers and ought to be able to undertake a great deal of the distribution end of these matters. There is a vast amount of duplication. I should like to ask the minister if there is any possibility of closer coordination.

Mr. GARDINER: I can speak only from experience in one province. In so far as publicity in that province is concerned it is cut down to the very lowest possible cost at the present time. There is very little going out in the way of printing from the agriculture department of that province, and I think that is true of at least most of the western provinces. The department here and those provincial departments have been working in the closest possible cooperation. Much of the information that is gathered by this department the provincial departments could not possibly gather and therefore could not possibly distribute. As regards anything having to do with matters of trade in other countries, we get the information, some of it through the Department of Trade and Commerce, some of it through our own officials. That information naturally goes out through our department. Other information, with regard to wheat, for example, which is handled through the Department of Trade and Commerce, goes out to a large extent through that department, as was suggested by the leader of the opposition. But there is a considerable part of it that has to go out through the agriculture department, because it is information which is contained only there.

I can understand the criticism that there is some overlapping, and the further criticism that many of these periodicals are not read. For the twenty or more years that I have been in public life these periodicals have been sent to me automatically, and I must say that many of them I have not read; I did not have the time to read them. But there are people in every community who do read one or another of these periodicals, and whenever a farmers' gathering is held, while perhaps nine out of ten of the people who are there have never read them and have never seen them, one individual may and on many occasions does get up and give the information to those who are present, and they get it sometimes in spite of themselves. The department has to distribute a certain amount of this information to people who will read it. In doing so no doubt they distribute some of it to persons who make very little use of it. I do not know of any way by which you can really overcome the difficulty in connection with that if we are going to have the information distributed at all.

Mr. STEWART: Are there any new features in the publicity program for this year as compared with past years? Is the minister considering any new methods of advertising or publicity?

Mr. GARDINER: The only new developments are a sort of consolidation of the exhibits that are made in connection with fairs and exhibitions here and there, which is under this branch. Then a certain amount of work is being developed in connection with giving information over the radio; that will require some extension. We have also in mind to do a greater amount of work in connection with the promotion of marketing. I am hopeful, as minister, that we can develop in the department a greater degree of publicity which will be effective in keeping our agricultural products before the public, not only inside Canada but probably outside Canada. Some publicity along that line will be carried on.

Mr. STEWART: I should say it is very necessary. Anything that is calculated to promote in these difficult times the sale of agricultural products at home or abroad is very desirable indeed. I was wondering whether in connection with cooperative marketing or the Natural Products Marketing Act any additional expense is involved in any extension of the services. Also, is there any revenue from publications by departments which charge something for certain pamphlets?

Mr. GARDINER: There is very little revenue. There is the odd publication from which a small amount of revenue is obtained, but all the farmers' publications are distributed free.

Mr. STEWART: Under the Natural Products Marketing Act is there anything in this vote calculated to assist in promoting the work of that board and the disposition of products under that act?

Mr. GARDINER: There is another item, under "miscellaneous," dealing with the marketing act. I had hoped to be able to discuss that when we reach that item.

Mr. STEWART: I mean publicity in connection with the act rather than the working of the act itself. Is anything to be spent under this vote in familiarizing the public with the meaning and the purpose of the schemes in connection with the act?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not in this vote, and I may say that there is very little possibility of doing much until we get the decision of the supreme court. It is rather difficult to promote a thing when you hardly know at the moment what position it is in legally.

Mr. GRAYDON: To what extent is radio used in advancing the publicity of the department?

Mr. GARDINER: There is very little cost in connection with radio work. It is done through the radio commission and no charge is made to the department for the use of the radio; the only cost is for preparation of the material that is used, but costs in connection with radio work are not great.

Mr. STIRLING: In the various districts there is a certain amount of broadcasting done, is there not, that does not come under the commission? There is in my part of the country.

Mr. GARDINER: There is some local station work in connection with the branch farms.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister again whether, in view of the fact that there is little or no expense in connection with radio broadcasting of the activities of the department, the radio could not be used more extensively for the stimulation of markets for farm products in the dominion?

Mr. GARDINER: I think that suggestion is worthy of consideration. I am informed by officials of the department that there is a limit to the extent to which the radio can be used effectively.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have in mind what the minister said about external advertising. I was wondering whether his department is cooperating with the Department of External Affairs, because the Prime Minister, speaking a short time ago with reference to the item in his department in connection with advertising in London, said that part of the appropriation is for advertising the farm products of Canada. Are there two departments advertising Canadian farm products, I mean externally?

Mr. GARDINER: I was speaking, of course, of the marketing end of the advertising, in connection with something we have in mind for the future rather than what has taken place in the past. There has not been very much advertising done by the Department of Agriculture as such; most of the work in connection with the promotion of the sale of our products has been done by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am not familiar with the amount that may have been done under External Affairs.

Mr. LENNARD: Could the minister give me the distribution of publicity in each province?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the distribution by provinces.

Item agreed to.

Farm economics, including agricultural cooperative marketing, $38,400.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the minister in what way the government encourage cooperative marketing. I am very glad to see that they do it, but how is it done?

Mr. GARDINER: The economics branch was set up under Doctor Booth, who has had a rather wide experience in connection with cooperative work. I think he was first trained in the Department of Agriculture of Saskatchewan and later spent some time in Washington with the American organization carrying on that work. I believe he is in every way fully qualified to deal with cooperative activities. The branch gathers all the information it can from both inside and outside Canada with regard to cooperative activities, and that information is made available to persons interested in forming cooperative organizations. Men from this branch go out and assist in the formation of cooperative organizations, giving information verbally and otherwise as to how organizations can best be set up, and making available the experience they have had elsewhere in connection with cooperative work.

Miss MACPHAIL: I appreciate what the minister has said, and I would not want him to think I was criticizing the vote or the idea of setting up a branch to take care of cooperative marketing. I quite believe that Doctor Booth is an expert in this work. I was just wondering if the Department of Agriculture contemplates pushing this work more in the future than has been the case in the past, without waiting for requests, by attempting to interest people in the cooperative marketing of farm products as, during the years, the department has attempted to interest farmers in better production methods.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not just familiar with the extent to which this work has been pushed, or whether the information has been given out only when asked for or otherwise. Knowing Doctor Booth as I do, however, I am quite sure that he has been as active as the funds at his disposal have permitted in promoting cooperative activities. He always has been a very strong advocate of them, and he comes from a part of the country where cooperative organizations have always been considered as moves in the right direction.

Miss MACPHAIL: What part is that?

Mr. GARDINER: The central west.

Item agreed to.

Contributions to empire bureaux, $21,535.

Mr. BEAUBIER: Could we have some explanation of this item?

Mr. GARDINER: These empire bureaux are a group of organizations in Scotland and England that collect and disseminate the results of all the research work carried on in different parts of the empire and in other places, and all the countries that benefit from that work make grants by way of assistance in order that the work of these bureaux may be maintained. This sum is for the purpose of contributing towards the work of the bureaux, including the distribution of information from the bureaux and so on.

Item agreed to.

Advisory committee on agricultural services, travelling expenses, et cetera, $5,000.

Mr. BARBER: Is this a local committee?

Mr. GARDINER: This is to provide expense money in order to carry on the work where provincial and federal committees get together for the purpose of trying to eliminate overlapping in departments.

Item agreed to.

Dairying, $256,000.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The minister might let this item stand. A number of members are interested in this matter, and I think the minister has been quite fortunate in getting his estimates through so rapidly at this stage of the session. I know many members who are not here to-night are very much interested in this matter, so I wonder if the minister would not let the item stand.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be very glad to do that.

Item stands.

Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, $39,506.39.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this large decrease mean that the government has changed the policy with regard to assistance to cold storage warehouses?

Mr. GARDINER: No; there has been no change in the policy. This covers all the commitments that we know about at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: Then it follows that it will not be of much use for any districts to make application for further assistance this year.

Mr. GARDINER: That has been done in other years by way of supplementary estimates, and all applications will be considered on their merits as they come in.

Miss MACPHAIL: I wish to discuss the grading of eggs. It is not possible to do so this evening. If I can discuss it under the dairying item, all right; if not I should like this item to stand. It is hard to tell where it comes in.

Mr. GARDINER: It really comes under live stock, and that was passed some days ago.

Miss MACPHAIL: I asked the chairman and he thought it might come under item 39.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to the discussion of it under that item. Does the hon. member wish it to stand?

Miss MACPHAIL: I would like it to stand.

Item stands.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, including grants to seed fairs, et cetera, also grant of $18,900 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $407,200.

Mr. BENNETT: I recall that strong opposition was taken to the grant of $18,900. There were discussions which seemed to indicate that it might become unnecessary. Will the hon. gentleman give an explanation concerning it as it now stands?

Mr. GARDINER: I know only of the operations of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association under local organizations in our own province. We have always considered these organizations very valuable.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this grant for?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a grant to this organization. The grant goes to the central office and is expended from there. We have not the particulars here in regard to the distribution of it.

Mr. BENNETT: It was suggested that this is an item for which there is no real reason. I think it was suggested that some inquiry should be made into it, and for that reason I should like to know just what it is.

Mr. GARDINER: The work of the association as I know it is a work that the department could scarcely carry on. The organization consists of men who for certain reasons are particularly adapted for this kind of work. They meet from time to time and discuss the possibility of certain seed developments. They use registered seed on their own farms and give particular attention to the production of the very best quality of seed and to keeping that seed clean and pure and having it properly distributed throughout the areas in which they work, as well as other parts of the province as well. Men of this type should be encouraged in carrying on high class seed production. For example I received a letter the other day from one of them whom I know to be very active in Saskatchewan. He wrote protesting about the distribution of a certain variety of wheat said to be rust resistant. I made inquiry in the department, got what information I could, and knowing the man as I do I was satisfied that the information he gave me could not be overlooked. I wrote back for further particulars and he sent a sample of the wheat about which he was complaining. One had only to look at the sample to know that there was reason for his complaint. He was interested in seeing that nothing happens to the wheat crop in western Canada that would be detrimental to the farmers as a whole, and he had the idea that if this wheat were distributed over western Canada and sold in a large way it might in the end be very detrimental to the whole crop. I think we should spend at least this amount in promoting seed production work among farmers.

Mr. BENNETT: The question was not as to the amount. What was spent last year for this item?

Mr. GARDINER: It was $17,010. There is approximately a five per cent increase this year.

Mr. BENNETT: I know nothing about this except the opposition that was urged to the grant in some quarters. It was contended that it meant nothing more or less than payment of money to men who are making large sums out of the sale of their seed; that they are charging very high prices for certified pure seed, and also being compensated for it by the government. Naturally I have no means now of checking this up departmentally, so I am asking for the information. Personally I have no view about the matter; it is just what was represented to me. But that complaint was made very vigorously, that the only effect of paying this money is to hand it to men who are already getting high prices for their seed. I made the inquiry purely for information.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that there are about 1,600 of these growers. Of course 1,600 growers would not draw any considerable amount individually out of this. The amount that was obtained in Saskatchewan last year by these men for their seed was fifteen cents a bushel above the market price of wheat, which is not a very considerable amount, or anything that I think anyone would complain about. I believe any farmer would prefer to buy that kind of seed from men with a reputation that most of these men have for the production of good seed, rather than pay the market price for seed of which they knew little or nothing.

Mr. BENNETT: The explanation given by the minister would seem to be reasonable. I was just asking my colleagues if they could tell who it was who raised the issue. I recall making a mental note to try to ascertain the facts. I think the hon. member who raised the question is not at present in the chamber. At that time I believe he sat to the left of the Speaker, and I was much taken with what he said. It seemed to imply that this is really a little gift handed out to men who are getting an increased price for their seed. I believe I was told much the same as the minister has now told us, but I wanted to know if the matter had been considered. I think the explanation given is not unreasonable.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There are many men in the west who have taken high honours for producing high class seed. Very few of these men have made much money for themselves at that work. Just a little while ago the review board of Saskatchewan was meeting in Saskatoon and one of the most prominent of these seed growers, one who had taken many honours, came before them hopelessly involved because he was not able to make enough on his farming operations to carry on. There are many such men in the different provinces, and I do not think any of them have made much out of the high class seed they have produced. The price at times does seem high to farmers who have to buy the seed, but if we take into consideration the amount of work, the care in growing and cleaning and keeping the seed separate and all that kind of thing, as well as the cost of buying seed originally, the net results are not very large. But these men take pride in their work and pleasure in carrying on that type of seed selection and reproduction, and they keep on doing this as long as they can. I think that is the history of a great many seed growers in western Canada who have achieved prominence; they have not gained much wealth for themselves. The result for their neighbours has been valuable. The seed is moved from one district to another readily and cheaply in small quantities. When these men hold a supply of good seed available, farmers hundreds of miles away are able to get supplies which might cost fairly high per unit, but the aggregate cost of which is small. I believe the work should be encouraged.

Mr. WOOD: I commend the hon. member for Melfort for his attitude. I have noticed that the questions are asked to a great extent by hon. members who are not farmers. May I say that I come from a constituency wherein there is an active seed growers association, one which is doing good work. I believe any money spent in the development of good seed would be used properly. I do not think there is anything in agriculture which will do more to increase the general well-being of the nation.

I should like to know if there is in the estimates a contribution for seed cleaning plants. I know that some assistance is given to these plants, and that they have worked more or less cooperatively with seed and feed branches. Great advances have been made in the development of seed cleaning equipment. Today there are on the market machines capable of separating a mustard seed from a turnip seed. Hon. members who are farmers will appreciate my meaning. I am sure that any grants given to these seed cleaning plants would be for the good of the farmers. Is part of the vote for seed cleaning establishments?

Mr. GARDINER: Not part of the $18,900, but part of the $407,200 goes for that purpose. The dominion government puts up $600 towards the price of each machine, provided that the province puts up a like amount, and these sums are distributed for the purposes indicated by the hon. member.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Could the minister tell the committee what part of the grant goes to seed fairs, and on what basis the grants are made?

Mr. GARDINER: The amounts are divided, for different purposes. If it is the wish of hon. members I shall give the details, as follows:

Total Subventions Available to a Province

1. The total subvention available to a province within the dominion fiscal year shall not exceed the sum of $1,200 unless more than one million acres are under cultivation in field crops within the province, in which case the subvention may be increased pro rata $1,200 for each additional million acres under cultivation as reported by the Dominion Bureau of Statstics for the previous year, provided that the total subvention shall not exceed $1,200 pro rata per hundred thousand of total population as shown by the latest available federal census return.

2. These subventions shall be for the purposes and in the amounts hereinafter specified, but shall not exceed one-half the total amounts paid as cash prizes or grants by the provincial Departments of Agriculture.

The total amount is based on what the the province pays.

$50 for Seed Crop Competition

3. Seed crop competitions have been discontinued in most of the provinces. As a seed improvement agency they are believed to be less effective than the combined seed crop and cleaned seed competition. Subventions shall not exceed $50 for each seed crop competition, the total not to exceed 25 per cent of the amount available to a province.

$200 for a Combined Seed Crop and Seed Competition

4. Each combined seed crop and seed competition in which the seed used must be a registered grade or grade No. 1 certified as to purity of variety, trueness to tyne or fredom from noxious weeds, shall be eligible for a subvention of $200.

$50 for a Local Seed Fair

5. Local seed fairs continue to be serviceable in a few localities and may participate in these subventions to an amount not exceeding $50 for each such seed fair.

$250 for District Seed Fairs

6. District seed fairs are organized in some provinces to meet the needs of groups of counties where local seed fairs are not held, the larger fair being held at different points within the district during successive years. Subventions not exceeding $250 may be paid on acount of each such district seed fair.

$600 for a Provincial Seed Exhibition

7. Subventions on account of each provincial seed exhibition shall not exceed $600.

Then there is a paragraph dealing with an amount of $600 for seed cleaning machines, about which we spoke a few moments ago. The next paragraph is an amount of $300 for machines to grind limestone and mix fertilizer. Paragraph No. 10 indicates a charge of fifty cents per ton for agricultural lime freight charges. Paragraph 11 is as follows:

11. The Minister of Agriculture for the province may utilize the total subvention for any or all of the purposes mentioned, except as provided in section 3.

12. Subventions accounts should be submitted to the seed commissioner, Ottawa, through the office of the seed branch district inspector for the district in which the subvention was earned, by the Minister of Agriculture for the province, or his authorized representative, before the end of March each year.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Would the minister give a further explanation with reference to the $18,900 to the Canadian Seed Growers Association? In what provinces was that distributed last year?

Mr. GARDINER: Money is provided to the chief association in Ottawa. I have not the distribution, by provinces, and I am told it is impossible to get that detailed information. The work is carried on largely by the association.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): It is turned over to the association?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): On what basis is it turned over? How is it that while there is provision for $18,900 in these estimates, only $17,000 was provided last year, and there is no record of where it went?

Mr. GARDINER: A surplus had accumulated prior to last year, from two-years' operations, and as a result of the accumulation of that small surplus it was agreed last year to cut down the appropriation to about $17,000, on the understanding that the surplus would be used up during the year. This year the surplus has been used up, and the usual amount is being voted. The former minister made that arrangement to permit the use of the accumulated surplus.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): On what basis could you make the estimate?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday, 4th March next, to the end of the session, government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesday over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

DOMINION HOUSING ACT

Mr. HEAPS:

1. How many loans were made by the dominion government under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935?

2. What was the amount in each case of such loans?

3. What was the total amount of such loans as at January 31, 1936?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Number of loans approved under the Dominion Housing Act to February 25, 1936—113.

2. Classification of loans to February 25, 1936:

Not exceeding	$3,000		8
Over $3,000	not exceeding	$4,000	17
" 4,000	"	5,000	22
" 5,000	"	6,000	12
" 6,000	"	7,000	17
" 7,000	"	8,000	20
" 8,000	"	9,000	9
" 9,000	"	10,000	1
" 10,000			7

3. To January 31, 1936—$666,508; to February 25, 1936—$755.900.

Note.—In this answer the amounts in dollars include the share of the dominion government and of the approved lending institutions.

CHAMPLAIN COUNTY EXHIBITION

Mr. BRUNELLE:

What was the amount of the annual grant given by the federal Department of Agriculture to the exhibition of Champlain county from 1925 to 1935?

Mr. GARDINER:

No federal grant has been given to any exhibition in Champlain county during the years 1925 to 1935, inclusive.

JANSEN, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. FLEMING:

1. Who conducted the investigation into the Jansen post office resulting in the dismissal of Ernest J. Symons, former postmaster?

2. At whose request was the investigation made?

3. Is the person who requested the investigation, any relation to the commissioner who conducted the investigation?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. George Wilson, barrister, Kinistino, Sask

2. E. S. Wilson, of Humboldt, Sask.

3. Yes. Brother.

LAC VERT, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. FLEMING:

1. Who conducted the investigation into the Lac Vert post office resulting in the dismissal of D. N. McRae, former postmaster?

2. At whose request was the investigation made?

3. Is the person who requested the investigation any relation to the commissioner who conducted the investigation?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Inspector of postal service L. S. Cummings (Saskatoon District).

2. Complaint was received by district superintendent from F. A. Rose, a merchant of Lac Vert, regarding mistreatment of mail matter.

3. No information.

SOCKEYE SALMON INVESTIGATION

Mr. REID:

1. What persons were appointed under the direction of the biological board in charge of the sockeye salmon investigation at Cultus and Harrison lakes?

2. When were they appointed and what were their official positions?

3. When did they conclude their investigations?

4. At what date was their report sent or given to the biological board?

5. At what date was their report received by the Deputy Minister of Fisheries?

6. Was the report, when first received by the Minister of Fisheries, the deputy minister or any official, sent back suggesting any alteration or amendment or for further consideration?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Dr. R. E. Foerster.

2. 1925. Assistant biologist.

3. The board decided to bring the investigation to an end with the counting of migrants from Cultus lake during 1935.

4. The final report was submitted to the executive committee of the board in November, 1935.

5. In November, 1935.

6. No. The report and conclusion reached by the board are now receiving consideration.

SALARY DEDUCTION

Mr. CRETE:

1. What is the total amount of the five per cent salary deduction affecting civil servants according to the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1937?

2. Do such estimates make provision for salary increases to certain members of the public service?

3. If so, what is the name and occupation of each such person, the amount of the salary increase in each instance and in what department is he employed?

4. Will such salary increases, if any, be paid out of the five per cent deduction applicable to other civil servants?

5. If the estimates make provision for salary increases to certain members of the public service, who recommended such increase in each case and to whom was the recommendation made?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Approximately $3,100,000.

2, 3 and 5. Yes, for statutory increases as provided by section 14 of the Civil Service Act, and a small number of other increases specifically mentioned in the estimates as tabled. (To furnish names and occupations of all persons receiving statutory increases would entail returns from all departments and a great deal of clerical work).

4. No.

EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Who are the members of the Employment and Social Insurance Commission, and on what date were they appointed?
2. What salaries have they been paid to date?
3. How many persons are employed by the commission?
4. What is the amount of salaries paid in that respect to date?
5. What is the total cost of the Employment and Social Insurance Commission since its inception to date?
6. How many unemployed has it been instrumental in providing with employment in each province?
7. How many reports has such commission made to the government, and what is the date of each such report?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Tom Moore and Nazaire Roméo Beaudet. Appointed July 20, 1935.

2. Tom Moore, July 20, 1935, to February 29, 1936, $5,263.31. Nazaire Roméo Beaudet, July 20, 1935, to February 29, 1936, $5,263.31.

3. Three.

4. $1,563.79.

5. To February 29, 1936, $37,894.92.

6. Administrative staff not appointed to operate part II (employment service) of the act.

7. None. The act provides for an annual report to be submitted one month after March 31 each year or within such longer period as may be approved by the governor in council.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

TARIFF BOARD

Mr. CRETE:

1. How many petitions have been submitted to the present tariff board since its establishment by companies or persons: (a) of Great Britain; (b) of Canada; (1) prior to October 14, 1935; (2) since such date?
2. How many petitions by companies or persons: (a) of Great Britain; (b) of Canada, were: (1) granted; (2) rejected; (3) are still pending, with respect to each of the above-mentioned periods?
3. Is there in Great Britain a public body similar to the Canadian tariff board to which Canadian manufacturers or citizens may submit requests for a reduction of customs' duties?
4. If so, what is the name and address of such public body?
5. In how many cases has the government acted in accordance with the recommendations of the present tariff board since its establishment: (a) prior to October 14, 1935; (b) since such date?
6. What are such cases?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

JANSEN, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. FLEMING:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence and other documents respecting the dismissal of Ernest J. Symons, former postmaster at Jansen, Saskatchewan.

LAC VERT, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. FLEMING:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence and other documents respecting the dismissal of D. N. McRae, former postmaster at Lac Vert, Saskatchewan.

GROSSE-ILE, MAGDALEN ISLANDS, PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of Public Works department pay-lists covering the months of November and December, 1935, with respect to all works carried out by such department at Grosse-Ile, Magdalen islands.

SUPREME COURT BUILDINGS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of the report of the inspection of the supreme court buildings by the officials of the Department of National Health, according to instructions given in November, 1935, and submitted to the Department of Public Works for consideration.

Mr. POWER: Return tabled herewith.

POWER COMMISSION ACT, 1935

Mr. STEWART:

For a copy of all petitions, resolutions, letters and telegrams making representations in favour of or in opposition to the disallowance of an act of the legislature of the province of Ontario, intituled, "The Power Commission Act 1935," being chapter 53 of the statutes of said province for the year 1935. Also a copy of all communications in reply to the said communications.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Justice, I believe, desires to have a word with my hon. friend in regard to this proposed order of the house. If the order is passed as requested, it will involve an enormous amount of copying of correspondence. If it will serve my hon. friend's purpose to have the names of all the persons who have communicated with the government, both for and against the disallowance of the act referred to, it will simplify matters very much. If my hon. friend wished to see any of the communications they could of course be made available to him. But to have them all copied would make the return an enormous one.

Mr. STEWART: I have no desire unduly to handicap the permanent officials in connection with this matter. I am content with that as a beginning, with a reservation of the right to ask for further information if what is brought down by the Prime Minister is not satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

FULFILMENT OF OBLIGATIONS AND PURPOSES OF COVENANT, ESPECIALLY AS TO SANCTIONS AND THE CAUSES OF WAR

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn) moved:

That this house urge upon the government the necessity for sincere and complete fulfillment of all obligations assumed under the covenant of the League of Nations and especially the prohibition of direct or indirect export to an aggressor nation of all raw materials and manufactured articles necessary for war purposes:

And be it further resolved, that this house, realizing the danger and futility of sanctions unless collectively imposed and unless accompanied by a determined effort to remove the causes of war, urge that, as now provided for in the covenant of the League and the resolutions of the assembly, the Canadian government initiate proposals to achieve the more complete fulfillment of the following purposes of the covenant:

(a) Collective reduction of armaments;

(b) Open and collective diplomacy with reference to international disputes;

(c) Abrogation of treaties and agreements not in accord with the covenant;

(d) Definite steps under article 19 of the League covenant to revise the peace treaties and to apply the principles of international justice to the solution of those economic territorial and racial problems most frequently the cause of international disputes;

(e) Prohibition of unilateral agreements and unilateral mobilization likely to undermine the efforts of the League to establish conditions of peace;

And be it further resolved, that, unless and until, there is a sincere acceptance and application of the above by the member-nations of the league, Canada will refuse to participate in any foreign war no matter who the belligerents may be.

He said: Mr. Speaker, no person in the house realizes more than I do how unfitted I am to deal with this task with any degree of thoroughness. Even if I were adequately fitted, how limited the time is at my disposal to deal with so great a subject.

At the outset I wish to lift this whole matter out of the realm of party politics.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it in it?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The desire for peace is not a monopoly of any party in this house. I believe it is true that the great majority of members of this house, as well as the great majority of the people of Canada, are in favour of peace. During the last year a most remarkable thing has taken place in Great Britain. The result of a peace ballot, taken under the direction of Lord Cecil, one of the great crusaders for peace, and in which almost thirteen million ballots were returned, shows the following facts:

In answer to the question: should Great Britain remain a member of the League of Nations, 97 per cent answered "yes" in relation to those who answered "no."

In answer to the question: are you in favour of an all round reduction of armaments by national agreement, 92·5 per cent answered "yes" in relation to those who answered "no."

In answer to the question: are you in favour of an all round abolition of national military and naval aircraft by international agreement, 85 per cent answered "yes" in relation to those who answered "no."

In answer to the question: should the manufacture and sale of arms for private profit be prohibited by national agreement, 93·1 per cent answered "yes" in relation to those who answered "no."

In answer to the question: do you consider that if one nation insists on attacking another, the other nations should combine to compel it to stop by economic and non-military means, 94·1 per cent answered "yes" in relation to those who answered "no."

To the last question: do you consider that if a nation insists on attacking another, the other nations should combine to compel it to stop, by if necessary, military measures, 74·2 per cent answered "yes" in relation to those who answered "no."

We have no statistics of a similar nature in Canada. But the resolutions passed by several national bodies and by church organizations, and the general sentiments expressed in the press, would lead one to believe that, like the motherland, the great majority of the Canadian people are opposed to war and are in favour of taking whatever steps are necessary to maintain peace.

I draw these facts to the attention of the house because I want to make it clear that we in this corner are not presenting this resolution with the self-righteous attitude that we are the sole champions of peace. I think we all want peace. The question is, how can we best maintain peace? It is not a question of peace or war. It is a question of what is the best policy that shall make for peace for the prevention of war. A year ago this was a very simple question to answer. To-day it is not quite so simple. The whole confusing subject of sanctions has arisen. Certain events of the last year have confused the minds of those who desire peace, with the result that the ranks of peace lovers have become somewhat disorganized and it is necessary now to think the whole question over again.

May I in leading up to the subject review very briefly what has occurred since the beginning of what is called the Italo-Ethiopian question. The whole dispute began as a result of a border incident known as the Walwal incident, which took place on November 23, 1934. Subsequently a commission was set up to investigate the matter, and it finally decided that neither nation was to blame. From January, 1935, until last July, friction increased rather than decreased. The Italian government continued to pour troops and munitions into Africa, apparently with a view to military aggression. The major powers of Europe who were concerned endeavoured—I think unfortunately—to settle this matter outside of the machinery of the league; that is, their negotiations were based entirely on the Tripartite Agreement of 1906 and the revision treaties of 1926 and 1928. There was no recourse to the machinery of the league during the whole of the time that the Italian government was massing troops in Africa. It was not until July last that the major powers referred the case of Italy and Ethiopia to the League of Nations. I think we may be proud of the fact that on that occasion the lead was given by Right Hon. Sir Samuel Hoare, then British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. At that time, in a brilliant and spirited defence of the League of Nations, Sir Samuel Hoare placed the British government and the British people solidly behind collective action to maintain collective peace. I shall read just the closing part of that address:

> In conformity with its precise and explicit obligations, the league stands, and my country stands with it, for the collective maintenance of the covenant in its entirety, and particularly for steady and collective resistance to all acts of unprovoked aggression. The attitude of the British nation in the last few weeks has clearly demonstrated the fact that this is no variable and unreliable sentiment, but a principle of international conduct to which they and their government hold with firm, enduring and universal persistance.

I say, I think we may well be proud of the fact that a British foreign minister, backed by the peace ballot to which I have referred and by the growing sentiment in Great Britain that the British people were prepared to make tremendous sacrifices in order to maintain collective peace, placed the British people solidly behind the League of Nations on that occasion. I should like to point out also that on that occasion Canada as well was placed solidly behind the League of Nations. I quote the closing paragraph of the speech delivered by Hon. Howard Ferguson on September 14, 1935:

> Impressed, then, by the gravity of the situation, my government has requested me to make its position clear with regard to this matter. Canada believes the league of nations is an indispensable agency for world peace. We cannot agree that any member is warranted in resorting to war to enforce its claims in violation of its solemn pledges to seek and find a peaceful settlement of every dispute. We hope that an honourable and peaceful solution of the Ethiopian controversy will yet be reached. If, unfortunately, this proves not to be the case, Canada will join with the other members of the league in considering how, by unanimous action, peace can be maintained.

Thus in July last the machinery of the League of Nations was invoked as a means of settling what had become a very critical question. Ten years ago, when the league was being discussed somewhat critically, there were those who said it was so weighty that it would be simply impossible to get it to function quickly in a time of crisis. I am sure, however, that even the most optimistic supporters of the league hardly believed that the league would actually function as quickly as it really did. I have little doubt that the period from October 7 to October 14 will go down in history as a most remarkable phenomenon of international collective action. You will remember, sir, that hostilities were begun on October 4, and this is actually what happened in the following few days. On Monday, October 7, thirteen members of the council of the League of Nations found Italy guilty of resorting to war in disregard of her covenants. On Wednesday, October 9, the verdict of the council was referred to the assembly of the League of Nations, consisting of fifty-four nations. On Thursday, October 10, this verdict was passed upon by the assembly of the league, which found Italy guilty; fifty-one nations, representing four-fifths of the population of the earth, concurred in that decision; five nations were absent and three nations voted against the verdict. On Friday, the 11th, the committee on sanctions formally approved an embargo on arms to Italy and the removal of restrictions against Ethiopia, and on Saturday, October 12, financial experts proposed credit restrictions against Italy and Mr. Anthony Eden proposed a boycott on the import of Italian periodicals. Thus in this short period from October 7 to October 14 the league—though somewhat late, I think—swung into action and took the necessary steps, first of all to condemn the aggressor and second to set machinery in motion to prevent that aggressor receiving the necessary materials with which to carry on war.

In order to keep the logic of our sequence intact let us look for a moment at what was done by the Canadian government at this time. Hon. Howard Ferguson, undoubtedly under orders from the government of Canada, —the previous administration,—made this statement on October 11:

> The sole problem before the committee was to decide what sanctions the delegations could all agree upon that afternoon and put into application immediately. Let them show the world that the league was no longer to be scoffed or laughed at, but that it meant business, and that when a breach of its covenant took place it proposed to deal with the aggressor in the proper way. Otherwise the league and the assembly would lose prestige and influence in the world and might as well be dissolved. If the delegates were not at Geneva to see that the covenant was carried out, there was no purpose in their being there at all.

This was followed, on October 29, by a statement from the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who said:

> The government has no doubt it expresses the overwhelmingly conviction of the people of Canada in declaring its continued and firm adherence to the fundamental aims and ideals of the league of nations, and its intention to make participation in the league the cornerstone of its foreign policy in the general field.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Canada, both the previous administration and the present government, interpreted correctly the psychological attitude of the Canadian people, in that they desired in the main a firm adherence to the policies of the League of Nations and were prepared to take any reasonable steps to preserve peace and prevent a recurrence of war.

There is no need for me to do more than touch very briefly on the sanctions that were suggested and proposed by the coordinating committee. They were five in number: First, an embargo on arms, munitions and implements of war; second, a restriction on loans and credits to Italy; third, a restriction on imports from Italy consisting mainly of periodicals, magazines and papers; fourth, an embargo on key products used by Italy to carry on war, and fifth, mutual economic support given to nations participating in this economic boycott. Canada agreed with all five, the last one in principle and the other four in their entirety.

I have given, sir, this brief review of what has happened during the last year, so that we might understand more clearly just what the problem is that confronts us at the present time. No doubt many people who desire peace are asking themselves if it is wise to apply sanctions, if it is wise to extend these sanctions, and exactly what the policy of those who desire peace ought to be. There are those, quite sincere people, who take the attitude that we ought to remain neutral, to isolate ourselves; they agree with the great body of public opinion in the republic to the south, that we should cut ourselves adrift from the League of Nations and from European diplomacy. To that argument it may be said, first, that such an attitude is scarcely morally justifiable. I need only quote a statement of Lord Cecil, who said:

> Loyalty to this principle of "pooled security" is as necessary to the great society of nations as it is to the society of citizens within the nations. We have to "respect" the broad rules of peace ourselves; but we must also "preserve" them against violence, as the covenant affirms. Every isolationist who challenges this principle and who says in effect "am I my brother's keeper?" is a contributor to anarchy: he is keeping alive the anarchic conception of "security" as meaning a precarious "supremacy" in a world of competing armament, and is preventing the emergence of a new, rational conception of "security" as meaning the public assurance of solidarity against violence and wrong.

Then, Mr. Speaker, even if a policy of isolation were not morally unjustifiable, practically it is not feasible. The one nation in all the world which might have remained neutral in a time of war was the United States of America, a self-sustaining nation which in 1914 decided that she would have no part in the war, and in 1917 elected President Wilson on the platform that he would keep the United States out of the war; but five months later she was plunged into the conflict. In a time of war an exporting nation must send out its ships unless it is to succumb to economic stagnation. If its ships sail the seas they are likely to be attacked or sunk, international complications set in, and the policy of isolation becomes next to impossible.

There are those who maintain to-day that if we invoke economic sanctions they will lead to military sanctions, and that economic sanctions will lead to war. May I point out, first, what sometimes we do not recognize, that failure to apply economic sanctions may lead to war. The League of Nations cannot stand the loss of prestige that would result from permitting the Italo-Ethiopian dispute to go on without intervention. The Sino-Japanese affair caused the prestige of the League of Nations to suffer greatly. If the league again suffers a diplomatic defeat the only remaining agency for international peace will be completely dismembered. I am not one of those who give unswerving allegiance to the League of Nations; I believe it has its shortcomings, and that it has been used again and again to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for certain imperial interests. But I maintain that it is the only available agency to-day for collective action and collective security. Those who say that if we invoke economic sanctions it will lead to military sanctions forget that if all the fifty-two nations which have promised to invoke those sanctions cooperate, military sanctions will become unnecessary. No nation, no matter how great, could long stand the pressure of an economic boycott on the part of fifty-two other nations. But may I point out that economic sanctions do not necessarily mean military sanctions. I have not time to read article 16 of the covenant of the league, but most hon. members know that in that article economic sanctions are absolute; military sanctions are conditional. It will be remembered, too, that in 1920 Canada made a reservation to article 16. This is it:

> It is in conformity with the spirit of article 10 that, in the event of the council considering it to be its duty to recommend the application of military measures in consequence of aggression or danger or threat of aggression, the council shall be bound to take into account, more particularly, the geographical situation and especial condition of each state.

May I remind hon. members that in 1921 the League of Nations in sending a note to Germany made it quite clear that military sanctions would not be compulsory, but were dependent entirely on the regional and geographical situation of the nations. Therefore the argument that the application of economic sanctions must lead to the application of military sanctions and thus to war is not well founded.

In the resolution which I have the honour to present to the house we are asking for a more sincere fulfilment of our obligations under the covenant of the league. We believe that can be done in two ways: first by tightening up the present sanctions, that is by extending the list of things that shall be prohibited from export to include all articles necessary to carry on war. I have no wish to bring up what is sometimes called the Riddell incident; it has been discussed in a more or less partisan way, and we are dealing just now with something that rises above party politics. But I would remind the house that when we are talking about collective action someone has to initiate that action; that when the members of the League of Nations gather to decide what steps they shall take for the maintenence of peace, somebody must propose the steps that should be taken. I submit that there is perhaps no nation represented at the council table of the league that is in a better position to initiate such steps than Canada. By asking for a more sincere application we mean not only an extension of the list of articles now under embargo but also a tightening up, with a view to investigating what commodities are being shipped indirectly to countries engaged in active aggression. I have the figures here for the export of nickel. It is a remarkable thing that last year, 1935, we exported more nickel than in any year of the last ten. That some of this nickel is being used indirectly to provide armaments for war is almost beyond question. I know it is very difficult to deal with the question of indirect exports. I know there arises the question of remuneration of those who stand to lose by such an arrangement. Yet I submit that the great majority of the Canadian people would support any steps the government might take to see that goods produced in Canada are not being used to enable one nation to carry on a brutal and ruthless massacre of a primitive and defenceless people.

In the resolution I have presented we point out that sanctions are not in themselves sufficient. We point out the danger and futility of sanctions. In the first instance they are dangerous because they may be used for the advancement of imperialism. There are those to-day who are pointing with a critical finger to the fact that Great Britain, who was so active in applying sanctions against Italy, was loth to apply them against Japan. They say the reason is that there is a Suez canal in Africa, but no Suez in Manchuria. I am not one who holds that point of view. However, there is a decided danger that sanctions with a view to maintaining peace may be used to maintain and advance imperialistic means of aggrandizement.

There is a danger of sanctions being used to maintain the status quo. I believe President Wilson was the man who, perhaps more than anyone else, was responsible for the drawing up of the covenant of the league. He saw the danger that the league, which was to be an instrument of justice, might become an instrument of injustice, and that as the years went by certain international problems might crop up and necessarily international readjustments would have to be made. He saw that from time to time there would have to be a rearrangement of treaties, particularly a revision of the treaty of Versailles, and that it would be necessary to set up the machinery whereby that revision could take place. For these reasons we point out that in themselves sanctions may constitute a danger, and not only may they be dangerous but they may be futile in the prevention of war. To-day sanctions may postpone war; they may prevent its happening in the immediate future, but unless the League of Nations is prepared to deal with the underlying causes leading to war we cannot hope to maintain peace. Unless we are prepared to see that there are economic problems, that there are colonial problems, that there is a pressure of population in certain areas of the world which inevitably must lead to war, and unless we set up the machinery necessary for peaceable change, the mere application of sanctions will only postpone the inevitable day of reckoning. That is why we have made these proposals.

As I have not much more time to speak I shall not deal in detail with the proposals, but we ask that first of all Canada shall take the lead in securing collective reduction of armaments. If we are going to condemn Italy for breaking article 10 of the covenant, and Germany for breaking the treaty of Versailles, we must be prepared to observe article 8 by which we promise to reduce armaments. There must be collective and open diplomacy, and an abrogation of treaties not in accord with the covenant. Above all, under article 19 we must set up the machinery whereby the problems of territorial expansion, pressure of population, and economic stagnation and suffocation shall be submitted to some body with authority which will be in a position to suggest possible ways of peaceable change.

Change is coming; it is bound to come. The only sensible procedure would seem to be that of setting up the machinery whereby it may be done peaceably and without recourse to force. Unless we recognize this fact, all our talk about sanctions is beside the point. The founder of the league and Right Hon. Sir Samuel Hoare, Lord Lothian and a number of other prominent men who have worked tirelessly for peace, have made this point clear.

I suggest further that we do away with unilateral agreements.

Mr. CAHAN: What is a unilateral agreement? That is puzzling to me; I never heard of one before.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I have this in mind: From January to July of last year Great Britain, France and Italy, working outside the league, endeavoured to settle the dispute in Ethiopia by giving to Italy certain concessions of land.

Mr. CAHAN: It would be a tripartite agreement.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: That was not unilateral, then?

Mr. DOUGLAS: It was suggested that they would be unilateral between Ethiopia and Italy.

Mr. CAHAN: Would that not be a bipartite agreement? I never heard of such a thing as a unilateral agreement.

Mr. DOUGLAS: It is the term we use, I believe.

Mr. CAHAN: I never heard of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The idea is that machinery outside of the league is used, and in the solving of problems which may come up resort is had to old imperialistic methods rather than to the machinery of the league. In this morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette we see a very good example. It appears that Italy, having had a number of successful encounters with Ethiopian troops, is now saying to the French government that she is prepared to enter into negotiations with Ethiopia. However she is not making that statement to the league, nor is she using the machinery of the league. I maintain that if Italy and Ethiopia settle their differences outside the league by a mere juggling of territory we are sowing the seeds of another war. We cannot drive two horses in different harness. We must either work through the machinery set up by the league or resort to the old diplomatic balance of power which inevitably must lead to war.

Summing up, we take the attitude that if the League of Nations is to be used to maintain the status quo; if it is to be used so that the major nations, who have eaten their full in the race for colonies, may use the league to prevent the growth of other nations and to prevent economic expansion, and if it is to be used merely as a machine to enable those who have to keep what they have, we do not feel that such a league can be a satisfactory agency for peace. We maintain that if the League of Nations is used for what we believe it can be used, namely, an instrument of collective action, guaranteeing collective security and giving collective peace, if it is prepared to set up the machinery necessary to bring about revisions and readjustments in the international field, and if it is prepared to become a tribunal to which nations may go to air their grievances, it can, and I believe will, bceome a great power and a great force in the maintenance of world peace.

My submission is that no nation in the world has a greater responsibility or opportunity to that end than has Canada. We have no desire for colonies and no imperialistic dreams. We have no neighbours of whom we are afraid. Our relationship with our neighbours to the south stands a monument to peace and good will, and I suggest we are in a first class position to set up machinery which would give moral leadership to the nations of the world to the end that men of all races, colour and speech ultimately may come to sit in the parliament of man and the federation of the world.

Mr. LENNARD: What position would Canada be in if it were not for the protection of the British empire?

An hon. MEMBER: Answer it.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this resolution I do so with a certain amount of trepidation. As a new member may I express to you, sir, and to the older members of this house—older not so much in point of age but in length of service—our appreciation of the courtesy and kindly tolerance which has been extended to us as a group of social crediters on account of the fact that we are new to this particular sphere.

The resolution before us is rather a long one, and it is not my purpose to discuss it in its entirety. I think it can be summed up in four words: We want international peace. I believe it is true, sir, that in the multiplicity of words there is much confusion, and in my own mind at least—I do not know whether in the mind of other members of the house—there is a certain amount of confusion as to exactly what this resolution means and exactly what it asks. I believe, too, that on account of conditions as they exist in Europe to-day it perhaps might be better if a resolution of this nature were not brought up for discussion.

Going back into the record of the proceedings of this house I find that discussions of international peace have taken place almost yearly since the great war ended in 1918. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) has been most persistent in her demands for action by Canada in the cause of international peace, and she is to be commended for her action in that regard. I believe it is the duty of every red-blooded Canadian to seek every possible avenue which might lead to a solution of this problem When the war ended in 1918 we said that never again would we permit nations to bring such another catastrophe upon the world. We meant every word we said in those days, and yet in spite of that we find the nations to-day flying at each other's throats. They have forgotten the expression "peace, perfect peace."

At the close of the war the League of Nations was set up, and it had two great aims: first, to preserve peace and to seek a peaceful settlement of international disputes, and second, to organize in the most varied spheres the cooperation of peoples with a view to the material and moral welfare of humanity. These were very excellent aims, but I fear that to a great extent we have lost sight of that first aim, the preservation of peace.

To find out exactly what some of our leaders in this parliament have said and thought in regard to international peace I went back over the record of Hansard, and I find that the opinions expressed are very divergent indeed. They do not throw any new light on an old subject. Here are some opinions which were expressed on March 26, 1928. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking on the subject of international peace, used these significant words:

> This government and this parliament have identified themselves in a very real and immediate way with the League of Nations. Everything we do in connection with the League of Nations we are doing along lines that are promoting this very objective—international peace.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), on a subsequent occasion, used these striking words:

> There can be no educated public opinion so long as the machinery of parliaments is utilized for the purpose of providing armaments with which man may go to war.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in 1930 used these words:

> The old system has failed and a new structure is being built—

Those are very significant words indeed to-day. He continued:

> —I hope on a basis of justice and solidarity. The League of Nations is no longer an idea; it has become a reality and its strength is continuously increasing.

Then we have the member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) saying this:

> You will never bring about peace by philosophical dissertations. There is only one method I know of and that is by promoting the principles of the Prince of Peace.

These, sir, are significant words, non-committal it is true, and general in their scope. Let us turn to some other comments. Let me read one which was made by the member for Broadview (Mr. Church). Commenting on an article written by George Bernard Shaw, the hon. member said:

> Now let us see what Bernard Shaw has to say in regard to this wonderful mock parliament known as the League of Nations, which is doing more to create strife than any other agency I know of. In my opinion they should change the name from League of Nations to League of Humbug, because that is all it is.

Then he goes on to quote the words of Bernard Shaw, who, I am sure you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, is a man of thought, a master of English, and a moulder of public opinion. Bernard Shaw said:

> Roughly and generally it is a fact that the pacifist oratory at the assembly is Christmas card platitude at best and humbug at worst. The permanent departments of the league have to fight hard to defeat the frequent attempts to sabotage it by the big powers through their deciduous members.

There you have, I think, the two schools of thought, one leaning towards the idea that the league is a successful institution, and the other suggesting that it has in a measure failed in its purpose, the purpose for which it was brought into being. Those who have criticized the League of Nations, it must be admitted, have had courage and daring. They may possibly be branded as men of warped intelligence, but notwithstanding that we ourselves in our hearts can criticize some of the actions of the league. No one will deny that the aim of the league, namely, the abolition of war, is a very worthy one indeed; but its sphere of activity has been so greatly widened that the primary aim, the abolition of war, has been lost sight of.

War is an inevitable result of the present financial system. I emphasize that with all the power at my command: war is an inevitable result of the present financial system. It has been said that war is economic peace and conversely peace is economic war. In peace nations enter into competition with one another for foreign markets in which to dispose of their surplus goods. I do not think that anyone will gainsay that fact, and that invariably leads in practice to war. When there is war goods are destroyed almost as quickly as they come into existence; people are in possession of plenty of money and we have an all round stimulation of business; in other words, we have economic security. Some suggest that we should abolish entirely the manufacture of war materials. I heartily agree with that; and I think we are all agreed that the main reason for the boom which Great Britain and other nations are experiencing at the present time is the manufacture of war materials. But the question arises then: If you ban the manufacture of war materials what are you going to do with the unemployed? You will immediately throw people out of work; you will swell the ranks of the unemployed, and your problem is accentuated.

What is the solution of the problem? I think the solution lies in endeavouring to bring to the consumer more than he is obtaining at present. Make your people happy and contented by giving them all they want to eat, all the clothes they can wear and decent homes to live in, and you will banish the incentive to go to war. The problem of peace is one that lies within our own border, and it lies in the realm of finance. I cannot stress that too strongly. Give the consumers of this country or any other country for that matter the necessary purchasing power to buy goods as produced and you will solve this problem of war.

Let me say this in conclusion. While I sympathize with the aim of this resolution, yet in a measure I am opposed to the means of attaining the end it sets forth. I wish to make a statement on behalf of this group with which I have the honour to be associated. We are opposed to war, but we are convinced that its prevention does not lie in its prohibition but rather in a removal of the causes that make war inevitable. The chief of these causes is the drive for foreign markets, and the reason for this struggle for markets is the present financial system, which makes it impossible for any nation to distribute its wealth amongst its own people. Until this fundamental cause is removed all talk of permanent peace is not only idle but misleading. Attempts to prohibit war without removing its causes must aggravate the disease. Prohibitions by sanctions may postpone war but will inevitably cause offensive alliances, thus in the end enlarging the scope of war.

Recognizing that we are a small nation, we realize that our only hope of securing lasting peace lies in cooperating with the English speaking nations of the world who alone have preserved the political freedom necessary to bring about economic reforms by constitutional methods. We are unalterably opposed to war except in defence of our political freedom.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Although the mover of the resolution (Mr. Douglas) is a member of our own group, perhaps I might be permitted to express my appreciation of the comprehensive and dignified manner in which he has dealt with this subject. With regard to the speech to which we have just listened, we are heartily agreed that the only real way to prevent war is to remove the causes that make for war. But we have to face a world in which Canada is not a self-contained country but is inevitably brought into relations with other countries. We are to-day dealing with other countries. Under almost any circumstances that might be imagined, Canada would be dealing with other countries, and under these conditions when hostilities break out we simply have to face the issue. And it is in order that we may the more intelligently face that issue that the resolution is introduced to-day.

Before considering the resolution in detail, I should like to take this opportunity to call attention to a report of a speech by the Italian consul, Luigi Petrucci, given before the Italian chamber of commerce yesterday in Montreal. It seems to me that this is a most improper speech and a very dangerous one. After criticizing very severely the League of Nations of which we are a member, and which league has condemned the action of Italy, he goes on to say—I will quote only part of the article which appears in the first column of page 2 of this morning's Montreal Gazette:

> I cannot refrain from expressing my sorrow because Canada is applying sanctions against Italy, sanctions which are dangerous because they can bring another world war and which have destroyed the Italo-Canadian trade, which only a few months ago the two countries were trying to improve by means of a new commercial convention.
> These sanctions cannot stop the Italian enterprise in East Africa. Other effects of sanctions are that they will create a great wall between nations and will make economic liberalism even more unrealizable and utopian. The covenant will become more and more difficult to apply and economic wars between nations will become the rule.
> Italy refuses to admit the judgment taken by the League of Nations against her as illegal and iniquitous, and will stand with all her strength to oppose the effects of sanctions.

That is a challenge to Canada, and a challenge to the league, uttered by one who enjoys special privileges and special immunities in this country. I submit that it is ample ground for asking for his withdrawal from this country as the consul of Italy. May I further say that this is not the first time that we have had trouble with this particular consul. Members will remember something of this kind about a year ago, if I recall aright. Further, I remember last year a deputation of Italian citizens waiting upon me here in Ottawa, they having come from Montreal to make certain charges against the consul. They claimed that with his connivance there was being built up a secret fascist organization called the nationalist organization for the repression of anti-fascism. They charged that the officials of this organization were paid by the Italian government notwithstanding that they were British subjects by naturalization. They charged that the consul exercised a great deal of intimidation over Canadian citizens; that, naturally, Canadian citizens had to go to the consul for a good many things relating to their homeland —certificates of birth and so on; that when they did so the accommodation was refused them unless they joined the fascist organization, and further that threats were made, not merely of bodily harm to Canadian citizens here but also to relatives of Canadian citizens who were still in Italy. There was shown to me a photostat of what purported to be an oath which was being administered by the consul to Canadian citizens. This ran as follows:

> In the name of God and Italy I swear to execute the orders of Il Duce and to serve with all my strength and if necessary with my blood the cause of the fascist revolution.

I am not prepared, obviously, as a private citizen to make investigation as to how far these charges are justified. I turned over the memorandum, which was submitted to me by a lawyer of Montreal who appeared with the delegation, to the Department of External Affairs. I do not know whether any action has been taken, but I submit that these are serious charges and ought to be carefully investigated. I have not brought this matter to the attention of the house, but when such statements are made, as appeared in the Montreal Gazette to-day, it is high time that some action should be taken by the government.

Coming to the resolution, may I point out that in the past it has been extremely difficult to get a discussion of foreign affairs. I do not know why it is, but it has been the practice to bring in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs very near to the close of the session. I am glad to say that that practice has been modified this year, and we already have had before us some of these estimates. But year after year about the only opportunity the house has had of discussing foreign or external affairs has been on the estimates, and they have come in very late. Last year—I do not say it was done by design—they came in late one evening just at the close of the estimates of another department. One minister was not prepared to go on; a switch was made to the Department of External Affairs, and the estimates went through without even a single comment; in fact there was not even a reference to them—I suppose for that reason—in Hansard. One result of this lack of discussion in parliament had been that our people generally have not been very much accustomed to discussing foreign affairs. Of course it is quite true that with us foreign affairs have more largely to do with our relations with the United States, but notwithstanding that fact I think we all must recognize that in the last great war we were thrown into the struggle, and in all probability we may be thrown into another great struggle.

Miss MACPHAIL: We jumped in.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That struggle led to the sacrifice of the lives of tens of thousands of our best young men and brought this country to a condition of bankruptcy or near bankruptcy. It is curious that although we participated in one great war and are in danger of being thrown into another, we take no very active part in actually discussing external affairs. I have expressed on several occasions the hope that the reports of the League of Nations delegates should be referred to the committee on industrial and international affairs. Almost anything that would stimulate an interest among Canadians in the matter of our external relationships ought to be welcomed. The Prime Minister the other day, discussing the estimates for his own department, referred in this house to the way in which external affairs were pressing in upon us in recent years. They are bound to do so, and yet any crisis that arises finds our people quite unprepared.

A few years ago Canada was a signatory of the so-called Kellogg pact, in which we definitely abandoned war as an instrument of national policy. Nearly all the leading nations of the world signed that pact, and yet none of us apparently has implemented it by any change in national policy. I urge that not only should we abandon war as an instrument of national policy but we should abandon it as a recognized means for settlement of international disputes. Such a settlement is not permanent. The organization with which I am connected stands opposed to war. In order to make very clear our position I would read a statement with respect to peace, published two years ago at our Winnipeg convention:

> We recognize that modern war rises primarily from the clash of interests in a world economy based on competition, therefore the establishment of world peace depends on abolishing competition and on building a cooperative commonwealth.

I trust that hon. members will not accuse me of unduly dragging in party considerations We were thinking of much larger things than any Canadian party when we spoke of it. The statement proceeds:

> The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is ualterably opposed to war. If the great capitalist powers drift into another war Canadian neutrality must be rigorously maintained whoever the belligerents may be. Canada must refuse to give military assistance to the League of Nations as at present constituted. We stand for thorough reorganization of the league in order to make it an effective instrument of peace.

The last clause of the resolution before the house is as follows:

> That unless and until there is a sincere acceptance and application of the above by the member-nations of the league, Canada will refuse to participate in any foreign war, no matter who the belligerents may be.

Personally I would go farther than that. The longer I live the more convinced I become that war settles nothing, that war is the greatest disaster that could come upon any nation. I am convinced of that. I do not care whether or not somebody dubs me pacifist, with all the rather opprobrious connotations of that word; I think it is the only sane and safe policy in the world to-day. I have a good deal of respect for Mr. George Lansbury who, speaking of his resignation as leader of the Labour party in Great Britain, made this statement:

> It is impossible for me to believe anything good can come out of mass murder, whether this is carried out by order of a league of nations or by a single nation. Evil cannot be swept out of our lives by evil; the spirit of war cannot be destroyed by more war.

I want to adopt that statement as my own, so there may be no doubt in the mind of any hon. member as to where I stand.

We come to the policies of our country, and as yet, unfortunately in my judgment, this country, like a good many other countries is still relying more or less upon armaments as a last resort. I suggest that an isolationist position cannot be successfully maintained in the world to-day. Things may come to such a pass, if we are about to be dragged into a war and there may be no other policy open to us. We may be forced to adopt an isolationist policy and refuse to be dragged in. But it should be remembered that to-day the world is becoming more or less integrated industrially, financially and socially. We cannot stay out by ourselves. As long as we are in the world neighbourhood we have to deal with the people whom we meet in that neighbourhood. So we ought to recognize that the League of Nations, in so far as it is an association of nations seeking to promote peace, ought to be supported.

We are also of course a member of the British empire. Two years ago I had the opportunity to attend, as a delegate, the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, which met at Toronto in association with the Royal Institute of International Affairs, which has headquarters at Chatham House. Viscount Cecil led the British delegation, which included Liberals, Conservatives and Labour men. We discussed the question as to what would happen if, perchance, the interests of Great Britain and the League of Nations should not be identical, which should claim our loyalty. Possibly the answer to that question was evaded, because there were certain differences of opinion, but the conclusions finally adopted were to the effect that we could not possibly see that the interests of Great Britain could be divergent from the interests of the league itself. So I do not think we need discuss our special obligations to the British empire; they ought to be identical with those we owe the league.

I frankly confess, Mr. Speaker, that the league as now constituted is a very imperfect instrument for maintaining world peace. For some years I declined to join the League of Nations Society, just for that reason. At that time the league seemed to me essentially a league of victors. For a time the situation improved. Now the United States is still out; Germany came in and went out; and Japan is out. The entry of the U.S.S.R. into the league, meant a distinct advance but still it is essentially only a partial league of nations.

Further than that, national sovereignty is still maintained. I know every nation is jealous of what it claims to be its own final right to decide things, but just as within our national life smaller groups have given up their voices in the presence of the larger groups, so it seems to me we ultimately must come to the place where we will be willing to sacrifice for the common good what we have hitherto claimed to be our national sovereignty. I think we will have to come to that. To-day two people come to the court; they ask the court to make a decision, and then they loyally accept the decision that is made. As nations we refuse to do that. In the first place we all maintain our armaments, and a number of nations persist in carrying on a line of independent action. Just recently, for example, Great Britain held some naval manoeuvres in the Mediterranean, taking independent action at the very time when it would seem that every move should have been taken through the league.

I will admit, too, that to a large extent the league to-day is dominated by the great powers. Several years ago it was largely dominated by France. To-day I think the predominate influence is that of Great Britain. The great empires have their own ends to serve. I think that can be said without particularly casting reflections upon them as empires. They have their own ends to serve; they are not impartial judges. In my judgment there is a very great danger that the league may be made a kind of smoke screen behind which imperialist aims and ambitions may be carried forward. I am not ashamed of being a Britisher, but I unite with a great many Britishers living in Great Britain in denouncing imperialism as we know it in modern days, and imperialism is none the less to be denounced because it is British imperialism. We denounce German imperialism and French imperialism and Japanese imperialism, and I cannot exclude British imperialism. I do not think Great Britain had been worse than most empires, but as we look back through history and see the processes and developments that have taken place we must admit that our British empire has been built up by methods none of us to-day would care to justify.

Now let me say a few words with regard to sanctions. I think we may distinguish between economic sanctions and military sanctions. I know there is a danger that economic sanctions may provoke an enemy in a desperate position to reprisals, perhaps even to the declaration of war. In the case of Italy I cannot but think that a declaration of that kind on our proposal to extend sanctions was a good deal of a bluff. However, there is that possibility. As the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) suggested in moving the resolution, however, there is also the danger that unless we do exercise economic sanctions we may very easily provoke war. There is danger in every direction, but if we were only sincere and thorough-going in our exercise of sanctions it seems to me we would not have to face war. Take this question of oil. I do not know the ins and outs of the handling of oil. I do know Great Britain is said to have a very considerable number of shares in the Anglo-Persian Oil Corporation. I know something of the part that oil has played in the past, and it may be that there has been pressure on the British government from the oil companies. I do not know. A few weeks ago it seemed as if the United States, despite the difficulty of the president taking action along this line, might possibly have joined with other nations in bringing oil sanctions into effect. But if sanctions are to be applied, they must be made effective, and all nations must be willing to do their share. I am glad to think that at last we have come to the point of recognizing the desirability of not allowing war materials to pass into the hands of the aggressor. I think it is two years since I brought in a resolution in regard to nickel, urging that we express our willingness to cooperate with the League of Nations in seeing that no nickel found its way into war materials. That resolution was not adopted by this house. Here is an extract from a stock market publication, issued a little less than a year ago; it is given in the League of Nations Society in Canada monthly news sheet:

> Current demands for nickel are running at a record making rate, moving ahead with the added force of peace time requirements. In addition, there has been little let up by the purchases by many nations of armaments and this has meant in one way or another the buying of nickel. Nearly all major powers are increasing substantially their naval and military appropriations. These and other factors seem to promise a rising curve of nickel consumption, production and earnings.

I cannot see that we as a nation can escape responsibility for having continued to send abroad nickel that has been finding its way into the making of war materials. Here is a recent Canadian Press dispatch which appeared on the regular financial page dated at Ottawa, November 20, with regard to nickel:

> The Dominion Bureau of Statistics disclosed, Tuesday, that Italy, apparently racing to get under the League of Nations' sanctions wire, imported from Canada almost twice as much fine nickel in October as it did during all last year, increasing its total imports from Canada 119 per cent, compared with October, 1934.

And the dispatch goes on to speak of the greatly increased production and shipment of copper. I am glad that we have stopped the exportation of nickel—at least I hope we have. At Brockville the other day a railway employee pointed across the railway yards to a car which he said was loaded with nickel and which was being stopped in transit. That is at least some indication that perhaps action is being taken. But I submit that we should have taken action two years ago, and very drastic action, even before we formally consented to join in these sanctions.

The purpose of the resolution is to point out that sanctions in themselves are not enough. We say that we should remain loyal to the terms of the covenant. That may be, but may I point out that there are other clauses in the covenant besides 10 and 16. Take the first clause in article 8:

> The members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

Have the countries of the world actually disarmed? Instead of that they have been arming, and now we are told that Great Britain is giving up the idea that there will not be a war within ten years; her leading statesmen are saying that war will almost inevitably come inside of four years, and so a greater armament campaign is being proposed. We asked Germany to disarm, and Germany disarmed under the express condition that the other nations would do the same. The other nations did not carry out their solemn obligations to Germany, with the result that an almost desperate German people developed fascism. We have not carried out our obligations under section 8 of the covenant.

Then there is section 19, which I think is not quite so familiar to some of our people. It is very short:

> The assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

There is no doubt that a great many treaties that exist are not applicable to-day. There is no doubt in my mind that the Versailles treaty is not a just treaty. In many ways it ought to be revised. Under pressure from Germany certain clauses have been slightly revised. We are willing to concede now that Germany was not wholly responsible for the war. The provisions with regard to reparation payments have become in effect dead letters, but we have not made those general revisions that seem to be justified if the peace of the world is to be preserved. I feel very strongly that some responsible body must undertake to get at the causes of war, the causes of friction. That was one of the purposes for which the league was set up. A few weeks ago there was a discussion of the league policy carried on under the auspices of the League of Nations Society in Canada. Comments were sent in from various members of the society, and a number of them were published in the organ of the society. Among others I find this:

> Her (the Canadian) representatives have two distinct questions to answer for her people, before they can properly take or support action at Geneva. One is: what can she do through her own government, and in cooperation with other nations, to satisfy the claims and desires of Italy that are just and genuinely in accord with civilized life, and thus prevent war?.... If war is the alternative, the Canadian people should be allowed to choose between a war, and its consequences near and far, and a reorganization of her economic and social life....
> Until some powerful effort has been made by Canada or someone else to attack the causes of war, and to remove them by paying a price which however great cannot be as great as war itself, Canada should not become involved in any system of sanctions which under those circumstances would not be sanction—that is the force of equitable authority—at all, but would simply be the old-fashioned private war used by a stronger group to assert its will.

Thus we are forced to recognize the danger of sanctions unaccompanied by other action. Sanctions in themselves might simply maintain the status quo, which might prevent a just solution of existing problems. Lord Lothian put this matter very clearly in a speech delivered on September 28 of last year:

> We have allowed it (the league) to become an instrument not for settling grievances but for perpetuating a status quo which is every year becoming more difficult to justify.

A few days later Sir Herbert Samuel put it this way:

> The League of Nations must become something more than a mere defender of the status quo.

May I quote once more from Lord Lothian in a speech delivered on September 18 of last year:

> Italy has a case against us and the league—a much better case than she has against Abyssinia. In the last century there was practically free migration all over the world, and in substance free trade in goods, foodstuffs and capital. To-day the nations are living in watertight compartments, with no migration and no freedom of trade, with the result that many of them have got into such tremendous population and economic difficulties that they have resorted to dictatorship to maintain order at home, and most of them are adding to their armaments in order to try to solve their internal problems by action in a foreign field.

In summing up my position I believe I could do no better than quote the observations of Mr. Escott Reid in a statement before the National Council of the League of Nations Society in November:

> An effective collective system means not only the restraint of the aggresor but also disarmament, international instead of imperial control of colonies, and effective machinery to deal with treaty revision and the problems of markets, migration and raw materials. The crisis which presents itself to-day gives us an opportunity to build the foundations and perhaps some of the framework of such a system. If we seize that opportunity we shall greatly diminish the prospects of war. If we fail to seize it, war will not be far off.

