The citizens of the United States are entitled to take back with them when they return to that country after a visit to Canada goods to the value of $100 when intended for their own use. I am particularly interested in this matter because I represent a riding which is really the gateway to the playgrounds of this province. This part of Ontario is often described as the place of lakes and waters. It also is on the way to the birthplace of the quintuplets which is claimed by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). Citizens of the United States visiting this part of the country buy an enormous amount of goods from merchants in the different cities and towns through which they pass. This fact is proven by the special display of woollen goods such as blankets, Hudson Bay blankets, motor rugs and other articles in the windows of these merchants. These articles are not displayed during July and August to attract Canadian business; they are there to be sold to United States tourists.

We could not expect that that privilege would continue to be extended unless we were prepared to give the same privilege to Canadian citizens returning from a visit to the United States. I am glad to note that this agreement contains this provision. Canadians who go to the United States for a holiday may purchase goods to be brought back to Canada. We are helping the merchants who sell and the manufacturers who make the articles purchased by these tourists and, on the other hand, we are helping our own citizens and our own consumers by allowing them to bring back these purchases from the United States.

I support this resolution because I believe in the enlargement of trade, and especially in the enlargement of trade in primary products. I believe this will bring prosperity, happiness and comfort to the people of Canada.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, the county of Peel which I have the distinctive honour of representing in this House of Commons is peculiarly interested in the legislation now before the house. This interest is brought about by the many different products produced within the confines and boundaries of that county. May I be permitted at this time to tell hon. members of the house and you, Mr. Speaker, that there is in my riding, among other enterprises, dairy and mixed farming, manufacturing, flower growing and a very extensive fruit and vegetable industry. In my previous address to the house I mentioned the extent of the flower growing industry. We claim that Peel county is the Canadian paradise of beauty. I should like to extend to you, Mr. Speaker, and to every hon. member an invitation to visit Brampton, the beauty spot of North America. We shall not question your brand of politics; if you are a Liberal, you may come; if you are a Conservative, you may come; if you are a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation you may come and if you are a Social Crediter you may come. However I would like to give one warning; if purchases are made we will perhaps refuse to accept social credit dividends. In the county of Peel we are used to actual cash.

I should like to refer particularly to the three industries in this riding: Dairying, flower growing and fruit and vegetable growing. Our dairying industry partly supplies the great metropolis of Toronto with its whole milk and we take second place to no other area in the whole dominion in so far as this particular industry is concerned. As I have stated already, we are the largest producer of cut flowers in the world and our fruit and vegetable industry compares favourably with that industry in any other section of Canada.

The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has filled volumes of Hansard, which is read religiously by the people in my riding, directing attention to the municipality of Rivière du Loup in his own riding. I want to serve notice upon him that he should look to his laurels because I intend, if my halting efforts will avail, to supplant that constituency, in so far as the attention of the house is concerned, with the one I represent.

We have heard a great deal of the history of trade negotiations between Canada and the United States. All this is very interesting and enlightening, especially to the new members, but may I suggest that the man on the street, the man who is looking for relief from the effects of the depression, is more interested in the present and the future than in the historical facts in connection with these negotiations. I suggest that this Canada-United States trade agreement should be viewed through the clear eyes of two classes of our people, the struggling farmers and the workingmen. Let me say a word with reference to the dairying industry in my riding. Because of a surplus production, because of other factors which perhaps are not relevant to a debate of this kind, in many instances the farmers cannot market their milk in as profitable and orderly a manner as they might desire. What these farmers want among other things is an agreement which will relieve the stress and pressure caused by this milk surplus.

It is true that in the agreement there is a lessening of the restrictions on cream going into the United States market. We are always thankful for small mercies, but I suggest that that does not go very far in the direction of helping the people in the riding I represent. I am hopeful, however, that as regards cattle the provisions of the agreement will afford some relief. I have been told by some of the farmers of Peel county that since the agreement went into effect it has resulted not in raising the price of cattle but rather in depressing it, but I am inclined to think this may be only temporary, and I trust that in the end some measure of real benefit will accrue to these hard-pressed men who deserve some assistance.

In the course of the debate a good deal has been said with regard to the protection of industrialists, the implication being apparently that when you protect an industry you are apt, for some reason or another, to ruin the agricultural population, its activities and endeavours. Speaking for my county, we depend very largely upon the home market. A market within twenty-five or thirty miles and comprising nearly 700,000 people is one which our farmers are anxious to maintain and extend, and I commend this thought to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen), who spoke so eloquently the other evening, and whose facts were so well marshalled. When he speaks about protection to industrialists he should remember that our farmers do not all feel as he does. Indeed, we regard the protection of industry as a means of protecting and extending our market for our own farm products.

Let me say a few words with regard to the cut flower industry, of which we have heard so much, and of which no doubt hon. members will hear more as time goes on. The flower industry is one that has come in for a good deal of publicity in the house. There are at present in the town of Brampton about a dozen operators of greenhouses. The largest greenhouse there employs 300 men the year round and there are some others employing altogether a total of nearly 300 more. In other words, about 600 persons are engaged in this industry. Since the initiation of the Canada-United States agreement representations have been made to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) by the largest greenhouse operators in my town, and in addition to these there have been representations, couched in no uncertain terms, by one of the prominent government supporters in Brampton, directed not only to the government itself but to nearly all private members of the house. However I do not wish to speak with reference to this particular aspect of my subject from the standpoint of the operators especially in the town from which I come; I would rather direct my remarks from the point of view of the 600 working men in whom I am intensely interested and who are anxious that the solvency of these enterprises in our town shall not be endangered. It should be the desire of every member of parliament; it should be and I hope it is the desire of the government to see that the standard of living and the wages of these men engaged in the cut flower industry shall be so raised as to enable them to live in the way they so richly deserve to do. I suggest therefore that in the legislation now before the house, by virtue of the United States gaining the advantage of the intermediate tariff which allows flowers to come into Canada free of duty, no appreciable move is being made by the government towards the goal of a higher standard of living for the men engaged in this enterprise.

Perhaps I might be allowed to dwell for a moment on the history of this business. Before 1930 there was a tariff of 17½ per cent on flowers coming into Canada from the United States. Early in that year the present Minister of Finance, in his famous budget, raised the tariff to twenty-five per cent; as a matter of fact, at that time by virtue of the countervailing duties which he also employed, the tariff was increased to a maximum of forty per cent. At the same time there was a duty of forty per cent against our flowers entering the United States. At that particular time, as I find by reference to Hansard, the Minister of Finance, in explanation of the increase in the tariff, stated that it was in consequence of a consideration of the matter by the tariff board. The board had considered it and for that reason he desired to increase the duty. When the present leader of the opposition (Mr.

Bennett) came into power in 1930 the general tariff item on flowers entering Canada was placed at the forty per cent mark, so that since that time flowers, both those coming from the United States and those going from Canada to that country, have had a duty of forty per cent. However, for some reason the intermediate tariff has been free; and the United States having gained the advantage of the intermediate tariff under this agreement, we find that flowers from that country are coming into Canada free of duty while our flowers are still subject to a forty per cent duty going the other way.

Climatic conditions are very much against greenhouse operators in Canada. For example, in one plant alone in Brampton, in order to overcome climatic conditions an expenditure of $180,000 per annum in coal is necessary to take care of that large area of greenhouse space. If, therefore, there is any adjustment in the tariff we should be entitled to something better than the Americans enjoy with regard to their flowers coming into Canada, instead of having the tariff lower on flowers coming in and higher on those going out. This makes imperative an adjustment in the legislation to be subsequently brought down.

While operators in other centres in the last few years have been experiencing hard times, a number of them having gone into liquidation, operators in the Brampton area have been able to keep going. These are not what might be called fly-by-night concerns, nor are they industries which might be regarded as "children of protection" alone, because as a matter of fact they did not grow up under protection. We are producing in Canada about one million dollars' worth of cut flowers, and that, I submit is something which the government should take into consideration. But what did we find in February of this year? In one of the largest departmental stores in Toronto there were roses—perhaps not as good as ours, because there are no roses as good as those grown in Brampton—selling at twenty cents a dozen, I am told, very many times less than it costs our people to produce them in the town from whence I come. I do not particularly rely on figures, because they may prove almost anything, I believe, but the imports of cut flowers from the United States in January, 1936, as compared with imports of cut flowers in January, 1935, actually showed an upward trend of eighty-five per cent.

I hope always in this house to try to approach these matters as far as possible without partisan bitterness, because it is something which to my mind is inexcusable. But I cannot emphasize too strongly the imperative need of something being done for these florists when the budget is brought down. If it can be done before that, it will be very greatly appreciated so far as our industry is concerned. When the Minister of Finance is fixing up these items in the budget I suggest that he should not fraternize too closely or take too seriously his friendship with the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) who sits over there and who delivered the other evening such an inspiring and excellent address, except for one point when he appeared to be a little anxious that the intermediate tariff should not be raised on any items. I have in mind the florist industry, in which I am very much interested, so I suggest that the Minister of Finance see to it that when this item is being discussed the hon. member for Selkirk is somewhere else in the building.

I should like to draw attention to another branch of agriculture in which I am particularly interested and in which many people in Peel are involved, although it is not particularly confined to my riding alone. I refer to the fruit and vegetable business, which has also become a great industry in other parts of the Dominion of Canada. It occupies, however, a prominent and important place in the activities of the people of our county. We have in the county from which I come between eight and nine thousand acres under market gardening and fruit farming cultivation located in an area in the township of Chinguacousy, around the village of Huttonsville, and also the southerly part of the riding, which contains many market gardeners and fruit growers who are trying to eke out an existence. The whole industry seems to indicate that hard work and uncertain returns are inevitably involved in the business. Last summer, when I was out making a few calls for certain reasons which may be apparent to some members of the house, coming across many of the market gardeners and fruit growers, and seeing the hard work which they had to do, I thought to myself: Why, you are heroes in your fight for economic independence. Coming from a dairy farm as I did, and realizing what a great tie that is to people who have to attend to milking night and morning and be on hand year in and year out, I came to the inescapable conclusion that, after all, the dairying business had only one parallel in so far as hard work is concerned, and that was the fruit and vegetable industry.

So we must remember that in attacking a problem of this kind many factors must be taken into consideration. I do not wish in any way to repeat the arguments which were so eloquently put by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) the other evening. There are two reasons why I shall not do so. The first is that, as I see it, there has been up to the present time too much repetition of arguments in the House of Commons. The second is that I am afraid, in contrast with the eloquence with which he presented his case, I might be found to be a very poor parliamentarian indeed. However, I should just like to say this much, that in so far as climatic differences are concerned it means that growers of fruit and vegetables in the United States of America have two high class markets and one low or medium class market. The difference in climate, the fact that actually they are able to produce earlier in almost every instance, gives them a high class market in the United States and provides them also with a high class market in Canada if they are allowed to bring their stuff in here and sell it. That means, of course, that special protection is required for this branch of agriculture.

In 1926 the government of the day, under the leadership of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, brought in legislation which helped the fruit and vegetable growers very materially; it helped them by applying a dumping duty in so far as these perishable commodities were concerned. I will not go into what happened after that; but in 1930 it was necessary that the dumping duties be applied again. From 1930 to 1935, under the government of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the fruit and vegetable men, while they complained somewhat because the restrictions were not higher—and perhaps legitimately complained as to that—were reasonably satisfied in so far as the protection they got was concerned. A number of them told me that they believed it was really a Godsend to them that the dumping duty was imposed. The only complaint I received so far as that was concerned was that the growers believed that in some instances it might have been applied a little more strongly and, perhaps, a little earlier.

I had hoped that when the terms of the new agreement were tabled they would disclose that the fruit and vegetable growers would receive that additional protection through the strengthening of the tariff regulations so far as their products are concerned. Broadly speaking, the tariff on fruits coming into this country has been reduced from twenty to fifteen per cent, and on vegetables from thirty to fifteen per cent. However, I may say, in all fairness, that the tariff is not perhaps the most serious matter that has to be contended with. I am told by one grower, however, that it does and will affect the sale of beets and carrots later on in the year. The tariff reductions would not be so bad if compensating advantages were given under this agreement in so far as dumping duty regulations are concerned. When the government has taken off the dumping duty regulations from some of the fruits and vegetables its hands are tied to some extent in so far as the application of the duties on the balance goes. I am not sufficiently well versed, perhaps, in the details of the industry to say just how far that may go, but certainly much concern is felt among those who are actually and intensely interested in the success of the industry. I should just like to point out and to recommend that in so far as the power is left in their hands, the government shall not only apply the provisions of the anti-dumping legislation severely and restrictively, but shall apply it in time to save the market, which is a seasonal one, for these perishable fruits.

I want to refer particularly to three articles in which I am specially interested. The growers of my constituency produce large quantities of asparagus. I have a letter from one of the large growers in my riding saying that one of the canning companies bought last year a large proportion of the asparagus crop at ten cents. To-day six cents, he says, is the price likely to be paid, because the canning companies are not going to make contracts with the farmers, when they feel that perhaps the supply can be obtained from growers in the United States.

Mr. CLEAVER: May I ask the hon. member: Is he aware that during the last week the canners have signed up for the asparagus crop of this province at ten cents a pound?

Mr. GRAYDON: My latest information is that the canning companies have not signed up for the whole crop. Certainly from the information I have they have not signed up for the crop of this grower in the county of Peel. Certainly, if the statement of the hon. gentleman were correct, I would gladly suffer any humiliation on the floor of this house to see it come true.

The growing of strawberries is also an enterprise of great importance in my constituency. This fruit is a perishable commodity; it must be sold quickly and at a particular season. Therefore, when the public taste is satiated by berries from the United States the market is left in a very unreceptive state. Only well regulated and properly timed dumping duties can save the strawberry market for the growers of such a constituency as I represent. I have a letter from one of my constituents saying that he is fearful that the great markets of Winnipeg and Montreal will be largely taken away from the strawberry producers of that county. Another large producer of fruit and vegetables in my riding says that a commission merchant in one of the large cities of Ontario has contracted to purchase seventy-five carloads of strawberries, and under the new tariff regulations $200 will be saved on every carload.

Another branch of the vegetable growing industry is the production of potatoes. Our county produces potatoes of excellent quality. Before this agreement went into effect potatoes coming from the United States paid a duty of seventy-five cents per hundred pounds. Under this agreement the intermediate tariff applies and potatoes enter free of duty. Not long ago I was talking to one of the large growers in my constituency. He said that he was in the United States viewing some of the agricultural districts there, and in one of the southern states he saw an area of potatoes stretching as far as the eye could see, in bloom, many weeks earlier than our crop. This agreement puts the potato growers of Canada, and especially of the county of Peel, in a very difficult position. May I make this suggestion, that when the budget is brought down special attention should be given to the question of raising the intermediate tariff on potatoes to the rate at which it was before? And I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to consider a suggestion which I think could be easily carried out. One of the growers in my county writes me saying:

> A lot of people do not think that potatoes imported will hurt our prices as the freight on them will be heavy. I see this matter at a different angle being a grower of about ten acres every year and in touch with markets frequently. In the first place the grades are not similar. Our Canada No. 2 is every bit as good as their No. 1, therefore the American grower will be able to put on the market a so-called No. 1 grade of potatoes considerably cheaper than we can, and pay freight and still realize as much for their potatoes as we do according to Canadian grading. I would like to see the American growers compelled to grade their potatoes according to Canadian specifications if they expect to sell them in Canada, then we would have fair competition.
> Secondly I do not expect that there will be any encouragement for the Canadian potato growers to try and have their potatoes early, as the market no doubt will be flooded with American potatoes before we have them fit to dig.

One other suggestion, and that is in regard to the dumping regulations. I suggest that there should be some permanent orderly regulation in regard to the fruit and vegetable industry, so that a man who plants his crop in the spring may be able to plan and see a year ahead and have some reasonable certainty as to results. I leave that suggestion, as the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said the other day, on the doorstep of the government.

I am not desirous of placing unnecessary obstacles in the way of a government which has such heavy responsibilities and duties. I take my stand against this agreement only in protest against the treatment which has been accorded to the industries I have mentioned. It is my conscientious hope that the rest of Canada may receive greater benefit under this agreement than it would appear on the surface that the county of Peel is likely to enjoy. No one in the house will be happier than I shall be if this agreement proves to be a step towards Canadian economic recovery, as I have no doubt the government honestly and conscientiously believe it will be. I do not agree with the policies instituted by the government in its efforts to stimulate trade because I believe in protection for our people, but at the same time I say to the Prime Minister and to his government: God speed, and let us see if something concrete can be done for the people of this whole dominion who so richly deserve improved conditions.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there has to be a first time for everyone, and this is mine. I do not rise to address the house with that feeling of temerity which I think I ought to have. On the contrary my feelings at the moment are quite the opposite of temerity. However, I have observed the very kindly attitude displayed by hon. members and particularly yourself, Mr. Speaker, to the various new members who have spoken so far this session. What I have seen emboldens me to rise at this time to address the chamber.

Nor am I vain enough to believe that anything I have to say is of transcendent importance. I am quite well aware of the fact that anything I may be able to say upon this important trade agreement has either already been said by others or could be stated by other hon. members more adequately. Nevertheless the electors of Winnipeg South Centre did me the honour of sending me here as their spokesman, and I owe it to my constituents to endeavour to express in the best fashion of which I am capable their opinions upon this all-important matter.

I would be doing less than justice to my constituents if at the outset I did not express their appreciation of the promptness with which this agreement was effected, as well as their satisfaction with its broad general lines.

During the election campaign the gage was thrown down in the words, "Vote Liberal and get action." The people of Canada took up that gage. When the Prime Minister returned from Washington it had been redeemed. This type of action marks a new day for Canadians, and as a result of it naturally the people are imbued with a new hope.

As has been stated many times the agreement is designed to benefit all consumers and many producers. I look at most questions from the viewpoint of the consumer. Cheapness is a corollary of abundance and dearness follows in the train of scarcity. Naturally we want cheapness. It seems to me that in the past more attention would have been paid to the needs of consumers if the consumers, as such, had been organized in the way many producing groups have been. I conceive it to be my duty to endeavour, in some small measure at least, to destroy what has been called the inarticulateness of the consumer of Canada.

Leaving that for the moment, however, and glancing at the agreement, can we seriously doubt that certain producing groups will be benefited by the operation of its schedules, particularly when we remember that in the lumbering industry, for instance, the duty on logging apparatus has been reduced by twenty-five per cent. We get further satisfaction when we see that lumber and timber are given access to the great markets to the south of us, and enjoy fifty per cent less impost than had been the case for several years, during those years, in fact from the time when the last administration goaded the United States government into effecting retaliatory measures against us.

Some time ago I read the story in the Manchester Guardian respecting the lumber industry and I should like to quote from it briefly. The article to which I refer is found in the issue of January 5, 1934, and is, I believe, one of the many sad stories of the last five years.

When the Bennett government took office in 1930 the United States market was open to Canadian lumber. The duty was one dollar per thousand feet, and on an average Canada exported $20,000,000 worth of softwood annually and imported $2,000,000 of hardwood. The hardwood manufacturers of Ontario applied to the Bennett government for tariff increases to keep out this hardwood, and in April, 1931, the "Canada First" policy was applied by the imposition of arbitrary valuations. In the following June Mr. Bennett imposed a one per cent primage duty on imports, including lumber. This was followed by an order of the national revenue department in August, 1931, reducing the discounts allowed to the United States hardwood manufacturers, and in November by dump duties against United States hardwood doors.

[Mr. Maybank.]

These successive affronts brought retaliation by the Washington government. The duty on Canadian lumber was increased by one dollar per thousand feet. The Bennett government, realizing their error, endeavoured to placate Washington by withdrawing the primage duty. The other tariff increases, however, were retained.

In June, 1932, congress took the final step in retaliation and increased the duty on Canadian lumber from one dollar to four dollars per thousand feet. The effect was ruinous to Canada. Exports in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1933, fell to the incredibly low total of 235,528,000 feet.

The article is headed: "The tariff that lost a market." Happily this sort of action is now a thing of the past.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that is incorrect?

Mr. MAYBANK: I have been quoting an article from a reputable journal. If there is anything incorrect about it I believe the right hon. gentleman will have another opportunity during the session to deal with it.

Mr. BENNETT: It happens to be against the rules of the house to read articles, but the member being a new one I did not raise the point. It was not all tariff; it was in part a tax under the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. MAYBANK: I should not have objected if the rules of the house had been drawn to my attention, no matter how new I may be. I am quite conscious of all the right hon. gentleman has said with respect to my newness. However I do not think he quite does himself justice when he rises after the fact to tell me something that I should not have done, and questions it. After all, he cannot have it both ways.

Nor do I think it can be doubted that, normally, a reduction in tariff, such as we see before us in connection with agricultural machinery, would be of benefit to the agriculturists of Canada, despite the price increases about which we have heard in this chamber during the present session. Of course the answer to the price increases, lest there be any doubt as to whether taking off the tariff can raise the price—and of course there is no doubt—is to take the balance of the duty off, and to obliterate every sign and trace of tariff upon agricultural implements.

For my part I like to translate trade movements into hours of work rather than deal with them in millions of dollars. We speak of millions of dollars of imports and exports, but sometimes when discussing them in these monetary terms we lose sight of the amount of work lying behind each dollar's worth of goods moving out of or into a country. If we were to examine the lumber industry, or the manufacturing of shingles, we would find that the total amount of work lying behind a carload of shingles is rarely appreciated. The number of man-hours of labour connected with the felling of a tree and getting it to the skidway is appreciated by few people. Prior to the logs reaching the sawmill a very great number of man-hours of labour are involved, and then afterwards it will take two or three hours per day of two or three different men's time to get the first thousand shingles off any one log. After that, it will take three or four men supplying three or four more men to pack about sixty thousand shingles in a day, and after several days of that sort of work a carload results.

Then commences the next train of work: A man examines the car, the waybills are made up; the different items in the car are checked, and finally five men will be employed in pulling the car out and bringing it to where it will eventually be hooked up in a train. There the whole process of inspection is gone over again, and the car then starts to move to its destination. Consequently, when we talk of millions of dollars of exports, this involves millions or many hundreds of thousands of hours of labour, which is represented by the figure first mentioned. Similar to that is the process in respect to imports.

In addition, when we read these import and export figures, we have to take into account the money which is spent in the various stores after the wage earner has given the money to his wife, perhaps, so that she may do the spending. It seems to me that that ought to bring home to us that the only depression breaker that ever did or ever will have any efficacy, is the exchange of commodities, and if we cannot have that, no depression will ever be broken.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house certain figures which came to my attention last year and which I found in the reports of the League of Nations. They show the contraction of trade throughout the world as thirty-one per cent below normal, and at the same time the employment figures represent employment as being thirty per cent below normal. It seems to me that these figures are striking and ought to bring home to us, if anything can, the fact that it is exchange of commodities, and exchange of commodities alone, that makes for any appreciable amount of employment.

As I have said, my chief interest is in the consumer. I am interested in the getting of goods as cheaply as possible. However, from the viewpoint of the primary producer it seems to me that we should always have a tariff low enough to allow sufficient goods to flow into this country to pay for the products for which our primary producers have to find a market abroad. Whenever we find that our primary products, the products of the farm, the forest and the stream, are not moving out of the country as they should, then tariffs should be lowered to invite these payment-commodities to come into the country and assist in getting our own primary products out.

I confess I do not hold strongly with the idea lying behind such expressions as "quid pro quo." "concessions," and so forth. I regard lowering of tariffs, generally speaking, as good in itself because it tends towards the movement of trade. As far as I am concerned I am only sorry that the tariff cuts made in this treaty are not greater.

Some fear has been expressed that the balance of trade between us and the United States may be unfavourable. Surely we do not have to have a favourable balance of trade with the United States or any other particular country. I had thought that idea had long since been exploded. I must confess I was considerably humiliated when I read the communication of Secretary of State Cordell Hull in 1934 to the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) of Canada, in which he found it necessary to inform the then Prime Minister that the settlement of international indebtedness was often roundabout. It would seem from the wording of that letter that the Prime Minister of that day was not aware of that fact, of which most students of economics most certainly are aware.

Equally meaningless, it seems to me, are criticisms of this agreement based on any argument as to per capita purchases. We have been told, for instance, that we purchase from the United States $28.86 worth of goods per capita per annum, and that they only purchase from us $2.23 worth of goods per capita per annum. So what? What does this prove? It does not prove anything. It is one of those propositions that when you state it it means nothing. If we take the whole world as one country and Canada as the other, we find that we buy $55 worth of goods per capita from the world, but treating that world as one country we find that they buy from us only an infinitesimal amount per capita as compared with that $55. Is it then to be concluded that we shall not deal with that other country, which is the world? The idea is preposterous.

I do not particularly wish to obtrude on the attention of this house anything with relation to myself and my own family. but perhaps I might be permitted to do so to illustrate my argument. I happen to be one of a family of five—three children, a wife and myself.

An hon. MEMBER: Four.

Mr. MAYBANK: Four and a half, anyway. Suppose I go down to Utah and start a grocery store there, and that the present head of the Brigham Young family—you know Brigham Young had a great many wives and a tremendous number of children—comes to me and says, "Maybank, if you will undertake that every member of your family will buy from us $50 worth of goods per annum I will see that the Brigham Youngs buy fifty cents worth per capita per annum from you." Do you think I would not jump at the chance? I would not worry about the disparity between $55 per capita on the one side and only fifty cents per capita on the other, if I could get fifty cents each from that immense number of people, because I believe by now the Brigham Youngs are an immense number.

No; we do not have to worry about the balance of trade with any particular country. We all know now; we have learned to our sorrow in the last five years, that we cannot sell if we do not buy, and that people outside cannot sell to us if they will not buy from us. Naturally I shall support this treaty because it is the one bright spot in the fiscal policy panorama of this country for a great many years.

For just a moment I should like to refer to the subject of publishers and magazines. This is one of the matters referred to by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). The hon. member was very much against letting in American magazines. He referred to their teaching a foreign culture and a different patriotism, to their being published by people with a national outlook which varied from our own. I want to say to the hon. gentleman and to all hon. members: The way to help the publishing industry of this country is by removing some of the impediments from which the industry is suffering. Recently I received a little publication from an agency which apparently represents the Canadian publishing trade and I had in mind placing upon Hansard a part of the argument cited here. A short time ago I apparently transgressed the rules of the house and I do not want to repeat that mistake. If I am wrong in reading this I hope, sir, you will stop me. Apparently this is a reproduction of an article which appeared in my own paper, the Winnipeg Free Press, and is signed "H. B. G." I really intend to adopt this article as my own argument; I am not quoting it exactly as an authority. It reads:

> We are told that while the American publisher has a much larger market for his product than the Canadian publisher, the latter is also handicapped in having to pay more for his paper, his inks, his type, his machinery and other supplies because of customs tariffs and sales taxes that are not borne by his United States competitor. He pays a high postage rate, owing to the increase during the depression. On everything that enters into the production of a magazine, say the Canadian publishers, there is high protection and heavy taxation.
> This is the work of the previous administration at Ottawa, which could never conceive it possible to go too far in providing protective devices. But since the attempt to ban the entry into Canada of American magazines was an entirely mistaken policy and one inimical to the intellectual and cultural interests of this country, and has now properly been reversed, it is only right that the duties on the equipment and supplies of Canadian publishers should also be removed or greatly reduced.

I commend that to the attention of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and to all other hon. members.

I do not think we need to worry about foreign culture or foreign influence. I suppose we are affected somewhat by these magazines which teach a foreign culture and a different patriotism, but this effect is not very great. After all, Canadians are fairly impervious to influences of that sort. The Canadian people were not affected very much by the American influence with which they were confronted for two or three months before the election. For instance, they were completely impervious to the jargon sent over the radio by Mr. Sage. That was an instance of a Conservative importation of foreign culture, and, far from doing harm, it did the Canadian people a lot of good. I hope it proves to be a salutary lesson to the Conservative party.

We do not need to worry about foreign culture. We are a hardy people; we are a characterful people, and we are quite capable of carving out our own destiny and developing our own character. We may as well make up our minds anyway that we cannot keep out American influence by stopping American magazines. This is impossible when as a part of our daily lives we have the automobile upon the open road, the movie and the radio. Nothing can be done about the matter; we must rely upon our own characters and I believe the character of the Canadian people is sufficient to withstand these successive shocks.

As I have said before, I am sorry that the tariff cuts are not more extensive. Instead of the duty on agricultural implements being reduced by fifty per cent, I would prefer to see the tariff wiped out altogether. I consider the tariff on automobiles is entirely too high and that a fifteen per cent combination of imposts would be plenty. I would like to see the gasoline racket stopped completely by putting that commodity upon the free list.

I used to be a lumberjack in British Columbia and at that time I came into contact with that union about which we sometimes hear, known as the I.W.W. These boys would stage a strike for practically any one of the reasons for which a man takes a drink and they were ready at any time to stage a strike for any other reason. Often when they staged one they used to walk down the valley singing, "There'll be pie in the sky when we die." The people in my constituency are not interested in "pie in the sky when they die." They want the benefits of Liberalism right away. They want to be able to pass on a heritage to their grandchildren, a heritage made possible because of Liberal policies put into effect to-day. We want to start with the Dunning tariff of 1930 and proceed from there on.

While this treaty does not go as far as I would like it to go, nevertheless it is wholly good. It does not preclude us from further gifts to ourselves by way of additional tariff reductions. I had intended to refer to certain figures indicating the improvements in trade in the month of January of this year as compared with January of the year before. I believe however that in the main they have already been placed on Hansard. But it is obvious to everyone that both in imports and exports trade in the month of January greatly increased over the previous January, and that, as the Prime Minister has said, was the result of only a partial operation of the treaty. When we again translate figures of that sort into working hours we see the great importance of trade as a means of relieving depression.

I regard this trade agreement as being wholly good because it is the first step; because in the mind of the leader of the opposition, although he would not say so, it marks a new orientation to the fiscal problems of this dominion. I am further glad to support the agreement because of the example it is to other countries. Five years ago the whole world except Canada was mad with the disease of economic nationalism. Then we followed the multitude to do evil; in fact, in the last five years we overtook the multitude and committed more sin than did most other nations. But now fortunately economic sanity has returned and it is my hope and belief that by this act we shall influence other nations back in the direction of economic virtue to the benefit not only of those nations but of ourselves and to the general advantage of all with whom they and we respectively live, move and have our being, commercially speaking. For all these reasons I am happy to support this treaty.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): I shall take a few minutes only in discussing this trade agreement, which is of great importance to the people of Canada. It is an agreement in which we are all particularly interested. It is not my intention to discuss it from the general standpoint because I do not consider myself qualified to do so, but I should like to consider it from the point of view of those provinces of which I have the honour to be one of the members—the maritimes.

It is interesting to know that according to the last census the population of Canada has become more urban and less rural, but this fact does not apply to the three Atlantic provinces; we are more rural than urban. The census of 1931 shows that the population of Prince Edward Island was 67,653 rural and 20,385 urban; Nova Scotia, 281,192 rural and 231,654 urban; New Brunswick, 279,279 rural and 128,940 urban, or in the maritimes a total rural population of 628,124 and a total urban population of 380,979. I quote these figures to show that we in the maritime provinces are distinctly a rural population and are primary producers. The great industries of the maritime provinces are fishing, lumbering, mining and forestry, and any agreement which is made, if it is to benefit us, must give us some benefit in these primary industries that I have mentioned.

Let me take first the great industry of fishing. It is a fact which is well known not only in this country but throughout the world that the maritime provinces of Canada possess the greatest fishing area to be found anywhere in the world. It is an old industry, one of the first to be established on this continent; for we all remember from our history that in the days of Cabot men came from England, France and other places across the sea and reported that fish were so plentiful in the northern Atlantic ocean that they could be gathered up in baskets. We have over 8,000 square miles in the bay of Fundy and 200,000 square miles, or over four-fifths of the fishing ground, in the north Atlantic, and in addition to this we have 15,000 square miles of inshore waters entirely controlled by the dominion. Besides this great extent of fisheries we have, I believe, the best fish to be found anywhere in the world. I say this because it is well known that the colder the water the better the quality of fish, and as you go north in the northern Atlantic and up among the maritime provinces you find, with the purity and coldness of the water, a better quality of fish, including cod, herring, mackerel and salmon. In this great industry some 40,000 fishermen are employed. This will indicate to some extent the importance of the industry. Taking five members to a family—and I am not taking a Brigham Young estimate now—there are about 200,000 people dependent on the industry in the maritimes, and a capital of $16,138,728 is invested in the fisheries of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

I have laid this foundation to show the extent and greatness of this industry which we have in the Atlantic provinces. It is well known that in the last five or six years the industry has been in a very bad condition. Markets have not been good, and there is no class of people in the maritime provinces —and I doubt whether there is in any other part of Canada—who have suffered more than have the fishermen. Not only have they lost tens of thousands of dollars' worth of equipment, but in 1934 many lives were lost. It is a very hazardous occupation; I doubt whether there is any more hazardous. These men therefore should be well compensated for the work they are doing. I am safe in saying that in the last few months, or prior to October 14, the maritime provinces were promised that in the event of a reciprocal agreement being brought about with the United States they would be one of the first sections of Canada to be considered, and that they would receive great benefits from such a treaty.

In any reciprocity treaty which has ever been mentioned through all these years it will be found, if one will take the trouble to study the history of the proposals and agreements, that the fisheries of the maritime provinces was, or was supposed to be, one of the first considerations as regards any agreement. In this connection I should like to quote the remarks of an hon. gentleman who a short time ago was a member of this house and who to-day I congratulate upon having been elevated to the Senate; I refer to the Hon. William Duff. Senator Duff has always been greatly interested in fisheries in his native province, and on many occasions has spoken in this house as to the great benefits which would be derived by the fishing industry from a reciprocity treaty with the United States. At different times he brought in several resolutions, and in speaking to a resolution which he presented on February 20, 1933, he gave expression to these thoughts:

> My hon. friend asks who imposed the duty; the United States, of course.

Then he goes on:

> Now, in my opinion, with the Canadian fisheries in their present condition—

And he had told the house of the deplorable condition of the fisheries at that time:

> —there is only one salvation for them, and that is for this government—

And he was exhorting the Conservative government of the day:

> —to make a trade arrangement with the United States so that our fish might go into that country.
> We hear a good deal about trawlers nowadays. I have no time to go into that question to-day, but if we had the United States for a market there would not be very much talk about trawlers because the trouble to-day is that Canada is a very small market. Great Britain is too far away from us, being some twenty-five hundred miles across the water, and they have their own source of supply so far as fish is concerned, so that practically the only market open to us now, to which we can extend our business, is the United States. I need not say that the fisheries of this country are in a deplorable condition, and I appeal to the government to do everything they can to help the industry. There is no question about it that there is a great opportunity for the government as well as for the fishermen of Canada.