I know it is very difficult for most of us to come to anything like a satisfactory conclusion in connection with the Italo-Ethiopian tangle. I should like to express my personal sympathies for Ethiopia. I cannot see how possibly we could too strongly condemn Italy's action. At the same time I am conscious that other nations have sinned in much the same way as has Italy. I have before me a volume published several years ago by the late John S. Ewart, entitled Canada and British Wars. Could anyone read a document such as this without realizing that in nearly all disputes of recent time Great Britain has been at fault as have other empires, in the wars of imperial expansion. Undoubtedly the British empire has been built up by methods not greatly dissimilar from those now being used by Italy and Japan. I think of India, of Egypt from 1882 to 1895, of the Venezuela boundary dispute of 1895-6, of Persia in 1896, of South Africa in 1895 and through to 1902, of the Anglo-Japanese alliance of 1902, of our relationships with France, 1898-1914; of the Moroccan crisis, 1905-6, of the Anglo-Russian relationships, 1906-7; of the triple entente 1907, and of all the difficulties we had in Morocco and Persia and the Balkans; of British action in China, and so on.

Hon. members of my own generation will recall the difficulties which were experienced in connection with these matters. One cannot go back over the history of modern imperialism without realizing that there is much to be deplored. At the same time that does not mean that we can condone what Italy is now doing, but it does mean that we must frankly recognize our responsibility in the matter. I do not often feel like quoting Mr. Amery, but I should like to read a statement he made a few months ago. Hon. members are aware that he was former dominions and colonial secretary. He said:

> There is something rather humorous in a gorged and satiated lion reproving a hungry young tiger, saying it sympathizes with him, but his appetite must be satisfied in accordance with the rules of the vegetarian society, of which the lion has been the last joining member.

There is a great deal in that statement. Along similar lines Sir Stafford Cripps made this statement at the Brighton Labour party conference:

> It is argued that Mussolini will be crushed. He will not. In all probability he will drive a satisfactory bargain with his fellow members of the international burglars union momentarily termed policemen.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Very well, I shall have to leave it at that. May I say in closing that if we are to have peace we must be prepared to pay the price of peace—a price which, at the very worst, could be nothing like as heavy as the price we pay when war is declared.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the resolution of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) is of interest to all hon. members. Undoubtedly a very strong opinion in Canada against Canadian participation in European wars was shown during the last campaign, when parties and groups, either through conviction or because of their desire to say things which were pleasant to the ears of the electors, took the same stand on this question. Every party or group whose campaign literature reached me, or whose speeches I read in the press, stood against Canadian participation in European war, until we had consulted the people through a plebiscite or something of the sort. Then if people decided that they wanted to go to war, then they would go to war. I believe the party in power took the stand that Canada would not participate in any European war until the matter had been submitted to parliament, which in practice would mean submission to the Liberal party.

The feeling on this matter of a great many people is one of confusion and uncertainty. I find myself troubled by the common ground taken by the imperialists and the enthusiasts for the league on the matter of sanctions. It is the first occasion of which I am aware that they have taken the same ground, and they seem to be about equally enthusiastic though I am quite sure, for different reasons.

The whole question of sanctions brought the matter of participation in European war clearly before us, and any thinking person has to come to some conclusion or other in regard to it.

For many years I have been exceedingly enthusiastic about the league and have been hopeful that it was the organization in the world which was going to do the most to remove the causes of war. I have always been more interested in removing causes than in the maintenance of peace by force. Peace maintained by force, whether the force be called sanctions or by some other name, is a precarious peace. In my view the only peace which can be lasting is one which arises as the natural consequence of the removal of the causes of war. My undimmed enthusiasm for the League of Nations lasted until the disarmament conference. My faith in British sincerity in maintaining world peace through the action of the league lasted until the disarmament conference, but I say to this house quite frankly that I have never been as enthusiastic on either point since the failure of the disarmament conference. I feel that at that time Canada did not take as strong a stand as she might have done. She took just a nominal stand, and did not put up the fight at the conference that I would have wished to see. I was not pleased with the attitude of Great Britain at that time. I did feel then, and I have felt since, and do feel now that we lost a tremendous opportunity at that time, and it is one that may not recur. It may after another blood bath, or it may never.

In reading over the resolution I feel myself in harmony with most of the statements made therein—it is rather too long to read again—but I want to take some little time to say that I feel the greatest need of Canada and all the other countries which are sincerely anxious for world peace is the pressing for the application of article 19 of the covenant. I think that if we are only going to go on invoking sanctions, we are wielding a big stick which will eventually not be successful. It may now be successful, but the time will come when the group of nations which "have not" will become as strong, by combinations, as the group of nations which "have," and when that time comes sanctions will not be effective. So I think if we are going to remain in the league we ought as a country to take the work of the league very seriously. We ought first to have a Department of External Affairs that is not headed by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking of this matter the other evening said, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) agreed with him, that he would have to know what went on in that department anyway, and with that I agree; still if that department were headed by a person who specialized in international matters, his consultation with the Prime Minister would make it a stronger department than it could possibly be when headed by an altogether overworked man, as the Prime Minister of Canada must be. So I think we should have a Department of External Affairs with a minister at its head apart from the Prime Minister.

I believe, too, that we should raise the status of our representative at Geneva. I believe that we ought to take the road to peace definitely. But what we have been doing, and everybody in this house knows it, is trying to take both roads—peace and war—at once. We have not been spending much money on peace or on the Department of External Affairs or on our office in Geneva. We have not even made a place on the agenda of the House of Commons for a report of the delegates when they come back from Geneva. We thought what they did at the league of so little consequence that we did not even provide on the agenda a place for their report when the delegates returned, so that they could make clear to the house what went on there and what the stand of Canada was. And we should send to the league only people who are members of parliament, either of this house or of the upper house. It is simply ridiculous to send people who are not members of either house. It has been a method of rewarding people who have been kind to the party in power or some such thing. It has no meaning so far as the peace work is concerned.

So if Canada is going to stay in the league I would like to see her seriously undertake the work because nominal support is likely to draw us into sanctions and into war, without our ever having used the league as an instrument for the preservation of peace. I think we have come to the place where we must decide what we are going to do, whether we are going to stay in the league and be active members of it, or not stay in at all.

I hear a good many people talking about the happy results that would come from an English speaking alliance. May I say that I think a great deal of danger lies in that direction unless we clearly recognize the differences in interest and the different areas of the earth which constitute the first interest of the great English speaking nations. It is true that Britain and the United States have very much in common. There is no quarrelling about frontiers; there is no wrangling over spheres of influence or over the expansion of their empires. In fact, they are both contracting and are getting out from under the weight of their imperial interests by gradually, and sometimes rapidly, giving self-government to their dependencies. The Philippines would serve as an example in the American sphere, and the growing power of the dominions and of India in the British sphere. As far as we have gone now, Great Britain and America have a similar outlook on world politics. Then they have this other thing, which is greater than all; they have a common tradition, and they have a common language. But we are apt, when we have come to see that all this is true, to jump to the conclusion that their interests are therefore identical. May I take a moment to point out that their interests are not identical; their most immediate and pressing problems are not the same, and if we recognize that fact it will save us future disappointment. Let me quote a paragraph from Walter Lippmann on this point. He says:

> American isolation is one of the optical illusions of the present era. American policy is conditioned by its vital interests just as is British policy. Thus America is isolationist as to continental Europe, but it has never been and is not now isolationist in the region of the Caribbean or the Pacific ocean. The British ardour for the league is a reflection of British interest in British security; the lack of British ardour for the collective system in the Far East is a reflection of a greater concern with European security.

He goes on to say about his own country:

> So it is with us. President Harding, who was elected in 1920 as a result of a rebellion against the league, signed a whole series of treaties in 1922 which applied the league's principles to the Orient. In 1931 Secretary Stimson stood forth as the protagonist of league principles and Sir John Simon did not.

I think that is true, and I think it is an explanation of why Great Britain was not as much interested in invoking certain articles in the league covenant in relation to Japanese aggression in Manchuria as was the United States, and of why Great Britain is much more interested in invoking certain articles of the covenant in relation to Italy's aggression in Ethiopia than the United States is, and, in fact, than we are. Whether we like to admit it or not, and I for one quite frankly admit it, Canadians are North Americans. We have a divided interest. While sentimentally and patriotically we are bound closely to Great Britain, economically and geographically we are bound to the North American continent. So that we find it difficult—at least I find it difficult, and I believe a great many other Canadians do—to be as enthusiastic about invoking sanctions in Europe at the moment as Britishers are. I find myself irritated by the continued animosity of Europeans; I find myself remote from these continual quarrels, and I believe we all do—which is only another way of saying that we live on the North American continent. I venture to say that if the English channel were as wide as the Atlantic, Great Britain's reaction to European problems would quite likely be exactly ours. I feel therefore that while doing everything we can to foster good will and understanding among English speaking nations, we ought to recognize the differences that exist. If we did we should not be so much disappointed over the lack of British interest in the far east and the lack of American interest in continental Europe. For it simply means that their greatest concern is respectively in that area in which their first interest lies.

When I was in the United States shortly before this house opened I heard some Oxford students discussing these questions—and very able young men they were. In my opinion they were stressing unduly this question of friendship between English speaking peoples; I could not help feeling that they were not recognizing the differences that actually exist. They were more or less chiding the United States for not being as much interested in the European problem as Great Britain was, when it was evident to anyone looking at a map of the world that the United States would not have the same interest. I do not think their visit did any good; I do not think it helped the very thing they came to promote, whereas if they had recognized that each was loyal to the sphere of its first interest they would have accomplished more.

I have always been extremely opposed to war and I am still; but I am not so much interested in whether Canadian boys die in one kind of war as distinguished from another as I am in keeping them from dying in any sort of war. I cannot therefore work up very much enthusiasm about military sanctions. What I want to prevent is war; and in the last two or three years we have found the nations of the world apparently seeking peace in several ways, the three most outstanding being collective security and at the same time, and running parallel, a race in armaments, simultaneously with pacts outside the league, until some writer—I forget who it was—said there was a bad epidemic of pactomania. Now these three methods pursued at the same time do not make sense. I can understand reliance on an armament race and on pacts, but I cannot understand collective security with a race in armaments and at the same time pacts outside the league.

In this house over a long period of years I have noticed the same thing—fear of trying new peace methods. The house apparently has been afraid to abandon the old military methods but has run along timidly with a short step in the direction of peace and a long step on the military road. We have almost forgotten the ideas that emerged from the war. One of the sentences of Woodrow Wilson we ought always to remember; it is: that peace must be peace without victory, for only peace between equals can last. Well, it was not peace without victory and certainly it was not peace between equals; and instead of seeking to make it peace between equals, as time went on, there was a disposition on the part of the league to defend the status quo in Europe. And it is the invoking of sanctions in defence of the status quo that I fear more than anything else.

It is true that the League of Nations has worked out—I am happy about this—the technique of cooperation through conference, and by doing so it has been able to make a very considerable contribution to all the nations and to our common life, which is the community of the world. It is true too that in these conferences many errors have been made from time to time; but it is also true that invariably when errors have been made the nations have been called together again in conference and some at any rate of the errors have been rectified. But though the league has worked out the technique of cooperation through conference, it has never attempted to invoke article 19 of the covenant. This article was read by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) but I should like to read it again, because it is that part of the covenant which we shall all have to learn thoroughly in the future:

> The assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

I think the task of the league now is to invoke article 19; and while I certainly have no sympathy with Italy, I do believe that in the long run the invoking of that article is infinitely more important than the whole question of sanctions. In my opinion the future of the league will depend upon its ability to invoke article 19 and to settle perplexing economic and racial problems through the method of cooperation, because it is more and more becoming realized that all nations should have access to raw materials and to areas and to markets. I feel that Sir Samuel Hoare will be remembered, because he made a strong speech on this subject, long after the Hoare-Laval—misnamed—peace proposal is forgotten, because in emphasizing the need of nations having access to raw materials and areas and markets he did strike the thing that is vital. It is true that there are other considerations. The carving up of Europe, the taking away of the hinterland of countries that cannot very well get along as they are now constituted, the dividing of people who should be one racially and culturally, are also grievances that are likely to lead to war. Yet I think that the economic cause is the greatest, and that we need as a League of Nations and as a country that is a member of the League of Nations very seriously to take up the question of remedying these grievances rather than to seek to keep things as they are by using sanctions in defence of the status quo.

While it is true that the principle of graduated responsibility in relation to sanctions has been recognized, I think it has not been sufficiently realized that those who are most involved need to take the initiative and to assume the greatest responsibility in the invoking of sanctions. I do not feel that we can forever be rushing to Europe to save Europe from itself—because that is what it almost always comes to. I have, as I said before, lost patience with a continent that cannot evolve some sort of entity, that cannot manage its own trade and language and racial problems. We are a long way from Europe, and there does not seem to me to be any reason why we should forever be thrown into the settling of European disputes. Sometimes I think that if Europe came to realize that the rest of the world were not as interested in her difficulties as she now thinks they are, she might more seriously go to the task of finding a solution of her own difficulties.

I think I have said all I need to say about the need of graduated responsibility and the taking of the initiative and the bearing of the burden by those who are most closely connected with the difficulty. Some one said, speaking on this matter a little while ago, that he thought unless we could settle disputes and difficulties at home there was not so much we could do abroad. I wholly agree with that position. I was reading not long ago a statement by Mr. Halton, writing in the Toronto Daily Star, that one third of the people of Great Britain were not getting enough to eat. May I frankly say that in my opinion the first task that faces Great Britain is the feeding of her own people; and the first task that Canada faces is to take care of those who are not getting sufficient food and shelter and medical attention, who are not given the opportunity of living a full and happy and purposeful existence. That is our first task, as it is the task of every other country. I was reading not long ago an article written by Professor Soddy in which he said that very thing; if we could solve the problem of getting to the people who need it the plenty which we have, war would disappear. Madame Curie, whose middle name I have forgotten, talking in France said the same, that she had lost all patience with the nations of the world because they were willing to spend a great deal of money on armaments and on all the various preparations for conflict rather than upon endeavouring to remove the causes of conflict and to give assistance to their peoples along scientific lines.

It may be that neutrality is not possible. It looked like it during the last war. Personally I would very much rather see us solve our problems collectively, but solve them from a peace point of view, not from a war point of view, because the moment the League of Nations becomes an international war office it defeats, in my opinion, its whole object. Last time we had a holy war, a war in which we were on the right side, a war which we won, so we cannot improve on that; and we came out of it believing that it was a pretty punk affair. So if we are going into another holy war it is going to be a little more holy, because we get that way; we shall be on the right side. But to me that is not good enough. I should like to see us go first at this thing with the will to seek and find in cooperation with other nations a solution of the problem by removing the causes of war. If we fail in that it may be that the North American continent will make desperate efforts to remain neutral. If we do, it will be at great cost. It will cost a great deal in money, it will cost a great deal in pride, possibly in lack of prestige. It will be very difficult for business. So that the first thing that I should like to see tried is to remove the causes of war through collective action; but may I say quite frankly that the second thing is the maintenance of neutrality at whatever cost.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I am convinced that if the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) had been in the house during the last ten or fifteen years and had occasion to study carefully the attitude and disposition of successive Canadian governments with respect to the work of the League of Nations he would not have drafted a resolution in the terms in which this resolution is drafted. I recall clearly the fourth assembly of the League of Nations when the draft Treaty for Mutual Assistance was formulated, in 1922 and 1923, and remitted to Canada as to other members of the league for consideration. That discussion and the final action with regard to that draft treaty are very enlightening indeed. Canada rejected that treaty by the reply of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in July, 1924, and I think that the general sentiment of the people of Canada supported him in that rejection. But the succeeding assembly of the League of Nations, which met in September, 1924, devised then the Geneva Protocol for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes. This protocol was also submitted to and rejected by all the British nations who form the British Commonwealth of Nations, as well as by other nations members of the league. And I think that rejection was in accord with general public sentiment in this country.

Again, if the hon. member for Weyburn had followed carefully the disarmament conference at Geneva, at which the late government was represented by the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), I think he would have to concede that that government, in exceptionally difficult circumstances, did everything that could possibly be done in the way of securing the disarmament of the great nations. But the fact remains that, conditions being as they then were and now are, it was impossible to bring about a general disarmament. In fact Great Britain, supported by the governments of the British dominions, was and is the only nation in Europe to make great sacrifices by reducing its armaments, both naval and military, in every possible way.

This resolution, therefore, is not drawn up with a clear conception of what Canada has done and what Canada or the Canadian government may be able to do at present or in the future, and certainly I cannot support the resolution in its present form. I am speaking merely for the purpose of reserving the right to discuss, at some later date during the session, certain perhaps minor issues arising out of the Geneva situation, when one of the Geneva estimates is brought up for consideration. The Prime Minister has promised us that an opportunity for such discussion will be afforded on that occasion.

Of course we are all pacifists in this country; we all must and will endeavour to support in the future all efforts of the league to mediate and conciliate between conflicting national interests in the hope of establishing and maintaining peace. The preservation and maintenance of peace was the primary object which the nations had in view in establishing the League of Nations, but now there is another phase of the question to consider when we are face to face with the problem of imposing economic sanctions upon a nation which refuses to comply with the findings of the council of the league. We now see that the league, originally conceived as an agency for the preservation of peace, by having imposed certain sanctions as I think we were bound to do, may nevertheless become an instrument or means for precipitating a great war.

The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) made some sarcastic reference to the fact that Great Britain did not take any active measures to impose sanctions at the time of the Japanese-Chinese controversy. It is not always possible to disclose the real reasons for declining to intervene in a contingency such as that which then arose. I know that when I returned from Geneva, as one of the Canadian delegates to the League of Nations, I was denounced on every platform from the Atlantic to the Pacific by reason of some pacific words which I had expressed at Geneva at the time of the Japanese-Chinese controversy. I say now, however, that from the information I had received I was convinced at that time that conditions on the Pacific were such that the imposition of sanctions against Japan might and probably would have led to a naval conflict in the northern Pacific in which, for a time at least, the British flag might have been driven from the north Pacific ocean. That, at least, was the possibility that Great Britain and the British dominions were face to face with at that time.

So, though we may be in favour of sanctions and the interposition of sanctions at the present time, we must remember that the exercise of the coercive power of sanctions in order to impose the will of league members upon a recalcitrant state or recalcitrant states may and probably will result in warlike preparations for defence and for a defensive offence. In a conflict between great nations, as the late war disclosed, suffering and death by shot, shell and gas are no more deplorable, in the minds of those who suffer from sanctions, than suffering and death resulting from starvation. A first class power, under present world conditions, before hostile embargoes and sanctions can complete their work, may prefer to resort to offensive military and naval action in the hope of ensuring its own political survival.

I am not contending now that the interposition of sanctions against an aggressor is not necessary at the present time, or that such imposition may not be necessary in the future, but I do suggest that our government and our people, when deciding to impose sanctions, should not conceal from the public view, but should frankly disclose the fact that sanctions are not wholly pacific measures, and that governments which resort to sanctions may be compelled to prepare for war. The war which is induced by the imposition of sanctions for the purpose of coercing an aggressor state into subjection to the will of other states may be a just and righteous war. I am disposed to think that if war should ensue from the conditions which now prevail between Ethiopia and Italy, that war on the part of the members of the league would be a just and righteous one. Nevertheless such a war, though just and righteous, will entail suffering, death and widespread destruction of property. But Canada, as a member of the league, bound by the covenant of the league, must face such possibilities. Therefore I trust that the peace loving people and the peace societies of Canada will not be blinded to the stern realities of the present international situation.

Sometimes it has seemed to me, particularly in recent months, that our peace societies which were formed for the preservation of peace have diverted their energies from their original aims and are devoting them at the present time to devising measures for the punishment of an aggressor, even at the cost of war on a great scale. Certainly pacifists in this country should assist in every way for conciliation and mediation before resorting to the extremity of war. But if it should now appear that the imposition of economic sanctions against Italy precludes the success of Italy in the Ethiopian field I think we should envisage the possibility, if not the probability of the executive head of the Italian nation precipitating a death struggle by striking suddenly in the Mediterranean with his aerial and naval forces. The British government have certainly taken cognizance of the actual conditions and are providing for security against that possible action. As that question may be discussed in parliament at greater length on the estimates, I wish to reserve the right to discuss it at that time rather than enter upon any detailed discussion at present.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope that, if there are other hon. members who wish to speak on this resolution, they will avail themselves of the opportunity at once, because I propose at the end of my very few remarks to move the adjournment of this debate. I intend to do so for the reason just given by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) for not pursuing his discussion further. I mentioned a week ago, I think it was, that the time which I thought would be most appropriate for the house to discuss any phases of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict and other matters related to the League of Nations would be when we have before us in committee of the whole the several items dealing with the League of Nations. I would prefer not to anticipate what I may wish to say with reference to matters that may then be discussed, by taking up time now in debating further this resolution.

I hope the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) will not mind my saying that I think his resolution would have been better drafted if he had not attempted to embody within its provisions as much as he has. I agree with hon. members who have spoken, some members of his own group, when they said that the resolution as framed is a bit confusing; it is, I think, in some particulars inconsistent. At any rate, it does not afford us an opportunity to discuss the real issues either as respects the present position of the league or the imposition of sanctions. These may, as I have said, be better discussed when we come to deal in committee of supply with items pertaining to the League of Nations.

However, I do not wish to let this occasion go by without joining with my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in deploring the speech which was made at montreal on Saturday evening last by the Italian Consul General. I think that speech was very ill-advised, and in the circumstances quite improper. I would say that a discussion of the policy of Canada by a representative of a foreign government is not in accord with the established rules and conventions of international intercourse. It would constitute an attempt to influence opinion against a policy adopted by the government of Canada. It is true that the rules regarding consuls are not as strict as in the case of diplomatic officers, and the present situation might, I suggest, be considered as being in the nature of a serious error of judgment rather than a violation of international practice. In the light of existing conditions in other parts of the world we might well take that view of the matter at the moment. But if an incident of the kind should occur again the government would certainly have no option but to make immediate representations to the government of the country concerned with respect to what was said by its representative in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In that connection might I ask the Prime Minister if the interests of naturalized Canadian citizens could be protected, that there should be no intimidation of Italians resident in this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly the government would not permit intimidation of any residents of this country if it is at all within its power to prevent such, and I imagine it has ample powers to that end.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the debate was adjourned.

FARM IMPLEMENTS

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO HIGH PRICES WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO INCREASES FOR 1936

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Lake Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, an immediate inquiry should be made under the provisions of the Research Council Act, chapter 177, R.S.C., 1927, or by other means into the causes underlying the high price of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices for the year 1936.

He said: In moving this resolution I do so in the interests of what I think all hon. members of the house admit to be the great basic industry of agriculture. Anything that affects the welfare of that industry affects the well-being of all the people of this country. The resolution speaks for itself. There has been a sharp increase in the price of those implements that farmers have to use. We all know that nearly fifty per cent of the people of Canada live in the rural sections. Until very recently more than fifty per cent of our people resided in the rural districts; the census returns of 1921 indicated that fact. Ten years later at the time of the census of 1931 a change had taken place and over three quarters of a million more people resided in urban centres than in the rural districts. Even to-day in this country we hear some talk about bringing more people into Canada, and inducing people now resident in urban centres to return to the land. The figures I have given indicate that in recent years the trend has been not back to but away from the land.

Our friends in this country who manufacture farm implements and machinery claim that they are not making money, and if we look at their annual statements we may be convinced that in recent years they have not been making money. Why have they not? To my mind there is just one reason, a very simple one, and that is that the farmers have not been purchasing the products of these factories. And the reason they have not is the very good one that the farmer has not the wherewithal to buy them. I have in my hand a bulletin issued by the bureau of statistics in 1934 dealing with this matter. In table No. 1 on page 2 of the bulletin we find statistics of farm implement and machinery industries in Canada. The figures are given for the years 1920 to 1934, both inclusive. Time will not permit me to give the list in detail, so I shall content myself by giving the figures for the years 1929, the peak year, and 1934. The following table will serve to show a comparison between these two years:

Year	No. of plants	Capital employed	Average number of employees	Salaries and wages	Cost of materials at works	Selling value of products at works	Value added by manufacturing
1929	62	103,356,773	11,408	$14,775,889	$19,016,981	$40,659,479	$21,642,498
1934	35	55,742,696	3,706	3,776,918	3,632,821	8,817,756	5,184,935

In taking the year 1934 I have not taken the one with the smallest output. The years 1932 and 1933 will show a greater shrinkage than does 1934, because in that year there was an increase over the two preceding years. The figures in another table before me are illuminating, because they give the apparent consumption of farm implements and machinery in Canada. Again taking the years 1929 and 1934, the figures are:

Year	Production of the farm implement and machinery industry (selling value at works)	Imports	Exports and re-exports	Apparent consumption
1934..	8,817,756	3,204,029	3,351,220	8,670,565

These figures are sufficient indication as to why we have unemployment in this country, why machinery companies are not making money and farmers are hard up. I believe these figures give the whole story in connection with the manufacturing of farm implements. Why have not the farmers been purchasing? To answer this question we turn to certain information appearing in a bulletin on agricultural statistics for March, 1932, issued by the bureau of statistics. We find that the estimated gross annual agricultural revenue of Canada for 1925 was $1,709,815,000; in 1926 it was $1,714,477,000; in 1927, the peak year so far as agricultural production is concerned, it was $1,825,950,000. In 1929 there was a drop to $1,631,081,000; in 1930 there was a further shrinkage to $1,235,319,000; in 1931 the amount had shrunk to $839,881,000, and in 1932 to $766,794,000, or a little less than one-half of the peak year. In 1933 it had risen to $802,946,000, and in 1934 there was a further increase to $931,347,000.

These figures indicate clearly why farmers have not been buying and why machinery manufacturing concerns have not been selling their products. The question as to the price of farm implements is an old one. I find that in January, 1911, the then hon. member for Portage la Prairie, Mr. Meighen, moved the following resolution as it appears at page 1915 of Hansard for that year:

> That, in the opinion of this house, a substantial reduction in the import duties on agricultural implements is now due the agriculturists of Canada, and is in just accord with the true ends of a protective tariff.

My reasons for referring to this resolution are that the then hon. member for Portage la Prairie at a time twenty-five years ago felt it incumbent upon him, as the representative of a rural constituency, to bring this matter to the attention of the house. At that time the price of agricultural implements in Canada was just about one-half of what it is to-day, while prices of commodities the farmer has to sell were higher than they are at present. Is there any reason why these implement companies are not able to sell the products of their factories? How can farmers buy when, although what they have to sell has not increased in price, prices of the machinery he must buy to cultivate his farm and harvest his crops have almost doubled. Speaking to his resolution the then hon. member for Portage la Prairie said this:

> I call the attention of the house to the present conditions with regard to agricultural implements. I have chosen this field not because there is nothing else that could be the subject for attack, but because observation has shown me that a very strong argument can be made in that field and because also, it seems to me, a better purpose can be served by a clear cut and definite discussion of one class of business rather than by a rambling one over the whole field of our tariff list.

That was the hon. member's idea at that time. To-day if we are going to solve the problem we shall have to take account of some of the other matters referred to in that statement. The high price of farm implements is not going to be met by considering high prices alone. Other matters will have to be looked into. In those days, Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, the price of farm implements in Canada was just about one-half of to-day's price, and still we have this increase. When I decided to place my resolution on the order paper I wrote to the different machine companies asking for their price lists and I have them before me. I intend to give the house the changes that have taken place in prices during the last few years. In some cases the prices that have been given me are only for the years 1935 and 1936.

First I will give the prices of the Cockshutt Plow Company. As most hon. members know, the Cockshutt Plow Company builds a complete line of farm machinery, and I have under my hand their prices on four machines that are used on every farm in Canada. The prices that I am now going to quote are given me as being applicable to the Winnipeg district.

The price of a Cockshutt Plow Company eight-foot binder with pole truck and four-horse trees—that means fully complete, with everything ready to hitch on to—was in 1930, $275. In 1934 there was a drop in price. It is very significant, and I hope hon. members will note it. While the price in 1930 was $275, the price in 1934 was $261; in 1935, the same price, $261, while this year, 1936, the price has advanced to $278, or an increase over last year of $17 for that machine.

I take next their 24-run double disc drill. The price in 1930 was $308; in 1934, $291; in 1935, $291; and for this year, 1936, $305, or an increase of $14.

Their eight-foot tractor disc harrow was sold in 1930 for $126; in 1934 the price was $115; in 1935, $115; in 1936, $118, or a slight increase amounting to three dollars.

Their 28-inch Jewel gang plough sold in 1930 for $152; in 1934 the price was $137; in 1935, $137; in 1936, $140, or an increase of three dollars.

Now I will give the prices of the Massey-Harris Company, and I might say that they have given me prices only for the years 1935 and 1936. The same eight-foot binder for which I have given the price of the Cockshutt Plow Company was sold by the Massey-Harris Company in 1935 for $278.50, and in 1936 for $291, or an advance of $12.50.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that for the Winnipeg district?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): The Regina district. The Massey-Harris Company's 24-run double disc drill sold in 1935 for $301, and in 1936 for $315, an increase of $14.

Their tandem disc harrow, (14-disc out-throw and 16-disc in-throw) sold in 1935 for $129, and in 1936 for $131, an increase of $2.

There is no change in the price of their 14-inch two-furrow gang plough, the price being $145.50 for 1935 and 1936.

Now I will give the prices of the International Harvester Company of Canada, Limited, and I think these prices are for the Winnipeg district as well. Their eight-foot binder sold in 1935 for $263, and in 1936 for $281, or an increase of $18.

Their 24 double disc drill sold in 1935 for $284, and in 1936 for $298, or an increase of $14.

Their 16/16 horse tandem disc harrow sold in 1935 for $137 and in 1936 for $142, or an increase of $5.

There was no change in the price of their 14-inch gang plough, the price being $133.50 in both years.

Then there is the question of parts for a tractor that is admitted free, but that has been dealt with, and the other evening the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) gave a ruling which partly meets the case.

While the price changes that I have quoted may not strike hon. members as being tremendous, when one takes into consideration the high prices at which these machines were sold even before the increase this year, and what these high prices must mean to those farmers in Canada who have not been able to purchase implements at all during the last number of years, I think hon. gentlemen will agree that the increase is material.

Again, Mr. Speaker, if the machine companies expect to do more business, sell more machines, how are they going to do this with an advance in price? It strikes me that the only way by which a machine company can expect to make more money is by reducing their prices and increasing their volume. If a farmer could not buy a binder last year at the price then quoted, how is he going to buy one this year when the price has been increased? It is a well known fact that western Canada, in particular Saskatchewan, is almost bankrupt of farm implements. For the last number of years we have not been able to secure crops and our farmers have been patching up their old machines trying to get along as best they can. I wonder if that is the reason why the machine companies are advancing their prices. I would not want to think it was.

Mr. SENN: May I ask the hon. member when these recent price increases became effective?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): I have given the house the figures sent to me by the machine companies themselves from their head offices at Brantford, Toronto and Hamilton, and I do not think they give the particular dates these prices became effective, but they take effect this year. I have taken the matter up with some of the local agents and they have advised me that these are the prices for this year.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): When the house rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to point out why farmers had not been buying implements and why the machine companies had not been making profits in recent years. I pointed to the loss in production by the agriculturists of Canada during the last number of years and also to the shrinkage in sales of farm implements. I wish now to call attention to another bulletin issued by the bureau of statistics, bulletin No. 33. In that return we are informed that those of our people who are engaged in manufacturing plants in this country earn an average of $1,038 a year while those engaged in agriculture have an income of $319, or just about one-third. I suggest that our farm implement manufacturing friends are not going to make very much money while that condition continues.

On Saturday last I clipped from a newspaper a dispatch from Brantford, Ontario. It reads:

> Sales of Cockshutt Plow Company Limited rose 42 per cent last year over the 1934 business, though still below 1929 and 1930, Colonel H. Cockshutt, chairman of the board, reported yesterday to the annual shareholders' meeting. Prospects for this year, he said, were optimistic.

I think Mr. Cockshutt has not been travelling through the western provinces to any great extent when he makes that conjecture. Those who are acquainted with conditions in the prairie sections of Canada know that the reason the farmers have not been buying implements during the last four or five years is, as I stated before the dinner recess, that they lack the purchasing power, and that purchasing power has not been increased in recent months. I am afraid Mr. Cockshutt will be disappointed if he expects to increase the volume of his output very materially this year.

With regard to the whole matter I would say this: People engaged in agriculture in the part of the country from which I come are not now asking nor have they ever asked for protection as a permanent policy. What the people of my province feel is that they have been subjected to a tax through the tariff and have been called upon to pay tribute to the manufacturers of eastern Canada; and they are not to-day, even though the price of wheat be pegged, asking for protection as a permanent policy. There are those in the section from which I come who feel that ever since 1878, when the old national policy was introduced in Canada, agriculture has been called upon to pay tribute through the customs tariff. When a resolution was brought forward twenty-five years ago by the member then representing Portage la Prairie the duty on farm implements was twenty per cent, while the price of these implements, as I have already indicated, was just about half what we are asked to pay to-day. As hon. members who were in the house at the time will recall, in 1924 the government of that day reduced the duties on farm implements to a material extent. On the major portion of implements and machines used in western Canada and in other parts of the country the duties were reduced from 17½ to six and ten per cent. There was in the price to the farmer some slight reduction, but not a corresponding one, not one to equal the reduction in the customs tariff.

Then we come to 1930, when there was a change of government, and the duty on this class of machinery was increased from six and ten per cent to twenty-five per cent, with the result that prices of farm implements were reduced by these same machine companies. That was pleasing to some hon. gentlemen opposite, but I suggest to them as to all hon. members that that does not solve the problem. These reductions were made following the increase in tariff in 1930. On the first of January this year Canada put through a trade treaty with the United States and these duties were reduced by fifty per cent; that is to say, a reduction in the duties on farm implements from twenty-five to 12½ per cent. But what a surprise it was to the farmers of western Canada to learn that these machine companies, instead of passing on the benefit to the farmer, were increasing the prices of machines. I learned of this just before leaving home to come to Ottawa, and when I was passing through Winnipeg I attended a motor show that was being held in that city. While strolling through the building I noticed certain signs which were headed with these words:

Price reductions because of Canada-U.S. trade treaty.

I went to the trouble of taking down some of these price reductions on motor cars, because it is a fact well known to all of us that farm implements, generally speaking, are made from steel and iron and materials of that kind, as are motor cars. The machine companies give as a reason for the increase in the price of farm implements the increase in labour cost and the increase in material cost. Well, if this applies to the farm implement people, surely it must also apply to the motor car people. But we find that while the farm implement manufacturers are raising their prices the motor car people are able to announce their reductions by reason, as they state, of the Canada-United States trade treaty. On seven different types of Nash cars the reductions ranged from $165 on a three passenger coupe to $212 on a six passenger sedan, very material reductions; and on three higher priced cars of the same make the reductions were $240, $261 and $368. On nine low priced Lafayette cars the reductions ranged from $116 to $181. I suggest that this in itself gives me or any other member sufficient ground for bringing the matter to the attention of the house. The motor car manufacturers can reduce their prices, and the class of people who are buying motor cars are in a better position to pay higher prices than are the farmers of western Canada who have been without crops for a number of years past.

Is it worth while to do something to assist agriculture? There are those in the country and probably some in this house who think that we are over-producing; that there is too great a production, and that probably it would not be a bad thing to let the farmer become hard up and in that way curtail production. I do not subscribe to that policy. I rather feel that there is not over-production but under-consumption in this country, and the reason we have under-consumption is because the great masses of the people of not only Canada but other parts of the world lack purchasing power.

I noticed an article in the Montreal Standard a week ago. It is headed thus:

Billion Dollars' Worth of Food. This Extra Amount Required for Stamina of Britons—

And so on. The article reads:

Ottawa, February 15—
Canadian farmers may be intrigued by the possibilities of prosperity which might arise from increased demand for their products if the people of Great Britain attained the standard of living which Sir John Orr thinks they ought to enjoy.

The article continues:

Addressing the British Association of Science, Sir John said he thought the food budget of British families should be £200,000,000 greater than it is. Then the consumption of food would only be on proper scale needed to maintain the stamina of the race—

And so on. If that is only twenty-five per cent true there is a potential market there for Canadian farm products. I will quote another authority, one known, I think, to many hon. members of this house, Doctor Harold G. Moulton, President of the Brookings Institution of the United States. Doctor Moulton has this to say:

> A seventy-five per cent increase in production would be necessary in order to supply the entire population with the goods which the Department of Agriculture considers essential to a "reasonable" standard of living.
> The obvious conclusion to be drawn at this point would be that American consumption is potentially enormous, that American production is potentially much larger than actual production has ever been, and that the defect in the system lies in the element which connects the two to each other—the element of purchasing power. If the great mass of the population has incomes too small to enable it to buy what it wants and if an infinitesimal minority has incomes larger than it can spend, then consumption will be less than it could be and production also less.

Doctor Moulton continues:

> To attain the standards of living desired by the American people the national output of goods and services must, as our earlier statistical studies of production and income prove, be greatly increased.

I should like, if time would permit, to continue that quotation to the end, but I see that my time is drawing to a close. To conclude: Part of that quotation reads thus:

> Year in and year out, production has not been in excess of consumption; even during the period of the twenties when production was it its peak, there was no large accumulation of unsold inventories but, on the contrary, a frequently remarked growth of hand-to-mouth buying, with merchandising stocks kept at a low ponit. So-called overproduction made its appearance, as always, in the ensuing depression when consumption fell off faster than production could be curtailed. But production, even then, soon conformed to a diminished demand, and there was a balance on a plane of lower living standards.

That is Doctor Moulton's opinion, and I think it is a sound one. But with regard to all this, the farmers of this and other countries who have been living under a policy similar to ours find themselves ground between the millstones of drastically lower prices for what they have to sell and of higher prices for their implements which are, after all, the raw material which they must have if they are to carry on their work. The farmer is forced to buy in a protected market while forced to sell in the open markets of the world, competing against all comers. This situation to my mind is wrong: it is deserving of the best attention and consideration of all hon. members.

I should like to bring many other matters to the attention of the house, but I see that my time is up. Let me in conclusion, as one Canadian to others, solicit the support of every hon. member and the employment of his best thought to bear upon the solution of this problem. I wish I could get the support of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) who now leads the official opposition in this house. With all his ability and his capacity for effort, with all his driving force that secures results, I am sure that if we could only get him on the right track to start with we should find the solution of this problem. I know that this matter will receive the earnest consideration of hon. members, and I hope that if a solution is to be found we shall bend our efforts towards getting it at an early date. To-day the western farmer is in such a position that he is bankrupt of machinery. It is not in the best interests of this country, no matter in what part of it we live, that such a situation should continue any longer.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): If we take the price level of 1926 as equalling 100, the price level of farm products in 1913 stood at 64, and the price level of manufactured products at 64·8. In 1935 the price level of farm products stood at 63·4, or just slightly below the level of 1913, and the price level of manufactured products at 73·3. Manufactured products were therefore 15·6 per cent above the level of farm products in 1935. If we turn to agricultural implements—and I quote now from figures presented by the agricultural implement companies before the price spreads committee—we find that the average price level of nine implements produced by the Massey-Harris Company stood at $86.39 in 1913 and in 1930 it stood at $130, or an increase in that period of fifty per cent. While the price level of implements is fifty per cent above what it was in 1913, that of farm products remains almost exactly the same.

Mr. SENN: Would the hon. gentleman also give the amounts of profit made by the companies?

Mr. DEACHMAN: My hon. friend will have to wait for that. I cannot give it all in one sentence.

Mr. SENN: I have it before me.

Mr. DEACHMAN: We will come to that later. This means that the farmer who in 1913 laid down $100 worth of goods for farm implements must now lay down $150 of his products for the same farm implements; and as the price level is the same it means that whereas in 1913 he laid down one hundred units of goods for a machine, he must now lay down one hundred and fifty units of goods for the same machine.

It is very interesting to take the figures showing how this amount of $130 is made up. There was $42.08 of raw material and $6.33 worth of direct factory labour. Those two, amounting to a total of $48.41, were transposed into an agricultural implement which sold for $130 to the farmer in Regina. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to that particular item. We have had during the past few years a tariff of twenty-five per cent on agricultural implements. Raw materials and labour combined in this particular example cost $48.41. Twenty-five per cent on an implement costing $130 would be $32.50, so that the tariff imposed by the previous government amounted to almost seventy per cent of the value of the raw material and direct factory labour going into the implement, and now the tariff would amount to nearly thirty-five per cent of the raw material and labour cost. In addition there was $20.92 for agent's commission, $16.58 for freight, $26.42 for other factory expenses, and gross profit before selling expenses, $17.67.

I should like to direct attention to the increase in these items which took place between 1913 and 1934. The agent's commission increased by $10.98, which was 101 per cent above the agent's commission in 1913. Freight cost thirty-four per cent more; materials cost sixty-four per cent more; labour cost twenty-seven per cent more and other factory expenses, largely overhead, increased by 246 per cent over 1913. If you will note these figures you will see that labour was not getting an excessive amount out of the cost. The increase in the cost of labour, the direct factory wages, amounted to only twenty-seven per cent, while nearly all the other items entering into the cost were almost doubled, so that as far as factory wages were concerned it does not seem that the tariff of twenty-five per cent was of any particular benefit, though it may have helped to keep up the price of the implements.

Now I come to the question which has been raised by my hon. friend. Of this increased cost $43.61 is added to the price of the implement and the balance, $8.21, is taken out of the gross profit of the manufacturer. Management, pensions, selling costs, collection expenses, bad debts, depreciation, experiments and other general expenses on this list of implements would amount to approximately $50, which sum has to be paid out of the $17.67 gross profit of the manufacturers. Clearly they are not making money; I quite agree with that, but there is a reason why they are not making money and to that I now wish to direct attention. The ability of the farmer to buy has been destroyed, and as a result the farmer is no longer able to buy agricultural implements. It follows, naturally, that we are driving capital and labour out of the production of agricultural implements and into the production of other commodities which have a broader field and a wider market, and the inevitable tendency of this policy, if continued, must be to make things cost more and more as far as the farmer is concerned. With that, possibly, there is a tendency also to bring down the prices of other products which are bought by the wealthier classes of the community. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when the farmer has reached the position where he must pay fifty per cent more for the articles he buys than he paid in 1913, we have before us a problem which requires the most careful study, thought and attention. We cannot build an industry in this country upon a decadent agriculture; the history of the agricultural implement business in Canada is ample proof of that statement.

I now come to the question of what constitutes the remedy. I admit that this is perhaps a more difficult problem in connection with agriculture than in connection with any other single item confronting the house to-day, for the simple reason that this process has gone on for a long time. We have built up this situation by what might be considered fifty years of mistaken economic policy. I know it was intensified in 1930. I do not want to make a political issue out of this matter, but it was intensified in 1930 because the government of that day held that it was essential, in order to preserve the integrity of the nation, that we should raise the tariff on all the products the farmer had to buy. But, Mr. Speaker, if the integrity of the nation had to be preserved by that process I ask this house what is to happen to the integrity of agriculture and what is to follow if, in the years to come, we continue on the basis upon which we are building now, day by day destroying farm purchasing power in every possible way and still expecting that we should live on the natural resources of the country? I tell you it cannot be done.

What must we do? Well, I think the government have made a small step in the right direction; I think they are moving, but they are moving very slowly. I believe, as everyone in the house must, that there is a tremendous amount of ground to cover if we are going to restore agriculture to the parity which existed in 1929 and 1930 or in 1913.

We have come a long way from that, and we cannot get back by simply cutting little bits off the tariff here and there. We must restore equilibrium between the prices of manufactured goods and the prices of farm products. This cannot be done by any slow, measured process, because the farmer is perishing while we fail to act. Somewhere in a park in France there is a sun-dial on which is carved these words, "It is always later than you think." I place that problem before the government to-day, before those who are on the opposite side physically but with me spiritually. They are in the beginning of their effort; they have made a start. We who think as they do are grateful for that start, but we must go forward steadily and swiftly in the direction in which we have started, or at the end of the next few years we shall find that the farmer's problem still remains unsettled. And if it is not settled by that time we shall have to find some other way of settling it, which way may not be as satisfactory as we would wish.

I believe it is possible to do many of these things. I believe the other nations of the world want trade just as we want it. Trade is a natural human instinct. It starts with a boy when he begins to swap jack-knives at school; it will never end so long as there is business instinct left in man. There is no reason why, with the situation as it is, we may not hope for a steadily expanding market. We have not succeeded in the past, not because there was no market but because we were unwilling to make the necessary move to obtain the market. If we are willing to exchange our products for those of other people I have no doubt that we shall find other nations equally willing to do the same, and in that way we may re-establish the agriculture of the dominion on some such basis as that on which it rested in the old days.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford): Before entering into the debate on this motion, allow me, Mr. Speaker, on this my first opportunity, to congratulate you on the high honour which has been bestowed upon you. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) were in his seat I would take this opportunity of felicitating him on the high honour conferred upon him by being elected to the eminent position of Prime Minister of this dominion. I trust some of his colleagues will deliver this message to him. I further congratulate him on the body of men with whom he has surrounded himself and who now form the cabinet of this country. It was said of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier that he surrounded himself with a cabinet of talents. I hope the present cabinet will prove to be at least equal to and probably greater than that of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

As I rise to speak to this motion I do so not for the purpose of defending or condemning the agricultural implement manufacturing companies. I rise because I am honoured to represent that great industrial centre, the city of Brantford, in which are situated two of the largest farm implement manufacturing companies in the dominion. During the days of prosperity under the former Liberal administration there were employed in those factories approximately three thousand men. Unfortunately, during the last few years the number employed has decreased at times to less than eight hundred. Therefore I feel that I would be recreant to my duty if I did not at this time say a word on behalf of that great band of loyal workers who have struggled honestly for years to turn out the implements which reap the crops of this country. We have heard a great deal of the hardships of the farmer, and far be it from me to belittle them. I know the trials and difficulties of the farmers. But I would remind the house that others also have suffered trials and difficulties. We have heard that a large percentage of the farmers are in virtual bankruptcy. I would remind hon. members that in Brantford approximately one-quarter of the population was not only in virtual bankruptcy but would have been in actual need had it not been for government assistance. In January, 1935, out of a population of about 30,000 there were on actual relief 7,237 people, or approximately twenty-five per cent. This year I am happy to say that that number has decreased to 5,719, but it is still about twenty per cent.

It has been said that in 1929 there was produced in this country about $40,000,000 worth of farm implements. In 1932 that production decreased to about $5,000,000. In 1926 farm implements amounted to 1·18 per cent of the total manufactures of this country, while in 1932 farm implements amounted to only 0·32 per cent of the total. I mention these figures so that hon. members will have some idea of the effect that has had on Brantford. It means that the working men of that city have been out of employment; they have had to struggle to maintain their standing in the community. I bring this matter to the attention of the house in order that we may all realize that Canada must be looked upon as one great country. I do not believe in sectionalism; I do not believe in provincialism. We cannot set the east against the west; we cannot set Ontario and Quebec against the maritime and the western provinces. The farmers must not be set against the manufacturers, or manufacturers against working men or working men against farmers. We must regard these problems as our common problems, and as a united people, not as one class only in the nation, try to solve them.

I should like at this time to clear up some misconceptions. Naturally the farmers buy a considerable number of farm implements. I have in my hand a chart which appeared in the Nor'west Farmer, a journal of very high standing published in western Canada. According to this chart, of the total income the farmer receives he spends only three per cent on farm implements and repairs. Not a very large percentage of his income, hon. members will agree. I also notice that he pays eight per cent of his total gross income for interest, and eight per cent for automobiles. The amount he spends on farm implements and repairs is less, I am safe in saying, than he spends on any other class of goods. So it must be agreed that farm implements are not his major expense.

Then, as has been stated by two former speakers, the implement companies have not made money. I am glad that statement has been made, because there is a feeling abroad—I have met with it from time to time in conversing with members of this house and other people throughout the country—that the implement companies have been making a great deal of money. They have not. During the last five years one company not only has not made any profits but has gone behind $20,000,000. The other company in my constituency has lost all the surplus it had and is in debt to a very large amount. With regard to the investors in those companies, very little has been paid to them. One company did pay dividends to its shareholders in 1928, but at the time it commenced to pay those dividends it was sixty per cent in arrears on its preferred stock, which showed that it had not been making much up to that time. That company paid dividends for two years and for two quarters of 1930, but since then no dividends have been paid. I have heard it said that the deficits of those companies are due to a large extent to bad debts. True, there have been many bad debts, and the debtors of course are the farmers of this country. One company informed me that during the last three years their collections were as follows: In 1933 they collected twelve per cent of their outstanding accounts; in 1934, eighteen per cent and in 1935, sixteen per cent; and it cost them each year to collect those debts fifteen per cent of what they collected. So there cannot be much money in that.

I should like to remind hon. members of certain laws in effect in Canada. For instance, when an implement is sold the company may take a lien on it. The farmer does not pay cash. In the event of non-payment, however, the manufacturer cannot go in and seize the implement, simply because he happens to hold a lien. The law has been changed so that the farm implement manufacturer must go to the commission to obtain its permission to seize the implement. The chances are that the commissioner will say, "Well, let the farmer keep it a little while longer. Let him keep it another year, anyway, and we will see what will happen then."

I would draw hon. members' attention to the fact that if through no fault of his own a farmer does not pay his debts, or cannot pay them, he has some recourse. He may go to a board which has been set up under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and in the event of his owing one of the farm implement companies an amount of, say $800, the chances are that the official on the board will say, "Do not worry about the farm implement company; pay them $200, and call it square." The farm implement company has no recourse. I mention this point to show that the farmer has been receiving some consideration. I do not want to set the farmer against the workingman, but I must remind hon. members that if one of the workers in the factories of Brantford cannot pay his debts he is not protected by a creditors arrangement board. His creditors enter a claim in the courts, and in the event of their obtaining judgment against him they seize all he owns. There is no recourse for the workingman; he has to pay. I sometimes hear it said that the manufacturer wants to beat the farmer, but I do not believe that is right. The manufacturer knows that the farmer is his sole customer.

One of my purposes in rising to-night is to try to instil a better spirit of good will not only between workers and farmers, but among workers, manufacturers and farmers. The statement has been made that prices have increased, and we have been given comparisons between prices of 1911 and those of 1930. I do not intend to meet the argument at length. As a matter of fact I have not a clear recollection of conditions in 1911, but I do know there has been a great change between conditions of those days and those of 1930. Unfortunately the farmer has not benefited to the extent he should have. I know, however, that the city dweller has to pay more for everything he buys, and that the manufacturer of all lines of articles cannot manufacture as cheaply to-day as he could in 1911.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) stated, quite correctly, that since the war prices of automobiles have decreased. The statement is made that to-day we can buy a better automobile for less money, and on the face of it that would seem to be a good answer to the question: Why should not farm implements be in the same class? I would like to remind hon. members, however, that the farm implement business has been in existence for generations, whereas the automobile business started during our generation. Mass production has just developed in the automobile industry, but in the implement industry mass production was at its height before the automobile was invented. For these reasons I would say that the two industries are not comparable. However, if hon. members do wish to make a comparison I would suggest the comparison between the tractor and the automobile. I believe such a comparison will show that to-day the tractor costs just about half, or at any rate considerably less than it did in 1918. Prices of tractors have declined, because in 1918 they were not being turned out in such large quantities as they are to-day.

Certain figures were quoted to which, if I have time, I shall direct my attention in a few minutes. It must be remembered, too, that there have been improvements in farm implements, and that to-day there are certain implements a farmer can buy at the decreased or former price, if he is content to take an obsolete implement, or one that is not quite up to date. Prices of the older types of implements remain where they were, but improvements have been made, and if a farmer wishes to obtain the improved article he must pay more for it. I am informed on reliable authority that to-day the farmer wants the best implements he can buy, and that the manufacturers cannot sell the old style machines because the farmer wants up to date machinery. We cannot blame him for that, because we all feel the same way.

It is true that prices have been increased. I do not deny that between 1911 and 1935 prices were increased, but again I am informed that the implement of to-day is worth considerably more than that of 1911, and if you take into account the repairs which had to be made to the implement of 1911 and compare repair expenditures with what the farmer has to pay to-day, I am advised that the implement sold to-day is a better buy, dollar for dollar, than that of 1911. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that although prices of implements, generally, have gone up a small amount, prices of spare parts have not increased. Prices of spare parts remain as they were.

I shall not go into all the prices quoted by the hon. member for Lake Centre, but if hon. members followed them they would know that in no instance is the price for 1936 greater than it was in 1930. True, there is a slight increase over 1935, but the 1930 price in practically every case was higher than that of 1936. If you take the 1936 price and compare it with that of 1935 you find that the increase by percentage has not been very great. As a matter of fact if one were to take the trouble to figure it out he would find that it comes to only approximately three per cent, while in some instances there has been no increase. I think hon. members will agree that three per cent is not very great.

I suggest that we are not tackling this problem in the proper manner. Again I wish to express my sympathy for the farmer. There are farmers in my constituency, and I should like to see them buy their implements as cheaply as possible. On the other hand there are thousands of working men in that constituency, and I want to see them employed at fair rates of wages. I do not think the time of hon. members should be spent in costly investigation. Last year the farm implement industry was investigated very thoroughly and carefully by the experts of the price spreads commission. They went into every phase of the industry. Is it the desire of the house that in order to investigate this industry we should again spend thousands of dollars of the public money and also have the implement companies spend thousands of dollars of their money? I do not think we should go about the matter in that way. As the increases have been only three per cent, I think we should devise ways and means of obtaining for the farmer a better price for his products so that he will have money with which to buy the necessary implements.

It is my intention to support the treaty between the United States and Canada because I feel that it will put more money into the hands of the purchasing public. In conclusion, let me say again that I trust the house will not decide to spend thousands of dollars to investigate this industry, but will devote its attention to getting more money for the products produced by the farmers so that the working men in Brantford may obtain a fair wage for the work they do and implements may be sold to the farmers at a reasonable price.

Mr. POOLE: Does the hon. member know what wages were paid in 1911 in the production of a binder, and the wages paid in 1936 for the same work?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. friend the correct figures. However I can say on very good authority that the working man is getting more money to-day than he did in 1911. Of course, I am not satisfied with the amount he is getting and I hope he will get even more when conditions return to normal.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, judging from the remarks of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) I should imagine that a number of hon. members from western Canada will have something to say in respect to this resolution and in reply to the hon. member. I do not propose to take more than a very few minutes in making my remarks. I am behind this resolution one hundred per cent. I think an investigation should be held with respect to the prices of agricultural implements, especially in view of what has happened during the last two months. If there is a nigger in the wood-pile we should endeavour to find out where he is and how he got there.

Mr. EULER: And who he is.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): A study of the tariff is somewhat confusing. During the last four or five years many views have been advanced in the house in connection with the tariff. In the last parliament there were some free-traders and there were some high protectionists. The effects of changes in the tariff upon trade and the price of commodities are very confusing. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) was very fair in most of what he said. He quoted prices of implements in 1930, 1934, 1935 and 1936. He referred to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and to a resolution which he proposed in the house when he was member for Portage la Prairie in 1911. I think he should have developed further the policy of that right hon. gentleman and told the house what had happened when the latter was Prime Minister from 1919 to 1921. During that time a change occurred in the tariff on agricultural implements. I think it is within the memory of some hon. members that at that time tractors, tractor parts and certain other agricultural implements were put on the free list. In those days there were some twenty concerns producing tractors or tractor parts in Canada. We all know what happened. Prices went up and the industry was destroyed. To-day there is not in this country one concern manufacturing complete tractors or tractor parts.

The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted prices that he had received from the Cockshutt Plow Company, the International Harvester Company and the Massey-Harris Company on binders, drills, disc harrows and gang ploughs. These prices showed that a decrease had occurred in the period from 1930 to 1934 while there had been increases from 1935 to 1936. I also received prices from the Massey-Harris Company and the Cockshutt Plow Company. These prices show increases, but I do not think the reasons given by the companies for these increases are justifiable. We should have an investigation. I expect that a number of hon. members opposite who came from western Canada will support the resolution of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I should imagine that the members from Manitoba particularly will have something to say. I have in my hand an article which appeared in the western press dated Winnipeg, February 27. This reads:

> Urges Protest on Machinery Price Boosts
> The Manitoba government was charged Wednesday to consult with the dominion administration with a view to bringing the price of agricultural machinery down "to what they were under the Bennett régime."
> Quoting from price lists to show that the cost of farm implements was substantially increased this month, A. R. Welch (Conservative, Turtle Mountain) said in the provincial legislature it was the duty of Premier Bracken to press upon Ottawa the need of a twenty per cent reduction in prices.
> Douglas Campbell, Progressive member for Lakeside, also complained of higher prices for farm machinery. He stated that the Canadian-American trade agreement had resulted in lower prices for live stock and higher prices for farm machinery.

It is very interesting to know that the Manitoba government is being asked to have prices brought down to what they were under the régime of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I think western members would be wise to support this resolution. I agree with hon. members who have spoken already when they say that the farmers should have an equal opportunity. The hon. member for Lake Centre has said that he should not have to pay tribute because of the tariff or anything else.

I should like to refer to some of the figures quoted by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman). I think the hon. member was a little unfair when he took the 1926 figures as his index and then made a comparison between 1913 and 1934. I have before me a list of prices prepared by the Dominion

Bureau of Statistics ranging from 1913 to 1934. These show that it is not fair to use the 1926 figures as an index and then compare 1913 prices with those of 1934. In 1913 we had practically the lowest prices on agricultural implements that we have had in the last twenty-five or thirty years. I think it would have been fairer if the hon. member had made a comparison between 1913 and 1924, which was the peak year. During that period, particularly from 1919 to 1924, we had the lowest rate of tariff. As the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) pointed out, the tariff had been reduced from twenty per cent to six and ten per cent, and it was during the period from 1919 to 1924, when we had the lowest rates, that we had the peak in prices, in 1924.

Coming to the period from 1930 to 1934, we had a reduction in prices. Those who were in the house in 1930 will remember that in that year there was a change in the tariff; increased protection was given to Canadian industries; the Prime Minister of that day made an agreement with the manufacturers that there should be no increase in price, and there was not; as the hon. member said, there was a reduction. Then we have the price in 1936 as compared with the price in 1935, a considerable increase; it ranges from $2 to $40 on some implements. I cannot see any justification for it, and it must surely be a great shock to the hon. member for North Huron, for he was out in the west in January telling the people what a wonderful deal had been made in the Canada-United States trade agreement in so far as farm implements were concerned, and what the farmers might expect. It must have been a rude shock to all western members to see the price list issued on the first of February showing a considerable increase in the prices that then went into effect.

I do not think it is necessary to take up much more time. I am very much interested in this resolution. I hope it will carry and that the government will appoint a commission or a committee to investigate the matter thoroughly. I trust that western Canada will be well represented by legal talent on such a commission or, if it be a committee of the house, by members from the west, and that every opportunity will be given to inquire into the whole subject with a view to ascertaining the cause of the increase.

The farmers of western Canada are certainly very much upset, for they expected a reduction in price this year. As the hon. member pointed out, much of the farm machinery in the west is worn out. Conditions during the last five years have been such as to compel the farmer to use his old machines and have repairs made to keep them going. But that old machinery is practically worn out and in the next year or two a good deal of new machinery will have to be purchased if the farmers are to carry on their operations with any degree of success. I do hope that this resolution will receive due consideration and that there will be a full investigation.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In supporting the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) on his resolution, I speak as a farmer of some twenty-five or twenty-six years' experience; farming has been my business all my life. I can assure the house that there was never a time in the history of the west when farm implements were of more importance to the farmer there than they are to-day. Year by year the growing of grain is becoming more mechanized in western Canada. There are many people who advocate the splitting up of lands in the west into smaller farms. In the wheat growing section the trend has been towards larger instead of smaller farms and towards larger instead of smaller machinery. There are certain parts, marginal lands, rolling, hilly or stony lands, where pasture is usually good and where increasingly we shall go into the live stock industry. But on the great plains known as the bald-headed prairie, wheat will be grown for many years to come, and it will be grown by the farmers on a large scale.

The people of western Canada are very much interested in farm implements and anything that tends to increase prices to them is of vital interest to members of the house from western Canada. Before leaving for Ottawa I heard of the rise in prices of farm implements, and at that time I made a statement to the press in my home city. I have always been in the habit of making and I have always been willing to make in the House of Commons any statement I have made either to the press or in public, and the statement I then made was that if in the face of the reduction in the duty on farm implements from twenty-five to twelve and a half per cent under the trade treaty the manufacturers of farm implements in Canada could raise their prices, then that proved that they did not need a tariff. They have practically told this government that they are a combine, and we know that from the price spreads report, because it was shown in that report that there were only three large implement companies practically controlling the Canadian market in the production of farm implements, these companies being the Massey-Harris Company, the Cockshutt Plow Company and the International Harvester Company. The Cockshutt Plow Company, according to the price spreads report, own and control the fourth company in Canada, the Frost and Wood Company. There were some smaller ones mentioned, but in effect these three companies control the manufacture of farm implements in Canada; and from the prices quoted by my hon. friend from Lake Centre we can see that that fairly well follows through in the prices of implements as given. There is very little difference in the price of any one kind of implement as between one company and another in any one place in this country.

Another reason why the farm implement companies do not need a tariff in Canada is that they have always been large exporters of farm implements to other parts of the world. I see my hon. friend the member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) shaking his head. According to the price spreads report, from sixty to eighty per cent of the total sales of the Massey-Harris Company in the last seven years has been export business.

Mr. SENN: But the other two are not exporting in the same way.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I cannot say how much the International exported from Canada, if anything. I know that they import a great many farm implements. But imports and exports of farm implements into Canada and out of Canada in the last few years have been about equal at all times; we have imported about the same amount as we have exported. If any manufacturer in Canada can export into the world market over the top of tariff walls in other countries, give me one sound reason why we should pay a price here—

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Were the tariff walls there when they were exporting? Were the tariff walls on the foreign countries when they were exporting?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Well, they are exporting to the United States.

Mr. SENN: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They were exporting to Europe.

Mr. BENNETT: They have factories in Germany and they have factories in the United States.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They are exporting to the United States now, and always have been.

Mr. BENNETT: What are they exporting to the United States? Well, go on. Excuse me, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Threshing machines or separators for the threshing of grain go into the United States in large quantity. My right hon. friend had a tariff of twenty-five per cent on their coming into Canada. If a man can manufacture goods in Canada and sell them in other countries, surely he should be able to sell them in this country without protection. After all, what are we doing when we are protecting the manufacturer of farm implements in Canada? We are paying part of the shot in the manufacture of an implement to be sold at a lower price to our competitors in other countries. That is what we are doing.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Do you know that for a fact?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): All my hon. friend has to do is to use common sense. He does not need any facts. This is an agricultural country. Surely if our manufacturers are able to ship agricultural implements out of Canada into other countries which have a tariff, or no tariff, where world competition has to be met, they should be able to meet world competition in Canada. Surely that is a reasonable argument.

An hon. MEMBER: Take the tariff off.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And in connection with this tariff—and we have just fought an election largely on it—as a matter of fact back in 1930 my right hon. friend went from one end of this country to the other and told the people at that time that he would put up a tariff to fight for them, to fight their way into the markets of the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Blast.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Well, "blast" was the word used. At any rate he said he would do that. But that was not the main issue in that election. The issue that the people voted upon was that my right hon. friend was going to end unemployment forthwith. But when 1935 came along my right hon. friend had put into effect a very high tariff policy in this country, and the people from one end of Canada to the other had seen the complete failure of that policy. The people engaged in the basic industries from one end of the dominion to the other voted at this election for lower tariffs on all the implements of production and those commodities which have to be purchased by the basic industries of this country. If we are ever to have prosperity again in Canada we must frame our policies in such a way that those basic industries may become prosperous, and when that occurs the secondary industries will also become prosperous.

What does the policy of protection do in this country? The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) says that he does not want to set one section of the country against another or one section of the people against another. Neither do I. But let me say this, that the policy of protection as put into effect by the leader of the opposition came closer to dividing this country than anything that has been done in it since confederation. After all, what are we doing? We have been protecting our secondary industries at the expense of our primary or basic industries. We have been drawing into one small section of Canada the lifeblood of every other section of the country. There is not any doubt about it.

My hon. friend tells us that two of the large implement industries are in one city or town in this part of the country. And every farmer in this province and in every other part of Canada must pay an additional price on that account. The same thing holds true of practically every other industry we have in the country. Follow this out and you will find that the very lifeblood of every part of Canada in all the basic or primary industries is being drained into one small centre where the secondary industries are.