Then he goes on to say:

> I think the time ripe for something to be done if we are to be clear of our surplus product. This is the time for the government to enter into negotiations with the government of the United States.

That is the exhortation which was given to the Conservative party in 1933. On Februrary 19, 1934, Mr., now Senator, Duff brought in his resolution again. At that time he said:

> If an arrangement could be made whereby certain goods from the United States were permitted to enter this country free of duty while the fish from lake Winnipeg, the great lakes and the Atlantic and the Pacific could enter that country free of duty, the fishermen of Canada would be in a much better position than they are to-day. In my opinion, this government should do everything possible to see that this is done.

I quote this to point out that Senator Duff was voicing the opinion of the maritime provinces as regards fish.

A reciprocity arrangement has been entered into, not by a Conservative government but by the government opposite, a Liberal government, and I should like to ask if Senator Duff's recommendations have been carried out by his old government. I think the facts will prove very much to the contrary.

I should like to refer for a few minutes to some of our leading fish. In this connection may I say that I am sorry that the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) is not in his seat. I was surprised to hear him, in this house a few days ago, tell us that he was the representative of the best fishing county in the maritime provinces and also in Canada, and say that he supported this reciprocity agreement. We find that in Nova Scotia lobsters are the greatest fish product of the province. In 1934 the catch was 18,459,000 pounds, and the market value $2,461,784. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, this fish has always entered the United States free.

It is well known that we in the maritime provinces and Newfoundland produce practically all the lobsters in the world. We have the finest lobsters that are found anywhere. The only lobster, I believe, that is found outside of Canada is one called the spiny lobster, which in reality is not a lobster at all. Lobsters are entering and have entered the United States free, because the Americans want our lobsters, and I think we shall find in reviewing any agreement with the United States that anything the Americans want from us they allow us to send them free, but anything about which we wish to bargain, it is a very hard matter to make a favourable bargain.

The cod is a fish which is produced in great abundance in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. As a matter of fact, cod is the second largest fish product of the maritime provinces, and our fishermen hoped and expected that it would have been included in the agreement with the United States. But there is a duty, and a heavy one, on cod, and it is because of this duty that many of the fishermen of these provinces are in the deplorable condition in which they find themselves to-day. We expected that the government, in making an agreement with the United States, would take this into consideration and secure the removal of the duty.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, in speaking the other day, said that he understood one reason why the duty was not taken off cod and haddock was because we had allowed English anthracite coal to come into this country, and that coal was the commodity which the Americans wished to barter in exchange for our cod and haddock and other fish. I think this is a very far-fetched argument, because we all know that in Walkerville, Ontario, for instance, the liquor producers have been given the opportunity to ship at a greatly lowered duty millions of gallons of whiskey into the United States, and I have not heard that any quid pro quo was demanded as far as whiskey is concerned. It might also be pointed out as regards fisheries in the maritime provinces that the government, on account of the market now opened to the American manufacturer in the maritime provinces, containing a population of over a million, could have very well exchanged our fish for the manufactured products which we shall undoubtedly receive from that country.

I could go on down through the list of fisheries in these three provinces, but it is not my intention to do so. The list is long. I have pointed out that the great fishing industry in the maritime provinces was not considered at all. They speak about swordfish; we all know there is very little export of swordfish to the United States, we know also there is still a duty on swordfish. As to herring, the great market is not in the United States but is I understand, in the British West Indies. Then there is the small herring used in New Brunswick for sardines. Sardines have not received any benefit under this agreement. Sardines form the greatest fisheries export of New Brunswick. In 1934 it amounted to 41,458,200 pounds, of a market value of $1,087,674. These were not exported to the United States, because the United States impose a heavy duty on our sardines in order to protect the sardine canneries of Eastport and the Maine coast. As far as the fisheries of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are concerned they gain nothing from this agreement, although they were led to believe they would receive much.

It is a small step from fish to potatoes. I am not going to say much about potatoes to-night because that subject has already been pretty well covered. I was amused when the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) in his excellent address spoke of a ten acre field of potatoes. I may tell my hon. friend that in my province of New Brunswick a ten acre field of potatoes is just a back yard garden. We grow potatoes there by the hundreds of acres. In the county of Carleton, New Brunswick, whose representative (Mr. Patterson) I see in the house—and he can verify what I say—it is not uncommon to see fields of potatoes of one hundred acres and more. What do we find in regard to potatoes since this agreement came into force? The potato farmers of New Brunswick are not receiving any benefit under it; very much the contrary.

In that connection I wish to read a statement from the Carleton Sentinel, a paper published in the county of Carleton in which many potatoes are produced:

A move is now on foot, sponsored by the New Brunswick Farmers' Industrial Organization, to have a countervailing duty placed on American potatoes, which under the existing regulations may be imported into Canada duty free. Apparently this phase of the new reciprocity treaty was not regarded as important, as it would be only on rare occasions that American potatoes could be imported as cheaply as home produced stock could be purchased. It is generally supposed that should such a thing happen as a flow of potatoes starting from the south, the government would act at once and place a countervailing duty in effect, such as prevailed prior to 1930.

A situation has arisen, however, which was probably not foreseen. Potatoes are now a fairly good price in Canada and it is thought they will go higher, possibly to a price above that in the United States. For that reason dealers on the receiving end are believed, correctly or otherwise, to be watching the market very closely. This has caused some unsettlement of the market, particularly as recent court decisions south of the line will have, it is thought, a depressing effect on the Canadian market.

We believe the federal government would do well to accede to the wishes of the farmers, and put on a countervailing duty as soon as possible.

Then another article in the Hartland Observer, also published in that county, says:

A letter from Windsor confirms the fear that United States potatoes under the treaty would compete unfairly with ours. The writer says, Michigan potatoes are being marketed at 40 cents per bag cheaper than ours, and adds that but for the fact that Canadian dealers are as yet chary about handling them to the detriment of Canadian prior contracts, there would be a brisk trade for American spuds in Ontario. Canadian farmers are being made philanthropists to their American cousins.

I received also a letter to-day from a gentleman who is a very large exporter of potatoes in Carleton county, Mr. Hatfield, who claims that there are being sold in Montreal and Quebec, Maine potatoes, called "commercials," of a grade not marketable by Canadian farmers. He also says that Maine potatoes are crossing daily from Van Buren into St. Leonard free of duty under the provisions of the new trade pact with the United States. I quote this to show that as far as potatoes are concerned—and in my province we are large potato producers, as they are in Prince Edward Island and to a less degree in Nova Scotia—we receive no benefit from this agreement for this primary product. Someone may say that the seed potatoes receive some benefit. That is true, but it is not the seed potato that is the great commercial potato of the maritime provinces, and it is not the seed potato producer, but the producer of table potatoes who needed protection.

I rather hesitate to say anything regarding small fruits, vegetables, apples, and dairy products, which we produce very extensively in our province and the other provinces by the sea. What has been said by previous speakers applies also to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. We receive no benefit as far as these vegetables and small fruits are concerned. Our market will be open to the products of the United States, which will come in earlier than ours and satiate the appetite of the people in Montreal, Toronto and other places where we market much of our small fruits and vegetables.

Mention has also been made of the lumber industry. We in New Brunswick are greatly interested in lumber. Years ago the United States market was the best one we had, but on account of the duties which have been imposed against the lumber products of the maritime provinces that market was closed to us. The duty has now been lowered $2 per thousand feet, but anyone who is lumbering in New Brunswick to-day will tell you that it was not the producer of lumber in New Brunswick, but the consumer in the United States, who received the benefit of this lowering of duty, with the result that there is far less lumber being cut in New Brunswick to-day than there was a year ago. The only market we had is the market which we obtained through the Ottawa agreements. If it had not been for the Ottawa agreements, during the last three years the lumber industry in these provinces would have been practically dead. Only last week when I was home there were three ships loading lumber in Saint John, not for the United States but for England. A lumberman told me that he was selling one and a half million feet of lumber in England, and that during the last two or three years, and particularly since this agreement came into effect, he did not find it profitable to sell one stick of lumber in the United States.

Mr. RYAN: Will the hon. member tell us who told him that?

Mr. BROOKS: Yes, I will tell you any time you wish to know.

Mr. RYAN: Tell the house.

Mr. BROOKS: It is not necessary. Let me tell the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Ryan) that there are twenty-five members from the maritime provinces in this house and if they will inquire from their constituents they will be told that they have not received any benefit so far as this agreement is concerned. It is a well known fact that under the trade agreement the cities of Saint John and Halifax stand to lose a considerable amount of trade. This was trade that under most favoured nation agreements was compelled to come through these ports. Now it may go to the ports of Boston, New York or other points along the Atlantic coast.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg found something beneficial under the agreement. He said that as he was going through Nova Scotia he saw some men loading oxen to be sent to the United States to work in the woods. He added that it was a sight he had not seen for a long time. I can believe the hon. gentleman; may I add that probably it is a sight he will never see again. So far as we are concerned, the agreement is out of balance, and I believe people from our provinces will substantiate me in this statement. I was surprised to hear the hon. member defend the agreement. A few days ago, while making a speech in connection with seamen on British ships, he stated that he was particularly anxious to look after the interests of those men who went down to the sea in ships. I would say to him that there are thousands of men connected with the fishing industry in the maritime provinces who go down to the sea in ships, and I would ask the twenty-five members and the four ministers from the maritimes what was done in this agreement for those men who go down to the sea in ships in the fishing industry.

It is not my intention to say anything further than that, so far as the three maritime provinces are concerned, the agreement is very much out of balance. The reason there is such a large representation of government followers from the maritime provinces is that people down there were led to expect big things from the reciprocity agreement. They have been disappointed. Hon. members may have noticed that recently in the press there has been some talk of secession in the maritimes. May I say here and now that there is very little secession sentiment down there, but I do believe that during the last few weeks, born out of disappointment at the agreement, there has been secession talk. In the hearts of the people in the maritimes, however, there is neither the desire nor the intention to secede from the rest of Canada. We have made too great a contribution to the dominion even to think of such a thing. For the reasons I have stated it is my intention to oppose the agreement.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate with a deep sense of my lack of qualifications, but with a consciousness of the fact that if I did not raise my voice in support of the agreement I would be remiss in my duty to my constituents.

Before entering into a short discussion of some of my reasons for supporting the pact may I be permitted to extend to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) my sincere apologies for interrupting him while he was speaking. I did not intend the interruption to be an act of discourtesy, and if he considered it as such I apologize. I know he will be just as pleased as I was to learn that asparagus growers are this year receiving from the canners ten cents per pound, and not the four or five cents the hon. member feared they would be receiving.

May I be permitted to comment briefly on the observations of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). As I listened to him I could not but be deeply impressed by his sincerity and the experience behind his words, but I was surprised and almost startled to find that one of his experience in public life could be so far removed from and almost ignorant of the actual living conditions of the great mass of the common people, and I was further surprised to hear him express satisfaction with the trend of affairs in Canada in the last few years. Perhaps so far as our financial interests are concerned there is some reason for satisfaction, but surely when we consider the plight of our farmers and workers we find no cause for satisfaction. Great numbers of our people are on relief, with all its consequent hardship and distress. One worker in every eight is denied the right to earn for himself and his family an honest living. Without fear of contradiction I state that if it is necessary to sacrifice the welfare of the common people to salvage our financial institutions, the price is too great. If the time should come when I as a member of this house would have to choose between property rights and personal rights of the people, I would have no hesitancy in making my choice.

Listening to the speeches which have been made concerning the trade agreement it seems to me that the matters in dispute are brought down to a narrow compass. After brushing aside all the frills I believe the only real objections to the pact that I have heard are the two raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). May I deal first with his criticism of the weakness of our present tariff structure in so far as it applies to the intermediate tariff. In this connection he cited several items, but greatest stress has been placed upon cut flowers and potatoes. If I understood him correctly he blames the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for negotiating an agreement whereby, until a change is made in the tariff, certain articles will enter Canada duty free. I was interested to look back to ascertain who was responsible for the present weakness in tariff structure in so far as the intermediate schedule is concerned. Looking up the record I find that cut flowers constitute item 79b. I find that this tariff was under consideration and some amendment was made to it in the September session of 1930. Now who was the leader of the government in September, 1930? Who was responsible for our present tariff structure, which has recently been criticized, and for which the present government was almost blamed?

Coming to the other item of potatoes, also referred to in the debate, it is item 83 in the tariff, and there again I find that the tariff on potatoes was dealt with by the government on October 13, 1932. Now who was the leader of the government on October 13, 1932? I submit, sir, that our present Prime Minister did everything he could to protect the people of this country in respect to those items in regard to which our intermediate tariff structure is weak when he retained the right on behalf of the parliament of Canada to raise the intermediate tariff on any of these articles if it should be deemed necessary or advisable to do so, and I suggest to you, sir, that it is strange that the leader of the opposition should attempt to blame this government for something which his own government did. If there is any weakness in the structure of the intermediate tariff, who is to blame for that? Our whole tariff structure was rebuilt by the leader of the last government in this country. I am not suggesting that in 1930 when he did revamp the tariff structure he should have had foresight enough to see the dilemma he would be in to-day, but I do say that if there is anyone in the house who should not criticize this government for what somebody else's government did, it is the leader of the opposition.

Coming to the other criticism which has been levelled at the agreement by the leader of the opposition, there is no dispute as to the principle that freer trade between Canada and the United States is beneficial to both countries. There is also no dispute that when the previous government instituted negotiations for the purpose of arriving, if possible, at a trade pact with the United States those negotiations were instituted in full knowledge of the fact that the powers of the president of the United States were very much limited in their character, and by initiating those negotiations I suggest that the leader of the opposition impliedly accepted those restrictions and cannot now be heard to express any criticisms in regard to them. Therefore the whole matter narrows down to simply an expression of opinion by experts as to whether the bargain which has been made is a fair and square one, and just in that regard I would like to make this statement.

The Prime Minister believes he has negotiated an agreement which is fair and equitable to both Canada and the United States. Any trade agreement which is to be permanent in its character must of necessity be fair to both countries. On the other hand, the leader of the opposition believes that the agreement is ruinous to Canada; that it is an improvident one. Now, when we reach the point at which it is simply a matter of weighing opinions by experts, I suggest that perhaps the best way to do that is to look at the past efforts and the past results of both these tariff experts. Certainly they cannot both be right; one must be wrong, and only experience and trial will prove conclusively who is right. But I suggest that by looking over the record for the last few years we can form a pretty strong conclusion as to which of our tariff experts in this house is the leader we should follow.

In 1930, when appealing to the electors of this country the present leader of the opposition criticized very severely many conditions which existed in Canada at that time, and he blamed the government of the day for those conditions. Private individuals were not to blame; companies were not to blame; the government was to blame. Speaking at Sarnia on July 17, 1930, as reported in the Mail and Empire, the leader of the opposition said:

> Someone is responsible for unemployment, not individuals, but governments.

And he set himself up as a tariff expert and propounded the scheme that by raising tariffs he would bring prosperity to this country.

Again, speaking at Winnipeg, he said:

> Listen you agriculturists from the west. You have been taught to mock tariffs and applaud free trade. Tell me when did free trade fight for you. You say tariffs are only for the manufacturer. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets which have been closed to you.

Again, speaking at Moncton, on July 10, during the same election campaign he said:

Mr. King promises consideration of the problem of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment. Which policy do you like best?

All the way through his speeches in that campaign the government was to blame, and his government would improve conditions. Then at Saskatoon—and I think his Saskatoon speech was the masterpiece of them all—He said:

No doles, no gifts, no charity, but a chance to work, I say.

The whole story of the leader of the opposition was that we were importing from other countries millions of dollars' worth of goods that we should be making right here at home.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLEAVER: And he would raise the tariffs high enough to stop that importation of foreign goods so that our own workmen would make them in this country and we would all be prosperous. He was a good salesman. A majority of the Canadian people took his scheme at par value, and his party was swept into power with an overwhelming majority, with the result that in September of the same year, at a special fall sitting of the house, tariffs were raised for the express purpose of excluding those imports.

But there was one factor that the right hon. gentleman apparently forgot or did not think of. Statesmen, politicians, business men in other countries are just as clever as are our best men in Canada and are actuated by similar feelings—patriotism towards their own country, and good sound business principles. So that when we raised the tariff so high that we prevented our neighbours from selling to us, those very same tariff walls prevented us from exporting our own goods. International trade is nothing more or less than exchange of commodities. If we will not buy we cannot sell, and the result of five years' experimenting by the late government with high tariffs—I take my figures from the last Conservative budget of 1935—was this: Our trade dropped from a total of 2,506 million dollars in 1929 to about half of that amount, 1,292 million dollars, in 1935. This policy of high tariffs, instead of curing unemployment, has increased it four times. These figures are known to all hon. members. Though the world surplus of wheat has been cut in half, our surplus of wheat has doubled as a result of our trade policy. Our farmers are practically ruined. All types of business have suffered, excepting, of course, monopolies. The national debt has increased by 900 millions of dollars. Is it any wonder that when the people of Canada at last had an opportunity to vote they voted in no uncertain terms? They passed up and repudiated this policy of high protection. I believe the leader of the opposition has made a real contribution to the life of this country in that by the distress of the last five years he has taught us a lesson we will never forget. In the words of the Hamilton Spectator, a Conservative daily, high tariffs may profit a few people, but for the country at large they do not pay. They are artificial restraints on trade which put men out of work in all countries. After five years of bitter experience with the present leader of the opposition as our tariff expert, is it any wonder that the people rebelled and decided that they would change over?

Halton county, which I have the honour to represent, is sometimes considered as part of the garden of Canada. There is a large acreage under fruit and vegetables. During the past five years our growers asked for and received sufficient tariff protection to exclude all foreign fruits and vegetables from the Canadian market during the crop season. Notwithstanding the fact that they enjoyed a practically exclusive Canadian market during the crop season, this exclusive right turned out to be absolutely valueless. The very instrument which gave them that right was also depreciating the buying power of the general public so that the domestic market was of no use. Representing the fruit and vegetable growers of Halton county I am pleased to say that they are taking this pact on faith. It is quite true that in connection with potatoes and one or two other items amendments will have to be made because of the weakness of our intermediate tariff structure, but these growers know the Liberal party has never bartered away their rights; they know they have never suffered at the hands of that party and they are looking forward to the future with every confidence. In conclusion, on behalf of the people of Halton county I wish to extend to the Prime Minister and to the officials of his department who assisted him in the successful negotiation of this trade agreement our heartfelt thanks and congratulations.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, may I avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate you upon your election to the high office of Speaker of the House of Commons. Unlike many other hon. members, I cannot speak from past experience, but from my observations during the past few weeks I am satisfied that you have maintained the high traditions of the office that you have been called upon to fill. I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), the leader of the Reconstruction party. In his remarks to the house the other day he emphasized what I thought was a very important fact. He said that for twenty-five years he had sat with the party led by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and during that time he had supported sky-high protection. I think it is significant that at this session, the first after he had separated himself from that party and adopted an independent attitude, he should be convinced that it was his duty not only to his own constituents but to the citizens of Canada as a whole to support this United States-Canada trade agreement. I am sure that loyalty to their leader, loyalty to past traditions or something of that kind is responsible for the trend of some of the arguments advanced by hon. members to my immediate left.

Before discussing the details of this agreement I should like first to illustrate what I believe to be some important reasons why this House of Commons, as representative of the opinions of the Canadian people, should adopt the resolution moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which will give legal status to this agreement. One of the reasons why we believe this agreement should be adopted is the fact that in Canada we have developed very extensive facilities for transportation by rail and water. Both forms of transportation are capable of carrying increased tonnage and there are many unemployed transportation workers who will be given work as a result of the adoption of this agreement.

I am not going to maintain that this agreement will meet with the approval of every citizen of Canada. That would be impossible The conclusion of the empire trade agreements created a measure of dissatisfaction in certain quarters of Canada and the old land, and the same may be said of this agreement. However, we are satisfied that the adoption of this agreement will be in the best interests of the Canadian people as a whole. I am sure that it could never be concluded on the basis of satisfying each and every individual.

There is another reason why it will be advantageous to adopt this agreement. The investors of the United States have invested the huge total of four billion dollars in Canadian provincial, municipal, federal, business investments and securities. The annual interest and principal payments amount to approximately $240,000,000. I believe this exchange of international obligations has been one of the reasons why we have been able to conclude this agreement. The general recognition of the interdependence that exists between two countries lying alongside each other has made possible the final settlement of many items.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), in his speech the other day, argued that we should develop trade east and west. That is all very well; I agree that we must develop trade east and west. But in addition to that we must develop trade across the seas and we must develop trade north and south; for it is absolutely necessary that we should develop our trade from every possible angle in order to take care of the vast surpluses of primary products which we have in Canada.

One important feature of this Canada-United States trade agreement is the application of the most favoured nation clause whereby the dominion will receive the benefit of the intermediate tariff of the United States. I do not think there is any other country in the world that will derive as much benefit from the inclusion of that most favoured nation clause as will the dominion, because by this provision there have been made available the intermediate tariffs of a large number of countries in addition to the United States, and in any further treaties negotiated by that country Canada will indeed reap considerable benefit.

Since the discussion of this agreement started we have heard a good deal about trade balances. Trade balances are important; nevertheless I think I am within the bounds of truth in saying that we cannot set up trade balances as a barometer and declare that they constitute absolutely a measure whereby to judge the solvency or insolvency of a nation. Moreover, we must, in order to get a clear picture of trade balances, take into consideration the entire trade situation in any country. There are many other matters that enter into the prosperity of a nation or into the question of trade balances which the time at my disposal will not permit me to deal with just now.

I should like, however, to illustrate the point with a few commodities. We will have imported in the first three months of 1936, approximately $1,000,000 worth of oranges alone, and in the last fiscal year we imported of that one commodity $5,000,000 worth. If we consider a great many items not produced or manufactured in Canada, it is inevitable that over a period of years we shall expect from our neighbour to the south perhaps a substantial difference in the trade balance. But we have the tourist traffic and several other items to counterbalance that. I mention the tourist traffic, that may not amount to a very great deal in this agreement except the right granted to Canadian citizens to go to the United States and bring back $100 worth of commodities free of duty. But in the riding I have the honour to represent there is a district the citizens of which moved in at the time that lumbering operations were in full swing. Now, however, the timber is pretty well gone; we have the citizens, and the tourist traffic is about the only means of livelihood, during a considerable part of the year, so far as these people are concerned. If, therefore, through trade agreements or in any other way we can create a better spirit of good will between these two great peoples, north and south, I am sure this district will reap considerable benefit. I desire to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), and this may be aside from the question, but I would point out to the minister that in this territory it is necessary, in order to facilitate the movement of tourists, to improve certain trunk roads, and I trust that in the supplementary estimates some provision will be made whereby a scheme can be worked out by which, at least during a part of the year, the people living in the tourist area, without suitable land from which to earn their entire livelihood, may be given some employment to assist them in the education of their children and to help them to maintain a reasonable standard of living.

To my mind, this agreement is not based upon the idea that one country is receiving a great deal more benefit than is the other, nor do I think it was negotiated in that spirit. It seems to me that a safe, sound, sane trade agreement must be based upon the principle of mutual advantage to the two countries involved; and if the agreement is going to last; if it is to be renewed, that is the only basis upon which it can be satisfactorily negotiated. I therefore congratulate the Prime Minister upon the attitude he has taken towards the entire negotiation and all the procedure connected with the trade agreement, which I believe will be of lasting benefit to the dominion.

There is another point of view to be considered. Hon. gentlemen to my left are inclined to emphasize the position of the industrial worker. The riding which I represent embraces agricultural interests, lumber interests, tourist interests and also some important industrial interests. I want to point out—and I believe this will bear the searchlight of this house—that during the period in which the more elastic trade policies of the government now in office have been in force the industrial workers of the dominion have not suffered to the same extent that they suffered during the last five years by reason of the extreme policy adopted by the government that was in office prior to October 14.

There is another angle of this industrial worker situation that I think we must not overlook. We have in this dominion a potential home consumers' market that is very much affected by the prosperity of the people who are engaged in the primary industries. One of the great needs of the industrial worker to-day is increased purchasing power of those who are employed in the wealth-producing activities of the nation. Therefore when you negotiate an agreement that has a tendency to increase the purchasing power of the people engaged in actual production, this is sure to be reflected in such a way as to assist the industrial workers of Canada.

As I have not time to conclude my address, and it is five minutes to eleven, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 6, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) presented the second report of the special committee on elections and franchise acts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are several sections in the bill which are necessary in view of the supplementary note appended to the trade agreement with the United States. We agreed that we would make certain amendments to our Customs Act, and sections of the bill indicate the amendments to be made. Then, there are in it several other miscellaneous sections which are designed mainly to strengthen the hand of the preventive service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

ADMINISTRATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND PROVISION FOR NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the establishment of a commission, to be known as the national employment commission, to supervise or administer the expenditure of funds voted by parliament for unemployment relief and for providing employment, and for other purposes related thereto; and to provide for fees or compensation and for the travelling and living expenses of the commissioners, for the salaries of the secretary and other employees of the commission, and also for the travelling and living expenses of the members of a national advisory committee.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS

APPROVAL OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL RESPECTING TRANSFERS OF LAND

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of the Interior) moved:

That the orders in council made between the 1st day of January, 1935, and the 31st day of December, 1935, under the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 113, R.S.C. 1927, and which were laid on the table on the 10th February, 1936, be approved.

He said: By way of explanation may I say that the chapter of the Dominion Lands Act mentioned in the resolution provides that transfers of land by order in council are to be laid on the table of the house at the opening of each session of parliament. That provision was complied with on February 10. I have not examined them all, but I know they relate to the transfer of some odd parcels of land, in carrying out the agreement made with the western provinces. In some cases they relate to leases of small areas in the northwest territories used for fur farming, and that sort of thing. I believe they are all in order. The statute requires that the house formally pass a resolution, approving these orders in council, and it is now submitted.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with, perhaps the Minister of Railways will give us some idea when we may expect the annual report of the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I am told that the annual report will be in my hands towards the end of next week, and it will be tabled when received.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): May I ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar) a question? The soldier settlement amending act of 1933, which adopted the policy of what is generally known as dollar for dollar rebates on land payments, expires this month. Owing to the depression many people were not able to take advantage of it, and the soldiers are very anxious to know if the government have any intention of extending the life of the act.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was good enough to intimate to me yesterday that he was going to ask this question. In reply, I may say that it is the intention of the government to bring down legislation extending the period for at least two years—I am delighted with the reception which that announcement receives—to enable returned soldiers to take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus policy. That has been done because crop losses, in the western provinces particularly, have been very severe and prices low. The same conditions obtain in British Columbia and other provinces, and in the opinion of the department it is only fair that a further opportunity should be given to the soldiers to take advantage of the bonus plan.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The rights and privileges of members of this house are sacred, and I regret very much to read in the official report of the Senate the remarks that have been made in the other chamber about the work that has been done by this house. I cannot read in full the text of the speeches delivered by the leader of the government in the Senate, but he blamed this house for not passing legislation quickly enough, and not sending enough legislation forward to the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend knows that proceedings in another house should not be made the subject of discussion in this house. I think the hon. member is out of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree, but they did not pass the two line bill to abolish the economic council.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 3, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

He said: I might explain in a few words, Mr. Speaker, that the changes made by the Senate in the bill to amend the Franchise Act are not very material and deal merely with its phraseology. The purpose of the bill is not changed at all. It will be remembered that the purpose of the bill was to postpone the revision of the electoral list for one year, and in the original bill passed by this house the date 1937 was substituted for 1935. The Senate have thought in their wisdom that it was better to keep to the original wording, 1935, adding the words, "except in the year one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six." They have made that change in section 20, and also suggest that it should be made in section 22 of the bill. The purpose of the bill remains exactly the same, and although the amendments are not very material I think we should accept them.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact is that the Senate has rewritten the bill, and I think it more adequately expresses the will of this house than did the original bill.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed from Thursday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty's government in the Dominion of Canada and the government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, continuing my remarks on the motion before the house, I desire to place on record the percentage of reductions in the tariff on certain canadian primary products entering the United States market. They are as follows: Live stock, 33⅓ to 50 per cent; grass and clover seed, 50 per cent; turnips, 50 per cent; hay, 40 per cent; live poultry, 50 per cent; dressed poultry, 40 per cent; leather, 20 per cent; lumber, 50 per cent.

One of the most important items in the entire pact is the concessions granted to the live stock industry, based on the average number of cattle slaughtered each year in the United States, which gives an estimated quota of approximately 227,700 head of Canadian cattle. While I agree that a larger quota would be desirable, a breakdown of the figures gives us the following result, provided that full advantage is taken of the quota. We have three major cattle markets in the Dominion of Canada—Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. Divide the total quota by fifty-two, the number of weekly markets, and you get the number that may be shipped each week throughout the year from each of these markets. It means that 1,450 head of cattle may be shipped at the reduced rates to the United States from each of these three major markets throughout the entire year. I think that the average person who has a knowledge of market conditions as they affect the live stock industry must agree that during the last two or three years, with the congested condition that has affected the live stock markets of this dominion, if 1,450 head of cattle could have been lifted from each of our three major markets every week, a total of 4,350 head, it would have been of material benefit to our hard pressed live stock producers. I believe, sir, that the circumstances surrounding the cattle industry in this dominion for the last three or four years warrant some action being taken by the government to bring about a measure of relief, if possible, and I think we should be prepared to leave it to the judgment of the live stock industry of Canada to say whether or not this concession is of value to the industry.

There is one other point that I desire to emphasize, when trade declines, customs revenue declines, and then it is necessary to increase taxation or increase the debt, either of which places an additional burden on the people. I believe the increasing trade that will surely follow will relieve the Canadian taxpayer to some extent.

The reduced rates on imports have been criticized in some quarters, but they represent a measure of relief to the consumers of goods in this dominion. There is one further point we must stress. The endorsement of a Canada-United States treaty does not weaken one thread in the bond that binds us to the mother country as the senior dominion in this commonwealth of British nations. Intra-empire trade will remain the corner stone of the fiscal policy of the Liberal party, yet we must never lose sight of the importance of other potential world markets.

When I hear the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) ask, "Why could we not get the full fifty per cent reduction with respect to cattle and other commodities of that nature?" I realize why for a period of five years two and a half months the government under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman failed to negotiate a treaty with the United States. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) referred to the sales resistance which existed in connection with the marketing of Canada's wheat. After hearing the remarks of some hon. members and taking into consideration the fact that this treaty was not completed prior to the present administration coming into office, I am satisfied that there existed in certain quarters, and perhaps in the fiscal policy of the opposition, a trade resistance that reacted against the best interests of the primary producers of this dominion.

In conclusion, let me say that if the present government had followed the course advocated by the official opposition, they would have betrayed the trust placed in them by the electors of this dominion on October 14 last.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is quite gratifying to me to be able to remember and to look back on the many trade benefits that flowed from the passage of the first reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States, sometimes known as the Elgin-Marcy reciprocity treaty, which died shortly after in 1866, a fact much regretted by the people of Canada as a whole. I remember also the great depression which followed thereafter, more prolonged and deepseated than anything Canada has seen since, with the exception of the one through which we are now struggling. With these thoughts still fresh in my memory, it is with considerable pleasure that I find myself after seventy long years, rejoicing with those who do rejoice at the birth of a second reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States. But seventy years is a long time between trade liberation drinks with next door neighbours. Now that the government has turned its hand so auspiciously to the removing of some of these trade fetters, let those of us who are like minded in this respect encourage, yea urge them on if necessary to greater feats in this direction. Possibly this joy and gratification I am experiencing is one of the compensating benefits which sometimes come with advancing years.

When I listened to the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who was followed by the booming support from Toronto and elsewhere, I was reminded of the fact that there was no opposition whatever to the first reciprocity treaty, which was in existence from 1854 to 1866. I have not the exact figures, but I believe in 1854 Canada was at least eighty per cent rural. At least that percentage of the population of Canada were in favour of reciprocal trade with the United States, and so far as I can find out there was really no opposition to the first agreement. Montreal, Toronto, the maritime provinces, Ontario, Quebec, all of Canada of that day, were in favour of this agreement. What has happened since then? The manufacturing industry in Canada was very primitive in 1854 but these interests have grown rapidly since then. It is quite natural that they should want to preserve Canada as a market for their manufactures by a stiff tariff which has enabled them to sell cheaper to foreigners than they do to their own people. They want it and the farmers do not want it, and there lies the difference.

After listening to our Conservative friends lauding this form of agreement with the United States for two years, I was quite amazed to see them loop the loop and vehemently attack this treaty. My first thought was that they had gone back on their former conversion, but when I come to think of it they never really were converted. They just wanted to give the people something that would distract their attention from their own shortcomings. I do not say that it is wrong to try to please the people, but it would have looked far more seemly if they had stayed with their new love for a little while. At least they should have supported the principle of this resolution. Surely it would not have torn their protectionist hearts asunder to have done that. They could have gone after the details as much as they liked, but they should have supported the principle. I am afraid their conversion at least was not like the conversion of Paul on the way to Damascus; possibly it more resembles Lot's wife when looking back on stricken Sodom.

I have no ill will against the Conservative party. We must have an opposition, and I should hate to see them commit political hari-kari by opposing this trade agreement. We do not know what would follow if another opposition took their place. I see a new party over there which has not yet won its spurs; they are strange to me and I still prefer even the Tory opposition to them as an opposition. We know what the Conservatives are and stand for, while the others so far belong largely to the unknown.

I am really at a loss to know how to explain the present attitude of the Conservative party. I have had many trimmings myself in my life and I know what it is to be defeated; I know what it is now to win, and I can therefore feel magnanimous. But even at this late day I would ask the Conservatives this question: Would it not be more logical for them to join with the government in support of this resolution? We do not need any further majority; we have in all conscience a large enough one now. But would it not be better for the house, would it not be more consistent on their part, would it not create a better feeling throughout the country for them to join with us in supporting this resolution than to put themselves in the position of having, so to speak, looped the loop so quickly with their newly adopted baby. In fact, I think it was a kidnap which they made from the Liberal nursery; but kidnapping is not as popular as it used to be and is much more dangerous —they found it dangerous. Their movement in the direction of reciprocity, never believed in by them, was made for the same purpose for which the wonderful radio addresses were given—to please the people. Of course, there is no great harm in that, but I think that propriety would have justified them in staying with the agreement, at least to the extent of supporting the principle of this resolution.