That policy did not bring prosperity to Canada. The only thing that can bring prosperity to Canada is to build up the primary industries. My hon. friend says that the machines of 1911 were not as good as are those of 1935. I will grant him that on many of them there have been some improvements. But I have been farming all that time, and I can say that there is very little difference between the eight-foot binder of 1911 and the eight-foot binder of 1936. As a matter of fact if you set the two down together I think you might find that the 1936 binder was a little easier running but that the 1911 binder had a heavier construction and probably would stand up better than one that is built to-day. Let us consider the prices at that time. Somebody gave the price for 1936. I remember a binder I bought in 1911 for $165; the price must be now around $300. At that time the farmer's produce—wheat, at least—was selling for about the same price as it is to-day. It was sometimes a little higher and sometimes a little lower than the set price we now have.

I might say a word on this set price, too. As a grain grower from western Canada I am sorry that we ever had to come to a point at which it was necessary to set the price of wheat in Canada. I have never believed in that kind of business. The farmers of this country do not want to be subsidized; All they want is to be able to but what they have to buy at world prices and to sell at world prices. The policies that have been put into effect by successive governments in this dominion have been such that finally the farmer has drifted to the level at which the government has had to come to his assistance and set a price for his crops. That I think can be done away with rapidly if this government will follow out the policies on which they were elected. We were elected on lower tariff policies. I commend the government for the move that they have made in the trade treaty with the United States but, like the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman) I say that that is a first step and we must go much further than that.

Since the farm implement people have very plainly stated that they do not need any tariff on farm implements in order to carry on; since they are a combine and will set their prices no matter what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) does with a tariff or treaty, I would suggest that he start out by cutting off the entire tariff on farm implements. In connection with our industries in this country we have been told for many years by our opponents that if a high protection policy were put into effect people would be put to work. Well, no one needs to argue against that any more; we had that proved between 1930 and 1935, when for the first time the people of Canada were given a real taste of a high protection Tory policy. What was their answer? In the three maritime provinces they did not want that kind of policy at all; they wanted lower tariffs. One Conservative out of twenty-six members was returned to this house. In Quebec the Conservatives did not do much better. In Ontario they were up against the greatest losses they have ever had. In Manitoba they got back with one lone man.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the hon. gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Surely.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. gentleman just remarked that in Ontario they—and I presume he meant the Conservative party—were up against the greatest losses they ever had. I can tell the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the question?

Mr. MacNICOL: I just want to correct a statement made by the hon. gentleman. I will ask him to apply his statement to Toronto, Hamilton and London, three cities that benefited very greatly as a result of the tariffs of the Bennett government. They all returned Tories, except two out of the eleven Toronto seats.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is just the little part of Canada about which I have been talking, that has been sucking the life blood out of the rest of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: And a very important part, too.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Too important for the rest of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: It puts up a lot of the taxes of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): After it gathers them from other people. As I said before, this policy of protection as put into effect by my right hon. friend for the first time lost out all along the line. They returned one member from Manitoba and one lone member from Saskatchewan, who I am glad to see is supporting this resolution, and I hope he will support the trade treaty with the United States. Then we come to Alberta. If it had not been for the friendship shown by the Premier of Alberta to the then Prime Minister of Canada not one lone Conservative would have come back from the massacre of the plains of Aberhart.

Mr. STEWART: Would the hon. gentleman let me ask him a question? Was the tariff an issue in Alberta, and, if so, what happened the Liberal party there?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend asks me what happened to the Liberal party there. I will admit that the Liberal party returned only one member from Alberta, but certainly the Conservative party got through with only the then Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: And he was elected by a clear majority.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The effect of third parties in western Canada was more against the then government than against any other party. My hon. friends in the far corner, who say that the people of western Canada are not interested in trade, are lucky that they do not have to go back to the country very soon.

Mr. POOLE: Do not boast; we will beat the two of you.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Oh, I had a social credit candidate running against me, and he lost his deposit.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I heartily endorse the resolution moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston), and I would go further. I hope that without too much investigation, because I do not think it is necessary, and without too much delay the government will take action in connection with this matter. When a combine, a practical monopoly, defies the government of the people of Canada it is high time for the government to teach it a lesson.

Mr. H. W. WINKLER (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a few brief remarks to the resolution before the house, particularly with regard to its effect upon a certain section of rural Canada which lies along the international boundary. I refer particularly to the great drought area of western Canada, where for the past six years there has been a prolonged drought such as has never been witnessed before. This condition has had a disastrous effect upon the population of the west. In the riding which I have the honour to represent there are sections where for six years in succession they have had drought conditions, and you can imagine the plight of those people today. Their houses and farm buildings have depreciated very badly and their live stock is greatly depleted, in spite of the fact that this is a mixed farming area. The situation has become so serious that in the main taxes have been consolidated, which means that the taxes have been put on an instalment basis over a period of years.

In addition to all this, the question of farm implements has become very acute. During the last six or seven years very few farm implements have been purchased by these farmers; very little repairing has been done, due to a lack of finances, and as a result we find most barnyards completely filled with junk. Under the circumstances it will be understood that in connection with the replacement of this machinery these farmers are faced with one of the greatest problems of their lives. So the resolution before the house this evening concerns them very materially. The farmers of this district have a right to know why prices of agricultural machinery have risen, and this resolution seeks to disclose exactly what they want to know.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, representing a western constituency I should like to say a few words on the resolution now before the house, though very little can be added to what has been said already. There is no doubt that the west is very much interested in the increased prices of farm machinery. One hon. member would lead us to believe that the manufacturer of farm implements is in a serious financial condition, with no dividends being paid. There may be some truth in that; therefore there is double need for investigation. Over-capitalization might be found. Reference was also made to the very low percentage of collections in recent years. We from western Canada well understand the reason for that. Another point was that the manufacturer perhaps could not take advantage of the clause in his contract holding the agent liable if the customer did not pay. That has been in effect in many cases in the west. I have had a little experience along that line, and I know it to be a fact that the agent does not get much even when prices are high. We know how frequently agents change in the different communities; they do not last for many years. It is often said that all the manufacturer is looking for is an agent with lots of money and little experience; the manufacturer will soon have his money and he will have the experience. It has worked out in that way in many cases.

I think we are all agreed that in reality there is only one company that we have to deal with. We know that they have a gentleman's agreement among themselves. You never see any price-cutting by the farm implement makers. They work in cooperation one with another. I need not further emphasize the condition of the agricultural producer throughout western Canada at this time.

In regard to the change in prices, I have before me a price list for 1916. I find the cash price of an eight foot binder in the Saskatoon area in that year was $192. In 1926 it was $292.50, and in 1936 it was $291. Compare the prices the farmer was getting for his produce in those years and you will see the sort of deal the farmer gets. A few years ago we know there was an enormous sale of farm implements, especially power implements, tractors and tractor drawn machinery. Where are they to-day? Scores and hundreds of them never turned out last summer because the farmers could not buy the oil and gasoline to run them; so it is back to the horse, and the indication is that we shall soon be back to the oxen, just as we have the cars drawn by horses.

The resolution calls for an investigation. I am strongly in favour of it, if an investigation will amount to anything. The statement has been made that we have had investigations in the past and very little has resulted for the welfare of the agriculturist. I have very little faith in commissions. There needs to be some very drastic action by the government. In other words we must go deeper than mere investigation; there will have to be action. We know that farm equipment in the west is worn out, and one of the biggest problems the farmer is facing this spring is how he is going to put in his seed and take off the crop in the fall, because of the condition of the machinery and his own financial condition. I have been wondering what the pioneers who went out to the frontiers and there set up their shacks and established their homes as well as they could—and some perhaps have never left the township since—would think if they could come down east to the cities that have been mentioned here to-night and see the difference between one class of people and another. I called at quite a number of homes last fall, and again and again I heard this statement. I have produced on this farm sufficient to have paid my debts during these five years of depression had I got a fair return for my produce, but I am worse off than I was five years ago. There needs to be an investigation, but there must be something real behind it to give proper effect to the findings.

Many farmers here no doubt know very well that whether they got $1 a bushel or 50 cents a bushel for wheat, it made very little difference in the final return, because prices were adjusted according to what the farmer received for his produce. Hence you have a rise in prices of farm machinery this year, because last year the farmer had a set price for his grain, and the manufacturers are after it. They think he has a little advantage somewhere. Those are matters that require investigation. Before this session concludes, something may be heard from this corner regarding the just price to the manufacturer and the just price to the producer. If the investigating commission studied those questions they would solve the problem, not only temporarily but for all time. It is the only scientific solution that we know about; it is the only reasonable one—a just price to the producer, a just price to the retailer, a just price all round and then all will be getting the same deal and all will be satisfied.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, we know the condition in which agriculture finds itself in western Canada to-day after many years not only of drought but of low prices. Now we are met with a rise in the cost of farm implements, and I feel that I would not be doing my duty to those who sent me here if I did not say a few words in support of this resolution.

The situation may be put very briefly. We find that in 1928 the income of the farming industry of Canada was $1,501,000,000, or, roughly, one and a half billion dollars. Six years later, in 1934, that income had shrunk to $525,000,000, a reduction of about two-thirds or sixty-six per cent. That is the situation as to the money the farmers were getting for their products. What about the commodities they had to buy. Taking the index figure of one hundred as representing the retail price of articles they had to buy in 1926 we find that in 1929 there had been practically no change, and that the index figure remained at 99·9. By 1934 it had gone down only to 79. In other words, in those five years there had been a reduction in the index figure of retail prices amounting to roughly twenty per cent. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, that during that time, where the farmer had formerly received three dollars of income, he was now getting only one, but in the retail price of articles he had to purchase he had to pay eighty where he formerly paid one hundred.

We find that instead of decreasing, the burden of taxation has increased. Not only has the burden of his private debt not remained the same, but owing to the fall in the value of what he has to sell that burden has increased greatly. Under conditions where he received only one dollar where formerly he received three dollars, the burden of a debt of $100 became three times as heavy. In other words, the burden of debt on the farmers of Canada in those six years has increased by three hundred per cent. That is the situation. There has been an increase in the burden of taxation, a very small reduction in the index prices of their retail purchases, and an increase in the burden of their private indebtedness. That is the situation in a nutshell. Is it any wonder that as one watches the situation, especially, in agricultural western Canada, one sees that slowly but surely those good people are gradually being forced down, down, down to the level of a peasant population? It is the duty of every hon. member—and I do not say this for the purpose of setting the east against the west—to ask himself if he intends to be a party to a slow change that is going to reduce his fellow Canadians to the level of peasants, and a lowly class of peasants at that, when we understand that they have to live in such a state that they cannot educate their children, cannot provide them with proper medical attention and cannot do for their children any of those things which every hon. member would want his fellow Canadians to be able to do.

Since I have come to this House of Commons, statements which have surprised me have been made by hon. members from Ontario. The suggestion is made that Ontario and Quebec are paying the bulk of the taxes. Why is it that Ontario and Quebec are paying the bulk of the taxes in Canada? Is not this the answer: They have the money.

An hon. MEMBER: Where did it come from?

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend asks where it came from. The whole tariff policy, and especially that of the Conservative party, has been designed to benefit the central part of Canada at the expense of the west and the maritimes. The financial policy of this country has been so designed that it causes interest to flow into the head offices of the big financial concerns situated in Ontario and Quebec. If I were a representative from Ontario I would not draw the attention of the people of Canada to the fact that my province was so well off, or that they could pay so much in the way of taxes at a time when the rest of the people cannot get even enough to live on.

That is the situation. As fellow Canadians we say to them that if we were in their position and were able to look after ourselves as well as pay taxes we would be glad to pay the taxes they are paying. I am not forgetting what the rest of Canada has done for Saskatchewan, and especially that section affected by drought. We have appreciated the attitude of sympathy and help extended to us, and that feeling of good will has done a great deal to tighten the bonds which bind confederation. But I ask them to give us not charity but justice. Let us have not, a situation in which they are wealthy and we are poor, shall I say, orphans, but rather one in which we have equal shares in our common patrimony. Does any person suggest that under our present organization there are equal privileges for all and special for none? I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker—and I am sorry I have not the figures in front of me—the state of affairs disclosed in a brief submitted by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to the government of Nova Scotia, wherein it was shown that owing to tariff regulations in one year Saskatchewan alone paid about $28,000,000 more for what it had to buy, $4,000,000 of which went into the pockets of producers in Saskatchewan and $24,000,000 into the pockets of producers in Quebec and Ontario. That happened in one year. The sum of $24,000,000 in increased prices went into the hands largely of private interests and corporations from Saskatchewan alone. And then we have hon. members from Ontario suggesting to us that they should have some special consideration because out of that money which we are pouring into their corporations they pay the bulk of the taxes. That is a situation which I deplore.

In connection with the question of wages, to which a previous speaker referred, may I observe that from 1913 to 1930 the average price of nine Canadian farm implements has increased by roughly $51.82. The surprising fact about the analysis is that of that increase only $1.36 went into wages. I commend that fact to the consideration of the hon. member for Brantford city (Mr. Macdonald). Of the $51.82 increase in price during those twenty years only $1.36 went into wages, and those are actual figures from the price spreads report. The amount going into factory wages in 1913 was $4.97, whereas in 1933 it was $6.38, or an increase of around thirty per cent. What about factory expenses? We find that factory expenses increased from $7.63 to $26.42, or an increase of almost four hundred per cent. That is where a great part of the increased price occurred.

I do not wish to condemn anybody. According to the factories manufacturing farm implements they are making no money. but I must bring this fact to the attention of hon. members: Here is the great basic industry of agriculture getting one dollar where formerly it got three dollars. We find that the burden of debt is weighing too heavily upon the farmer and that, after all year after year, the cream of his crop is taken away. Every hon. member knows that when a man gives one-third of what he produces towards the payment of interest on his private indebtedness, as a great proportion of the farmers of the west have to do to-day, in many cases there is not enough left to look after himself and his family. What hope is there for the thousands of people on the western plains living under those circumstances?

When I speak, Mr. Speaker, I am thinking of the part of this dominion from which I come. According to the census there were 728,000 farmers in Canada who, with their wives and children, made up a total of 5,473,000 of our population. If you are going to say to almost 6,000,000 people in Canada: We are going to put you on a basis where your purchasing power is down by two-thirds, but where you are going to carry the same private debt and where you are going to pay public debts at one hundred cents on the dollar; which means 200 or 300 cents on the dollar; when you consider the appreciation in the value of money; when you consider that the attitude of the preceding government was that we were to follow a policy of sound money and that we were going to drive our people until they paid every cent; when you consider that that is being done at the expense of our own Canadian people, our own flesh and blood on those western plains; and when you consider that it has not been considered wrong for the greatest of nations in the family of nations, namely Great Britain, to do otherwise, then we have cause for reflection.

What did Great Britain do with regard to her war debt? The Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, Prime Minister of England, came over to the United States in 1922, I think it was, and promised formally to pay the large debt which Great Britain owed to that country. What do we find to-day? I think it is three years since Great Britain has paid anything and it is well understood that nothing will be paid on that debt. Of all the nations owing money to the United States, Finland is the only one that has paid as she agreed. The reason given by England for not paying is that she cannot pay. It has been said that England can pay only if the United States will take goods in payment. Do hon. members think Mr. Stanley Baldwin did not know that when he promised that England would pay her debt? I submit that he did know, or that it must be presumed that he knew. If it is all right for Great Britain to say that she cannot pay without ruining her people, it should be all right for the people of Canada to say that there should be an adjustment of private and public debt in order that they shall not be ruined.

There is a sheer necessity for some logical approach to the solving of this great problem of public and private debt which is such a burden upon the people. I submit that it is not enough to say that we will ride out the gale; that somehow we will pull through. The situation in western Canada is very serious. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has just entered the chamber, and I do not believe there is an hon. member who knows better than he conditions in western Canada. He homesteaded there and he knows the privations and hardships that face the western farmer. He knows how unfair it is to deprive any of these men of the fruits of his hard labour of twenty or thirty years. I know that I do not need to appeal to the minister as I believe he has given this question his earnest consideration. I think he is aware that something must be done with regard to the burden of taxation as well as of public and private debt which rests upon the people. Is it fair or equitable that the dollar should be inflated in value to a point where it now takes three times the quantity of basic products to pay a debt contracted five years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: In view of the fact that the hon. member has referred to me, may I say that upon looking at the resolution I find that it has to do with the advance in the prices of farm implements. Might I suggest that we discuss the subject matter of the resolution?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should confine his remarks to the resolution.

Mr. TUCKER: If we are going to deprive the farmer of practically all his money, if it takes all his earnings to pay interest, he can ill afford to pay a higher price for his farm implements. I thought the Minister of Finance would like to be reminded of those days when he pioneered in Saskatchewan, but as he does not want the time of the house taken up with these references I shall come back to the resolution.

The people of Canada elected those whom they thought were the men likely to represent them best in this House of Commons. They hope that their representatives will do the best they can to figure out and solve their problems. During the next year they expect that something definite will be done to lighten their burdens and enable them once more to live the life which we expect ordinary Canadian citizens to live. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) has referred to the fact that these farm implement companies are raising their prices in the face of a reduction in the tariff. The right answer to that kind of action is: If you are in a position to raise your prices despite a lowered tariff, then we will take the tariff off altogether. It has been suspected that an international combine or cartel exists in connection with the marketing of oil and gasoline and perhaps one exists in connection with the manufacturing of farm implements. If it is found that the large manufacturers of the world are getting together to control prices regardless of tariffs, then I submit that the Liberal party has a policy well designed to deal with such a problem. A part of this policy is contained in the Combines Investigation Act.

Present conditions constitute a challenge to the intelligence and wisdom of parliament. Over half our people have lost two-thirds of their purchasing power while the price of the articles they require has been rising. This is not my problem alone; it is the problem of every member of parliament. I commend most highly the hon. member who introduced this resolution (Mr. Johnston, Lake Centre). This problem should be submitted to some group of men who will examine into it and try to do something for the basic producers on the western plains who are endeavouring to do all they can to get along under present conditions. I feel sure that hon. members from eastern Canada will give us their co-operation. They know that unless the great primary industries, such as the farming industry of Canada, are prosperous, the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec will be in a depression and faced with unemployment. No matter whether a member represents an agricultural constituency in western Canada or a manufacturing constituency in Ontario, it is equally his duty and his privilege to study this problem so that half the population of Canada may be brought back from practically a poverty stricken level to that upon which we want Canadians to be. Once the farmers of western Canada are able to buy the articles they need the manufacturing centres of the east will be prosperous and the spectre of unemployment will no longer stalk through our land.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as Minister of Agriculture, I do not think it would be proper for me to permit a resolution of this kind to be discussed in the house without expressing an opinion upon it. At the outset I should like to say that although I come from western Canada and represent an agricultural constituency in that part of the country, I am still mindful of the fact that more than half the agricultural people of Canada live east of the great lakes. In this house are hon. members representing agricultural constituencies in the eastern part of Canada as well as in that part of Canada which lies to the west of the great lakes. Most of the discussion in the interests of agriculture, in so far as this resolution is concerned, has been carried on by hon. members from the central west or the prairie sections of the dominion.

A few days ago a member from one of the rural constituencies in the east placed in my hands a price list in connection with this very question. This list was sent to him apparently by one of his constituents, a man who is interested in prices of implements in eastern Canada, and I find that it compares almost exactly, so far as increases are concerned, with price lists from western Canada which have been read in the house. This is a price list secured from an implement dealer in St. Thomas, and according to this list a six-foot binder sold in St. Thomas in 1935 for $225.50; but in the list which has been recently put forward for 1936 the cash price is $242.20, which is practically $17 higher than the 1935 price. If my memory serves me rightly, that is almost identical with the increase which has recently taken place in binders in the west. A six-foot mower sold in 1935, cash price, at $84, and in 1936 it sold at $92, or an increase of $8. A side-delivery rake sold in 1935 at $118 and in 1936 at $128, or an increase of $10. A hay loader sold in 1935, cash price, at $114, and it is listed for this year, cash price, at $124, again a $10 increase. A 13-disc fertilizer drill sold in 1935 at $169, and is listed for 1936 at $179, or an increase of $10. A manure spreader sold in 1935 at $164, and this year it is listed at $174, again a $10 increase. A 13-tooth land cultivator sold in 1935 at $73, and in 1936 the price is $76, or an increase of $3. A 14-blade disc harrow sold in 1935 at $47, and in 1936 the price is $48, or an increase of $1; and an eight-foot tractor disc harrow sold in 1935 at $103 and in 1936 it is listed at $106, or an increase of $3. This list represents implements used on every farm in the eastern part of Canada, and the increases in the east are similar to those that have been made in the west.

The discussion of the resolution before us has indicated to me that there is some reason for an inquiry into these increases in prices, particularly because of their having been made at this time. I was somewhat interested in the remark made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) when he called attention to the fact that certain people were contesting an election in a constituency in Saskatchewan at the beginning of this year and that at that time those of us who were in the constituency fighting in the interests of the government were taking some credit to the government for the trade treaty that had been recently made between Canada and the United States; and he said it must have come as rather a shock to us to find that at the beginning of the next month there was an increase rather than a decrease in prices of farm implements as a result of that treaty having been brought into effect. Well, that fact was perhaps not as great a shock to those of us who took part in the campaign, knowing as we did what has taken place in the dominion following previous reductions in the tariff, as it was to men from one end of the dominion to the other when the price list came out and stared them in the face as representing an increased cost of production to the agriculturist in Canada in the coming summer.

It is for that reason that we believe some sort of inquiry should be made into the causes of the increase in prices of farm implements under conditions that prevail in Canada at the present time. As regards conditions existing in Canada, I do not need to confine my remarks to conditions as we know them to-day in western Canada. Conditions in the west to-day are such as naturally exist in a country that is comparatively new, when the whole world is going through the trying times that are being experienced at present. There are in this house men who can recall similar experiences on the part of people living in the rural areas of Ontario, of Quebec and of the maritimes, in the latter part of the last century, by reason of the prevalence of similar conditions in the world at large.

One of the reasons for the prevalence of the conditions that have been described by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and by other hon. members from the western provinces is the fact that we are passing through the first generation of settlers in western Canada; and while we have large debts to meet, while we have to pay for some of the development that has taken place in the past, we are confronted with the fact that it was the opening up of that part of Canada, through the efforts of people in the east, that put this country on the map as a really important nation among the nations of the world. We as a people living in the west owe thanks to the people in eastern Canada for the capital which has been put into western Canada and for the effort which has been made by the people of the east in the direction of developing the western section of the dominion; and we have reason to believe, from the actions of men throughout the eastern part of Canada during the last five or six years, while we have been passing through our trying experiences, that the men in the east who have been responsible for assisting in our development in the past are still not only able but anxious to participate in the future development of western Canada.

One of the reasons we are suffering in the west to-day is that, whereas in the three best years we have ever had in the west, 1926, 1927 and 1928, agriculture produced, in Saskatchewan alone, $1,180,000,000 worth of new wealth which went into business from one end of the country to the other, creating prosperity throughout the country; In three of our most difficult years, 1931, 1932 and 1933, we produced from these same farm lands only $354,000,000 worth of new wealth, or less than one-third of what we produced in the first three year period. And it is because of that reduction in the output of wealth in the west as well as of a similar reduction in the value of the wealth produced throughout Canada that we have been suffering from the difficulties which we have experienced. But in western Canada we have had the additional burden that in the southern part of the three prairie provinces we have been visited by a drought more severe than droughts of the past, and that drought has been accompanied by the lowest range of prices that any part of Canada has ever experienced for farm products. With those two conditions operating together we are of course having hard times and low purchasing power.

But I am one of those who believe that purchasing power can be reestablished only by the cooperation of the farming populations of the west, the farming populations of the east, the industrial populations of the east and west alike, and the financial people in the eastern and western parts of Canada, and that if we are to succeed in bringing back that prosperity for which we are all praying and of which, at the moment, we all dream, we shall succeed only through the one hundred per cent cooperation of the peoples living in all parts of Canada and those engaged in all activities within this country.

I believe the facts produced in this particular debate have emphasized two points. There are those who believe it is most important that we should maintain labour in industry in the different parts of Canada; and I am one of those who believe that in every industry in this country, whether it be for the manufacture of goods or for the production of primary products, first consideration should be given to labour; that when men are not given proper returns for the labour which they put forth in order to produce wealth, whether in industry or in agriculture, or whatever it may be, then we are going to suffer difficulties in every part of Canada. For that reason every effort should be put forward in this house, by inquiry, by legislative endeavour, and in other ways, to see to it that whatever happens, those who give of their labour to produce new wealth in this country from any source should be taken care of before one dollar from that industry goes anywhere else. Believing that, I think it is necessary to have some further inquiry into the reason for this increase in prices, coming at this, one of the most difficult periods that agriculture in Canada has experienced. I want just for a moment to read the resolution and to consider certain proposals which are made in it. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, an immediate inquiry should be made under the provision of the Research Council Act, chapter 177, R.S.C., 1927, or by other means, into the causes underlying the high price of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices for the year 1936.

The discussions indicate, as I said a moment ago, that some are concerned about labour; others are concerned because of the feeling that the actions of companies in connection with prices relative to increases and decreases in tariffs indicate that there is a combine of some kind or another among the companies that are producing farm implements in this country. I think some inquiry should be made before this particular matter is handed on to any particular council or commission for further investigation; that some inquiry should be made by a committee of this house into representations that have been made by members in connection with this resolution. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker:

> That the resolution be amended by striking out the words "under the provisions of the Research Council Act, chapter 177, R.S.C., 1927, or by other means," where they appear, and substituting therefor the following words, "by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization."

The resolution will then read:

> That, in the opinion of this house, an immediate inquiry should be made by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization into the causes underlying the high price of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices for the year 1936.

That inquiry, Mr. Speaker, should determine whether or not this is a proper question for submission to, say the tariff board or to the research council referred to, or a proper question for submission to an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, or whether some other procedure should be taken in relation to it. I move this amendment to the resolution, and with this amendment will support it.

Mr. POOLE: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POOLE: —whether, when he was quoting the difference in value over a period of six years, he meant price values or reduced production.

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot hear the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RURAL TELEPHONE COMPANIES

PROPOSED EXEMPTION FROM FEDERAL INCOME TAX

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, all rural telephone companies should be exempt from federal income tax.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would ask your ruling as to whether this resolution is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had anticipated that there might be some objection in connection with this matter. If any hon. members wish to speak on the point of order raised, I am ready to listen to them, and I will then render a decision.

Mr. THOMPSON: I have no intention whatever—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member want to speak on the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance in connection with the resolution? If anybody wishes to speak on the point of order I am ready to listen.

Mr. DUNNING: The point of order is that, if this resolution carries, it constitutes a definite instruction to the government to exempt a certain class of companies from a certain tax. As such it is a matter which cannot be introduced into this house except preceded by a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER: On the point of order raised by the hon. Minister of Finance, I have looked into this matter, and I find that this resolution is not in order. The hon. member's motion is out of order because it is not framed in such abstract or general terms that it can be entertained by the house. The proposal made therein is for a special reduction in the public revenue. The item to be struck out is mentioned, namely, the income tax levied on rural telephone companies. Such a proposal can be entertained only in committee of ways and mean, and, as May says, at page 544:

> These proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government and it must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year.

True, the motion says that the exemption of the tax "should" and not "shall" be made, but even at that I think the proposal ought to be considered in the committee and not by the house, for it is essentially a ways and means resolution.

Mr. THOMPSON: I abide by your decision.

WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY

PROPOSAL THAT GOVERNMENT SUBMIT LEGISLATION GUARANTEEING MINIMUM PRICES

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should submit for consideration of this house such legislation as may be necessary in order to guarantee a minimum price, based upon cost of production, plus a fair remuneration to the producer, on wheat, oats and barley, as a permanent measure.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I realize that this resolution deals with a difficult problem, and no doubt it will be asked how can we guarantee a price based upon cost of production when we have a variety of grades and costs of production vary throughout the country. Of course I realize that it would be impossible to set a minimum price that would cover the cost of production and be equitable to all farmers, but on the other hand we must remember that by harvest time the bureau of statistics is in a position to make a fairly accurate estimate of the yields of various grains throughout the country and to arrive at an approximate cost of production based upon averages. If this minimum price were to apply in the first place, say to No. 1 grade, and if the spreads on other grades were shortened to the extent considered advisable, I believe that would be as satisfactory a method as any.

Eastern interests and some hon. members from time to time have criticized legislation introduced to give financial assistance to agriculture and to relieve the distress in agriculture, especially in western Canada. But we must realize that the success of agriculture is not of interest to farmers alone, but of vital interest to the whole of Canada. In order to stress this point I should like to quote a few figures mentioned by the Alberta wheat pool in a broadcast on November 27, 1935. In the course of that broadcast it was stated that Canadian agriculture is a five billion dollar industry which supports nearly five million of our population directly and many more indirectly. Canadian agriculture supplies practically half the domestic market for factory products. Nine thousand factories are engaged in the processing of agricultural products. They report a total capital value of close to $700,000,000; they employ 125,000 people; they pay out annually in wages $125,000,000, and they produce products annually to the value of $750,000,000. In themselves I think those figures are sufficient to indicate the tremendous importance of agriculture in Canada, and to justify the statement that until agriculture is put upon a sound business basis there can be no permanent prosperity in this country.

I do not believe anyone would be so foolhardy as to claim that to-day agriculture is on a sound business basis. How can any industry be said to be on a sound basis when it is forced to produce below cost of production, and that has been the case in the past in connection with agriculture? To substantiate that statement I should like to quote a few figures taken from the Canada Year Book, 1934-35. We find the total value of field crops, live stock and dairy products in 1926 represented by the figure of $2,078,760,079. Six years later, in 1932, we find that the value of these agricultural products fell to $986,600,033, or a decrease of over a billion dollars. We might well say that if we could restore that billion dollars of lost purchasing power to the farmers we would be well on the road out of the depression. At page 862 we read that between August, 1929, and February, 1933, Canadian farm products fell 60·7 per cent, while fully and chiefly manufactured goods fell only 29·3 per cent. Again, at page 866, taking the 1926 index figure as 100, the index figure for grains in 1932 was 41·1, while the index figure for manufactured goods of mineral origin, such as farm machinery, stood at 84·8. In other words, while the index figure for grains fell by 58·9 per cent the index figure for manufactures of mineral origin fell only by 15·2 per cent. This means that a farmer in 1933, paying a debt incurred in 1929, would find his purchasing power reduced from $1 to 39·3 cents, while the price of manufactured goods had increased by 31·4 per cent and the price of machinery to the farmer had increased by 43·7 per cent.

In dealing with the question of the cost of production, according to bulletin No. 159 of the Department of Agriculture, published in 1932, a survey was made of a number of farms in order to arrive at the cost of producing wheat. It was found that the average cost of producing wheat on summer fallow was seventy-eight cents per bushel and on stubble $1.12 per bushel. The lowest recorded cost was fifty-three cents; the highest recorded cost was $1.46. According to reports from the experimental farm, taken over a period of ten years, the average cost of producing wheat was sixty-nine cents a bushel, yet from 1930 to 1933 the average price of wheat in Canada, according to the Canada Year Book, 1934, page 257, was forty-three cents a bushel. In 1932, during threshing operations, No. 1 wheat fell to the low figure of twenty cents in the Calgary district. Therefore it is obvious that from 1930 to 1933 farm products were being produced very considerably below cost of production. At the same time taxation increased. Costs, as represented by wages, of course fell, but on the other hand it must be remembered that according to the 1931 census only 38·6 per cent of the farmers employ help, so in view of this fact the saving in labour costs was very slight.

It is useless, therefore, to talk of permanent prosperity in agriculture until steps have been taken to guarantee prices for farm products commensurate with prices of other commodities. We are only too familiar with the statements of many prominent business men to the effect that we cannot guarantee prices for agricultural commodities above world market levels. On the other hand, however, when you take into consideration the fact that all real wealth comes out of the soil I think it is absurd to make the statement that you can guarantee minimum wages in industry; you can guarantee the wages of civil servants and you can guarantee the wages of politicians but you cannot guarantee the prices of the very commodities that have made all these services possible.

By guaranteed prices of course I do not mean prices sufficiently high to include large profits, as that would be a direct incentive to the increased production of agricultural products. I refer to a just price, a price sufficient to return to the producer the cost of production and at the same time be commensurate with prices of other commodities. In addition to low prices farmers have had to fight drought, grasshoppers, hail, frost and soil drifting, with the inevitable results that agriculture to-day is in a precarious position. Farmers who by 1929 had built up a fair reserve have seen it vanish; they have not been in a position to replace their machinery; farm buildings have become dilapidated and the inside of the homes in many cases is in dire need of refurnishing. And what of the families? Living in a climate of extremes of heat and cold, the children often have to travel three or four miles to school, undernourished and insufficiently clothed. Yet in spite of that we hear such statements as that of the senator from Rougemont, Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux: "Surely the farmers throughout Canada are not so wholly ruined as to have the right to claim that they should not pay."

We find at the present time a determined effort being made to do away with the existing debt legislation throughout the provinces. In that regard we should remember the statement of Major Douglas, "Show me any concern that does not recover cost out of prices, and I will show a concern headed right for bankruptcy." That is why to-day the farming industry is fast becoming bankrupt, because it has not been in a position to recover costs out of prices. And so before we can hope to put agriculture on its feet by such measures as debt legislation it will first of all be necessary to remove the cause of these debts. When one considers the actions of the majority of the great nations in spending many millions of dollars in maintaining high internal prices for agricultural products, then I think we can fairly say that Canada has not been over-considerate or over-generous in her treatment of agriculture. The action of the government last year in establishing a wheat board and a minimum price for wheat to a very large extent restored the confidence of the grain farmer. It is to be earnestly hoped that the board will be kept in operation as a permanent institution.

I referred to the fact that the nations of the world have spent many millions of dollars in maintaining high prices for agricultural products in their own countries. In support of this statement I should like to quote from a speech made by John I. McFarland at a luncheon at the Palliser hotel, Calgary, on February 14 of this year. Dealing with this subject, he said:

> I have shown you there is no world price, professional and non-professional speculation has been down close to zero in almost every line where there is a risk which must be carried. It is no longer considered sound business ethics for our business men to assume speculative risks. Governments in other countries have been expending and diverting enormous sums of money to producers. Australia paid over 60 millions of dollars in direct payments and indirectly 25 per cent in depreciated currency. The United States have paid about 200 million dollars in stabilization of wheat alone, and hundreds of millions in processing taxes have been levied on consumers to provide benefit payments to wheat farmers. Argentine contributed indirectly 25 per cent through depreciated currency, while controlled foreign exchange has added to consumers' burdens of that country for the benefit of their producers. England, a country which produces only about 60 million bushels per year, has collected from consumers for the benefit of their wheat farmers about $100,000,000, while other importing countries of Europe and elsewhere have imposed high tariffs against wheat, which have maintained fantastically high prices in various importing countries, thus exacting from consumers enormous sums of money for the benefit of home production.

Now I think we are agreed that the producers should recover cost of production out of prices. But on the other hand I am very much opposed to many of the measures referred to by Mr. McFarland, because they ignore the very root of our present economic evils, namely, that owing to certain practices under the present system industry fails to distribute sufficient purchasing power to buy back its own production. The last time I spoke in this chamber I dealt with this subject somewhat fully; therefore I shall not take the time of the house to deal with it again, but in view of this fact it is obvious that if you tax the consumer in order to raise the price level of any commodity you are placing a very heavy burden upon the consumer and are merely transferring the burden from one part of the community to another. Therefore I take the stand that in the event of world market prices of grains falling below the cost of production the dominion government should create the necessary financial credit in order to stabilize the price of these commodities at a level that would at least cover the cost of production to the Canadian producer. The futility of attempting to accomplish this by borrowing money from the banks is well emphasized by a statement from one of the greatest commercial organizations in the world, namely, the London Chamber of Commerce. The article was in reference to financing a government expenditure and read in part as follows:

> It is quite evident that this cannot be done by the old method of asking the banks to create new money by the not very arduous activity of writing figures in a ledger, the state then borrowing the result from them at interest. In order to repay the capital and interest more money must be recovered from the community by taxation than has been issued to it, since the banks did not lend the interest, so that the last state of that community is far worse than the first. The entry of figures in a ledger, by means of which the banks create new money "out of the blue" under the present system, cannot be held to justify the claim to repayment, with interest, by the community. The sacrifice on the part of the banks to create this new money involves but a few seconds of a clerk's time.

The justification for this argument of course rests upon the fact that the banks create this credit not out of anything they possess, but against the real credit of the borrower. This action by the government would become necessary only in the event of grain prices becoming deflated below cost of production, and therefore this action instead of causing inflation would cause reflation, a process that would be very necessary if Canada is to be saved from the disastrous results of the low prices of 1930 to 1934. This issue of financial credit would be cancelled automatically by the farmers meeting cost of production plus living expenses, and in the event of any part of this credit becoming redundant it could be recalled by an income tax.

We still hear a good deal of talk about over-production, but in the majority of cases it is in reality a matter of under-consumption rather than over-production. If the purchasing power of the people were increased up to the full capacity of industry to produce and deliver goods the bogey of over-production would to a large extent disappear. At the present time we hear a good deal about increased immigration, and placing more people on the land. The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) advocated the conscription of the unemployed and placing them on farms. But would not this cause greater production of agricultural products and so tend to bring about lower prices unless the government is prepared to guarantee a minimum price?

In the drought area we have many farmers who are very anxious to move to better districts. In many instances these men moved into the areas with a little capital, good health and plenty ambition. To-day they have lost their capital; in many cases their health has suffered and they are fast losing their ambition. Surely before helping to settle foreigners on the land in Canada we should help these Canadian farmers to become reestablished. To-day it is costing thousands of dollars to ship in feed and seed to these families and to keep them on relief. In the long run would it not be cheaper to finance them to a new start in a good district? Then, provided prices of grain were maintained at a just level they would soon become self-supporting.

The main principle behind the resolution is that farmers should be guaranteed a fair price for wheat, oats and barley, or a price sufficient at least to cover cost of production and a fair profit. Even if this means a slight increase in the price level of commodities to the people of Canada I would ask this question: Have Canadians any right to expect that a large body of the Canadian people should produce below cost of production in order that they may be in a position to buy more cheaply the goods they require. Personally I would say that that should not be the case.

If the resolution were agreed to it would possibly involve an amendment of the act establishing the wheat board, so that paragraph (a) of section 8 would read as follows:

> To fix a price, based upon cost of production plus a fair remuneration to the producer, to be paid to the producer for wheat delivered to the board as by this act provided, subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Then the act would be made to apply to oats and barley in the same way that it applies to wheat. It applies only to grain produced in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia because grains produced in other parts of Canada to a great extent are used for feed.

[Mr. Quelch.]

In offering the resolution I wish to stress the principle that the price of an article should be based upon cost of production, a condition which does not obtain at the present time. To-day the price of an article is governed by what it will bring, and then, after deducting certain fixed charges and commissions, the primary producer gets what is left. In some cases that means he receives nothing, and in many others it means an amount altogether inadequate to meet costs incurred in the production of the article. In closing may I observe that I hope hon. members, instead of being too critical of the resolution, will be prepared to admit the justness of the principle expressed therein.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the resolution I wish heartily to endorse the views placed before hon. members by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). It is not my intention to speak at length because I believe enough has been said this evening to show the necessity for what is indicated in the resolution. It is my belief that if civilization is to continue this chamber has a great task to perform. For the disposal of our chief grains I believe a just price, as suggested by the previous speaker, offers about the only way we can succeed. For a number of years we have been producing grain below cost. I may be challenged with respect to the 1936 crop, but I believe I can substantiate by figures my statement about crops marketed in the past year. During the past season there has been a great deal of rust and hail and, in some cases, frost. In the constituency from which I come we were about three weeks late getting on the land in the spring and, in addition, we had early frosts which cut down the grade from the top, No. 1 northern, to No. 6 and feed. In addition, the yield has been cut by at least fifty per cent.

The price of feed wheat on a twenty-four cent freight rate was thirty cents per bushel and the average yield would not be above fifteen bushels. Hon. members can readily understand what profits are being made on that basis. As hon. members are aware, in the past the farmer has been in the habit of taking his grain to the elevator. He would ask the agent what grade it was, what dockage there would be, and how much per bushel he might receive. If he did not like the answers he got he had to lump it. This has been the condition particularly since 1930, in which year we had to lump it practically all the time. In that year there was a heavy crop of straw and grain in several districts, but in my particular district the grade was from No. 4 tough, down. Those of us who sold through the pool that year, on a twenty-four cent freight rate basis, got twelve and one-half cents per bushel although it cost us ten cents per bushel to thresh the crop. Perhaps hon. members will see why we are asking for a set price on the grains mentioned.

When the implement manufacturer has his implements ready for market he does not go to the farmer and ask him how much he will pay. The manufacturer sets his price, one which is not by any means below cost of production, and if the farmer does not like the price he must do without the implement. He cannot go to another implement company and obtain a machine to do the same work for less money. I believe that has been proven many times. One can picture an automobile manufacturer taking his product to a customer and asking what he will pay for it, and in most cases taking what is offered. That, however, is what the farmer has to do. When we have grain to sell we take it to the elevator and learn from the agent what he will pay. In nine cases out of ten we take what we are offered and say nothing.

I believe farmers have done everything in their power to cut production costs. When a machine which cuts cost of production is put on the market we find farmers rushing to purchase it, and paying good high prices for it. Abut thirty years ago farmers began making improvements for themselves. As they were denied improvements by the grain companies—I believe some of those pioneers are still opposite in this chamber—step by step conditions were improved until in 1923 we reached the point at which we organized the wheat pools. Since that year the pools of the west have continued to build up and to develop the greatest grain handling organization in the world. To-day on account of conditions over which we have no control we are not able to derive the benefits to which we are entitled. It has become necessary therefore to have a wheat board.

The wheat board is not a true representative of the producers. We have nothing whatever to do with what our grain will bring or for what it will be sold. It has simply been taken to the market place and whatever is offered is accepted. This seems rather foolish, but it is the condition that exists. If farmers cannot get the costs of production I think all hon. members realize what will happen. Factories will have to close down as the farmers will not be able to pay the price for the products turned out. When factories are closed down this means unemployment, and I think we have had enough of taking care of the unemployed. Unemployment is one of the greatest and most demoralizing questions facing us to-day. The other day the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) said that if he wanted to take a bath, he had to take it in a wash basin. It seems too bad to think that the people who produce the wealth of this country have to take a bath in a wash basin or go without. This is what is taking place when other people handling our products can live under the most luxurious conditions.

The farmer should be able to buy a bathtub and the other up to date conveniences found in the city. If he could, things would be helped all round. The plumbers and the manufacturers of bathtubs and other appliances would be busy. I think it would be in the interests of the agriculturists and Canada as a whole to pass this resolution and give the farmers of the east and the west, and the other interests in this country a chance to get on the road to recovery. We are told that prosperity is just around the corner, but that corner seems to be one that we cannot get around.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the house on this resolution I must say that I am sorry the hour is so late. To discuss this resolution properly would require more time than is now available. The resolution appears on the order paper in the following words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should submit for consideration of this house such legislation as may be necessary in order to guarantee a minimum price, based upon cost of production, plus a fair remuneration to the producer, on wheat, oats and barley, as a permanent measure.

There has been a great deal of discussion during recent years as to the advisability of having minimum prices permanently established for certain farm products. In western Canada this discussion has centred largely round prices of grain while in other parts of Canada it has centred largely round prices of other products of the farm. I am sure hon. members realize that there would be considerable difficulty in setting and maintaining permanent prices upon the basis set forth in the resolution. In the first place, there would be some difficulty in determining costs of production in the different parts of Canada. I can conceive of a price being set based upon production costs on the Regina plains, while in other parts of the country, particularly in the southeastern part of Saskatchewan and the central and eastern parts of Alberta, costs of production might be considerably different. A different basis would be found if we were going to take costs of production in the northern and eastern parts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The reasons for these differences would be many in number. First, there would be the difference in climatic conditions; second, there would be the difference in the fertility of the soil and, third, there would be the difference in methods of agriculture followed.

For example, in the northeastern part of the province it is possible to carry on mixed farming. Saskatchewan is divided into nine wheat districts. During the past eighteen years in district No. 1 the average farm has produced annually wheat to a value of about $1,200. In grain district No. 2, which takes in the Regina plains, the average farm has produced wheat to the value of over $2,000. In grain district No. 3 the value of the average annual production of wheat has been about the same as in district No. 1. In looking at the production yields we find that in the eighteen years the average yield in district No. 1 has been about 12·9 bushels per acre. In district No. 2 it has been about 13·8 bushels; in district No. 3, about 12·4 bushels, and in district No. 4, about 12·8 bushels per acre. In other words, during an eighteen year period the difference in yields per acre in the different areas has not been so great while the difference in yields per farm has been considerable.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 3, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT ON AMENDMENTS TO ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE ACTS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the other day the house agreed to appoint a special committee for the purpose of studying the Dominion Elections Act and the Dominion Franchise Act and possible amendments thereto, and it was suggested that this committee should consist of thirty members. In order to save time I would ask the consent of the house to make a motion to complete this committee to-day, as follows:

That the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act 1934 and amendments thereto and the Dominion Franchise Act 1934 and amendments thereto shall consist of thirty members, and that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto, and that the following be appointed thereto:

Messieurs: Bothwell, Cameron (Cape Breton North), Clark (York-Sunbury), Dussault, Factor, Fair, Girouard, Glen, Heaps, Jean, MacNicol, McCuaig, McIntosh, Parent (Quebec West and South), Perley (Qu'Appelle), Power, Purdy, Rickard, Robichaud, St-Père, Sinclair, Slaght, Stevens, Stewart, Stirling, Taylor (Norfolk), Turgeon, Turner, Wermenlinger, and Wood.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATES COMMITTEE

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, by special leave of the house, if the house is unanimous in the matter, I wish to move:

Whereas the last meeting of the select standing committee on debates took place on June 17, 1931;

Whereas, before taking into consideration any further matter which might be referred to them by the house, a general and summary survey of the manner in which the past recommendations of this committee which have been approved by the house have been complied with during the last five years, shall be made;

Whereas a meeting of the said committee has been called for Thursday next, March 5;

That the said select standing committee on the debates shall take into consideration any matter within the scope of their jurisdiction and report to the house accordingly.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe notice of motion will be required.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this is one of the motions of which notice is required before it can be put to the house. I therefore direct that the motion stand as a notice of motion.

Motion stands.

WHEAT POOL

EQUALIZATION OF 1930 PAYMENTS ON WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I should like to ask the government whether or not we may expect that the legislation promised by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with respect to the payments for grain sold by producers thereof in 1930 will be introduced at an early date. I do this in consequence of receiving large numbers of communications complaining that with the bitterness of the weather and the bills that have been incurred this money is very urgently required.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I hope it will be possible to have the legislation brought down within a fortnight.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed, from Friday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty's government in the Dominion of Canada and the government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the short space of time that remains at my disposal I shall make only a few remarks. It is perhaps too early to pass any considered judgment with regard to the enlarged trade with the United States that will follow as a result of our trade agreement with that country, but already there are some indications of what is likely to take place; for we have the trade figures for January of this year and we can compare them with the trade figures for January, 1935. Our exports to the United States for January, 1935, amounted to $17,872,669, whereas our exports for January, 1936, amounted to $20,872,966, an increase of approximately 17 per cent. On the other hand our imports from the United States for January, 1935, amounted to $23,156,701 whereas our imports for January, 1936, amounted to $26,284,935, an increase of approximately 13½ per cent.

Some of the commodities exported to the United States are striking; I shall deal with one of them. Our exports of cattle, for example, increased from $67,647 in January, 1935, to $498,270 in January, 1936. Our exports of shingles doubled; our exports of planks, boards and other kinds of lumber also showed substantial increases.

The speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was a remarkable address; it made a number of things perfectly clear to this house and to the people of Canada. In the first place—I think it cannot be disputed—the speech of the right hon. gentleman made it perfectly clear to everyone in Canada that if the Conservative party had been returned to office Canada would not have had any trade agreement with the United States at the present time. The right hon. gentleman blames the government for not obtaining greater concessions from the United States, and then in the next breath he says that he would not give the United States the concessions they ask, at any price. How can trade with any country be built up with that attitude of mind towards it? The right hon. gentleman wants everything his own way; that is not conducive to the building up of trade with other countries. He is very much like the spoiled boy who will not play with the boy next door unless he can have the play all his own way.

Then the speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition showed a peculiar attitude towards trade agreements that is not conducive to international good will. He showed much the same attitude during the negotiation of the Ottawa agreements. He desired to give Great Britain a preference in Canada, but before doing so he raised the tariff sky high so that what seemed to be a preference to Great Britain was in reality no preference at all. Now the right hon. gentleman wants to know what we intend to do with regard to the intermediate tariff. Why should he be concerned with what our attitude is going to be during this session towards the intermediate tariff? Would that affect his attitude towards this agreement? Would he vote for this agreement if he were told that immediately after that we would increase the intermediate tariff? Would he have the government do that; would he have this parliament pass this trade agreement and then, immediately after passing it, during this very same session, raise the intermediate tariff? Is that the spirit that should be shown in bringing about a trade agreement? Is that what he is asking us to do? In effect that would be a breach of the spirit, at any rate, of the trade agreement which we are now considering.

The speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition shows very distinctly the fundamental difference that exists between the party of which he is the leader and the Liberal party with regard to tariff and trade matters. We on this side of the house desire an enlargement of our trade with other countries. We are willing to make concessions to other countries in return for a fair and reasonable prospect of enlarging our trade with them. We are satisfied with a fair exchange, and we believe that in this trade agreement we are making a fair exchange with the United States. But there is another difference between the viewpoint of the Conservative party and the viewpoint of those who sit on this side of the house. Personally I do not like the word "concession" as applied to the tariff reductions that we have made. We are not making these tariff reductions in any sense as concessions to the United States. We do not regard them as gifts to the United States; we regard them as tariff reductions made in pursuance of the Liberal policy with regard to the tariff. We wish to make substantial tariff reductions in Canada for the benefit of the Canadian people, regardless of whether we get concessions from other countries or not. If we can get concessions, well and good, but whether we get concessions or not we on this side of the house feel that the time has come when substantial reductions should be made in our own tariff. The Liberal party was elected on a platform of substantial tariff reductions. The tariff structure in this country is much too high. We have had five years' experience of high tariff policy, and I think it has been demonstrated throughout the whole of Canada that that policy has failed. There are many commodities on which in the interests of the producers and the consumers of Canada we require an immediate and substantial decrease in the tariff.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. THORSON: I have only a word or two more. We wish substantial reductions on such commodities as gasoline, agricultural implements and textiles, to mention only a few. This country has suffered from the policy of high tariffs, not merely in one section but in all sections. The overwhelming vote given to the Liberal party meant that Canada did not wish to endure any longer a policy such as that from which it suffered during the preceding five years. Substantial tariff reductions are demanded, and it is the duty of the Liberal party to carry out the mandate given to it by the people of Canada.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this my first opportunity to congratulate you on your elevation to your high office, and in the same sentence may I add my congratulations to the Deputy Speaker.

I hope my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Thorson) does not go away, because I am going to have something to say to him in a few minutes; meantime I would much rather address myself to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who consummated this Canada-United States trade agreement. During the past twenty-five years it has been my experience to have pass over my desk from week to week invoices for one or two cars of goods going out of this country and one or two coming into Canada, so that by absorption if in no other way I should have some idea what it means to trade with our American cousins. Perhaps that is why I was interested enough to sit quietly and listen to the Prime Minister expound to us what I hoped would be shown to be the benefits of this trade agreement to our Canadian people. I listened to a long historical review of what had been done in the past, and what they had tried to do with regard to negotiating a treaty. When he came to something political that might sound good to the ears of his followers he stressed it very heavily, but to my idea this agreement is entirely bereft of any virtue or good result in the main to our Canadian people. I was thinking of those Canadians who to-day are on the relief roll, and those good Canadians who find their vocation in industry. I heard that the Prime Minister went across the street in Ottawa to the United States representative and asked for an interview with the president of the United States, because he was going south for a holiday. A Florida frolic! I thought one of his protegés from Ontario did enough of that during the last two years, according to the press reports, to prevent the Prime Minister giving to the press a statement that he was going south for a Florida frolic. However the interview was arranged; the Prime Minister went to Washington, called on the Canadian legation and stayed overnight in the White House—all the things which he said had been done previously by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He achieved the interview with the president, as the leader of the opposition did, slept overnight in the White House in like manner, I suppose had the same brand of orange juice for his breakfast in the morning, and I suppose slept in the same bed. At any rate the next morning he gave a statement to the press. Then instead of going south for his Florida frolic he hastened back because Armistice day was approaching, and he made a statement in Canada. I hope there was no political significance attached to that; I do not think there was. However, it will be said that he did a great deal more than the leader of the opposition; he consummated an agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS: I admit at once—the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) says "hear, hear"—that he did consummate an agreement. And it will be said that it was on the same basis as the leader of the opposition was negotiating an agreement previously. That side of the picture is perhaps true, but the leader of the opposition stopped and waited to see whether we were going to get everything which which it was in the power of the president to give, inasmuch as the Prime Minister gave everything which it was in his power at that time to give. He gave most favoured nation treatment; he gave the intermediate tariff—I ask my hon. friends not to go too far away; I shall have something more to say about the intermediate tariff. When he gave this intermediate tariff of course he left a loophole so that when the budget comes down my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, one of those orthodox Liberals that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Mallette) was talking about the other evening, along with his orthodox cabinet, can deal with it. And he will get the support of a lot of other people if he does see to it that when it comes to arranging the intermediate items in our tariff the livelihood of those of our citizens who find themselves in difficult circumstances trying to continue to produce in industry will have an opportunity to live. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to have your position for about a week. If I had it I would make a gangway just beyond these ultra-Conservatives like the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) down there so that the radical breezes from the southeast corner would not blow over here and contaminate us. I would take these radical Liberals, these enthusiasts that come from Rosthern or some such place, even my hon. friend from Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), make room for them down beyond the gangway, and pick out a seat for the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson), because he will want to sit beyond that gangway by the time the orthodox Liberals are separated from the radicals that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was telling us about not long ago. I ask you, sir, is it fair to expect us to vote on the Canada-United States trade agreement when we do not know what is going to happen when the budget comes down? I do not think it is. However, here we have it, a white paper with a list of goods which can now enter the United States a little easier, and a great long list which can now flow into this country a little easier. Look at it any way you like; analyze it, and in the main you will find that the products of our primary producers are going to be able to enter the United States a little easier. Yes, we are thankful for that. In a moment I will deal with cattle. But in the main, as far as goods coming into this country are concerned, they will be manufactured and partly manufactured goods. What does that mean? What is going to be the result? It is difficult to prophesy, but we have before us the record of the last twenty-five years, since the 1911 reciprocity deal was sponsored by my hon. friends opposite. As briefly as I can I shall try to recite its effect. First take the railway situation; the Jersey Central, the Illinois Central, the New York Central, the Chicago, Minneapolis & St. Paul, all those railroads running, like the Mississippi river, north and south, depositing their wares close to the border of Canada; you will find more and more of these manufactured goods coming into Canada, whereas our great railroad systems running east and west will lose the most of their revenue from the long freight haul on the traffic which bears the highest freight rates, that is, manufactured and partly manufactured goods. This agreement will tend to divert that trade north and south; it will not help the east and west trade and therefore will not help our railroad problem. The Chicago, Minneapolis & St. Paul will carry goods into our western provinces; the New England lines will supply the maritime provinces; Detroit and Michigan will be supplying southwestern Ontario; Buffalo and that part of New York state will be supplying the Niagara peninsula and Toronto, and Seattle will be supplying British Columbia. Is that going to help our railway situation? Not as I see it. Time will not permit me to go into more detail, but before passing the subject may I say this: When by the agreement the government did away with the preferential position held by our ports of Saint John, Halifax, Quebec and Vancouver, which enjoyed a ten per cent reduction of the duty payable on goods coming to those ports it made a most unnecessary move. It was not necessary to do that. I say that it was not necessary to put New York, Boston and Seattle in the same position as the other ports I have mentioned. Hon. members opposite say that it was. The railways say that we get millions of dollars of revenue from the haul of export goods from midwestern states through Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS: Of course we do, and ever shall. My hon. friend pounds his desk. Look at the geography; look at your maps, if you have not looked at them, and trace the shortest route to the seaboard from the great Chicago market. Find the shortest route for the export of goods going to London and Liverpool markets. Those goods come through Canada; the freight will find its way through the shortest possible and least expensive route which, fortunately for us, is through Canada. The alibi of some private member in Albany or a senator in Washington introducing a bill is all humbug and eye-wash, to my idea, because business will find its channel along the lines of smallest cost. That is my experience and it has been the experience of other business men, regardless of the sentimental idea that our United States cousins would force these goods to go over their own railroads. I would remind the house that their railways run north and south, anyway.

I do not know the constituency of my hon. friend, but he seems to be taking an active interest in the subject. I may have something to say to him in a moment or two.

Mr. McPHEE: My interest is in the new senator who has just entered the gallery.

Mr. HARRIS: I will leave it to the maritime righters to rise in their places and tell us all about the port preference. Perhaps they may be moved down beyond the gangway, before the next four years are over.

I shall return to a discussion of the remarks of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson), and shall deal with his observations on the Ottawa trade agreements. I wonder if he has been in a huddle with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) in his consideration of this matter. I wonder if he has looked at the figures; I wonder if he has looked at the statistics; I wonder if he really thinks they are as iniquitous as he would have us believe. I wonder if when he was speaking about the increase of trade with the United States in January he would not have been more fair if he had shown that whereas there was an increase of $5,600,000 in exports to the United States in that month, at the same time we had an increase of $6,000,000 to the United Kingdom, due to the Ottawa trade agreement. Why did he not put all the figures and all the facts on record, if he wanted to put any of them before the house.

He has said that the tariff was raised two hundred per cent, but he does not mean that. He has stated that an unfriendly spirit has been engendered in Great Britain towards Canada, but he knows that is not true. He knows that when a question was asked in the House of Commons on December 10 of last year by Sir Percy Hurd I think it was, the reply by the Right Hon. D. Hacking, Under Secretary of State, was in most friendly terms. The hon. member for Selkirk quoted nothing to support his statement, but I shall give something to support mine.

Looking over my files I find a letter dated February 3, addressed to me from Kingsway, England. This letter contains a review of general conditions. There is one page dealing with Russia, another with Germany, another with France, and then some observations on this country. My English correspondent is a director of organizations employing at least 3,000 people; he is connected with seventeen concerns, is chairman of a European cartel and knows whereof he speaks. He says:

In this country—

The United Kingdom.

—our position following Ottawa and the duties which were imposed here, is distinctly improved. Production has increased and we have gained a larger share of our home trade which has benefited us in spite of the fact that prices have shown a tendency to fall rather than to increase as a result of the tariff.

We have made substantial strides in general production as well as in special production, and are now getting a very substantial share of the home trade in the former category as well as in the latter. One result of the tariff has been that this country is taking its proper place as an important producer.

I have given a statement supported by evidence, whereas my hon. friend's iniquitous statement was one without any evidence of fact behind it. To substantiate the facts I shall quote figures supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. These figures show that our domestic exports to the United Kingdom increased from $16,611,036 in January, 1935, to $21,682,840 in January, 1936. At the same time I admit there was only a small increase in our imports from the United Kingdom. Then, we find a substantial increase in yearly exports to the United Kingdom, and we find that they jumped from $174,043,725 in 1932 to $184,361,019 in 1933, $227,601,411 in 1934 and $274,182,737 in 1935. I ask the hon. member to go home and ask some of the hog producers of the dominion how they feel about the empire trade treaty. They saw the production of 6,000,000 hogs per annum raised from the four dollar per hundred price level which was prevailing. One year it is raised to six dollars, then the next year to eight dollars, at which price it remained, and we have poured $24,000,000 into the pockets of the Canadian farmers in one year and $48,000,000 in the next year by raising that level. I ask the hon. member if that was so iniquitous or if it was hard for us to take. Was it hard on the Canadian people? Did it make for what he called empire nationalism?

The hon. member has said that the trade agreement with the United Kingdom made it more difficult for us to make agreements elsewhere. He suggested that we were becoming nationalistic and empire minded. I say to the hon. member for Selkirk here and now that this Canada-United States agreement will do more towards Americanizing us than did the United Kingdom agreement towards making us more British. I ask him to take his choice; does he wish to be more Americanized? In twenty-five years does he wish to see this country another state of the union—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARRIS: —or would he not be more content to be a little more imperialistic? That is all I have to say to the hon. member for Selkirk.

In the next sentence I admit that there are some good features in the United States agreement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARRIS: The Minister of Finance does not seem to think that that is sensible or logical.

Mr. DUNNING: I do; it is the first logical thing the hon. member has said.

Mr. HARRIS: In the same sentence I say that there is not enough. Let us take the commodity about which the hon. member spoke a few minutes ago, namely cattle. Why did the government not get the full presidential possibility in the arrangement as to cattle? There is a quota. Why did they not get one and a half cents a pound while they were trying to get something, instead of being content with one cent per pound? I say that we are not anywhere near back to the export position with cattle we occupied when hon. members opposite came into power in 1921. I hope we get back to a position where cattle will enter free. After all is said and done, we have a small quota—not as much as was exported in the days of 1921, 1922 and 1923, so far as numbers are concerned. I say that the quota should have been doubled in order to stimulate our Canadian market. But through the quota we have in the agreement there is provision for less than one per cent of the American consumption or the American slaughterings of cattle.

Let us look at the white paper. Point out to me any other commodities coming into this country in connection with which United States interests will not raid our markets—not by one per cent, as in the case of cattle, but by twenty-five per cent and fifty per cent. If I were one given to exaggerating, as is apparently the hon. member for Selkirk, I would talk about a two hundred per cent tariff. I could go so far as to say that in some respects our markets would be raided by one hundred per cent, owing to the effects of this agreement.

I shall devote the rest of my time to an attempt to picture what is going to happen in the next twenty-five years, with this trend facing us, and what would have happened had the 1911 reciprocity treaty been negotiated. All through my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to think of those of our people who are looking for work or employment. If the agreement of 1911 had become law it is safe to say that the percentage of exports of manufactured goods and of raw products from this country would have remained about the same. The imports of manufactured goods may have increased, but let us grant for the moment that the percentage would have remained the same, and the percentage of raw materials the same, and let us compare the 1911 figures with the figures for 1935. But first let me make this observation. It has been my pleasure for many years to look over many operating balance sheets, and I find that on the average fifty per cent of the cost of an article goes for raw materials, twenty-five per cent for wages and labour, and the other twenty-five per cent represents expenses of production, profit and loss, interest rates and overhead. Comparing 1911 with 1935, what do we find with regard first to our exports? Based on that assumption which I have made, our exports of fully manufactured and partly manufactured goods increased from $44,000,000 in 1910 to $164,000,000 in 1935, a percentage increase from 42½ per cent to 75·3, and figured on the basis of last year's exports, $224,679,000, we have an increase of 30 per cent in the exports of manufactured and partly manufactured goods. Twenty-five per cent of that increase represents wages. In other words, we have retained in Canada a payroll representing last year $17,051,000, on that one item alone, because we did not negotiate the 1911 agreement.

In like manner we had a smaller export of raw materials. It is interesting to note that in the last twenty-five years our exports of raw materials to the United States have not increased by one dollar, being $58,000,000 in 1910 and $58,000,000 in 1935. Therefore when you have increased your total export from Canada from $104,000,000 to $224,000,000, you have decreased the percentage export of raw material, and have retained those goods in this country to the tune of 30·8 per cent of the $224,000,000. That means that if we had maintained the percentage we would have lost the opportunity of putting labour to work on 30·8 per cent of $224,000,000 worth of raw materials, which is being manufactured in this country into manufactured goods for sale. That amounts to $69,000,000, raw materials representing fifty per cent and wages twenty-five per cent. In other words it means that you have retained for Canada in that item alone of decreased exports of raw materials, $34,603,000 in wages.

In like manner we have had a lesser percentage importation of manufactured goods, but would you have had a lesser percentage importation of manufactured goods if you had negotiated the reciprocity treaty in 1911? You would have had an increased percentage of manufactured goods, and we Canadians truly would have been hewers of wood and drawers of water for Uncle Sam. Now 3·2 per cent is the lesser importation of manufactured goods, and that percentage of $303,000,000 amounts to $9,716,000, twenty-five per cent of which is for labour performed, not by American workmen, but by Canadian workmen last year. That is what was saved in wages to the Canadian people on that one item last year because the 1911 reciprocity treaty was not enacted into law. The percentage of importations of raw materials increased from $73,000,000 in 1910 to $112,000,000 in 1935. The percentage increase of 3·2 of the total imports of $303,000,000 amounted to another $4,858,000, representing working wages for our own artisans.