And now a word or two with regard to some of the amazing statements of the leader of the opposition. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) disposed most successfully of the more vulnerable parts of the right hon. gentleman's speech and I will now refer to the statement he made—it will be found in Hansard—that had it not been for the tariff increases against both the United States and Great Britain in 1930 there would have been no possibility of any kind of treaty in 1935 and 1936. History does not support that statement. At no time in the history of Canada did any party ever enter into a reciprocity agreement, either with the United States or with Great Britain, after previously running the tariff up to a sky-high point of elevation in order to use that as a bargaining feature except the Conservative party in 1930, and what it did then did not work out as anticipated. If we are to give credit to the one who put up the tariff, on the ground stated by the leader of the opposition, then we might as well say that had it not been for that robber band in the eastern land who fell upon that historic traveller on his way from Jerusalem to Jericho, there would have been no story about the Good Samaritan and therefore we should give credit to the robber. We might as well say that as to say that had it not been for the high tariff devotee and addict who was at the helm of state in Canada in 1930 there would be no reciprocal agreement to-day. Of course that is nonsense.

I rather regret the necessity of having had to add these few words to an already prolonged debate, but I felt that it was my duty to speak because of the great importance of the question. We shall have a further opportunity of dealing with the subject, but I will conclude these few remarks by again expressing my appreciation of the action of the ministry in affording me an opportunity to see this day with its evidence, as revealed in this agreement, of returning sanity and common sense with respect to questions of trade between nations whose interests are best promoted not by the erection of high and repelling tariffs and by other trade impediments, as if trade were some evil thing to be feverishly shunned instead of a great blessing to be pursued and sought after diligently. Rather should we trade as freely as possible, especially with our adjoining neighbour, consistent with our respective mutual interests and with the public revenue requirements of our own country.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I always listen with a good deal of interest and amusement to the addresses of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), who has just entertained the house with a brief jocular comment upon this trade agreement. He says he rejoices that after this long lapse of time separating agreements between Canada and the United States we are now about to consummate another. I cannot help thinking that my hon. friend's rejoicing must have a tinge of regret in it, namely, that between the years 1920 and 1930 no agreement of this kind was negotiated, nor were attempts made, as far as I know, to bring one about. Then he speaks about the tariff and seems to suggest that it is a harmful influence and that the protective principle in it is wrong. Well, all I have to do, I think, is to point out to him and to the members of this house that from 1896 until 1911 the protective principle of the tariff was maintained by the Liberal party, and that between the years 1920 and 1930 the same principle was maintained by the same party.

He also thinks that we on this side would be well advised to join with the government in supporting this agreement. I know that advice was given in the kindliest spirit, but after all we have our responsibilities. We have our duty to perform, and I am sure he will agree that this is a question upon which there may be an honest difference of opinion. And looking back again I think that, in view of what has happened, my hon. friend must regret that in 1932 when there was before this house for ratification the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, which so largely extended and developed the trade of this country, particularly in the interests of the agriculturist, which my hon. friend with such ability always espouses—I say again that perhaps when he recalls the opposition of his party, including himself, to that agreement, there is a tinge of regret in his recollection.

I shall proceed to a consideration of this agreement. The trade agreement which is the subject of this debate has been before the people of Canada for some months, but it is only since the debate began in this house that there has been that keen, critical analysis of it, that examination of its provisions, that will enable hon. members and the people of Canada to come to a conclusion as to its merits. As good citizens we all desire to approach any proposal for the extension of the trade of Canada with sympathy and with the desire to give approval wherever such approval can be given without damage to our agricultural and industrial development. At the same time we must keep alert for the purpose of discovering and if possible avoiding errors in connection with any attempted extension of our trade. We must be sure that we are getting a fair return for any advantages which we are extending to our neighbour, no matter how good that neighbour may be or how desirable it may be to extend our trade in every direction.

The historical review of the negotiations for trade with the United States has been made from two standpoints. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his very complete exposition of this agreement, traced back the development or lack of development of trade between Canada and the United States for a period of fifty years. He came to the conclusion that on the record the Liberal party were more favourable to development of trade in this direction than the Conservative party.

[Mr. Stewart.]

But the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) supplemented the information given to the house by the Prime Minister and demonstrated, I believe beyond question, that the Conservative party had an equally honourable and equally favourable record in the matter of a disposition and a desire to extend our trade relations with the United States. Going back to confederation, to the declaration of the national policy, to the declarations of the Liberal leaders themselves, and looking at the matter from every standpoint, I think that honours in that direction are about even. I cannot understand how any member of the Conservative party at the present time, or any one who has been a member of it and is familiar with its traditions, familiar with its declarations of policy and the efforts it has made, can say that it has not been in favour of reciprocal trade relations with the United States.

Let us be fair about it. Both historic parties, and let me say all parties, recognize the value of trade and of markets for our products. No party has the monopoly in that respect. It would be strange indeed if any one party should have the exclusive possession of a disposition to trade, to extend our present markets and to develop new ones.

There are two great markets to which the Canadian people have always looked: one is in Great Britain and the other is in the United States. In both of those directions each of the two parties has made honest and sincere attempts to bring about favourable trade arrangements. The Liberal party endeavoured to bring about preferential trade, endeavoured to bring about a reciprocity agreement with the United States. Both parties failed, in large measure, until recently. The first outstanding success was that achieved by the late government, led by the present leader of the opposition, in the successful negotiation of the United Kingdom agreement. I say that was the first outstanding success, the first outstanding achievement in securing an extended market for Canada in the United Kingdom.

I do not desire to enlarge upon the results of the Canada-United Kingdom agreement. Any honest, fairminded citizen, looking back on conditions as they were in 1932, looking at the volume of trade at that time, and studying the statistics as they are now disclosed to us, must come to the conclusion that at a difficult time, a critical time, a time of great depression not only in Canada but all over the world, these agreements have been of significant advantage to the people of Canada. They deserved better support than they received in this house when they were before parliament for approval, and they vindicated the faith and the vision of those who were responsible for their negotiation.

The basis of negotiations for the present agreement between Canada and the United States was prepared also by the former government. A change came about in conditions in the United States, a change, I think, of attitude of mind, a greater disposition on the part of the United States to trade more freely with Canada than she had shown during a period of ten years, particularly between 1920 and 1930. I think we may truthfully say that that disposition to trade more generously with Canada was to a large extent due to the negotiation of the Canada-United Kingdom agreements. Be that as it may, there was undoubtedly a change in the attitude of the United States towards Canada, and, as soon as the president secured from congress authority to negotiate, the matter was taken up by the former government in earnest, a communication was presented, and from that time on negotiations proceeded. Upon the basis so laid, upon the opening thus made, this agreement—whether we agree with it in its conclusions or not—was undoubtedly founded.

There are many hon. gentlemen in this house who contend that the tariff policy of the Conservative party is one of extremely high tariffs. I am sure we have heard that throughout Canada, particularly in the last five years. If I had time I could put on Hansard a comparison and analysis of the tariff of Canada as compared with the tariffs of other countries, such as Germany, France, the United States and even Great Britain, and the tariff of Canada as compared with the tariffs of these other countries is not a high tariff. During the budget debate I hope to have an opportunity of developing this point a little further. A couple of years ago I spent some time on it, and I was pleased indeed to find, notwithstanding the allegations that the tariff policy of the Conservative party was almost exclusive, that when compared with the tariffs of other countries that charge was not well founded. Undoubtedly during the depression, from 1929 to 1932 and 1934, measures were taken to increase the tariff, but the reason for these increases has been given. They were emergency measures, taken to preserve the financial integrity of the Dominion of Canada, and many who are capable of judging the situation better than I are confident that if these measures had not been taken, disaster would have been the result.

Tariff increases have been made, and there is also a belief on the part of many hon. members that if you increase the tariff you increase the cost of articles protected by the tariff. They believe on the other hand that if you would only reduce the tariff you would reduce the cost. Well, we have had a striking answer to that contention; recently in this house we had a debate on the price of agricultural implements, and during that debate the history of these prices over a period of years was reviewed. It has been shown by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the house that a reduction in the tariff in more than one instance has resulted in an increase in the price. They are so convinced of the soundness of their theory that tariff increases always increase prices that now they are asking for an investigation to find out how it is that a reduction in the tariff has resulted in an increased price.

On entering into these negotiations with the United States, Mr. Speaker, I think we must keep in mind that the United States has certain undoubted advantages. In the first place it has a population of 120,000,000 people. I have heard hon. gentlemen on the other side contend that the United States presented an outstanding example of the success of free trade, that in that country we had the spectacle of 120,000,000 people trading freely between themselves. In the days of prosperity this was pointed to as a vindication of the policy of free trade. But what has happened? We find that in time of depression this great mass of people suffered just as severely as those countries that were not in that happy position. I want to point out that the United States comes very close to obtaining the advantages of both free trade and protection. It has free trade between 120,000,000 people, but around that 120,000,000 people it has the advantage of a very high tariff wall. They have the advantage of cheap mass production; they have a climate favourable to the production of nearly all their own requirements, and at any and all times they are ready with a surplus of natural and manufactured products to export into the markets of the world.

We entered the negotiations under certain restricted conditions. Congress gave the President of the United States authority to negotiate trade agreements, but with the caution usually displayed by that nation they put certain restrictions upon him lest he might go too far. They said he could reduce the tariff, which was a high tariff, by only fifty per cent, that no article on the dutiable list should be placed on the free list, and that from the nations with whom he made agreements they must receive favoured nation treatment. There was also a limit of three years placed upon the life of such agreements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The favoured nation treatment was domestic policy, was it not? It was not part of the statute restricting the president?

Mr. STEWART: I am not sure of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it was a matter of domestic policy.

Mr. STEWART: I thank my right hon. friend; I thought that was imposed on the president by congress. However, it was there; it was one of the limitations placed upon him in his negotiations. In consideration of these facts, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we were entitled to ask for and receive from the United States the full measure of the limited concessions the president was authorized to grant. Now let us look at this agreement and see what Canada gets and what Canada gives, because that is the basis on which we must judge.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt for just a moment? Does my hon. friend say he thinks we ought to get all that the president could have given under the powers congress granted? That would be a fifty per cent reduction on everything.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, I would think so; I would suggest that we should have got that. Canada gets concessions on cattle. I do not propose to deal with that matter, because there are others in the house more familiar with that trade than I am, but here is a quota which, as I understand it, limits our exports of cattle to the United States to approximately one in every hundred that are slaughtered in that country. Surely, with regard to only one per cent of their consumption, we might have expected our cattle to be allowed in free. In any case we get a reduction on cattle, to the value of $11,400,000. In connection with cream we also have a quota of 1,500,000 gallons, valued at $5,200,000. We get concessions on $2,300,000 worth of maple sugar; on seeds, $2,000,000; on other agricultural products, $4,200,000; on fish, $4,800,000; on lumber, $38,000,000; on minerals, $5,800,000; on whiskey, $82,000,000, and on miscellaneous commodities, $5,000,000, making total concessions of about $160,000,000 worth of trade. It is clear that the United States always liked our whiskey. They were short of it and needed our production, and it is possible that in any event they would have taken the quantity mentioned.

Then we get down to the items that are unchanged and upon which we get no concessions, but in respect of which a guarantee is given that there shall not be any increase in tariff during the life of the agreement.

Let us see what Canada gives, as compared with what she gets. She gives concessions on oranges to the value of $21,000,000; fruits and vegetables, $11,000,000; canned meats, $3,000,000; corn, $8,000,000; other agricultural products, $4,000,000; farm implements, $40,000,000; machinery, $25,800,000; iron and steel, $15,700,000; household goods, $11,000,000; electric motors, $6,900,000; periodicals, $4,000,000, and other merchandise $16,000,000. The intermediate tariff is imposed upon textiles and clothing to the value of $24,800,000; furniture, $3,500,000; consumers' goods, $8,000,000; automobiles, $26,000,000; gasoline, $18,000,000; automobile parts, $56,000,000, and automobile engines, $11,700,000.

In connection with dairy products, in which I am particularly interested, I find that a rate of thirty-five cents per gallon still remains against Canadian cream, and the quota is limited to 1,500,000 gallons. I do not expect that this will be of very great advantage to the farmers of eastern Canada. The rate of five cents per pound on cheese is the same. When we remember that the domestic market of Canada consumes between eighty per cent and ninety per cent of these agricultural products, and that we are granting concessions upon fruits and vegetables, I think it is doubtful if there will be much advantage gained from these agreements by the farmers of eastern Canada.

The agreement has been defined as a step in the right direction. Before we make any decision I should like to know in which direction we are going. Is it a step in the direction of an adverse trade balance? If it is, it is a step in the wrong direction. It is said that the agreement removes obstructions in channels of trade. Undoubtedly it removes obstructions in the channel of trade that will flow into Canada from the United States. It is said that it is an effort to destroy economic nationalism. Well, when 10,000,000 people start out to destroy the demon economic nationalism they are undertaking a big task, and while we hope they may have some success I would be very careful about expecting too much in this direction.

The opinions of others as to the value to Canada of the trade agreement may be worth consideration. Without quoting in full I should like to refer to the comment of Professor Brebner, of Columbia university, which has already appeared on Hansard. In the United States there is a body of opinion that the agreement is perhaps more favourable to that country than it is to Canada. There is one feature of the agreement however to which I should like to refer briefly. May I draw the attention of hon. members to three articles in the agreement relating to its life, with special reference to duration and termination. Article XV is as follows:

The entire agreement shall come into force on the day of the exchange of the proclamation and ratification at Ottawa. The agreement shall remain in force until December 31, 1938, subject to the provisions of article VII, article X and article XIV.

Unless at least six months before December 31, 1938, the government of either country shall have given to the other government notice of intention to terminate the agreement on that date, the agreement shall remain in force thereafter, subject to the provisions of article VII, article X and article XIV, until six months from such time as the government of either country shall have given notice to the other government.

In other words the article states that the agreement shall remain in force for three years, and thereafter be subject to six months' notice. Other significant articles must be read in conjunction with article XV. I shall refer first to article VII:

No prohibitions, import or customs quotas, import licences, or any other form of quantitative regulation, whether or not operated in connection with any agency of centralized control, shall be imposed by Canada on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States of America enumerated and described in schedule I, nor by the United States of America on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated and described in schedule II, except as specifically provided for in the said schedules.

Then follows the significant paragraph:

The foregoing provision shall not apply to quantitative restrictions in whatever form imposed by either country on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of the other country in conjunction with governmental measures operating to regulate or control the production, market supply, or prices of like domestic articles, or tending to increase the labour costs of production of such articles. Whenever the government of either country proposes to establish or change any restriction authorized by this paragraph, it shall give notice thereof in writing to the other government and shall afford such other government an opportunity within thirty days after receipt of such notice to consult with it in respect of the proposed action; and if an agreement with respect thereto is not reached within thirty days following receipt of the aforesaid notice, the government which proposes to take such action shall be free to do so at any time thereafter, and the other government shall be free within fifteen days after such action is taken to terminate this agreement in its entirety on thirty days' written notice.

Article X reads:

In the event that a wide variation occurs in the rate of exchange between the currencies of Canada and the United States of America, the government of either country, if it considers the variation so substantial as to prejudice the industries or commerce of the country, shall be free to propose negotiations for the modification of this agreement; and if an agreement with respect thereto is not reached within thirty days following receipt of such proposal, the government making such proposal shall be free to terminate this agreement in its entirety on thirty days' written notice.

And article XIV:

The government of each country reserves the right to withdraw or to modify the concession granted on any article under this agreement, or to impose quantitative restrictions on any such article if, as a result of the extension of such concession to third countries, such countries obtain the major benefit of such concession and in consequence thereof an unduly large increase in importations of such article takes place: Provided, that before the government of either country shall avail itself of the foregoing reservation, it shall give notice in writing to the other government of its intention to do so, and shall afford such other government an opportunity within thirty days after receipt of such notice to consult with it in respect of the proposed action and in respect of such compensatory modifications of the terms of the present agreement as may be appropriate; and if an agreement with respect thereto is not reached within thirty days following the receipt of the aforesaid notice, the government which proposes to take such action shall be free to do so at any time thereafter, and the other government shall be free within fifteen days after such action is taken to terminate this agreement in its entirety on thirty days' written notice.

There are three opportunities, Mr. Speaker, for the termination of this agreement, three avenues of escape, three doors of opportunity for terminating it. In view of the fact that there has been in the United States regulation and restriction under the NRA, which, although for the moment out of the picture, will probably be replaced by other legislation of the same effect, there are elements of danger and uncertainty and instability inherent in this agreement which make its termination almost probable, indeed which almost invite its termination on fifteen or thirty days' notice. I suggest that a comparison be made of the provisions for abrogation of this agreement with the relevant provisions of the United Kingdom agreement, which provide only for consultation.

I see that my time has almost expired, and I shall therefore summarize my objections to this agreement.

The agreement covers a long list of commodities, but on the whole, while it is broad in that respect, it is shallow in its concessions to Canada. Most of the rates of the United States tariff are still so high that little benefit will result. Many of our industrial plants will be forced to close, particularly United States branch factory plants. Unemployment with all its hardships will be increased; the investment of capital in industry in Canada will be discouraged; the home market, which absorbs from eighty to ninety per cent of our agricultural products, will be contracted because of decreased purchasing power at home; our railways will suffer decreased revenues because of the possibility of much freight coming in through ports other than our maritime ports. Let us remember this also, that when you import a ton of manufactured products from the United States or any other country our railways have just one haul of that ton, but if it is a ton of commodities manufactured in this country I am told that it represents the haulage of three or four or five tons of freight as against only one ton of a completely manufactured imported article. The development of this three or four or five tons is brought about through the assembling of raw material and everything that goes into the manufacture of the fininshed article.

In return for the concession we are granting to the United States of our intermediate tariff we should get a full fifty per cent reduction all along the line.

This agreement, I believe, will render it more difficult to renew and extend the provisions of the Canada–United Kingdom agreement. The agreement, the provisions for the termination of which I have already referred to, is limited in its life to three years, making its operation uncertain and almost inviting its termination. For these and other reasons which I propose to give more in detail when we come to deal with the different items, I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with pleasure to my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart). I have always liked him personally and I am not likely to change my mind after listening to the rather effective speech which he delivered this afternoon on the wrong side of a very important question.

[Mr. Stewart.]

My hon. friend tells us that the Conservative party still has faith in protection, but faith without works is but a dead thing, and I wonder how many years they would go before their faith brought forth any fruit.

My hon. friend also tells us that the tariff does not always raise the price of a commodity, but there is a peculiar thing I might mention in this connection. I attended 175 tariff board hearings, and never once did I hear a manufacturer come before the tariff board and say: Will you please lower the tariff which I have enjoyed so that the price of the commodity I produce may be raised? Nor have I ever heard one say: Will you raise the tariff on the raw material which I use in order that I may get it at a lower price?

I want to suggest this to my hon. friend, who made some prophecies at the close of his address. He prophesied an increase in unemployment, a loss of revenue to the railways, and many other things. We are friends personally and I want him to invite me to his constituency for the next election. There the first thing I shall do, and I warn him now, is to look up Hansard and read the speech which he delivered this afternoon, and ask him how many of his prophecies have come true. I shall ask him at that time, when he will be prophesying some more, what is going to happen to his prophecies of 1940 or 1941, seeing that he prophesied so badly in 1936.

There is a rather peculiar mood in Toryism which I never can understand. The leaders suggest eternally upon every platform that we are always in danger when we trade with a nation larger than our own; that we are a nation of ten or eleven millions alongside a nation of 127 millions; and I often wonder how a unit of 127 millions manages to survive because it must trade with the world! Does anyone imagine that we would be better off if the United States should be towed away from its present moorings to-morrow and placed alongside the continent of Australia. I venture to say that we would lose many of the comforts and many of the enjoyments which we now have. We would lose the markets which we sorely need, and what would be a loss to Canada would certainly be Australia's gain.

Many strange doctrines have been brought forth by my hon. friends immediately to the left. One is that we have given away too much. A representative of the government which was in power in this country for five years and which raised the tariff as high as it could possibly be raised, announces now that it was raised for the purpose of affording an opportunity for bargaining with other nations. But when a bargain is at last consummated by a new government, he tells the house, "You have given away everything; we have nothing left to give away!" When our taxes are reduced do we consider that we are giving away something or that we are getting something? I believe I have a sounder criticism to make of my hon. friends of my own political faith, and I intend to drive that home both here and throughout the country whenever I have an opportunity. My challenge to them is that they did not give away quite enough, that many of these tariffs are now atrociously high. The tariff on agricultural implements has been reduced from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent. This is half what it was under the previous government, but it is still double what it was under their government which was in power in 1929 and 1930. I should like to give particulars of some of these reductions—permit me to put on my glasses so that I can give them exactly, because many of them are very small.

On February 6, 1935, the laid down cost of artificial silk fabrics amounted to 83¼ per cent. On January 1, 1936, this cost was 73 per cent, but when the Liberals went out of power it was only 37¾ per cent. On cotton fabrics the rate has been reduced from 48½ per cent to 42½ per cent, but when the Liberals left office it was only 32¼ per cent. On cotton towels the total duty has been reduced from 60¾ per cent to 53¾ per cent, but in September, 1930, it was only 32¼ per cent. The laid down cost in February, 1935, of cut tobacco was 120 per cent; in January, 1936, it was also 120 per cent, but in September, 1930, it was 102½ per cent. There is another item here of particular interest at Christmas time. Our Conservative friends raised the duty on toys coming from the United States from 32 per cent, as it was in September, 1930, to 53¾ per cent in February, 1935, and the Liberals have only had the good conscience to bring it down to 42½ per cent. I would be quite willing to sacrifice at least two-thirds of this duty, and in doing that I do not think we would be doing too much.

There have been some gains, small though they may be. A friend of mine purchased a sprayer the other day and I wired him to find out what his saving had been. I received a wire in reply stating that the sprayer had been laid down at Burlington with a saving of $189. I submit that my friend Paul Fisher of Burlington who purchased this sprayer at a saving of $189 does not think that anything of his has been given away. The Liberal party leaders have allied themselves with Paul Fisher in attempting to reduce his costs and improve the quality of the fruit which he grows by giving him a sprayer at a lower price. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) ally themselves with the caterpillar and the codling moth to destroy Paul Fisher's crop.

We have secured access to the American market for our cattle. I have a friend in my constituency who is a fairly large dealer in cattle. I had a letter from him the other day in which he says:

> I have brought down from the west 400 head of cattle. We are feeding about 150 head, and with the feed so plentiful expect to have them in good shape. This U.S. deal has certainly helped us. When we go to Toronto with our cattle and the buyers turn us down, it makes them stand up and look when we have them billed to Buffalo.

I submit that by this agreement very material help is being given to our friends who are farming and who are endeavouring to make money by feeding cattle on the farms of Ontario. They now have two markets where formerly they had only one. I imagine that my hon. friend the Reconstruction party in this house, the hon. gentleman who was anxious that the farmers should have a little more, will be pleased with this one item by which we have given to the farmer a broader market and an increased opportunity to obtain higher prices.

We learn from our hon. friends on the Conservative side that we have done something deadly because we have endangered our balance of trade. I have said time and time again that more nonsense has been spoken in this house about balances of trade than about any other single matter. In regard to this I should like to point out that sometimes light does dawn on certain departments even if it does not spread to the head of the government. I have here a bulletin entitled Canada's Balance of International Payments, 1926-1932. I should like to read from the introductory paragraph as follows:

> "Balance of trade" figures are frequently misinterpreted due to the persistence of an old doctrine long ago exploded that a nation's trade is in a healthy state when exports exceed imports necessitating an import of gold to make up the difference.

On the front of this pamphlet I see, "Published by authority of the Hon. H. H. Stevens, M.P., Minister of Trade and Commerce." Apparently there was not complete agreement between the Conservative party and the Reconstruction party even before they agreed to disagree. I should like to quote Professor Taussig formerly professor of economics in Harvard university, who says:

> Anyone who has grasped the elementary truths about wealth, exchange, money, will see the absurdity of supposing that the prosperity of a country is bound up with the inflow or outflow of specie. The astonishing thing is that, notwithstanding the simplicity of those truths and their repeated and widespread exposition, ignorance regarding them should be so common. Many people who think themselves entitled to attention still speak as if an excess of exports promised a profit to a country, and an influx of specie were a realization of that profit.

I wonder how any hon. member of the Conservative party can speak with regard to balances of trade. In all the years that they were in office from 1880 to 1935, leaving out only the war and the immediate post-war years, the total favourable balances of trade amounted to only $435,000,000, or just slightly under the favourable balance of the Liberal party in 1926. In the seven years between 1923 and 1929 the total favourable balances under the Liberal administration amounted to $1,495,000,000. Yet hon. members of the Conservative party stand in their places in this house, as did the hon. member for Leeds a few moments ago, and say to the Liberal members: You are endangering our economic fabric; you may disturb the balance of trade; we are its natural guardians; we are the only ones who can take care of it. To my hon. friend and to the leader of the Conservative party I would point out that the three largest unfavourable balances of trade we have ever had in the dominion were in the years 1912, 1913 and 1914. In those three years the total unfavourable trade balance amounted to $722,000,000. My hon. friend was a member of the house at that time. I admit he was relatively young and perhaps new to the scene and did not realize the danger that confronted the country! But so far as my recollection goes, and I think Hansard will bear me out, he did not utter a single word or moan about the danger to the country from that stupendous adverse balance of trade. Why? Well I will tell you the reason; it is very simple and clear. The Conservative party was in power at that time; God was in his heaven and all was right with the world.

Every man has an adverse balance of trade with some of those with whom he is doing business. Almost everyone has an adverse balance with his grocer, his dentist and dozens of people with whom he does business throughout the year. I go further. I say that no single individual doing business in Canada can balance his trade with everyone with whom he is doing business.

[Mr. Deachman.]

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEACHMAN: If that be true of 11,000,000 people in Canada, how can we expect that this country is going to balance its trade with every nation with which it deals.

Mr. BENNETT: We do not.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Exactly—

Mr. BENNETT: And never have.

Mr. DEACHMAN: —and I will prove that the right hon. gentleman does not want to do that, that he does not believe it.

Mr. BENNETT: I never suggested it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: He never suggested it? We will see what he says about it. Let me quote from Hansard of 1935. He was discussing the clearing house agreements by which some nations were able to exchange wheat, for instance, with the products of European countries, and he made this statement, at page 3576:

> I heard a distinguished member of the French ministry of the day say in Geneva that they were very bad,—

Referring to clearing house agreements.

> —because they were the very negation of the promotion of international trade ... because the essence of international trade is not that it should be balanced but that there should be adjustments between respective countries from time to time, between A and B and C and D, a surplus here, and a deficit there.

Quite true; yet what has he been trying to do? He has been protesting time and time again that we are in danger because of our adverse balance of trade with the United States—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEACHMAN: —and trying to bring about arrangements whereby trade would be perfectly balanced as between these two countries, despite his assertion that the attempt to do that very thing on a large scale is the negation of trade.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. gentleman say that I ever suggested at any time or in any place that there could be equality between the United States and Canada?

Mr. DEACHMAN: My right hon. friend has said time and again that we could not do business with the United States because there was an adverse balance against us in our trade with that nation—that the adverse balance was too large—

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. DEACHMAN: And that it had to be reduced no matter what happened.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEACHMAN: My hon. friend has also contended that when the Conservative party came into power in 1930 their first great task was to adjust the adverse balance of trade which existed in the exchanges between Canada and the United States. We know how often that sentence has been repeated, how often it has been explained; and therefore, my hon. friend said, the tariff had to be raised. They raised it, he said, at great cost and sacrifice to preserve the national integrity of this dominion. That is the essence of his remarks. Perhaps I had better quote his exact words, as reported at page 2394 of Hansard of April 26, 1932:

> For, in the end, when you have more imports than exports an adjustment has to be made to bring about a favourable balance. If there is a gap it must be bridged, and it can be bridged only with fresh capital coming to this country or by borrowing.

In other words, when there is an adverse balance between Canada and the United States settlement has to be made by borrowing; and when we ceased to borrow in the United States in 1930, the decline in the adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States absolutely and necessarily followed, and nothing could have prevented it following, no matter what government was in power, Liberal or Conservative, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or Social Credit. When our borrowing ceased in the United States, we had not then the means of payment; our imports from that country necessarily declined, and as a matter of course our adverse balance also declined.

And now let me show the decline in borrowings that took place. The total bond sales of the dominion in 1930, largely in the United States, amounted to $398,000,000. In 1934, according to the Monetary Times, our borrowings were $108,000,000. There was a decrease in bond sales of $290,000,000—$290,000,000 less with which to pay obligations in the United States; and as a direct consequence of that we had necessarily to reduce our imports, not because of action taken by the government but because we had not the means of paying.

I put it to hon. members on a personal basis. If any member has a salary of $5,000 and he has a capacity to borrow from his friends another $5,000, he may spend $10,000 in a year; but if his capacity to borrow is gone, he will cut expenditures and buy less. And that is what the nation did between 1930 and 1934. So much for the balance of trade.

My hon. friend makes this suggestion: the estimated loss of revenue through the agreement is $6,000,000. I am not going to dwell on that but I would point out that throughout Canadian and English history it not infrequently follows that a lowering of taxation increases revenue. We had that as far back as the days of Sir William Mulock in connection with postage, and it was repeated in the Robb budgets and in the budgets of Gladstone. In one particular instance, I may point out to the leader of the opposition as an example, the duty on blankets was doubled between 1930 and 1934, and the revenue fell off from $163,000 to $29,000. My right hon. friend raised the tariff on soups 7½ per cent, killed the imports, and we lost a revenue of $542,000. We know and realize full well that under a course of expanding trade, which the Liberals are now going to adopt, wherein we have made the first few faltering steps—and I wish they were stronger—we shall have an expansion of revenue just as we had on the previous occasion.

My hon. friend says that 82 9/10 per cent of the value of all our agricultural production was used at home, and only 17 1/10 per cent of our agricultural production found a market abroad. My friend arrives at these statistics by taking the gross value of the agricultural production of Canada. The gross production is not the net production, because it includes the amount that is used up in the production of the net, for instance, feed for cattle and all the rest of that stuff which does not reach the market directly but enters it in the form of beef and other finished products. In that process some of these things are counted twice, and thereby he reaches a figure which is not more than one-half the total percentage of the exports of farm products.

I come now to a point upon which I wish to place some emphasis. It has been argued by almost everyone on the Conservative side of the house that this agreement will work great injury to our railways. We heard that from the hon. member for Leeds; we heard it from the leader of the opposition; we heard it from the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) and, I think, from all the others who spoke against the resolution. Now, what is the test with regard to this question? I submit that it is the test of how it works out. In 1928-29 we had heavy imports from the United States. What was the condition of our railways at that time? They were very prosperous; they were at the highest level of employment and the highest level of earnings in their history, barring possibly the war years. So I thought I would work out a table giving the revenue of the railways, the index of that revenue, the imports from the United States, and the index of imports from the United States. Taking the basis of 1926 as 100 I find this in seven years, covering 1922, 1926, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1933, and 1934, the three highest years of railway revenue were the three years of the highest imports from the United States; the three lowest years of railway revenue were years of the lowest imports from the United States. I find that when the Conservative government came into power, pledged as it was to cut down imports from the United States, it brought them down, and brought them down with a crash, but it brought the index of railway earnings down from 114 in 1928—as compared with 100 in 1926—to 54 in 1933. With the permission of the house I will place this table upon Hansard:

Calendar years	Revenue of railways	Index of railway earnings	Imports from United States	Index of imports from United States
1926	493	100	669	100
1928	563	114	826	123
1929	534	108	894	133
1930	454	92	654	97
1933	270	54	217	32
1934	300	60	294	43

Figures of imports and railway earnings in millions—add 6 ciphers.

I should like hon. members to examine these figures. I think they will conclude this: that where the facts point out, as they do point out clearly, that the larger our imports from the United States the more prosperous our railways have become, then the solution of our railway problem, the solution of our traffic problem, does not lie in the restriction of imports from the United States. That I think is clear. There is no escaping the obvious fact that every time in Canadian history we have restricted imports its direct reflex has been loss of traffic to the railways. I made that remark the other day to a friend of mine upon the other side of the house—I mean upon the Liberal side of the house—and he said, "What do you expect? Is not that the natural and logical result to follow?" Not only natural and logical, but inevitable. And when this trade develops, as it will under this agreement, there is no question as to the results so far as the railways of Canada are concerned: they will move back once more to the era of prosperity.

I appeal to my Conservative friends to take the broad view of this question. My hon. friend from Leeds was worried for fear we had lost some little thing, a cent or two here and there or some trifling item in connection with this arrangement with the United States. But I want to point out that so great is the force which drives us to trade with the United States, it matters little if some of these trifling difficulties arise so long as the whole channel of trade is broadened and deepened and trade is permitted to flow. May I also point out how powerless we are to restrict it even when we try. In 1878, before the national policy was put into force, the percentage of imports from the United States amounted to 53·1 per cent of Canadian imports, exports to the United States amounted to 35·9 of total Canadian exports, and I doubt not that at that time when they were discussing that issue they said: Let us adjust the balance of trade with the United States. What followed? In 1880, under the first shock of the national policy, trade did adjust between the United States and Canada. Forty per cent of our imports came from the United States; forty per cent of our exports went to the United States; a triumph for the national policy! It was a short lived triumph, for in 1896, after eighteen years of struggle, eighteen years of high tariffs, we were bringing in 50·8 per cent of our imports from the United States and only 34·9 per cent of our exports went to the United States. After eighteen years the national policy had failed to change by more than a trivial extent the trade relationship between the two countries. Why? Simply this, that the imponderable forces which draw these nations together are far greater than the petty interferences which can be brought about by raising tariffs and striving to restrict the trade between the two nations. Since 1878 almost down to the present day we have done far too much on both sides of the house to restrict trade between the two countries. If common sense had guided us in the relations between Canada and the United States, what a different tale might have been told to-day!

I want to appeal to hon. members to look upon this issue in a broader way, not fault finding, not cavilling, not objecting here and there to some minor item which may interfere with a small industry in a particular constituency. I quote, in closing, a statement made by Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone with regard to the trade treaty made by the government of that day with France:

The only reason—

And this is strangely apropos.

—why we have not made bargains similar to the present in former years, was simply because we could not make them. It was not for want of trying. For four or five years this was almost the chief business of one or more departments of the State, and yet no progress could be made. Why? Because we then set out upon a false principle,—we argued the matter as if the concessions which each party made to the other were not a benefit but an injury to itself.

Is not that characteristic of the language which we have heard in the discussion of this issue? He continued:

We have not now proceeded upon that principle. We have never pretended to France that we were going to inflict injury upon ourselves. We have simply offered France our best aid in breaking down her own vicious prohibitory system. In doing so, we may have given a greater benefit to France than to ourselves. I shall not attempt to measure the comparative good to be reaped as between one side and the other. What we have done is good—nay, doubly good; good for ourselves if France had done nothing at all, doubly good because France has done a great deal.

I repeat that last sentence with one slight modification: What we have done in regard to this agreement with the United States is good—nay, doubly good; good for ourselves if the United States had done nothing at all, because we have lowered our own tariffs; doubly good because the United States has done a great deal.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) quote scripture so freely I began to wonder what was the relation between the question under discussion and the experience of Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus or the parable of the good Samaritan. I am afraid that my hon. friend is somewhat of a Scotsman, and the suggestion is that a Scotsman is one who is well versed in the scriptures but who nevertheless has a strong commercial instinct.

The last speaker (Mr. Deachman) referred to the "nonsense of discussing trade balances," if I understood him correctly, and then proceeded to take fifteen or twenty minutes of the time of this house to give a very considerable number of figures in connection with trade balances, which I believe very few members of this house knew anything about. If it is nonsense to discuss trade balances—and that was his opinion—I do not see why during the last campaign the Liberal party did not make a greater effort to discuss trade balances from that point of view from platforms all over the country.

In discussing the question before the house I should like to suggest at the outset something that no doubt can be taken for granted; that is, that I find I am not in agreement with this resolution. In a very brief space of time I should like to outline why I have reached that conclusion. I do not know whether or not my reasons will have any effect on the course of this debate; nevertheless I should like to have the privilege of recording my personal views, which I believe are in harmony with those of my party.

As we have been told on many occasions the tariff serves two distinct purposes, the one to raise revenue and the other to afford protection to both industry and labour. For a moment I should like to deal with the first point, the purpose of raising revenue, and I do so in order to suggest to this house the possibility of placing more emphasis on that feature of the tariff and less on the second feature I mentioned. By reference to the publications of the Department of Trade and Commerce I find that in 1890 the total revenue of this country was $38,500,000, of which the customs tariff supplied $23,300,000. In 1913 the total revenue was $168,600,000, to which the customs tariff contributed $111,700,000. Coming down to 1934 we notice a tremendous shrinkage in the amount of revenue raised through the customs tariff. In that year the total revenue was $324,471,270, of which the customs tariff gave only the meagre sum of $66,305,356.

I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that in future more attention be given to the possibility of raising revenue through the tariff rather than through the process of direct taxation. For my own part, and I think I speak for the majority of the citizens of this country, I believe that is a fairer method of taxation; at least it distributes the taxes equally and more equitably among the people as a whole. I would far rather go to a store and pay $30 for a suit of clothes, if I could ever raise that amount of money, than pay $28 and then have to write out a cheque for the additional amount by way of income tax at the end of the year. I also believe, naturally, that we should continue to endorse protection as a policy. Canadian labour requires protection against unfair competition from countries where the wages paid for labour are ridiculously low, and our industries also require this protection not only because of the amount of capital invested in them but also because of the number of workers employed.

Many references have been made to the history of Canadian tariffs, and particular stress has been laid on the previous reciprocity treaty that came into operation in this country on March 16, 1855. That treaty was abrogated by the United States, and if I might intrude the remark at this stage I would suggest that the same step will be taken in the near future and the United States will abrogate this treaty that I presume we are about to consummate. As I have said, the first treaty was abrogated. The reason for that action was not as suggested by a previous speaker, as is well known to all students of economic history. It was terminated because of (1) friction which resulted from the civil war in the United States; (2) retaliation for a Canadian tariff imposed in 1859, shutting out United States manufactured products.

A little later we had the consummation of confederation, which opened up a very wide market within Canada for Canadian manufactured and agricultural products. At that time, and immediately following, we also had a small but nevertheless increasing market in Great Britain. In 1878 we had brought forward in parliament by way of legislation the so called national policy. If the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would permit me to do so, I should like to take exception to the suggestion he made during the course of his remarks, when he said that that policy was introduced as a retaliatory policy against the United States. If the right hon. gentleman would study again Canadian economic history he would quickly appreciate that the national policy was introduced by the Conservative party not for that reason but to correct the ills which had befallen this country chiefly because of the previous administration that had been in power previous to 1878. I would quote the words of Sir Leonard Tilley who, upon presenting his budget in 1879, said that the national policy was being put into effect "to select for a higher rate of duty those articles which are or can be manufactured in Canada, and to have those that are neither made nor likely to be made in Canada at a lower rate." That is the reason for the national policy, and I suggest that we note the two reasons he advanced, one being that of protection and the other the possibility of financial revenue.

We also notice the trade development in Canada during succeeding years. In 1896 there was a Liberal victory at the polls. Immediately following that election the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding was placed at the head of a commission to investigate tariff conditions in Canada. May I pay tribute to the then minister of finance, because I believe he was an outstanding Canadian and one to whom a prominent place will be given when the history of Canada from 1896 to the time of his death is written. As the head of the commission he made a thorough investigation, but found no reason for changing to the extent of one iota the national policy under which Canada had operated for the previous few years. He continued to govern under the same policy.

The first important change made in Canadian tariff policy was about 1907. At that time we find three columns in place of the previous two which, in turn, had replaced one column. To-day we have the British preferential, the intermediate and the general tariff. Reference has been made to the reciprocity campaign of 1911, and I am surprised that so many men otherwise endowed with good judgment should inject into a discussion of that campaign certain remarks offered as facts, but which in my estimation were somewhat distorted. One hon. member supporting the government suggested that the election in 1911 was won by the Conservative party because it played only one string of the instrument, namely the possibility of annexation to the United States. That might have been mentioned during the campaign, but I suggest emphatically that it was not the cause of the defeat of the Liberal party. My Liberal friends well and truly know the truth of my statement. Reciprocity was defeated at that time because the people believed that if such legislation became effective Canada would be prosperous for only a day, and that after the treaty had been tried and abrogated by the United States, as the previous treaty had been, the people of Canada would have to find new avenues of trade.

We have always experienced considerable difficulty in our trade relations with the United States. Trade with that country is an uncertain quantity. Down to 1920 it was more or less peaceful, but following that time it was disturbed first by the Fordney-McCumber tariff, and then, to make matters worse, by the Hawley-Smoot tariff, the provisions of which were directed principally against our primary products of fish, cattle, lumber and agricultural products. As a result of those tariff restrictions we were forced to find markets elsewhere, and proceeded to do so. Even my Liberal friends, while in office from 1921, were forced to take cognizance of conditions actually existing and to endeavour to find avenues of trade with countries other than the United States.

In a few moments I shall quote figures to show that we have been more or less successful in seeking other markets, and that the government in office after 1930 was eminently successful in finding new avenues of trade for Canada. Those avenues were within the empire first, and then with other countries, not neglecting the United States. When we are farther removed from 1932 and when the history of that year is written I believe that standing out in prominent relief will be the trade agreement made by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who suggested the possibility of the conference in Ottawa, at which were effected the empire trade agreements. May I add that no more important piece of legislation has been introduced, and no legislation that gave such an immediate stimulus to trade, than the trade agreements made in Ottawa in 1932. Does any hon. member suggest that the Ottawa agreements had a disastrous effect upon Canadian trade? Let us examine the figures for the year ended March 31, 1934. I am going to examine them not from the point of view of the tremendous increase in trade between Great Britain and Canada, but in a broader sense. I want to see if that increase in trade with the British empire, and the United Kingdom in particular, had any disastrous effect upon our trade with other nations, particularly with that of the United States.

Our greatest exports go to the United Kingdom, the United States ranking second. In 1934 the value of exports to the United States was $194,443,139, and I would remind hon. members that we had that amount of trade after the trade agreements signed in Ottawa had been in effect for a year. Does that represent an increase or a decrease in trade as compared with the previous year? It represented an increase of $51,282,000 over our trade with the United States in 1933.

Did the trade agreement of 1932 have a disastrous effect on our trade relations with other countries? Not in the least. I find that we had our greatest imports from the United States, with Great Britain ranking second. From the United States we imported $238,187,000 worth of goods, representing an increase of $5,639,000 over the previous year. Nevertheless we continued to have an unfavourable trade balance of about $44,000,000. I agree with the previous speaker in his suggestion that we should not consider trying to establish a favourable trade balance with every country with which we trade. I believe that is an economic theory with which most hon. members will agree. I must emphasize the fact, however, that it is not advantageous to have an adverse trade balance with countries as important as the United States or Great Britain, for the simple reason that our money markets are situated in both those countries, and if our unfavourable balance in actual trade is too great it adversely affects our borrowing powers in those markets, particularly when we have to add to that unfavourable balance in actual trade the amount of money we have to pay out in interest and dividends to the New York and London markets.

I notice by reference to the statistics that Canada's external trade for the year ending March 31, 1934, was slightly over one billion dollars, an increase of 14·9 per cent, and this gave us a favourable trade balance of $218,000,000 despite an unfavourable trade balance with the United States. I must emphasize, in considering the motion before the house, that as a debtor nation Canada must maintain a favourable trade balance to facilitate the payment of our international obligations. Our Prime Minister realizes that; our Minister of Finance appreciates it; all members understand it is important, and I feel that careful study should be given to every phase of this agreement, bearing in mind our adverse trade balance with the United States at the present time and the tremendous amount of money we must of necessity pay in interest and dividends to that country.

I should like now to make reference to one particular industry that is adversely affected by this trade agreement, and I mention this one in particular because I am familiar with it and because it exemplifies many others placed in a similar position. The duty on the product of this industry, before the signing of the present agreement, came under the general tariff, with a rate of 32½ per cent. Now the products of that industry have a protection of only 30 per cent. The British preferential was 20 per cent, which was later reduced to 15 per cent. When we take into account the rate of wages paid in Great Britain as compared with Canada, and the lower cost of fuel and raw materials in Great Britain and some other countries, the 15 per cent and the 32½ per cent represent not enough protection for that particular industry. Yet part of that protection has been removed and the result is anxiety not only on the part of those financially interested but also on the part of labourers and others actively engaged in the industry. In this particular industry the wages paid in Canada are about the same as in the United States, but our raw material costs are from forty to one hundred per cent greater in Canada, and for that reason the industry feels the effect of this new tariff arrangement. Very unfortunately the government, in the short sightedness of their policy, lowered the tariff on the finished article of this concern and forgot to lower the tariff on the raw materials entering into its product. The result is that the industry is suffering a handicap, and it cannot face any lower duty. The duty on the raw material of this particular company is exactly the same under the general as under the intermediate tariff. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back to a discussion of that particular phase a little later on, and to speak of another feature at the moment.

The raw materials which this company purchases wherewith to make its manufactured goods come into this country, or rather they are assessed in order to prevent them from coming in, on a specific duty basis, and not on an ad valorem basis. Let me give you an example of exactly what is happening. In previous years the raw material of this concern cost $4 a ton; to-day it is selling at $2 a ton, and the specific duty has remained exactly the same. That gives those who are manufacturing this particular material a protection, not of twenty-five per cent, but of fifty per cent, with the result that the company is charging seventy cents more for the product in Canada than is being charged for the same product in the United States. They are taking advantage of the tariff because the tariff is so arranged that the duty on the raw material is on a specific rather on an ad valorem basis. I would like to pursue that subject further a little later.

Coming back to the first question, I ask if it is not reasonable to expect that an intermediate tariff will be lower than a general tariff. If it is not, for what reason is there an intermediate tariff? If there is a rate in the general tariff of 32½ per cent, why should we find that same rate, 32½ per cent, in the intermediate tariff? We extend intermediate tariff privileges to certain countries, and they think that they are enjoying a benefit, but in reality they are not. In my estimation, Mr. Speaker, there should always be a difference between the general tariff, which should be higher, and the intermediate tariff, which should be lower. Otherwise you are going to have constant recurrence of this same trouble in industry where the raw material is assessed in one way and the finished article in another, where the raw material is protected on a basis where both the general and the intermediate tariffs are the same, and the finished article is protected on the basis of a difference between the general and the intermediate tariff. It is not fair, and I hope that the Minister of Finance will give consideration to that particular point.

[Mr. Walsh.]

There is another point I wanted to discuss in connection with specific duties. I do not believe in specific duties. They are handy and convenient at times, but they work out into a nefarious influence in our tariff arrangements with other countries. I refer you particularly to a certain heavy chemical, the duty being three-tenths of a cent a pound under the general and intermediate tariffs. When that tariff was instituted the chemical in question sold at $2 per 100 pounds. That represented a protection of about 25 per cent. To-day that same chemical is manufactured and sold at $1 per 100 pounds, and yet the specific duty remains exactly the same. It means that the industry is protected to the extent of fifty per cent, and I contend that that is not a fair way in which to make the tariff arrangements of this country. I would advocate doing away with these specific duties and placing the greater number of them, if not all, on an ad valorem basis.

I would also like to urge upon the attention of the house the fact that, on account of the influences that have been brought to bear from time to time, the tariff has been made into an unwieldy and peculiar proposition. Certain discrepancies we know are hidden in it. Certain primary industries that are so well protected that they are getting what I consider exorbitant prices, as compared with other countries, for the article they produce, and that in turn forces a higher price on the finished article of some other industry in this country. I would urge the Minister of Finance, when he is giving consideration to this treaty, to bear in mind such points as these, with a view to lessening the evils that may otherwise be done.

The suggestion is made in connection with this treaty that it is going to cause traffic to flow from Canada to the United States and from the United States to Canada; but I would like to ask, does it actually work out that way in practice· Is there not more theory than practice in that. Let us take an example. The tariff is lowered, but is the manufacturer of a certain line of goods going to discontinue his operations because of that. No; he is going to try to meet the competition from the United States, and if necessary, he will reduce his price. Some hon. members say that is exactly what they desire, but what happens to an industry under those circumstances. The manufacturer is intent upon maintaining the same rate of profit in his business, and in order to be able to sell at a reduced rate he endeavours to increase the efficiency of his plant. In other words, if a workman has been producing fifty articles per day in the past, in order to meet this new arrangement he must now produce fifty-two articles so that the profits of the industry may be maintained and the United States competition met. Canadian industry is going to endeavour to keep out the products of United States industry; it is going to meet the competition and there will be no flow of trade between the United States and Canada if they can help it. The only time that a flow of trade will take place will be when one of our industries is forced to the wall. Such an occurrence will be disastrous, not only to the financial interests but also to the workingmen of this country. Every time our tariff arrangements are changed, some industry is affected. If our manufacturers are to be placed in competition with the manufacturers of outside countries, they will endeavour to meet that competition; they will attempt to meet it at the expense of our workingmen. I do not think it is fair for any government to put a manufacturing concern in the position of having to meet outside competition by taking it out of the workingmen. This is what will happen, and every hon. member realizes it.

American industry has three prices, commonly referred to as the l.c.l. price, the c.l. price, and the quantity or preferred price. If I am a small purchaser in the United States I am quoted the l.c.l. price; if I am a large purchaser I am quoted the c.l. price, but if I am an exceptionally large purchaser and happen to be in that preferred class, I get a still better price. When the American manufacturer enters into competition in a foreign market, does he quote the first price? No. Does he quote the second price? No. He quotes the third or preferred price. I maintain that industry in this country is being placed in an unfair position when it has to meet the lowest possible price American industry can quote. That is not fair or reasonable competition and we should not expect Canadian industry to have to meet it. We must realize that the finished product of one industry becomes the raw material of another. Once we begin to meddle with tariffs in the way suggested by the resolution now before this house, there will be a disastrous effect upon business. That effect will be felt in financial circles and also in the homes of the labouring class.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has suggested that "night will follow day." If he gives full effect to this treaty so soon after coming into office I am afraid that "night will follow day," not only in the industrial and commercial world but also as far as the Liberal government is concerned. What did the Liberal government do from 1921 to 1930 when they were faced with the effects of the Fordney-McCumber and the Hawley-Smoot tariffs. In his address to this house the Prime Minister suggested that the Liberals had done a great deal, but he gave us no example. I do not know whether the rules of the house make it necessary to accept a statement of that kind as bona fide, but I know in ordinary business such a statement would have to be followed up by one or more concrete examples before full effect would be given to it.

The Minister of Mines (Mr. Crerar) was loud in his applause the other evening when an hon. member mentioned his gratification at the clause giving $100 exemption to tourists. I invite him or any other member of the government to go before any meeting of boot and shoe retailers or any other retail organization in this country to see if he can get the same volume of applause as he gave to the hon. member. I am not playing politics when I say that this provision is going to have a serious effect upon certain Canadian businesses. The business life in many of our cities and towns will be affected, and I urge the government to give very careful consideration to this provision. In the interests of the many small businesses that have been built up through the years, the government should be very careful in defining what is meant by a tourist. If this is not done, many businesses in the towns and cities not too far from the border will have to close.

In conclusion, I should like to make one further plea. It is that in the future the tariff should not be considered as a political football. Whenever a change is made in the tariff, no matter how small, a ripple of discontent and fear runs through the industrial life of this country. Tariffs should be removed from the field of politics. A competent commission should be appointed, a commission composed of real experts. With due respect to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), I contend that these experts should not be all from our universities; some of them should be men of practical experience who know how to handle this intricate problem. Such a commission should be free from political influences and be able to remodel and revise our tariff system so that the discrepancies I mentioned in the early part of my address will disappear entirely and the business men of this country may have absolute faith in any government that may be in office. I do not agree with my hon. friends to my extreme left when they say that the Liberals and Conservatives have again been riding their "old hobby horses."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. WALSH: May I be allowed to conclude? I suggest that the Liberals and the Conservatives are speaking sincerely; we are not riding a hobby horse. The Liberals have a certain point of view on the tariff and so have the Conservatives, and we express those views sincerely. I hope therefore that the remarks I have made will be taken as a sincere expression of my own feelings in the matter. I urge again that the tariff be removed from the field of politics and placed under an adequate commission, where it will be dealt with to the satisfaction of the business man, the industrialist, the financier, the labourer, the agriculturist and every other class in the Canadian nation.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I almost hesitate to attempt to add anything to this debate, which has been going on now for a considerable time. I do not flatter myself by thinking I am going to add anything of material value to the discussion we have had so far. I am inclined to think the debate has already lasted much too long, and I recognize at this very moment that I am guilty of protracting it. I must say, however, that I remarked to the chief whip that if there were any way of concluding the debate at once I for one would not stand in the way.

Before going further I want to say a word or two with regard to the observations of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Walsh). He began by referring to his preference for what he called a tariff for revenue. Let me invite him to change sides; let him come over here. A tariff for revenue is not a protective tariff. It may to a slight extent be protective, but primarily it is based upon the principle of yielding revenue, and whenever a tariff becomes too high, whenever it becomes in fact a protective tariff so as to keep out imports, it ceases to be a revenue tariff. I would ask the hon. gentleman to study the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff. If he did so he would probably find his seat somewhere on this side.

The last remark of the hon. gentleman was this, that if there was one thing he would appeal to the house to do, it would be to remove the tariff from political action. If I had the responsibility of naming a tariff board to which to refer such matters, I would start with the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman); I would name Mr. E. J. Young, who formerly represented the constituency of Weyburn, and some other gentleman with views similar to the views of these two, and then we should see whether my hon. friend would want to take the tariff out of politics and entrust it to such a board.

Mr. WALSH: Does my hon. friend not think that to choose politicians would be putting the tariff directly into politics?

Mr. YOUNG: One of the gentlemen I have suggested is unfortunately not in the house at present.

An hon. MEMBER: Not for long.

Mr. YOUNG: As my hon. friend says, it is not for long. If there is one thing that we certainly should not do it is to take the tariff out of the House of Commons, where we represent the views of the people, and hand it over to the sort of board my hon. friend would set up. If we did that, then I would say, God help this country.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate. I listened with particular interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as he presented the case, and when he was through I wondered what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) would have to say. When the Prime Minister concluded I was afraid of one thing and one thing only; he had proved so conclusively that the Conservative party had had a good deal to do with what they called the basis of negotiation that I was afraid there must be something wrong with the agreement itself. I was therefore profoundly relieved to discover, as this debate proceeded, that after all their negotiations in connection with an agreement had been carried on merely for a political purpose.

I must congratulate not only the party to which I belong but the country upon having at the head of affairs a man of the clear vision and undoubted leadership of the present Prime Minister. It is most fortunate for Canada that we have as Prime Minister a man whose views on these questions lie along the channels of those of the right hon. gentleman, and I must compliment him upon having taken the earliest opportunity to go to the United States and conclude an agreement, which possibly may have been begun by my hon. friends on the other side.

The Prime Minister took three hours to set forth his case, and he stated it quite clearly. I am not worrying about the length of time he took because, as I say, he presented the whole subject with unequalled clarity, forcefulness and thoroughness, so that after he was through there was—I at any rate felt so—nothing more for us to do than to let the question go to a vote. I thought however that it was only fair that the leader of the opposition should take two or three hours to state the point of view of his party, and he did very well from that standpoint. But I was rather disappointed that these hon. gentlemen should have gone back to the years 1854, 1867 and 1871, and my hon. friend who has just sat down quoted something said by Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879. Now I am not very much concerned with what Sir John Macdonald or Sir Leonard Tilley or anybody else may have thought; I am concerned with what this agreement means to people in Canada who are suffering at this very moment. I know that those whom I represent are more concerned with that question than with anything else.

After all, what of this agreement? What is it for? What is its purpose? Well, the debate served one useful purpose at any rate; it showed the distinction between a Liberal party and a Tory party. We on the Liberal side recognize that trade is not war and that a fair exchange of goods can do nothing but good to the countries engaged in that operation. That is the first point we keep in mind, and in this agreement we tried as far as possible to carry that principle into action. We realized that there was something materially wrong with the world. I should like to quote a few words which I have come across in various papers and documents in the course of some years. When the world was heading for disaster I found that statesmen everywhere, and bankers and business men of all classes, were seriously considering the world's state of affairs; and it is amazing to find that even the Conservatives, when they are making speeches not directly aimed at securing votes, sometimes utter words of sanity.

I will quote first from a statesman who is well known, Mr. Lloyd George. What did he say in 1931? He said:

> Tariffs and armaments are the favourite children of the god of war.

I wish those words could burn themselves into the souls of hon. members. Mr. Lloyd George, in other words, is saying that by increasing tariffs throughout the world men are endangering the peace of the world. And what was said by Arthur Henderson, British Foreign Secretary, in the same year, speaking to the council of the League of Nations at Geneva? A New York correspondent described his remarks as the most forceful appeal for action on behalf of suffering humanity ever heard in the League of Nations. This is what he said:

> Then, dealing with the various proposals before the commission, he referred to existing tariff conditions as a state of economic war and branded the policy of nations which strive by every means to keep out foreign goods as a policy of madness.
> "I repeat," he said, "that among the different causes contributing to the world depression the magnitude and high level of protective tariffs rank first and foremost."

Then I quote a statement given in 1932 by one of the business men of Great Britain. I had the pleasure of meeting him a few months ago in my own city. This is what he said in the press in 1932:

> During the last three years we have exported less of our goods to Canada than for many years before, and this is due to a great extent to conditions in the dominion and to your ridiculous tariff policies. If your wheat belts are down the whole of Canada is down and all the twopenny-halfpenny manufacturers of eastern Canada cannot alter the situation. These tariffs are responsible for the high cost of living in the dominion, and you people out in the west have to pay through the nose for all you get as the result.

When I saw that gentleman he went further than that. He said to me:

> We can do without your business in Canada, but you cannot do without our markets in Great Britain for your western products.

That is not all. Some years ago a very large number of economists in the United States signed a petition to the then president, Mr. Hoover, asking that tariffs be lowered. They recognized then that the Hawley-Smoot bill was a virtual embargo against goods coming into that country. They said this:

> We were convinced from our study of this question and from an analysis of the bill that it would work disaster upon the foreign trade and the domestic economy of the United States. These conclusions have been confirmed by events.
> Many of the duties written into the Hawley-Smoot bill were intended to raise prohibitive tariff walls against international trade. Such rates defy all sound principles of economics. They spread the blight of unemployment and strangle commerce. While deluding them with a false promise of improvement in their condition, they impoverish the working people of all nations.

Later on we were very glad to see that, when there was a change of government in the United States, Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States, admitting that the United States had set the vicious example of high tariffs, said:

> We have now repented.

There was the beginning of an opportunity of making a reciprocity pact between Canada and the United States. He went on to say:

> Just as we set the vicious example of erecting the trade barriers of high tariffs which induced others to follow us, so now we are asking other nations to join us in an attempt to undo the damage our collective action has worked. We wish to break down all the artificial and excessive impediments put in the way of world commerce, not only in our own interest but for the benefit of all others as well, since only by restoring the whole world can individual countries hope ... to remain economically healthy long.

The bankers in our own country have begun to take a real interest in this matter. They saw how their own situation, like that of all the people, was becoming serious. The manager of one bank said:

One of the reasons of the intensity of the depression in Canada is the high tariffs and trade restrictions throughout the world.

The manager of another of our large banks said:

The world's tariff barriers would increase until they become so provocative that a new generation would arise and knock them all down, Mr. Wilson answered William Duff, a low tariff Liberal. Liberal members of the committee applauded. Mr. Duff had asked Mr. Wilson as a banker and business man how Canada could increase her foreign trade. Mr. Wilson said there were too many tariff and other barriers against world trade. To get an increase of this trade there must be general lowering of tariff barriers.

Yet another manager of a bank said—and I want every hon. member to realize the meaning of these words:

We will get out of this depression when the governments get together and start trading again among themselves. I think it is well known that tariffs, quotas and heaven knows what, have prevented world trade.

Mr. BENNETT: It is "heaven knows what" that is the trouble.

Mr. JAQUES: May I ask the hon. member to explain how it is that Great Britain, when completely free trade, was the first country in the world to feel the depression, ten years before we did, and how, under a system of protection—

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I have not enough time. I cannot hear my hon. friend anyhow.

An hon. MEMBER: You never can.

Mr. YOUNG: If I were to digress to a discussion of the matter of free trade in Great Britain it would take too much time.

Mr. JAQUES: The hon. member is the one who has just referred to Great Britain. I asked him a plain question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Saskatoon has the floor unless he permits the hon. member to ask a question.

Mr. YOUNG: I did not hear the hon. member's question. Anyhow my time is too limited. I want to come a little closer to my hon. friends the Conservatives and see what they said.

Mr. Henry, when he was a good Conservative premier of Ontario, made a speech at the opening of the Woodbine bridge in Toronto. Perhaps the bridge, with its provisions for two-way traffic, suggested the matter of trade to him, because he made some statements that have been made frequently in the west. He said:

If Canada is to sell to the other parts of the empire, Canada must be prepared to lower the barriers of protection. If the imperial conference at Ottawa proceeds on a basis of give and take, then it will achieve results. If not, then the gathering of the empire representatives around the conference table will be abortive. We must throw overboard many of our old beliefs.

The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen said, in a speech at St. Catharines:

A compact of nations to lower tariffs is part of a logical solution for the depression.

Then my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said this in 1932:

For we must commonly agree that there can be no continued sale without purchase; that if we expect to market our goods in the United Kingdom we must expect to purchase goods from the United Kingdom.

Our present Prime Minister, quoting these words, said:

There at last we have a straightforward admission from the government that exports are paid for by imports. And what is true of trade between the United Kingdom and Canada is equally true of trade between other parts of the world and this country.

Canon Cody, now president of the university of Toronto, a lifelong Conservative, and once a minister in a Conservative government, said:

The British peoples do not desire or mean to pursue a policy of economic isolation, but they are in a mood at the moment to remember the family first. When these family claims and inter-relations are secured there will still be ample scope for the friendliest relations with other countries and particularly with this great country—

He was speaking in the United States—

—on the basis of give and take. Can you ever get a satisfactory arrangement that is not based on give and take? It can't be all take and no give. No country can carry on business under those conditions.

And then he went on to say:

I entirely agree with what His Excellency Sir Ronald Lindsay has said. Ultimately there will have to be an adjustment of ideas, in my humble opinion, on the whole question of tariffs, throughout the world, if the world is to regain the prosperity for which it hopes. At first we all want to sell as much as we can abroad and buy as little as we can abroad, but that program in the long run can never be carried out. Commerce involves mutuality.

We all want more international trade. Yet in fact we put barriers in the way and then wonder why there is not so much international trade as we wish to have.

I have not time, Mr. Speaker, to give many more quotations. I have cited sufficient to show that in the last five or six years not only politicians, or statesmen if you will, but bankers, business men and others, have been proclaiming that the only way to begin to solve our economic difficulties is by again starting to establish international trade. I have quoted from Conservative speakers in their lucid moments, when they are opening bridges and the like. They will then say what they really know and believe, that only by reducing these tariff barriers and other restrictions are we going to begin once more to have international trade.

What is the very basis of this reciprocity pact? There is nothing very strange or wonderful about it. It is simply making a deal with another country, that they shall take some goods from us and we shall take some goods from them, the one in payment of the other. And because some hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to say that these accounts may not exactly balance we are told that therefore the proper thing to do is to keep on strangling trade.

I was surprised at the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) the other night. First let me say that the right hon. leader of the opposition attempted to chide the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada for not having made this agreement between 1921 and 1930, but later the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said that he was not going to do anything of the kind because he recognized that the government in power in the United States at that time would not deal with the Liberal government or any other government; consequently he told the Prime Minister not to offer any apology. That was different indeed from what was said by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. But the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George went on to say more, dealing with the policy of the Conservative party when they were in power. At page 800 of Hansard the hon. member said:

> It is further suggested by one hon. member who preceded me that we were in favour of high taxation and that the late government had increased taxation and the rates of duties on imports. We did. By various ways, which if you like you may describe as subterfuges, we did decrease the importations from the United States, and in doing so we believed that we were salving and saving the financial stability and the whole financial structure of Canada. In the forty minutes allotted to one it is impossible to give details, but I am fully convinced of the fact.

Then the Prime Minister asked:

> Would that be equally true of imports from other countries as well?

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George replied:

> We were anxious to take imports from any country that would trade with us, but the United States would not trade with us.

Have hon. members ever heard a statement delivered by any hon. member in this chamber which said more clearly and emphatically that the Conservative party did not want to trade with the United States than the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who says that they tried even by subterfuge to keep out goods coming from the United States? Am I supposed to believe this was the party that sincerely went to that country to try to bring about a reciprocity pact? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what took place. Those negotiations were carried on just prior to an election. That was the dummy that was to be dangled before the eyes of the electors of the Dominion of Canada by the Conservative party, to see whether perchance they could not get some votes.

Then I want to go a little further. The other day the Prime Minister asked the leader of the opposition why he did not conclude an agreement if the negotiations had proceeded to the point at which the agreement was ready for signature. What was the reply? The right hon. gentleman said that he preferred his country to office and power. Did you, sir, ever consider the meaning of that statement? The right hon. gentleman must have believed the people of this country would support a reciprocity pact; otherwise the statement means nothing. The further inference is that if he brought in such a pact the people would vote for him and he would be in power. He said that he preferred to stand by his country; in other words he was afraid to trust the judgment of the Canadian people. Let me say to the right hon. gentleman, however, that even if this pact had been negotiated and placed before the people and approved, as it will be approved by them, that was only one element that had to be considered in that election. Even had the right hon. gentleman negotiated this reciprocity pact the Conservative party would not have been returned to power; there were so many other factors operating against that party that this one act, even if it had been consummated, would not have been sufficient to return them to power. I want every hon. gentleman to remember that statement of the right hon. gentleman who must have thought the people would approve a reciprocity pact.

We have heard many speakers during the debate, and I have in mind particularly the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who spoke of the tariff of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I wondered whether he was drawing a distinction between the tariff of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and the tariff of the Conservative party, when he repeated his leader's name time and time again. Then the hon. member went on to say that nine Conservative members had been returned from the city of Toronto and a few others from nearby centres. I interjected the remark that if the hon. member would take a look around the house he would find out exactly what the people of Canada thought of the actions of the government led by the present leader of the opposition. The hon. member for Davenport was trying to show that the high tariff of the previous government, the highest tariff ever known in Canada, together with the manipulation of exchange, the dumping duties and various other restrictions, may have brought some immediate advantage to some of the manufacturers of Canada, but there is one factor of which the hon. gentleman has never thought. He has never given any consideration to the interests of the consumers of Canada. Unless we turn the whole table around and look after the consumers, we shall never reach a basis on which prosperity will be established in Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

POST OFFICE ACT

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Post Office Act.—Mr. Boulanger.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the bill is read a second time it is my duty to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that I think this bill is not in order, as it is a money bill.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt you, but the accused claims the right to be heard before sentence is passed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member wish to speak to a point of order?

Mr. BOULANGER: I should like to know what the point of order is.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was about to rise to a point of order. This bill contemplates an appropriation of public moneys, and therefore it is beyond the province of a private member to introduce it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do any other hon. members wish to speak to the point of order?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I understand that when a point of order is raised by an hon. member it may be debated, but when Mr. Speaker renders a decision on his own initiative, I do not believe it is in conformity with usages to discuss it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker did not rule.

Mr. RINFRET: I have nothing to say about the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I invited hon. members to discuss it, because the other day I had some doubts. Since then I have looked into the matter and now I have no doubts about it, but before giving my decision I should like hon. members to express their views.

Mr. BOULANGER: On the point of order, I understand that objection is made to the bill because it is alleged that it calls for an expenditure of public moneys, thereby involving a procedure which is not within the rights of a private member. I submit respectfully that this bill does not call for a fresh expenditure of money, but calls simply for a new method of expending money which has already been voted.

The object of the bill is to replace the sweat shop and cutthroat competition system existing of awarding mail contracts by a more reasonable and more logical system based upon mileage and a flat rate. It might be that the average remuneration of mail contractors under the proposed system would be a little higher than the average remuneration under the present system, but I submit respectfully that there is no evidence of that and, further, that the system proposed by the bill is so simple and so easy of application that it will result in a saving to the government. The saving in the application of the new system will compensate for any increase, if there is any, in the average rate of remuneration of mail contractors.