I have not time, Mr. Speaker, to give all the other figures which I have under my hand and will give them to Hansard:

[Mr. Harris.]

Let me make this general observation. Had we remained in the same position we were in in 1911, then if we had passed the 1911 treaty and had no increase in the export of raw materials and no increase in the importation of manufactured goods it would mean that because of the treaty $58,000,000 less would be paid out through the payrolls in Canada than was the case last year. I prophesy this, Mr. Speaker, that if the government goes the way the radical Liberals want them to go, not the orthodox chaps, that is what is going to happen, and instead of having a balanced economic life as we have in Canada to-day, we will have an economic life very much out of balance; our people would have to revert to primary industry when everybody knows in his heart that that is the last thing they will do. Let me illustrate that trend. People are prone to say to-day that machinery is displacing labour, and to a degree it certainly is, but primary production in this country to-day is nevertheless employing the same number of people that it did in 1910 whereas manufacturing industry has jumped from 400,000 to 600,000.

In 1910 two-thirds of our people were engaged in primary production and one-third were engaged in secondary production, but to-day fifty per cent of our people are in one category and fifty per cent in the other. If you leave out the people engaged in services —I refer to people such as are members of this assembly, non-producers, educationalists, men who look after our spiritual welfare, doctors and all those others who look after our services—if you take out that one million and leave only the producers, primary and secondary, you have the balanced national life such as we have in Canada to-day. And that proves my point, which is that there has been retained for Canada an annual payroll of $60,000,000 by the rejection of the 1911 treaty. So I say to you orthodox Liberals, if you accept this Canada-United States agreement you will jeopardize the future of this country to the extent I have indicated, and I do not think you want to do that. In other words, Mr. Speaker, get the gangway ready and let us find out who is who on this agreement.

I would not say anything to my hon. friend from Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) if he were not a former member of this house. But last night he rose in his place and deprecated the increasing costs of agricultural implements. Agricultural production has gone down and manufacturing production has gone up, and so we have a more balanced economic life in this country. Our production of products of agriculture, forests, fisheries, mining and electric power amounts to $1,051,543,238, or a percentage of 49·95 of our total production, while our production of manufactures amounts to $1,170,225,872, or 50·05 per cent of our total production.

I want to say a word to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, in a little wee paragraph about so big in his speech, was so solicitous about manufacturing industry. I shall not take time to read it, but he said that in no case would Canadian industry be in a worse position, that on the contrary industry would be in a better position because of the reduction in the costs of implements. Dealing with the primary producer, first, what did the hon. member for Lake Centre say last night about the reduced cost of the implements of production? As he said, when the duty went off, the price went up. We held them to the dotted line when we were in power and saw that they did not increase the cost of implements to the primary producers. The amount of secondary production in manufacturing these instruments of production is very little. He said there would be a lessened cost of living. Surely my right hon. friend does not mean to give to the industrialists the idea that those who find a vocation in their particular plants are going to have a lessened cost of living. If that is done, if the living costs are reduced, in the next breath they will be saying that wages should be reduced also. I employ 140 men and I have not fired an honest one in ten years. I think every one of those men respects me, but I know they are all having a hard time to get along. Their wages are too low. If the Prime Minister holds out the bait of a lessened cost of living, certain manufacturers, with whom we do not like to associate, will take advantage of his statement and see that a lessened living cost means a smaller pay envelope. This would be bad business.

The hon. member stated that an increased demand for commodities would stimulate trade. Be careful to see that that increased demand for commodities is not supplied by our friends south of the border. I still have faith in the orthodox way of doing things. I have before me a long list of items to which I should like to refer, but I have not the time. I shall deal with one which is not very important; I shall not deal with those that do matter for fear that they might not be fixed up when the time comes. There are ninety-three establishments manufacturing jewelery in this country with a capital of $8,000,000. The total production is worth $6,000,000 and 1,600 men and 500 women are employed with wages amounting to $1,500,000 and salaries amounting to $779,000. Under the intermediate tariff articles of adornment will come into this country much more readily than previously. The government is endangering these ninety-three industries. At least they will be slowed up. You are not doing anything to stimulate this industry, you are endangering the vocations of these 1,600 men and 500 women.

I wonder how many of those men in the west who are in the habit of covering a driving shed with tar paper have been to Philadelphia and have seen that tremendous factory along the Schuylkil river which manufactures tar paper? The duty on tar paper has been reduced ten per cent. There are eleven factories in Canada manufacturing this commodity, with a total production valued at $4,000,000; five hundred men are employed in this industry which represents a total investment of $5,000,000. In practically every fair sized city throughout Canada you will find close to the gas works one of these factories manufacturing tar paper. There is danger of their product being displaced by the product of that gigantic company down by the Schuylkil.

The problem is so simple and has been enunciated so many times that I hesitate to repeat it. A manufacturer in the States will manufacture 1,000 units of his product. He sends out his travellers throughout the length and breadth of the States; they return with their orders, but when shipments are finally made it is found that there are 100 units which have not been sold. I do not care what industry you take, furniture, clothing, radios, furnaces or anything else, this applies equally to all. When the manufacturer sees he has 100 units still unsold does he send out his selling organization to try to sell these in the United States? No, they are dumped in Canada. It may be said that we have dumping regulations, but I say that the government has in the back of its head the idea that those dumping regulations will be done away with. These questions must be handled in an orthodox way, either that or get out to the end of the gangway. Those 100 units will be dumped in Canada.

My hon. friends on the treasury benches contend that they are anxious to do something for those who are in remunerative employment and for those who are employable but at present on the relief rolls. I am sure the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tuskin) probably will have something to say about this. I almost forgot the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler); he may have something to say. Surely the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) will speak about this matter. The old rate on furniture was 45 per cent, the new rate is 27½ per cent. The furniture industry employs 7,783 men and 565 women and pays wages and salaries amounting to $7,000,000. There are 380 factories in Canada and the industry as a whole has had very difficult times. During the past five years business has shrunk twenty, thirty and forty per cent. Furniture can be produced much more cheaply in the southern States than in Canada. The cost per unit is much less because of the greater use of automatic machinery to displace labour. The factories in Grand Rapids, Michigan, are more than anxious to supply western Canada with the necessary furniture. These manufacturers know and the government knows that this Canadian industry has had its trials and troubles because of the industrial codes which have been put upon the statute books of the province of Ontario. These employers are finding it difficult to get along and the government should be fair to them and give them an opportunity to survive.

I notice that it is intended to permit a tourist to bring back $100 worth of goods every time he goes to New York. The other Sunday evening a lady and her daughter came to my house for dinner. She told me that she had been in New York the week before with her daughter and that they had both bought new ensembles. They intended to go down to the Sunnyside boardwalk on Easter morning if it was fine and display their two hundred dollar purchases. Each and every year from 500,000 to 1,000,000 people cross the border between this country and the United States. I am not one who believes that because there are twelve times as many people south of the line, we can expect twelve times as much trade. If these million people who go back and forth every year bring in only one-half their quota of goods, it means goods to the value of $50,000,000. When this amount is broken down, as I indicated a few moments ago with other figures, it represents a reduction in the payrolls of Canadian people of $12,500,000 per year. The reduction will be at least that much, if not more.

When people from south of the border come over here they just shoot a few deer and take home the horns. They may take home a box of fish or a few pieces of woollen goods, but that is all. When it comes down to the question of style, we go to the United States. Look at what the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) brought from Broadway? What do you think of that? Was that made in New York? Goods brought home from New York! See the cut of it!

[Mr. Harris.]

But in garments such as these, in which my hon. friends may strut around, will be twenty-five dollars' worth of wages for an American citizen, wages taken from a Canadian. And what applies in that regard will apply not only to dress goods, but to Edison inventions of one kind or another, Westinghouse inventions of one kind or another, parts of this, that and the other, all the handicrafts of Americans who set the style, who set the vogue, who give us our new inventions, let in to the tune of $50,000,000, twelve and a half million dollars of which is taken from the wage earners of Canada.

While the present Prime Minister was in power for the ten years from 1921 to 1931, 1,255,000 of our people left Canada and 288,000 Canadians returned to Canada—a loss of close to a million in ten years; 100,000 a year on the average went south. They are not going south now; they are coming back. The duty of the Prime Minister as I see it is to provide for them, to provide for the employables, to provide for those who are to-day engaged in industry, and to see to it that his broad ideals about free trade and breaking down the barriers of world tariffs here and there do not blind him to his responsibility first to tackle the problem of finding work for the minds and hands of all kinds and classes of our people to-day, and then to go carefully on agreements such as this.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the organ tones of my hon. friend from Danforth (Mr. Harris) I could realize the joy that is in his heart because at last he is able to get up once more and make a typical old-fashioned, 1911, Tory, no truck or trade with the Yankees speech. I know how much he enjoys doing that, and we should allow him a little latitude because, during the months immediately prior to October 14 last, think of the repression which my hon. friend from Danforth had to exercise while his leader and other leaders of his party were making pilgrimages to Washington, almost on their hands and knees, in an endeavour to secure from that country an agreement which could not do for this country what the agreement of 1911 would have done had it been executed.

This government entered into the agreement with the United States of America because we sincerely believe that agreement to be a good thing for the Canadian people. We also believe that it is a good thing for the American people. We do not view matters of trade as matters of war, but we do view trade as a means of building up mutual interests. We believe it to be possible on the basis of the start now made, a start which has been striven for by people of good will in both countries for many years, to go forward and develop to the mutual advantage of people on both sides of the international border an ever increasing volume of trade. We do not claim perfection for the treaty. The negotiation of it was necessarily surrounded by the limitations which were upon the governments of both countries, limitations which have been discussed by both the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). This much is clear, however, from our point of view, that when the right hon. leader of the opposition says that he refused to sacrifice his country, thereby implying that we have done so, we make no great professions of pluperfect patriotism; we are not entitled to use the words "my country," as he does; we can only use the words "our country." We have not as large a proprietary interest in it, it is true, but we are Canadians, and we resent that old Tory accusation that we are sacrificing our country. No man in this house, no matter what his party, would intentionally sacrifice his country. We may make mistakes in judgment—all of us, I presume, have done so—but I do not believe there is a man in this house who falls short of another in his affection for and his support of this Dominion of Canada and its people.

With regard to my right hon. friend's speech I want to point out one or two things in it, in the short time at my disposal, and I shall hurry on and adhere very closely to my notes.

The right hon. gentleman indicated percentages of reduction in the treaty on United States goods coming into Canada, and he rolled over his tongue "100 per cent," "50 per cent," and another percentage, but he did not of course tell the house that these percentage reductions were exactly those involved in his note of November 14, 1934, to the government of the United States; that the offer made by my right hon. friend and his government involved all the percentage reductions he referred to.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I must rise to a question of order. There was no offer made. There was an offer of a basis for negotiations.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I expected my right hon. friend to correct me. It was a basis for negotiations. Whoever heard of any one advancing as a basis of negotiations more than he was prepared to give, or demanding in return less than he was prepared to take? This was the commencement of a deal. The advances a basis of negotiations, to use his own language. He does not mean to tell this house that he asked the United States for less than he was willing to take in opening negotiations. I do not think he would ask us to credit anything of the kind. My right hon. friend says, on page 625:

> I am one of those who have always been more or less alarmed and concerned about the favoured nation clauses in our treaties.

Well, sir, as a basis of negotiation, on November 14, 1934, he offered the United States of America full most favoured nation benefits in their relations with Canada. Those benefits must necessarily have been exactly the same then as now. There has been no change in the meantime.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, he has entirely misapprehended the point. The point was that that was the basis of negotiation, depending entirely upon what we got for it, and unless we got sufficent for it we would not give it.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall come to that point presently. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will remember these interruptions. Unlike my right hon. friend, I have not three hours; I have only forty minutes in which to develop my argument.

Then on page 627 my right hon. friend says:

> That means that we have bound ourselves not to increase the duties, either intermediate or general, during the term of this agreement on those seventy-seven items.

This is an entire misapprehension of fact. There is no such undertaking anywhere in the agreement as far as the general tariff is concerned. Later on the same page my right hon. friend refers to the right granted the nationals of any country under the intermediate tariff to bring in their goods through other intermediate countries, and he says that the practice of goods passing through other intermediate countries started with the French agreement of 1922. Perhaps the point is not of very great importance, except for the reference made to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in that connection, but I would point out that the same provision was in force for many years prior to 1922 and occurred specifically in the agreement with France negotiated in 1907. In fact it was in existence for many years prior to that in connection with British treaties to which our young dominion adhered. I might specially mention the old arrangement with Switzerland. It will be evident to everyone that it must have been the case in connection with any agreement with that country, because Switzerland is entirely an inland country and goods passing from Switzerland to Canada necessarily must pass through another country in order to reach our shores.

Then there is a most astonishing statement by my right hon. friend which apparently he expects us to take for granted. He says:

> I need hardly point out that in all the treaties that have been negotiated up to the present—and this we did point out with as much clarity as possible—we proceeded on the assumption that the United States was under the general tariff.

Then he goes on:

> I am not in a position at the moment to state what will be the result in the various countries with whom we have treaties, now that they find themselves no longer under their special treaties, meeting the conditions provided thereby, but are faced with a new set of conditions under which the nearby United States of America enjoys the same benefits and in some instances even greater benefits—

And so on. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a most astonishing statement, the idea that we told or implied to countries with whom we entered into agreements down through the years that the United States always would be under the general tariff, and that these countries, though they were getting only our intermediate tariff, could always rely on this great potential competitor, the United States, being subject to our general tariff. Well, certain fairly recent negotiations, those of 1932, under the late administration may have been carried on in that spirit or attitude of mind, but surely it was never stated by anyone in authority, even under the extraordinary circumstances of 1932, that the United States would remain always under the general tariff. No more was any such promise, statement or implication given in respect of Canada's past negotiations with any other country, British or foreign.

I am attaching very considerable importance to this, Mr. Speaker, and am being very careful of my words because it is an extraordinary spectacle to see a former prime minister deliberately suggesting to treaty countries that the government of the day in Canada has so acted that they, the treaty countries, find themselves no longer under their special treaties, to use the right hon. gentleman's own words, meeting the conditions provided thereby, but are faced with a new set of conditions. I quote exactly from my right hon. friend's words. Such an idea, I venture to say, sir, would not occur to any of the countries with whom Canada has commercial agreements, since Canada, no less than they, is free at any time to admit to its most favoured nation circle any nation on earth not formerly within that circle.

If my right hon. friend believes what he says in this regard how did he feel free to offer to the United States our intermediate tariff or our most favoured nation treatment? Surely he was not deceiving the United States in making that offer. How then, after the event, can he come here and create doubt in the minds of all those countries with whom Canada at present has trade treaties? Then my right hon. friend goes on to say:

> We have built up our ports on that assumption ... on the assumption that in all the treaties we made by which we granted favoured nation treatment to various countries of the world, it would be provided that they would ship their goods direct to this country through a lake, river or sea port.

Again I ask, did my right hon. friend inform the United States that the only kind of agreement he was willing to consider with respect to the United States would be one which compelled all goods coming from that country to Canada to enter in that manner? He knows perfectly well that he did not. It would have been an absurdity when, as a matter of fact, the boundaries of these two countries meet over three thousand miles of land. Such a provision inevitably would mean that parts of Canada could not import goods at all from the United States under the provisions of the treaty. If my right hon. friend really means what he says in this regard at least he should have pointed out to the United States in his note of November, 1934, that his offer was limited to goods that would be imported at sea, lake or river ports only. Did he do so? No.

Then the right hon. leader of the opposition asks what will be the effect on our railways. I for one am not apprehensive as to the effect on our railways, but I was apprehensive, as I believe members of the previous government were, of the possibilities inherent in the measures which had been proposed on several occasions in the United States congress by way of retaliation on Canada in this regard. There was, as every man who has occupied a position of ministerial responsibility in recent years knows, a grave danger that the White bill, or one of the other retaliatory measures which have been before congress in recent years, might possibly have become law, and it is not too much to say that both our great railway corporations were very apprehensive of the result of such a retaliatory measure on the part of the United States.

Then I come to the effect on our factories. Men are being released from employment, my right hon. friend says, in some of those branch factories to-day because it is cheaper to produce the goods in the central United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have made some inquiries. Some of the very few branch factories from which men are being released are branches of United States concerns which have been in existence in Canada in recent years with extremely high protection, achieved by means of arbitrary valuations, which had no economic justification for existence.

Then the right hon. gentleman developed his argument further and said, "We have a right to know whether the intermediate tariff is to be raised or not, because it changes the agreement." Well, Mr. Speaker, in fact it does precisely the opposite, because the agreement itself reserves to the Dominion of Canada full control over its intermediate tariff, with the exception of those items specifically excepted, which are contained in a schedule separate from all the rest. As to the right of the opposition to know to-day what will be proposed in the budget with regard to the intermediate tariff, it would be just as reasonable to ask what will be in the budget with respect to the intermediate tariff next year or the following year. The right of Canada to deal with its intermediate tariff, with the exceptions I have noted, is specifically and clearly preserved in the agreement. And we propose to deal with the intermediate tariff in accordance with the best judgment of this government and in the interests of the people of Canada. We shall propose to the house from time to time, in successive budgets, such modifications, up or down as the case may be, as we feel we can justify to this parliament as being in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Then my right hon. friend says, on page 629:

> The government may reduce every item in the tariff except those with respect to which they are bound to specific duties or free entry, ...

Well, Mr. Speaker, the bound items do not bind the government of Canada not to reduce. They merely bind the government of Canada not to increase during the currency of the agreement. We have perfect freedom to reduce the rates with respect to the bound items, and my right hon. friend was quite incorrect in his reference to that matter.

Then there was a dramatic interlude. The right hon. gentleman gave a list of items which must be considered by this government —eggs, oats; he goes on all through the list. Now, these items existed in exactly their present form when the basis of negotiation of November 14, 1934, was offered to the United States. My right hon. friend knew at that time that these rates existed and that if he succeeded in making the treaty he would be faced with the question of how items such as these should be dealt with. And he expected, as this government expected—and as this government accomplished—that the right of this parliament to change its intermediate tariff on such items would be entirely preserved. I presume my right hon. friend knew perfectly well that he could not come to this parliament with any agreement which involved a wholesale surrender of the right of parliament to deal with its intermediate tariff. In that regard we agree with him, and we have preserved the right of parliament to deal with its own tariffs.

Then the leader of the opposition becomes very much concerned. He says, "What more can we give the United States than we have already given them under this agreement? What have we left to negotiate with?" "All is lost," he says, "nothing more can be done." What are the facts? Sir, there are hundreds of items in the Canadian tariff on which the existing rates are relatively high and often prohibitive. There are scores of items on which the intermediate tariff is the same as the general. In my humble opinion we have a great deal with which to bargain with the United States, if we wish to put it that way.

Then my right hon. friend got into a little difficulty with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). At page 634 the Minister of Trade and Commerce asked:

> Mr. Euler: Did you ask for fifty per cent?

And the leader of the opposition replied:

> Mr. Bennett: The question is not whether we asked for fifty per cent; we said fifty per cent would not be adequate.

Now I am in some difficulty, because a great deal of the information regarding these negotiations which is in the possession of the government is necessarily confidential. Obviously also we do not want to be in the position of cross-examining civil servants, who served the late government and serve ourselves faithfully and well. But I can say this, that there is nothing on record anywhere showing that my right hon. friend ever asked for the full fifty per cent, the full extent of the president's powers, across the whole line of the American tariff. There is on the other hand plenty of evidence that my right hon. friend never had in his mind the possibility of getting a fifty per cent cut on the whole American tariff. What is that evidence? What did he suggest as a basis of negotiation? Now, anyone knowing him would know that he would ask for enough. He would surely ask for the utmost possible by way of concession from the United States. And what did he ask for? He asked that the United States should reduce its tariff by fifty per cent on a specified number of natural products—not all across the board, as he said the other day—and reduce existing rates on a number of partly or wholly manufactured products of Canada. This was offered as a basis of negotiation. If my right hon. friend ever expected to get a fifty per cent cut right across the board, surely he would have asked for it in his basis of negotiation. Surely he did not expect the President of the United States to say: Why Mr. Bennett, you have not asked for enough!

My time is getting along, and I want to deal now with the point of my right hon. friend's argument that we have given far too much for what we have received. What have we given? Again I refer to my right hon. friend's basis of negotiations of November 14, 1934. He offered the whole intermediate tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, perhaps I had better quote from the note.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, just quote. I hesitate to interrupt.

Mr. DUNNING: I read this:

The mutual concession of tariff treatment as favourable as that accorded to any other foreign country;—

Mr. BENNETT: Read the first part.

Mr. DUNNING: These are my right hon. friend's own words:

—this means that Canada would extend to the United States its intermediate tariff—

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING:

—involving reductions from the present rates of duty on some some seven hundred items, including both natural and manufactured products, together with a number of further reductions below the intermediate tariff rates through the extension to the United States of concessions made by Canada in trade conventions with foreign countries.

That is what my right hon. friend said. Now he says he did not offer the intermediate tariff to the President of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that he did not. If the hon. gentleman desires to read from the note, let him read what is said. That was the basis of negotiation; then follows a statement of what we wanted in return, and the Secretary of State wrote to us saying each item would have to be taken up item by item.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course. But my right hon. friend in this original basis of negotiation offered the intermediate tariff.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: He did not do that. He offered that only as a basis of negotiation.

Mr. DUNNING: And he now desires us to believe that he offered as a basis of negotiation something less than he was willing—

Mr. BENNETT: No, he did not say that either. It depended on what he got.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend offered as a basis of negotiation most favoured nation treatment, in the clause I have just read. He offered the binding of the free list, and he offered shipping participation. Will my right hon. friend deny that?

Mr. BENNETT: Offered what?

Mr. DUNNING: Shipping participation, the shipping provision.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly he did not make any offer of that kind.

Mr. DUNNING: Then my right hon. friend stands convicted—

Mr. BENNETT: No, hold on. Does the hon. member ask me whether or not it is in the document?

Mr. DUNNING: I ask if my right hon. friend offered the United States the direct shipment provision.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not offer them direct shipment, because no bargain was arrived at. The matter was discussed; that is the position. It was discussed, that is all.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid my right hon. friend would stand convicted of having deceived the United States because—

Mr. BENNETT: Not one bit of it; it was discussed, and that is as far as it got.

Mr. DUNNING: The language of the note is clear, and I would commend it to the study of all hon. members.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a truly historic document. The man who wrote it is forever estopped from criticizing the treaty which this government entered into.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing the following resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty's Government in the Dominion of Canada and the Government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

At the outset I wish to say that I propose to support the resolution and to facilitate the introduction of the necessary legislation, so that in its course through the house, in the commitee of the whole and the various stages the details may be discussed.

It is not my present intention to discuss many of those details. A few I shall touch upon by way of illustration, but I do wish to deal with some of the principles involved in, shall I say, this transaction. May I preface what I wish to say a little later on by observing that one could scarcely call this agreement a treaty of reciprocity, in the old acceptation of that term. Rather it is a trade agreement based upon the modern exigencies of the case and the times. I do not believe there is much to be gained by an analytical examination of the history of the two old parties in Canada with respect to the reciprocity policy. A few days ago we listened to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and he will pardon me if I suggest that the first two hours of his speech spent upon a well worked out historical record was less interesting than the last half hour which dealt with the treaty. I think the same can be said about other speeches we have heard. The argument back and forth as to whether the Tory party was for reciprocity and the Liberal party more so is not of much avail.

I am going to speak for myself. I have been in the house for, I believe, twenty-five years. Up until a year ago, or thereabouts, I was a member of the Conservative party. I cannot recall that during that time the Conservative party favoured reciprocity with the United States. Certainly I did not. I may have been misguided or misled, but certainly I am not going to pretend to the house that I favoured reciprocity, because I did not. In 1911, my first election campaign, I was elected after a very bitter controversy over reciprocity. On many occasions since I have opposed reciprocity in various forms. I would not be true to myself or to my past record were I to pretend to-day that I was or had been in favour of reciprocity.

In 1932 or thereabouts, however, at a time when I was Minister of Trade and Commerce, I realized that the trade relations between Canada and the United States were not on a very good basis. For many years—and I am not excepting the period between 1922 and 1930 when the right hon. gentleman opposite was in power—we had had, shall I say, certain controversial relations with the United States on these matters. There was no open governmental controversy, but it was well known that the views of leaders in the United States were strongly against reciprocal arrangements with Canada, and on the other hand there was a good deal of criticism in Canada of the attitude of the United States towards entry of our goods. So I might be justified in saying that there was a degree of controversy.

About 1932, in view of conditions that were developing the world over and the inhibitions against Canadian exports entering other countries, I felt that quotas, import restrictions, the raising of tariffs, what is commonly called a national spirit, which was so prevalent and is still so prevalent throughout the world, placed many obstacles in the way of our trade and in the way of trade generally. I felt it was highly desirable that Canada should study the trade relations between our country and the United States, and with that in mind I instructed the staff under me at the time to proceed to a study of the trade between the two countries, and to prepare in detail the items upon which without injury to ourselves and in all fairness to the United States we might offer some considerations for favourable trade. I find in the agreement many of the items which we reviewed about three years ago. Many of the commodities we had studied then are included both in the note of November 14 and in the treaty. Why, under those circumstances, should I oppose the agreement?

In considering this matter I think we might take a look at the world. If we do that we will note that the great continent of Asia is the scene of threatened conflict—I am not overstating it when I use that word—between the great empire of Japan, and Russia, with China as the bone of contention. Every day in press reports we find announcements of new developments, and relations are very much strained. There is little evidence of peace and good will in Asia. Turning to Europe we find all the older and more powerful nations feverishly arming and eagerly making alliances one with the other when they think such alliances will help them in the defence of their realm—not trade agreements, not commercial understandings with each other, but alliances of defence or offence, as the case may be. Africa is a cockpit, and at the present time a slaughter is taking place in that continent which certainly offers a challenge to the modern idea of humanitarian practice. However on the American continents, both north and south, we have a condition of peace and accord, and nothing threatens the good will of our people. I suggest, therefore, that any gesture of good will between important countries on the North American continent is a splendid contribution to the general cause of peace and good will and concord, and while the Prime Minister may have exaggerated to some extent its influence on the rest of the world, one thing is certain in my mind, and that is that we would do well to ensure as far as we possibly can that there shall be enduring peace and concord in this part of the world. I know of no better way, Mr. Speaker, of bringing about that condition than by settling all outstanding trade and commercial difficulties and differences.

May I read an extract from this famous paper that has been quoted so often, and which I agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is historic and important. I quote from the reply of Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State for the United States, to the famous note of November 14. The American minister in his reply says:

> I believe that a point has now been reached when an exchange of views on this subject with Canada should be undertaken, and I am, therefore, gratified to learn that your government is of the same mind. Whatever the desirability of the freest possible exchange of natural products, and indeed other products, between the United States and Canada as an ultimate goal, the United States government must in any negotiations undertaken at this time restrict itself to measures authorized by the Trade Agreements Act, 1934.

The point to which I wish to call attention in this quotation is that the agreement is obviously looked upon by the government of the United States, and so declared in this historic document, as a step towards some ultimate goal which would be of a wider character than the present agreement or than that which was outlined in the note of November 14, 1934. And so, Mr. Speaker, in supporting this resolution and facilitating the passage of this measure we are taking, I believe, a step towards a larger and a more complete ultimate understanding with the United States. If that can be achieved I think it is all to the good.

Let us look for a moment at the agreement. The agreement is, as I have said, a step or a gesture in the right direction. I notice that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day seemed desirous of justifying himself for the action he had taken. I want to say to him that I do not think he needs to do that at all. I think that the result of his action is measurably satisfactory. I shall deal with the agreement in more detail a little later on, but on the whole I think he has every reason to believe that he has made a satisfactory arrangement, not wholly satisfactory, but a fairly satisfactory arrangement that does not need any justification.

I would like to pause here to commend the utterance of the Prime Minister when he paid tribute to the permanent officers and officials of the government. In his capacity as Prime Minister I suppose it would not have been proper for him to make mention of any particular names, but I do not feel bound, shall I say, by that same degree of reticence. I should like to pay tribute to Doctor Skelton, head of the external affairs department, and his staff, because I know something of the work they have done in this matter. I should like also to pay tribute to Mr. Wilgress and his staff for the splendid detailed work they have done in this and in many other matters. I should also like to pay tribute to Mr. McKinnon, one of the ablest officials that we have in the government of Canada in tariff matters. I say from experience and from intimate contact with these and other officials that no minister could possibly discharge his duties in a matter of this kind without having at his elbow these splendid officials, and Canada can well be proud of its permanent civil service. I do not think it is out of the way once in a while to pay public tribute to these men on an occasion of this kind.

I should also like to refer to the work, because I know something of the task that he had, that was done by Mr. Herridge as the representative of this country in Washington. In this connection and in other matters I think his services to Canada are worthy of note and commendation, and I would say to the Prime Minister that neither he nor any other head of the government will lose in dignity or prestige by acknowledging that others within the ambit of government may have some part to play in the success of negotiations of this kind and in the discharge of these very difficult duties.

The Liberal program has frequently cited external trade as a likely cure for many internal ills. The Prime Minister put it in rather eloquent language the other day when he said, "Depression means absence of trade." Then he reversed it and said, "Trade means the end of depression." I should like just here to sound a note of warning and to say that while I take second place to no one in desiring to promote Canada's external trade, we would be misleading the country were we to leave the impression on the minds of those who are to-day unemployed, our agriculturists and our unemployed workers, that their troubles are ended with the expansion of trade. That would be a mistake. By all means let us expand our trade and do everything possible in that direction. It may be a contribution towards the ending of commercial stagnation, but it is not a cure for the problems of agriculture and of labour. It may ameliorate present conditions, but it will not cure them or solve our problems, and I think it would be unwise for us to assume that it would.

Coming to the agreement itself, I would say that the making of a treaty is a difficult matter at any time. You cannot always get things and never give something in return; that is clear. It is absurd to suggest that we can reach out and get all we want and give nothing in return. All we have to do is to read the public press and note the grievous complaints made south of the line regarding this trade agreement as evidence that they feel that some of their interests have been sacrificed, while on this side other interests feel that they have been sacrificed. It is not clever to criticize this treaty simply because individual interests may be affected. I am not disregarding them, and I hope time will permit me to touch on a few before I am through, but you could never make any trade agreement if you had to safeguard the interests of every individual in the country. It simply could not be done. There are bound to be some cases where there appears to be an injury, but what I would suggest is that we wait for a time and see whether these imagined injuries are real.

In the first place I want to say that this treaty is good because the motive and intention behind it are good, and I think it should be supported because the motive and intention are good. There is a spirit of good will in the treaty which ought to be and I am sure is welcomed by both countries.

The next point is the most favoured nation provision, about which there is a great deal of misunderstanding. For many years I was one of those who had a doubt, and I still have it, as to the wisdom of originally adopting the most favoured nation system of trade agreements. We have had this provision in effect in this country for twenty years or more, but it has been accentuated during the last sixteen years. During the last fifteen years the government of the right hon. gentleman opposite and the government of hon. members on this side have made in the neighbourhood of twenty to thirty treaties containing such a provision. I believe there are twenty-seven such treaties now outstanding. Let us examine this provision for a moment. It is comparatively simple, but it is significant. I should like to read one or two extracts from treaties to indicate the wording of this provision. The treaty with Czechoslovakia contains this clause:

> Articles the produce or manufacture of Canada imported into Czechoslovakia and articles the produce or manufacture of Czechoslovakia imported into Canada shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges than those paid on the like articles the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country.

The treaty with Finland contains a clause which is somewhat different, and which reads:

> Goods produced or manufactured in Finland shall receive in Canada treatment as favourable as that accorded to goods produced or manufactured in any other foreign country so long as goods produced or manufactured in Canada enjoy in Finland the same treatment as is enjoyed by similar goods produced or manufactured in the United Kingdom.

There are some twenty-seven similar treaties, the present one making twenty-eight. What does this provision mean? Suppose we made an agreement to-morrow with Honduras—I suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) that if we had a treaty with Honduras we could do business with that country which we cannot do at the present time—containing certain concessions. Those concessions would apply to the goods from all the twenty-eight countries with which we have similar treaties. On the other hand, we would enjoy any favour shown by Honduras to any other country.

There is one feature of this matter which has not been noted or recognized. Up until a matter of two or three years ago the historic policy of the United States was one tariff for all. That country has now adopted the system, which we are following in part, of making special agreements with other countries. Where the United States makes an agreement with a country with which we have an agreement, we will enjoy the same privileges as those given to the United States. I believe there are some seven or eight countries with which the United States has made agreements and with which we have also agreements. The two countries will be placed on the same basis and inasmuch as we export many things which are also exported by the United States, we will have an added advantage in those countries.

The next point to which I should like to refer is the maintenance of the free list. Since the change in policy of the United States we have been threatened with the cancellation of favoured treatment in that market unless we made this agreement. That would have been very serious to us. Let me mention a few items on the free list. Last night the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) brought up the matter of agricultural implements. One of the arguments advanced for a tariff against goods coming into Canada from the United States is the fact that the population of the United States is 120,000,000 while that of Canada is only 10,000,000. That is a perfectly valid argument, but in the case of agricultural implements we have had free access to that market of 120,000,000 people for many years. The bases for the agricultural implement industry in Canada offer first hand opportunities for large production, yet shortly after the signing of this agreement these manufacturers raised their prices. The resolution introduced by the hon. member proposes that an inquiry should be held. Whether or not an inquiry is held, I say to the Prime Minister that he should bring representatives of the International Harvester Company and the Massey-Harris Company, the two largest manufacturers, to Ottawa, and ask them to show reason why prices have been raised. I do not want to impinge upon the other debate, but this is germane to this subject. For the last five or six years the farmers of this country have experienced a diminution in the prices of their products and in their purchasing power. Then just as prices were recovering, just as they were given an opportunity to buy, these implement companies raised their prices, There may be justification for this raise but it is not discernible to the average man. I think they should be called to Ottawa to show cause for these increased prices.

The next item to which I should like to refer is wood pulp. Do hon. members realize what the maintenance of this item upon the free list means? I have before me figures showing the imports into the United States of various kinds of pulp products, such as newsprint and that sort of thing. The total imports in 1935 were $146,000,000 in round figures. The imports from Canada in that year were valued at $89,000,000; from Newfoundland, $3,700,000; from Norway, $4,600,000; from Sweden, $28,000,000; from Finland, $8,000,000; from Germany, $5,000,000; from Czechoslovakia $1,000,000, and from France $4,800,000. It will be noted from these figures that by no means do we control that market for these products. At the present time we have an advantage because of propinquity to the market, facilities of manufacture, transportation and so on, but there are present all the elements of successful competition from these various countries unless we can maintain our position on the free list. Let us not forget that this is one of the big items of export from this country and it should be safeguarded by every possible means.

[Mr. Stevens.]

For several years there has been a distinct agitation in the United States for a duty against wood pulp and newsprint in order to encourage the production of these articles from southern pine. Successful experiments have been made in the production of these articles from this wood. Take another item. We have had free access to the American market for shingles, and I well remember that for a period of over a year when I was Minister of Trade and Commerce we were labouring under the greatest anxiety because of the efforts that were being made to stop the importation of shingles into the United States. That is something which is vital to the lumber and the shingle industry of British Columbia, and it is safeguarded and ensured and stabilized by this treaty.

Then, as regards squared timbers, ties, poles and posts, here again is a tremendous business of a very valuable character for the working men of this country, the settlers and people more or less of the poorer class who cut these poles and make these ties; we have free access to the American market for them; it is safeguarded and ensured in this treaty. It is not enough to say that it was free before, because I know from my own experience that in many of these cases we were threatened with the shutting of these commodities out of the American market, or with an impost that would have affected them had we not made this treaty.

There is also the stabilization of our position with regard to cattle, sawn timber, and some, although not enough, of the fish products; there are some we should like to see added. But again I recall to the minds of hon. members what was said by Mr. Cordell Hull, that this was a step towards what it was ultimately hoped to achieve; and what we do not yet have we can hope later on to secure. But we did stabilize certain classes of fish, and particularly lobsters.

There is also an item regarding leather to which I should like just to make reference. I have cited only a few items. There are many others. These are items of major importance to Canadian trade and to the Canadian workman. It was highly desirable that we should ensure that these should be maintained either on the free list, or at a low rate of duty, such as is the case with the items to which I have referred.

No doubt difficulties will arise. It is inevitable and unavoidable in a treaty of this character, particularly after these long years of controversy, not without bitterness, that difficulties and complaints will arise. But I would remind the house, and I say in all sincerity—that we are free to amend the intermediate tariff if we wish, although I would warn the government and the house that we should not exercise that right carelessly; this should be done with tact and courtesy and with consideration for the other party to the agreement. But where it is shown that an injustice is done, where it can be demonstrated that someone or some industry is injured, the proper course is to take the matter up through the usual diplomatic channels with the authorities of the United States, as the treaty in several articles provides, and make suggestions for adjustments along those lines. Undoubtedly suggestions will come from the other side. I have had something to do with several agreements, and I have never known of one where complaints have not arisen from both sides after it was passed, nor have I known of any agreement where adjustments have not been made after it had been signed and put into effect. We cannot give with one hand and withdraw with the other. We must recognize that there are two parties to a deal of this kind.

I should like to make very brief reference to a few matters which appear to me to give some cause for anxiety. There is the question of the hundred dollars free entry. Persons going to the United States may, on returning, bring in goods freely to the value of one hundred dollars. This has been the case in the United States for many years, and during that time Canada has built up quite a nice trade because of that privilege granted to American citizens who come to this country to buy goods and return to the United States with those goods free up to one hundred dollars worth. I should like to suggest to the minister who has charge, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), that the privilege granted in this agreement should be limited distinctly to private purchases. There are certain specialty dealers, particularly in radios, electrical appliances, and some of the higher priced smaller articles, who might take advantage of this provision. By constantly running backwards and forwards from, say the Niagara peninsula to Buffalo, or Windsor to Detroit, or points on the St. Lawrence to various towns on the other side, it might be possible for dealers of that character to take advantage of this one hundred dollars rule to do an injustice to their competitors in Canada. I do not think there should be much difficulty; at any rate I do not think it is beyond the ability of the Department of National Revenue to devise regulations which will safeguard that provision from abuse. I wonder if those who complain about this realize the advantage that we have now and have had for many years in selling American tourists gifts to the extent of one hundred dollars per person. We must recognize that.

Then the florists are making some complaints, and there is danger there. It is quite true that some distance south it is quite easy to raise all sorts of flowers from bulbs and other stock and ship them into Canada under this treaty. The government ought to take into account that Canadian florists have paid substantial duties on their bulbs, rose-bushes, and other stock of that calibre and are entitled to some consideration in that respect. The case is somewhat complex. On the one hand you have those in Canada who produce bulbs and base stock asking for protection, and then you have dealers of cut flowers, the finished product, also asking for protection, claiming that they have to pay this duty. I suggest to the government that an effort should be made to see that no real injustice is done to those who are producing florist stock in Canada.

The other day when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) were before the house, reference was made by some of my hon. friends from British Columbia, to baby chicks. This sounds like a trivial matter, although to British Columbia it is of some importance. But I would remind my friends from that province—and I take second place to none of them in my desire to protect its interests—that British Columbia has received splendid concessions on lumber which have already been of tremendous benefit to them. They have the assurance of free entry for shingles, which is of great importance to them. I would remind them that there are some provinces to which we cannot now ship our baby chicks, and I think that before we complain about the danger of competition from the United States we should get the Minister of Agriculture to unravel the problem of shipping our baby chicks within Canada; when we accomplish that, perhaps we can turn our attention to the other matter.

Perhaps we have slipped up on the question of potatoes. As I understand it, there is a duty on Canadian potatoes going into the United States, while United States potatoes come in here free. We have clarified the matter of seed potatoes, but the other question affecting potatoes is rather serious. I do not doubt that it can be rectified if the matter is carefully examined and placed in its proper light. No objection could be found to raising the intermediate duty here if, after such examination, this was deemed desirable. I suggest it is a matter that should receive study and consideration.

I was rather amused at the reference to the furniture industry, that there was a danger of our driving the furniture manufacturers of Canada out of business. The pathetic story of the furniture industry is pretty well set out in the price spreads report, from which I will quote, because in my opinion the question of tariff has nothing to do with the matter at all. I will read just two or three extracts from the report of the price spreads commission with regard to the furniture manufacturing industry:

> Coincident, however, with the growth of furniture factories was a concentration in retail distribution which led to the elimination of more and more independent outlets. In the city of Winnipeg during the past twelve or fifteen years approximately one furniture dealer per annum has ceased business and at the present time there remains only one dealer aside from the department stores.

The same story may be told of nearly every city in Canada. Then the report goes on:

> ... it became of paramount importance to every manufacturer to sell to the department stores. The concentration of purchasing power in the hands of the latter undoubtedly intensified competition and accentuated the severity of the necessary adjustment.

I will ask the house to note what is said in conclusion, in view of the suggestion that the furniture industry is to be injured by a lowering of the tariff from forty-five per cent to twenty-seven per cent:

> ... this industry presents an illustration of a completely disorganized body of producers.... The field of retail distribution of the industry's product is, however, dominated by a few department stores, giving rise to a wide disparity in bargaining power between the producer and the distributor of furniture.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but already he has spoken for more than forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Finish.

Mr. STEVENS: With your consent, Mr. Speaker, I will finish:

> The result of such disparity, combined with over-extension of production facilities, has been to drive prices to a point well below the proper cost of production with a consequent impairment not only of the manufacturer's capital, but of the standard of living of the wage-earner.

I refer to that particularly because it indicates that the question of the tariff has nothing to do with the welfare of that industry. It is a domestic question and a matter of their own practice in control of their own business.

Just in conclusion, sir, may I say that in my opinion the proper course to follow is to give this agreement a chance. Let us see whether it will work. The government has promised great things from this treaty, and the country is looking for great results. I would say to the government that the measure of success attained will depend largely upon the manner in which this agreement is administered.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as this is my first opportunity to do so I should like to extend my congratulations to you and to the deputy speaker of the house upon your appointment to the high positions which you occupy.

As I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), I could not help but think how great minds change. I well recall that when the Minister of Finance first came to parliament he entered this house as more or less of a free trader from western Canada. This afternoon, however, he reserved the right, when the intermediate tariff is dealt with in the budget, to revise it either upward or downward. 'Twixt the wheat fields of Saskatchewan and the lights of St. James street his policy has altered almost as rapidly as his location has changed. As I listened to the hon. member for Kootenay East, who also supported this proposed agreement, I could not help but recall the vigorous protectionist speeches made by the hon. gentleman in other days.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Now the hon. gentleman is presenting an equally vigorous defence on behalf of the low tariff party. I am reminded of those words which have been set to music, "What a difference just a few years make." I am not surprised that one who has changed so often should perhaps prefer not to refer to the records of the two major political parties in this country.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am glad to anticipate certain advantages which may accrue from the proposed agreement, but I am alarmed when I consider the serious dangers that threaten the economic life and national outlook of Canada. I have heard it said in the house that this achievement is the dream of Laurier Liberalism come true; I have heard it said that this agreement has been brought about through the good feeling that has been established between the two countries. No matter how much one might be tempted to do so, however, I do not think any hon. member on either side of the house should claim that his party is the only one that desires a reasonable increase in trade with the United States. I have read many of the debates that have taken place in this chamber; I have listened to speakers on both sides for ten or eleven sessions and I am satisfied that ever since confederation every party in the house has had an underlying desire for a closer trade relationship with the United States. More than that, practically every party has made definite efforts to that end. Some have merely clamored for more trade on a free trade basis; others have advocated fair trade; others have supported reciprocity at any price, while still others have insisted that any agreement or reciprocity must be one that would reciprocate advantages to Canadians as well as to Americans.

I know that for a long time there has been a difference of thought as between high and low tariffs but, as someone has well said, any agreement is popular at its inception. Therefore I hesitate to forecast the ill effects that I believe may result from this agreement, because for a long time the idea of some such agreement has been very popular in the public mind. However, if there is any one thing more conspicuous than the spectacular manner in which this agreement was speedily ushered into this house, it is the evident lack of consideration that was given to it. Why, on the part of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) it was only a holiday affair; it took him only forty-eight hours to negotiate an agreement which for forty-eight years his party had failed to bring into effect.

I do not intend to go into all the details of this agreement. They have been well covered by my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) and well explained from the other point of view by the right hon. Prime Minister, but I feel in duty bound to point out to the house some of the general principles involved as well as the reason why I propose to vote against this agreement. I intend to express my lack of confidence in the fiscal policies of the Liberal party and to deal with a few of the details of the agreement which I believe threaten the economic independence and national outlook of this country.

It is true, as has been well said, that we live in close proximity to a country speaking our language, having the same customs, and with similar standards of living. Interchange of goods, views and even influence during the years has been much more convenient than would have been the case had our traditions been more foreign and our geographical location more distant. We find our trade has developed enormously; even without any agreements we have had an enormous volume of trade with the United States for many years. Canada has achieved the unique position of being the greatest foreign customer of that vast republic. The Prime Minister of Canada has for many years been a champion of friendly relations with the United States and has repeatedly expressed the underlying desire of Canadians for the closest possible relations with that country. Little need be said about our peaceful relations with the United States; for over one hundred years we have maintained a relationship based upon a desire for international peace, a relationship closer than exists probably between any other two countries.

But it has been said, and said truly, that there is no sentiment in business; that statement I believe has never been challenged. I think it is equally true that bad trade arrangements and unsound trade policies have never improved relations between any two nations. There are in trade elements that are important and vital, and one of the most important is regularity and stability. We have no particular assurance of any stability, regularity or continuity of demand in trade with the United States. As I look back over our history—and I am not afraid to look back; I look back sometimes to get more light that I may see further ahead—and when I think of the trade agreement we had with the United States from 1854 to 1866, the oldest trade agreement and the only one that ever stood with that country, which was cut off abruptly, I read of how our pioneer forefathers were forced to struggle for their livelihood when they found that trade which had been established north and south suddenly cut off. Everyone knows that the cutting off of that trade was a considerable factor in bringing about confederation, and led to the establishment of a transcontinental railway and to a national fiscal policy, a national plan for our development east and west, because our fathers saw the danger of building on the shifting sand of a market controlled by another country. With that in view we find that immediately after 1866 when that trade was cut off these other developments that, after all, are the fundamental features of our national structure were established. From that day on, from Quebec to British Columbia, we have steadily developed our trade east and west; the transcontinental railways, which those who still desired trade north and south forecast would not pay for the axle grease, were made to pay and served the great provinces of the west, and that development east and west has been such as to make it possible for the Prime Minister, as head of the sixth trading nation of the world, now to negotiate with a great foreign power.

Among the factors involved in this issue are trade, transportation and employment. I shudder to think of the effect upon our great transportation systems that are to-day operating with difficulty, when under this agreement trade is encouraged to flow north and south rather than east and west, when the short haul of the United States roads to serve western Canada from the cites of the central states replaces the haul from our eastern cities, which I believe it must be said in all fairness have done fairly well by assistance to the western provinces. It might reasonably be expected that north and south trade would develop markets for us when we remember that there are some 125 million people to the south of us while we have only about 11 million here, but I am amazed to find that in the last forty years we have purchased from the United States every year $150,000,000 more in value of goods than we have sold to them. Let us pause to imagine what that means, a total of $6,000,000,000, double the national debt, equal to the total agricultural production of Canada every six years. That is what we have paid for our trade with the United States, and we still owe them $1,000,000 in carrying charges on our debt every day the sun sets. This great trade has been established, why? Because the United States, just as in this trade agreement, have seen to it all down through the years that they supply us with the finished products of the labouring men of the United States and receive from us more in volume of raw products but less in value until processed by American labour. Not even the minister who smiles can deny that the advantages secured in this agreement, which are very small, are for our raw products and only to a very limited degree even at that.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will permit me, I was smiling at his speech, and wondering if he had been in favour of the agreement his leader tried to negotiate.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I can only say that I have followed my leader longer than the hon. minister has ever followed any leader. I believe in trade east and west, trade that will develop Canada for the Canadian people. I have no apology to make for any of our slogans in the past, no apology for any of our policies in the past, no apology for the encouragement of trade that assists our own ports instead of American ports, no apology for policies that assist our own labour rather than American labour. I have reason for lacking confidence in the present government's fiscal policy, because even you, Mr. Speaker, before you dropped your political affiliations, realized full well, looking back over the pathway of Liberal fiscal policy that it was a path strewn with fear, failure and uncertainty. When I think of its winding, changing course in the fiscal affairs of this dominion, I say "fear" advisedly. The Prime Minister smiles. I do not mean to say that he is fearful under all circumstances. I have seen him quite brave in parliament; I have seen him quite brave in the country, and I congratulate him upon his success. But I find as I look back over the record that Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie, and his former leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, warned us against trade policies that would annoy or irritate the United States. Then prior to 1930, when American tariff increases were being discussed and the present Prime Minister was urged by those on this side of the house to raise our tariffs against the United States I remember him saying: No, we must not do anything for fear it might be considered provocative in the United States at this time.

When the Prime Minister spoke a few days ago he went into details, covering two pages of Hansard, in outlining his policy of fear, in which he stated that if we did not negotiate the agreement immediately, the United States threatened to retaliate; that they would raise their tariffs, placing them in the general column, an innovation in tariff practice which the right hon. gentleman explained. He said, further, that apart from the treaty he was fearful that the United States might retaliate by higher tariffs unless we reduced our tariffs in some way or made it possible by our intermediate tariff arrangements and regulations to allow trade to come in through American as well as Canadian ports. In the view of the right hon. gentleman to do otherwise might be costly to our newsprint industry, in that newsprint might no longer be exported to the United States unless we accepted this agreement.

To-day as I listened to the Minister of Finance it appeared to me that evidently he has been contaminated by that feature of the policy, and that he was also fearful of retaliation from the United States. When we consider the history of Canada all through the years we find that more or less that has been the policy of the Liberal party endeavouring to consummate United States agreements; that all through the years they have emphasized to a greater or lesser degree that we should not irritate or annoy that country. We received the warning about not being provocative to the United States at a time when we were buying a million dollars worth of goods more from them each day than we were selling to them. Canada changed her favourable trade balance of over $400,000,000 in 1926 to an unfavourable trade balance of over $100,000,000 in 1930. During that period we did not increase our unfavourable trade balance by $150,000,000, as was mentioned previously, as an average, but were buying over $300,000,000—in fact, in 1929 I believe it was over $400,000,000—more from the United States than we sold them. The Prime Minister knows as well as does any other hon. member that during those years almost half a million of our boys and girls went to the United States to find employment.

These are serious national matters, of great concern to the dominion. I know it would not be expected by hon. members to your right, and overflowing to your left, Mr. Speaker, that I would have much confidence in the fiscal policy of the Liberal party. But I say in all kindness to each individual of that large, unwieldy and possibly temporary force that the policy of their party so far as trade relations are concerned has changed many times. I have read where leaders as great as Hon. George Brown left the Conservative party, after the government of that day tried so hard to renew the treaty that had been cut off in 1866. He left it and joined the Liberal party because the late Sir John A. Macdonald offered too much on behalf of the Canadian government. Later, that same Liberal party, which at one time thought not enough was being offered and another time thought we offered too much, changed to unrestricted reciprocity. Then later, by name alone it followed a policy of commercial union with the United States. On down through the years we find those different suggestions dying; one by one; some died in parliament; some died in congress; some died before they got to congress and others died in the country. In 1911 reciprocity died before the vote of the people, and I venture to say that if this trade agreement were presented to the Canadian people in the light in which it has been presented to this chamber it would not carry a majority of the votes of this country to-day.

One could name many more instances, but I would hesitate to do so. We know however that such a great leader of the Liberal party as Sir Richard Cartwright took a definite stand in the matter. One can trace a changing Liberal doctrine all down through the years. The late Sir Richard Cartwright said that we must have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, no matter what the cost may be. He said, "We will have it, no matter what the cost is." Twitted in parliament and asked if he did not think this would affect our trade with the United Kingdom he said, "Yes, and the only way to get it is by raising your tariff all along the line against every country on the face of the world, even the United Kingdom as well."

Well, to-day we find the doctrine of the Liberal party has been emphasized, and was emphasized particularly during the election. To-day that party is one which stands for the lowering of tariffs all along the line, a policy which is proposed by the right hon. the prime minister to be the only proper basis for trade negotiation. I pause to urge hon. members to watch carefully the budget which will be brought down by the Minister of Finance, in view of the fact that to-day he told the house that he reserved the right to raise or lower duties. As a one time free trader he now stands as a protection valve, to repair tariffs lowered by his leader. He now stands ready to apply emergency measures he may consider necessary to restore an equalizing effect upon Canada in view of the situation brought about by the freer trade inclinations of the Prime Minister. I know many other changes, and especially the ones respecting the imperial trade relationships, could be mentioned.

While the late Sir Richard Cartwright would even tax Great Britain in order to have trade with the United States, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, "There shall be no more pilgrimages to Washington," and he turned his attention to the motherland. What did he do? He gave a preference to the motherland, and did not ask anything from them. Yet to-day the Prime Minister—

An hon. MEMBER: And Sir Wilfrid Laurier was opposed by the Tory party when he did it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Certainly he was opposed by the Tories; the new member is right. He was opposed by the Tories and by Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper. Sir Charles Tupper stated that he believed in reciprocal trade arrangements with the old land, as well, which would give equal advantages to Canada and England.

An hon. MEMBER: Knowing he could not get it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): My hon. friend should look back and remember what happened. The present leader of the government knows that between 1899 and 1905 one-third of the textile industry of Canada went out of business and thousands lost their jobs because the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier was too generous to England, and had he followed Sir Charles Tupper's advice the textile industry of Canada would not have received the death blow she did receive at that time.

The present prime minister did not suggest that we should give the motherland preferences and receive nothing, but he refused to support the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) who brought the imperial trade agreements before this chamber. He refused to support a preference for England when Canada was securing more by way of preference than the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier ever expected to receive or any Canadian had even hoped for. When I speak about the imperial trade agreements I notice the Prime Minister laughs, but my reply is that he who laughs last laughs best. If he and I are spared for two or three years—and I hope we shall be—we may have an opportunity to compare the advantages derived from the imperial trade agreements with the disadvantages Canada will suffer from the Canada-United States agreement now before us. Keep my words in mind, because I say to every hon. member within sound of my voice that if he has given any thought to the imperial trade agreements he must agree with me that had it not been for them agriculture, the great basic industry of Canada, would be bankrupt to-day. I urge hon. members to consider that point carefully.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) placed on Hansard details which I shall not repeat. I shall be content with saying that the advantages we secured in the motherland had the effect of stabilizing our markets. I shall mention only one example of stabilization, although in fact many could be cited. There is not an hon. member experienced in agriculture who would not agree with the statement that since the imperial trade agreements became effective we have had a more stabilized price for bacon than at any other time since confederation. Any farmer knows what that means. Even the Minister of Finance himself, who has been removed from the pursuit of agriculture for some time, will agree that there is nothing more important for the Canadian mixed farmer than a stabilized price for his products. But the imperial trade agreements did not do only that. They provided us with advantages in the greatest market in the world, and the one in which we can hope for the greatest stability.

What have we received in this agreement? As I listened to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) I wondered why he should have a change of heart now and accept this agreement as something that was going to bring great benefits to Canada. Lumber has been mentioned. It is true that under this agreement we can send our lumber to the United States at a lower rate of duty, not free but at a reduced rate, and then only in limited quotas, but in return we tell the manufacturers of the United States that they can ship their furniture into Canada, not in limited quantities, but as much as they like, free of duty.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): At a reduction from forty-five to 27½ per cent.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is not free.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I would urge upon the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget, even though his tariff inclinations have been downward before, to raise the tariff to save the furniture manufacturers of this dominion, for as he himself expressed it he still retains his freedom to move the intermediate tariff up or down.

Again we are told that under this agreement we can ship our cattle to the United States at a reduced rate, from three to two cents. It is true that we can send our cattle over there in limited numbers, but we can ship only half as many cattle over there and pay a duty of two cents a pound, as we shipped in 1921 free of duty. Then, under this agreement we say to the United States: We will take from you your processed hogs, your bacon, shoulders and hams processed by American labour, and we will give you a reduction of 3¼ cents a pound and let you ship in as many as you like. While we are shipping out of our front door our finest bacon to the United Kingdom market, we give the United States an advantage of 3¼ cents a pound to ship in American bacon through our back door. It is true that we get a cent reduction in the tariff when we ship our lambs and sheep, live weight, to the United States in certain years, but we give them two cents a pound reduction when they process the carcasses and ship the meat back to this country. They will not accept our meat carcasses. They will take the hides off our cattle and finish them into leather goods, but if we take the hides off our cattle in Canada we have to pay a duty of 12½ per cent when we ship the hides into the United States. We reduce the duty when they ship them back to Canada in the form of leather goods, and on our leather goods going into the United States we have to pay a duty of fifty per cent as before the agreement.

I see that my time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker, but before I sit down I should like to ask hon. members who represent rural ridings to remind their constituents that under this agreement they are not securing a free market for the export of their surplus products. You can ship your eggs to the United States if you still pay a duty of ten cents a dozen while we let American eggs come in here with a duty of a nickel a dozen. You can send your oats over there and pay sixteen cents, but the United States farmer, when he has a bumper crop, can ship his surplus oats over here at a duty of nine cents. You can ship your wheat to the United States and pay a duty of forty-two cents, while United States wheat coming in here pays a duty of only twelve cents. You can ship your flour to the United States and pay a duty of $1.04 a barrel, while on United States flour entering Canada you pay fifty cents a barrel. You can ship your hay to the United States provided you pay a duty of $5 a ton, but when we let their hay enter Canada it pays a duty of only $1.75 a ton. You can ship your potatoes to the United States and pay a duty of seventy-five cents a bag, but when they have a bumper crop they can ship their potatoes into this country free of duty. I want the farmer members of this house to realize that while their farmer constituents are selling their barley to-day for less than cost of production they still have to pay a duty of twenty cents a bushel to get it into the United States.

Now I come to the fruit and vegetable industry, that great branch of agriculture which gives the most employment for the amount of money invested, and therefore is to some extent a poor man's vocation. I would urge upon the Prime Minister to have another change of heart, to forget his pre-election pledges with respect to dumping duties and seasonal tariffs—he has forgotten many pledges before that were not half as important. Our fruit and vegetable growers are facing absolute ruin and I urge upon the government to use the means they have in their power, as mentioned by the Minister of Finance, of moving the tariff up or down, to move it up when the budget is brought down, so that our fruit and vegetable producers may be saved from ruin. We are told that under this agreement we can send our fruit and vegetables within certain limited seasons into the United States free of duty, but on the other hand we give the American manufacturer free entry for his canned goods at every season of the year. These matters are vital to employment in this dominion, and if the tariff is not raised to save the fruit and vegetable growers I shudder to think what may happen. I know it may be said that there are covered by this agreement from 800 to nearly 1,000 items on which we have reduced the duty. I do not propose to mention them in detail or to say anything more than that I fear we are sacrificing the industrial life of this dominion for temporary advantages that may not last for any length of time and that will be of no great advantage to agriculture.

I still recall my own position in this regard on many other occasions. I believe the greatest security for the farmer of Canada is to be found in protecting that market which takes over eighty per cent of his production, namely, the home market in this dominion. That is the only market we control. We live on the coldest part of this continent. I say again, that the greatest and most stable market that we can find anywhere in the world for our foodstuffs is right here in Canada, and we cannot afford to threaten the industrial life of this dominion which affords us such a market for our farm products.

I have mentioned something of uncertainties, and surely no one will deny that this proposed treaty is bristling with them. There are uncertainties about it even before it leaves this house. We do not even know whether it is going to stay as it is. We do not know whether the Minister of Finance is going to raise or lower the intermediate tariff. We do not know whether this agreement is going to be used as a political football in the United States. We do not know whether it is going to be declared valid or invalid by the courts of the United States. We do not know whether congress will approve the agreement if it is put before it. We do not know whether the present president of the United States who has accepted it will be one more year in office, and this agreement is negotiated for three years. I say that this agreement bristles with uncertainties viewed from any angle one can think of; its disadvantages are outdone only by its uncertainties, and when we think of how treaties have died before, as I have already mentioned, I can only urge in conclusion that the government should consider at least a slight change of fiscal policy in order to remedy some of the hardships that will otherwise have to be endured in this dominion.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance took the attitude he did to-day and said that he can move the intermediate tariff up or down, but he would not tell the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and those who sit on this side of the house whether he was going to move it up or down. Perhaps he wants to leave the Prime Minister in a position in which he can give a nod to the free traders of the west and a wink to the protectionists of the east, and leave his course ahead as uncertain as it has been behind him. He may derive temporary benefit from that, but I would urge upon the Prime Minister to forget some of his pre-election speeches with reference to dumping duties and seasonal tariffs, and that he may reconsider the abolition of section 43. I hope he may not say to Japan that "of a class or kind produced in Canada" means a ten per cent production in this country. It may be that he will change many of these items and avoid these dangers to which I have referred. If he does not I only wish to point out to him that if in the next year or two he fulfils the pledges and promises he made prior to the last election, then he will have prohibited many new industries being born in Canada and will have injured the old ones already established. I think that should be said in fairness to the right hon. gentleman, in fairness to his government and in fairness to this country.

If we establish trade north and south we shall be faced with the advantages that are given to American labour and the advantages that accrue to the American manufacturer because of his mass production and short rail hauls. We are telling the American magazine publishers that they can ship to this country hundreds of thousands of their magazines containing a culture not our own, teaching a patriotism that we know nothing about and telling us of a national outlook that is not our own. We are embarrassing the renewal in 1937 of the imperial trade agreements. It would be better if we were establishing our trade in an east and west direction; we should endeavour to maintain the more stable imperial trade.

I ask the Prime Minister to reconsider some of the intermediate traiff concessions he is giving to the United States. These concessions cover a number of articles from the southern states similar to those now being brought in from British countries under the imperial trade agreements. I am sure that when he attempts to renew the imperial trade agreements he will find it most difficult to do so because of this change in the direction of our trade to north and south. If this course is continued the stability of our trade, the interests of agriculture, and interests of the Canadian people as a whole are seriously endangered. The right hon. the Prime Minister said the other day it would have been much better if the imperial trade agreements had never been made, so far as securing the United States agreements was concerned.

I wish the government Godspeed in turning from the errors of their ways. I urge the right hon. gentleman still to look east and west as did his late leader, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he too turned to the motherland. He should beware of the north and south route which has been so uncertain in the past.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code (fines and penalties).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this particular bill, copies of which are on member's files, is to provide that fines imposed under the criminal code may be paid on time or by instalment, the conditions to be laid down by the magistrates or judges after inquiring into the ability of the accused to pay. Owing to five years of depression many people on relief and out of work, or on part time, many of them first offenders with families and some of them returned soldiers, cannot pay their fines, and have to go to gaol,—which is another way of imposing imprisonment for debt. The bill follows the provision of the law of England, 1935, 25-26 George V, chapter 46, known as Money Payments (Justices Procedure Act), 1935.

The first section of the bill is partly new matter; the other sections are entirely new. The first section in the bill amends section 1029 of the criminal code, "fine or penalty in discretion of court":

> Wherever a fine may be awarded or a penalty imposed for any offence, the amount of such fine or penalty shall, within such limits, if any, as are prescribed in that behalf, be in the discretion of the court or person passing sentence or convicting, as the case may be.

Sections 1036, 1037 and 1038 of the code deal with fines and forfeitures.

The first section of the bill is entirely new, and all the other sections follow the law of England. This matter came up in Great Britain two years ago. It was dealt with by a committee of parliament and a departmental inquiry, and this particular act which is now the law of England came into force on January 1 and is working well in the old country.

During times of depression people get out of work and, if convicted, cannot pay their fines, with the result that they have to go to gaol. Many of them have families.

The British Money Payments Act was introduced in the House of Lords on July 11. It went over to the House of Commons on August 2, and received the royal assent. It was supported by all parties in both houses of parliament, and the judges who took part in the debate in the House of Lords spoke strongly in favour of this measure. This whole question, Mr. Speaker, is wrapped up in the liberty of the subject, and after all is said and done, Britain is the only country in which there is real liberty to-day.

As I view the situation, the term "liberty" is becoming meaningless in Canada, with imprisonment of thousands for debt, with trial by newspaper supplanting trial by jury, with the difficulty of getting bail, with the almost kingly powers which parliament and the provinces have conferred upon magistrates. It is all right to read of a conception embodied in text-books on the law of evidence two or three hundred years old, but it needs to be brought up to date and rewritten, when you have a magistrate committing a man for trial, a grand jury finding a prima facie case is made out on the facts, and along coming a judge who, not satisfied with telling the jury what the law is—which is his proper function—takes the case from the jury, often supplanting trial by jury. We have cases about the fourth estate affecting reports of this parliament, reports of committees; freedom of the press is assailed openly in Canada to-day.

This bill deals with an important question of law reform. It is one of the greatest problems affecting this country at the present time. Law reforms here are away behind the times; we have to go to the motherland, the land of the free, and see what they are doing over there. We find they are getting back to the principles of magna charta, the principles of the Petition of Right, following right away down to the statute of Westminster. Throughout we find the principle of the liberty of the subject. In Canada the liberty of the subject does not extend very far. Certain people outside this house can snap their fingers at parliament; they can even say to a newspaper "We will cut off your advertising if you dare to publish the truth, or publish what goes on in the debates of this house or its committees."

I do not ask that the government shall immediately adopt this bill. I believe we should follow the procedure of the mother of parliaments, in which, prior to the act to which I referred last August being placed on the statute books, it was admitted that the case was proven and they appointed a departmental committee. Besides having as its chairman a distinguished lawyer, Sir John Fischer Williams, K.C., the committee also comprised a former chairman of the prison commission, a former metropolitan magistrate, a leading stipendiary magistrate and a justice's clerk. They went into this whole question and presented a report to both houses of parliament, with the result that this act was placed on the statute books of the motherland. I think we should do well to have the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) appoint a parliamentary committee or a departmental committee to deal with this whole problem of law reform.

After all is said and done, what is Liberalism? As we have it to-day it does not exist along these lines, when we see that "liberty" is just a meaningless term in this country. As I said, this bill is wrapped up with the liberty of the subject. Imprisonment for debt was abolished in England and Wales by act of parliament in 1869; yet in 1923, according to a report of the House of Lords, 23,000 people were imprisoned for failure to pay sums of money. In 1910 the number was 90,000, although imprisonment for debt had been abolished for forty years. Figures show that only twenty-seven per cent of the men and twenty-one per cent of the women imprisoned in England had been convicted of indictable crimes; the rest had made default in payments of money and had been convicted of breaches of various acts, regulations and by-laws with respect to which imprisonment with or without the option of a fine could be imposed.

When a man is sent to gaol in default of payment of a fine he is not the only person who suffers. His family suffers; his children suffer through the bread-winner being in gaol; his reputation suffers; he may lose his job, and then it is hard for him to get another. In England last year 11,000 people had to go to gaol because they were unable to pay fines. An attempt has been made to remove this state of affairs through the new statute to which I have referred.

The bill which I propose will need the support also of the provinces. It deals with offences under the criminal code just as far as the legislative competence of this parliament goes. In addition, the provinces should pass complementary legislation. The practice at present is as follows: A fine is first imposed. Under my bill there will be an amendment whereunder the fine will be fixed first, and if default occurs in payment an inquiry will be made by the judge or the magistrate as to the ability and capacity of the defendant to pay, and his means in relation to the amount involved. A prison term will be ordered only if the court thinks it wise. That is modern, humane legislation.

As a result of a similar law, Mr. Speaker, half the prisons are closed in the old country, at a great saving to the state, for seventy-five per cent of persons in English prisons were imprisoned for debt and only about twenty-five per cent for indictable offences. Imprisonment is a most expensive luxury for the state. Also it is harsh and severe in its consequences to the individual; it has a bad effect upon a man's character and his self-respect. It causes suffering to his family and dependents, interruption of his work, and the possibility of failure to find work upon his release—penalties often out of all proportion to the wrong which the offender has committed or the fault of which he has been found guilty. Such a penalty should never be imposed without careful consideration and only resorted to if it is the only practical way of vindicating the law of the land or enforcing obligations which must be enforced. It should never be imposed in the mechanical or autocratic way that prevails at present.

The peak of imprisonment for debt in this country seems to coincide with times of great industrial depression. The figures indicate this clearly. It is most regrettable that unemployment should result in the imprisonment of men because they are unable to fulfil obligations contracted for when they were at work; that they should be forced to comply with a court order which is based upon their earnings when they were employed. I think it is also regrettable that there are so few methods of dealing with offenders; that such methods are limited to the ones used three hundred years ago, namely, fines and imprisonment.

In his work The New Despotism, Lord Hewart has referred to this matter. It seems to me that at last the British government has written finis to Little Dorrit, Dickens' novel criticizing the conditions he described a century ago, from personal knowledge of the debtors' prison in London. Little Dorrit herself ministered there, and of the conditions Sam Weller said, "It's unekal, and that's the fault on it." In 1869, stirred by Dickens' description of these conditions, the government of England brought down an act prohibiting imprisonment for debt. Nevertheless to-day nearly half the commitments to prison, though nominally on account of what is known as contempt of court, are actually for non-payment of money liabilities.

The action now being taken is intended to change this state of affairs. First the government appointed a departmental committee; then the matter went to the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and the bill passed both houses unanimously, and was supported by the press all over England. They circularized the magistrates and judges and obtained full information before the act was passed. I should like to read one or two press clippings in regard to this matter:

The Earl of Faversham announced this on behalf of the government in the house of Lords. The government's object, Lord Faversham said, was that there should be "no delay whatsoever in bringing to the notice of all courts of summary jurisdiction suggestions and considerations which may tend to reduce the number of imprisonments and may assist courts to confine the use of this extreme measure to cases where it is unavoidable if the authority of the courts is to be properly upheld."

This statement was the climax to a debate initiated by Lord Arnold, Labour party peer, who called attention to the report made last autumn by a government committee on this question. Lord Arnold said that in 1932 no less than 24,272 persons in the United Kingdom were sent to prison for non-payment of fines, maintenance orders, local taxes and other monetary demands.

In one case, he said, a youth was sent to prison as the indirect outcome of swinging in a public park in the wrong swing. The young man had been fined. He was careless, and because the fine was not paid, and perhaps could not be paid, he had to go to prison. In another, a man was similarly imprisoned for failure to pay a fine imposed upon him for sleeping in an automobile upon a public road.

Baron Merrivale, a lord justice of appeal, confirmed the fact that such a state of things existed. It had come to an end practically for well-to-do people a century ago, Lord Merrivale said, but it had not come to an end for "the poor people who are the subject of these various orders."

Baron Snell, late member of the Imperial Economic Committee, pointed out that Britain has much to learn on this question from the United States. "When I was in America a year or two ago," he said, "a judge of the supreme court was good enough to express to me in the most emphatic way his admiration and the admiration of American jurists generally for the common law of England."

In this parliament we should always be on our guard in order to do nothing that will take away from the liberty of the subject. When we look at Europe, where there is no longer any liberty in the legislatures, the press, the pulpits or the universities, more than ever we should stand on guard to see that the principles of magna charta are not violated. They are being violated in this country to-day; in fact I should like to know where the magna charta exists at the present time. The development of this liberty took many centuries; it was achieved at great cost both individually and to the state. One principle of the great charter was that no free man should be arrested or detained in prison, or outlawed or banished or brought to ruin, save by the judgment of his peers and in accordance with the law of the land. On the other hand we have taxation without representation, and liberty is being restricted all along the line, with the vast powers now enjoyed by the magistrates, with the jury system supplanted by newspaper trials and all that sort of thing. Where is the Magna Charta when people are sent down for non-payment of small fines?

Our whole system of freedom, as we have it to-day throughout the British empire and the United States, is based upon the subjection of the executive and its ministers to the law of the land, and one of our cardinal principles is that the courts are subservient to the legislature. Look at the United States; where is liberty there? What has happened to the liberty of the subject over there? In this country, too, those ties which bind us to the motherland seem to be weakening. In the United States they suffer from politics and lawlessness, kidnappers, racketeering and all that sort of thing, and to a certain extent we suffer from the same conditions. The square deal of Theodore Roosevelt and the new freedom of Woodrow Wilson have been absolutely swept away. So much is this the case that a distinguished citizen of the United States, Colonel Lindbergh, had to leave the land of the free and the home of the brave for a really free country, the only one in the world to-day.

I would suggest to the minister that he follow the practice that has been followed in the old country, and institute a departmental inquiry into these questions. He is a very efficient minister, and he has always been receptive to suggestions coming from the opposition, though it is true that he sent the new deal, the new freedom, to the law courts. In this country, as I say, the courts are subservient, or should be, to the legislatures, and I believe the time is not far distant when we shall have to reassert the principle enunciated by Theodore Roosevelt at Chicago in 1912, when he said, "The American people, not the courts, should determine their own policies." The court of last resort is the people, and this high court of parliament could accomplish no greater work than to protect the liberty of the people. This should be even more so now that we have twentieth century Liberalism in Canada. I am afraid, however, that twentieth century Liberalism and economic Liberalism in this country are nothing but myths.

I hope the minister will give serious consideration to this bill, which is patterned after the English act now in force. I should be glad to send the minister a copy of the English bill, which is contained in a book entitled Imprisonment by Justices for Non-Payment of Money, written by Wallace Thoday, who is a member of the bar, and published at Mansion House, London, December, 1935. I suggest that in this connection the minister should consult the municipalities also, because after all is said and done the municipalities, rather than the provinces, should receive all the fines. All fines levied under the criminal code should belong exclusively to the municipalities. Parliament gives the provinces subsidies for the maintenance of provincial institutions, while the municipalities have to maintain the police forces, which in some cities cost two or two and a half million dollars. Australia gives a subvention to her capital city for the maintenance of the police force there. A few years ago parliament conferred upon the provinces the right to collect these fines, subject to an agreement to be made with the municipalities. Some fines go to the provinces, many to the municipalities, but all these fines should go to the municipality, to the authority which not only enforces the law but prosecutes.

In my opinion the time has come for reform. I should like to hear from the minister whether he is agreeable to acting along the line taken by the mother of parliaments, where they found a condition under twentieth century Liberalism that 24,000 people were in prison for non-payment of debt. In any event during the depression there should be a suspension of imprisonment for non-payment of fines, and time given to pay. Before a fine is imposed this bill provides that a magistrate should make inquiry as to the ability of the accused to pay. It is not only the man himself who suffers; if he loses his job the wife and family suffer. In Toronto forty-five years ago the late R. J. Fleming when chairman of the board of police commissioners passed a by-law allowing the police inspector discretion to release a man arrested for drunkenness, with the result that he could go to his work in the morning. By that humane provision he saved many a family from suffering. I hope the minister will be in a receptive mood and follow the example of the motherland. If he admires Liberalism as they have it in the old land let him follow them in that respect. The government of the day is responsible to the electors of the country for bringing about such necessary reforms. These reforms are in the public interest and protect the liberty of the subject, which is becoming an almost meaningless term in this country.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The main section of this bill, which is section 1, would give discretion to a court or to a person imposing a fine or penalty to allow time for the payment of that fine, and even to order that the amount may be paid by instalments, at times, in amounts and under such conditions as the case may require. This is the most important section of the bill. Fundamentally I do not see any objection to the principle of this section. I understand that certain magistrates even now purport to do this although there is no statutory authority that allows it. But the difficulty would be to devise a law which, while giving this discretion in cases where it may be properly exercised, would have the necessary safeguards to prevent those who could pay from escaping part of their sentence.

In 1929 there was introduced in the other house by Senator Beaubien a bill of this kind containing exactly the same provision as appears in this section. I have before me the debates of that year in the other house, and there were objections raised to that provision. The bill was withdrawn. I call attention to the fact that in the explanatory note to the bill now before the house my hon. friend says that this legislation is advisable owing to the five years of depression which have caused many people to be on relief or out of work. The bill in the other house was introduced in 1929, at the peak of the boom. At any rate the principle of my hon. friend's bill is not entirely new. But as I say, there is nothing which seems specially objectionable in this provision so long as the section is drafted in such a way as to provide all necessary safeguards.

Section 2 of the bill provides for new sections 1029A and 1029B. I must confess I cannot see that those sections would be very valuable, and there are objections to them from certain viewpoints.

As to section 1029C, if the first section were accepted this should be accepted also. It provides that when a convicted person would have paid part of the penalty, if he could not pay the balance and had to serve a term in gaol, the term of imprisonment should be reduced because of the amount of fine he has paid.

As to section 3 of the bill, which would enact two new sections, 1057A and 1057B, I would not only be inclined but have to oppose this section. By section 1057A a court which has power to pass a sentence of imprisonment—> —in lieu of passing a sentence of imprisonment, may order that the offender be detained within the precincts of the court, or at any police station, till such hour, not later than eight in the evening on the day on which he is convicted, as the court may direct.

And the court—

> —shall not make any such order of detention under this section as will deprive the offender of a reasonable opportunity of returning to his abode on the day on which such order of detention is made.

Well, I am a friend of liberty, as my hon. friend is, but this would be almost killing the offender with kindness. If I correctly understand this section the court would not even sentence the prisoner—or he is not a prisoner, because this is for the purpose of preventing him from going to gaol—but instead of passing sentence the court would merely order that he be detained within the precincts until not later than eight o'clock in the evening.

The hon. member said that the bill before us is based upon the English Money Payments Act of 1935. I suggest however that it goes much further than the English act. Under that act the court which has adjudged the sum to be paid by the accused, in lieu of issuing a warrant immediately may order that he be detained in the police station until he can obtain the money to pay the amount of his fine. In the proposal of the hon. member, however, there is no such provision. Instead of passing sentence on a man the court would simply order that he be detained "within the precincts of the court, or at any police station, till such hour, not later than eight in the evening on the day on which he is convicted." I do not think it would be worth while for any person to make a complaint and secure such a conviction.

Then, section 1057B is along the same lines. It would enact that:

> (2) Where a person is liable to be sentenced to imprisonment by a court of summary jurisdiction, the court may, if any suitable places are available for the purpose, order the person to be detained within the precincts of the court or at any police station for such period not exceeding four days as the court thinks fit, and the order shall be delivered with the offender to the person in charge of the place where the offender is to be detained.

That section would prescribe that no person shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a period of less than five days. When the sentence is less than five days, the judge would order that the person be detained within the precincts of the court or at a police station, instead of going to gaol. I must object to the two proposals contained in section 3 of the bill.

I suggest to the hon. member, however, that in Canada the administration of criminal justice is under the control of the provinces. The officers who have the experience in these matters are the attorneys general of the various provinces. They are the officers who are responsible, and I should like to submit to the law officers of the different provinces the proposal contained in the hon. member's bill. Upon consultation with them it might be possible, as I stated before, that section 1 and part of section 2 might be accepted. Either such provisions might be included in the bill which will be introduced by the government to amend the criminal code or, if the hon. member would prefer, his bill might be allowed to stand until I receive the advice of the various legal authorities of the provinces as to the merits of the provisions in the bill. Under those circumstances we would be able to proceed and give to the hon. member the amount of satisfaction his proposal deserves.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I gladly accept the suggestion offered by the minister. As I said before, I did not expect the bill would be passed until such time as it had been considered by the provincial attorneys general and by officials of municipalities as to how it may affect the payment of fines. I would be the last person to propose interfering in that regard, because I have always contended that fines belong to the municipalities. I would suggest that the bill stand over, and that the minister incorporate it in the general amendments to the criminal code which will be brought down later in the session. Meantime the minister could consult representatives of the provinces.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the debate was adjourned.

POST OFFICE ACT

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the bill is read a second time, I must draw the attention of the house to the fact that I do not think it is in order.

Mr. BOULANGER: I have been asked to let the bill stand. I have no objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

Motion stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) will place me, after I have finished speaking, whether he will put me on the gangway which he has created, or in some other place. I am sure, however, that he will know exactly where I stand, and what I think about the trade agreement now under discussion.

While I have no further observations concerning the hon. member for Danforth I have one or two respecting the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). In the first instance he took exception to the speech made by the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens). He recalled some protectionist speeches which in years gone by had been made by that hon. member. I could not help thinking that had the fortunes of war favoured the Conservative party and had they been sitting on the right side of Mr. Speaker the hon. member would have been one of the first to have echoed the speech made by the hon. member for East Kootenay, and would not have been deploring the fact that we have a treaty giving us trade relations with the United States.

He spoke, further, regarding the haste displayed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in consummating and completing the agreement. If the Prime Minister had delayed much longer and if the agreement had not been completed and we were not discussing it at this time I can assure hon. members that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe would have raised his hand in holy horror because of the delay of the Prime Minister in completing an agreement so far advanced by his own party.

If in my observations I have to deal with statements already made I do so because this seems necessary from the western standpoint, and I do not use the term in a parochial sense but rather from the point of view of the dominion. The debate of this measure seems to me somewhat like preparatory service to the communion on the budget. Most of those who have spoken have been dealing with the matter from that standpoint, as a preliminary to the budget, because you will find, Mr. Speaker, that most of the remarks are addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and he is somewhat on the defensive and is endeavouring as best he can to conceal his thoughts as to what might be contained in the budget.

There is one feature of this debate, however, that I am rather glad to see, and that is that we have an opportunity of discussing the principles of protection and free trade so early in the session rather than on the eve of an election, and in this debate, before we are through we shall find just what are the bases of the principles upon which each of the parties made their appeal to the country. I do not know whether ever in the history of Canada before there has been a situation such as we have here where the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has made to a neighbouring government proposals along the lines of a treaty. The only parallel that I know of is one which took place, I think in 1867, when Mr. Gladstone through his government was introducing an extension of the Franchise Act, which Mr. Disraeli was then opposing. In the subsequent election, and chiefly on the ground of his opposition to the Franchise Act, Mr. Disraeli was returned to power, and then when he came into office, with a cynical indifference to consistency he passed that very bill of Mr. Gladstone's and, in fact, extended its provisions. In the present case the situation is somewhat different. The present leader of the opposition had as Prime Minister made certain proposals to the United States government and these proposals had been under consideration for some considerable time by the permanent officers of the two governments and by the then Prime Minister himself. For some reason or another the response that was made by the United States was not such as the then Prime Minister wished. Then when the late government was turned out on October 14, a new Prime Minister took office, and with the sanction and the entire concurrence of the people of Canada he immediately approached the United States government with a view to a trade treaty. In that treaty he was able to embody a great many of the proposals set forth by the present leader of the opposition, and the present Prime Minister was able to complete the treaty within a remarkably short time.

May I say that in my judgment it might have been well if the leader of the opposition had taken the position that Mr. Gladstone took when Mr. Disraeli's government brought in the franchise bill. Mr. Gladstone supported it, and I do think the leader of the opposition might have been well advised to approve this treaty as he certainly had a great deal to do with its framework. However, he did not do so, and so we are met with his opposition to the bill, which opposition has been replied to in extenso, I think, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to-day. The Minister of Finance to-day gave to the house these uncontroverted and incontestable facts, that the provisions of the treaty were initiated in the proposals of the leader of the opposition, and that, despite what was said by the leader of the opposition in his speech the other day, these proposals have been completed by this government.

[Mr. Glen.]

I remember hearing the leader of the opposition make a radio address last September. It was the only address I heard him make during the course of the campaign, and it was given, I think, on a Friday or Saturday night. This is what he said—I have a copy of his remarks here:

> You say: "But you have not mentioned the trading situation with the United States." I have not, but I now will. It has been said by my opponents, and particularly by my opponents in the west, that the Bennett government did not desire to trade with the United States, that the Bennett government had no realization of the need of securing for our primary producers greater markets in that great country, and that therefore we were making no effort to obtain them.
> It was said that we had a brief for the industrialists and didn't care a hang about our agriculturalists. And that consequently we were just going through the motions of trading with our good friends to the south.
>
> Well, that does not happen to be the case. Ever since this government has been in office, it has done everything possible to increase our trade with the United States. We have consistently expressed our willingness to give concessions for concessions granted. Before June, 1934, by the then only practicable means available, we did all that was possible to secure greater entry for our natural products in that great market. When, in June, 1934, Congress gave to the president of the United States powers to conclude trade agreements, this government was eager to take advantage of what it regarded as this new and better opportunity to increase its exports. It acted accordingly. Note this fact carefully. What specifically this government did, and the nature of its proposals, will be made known to you through the publication of a certain document. This publication will be made on Monday next.
> This document will be my answer to the unfair-minded people who, knowing better, still maintain that this government has never seriously attempted to do business with the United States. Set up the statements of my political foes against the written statement which you will read; and learn in time how little dependability can be put upon the words of the leaders of Liberalism.
> So much for that, to-night. But carefully examine this document.

Well, it happened that I was addressing a meeting that night, and I ventured into the realm of prophecy, as a rule a very unsafe place to tread. I then stated on that platform, as I stated on every platform during that campaign, that there would be no trade treaty with the United States through the instrumentality of the then Prime Minister. I said that he would make the approaches, but he could not and he would not give the concessions that would be demanded by the president of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. GLEN: I further stated on every platform that there was only one party and only one man in the dominion who could complete a trade agreement with the president of the United States, and that party was the Liberal party, and that man was the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I stated my reasons also. I said that I knew something of the mentality of the right hon. leader of the opposition. I knew the environment in which he had lived during most of the years of his manhood; I knew from his speeches in the house and on the hustings that there was no possibility of any agreement being consummated by him just because of his mentality. He had indicated that in the house and in committee.

Some hon. members who were in this chamber at the time will remember that when the grain board was being constituted and the leader of the opposition's own friend, Mr. James Richardson, was giving evidence, Mr. Richardson stated that he could sell fifty million bushels of grain at seventy cents a bushel, whereupon the chairman of the committee, the right hon. leader of the opposition, said, "What then?" The reply was that we must purchase the goods of those countries in which we sell our wheat. The leader of the opposition replied: "The same old story," that the goods of the industries of the United States would flood the markets of Canada. At that particular moment, when they were dealing with the affairs of the farmers of Canada, the then Prime Minister made it absolutely clear to the country that what he was concerned with was the rights, as he thought, and the privileges of the industrialists. I think the statement that he made in his radio address that they were concerned only with the industrialists was entirely true because he has consistently taken the position that he has saved Canada during the last five years; in the saving of Canada he has pointed to the protection that he has given to the industrialists of the east, and in that way he believes he has saved Canada.

I am going to suggest that the leader of the opposition is not a very good logician. I remember when I was studying logic it was always clearly brought to my attention that you could never draw a universal conclusion with a minor premise in the syllogism. He has taken the position and he has drawn a universal conclusion with a minor premise because he has said that protection is necessary to save Canada: I have given protection to the industrialists, therefore I have saved Canada. I think that is fair comment and I submit that was entirely the policy and program of the leader of the opposition during the whole of those five years. I suggest to my right hon. friend that he again pursue the study of logic. He will find it useful in dealing with these matters.

The Prime Minister said that immediately on attaining office he would proceed to deal with the United States in connection with a trade treaty. He made no promises in his speeches, but the platform of the Liberal party did invoke wider markets for the people of this country. In fulfilment of the intimation that he would proceed to deal with the United States the Prime Minister met Mr. Armour, United States minister, the day after the present government was sworn in. During the election certain people were saying that there was no difference between the Liberal and the Conservative party. I think this is an illustration of the real difference between the two parties. We saw a former Prime Minister making promises which were not fulfilled, and we have the present Prime Minister fulfilling statements given during the campaign. The leader of the opposition went to Washington with the idea of arranging a treaty, but he did not and could not complete one. The Prime Minister went to Washington to arrange a trade treaty and he completed the arrangements. I know of no better illustration of the difference between Liberals and Conservatives in trade matters.

Sometimes you hear people say, "Just tweedledum and tweedledee," and when they utter these words they think that expresses everything, and they have proved their case. I hope the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) will read what I say. So far as this treaty is concerned, I am in hearty accord with its provisions. I realize that this is the first break that has been made in the crust of economic nationalism under which this and other countries of the world have been during the last five or six years. I realize that this is the first time an attempt has been made to show the world that a break can be made in this crust and I am proud that the Liberal party of Canada, through its Prime Minister, was able to make this break.

I listened to and read carefully the speeches of both the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition and I found it extremely puzzling to discover the objections of the leader of the opposition to the terms of the treaty. I have endeavoured to put those objections under different headings and I believe I am fair in making this presentation. In the first instance, he took about fifteen columns of Hansard to give a résumé of the history of the Conservative party with regard to tariff matters. I am bound to say that the Prime Minister also took a large number of columns to outline the history of the Liberal party on the same matter. I do not quarrel with this because I believe the historian of the future will be anxious to know contemporary thought and both these speeches will be of value in days to come.

The leader of the opposition could hardly object to the time factor in the agreement. Such an objection had gone by the boards as a fixed time had been inserted in other agreements. He did say that in 1911 he objected to the reciprocity treaty because there was no fixed time limit, because either party could cancel the agreement almost at their own sweet will. As far as this treaty was concerned, he was bound by his own actions because he had signed treaties containing a time limit. The president of the United States was empowered to sign an agreement only for a period of three years. The leader of the opposition could not say very much about this feature of the agreement.

His next objection was to that hoary old sinner that is always resurrected, the adverse trade balance. I thought that particular theory had been exploded long ago. I thought it was agreed that an adverse trade balance with one particular country did not matter. That is the enlightened opinion, but the leader of the opposition seems to be an ardent believer in the old theory. Surely there is no doubt as to the fallacy of that argument. The error occurs in the belief that the debits and credits of countries are settled in the same way as are debits and credits of individuals who may buy and sell goods in one particular country. That is not the way in which the trade of countries is carried on; debits and credits are settled largely by bills drawn upon the debtor nations.

The next objection was that Canada had given a larger number of reductions than had the United States. This objection was fully and completely dealt with by the Minister of Finance this afternoon and no word of mine can add anything to what he said. There was also the favoured nation treatment provision. There cannot be any great objection to this as we have a similar clause in most of the agreements that have been consummated by Canada. We know the effect of such a provision; we know that it opens the door to Canada in many ways. The leader of the opposition knew that his hand was bound by the former treaties which had been signed by the government of which he was the head. He could not say much about that particular feature, but nevertheless that is one of the objections he took to this treaty.

He dealt also with the question of direct shipment and the injury that might be sustained by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific railway. Again this matter has been dealt with by the Minister of Finance and I need not deal with it further. In a forty minute speech it would be impossible to deal with all the objections taken, but there are one or two remarks of the leader of the opposition to which I wish to take objection. At the beginning of his speech he said that he did not suppose his hon. friends opposite would be prepared to concede to him the same degree of sincerity that they claimed for themselves. I think the right hon. gentleman is entirely in error in making a statement of that kind. I think he must admit that we of the west are sincere in the principles we advocate in this house. When the Prime Minister asked the leader of the opposition why he had not completed an agreement with the United States, he replied: Because I prefer my country to office and power. I think he will agree in his calmer moments that the inference to be drawn from such a statement is bound to be offensive to many of us in this section of the house. The inference is that we are here simply for office and power, and that we are prepared to do anything in order to attain that. I wish to think that was simply a remark made in the heat of debate, such as a man usually regrets later on, and as such I will regard it.

There are a number of hon. members here who by conviction and experience are free traders. When this treaty was brought before the house those of us of that type of mind were certainly in favour of it because we realized, as we have not been able to realize for some time, that the country has been given a hope of larger markets. This is one of the results of the policy of the Liberal party. We believe that is not the end of the tariff reform program of the Liberal party, and the country expects that it is not.

From the point of view of western Canada —and I say this without any desire to offend those of the east who are directly interested in industries, as distinct from farming—when we see, after the treaty has been invoked and promulgated, some of the implement industries of the east taking the position that despite the reduction of the duties they immediately increase the price of the articles they produce, we wonder just what they suppose that the country, after the election of October 14, will think of that attitude. Do those people think that the resources of statesmanship are exhaused in the mere winning of an election? Do they realize that their action has called forth condemnation throughout the whole of this dominion, and particularly in the west? When duties are reduced, an increase in price does not seem logical, and I was glad to hear the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) make in this connection the suggestion to the Prime Minister that some satisfaction should be given to the people as to why it was necessary to raise the price despite the fact that the duties had been decreased.

These parties in the east who think that industries alone have the right of control over their prices, and do not take into account the farmers of the west, who after labouring for forty or fifty years see their patrimony dissipated and disappearing daily, although the employment they give to the vast number of men engaged in agriculture is just as material to the interests of this country as is the business of the east, should realize that there must be a spirit of compromise in a country as diverse as ours and with such varied interests. Yet we find that just following the promulgation of the treaty, these prices are raised against the farmers. I say with all sincerity that I have never heard so many suggestions of division in the west as I did in the last election. The appeals that were being made and the utterances that were being given on the question of the division of this country were more pronounced than at any time I have known. When you get an instance such as we have in this case, that merely accentuates the situation. Vast numbers of people from all over the country are writing to the members complaining about the matter, and asking the reason. They demand that the Liberal government shall see to it that these manufacturers shall not impose their will upon us very long. I am therefore entirely in accord with what was said by the hon. member for East Kootenay that this is also a matter for investigation. If there is a proper answer, all right, let us have it; we want to know it, but certainly the people of Canada have a right to learn the explanation of these industries in raising their prices.

I should also like to point out, with every desire for unity between the different parts of the country, that both in the west and in the east there is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party who have not taken a position with regard to trade. They do not think the same way as I do in this respect. They are rather casual about trade. To them it is a matter of some importance but not of the importance that we give to it. I would point out that upon their attitude towards this agreement will depend to a large extent the success they will have in their appeal to the people. If they do not support, as I think they ought, an agreement which will tend to lighten the burdens of the farmers throughout the west, they will certainly be faced with the response of the people that progress and prosperity are the negation of their party's hopes. I submit to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that in this they are dealing with realities, realities which have been reduced to concrete form. This is something which, judged in the light of history, must necessarily respond to the benefit of the common people. It is a reality reduced to concrete form. Are these representatives of the west and the east going to deny to the government of the day that support which is necesary to show not only to the United States but even further than that, across the water to the old land, that Canada is ready to trade with her neighbours, ready if necessary to give concessions freer than have ever before been given, and that we are ready to act as neighbours?

In connection with that, Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable discussion with regard to another agreement. The Prime Minister took the earliest possible moment to complete this agreement with the United States. I suggest that he is now in a position to treat with the old country. In the Ottawa agreements what I would call a savage bargain was made by Canada as against the old land. I refer particularly to section 11 of the Ottawa agreements providing for the equation of prices in costs of production as between Canada and Great Britain. I assert that it will be impossible for the parties to reach agreement on that question of prices with a view to the enlargement of trade between the two countries. An impossible barrier has been erected, a barrier which must be removed. I do not think I am asking the Prime Minister to do something in a hurry, but I do say that the Ottawa agreements, which do not expire until 1937, could very well be approached now.

My correspondence with persons in the old country and my reading of newspapers of the day lead me to the conclusion that old country people are ready, willing and anxious to meet the Prime Minister of Canada to-day and enter into agreements which will be satisfactory to both parties and not to one party alone. In the guarded statements of their statesmen after the last election here, one can read between the lines the expression of the relief they felt and the hope and expectation they have that Canada will come to them now and make a bargain that will be worth while. I am anxious to see that completed because I believe that the bonds of trade are stronger even than the bonds of blood, and that our trade with the United States, if it grows as much as we expect, may lead to a division between ourselves and the old land, which division can be avoided now by a trade agreement satisfactory to both countries. I therefore suggest to the Prime Minister that it is not necessary to wait until 1937 before an approach is made. I am quite certain that the response he will receive from the old country will be such as to gladden the hearts of himself and his government and all the people of Canada. I therefore make that suggestion in all seriousness to the government. I hope it will be acted upon, and soon.

Do hon. members realize this fact also, that Britain is making treaties with other countries, and the time may come when she may say that she is not anxious to make treaties with Canada because we have shown in these Ottawa agreements that we are more concerned for our trade than we are in the kinship which it was thought existed between both countries. The day may come, and very early, when Britain may say that she is not anxious to treat on these matters; that she cannot and perhaps will not consider a trade bargain, although the Prime Minister of Canada more than any other man is in a position to make compromises in the matter of trade with the old land.

I am glad indeed to be able to say that this treaty has evoked a warm response in the west. In fact it may have created hopes that cannot be fulfilled. The hon. member for East Kootenay said that this was not all that could be obtained; that the benefits we have secured would not rectify everything. Everyone realizes that fact, and in one of his radio addresses the Prime Minister pointed out what I think is a very evident truth, that before reform there must be recovery. I entirely agree with that statement; we must have recovery before we can have these reforms. We need not necessarily delay reforms, but our efforts will be futile unless we are able to say that we have recovered sufficiently to bring about reforms. I agree that we have within the dominion many problems which have to be solved, but the first one we have before us is this question of trade. I have gone through this agreement. I am not entirely satisfied with all its terms. I should like it to be much more comprehensive, but I am willing to accept it knowing that it marks the establishment of a principle which will do much to raise the hopes of the people in the Dominion of Canada. Therefore I will support it with my whole heart.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I have paid close attention to the speeches delivered so far during this debate, in the hope that I might be able to get a clearer vision of all the implications contained in this agreement. An agreement between Canada and the United States is a matter of such immensity that it is by no means easy to gather all its implications. A bargain can be made easily between two people; an agreement can be made without difficulty between two countries, provided you are ready to give enough. This agreement touches so many branches of industry and is so spread over all the nine provinces, with all their divided industries, that it is by no means easy, study though you may, to ascertain fairly the implications it contains.

I listened particularly to the long speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when introducing the resolution. I listened to the historical part of that speech. I was more interested in the latter years, when he dealt with them, than with the earlier ones, because during eleven of those latter years I was a member of this house. The right hon. gentleman chided the late administration for not having made more progress than it did. He expressed extreme regret that he was not in power during those years, because if he had been in power there would have been manifest progress, and that in spite of the fact that in the nine years during which he was in power, there was no progress; in spite of the fact that on two occasions during those nine years the United States raised its tariff to such an extent that Canada's trade was grievously affected, and in spite of the fact that the right hon. gentleman's view as to the proper action of the Canadian government at that time was that it should do nothing which could be looked upon as being of a provocative nature.

Probably it would be more correct to point out that these negotiations would not have attained the progress they did attain had it not been for the fact that the United States realized that in this country there was a virile government whose intention it was to govern Canada for the benefit of the Canadian people, and particularly for the benefit of the Canadian worker. There is very little doubt, I think, that had it not been for that virile government that was in power during those five years we should not have had the empire trade agreements we now have. I think it is evident also that the United States took note of the existence of that government and of the fact that its policy was to link up the trade relations of the empire as a preliminary step towards the negotiation of trade agreements with other nations of the world. It is noticeable that it was not until June, 1934, two years after the Ottawa agreements were consummated, that for the first time in history the United States congress empowered the president to make trade agreements, with certain restrictions on his actions. After that had been accomplished the preparatory work went on at a much faster pace and by last summer a sufficient quantity of facts and figures had been collected to make it possible for the spokesmen of the two countries, after they had digested those facts and figures, to approach each other with the idea of coming down to definite terms of negotiation.

As the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has pointed out to the house, he discovered and reported to his government that what the United States required Canada to give was, in his opinion, too great a price to pay, so it was not possible for that government to consummate an agreement. Then, not unnaturally, the matter was dropped during the period of the election campaign. Later as a result of, shall I say, an accident of electoral arithmetic, my right hon. friend opposite found himself in a position of power. He then hastened to Washington and, using the same facts and figures, came to the conclusion that it was possible for Canada to pay that price. Hence we have this agreement which we are now debating.

It will be noticed that Canada gives the United States one of three things: the intermediate tariff, the most favoured nation treatment modification of the intermediate tariff or the special schedules attached to the treaty. These apply particularly to the commodities we have to sell to the United States and those the United States have to sell to us. In the short time at my disposal I propose to deal with the effect of this treaty on the fruit and vegetable industry, which is the principle industry in the constituency of Yale. It does not appear to me that the treaty has much effect on the other industries carried on in that district. I do not think the treaty has much effect on the dairy industry as carried on there or on the mining industry, which has to do with coal and copper, gold and silver. I do not think it has much effect on the lumbering industry as carried on in those hills and valleys, for that industry is not on an export basis; it depends for its prosperity on the prosperity of the other industries in that district, principally the fruit and vegetable industry.

In considering tariff matters as they relate to fruits and vegetables I always think that there are two facts which should be kept prominently in mind. One is that these commodities are perishable; they must be sold when they are ready to go to market. That market must be in a receptive condition. If the market is not ready for them they must be destroyed or stored, and storage is costly for it has to take care of cold and heat, and to preserve humidity by the most perfect ventilation. And it is only for a comparatively short time that these perishable products can be stored. The other fact that must be kept in mind in discussing trade with the United States is that we are dealing with a country in which the time of maturity of these perishable products is several weeks in advance of ours, and when a certain commodity produced in Canada is ready to roll towards our markets it arrives in such markets at a time when the same variety produced in the United States has almost finished its marketing period. And United States distributors have never shown any lack of desire to get rid of their surplus products by sending them into a market other than their own country to relieve their own market of pressure, and naturally it is not a matter of concern to them what the price is in the Canadian market.

That distributors in the United States are still of that opinion we have an excellent illustration in the markets of Great Britain in recent months. Last season the apple crop in Great Britain failed; it looked as if there would be a bare market, and the United States have been shipping into the markets of Great Britain hundreds of thousands of packages of excellent apples, good in quality, beautifully packed, exactly the same quality, exactly the same pack as our boxed apples produced in British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec. The result was that prices were driven so low that our producers received barely the cost of production. But those United States apples went into Great Britain over a tariff of 4s. 6d. a hundredweight, so that with our producers receiving barely the cost of production the United States producers have been receiving forty cents a box less than that. This illustrates the fact that the United States distributor does not mind losing money on a certain portion of his crop so long as he can prevent it from disturbing his own market and driving down the price for the rest of his crop.

I want to spend a minute or two in refreshing the memories of hon. members with regard to the changes that have taken place in the Canadian tariffs on these commodities in recent years. Twenty-nine years ago a Liberal government amended the customs tariff by inserting section 6, known as the dumping clause. Unfortunately they never used it. Fourteen years ago the Liberal government of which my right hon. friend was the leader amended the Customs Act by the insertion of a clause which enabled the Minister of Customs, as he was then called, to proclaim a value for duty which would enable the dumping clause to be used. Unfortunately he never used it. In 1926 a Conservative government, being in power for a few months, promptly proclaimed values for duty, and for two shipping seasons the producer in Canada had the reasonable opportunities of his own market, and the consumer did not suffer. In March, 1928, however, my right hon. friend decided, owing to pressure brought to bear upon him by his free trade supporters, that the orders in council must go. They were all cancelled. With them went the values for duty; no more use was made of the dumping clause, and for two seasons the Canadian producer had the utmost difficulty in marketing his produce in the Canadian market.

In 1930 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) brought in his famous budget, the budget which was to win the victory for the Liberal party. In introducing his budget he explained to the house that the government had considered the application of seasonal duties, but had come to the conclusion that seasonal duties were not suitable to Canadian conditions. I have never understood why seasonal duties would not be suitable to Canadian conditions. It is not a particularly new idea; sixty-five years ago the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association advocated their use. As far as I am aware they were never tried. But in 1930 the government did not propose to adopt them because they did not consider them suitable. Again pressure was brought to bear upon the minister by the free trade section of the Liberal party, and to our surprise, after the gruelling which the schedules in that tariff received when that budget finally emerged from the committee we found that seasonal duties had been introduced into it all down the line. Then came the general election and the change of government, and one of the first actions of the new government was to proclaim once more the values for duty, and to invoke the dumping clause. For five shipping seasons the producer in Canada had the reasonable opportunities of his own market, and certainly it cannot be said that the consumer suffered.

I want now to turn to a consideration of the items in the treaty which affect the fruit and vegetable growing industry. They will be found principally in the schedule attached to the treaty. It will be noticed that, to speak in general terms, the duty on vegetables has been reduced from thirty per cent to fifteen per cent and the duty on fruit from twenty to fifteen per cent. If they are left with only that amount of protection I am afraid that the fruit growers and the vegetable growers in Canada will find themselves in a parlous position. But as far as ten fruits and fifteen vegetables are concerned the government have taken power to apply the dumping clause in a modified way. They have power to declare a value for duty and added duty which shall not exceed four-fifths of the minimum amount used in the years 1933, 1934 and 1935. To my mind the question turns on this point, that although this power is provided in the treaty, if we remember the actions of a Liberal government composed to a certain extent of the gentlemen who hold ministerial positions to-day, a doubt must exist in the mind of the producer whether the government proposes to use this method of protection. If they use it the next question would be: Do they propose to use it to the full extent of their power? If they do so use it, do they propose to use it in time? For it is obvious that if Canadian produce rolls towards the Canadian market and arriving there finds that market cluttered up with the surplus of another country, and prices consequently very low, it will be of little assistance then to impose a value for duty, for it is most improbable that in face of Canadian production that price will rise. To my mind the whole question in considering the effects of this treaty upon the industry turns on that fact.

But there are three commodities which come in for less kindly treatment than do the others. There is one fruit, strawberries, and two vegetables, celery and lettuce, which receive considerably less assistance than do other fruits and vegetables. Why they have been selected for special treatment I do not know. As hon. members are aware strawberries are produced in considerable commercial quantities in British Columbia, Ontario and parts of Quebec. Just at the time when our strawberries are ready for the market they find themselves in a market cluttered up with the surplus of United States crops, which are just clearing up, and at a time when distributers in the United States are using every endeavour to keep that large quantity off their market. They do not care what happens to the Canadian market. Even though the minister employs to the greatest extent and at the proper time the powers provided in the treaty, strawberries will receive less protection than they did under the 1930 budget, without the assistance of any dumping duty. Similarly, in the Armstrong section of the Okanagan valley celery of quality is grown, and it is put up in such a pack that it is known throughout Canada. In California, just to the south of us, they do not grow their lettuce and celery by tens of acres; they grow it by thousands of acres, and it appears to me that British Columbia and Ontario will find themselves tremendously handicapped because of lack of assistance even to the extent of that contained in the 1930 budget, to say nothing of the help producers of those two commodities have been receiving in the last five years.

Last year Canada imported $2,500,000 worth of vegetables and $2,500,000 worth of fruits, principally from the United States, of kinds and varieties produced in Canada. In the fiscal year 1929-30 we imported a little more than $7,000,000 worth of fruits and $8,000,000 worth of vegetables. Conditions in 1929-30 were very different from conditions obtaining to-day, and it does not seem at all improbable that the amount Canada will import in coming years under the provisions of this treaty will very considerably increase. I know of no variety of fruit or vegetable produced in Canada which could not be produced to a point which would go a very long way towards supplying the needs of the Canadian consumer at the time he requires them, namely in the actual producing season.

An examination of the effects of this treaty on commodities other than those mentioned in the special schedule reveals the fact that there are two which in future will come in under the intermediate tariff. I am referring to cut flowers and potatoes. Hitherto cut flowers came in from the United States under a tariff of forty per cent and potatoes under one of seventy-five cents a hundred. In future both will come in free. On Canadian soil and under Canadian conditions there is no question that dotted across Canada flowers of excellence are being grown. There are many occasions in our lives when we wish to purchase flowers; usually we want them in a hurry and are particularly anxious to get them. It seems to me most unlikely that florists will be able to produce in anything like the same volume they have produced in the past if in the future cut flowers come in free of duty from the United States, where frequently they are grown with the assistance of cheap labour, and, if they be hothouse production, under lower fuel costs prevailing in the United States.

It is less easy to understand the situation produced by the treaty with regard to potatoes, because in connection with this commodity Canada is on an export basis. Last year she exported five times as much as she imported. Surely the government does not propose to balance the trade in potatoes. Surely it is unlikely that the United States will fail to make use of the situation described by the Prime Minister in these words:

> Of the other products not covered by the trade agreement the most important are codfish and table potatoes, and in the case of both these products low prices and depressed conditions in the industries concerned in the United States made it impossible for the government of that country to consider the granting of concessions on these products at the present time.

I do not know if that can properly be connected with what I am referring to, but it amounts to this, that the price is so low in the United States that we will now let them enter Canada free, while Canada is on an export basis. However the government, if the minister sees fit, can correct these difficulties. He has pointed out, and quite correctly, that it is quite impossible for him to reveal the secrets of the budget before its introduction. I find myself in the position of having to endeavour to judge the treaty on the facts which present themselves to me at this time. Whereas these two commodities used to come in here under a tariff they now come in free, and I do not see how the producers can be other than troubled and anxious with regard to possible results.

For a few moments I should like to look at the other side of the treaty, and see what Canada receives. I find that in the future apples may enter the United States under a duty of fifteen cents a bushel rather than one of twenty-five cents. I wonder if hon. members know that forty-one states of the union produce apples on a commercial scale. I wonder if they have considered whether in view of that fact it is probable that Canada will be able greatly to increase the $10,000 worth of apples she sent to the United States last year. It does not seem to me that a country which grows apples to the enormous extent they are grown in the United States, and which has a proclivity for dumping its produce on our markets, will be very receptive to an increase in the supply of apples from Canada.

The duty on strawberries is reduced from one and one-quarter cents per pound to three-quarters of a cent per pound. Last year we exported $19,000 worth to the United States. I have already pointed out that when our strawberries are ready to move to the market they come up against the tail end of the United States strawberry season. Is it likely, then, that we shall find a receptive market in the United States for our strawberries? The duty on cherries is cut in half. We exported so small a quantity last year and in recent preceding years that they are not even mentioned separately, but come in under the heading of other fruits, n.o.p.

The duty on peas is cut in half for three months. There, again, the amount which we have shipped is negligible. Then we come back to potatoes. The duty on potatoes has been reduced for certain months and a quota established. They want to buy our seed grain from this northern climate, but as we are on an export basis already, as they are allowed to ship their potatoes into Canada free, as our producers of early potatoes have more than enough to supply the Canadian market, it is very questionable to my mind whether we shall benefit greatly from that item.

The tariff on turnips is cut in half, and I think that will help. Two areas in Canada produce turnips on a commercial basis, and we shipped into the United States last year $396,000 worth. It may be that other areas in Canada will be able to turn to the production of turnips and that this reduction in the tariff will assist us.

The tariff on cabbage is reduced from two to 1½ cents. The quantity we shipped last year was negligible, but the quantity which the United States shipped to us last year was $161,000 worth, and four years ago it amounted to $450,000 worth. I do not think it is very probable that we shall get much assistance on cabbage.

So here we have seven items in the fruit and vegetable schedules on which we do get tariff assistance of a sort from the United States, but the whole of the rest of the fruits and vegetables which we produce will remain under the Hawley-Smoot tariff. In endeavouring to come to a fair decision with regard to the implications of this treaty regarding advantages to this particular industry, I am bound to say that I cannot find any. But the whole matter, let me emphasize, turns on the willingness or otherwise of the Minister of Finance to make use of the powers under his hand, and I would remind him once more that although the amount he can use is less than it was—I must also refer to the fact that it is a method of protection against which he set his face in an adamant way in 1930—the harm which this treaty may do to the fruit and vegetable industry will be considerably lessened if he will use that power to the full, and if he will use it in time.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, before this debate adjourns and the house goes into committee I should like to say that it has been a source of satisfaction to me to have occupied a grandstand seat in the House of Commons while the two old stalwart political parties have been riding the hobby-horse of high versus low tariffs around the racecourse on its perennial run which it has been following now since 1867. It has been quite enlightening to watch it.

[Mr. Stirling.]

I should like to refer to a remark that was made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) last night when he said, "My hon. friends in the far corner who say that the people of western Canada are not interested in trade are lucky that they do not have to go back to the country very soon." I wish to correct any misunderstanding that hon. members may have in thinking that we in this corner are not interested in trade. I do not wish those words to be put into our mouths at all. We, in western Canada are very greatly interested in trade, and we here in this corner representing Alberta are vitally interested in trade. We feel, however, that our interest is more in internal trade than in external trade at this time. We do not believe with the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that external trade is going to solve the problem which now confronts Canada and do away with our unemployment problem and our relief camps and the various other troubles that confront us. We have no real hope that this trade treaty which is now being completed with the United States will bring back any very great measure of prosperity.

We have no really fundamental fault to find with the treaty, and I myself am going to vote for the passage of this resolution now being debated, but I am doing so not with any pious prayer that this new agreement, which might have been efficacious many years ago in the history of Canada, is going to be the one panacea we have needed these last five years to put our unemployed to work and that sort of thing. Our interest is in trade, in free trade, in lots of trade, but we might well have spent the time we have taken on this debate, and perhaps more, and I hope we shall before parliament prorogues, in devising ways and means whereby trade inside Canada might be stimulated so that our own citizens might be provided with the means for consuming to the full. Then, after that, we might make agreements with foreign countries for the disposal of our surplus. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we shall spend just as much time on this new horse, which is not a wooden one like the hobby-horse of high versus low tariffs, and so, not being wooden, is likely eventually to arrive somewhere.

I have a particular interest in the last paragraph of the communication which passed between the Canadian legation in Washington and the Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States, and signed by

H. H. Wrong, Charge d'Affaires. The last paragraph reads as follows:

I am further directed to state that the Canadian government propose to invite parliament to permit the entry free of duty and charges of incidental purchases by residents of Canada returning from the United States of America, not exceeding the value of one hundred dollars, under regulations, particularly as to the frequency of such entry and duration of visits, to be prescribed, for such time as treatment substantially equivalent to that now in effect is accorded by the government of the United States of America to incidental purchases by residents of that country returning from Canada.

People meet in tourist camps; travellers meet on the trains and in many instances the conversation turns to the great difference in the treatment regarding the entry of purchases accorded to American and Canadian tourists. Sometimes the American tourists feel a certain superiority which we do not like. My constituency of Medicine Hat touches on the international boundary. Many of my constituents live long distances from the stores and populated centres in Canada and they find it more convenient to cross the boundary to the towns of Montana. On their behalf I feel very grateful that it will be possible for them to avoid the temptations which are always in the way of such people to smuggle ordinary articles into Canada. I am glad to know that travellers and tourists going into the United States will be able to bring back those little articles which they feel they want and which they feel can be bought more advantageously in that country. They will not then be tempted to smuggle these articles into Canada. As a guide to what I expect from this government, I will read a paragraph from the United States Tariff Act of 1930. This is paragraph 1798 of the act, and it reads:

Residents of the United States returning from abroad are allowed $100 in value on articles acquired by them for personal and household use or as souvenirs or curios. These articles can be brought in free of duty provided they are not bought on commission or intended for sale; provided, that a resident of the United States shall not take advantage of the exemption herein granted within a period of thirty days from the last exemption claimed.

The last paragraph of Mr. Wrong's letter reads in part as follows:

—for such time as treatment substantially equivalent to that now in effect is accorded by the government of the United States of America to incidental purchases by residents of that country returning from Canada.

There is no definition there of a tourist or there is no stipulation as to how long one must remain in a foreign country before he is allowed this privilege. The real teeth in the United States act are that a returning resident must not use the privilege more than once every thirty days, and that the goods must not be bought on commission or intended for sale. It is my hope that the Canadian regulation will be similar to the American one and not specify a certain period which a tourist must remain in a country before he can take advantage of this exemption. Newspaper articles have appeared from time to time indicating that this period will be all the way from three weeks to three months. I hope the regulations will not be so couched that they will remove entirely the benefit of that particular clause.

On motion of Mr. Leader the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Salaries, $946,240; contingencies, $75,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister give the committee particulars of the increases in this item?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): The increase of $74,910 in salaries is due to statutory increases and the transfer of about forty-five clerks from the temporary to the permanent staff and the establishment of ten additional positions of a minor character. The decrease in the contingencies of $22,700 is accounted for by the transfer of the forty-five officials mentioned already. The amount involved in this change is approximately $45,000, but from this amount must be subtracted an increase of $15,300 in the appropriation for printing and stationery to provide for tabulating equipment in the statistical branch, and an increase of $7,000 in sundry expenditures to provide for travelling expenses of officers of the headquarters staff.

Mr. BENNETT: Before this administration came into office consideration was given to co-ordinating the preparation of statistical information, and the mention of the tabulating equipment brings this fact to my mind. Could the minister advise us if anything has been done in this direction? The minister knows, perhaps better than I, that at the end of each month his department endeavours to get out with great rapidity information in connection with the trade during the month. A certain amount of tabulation also takes place in the statistical branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. An effort was being made to see whether something could not be done to coordinate this and prevent duplication of effort and expenditures.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are working on that all the time. The method of tabulation now employed in the Department of National Revenue has been worked out with Doctor Coats of the bureau of statistics. That is about all the information I think I can give.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to draw a little incident to the attention of the committee and the minister. Although it is not very important, it may be symptomatic of many incidents which take place on our border line affecting people who return from the United States. A week ago yesterday I was crossing the border from Ogdensburg to Prescott and I was asked at the boundary if I had anything to declare. It so happened that I had in my possession a small box of cigars which had been given me and which I declared to the customs official there; it contained twenty-three cigars. I do not smoke, but I brought them back—at least I thought I was going to bring them back—for some friends in the house who do smoke. I told the customs official that I had there a box of cigars valued at, I think, exactly $1.10. He figured out what the duty would be and said it would be exactly $2.40 for cigars which cost retail $1.10. I told him he had better keep the cigars there and we would see what could be done about a duty of eleven cents on a cigar which cost a nickel retail on the other side. I asked for a receipt, which was given me. What I was wondering was: What is the disposition of goods that are impounded or retained by customs officials? I was told that these cigars would go up in smoke, but whether they were burnt or not I cannot say. I was told, however, by officials of the department that goods which are detained or seized by customs officials are destroyed by them at certain stated periods.

An hon. MEMBER: Destroyed by smoking.

Mr. HEAPS: It seems to me that if such is the case it is a most absurd regulation that anything which is seized or is left behind with customs officials should be destroyed, when there are many places where real use could be made of those articles. For instance, in the case of whiskey or cigars which happen to be seized by customs officials, it would strain my imagination a good deal to believe that all those goods are destroyed. I can hardly imagine that our officials are so honourable and generous that they can allow themselves to see good smokes and good whiskey going to waste in that way. I hardly think they would take the whiskey and pour it into the river St. Lawrence, nor do I think they would dispose of cigars in that way. But I do think, Mr. Chairman, that as regards goods seized or left at customs houses there should be some definite means of knowing what is done by way of disposing of them. In the case of such articles as I have just mentioned I see no reason in the world why, for instance, the tobacco could not go to some old folks home in the neighbourhood, and the liquor to the hospitals. I think it is ridiculous to waste material of which good use could be made. I have mentioned this matter privately to the minister. I should like him to inform the committee, if he can, how much goods have really been destroyed over a period of time and the character of the goods that have been so wasted.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it will be possible to get the information for my hon. friend. The regulations are very strict as to the destruction of that class of goods, they are destroyed periodically when the inspectors visit the customs houses in question. I do not think, from information I have had since being in the department, that the suspicions of my hon. friend are justified, because nothing is more strict than the insistence upon the destruction of goods that are seized under such circumstances as he has mentioned.

Mr. HEAPS: But is there any reason in the world why these goods should be destroyed at all?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not given consideration to the policy underlying the provisions of the act, but that is the law. I suppose, if it were not, abuses would creep in. One would have to be very careful about the destination of seized goods.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it the law or is it a regulation under the law that these goods have to be destroyed?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the law.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister not think that, in cases such as those to which I have just referred, the law might very well be altered and that we should stop the wasteful destruction of goods which might be serviceable to people in this country who need them?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall be very glad to give consideration to my hon. friend's suggestion. It would, however, require amendments to both the Customs Act and the Excise Act.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us have them.

Mr. LAWSON: On page 90 details are given of increases in several of the salaries. I assume these are the details of the item under discussion. I notice that the salary of the assistant commissioner of excise is increased by $300; that of the dominion customs appraiser is also increased. Are those statutory increases under the Civil Service Act or are they matters within the discretion of the minister under the National Revenue Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Both are statutory increases.

Mr. LAWSON: Does that apply to the whole list set out on pages 90 and 91?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the main, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to ask the minister one question and see if I caught his answer correctly. There is an increase of fifty-five persons in the service of the department, from 474 to 529. In reality, I gathered from what the minister said, there was a very slight increase, forty-five being already there, who show now where they were not shown before.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. The forty-five were taken from the temporary classification and put in the permanent classification.

Mr. BENNETT: When was that?

Mr. ILSLEY: A few months ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Before or since this government came in?

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the change of government.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice an item, examiner of publications and director of publicity, $4,200. Can the minister explain to the committee the duties and functions of the gentleman who occupies that position?

Mr. ILSLEY: That official is charged with the administration of the tariff item which prohibits the entry of certain literature, which is seditious, immoral and so forth. That is one of his duties. He has others as well.

Mr. HEAPS: That was the item of which I was thinking. I observe that the gentleman in question has vested in him very wide powers, and of a kind which I do not think he ought to have. Under his jurisdiction, his guidance, literature which ought to come into this country is often banned. Literature that we can find in practically all our public libraries is not allowed into Canada. I do not know what special qualifications the official in question has for saying what literature should and what literature should not come into this country. But I do think matters of this kind, concerning what is fit for people to read, or what publications should be allowed entry into Canada, should not come under the Department of National Revenue at all. They ought to be under some department more competent, I believe, to judge of these questions than is the department which is charged with the collection of the revenues of this dominion.

I have had a little experience with this department in the past in reference to the banning of books. I remember that I went to a former minister of this department and asked if he thought certain books ought to be banned. He told me that he did not think so, but in the meantime the official of the department had banned those books which the minister thought ought to be allowed free entry into this country. I want to know what authority is given this gentleman in question; how he judges what books are to be banned and how he comes to exercise the authority and jurisdiction which he does exercise.

Mr. ILSLEY: Someone has to do it, Mr. Chairman. Really it is the minister who bans the books, but of course the minister cannot read all the books, so we have to get the most competent official possible to examine this literature. With regard to the qualifications of Mr. Roe, I may say that he is a journalist of many years standing and a former member of the press gallery, with a long record of public service. I have no reason to think his qualifications are not of the highest character. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has in mind any particular books that were banned which in his opinion should have been admitted.

Mr. HEAPS: I was referring to ordinary books of a socialistic character that, to my own knowledge, have been banned, books that were published by Charles Kerr and Sons, of Chicago, that were held up by the department and not allowed to come into Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman give me the name of the book or books by the author he has named, which literature he thinks should have been admitted?

Mr. HEAPS: The name I mentioned is that of a publishing house in Chicago which publishes a more radical type of literature. My colleague from Vancouver East tells me that he can give an instance.

Mr. MacINNIS: I had a letter a day or two ago with regard to a book that to my knowledge has been in circulation in British Columbia for the last twenty years. The title is Socialism, Utopian and Scientific, by Friederich Engels. As a matter of fact it is an old classic that has been in circulation for the last thirty-five years. Why it should be held up now is something beyond my comprehension.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will look into the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will not mind I should like to say that a great many complaints were received, even by myself, that we were entirely too lenient in our administration in this regard. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) could be quite easily satisfied as to why this comes under the customs department. There is in our customs tariff an item which has been there for many years, forbidding the importation into our country of immoral or salacious literature, or literature that promotes revolution—I will put it in that way—or the use of force for the attainment of political ends. Someone has to determine whether a given book is immoral or salacious or whether it advocates the accomplishment of purposes in the manner I have indicated. There have been frequent complaints received to my knowledge, in fact by myself personally, with regard to books dealing with what one might call the new economic theories that advocate the accomplishment of a complete change in our social system by methods that at least the Supreme Court of Ontario have held to be improper. After that decision books that at times had come in freely were confiscated, because they constituted a violation of the provisions of the statute in the light of the decision that was given.

Mr. HEAPS: The book mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East is looked upon as a classic the world over. I assume one could find it in the public library here, though I have never tried to do so. I have no doubt it is in the parliamentary library; I believe if I sent for it I would get it. But, while it is permitted in all our public libraries, if anyone sends to the United States for a copy of the same book it will be held up and confiscated and considered to come within the classification of banned literature. I realize that there may be some force in the argument of the leader of the opposition, but there is the difficulty of allowing one individual to say what literature should be permitted to come through the customs and what should not be permitted to come through.

I think perhaps there is more involved in this than appears on the surface. It may be true that in some cases communications have come to the department urging that they should be a little stricter in their application of the ban on certain types of works, perhaps of a radical, socialistic or communistic character.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

On the other hand, we might ask for a ban on all fascist or nazi literature, and so on. One cannot say one form of literature must be banned while another of similar type is allowed entry. I think the gentleman in question, under whose jurisdiction lies this very important question of saying what is fit to read and what is not fit to read, should be guided by some definite policy, and there should be uniformity so far as the actions of the department are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not like the hon. gentleman to go away with the idea that the department, the minister or any official has the right, by law, to determine what people may or may not read generally. All the department can do is administer a certain item of the tariff. That is item 1201 of schedule C of the tariff:

> Prohibited goods: Books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind of a treasonable or seditious, or of an immoral or indecent character.

Necessarily there must be some discretion in deciding what is of a treasonable or seditious or an immoral or indecent character. To tell the truth, I do not know how the difficulty can be overcome. I will look into the question of the book mentioned by my hon. friend. I do not know its status, at the moment; that is, whether or not it has been banned.

Mr. MacNEIL: I should like to direct attention to a procedure which causes some inconvenience and hardship to booksellers. I refer to that class of literature which cannot be regarded as treasonable or seditious, and which has been in more or less general circulation in Great Britain and the United States. In the past the practice has been to hold up these books at ports of entry in British Columbia and other provinces and send them to Ottawa for examination. If it is found ultimately that they are not on the banned list, they are allowed to enter. Possibly in some cases some over-zealous officials have held up books in this way. I should like to suggest that some procedure be found which will do away with this hardship to the booksellers and avoid this inconvenience to those who have ordered books and who believe they are entitled to receive them. May I ask as to the policy in that regard?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are very few complaints of any hardship resulting from this practice. If the hon. gentleman would suggest any other procedure which might be followed I should certainly be glad to give the matter consideration. I presume there are occasions when the collector does not feel himself qualified to decide whether the book is of a character to bring it under the item, and so he forwards it to the department for examination.

Mr. BENNETT: And to secure uniformity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have had from time to time a number of complaints about the holding up of certain papers and books which I find on inquiry are not banned. Only a few days ago I had an inquiry from a prominent citizen of Alberta with regard to the Moscow News, which is not a propagandist organ, strictly speaking, but is a news organ printed in English. I remember some years ago on returning from two or three weeks in Russia I subscribed to that paper just to know what was going on. I subscribed for it in London, England, at a regular bookshop. My copy came through regularly. After the year expired I did not renew my subscription. But now I have a number of protests from different parts of the country, people saying that although they had subscribed through the London office they had difficulty in getting their paper. Only a few days ago I had a similar protest from Alberta about the paper not coming through. I understand it is not on the banned list. Why it should be held up at some local post office or by some customs official in the west, I cannot imagine. Can the minister give us some idea as to the mode of procedure in the matter?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think perhaps some collector might detain the Moscow News, not knowing, and wishing to ascertain, whether it is properly admissible. I believe, however, that such occurrences as the hon. member mentions are very rare; very little complaint has been made to the department of anything of that character.

Mr. HEAPS: I said it was quite possible that that book which was banned might be found in the parliamentary library. I have just sent a page for the book called Socialism, Utopian and Scientific, and from the parliamentary library comes this book that has been banned by the minister's officials. It has been in print since 1892. I do not have to comment on this matter any further; it shows the absurdity of some of the regulations put into effect by the individual in question. In spite of whatever qualifications he may have I think he must be governed by certain considerations that prompt him to ban books which can be found in practically every library in Canada, public, university, and private.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must find out whether that particular book is banned or not. I should be very much surprised to find that it is.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): A rather serious instance occurred recently in Toronto. A man named John Stimak was fined $100 for having in his possession some Lenin books. On questioning Mr. Roe, the official referred to, he made the statement to me and my colleague on the right (Mr. MacNeil) that he endeavoured always to permit such books to come into Canada if they were philosophic in character and not definitely propagandist, but that his action did not affect the Stimak case; that once the book is in the country it remains for the various provinces to decide whether they shall permit it to be handled by their citizens. That seems a very ridiculous state of affairs. If the book is permitted to enter Canada it should be permitted to enter every province, and if a man in good faith is importing books that are permitted by the dominion customs to enter, then there should be no penalty for being in possession of those books in any province of the dominion.

This also should be said, that when a minister is considering the banning of books that advocates the use of force to change the social system he should also bear in mind the banning of books that advocate force to maintain the social system, and there are plenty of such books in circulation at the present time.

Mr. LAWSON: The seventh item on page 90 provides for an assistant private secretary, apparently the creation of a new position. Is that an assistant private secretary to the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Further down there is another item: secretaries to executive. Apparently last year one executive had a secretary, and for the following year two are to have them. To which executive of the department is a secretary being provided that was not being previously provided?

Mr. ILSLEY: One of these positions was previously in existence and is in the office of the commissioner of excise. The other one is not filled. It provides for a position in the minister's office, and there is no present intention of filling it.

Mr. LAWSON: Then why include it in the estimates?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it makes provision.