May I cite a precedent, Mr. Speaker, for your consideration. In 1929 an amendment was moved in the house by the Hon. Mr. Guthrie. The hon. member's amendment did not have quite the same phraseology as has the bill now before us, but the object was the same, and it was not ruled out of order. It was discussed during two sittings of the house. That amendment was moved on April 16, 1929, and is found at page 1616 of Hansard. On motion of the late Hon. J. A. Robb, the then Minister of Finance, that the house go into committee of supply, Hon. Hugh Guthrie, the then member for South Wellington, moved the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this house the present system of awarding contracts for the delivery of rural mail by tender has proved unfair, burdensome and unsatisfactory, and that such rural mail carriers should be appointed by the civil service commission upon a permanent basis with a definite rate of pay, based upon mileage and the physical conditions of the territory involved, having regard to the amount paid to the other servants of the government for similar employment."

That amendment was discussed during two sittings of the house, and I suggest that the object behind it is exactly the same as that behind the bill standing in my name. I repeat that the bill does not call for an expenditure of additional money which would have to be voted, but provides simply a new method or a new way of expending money which has already been voted for the payment of rural mail contractors.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the point of order further than to deal with the statement made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) that there is no evidence that this bill involves an increase in the expenditures for the transportation of mail. First I would ask hon. members to consider the object of the bill. It states that it is "to properly remunerate the mail carriers." Its object is to give higher pay to those hauling mail by doing away with the present system.

I do not propose to discuss the relative merits of tender and flat rate payments, because at this point I do not think those questions arise. On the point of order, namely as to whether the bill would have the effect of increasing the amount of money to be paid, I have obtained from officials of the department an estimate of the increase in the cost. According to figures furnished by them the present cost of mail transportation is about $6,000,000 per year, or an average of about eleven cents per mile. My information is that if the provisions of the bill were adopted the minimum price mentioned in the bill—

Mr. BOULANGER: I wish to raise a point of order. The minister is discussing the merits of the bill, something which he has no right to do on the point of order which has been raised. The point of order is this: Is the bill in accordance with the rules of the house. I would point out the minister is discussing the merits of the bill, and that he has no right to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not think the point of order is well taken. The minister is trying to show that the bill would have the effect of increasing expenditures, and that is the very essence of the first point of order raised.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Surely.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has the right to raise the point he has raised, and to make the explanation he is now making.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): My information is that an increase to the minimum rate mentioned in the bill would mean an increase of $10,668,000 per year over the $6,000,000 that we now pay.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the figure?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): We now pay $6,000,000, and I am told that an increase to thirty-five cents a mile for the transportation of all the mail would mean an increase of $10,668,000. To-day the total revenue of the Post Office Department is about $36,000,000. Therefore the change would bring about an increase to the extent of nearly a third. To increase it to seventy cents per mile would increase the amount by over $27,000,000. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make our position clear. We are absolutely opposed to the bill, but we believe it is the right of hon. members in this house to present motions of general importance and couched in general terms, and we feel that to have such motions refused is an infringement on the privileges of the house. We do not think it is proper to refuse such motions simply on the ground that in some remote way they may or may not involve some increased public expenditure. I take it that we are simply discussing a principle of policy—

Mr. BENNETT: This is a bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Although I am not in favour of the bill I think we should safeguard private members' resolutions.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I spoke briefly before, but I should like to say something further.

Mr. SPEAKER: Proceed.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a bill, not a resolution. A resolution offering an amendment to a motion to go into supply might obviously be in order and a bill would not be in order, for reasons which need not be mentioned. Paragraph 549 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads as follows:—

549. All bills providing for the payment of salaries or for any expenditure whatever out of the public funds of the dominion must be first considered as resolutions in committee of the whole. And all such resolutions necessary to the introduction of a bill must first obtain the recommendation of the governor general. It often happens that bills are introduced with certain clauses providing for salaries or other charges on the public revenue, and in that case the bill may be introduced directly on motion, while the clauses in question (which should be distinguished by italics or brackets), are considered in the shape of resolutions in committee on the bill. But this can only be done when the money clauses are merely a part of the bill. Whenever the main object of a bill is the payment of public money, it must directly originate in committee of the whole. The rule also applies to releasing or compounding any sum of money due to the crown and to the imposition of any state tax upon the people, but not to pecuniary penalties necessary to the operation of a bill.

That is a quotation from paragraphs 502, 503 and following of Bourinot.

The preceding paragraphs are in much the same terms, and paragraph 791 gives effect to that principle. I was anxious to hear what the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) had to say as to what was involved, and apparently it means an imposition of an additional tax upon the people of Canada of approximately $10,000,000, which is a very large sum of money, and when he made that statement it did seem to me that it was conclusive of the matter. One might well be in favour of the principle of the measure, but it would have to be one that emanated from the government as a matter of governmental policy. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) must agree that there is a vast distinction between a resolution which merely expresses a pious hope that something may be done and a bill which, when enacted, becomes part of the statute law of the country. There is a clear distinction made in the books, and that is the reason I raise the point.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): I understand, Mr. Speaker, that we are not allowed to discuss the provisions of the bill and can speak only to the point of order. I have nothing further to say on the point of order, but I heartily agree with the provisions of the bill, and when it does come up I shall support it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill provides that that Postmaster General may award contracts for the transportation of mail; that no contract for an amount exceeding $1,000 per annum may be awarded without the approval of the governor in council, and that the contractors shall be paid according to a fixed rate between thirty-five cents and seventy cents per mile per day unless otherwise authorized by the governor in council.

Moreover, the sponsor states in the explanatory notes that it is sought by this bill to "allow the Postmaster General to properly remunerate the mail carriers who perform the important function of transporting the mail of Canada."

In the session of 1929 Mr. Guthrie moved as an amendment to the motion for committee of supply that rural mail carriers should be appointed by the civil service commission upon a permanent basis with a definite rate of pay based upon mileage and the physical conditions of the territory involved, having regard to the amount paid to other civil servants for similar employment. This was in order because it was not a bill; it was a proposed resolution drafted in general terms which had no immediate effect and would have had to be followed by a bill amending the Post Office Act. But a bill like this one, authorizing the Postmaster General to enter into contracts for carrying the mail involves the appropriation of public revenue and must be recommended by the governor general and originate in a committee of the whole specially set up for that purpose. A resolution must first be submitted which, under standing order 60, cannot be considered on the day it is moved but must then be adjourned to a future sitting. A bill founded on that resolution is then introduced. Such measures are always sponsored in our house by ministers of the crown.

This bill does not follow these requirements, which are obligatory under the British North America Act, the standing orders and our practice, and I am bound therefore to rule it out of order.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Civil Service Act (vacancies, outside service, priority to returned soldiers).

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker, this bill is an amalgamation of two bills which have already been before the house. Sections 3 and 4 of the present bill contain the objectives of the bill which I myself presented in 1931, and sections 2, 5, 6 and following sections contain the objectives of the bill that was presented to the house by Mr. Gagnon, the former member for Dorchester, during the last days of the session of 1931, and again in 1932. In 1931 Mr. Gagnon's bill was not discussed, but it was discussed at some length in the 1932 session and was finally given its second reading and referred to a special committee of the house. As to my own bill it received first and second readings, was discussed at three or four sittings of the house, and finally was killed in committee on the motion of Mr. Bell, then member for St. Antoine, that the committee rise.

It would not be correct for me to say that the two bills were received with unanimous approval by the house, but they had quite a number of supporters, and with the permission of the house I shall quote from the debate that took place when the bills were under discussion, as it will save my making arguments of my own. Referring to the preference given to returned soldiers and to regulation No. 11 of the civil service commission the Hon. Charles Stewart, then member for West Edmonton, said, as reported at page 1199 of Hansard of 1931:

> As I understand the bill, and I hope I am correct, it does not attempt to interfere with the preference granted to Canadian soldiers. But we are more than twelve years—
> It is seventeen or eighteen years now,
> —away from the war, and I think it can be said without fear of contradiction that the Canadian government, quite irrespective of party, has given preference to British soldiers and soldiers of the empire which are not duplicated in any other dominion or in any other part of the empire. To say now that a British soldier who has come to Canada within the last three years shall have the same preference as a Canadian soldier hardly seems fair. Mark you, I am not desirous of taking away the preference from the Canadian soldier; I am very much in favour of it, but to say that a British soldier who has resided in England since the end of the war and who has come to Canada within the last three years shall enjoy the same preference as the Canadian soldier, both as against civilians in an application for a civil service position, is I think going a considerable distance. I do believe the preference should be retained in its entirety as far as the Canadian soldier is concerned, but I do not think it should go beyond the provision suggested in this bill by my hon. friend, namely that recipients of this preference shall have resided in Canada for five years.

I pause here to say that in 1932 the Civil Service Act was amended to make the residence requirement five years instead of three, as was proposed in my own bill at the time, before anyone could be appointed to a position in the civil service. The Hon. Mr. Stewart continued:

> That seems to me an eminently fair proposal. Our own Canadian soldiers have had that preference since 1918, as was pointed out by my hon. friend, and I think the time has come when young civilians growing up in the country have a right to some consideration over those who have come to Canada and taken up their residence among us but have not been here for five years.
> That is my position in regard to this bill. I do want to see that preference retained as far as the Canadian soldier is concerned; a right which he has enjoyed since 1918, but it seems to me we are over-generous in our treatment of the men who have come among us within the last few years in giving them a preference over our young civilians who have grown up in the country.

I should like to quote what was said by another good friend of mine who is no longer in the house. Mr. Duguay, the former member for Lake St. John, is reported at page 1201 of Hansard of 1931 as follows:

> If all the Canadian veterans had work, I readily would understand that the bill of the hon. member for Bellechasse would be unnecessary. However, there are too many of them unemployed and needing the assistance of the government. I think that we should all favour this measure; for my part I shall give it my entire support.

I should like to quote what was said by my member in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), Minister of Pensions and National Health. I might tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I always vote for the minister. When my bill was under discussion before, a point was raised by Mr. Geary, the former Minister of Justice. My bill asked that the veterans' preference should be restricted to Canadian veterans and Mr. Geary pointed out that that might result in an injustice being done. He said that a number of citizens of Great Britain, for instance, were living in Canada at the time of the declaration of war. Many of them enlisted in the Canadian forces and he contended that an injustice would be done to those who had not resided the necessary five years in Canada prior to enlistment. Although these men were not Canadian nationals they enlisted in the Canadian army. I saw the force of his argument; I realized that my bill was not drafted correctly, and as a good elector I called for the assistance of my member. I asked the Minister of Pensions and National Health to draft an amendment, and section 3 of the present bill is the amendment which he drafted to the 1931 bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He acted as legal adviser.

Mr. BOULANGER: He acted as my private adviser, as all members of parliament should act towards their electors. This is what the minister said, as reported on page 1763 of Hansard of May 19, 1931:

I believe a number of the members of this house will agree with me that, whatever patriotic motives we may have had at that time in inserting such a provision,—

He was referring to the veterans' preference in the Civil Service Act.

—it is no longer necessary that we should give a preference to those who served in the allied forces. Let me give an example which, while it may be personal, I believe will apply to other members of this house who served overseas. I have a son of seventeen. In another year or two he will be eligible to enter the civil service of Canada. I hope and pray he will never desire to do so, but the fact is that he will in due course become eligible. Should he desire to enter the civil service he will be obliged to submit to a preference in favour of a Portuguese or a French Senegalese or some other soldier who at some time or other served in the allied forces. This seems to me absolutely ridiculous. There is no reason why the children of Canadian returned soldiers should be obliged to give preference to someone who served in any one of the allied forces.

An hon. Member: In the foreign legion.

Mr. Power: Yes, in the foreign legion. But I am giving examples of armies from which it would be very difficult for us to obtain the real military record—armies of Montenegrins, of Serbians and of every nation on earth.

An hon. Member: Russians.

Mr. Power: Such men may come to Canada and, provided they have the residential qualifications, having become British subjects perhaps only two or three years ago, just long enough to make them Canadian nationals, may have the preference over children of returned Canadian soldiers. I submit that the act as originally drawn, in section 29, subsection 4, should be changed; and if this bill is allowed to go into committee I propose to submit an amendment which will eliminate the preference given to members of the allied forces.

That amendment is section 3 of the present bill. The minister continues at page 2690, as follows:

When this bill was last before the house, I gave notice of an amendment which I proposed to move. It will be found in Hansard of May 19. The object of the amendment was while preserving to Canadian soldiers and to those who had served in the Canadian army or in the army of the British Empire the returned soldiers' preference, to exclude those who served in the armies of the allies and who had come to Canada after the date of the passing of the act. It was the purpose also to exclude those who served in the armies of the empire other than the Canadian army who may have come to Canada after the passing of the act. That is to say, anyone who is living in Canada prior to the passing of this act and who had served in any of the forces of the empire, either naval or military, still keeps the preference which was accorded to him by the Civil Service Act of 1919. Any who come in the future however will be excluded from that preference. To my mind the suggestion is broad enough; as a matter of fact a great many people have told me that perhaps it is too broad. At any rate however it amply preserves all the rights and privileges of people who at the present time are citizens of Canada and who fought the battles of the empire. On the other hand it enables young Canadians if they so desire to qualify for service in the civil service of Canada and not to be excluded from entering that service by being brought face to face with a preference in favour of persons who by no right or privilege which we can grant them should be allowed a preference over our own people.

Those were the opinions in favour of the bill which were expressed at that time. We desire to restrict the preference given by section 29 of the Civil Service Act to veterans who enlisted in the Canadian army. I think that is only right. I hope that at least this part of the bill will have the support of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). It is a good "Canada first" policy. After this bill had received its first reading I received a telegram which I should like to read in order to show that Canadian veterans are not opposed to the principles embodied in this bill. The telegram reads:

Your bill re Canadian ex-service men long overdue. Reference to Welland canal will prove your contention. Congratulations on your stand.

N. McCrae,
Ex-member—First contingent.

In order to illustrate, not my argument but the arguments of others which I have read already, I should divulge to the house the situation at the Welland canal. I have in my hand sessional paper No. 428 tabled during last session. This shows the names, occupations and salaries of the persons employed as of June 5, 1935, by the government of Canada on the Welland canal. It gives also the country of origin of each of these persons, and how long they had been residing in Canada, when they entered the public service. I have made an addition and have found that at that date there were 511 persons employed by the government of Canada on the Welland canal. Out of this grand total of 511 there were 245 persons who had not been born in Canada, but I do not want to leave the house under a false impression. Not all of these 245 had recently come to Canada when they entered the public service on the Welland canal; a great number of them had been here ten, twenty and even thirty years. But out of the 245 I find that there were fifty-eight who had not resided ten years in Canada when they entered the service of the country, and sixteen had resided less than five years when they obtained employment on the canal. There are a few extreme cases to which I would call attention. There is, for instance, the case of a man who came from Italy and got a job on the canal after having resided in Canada seven years, and it is stated on the return that he is an overseas man. He received the preference provided for in the Civil Service Act, in regard to men who had served in the allied armies. He had served with the Italian army; he came to Canada and resided here the necessary five years, and then he claimed his preference as a veteran of one of the allied armies.

Mr. BENNETT: What was his occupation?

Mr. BOULANGER: He was a linesman at a salary of $1,020 a year. I do not believe Mr. Mussolini would give, to a returned Canadian soldier, a preference in the civil service of Italy. There is another one employed as lockmaster at a salary of $1,920 a year. He came from Newfoundland and had been residing two months in Canada when he got the job. He is also a returned man. Newfoundland is not very far from Canada and we should maintain amicable relations with our friends there. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the government of Newfoundland gives to returned Canadian soldiers a preference in the civil service of Newfoundland.

Mr. HEAPS: Was that a civil service job?

Mr. BOULANGER: Of course; they are paid by the government of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the position?

Mr. BOULANGER: I said lockmaster.

Mr. HEAPS: Does that come under the civil service?

Mr. BOULANGER: Yes. You cannot sweep around the parliament buildings without going through the commission first.

Mr. POULIOT: Being a lockmaster is a key job.

Mr. BOULANGER: There is another Italian employed as linesman. He resided nine years in Canada and he was an ex-service man. He got a job at $1,020 a year. Another man is employed as labour foreman of the first class; he gets $1,920. He came from England and had been residing in Canada four months when he got the job. He is not an ex-service man. As regards the preference to returned Canadian soldiers, perhaps I have said enough.

Now I will turn to section 4 which suggests an amendment to section 33 of the Civil Service Act. We wish to oblige the civil service commission to go before the governor in council, that is, before the government, whenever they desire to be exempted from the necessity of requiring of any applicant for a position in the civil service a residence of five years in the country. The law as it stands since it was amended in 1932, requires that an applicant must have resided five years in Canada; but under the Civil Service Act there was passed regulation No. 11, which will be found on the page reserved for explanatory notes; it appears in connection with section 4. The commission passed this regulation:

> In cases where, after due publicity, the commission has been unable to secure an adequately qualified applicant with the necessary five years' residence in Canada, persons may be admitted to examination despite the fact that they have not resided in Canada for five years, provided they are otherwise qualified under the law and regulations.

This is a blanket regulation which was authorized by an order in council passed in 1922. The order in council was in very broad and general terms; it still applies and is the authority under which the civil service commission passed the regulation I have just read. With the permission of the house I will read this order in council passed in 1922. It is P.C. 2415, dated November 24, 1922:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated September 26, 1922, from the Secretary of State, submitting the following from the civil service commission:
> Section 41(1) of the Civil Service Act provides that, "No person shall, without the authority of the governor in council, be admitted to any examination unless he is a natural born or naturalized British subject and also has been a resident of Canada for at least three years."

As I have pointed out, it is now five years.

> In connection with local competitions for the filling of positions outside of Ottawa—

I wish to call attention to this.

> —it is frequently found that the only qualified candidate has not resided in Canada for the full term of three years. In each case of this nature it has been found necessary to make a report to the governor in council, requesting authority to waive the clause regarding residence. The civil service commission is of the opinion that delays—

They are against delays, though it takes them six and sometimes perhaps twelve months to fill very minor positions.

> —in making appointments in local competitions would be considerably lessened if, where the only available candidate qualified for the duties of the position has not resided in Canada for the full term of three years but is otherwise qualified under the Civil Service Act as to British citizenship, he may be declared eligible for appointment to the civil service without an individual report to the governor in council in each case. The civil service commission therefore recommends that in local competitions, after due publicity, where the only qualified candidate does not conform to the regulation as to residence in Canada but is otherwise eligible under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, such candidates may be declared eligible for permanent appointment in the civil service.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

We propose to do away with this blanket order in council and regulation of the civil service commission. We want the old order of things restored; we want the civil service commission, in any case where they desire to override the Civil Service Act, to come before the cabinet and state their reasons. We claim that it is giving too much power to the commission to give them authority in broad general terms like that to do whatever they like as respects the residence of applicants for a position in the civil service. The proposal seems to be logical enough and does not need any explanation. I might say that under this order in council which I have read and under regulation No. 11 the civil service commission, for example, appointed as prison guards in Canadian penitentiaries, twenty or twenty-five persons who had not the necessary qualification as to residence. It seems to me that it would have been quite easy in Canada to find prison guards. This job does not require any special qualifications.

Mr. STIRLING: Does it not?

Mr. BOULANGER: It is necessary only to be strong and intelligent, and, generally speaking, all Canadians have those qualifications. It was not necessary to go to England or to go outside Canada to find guards for our penitentiaries.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are prison guards at the present time under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. BOULANGER: Yes, they are.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think they are. I think an act was passed a year or so ago taking them out of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BOULANGER: I beg pardon. I did not know that, but that does not detract anything from my argument. At the time of their appointment they were under the civil service commission; they were appointed by that commission under the blanket authority which was given to it by the order in council passed on November 24, 1922, which I have just read. I might add that the government is very often an offender.

Mr. HEAPS: Not the present one!

An hon. MEMBER: Worse.

Mr. BOULANGER: The old government. The government often disregards the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Every year when we read the estimates we find a vote to appoint so and so or such and such a class of employees "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act." I remember that in 1931 the late government, through a vote in the estimates, appointed J. L. A. Tanguay, an election organizer, to be a clerk, grade 4, in the Department of Justice, and they also in the same manner appointed as an inspector of weights and measures a man named Hyppolite Couture, who had been dismissed for cause and therefore was not eligible under the Civil Service Act. They found out that he was not eligible, so they appointed him by a vote in the estimates.

This year I open the estimates and I find this, at page 6:

To provide for temporary clerical work in connection with the transfer and registration of bonds, etc., and the flotation of loans and authority for these purposes, to employ a temporary staff, fix their rates of remuneration and otherwise wholly regulate their services without reference to and notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

That is under Finance, I suppose. And I find this at page 55, under the External Affairs department:

Washington—

Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments.

Paris—

Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments.

Tokyo—

Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments.

It is not as bad, though, as what was done in 1931. At page 61, under national revenue department, I find this:

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports of the dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary buildings and rentals.

Mr. Speaker, we see items of a similar kind every year in the estimates.

I come to the second part of the bill; it is Mr. Gagnon's bill, which was discussed extensively in 1932. One part of it is for the purpose of excluding the outside service of Ottawa from the jurisdiction of the civil service commission, and the other part is for the purpose of giving more power to the government, to the ministers of the crown and to parliament over the civil service and over appointments and promotions of civil servants. There is also a provision giving more power to the government as regards technical appointments. I will do as I did in connection with the first part of the bill; I will read the opinions of those of my colleagues who were favourable to the bill. First, I will read what Mr. Gagnon said when he introduced the bill for the first time in 1931. I have not the page number, but it is in Hansard of 1931. Mr. Gagnon, then member for Dorchester, said:

> The bill which I have the honour to sponsor speaks for itself; it needs no explanatory remarks. I feel however it is my duty to the house to say that I have studied the various questions involved, free from party prejudices and without the exaggerated zeal of a would-be reformer, but with a true desire to interpret the wishes of numerous people in Canada as well as a great number of the members of this house, who contend that the Civil Service Act ought never to have been made to apply to the outside service, and that in the public interest reforms are urgently needed. Long before I had the honour of being a member of this house, I had heard eloquent members of parliament denounce the Civil Service Act of 1919 as being inconsistent with the elementary principles of responsible government. I have read the voluminous report of the Malcolm committee which was appointed by this house, in 1923, and have studied the valuable recommendations made by the committee that was appointed by the Senate in 1924. A good deal of evidence was adduced before the special committee appointed by this house in 1923. The deputy ministers of all departments appeared before the committee and made valuable suggestions. Amendments were contemplated, but no serious action has been taken. I venture to say that public sentiment in my province is strongly in favour of removing the outside service from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Act. The people realize that the civil service commissioners, whatever may be their qualifications, cannot find the best possible candidates for all positions. It is indeed amazing to expect the same three men to find the best possible candidates for positions as varied, for instance, as a caretaker in the Port of Vancouver, a customs agent in Gaspe, a director of expositions in London, England, and a postmaster in the district of the Yukon. It is amazing that the government of the day must rely entirely on these three men, who therefore must be practically encyclopedists of science to determine the qualifications required for such diversified positions.
> As one may easily imagine, a great many mistakes have been made. The civil service commissioners cannot act alone. They have to ask for the assistance of employees of the departments, and in many instances appointments have been made by an employee of the department.

I might say, almost all the cases that I know.

> On the other hand the Civil Service Act prevents the ministers and deputy ministers from making appointments. The situation indeed is intolerable and ridiculous. This Civil Service Act subjects parliament to the authority of a kind of bureaucracy, which Lord Hewart of Bury, Lord Chief Justice of England, has happily called the New Despotism.

And in 1932, when Mr. Gagnon presented his bill in the house, he said about the same thing, so I need not quote him, but I should like to quote Doctor Grant, as he was quoted by Mr. Gagnon in 1932. I understand that Doctor Grant was the principal of Upper Canada College, Toronto, and at page 353 of Hansard for 1932 he is quoted by Mr. Gagnon as follows:

> The whole idea of having three men to do such an executive job was wrong from the first. A commission is an admirable body to investigate and report; in an executive, unity of command is necessary. If the Canadian Pacific Railway ever wishes to go into bankruptcy, it could hardly find a better way than to put its general managership into commission and to give any two commissioners power to overrule the third. Any old timer who remembers Sir William Van Horne will think with joy of the language that artist in profanity would have used to describe such a suggestion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend is not quoting Doctor Grant as being in favour of doing away with the civil service commission? It is a mere reorganization he has in mind, is it not?

Mr. BOULANGER: No; I am quoting Doctor Grant on the principle that the administrative and executive functions should be separate, and to show that the civil service commission would be in its proper place for the purpose of examining, grading and classifying employees, but that the executive function should be in the hands of the government, in the hands of ministers responsible to the house and to the country. I wish now to quote the opinion of Mr. Bourassa, whose absence we regret very much.

Mr. BENNETT: The time to do that was last October.

Mr. BOULANGER: I am serious in saying that. It is no fault of mine that he is not here, but the people have spoken. At page 464 of Hansard for 1932 Mr. Bourassa said:

> From the purely administrative point of view my opinion is that much more authority and freedom of action should be left to the permanent heads of departments, not to the ministers. I think ministers temselves are much too bothered with questions of patronage as it is. They should have enough confidence in their deputy ministers and the heads of the various branches of their departments to rely upon them in all that concerns promotions and appointments from a list prepared by the civil service commission, based on the technical merits of the candidates.

I wish now to quote the remarks of Mr. Peck, member at that time for Peterborough, which occur at page 540 of Hansard for 1932:

I do not think the member for the district in which an appointment is to be made should be entirely ignored. After all, the member should have some say as to who should be appointed. He is as a rule a person of reasonable intelligence, and more than that, he is the choice of the people of the district. Surely, therefore, he should have some voice in the selection of those who are to carry on the business of the government in the riding that he represents. The inside service is not under consideration in this connection at all, but when there is a vacancy in the outside service, what happens at the present time?

What Mr. Peck said is very true.

There is a perfunctory kind of examination; some representative of the department concerned, I suppose, goes down to the district, probably knowing nothing of it or of the candidates, and after making a few cursory inquiries goes back and reports to the civil service commission that such and such a person is the one he thinks should be appointed to the position. He has not the means of knowledge which are open to the member for the district, because generally the member has been brought up in that district and is very well acquainted with the people who are likely to be applicants. So I submit that the committee should consider this question; that after a list of eligible candidates has been prepared for the commission it should be submitted to the member for the district, or at least the first three or four names on the list, so that the member may express his opinion as to the merits of the candidates. In that way we would avoid having someone appointed who is not really under all the circumstances the most suitable man for the position. I think the member can be relied upon to select a suitable candidate. He is responsible to the people he represents, and I am sure he can be relied upon to decide on the basis of merit.

Now I should like to quote the present right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is better; all the others have been defeated.

Mr. BOULANGER: I want to quote a gentleman who has not been defeated, the right hon. leader of the opposition, who was then Prime Minister. He placed the matter in its proper light and perspective. Of course those opposed to the bill said, "You want to do away with the merit system," and the then Prime Minister replied, "No, the merit system is not in question. The question is who shall determine merit." That is exactly the object of the bill. We do not want to do away with the merit system. we want the civil service commission to examine, grade and classify the candidates and then report to the ministers of the departments concerned. We want merit to be determined by the commission, but we want the appointment, which is the executive end of the matter, done by the government. At pages 541 and 542 of Hansard for 1932 the Prime Minister of that day said:

During the last fifteen months I have had occasion to examine the operations of the statute, and I think perhaps this house is overlooking the fact that after we concede the merit system is the proper system, the next question is: Who is to determine merit? That is where the difficulty has arisen, and it is a real difficulty....

It must be apparent therefore that something must be done by which the merits of contending applicants may be decided by proper methods.... It is for that reason the government has concluded it owes a duty to the merit system to see that the factors which determine merit are factors not under the control of a hidden hand which operates through an official drawing an insignificant compensation, and with power to determine the life or death, officially, of applicants for positions. It is for that reason the government asks that this bill be referred to a committee so that these matters may be considered.

I think this year we shall have less difficulty in having this bill adopted.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was that Mr. Gagnon's bill?

Mr. BOULANGER: Yes, it was. We have the support of the leader of the opposition, and I am sure we shall have the support of the Prime Minister, because I am fighting for the supremacy of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. member cannot have my support.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to consideration of the trade treaty.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Speaker, shortly before recess an hon. member in the far corner asked a question which at that time was quite inaudible. Since then I have found that he asked why it was that Great Britain, a free trade country, was the first to feel the repercussions of the depression. His question contains a premise which is quite inaccurate.

Instead of being the first to feel the repercussions of the depression, Great Britain was the last. More than that, Great Britain departed less from the free trade principle than did the other great trading nations, and all through the depression suffered less than did the other countries of the world.

Before recess I was dealing with what had been said by some hon. gentlemen opposite, and in particular I was referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). He is very much concerned about some of our industries that he thinks will be adversely affected by the removal or reduction of tariffs between Canada and the United States. I remarked that he had stated to the house that if we wanted to know what some parts of this country thought about the great increases that had taken place in the tariff structure during the last five years we had simply to take note of the fact that nine Conservative members had been returned from Toronto and others from other industrial centres near by. He failed to look around the House of Commons and to see what the people of Canada thought about those increases in tariffs; he failed to recognize that Canadian consumers have a real interest in tariff structure.

All through the discussion hon. members opposite have been attempting to say that as a result of wider and freer trade some workmen are going to lose their jobs. Hon. gentlemen who use that argument have failed to recognize the fact that when imports have been greatest unemployment has been at its lowest point. That has been the case in all countries, and will continue to be so. I have been surprised to note that on all occasions when increased trade with the United States is suggested, hon. members opposite immediately get out the old flag and wave it in the breeze. I say that if they must use arguments of that kind, their arguments cannot be sound.

The world has gone mad with economic nationalism. This afternoon I quoted representative authorities from different countries of the world. I picked out only a few citations, but I have scores of them in which I read that the world will never be right again until we are prepared to support international trade on a wide scale. To-day in the United States there is a government prepared to deal with Canada. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) began dealing with that government, and went so far as to get some kind of understanding, just sufficient to use as a dummy to hang before the eyes of the electorate in an attempt to lead them to the conclusion that if the Conservative party were returned to power it would require only one short step to effect consummation of the agreement. But what do we find? Do we find hon. members opposite supporting the pact which they allege they framed? No, they do not; there are objections from all corners. As I stated before recess, we are thankful that the leader of the Liberal party had the support of Canadian people to an extent greater than that enjoyed by any former Prime Minister. He has gone to Washington and in a short time has consummated that pact. Is it perfect? I think not. I support the agreement, for what reasons? I support it because the principle behind it is that of providing greater facilities and more opportunity for international trade between Canada and the United States. I say that principle is sound. What is my objection to the agreement? My objection is that it does not go nearly far enough.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not provide enough jobs.

Mr. YOUNG: I was gratified to hear in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the statement that this is only a beginning, and that he hoped the present agreement would so commend itself to both countries that very soon there would be extensions of it. Let me say to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that I am disappointed to find that in the agreement agricultural implements do not enjoy as low a tariff as they did under the famous May day budget of 1930. I suggest to the government that we should not be content until we go at least as far as the May day budget went in connection with agricultural implements. A few nights ago there was a discussion in this chamber concerning the increase of prices on agricultural implements. This afternoon the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) said that the increased price was the result of the lowering of the tariffs. I wonder if he believes that. I wonder if any member of the Conservative party believes it. I wonder if anybody believes it. The reason is, I think, quite different from the one suggested. If it is true that because of a reduction of tariff rates prices are increased, then why do we hear the arguments of hon. members opposite with regard to the reciprocity pact with the United States? They know perfectly well there is nothing in that suggestion.

What about automobiles? They now enjoy the intermediate tariff, yes. Have we gone far enough? I suggest that the Minister of Finance should look into the tariffs on automobiles, because the Canadian people have suffered long and severely the increased costs of cars purchased in Canada, a condition which must not be permitted longer to continue.

The agreement is good in that it is a beginning on the right path, and I trust that not only Canada and the United States but all countries of the world may get away from that intense economic nationalism which has prevailed. Some hon. members opposite have been wondering what was going to happen to the intermediate tariff. Their suggestion has been that if they knew what the Minister of Finance intended to do with the intermediate tariff they might vote for the agreement. I recognize that there may not be the same proportion between the various items under the intermediate tariff as there is under the general tariff, but if that is so my suggestion would be, not to correct this by an increase in the intermediate tariff, but that items in the general tariff be reduced so that those who might suffer slightly under the intermediate tariff in the agreement may obtain a relief through a reduction in the general tariff.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) asked the leader of the opposition a very pertinent question, namely, whether the right hon. gentleman opposite had suggested to the President of the United States that he would conclude an agreement provided the president would reduce the tariff in the United States to the full fifty per cent. Hon. members who were present will recollect that the right hon. gentleman did not give a direct reply. I have listened for several days to hon. members opposite jumping from pillar to post. They are not quite sure whether they should or should not support the pact.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes they are.

Mr. SPENCE: You are doing the jumping.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member will get a chance to vote on the agreement, but he has not spoken on it. I have listened day after day, and I noticed that they were not quite sure whether they would support the pact. Some were saying: "This is our baby, but since the other side has brought it into being and given it life, we do not think we can support it." I wonder where the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) will stand.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): He will let you know after a while.

Mr. YOUNG: Where will he stand on the agreement when at least some of our primary products—not sufficient, but some—will gain freer access to the United States? Where will the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Beaubier) stand? It is true that we are bringing goods into this country, but unless we recognize the principle that imports are paid for by exports, there could be no international trade.

Canada is behind the agreement; our people realize that it is in the interests of the consumers, and that it will bring benefits to many of our producers. If I felt that in future trade agreements we would go no farther than we have gone in this, I would not be satisfied, but I believe this is only a beginning. The government have demonstrated that they wish to trade with all other countries who are willing to trade with us on a reasonable and fair basis. This development of trade will bring comfort to many people in Canada who have been suffering in the last five years under exorbitant tariff and other restrictions greater than had been known previously. Those people will be greatly relieved to know that at last we are on the right road, and that we have in power a government which believes in international trade.

The debate has served this purpose if it has served no other. It shows this: My friends opposite really do not believe in international trade; that is the trouble. But hon. gentlemen on this side, members of the Liberal party, believe in freer intercourse in trade, and what can we expect from that freer intercourse? First, it will help the producer and the consumer. Next, it will help our railways. We hear a great deal about our tremendous railway problem, but hon. gentlemen opposite always put the cart before the horse when they discuss that problem. Unless we increase the business of Canada we shall never solve our railway problem. The best and the only way to solve our railway problem is to increase the volume of business done in this country, and then the railway problem will become a thing of the past. I support this bill whole-heartedly, not because it is perfect but because it is a step in the right direction, and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that we shall take many other steps of the same kind in the same direction, to free the channels of trade and let Canada return once more to that prosperity which she enjoyed, under a Liberal regime, from 1921 to 1930.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the country or the house is so very much interested in the history of what has been termed reciprocity nor do I think it is particularly interested in who inaugurated the agreement which we have before us to-day. They are interested rather in just what it means to Canada.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite have intimated that it is just too bad the opposition are prolonging this debate, but if they will check up Hansard they will find quite a number of speeches similar to that delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Young), who has taken up a good deal of the time of the house but has not really discussed the items contained in this trade agreement.

I believe, as an hon. gentleman stated to-day, that the opposition play a part, and a very important one, in government. I have been in the house for ten years; I sat on both sides of it, and I always felt, when I was in opposition, that I was representing the people of a section of Canada, and that I was here to consider legislation and to help in solving the problems that come before us from time to time. Occupying a seat in the opposition to-day does not prevent me from supporting any measure which I think is likely to aid in solving any of the difficult problems with which we are faced, and if this trade agreement would solve any of our problems, our unemployment, financial or other problems, I would support it wholeheartedly. I believe it is the duty of the opposition, not only to support good legislation, but to point out weaknesses in the legislation that is brought down in this house. I believe it is my duty, and I think it is the duty of every hon. member, to study and discuss this agreement. I have gone over the schedules carefully, but I must admit that it is impossible for any one member to decide whether this agreement is going to prove in the best interests of Canada as a whole. A member may know how it will affect his own particular part of the country, but I doubt whether any one member knows how it is going to affect every part of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

We have heard during the debate from members from different parts of this great country, discussing the details of this agreement and how it is going to affect their respective districts, and from that information the government will perhaps be able to size up the situation and correct the agreement in its details where that appears to be in the best interests of Canada. I think I am safe in saying that no member of this house is perfectly satisfied with the agreement as it stands. The previous speaker expressed himself in that sense. A number of hon. gentlemen opposite are dissatisfied with some of the items and with some of the changes that have been made in our tariff schedules by the agreement.

I said a moment ago that from the discussion that is taking place we can get a general picture of how this agreement is likely to affect the country as a whole. I listened with great interest last evening to the speech of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), who made it quite plain that this agreement would not help his section of the country; that it would not assist those fishermen in depressed circumstances who go down to the sea in ships, nor would it help the fruit and vegetable growers of that part of Canada. I also listened with interest to speakers from Ontario who pointed out the bad effects this agreement would have on certain branches of agriculture and also on the large manufacturing centres, where they expected the unemployment would be intensified rather than alleviated by this agreement. We have also heard from the members from western Canada, from the prairie provinces, who have made it plain that they endorse that part of the agreement which lowers the tariff on the implements of production. But we had in this house the other evening a debate on a resolution which I think made it clear that lowering the tariff does not necessarily lower the price of agricultural implements.

I wish, as one of the representatives from the great province of British Columbia, and in particular of that portion known as the lower mainland of that province, to take a few minutes to-night, to show how this agreement will affect the district which I have the honour to represent. We have there, in spite of what the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has said, perhaps one of the richest agricultural districts in the whole Dominion of Canada, comprising the dairy industry and all that goes with it; the poultry industry, perhaps the largest poultry plants in this dominion, and a large section that is devoted to production of fruit. In addition to agriculture, very large logging and lumbering operations are carried on in that district known as the lower mainland, there is also considerable mining development. So it is perhaps a typical district, and one which one would expect would be deeply interested in this agreement, not only because of the diversity of occupation that is carried on within its boundaries, but from the fact that it lies right up against the great state of Washington to the south and very close to the state of Oregon. The states of Washington and Oregon produce commodities similar to those produced in that particular part of British Columbia. It will thus be realized that anything which tends to reduce the tariff or in some cases to increase it, affects that particular part of the province. The states of Washington and Oregon have advantages over us, one of them being their climate. Their crops ripen earlier, this constituting a problem which we have to face.

I think the practical test of this agreement is: What do we get for what we give? I am going to consider it from that angle and as it affects that particular part of the country. What do we get? We get reductions in the tariff on cattle, on lumber and on whiskey. But there are limitations to these concessions. There is a quota on cattle and there is a quota on lumber. I believe the United States would have given us reductions on whiskey no matter what we did. The concessions granted in connection with cattle and lumber undoubtedly will be beneficial to these industries in British Columbia. I welcome anything that will help to restore the lumber and cattle markets which were lost under a previous Liberal government.

The United States tariff on beef cattle is reduced from three to two cents a pound for cattle weighing 700 pounds or over. But there is a quota limiting our sales to less than they were in 1929. In 1929, under the Fordney-McCumber tariff our cattle exports amounted to 247,000 head. Under this agreement our sales are limited to 155,799 head. So we are worse off than we were in 1929. On the other hand, on beef cattle entering this country, we are granting a reduction in the tariff of from three to two cents per pound. The tariff on sheep and lambs entering Canada has been reduced from $3 to $2 per head. The rate on live hogs has been reduced from three cents to one and a quarter cents per pound. We have reduced the Canadian tariff on fresh meats, beef, veal, lamb and mutton, from eight cents to six cents per pound. There has been a fifty per cent reduction on fresh pork, the rate being reduced from five cents to 2½ cents per pound. Under this agreement bacon, hams and shoulders enter this country under a rate of 1¾ cents per pound instead of five cents per pound as was the case previously. By these items we will pay the price for the concessions which are granted in connection with cattle of 700 pounds and over.

What do the Americans say about this agreement? This has been quoted before, but I think it is worth while quoting again. Mr. Henry Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, speaking at Chicago on December 10, last, is reported as follows:

> It was his considered judgment that American agriculture gains from the Canadian reciprocal trade treaty so far outweigh the losses that the net advantage to our agriculture as a whole is very much worth while; that Canadian concessions on meats and meat products duties will open the way for our farmers to get back a bigger share of the British pork market. The new agreement will permit American pork to go to Canada to replace Canadian pork exported to Great Britain, thus, in effect, permitting increased exports of American pork to Great Britain.

The government has boasted that the dairy industry is receiving great benefits from this agreement. The American tariff on cream is reduced from fifty-six cents to thirty-five cents a gallon, but there is a quota provision. Under the Fordney-McCumber tariff it was twenty cents a gallon and in 1929 it was thirty cents a gallon, so we are worse off to-day than we were in 1929. The duty on milk has not been touched at all. The tariff on American butter coming into this country is reduced by two cents per pound. Nothing whatever has been done for the Canadian dairy industry.

Now, what about the reduction on lumber? Under this pact we are receiving a reduction of fifty per cent. While the charge against our lumber has been reduced to $2 per thousand feet, we are again met with a quota. The combined quota on Douglas fir and western hemlock is 250,000,000 board feet. Items 503 and 504 of our tariff permit similar lumber to enter Canada from the United States duty free. This reduction will help the lumber industry in our province and I heartily support anything that will tend to restore the American market for our lumber, a market which we lost in 1930 and in the years prior to that.

The Ottawa agreements have been assailed in this debate, but I want to remind the house that those agreements saved the lumber industry of this country. That industry in British Columbia wants once more to enter the markets of the United States, but it does not want to sacrifice for that concession the markets which it secured under the empire agreements. I think the lumber people are inclined to be alarmed at the continual sniping at those agreements by the Liberal party. Only the other evening the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) was reported on page 638 of Hansard, as follows:

> The Liberal party was returned to power by a tremendous majority. The voice of the people spoke with no uncertain sound. That voice expressed discontent with existing conditions and with the policy of the previous administration. If there was any mandate at all in that vote of the Canadian people it was most emphatically a mandate that there should be substantial tariff reductions.

The hon. member is also reported on page 637 as follows:

> During the course of this debate mention has been made of the Ottawa agreements. I express the hope that never again will this country make an agreement along the lines and principles of the Ottawa agreements. I regard them as a dangerous step in the direction of economic imperialism.

What was the mandate of the Canadian people? As was pointed out in an earlier debate in the house, the mandate which the Liberal party received was received from thirty-five per cent of the people entitled to vote in the last elections. Does the hon. member consider that a mandate to destroy the empire agreements? There is to-day on the order paper a resolution moved by a Liberal member proposing that the trade agreements with the united kingdom be revoked. I say that the lumber people have a perfect right to be somewhat alarmed at this continual sniping by the Liberal party at these empire agreements.

Let us consider lumber under the Ottawa agreements. I have before me three tables giving the figures of lumber shipments from the Pacific coast for the last six and a half years; one table, Pacific coast to the world; another table, Pacific coast to the United Kingdom; and a third table, Pacific coast to Australia. These figures represent board feet and are from the Pacific lumber inspection bureau. I will not quote them in full, but as figures set forth, more plainly than hours of argument could, precisely what the Ottawa agreements did in the way of finding a market for this product of our province, I will give the figures for 1929 and 1934.

In 1929 British Columbia shipped to the world 399,000,000 feet; in 1934, two years after the agreements came into force, we shipped 830,000,000 feet. British Columbia increased her shipments to the united kingdom during the same period from 69,000,000 feet in 1929 to 455,000,000 feet in 1934, and she increased her shipments to Australia from 41,000,000 feet in 1929 to 128,000,000 feet in 1934. The result of the preference can be seen by a comparison of shipments from Washington and Oregon to the United Kingdom and Australia. During the same period, while our shipments increased enormously, shipments from the United States decreased correspondingly. For instance, in 1929 Washington shipped to the United Kingdom 196,000,000 feet, and in 1934 this was reduced to 28,000,000 feet. Oregon's shipments were reduced from 88,000,000 feet in 1929 to 8,000,000 feet in 1934.

These figures show what happened to the lumber trade of Washington and Oregon, which did not have the Ottawa agreements to support them. It is well to remember that the Ottawa agreements were negotiated by the Bennett government and that when they were in this house for consideration they were opposed by every Liberal who then occupied a seat in the opposition. Let me put in concrete form what the Ottawa agreements did for the country at that time. In 1924 Canada held fifth place as an exporter to the united kingdom. In 1930 we lost so much of this business that she dropped to eleventh place. She slipped to twelfth place in 1931, jumped to fourth in 1932, the year the agreements were signed, and climbed to third place the next year. By the end of 1934 Canada took second place in the British market, headed only by the United States. That tells the story of the Ottawa agreements.

As I said at the beginning, there are in this agreement some good features and some that are not so good. This one and perhaps the one in regard to live stock will be appreciated by the people of British Columbia. But what price have we paid for what we have received? I have before me the opinion of Mr. Wallace, in a United Press dispatch from Washington dated November 19, which states:

> In an official statement Secretary of State Henry A. Wallace said the treaty would benefit "the whole of agriculture" and predicted recovery of most of the $35,000,000 decline in United States agricultural exports to Canada during the past five years. During that time, he said, exports to Canada of American farm products, upon which duty reductions are secured in the treaty, declined from $50,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1930, to $15,000,000 during the year ended March 31, 1935. Wallace cited the reductions granted to Canada on a quota limit of beef, cattle, calves and dairy cows and added:
> "There are a few farm groups which will fear they are being hurt by the new agreement, but actually in those cases the tariff reductions are moderate, and in addition there are quota restrictions of such a nature that imports from Canada cannot affect the American price structure by more than 1 per cent. Both countries have made tariff concessions in order to increase the volume of trade between them. Canada has agreed to reduce import duties on a long list of American farm products, reductions ranging from 25 per cent on certain fruits and vegetables to 100 per cent on potatoes. The United States has agreed to reduce duties on seventeen Canadian farm products, and to bind the present rates by three others."

According to this statement Mr. Wallace is of opinion that the concessions given by Canada are quite valuable, and I notice he mentions potatoes. Under this agreement which we have before us—it has already been mentioned in this debate—potatoes are admitted free into Canada, while those of us on the lower mainland of British Columbia, if we wish to export table potatoes to the United States, must meet a tariff of $15 a ton. I am told by producers in British Columbia that if this item is not restored to the general tariff rate, with the better climatic conditions in the great states to the south the producers of Washington and Oregon will be able to flood that part of Canada with potatoes at such a reduced price as to be less than the cost of producing in that section.

Another item in which we are very much interested, particularly in my district, is hay. In the duty on hay coming into Canada from the United States, we find a reduction of from $5 a ton to $1.75 a ton, while the duty on hay going into the United States is reduced from $5 to $3. I want to picture this to you, Mr. Speaker: This is a district lying close to a great state in the south producing an abundance of hay. I recall the time when hay was $3 a ton in the Canadian tariff. The Americans had a surplus and they established a selling agency in Vancouver. There was a string of trucks passing across the line, down through the lower mainland of the province, to Vancouver, passing by farmers' fields in which were piled tons upon tons of hay that they could not sell. The government five years ago raised that tariff to $5 and gave the farmers protection. What are those farmers to do now that the tariff is reduced to $1.75? The Americans under this agreement did not give us even the fifty per cent reduction; they reduced their duty to $3. The farmers of the lower mainland of British Columbia are much concerned over this item and some others as well.

What about the poultry industry? I have under my hand extracts, letters and telegrams, which I am not going to unload on Hansard. I will say simply this, that there is a fear on the part of this industry in British Columbia that American eggs will enter in greater quantities, resulting in lower prices to the producer as a consequence of the reduction in duty from ten cents to five cents a dozen and the removal of the dumping duty. This is a serious matter to the poultry farmers in my part of the country. It means that protection from the dumping of American surplus eggs into Canada has been removed. I think there are some members in the house to-day who were here prior to 1930. They will recall the problem which faced the government of the day because of the large importations of eggs from the United States. In 1930, the last year of the low tariff, 3,000,000 dozen eggs were dumped into this country from the United States, with the result that this demoralized the Canadian market at certain seasons of the year. In 1934 importations were reduced to 115,000 dozen. In 1934-1935 importations amounted to the paltry sum of approximately $17,000.

The poultry industry has had to overcome many difficulties in our province. One has been the price of feed, when we have had to compete with eggs marketed particularly during the summer season from other parts of Canada. With the protection that was afforded under the previous rate of ten cents—the total protection with the dumping duty amounted to about thirteen cents—they were able to stand the storm of the depression. Under the new arrangement, as I have pointed out, they will be called upon to face serious competition from the south.

Another product of the poultry industry is baby chicks. We have perhaps some of the largest plants producing baby chicks in the Dominion of Canada. One of the producers in my district has already this year received orders for 50,000 chicks. They have produced a very high laying strain in our part of the country. It will perhaps be recalled that hens from British Columbia secured world championships for a number of years. These producers went to a great deal of expense and much time and trouble to develop these high-producing flocks from which they market the baby chicks. Now, under this trade agreement we find that the protection which was afforded them during the last five years has been almost completely removed. The dumping duty is removed. One man writes informing me that in order to give protection that would put them on an equal basis with American producers it would be necessary that they should have a specific duty of at least seven to eight cents on each chick. They ask: What is a protection of twenty per cent against chicks imported from the great plants of California and Oregon? If they are laid down at the border at five cents apiece there is no protection.

Another industry which I mentioned was that of fruit growing. In this connection I want to refer particularly to what we call soft fruits. This is an important industry in the district which I have the honour to represent. Of one variety of fruit alone, namely strawberries, somewhere about 3,000,000 pounds were produced last year in the lower mainland of British Columbia. They were sold in carlots, in less than carlots, locally, and a large quantity was exported in processed form. Last year British Columbia shipped 153 cars of soft fruits out of the province, and in addition 700 tons of processed fruits were exported. The terms of this agreement provide for reductions in both the tariff and the dumping duty. On vegetables the tariff was reduced from thirty to fifteen per cent, on fruits from twenty to fifteen per cent. Dumping duties are reduced by about one-fifth.

Take rhubarb for example. On rhubarb there is during the shipping season a reduction of 33⅓ per cent. That is the reduction in the protection which was afforded that particular industry in 1935. On raspberries we have a reduction in protection of forty per cent. On strawberries the reduction is forty-four per cent; on prunes the reduction in total protection is thirty-three per cent; on pears, sixteen per cent; on apples, 28⅔ per cent. The protection on celery during the shipping season is reduced by sixty-one per cent. On asparagus we have a reduction of thirty per cent in the protection; and I can safely say that asparagus growing is an industry that has grown up under protection; a large amount of money has been invested in it, and if it is not afforded proper protection it will be wiped out. As to the harm that this agreement will do to the fruit and vegetable industry, I might quote from my hon. friend the member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), when he said the other night, that the harm would be considerably lessened if the government would use the power they have, if they would use that power in full, and if they would use it in time.

I have undertaken in a few minutes to-night to point out to the government what in this agreement I consider is not in the best interests of the people of the particular part of the country from which I come. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), as he has said that he has power to raise the intermediate tariff, that he exercise that power with regard to many of these agriculture items. They have been brought to the notice of the government during the last few days by members of this house. I should like to suggest that, for instance, in the case of potatoes the tariff be restored under the intermediate schedule; that the tariff on eggs be restored, also, if possible, that on baby chicks. As to fruit, as the member for Yale as well as I have said, the situation depends a great deal upon the production in those states to the south. If they have over-production; if they have a surplus which they want to dump some where, it will be necessary that we should have the very fullest protection, and that it should be applied in time. During my experience as representative of the district I have found that the difficulty, in dealing with matters pertaining to the application of dumping duties, has been to get them applied in time to give us proper protection during the shipping season.

I am sure that there are on the other side of the house members who are not exactly satisfied with every item contained in these schedules. I suggest to them that they, along with us of the opposition, urge upon the government the necessity of restoring this protection to these particular items which are so important to the agriculturists of this country.

Mr. W. M. RYAN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was very much impressed with the striking point emphasized by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his address on this resolution. At page 503 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman said:

> Let me stress this point—I have overlooked it up to the moment, but I want to emphasize it now. This government came back with a mandate from the people of Canada to put through a reciprocal agreement at the earliest possible moment. So far as asking the approval of this house is concerned, I regard that in some respects as an almost unnecessary step; the country itself has given so overwhelming an expression of approval of its confidence in a reciprocal agreement with the United States to be negotiated by a Liberal administration.

Agreeing so thoroughly with that view and believing as I did that this resolution was before the house bearing the approval of the people, I had not planned to participate in this debate. Within the last few days, however, what might be called challenges were thrown across the floor of the house by hon. members opposite. I think it was the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) who said, "Stand up, you maritimers, and express yourselves." That is why I have risen in my place here to-night. I am a maritimer representing the constituency of St. John-Albert, which includes the city of Saint John and boasts of the finest natural, year-round port in the Dominion of Canada. With all due respect to the other ports, we in the city of Saint John are modest when we make that statement, and we are prepared to stand by it.

This gives me an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to extend my most sincere congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister upon having so successfully negotiated this agreement, and I want to tell him that I feel I am expressing the opinion of the people of the maritime provinces when I say that we are unanimously behind the agreement. Two of the greatest handicaps we have had to combat since the days of confederation have been discrimination in freight rates and inability to find a market for our natural products. I am happy to say here that, thanks to a Liberal government presided over by the present Prime Minister, the question of freight rates was partly solved by the introduction into this house of the Maritimes Freight Rates Act, and to-day we must again extend our thanks to the same government, presided over by the same able leader, for assisting us in solving our other difficulty of finding markets.

In 1927 parliament appointed a commission to inquire into the difficulties of the maritime provinces. That commission is now known as the Duncan commission. It was an able body of men, presided over by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, an eminent British statesman. That commission did its work and reported to this house. I have before me a copy of that report to which I intend to refer, because it is essential to the argument I have to present for the consideration of hon. members. May I say, however, that if hon. members will read the report they will find that this commission spent a great deal of its time in trying to solve the question of our freight rates, as well as in trying to develop some ways and means to help us in finding markets for our natural products. At page 31 of the report we have a reference to the maritime provinces with regard to primary industries. I want to bring these facts before the house so that hon. members may realize and understand that to-day we are faced with the problem of finding suitable markets for our products, but that problem has been solved to some extent and I am satisfied that when this agreement passes the house, the problem will be completely solved. At page 31 of the report of the commission I find the following:

> Forest production for the year 1924 was thirty-five per cent of the total production of New Brunswick, seven per cent of that of Nova Scotia and four per cent of that of Prince Edward Island. Apart from the production of firewood, ties, rails, poles, posts, etc., for which no definite figures are available, the lumber industry consists, first, of the manufacture from raw materials produced by operations in the woods, of dressed lumber, or board measure lumber, laths and shingles, and, second, the manufacture of pulp and paper, an industry of comparatively recent development. The latter includes three forms of industrial activity: the operations in the forests with pulpwood as the product, the manufacture of pulp, and the manufacture of paper. The value of the output of lumber, laths and shingles manufactured in the maritime provinces 1924 was approximately $18,000,000, or over twelve per cent of the total value of such output in all Canada.... Fourteen pulp and paper mills operated in the maritime provinces in 1924. The average number of persons employed in the production of pulp was 15,000, and the capital invested in pulp mills and buildings was over $30,000,000.

The commission also dealt with the question of our fisheries, to which I should like to refer also:

> The average yearly value of the catch in the maritime provinces during the five years from 1920 to 1924 inclusive, was approximately $16,000,000, or over thirty-six per cent of Canada's total catch during that period. During the year ending March 31, 1925, the capital invested in the maritime provinces in equipment for fishing, such as boats, nets, traps, and general gear, was over $12,000,000, or fifty-two per cent of the total capital invested in Canada in such equipment. The capital invested in factories and curing establishments was $5,500,000, or thirty per cent of the total amount invested in all Canada in such establishments. Thus the total investment in the fishing industry of the maritime provinces in primary operations and manufacturing was over $17,500,000, or forty per cent of the total Canadian investment in the fishing industry.

I refer to these facts because the commission found it necessary to bring before the house the proposition that the maritime provinces were concerned in the marketing development of their primary industries.

The agreement introduced by the Prime Minister contains certain provisions which are bound to prove advantageous to Canadian primary producers, and therefore must be highly beneficial to the maritime provinces. Can the agreement help the maritime provinces? If one examines the items in the schedule one would conclude that any man coming from the maritimes who did not rise in this house and support the agreement would not be true to his constituents.

I should like to quote no less an authority than Sir Thomas White, a former Minister of Finance and one who is by no means a Liberal. His opinions, however, are valued highly in regard to all matters affecting finance. After he had examined the trade agreement Sir Thomas expressed the following opinion:

> The lowering of United States tariff barriers on lumber, fish, agricultural products and other commodities should prove of material advantage to Canadian primary producers.

In this connection I shall quote, further, from an editorial which appears in the Saint John Daily Telegraph-Journal, one of the leading newspapers in the maritime provinces. It is an independent journal, and one which so far as I know has no political leanings.

Mr. BROOKS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RYAN: The hon. member laughs; probably he is in the know, but I can tell him—

Mr. BROOKS: I think everybody knows.

Mr. RYAN: I am prepared to let him express his opinion, if he can speak as to the political bias of this paper. However I say that it is an independent paper, and in its issue of November 18, 1933, I find the following comment:

With reciprocity between Canada and the United States having practically unanimous support in this country, it carries an increased importance over that of any similar proposal in the past. There will be objections raised in many quarters to reductions in duties on various commodities effected, but so far as the maritime provinces are concerned, our real concern lies in the benefits which may accrue to those interested in primary products. With the wiping out of many maritime industries during the last sixty years, we may be pardoned if our sympathy with some manufacturing concerns has been somewhat lessened.

I shall now turn to a discussion of some of the items in the agreement. Speaking generally, I say that it is greatly to the advantage of the people in the maritimes. First, let us consider the situation with regard to lumber. Shortly after the federal elections I was deluged with requests from lumbermen in the maritime provinces urging me to take up with the government the matter of having United States customs duties reduced on lumber. I am sure similar requests came to the Prime Minister, because attached to the correspondence I received were copies of letters addressed to him. May I say to the hon. gentleman who refused to give me names last night that I can give them to him tonight, but shall be content by saying that the letters come from reputable lumbermen. They ask that the duty on lumber be cut at least in half. These representations were made to the Prime Minister, and that is exactly what they got. I say that any man from the maritime provinces could be accused of base ingratitude if he did not stand in his place and support the agreement, if for no reason other than the support it gives to the lumber industry.

Mr. BROOKS: Is lumber in quantities being shipped to the United States?

Mr. RYAN: I would reply to the hon. member for Royal by stating that I have not the statistics before me, but I can assure him that just as soon as the agreement is fully ratified plenty of lumber will be shipped to the United States.

May I say that down in the maritime provinces we regard the report of the Duncan commission as more or less our magna charta. While I do not think it was within their powers to make representations as to the negotiation of treaties, by suggestion or inference the Duncan commission did make such recommendations. Quoting from page 32 of the commission's report, which is available at the distribution office of the House of Commons, I find the following:

On the question of markets, witnesses who appeared before us from New Brunswick expressed the unanimous opinion that a trade treaty with the United States in respect of forest products would greatly benefit industry in the maritime provinces and result in extensive development.

The report states further:

The request made in this connection was supported by the Premier of New Brunswick on behalf of the province.

At that time the premier was the Hon. J. B. M. Baxter. He was a Conservative premier, and is now Chief Justice of New Brunswick. Sitting in the legislature at that time was the hon. member for Royal, who spoke last night in this chamber, and who applauded the premier when he appeared before the Duncan commission and made these representations. Now the hon. member appears in the House of Commons and listens to the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett) oppose the agreement. We find the hon. member for Royal following the lead of his right hon. leader. Well, he may try to ride two horses, but when he goes back to New Brunswick I can assure him he had better not make the speech he made in this chamber last night for the benefit of hon. members assembled here in Ottawa.

I now discuss the item of fish, one which is of prime importance to the people in the maritime provinces. In checking the schedule I find that the rate on halibut is reduced from two cents to one cent per pound, the rate on salmon from two to one and one-half cents per pound, and the rate on smoked herring from one and one-quarter cents to five-eighths cent per pound. There is the added assurance that lobsters and shell fish shall be kept on the free list for at least three years. These are matters of tremendous importance to the people in the maritimes. We in New Brunswick are deeply interested in the shipment of smoked herring, and the salmon industry, too, is of great importance.

Referring again to the Duncan report I find that the commission touched upon the question of finding markets for fish, and at page 33 of their report they state:

We shall deal with some other aspects of the fishing industry later.

Though in the case of fish, particularly cured fish, we had considerable evidence to show the possibility of very greatly extending the market within Canada, representations were made to us, as in the case of forest products, upon the desirability of a trade agreement with the United States.

That is the report of the Duncan commission, and I want to add that it is my belief that the introduction of this trade agreement is an implementing to some extent of the report of the Duncan commission, and I commend the right hon. the Prime Minister for the splendid work he has done in negotiating this agreement.

I could go on all down the line and speak of the benefits that will accrue to the maritime provinces from this agreement. The duty on seed potatoes, for instance, from March to November, has been cut from seventy-five to forty cents per hundredweight, and while there is a quota of 780,000 bushels, that is three times the amount of the current exportation, as was pointed out by the Prime Minister himself. The duty on turnips has been reduced from twenty-five cents to 12½ cents per hundredweight, and the duty on maple sugar from six to four cents per pound. In that one item alone of maple sugar I can see tremendous possibilities for my own province of New Brunswick.

It is only recently that the Telegraph-Journal, the paper which I mentioned a moment ago, had a leading editorial urging the people of New Brunswick to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the trade agreement. There is no question that this agreement contains provisions which are of great advantage to the people of the maritime provinces. Some may say: Well, you did not get all you wanted or all you asked for. But, Mr. Speaker, this world is so constituted that we shall never get all we want, and I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) realizes that to-day. But is there any reason why any member from the maritime provinces, at any rate, should vote on the floor of the house against this agreement which means so much to the people of the maritimes?

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) quoted last night from two newspapers published in Carleton county, New Brunswick, and read a letter from a gentleman who lives in that county. The tenor of those reports in the papers was that the potato industry would be injured as a result of putting American potatoes on the free list, but I would remind the house that those editorials, coming from Conservative newspapers, were more or less inspired, and that the gentleman who was referred to last night was the editor of one of those newspapers and Conservative organizer for the county.

Mr. BROOKS: I want to correct the hon. gentleman. One of those newspapers is a strong Liberal paper.

[Mr. Ryan.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not permitted to ask questions without the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not asking a question—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the hon. member speaking to a point of order?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes. I wish to point out to you, sir, on a point of order, that the hon. member for Royal was not asking a question. The hon. member who has the floor had made the statement that a certain newspaper was a Conservative newspaper, and the hon. member for Royal rose to say that that was a mistake, as I submit he has a right to do.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. RYAN: I would say to the hon. member for Royal that I have reference to Mr. Hatfield whose name was quoted here last night. Turning back to the question of potatoes, which seems to agitate the mind of my hon. friend—

Mr. LENNARD: And some others too.

Mr. RYAN: Well, if those hon. gentlemen would take the trouble to check the statistics they would find that nothing has happened yet under this agreement to injure the potato industry of this country, because in the month of January of this year there was shipped into Canada only 381 hundredweight of American potatoes as compared with 202 hundredweight in 1935, or in other words an importation of the value of $600 for the whole dominion.

Mr. LENNARD: But what is going to happen in 1936?

Mr. RYAN: I have just given the importations for January, 1936. I have made a further check on the potatoes coming in within the last two months; I find that nothing but cull potatoes have been coming in, and I believe there is a sinister motive behind that importation. The speeches we have heard from the Conservative side of the house on the question of potatoes dealt only in generalities. They have produced no facts and figures to show that the potato industry will be injured as a result of American potatoes being put on the free list. It is all right to talk generalities, but let them give us the facts. I am giving the facts because the figures I have given came from the Department of National Revenue in Ottawa only a short time ago. I do say this, however, that within the next few months American potatoes will no doubt come in as they did in the past, at a time when we have no potatoes to compete with them. In June, 1935, for instance, 57,466 hundredweight of American potatoes were shipped into Canada, and in July, 15,870 hundredweight. But as soon as our own potatoes were available and we were able to compete, shipments from the United States fell off. We need have no fear that the Canadian potato producer will not be able to meet the competition of American producers at all times because we grow a superior potato.

In conclusion, I would just say that it almost takes one's breath away to hear our friends opposite expressing fears for the success of our great national ports, when we remember the experience we have had in the last five years, with trade restrictions such as they have been, and the business of our ports falling off alarmingly. I repeat, it almost takes one's breath away to find these new champions springing now to the rescue of our national ports.

I have before me some statistics supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce. They show that in 1929, the last full year in which the Liberal party was in power, inward shipments of sea-going vessels arriving at St. John amounted to $15,691,713, whereas in 1934, the last full year in which the Conservative party was in power, those shipments had dropped to $8,113,477. The figures for 1929 show that goods exported from St. John were valued at $55,861,050, whereas in 1934 they dropped to $33,209,104. It may be said that values do not offer a true criterion by which to make comparisons; that the true test is tonnage. In order to be absolutely fair, I shall give the figures in tons. The official figures show that in 1929 the amount of freight imported through Saint John totalled 387,050 tons, whereas in 1934 the figure had dropped to 350,854 tons. Exports amounted to 1,075,765 tons in 1929, whereas in 1934 only 515,164 tons were exported. These figures show how shipping fell off at the port of Saint John due to the trade agreements negotiated by the last government. The records of other ports will show a somewhat similar condition.

When the late government introduced a tariff measure affecting Cuban sugar, the government of Cuba retaliated and raised their tariff against our potatoes. This meant the loss of the sale of some 3,000,000 bushels of potatoes per annum. When we were making these potato shipments to Cuba there were something like four ships leaving Saint John every week for that country. Employment was given to the dock workers and our railways were assisted by the traffic. After the tariff on Cuban sugar had been raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) we had scarcely one boat sailing from Saint John. When hon. friends opposite set themselves up as the champions of the ports, I want to tell them that we would rather leave our fate in the hands of the government presiding over affairs to-day. It will be the salvation of our ports when this agreement is put into effect and there will be further benefits when the trade agreement with Japan is in force. Other agreements are to be negotiated which will open up the markets of the world and our ports will have the advantage of increased traffic.

I am proud to record my vote in the house in support of this measure. This will be my first vote on a major measure in this chamber and I am thankful to know it will be for an agreement between Canada and the United States which means so much to our maritime provinces.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, we have heard quite a number of speeches on this agreement, some of them very interesting and all of them varied in character. Just before six o'clock the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) said that he thought sufficient members had been heard from. I do not believe he can criticize the Conservatives from Saskatchwan for prolonging this debate. I think I should have the privilege of making a few observations and I can promise the hon. member that there will be only one Conservative voice from that province.

Much has been said about international trading and we have been accused of pursuing a policy of economic imperialism. This matter has been viewed also from the standpoint of domestic markets. I am not going to discuss this matter from any of those different angles, but I shall refer briefly to international trading. I admit that international trade is a splendid thing, but I would remind hon. members that when the government headed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) came into power in 1930, Canada was in eleventh or twelfth position as far as international trade was concerned. When that government left office the position of Canada had been materially improved because of the policies pursued, this country being then in either fifth or sixth position.

Many hon. members have discussed this matter from a local viewpoint, and this is quite natural as they are interested in how this agreement may affect the part of the country they happen to represent. I am also going to deal with the question from that standpoint. The right hon. leader of the opposition has reviewed the history of reciprocal trade or reciprocity since confederation and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) also made a careful review of the policy of reciprocity. I have nothing to say in that regard other than to remind the house that when Sir John A. Macdonald introduced his national policy in 1878 he announced that it provided for free trade with the United States on a large number of articles. As was made quite clear by the leader of the opposition, since that time the Conservative party has always been ready to negotiate with the United States agreements along reciprocal lines as long as they were fair and equitable and did not sacrifice the interests of the Canadian people.

I should like to review briefly what has taken place in the United States with respect to tariffs. I mention first the Wilson-Underwood tariff which was in effect from 1913 to 1921. This tariff made substantial reductions in the duty on a considerable number of articles. I hold in my hand a list of forty odd primary products that were affected. All grades of cattle, hogs, sheep were allowed free entry under that tariff. All kinds of meat products such as beef, fresh and frozen, pork, fresh and frozen, and salted pork, were all free. Dairy products were free with the exception of butter on which was a duty of 2½ cents per pound. Then followed a long list of grains and seeds which were all free. We next had the Fordney-McCumber tariff which was introduced in 1922 and which commenced an era of protection in the United States. Heavy rates of duty were imposed upon certain Canadian farm products and the result was a great reduction in the sales of these articles in the United States. That tariff was in force until 1930 when the Hawley-Smoot tariff came into effect. No matter what the Prime Minister said with respect to wider markets and freer trade, he was powerless to prevent the increase in tariffs from going into effect in the United States.