Mr. LAWSON: But if it is not necessary and there is no intention to fill it, why provide money for it? Judging by the minister's answer it is not a provision for a secretary for some executive in the department; apparently it is a provision for a secretary in the minister's office in addition to the private secretary who has always been there, and an assistant private secretary, which position is also provided for by these estimates.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. The provision is made to give some little latitude in the organization of the minister's office. There is no secretary to an executive there other than the assistant private secretary, and there is no present intention of putting one there. But this gives a little latitude in case it should be necessary.

Mr. LAWSON: In other words provision is being made in these estimates for an assistant private secretary to the minister, an official he did not previously have, and for another secretary to the minister under the title of secretary to executive. Surely that cannot be so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that there was an assistant private secretary before.

Mr. LAWSON: For a time, yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Then why complain now?

Mr. LAWSON: I am not complaining; I am asking for information. I have not made the slightest complaint, but when I see in the estimates an item which provides for a secretary to an executive, and the minister intimates that it is to be another secretary to the minister, obviously I think there must be something unusual in the situation, and I am trying to find out what it is. I supposed the executives in the national revenue department would be the commissioner of customs for example, the commissioner of excise, the commissioner of income tax. All I want to have clear is: Does this provision for an additional secretary as secretary to executive mean an additional secretary or assistant secretary to the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is and has been for many years provision for a secretary to the executive in nearly every minister's office.

Mr. LAWSON: For one, yes, and there has been one in the office of the Minister of National Revenue. But the minister is now providing for two.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, only one secretary to executive. It is true that provision has been made for an assistant private secretary; that has been done there too. The only point is that I do not intend to fill that position.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. LAWSON: I hope the minister and I are not at cross purposes. He says that there is only one, but if he will read the item in the estimates he will find there is provision for two secretaries at $2,100, and that it is carried out to $4,200.

Mr. ILSLEY: One is not in my office.

Mr. LAWSON: That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought I said that one is in the office of the commissioner of excise. The other is provided for, but as I say, I have no present intention of filling the position.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LAWSON: Some hon. members must wish to hold up the estimates; if they do I promise the committee we could spend a long time on them. In connection with one or two items I see reductions in salaries without corresponding reductions in the number of employees. About half way down the page I find an item with reference to chemists. There were four in 1935-36 and provision is being made for the same number in these estimates, but there is a reduction of $200 in salaries to be paid. Then, further down the page the minister will find a reduction of $400 in salaries to assistant chemists, although the same number are being retained. I should like to know the reason for the reductions in the aggregate amounts paid.

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason is that with the retirement of officials who have reached the age of sixty-five years—

Mr. LAWSON: Young men come in at lower grades.

Mr. ILSLEY: —other men come in at lower salaries.

Mr. HEAPS: May I revert to the banning of certain books. Perhaps the minister would give the committee a list of publications banned by his department.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would be reluctant to do that, because to begin with it would be advertising salacious literature.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not wish to do that. The minister knows what I have in mind. I am thinking particularly of works along lines I discussed a few moments ago, and I think particularly of a book by Friederich Engels entitled Socialism, Utopian and Scientific. There must be many other works of the same type which have been banned by the department. A minute ago the minister wanted to know if there was a ban on the book. It is quite possible that so far as the department is concerned there may be no official ban, but I do know that in certain parts of the country books are not allowed to go through the customs department.

The hon. member for Vancouver East has in his possession a communication from an organization in Vancouver asking him to inquire about the ban on this particular book. Evidently a ban must be exercised by some of the customs officials in certain parts of the country. I do not want any advertising of salacious literature in this house or anywhere else, but it is quite another matter when departmental officials attempt to bar from proper circulation books of a philosophical nature in which are discussed questions and which any person might read to good advantage. I am suggesting that the minister might read the book by Friederich Engels; it would not do him any harm, and it might do good to some other hon. members in the committee if they were to read it. The book in question was published forty or fifty years ago, and I believe if we had a list of banned literature it might help some of us who occasionally read books of that kind.

Mr. MacINNIS: Despite the possible bad effect produced by advertising books of a certain type, nevertheless I think we ought to have some indication of what books are banned. It is possible that these books are banned only to some people, and that other people may bring them in or get them. That would be an undesirable state of affairs. I have been informed that although certain literature was banned to some people, other people could get those books. When we speak about salacious literature we are talking about something altogether different. It should not be difficult to find out the books which would come under that heading. At the moment I am not prepared to say that it would be worth while to have a censor. We could not do anything for those who would be detrimentally affected by reading such books, and those who would not be affected would not be reading them. There is no reason in the world, however, why we should not have a list of books such as I have indicated, and we should know why they are or are not admitted into the country.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister accept a suggestion whereby the department would be approached by publishing houses and booksellers, listing with the department books of a philosophical nature read generally throughout the world? After they have been scrutinized by the department orders could be issued to the officers at the different ports of entry advising them that there would be no reason for banning such literature. I believe such an arrangement would eliminate a good deal of discontent and considerable inconvenience now being caused booksellers and customers.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is substantially what is being done now.

Mr. BARBER: I see an expenditure indicated for the salary of an expert tea tester. Is that an all year round job? I notice the salary is reduced by about $500.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an all year round job, beginning at the lower range. That is the reason for the reduction.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Fisheries—Salaries and contingencies, $133,331.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the salary of Mr. Larabee in this item?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Not in this item. He is a temporary employee.

Mr. NEILL: There are a number of items I should like to discuss, but the list is so comprehensive that it is difficult to know which one to speak about. Speaking generally about the salary estimates I should like to suggest to the minister, who of course is new in his department, that what is badly needed in the department is a complete shake-up, and that applies both to officers at Ottawa, and particularly in British Columbia. In saying that I am not reflecting upon the management of the present minister or, indeed, upon that of his predecessor. The last minister was a victim, shall I say, and the present minister is liable to be embarrassed by the subtle, feather bed influence of his officials. They do not say to him: You shall not do so and so. That would possibly excite his suspicion and his resistance. But the continual dropping of water wears away the stone, and they yes, yes him, and then gently but quietly, day by day, influences are brought to bear and facts or semi-facts brought forward, and presently the minister finds himself committed to the stagnation of bureaucracy, than which there can be no more hopeless condition.

I do not suggest, when I say that there should be a shake up, that the minister should discharge the officials or attachés appointed by the late Conservative government, who have now become to a very large extent barnacles on the ship of state, and supplant them by Liberal attachés who in time would also become barnacles, but I use the word as I intend it; I mean: Shake them up. A certain section of the employees are more or less asleep. Another section is composed of political hacks in every sense of the word. Another section, the larger one, and the most fatal of all, the one of which I, perhaps, complain most, is composed of those who have got into the official rut, and there is nothing more hopeless to get action from than that.

I have some knowledge of that situation myself, having been a civil servant for ten years, and I saw both in my own experience and that of others how the continued officials come to resent anyone coming forward with any suggestion that might mean action or change. We got into the position where we knew that it meant trouble and worry, and possibly a reprimand from the government for taking the wrong way instead of the right way. It was so much easier to make some general evasive reply or objection, and stall off the man or woman who wanted change. I was once told by a deputy minister of an important portfolio in this government, speaking from a long experience, "Mr. Neill, I get along best when I do nothing." He was deputy minister of an important department, and there are parts of this country suffering to-day from the policy or lack of policy indicated by his attitude. He is no longer a deputy, so I am not hurting anybody's feelings.

When I say, shake them up, I mean that those who have got into a more or less sleepy condition should be advised to wake up. The political hacks to whom I have referred, who got their positions through political influence—and I have no objection to that provided they carry out their duties—do not seem to be aware that there has been a change of government, and they are still continuing to play politics. I am referring more to British Columbia than to the offices here where, in fact, I know of none of that.

The third thing is to get them out of the rut, so that when a suggestion is made by people whose livelihood is at stake they will not simply sit down and write a letter, take the line apparently of least resistance, stall the man off, give him some form letter—I have received scores of them and have a dozen in front of me now—hoping that he will forget about the matter or give it up in despair.

Coming to the estimates themselves, I see the details are given on page 77. We know, if not from personal knowledge, at least from the press, that the government has told the different departments that they must cut down and practise economy. I do not know if they have been told that they must cut down their estimates to those of a certain year, or that a certain percentage must be cut off, or a certain sum, such as $200,000 or $300,000 must be cut off. At any rate, glancing at this book of estimates, the result is obvious. Orders have been given—and I am not complaining of this—to cut down expenses. It is the method I wish to protest against, and it is perhaps not the fault of the officials so much as of the system that has been adopted.

The minister or his deputy is told, we will say, that he has to cut down to the amount of $200,000. There are only one or two ways in which he can do this. The deputy can either cut down his staff, dismiss some of them, or cut down the seasonal work that is done in the field. Why can he not cut down the salaries of his employees? He cannot do that because that is regulated by the government in another way. If the government wish to cut down the salaries of the civil service they do so, as they have done, by a blanket reduction all round, but that is not within the scope of the deputy or the minister who is told to cut down the expenses of his department.

Then the deputy is confronted with this situation: I have to cut down $200,000; I cannot take it off salaries; what am I going to do? One thing would be to reduce the staff, but did one ever hear of a deputy doing that? What is the whole idea of a man when he gets into public office but to build a bureau around himself. Give a man the job of shovelling snow between the east and the west block, and then go away and come back in ten years, and you would not find him shovelling snow any more; he would be the deputy superintendent general of snow shovelling, with an office of his own and a deputy and assistant deputy, an accountant, and probably a purchasing agent, and we would be mighty lucky if he did not have a publicity agent as well. The deputy cannot get away from the temptation of building a staff around himself, and the superintendent general of snow shovelling would, of course, get a bigger salary than the man handling the shovel. Very well then. The deputy is not going to cut down his staff for that reason; then there is also the pressure of friends, and all his subordinates have friends and relations who will put pressure upon him.

Then what is he going to do? He will do as we see revealed in the estimates. He will cut down on the practical work. Instead of cutting down these salaries I note that there is an increase of $4,893, practically $5,000 of an increase, mark you, in salaries. Then if you will look at page 44 you will find that substantial reductions are being made in the work that is carried on. There is a total reduction of $185,112 in the various items, and where did the bulk of that reduction come from? The biggest item of salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol, and fisheries protection services. a very essential service in connection with the conservation of fish, is being cut down by $141,548 out of a total reduction of $185,112, while the overhead, the permanent salaries, has been increased by nearly $5,000. There are other items, some of which are being reduced thirteen per cent, some seventy-six per cent—that is one of the most important items that I shall deal with presently if I have time—another one, thirty-four per cent, and so on, while the overhead has been increased four per cent.

Partly it is the system that is wrong, and partly this is due to human nature; they do not like to go at it in the right way. It is inimical to the best interests of any industry, when economy and curtailment must be practised, that it should be practised on the practical work in the field rather than on the overhead. It might be said that the men working in the fields are also getting salaries, but they are cut out because they are seasonal men. The order goes out that instead of 150 guardians there shall be only eighty. Do hon. members realize the damage done by such a reduction? Streams that have been protected for fifteen years are left without guardians, and when a stream is left without guardians it means that poaching occurs, human nature being what it is. In British Columbia these conditions are particularly bad. There is an over-staffed office in Vancouver, but there is no suggestion of cutting down there. The really practical work in the field is to be curtailed.

Turning to the head office, I find that one man who is drawing a very substantial salary died but his position was filled at once. I believe his work could have been done by others in the department and there would have been an opportunity for some retrenchment. Instead of this, I notice that the staff at Ottawa has been increased from sixty to sixty-one. Then I notice a fisheries engineer, but that is all right. Then I notice a purchasing agent. How many things must be purchased for the department? Could not the services of the purchasing agent of the Department of Marine be obtained for the purchase of the things required for this department? Is it necessary that every little department should have a purchasing agent? I notice that the last auditor general's report gives the salary of this man as $2,862, but he is now slated at $3,420.

Then we find what I think is the gem of the whole collection, a director of publicity. What does the Department of Fisheries need with a director of publicity? What does he do? Before this item passes I intend to ask for full information on that. Then when I get it, I am going to ask what his assistant does. I have no doubt that if I looked further into this matter I would find that the assistant had an assistant, probably under the designation of clerk or something of that kind. Then we find a director of fisheries promotion and inspection. This gentleman receives a very substantial salary. Possibly he does useful work, but when the general services of this department are being reduced by $185,112, as will be found on page 44, I cannot understand why there should be an increase of $4,893 in the salaries of the permanent staff at Ottawa.

It is not possible to get full details for British Columbia as the auditor general's report is about two years old when it is issued, but I am sure the same conditions prevail there, if they are not worse. I believe they have a director of publicity, but he goes under a different name, something to do with statistics. I should like the minister to give me some explanation about these matters. First, what are the duties of the director of publicity and his assistant?

Mr. MICHAUD: In reply to the hon. gentleman's direct question I may say that the director of publicity and his assistant collect statistics and distribute them throughout the country and the world in an effort to increase the demand for fish. The fisheries industry of Canada is worth about $34,000,000, the fisheries of the Pacific coast alone are estimated to be worth $20,000,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: On page 77 I notice the salary for the private secretary shows an increase of $1,532.59. Why is that?

Mr. MICHAUD: Last year there was not a private secretary engaged for the whole year. The estimates for next year provide for one being engaged for the full year.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 4, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. McLean (East Simcoe) be substituted for that of Mr. Slaght on the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, and amendments thereto and the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, and amendments thereto.

Motion agreed to.

JANSEN, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a return asked for by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) with regard to correspondence respecting the dismissal of Ernest J. Symons, former postmaster at Jansen, Saskatchewan. I might say that a complete return in this connection was tabled in 1932 and is contained in sessional paper No. 388 for that session. That return is available to the hon. member.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the criminal code (death penalty).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BLAIR: Mr. Speaker, this bill is simply designed to abolish hanging and to bring about executions by means of lethal gas, or a lethal chamber.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PATROL VESSELS—PREVENTIVE SERVICE

Mr. VENIOT:

1. What vessels having their base at Dalhousie, N.B., were engaged in patrol work by the preventive service in 1933 and 1934?
2. What was the cost of same for each year?
3. What vessels, having their base of patrol at Shippigan, N.B., were engaged in patrol work by the preventive service in 1933 and 1934?
4. What was the cost of same for each year?

Mr. ELLIOTT (for Mr. Lapointe, Quebec East):

1. The patrol boat Vigil was based at Dalhousie, N. B., in 1933. No vessels were based at this point in 1934.

2. The cost of the patrol boat Vigil for the calendar year 1933 was $3,417.28. In addition the establishment for a vessel of this type provided for a chief petty officer at $3.20 per day, an engine room artificer at $3.10 per day and an able seaman at $1.95 per day. These men received a subsistence allowance of 60 cents per day each.

3. In 1933 the Neguac was based at Shippigan. In 1934 the Beebe was based at Shippigan.

4. The cost of the Neguac for the calendar year 1933 was $1,530.64. The cost of the Beebe for the calendar year 1934 was $1,930.38. In addition to the above cost the establishment for vessels of this type provided for a chief petty officer at $3.20 per day, an engine room artificer at $3.10 per day and an able seaman at $1.95 per day. These men received a subsistence allowance of 60 cents per day each.

LIEUT.-COLONEL W. ARTHUR STEEL

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was Lt-Col. W. Arthur Steel seconded by the Department of National Defence to the radio broadcasting commission?
2. If so, from what date?
3. What was his salary in the Department of National Defence?
4. What is his salary as a member of the radio broadcasting commission?
5. What will be his pension (a) if he is sent back to the Department of National Defence before being retired, and (b) if retired while still seconded by the Department of National Defence to the radio broadcasting commission?
6. Is there any statutory provision for the superannuation of members of the radio broadcasting commission; if so, what is it?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.
2. 1st October, 1931.
3. $4,453 per annum.
4. $8,000 less five per cent.
5. (a) $1,975.38 per annum as of 1st April, 1936; (b) $3,520 per anum as of 1st April, 1936.
6. No.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—TRAVELLING EXPENSES

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

What amount was spent in travelling expenses by each commissioner and official of the civil service commission during the calendar years 1933, 1934, and 1935?

Mr. RINFRET:

Travelling expenses during the calendar years 1933, 1934 and 1935, of the commissioners and officials of the Civil Service Commission.

MAJOR-GENERAL A. G. L. MCNAUGHTON

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was Major General A. G. L. McNaughton, chief of general staff, seconded to the National Research Council; if so, on what date?

2. Was he retired as chief of general staff; if so, on what date; if not, why?

3. Referring to the previous paragraph, in the affirmative, what is his pension as chief of general staff, from the date of his retirement?

4. If the answer to paragraph 2 is in the negative, what pension will be paid to the said McNaughton: (a) if he is sent back to the Department of National Defence and retired as chief of general staff before July 4, 1936; (b) if his retirement takes place on or after July 4, 1942, and if he is seconded until then by the Department of National Defence to the National Research Council?

5. Did his predecessor, Dr. H. M. Tory, the former president of the National Research Council, receive a pension?

6. Is there any statutory provision for a pension to be paid to the president of the National Research Council; if so, what is it?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes. On the 1st June, 1935, in the following terms: "Branch of the General Staff, Maj.-Gen. A. G. L. McNaughton, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., M.Sc. LL.D., i.d.c., p.s.c., chief of the general staff is seconded, whilst holding the appointment of president of the National Research Council, 1st June, 1935."

2. No, because it was then decided that he should be seconded.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. (a) $4,800 per annum, as of July 4, 1936; (b) $9,000 per annum, as of July 4, 1942.

5. No.

6. No.

THREE RIVERS ELEVATOR

Mr. HALL:

1. Has the government signed the lease with the Three Rivers Grain and Elevator Company, Limited, covering construction of a private elevator on a government owned wharf; if so, when?

2. Has work on this elevator started; if so, who gave the necessary authority, and was it given before the expiratory date for the approval of plans had elapsed?

3. What money was spent by the government in developing the site upon which the elevator is being constructed?

4. What annual revenue does the government expect to receive, and what yield does this give on the investment?

5. Are not the present elevator facilities at Montreal and Quebec adequate?

6. If an elevator is required at Three Rivers, why does the government not build and operate it when they already have developed this site?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes. The Three Rivers harbour commissioners who went out of office 31st October, 1935, had authorized and executed a lease of a site on the 29th October, 1935. The new board of harbour commissioners who assumed office 1st November, 1935, recognized the obligation entered into by the old board but found a modification and revision of the terms embodied in the lease necessary in the public interest. The revised lease was executed 26th February, 1936.

2. Yes. Approval of the plans under the Navigable Waters Protection Act was found to be unnecessary.

3. The site leased forms part of the property which was made available for use by dredging, filling and reclaiming 834,512 sq. ft. of land and by building 2,690 lineal feet of wharf frontage. The cost of the reclaimed area based on the total cost of the work is approximately $3 per sq. ft. On this basis the value of the site leased is $206,100.

4. Estimated annual revenue:

1. Rental of land, 68,700 sq. ft. at 5c. per sq. ft.....	$ 3,435
2. For use of wharf frontage, 300 ft. at $2 per ft.....	600
3. 6c. per ton on all grain passing through the elevator estimated at 16,000,000 bus.....	28,800
Total.....	$32,835

This revenue would yield 16 per cent on the investment in the land leased.

5. This is a matter of opinion.

6. In the opinion of the government if private capital is willing to build and operate a grain elevator at Three Rivers, it should be allowed to do so.

JACQUES-CARTIER DISTRICT—SETTLERS

Mr. MALLETTE:

How many settlers in the district of Jacques-Cartier took up land under the act that ensured them a grant of $600?

Mr. ROGERS: Under relief legislation the dominion government has entered into an agreement with the province of Quebec, under the terms of which the dominion, province, and municipality contribute each a sum not exceeding $200 towards the settling on the land of any family which is on relief, or which would otherwise be in receipt of relief. Provision is made for an additional contribution of $33.33 for subsistence expenditures during the third year of settlement by each party to the agreement if the family is not self-supporting at the end of the two year period.

Selection of settlers is made by a committee which includes representatives of the federal government, the province, and the colonization departments of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. This committee has selected for settlement 976 families with 5,029 dependents, of which number 21 settlers with 97 dependents are from the district of Jacques-Cartier.

PRINTING BUREAU EMPLOYEES

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. What are the names and addresses of all persons appointed (a) as temporary employees, and (b) as permanent employees at the printing bureau since October 14, 1935?
2. Who made such appointments?
3. Who recommended them?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. (a) Name—Address—Duties

(1) Wm. J. McCabe, 198 Woodbine ave., Toronto, Ont., hand compositor.

(2) Antonio Gariepy, 44 Bolton st., Ottawa, Ont., typist, grade 1.

(3) Marc A. Bérubé, 139 Notre Dame st., Hull, Que., typist, grade 1.

(4) Laurent St. Amour, 33 Montcalm st., Hull, Que., stenographer, grade 1.

(5) T. D. Donoghue, 141 Patterson ave., Ottawa, Ont., hand compositor.

(6) Alfred Schingh, 338 St. Patrick st., Ottawa, Ont., labourer.

(b) None.

2. First to fifth by civil service commission. Sixth by the minister.

3. First to fifth—no knowledge. Sixth—the member for Ottawa East.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ALBERTA PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. MARSHALL:

What public buildings has the dominion government erected in the province of Alberta in 1935 (a) from moneys chargeable to capital; (b) from moneys chargeable to income?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

PENSION APPEAL COURT

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. How many appeals were pending consideration by the appeal court as at December 31, 1934, in the following categories (a) appeals by the crown from quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?
2. How many appeals were filed with the appeal court during 1935, as follows (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?
3. How many appeals were heard by the appeal court during 1935, as follows (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?
4. How many appeals were allowed in 1935, as follows (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?
5. How many appeals were disallowed in 1935, as follows (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?
6. How many appeals were referred by the appeal court to the pensions commission in 1935 (a) appeals of the crown from the quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from the quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?
7. How many appeals were awaiting consideration by the appeal court as at December 31, 1935 (a) appeals of crown from quorum pensions commission; (b) appeals of applicants from quorum pensions commission; (c) other categories?

BROADVIEW, SASK., POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) the reason for the delay in opening a new post office at Broadview, Saskatchewan. This very fine building was completed last November and taken over from the contractor, and the people would like to know what is the occasion for the delay in opening it.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): This matter is within the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works. The Post Office Department was advised by the chief architect on December 17 that a contract had been awarded for the supply and installation of interior fittings for this building, and under date of February 19 a request was made to the chief architect to ascertain when it would be possible to occupy the building. I understand that inquiries were made of whoever was in charge in the district, and that as soon as a decision has been reached my hon. friend will be advised.

ELMWOOD, MAN., POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): May I ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) when the post office at Elmwood, near Winnipeg, which is now completed, will be opened?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): I think I can give the same answer to this as I did to the question put by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). The building is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works, and consideration is being given to the matter referred to by my hon. friend.

HAGGIS IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland): I should like to direct a question expressly to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). A matter of national importance arises out of a communication I have received to-day from a prominent Canadian citizen:

> As a Scotchman born in Dumfriesshire of sheep stealing ancestors, I am passionately fond of the national dish of Scotland, namely, the haggis, and it always used to be my practice until a year or so ago to bring these out from Scotland in tins and consume them accompanied by the necessary neat Scotch whiskey.
> Early last spring I was told that a permit was necessary from the Department of Agriculture of the dominion government to bring haggis into Canada—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Shame!

Mr. FRASER:

> —and after voluminous correspondence with that department I was informed that the permit would be issued by a certain health officer in Edinburgh who looked after such things for the Canadian government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Reading this letter is highly improper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to confine himself to putting his question.

Mr. FRASER: My question is, what steps will the Minister of Agriculture take in order that Scotchmen in Canada may be permitted to import haggis direct from Scotland instead of its having to come from France under the present regulation? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, a matter of national importance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

CANADA–UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

> That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty's government in the Dominion of Canada, and the government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): In rising to continue the debate on this motion the first statement I want to make is that I intend to vote for the resolution. I am doing this not because I think this agreement is the last word in reciprocal trade arrangements, but because I believe it is a step in the right direction. I believe it points the road that the nations of the world must follow if we are to regain our lost prosperity. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches so far made. One thing has been made very clear to me, and that is that the Conservative party is opposed to reciprocity with the United States. Not that I had any doubt in the matter, because I took the view during the last election campaign, and expressed it, that we had no assurance of a fair trade arrangement with our great neighbour to the south if a Conservative government should be returned to power.

Mr. SPENCE: You have got one now that you will be sorry for.

Mr. LEADER: On the other hand I was sure that if a Liberal government were returned we had reasonable assurance that we would have a trade arrangement with the United States. In view of the attitude that has been taken by members of the Conservative party, and particularly by the leader of that party, it seems to me that my attitude at that time has been vindicated. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) yesterday afternoon was frank enough to state that after serving twenty-four years with the Conservative party he never was convinced that his party believed in reciprocity with the United States. I am glad the hon. member was manly enough to come out and make that statement. I want also to congratulate him on his assurance to the house that he intends to vote for this resolution.

I have a political background that perhaps is not known to all hon. members of this house. Some may remember that I sat with the Progressive group in this house for four years.

Mr. SPENCE: You bet we do.

Mr. LEADER: A good many years before that I had belonged to the Conservative party.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame!

Mr. LEADER: I remember that when in 1911 reciprocity was an issue the Conservative party were opposed to reciprocity as they are now, and thinking I was a loyal Conservative and was doing what I thought was right by my party, I voted against reciprocity and have regretted it ever since. Now, lest someone should wonder why I am on this side of the house, I make this statement; I am over here believing that the Liberal government intends to do something, and I want to help them. I make this further statement, that should a Liberal government not legislate in the interests of my people I shall not hesitate to vote against them. That is my position in this house. I believe in Liberal principles; I believe that the Liberal party at the present time has a wonderful opportunity to do something of real value for the Canadian people, beyond that of any party that ever succeeded to power in this country, and I believe that they will. Our hope is in the Liberal party and they will not fail us.

This afternoon we are again discussing reciprocity. The measure is introduced by the Liberal party and is again opposed by the Conservative party. After all, it is not what one says that amounts to very much, but rather his achievements. I am reminded of the old saying, "By their fruits ye shall know them." I believe the agreement will be beneficial to Canadians, and particularly to agriculture, that part of Canadian industry with which during all my life I have been identified, and with which I expect to be identified as long as I live.

May I refer particularly to the agreement as it affects the cattle industry. I was pleased to note that while pointing out that the agreement might prove to be disastrous to Canada, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) admitted that it was beneficial to the cattle industry. For a moment I should like to discuss the terms of the agreement. It provides that cattle weighing over 700 pounds will be admitted into the United States at two cents per pound, which is a reduction of 33⅓ per cent from the former rate of three cents per pound. A quota of 155,799 head is stated in connection with the shipment of these cattle. Then, there is the further provision that cattle weighing less than 175 pounds will be admitted at 1½ cents per pound instead of 2½ cents per pound, a reduction of forty per cent in the rate of duty. In that category we will be allowed to ship 51,933 head. The rate on dairy cattle weighing more than 700 pounds is reduced from three cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound, or the equivalent of a reduction in duty of fifty per cent. Of that class 20,000 head will be allowed in. Last year we shipped 123,501 head of cattle to the United States market. If we fulfil our quota this year we will ship 227,732 head, or an increase over last year of 104,231 head. Surely that is a substantial margin of increase, and will go a great distance towards helping our cattle industry.

I should like to state what this will mean in dollars and cents. At one dollar per hundred pounds it would amount to $12 on a 1,200 pound animal, and less than that on one weighing less. It is estimated that the average benefit from the treaty will be $9 per head. Last year we received $6,295,682 from the total number of cattle shipped to the United States. If at that time the rates of duty indicated under this agreement had been in force this would have added an extra amount of $1,111,509 to the receipts of cattle producers. This amount added to the purchasing power of the Canadian people could not help but boost industry all along the line.

But that is not the whole story, by any means. It is a well known fact that the price we get for our domestic produce is regulated by the export price. In view of that fact I should like to refer to figures handed to me by the Department of Agriculture which indicate that we produce 2,000,000 head of cattle each year. If we multiply that figure by $9 we have a total of $18,000,000. Therein lies the real value of the agreement. We now have two outlets for our Canadian cattle. I should like to give the figures for the last ten years of shipments of cattle to the United Kingdom and the United States. They are as follows:

Calendar years	Shipments to United Kingdom	Shipments to United States
1926..	$ 79,985	$158,295
1927..	8,263	283,004
1928..	405	242,354
1929..	....	250,536
1930..	5,400	54,716
1931..	27,149	24,589
7932..	16,568	12,865
1933..	50,317	5,734
1934..	53,953	6,567
1935..	6,704	123,501

It appears that prior to 1930 our best market was in the United States, but during the last five years it has been in the United Kingdom. To-day we have these two markets to which we may ship our cattle—a very welcome improvement, so far as cattle producers are concerned. An alternative market adds to the stability and guarantees a fair price. May I read a portion of a communication I received from the Department of Agriculture:

> The most recent development in the cattle industry is a revival of interest in Canadian cattle on the part of a number of importing firms in the United Kingdom. Six boats have been booked, having a total capacity of approximately 3,000 cattle and two boats have left the port of Saint John for British ports. The cattle situation in the old country is such that a scarcity of good fresh beef is expected and the market there is for the first time in almost a year returning to an export basis for Canada.

This agreement offers us a better opportunity to get into the United States market. The result is that we have not only the market in the United Kingdom but also the great market to the south of us to which we may ship our cattle. Although the cattle industry has suffered grievously, it would appear that brighter prospects are ahead. May I quote further from the letter from the Department of Agriculture:

> The most disturbing factor in the present situation in the domestic market is the tendency to liquidate heavy supplies of unfinished cattle, cattle that are neither good nor common, but of in-between quality and a distinct loss to the producer, since the cost of such stock last fall when put in stables was as high or higher than such quality stock has been realizing during past week.

That is what I mean, Mr. Speaker. It adds stability to have this alternative market and to be able to ship either to the United States or to the United Kingdom, whichever market is the more favourable. Anyone who has been engaged in the cattle industry knows that you do not make much money out of an animal unless it is fat, and when we have an unstable market the tendency is to get rid of beasts when they are only half fat, instead of fattening them up and thereby getting the maximum return.

While our market in the United Kingdom is very valuable, our natural market is with our neighbours to the south. At the present time, when you take into account the duty, the price of our cattle entering the United States is about on a par with the price in the old country, but transportation charges to the United Kingdom are so much heavier that for all time I think we shall have to rely mainly on the United States market. I have before me a few figures in regard to transportation charges. It costs approximately $26 including duty to ship a 1,000 pound beast from Winnipeg to St. Paul in the United States, and it costs in the neighbourhood of $30 to ship a 1,000 pound beast from Winnipeg to Glasgow or Birkenhead in the old country. There is also the danger of shrinkage in shipping to the United Kingdom market. It is a well known fact that cattle shipped to the old country very often shrink; in fact, the shrinkage often takes away all the gain that would otherwise accrue to the shipper.

As I said a few moments ago, the market at the present time is not so good, but under the stimulus of this treaty we are increasing our shipments of cattle to the United States. From January 1 of this year to date we have shipped 21,220 head of cattle to the United States as compared with 9,802 head for the same period of last year. At this point I should like to say to the government that I believe the time will come when it will be necessary to regulate our shipments of cattle to the United States so that we shall not use up all our quota in the first two or three months of the year, because to do so would work a great hardship on those who had not their cattle fattened in time and must therefore hold back and lose the benefit of shipping to the United States to the extent of the quota stated in the agreement.

I should like to say a word with regard to the quality of our products. If we are going to gain and hold a market in the United States or anywhere else we must produce what the trade demands, and I would submit to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), whom I see in his seat, that great care should be taken by the government to see that the quality of our cattle is improved. I say "improved," because at the present time they are not of as good quality as we should like to see. I heard the statement made at Brandon this winter, that the quality of cattle coming into the Manitoba market at St. Boniface has decreased forty per cent within the last ten years, and there is a reason for that. During these years of the depression farmers have more or less lost their morale and become somewhat indifferent; they have allowed their cattle to depreciate in quality. I would point out, however, that we can improve the quality of our cattle only by using good sires, and I would like to see the government undertake to do for the cattle producers of this country something along the lines followed in Great Britain and Ireland, where they have developed a better sire policy that has proven its worth in those lands. We have in operation in Manitoba and also in the dominion what are called bull loaning policies, but since the dominion government has undertaken to go into that line of work Manitoba has discontinued that policy.

Without appearing prejudiced or wishing to boost any particular breed of cattle I want to submit some figures which I think will be significant at least to cattlemen, and I hope they will cause some thought on the part of our Canadian officials. I love a good beast irrespective of breed. When a person speaks of beef cattle one immediately thinks of three outstanding beef breeds: the Shorthorn, the Hereford and the Aberdeen Angus. It does not matter to me what breed the animal is, so long as he is of the correct type, short legged, thick fleshed, deep bodied, the early maturing kind, the kind that will produce the best market animal. That is the sire one should buy irrespective of breed.

Now I want to give some figures in regard to the number of beef bulls that have been loaned in Manitoba from 1929 to 1932. The numbers were two hundred and fifteen Shorthorns, twenty-seven Herefords, and eleven Aberdeen Angus. Let me give the numbers of the beef bulls that have been loaned for breeding purposes by the dominion Department of Agriculture, and I may say that these figures were handed to me just recently by officials of that department. In the last four or five years it has loaned one hundred and sixty-eight Shorthorn bulls, seventy-one Herefords, and six Aberdeen Angus. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this situation is worthy of very careful thought on the part of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the officials of his department. I am not going into details in regard to the bull loaning policy, but I have the idea that the farmer himself should be allowed to choose the breed that he wants, the bull he thinks it will be in his best interests to use. I also think the government should step in and provide a bonus to the purchaser of that animal, not to the man who sells it; they should give the purchaser a bonus with the animal he buys. There should also be a bull grading system, and the man who buys an outstanding animal under that system should receive the larger bonus. The animals should be graded No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3, and in no case should any bull that is graded below No. 3 be put up for sale for breeding purposes; it should be marketed, via the stock yards.

Perhaps some hon. members have not been very much interested in what I have had to say, but to me it is a very interesting subject and I am very glad to have had this opportunity to say a word in the House of Commons for the people whom I represent; especially am I glad that I have been able to say something in the interests of agriculture and on behalf of our stock raisers in particular.

In closing, I should like in supporting this resolution to offer my congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon his splendid efforts and success in securing the present trade agreement. It is more than a trade agreement; it is the hand of friendship extended to a nation that is our kin. It is an invitation to other nations of the world to trade more freely with each other and forget their economic wars.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Leader) has followed in the wake of other hon. gentlemen, especially those opposite, in supporting the resolution before the house. He was very careful to avoid any reference to the agreement being beneficial or otherwise in connection with the best market that the primary producers of Canada have, the market represented by the purchasing power of 1,000,000 workers employed in the industries of Canada. I do not include in this category the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I believe they are both honest in their convictions, but it would appear that the Minister of Finance has a card up his sleeve in the shape of probable changes which may be made in the intermediate tariff when the budget is brought down. If that card were thrown on the table where we could see it, it would perhaps change the tenor of some of our remarks. I intend to deal with the agreement as it is now before the house and not consider it from the point of view of any changes which may come later.

Before dealing with the agreement, I should like to congratulate my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) upon the clear statement he made to this house. I understand he stated that he could have concluded an agreement like this, but in his opinion such an agreement would be disastrous to the people of Canada. I congratulate the leader of the Conservative party upon having the courage to refuse to accept such an agreement, even though the acceptance of the agreement might have returned him as prime minister of this country. The Prime Minister referred to the historic policy of this party as being one of retaliation. I always like to go back into history as far as possible, and I have before me a photograph of the original draft of the national policy as drawn by Sir John A. Macdonald when he attended a convention at Shaftesbury Hall, Toronto, in January, 1878. I should like to read three resolutions adopted at that convention, as follows:

1. They are satisfied that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national financial policy, which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the dominion.

2. That no such readjustment will be satisfactory to the interests affected, or to the country, if adopted as a provisional means only —to meet a temporary exigency, or to supply a temporary deficit—nor unless it is made and carried out as a national policy.

3. That until a reciprocity of trade is established with our neighbours, Canada should move in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs, so far as her varied interests may demand.

That shows that the statement that the national policy was one of retaliation is not founded on fact. The Conservative party has not used the national policy to prevent beneficial trade with the United States. The Prime Minister also said something about not being able to negotiate for other commodities. The inference in that remark is quite clear; he was referring to the Ottawa agreements. I believe the Prime Minister mentioned coal, and in this connection I should like to read a short report of a speech made by Mrs. Mitchell F. Hepburn, the wife of the Premier of Ontario, at a meeting of the Toronto Women's Liberal Association, held in Toronto on October 25, 1934, as follows:

Mrs. Hepburn stressed the matter of trade with the United States, and interpreted Mr. Roosevelt's statement that no trade agreement would be made with Canada until after a general election as meaning that "we cannot have fair exchange with the United States until Bennett is out of office." She deplored the unnecessary expense in bringing coal from eastern and western Canada to Ontario when Ontario might have freer exchange with the nearest point to the south. "Is there anything wrong with having freer exchange of Canadian wheat and United States cotton? There is stagnation in lumber and pulpwood industry in northern Ontario. Why not freer exchange of these products for iron and steel of the United States?" she queried.

If these remarks outline the objective of such an agreement as this, I doubt very much whether hon. members representing Alberta and Nova Scotia will endorse the doing away with the use of Nova Scotia coal in central Ontario and of Alberta coal in Manitoba. Canada has unlimited deposits of soft coal which could be used to great advantage in Ontario. I put in blowers for soft coal in four buildings and I have cut my coal bill in two. I believe it would be good policy for the government to advocate the bringing in of soft coal from Alberta and Nova Scotia. Where coal must be brought in from outside, the government should encourage the use of coal from Wales. This method would not allow coal to interfere with the British markets.

In connection with the British agreements, I should like to refer briefly to The Monthly Bulletin published by the Canadian chamber of commerce in Great Britain. In the September, 1935 issue it is stated that in the British market Canada holds first place in wheat, third in barley, first in oats, first in wheat flour, second in total grain and flour, second in cattle, second in bacon, second in hams, fifth in total meats, fifth in cheese, thirteenth in total dairy products, second in apples, fourth in canned salmon, first in lobsters, second in unmanufactured tobacco, first in copper, second in hides, second in unwrought copper, second in pig lead, first in total non-ferrous metals, third in machinery, fourth in total manufactures of wood and timber, first in patent leather, second in newsprint, fourth in paper, and first in rubber manufactures. If we are to infer from what the Prime Minister said that when the British agreements are up for renewal, drastic changes will be made, I for one have grave fears of Canada continuing to hold her place in the British market.

I should like to refer briefly to what Canada gives away by this agreement. I shall not spend any time in telling the house what Canada obtains by the agreement—and there are some good features—as my hon. friends opposite can do that.

1. Canada gives the intermediate tariff on a large number of American articles.

2. There is a reduction of 2½ per cent in the duty of motor cars valued under $1,200.

3. There is a reduction of 7½ per cent on motor cars valued at more than $1,200.

On the higher priced cars the reduction is 10 per cent.

4. The existing tariff on fruits and vegetables is slashed by 10 per cent to 15 per cent.

5. The duty on practically all agricultural implements is cut in half.

6. We have promised to abolish special valuations for duty purposes.

7. Canada gives specific reductions on sixty-eight items.

8. Canada allows free entry on twenty items now dutiable.

9. Canada guarantees not to increase the intermediate tariff on seventy-seven items.

10. Canada guarantees not to impose duties on fifteen items now duty free.

11. Canada will allow Canadian tourists to bring back $100 worth of goods from the United States.

12. There is also the favoured nation treatment which will apply also to twenty-nine other countries.

We had a dose of this kind of medicine between 1921 and 1926, when the government of the present Prime Minister reduced duties in the sessions of 1922, 1923, 1924 and later in 1925. What was the result? The Prime Minister will remember that a large delegation of manufacturers came here on September 4, 1924, and submitted figures to show that as a direct result of these several slashes in the tariff there was a net loss to Canada of 417 industries which closed their doors and threw their men on the labour market. Do we want another dose of that kind of medicine? Speaking as one who ought to know a little about industry and labour, if years at it count for anything, I intend to prove that many of the schedules are a menace to employment of workers throughout Canada.

Let me divide the iron and steel industries into ten subdivisions, taking the figures of 1929-30, the last years during which the Liberal party was in power prior to the election of 1930. I give the list: blooms and billets; castings and forgings; pipes, tubes and fittings; wire; boilers and engines; hardware and cutlery; machinery (not farm); tools and stampings; vehicles; sundry items.

In the year 1929-30 Canada imported from outside countries $278,000,000 worth of these lines of goods. Canadian industries, had they been given an opportunity to manufacture these goods, could and would have manufactured not less than $100,000,000 worth of them. It was because of the decline in the productivity of industries in Canada that the last Liberal government was defeated in 1930; the country had gotten into such a state as a result of the effect of its policies on industry throughout Canada, thousands of men being out of work, that the workers in 1929 were begging that government to go to the country; and when that government did appeal to the electorate it was thoroughly defeated. The leader of the Conservative party, when he came into power, reversed that policy. I am very much surprised at the way some hon. gentlemen opposite talk; they certainly cannot be familiar with what industry in Canada achieved under the Conservative government, for I make this statement without fear of successful contradiction, that Canada's position would have been infinitely worse than it actually was during the last four or five years had it not been for the tariff of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I made a survey of a great number of these industries and I know. The tariff structure erected by the leader of the opposition when he was prime minister resulted in bringing into Canada 135 new industries which began to manufacture goods many of which had never theretofore been produced in this country. Those industries occupy 5,000,000 square feet of floor space, have invested in them $40,000,000, and employ 10,000 employees; and in addition to that, hundreds of other established industries employing from 80,000 to 90,000 more men were kept in motion in old lines, making goods that would not have been manufactured had it not been for that Conservative tariff policy.

The former prime minister, I know, received from industrial workers of Canada unbounded credit for what he did, and that was very well reflected in the last federal election in the cities that early benefited from that tariff policy—Toronto, which elected nine Conservatives out of eleven members; Hamilton, two out of two, or rather three out of three, taking the county; and St. Catharines and London, all of which profited considerably by the Conservative tariff.

Mr. YOUNG: If the hon. gentleman will look around him in the house he will see what the real result was.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, if the hon. gentleman's party continues in the policy it is now pursuing, the membership of the next parliament will reflect the views of the people regarding that policy.

Let me now take up certain schedules one at a time, as rapidly as I can. The first item I look at is 184d. The new arrangement wipes out the duty on United States magazines. The late government placed on magazines coming from the United States a duty that had the effect of having printed in Canada about fifty of these American publications.

This resulted in giving employment in various companies to approximately 250 printers and other workers. It resulted in bringing into Canada from Chicago two plants which operated in Toronto, making ink too, and in which some fifty workers were employed. In other words, the printing industry, backed up by the tariff imposed by the leader of the opposition, then prime minister, resulted in providing directly 300 new jobs, with a monthly payroll of $40,000, and the government received some $6,000 per month in postage from mailing the magazines. I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen on the opposite side who are familiar with that situation can denounce legislation that brings about such results.

Coming now to the iron and steel industry, I take item 378b, bars and rods, not further processed than hammered or pressed. The duty has been reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. The next item, 380, is steel plates, flanged, dished, curved, hot rolled, which has been reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. This will result in a good deal of steel equipment being brought into the country, flanged, dished and curved by the great American plants, so that American workmen will receive that much extra labour in addition to the manufacture of raw steel plates. The next item is 381b, sheets of iron or steel. The reduction has been from $7 to $6 a ton, and that will certainly help the Belgian steel makers of the European cartel; but it will not help the steel makers in Sydney, Nova Scotia or in Sault Ste. Marie or Hamilton. It will mean a harder time for Canadians to keep their plants in operation. Item 382d is cold rolled hoop steel and 383d, 383e, 383f and 383g all have reference to a line of equipment the making of which has recently begun in Canada. A short time ago I went to see the plant in operation in Hamilton and as a Canadian I was greatly pleased to see fellow Canadians making this new line of equipment. In my opinion it is tough on the men who have invested money in these steel plants, which have given work to Canadians, and much tougher still on the men engaged in these plants, to find themselves with the possibility of being thrown out of work. Undoubtedly these plants will be affected to the extent that the reduction in the tariff makes curtailment inevitable. In the last three items we have reductions from 15 to 12½ per cent; from 25 to 20 per cent; and from 25 to 20 per cent. Take item 387, railway rails, which are made in Sydney, Nova Scotia and in Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. The tariff has been reduced from $7 to $6 per ton. Every man in this house knows that the steel mills in Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, have had a hard struggle during the last few years, and I for one cannot understand why the government, now that these mills are beginning to find things a little better, should reduce the duty on rails from $7 to $6 a ton. I feel that the men working in these plants have a grievance against the government as a result of this item in the schedule. The same applies to item 387a, covering railway fish plates and so on. A list of steel mills and forging shops in Canada deal with those items, and these factories will be affected proportionately because of the reduction in duty from $8 to $7 per ton. Then the rate under item 388c, covering iron and steel beams, not punched, is reduced from 17½ per cent to 12½ per cent. Recently, Mr. Speaker, the steel mills of Sault Ste. Marie commenced to roll beams in additional smaller sizes. This line is new industry in Canada, and should be encouraged to continue to roll wider beams and give work to more men instead of having the tariff reduced in this way. I might say the same with regard to item 388d, which covers iron and steel angles and channels, on which the duty has been reduced from 40 per cent to 35 per cent, and with regard to item 350, covering wire of all metals and kinds, under which the rate has been reduced from 35 per cent to 30 per cent. In the town of Waterloo, Quebec, they have a very good wire mill, I am told, and in addition there are large mills in Montreal, Hamilton and Toronto.

Before going further, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I am not referring to the western provinces simply because I have not made a survey of the towns and cities of the west from an industrial standpoint. Therefore I am not qualified to state what mills out there, if there are any, of this kind are affected as the mills of the east are.

Then item 312 refers to asbestos. We have by far the largest asbestos deposits in the world, but, being a very small consuming country, the asbestos is not manufactured into finished products to the extent one might expect. People have been getting into that business, however, and mills in Montreal and elsewhere have been manufacturing asbestos into pipe coverings and that sort of thing. The men working in these plants will be affected by the reduction in the duty on asbestos from 25 per cent to 22½ per cent. Then we have item 388, covering iron or steel angles, beams and so forth, on which the duty is not changed. Item 392 covers forgings. We have very fine forging mills in Belleville and Guelph, Ontario, two of the smaller cities of the province, and in most of the large centres we also have mills making forgings. I do not see how men can feel encouraged to continue with that work after having the duty reduced as it has been.

Next is item 394, covering axles and axle bars, which are also made at Guelph, Welland and many other places in Canada, on which the duty is reduced from 35 to 30 per cent. Item 400 covers fittings, of iron or steel, and there again the duty is reduced from 30 per cent to 27½ per cent. Fittings are made in some twenty-five or thirty plants in Quebec and Ontario. Then item 402a covers welded or woven wire fencing, which is made in Hamilton, Niagara Falls, London and other centres. Item 407a, covering chains, shows a reduction in duty from 35 per cent to 30 per cent. This country deserves a good deal of credit for the two chain factories that have been established in St. Catharines and Niagara Falls, and surely the men working in those plants are entitled to more consideration from this government than to have the duty slashed to that extent. As far as I can see, Mr. Speaker, under this agreement we are going right back to the disastrous period of 1921 to 1926, when we were also under a Liberal government.

Then we come to the schedule of items under 409, pertaining to agricultural machinery. While this machinery may become a little cheaper because of the reduction in duty from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, I feel very sorry for the plough factories, the cultivator factories and such plants in Aurora, Brantford, Lindsay, Toronto, Hamilton, Woodstock, St. Mary's and at various points in the province of Quebec. This is not the way to encourage men to invest money in business, and to give employment. We also have an item concerning windmills. If my memory serves me aright, Mr. Deputy Speaker, at one time there was a very good windmill factory in your own town; I am not certain about that, but I know there is a large windmill factory in Brantford, and the duty on these windmills has been reduced from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, which is a very serious cut.

Item 410(1) covers ore crushers, rock crushers, drills and so on. A year or two ago I made a trip to northern Ontario, and I found the people there using Canadian drills—made at Welland, I believe—as a result of the tariff of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. There were 150 men engaged in making these drills in Canada at Welland and elsewhere, and traffic to the extent of 150 cars per year was supplied to our railways. That business may be seriously crippled by the reduction in duty from 25 per cent to 20 per cent, and mills in Montreal, Sherbrooke, Quebec, Hamilton, Toronto and many other centres will be affected under this item.

So it is with a number of other items. I cannot discuss them all, but as far as I can see the reductions are all very serious. Item 415a covers refrigerators. This reduction will not help the city of London, Ontario, where we have a very fine refrigerator plant. I should like to say a word also about washing machines. When the late government came into power, washing machine parts, tubs and other equipment, were largely imported. For the most part they were made at Erie, Pennsylvania, Warren, Ohio, and Woonsocket, Rhode Island, but as a direct result of the tariff of the late government a great deal of that equipment has been made in this country during the last four or five years, much of it in St. Mary's, London, Stratford, Ingersoll, Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal and many other centres. As a result some 250 additional employees were given employment in the washing machine industry of this country. I would much rather give employment to 250 employees in the cities and towns I have just mentioned than to workmen in those three United States cities to which I referred.

I will conclude this part of my argument by referring to the long list of items covering, the larger machines that have been made in this country during the last five years as a direct result of the tariff of the Bennett government, some that were never made in Canada before that time. I have in my hand the picture of a very large machine made in the Bertram plant at Dundas, a hoist weighing 460,000 pounds, capable of raising or lowering sixty men at each lift, and of lifting them up or lowering them 4,200 feet. That company, as well as other companies in Brantford, Galt, St. Catharines, Welland and other cities and towns I have visited, did a good deal of business in the last four years in the manufacture of new machines of one kind or another. Now this government comes along and reduces the duty on such machines from 35 per cent to 25 per cent. That, sir, is a serious blow to iron workers, machinists, erectors of structural steel, and others working in the iron and steel plants of this country, and I fear very much that it will result in the loss of a great deal of employment.

A few days ago a newspaper was sent to my office, the Saskatchewan Liberal of February 27, 1936. The article reads:

Tariff Protection Exceeds Wage Bill

In 1934 Canadian automobile plants paid $12,938,933 in wages, and produced 116,852 cars and trucks worth $76,133,448. It will be seen that the total wage bill for this automobile and truck production is a few thousand dollars less than 17 per cent of the production value.

That statement does not give all the facts. For that total production of $76,000,000 the wages were, as the article sets out, $12,938,000, but the parts made in Canada by Canadian workmen in Canadian plants entering into that total production cost $24,355,000, and half of the parts that were made for jobbers amounted to $2,478,000. And of the United States parts imported entering into that total production are as follows:

United States parts	$13,677,000
United States engines	4,294,000
United States tires	106,000

On those importations the duty at approximately 30 per cent amounts to $5,423,000, the 6 per cent sales tax to $1,084,000, and the excise tax at 3 per cent to $542,000. The total of all these items is approximately $65,000,000. I leave out the freight, the drawback and the overhead.

It is apparent that these figures present an entirely different picture from that conveyed by this article. The press of this country should send out, and particularly to Saskatchewan where this paper is published, figures to show how misleading such an article is. It is not fair to the workers in industry of this country, to the workers making parts for automobiles and those working in the automobile plants in Canada.

Now may I quote some figures to illustrate what the market furnished by the industrial workers of Canada means to our primary producers. They are based on 800,000 families supported by industrial workers. I would rather understate my argument than overstate it. Eight hundred thousand workers' families would consume yearly:

	Head
Cattle	700,000
Hogs	625,000
Sheep	1,333,000
	Pounds
Fowl	24,000,000
Milk	800,000,000
Butter	125,000,000
Cheese	15,000,000
Vegetables	1,200,000,000
Fruits	296,000,000
	Dozen
Eggs	80,000,000
	Bushels
Wheat	20,000,000

Those figures are based on the report of the Michigan state commission on the cost of living in 1923.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Where does the hon. member get his 800,000 families?

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the number in industry.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Figures show that in 1933 there were only 493,903 employees in Canadian industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member can speak when I have finished. I heard him the other night. I refer to his own county—or rather the county he represents—to show what industry means, as compared with the county of Waterloo. The county of Huron has an acreage of 830,000; the county of Waterloo 330,000. The assessed value of Huron county is $41,000,000, of Waterloo county $31,000,000. In Huron county there are approximately 180 small and large factories; in Waterloo, 400. That is reflected in the sums invested, being only $6,000,000 in Huron in contrast with $90,000,000 in Waterloo. There is a corresponding difference in the number of workers, 1,500 in Huron as compared with 20,000 in Waterloo. Of course these figures are for some years back. Wages in Huron totalled $1,200,000 as against $22,000,000 in Waterloo. That is what industry does for a county; if there were twice as many industrial plants in Huron the farm values of the county would be much higher than they are. No one would claim that the higher assessed value of land in Waterloo is owing to any higher quality in the land itself. It is clear evidence of what industry does for the farmers.

I checked the prices of farm produce in the two main towns of Huron, Goderich and Clinton, as compared with prices in the two main towns of Waterloo county, Kitchener and Galt, on the same day, and I found that Kitchener and Galt prices averaged 25 to 50 per cent, and in some cases 100 per cent higher than in Huron. Why is that? It is because of the larger percentage of men working in industry in Waterloo.

I wish now to give some idea of what the United States does for its industries. In this house there are many who denounce industry at every opportunity; they cannot denounce industry without denouncing the men working in industry, nor can they denounce the employer without also denouncing the employed. We do not find it so in the United States. In considering this agreement I recall what took place in England in 1843-44 when the then Mr. Disraeli opposed his own leader, Sir Robert Peel, in the introduction of free trade. He said:

> We will admit into the home market, at reduced rates, the corn, hemp, and tallow of the northern powers,—

Meaning Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and so forth.

> —provided they will reduce, in equal proportion, the duties which they now levy on our cutlery and hardware.

That is the situation here. By this agreement the United States, according to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, allow a certain amount of our raw products to enter their country, but in exchange for that they receive the right to ship into this country millions of dollars worth of manufactured goods. This will result in displacing from employment thousands of men engaged in industry in this country.

On April 29, 1934, United States Senator Glass introduced a bill to amend the Federal Reserve Act, section 13, with the object of encouraging industry by providing for loans to industry. We have had no such proposition in this country. The bill provided that:

> In exceptional circumstances, when it appears to the satisfaction of a federal reserve bank that an established industrial or commercial business located in its district is unable to obtain requisite financial assistance on a reasonable basis from the usual sources, the Federal Reserve Bank, pursuant to authority granted by the Federal Reserve Board, may make loans to, or purchase obligations of, such business, ...

This is encouragement to business. In this proposed agreement also the United States are encouraging their own business. The whole American plan has been to encourage industry. Their industrial market, as the result of the encouragement of industry, is the greatest market they have, just as in this country the greatest market for the farmer is the home industrial market. In considering any agreement with other countries, such as Japan and the other twenty-nine countries that come under this same agreement, consideration should be given to the wages paid to the Canadian worker in comparison with the wages paid to the foreign worker. I find that in Japan the silk throwers receive 2·2 cents per hour, cotton spinners 2·2 cents, cotton weavers, 1·9 cents, hosiery knitters, 4·2 cents, glass makers, 4·9 cents, potters, 5 cents, shoe makers 5·1 cents and founders 6·3 cents. Compare those rates with the wages paid in Canada. How can the industrial worker in the textile, shoemaking or hosiery plants in Canada compete with labour wages of that kind?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): I could not rise for the first time to address the house without first saying a word to His Honour the Speaker who has been given authority to preside over the destinies of the House of Commons. I would speak in this connection particularly since it has been my privilege to have had his honour's friendship for some years. Naturally my remarks to-day will be in English, not only because English is the language of my every-day life and, therefore, of my thoughts, but because essentially it is the language of my constituency and of the province from which I come. At the same time, not merely for the sake of saying a few words in the two official languages but in order that I may pay a tribute to His Honour the Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the house to speak briefly in the language which is particularly his own and that of the province from which he comes, the language which his ancestors and certain of my ancestors brought to this country hundreds of years ago, the language which has given so much to the literature and to the social and political life of Canada and, if I may add a purely personal tone, the language which my own elderly father took with him from the old province of Quebec when as a young man he went to my native province of New Brunswick. It is the language which during the last thirty-five or thirty-six years he has used in this chamber on many occasions.

(Translation): I wish to extend to the honourable Speaker my sincerest congratulations on the occasion of his election to the exalted and responsible office which he now occupies. I also wish to congratulate the house for having chosen to preside over its deliberations a man whose tact, learning and parliamentary experience assure him of a splendid career in the speaker's chair.

(Text): May I preface my remarks on the subject of reciprocity by saying a word or two with reference to the first minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). Speaking last week on this subject the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), in his condemnation of the agreement made on behalf of Canada by the Prime Minister, brought before us an image of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier refusing to accept an offer of reciprocity from the United States because he thought it militated against the interests of Canadian producers and industry. It is true that the name of Laurier is one which may be conjured with in this house and country, but I must say that it is not one the image of which may effectively be brought before us by the very people who hounded him throughout his life and eventually sacrificed him because of their pretended patriotism and their grasping greed for political power. It was in connection with this very question of freer trade with the United States that Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1911 met his defeat.

In appreciation of the Prime Minister of to-day may I say that in bringing before Canada an opportunity once more to accept the privileges of a reciprocal agreement with the United States he is treading on hallowed ground, ground hallowed by the sufferings and struggles, and eventually, by the sacrifice of the great past chieftain of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. On behalf not only of myself but of the people in the great constituency I have the honour and privilege of representing in this chamber I wish to pay the Prime Minister our hearty and cordial respects for what he has done. He has given us an opportunity for a greater degree of material prosperity than we have had in the last five or six years. But by the manner in which he brought about this reciprocal agreement he has done something more than that for the Canadian people. He has restored to people of Canada that confidence, that faith in their fellowmen and that belief in the institutions of government which during the last four or five years they had been losing, but which has now returned.

As I listened to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who has just taken his seat, two points were developed with which I think I ought to deal. He said that hon. members ought to accept the statement by the leader of the opposition that he had had an opportunity of making an agreement similar to the one before us, but that in the interests of Canada he refused to make it. I would be more ready to accept that statement if during the election campaign the right hon. gentleman opposite, the then Prime Minister, had made that statement publicly. I come from a district the very development of which demands an agreement of this kind and demands a market for its natural products. Throughout the riding we were told, from meeting to meeting, that all we had to do was to wait until election day had passed and Canada would have a reciprocal agreement with the United States.

The other statement made by the hon. member for Davenport to which I shall pay a little attention was that when we talked about the benefits to be received by Canadian producers through the operation of the agreement, we were not taking into consideration the trade they would lose by reason of lack of ability to deal with the woodsmen of this country. I have before me a communication dealing with this matter which, with permission of the house, I shall read. Before reading it, however, on behalf of myself and the people in that part of northern British Columbia which I represent may I say a word to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in appreciation of the efforts he has exercised on our behalf not only in connection with negotiating this agreement but in connection with everything else that has come before the government since he entered the cabinet formed by the first minister.

The telegram is adressed to me by the Prince George Spruce Manufacturers Association, a group which the hon. member for Davenport will no doubt admit has something to do with lumber and woodsmen. It is in these words:

J. G. Turgeon, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Reciprocity treaty with United States best thing that has happened to northern British Columbia lumber industry in many years. Prior to imposition of American tariff this district shipping eighty per cent to United States operated fifteen sawmills employing at least 2,500 men cutting 120,000,000 feet payroll about $2,000,000. Following imposition tariff this shrunk year by year until only five mills operated employing about 500 men. Fall has seen marked improvement price and shipment volume and definite plans for this year call for operation ten mills with prospects of more and with greater scale operations for mills which operated last year.

Log scale and employment should be at least double last year's with considerable additional employment in railway and other auxiliary services. Additional employment should take care of most employable relief cases in sawmill area. Possibly best feature of treaty is that it permits shipment to States of low grade lumber for crating, et cetera, which could not be shipped under four dollar tariff, and which was formerly dumped on prairie at ruinously low prices depressing that market. This association has no political bias and is glad to commend any government action which helps our industry. The reciprocity agreement has been definitely helpful.

Prince George Spruce Manufacturers Association.

In addition to the lumber industry in that great portion of northern British Columbia we have that very important cattle industry which permeates every part of northern British Columbia and finds its way into the great Peace River district, which is partly in Cariboo and partly in Alberta. During the last few years the voice of the Peace River district has made itself heard in this house, on many occasions, always I think complaining of injustices because of action or lack of action by governments in the past. The voice of the Peace River district has been heard all over the north American continent, and even across the ocean in Great Britain and part of Europe, crying to the world for settlement of its fertile and productive soil, and I am glad to-day, Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the great cattle raising and agricultural industry of Cariboo, to read in connection with this trade agreement a few telegrams of approval that I have received with respect to the reciprocity treaty now before the house. The first is from Dawson Creek, B.C., signed by W. S. Bullen, president of the Peace River Block Live Stock Breeding and Feeding Association. It says:

> Peace River Live Stock Breeding and Feeding Association unanimously approve reciprocity agreement. Same vital to live stock industry of this northern district which is most important source of profit. Will supply outlet for live stock and secure means assisting this country return to prosperity. Dawson Creek centre very heavy shipments hogs and cattle but heavily grained cattle being sold at loss to feeders.
> W. S. Bullen, President.

I have another one signed by the board of trade of Fort St. John, which is the centre of all that part of northern British Columbia lying north of the Peace river, and which only awaits action such as this agreement and other action that parliament can take, to bring it to the prosperity that will ultimately come to it. The telegram reads:

> At special meeting Fort St. John board of trade the following resolution was unanimously passed, that this board of trade wire J. G. Turgeon, M.P., expressing its support of reciprocity trade treaty in general.
> D. P. McKay, Secretary,
> Fort St. John Board of Trade.

I have another telegram from Fort St. John, reading as follows:

> Peace River Block Farmers endorse reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada.
> J. W. Abbott, President,
> Peace River Block Farmers Institute.

I do not intend to spend much more time upon this question, because I think these messages, not from individuals, but from reliable associations of producers express better than I can their appreciation and commendation of the action of the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada and his colleagues in negotiating this treaty with the United States. There are, however, one or two observations that I should like to make.

I have heard it said in the house, as have other hon. members—and it is but a repetition of the argument that was so destructive of the reciprocity pact in 1911—that we must be careful forever to maintain our east and west trade channel which has built up this Canada of ours, and that we must be perpetually upon our guard against even commencing on a north and south trade channel. That is the argument which has been underlying the whole economic policy of Canada practically ever since confederation, or at least since 1878 when the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald was introduced. All Canada has heard the complaints from British Columbia and Alberta with reference to injustices in the freight rate structure of Canada. Let me ask you this, Mr. Speaker: If there are injustices in our freight rate structure, are not those injustices based upon that very element of our economic policy which says that we must forever maintain our traffic in an east and west channel? But this Canada of ours is a country which extends not only from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but north and south. Many portions of this dominion are but thinly populated, and there has been built up, by a combination of unconscionably high tariffs linked together with that very element of our economic policy which says that we must maintain our trade in a channel running east and west, a concentration of industry at a few points in Ontario and Quebec, with the result that we have that unjust and unholy accumulation of wealth against which the whole country is crying to-day.

We can look for many causes; we can trace many of the steps that have been taken by these few men in Canada who control the accumulated productive wealth of the country, but the most potent cause of all is the undue protection that has been given by high tariffs to our secondary industries, coupled with our freight rate structure and that element of our economic policy which says that forever we must maintain our channel of trade east and west, and that everything that is produced and required in the maritime provinces down by the Atlantic, and everything that is produced and required in the far western provinces, on the prairies and in British Columbia, must find its way to and from those central points where the secondary industries are established in those central portions of Canada. I am not saying anything against secondary industries, but I believe this Canada of ours was meant by providence for primary production, and that our secondary industries should be built upon the success of our primary industries. But because of that combination of circumstances to which I have referred, unconscionably high tariffs and the freight rate structure, we have seen our secondary industries prosper out of all proportion to our primary industries. No one objects to our secondary industries prospering, but we do object to their prospering through the strangling of our primary producers.

I well remember that immediately following the election of 1911—and in that election campaign we were told that we must maintain our east and west trade channel and must beware of starting traffic north and south—at the very first session of parliament the government, supported by the present leader of the opposition, did two things almost by the same instrument. First, they caused the death of a motion that was presented to the House of Commons asking that the congestion of traffic in hauling grain from the prairie provinces to Fort William—it will be remembered there was a serious congestion in the year 1911-12—be relieved by lowering the freight rate from the prairies to the Pacific coast. The killing of that motion was followed almost immediately by an announcement by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, the late Sir George Foster, that he had arranged with the United States Interstate Commerce Commission for a reduction of freight rates on Canadian grain passing over American railroads to American ports for shipment to Great Britain and Europe. That was within three months of the time when the reciprocity agreement negotiated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding in 1911 had been defeated by the same cry that has been raised in the house during this debate, that we must beware of north and south channels of trade.

Let me ask a question with relation to this very cry. Before long the house will be giving consideration to possible means of increasing the tourist traffic; we shall be doing everything within our power to bring tourists from the United States to Canada. The former Minister of Railways, Mr. Manion, has stated that a properly organized tourist traffic would bring into Canada from one to two billions of new money. If every time we think of trading with the United States we are told that we must not have any traffic north and south, how can we encourage tourist traffic? I represent a constituency in the great undeveloped and fertile section of northern British Columbia. If we cannot have a traffic north and south, how can we bring in tourists to that great area? How can we do anything to advance the development of that part of British Columbia if we must always be on our guard against opening up, even to the least degree, channels of traffic running north and south instead of east and west? On behalf of the people of northern British Columbia, and especially those who live in the far reaches of the Peace river, I want to see something done to break the grip of certain interests in this country. I want to see channels of trade opened up to the north and south. Wealth has been concentrated in the hands of a very few and I want to see something done to break the grip which that concentration of wealth has upon the whole of Canada. I believe the greatest step that could be taken has been taken by this government by the introduction of this reciprocity agreement. I desire to commend the right hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues upon the action they have taken. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you, the house, for the patience and courtesy it has shown me in listening to my first attempt to address it.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Turgeon) has said a great deal about traffic north and south, but I want to say to him and to the house that I do not think there was ever in Canada a government that was not quite willing to have trade move north and south so long as the benefits of that trade were mutual and so long as it was evenly balanced. I do not believe there is any question about the principle of the agreement before us at the present time. It meets with general approval and it is only a waste of time to talk about trade north and south. We as Canadians are willing to trade wherever trade is beneficial. I do not think objections will be taken to trading with any country so long as the benefits accruing from that trade are evenly balanced. We must bear in mind that the channels of trade between Canada and the United States were not closed by Canada; they were blocked almost completely by the tariffs and restrictions placed upon Canadian exports by the government at Washington.

The question before the house is whether Canada is being justly compensated for what she is giving. Are we receiving fair treatment in this agreement? After examining the agreement I have arrived at the conclusion that the concessions received by Canada are altogether inadequate to reimburse her for the concessions she is making to the United States. A comparison of the terms of this agreement with those of our trade with the United States between 1913 and 1921, when our agricultural products entered that country free, will show how paltry are the advantages we are receiving. It is quite true that the President of the United States was authorized to reduce tariffs by only fifty per cent, but in the case of many items vital to the trade of Canada we do not get a fifty per cent reduction. In many cases the same commodities entered the United States between 1913 and 1921 free of duty. We have received on cattle, on lumber and on grass seed some concessions which I hope will be beneficial to the primary producers. However, the tariff on milk is still prohibitive. A duty of thirty-five cents per gallon on cream, eight cents on butter and five cents on cheese is prohibitive. I contend that nothing has been done for the dairying industry.

After looking carefully over the whole situation it is my considered opinion that Canada, with 11,000,000 people and situated on the northern part of this continent, will never be able to make a satisfactory and permanent trade agreement with the 125,000,000 people living to the south. Their climatic conditions are so much more favourable than ours. The United States to-day have a surplus of and is exporting practically every product that we are endeavouring to sell to them. In 1934 they exported almost $12,000,000 worth of bacon and $800,000 worth of beef. They exported large quantities of butter and cheese and other commodities which we are endeavouring to sell to them. How can we hope for a permanent market under those conditions? On the other hand, Great Britain will always have to purchase hundreds of millions of dollars worth of foodstuffs. It is a well known fact that the British empire within its far-flung stretches produces almost everything necessary to satisfy human needs. I think it behooves us to build up trade as far as possible within the British empire. I do not object to making trade treaties with foreign countries, but when we do so let us see that the benefits are evenly balanced.

According to the last census, over fifty per cent of our people now reside in urban centres. These people living in our towns and cities are dependent upon industry for their livelihood. These people consume over eighty per cent of the agricultural products of Canada. If this agreement strikes a blow at industry and depletes the purchasing power of those who are living in our urban centres, then we lose the market for the farm produce of Canada and our agriculturists will suffer just as much as will those engaged in industry.

We have heard a great deal about farm implements, about the increase in the price of implements following the announcement of this agreement. Well that is not strange; it is nothing new when you look over the history of this dominion. Lowering of tariffs has never assured to the consumer a cheaper article; very often where tariffs have been lowered the consumer has paid more for his goods. I am convinced that the provisions of this agreement will strike a staggering blow at industry and will result in thousands of our people being unemployed. And what do we give them? In this agreement we yield our favoured nation treaty to a very large extent, and we also yield our intermediate tariff. We endanger our trade balances, and worse than all we imperil our trade within the empire. These are facts that must be considered in this agreement.

I was rather surprised the other day, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) introduced this resolution, to see him throwing the agreement into the maelstrom of political controversy. It would have been more seemly had he introduced the resolution and asked the house to consider the agreement upon its merits, but he started by twitting the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) for not having been able during his years of office to consummate with the United States an agreement which he, the Prime Minister, could make in a few days. It is a well known fact that the then Prime Minister, now leader of the opposition, could have made a bargain such as we have here, but he would not sacrifice his country's interest for any party advantage. I believe every hon. gentleman in the house will agree with me when I say that it would have been of great advantage to the Conservative party before the last election if they could have gone before the electors with a favourable and satisfactory trade agreement with the United States. Everyone admits that, and why was it not done? Simply because the then Prime Minister would rather go down to defeat than sign an agreement that would be detrimental to the interests of Canada. But what did the Liberal party do? When that party came into power the present Prime Minister rushed to Washington and there swallowed the American bait, hook, line and sinker. He took their proposition, signed it and rushed back declaring that he had made a treaty of which Canada might well be proud.

Having honestly studied this agreement, I have come to the conclusion that Canada has got the short end of the stick, and the Canadian people, when the provisions of the agreement go into effect, will begin to realize that we have sold our birthright for a mess of pottage. Further, if such agreements as this are to be made, whereby industries in the United States will buy our raw material and manufacture it, selling back to us the finished product, they will simply make of our people hewers of wood and drawers of water. We can go into the woods and cut timber; we can go into the mines and mine the ore; we can do all the rough work in the production of these primary necessities, and this raw material can all be taken to the United States, manufactured there and sold back to us. This means that thousands of our men and women will be obliged to do what they did when the Liberal party was in office before; they will follow the trend of industry and go to the United States looking for work.

I cannot understand the attitude of the Prime Minister. I sat in this house and saw him strenuously opposing the trade treaties with Great Britain in 1932. Day after day he fought them. They were ruinous to Canada, he declared, and he marshalled every man behind him to vote against them. The fact is that those trade treaties of 1932 have been the greatest achievement in Canada since confederation. That preference in the British market has been the dream of every Prime Minister of Canada since confederation, and it was consummated only by the present leader of the opposition. Yet we found the then leader of the opposition, now Prime Minister, fighting that agreement. Further, I say that that trade agreement kept Canada solvent and her farmers from bankruptcy. But the moment the right hon. gentleman opposite is elected Prime Minister he rushes off to a foreign country, to the United States, and is willing to take any agreement they offer. Can one understand the Prime Minister of Canada refusing to endorse freer trade, beneficial arrangements with Great Britain, the mother country, and then being willing to make with a foreign country a treaty that will be detrimental to the best interests of this country? I do not wish to pursue this matter further; we shall have an opportunity, when the items are before us, to discuss them in detail. But I assure the house that I will certainly vote against this agreement when it comes up for ratification.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): The resolution before the house asks our approval of the Canada-United States agreement. A perusal of that agreement reveals at once how complex and intricate a modern trade agreement is, both in its general terms and in the schedules of the tariff items. In its preparation considerable skill, experience and technical knowledge is required. It always has been the pride of leaders in our country to try their hands at trade agreements with foreign countries. I think we can agree that this time the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) rose to the occasion and that he and his associates have brought to parliament an agreement which will be in the interests of the people of this country. He grasped the opportunity as it presented itself; he made an agreement quickly and effectively, and that is perhaps one of the things that appeals most to the people of this country This agreement must face the ordinary hazards of business when it becomes part of the law of the country. Some people will say it is a good agreement for the United States and others will say it is eminently in the interests of Canada. Let us hope it will be in the interests of both countries; that must be so if we are to have any permanent benefit from it.

The other day the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said there was no sentiment in business. As a business man of some experience let me say that in my opinion there is a good deal of sentiment in business, and I believe it is well for every business man to recognize that fact. We all like to think that we are logical, but no one knows better than public men that when sentiment is appealed to logic takes second place. I heard the hon. gentleman say there was no sentiment in business; I could tell, however, from the tenor of his remarks that he was a past master in sentiment, and that he used it well for his own benefit on the hustings when appealing for election. I believe this idea that there is no sentiment in business had its origin in the philosophy of law, with people who only have to do with business when it becomes unhealthy, when friendship ceases, and there can be no dealings of any kind. The sentiment that we require at this time, however, is the good will that has been so ably portrayed by the Prime Minister in his speeches and actions.

This modern agreement makes provision for almost every eventuality; it contains conditions that never before were considered necessary in a trade agreement. For example there is a provision for exchange; it deals with the value of our money, so there will be no inequalities in this regard. There is provision also that we may carry on properly the marketing of our products with no outside interference. The agreement provides against low wages to labour; it considers our morals and our health in their relation to trade, and finally the escape clauses provide a method of retreat, if it should prove disadvantageous to Canada.

Our trade agreements come close to our people. We hear very little from those who benefit, but those who are hurt talk loudly. I was anxious, as I know we were all anxious, to hear what the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) would have to say. From his experience and his position in the house we expected him to say the worst, and we knew that when he was through we would have heard the most that could be said against this agreement. After listening to his two hour speech may I say that in my opinion the members of this house and the country generally were more firmly convinced than ever that the Prime Minister and his associates did a splendid job when they went to Washington. The right hon. gentleman dipped into the past in an endeavour to defend the actions of his party in former years. I hardly think that was necessary. I am not one of those who believe that one party is always right and the other party is always wrong. I have been taught that whenever serious minded men get together for a serious purpose there is always an element of truth and an element of error, and in this case we must decide which predominates.

The policy of the Liberal party is one of wider markets and foreign trade. That policy was supported by the Liberals in the last election; it was endorsed by the people, and I think that endorsement is sufficient for parliament to carry out the terms of this agreement as quickly as possible. An eminent public man in Canada has made some splendid speeches recently; in one of them he said in effect it was wonderful, the instinct of the average man to be right as against the superior knowledge of the intellectuals. We know that by his vote the average man has endorsed the policy of the Liberal party. In addition to that only yesterday we heard the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), the leader of the one time Reconstruction party, who represents the opinions of a great many people in this country, say on the floor of the house that he would support this agreement because he thought it was a step in the right direction. During the last campaign we said, "Vote King and get action." The people voted King and they got action. I believe we in this parliament, fresh from the people, representing as we do the view they expressed by their votes, should give this agreement a good send-off, with the good wishes of every member of the house.

It is not only the Liberals who are in favour of this agreement; the financiers of the country are in favour of it also. Only the other day the governor of the Bank of Canada said in no uncertain terms that the shackles of trade must be loosed in order that Canada might do business with the world, and at the annual meeting of the bank of Nova Scotia the president of that institution made it plain that he believed that the first element to be considered in order to bring this country some measure of prosperity was the advancement of export trade for Canada. In 1911 the Liberal party, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was defeated on the issue of reciprocity, and we have heard quite a good deal about that. At that time Sir Wilfrid Laurier was attacked not only by the Conservative party in Canada; he also had to do battle with the reactionary interests in the United States. In addition he was attacked at a time when he was most vulnerable, because of an unholy alliance in this country. All these things combined to bring about the defeat of the great Canadian chieftain of that time. Privilege was in the saddle, within and without. The Liberal party was beaten and reciprocity went down. Why? Because Sir Wilfrid Laurier, instead of putting it through parliament and letting the people judge by experience, went to the country and met defeat. To my hon. friend who says: King should have submitted this to parliament and asked them to decide, I say: To-day the country needs leadership. And the Prime Minister gave us leadership; he has behind him a party of stability, put there by the Canadian people for the very purpose of doing this thing, and he did it well.

We cannot talk about reciprocity or trade agreements without thinking of a great Nova Scotian. I refer to the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, the little gray man from Nova Scotia, who for years was the finance minister of this country; who knew the problems of the maritime provinces, and could in a way that was almost marvellous harmonize the desires of his people down there with those of the people of central Canada so that we worked together effectively and successfully. We had prosperity in this country in the days of Laurier and Fielding. In those days we had no depression. I do not say that the conditions were the same. But they said: Leave well enough alone. That was the cry when Laurier was defeated on reciprocity. There are some who say that the present Prime Minister did not act quickly enough or was not persistent enough during his former years in office. I suppose he had the lesson of 1911 before him. Between 1921 and 1930 this country was prosperous, and perhaps he would have been unwise to disturb that prosperity; he knew what the Tories would say if they got a chance at him. Furthermore, he had practically no majority from 1921 to 1930; he governed this country almost by compromise, and he did it well. When anyone says that my right hon. leader should have made a treaty under such conditions he is saying something which will not bear examination. With regard to the Underwood tariff, that was a fine gesture on the part of the United States, an expression of good will, if you like. We gave them nothing; they lowered their tariff on many articles, and the fishing industry of my province was never more prosperous than in the years of the Underwood tariff.

I want to deal briefly with some of the objections raised the other day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He said the fishermen of this country who have to compete with the American trawlers will get very little out of this agreement—the American trawler, forsooth! In this country, competing against the Canadian fishermen, are beam trawlers bought on the bargain counter in England and now used as a club to keep down prices to the fishermen. A corporation which in the last analysis has its home in the United States becomes a primary producer in a position to dictate prices to the fishermen of Nova Scotia. If the leader of the opposition was so particular about our fishermen he should have looked after them when he was in power. He was there for five years; during that time the fishermen suffered as much as any other people in Canada, yet they received nothing at his hands. But now that he is in opposition he tells them they will have the competition of the American trawler.

An hon. MEMBER: They lost their market.

Mr. KINLEY: Ten years ago Lunenburg had 2,500 men on the sea; to-day we have less than a thousand, and unless something is done to help them the salt fishing industry faces extinction. It is my privilege as a member of this parliament to ask that something be done to stimulate that primary industry. We hear a lot about free trade and protection; I think one minister of the crown some days ago said that if we are to continue a high or an excessive tariff policy in this country we must stimulate the primary industries. The condition of the primary industry of fishing is such that it needs stimulation, and we ask that that industry be given consideration.

Then the leader of the opposition pointed out that the duty on flour was reduced to fifty cents a barrel, and, he said: You remember the old days when it came in schooners from Boston. Bread is the staff of life to the fishermen, and they complain that now they can buy flour cheaper in Newfoundland than in Nova Scotia. It looks as if the primary producer of flour does not get the benefit of the duty in any event. If there is any country that should be able to produce flour cheaply for its people Canada is that country. Hon. members would think a long time before voting for a high duty on flour, I believe.

Then the leader of the opposition says: Look at the revenue the country is going to lose by this agreement. From my experience in business I find that low prices increase turnover. If I want more business I put on a sale and reduce prices. Canada will do more business as a result of this agreement, and in spite of the fact that we shall not have to pay as much tribute in duties, the exchequer of the country will gain.

The right hon. gentleman said further that the British empire agreements made this agreement possible. Well, if so, he has done a good job in that regard, because I think this agreement is beneficial. But may I remind him of this: if the manufacturers of this country are going to be hurt by this agreement, how much more are they hurt by the British empire agreements? This agreement does not give the lowest level of Canadian duties; the lowest general level of Canadian duties is that provided under the British empire agreements. If there is the hazard that we are to be flooded by goods from other countries, they would come in the first place from the countries enjoying the lowest level of duties.

Then the right hon. gentleman, referring to our seaports, said that this agreement will ruin Halifax, Saint John, Quebec and Montreal. We know well that under the most favoured nation treatment they can bring goods in from such countries through the United States. But our trade with the British empire is not permitted to come through the United States. Then he says that we buy a lot from the United States and they buy little from us, per capita. I have never heard that you count people in business; it seems to me that the size of the invoice is what counts. The amount of goods we sell them would be a fairer way to consider the matter; the balance of trade is what counts. They have 127,000,000 people as potential customers for this country. They are adjacent to Canada and their standard of living is high. With such a great potential market I say that if we are aggressive and efficient and adopt the slogan "wake up, Canada," we can so increase the trade of this country that there will be practically no unemployment.

Queens-Lunenburg in Nova Scotia, the riding I represent, is an important fishing centre; it is probably the greatest fishing county in Canada. It is a great maritime county, and has also its share of manufacturing. My criticism of the agreement would be that it does not go far enough; I should like to see it go much further. I frankly admit that I am disappointed in the provisions affecting the fish of the cod family; I am sorry they are not included in the agreement. I can quite understand why trade in fresh fish might be objectionable to the Gloucester fishermen, but when it comes to salt fish they are not to any extent producers. It seems to me some effort should be made whereby our salt fish would find a better market in the United States, including Porto Rico.

Then, there was a reduction in the duty on halibut, and we hope that the reduction will bring about a greater trade in that commodity. There is a reference to swordfish. May I say that swordfish are caught chiefly off the east coast of Nova Scotia, and many of our Lunenburg fishermen with the larger boats spend the summer swordfishing. I believe most of the swordfish shipped to the United States are caught by fishermen from my county. I trust that the lowering of duty may help them in their business, and that this change may be only a start towards what might be done in the future.

We find that lobsters remain on the free list. Lobster fishing is still the greatest item of the fishing industry in the province of Nova Scotia, and while there may have been no immediate danger of a duty on lobsters, in these days of tariff wars it is hard to tell what may happen. Let me inform the house that only a few months ago, after the agreement was made, the duty on frozen swordfish, which are not included in the terms of the agreement, was raised to three cents, and I am told that change was made because there was a desire to prevent frozen swordfish from Japan from entering the United States. This example will serve to show the hazard which exists even to our free goods, if the policy of high protection is followed. I say it was a splendid achievement to remove that hazard.

The same could be said about paper. In Queens county, part of the constituency I have the honour to represent, is situated the Mersey Pulp and Paper Company. I believe this is the only paper company in Nova Scotia, and I am informed that it employs over six hundred men. To a great extent they conduct an export trade, and they have two steamers running to New York. Their business has been stabilized so that they may make commitments and know that they will be able to carry them out. They may approach the financiers of the country and say, "Our business is stable and a market is guaranteed by the government for the next few years." They are placed in an enviable position.

[Mr. Kinley.]

With regard to lumber may I say that the provisions of the agreement will improve the lumber business in Nova Scotia. We know that in the winter the farmers' sons desire to go to the woods and earn some cash money, as they call it. The agreement offers the opportunity they have been seeking, and a greater trade in lumber will immediately be reflected in the prosperity of the farmers in my county.

The same observations apply to cattle. Only a few days ago, while on my way to Ottawa, I stopped at the station and saw herds of cattle being put into box cars. I said, "This has not happened for years; what is going on"? The reply was "They are buying Lunenburg oxen and sending them to the United States. We believe they are going to use them in the lumber woods this winter." That is a splendid improvement, and it is a help to the cattle raising industry.

We find that the duties on vegetables have been lowered. My constituents sell turnips in the United States, and I believe that in that regard the farmers will derive benefit. Undoubtedly the export market controls the home market of the country, because that export market absorbs the surplus production. If we have an overabundance on the home market, prices become depressed, but if the surplus can be disposed of, if it can be sent to a foreign market, conditions at home are stabilized. Under those circumstances prices are better at home, and everybody feels better about it. After all the export market is the controlling factor of all business enterprises, and especially is that true of our primary industries.

Foreign trade is the emblem of the efficiency of our people. We can sell to one another at home, and may continue for a long time selling to each other in an inefficient manner or in a manner that is not quite up to the mark, but when we enter the foreign market, if we are to compete successfully with other countries, we must be efficient. There is no finer evidence of the efficiency of a people than the fact that they can enter a foreign market and place their goods therein in competition with the rest of the world. An ambition to do a great foreign trade is a worthy one. We know that in the past all great countries have had extensive foreign trade, and we find our greatest example in the mother country.

The leader of the opposition said, "Oh, but Canadians can bring back $100 worth of goods when returning from Boston or other points in the United States, and that is bad." Well, I would remind the right hon. gentleman that there are 127,000,000 people in the United States who can take our goods back to their country, whereas only 11,000,000 can bring them back into Canada. I will tell the right hon. gentleman that it will give decent citizens a chance to be honest. Goods are coming in now anyway, and I must say that in the province of Nova Scotia we appreciate this provision. After all, not one dollar's worth will come in from the United States by reason of the agreement unless some citizen feels that he would derive advantage or that his family would be benefited by bringing in goods bought in the United States. That is the idea behind this feature of the trade agreement. The principle behind trade agreements is to give the special privilege of dealing with other countries, and to give our citizens the opportunity to buy where it can be done most effectively and advantageously.

Some have said that people in the United States were anxious to have coal on the free list in Canada. We know that under the British empire agreements anthracite coal is free. In Canada we have long winters during which we must keep warm, and coal is expensive. It seems to me that if we could have traded fish for anthracite coal nobody would have been hurt. I am told however that because coal is on the free list in the British empire agreement, in order to maintain a proper ratio between the two agreements it was impossible to change the arrangements in connection with coal from the United States. For many years coal entered Canada free. I do not think the entrance of American anthracite coal would present any great competition with coal produced in Canada.

As I said before, if I have any criticism of the agreement it would be that I should like to have seen something more done in connection with the marketing of fish. However we must not criticize an agreement for what is not in it; we must be satisfied with what is in it. I hope that good will developed in the future will bring about further reductions in duties and advantages in trade which our people in the maritimes may enjoy. We wish to trade with the 127,000,000 people in the United States; if we could do that in fish we would not be coming to the government asking for help, and there would be no depression in the constituency I represent.

The other day the right hon. leader of the opposition said: I stand for Canada, and I reject this agreement because it interferes with the rights of Canada. But he was not thinking of the rights of Canada when he made the empire shipping agreement, whereby the sailors of this country were put in a class along with sailors from all other parts of the world. I regard that merchant shipping agreement, Mr. Speaker, as against the interests of the maritime people of this country, and I would like to know if it was a factor in making it easier to bring about the empire trade agreements. There is sometimes more money in carrying goods than in selling them, when you take into account the insurance and the other costs of transportation. With the Canadian manufacturer making all kinds of protests against a lowering of the tariff on his products, you can well see, sir, how it came about that the rights of the sailors down by the sea were sacrificed in the interests of the people of upper Canada who wanted higher tariffs.

I regard this trade agreement as a step in the right direction, and I hope that we shall go still further in the same direction. The leader of the opposition himself indicated how inequalities in the working out of the agreement could be corrected, by the raising of the intermediate tariff if and when that should become necessary, and I am sure that the prime minister will take him at his word if the agreement is found to work any injustice. I am confident that the government will use the power they have in their hands for the benefit of this country.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, there are times in the life of a person and in the life of a nation when there are unmistakable signs of rejoicing, and one of such times came last fall when it was announced throughout the country that the government intended to bring about a trade agreement between Canada and the United States. I believe I am voicing the sentiments of the people of my constituency, if not of the whole of Canada, when I say that every citizen who has studied the question must realize the wonderful benefits that will come, not so much from reciprocity, but from freer trade between the great neighbouring nation to the south and this dominion. There is nothing clearer than that, and I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) might well take some of the credit of the agreement to himself, but sometimes man and nature are incomprehensible to the ordinary man. For me it is hard to comprehend the attitude of the leader of the opposition to-day when during the last election everybody was under the impression that not only the Liberal party but the Conservative party was in favour of freer trade between Canada and the United States.

Before I proceed further I want to compliment most sincerely the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the wonderful work he has done in bringing about this agreement and upon the splendid presentation of the case which he made to the house only a few days ago. We now hear coming back to this house the echoes of the voice of the Canadian people. A voice heard throughout the length and breadth of this land in favour of the freer trade policies inaugurated in this agreement between Canada and the United States.

Freer trade between Canada and the United States is not a new question; it is an old one. It has been advocated in our national life for the last seventy-five years. I am sure that everyone who has read Canadian history must be fully seized of this fact, that every time we had freer trade with the United States we had prosperity in this country. Every student of our history knows that prior to 1846, before the repeal of the corn laws in Great Britain, we had great prosperity in Canada because we were allowed to buy American wheat, grind it into flour in this country and ship it to Great Britain, paying practically no duty at all. Then in 1846 Great Britain repealed her corn laws, and that was the beginning of a period of misery and depression for Canada. There followed in this country an agitation deeper than that of 1837. We all remember reading in our history books of the burning of the parliament building in Montreal, and, unlike the previous insurrection of 1837, it was not burned by French Canadians but by people of British descent. One of the leaders in that movement was J. J. Abbott, who afterwards became Prime Minister of Canada. There was talk at that time of annexation to the United States, and a good many of our Canadians had to go to the United States to seek work. Anyone who reads our history cannot escape the conclusion that freer trade between the two countries has always brought a period of greater prosperity for the United States and Canada.

We also remember the depression which this country suffered when Great Britain imposed upon us certain laws that struck at shipping on the St. Lawrence river. Again an agitation followed for a number of years, and then in 1856 our trade recovered when the United States allowed us freer access to their market. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that anyone, be he Liberal or Conservative, who reads our history with an open mind, cannot escape the conclusion that in those periods when we had freer trade between Canada and the United States we had a period of greater prosperity.

In 1866 the freer trade agreement that we had with the United States was abrogated because, I believe, the American people thought that we were in sympathy with the south, and again we had hard times in Canada. Again the question of freer trade was revived, and an agitation was carried on for a number of years, eventually coming to a head in 1911, when Mr. Fielding brought down his reciprocity agreement in the House of Commons.

I was living in the suburbs of Montreal at that time, and I vividly remember reading in the press of Montreal a report of what happened in the House of Commons when Mr. Fielding brought down his trade agreement and on the floor of the house enumerated the different items shortly before the general election of that year. I remember reading of the cheers that came not only from the Liberal but from the Conservative benches. The two major parties then—and I believe there were only two parties at that time—were absolutely in agreement in thinking that freer trade would be advantageous to both countries. In the discussion that followed I remember that when one Conservative asked Mr. Fielding what he would do about American wheat, he replied that it would be put on the free list, and there was applause from all sections of the House of Commons. But unfortunately for Canada and the United States —that agreeement did not go through—and it must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that no trade agreement can operate to the exclusive benefit of one country alone. Some indiscretion was committed either by Mr. Champ Clark or by Mr. Taft, and in the election campaign the Conservatives fought against the trade agreement. They must have long since deplored their action, realizing that they had not been fair to their own country and to the great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

It is all very well for the leader of the opposition to say to-day that the reciprocity pact of 1911 was defeated by the electorate, but I say no, Mr. Speaker, the electors in 1911 did not have a chance to get a clear vision of what the reciprocity pact meant. Those who come from Quebec will remember what happened in that province in 1911. There was no discussion of the reciprocity pact. Instead, the Conservative party was accusing the then Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of being untrue to the British connection in regard to the naval bill. We all remember that vividly. The Conservative party knew that the reciprocity pact would be a good thing for Canada, but the accusation was made that we were being sold to the United States. We should remember matters like this when we are discussing this resolution.

I think it was a good thing for Canada when on October 14 last the people spoke so distinctly. The decision was in favour of this pact and politics should not be instilled into the matter. When the people of Canada went to the polls they were satisfied that all parties were in full agreement that we needed freer trade with the United States. There is no avoiding the fact that the verdict of the people was clear. I do not believe the Conservative party is being true to its principles. When we go back into history we find that whenever they were on the government side they were in favour of a reciprocity agreement and freer trade with the United States. Along with the great majority of the Canadian people I find it hard to make that fine distinction made by the leader of the opposition and some of his supporters, that the Liberal party is not playing fair with the country. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said so well yesterday, no Liberal or anybody else in this country has to take a back seat to any Conservative. Our loyalty to Canada and to the British empire is much greater than mere treaties. That loyalty is what we carry in our souls and in our hearts. I am glad that for four years our Conservative friends will not have an opportunity of again raising the old bogey, of again poisoning the minds of the Canadian people by trying to make them believe that the Liberal party is ready to sell this country body and soul to the United States.

We are fortunate in being a neighbour of the United States. I do not doubt for a single moment that Australia would pay much for similar access to the American market to that which we have. I do not think the leader of the opposition is really sincere when he pictures the United States as being a monster ready to devour every little Canadian. Surely he must realize that the matter was one of bargaining and of playing fair. I could go into the elections of 1911 in greater detail, but I shall not take up the time of the house. In making the references I do I am speaking not as a Liberal only, but as a Canadian. Only a few months before the elections the Conservatives in the house were pounding their desks with both hands when Mr. Fielding announced a reciprocity pact between the two nations. It must be admitted that the Americans were partly to blame for what happened afterwards.

Every hon. member remembers the Wilson-Underwood tariff which gave access to the primary products of Canada to the American market. Prosperity reigned in this country. Then that tariff was withdrawn to be replaced with the Fordney-McCumber tariff. I could never understand why this tariff was put into effect in view of the great benefits which had been derived by both countries from the Wilson-Underwood tariff. Then I was dumbfounded and astonished later on when the Hawley-Smoot tariff was put into effect. This tariff was put into effect at a time when Canada was buying millions and millions of dollars' worth of goods from the United States. Even the American people found fault with the Hawley-Smoot tariff and I do not believe they were wholly behind it. Many of them realized that it was unfair, not only to Canada but also to the United States. Nearly 500 newspapers in the United States have spoken against this tariff, and I should like to give one or two quotations to show the feeling in that country. The first article is headed, "A Dangerous Tariff" and is from the Phoenix, Arizona, Republican, an independent progressive paper. It reads:

> If the advocates of general upward revision could have their way we should shortly be commercially isolated. The exports of the United States have come vastly to exceed our imports. Our markets have been extended and enlarged throughout the world, and to hold them we must maintain a friendly commercial attitude towards those whose business we enjoy. Otherwise not only we may, but we almost certainly would, provoke the retaliatory tariff legislation which would drive us out of many of our markets.

The next quotation is from the Columbus Despatch. It is headed, "An Example of Greed," and reads:

> The Hawley bill more than neutralizes its farm increases by heavy increases on many articles of which the farmers are almost universally buyers, not producers and sellers. Building materials, shoes, leather and harness are examples.
> The bill is one of the most striking examples of tariff boosting greed in all our tariff history and threatens a harmful interruption of world commerce, and business in general, unless saner counsels prevail before it is finally passed. President Hoover was right in advising only limited revision.

Perhaps this is why the nations of the world are beginning to realize that intensive nationalism does not pay. This principle which applies to Canada, applies just as forcibly to the United States. I can remember reading statements by great American writers to the effect that the United States could live within itself; that it was such a wonderful unit with such climatic conditions and everything else that it did not need any export trade. I believe that country has paid dearly for that philosophy. This applies equally to Canada.

I come from a section of Canada which is always penalized by tariffs. Northern Ontario is a producer of primary products which must find an outside market. At Iroquois Falls is one of the largest newsprint mills in Canada, large enough to supply the newsprint requirements of this country. A few moments ago the hon. member for Lanark (Mr Thompson) was saying that we should deal only within the British empire, but for his information I would tell him that the only market for newsprint is in the United States. It is all very well for hon. members opposite to refer to industries in their constituencies employing 100 or 500 men; this mill at Iroquois Falls employs 3,000 men in the mill alone, while thousands of men are employed in the fruitful occupations of lumbering, driving and so on. Yet our Conservative friends want to check any trade we have with the United States.

It was a wonderful sight five years ago to see going from the town of Iroquois Falls trainloads of newsprint manufactured on this side of the border. And where did that newsprint go? It was not manufactured for the Canadian market, which was saturated; nor was it manufactured for Great Britain. By the way I shall always be in favour of trade with the mother country; indeed, I am in favour of the British preference, because I believe it was the most wonderful thing we ever had between the two countries, Canada and Great Britain. But I can tell hon. members that every pound of that newsprint coming from one mill—and there are three in my riding—found its way thirty-six hours later to New York. We were satisfied to get American money in return for that Canadian product, the product of Canadian labour. These are facts which we must always bear in mind.

In our section of the country we are writing Canadian history in large letters. We are developing normally, and I maintain that within twenty years there will be found in northern Quebec and northern Ontario hundreds of thousands of people whom twenty-five years ago we should not have dreamed of having. In our part of Canada we are neither easterners nor westerners. We sympathize with the wheat growers of the prairies and we sympathize equally with the industrialists in the east; but at the same time we do not want to pay through the nose for the sake of supporting some mushroom industry. We are logical enough to realize that sometimes, during the infancy of an industry, a certain amount of protection is needed, but if you have too much protection it defeats its own purpose. I am absolutely in sympathy with the industries I mentioned a few minutes ago, but when we find that we have to pay forty cents a gallon for high test gasoline, then we know there is something wrong somewhere. And let me say that in this matter my sympathy does not extend to people driving motor cars for pleasure; I am thinking more of the farmers and those poorer people who use trucks in order to earn their living. The same applies to many matters I might mention.

We have been lobbied during the present session by some of the fruit and vegetable growers, and my sympathy goes out to them, but it has been too often an excuse for making us pay exorbitant prices in northern Ontario. As I listen to some of the members representing Toronto constituencies I wonder whether their vision ever rises above the horizon of Toronto. Do they ever come to our section and study our problem? We do not want to see them suffer hard times in their industries, but surely in a discussion of this kind it ought to be possible for us all to take the broad national point of view, so that everyone may be prepared to make some sacrifice in order to promote the general well-being. Coming to the question of a seasonal tariff on fruit and vegetables, I am in favour of this to some extent; but so far as our section is concerned, I can say that we have never been able to buy our requirements at reasonable prices during the winter or even in the summer. The only time we have some relief is when they begin to dump commodities from the Niagara peninsula.

I suggest that we should envisage Canada as a whole, concentrating neither on eastern nor on western Canada. There are some other matters I should like to discuss, but I do not think I have the time before six o'clock. I wish, however, to refer to some prophecies made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). No doubt he was sincere, and I do not for a moment question his sincerity. But he prophesied that within a few years the people would realize that this trade agreement had not been fair to Canada. I believe it was in 1930 that the hon. gentleman, discussing the New Zealand trade agreement—this was at the time of an election—tried to pit one section of the empire against another. He tried to make out that if we had not bought from New Zealand as much butter as we had, there would have been millions of cows and bulls in Canada. Well, his party abrogated the New Zealand agreement after the election of 1930 and I have yet to see that wonderful parade of live stock. If the hon. gentleman is as true in his prediction of yesterday as he was in that prophecy, then I am not worrying much about the effect of the present agreement.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) also made a statement which seemed to me to be rather far-fetched. At page 622 of Hansard, speaking of the population of Canada and the United States respectively, he put our population at 11,000,000 and that of the United States at 127,000,000, and he observed:

> Ah, more; for we were buying from them $28.86 worth per head during the year before while they were buying from us $2.23 per head.

Surely the leader of the opposition could not have intended to create the impression that for every dollar's worth of goods we buy from the United States they should buy from us the equivalent in ratio. Let us look at the figures for a moment, taking the two respective estimates of population. The ratio of 11,000,000 to 127,000,000 is as 1 to 11$\frac{6}{11}$, and the ratio of buying, $2.23 to $28.86, is as 1 to 13, so that according to the hon. gentleman's argument, if the United States bought from us in the same ratio as we bought from them, they would have to buy $3,665,220,000, or more than we produce. Surely the right hon. gentleman never intended to make that statement unless it was for effect.

I will give the total exports in the year to which the leader of the opposition alluded. In 1932 the total exports were $501,000,000, in round figures, and in 1933 $537,000,000. But under the trade agreement with the United States, the leader of the opposition wants to create the impression that, in order to be fair to Canada, the United States must buy from us at the very least approximately $3,665,000,000 worth of goods.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 5, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

DEBATES COMMITTEE

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the first meeting of the select standing committee on debates took place this morning. It was the first meeting during the last five years. For obvious reasons that standing committee met, but did not sit.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) presented the first report of the special committee on elections and franchise acts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSED STUDY OF METHODS USED TO EFFECT REDISTRIBUTION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

> That the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, and amendments thereto, and the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, and amendments thereto, be instructed to study and make report on the methods used to effect a redistribution of electoral districts in Canada and in other countries, and to make suggestions to the house in connection therewith.

He said: When the motion to appoint a committee to consider the elections act and the franchise act was before the house, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) asked whether the committee would deal with the recent redistribution of seats in this house, I replied in the negative. Since then notice of motion has been given to appoint another committee for that purpose. The motion I now present to the house would meet neither the views of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, nor the object of the resolution on the order paper. Its aim is rather to study, in a strictly non-partisan, non-political way, methods which could be adopted with regard to redistributing seats in Canada when the necessity arises.

When the last redistribution bill was before the house the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) expressed the view that instead of redistribution being proceeded with by a committee of the house, necessarily composed of a majority representing one of the political parties, it ought to be possible to find a way to have this work done by an independent tribunal, either a royal commission or some other board, which would give some guarantee of impartiality. In the end the redistribution was voted by the majority against the protests of the minority in the house, and there has remained in many quarters, I am free to say, a sense of injustice as to what was done in certain parts of the country. This motion would empower the committee to study the methods used in other places situated similarly to our own country. For instance, in the sister dominion of Australia, a growing country in which the population increases from one census to another, they have a method under which redistribution is brought about by a board composed of three officers, one of whom is the chief electoral officer and another the surveyor general. Their report is submitted to the parliament of Australia, but if the recommendations contained in the report are not considered proper in every respect it is not necessarily adopted. At all events it seems to me that we have here something which ought to appeal to the sense of impartiality of every hon. member. The motion will not commit parliament to anything, it will simply give the committee authority to study the question and to report to the house as to what in the opinion of the committee would be the proper system of redistributing the representation of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain that this is not a motion which should be preceded by notice.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, I understand. The question which arises on the motion may be said to divide itself into two branches, the first of which is covered by the constitution. Section 51 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

> On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:
> (1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members:
> (2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained):
> (3) In the computation of the number of members for a province a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number:
> (4) On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards:
> (5) Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

This section indicates the legal limitations imposed upon parliament in connection with redistribution.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no limitation there.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a very considerable limitation, if the hon. gentleman will permit me to say so. First, there is the limitation as to the number of members to represent Quebec; the number is placed at sixty-five. The second limitation is as to the number of seats that other provinces have with relation to the fixed number of sixty-five, and the other limitation is as to reductions.

To section 51 must be added the provisions contained in the amendment made to the British North America Act in the days of the Borden administration by which no province's representation in the commons is to be diminished below its senatorial representation. Therefore the province of Prince Edward Island, with a population of between 80,000 and 90,000, has four members in the House of Commons, because under the provisions of the agreement under which it entered confederation it has four members in the Senate. Similarly the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia must have ten members each because they have ten members in the Senate. Therefore there is the limitation imposed by section 51, together with the amendment made to the constitution which provides that the representation of a province in the house shall never be less than its representation in the Senate.

The method by which redistribution is to be done fairly is a matter that has engaged the attention of this house ever since there has been a parliament in Canada. It will be remembered that in 1887 the charge was made that a great deal of gerrymandering took place in the constituencies, and that allegation became a distinct issue in that and succeeding elections. In the redistribution which took place after the census of 1891 there were also complaints, and at a subsequent redistribution an effort was made to do something by setting up a committee of the house composed of members from all parties to bring about a reasonable agreement between the parties. After the census of 1921, agreement which was not complete was arrived at; one might say it was agreement with respect to over ninety per cent of the constituencies. In 1931 there was an agreement at one time, but unfortunately disagreement subsequently arose, so that it could not be said that the committee arrived at any final agreement satisfactory to all parties. The great difficulty in Canada has been that because of the shifting of population from rural to urban communities we have a condition which is a reality and which cannot be dealt with on an equitable basis, as was originally intended by the constitution. For if you had representation by population, just that and nothing more, the representation from the cities and towns would deprive the rural communities of many of the seats they now have. That difficulty has confronted every parliament which in recent years has had to deal with redistribution. But never was the problem so difficult or the situation so acute as it was after the census of 1931, because for the first time in our history, as I have so frequently pointed out, we had a majority of population in our cities and towns. Therefore the basis or unit of representation in connection with urban seats was made far larger than with respect to rural communities, so that if possible the rural population might have representation in the house practically equivalent to that of the urban portion of the dominion. That has not been easy. It may be that there is some fairer or better method which may be set up, but it must be remembered that after all parliament is a far better tribunal than any commission to determine the basis upon which rural communities shall find representation, and is a better body to be entrusted with the duty of applying the rules of representation in parliament.

If representation by population were obligatory it is quite clear that in this house there would be a diminution of members from rural communities and an increase from the urban centres of Canada. In view of what was said by all hon. members, including the Prime Minister, I believe that is something which would be undesirable at this particular time, having regard to the importance of the basic industry of agriculture in the life of Canada as a whole.

Another point was raised, namely that of representation of the universities. Having regard to the provisions of section 51, as the statute now stands it is quite obvious that such representation would be impossible of accomplishment. There would have to be an amendment to the constitution itself in order to enable us to effect that purpose. There are many other matters which would have to be considered from the constitutional angle, if we were to give effect to some of the views we hold. No matter has been so much discussed by parliaments and legislatures as that of the redistribution at elections. It will be recalled that Gambetta in France had certain well defined views as to the division into electoral districts. At different times in England various views have obtained—the single member constituencies, the double member constituencies, and the question as to whether there might not be grouping of constituencies, giving benefit to all for the purpose of carrying into effect the theories of proportional representation. In this country we have in the main stuck to the practice of the single member constituency, except that there have been certain double member constituencies, which in many cases have lost their members by reason of diminishing population. No harm can come from a discussion of the matter by a committee, but I think the committee should have clearly in mind the limitations imposed upon their activities; for if it is suggested that a new redistribution could be introduced and carried through this parliament, insuperable difficulties will be found in section 51. On the other hand, I do not think even the most violent partisan will suggest that the last redistribution resulted in any advantage to the party then in power. Under the circumstances it might well serve a useful purpose for the discussion to take place, because it is as old as representative institutions themselves and will continue long after we have concluded our discussions with respect to it. If it results in any advantage to air views that have been held from time to time and to take from books and papers the story of representation and redistribution—because you cannot bring witnesses here from France and continental Europe to tell us how they do it—and to have all that put in a report of a committee rather than have it available to us in the volumes from which it is taken, I have no objection, but I cannot see that it is going to serve any very useful purpose.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to make one or two comments, Mr. Speaker, on this proposal. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has suggested that there are very decided legal limitations upon what this committee can do, but it does seem to me, now that amendments to the British North America Act are being considered, it is quite possible that this committee might suggest certain amendments to that act, if indeed specific amendments are being considered. I cannot see why, for instance, because Prince Edward Island in days gone by had a certain number of members, it should have the same number of members to-day, out of all proportion to its population. I think that the people of the west have the right to be as fully represented as the people of Prince Edward Island. It is all very well to hold to certain historical traditions, but it is much more important to meet the needs of the present day.

The suggestion has been made that there might be some representation for the universities, because that has been the practice, I think, in England; but I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that there are certain groups in this country that need representation much more than the universities. I think of one class in the province of Alberta, for example, where there is a large number of miners scattered through some six or seven federal constituencies that are predominantly rural in character. The leader of the opposition suggests that the farmers, representing a primary industry, should be adequately represented. Well, what of the miners? It is almost impossible for them as a group to be represented under present conditions with small mining areas scattered through predominantly rural districts. If any group is to be given representation it ought to be some of these groups that are at present unrepresented. And again, I think of the large number of people engaged in construction work, scattered all over this country in small areas or along the railway lines, and of those engaged in the lumber camps. They are amongst the most needy of our population, yet in practice they lack direct representation. We have again and again urged that they be given greater facilities for exercising their franchise, but even if they were given that, it is very difficult for them to secure direct representation in this house. I hope when the committee is making its investigations it will not fail to remember some of these more or less neglected groups.

There is one other thing I should like to mention, and that is the necessity in any system of redistribution of a distinction being drawn between the people residing in urban and suburban communities, and people living in the country. Instead of making that distinction we have frequently split the urban population in two and added to each half a section of the surrounding country population. That may have been very desirable in some instances, from the standpoint of party politics, but I suggest that it does not contribute to the general welfare. The farmers have their own special problems, and it seems to me that the redistribution ought to be arranged so that they will have distinct representation. On the other hand, the people living in the cities and in the vicinity of cities really constitute a more or less unified community, and ought to be given representation as a city group.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: According to population?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: According to population. I am suggesting that at present the urban and rural groups are split up and combined in the most astonishing ways. If this committee would give attention to some of these considerations I think we might evolve an altogether new system that would reflect more adequately the needs of the people.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question of notice, I quite agree with my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that notice appears on the votes and proceedings of last Tuesday, but it has always been usual, as I understand it, to have the notice appear also on the order paper, and it is not on the order paper to-day. I do not know whether it was left off inadvertently. I have seen some of these notices put at the very first of the order paper when they were of a different category from the usual government notices. However, that is a matter of detail at the moment, and does not make any particular difference.

I should like to suggest to the Minister of Justice that the two matters which this committee was set up to consider are the Dominion Elections Act and the Dominion Franchise Act. It was stated by the minister in the house the other day, and quite properly —I entirely agree with him—that it was better to have these questions settled early in the life of a parliament rather than close to the time of an election. Both of these matters which the committee is going to consider are extremely important. Many things occurred during the last election to show that there were faults in both these acts. Some of them were perhaps not important, although other hon. members may not agree. At any rate those are very difficult matters for the committee to consider; they are of great importance. It will take the committee a long time, and it is right that this should be done early in the life of this parliament. But I submit to my hon. friend that this other subject which he now proposes to add to the duties of this committee is one about which there is no need for hurry. The next census will not be taken until 1941; by that time this parliament will have disappeared and a new one will have been elected, and all that will take place before there can be another redistribution. I feel quite strongly that the duties already imposed on this committee are serious enough, and that the committee should not be embarrassed by having this further subject thrust upon it. It is a different matter altogether; there is no occasion for haste in dealing with it, and I submit for the consideration of the minister and of the government that they should not add this new subject to the duties of the committee. If they desire to have it discussed, that can be done in the years to come, with plenty of time to spare. I feel quite strongly that it is a mistake to add this subject as an afterthought, to the committee's duties, which are already of very great importance, embracing two very difficult questions.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I say in answer to my right hon. friend who has just spoken (Sir George Perley) that consideration of the matter referred to in this motion is certainly germane to the two other matters which have been referred to this committee. Indeed, proportional representation is mentioned specifically in the reference to the committee for consideration. Any scheme of proportional representation would involve, of necessity, a redistribution of the seats as they are now constituted. Apart from all this, the resolution is general in its character. What is proposed is that the committee shall consider the methods which might be used to effect a redistribution of the electoral districts in Canada and other countries and make suggestions to the house. That does not necessarily mean that there will be an immediate redistribution, it will be a suggestion of what such redistribution should be when the time comes.

I do not agree with my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he says that parliament cannot at this time, or prior to a new census being taken, deal with the redistribution of seats. Section 51 of the British North America Act provides that after the completion of a census "the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides," subject to Quebec having sixty-five members and the other provinces a proportionate number according to what their population may be as compared with the population of Quebec. This section of the British North America Act requires that after every census there shall be an allocation of the number of members for each province, but it does not mean that parliament is prevented from changing the limits of the constituencies provided the number of members allocated is retained. I have not the book before me, but I remember having studied this matter two or three years ago. Lefroy, an authority on the Canadian constitution, states what I have just stated, that while parliament cannot change the number of members allocated to each province, after a census, parliament has authority to change the lines of the constituencies at any time provided the number of members is not changed. However, as I have said, while that may be done, this motion will not necessarily lead to that procedure. This is merely suggesting that consideration be given to the best methods of having a fair and just redistribution when the time comes that it should be made.

With regard to the last words of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and following the same trend of argument, may I say that possibly the results of the election were not due to the redistribution but were in spite of it.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. REID:

1. Is any financial assistance provided by the dominion government to the sons and daughters of officials or officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for high school or any other form of education?

2. If so, what sums of money were provided by the government for such purposes and to what persons was this money paid during the calendar years 1932 to 1935?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. No.

(a) Special training for sub-constables in clerical duties in connection with police work has been given at Regina, Saskatchewan, since June, 1934, and out of a total of 43 who have received this special training, ten have been sons of members of the force.

(b) In addition to the above, five other members of the force (one of whom is the son of an officer, Constable J. MacBrien) are being given courses in law at five different universities of Canada. The only financial assistance given is an allowance of 50 cents per diem each.

(b) (i) There is need of having members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who are experienced in police duties, trained in law. This is being done at Scotland Yard through the employment of special officers in the Criminal Investigation Branch and at the Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, Washington, U.S.A. In the latter case, no candidate is accepted for service unless he is a graduate in law or is a chartered accountant.

(c) No daughters of officials or officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been given financial assistance for high school or any other form of education.

2. Answered by No. 1.

HALLONQUIST, SASK., POSTMASTER

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What is the annual salary of the postmaster at Hallonquist, Saskatchewan?
2. What commission was paid from sale of postage stamps, money orders, postal notes, etc., for the past fiscal year?
3. What allowance is made for carrying the mail between the post office and the station?
4. How is the latter amount arrived at?
5. Is the basis the same in all cases?
6. If not, what other basis is used?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. The postmaster is paid a yearly commission based on the revenue of his office for the preceding fiscal year. The revenue is derived from postage sales and money order commissions.

2. Commissions paid to the postmaster for the fiscal year 1934-35:

Postage commission..	$243 42
Money order commission.. ..	32 56
Postal note commission.. ..	2 30
	$278 28
Rent allowance..	20 47
Total..	$298 75

3. 40 cents per trip.
4. By public tender.
5. No.
6. Annual, poundage or mileage.

FISH CULTURE

Mr. NEILL:

What is the total amount spent year by year for the last fifteen years on fish cultural work in (a) Canada; (b) British Columbia?

Mr. MICHAUD:

[Mr. Lapointe.]

VETCRAFT SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. WILTON (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) whether there is any possibility of the vetcraft shop which was recently closed at Hamilton being reopened.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. In reply I would say that the vetcraft shop was closed on March 1, and will not be reopened. Within a few months the district office of the department will be removed to the new government building and there is no accommodation in that building for a vetcraft shop. These shops were started originally for the purpose of training men in civilian occupations. It was anticipated that the training given would enable partially disabled ex-soldiers to obtain ordinary employment. However, it has been found during recent years that many of those who obtained employment in these shops did not leave. As there has not been any substantial change in the personnel for some time, it would appear that the object for which these shops were originally instituted has not been achieved. There were some eighteen men employed in the shop at Hamilton, receiving something like thirty-five cents per hour, the prevailing rate of wages. Each one of these men cost the country approximately $33 to $35 per month, and it has been felt that such men were receiving a preference over other returned soldiers. The men employed in any shop which may be closed will fall into the same category as other ex-soldiers. If they are pensioners drawing small pensions they will be entitled to relief.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty's government in the Dominion of Canada and the government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Yesterday afternoon when discussing this resolution I expressed the sentiments of the people I have the honour to represent. I said that during the last election all parties in Canada were perfectly satisfied that the then administration had been trying to effect an agreement with the United States and also that the Liberal party, if it were returned to power, would do its very best to bring about an agreement such as the one now under consideration. I said further that a good many sections of the population were astonished at the attitude taken by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I made that statement for this reason. I well remember that during the last session the then Minister of Finance made a statement in the house to the effect that the great Conservative party had always been in favour of reciprocity or of freer trade with the United States. I have received several communications from people in my own constituency, supporters of the Conservative party, for whose opinions I have always had the greatest respect, expressing their failure to understand the attitude of the leader of the opposition to this particular question.

Yesterday I said that in our part of Canada the people were absolutely impartial so far as the tariff was concerned, but I added that any tariff that raised an artificial barrier in the way of exports from a country such as Canada, which is always on an exporting basis, would certainly put a burden on the shoulders of the people I represent; and that applies to every section of northern Ontario. I also mentioned, so as to be fair, the benefits enjoyed by the newsprint industry. I listened attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), particularly when he said that he was content to deal with nations within the British empire, and I pointed out to the hon. gentleman that it was not possible to sell to Great Britain a single pound of the product of the newsprint industry. The natural, the only market we have now or have ever had in the past is the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is not correct. The Standard and the Express are very large users of Canadian newsprint.

Mr. BRADETTE: I did not quite hear what the right hon. gentleman said.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is inadvertently incorrect. The Daily Standard and the Daily Express of London, England, are both printed on Canadian newsprint.

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, no one will deny that the great bulk of the product goes to the United States. There was a time when we believed that we were supreme in that industry, by reason of our access and close proximity to the American market; but anyone who has studied the industry will find that in the last five years we have been faced with keen competition from the Scandinavian countries and from Germany. Sweden is advancing every year with a greater and greater average of production to compete with our Canadian newsprint. One realizes, in this connection, the great change that has taken place through the development of transportation, in the use of motor vehicles and in other ways, throughout the civilized world, so that so far as distance is concerned the world is really getting smaller and smaller; the old channels of trade, which were tedious and involved delays, no longer exist. These are facts to be remembered.

In our section we are primary producers and our surplus must necessarily find its way to the world's markets. I will not repeat what I said yesterday with regard to the tariff on fruit and vegetables. It is sufficient to say that in our part of the country we have been greatly penalized by the application of the so-called seasonal tariff, and I fervently hope that the Department of National Revenue will take steps to ensure that our people in that section will be able to buy these necessities at reasonable prices. I hope they will get fair treatment.

I have no doubt that every member has been lobbied with regard to Canadian magazines and periodicals, and again the bogey has been raised, that unless we erect artificial barriers to keep out such publications from other countries our Canadian mentality will be impaired. Any such statement is obviously far-fetched. There is one thing I implicitly believe in and that is the importance of education and the mental development of the people, and I submit that no obstacle should be placed in the way of this development. For a number of years prior to the imposition of duties on United States and other foreign publications I used to subscribe to the Literary Digest, a non-partisan publication which gives an unbiased view of all questions pertaining not only to the United States but to the world at large. After the duties were imposed however I found that I had not the means of securing that and other magazines. I am quite prepared to patronize Canadian magazines and periodicals; they are well written and well worth reading. But surely our loyalty to Canadian principles and ideals does not involve the audacity of prohibiting the people from reading American publications. I do agree that certain types of United States newspapers which are antagonistic to the British empire, and certain fiction magazines, should be absolutely prohibited; but those that treat of scientific matters, those that discuss international questions, should be allowed access to Canada. Surely our Canadian magazine publishers must have a certain market in the United States in respect of which there could be reciprocal literary exchanges. At any rate, personally I will not put any restrictions on learning and intellectual development.

I know that the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) will give me credit for sincerity when I compliment him on what he said the other day, and I believe he was but saying what the majority of Canadians think when they take the trouble to study the problem with which we are dealing at the present time. It is always very easy, in discussing a matter such as this, to raise bogies to scare the people, ignoring the fact that we are dealing with economic and commercial problems, for the purpose of making nationalistic and political capital. We have suffered from that sort of thing in the past. Experience has shown that freer trade between Canada and the United States, to the extent that it has been tried, has been beneficial to both countries. It is during such periods that we have enjoyed our largest share of prosperity. I do not go so far as to say that it is a formula for the solution of all our problems; our problems are not so easily solved. But inasmuch as we are an exporting country, I regard it as one of the best means of solving to a large extent our present unemployment problem.

I should like to quote two or three sentences from the speech of the hon. member for East Kootenay. At page 724 he is reported as having said:

> Let us look for a moment at the agreement. The agreement is, as I have said, a step or a gesture in the right direction.

This is absolutely true; no one even on the government side will dare to say that this agreement is perfect. It would not need to be amended from day to day or month to month, though perhaps it would from year to year. Later on at page 725 the hon. member has this to say:

> There are bound to be some cases where there appears to be an injury, but what I would suggest is that we wait for a time and see whether these imagined injuries are real.

I have no doubt that there is no person on this side of the house who would like to see any of our industries in rural sections of the country markedly injured by the present treaty with the United States. The same applies to all our social and economic and industrial and farm activities. At the same time, as was stated by the hon. member for Kootenay East, there is no doubt that in some sections a certain amount of sacrifice must be made for the benefit of the whole. Later on the hon. member says:

> In the first place I want to say that this treaty is good because the motive and intention behind it are good, and I think it should be supported because the motive and intention are good. There is a spirit of good will in the treaty which ought to be and I am sure is welcomed by both countries.

I hold no brief and have no right to speak for the Conservative party, but it will be a wonderful gesture at this time if the grand old Conservative party will see their way to support the treaty, will recognize the good that is in it, and will help the government in all necessary amendments.

I am very glad of this situation, Mr. Speaker, that for the next four or five years we may not have to hold an election in this country. I mention that point because it means that for four or five years at least there are not going to be raised the great questions with which we were confronted in the past when dealing with reciprocity pacts. We are going to apply the principle of this treaty—

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. BRADETTE: If you will allow me, sir, I will make one more observation. I think I have lost about eight minutes, but I accept at once the ruling of the chair. It is certain that in this question there are forces, stronger than politics or mere national selfishness and premeditated misrepresentation, which will keep alive the determination of the two nations to engage in profitable trade.

Mr. H. E. WILTON (Hamilton West): In coming up to the parliament buildings this morning I could not but be impressed by the beautiful sunshine of the morning and the evidence of the return of dead nature back to life. It should inspire all of us to higher thoughts; we should all be feeling in the best of condition to-day due to the improved condition of the weather. I could not but be impressed also by the seriousness of the fact that two great political parties such as the Liberal and Conservative parties cannot agree on a subject so vitally important to the whole of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WILTON: My friends on the opposite side echo that sentiment. But I am sorry to tell them, and I say it honestly, that I cannot feel they are on the right side on this question. I assure them, and in this I include the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that I should welcome an opportunity before the close of this parliamentary session to find myself in accord with them upon some measure brought down by the government, if for no other reason than to prove my good will towards them and my determination always to put principle ahead of politics.

I once heard a man say, addressing an audience composed almost equally of Canadians and of Americans, "I hope the time is not far distant when the same flag will be waving over both countries, Canada and the United States." Immediately there was loud applause by the Americans present. As soon as the speaker had succeeded in quieting the enthusiasm of the Americans he explained, "I hope you won't misunderstand me; I mean the Canadian flag." Then there was some applause by the Canadians. I am a Canadian. I was born in Canada. My parents were born in Canada. My grandparents were British; they did not come over to this country on the Mayflower, but they were on the dock to meet it when it came in.

Canada is a great country, and it is the duty of this government to see that nothing is done to block or dwarf its progress. Hamilton, the city I have the honour to represent, has a tributary trade territory of 400,000 people and a population of 150,000, and its manufacturing industries give employment to over 30,000 people. As a citizen of that great city I am interested in its future, and I am opposing this agreement because I see in it closed factories, unemployed men and women, and the breaking down of our commercial, industrial and social development.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Mitchell) speaking in support of this agreement the other day, said he was pleased to know it would make it possible for the people of his constituency to do their shopping in the United States. I wonder if he would have them spend their cash in the United States and, when they ran out of cash, get social credit in Canada. Isn't that a grand example of Canadian loyalty?

I am proud, as I said, to be a Canadian, proud of my British heritage, and proud that I am opposed to anything and everything which tends to affect adversely the best interests of Canada. In this agreement between Canada and the United States I see a real menace to Canadian progress, and I feel that I would be untrue to my duty as a Canadian did I not oppose it. I have heard the word "detour" defined as going the wrong way to get to the right place. I am sure that since I came to this house I have walked at least a hundred miles up and down its long marble corridors in my daily efforts to find the right place. In opposing this trade agreement, however, I am confident that I am on the right road, even though it is not blocked with traffic.

In a letter I recently received from a friend of mine who resides in the city of Grand Rapids, Michigan, he had the following to say:

> The new trade treaty between Canada and the United States will prove of great benefit to the city of Grand Rapids, which city is known far and near as a great producer of furniture. The furniture manufacturers here anticipate a big increase in production for their Canadian trade, which will mean increased employment for the people of Grand Rapids.

It is only fair to assume that this increased employment for the people of Grand Rapids will mean decreased employment for the people of Canada and the city I represent

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why?

Mr. WILTON: This is a Canadian parliament, sitting here to protect and improve the welfare of Canadians, not to advance at their expense the interests of the United States. I regret that I am obliged to oppose this agreement, because regardless of politics it is my duty as a loyal Canadian, my duty to the electors who sent me here, to vote in favour of any movement which in my opinion is for the betterment of the people of Canada. I have no special privilege to express the will of the party to which I belong, but sir, I do feel that I am voicing the sentiment of every member of this group, so frequently referred to as a small minority, when I say that every last one of them would give his undivided support to this agreement if he felt it was in the best interests of Canada so to do. I hope I shall never become so small-minded as to vote against any progressive measure simply because I am sitting on the opposition benches. I hope the time will never come when I shall have to confess to this house that I sat here for several years sacrificing principle to political influence. I would even go so far as to suggest that it might be a good thing in the interests of all of us to stretch a banner across this chamber bearing the words "Canada first."

I see in this agreement the possibility of the American rather than the Canadian flag floating over Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): A queer vision.

Mr. WILTON: One needs vision here No member of this house has a higher respect for the American people than I have. I have flesh and blood connections with the United States; some who are very near and dear to me are there, but I cannot forget my duty to the land of my birth. In this agreement we are practically presenting Canada to the United States, and getting little in return. Why should Canada give two for one in a trade agreement with the United States, when Canadian products are of greater value to that country than United States products are to Canada?

I heard this morning for the first time this illustration of the policy of the social credit party: a picnic was being held somewhere in the west prior to the elections, and two kegs of beer were ordered to be sent to the picnic grounds. Pat and Mike were sent to take charge of the beer, but during the day it rained and the picnic was called off. Before long Pat became dry and he said to Mike, "I would like a drink." Mike said, "Well, if you want a drink you will have to pay ten cents for it." So Pat paid Mike ten cents for a drink. A little later Mike got dry, and Pat said, "You can't have a drink without paying me ten cents," so he paid Pat back the ten cents he got from him. So it went on during the afternoon until the two kegs of beer were disposed of, and the only money that circulated was the one dime. But the question arises, who is to pay the man who supplied the beer? The question that comes to my mind is, who is going to take care of the thousands of men and women who by this agreement are going to be thrown out of employment?

As a new member of this house, listening to the various speeches I have been frequently reminded of an experience I once had in the Canadian north. I was lost in the bush, and, like the latest musical craze, continued to go round and round. A few days ago much valuable time was taken in debating the problem of unemployment and how to overcome it. To-day we are going in the opposite direction, considering the adoption of a treaty which will add to unemployment rather than decrease it. Again I say I regret that I am obliged to oppose this agreement. I am prepared to admit that it has some good points, but so far as I can see for each of its good points it has two or more which will prove disastrous to Canada. I represent the second largest city in the province of Ontario. It is one of the most progressive cities in Canada, and as an industrial centre is frequently referred to as the Pittsburgh of Canada. It has five hundred or more manufacturing concerns, employing thousands of men and women. Most of these concerns are branches of American companies, forced to locate in Canada and give employment to Canadians by the progressive protective policy of Conservative governments. One of these Hamilton concerns right now is laying men off because the product it produces can under this agreement be manufactured in the company's Chicago plant and delivered to the Canadian west at $8.75 less than the Hamilton plant can make it.

The proposed privilege of allowing Canadians to bring $100 worth of American merchandise into Canada free when returning from a visit to the United States will cost the business men of Canada and of Hamilton millions of dollars.