Then we had in June, 1930, the Hawley-Smoot tariff which completely closed the door against the entry of Canada's primary products into that country. Those were the words used by the Prime Minister when discussing that tariff; he said that it completely closed the door. But he made no protest. The statement he made at that time has already been put on Hansard during this debate. I could give the list of some forty primary products with the duties which the Hawley-Smoot tariff imposed—and they are very considerable—but I will not take time to go into the details. Suffice it to say that that tariff placed heavy duties on cattle poultry, fruits, vegetables, grains of all kinds. pork and pork products, and dairy products generally. The real effect of the Hawley-Smoot tariff was not felt in Canada until after the change of government in 1930, when it turned back to the Canadian market a great flow of our primary products that had been going into the United States prior to the coming into effect of that tariff.

Then we come to the United Kingdom agreements consummated in 1932. The Bennett government negotiated these agreements, which turned into the United Kingdom a considerable volume of trade that had formerly been going into the United States. I think it is important to point out that by 1934 we had witnessed the result of the United Kingdom agreement. It was the turning point; it was the turning point so far as the President of the United States and their government were concerned; it brought them to the position in which they were prepared to negotiate a reciprocal trade arrangement with Canada. I think that is important.

It is not necessary for me now to review the negotiations leading up to the signing of this agreement. That ground has been so thoroughly covered by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition that I do not deem it necessary to comment upon it. What is the effect of a reduction in duties? I think the house will agree with me that a reduction in duties has really two effects, the first being an increase in the volume of imports—at least that should be the first effect—and then the displacement of home labour by foreign or outside labour. And here I want to be fair. I think the government speakers could have taken advantage of an argument with respect to these two effects, though I have not heard it mentioned. However, I will state it. In a fair trade agreement these effects would be counterbalanced by provisions for greater exports which in turn would absorb the labour disturbed by imports. That is a fair conclusion. But can one find in this agreement provisions that make for that counterbalancing effect? I cannot.

This agreement, like all others, is in some respects good and in other respects bad. I will refer briefly to certain products in which Saskatchewan is more or less interested. The question of potatoes has been mentioned on both sides. We do not export potatoes from Saskatchewan to any great extent; very few, if any, are exported. But if it were possible, under this or any other agreement, for eastern Canada and the maritimes to sell their potatoes to our good friends to the south, we might be induced in the west to grow potatoes and ship them to Ontario and Quebec, so that these two central provinces might know what real potatoes are. I have not had a real potato since coming to Ottawa; I say that with all due respect to my good friend from Toronto, and I have told him so. Conservative members from Manitoba and Saskatchewan are going to bring their own potatoes here and have a few baked in the restaurant.

I come now to dairy products. This is important. I have searched the agreement and cannot find in it very much for the dairy producer in Canada. There is no lowering of duty on milk, milk powder, butter or cheese. It is true there is a reduction on cream from fifty-six cents to thirty-five cents a gallon, but there is a quota of 1,500,000 gallons which is only half the amount of cream exported to the United States in 1929, prior to the Hawley-Smoot tariff coming into effect. It may be urged that we in the prairies do not export cream or milk. That is quite true. We cannot make cheese advantageously on account of the distances between farms; they make cheese in eastern Canada. They can export cream and milk from eastern Canada to the states immediately to the south, but we cannot do that in Saskatchewan. But I will say for the benefit of hon. members that in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta we can make butter second to none produced in any part of this country; and if an arrangement could be made whereby the maritimes and eastern Canada could obtain a market to the south for their dairy products we could supply the east with the best butter produced in Canada. I have under my hand some figures showing the number of prizes taken in 1935 at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto. The three prairie provinces secured 1,406 prizes and Ontario and Quebec together secured 174. That was for butter alone.

I should like to put on the record figures to show the exports of butter and dairy products from Canada to the United States in 1929; that is, before the Hawley-Smoot tariff took effect. In that year we exported 3,750,000 gallons of sweet milk; 1,000,000 pounds of milk powder; 2,833,000 gallons of cream; 7,411,000 pounds of cheese; 231,000 pounds of butter, and the same year we exported 7,213,700 pounds of bacon and 240,000 head of cattle. I think that shows the importance of the dairy industry. And there is in this agreement, other than what relates to cream, nothing that will help us to sell a pound of dairy products in the country to the south.

Let us take cattle. The reduction is one cent per pound on cattle over 700 pounds. I admit that is beneficial. The farmers of western Canada were very glad to see it. But I think we might have had the full cent and a half, representing the fifty per cent which the United States president could have given. However I do not think the item will be of any benefit; owing to the quota we shall not ship very many more than we did in 1935, before this agreement came into effect. The decrease which has already occurred in the price, with the increased freight rate, more than counterbalances the one cent per pound reduction in duty. I have on my desk letters which I have received from Saskatchewan farmers who were shippers of cattle and who expected to ship more, but when they compare prices they dare not take a chance. Here, again, we have a quota. Cattle have been spoken about so much during the debate that I almost hesitate to mention the matter. But the quota, which will be in the neighbourhood of 230,000 head, is equal only to the average of what we shipped in the years 1927, 1928 and 1929. I want to draw attention to the fact that there is no reduction for the class from 175 to 700 pounds which is commonly spoken of as stockers and feeders. Also, the restriction surrounding the exportation of the milch cow is such that I do not think the farmers will take advantage of it because, as I understand the situation, there has to be a clear bill of health as far as tuberculosis is concerned for at least a year before the cow is exported.

At this point I want to reply to a statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) with respect to this one cent per pound on cattle. I may say that it is rather an advantage for us to have the hon. gentleman in parliament when he speaks for himself, because we know that in the last parliament he had a mouthpiece in the person of Mr. Young, the then member for Weyburn. I believe Mr. Young put forth free trade views even better than the hon. gentleman can. The hon. member made the statement this afternoon that the one cent per pound arrangement was very favourably received by cattlemen or certain friends of his in Ontario. He said that he had a friend in Ontario who had so much feed last fall that he bought and brought down 400 head of western cattle; that he put 150 head in the feed lot, and when he shipped the finished cattle to Toronto, if the price did not suit he could then bill them through to Buffalo.

Now, why did he not tell the whole story? He said how pleased his friend was when he found that he had the advantage of shipping them to Buffalo at a cent a pound reduction in duty. Well, this is the story as he should have told it. He said that he got these cattle from western Canada. Last fall the prairie farmers, the farmers out in Saskatchewan, were short of feed. We know how the calamity that occurred there last year affected our crops. Many of them had to sacrifice their cattle. Not having the feed, they could not properly finish their cattle to take advantage of the one cent per pound reduction in duty by shipping them to the south. I may say that these must have been a class of cattle which were feeders or stockers; they certainly were not fit for the market or they would not have gone into the feed lot in Ontario. They would be in a class not included under this agreement. If all grades of cattle had been included, they would have gone to St. Paul or some other point south from Saskatchewan. However, they came down to Ontario, and he got cheap freight; when they go into the feed lot they enjoy the cheap freight and a through billing. What he really was doing was exploiting the poor western farmer again. That is just what happened. I should like my hon. friend to make that speech out in Saskatchewan and tell the farmers there how, owing to this agreement, they were able to do that with western cattle.

I ask hon. members opposite: What is there in this agreement, when you boil it down that is of any value to cattlemen, and what is there in it for the grain grower? Is there included in the agreement any grain that will go into the United States or that we can ship under a lower rate of duty? And how about the dairy producer? These, I think, are all questions that should have been answered.

Much has been said about lumber. I am all in favour of a reduction that gives an entry into the United States for lumber. One of the members from British Columbia has elaborated to-night on that; it has meant certain benefits from a reduction in the duty; but I want to point out that already I have received protests from farmers in Saskatchewan owing to the fact that since the first of the year there has been an increase of $2 per thousand feet on lumber. The farmers out there are not receiving this very kindly. During the last five or six years they have not been able to buy lumber to repair their houses, their barns, their granaries and so on, owing to the calamity they have met in the loss of crops. They are in a similar position as regards lumber as they are in regard to machinery; the old machines are worn out and they have to buy new. And now, since the first of the year, they are faced with an increase of $2 per thousand feet of lumber, and they are also faced with a considerable increase in the price of machinery.

The reduction of duty on implements is from twenty-five per cent to 12½ per cent. When first the news came out, it was heralded as a great accomplishment on the part of the present government. The farmers received it very kindly because they expected to get their implements cheaper to the extent of at least twelve per cent of duty. But when the prices came out on February 1 and they found there was an increase from $2 to about $40 per implement, as the case might be, this was not very favourably received. Protests have been coming in, as we know; I have them before me, along with quotations from the western press to the effect that the farmers have protested. We know what has taken place in this house in the last two days, that a committee has been appointed to investigate this increase.

The fact remains, no matter how much we hear about free trade and about what lower tariffs will do, that when, on different occasions, we have had reductions in the tariff on implements in Canada, every time this has meant an increase in price, and that when we have had increases in the tariff, this has meant a reduction in the price. That is something I cannot figure out, and it has not been figured out by any of the members opposite. There is a joker somewhere. But I would remind this house that when the leader of the opposition was in power and we raised the duty on agricultural implements coming into Canada, he made the manufacturers put their name on the dotted line that there would not be any increase, and if the present Prime Minister had had the courage to talk to the manufacturers in Canada there is no doubt that there would not have been the increase now that they have lowered the duty.

Mr. YOUNG: Is my hon. friend in favour of taking the whole duty off agricultural implements?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Well, if it will work the way it has worked during the last four years, that when the duty was increased we had lower prices and when the duty was taken off we had increased prices, I would say no, for that one particular item.

Mr. KINLEY: What difference does the price make if you do not pay for your goods?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Well, I think the implement manufacturers have been pretty well paid in the past. If they got half of what they sold their implements for they would have been pretty well paid. However, that is the fact, and we shall see what will happen when we have the investigation. I am just as anxious to know as is any other member of this house. I am sure that the farmers of the west want to know, and if we can do so we should solve this problem of why these prices have gone up when the duty has been lowered.

I have tried to cover most of our primary products in a fair way and to point out the advantages, but there are one or two distinct disadvantages as well. Reference has been made already to the reduction in duty on pork and pork products, a reduction from five cents to 1¾ cents in some grades and from five cents to three cents in other grades. I should like to tell the house what the secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture thinks about this item of pork products. He stated:

—there would be a wide market in Canada for United States pork. He could see Canadian pork going to Great Britain and United States pork taking its place in Canada.

I have before me the figures with regard to exports of pork from Canada and imports of pork from the United States. In the last five years we imported from the United States 33,309,509 pounds and exported to that country 15,827,800 pounds. For the last three years or so exports and imports have practically balanced, but during that period we have had a very considerable increase in our exports of pork products to the united kingdom under the Ottawa agreements, under which we have a quota of 280,000,000 pounds of bacon. In the first year during which the agreements were in operation we secured in the united kingdom a market for some 43,000,000 pounds of bacon. In the second year we exported about 60,000,000 pounds and last year we exported over 80,000,000 pounds. I would remind the house of the statement made by Mr. McLean of Canada Packers, before the price spreads committee, that during the first year the agreements were in operation they meant $26,000,000 to the hog producers of Canada. In that year our exports amounted to only 43,000.000 pounds, so that on a similar basis that market must have been worth from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 last year. Compare what the Ottawa agreements meant to the hog producers with the statement made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) the other night, that this agreement would mean $18,000,000 to the cattle growers of Canada. It must be remembered that in making that statement the hon. member assumed that all the cattle produced in Canada during the year would reap the benefit of the $9 per head, which was the figure he used. That, of course, would be utterly impossible, but even if it were not, when these two advantages are weighed I think everyone will agree that the balance is in favour of retaining the hog market.

Now I should like to quote one or two opinions in connection with this agreement. This afternoon the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) also quoted the opinions of various people. First, I should like to quote a gentleman whose opinion I know the government will not hesitate a moment in accepting. I refer to a statement made by Grant Dexter, which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post in January of this year:

The United States treaty has undermined the foundations upon which the Ottawa treaties were built.

I think that is something important which should be remembered. The other opinion I wish to mention is that of the President of the United States, contained in an address to the American Farm Bureau at Chicago on December 9, 1935, appearing in the Duluth Herald of the same date:

Agriculture, far from being crucified by this agreement, as some have told you, actually gains from it. We export more agricultural products to Canada than we have imported from her. We shall continue to do so, for the very simple reason that the United States, with its larger area of agricultural lands, its more varied climate and its vastly greater population produces far more of most agricultural products, including animal products, vegetables and fruits, than does Canada. In the case of the few reductions that have been made, quota limitations are set on the amount that may be brought in at the lower rates.

That is an important statement, and we should keep it in mind. Then the president continued:

On the other side of the picture we believe, and most unbiased men believe, that the general increase in our trade with Canada, including the exports of our factories, will so add to the purchasing power of hundreds of thousands of wage earners that they will be able to spend far more than they do to-day for the products of our own farms, our own forests and our own fisheries. Greater trade is merely another word for more production and more employment. The proof of this particular pudding is in the eating, the best way to judge the new accord is to observe how it works out.

That is certainly good advice.

It will be impossible for me to conclude my remarks to-night, Mr. Speaker, so I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 9, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, respecting the Toronto harbour commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to clarify the present Toronto Harbour Commissioners Act. A doubt has been raised whether the act gives the harbour commission authority to refund its indebtedness. While there is no real doubt about it, the purpose of the bill is to make it clear that the commission has that right.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

DOMINION HOUSING ACT

Mr. JEAN:

1. What lending institutions entered into a contract with the Minister of Finance under the terms of the Dominion Housing Act, 1935?

2. How many loans have been made to date through the medium of such institutions (a) in the city of Montreal; (b) in the other municipalities situated on the island of Montreal?

3. What is the total amount of loans made (a) in the city of Montreal; (b) in the other municipalities situated on the island of Montreal?

4. In what wards of the city of Montreal were loans made, and what is the number and amount with respect to each ward?

5. In what other municipalities on the island of Montreal were loans made, and what is the number and amount with respect to each municipality?

6. How many loan applications were refused (a) in each ward of the city of Montreal; (b) in each of the other municipalities situated on the island of Montreal?

7. Were special instructions other than those contained in the act and the contracts given to lending institutions of Montreal?

8. If so, what are such instructions?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada; London Life Insurance Company, North American Life Assurance Company; Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada; Great-West Life Assurance Company; The Northern Life Assurance Company of Canada; Canada Life Assurance Company; Confederation Life Association; The Grey & Bruce Trust & Savings Company; Community Trusts Corporation; The Sterling Trusts Corporation; Capital Trust Corporation Limited; The Premier Trust Company; Guardian Trust Company; Osler & Nanton Trust Company; The Ontario Loan & Debenture Company; The Central Trust Company of Canada; The Waterloo Trust and Savings Company.

2. (a) 10; (b) 40.

3. (a) Montreal	10	loans		$ 154,103
(b) Outremont	2	"	$ 13,980
Mount Royal	26	"	194,561
Hampstead	8	"	57,436
Pointe Claire	4	"	16,566

4. No record by wards.

5. Answered by No. 3.

6. By Department of Finance: (a) 2 in Montreal (no record by wards); (b) 1 in Westmount.

7 and 8. No special instructions as to lending in Montreal.

Note.—In this answer the amounts in dollars include the share of the dominion government and of the approved lending institutions.

TRAP NET LICENCES—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. PLUNKETT:

1. How many trap net licences have been issued yearly for fishing in British Columbia waters from 1930 to 1936, inclusive?

2. To whom or what fishing companies have such licences been granted in each year?

3. Is it the intention of the Department of Fisheries to terminate some or all further licences for trap net fishing?

4. If so, what firms or companies will be refused further licences for trap net fishing?

5. At what date will such licences for trap net fishing terminate, should the department decide not to renew same?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. and 2.

1930—3 to Sooke Harbour Fishing & Packing Company, Ltd.; 3 to J. H. Todd & Sons, Ltd.

1931 and 1932—3 to Sooke Harbour Fishing & Packing Company, Ltd.; 4 to J. H. Todd & Sons, Ltd.

1933—3 to Sooke Harbour Fishing & Packing Company, Ltd.

1934 and 1935—5 to J. H. Todd & Sons, Ltd.

1936—3 to Sooke Harbour Fishing & Packing Company, Ltd.; 4 to J. H. Todd & Sons, Ltd.

3, 4 and 5. Notification was given that licences for these traps would be available for the season of this year. Whether they will be continued thereafter may later be considered.

MAIL TRANSPORTATION CONTRACTS

Mr. BOULANGER:

What number of contracts for the transportation of mail are in operation in each province at the present time?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

Prince Edward Island	249
Nova Scotia	1,099
New Brunswick	962
Quebec	2,723
Ontario	3,739
Manitoba	817
Saskatchewan	1,443
Alberta	1,104
British Columbia	802
Yukon	14

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. MULOCK:

1. How many postmasters were dismissed from August 7, 1930, to November 7, 1930?
2. How many postmasters were dismissed from October 23, 1935, to January 23, 1936?
3. How many postmasters were dismissed from August 7, 1930, to October 23, 1935?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I received from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) a request to add an additional month in each case, and the answer has been prepared accordingly, as follows:

1 and 2. Dismissals authorized for four-month period—(August 7, 1930-December 7, 1930), 73; (October 23, 1935-February 23, 1936), 52.

3. 913.

JAMES J. LARABEE

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Is James J. Larabee, of Eldon, Queens county, Prince Edward Island, in the employ of the Department of Fisheries?
2. If so, what was the date of his appointment, what are his duties, and what is his salary?
3. Is the position under the Civil Service Commission?
4. Is Mr. Larabee an ex-service man?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes.

2. December 18, 1935. Supervision of the fishery protection vessels and fisheries patrol boats on the Atlantic coast with a view to effecting economies therein. $3,500 per annum.

3. No.

4. No.

CHEESE BONUS PAYMENTS

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott):

1. What amount was paid on cheese bonus each month from July to December, inclusive, 1935?
2. What amount of such bonus was paid in each province during the said period?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. July	Nil
August	$ 233,916 44
September	278,848 01
October	261,893 98
November	121,936 42
December	137,274 20
Total	$1,033,869 05

2. Prince Edward Island	$ 2,146 87
Nova Scotia	Nil
New Brunswick	2,751 11
Quebec	216,186 29
Ontario	779,118 63
Manitoba	11,865 12
Saskatchewan	5,573 46
Alberta	11,231 92
British Columbia	4,995 65
Total	$1,033,869 05

KITCHENER MUNICIPAL COUNCIL—RESOLUTION ON IMMIGRATION

Mr. MALLETTE:

Has the government received from the municipal council of the city of Kitchener, Ontario, copy of a resolution passed by that council on December 16, 1935, respecting immigration?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

THREE RIVERS, QUE., GRAIN ELEVATOR

Mr. HALL:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents appertaining to the lease entered into with the Three Rivers Grain and Elevator Company, regarding the erection of an elevator at Three Rivers, on government property.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I., HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. SINCLAIR:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and any department thereof, or any other person, with regard to harbour improvements in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, since 1930.

LA DURANTAYE, QUE., POST OFFICE DEPOSITS

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Postmaster General or the general superintendent of postal service at Quebec, and the postmaster of La Durantaye, respecting the discontinuance of La Durantaye post office deposits with the Provincial Bank of Canada at La Durantaye.

LA DURANTAYE, QUE., POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Postmaster General at Ottawa and the postmaster of La Durantaye, from August 1, 1931, to date, respecting (a) the post office, and (b) La Durantaye rural mail No. 1.

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Quebec district superintendent and the postmaster of La Durantaye, from August 1, 1931, to date, respecting (a) the post office; (b) La Durantaye rural mail.

JAMES J. LARABEE

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the hon. the Minister of Fisheries, any official of the Department of Fisheries, and any other person, with respect to the appointment of James J. Larabee, of Eldon, Queens county, Prince Edward Island, to a position under the Department of Fisheries.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF BENEFITS OF OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT TO BLIND PEOPLE OVER FORTY YEARS OF AGE

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of extending the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act to blind people over forty years of age.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year a resolution similar to this was placed before this house by the then hon. member for North Renfrew, Mr. Cotnam. The resolution was debated and received the unanimous support of all parties. It was considered that a resolution of this kind was not of a political nature, but was one that appealed to people of all classes. The resolution was sent to a committee which, after considering it, reported back to the house in a favourable manner. The house then saw fit to refer it again to the committee with the request that certain other features be considered. The committee again reported to the house and the resolution was passed unanimously. Since that time nothing has been done. Probably the trouble of the last elections prevented the former government from putting the resolution into effect—

Mr. BENNETT: It could not do it; there was no appropriation.

Mr. DONNELLY: In any case, nothing whatever has been done, either by the Conservative or by the present government, to put this resolution into effect.

I do not feel that I need to apologize to the house or to any one else for bringing forward this resolution and asking the government again to consider the advisability of pensioning blind people over forty years of age. In my opinion the blind people throughout the dominion might be considered or thought of as the forgotten men. We have an obligation in respect to the blind which in my opinion has not been fulfilled. We have certain duties to these people which we have not lived up to.

Hon. members may ask what is the definition of a blind person. The definition varies in different parts of the world. For example, in the state of Kansas a blind person is considered as one who has lost all eyesight. In England the definition of a blind person is one who is unable to perform any work for which eyesight is essential. In my opinion the best definition of blindness is that used generally by ophthalmologists or oculists, that a man is blind who with all the assistance that can be given by means of glasses cannot see even with his best eye what is known as the 6/60 Snellen's test chart, in other words, one who cannot see block type one-quarter inch in size one foot from his eyes.

These blind people can be divided into three classes. First, there are those who are absolutely blind. Then there are those who can distinguish light from darkness, who can tell when it is daylight but who cannot see otherwise, although they may go to even the 3/60 Snellen's chart. Then there are those who can see certain large objects, but whose eyesight is not sufficient to enable them to read block type one-quarter inch in size one foot away from the eyes. The test to be applied to young persons or those who are illiterate is to place an apple two feet from the eyes, to see if they can distinguish it. Those who cannot distinguish it are classified as blind, and this is considered a definition of blindness in Canada and throughout the world, and they should be considered as 6/60 Snellen's chart. It is the definition most acceptable and practicable for dealing with these people.

The next question to be considered is the number of blind people in Canada and other countries. The average for blindness throughout the world is about one person out of every thousand. In some civilized countries this average is somewhat reduced. For example, in Canada, according to the 1931 census, there were 7,343 blind people, or a little less than one in every thousand. In Japan or India the average is much greater. The total number of blind people in the United States is in the neighbourhood of 75,000. In England the total is in the neighbourhood of 46,000; in Scotland it is about 7,000, but in India it is about 500,000.

The next question is whether the rate of blindness is increasing. The last census reports show that blindness has been increasing very rapidly in the Dominion of Canada during the last few years. The general idea is that because of hygienic measures adopted by different localities the number of blind people in the dominion is becoming less, but I find that the census of 1881 gave the total number of blind as 3,002; the 1891 census showed that the number had increased to 3,350. In 1901 there was a slight reduction, to 3,266; in 1911 there was a slight reduction to 3,226; in 1921 the number had increased to 4,388, and in 1931 there was a total of 7,343 blind persons in Canada. The tests for blindness made in the taking of the census prior to 1931 were not accurate, and it is believed that those used in connection with the 1931 census contained many defects. However, the census returns for 1931 are more accurate than any other return taken in the dominion. We believe that from 7,400 to 7,500 is a correct estimate of the number of blind people at the present time in the dominion.

The next thing that might interest some of us is the cause of blindness. Why are people blind? The first cause of blindness is disease. Ocular affections such as cataract, glaucoma, atrophy of the optic nerve, and other causes accounted for 1,699 of the blind persons in Canada, according to the 1931 census. Senility or old age is the second major cause of a large number of cases of blindness, the number being 1,301, and accidents are a third cause, the number being 1,283. These are the three major causes of blindness in Canada, according to our census returns.

The next question we may be interested in is the ages at which blindness takes place. At what age does it generally occur in Canada? I thought that I should find that the great majority of cases occurred in the first five years of age, but that is not so; the majority of those that become blind meet with this misfortune between the ages of sixty and eighty. There are 2,347 who have become blind between those ages. The next largest number is between thirty-five and sixty-five years of age, 2,180; next, between five and thirty-five years of age, 1,382; and those between birth and five years of age number 1,218. There are 216 who were not able to say at what age blindness took place.

In discussing a resolution of this kind the first question that occurs to us or that should be brought to our attention is this: How many people does the resolution affect? To how many would it be necessary to pay pensions? How many are between the ages of forty and seventy—because at present all those who are over seventy if they are in need come under the old age pensions scheme; this applies only to blind persons between forty and seventy, and who are without any means of support. We find that the total number of people between forty and seventy who are blind is 3,016, according to the census returns of 1931. But of this number there are some who would be excluded from the provisions of any scheme for pensioning the blind. For example, there are forty blind persons who are receiving workmen's compensation, an income sufficient to exclude them from pensions for the blind; there are sixty-seven mothers receiving mothers' allowance and they would not come under the scheme; there are eighty-nine blind returned soldiers who would not have to be pensioned; and there are 684 blind married women, a large percentage of whose husbands are earning a living, probably fifty per cent, so that that would leave a total in this class of 342 who would have to receive pensions. Then there are blind people earning over $500 a year; there are about 250 in this class to whom it would not be necessary to pay pensions. And over and above that there are people with private incomes for whom the government would not have to provide; there are about fifty in this class. This makes a total of 838 who would not be included in the first total I have given of 3,016; so that the number who would have to be pensioned to a greater or lesser degree by the government if this resolution were adopted would be 2,178. We realize, however, that there are many blind people who, when they found that a pension was going to be paid, might try to get under the act; in some way or other they might get on the pension list. We say therefore that in order to be quite fair we should add another twenty per cent to the total, which would make it 2,614. This is the total number of those who in my opinion would have to be provided for under this proposed scheme of paying pensions to blind persons between forty and seventy years of age.

The next question that arises is this: What is it going to cost the government? Suppose we pensioned the whole 2,614, giving them $20 a month or $240 a year? the amount involved would be $627,360. But as the dominion would pay only three-quarters of this sum and the provincial government one-quarter under the old age pensions legislation, if this were adopted on the same principle as that legislation, it means that the cost to the federal government would be about $470,520, or about half a million dollars in round figures. This is the maximum which in my opinion the dominion government would be called upon to pay.

Another question that naturally suggests itself is: What are other countries doing for their blind? How are the blind treated elsewhere? I find that in Great Britain they give 10 shillings a week to all over fifty years of age. In Northern Ireland and the Irish State they give 10 shillings a week to all blind people over thirty, and in Australia 20 shillings a week to all over sixteen years of age, while in New Zealand 17 shillings and sixpence is paid to all blind over twenty years of age. In Denmark all disabled persons are pensioned, and in France the necessitous blind over the age of forty receive pensions. Sweden recently enacted legislation giving $125 a year to the blind. Russia has established a large number of factories in which blind people are employed in cooperation with workers who can see. Russia perhaps has done more to give employment to the blind than has any other country. Thirty states in the United States pay pensions of varying amounts; for example, $1 a day is paid in Pennsylvania and $50 a month in California. Japan has set aside certain occupations to be engaged in only by the blind—the work of a masseur, for instance, which only the blind are allowed to do. Certain other countries give industry a bonus each year provided they employ only blind persons, and blind persons are engaged in these industries. This is what other countries have done for their blind, and we as Canadians have fallen down in our duty. We have not so far passed any law making provision for the blind in Canada, apart from such charity as has been given them during the last few years.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

The next thing I may be asked is why the age of forty years has been chosen instead of some other. I will only say that forty was taken more or less as a tentative age. On the other hand it is to be remarked that the blind are probably more systematically looked after in England than in any other country. There they have gone into the conditions surrounding blindness in much the same manner as they do everything else, very thoroughly and systematically. For some time pensions had been paid in England to blind people over fifty years of age, but in 1928-29 a British Ministry of Health advisory committee, under the chairmanship of the Right Hon. Lord Blanesburgh, P.C., G.B.E., investigated the age at which pensions should be paid to the blind, and decided to recommend that they be paid to all blind people over forty years of age. I wish to quote from a part of the committee's report:

> We understand that the minimum age for the receipt of these pensions was originally fixed at fifty years because it was thought that up to that age blind persons were generally fit for a course of vocational training and subsequent employment. We still believe that it is possible for many blind persons of fifty years of age, or even more in some cases, to be trained for successful employment, and we trust that local education authorities will give every suitable blind person an opportunity for training without being bound by an arbitrary age limit. Nevertheless experience has shown that in a number of cases it has not been possible, for health or other reasons, to train blind persons less than fifty years of age to earn a livelihood. We consider that the reduction of the age limit from fifty to forty years for the receipt of a blind pension would be fully justified.

That is one of the reasons why we have taken the age of forty.

Some people say, why not have it for all blind people? I do not think that would be a good idea. If you gave pensions to blind persons under forty years of age it would take away their incentive and their initiative to do work themselves, to be self-reliant, to be independent, to take up some vocation or other to earn their livelihood. We know that those who are able to work are much happier and more contented when they are doing something than when they are doing nothing and living on money they receive from the government. But we do find that when blind people are over forty years of age, if they are not then rehabilitated, not then able to earn their living through some useful occupation, it is almost impossible to train them to earn a living for themselves. That is why we have chosen forty as the age when a pension to the blind should begin.

You may also ask me why we should link up pensions to the blind with the Old Age Pensions Act. We think it is desirable to do so for two reasons. First because if it is connected with the Old Age Pensions Act it will not look so much like charity to the blind who receive it. They will feel it is coming to them anyway; it is not a charitable donation, but something which they deserve, being linked up with the system of old age pensions. Another, and I think the major reason for this course, is that one set of officials can administer the whole thing, can look after the blind as well as the aged, and at practically the same cost to the state.

I wish to say only this in conclusion. If legislation is passed connecting the present old age pension law with pensions for the blind, probably it will not be possible to put it into effect to any great extent this year. We realize that if this legislation passes we shall have to have concurrent legislation in the provinces before it can come into effect. But it will be a beginning, and probably it can be started next year and put into effect to at least a certain extent. There are two provinces in the dominion which have no provision for old age pensions; I refer to New Brunswick and Quebec. We believe that that difficulty will soon be overcome, that these provinces will put through old age pension legislation before the end of the year, and they will then have the same opportunity to give pensions to their blind as will other parts of the dominion.

It was a Liberal government that first enacted an old age pensions act. True it is that they did not give seventy-five per cent, the amount to which it was raised by the Conservative government, nor did they increase it to one hundred per cent, as the Conservative government promised to do. We hope it will soon be done, because the dominion government are paying practically all the old age pensions at the present time anyway. If people over seventy years of age are entitled to a pension, how much more deserving are blind people over forty, labouring as they do under far greater handicaps than older people who have kept their sight? I look around this house and I see sitting here people over seventy years who are hale and healthy and smart and able to carry on their occupations and make a living for themselves. Why then should we not fulfil our obligations to those who are labouring under the handicap of blindness, by pensioning them off?

It is true, as some point out, that there are people who labour under other handicaps; there are the deaf and the dumb. Probably at some time we shall have to pension them. But I do say that our first obligation is to the blind, and it is one which we should not disregard. They are calling out to us, appealing to us to remedy their condition, and I ask the government seriously to consider this resolution, which urges that pensions be given to the blind who are over forty years of age.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) has made a very complete presentation of the subject matter of his resolution, and it is my most earnest hope that it will be favourably disposed of, and that the government may see the way clear to bring down at this session legislation to implement the terms of the resolution. As the hon. member stated, a similar resolution was thoroughly reviewed by a select standing committee at the last session of this house. The resolution involves either an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act or perhaps special legislation. That, however, is a matter for the government. It also involves acceptance by the various provinces; as to that we need have little concern, because no doubt public opinion in each province will justify that acceptance.

We all know the personal interest of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in all matters affecting the welfare of the sightless, and we know too that every member of this house shares equally in such sympathy.

This is a private member's resolution, and unless it is disposed of to-day it will be a very simple matter to sidetrack it or send it to the parliamentary burial ground. No good purpose can be served by again referring this matter to a committee. If the government is disposed to bring down legislation every hon. member will have an opportunity to record his views, and I think the constituents of all members from one end of the dominion to the other will endorse the attitude of those who support any legislation that is brought down. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, through you I would ask hon. members to cease this discussion, call for the question and dispose of the matter immediately.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this resolution for two reasons. First I wish to express, not only on my own behalf but also on behalf of those with whom I am associated, our appreciation of the fact that this resolution has been brought before the house. In the second place it gives me a peculiar personal pleasure to speak to this resolution. For a number of years, for reasons I need not give,

I have been very much interested in the welfare of blind people, and have been privileged to act as honorary president of the Saskatchewan branch of the Federation of the Blind for some years. My only comment in regard to the resolution would be that perhaps it does not go far enough, but if it is adopted by the government it will be a start, and a very excellent start at that, in the right direction. I look forward to the day when we shall have not only a national plan to deal with blind people but also a general plan that will take care of those in our midst who are disabled or handicapped, not only those who suffer from physical defects but also the widow and the orphan.

I realize that a resolution of this kind, coming before the house at the present time, involves the question of finance. Consequently the government, perplexed with having to find money for the various activities of government, is loath to extend services of this kind. I noted that the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) who so ably introduced this resolution, stated that in certain countries—and Denmark was particularly mentioned—the government had instituted pensions for all disabled people. That is true. On more than one occasion I have referred to the social legislation that has been instituted in the kingdom of Sweden. I do not know if it is generally known in this house, but it was in 1915 that a Conservative government of that country introduced an old age pension plan. Faced with the necessity of financing the plan they adopted a novel method which I am going to recommend to the consideration of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) of this country. They took over what had become a great monopoly, the tobacco monopoly, and in the course of the years that have followed from that one source alone, earmarked for old age pensions, the government of Sweden has received something in excess of $300,000,000. Then they took over the liquor monopoly, and I think most of us in this house will agree that this is a traffic which ought not to be left in private hands for exploitation. A few days ago I saw an article by Professor Walter Thompson which stated that from that source Sweden was receiving approximately $50,000,000 per year, yet it was also pointed out that the cost of the various brands of wines and other beverages compared quite favourably with similar costs in Great Britain and other countries, and that drunkenness had been halved.