The most important thing to the progress of Canada, her commercial and industrial interests, is employment for her people. This new treaty will make it unnecessary for American manufacturing concerns to continue doing business in Canada and in Hamilton; consequently thousands of men and women will be thrown out of employment. The situation is a very serious one because it strikes at our very existence. It has been stated already that the greater proportion of Canada's population to-day is in its urban centres. The solution, then, of our financial, social and industrial problems is to be found in increasing rather than decreasing employment. Why is Canada being pointed to by every nation of the world as having led the way out of the darkness of the depression into prosperity? Because of the progressive policy so well and soundly established by the father of confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald, and so well followed since. That is what made Canada great in the eyes of the whole world. That policy is responsible for the fact that the city I represent is in the majority a home owning city. That is the policy which made Hamilton a city of tall factory chimneys, and has filled the workman's dinner pail. Now this protective wall is to be torn down, which will mean closed factories, unemployed men and women, empty dinner pails, empty cupboards and evicted home owners. That is the way I see it, and seeing it that way is it any wonder I oppose this agreement.

I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to keep within my self-prescribed fifteen minutes; in the interests of economy I hope always to do so. It cost the people of Canada $2,280,816 in the fiscal year 1934-35 to conduct the session of parliament, a daily average of $13,531. According to these figures, which I believe are correct, on a basis of two three-hour sessions per day it costs the taxpayers of Canada over $2,000 every time one of their elected representatives speaks for one hour. I do not think they are worth it. I am opposed to the agreement because it is not in the best interests of Canada or those of the city I have the honour to represent. According to the clock I have used up about $484 worth of time. If I have said anything which might have the effect of inducing my good friends opposite to change their minds, to get off the detour and back on to the highway of progress and prosperity, and to realize that the agreement is not in the best interests of Canada, I shall feel my time has not been wasted.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Wilton) that in this house there are Canadians just as loyal and as good as he is, and among hon. members who will vote for the agreement there may be as good and as loyal Canadians as among those who vote against it. It would be a sad day for discussion in this chamber and out of it if, in our discussions of questions of this kind, we always brought up loyalty and waving of the flag. In my view matters of this kind should be discussed on their merits, and on their merits only. Whether or not an hon. member votes for or against the agreement has nothing to do either with his loyalty or with his desire to do what is proper in the circumstances.

My main purpose however in rising this afternoon is to say a few words in explanation of my attitude towards the agreement. During the past few weeks, in some Liberal newspapers throughout western Canada there has been a campaign attempting to develop a certain amount of, shall I say misrepresentation, in the minds of electors in western Canada in regard to the attitude of the party to which I have the honour to belong. It is quite true that in this parliament we are only seven, and by the way, "seven" should bring to the minds of the Liberal party a striking incident in British parliamentary history. It will be remembered that Gladstone once after a famous campaign sent a telegram reading "We are seven." I feel quite sure however that in future no one will confuse the twentieth century Liberal party in Canada with the nineteenth century Liberalism of Gladstone.

May I attempt to place in its proper perspective before hon. members and their constituents the position taken by the group to which I belong? For this purpose, although I could go back to an earlier period, I shall be content with going back to 1928. First I wish to place on Hansard a subamendment moved in the course of the budget debate on February 22, 1928. It reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "regrets" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"that the government proposes further reductions in the income tax, thus making a serious departure from the principle of direct taxation: that the proposed revision of the customs tariff is inadequate to bring effective relief to the consuming public; and that the sales tax on the necessaries of life has not been eliminated."

More than one hon. member has asked us where we stand on this trade agreement. My reply is that we still endorse the amendment we moved in 1928. May I add that every Liberal member in the house at that time, some of whom have recently been asking where we stand, voted against the subamendment I have read and in favour of substantial reductions in the income taxes paid by the wealthy people of Canada, and gave no relief to the millions who required it at that time. I see in his seat the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) who has been very solicitous about how we stand on this matter. He was one who voted against the subamendment.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): A political subamendment.

Mr. HEAPS: Everything that comes from us is political, and everything that comes from the Liberal party is, I suppose, quite honest and perfect.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): For the benefit of the country.

Mr. HEAPS: Then on March 14, 1929, we proposed the following subamendment:

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "house" and substituting therefor the following:

"urges upon the government the consideration of an immediate and substantial increase of the British preference as a step towards freer trade relations between Canada and other nations."

This subamendment was voted down by the Liberal party. Again, hon. members in this chamber who have asked us where we stand on questions of trade and tariff were the ones who voted against that subamendment of 1929.

Coming to 1930, with the Liberal party still in power, I find that on May 8 there was moved from this section of the house the following subamendment to the budget:

That all the words after "it is of opinion that" in the amendment, in the tenth line thereof, be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The government having definitely adopted the principle of increased protection, modified only by certain extensions of the British preference, it is to be regretted that more effective consideration has not been given to the position of agriculture and labour, but that, on the contrary, the changes made in the iron and steel schedules will result in an increased cost in respect of all structural work and the machinery of production; and further, that the best interests of Canada would be served by a more substantial increase in the British preference, particularly as affecting textiles and other articles of a similar character, together with a modification or abandonment of the regulations requiring a fifty per cent empire content, which have largely nullified the effect of any preference given;

That a much larger proportion of our revenue should be provided for through direct taxation, more especially through the income tax;

We further wish to state our conviction that these and other changes in our fiscal policies are not of themselves a solution of our modern economic problems, but that effective encouragement should be given to the development of cooperative principles, having regard to production, distribution and the utilization and control of credit.

On May 15 this subamendment was voted down. Among hon. members who voted against these three subamendments submitted by our party were hon. members now sitting on the Liberal side who are asking us where we stand on questions of tariff, and adjustments thereof, to meet present day requirements. I think I might well ask those hon. members who were here when our subamendments were moved, where do they stand?

May I now proceed to discuss a few aspects of the agreement? As I sat in my place and listened to the arguments pro and con I could not help thinking how wide of the mark, at least in my view, were many of the sentiments expressed. Those who are in favour of this trade agreement between Canada and the United States seem to think that by its adoption we are going to usher in an era of prosperity. I only wish, Mr. Speaker, that I could bring myself to believe that such will be the case. In fact what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was that the removal of trade barriers is the cornerstone of Liberal policy in bringing about a return to prosperity. He said further that the agreement——will assist our railways, will bring about an increase in purchasing power, and may help very materially to lift our country out of the depression from which it has been suffering for so many years and to restore an era of prosperity and of better relations with other lands.

These rather extravagant hopes based on the agreement seem to me to be somewhat out of place. We are by the terms of this agreement lowering the tariff barriers between Canada and our neighbours to the south. Our neighbours to the south are undergoing exactly the same economic conditions that we are experiencing in this dominion, and yet it is thought, because we are establishing easier trading relations with the United States, that we are going to increase purchasing power here in Canada. I cannot see the logic of it. In the United States at the present time approximately ten million people are out of work, without any purchasing power whatsoever, and in addition to the ten million who are out of work there are many more millions who are on the government payroll, working on relief projects. So long as that is the state of the country to the south of us, I cannot see how by reducing the tariff and making it easier for us to trade with them we are necessarily going to increase trade between the two countries.

Then, on the other hand, I listened to the somewhat extravagant forebodings of the Conservative party, that this country is going to be ruined, that we shall become merely an annex of the United States, that we are giving everything in this agreement that we have to give, and so forth. I cannot become alarmed, Mr. Speaker, about these forebodings on the part of those who oppose this agreement, or enthusiastic about the anticipations of those who have a word or two to say in its favour. If the lowering of the tariff is going to bring about all the advantages which it is claimed tariff reductions will produce, how is it that when we had a low tariff government from 1921 to 1930 we were heading right into the greatest depression that this country has ever known? I refer to 1929 and subsequent years. Low tariffs did not help us in any way, shape or form to evade the depression that overtook us as well as other countries in the year 1929 and subsequently.

May I go a little further and point out that between the years 1930 and 1935, when we increased our tariff enormously, that increase in our tariff did not help us to get out of the depression either. In other words, Mr. Speaker, those who stress the tremendous importance of our tariff structure as a means of emerging from the economic crisis in which we find ourselves at the present time are leaning to a very large extent, I believe, upon a broken reed. All countries of the world, irrespective of their tariff structure, be it high or low, are undergoing similar economic conditions to those prevailing in this dominion. Take high tariff countries such as the United States. They were hit by the depression and had—and still have—tremendous economic problems to cope with. On the other hand, low tariff countries such as Great Britain, Holland and one or two others I might name, have to deal with the same economic problems as those which the high tariff countries have to face. Consequently something more fundamental than tariffs must be the cause of the economic condition in which we find ourselves at the present time.

The Prime Minister has claimed that depression means an absence of trade. I do not know whether that is a complete definition of what depression really is. Depression as I know it would mean that the great masses of our people have not sufficient in the way of food, clothing and shelter, and I would add, so far as Canada is concerned, sufficient of the food, clothing and shelter which they are in a position to produce in abundance and even superabundance. Absence of trade is a very loose expression. There is an absence of trade between this country and other parts of the world. May I also point out that there is an absence of trade between the people of Alberta, say, and the people of Ontario—a complete absence of trade. Why is that absence of trade possible? Why does it take place within the Dominion of Canada? Why cannot the great masses of the people of Ontario buy the coal which either Nova Scotia or Alberta could supply to them and which they want so badly and in many instances have now to receive from charitable sources? Why cannot the people of Ontario, for example, have the things which Alberta is able to supply in superabundance, and why cannot the people of our other provinces have the goods which Ontario and Quebec are able to supply in such superabundance? It is not a question of tariff at all because there are no tariffs between the provinces, and yet there is this absence of trade, the failure to supply the goods which our provinces are able to produce for the people of the other provinces who need them. Why are our provinces not trading with one another as they would if only the real opportunity was there for the people to consume the goods which they themselves produce?

When the Prime Minister spoke of absence of trade, he did not say whether he meant internal or external trade, and I was surprised at some figures which the former Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) gave when he spoke on this question. He pointed out—I am speaking from memory and subject to correction, but I think I am correct—that approximately eighty-four per cent in value of our agricultural products was consumed within the confines of the dominion in the year 1934.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Net or gross?

Mr. HEAPS: I think that was the gross—eighty-four per cent of the amount of agricultural products produced in Canada consumed in this dominion, and only sixteen per cent exported or sold abroad. Then he turned to manufactured commodities and pointed out that eighty-six per cent of the manufactured products of this country was consumed in Canada and only fourteen per cent exported. If that is so, it means that Canada along with the other nations finds diminishing markets to-day in all parts of the world. Why is it that in 1936 we have these diminishing markets? For the very simple reason that over a period of years the different nations of the world have learned to produce for themselves in the same abundance as the so-called more advanced capitalistic countries. Great Britain, for example, has sent its machinery to India, China, and Japan; these countries are producing in abundance, and the world at large is suffering from the competition it has to meet from them in the shape of manufactured goods, for example, textiles. The art of production has now become so simplified that nations have found it quite easy to produce. Practically every nation of the world is in a position where it can export a surplus amount of commodities. When all nations are on an export basis it means that there is a glut of goods for export purposes without available markets. We find this to be so with regard to many of the commodities which we were able to export in the past. I refer to the products of the farm, particularly to wheat. The nations of the world do not want our products to-day to the same extent that they wanted them years ago. France does not want our farm products, neither does Germany. Great Britain is increasing her wheat production year by year in the hope of diminishing the amount needed to be imported. She is doing the same with respect to other farm products. The producers of wheat are being heavily subsidized in order to encourage the growing of grain in the old country. We are living to-day in what has often been described as an age of contracting capitalism and diminishing markets.

If we are finding it more difficult to export our products and if there is a demand for these products in this country, we ought first of all to satisfy the home demand before shipping our surpluses abroad. As yet we have never been able to accomplish this; we have not even tried to accomplish it. As has been pointed out during this session, there are at the present time 1,200,000 men, women and children on relief in this country. I am not familiar with the standards of relief in all the different sections of this dominion, but I do know that in some western cities single men receive only two somewhat skimpy meals per day. In some parts of the country families are compelled to live on approximately $4 per week. Such conditions offer an opportunity of increasing our consumption.

So far as we in this corner of the house are concerned, we are for the fullest and freest commercial relations between our own people and those of other parts of the world. Just as we stand for the fullest and freest trade relations with other peoples, so do we stand for the freest and fullest trade relations between province and province of the dominion. However, we take this stand with one or two reservations, which I believe are such as will be accepted by most hon. members. First, we are opposed to the importation into this country of goods produced by sweated labour. We would not only put a tariff against goods of this kind; we would place an embargo against their entry into Canada.

Many of the conditions in Canada and the United States are parallel. Somewhat similar living conditions prevail to the south of us as prevail in this country, but they produce many things that we do not. There is an opportunity for friendlier and closer trade relations between ourselves and the people of the United States. Some people look upon trade as a form of war, but we do not; we believe that trade should be the cement that binds nation and nation together. It should give to the peoples of the world an opportunity of understanding the arts, crafts and culture of the various nations. We should have an opportunity of importing from the different countries of the world these things that are natural to those countries, and we should also have the opportunity of exporting the things that are natural to this country. Such a trade would tend to a better understanding between ourselves and the peoples of other parts of the world. When the government of the day, and I do not care what government it may be, is able to bring about an amicable adjustment of trade relations with our neighbours to the south, I think it is a step in the right direction.

The world to-day is in a great ferment. We claim that the cause of many of the troubles are economic. We believe that the expansion of Japan in China and Manchukuo is motivated purely by economic conditions. We believe that the desire of Germany for expansion is motivated also by such conditions, and I think we all agree that the grab of Ethiopia by Italy is motivated by a desire for greater markets and the need for raw materials.

We want to avoid as far as possible friction between ourselves and other parts of the world, and therefore we are opposed to the raising of tariffs which makes it almost prohibitive to trade with people in other parts of the world. In spite of the fact that there is a diminishing world market to-day, in spite of the fact that there are so many people out of work, we contend that economically speaking the world is no poorer than it was ten or twenty years ago. In fact, I believe that the reverse is true, that in many respects we are richer than we were a number of years ago. The trouble is that in this day and generation, like Frankenstein, we have created a monster and do not seem to know what to do with this thing of our own creation. We have created the machinery of production that produces in such abundance, but we have not as yet learned to bring about a proper and fair distribution of goods. We should endeavour to create a condition whereby people would have a reasonable and equitable distribution of wealth production.

I should like to say one or two words to my friends of the Liberal party. During the course of this debate many hon. members opposite have boasted of the victory achieved at the last election.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: Let me tell my hon. friend who says, "hear, hear" that his boasting is a little previous. I remember how members of the Conservative party boasted of their victory after the 1930 election, and I said to them at that time that although they might have won an election, they had not achieved victory. The victory of the Liberal party will be achieved only when they have cured the economic conditions with which we are faced at the present time. When the Liberal party has brought about an era of prosperity, when the people of this country are no longer suffering as millions are suffering at the present time, then I will agree with members of the Liberal party that they were victorious at the last election.

On many previous occasions when referring to the tariff I have pointed out to the house how little the tariff protection given by the government means to the workers engaged in the most highly protected industries. I have pointed out that the workers in these highly protected industries received practically no protection whatever. I have only to point to the miserably low wages received by the men and women engaged in such a highly protected industry as the textile industry. I can point to other industries even in the city of Hamilton, where everyone is supposed to have a full dinner pail. In these highly protected industries we have found that men and women are compelled to go on strike in order to obtain better working conditions than they are receiving under high protection. In other words, the protection given to many of the industries of the country has been really of no value to the workers engaged in those industries; for we find that in some of the industries receiving the least protection wages have been much higher than in those industries where protection has been highest.

I would point out that the figures given by the bureau of statistics in regard to wages indicate very often not the wages that are received by the workers but the wages that these men and women would have received had they been working fifty-two weeks in the year. These figures are therefore very often misleading. With respect to practically every one of the protected industries, in very few instances do the men and women work fifty-two weeks in the year. Take the textile industry as an example; the wages for girls outside the large industrial areas are $6 a week for beginners. For the first six months they receive the magnificent sum of $6 per week. That used to be for a week of fifty-five hours, but when the howl went up in regard to length of hours the week was reduced to forty-eight hours, and now they work for the same sum on the basis of a forty-eight hour week. However, I have no desire to go into that aspect of the question in detail.

I would say this in conclusion. We in this group of which I have the honour to be a member will support in general the trade agreement that is now before us for ratification. We do not think for a moment that its adoption will solve all our problems, but we do say that we believe that a reduction in tariffs in these days is a step in the right direction. Generally speaking, we believe that it will promote a better feeling between this country and the United States, and where there are natural products that can be advantageously exchanged between Canada and the United States we in this parliament ought to endorse a measure of that kind. Therefore for the reasons I have just indicated we will vote for this agreement between the two countries; and while expressing my hearty concurrence in the agreement I trust that in due course the government will bring in more radical measures as outlined, not in the speech from the throne but in election speeches, to provide for a more adequate and equitable distribution of the wealth produced in Canada.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I desire to discuss one particular phase of the issue now before the house and I trust I shall not be more than a few moments. One is perhaps unfortunate in many respect in living a long life; in another respect it provides a lengthy experience which enables one to judge by personal contact ever-recurring political issues. I say now frankly that I have had an intimate and close acquaintance with the men of both political parties in Canada who have endeavoured to secure from the United States advantageous reciprocal trade arrangements since 1870 at least; and so far as I am aware, and as I think and believe, there never was, prior to possibly June 14, 1934, an opportunity to secure any reciprocal trade agreement with the United States which did not endanger and imperil either the political independence or the stability of the financial structure of this country.

I make no apologies for having been opposed to every offer we have had from the United States, since at least I was a young man. In respect of this agreement I do not think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) need have apologized for not securing some improved trade arrangements with the United States between 1921 and 1930, when he was almost continuously in office. He knows and we know there was no possibility of securing any advantageous trade arrangement with the United States during those nine or ten years. In fact, if hon. members will look at the facts—and I like occasionally to refer to them—the United States emergency tariff of May 27, 1921, which continued until September 21, 1922, precluded us from obtaining any more advantageous entry for the exports of Canada into that country; and then under the Fordney-McCumber tariff, from September 21, 1922, to June 18, 1930, which was during the Liberal régime, no more advantageous entry for our exports into the United States could be obtained. If hon. members will look at the facts they will find that, as a result of the Fordney-McCumber tariff, during the Liberal régime—and this is not at all a criticism of the Liberal régime—in a time of very considerable prosperity in both the United States and Canada, the exports of our farm products to the United States decreased from $190,800,000 to $92,134,000, a net annual loss of nearly $100,000,000.

In April, 1929 I was invited by the Chambers of Commerce of Canada, as one of their representatives, being then a member of the board of trade of Montreal, to attend the annual meeting of the Chambers of Commerce of the United States at Washington in May of that year. On that occasion, after a very careful study of the situation, I was able to say to the immense audience gathered there, when the Hawley-Smoot tariff was under discussion in the congress of the United States, that:

Canada is now the largest foreign customer of the United States of America. During the calendar year 1928 we purchased from you for consumption in Canada $826,000,000 in value of commodities which you produce. In fact during the last calendar year 67 per cent of all our importations for consumption in Canada were purchased in the United States of America, and less than one-third from all other countries, including Great Britain and the British Dominions. But while we purchased from you commodities of the value of $826,000,000, you in return only purchased from Canada to the value of $493,000,000, so that, in order to meet annually our accruing liabilities for purchases from you, we were compelled to seek markets for our surplus products in other countries, reaching to the uttermost ends of the seven seas, in order to procure from our sales abroad bills of exchange to the amount of 333 millions of dollars in order to pay you for our annual excess purchases from your manufacturers and other producers of all classes.

That was the condition on the very day that the Hawley-Smoot tariff was under consideration in the house of representatives; in fact the gentleman who followed me on this occasion was Mr. Hawley himself, who advocated the United States tariff increase which was then under discussion. The Hawley-Smoot tariff went into force in the United States on June 18, 1930, the last year of the late Liberal regime. That tariff struck a further blow at our export trade to the United States, with the result that Canada's exports of farm products—I am referring to those because farm products seem to be the chief centre of interest in this discussion—decreased from $92,134,000 in 1930 to $49,294,000 in 1935, a net annual loss of 43 millions of dollars.

It is perfectly clear to my mind that the depression in Canada which began in 1929 and has continued to a certain extent to the present time has been to a large degree due to the excess purchases which we in this country have been making from the United States of America. In fact, even while the late Liberal government was in power, the whole financial structure of Canada was trembling for a time because competition in Canada for the purchase of American dollars wherewith to pay for our excess purchases from the United States had placed a very heavy premium upon United States funds and had decreased the value of Canadian funds. Therefore, when the Conservative government took office in August, 1930, it became absolutely necessary, if we were to continue to exist as a stable economic and financial community, that our imports from the United States should be restricted.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to suggest that if the United States has a cheaper market every citizen of Canada should be free to go to the United States and purchase what he will and bring it into this country. That seems to be the prevalent idea. But, Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to the fact that Canada has a large public and private indebtedness not only in the United States but in other countries, and our only means of paying the interest upon that foreign indebtedness and instalments of the principal as they become due is found in the excess of the products of this country which we sell to foreign countries over our imports from those countries.

From March, 1928, to March, 1929,, we exported to all countries 123 millions of dollars more than we imported from all countries, and that gave us the 123 millions of dollars wherewith to pay the interest on our debts abroad. When the western provinces got into difficulties and were unable to purchase the necessary American dollars to pay the interest on their debts to the United States, we as a federal government had to come to their assistance, and we did so at a time when there was a twenty and thirty and I think at one time forty per cent depreciation in our currency as compared with that of the United States.

In the last year of the Liberal regime we bought abroad $103,000,000 more than we sold and exported to other countries. This adverse change in the trade of this country to the amount of $226,000,000 during the two fiscal years of the Liberal regime ended March 31, 1930, indicated then to observant financial men the prospective collapse of Canada's whole economic system and necessitated immediate remedial measures, which were inaugurated by the late government at the session of September, 1930. Some hon. members may think I am wrong; they may hold different opinions; but unless we had met that position boldly and placed restrictions especially upon the importation of commodities from the United States, I certainly believe we should have had in this country a financial and economic collapse the like of which has not been known since 1870 on the American continent.

Hon. gentlemen may smile at our suggestion that we had almost insoluble problems to face, but I fancy, that now when they are meeting the ebb and flow of those same difficulties, they realize something of what the late government had to face, and—I venture to say it—faced manfully and courageously and to a large extent successfully during the last five years. The fiscal measures which were then adopted were in part successful, as is shown by the fact that the excess of Canada's exports over imports for the year ended March 31, 1934, was $152,000,000, and for the following year, ended March 31, 1935, $195,000,000.

If we had not been able to bring about that substantial excess of exports over imports we could not have maintained the solvency of our financial institutions in this country; I do not think there is any doubt about that. Therefore I say that I hope there is no possibility under this agreement of swinging back to the conditions of 1929, the year before the last of the former Liberal régime.

The table which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) placed upon Hansard during his address on February 25 shows that of United States imports for 1929, which he has taken as a standard or typical year, Canada was the principal supplier of $387,000,000 worth, of which goods amounting to $253,000,000 in value were then and are now on the American free list, while those that were dutiable amounted to $135,000,000. Of that $135,000,000 worth of dutiable United States imports, those on which the duties are unchanged amount to $47,000,000 in value; those on which duties are fixed by the agreement, to $9,000,000, and those on which duties are reduced, to only $79,000,000. Judging this agreement on that basis I believe it leaves the financial problems of Canada still untouched.

If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has studied the real facts of the case, as I think he has and as he is capable of doing, he will see that this agreement offers no solution of the vital financial problems which we have to consider in Canada at the present time.

The Prime Minister has stated, I understand, that increase of trade means increase of employment. Increase of trade may, and probably will, result in increase of employment. But where? An increase of employment in the United States or in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: Both.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend says, "Both." Possibly that is so. But if the increase of trade which we obtain from the United States is equal or nearly equal to the increase of trade which they obtain from Canada, the pressing trade and financial problems of Canada remain unsolved under this agreement.

I have studied, or attempted to study, the items of the Canadian tariff and the United States tariff. I know that when I sat down for nearly three months with fifteen men of the French government, three representing each of five departments, for at least four days a week, to discuss and negotiate a possible trade arrangement between Canada and France, we had first to take the tariff of Canada and in respect to each item, examine the trade returns in order to ascertain to what exent a reduction of the Canadian tariff would tend to increase the market in this country for those French products. Immediately we found that reductions which we proposed to give on certain French products under the most favoured nation treaties would have to be given to Denmark or Holland or Germany or some other state. Then the question arose whether the French producer would profit by a reduction of the Canadian tariff if the same reduction were made in favour of three or four competing European countries. So we had to study each item. Then we turned to the French tariff and studied it in the same way in relation to Canadian goods. Now in these days when members in opposition have no private secretary and not even a stenographer it is very difficult to undertake those complicated studies which I have undertaken before in connection with some other tariff arrangements. But this I do say, as I look into the problem and study it with our trade statistics—and I say this with all respect—I doubt very much whether the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, with such data as they had before them, when this agreement was negotiated and finally signed, were able to make a very accurate estimate of the prospective increases that are likely to result in trade between the two countries. Therefore they had to take it very largely on trust, and with a majority such as the Prime Minister commands in this house we also have to take it on trust. But let me say again that from this preliminary study which I have given I do not think very great advantages will accrue to Canada from the completion of this trade agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, he is of course aware that the permanent officials had been working out for the last two years the possible effects of the changes with respect to every individual item.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so; I have no doubt they have been. But if I may say so to the Prime Minister, I deprecate the idea that permanent officials are to become the deciding mediums in regard to either trade or fiscal arrangements. Perhaps I may be accused of egotism when I make this statement, but I would not accept any estimate from departmental officials with regard to any fiscal matter of political importance without at least spending some days or weeks in a reexamination of it from my own point of view, in order that I might pass my own judgment thereon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct, certainly. I agree entirely with my hon. friend on that point; each minister has to form his own judgments.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. I am not disparaging the participation of the right hon. gentleman in these negotiations, but I think it would be very difficult indeed for him and those associated with him in council to have formed any definite and clear appreciation of the effects of this agreement upon either American or Canadian trade.

Had the Minister of Finance been in his seat there were some points I should have liked to discuss with him. All I can say is that I am deeply interested in some of the financial problems now undoubtedly before him for consideration. He has my earnest and deep sympathy, and my sincere hope is that he may be able to arrive at some solution of these problems which has not yet been reached. I think it is the duty of every hon. member to give all possible assistance towards the solution of these problems.

I believe I am not unfair when I state that when the history of the last five years is written, as it never has been written, and the public are fully informed of the problems we had to face—and they have never been fully informed, as they could not have been without precipitating a financial catastrophe in Canada—my hon. friends opposite will appreciate the efforts which were made by the former Prime Minister and his associates and, on the whole, will feel that we did our best, although we may not have been fully successful in the end.

One word about tariffs. An hon. member who preceded me in the debate suggested that we did not derive very much benefit from our intra-imperial trade arrangements arising out of the economic conference held in Ottawa. I say that he is entirely mistaken. If we had not entered into those arrangements at Ottawa at that time there would be very little stability in Canada to-day. Our favourable trade balance with Great Britain, which balance during the last fiscal year of the Liberal régime in Canada was reduced to $94,000,000, had increased in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1934, to $123,000,000, and to $163,000,000 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1935. That increase in the sales of Canadian products to Great Britain assisted us very materially in overcoming the financial difficulties with which we were beset. It is further suggested by one hon. member who preceded me that we were in favour of high taxation and that the late government had increased taxation and the rates of duties on imports. We did. By various ways, which if you like you may describe as subterfuges, we did decrease the importations from the United States, and in doing so we believed that we were salving and saving the financial stability and the whole financial structure of Canada. In the forty minutes allotted to one it is impossible to give details, but I am fully convinced of the fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would that be equally true of imports from other countries as well?

Mr. CAHAN: We were anxious to take imports from any country that would trade with us, but the United States would not trade with us. They were exacting from us $350,000,000 or more per annum in cash, in order to pay for the excess of products which we were freely buying in that country. Under the financial and economic conditions which then existed we could not maintain Canada on an even keel, if we had allowed that excess of imports from the United States to enter freely into this country.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Would the hon. member state where they secured the cash to make the payments to the United States?

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member would simply study the financial returns of this country he would easily ascertain that information.

Mr. DEACHMAN: That is not answering the question.

Mr. CAHAN: Whenever the hon. member has time and I have a like opportunity I would be quite prepared to go into a discussion of that question with him or any other member.

In order to encourage trade with Great Britain we have continuously reduced tariffs on goods from that country. In the fiscal year 1935 the average ad valorem rate of duty collected on all imports from Great Britain was only 13·8 per cent, a percentage less than the average of any year since 1874. In 1935, 21·4 per cent of all Canada's imports came from Great Britain, a percentage higher than that of any year since 1911. In 1935, over forty-two per cent of all Canada's exports went to Great Britain, and that was a larger percentage than had been known in any year since 1919. In that year, which followed the close of the war, there was a heavy demand in Great Britain for the products of this country. I contend therefore that the annual sales of Canadian products in Great Britain and in our sister dominions, and the appropriate tariff measures taken by the late government enabled those engaged in Canadian industry to supply to our domestic market millions of dollars worth of Canadian products formerly imported from abroad, and enabled Canada more successfully than most other countries to survive the effects of the late world wide depression.

I do not believe it is necessary to enter into a full discussion of these measures. I have prepared a lengthy brief which I could place before the house, but I shall be content with stating that I see in this new trade agreement with the United States nothing which is likely to raise Canada out of the fiscal and trade difficulties in which we have been involved in years of depression. I do not look forward with any degree of confidence to the suggestion that this trade agreement will reestablish the prosperity and the industrial and fiscal independence of this dominion. I think perhaps we may be grateful that it does not injure this country more than it actually does. As to a great extent we have to take it on trust, I think we shall have to take it without very much confidence that it is going to reestablish either the industrial or the commercial welfare and prosperity of Canada.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the question before the house may be, in my humble opinion, considered from various aspects. May I be permitted, for a few moments, to express views entirely personal, but nevertheless sincere, because this being my maiden speech in the house, I would not wish to be taxed with unsound economic and parliamentary views. However, leaving to others the task of discussing this measure from an economic viewpoint, on the basis of intricate statistics, so allowing others better informed than myself to draw conclusions as they wish, I shall base my argument on grounds of a more philosophical nature, but of actual application, I think, to that class of young parliamentarians who, within the last few years, have had the courage to face public opinion and to champion Liberalism which has attained such a remarkable place in Canada at the last October election.

Therefore, I shall set forth, as premises, that it is the duty of the government to become more than ever the champion of peace ideals. More than ever the ideal of peace is losing ground throughout the world, and more than ever, I deem that governments, whether they be founded on democracy or even dictatorship, are in duty bound to have as their objective measures inspired by that peace policy. In my opinion, the policy of the right honourable Mr. King's government is all imbued and permeated with peace ideals, because the measure which we shall be called upon to vote, is the loftiest expression, to my mind, of a tempered free trade, which embodies a manifestation of peace.

What, sir, do we find in the world of to-day Numerous events are occurring which are greatly disquieting to youth. We find a militarized Germany. France alarmed and surrounding herself with guns, Italy no longer able to provide for her sons the land required for their subsistence, Russia who has built up—may I say—an utopian parliamentary system while maintaining an army which is a cause of great worry to her neighbours; and lastly, we see old England beginning to apprehend that her fleet may not be in a position to defend her shores and building aeroplanes in large numbers; only recently, peace was disturbed in Japan. Why, I ask, de we see peace in retrogression throughout the world? If I may be permitted, I shall quote a distinguished French economist, Henri Hauser, who in his work entitled La Paix économique, says:

> One of the most disturbing psychological phenomena of the present time has been the retrogression of peace ideals, during the last three or four years.

Why this retrogression? Unexperienced as I am, my impression is that this retrogression from the ideal of peace is due to the fact that the treaties concluded in the course of the last two decades have not responded to the legitimate aspirations, to use the words of an economist of the "glorious victims of 1917"; it is also due to the fact that the treaties of peace were based on economic grounds alone; and lastly, that the greed of the belligerents remains unsatisfied.

With your leave, sir, I shall quote the opinion of an English economist as to the chief causes of these universal disturbances. In his work, A view of Europe, published in 1932, Paul Van Zeeland says:

> The general readjustment of after the war, which would have been troublesome under any circumstances, was made still more complicated by the political difficulties, the violent hatreds, the contradictions of all sorts that followed from the remaking of the map of Europe. The accentuation of economic nationalism has retarded, if not indeed prevented, this readjustment in many cases; and one may say that the greater part of the task still remains to be accomplished.

What is to be done? To those concerned with this country's economic conditions, the answer is that they must resist economic nationalism with the weapons at our disposal, that is, by setting against it the full force of free trade which we are requested by our leader to sanction for the first time in the history of the dominion. Henri Hauser quotes the views of Sir Arthur Salter who once wrote:

That economical conflicts could create "not only strongly opposed interests between the various masses of people throughout the world, but an increasing feeling of offence and injustice," in such a way as "to complete, accentuate and inflame political resentment." He concluded with these words which may appear singularly ominous when applied to the days we are living in: "In view of the acuteness of the economic crisis affecting such and such an industry, if one government after another takes steps which the others consider injurious and unfair, and there is no brake in the form of legislation or recognized custom making it possible to distinguish between what is permitted and what is not, it is inevitable that international relations shall become more embittered, and sooner or later, the preventive machinery intended to safeguard the world against future wars will explode under the pressure." Sooner or later: with our eyes set on the gauge, we wonder how much longer the safety valves will function efficiently.

As to the brakes, sir, my personal opinion is that they no longer exist.

We are asked to support a resolution ratifying a convention between the United States and Canada. It is the best, the most commendable endeavour made so far by any Canadian government to recognize the principle of free trade.

Our friends who sit on the center benches opposite are shocked because we dare rob them of part of their small program, but, in my opinion, if the Conservatives have never succeeded in concluding a reciprocity treaty with the United States, it is because the old tory views with which they have at all times been imbued is incompatable with the broad-mindedness of free traders.

In the few moments remaining at my disposal—for I do not wish to speak too long—I shall confine myself to the analysis of the reciprocity treaty with reference to the needs of my constituency. I represent a county of woodsmen and farmers, composing the gallant army of the toilers of the land and of the forest. We have energetically requested to be allowed to sell our lumber and our hay; but always our claims went unheeded. Even in 1934, when I took upon myself to mediate between certain hay producers and certain United States importers, what happened? The first intimation we had was that an embargo had been placed on hay, and, as a result of this prohibition imposed by the late Conservative government, the hay remained in the farmer's barns.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Shame, shame!

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Hay then sold at $11 and $12 at the barn, and to-day we cannot get $4 a ton for it. That is one of the results of the super protection with which our opponents have always surrounded themselves and as Lucien Romier says in his works: "Prosperity is an utter impossibility if the nations, after warring with guns, continue to war with tariffs."

The reciprocity agreement was hailed with joy in the constituency of Labelle, especially as regards sections 401, 402, 412, 1402, 1413, 1502, 1716, and 601, which provide for reductions of fifty per cent on the duties levied on lumber products and by-products.

The opposition very magnanimously says: You should have obtained something in return; You should have secured a reduction of at least 100 per cent! The answer is quite simple; a child could give it: it is that, if we are not satisfied with the reciprocity agreement, six months' notice enables us to denounce it. Should the agreement not prove satisfactory to Canada, we will give that notice. There is no need for us to worry over futile considerations. The treaty is a loyal endeavour on the part of the liberal party to establish better commercial relations with our neighbours, and I wonder that those who pose as champions of peace should not at least give us their support by approving the agreement.

I may be permitted to quote a few figures that show that our lumber trade with Great Britain has increased since 1932. Why? Because of the preferential duties. Why therefore should not what is good in the case of Great Britain not also be good in the case of the United States?

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): If our lumber trade with Great Britain amounted in 1932 to 6 millions and a half, and in 1935—I do not say that it is due to the Imperial agreements; it may be, I cannot tell, but it is after all a matter of tariffs—increased to $20,679,000, why not look forward at least to a change for the better in our lumber trade with the United States as a result of the reciprocity agreement? What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander! The same simple reasoning, it seems to me, applies in political as in other matters.

I have before me a few figures which show, I am sure, that since January, 1936, when the agreement became effective, our hay exports to the United States have increased. We exported to the United States, in July, 1935, 490 tons of hay; in August, 182 tons; in September, 93 tons; in October, 240 tons; in November, 186 tons, and in December, 47 tons.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): From Labelle county?

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): From the whole of Canada. These are the figures supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

And in January, 1936, the first month in which the agreement was effective, our exports increased to 379 tons. A meagre result, you may say. But, at any rate, there has been no decrease, which is gratifying.

Just a word in connection with lumber. The county of Labelle hopes that the agreement will prove beneficial to the lumber industry, because if there is a class of workers that needs protection, it is the woodsmen. The house is perhaps not aware of the hardships obtaining in the lumber camps, of the exaction of certain contractors who hold their men in a tight grip. There have been years when woodsmen drew 35 cents a day for ten hours of arduous work; to-day, thanks to the intervention of the provincial government, they get $1 a day, which is still insufficient. I shall not venture to promise them, as some have done, wages of $52 $55 and $60 per month, but I trust that this agreement will result in increasing our lumber exports. According as trade increases, prices will go up, and we shall see once more the golden years of 1927, 1928 and 1929, when our woodsmen received fair wages and were able to provide for their families as free men, and not as slaves.

Mr. Speaker, I now bring my remarks to a close. If I wandered from my subject, it was in order better to emphasize the urgency of taking steps to bring about more friendly relations between the various countries. Statistics show that in one year alone seventy-eight treaties were concluded between various European countries and not one of them has revealed the slightest tendency towards free trade. These so-called free trade agreements have created between nations a spirit of animosity, followed, sooner or later, by reprisals that are sometimes attended by bloodshed. History tells us that at the bottom of every war lies some economic question. This is nothing new. Was not the Italo-Ethiopian conflict brought about by a question of trade? Of that I am positive.

Consequently, if we sanction this reciprocity agreement, as I hope we will, the Liberal government of Canada will stand before the country as a peacemaker; the government of the right honourable Mr. King will be entitled to the gratitude of the younger generation which to-morrow, whether it wish it or not, must shoulder the responsibility of the legislation of to-day, the generation which to-morrow will be called upon to assume the administration of the country's affairs. You could hardly believe, Mr. Speaker, how we, the young Liberals, with the full strength of our enthusiam, perhaps, but also with the deepest sincerity, feel confident that these measures of broadmindedness, of free trade and of neighbourliness, will give to our youth renewed hope....

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): There is need of it.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Indeed, we must have hope. Perhaps in certain respects we have been somewhat neglected, but when we see a government introducing measures of this nature, we have no hesitation in supporting it with the full strength of our convictions, and to-day I feel that I speak for all the young Liberals when I say to the government of the right honourable Mackenzie King that we place great hopes in its free-trade policy. That is why, at the last election, we gave it our fullest support and that is why to-day the younger members of the Liberal party, united in their enthusiasm, extend their hand to their elders, in the desire to work with them in the best interests of the country and to launch our dear Canada on the road to prosperity and sound progress.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the question of reciprocity with the United States has existed ever since Canada has been a country. We on this side of the house are called Conservatives and I think we should tell the house what it is we desire to conserve. Our party believes in the old doctrine of protecting our own markets, for our own products and our own work for our own workmen. That is what this party stands for to conserve, and has preached in and out of season. Burke once said that government was a practical thing; that it was not something to please the fancy or imagination of a visionary and an ordinary politician. Bolder and abler politicians than those who negotiated this trade agreement tried to effect an arrangement with the industrial and agricultural nation to the south of us in the past seventy years, but they got nowhere. I have no doubt the proper place to discuss these two white papers of agreements will be in committee. Both these documents embrace a large number of items upon which reductions in duties are being made. The more I study these white papers; the more I study this whole question, the more I realize that history has a habit of repeating itself. To me the doctrine embraced in these white papers and this agreement is the doctrine that it is more blessed to give than to receive. This agreement was negotiated in a rush during a visit by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the south, partly for business and partly for pleasure. It was consummated shortly before Christmas and Santa Claus could not have handed out presents more abundantly than did the Prime Minister to the people of the United States.

You and I, Mr. Speaker, come from industrial provinces, the central provinces of Canada, which have been built up by the doctrine of protection. Canada started as an agricultural country, but it was not long before it learned that no country can exist on agriculture alone and it therefore adopted the principle of protection to build up our own industries as a result of which nearly fifty per cent of the Canadian people have been engaged in industry. These two central provinces together pay nearly eighty per cent of the cash taxes collected in Canada, and they are affected economically more than any other provinces by the trade agreement which the Prime Minister has brought into the house for ratification. The agreement seems to be based upon the principle "that to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

The United States became rich by feeding its own people; it became a great nation because Americans were fed from the great wheat fields in the United States and not with wheat imported from Canada. This agreement seems to have overlooked entirely the maxim of Canada for the Canadians. At any rate our own market for our own Canadian products will be destroyed and our work for our own workmen will be done away with. I oppose this agreement entirely because I fear it will have an injurious effect in regard to unemployment. It will destroy many a basic industry in Canada.

I represent a riding in which there are 300 industries, large and small. Some of them would have gone bankrupt; they would not have been able to keep their doors open but for the British trade agreement consummated in 1932. I have seen on Eastern avenue, Toronto, carloads of an excellent product from a Canadian industry being shipped to every country in the empire, and what was responsible for that? It was the result of the statesmanlike policy which the former Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) put on the statute books in 1932. We live in a country in which taxation is becoming increasingly alarming. Why should we not retain our home market for our own products? Our industries provide work for a large part of our population, and those industries depend to a very considerable extent upon the home market. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) has estimated that eighty per cent of our food produce finds a market in Canada, and that market will now be destroyed. Are we to surrender such a valuable home market to competitors in the United States? That is the question before the house. Are we to serve the interests of Americans by giving them a part of our home market, badly needed by our own producers, so that Canadian producers will be compelled to share their own home market with outsiders? What will be the result of this agreement? The Americans will retain their own market for themselves and will come to Canada, where they pay no taxes, and share the Canadian home market for the products of agriculture and industry.

I oppose the agreement for another reason; I oppose it on the ground that we should have constitutional reform to provide that in the making of treaties no one man shall ignore the views of Canadians at large. We have heard a good deal about Hitler and Mussolini; the Prime Minister, speaking in Toronto, has talked a great deal about these dictators; and yet we find the right hon. gentleman, after a general election, going to Washington, and in one day making an agreement like this over the heads of the House of Commons and the Senate about to assemble. The proposed agreement is not the outcome of any doctrine which is Liberal; it is the net result of the doctrine that your leader is your policy. We saw what became of that doctrine in Ontario. I say that we should have in Canada parliamentary reform that would make it impossible for any reciprocity undertaking such as this, formal or informal, to be entered into by a prime minister with the United States without a full and frank discussion in parliament and with every opportunity for members on all sides to express their views fully. Such discussions are of course useless after the agreement is consummated, for grave issues of domestic and international policy are likely then to be involved. This question of constitutional and parliamentary reform has been raised in the old land, where it led to a very important debate about the right of one man to give India home rule over the heads of parliament. It seems to me that something should be done in that regard in Canada.

I contend that this agreement gives away Canada's birthright; it does away with her own market for her own products, and the creation of work at home for her own workmen. Time will reveal the advantages and disadvantages of the agreement, but certainly what we have before us reminds me of the old Toronto Street Railway agreement of 1892. I have read two or three of these white papers and they are filled with jokers at the expense of the people. The leader of our party decided that he would not accept an agreement of this sort; he let Washington know that it was more important that Canadian interests should be preserved than that, for the sake of party advantages, an agreement of this kind should be entered into with its inevitable consequences to the Canadian people. In the period from 1921 to 1930 the United States maintained high tariffs against Canada, and what did the Liberal government of that day do? That government simply turned the other cheek and told the United States to strike it. The result of that government's policy, or rather want of policy, in that decade was that nearly one million Canadians, including men who had fought for their country, crossed to the United States at the rate of a hundred thousand a year.

Canada has been the happy hunting ground for many years of American politicians and financiers. Take new Ontario, west of the Ottawa river and as far as Nipigon. Let me say this to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette): Canadians do not own anything up there; water powers, mines, and minerals—asbestos, copper, silver, gold—all these things are under the control of American capitalists and politicians.

In federal affairs we have many other examples of that particular doctrine to which I have referred. I remember when this reciprocity question came up in 1911, at the time when Sir Wilfrid Laurier hoped that, as the nineteenth century had belonged to the United States, the twentieth century would belong to Canada. For a long time the United States had desired a market in Canada for manutured goods, and the Conservative party were willing to meet them in a spirit of fair play, by giving concessions on raw materials. There was an increased demand for Canadian goods; owing to the industrial and agricultural development of this country there was a great growth in Canada of local industry. Combined with these signs of progress, the potential wealth of the great western provinces also caused great optimism. The result was a pilgrimage to Washington. But what the people of this country wanted was a tariff made at Ottawa, not at Washington. No matter what government has been on the treasury benches, no matter what party has been in power, there has been a continuous and presistent attempt to cultivate better trade relations between this country and the United States of America and a reciprocity that should be equally beneficial to both countries. The negotiations of 1866, of 1869, of 1871, of 1888, all bear this out. The Hon. Clifford Sifton in 1911 said:

> You cannot have, as the pact proposes, a free trade dumping ground for farmers' produce and a closed protected market for manufactured goods. The two things will not stand together. You can reject the pact and remain commercially independent of the United States, or you may accept the pact and have commercial union with the United States.

Sir William Van Horne said, in September, 1911:

> Reciprocity is a silly and dangerous thing. It is not a question of men or of party.

The people were not willing to give up all our home markets for this cheap boon of reciprocity. In 1911 the provincial legislature of Saskatchewan came out strongly in support of the pact. The first test it received came when, in that year, two Liberals, Hon. Clifford Sifton and Mr. Lloyd Harris, abandoned the Liberal party, the latter on account of the reduction of the duty on agricultural implements from five per cent to two and one half per cent. Sir Wilfrid Laurier decided that it was useless to get the pact through parliament without the verdict of the people. After eleven days of obstruction he took the country by surprise, dissolved parliament and appealed to the country on that particular pact, and the government of the day was defeated, as I believe this government would be defeated if this question was submitted to the people to-day. The present government would not have a chance, because our Canadian working men and farmers are no fools when it comes to losing their homes and their jobs, nor are our farmers fools when they are going to lose their markets; they will assert themselves.

As I said, Sir Wilfrid Laurier made a trip out west in 1911 after a session of this honourable house; he met the farmers out there and learned first-hand what the farmers and the grain growers thought of the protectionist policy which the Liberals had adopted from the Conservatives and of the repudiation by the Liberals of their platform when they were in opposition. There was an election, and in view of this they went down to Washington and Mr. Paterson and Mr. Fielding consummated this pact which was signed on January 21, 1911, between Canada and the United States. The agreement was in the form of a note addressed by the Canadian government to the United States in which fifteen points of agreement were recited and three schedules enclosed. This was acknowledged in a note from the United States, and an agreement followed along these lines.

I ask, Mr. Speaker: What must be the future of Canada within the British empire if this agreement goes through? I do not wish to wave any flag. Far from it; I am thinking of the homes and jobs of my constituents, and not of the flag, although the flag is an important part of our connection with the British empire. The three important empire problems for this parliament to solve are trade, defence, and migration, besides the questions of unemployment and of distributivism. What is the future of Canada in the British empire under this agreement? I for one fear for our future; I do not mean in a constitutional way. I fear for it in an economic way. Definitions do not always include facts. The other day I was looking at a map of the world issued by the Department of the Interior, a sort of illustrated geographical book.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of a principle of confederation of the old Cornish battle cry of all for each and each for all. I believe that a right solution of our economic problems is the proper application of the doctrine of protection for each and every one of the provinces of Canada. We saw that demonstrated in connection with the relief given to the coal, steel and iron industry in the maritime provinces some years ago. My hon. friends opposite opposed the action of the Conservative party in providing a subsidy for coal, iron and steel, which subsidy was afterwards extended to grain on the prairies by the stabilization fund.

Before recess I was referring to the British empire agreements and our relation with the other dominions regarding imperial preference. I was looking at a map of the world issued by the Department of the Interior, all over which map were red patches showing the different parts of the British empire, at the bottom being the caption "An empire on which the sun never sets." I closed the atlas feeling that the British empire as Victorians knew it and as Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier knew it is a thing of the past. The great group of free nations that we spoke of as the British empire is now known by the high-sounding name of the British Commonwealth of Nations. We now look to Great Britain for the final court of appeal and to the Britsh navy to protect our trade on the seas, but by this agreement we make it clear that we owe her no trade allegiance. Our support in war is a matter for our own decision, and by this agreement it is ourselves first and the British empire a very poor second.

If we vote for trade agreements we are voting for complete commercial union with the United States. I do not say political union, but it will be an economic union, and the United States will never grant Canada dominion status. By this agreement we shall be absorbed into an economic federation which eventually will result in the loss of our economic independence. This agreement comes after the motherland by the 1932 agreements has given us imperial preference in return for real reciprocity. This agreement will loosen Canada's desire to trade with the motherland and will not help empire trade. We shall soon be like South Africa and the Irish Free State which have not only claimed the right to secede but shown by their actions that for all practical purposes they have chosen complete independence. By the agreements of 1932 we decided for closer economic ties with the motherland, but by this agreement we take the position of a son who considers that the parent should give all and expect nothing in return. The general policy in this agreement is; the United States first and trade with England a very poor second.

I am not one of those Conservatives who apologize for my party's share in the defeat of reciprocity in 1911. I believe reciprocity on the basis then proposed would have made a Lazarus out of a country that Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed to have made a nation. That reciprocity proposal would have exhibited the Canada of Queenston Heights, St. Julien, Vimy Ridge, Passchendaele, Amiens and many other fields of glory, as a beggar for the poor favour of reciprocity and free trade. At that time our opponents contended that the grain growing industry flowed north and south, not east and west and overseas to the markets of the world. But the fact is that grain growing in this country never was a continental industry but is the greatest imperial industry we have ever had. The Liberal party was wrong in 1911 in this respect about grain; they were proven to be wrong. The poor grain grower was fleeced out of a fair share of the proceeds of his crop. By whom? As I said in this house on May 5, 1924, it was by the middlemen and the grain exchanges. The former member for Marquette, the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar) was one of the heads of the grain dealers, and grain exchanges that combined with the elevators and transportation and other combines who handle the wheat in transit, and I contended at the time in this house that the grain grower was fleeced out of millions by middlemen and not given a fair price or a fair share of the profits of his labour. I gave the Union government some credit for having tried to stop this and for trying to help the farmer, but these middlemen in the Maharg case continued and used the courts and injunctions to prevent free trade in grain inquiries when they were clamouring for free trade and reciprocity in grain. Look at what has happened in Buffalo with hard wheat as a result of this policy. The publicity commissioner there says in his statement for 1935 that they have thirty-seven elevators there. They have taken our hard wheat and bootlegged it, mixing it in the elevators and milling it into flour. I saw it myself, and the Turgeon report proved that it happened. They take the best wheat in the world and mix it and mill it at Buffalo and Baltimore and along the American seaboard. The western wheat growers have fulfilled in their experience with these middlemen and profiteers the words of Scripture, "A man's foes shall be they of his household."

I am reading so far from an address I made in this house on May 5, 1924, when I dealt at length with those responsible for fooling the farmers. The worst enemy of the western wheat growers is the policy of the Progressive party, its leaders and its representatives in this house. Another opponent of the western wheat grower is the present policy of the Liberal party, its leaders and representatives in the house. I submitted at the time that wheat growing in western Canada was the most truly national and most widely imperial of all Canada's industries. I said that the wheat growers of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan had more to fear from the big interests west of the great lakes than from the big interests east of the great lakes. I will not give my approval to having Canada's tariffs made at Washington instead of at Ottawa. Reciprocity on 1911 lines would have lasted only until some agricultural bloc in the United States imagined that it was putting a dollar into the pockets of the Canadian farmers. Then the United States and a farmers' bloc would have ended reciprocity as suddenly as they began the 42 cents a bushel tariff on Canadian wheat. The British and overseas market is and always should be a market of customers for Canada; the United States market is and always will be a market of competition with Canada. History always repeats itself in our agreements with the United States. We want to do business with them but on a fair basis. They have the cream of the business, selling us $150,000,000 a year more than they buy from us. We buy from them about $26.50 per head, and they buy from us about $2 per head.

In my opinion protection for the farmer is what this country needs. A truly national policy would not allow the Canadian farmer to be stung for an unfairly high price for agricultural implements, automobiles or any other production of Canadian industry. A truly national policy would provide an excise duty that would put into the public treasury every cent charged for agricultural implements or automobiles or any other product manufactured under protection a price that represented fair wages to the workingman and fair profit to the manufacturer. The price should be such as represents fair wages to the workman and a fair profit to the manufacturer. I know this proposal will be met with the shout of "paternalism." But I would sooner have the paternalism of a protectionist government than the paternalism of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, a paternalism of free trade that robs those who grow the best wheat in the world of $25,000,000 per annum and puts that $25,000,000 into the pockets of the Americans who handle that wheat, as I showed on May 5, 1924, in this house. We will have to have more paternalism in the management of this country's reserves and the promotion of this country's welfare.

I am just as much opposed to the Liberal party's policy of economic Liberalism of the Manchester school as I am to the teachings of Moscow. I plead for a departure from this free trade law of supply and demand, and for acceptance of the principles of the old national policy in our dealings with all the provinces of Canada. I plead for the application of the principles of the old national policy to all industries in this country from the manufacturing of agricultural implements to the growing of wheat. Leave the wheat growing industry of the west to the workings of the law of supply and demand, and that law would not fill the west with wheat growers. If that law did fill the west with wheat growers, wheat would not be worth fifty cents a bushel. The free trade law of supply and demand now costs the wheat grower of the west $25,000,000 per annum. This simply substantiates what I said before, namely, that there should be a rejection of the free trade 1911 reciprocity conditions and a return to the old national policy. When we are dealing with this matter, let us not forget the lessons history has taught us.

May I now discuss the duty on cattle. Last night the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) said that there were two markets for our cattle, namely those in England and the United States. He stated further, that the United States offered the natural market. I say that it is not the natural market; it is one that is here to-day and gone to-morrow. I say that it is one of the most undependable markets for cattle that could be imagined, and it is as fickle in connection with purchases of Canadian cattle as the Liberal party has been fickle in its support of protection. The only real and stable market is that of Great Britain; as it is our best market for grain, so it is our best market for cattle. The cattle kings of Chicago and New York are rejoicing at this agreement. Hon. members have only to read the reports of investigations now going on before a United States senate committee to learn what is taking place in connection with packing concerns and cattle rings in Chicago and other parts of that country. If they read those reports they will soon conclude that the agreement cannot last long, so far as any improvement in the cattle market is concerned. In my opinion it would last just long enough for the cattle dealers in Chicago to find out that the poor farmer in Canada might make a dollar, at which time it would end abruptly.

Owing to the disposition of our exportable surplus as provided in the agreement, there will undoubtedly be a serious unemployment condition on our national railways and other transportation systems. Both rail and water services will suffer greatly. Not long ago I was in Cleveland and while there had the privilege of talking to a celebrated railway official. A relative of his was responsible for the building of three or four billion dollars worth of railways in the United States, including the Nickle Plate and the Big Four. Some of those railway officials said that they hoped, as a result of the agreement, to get a large share of the business running north and south. What will happen to the railways of Canada? What will happen to the money spent on the development of our canals? We have nearly four billion dollars worth of railways, and I say that instead of a deficit of $50,000,000 we shall have deficits of $75,000,000 or $100,000,000. They will lose the revenue from the long hauls from the head of the lakes to Saint John and other ports. I suggest that that is one angle which should be given careful consideration.

I am sorry the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) is not in his seat. I was greatly surprised, in view of the investigations made by him as chairman of the price spreads commission, to hear him lend his support to the treaty. He is going to leave the working men of Canada at the mercy of American trusts, combines in restraint of trade, sweat shops, and child labour. Investigations have shown that nearly a million children under fifteen years of age are engaged in industries of the United States; they have sweat shops up to the hilt over there. The hon. member is going to allow these people to ship their goods into Canada, thereby sharing our home market with the products of Canadian artisans. I am surprised to find an hon. member who has given such long and notable service to the cause of protection making a right-about face in that manner. I do not doubt his sincerity, but I suggest he is greatly mistaken in his outlook on this agreement. He has been a consistent supporter of protection, but in this instance I am afraid he has made a bad mistake.

I do not know why no mention has been made of the St. Lawrence waterway in these agreements or negotiations, because I believe sooner or later this reciprocity matter will come before the United States law courts. In the last few minutes at my disposal may I say that I believe this agreement will receive the same treatment as did the new deal legislation in the United States. In that instance a decision was handed down by the United States Supreme Court, which by a majority of one declared ultra vires their new deal legislation. I believe this agreement too, will, for the reasons given in that judgment, be declared ultra vires of the president and people of the United States.

In my view this agreement should be placed before the Supreme Court of Canada also, as was the legislation brought down by my right hon. leader on the new deal legislation of last year. May I say that his personal probity, his political common sense and his political wisdom are known to every citizen of Canada; although one might not always agree with him one must respect his judgment as a great Canadian and he will occupy a place in history. I believe if this agreement goes before the Supreme Court of Canada it will receive the same treatment as did the new deal in the United States. Why should all the measures passed by the last parliament have been sent to the supreme court, and this agreement not be subjected to their inquiry as a matter of law? Also—

This policy of reciprocity and free trade kills industry. It destroys business and has a bad effect on prices. United States imports are to a great extent a menace to Canada. The whole prosperity of the United States has been built up by high tariffs; these are historical facts. Agriculture cannot be the basis for the whole life of a nation. Canada, like the United States, was at first an agricultural country, but at an early stage we found that protection must shelter the birth of big industries. Why can we not learn from history? Why build up the industries of other countries, instead of developing our own factories? As a nation, Canada should buy at home. Protection must shelter the birth of every big industry, and must nurture it in its struggling years. The truths uttered by Horace Greeley in the United States would apply as well here in Canada in 1936. It was stated by him that protection gives bread to the workers, in exchange for work, whereas free trade is an obstacle to a nation's growth.

I regret to see an agreement brought down in the manner in which the present one was introduced. If it had been made an issue during the election campaign I doubt very much if the present government would be sitting on the treasury benches to-day. Then, with respect to the quotas may I ask this: Is it wise to accept quotas from the United States? They have stipulated quotas on cattle and lumber, but we do not find any quotas being applied by the people of this country. Why was there not a fifty-fifty arrangement, if this is to be a proper reciprocity agreement, and one which represents fair dealing to both parties? Why do we not have the same arrangement for fish, lumber, and other commodities? I fear that the exportable surplus of United States farmers in years of heavy crops will be turned into Canada, at very low prices. They pay only a small amount of duty, as compared with the amount paid by us. The Canadian farmer pays a higher duty for the entry of flour, eggs, potatoes, cream, and other commodities.

In my opinion the agreement is nothing but one full of jokers, as the lawyers call them. For the last forty years we have purchased on an average of $150,000,000 worth more goods from the United States than they have purchased from us. In forty years that would amount to about six billions of dollars. We have bought these large amounts of goods from the United States, after giving them our raw materials. For instance, they take $6,000,000 worth of asbestos in the crude and semi-crude state from the central and northern provinces, and after importing it they develop it into $69,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, and ship part of it back to us, for us to buy, giving employment to Americans.

The policy of the Liberal-Conservative party has been consistent; it has been the same in all the provinces. I shall have another opportunity to speak on the agreement, and shall not speak at greater length just now. In closing, may I state that I believe we have, as decent neighbours been doing our duty to the American people. We have given them markets; each year we bought $150,000,000 more from them than they bought from us. We are content to deal fairly with them for three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, but the central provinces of Canada want fair play. We want fair play for agriculture, and for the industries in Ontario and Quebec.

We can remember the days in which the Drury government held office in Ontario. That was a government that preached blue ruin, and the result was that for ten years no industry was established in Ontario, because no industrialists would put money into it. Do we want to have that condition throughout Canada, under this agreement? I believe the Canadian people should have an opportunity to vote on the agreement, and I am stating that if they had that opportunity it would be voted down.

Mr. D. F. McCUAIG (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, following the last election a new wave of optimism was quite apparent, due to a great extent to the confidence of Canadians in the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). That confidence was increased when shortly after the election the people learned about the able body of men he had gathered around him as a cabinet. Very shortly after, confidence was still further increased when within one month after taking office the Prime Minister announced to the Canadian people that he had been able to negotiate a trade agreement with the government of the United States. I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister upon these achievements, and may I also add my congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Deputy Speaker, not only upon your election to your respective offices, but upon the very efficient way in which you have presided over the proceedings of this house.

I am particularly interested in the Canada-United States trade agreement because I represent a riding that is situated in a splendid agricultural district of this province of Ontario. Anything I may say this evening I feel will be only a reflection of the feelings and sentiments of the people of Simcoe North whom I have the honour to represent.

During the last few weeks we have heard a great deal about the condition and the problems of the farmers of western Canada, and we have heard from members from the west, some of whom seem to be under the impression that members representing the central and eastern provinces do not sympathize with their problems. But I feel that the problems of the farmers of western Canada, although perhaps more intensified than those of the farmers of our province, are, after all, of the same kind, and that whatever will solve the problems of the farmers of the west will also solve the problems of the farmers of the east. I believe it is the duty of members of the house to study the problems of all our people in all the provinces, because prosperity cannot come to this country unless we have prosperity in all the provinces of the dominion. I am glad that we have this agreement before us because, by affording us wider markets, I am sure that it will do much to bring about prosperity in Canada.

We were told the other day that over one-half of our population is situated in the cities and the larger towns. This is not as it should be in an agricultural country like ours. The flow of population from the farms to the larger centres is not in the interests of this country. Therefore I believe we should pay more attention to the basic industry of Canada and do what we can to help our farmers once more become prosperous.

We heard the other day from the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that 82⅘ per cent in value of the agricultural products of this country was consumed at home and only 17⅕ per cent found a market abroad. But that is not an argument against this trade agreement so much as it is an argument for it, since the larger the proportion of our products that we can sell abroad and the wider the market we can secure, the greater the advantage to our Canadian farmers, not only by reason of the increased percentage of agricultural products sold abroad, but because the increased price they will receive for their products sold abroad will tend to increase the price of their products sold at home.

Although I am not a farmer I am intensely interested in their problems. I feel I know what their problems are. The sooner we members of parliament give consideration to those problems the sooner, I believe, shall we have prosperity throughout the whole of Canada. I hope the day may soon come when our farmers and agriculturists will be able to enjoy many of the comforts and conveniences which the people in the larger centres enjoy. In some places these conveniences and comforts have been brought close to the homes of our farmers, but they are not able to take advantage of them because the price which they receive for the products of the farm does not enable them to afford conveniences, and of course all such comforts and conveniences would add to their overhead expenses.

[Mr. McCuaig.]

We also heard the other day something about the price of farm implements in this country. Undoubtedly farm implements are too expensive in comparison with the price which the farmers receive for their products. The trouble to-day is largely that the value of the products of the farm has not in the past number of years increased proportionately to the increase in the price of the implements of production.

We heard members of the opposition during the last week claiming that this agreement was bad, and yet in the very next breath they said that it did not go far enough. There are in this agreement, I admit, some items on which I think the tariff should be reduced still more, but at the same time should we not be thankful for what we have received? It is at all events a start in the right direction. We may be sure if the previous government had been returned to power we would not have the agreement and the lower tariffs we are going to enjoy from now on.

When I listened to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and his followers I could not help wondering what would have happened, particularly in the riding I have the honour to represent, if they had made, prior to October 14 last, similar statements to those we have heard them make during the last few days. All through the agricultural district of North Simcoe during the last election I was met with the argument everywhere, that although the Liberals would reduce duties and increase trade if they were returned to power, the Conservative party were going to do the same thing. The only way the Conservatives could attempt to hold the farmers of that district together was by insisting that they would negotiate a trade agreement with the United States and go just as far as the Liberals would.

The farmers of my riding are particularly interested in the reduction of the tariff from three cents to two cents a pound on cattle weighing seven hundred pounds or more. I would like to see that duty made still lower, but a reduction of only one cent a pound in the duty on cattle means a great deal of additional revenue to the farmers of this country. We have heard Conservative members complaining that a quota of 155,799 head of cattle per annum has been established, and they claim that we should be able to ship more cattle to the United States, but I would point out that if we ship only to the limit of that quota, the reduction of one cent a pound in the duty means one and a half million dollars to our Canadian farmers.

That is only a small part of the story, because by reason of the increased price we shall receive for our products sold abroad the greater will prices be for the products we sell at home. We can ship the full quota to the United States, but in addition the total production of cattle in Canada is approximately 2,000,000 head per year. This would mean approximately $15,000,000 per annum to the farmers of this country. This increase in the price received for cattle, together with the increase in the prices received by our farmers for other products, would bring back to them the prosperity which was lost due to the high tariffs and the blasting policies of the last five years.