We have in Canada a number of such monopolistic institutions that might be considered by the government in relation to problems of this sort; for I realize quite fully that we must find new sources of revenue if we are to institute and continue legislation of this sort. I should like to point out that in 1932 it was divulged, upon inquiry, that in Canada the tobacco business was already a monopoly. Therefore it is something that could be easily controlled by the government. We learned that two companies practically control the whole field, the Imperial Tobacco Company, controlling some seventy per cent of the business, and the Macdonald tobacco company, controlling some twelve per cent of it. In the five years from 1929 to 1933 some $1,861,000 was distributed to six executive officers of the Imperial Tobacco Company; dividends paid amounted to $26,000,000, and there were undivided profits of some $11,000,000 in the same company.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not think the hon. member is speaking to the subject under discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member is going too far away from the subject in showing how the government would be able to obtain money with which to pay these pensions.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In discussing this resolution I was anxious to make some constructive suggestions as to where the money might be obtained, and I was drawing an analogy between the situation in Canada and the situation in a country overseas where the money has been found for a similar service in the manner I have just outlined. I would suggest that the government explore avenues of this kind in order that we may provide for services of this description.

It is not necessary to emphasize the need of a measure such as this, but I should like to add one more thought. It is this, that the government of Canada should not only endeavour to provide for those already blind. As a condition of making that provision, in cooperation with the provinces, it should be laid down that the provinces which participate and which, to a degree, are financed by the federal government in this regard, should do something in reference to the prevention of blindness. For a number of years I have been associated with institutions where I have seen the necessity for that being done. Children have been unable to obtain the necessary care, with the possibility that in after years they may suffer from blindness. Consequently I should like to see the scope of this resolution extended, when considered by the government, so that whatever is done may be done on the condition that the provinces participating, through their educational and other institutions, should do something for the prevention of blindness.

I do not propose to say anything further, Mr. Speaker, except that we of the group with which I am associated, realizing that this is not a partisan or political issue, are thoroughly behind this resolution, and we hope the Minister of Finance will be able to see his way clear to make provision for the institution of this well worth while service.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this resolution from a sense of duty and fair play. Pensions to the blind are long overdue. When we see the need and realize our duty, something may be done. My eyes were opened to the needs of the blind when I saw a young man who had fought overseas and come back whole, and then had to go into a gravel pit on relief work to get a living for his wife and family and came out blind. It was then that we in Fort William woke up to the needs of those who are blind, and we found that at the head of the lakes there were over thirty who are sightless. Captain Baker, for whom we have great respect, told us the other night that the cost of pensions for the blind would not exceed $150,000 for this year. I got in touch with him to learn the reason for that, and he said that even if legislation is enacted at this session, regulations could not be made to inaugurate payments before October 1. Besides age verification and means test there would be the additional requirement of proof of blindness within the terms of the definition used in the act.

We take off our hat to a man like Captain Baker, whether we agree with war or not, who went overseas and served faithfully. He came back and fitted himself to lead out of darkness into light those suffering from this affliction. He is behind this resolution, and it is our duty to support him and those associated with him in this work. He is backed by men and women in all provinces, teaching handicrafts to the blind, but the difficulty is that when the goods are made it is hard to find a sale for them.

Every afternoon, Mr. Speaker, you open the session with prayer, and I admire your reverence, saying either in French or in English, "Our Father." If we say that prayer sincerely, every man and woman throughout this wide dominion should be our brother or sister. and when any of our fellow citizens fall into a pit it is our duty to help them out. To me there is no pit so dark and cruel as the pit of blindness. It is our duty to provide for the blind, even if it requires making reductions of expenditure in other places.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): I want to add my voice to the others who have spoken in favour of this resolution and the institution of pensions for blind people over forty years of age, payment to begin this year. It is now almost thirteen years, I think, since the agitation for pensions to the blind began. I think they say in the document they send out that since 1923 they have been seeking earnestly to get pensions. When times were not as difficult as they are now, blind people might have been able to get work, but now when those who have their sight and are trained cannot get work there is almost no hope at all for the blind in that regard. I do not think any of us meant to do what was done last year; we raised the hopes of the blind throughout Canada and then those hopes were dashed to the ground. It caused a great deal of suffering of mind and spirit, a great deal of bitterness in the hearts of blind people, because they thought they had won their fight. I believe that parliament meant, and even the government meant, that the blind should have the pension, but there were a lot of things to do and the matter was neglected. This should not be put off any longer. Canada will soon be the only part of the British empire that has not done it. Great Britain takes care of the blind; so do New Zealand and Australia and Ireland. also the United States, France, Denmark and Sweden. Surely we do not want to tag along at the very end in all great social services.

Last year the blind were so confident that by putting just a little more pressure on parliament they were going to get the pension that they had a great parade in Montreal. I have the story of that parade and the speeches at the demonstration as reported in the Montreal Daily Star of May 17, 1935, and there is a paragraph in it which expresses very well how I feel when I see blind people trying to get along. It says:

> The sight was one that brought a lump to the throat and tears to the eyes, as old men and women, well built youths and girls, and little children, linking hands to keep themselves in line, and guided by a sighted friend, walked behind the citadel band of the Salvation Army, and tried to keep in step with the lively march that was played. It was a tragic procession, and those who lined the sidewalks commented on that sadness, and could be heard endorsing the slogans that were carried on many banners: "Give the blind pensions NOW." Traffic police guided the marchers to the hotel entrance, and there a double line of bell boys shepherded their faltering footsteps up the stairway through the rotunda to the meeting hall.

That demonstration was largely organized by Philip E. Layton and his son. I think too much credit cannot be given to the Layton family for what they have done for the sightless in Canada.

I am not in the least convinced that we cannot find the money. I know we can, and I know we ought, and I think the House of Commons and the government should see to it that this year we inaugurate pensions for the blind. If we do not we can only be unhappy about it, and while we may seek reasons to justify our action to others, we shall not be able to justify it to ourselves.

Mr. H. W. WINKLER (Lisgar): In speaking to this resolution I desire to make special reference to a comparatively small class of the blind. Before doing so, however, I wish to refer briefly to the debate that occurred on this subject in the house last year. On January 31, 1935, no less than fifteen members spoke on this matter and I think advanced about every good reason that could be given for payment of pensions to the blind. The resolution before the house then was substantially the same as the one now before us, except that to-day's resolution says that——the government should consider the advisability of extending the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act to blind people over forty years of age.

On January 30, 1935, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), in concluding his remarks, asked this question:

I would like to ask the hon. member why he confines it to people over forty.

Then on January 31, on the motion of the then Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) the question was referred to the committee on industrial and international relations. On April 3, after witnesses had appeared before the committee, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said that they—the witnesses—asked:

... that special consideration be given to the unemployable blind of any age. We never considered that aspect at all. They asked that they be taken care of by a bill, separate from the Old Age Pension Act if possible, but we never embodied that consideration in the report.

I should like to refer briefly to the information in bulletin No. 43 issued by the bureau of statistics in 1935 in relation to the 1931 census. It gives the total number of blind in the year 1931 in Canada as 7,343. I have calculated some percentages from the figures given on page 2 and find that of the blind about 9 per cent are under twenty years, 25·3 per cent are under forty-five years, and 41·5 are over seventy years of age. Using these figures as a basis, approximately 10 per cent of the blind are under twenty-one years, 21 per cent are under forty years, and approximately 11 per cent are between the ages of twenty-one and forty. It is particularly with regard to that class that I want to speak to-day.

Considering all classes in regard to the benefits conferred by the government, we find that education is provided for the blind up to the age of twenty-one years. There are a few good schools for the blind in the dominion; the provincial governments, I am informed, pay the expenses of blind young people up to the age of twenty-one, and these benefits apply to approximately ten per cent of the blind. In all the provinces except two, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), the old age pension at the rate of $20 a month is provided for those over seventy, and that represents 41 per cent of the blind. But no government benefits whatever at present go directly to blind people between the ages of twenty-one and seventy, comprising approximately 48·5 per cent of the blind.

By this resolution it is proposed to consider the extension of the old age pension to those between forty and seventy years of age, or to approximately 37·5 per cent of the blind, or roughly 2,750 people. According to the 1931 census that would leave the blind between the ages of twenty-one and forty receiving no direct benefits from any government whatever, and that class comprises approximately 11 per cent of the blind, or about 800 people. Let me therefore give special consideration, Mr. Speaker, to the plight of these 800 people between the ages of twenty-one and forty who are receiving, and would receive under this resolution, no benefits whatever.

We know that when a young person without physical disability leaves school and is thrown on the world, especially in these days, finding a vocation is a difficult problem. We can, I think, safely multiply those difficulties by many times in the case of blind young persons who are looking for some occupation upon leaving school. If ever there is a time when a blind person needs assistance, it is when he or she leaves school and is seeking a vocation. I submit that the blind of that age, if of any age, should receive special consideration. This is the period of readjustment, and it determines to a great extent the type of citizenship we are going to have among our blind young people. The resolution before the house therefore does not meet with the most urgent requirements of the blind people as a class.

Furthermore, when we consider the requirements of the blind person of the age of twenty-one, let us say, it is found upon inquiry that the average active industrious young blind person requires a guide, and unless a member of the family or some child is willing to act in that capacity, it will cost from $8 to $10 a month to have someone act as a guide and take the blind person about. Deduct that from the $20 which is not even offered to this particular class under this resolution, and you can see how badly off they would be. I maintain that this is an additional reason why the resolution is entirely inadequate.

If I thought that in this resolution lay the only hope of the blind in that age class, I would support it as it stands at once, but I am sure I voice the opinion of a great many people in this house and in the country when I say that we are looking to the government to bring down legislation which will consider the rights and requirements of our blind people irrespective of age.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the test, it has been frequently said, of our Christian civilization as distinguished from others is the care we give to the disabled and the poor and the suffering. I do not quite agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), in his references to the blind, as to our having wholly neglected our duty in that regard. My earliest recollections as a young man of the care that was given to the blind go back to the time when every day I was passing a school for the blind in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and seeing the number of sightless persons that were there cared for and trained. Our estimates during all these years have indicated that we were desirous of making some appropriation to care for the sightless in every part of the dominion. We have given grants in aid of the work carried on by organizations in Montreal, Toronto and in the different provinces, in Nova Scotia and every part of Canada; so in fact we have endeavoured to assist the work carried on by various organizations in behalf of the blind.

In the days of my youth when this institution to which I refer was being maintained there was no thought that the state should care for the blind, or that the state should provide pensions for those over seventy, or that the social services that are now extended to so many persons in the community should be available. That indicates the great change that has taken place in the attitude of the people of this and other countries toward problems of this kind. In the older countries the legislation has assumed the characteristics to which reference has been made. In newer countries the progress has been slower, and on the American continent little thought was given to any such idea until more recent years. In 1927 we passed in this parliament an old age pension law which made it possible for the dominion and the provinces to cooperate to provide $20 per month or $240 per annum to men and women who had passed the age of seventy years, and who required this assistance. Need and age were the tests, and when the age had been reached, if the need was present, the state made the grants to which I have referred.

With respect to the need of the blind as compared with other classes, I do not think there is any difference of opinion in this chamber. Last year I listened with great interest to what was said in a very comprehensive discussion of the whole problem, and it was quite apparent that those who had personal and real knowledge of the situation were agreed that there was no doubt at all that the need was present, and that in many instances the unselfish devotion and the charitable instincts of humanitarian Canadians had supplied the needs so apparent of those who were sightless.

The question of age is one of the greatest importance. I shall not express my view beyond saying it did appear that in determining forty years as the age, those responsible for framing this resolution were following the course adopted in Great Britain. Like the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), I discussed the matter with Mr. Layton and he told me that there was no reason for taking this age beyond the fact that in Great Britain forty years had been determined upon, and that that was the age that appears to have been considered as being proper to submit to this parliament. In other parts of the British empire another age has been considered, but this question of age is a matter which can be dealt with just as parliament dealt with the age of seventy in connection with old age pensions. It can be determined by taking a general consensus of opinion as indicated by the members of the house regardless of their political affiliations.

There then arises the question that had to be considered last year, that must be considered this year and that will have to be considered at all times, the extent to which the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act can be made available to meet the conditions to which I have referred. The Old Age Pensions Act is predicated upon the assumption that each province that desires to take advantage of its provisions shall make an agreement with the dominion government. That agreement provides the amount that the dominion will pay, which has lately been increased to seventy-five per cent, and the terms and conditions under which it will be paid. I am bound to say that there have been very grave abuses under that statute, but efforts have been made to curtail them and I think to some extent the efforts in that direction have succeeded. There will not be much likelihood of any abuses in connection with the blind. Blindness is apparent to all and there could be no misunderstanding under the circumstances as to the question of need, because that could be ascertained without difficulty. There might be some difficulties in connection with age, but we will pass them up.

Last year when Doctor Cotnam succeeded in having the matter referred to a committee, which committee made its report, it was quite clear that there was substantial unanimity in the house that the matter should be dealt with. However, it was pointed out, quite properly, by one member, who is now a minister, I believe, that two of the provinces, in one of which there was perhaps the largest number of blind persons of any province in Canada, had not availed themselves of the Old Age Pensions Act. If we had given effect last year to the suggestions contained in the resolution it would have been necessary to enact a statute for the payment of pensions to the blind regardless of any provisions in the Old Age Pensions Act, because it was agreed by all members that it would be highly improper to leave out the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia in dealing with payments to sightless persons. It was suggested that we should proceed to set up machinery to deal with the matter. As I have indicated, the government felt that that would not be a proper thing to do and I still think that that is the correct view to take of the matter. As the hon. member for Wood Mountain has said, it is not improbable that during the present year Quebec and Nova Scotia will avail themselves of the facilities provided for the payment of old age pensions under the Old Age Pensions Act. If that is done, the provisions of that act will be applicable to these two provinces. That being so, this house would be within reasonable bounds if it asked the government to give to this matter their very serious consideration.

I am not one of those who urge upon the occupants of the treasury benches that they should do this and that because it is the popular thing to suggest. The government must in the very nature of things be in a position to determine what action may be taken. We who sit in other parts of the house must not fail to realize that upon the treasury benches there falls a great and ever increasing responsibility; in the ultimate analysis the determination of what is to be done with the taxes raised must rest with those responsible for the raising of those taxes. If we asked blindly that the government pay out half a million dollars, six hundred thousand or seven hundred thousand dollars to a particular agency to effect a particular purpose, we might be asking them to do something practically beyond their power and be embarrassing the administration instead of assisting with the business of the country. I take it from what has been said on previous occasions and from what has been said to-day that there is no hon. member of the house who, if he were convinced that it did not involve a question of difficulty on the part of the government to supply the necessary funds, would not urge upon the government the desirability of amending the Old Age Pensions Act so as to make pensions available to sightless persons when they have reached the age of forty years, assuming that that age is accepted as the arbitrary age. For the reasons that have been given, that age does not seem to be unreasonable. But despite the fact that we all desire that it should be done, despite the fact that there is complete unanimity on the part of this chamber that such an act would not only be gracious and proper but would be fitting as indicating the humanitarian and benevolent impulses of the parliament of Canada, those charged with the responsibility of raising revenues must in the ultimate analysis determine whether or not it is possible at this time to give effect to that purpose. I rise only to say how much I appreciate the difficulties of the government in that regard and how firmly I am of the opinion that if it is at all possible to carry into effect the sense of this resolution, it should be done.

In passing I join with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, in paying a tribute, not only to Mr. Layton and his family, but to the men and women in humble walks of life, and others in fairly good circumstances and conditions, who have made for themselves places despite their handicap and who have shown an unselfish devotion to this cause and have exhibited an earnest and continued anxiety to assist in every way within their power in bringing some measure of relief to those who are sightless. For relief is required not only by them but by many others. The epileptic, the deaf and the dumb and many others are crying aloud for help, but there is no case that seems to strike human nature so strongly and move men's hearts so greatly as that of the sightless person who has attained the age of forty, we will say, and finds himself or herself utterly unable to battle with life's difficulties and problems and utterly unable to earn anything at all for himself or herself. Therefore I join my voice with the voices of those who have preceded me and who may follow me in expressing thorough accord with the effort being made to arrive at a solution of this very complex problem. At the same time I do not do more than urge upon the government, that must, as I say, be responsible for the raising of taxes, on the one hand, and the expenditure of revenues, on the other, to determine whether under existing conditions they can meet the just and reasonable requests that are made because of humanitarianism and benevolence, if you like, and see that those who have struggled so bravely and made sacrifices so great are afforded such assistance by the state as will enable them to be recipients not of charity but of a just and proper pension from the country.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say just a few words in support of this resolution. I notice that so far all the speakers have been on the other side of the house, but I do not believe all the sympathizers with the blind are over there. I think it has been demonstrated, not only this year but in other years, that there is a very great unanimity among hon. members and the people of Canada that one obligation which has never been discharged properly and fittingly is that of looking after the blind. Like the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I too passed the school for the blind in Halifax many times in my younger days. There I saw a very large number of persons trained and educated to take care of themselves. Scattered all over the dominion there are blind persons. In the city I have the honour to represent, the blind are among the most courageous people in the whole community. It surely must awaken the sympathy of every man and woman either in this chamber or outside to see people who have lost their sight now in serious difficulty.

I congratulate the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) not only upon having introduced the resolution but upon the able way in which he has presented it. I have observed that many resolutions on very vital questions are fully debated here, but on following them up I fail to find that much has been done in a practical way with respect to them, and I would bespeak for this resolution the attention particularly of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I am sure there is no member in this house who is more sympathetic to those in need than the Minister of Finance. In his life in western Canada he has come in contact with people really in need, and I am sure that the blind head the list of those who ought to be assisted. I therefore commend this resolution particularly to his attention. It is no part of my duty to tell him where the money is to come from or how it is to be done; that is a part of his duty and he is quite competent to perform the function he is called upon to perform in the government of which he is a very notable member.

When I think of this dominion paying $140,000,000 a year in interest rates, I suggest that we might begin by refinancing some of the great debt and perhaps cutting down so that the payment of a small pension to the blind would be a mere bagatelle. I commend that to the hon. gentleman. And he need not perhaps stop there, because there are many ways in which we might find the small amount necessary to pay some compensation to the blind. I recognize that the figures given to-day would probably not represent the full and ultimate requirements; nevertheless I would urge the Minister of Finance to give the matter his serious consideration.

I doubt whether the resolution quite meets my own view. I had the pleasure some years ago of supporting a bill for the establishment of old age pensions, and I support the proposal to pay pensions to the blind at forty years of age, not because I believe that this is the real solution of the problem but because I do believe that it is a step in the direction of that solution; and in the meantime I think the house should adopt the resolution. This is a question which in the opinion of hon. members on all sides is one which is worthy of support, and I commend the resolution to the government in the hope that they will give it that full consideration which in my opinion it entirely merits.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Having served during the last session on a committee to which was referred a resolution moved by Doctor Cotnam, in terms similar to the one before us, and having heard before that committee representations from the various institutes representing the blind throughout the country, headed particularly by the Canadian Institute for the Blind of Montreal and the National Institute for the Blind of Toronto, I would be derelict in my duty if I did not rise now and say a few words in support of the present resolution so well moved by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly).

The number afflicted by blindness will, I am afraid, increase as time goes on. The worker in industry, owing to the fact that he is working with rapidly moving machinery, or owing to the effect on his sight of many of the factors that enter into production in industry, is subject at all times to loss of sight. The sight of workers in industry is all too frequently impaired, and because of long association with that class of men I hope that the government will find it possible to adopt this resolution and to formulate legislation thereon.

I support the resolution for another reason. While the matter was under consideration by the committee last year, I made it my business to visit the blind institute in Toronto and was taken by Mr. Myers, one of their principal officers, to see the work being done in that city, and I was very greatly impressed with it. A year ago I was in hearty accord with a similar resolution but I am now more strongly in favour of the government accepting the present motion and giving it legislative effect.

During the election I had an experience that impressed me greatly with the necessity for pensions to the blind. In the course of a canvass I called on a family. Both husband and wife were blind, and when I introduced myself to them it appeared that, through association with other blind folk, they had learned something that had taken place before the committee during the last session, and it seemed that my name had impressed itself on their minds as one who was strongly in support of pensions for the blind. I have never in my life had a more courteous or a more hearty reception than was given me by these two blind people. When I called first the husband was in the cellar, a very dark cellar, and I learned from that visit that there is one advantage which even a blind man has over a person blessed with his sight. As I say, the cellar was very dark, there was only a small window in it, and when he came up he said, "I have been downstairs reading a good book." Of course, a normal person could not have seen to read in a dark cellar, but he had had the advantage of having been taught to read Braille in some of the institutes for the blind.

I have nothing to add at present but a sincere expression of hope that the resolution will be heartily supported and will be accepted.

Mr. J. J. DUFFUS (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, doubtless I do not differ from any hon. member in this house when I say that I have every sympathy for the unfortunate people to whom this resolution refers. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) upon having again introduced this subject to the house. I do not suppose there is a person in the world who would forego the indispensable pleasure and use of his sight for any pension, however fabulous it might be. We should not overlook, also, the tremendous hardship which falls upon poor families who have among them one or more sightless members. Next to those who are facing starvation I can conceive of no unfortunates who are more entitled to the sympathetic consideration of this house than those who are blind. Unless the government has some insurmountable reason for deferring action upon the resolution or not supporting it in a financial way or otherwise at this particular time, I feel it my solemn duty to give it my hearty support.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): In rising to support this resolution I fail to see why there should be a debate on a question of this kind. I believe that, after all, the number of people affected is approximately 3,400. What I do not understand about the resolution is the age limit which is contained in it. I cannot understand why a man forty years of age is in any different situation from one twenty-four years of age; if they are both blind they are both incapacitated.

I was reluctant to speak to this resolution, because I thought it would pass the house without question. But I noticed that again the same old ghost was walking the floor of the House of Commons; I noticed that the question of dollars and cents was again brought in, that we should like to do something and we all sympathize with the unfortunate blind people but we wonder whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) can get the money. It is only a few days since the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) was telling of thirteen men who have accumulated a vast fortune from industry, from the association of the people of Canada and their ability to produce and consume goods. Surely if that is true we are bound to look after 3,400 people who have no more opportunity of competing in the labour market than the birds of the air or the animals of the forest.

Again, we are told that we are paying $140,000,000 interest on our debt. Of course, that is a sacred contractual obligation, but when it comes to paying pensions to blind people, Canadian citizens, we will feed them with sympathy. I often wonder, Mr. Speaker —I certainly have done so since I became a member of parliament—why we do not put a padlock on the door and bring in the bankers of St. James street and let them run the business of government, because, no matter what question we bring up here, whether it be unemployment, or relief, or social services, it makes no difference—you cannot do anything because you have no money.

I hope that the radicals in the Liberal party will make their influence felt on this occasion, remembering that a precedent has already been established by the last government in a grant of $50,000 to this institute for the blind. They saw the necessity of this; the people of Canada see the necessity of it. There is nothing to stop the Liberal government from giving these people a standard of living comparable with the ability of the Canadian people to provide a living for them.

After all, what do these people want? It is not money; it is food, clothing and shelter. And when you say you cannot provide it you are saying in so many words that we cannot produce it. It is hardly consistent. You find, on the one hand, machines and solar energy that are not utilized, and, on the other hand, thousands of unemployed people walking the streets. I think we have made a ghastly mistake in the last five years in elevating the question of money and submerging the economic question. Money is nothing but a ticket; if you have the goods you can always manufacture the money. I believe it would be a good stand for this government to take at this time, to say to the blind people: We will begin with you, by giving you that which is coming to you.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): Although I am the first member from Quebec to take the floor with regard to this resolution, you must not think, sir, that we are not interested in it. On the contrary, I am quite convinced that the entire population of the province is fully in accord with the principle of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly). According to the right hon. leader of the opposition there are legal difficulties in the way, but those legal difficulties could probably be overridden by a special act dealing with blind people alone. On the other hand, if I correctly understood Mr. Taschereau in the last campaign, there was a promise that old age pensions would become effective in Quebec.

The sentiments of generosity and of social justice which animate the deputation from all over Canada could hardly find a more magnificent and practical expression than through the adoption of this resolution. Since the opening of the present session many legislative proposals have been submitted to this house, all tending to improve conditions in Canada, but I doubt if there is one that has more merit than the one now under consideration by this house. No doubt, in view of the sentiments, so well known, of this chamber, there is no reason for my making a very long address on this subject, but I feel that I should express my sincere sympathy with the cause, especially because the riding which I have the honour to represent in this parliament contains the only French Canadian Catholic institution devoted entirely to the cause of the blind. I am referring to the Institut Nazareth, which is undoubtedly very well known to members from the district of Montreal and from other parts of the province of Quebec, as well as, no doubt, to those people in Canada who are taking a national interest in the welfare of the blind. This institution, which is now located at No. 4565 Queen Mary Road in Montreal, was founded in the year 1861, thanks to the generosity of a Sulpician priest, l'abbé Rousselot, a member of the seminary of Montreal. This institution has been managed ever since its foundation by the Grey nuns, whose devotion I will not try to describe, because it would be impossible. There are at the institute about forty nuns and a staff whose devotion is extreme to help the blind—their blind, as they call them in a sort of maternal way. On December 31 last there were in the institute 232 blind people of divers ages and conditions, and when one wishes to know how the good nuns manage to make both ends meet in an institution of that kind—well, they simply do not make both ends meet; they are able to give help and comfort and everything that can be given to their blind boarders, but when it comes to balancing the budget that is an impossibility. For the year ended June 30, 1935, they were short almost $61,000, and for the year ended June 30, 1934, the shortage was almost $66,000, and this after very generous grants by the provincial government as well as help extended by the public at large, by different organizations of ladies and gentlemen who hold parties, banquets and so on to raise funds and who also give very generously from their private purses. Last year the total expenses were over $120,000, more than $10,000 per month. When I asked the lady treasurer yesterday what she proposed to do to meet these deficits and where she would get the funds, she said that for the time being she relied on providence and on pensions for the blind being introduced. No doubt to rely on providence is a very magnificent act of faith, but I should like to see something more practical, so I do hope pensions for the blind will be in effect before very long.

Of the blind themselves there is not very much I can say that this house does not know very well already. When a blind person is brought to this institution or any other, at first the board is paid regularly. That goes on for some months or perhaps some years. Then the payments begin to get smaller and more intermittent, until one day there is no payment forthcoming at all, and after that the poor blind person is left entirely to the resources of the institution, which means that he is more or less brought down to the level of a beggar. We can imagine the obstacles which must be overcome by the blind in instructing themselves, whether in school education or in learning a trade. In addition we must remember that the work that can be done by blind people is very limited. Generally they manufacture baskets and things of that kind, but they have to work much more slowly than other people who can use machines, and as a result the cost of the articles so produced is so high that they cannot be sold at a profit but must be sold at a loss. There is a store in Montreal kept open purposely for this business. I am told that it brings in a little revenue during the holiday trade but that during the rest of the year it might as well be closed. Blind people are quite successful in music, and it was suggested to me that perhaps an effort might be made by parish authorities all over the dominion to reserve for the blind the work of playing the organs and pianos in the churches. Perhaps the radio commission could help; possibly those business houses who put special programs on the air could employ the services of the blind, because they can put on some pretty good programs, and that would be something very practical indeed in the way of helping them.

These blind people, naturally, have their pride; they want to earn their living and they do not want to be reduced to the level of beggars. I have been told another very astounding thing, that many of them want to get married and establish homes. I think that proves conclusively, once and for all, that love is blind. The depression has affected everyone, of course, but none more than it has affected the blind. They relied on the help of people with large incomes, but these large incomes have dwindled away to nothing and now they find themselves without help of any kind. I am told also that when a blind person reaches the age of forty there is usually no one of his family left to look after him. During his younger years his relatives will likely have lighter family burdens and therefore will be able to subscribe generously in order to help their blind brother. After these blind people reach the age of forty, however, generally their fathers and mothers are dead, their brothers and sisters have gone away, and they are left dependent upon public charity.

Yesterday, when discussing this question with the authorities of the Nazareth institute I was asked if there was any possibility of these pensions being granted this year. Not wishing to encourage false hopes I said I had strong doubts. I felt confident that the house would support the resolution brought in by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), but I did not know whether or not the government could put it into effect this year. The good sister said to me, "Well, Mr. Mallette, if we had gone to the government in 1930 we would have been told that they could not afford it, and since then we understand the country has gone into debt to the extent of about one billion dollars, so probably we will get the same reply now." When the provinces come to seek help from the federal government—and get it—why is it that a small minority of deserving people cannot get some financial assistance? Frankly I cannot understand it. To me it seems that in some way or other we should be able to adopt this resolution and put it into effect.

The discussion to-day has been of such a high order that, while I know it is impossible, I wish it could be printed in Braille so that the blind might know that from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) down to the humblest member they have nothing but friends in the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (Battleford North): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to make one or two observations in connection with the resolution now before the house. Last year a similar resolution was moved in this chamber, reading as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the provisions of the Old Age Pension Act should apply to blind people over forty years of age.

Perhaps a word or two might be necessary in connection with the action taken on that resolution, which, after a brief debate, was passed on to the standing committee on industrial and international relations. Having been a member of that committee not only during last session but during the last ten years, I can tell hon. members that the resolution was considered quite fully and quite sincerely by that committee. Many submissions were made, and after they were analyzed a report was submitted to this house. Hon. members who were in the chamber at that time will remember that the committee reported favourably on the resolution. Every member of the committee was in favour of it, but it was pointed out that if the resolution was adopted and legislation introduced based on that resolution, such legislation would apply to only seven provinces out of the nine. Two provinces, Quebec and New Brunswick, would be excluded from the operations of the legislation, and as a result practically one thousand blind people in those provinces would not receive any benefit. Because of that limitation a difference of opinion arose in the house during the debate. The division of opinion was along this line, that because of the limitation of the resolution some hon. members were for bringing down a special bill. In fact a special bill sponsored by the government was strongly supported by the house. In that way the resolution, although supported by the committee, was not referred to the committee again. The debate was adjourned, the matter left to the government, and no action was taken.

This afternoon we have before us a resolution presented by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), practically the same resolution as last year. The resolution means we are back at the same place as a year ago. Here we have another case of history repeating itself. From the debate this afternoon I am convinced that practically all hon. members, new and otherwise, are in favour of this resolution. The work of last year has thus gone on, public opinion has been forming, and to-day we have this house almost unanimous for action. This year's resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of extending the provisions of the Old Age Pension Act to blind people over forty years of age.

If the government adopted that resolution it would only partly meet the need. It would meet the need of those over seventy; it would meet the need of those between forty and seventy, but it would not meet the need of blind people under forty years of age. Consequently the government are faced with this situation: they know that if legislation were enacted in accordance with this resolution the cost involved would be only part of what will be required to meet the problem of the blind in the next few years in Canada. I believe that actuarially for this year $150,000 would be required, the next year about $350,000, and the next year practically half a million. So that half a million dollars will be required to meet the needs of the blind between the ages of forty and seventy, and then we have over two thousand blind people under forty. So, as I said, we have arrived at the stage we were at last year.

I do not think it is necessary to have this resolution referred again to the committee on industrial and international relations. The committee thoroughly analyzed the situation last year and reported in favour of the resolution, and it is not necessary to have that same work done again. What does that mean? It means that the resolution is before the house and the government, and we shall have to leave it with the government knowing that the government is sympathetic, that the finance minister is sympathetic, and that the situation will be dealt with by legislation as soon as possible. Nothing more can be done, because the government is the only power that can deal with this resolution and get the money to meet the problem that confronts this chamber in regard to the blind in Canada. The best we can do is commend the matter to the initiative and action of the government and to the good will of the finance minister, and knowing that the government is wholly favourable, we can look for action as soon as it is possible financially—at the earliest possible moment. More than that I would not say. It is not necessary to tell the government that they can get the money if they adopt new and fanciful financial policies. That is not our business as members of the house; that is for the initiative and vision of the government. After the government fully consider the resolution I believe we shall find in a short time that pensions for the blind will be operative in Canada.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): There is very little that I can add to the discussion on this resolution, but there is one material feature which should be brought out, and that is the efficiency with which work for the blind has been carried on in Canada during the last ten or fifteen years, perhaps longer. That is a material point, because the leaders of the blind come before this parliament to-day as a group who have done efficient work. I suggest that these men have done all that could possibly be done, and they are now up against a blank wall.

I should like for a minute or two to deal with the work of some of these men. It has been my privilege to see some of them at work. First I should like to mention Captain Baker. Captain Baker lost his sight during the war. He was a promising young engineer, a graduate of Toronto university, decorated for gallantry in the field, and one night he was shot across both eyes and blinded. From that time to the present his life has been an epic of courage and initiative, a life that in times to come I think will be looked back upon by the Canadian people as outstanding in his generation. Captain Baker, like most of the blinded soldiers, was trained at St. Dunstan's in England. When he came back to Canada he took charge of work for blinded soldiers; then he took over work for all the blind in Canada. He is now managing director of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, and probably one of the leading younger executives in Canada to-day.

Captain Baker has been able to draw around him several other leading young men, for instance, Mr. Harris Turner, who although blinded overseas was at one time leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition in Saskatchewan; also there is Mr. Myers, and we have in Vancouver M. C. Robinson, superintendent of the western division of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. Mr. Robinson was blinded overseas at the age of nineteen, and his work and experience have almost duplicated that of Captain Baker. Then we have Joe Clunk, placement officer of the institute, an American, a qualified solicitor doing wonderful work; and we have the work of the Layton family in Montreal.

I refer to these men for this reason, that in all their work their main idea has been to help to make the blind people independent, make them feel that they are taking their share in the life of the nation. In addition they have tried to raise the morale of the blind. As many hon. members know, blind people easily become discouraged, and it is no wonder they do. These leaders of the blind have started social clubs; for instance in Vancouver we have a club known as the Nil Desperandum club, which might be interpreted as the Never Say Die club. By such means the morale of the blind has been greatly improved. Despite this able leadership and good work there is a class of blind people for whom little can be done, and they are the ones for whom we are asking help to-day, the blind over forty years of age. These older blind folks are in many cases not active enough to work for wages; the majority of them have not the initiative to run concession stands, or carry on a business of their own and are really unemployable; they are just stranded, and I would suggest that the government could very well extend the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act to cover these people.

The Old Age Pensions Act is particularly suitable because under its provisions only those blind people who are not earning a certain income would get assistance, and it would throw a portion of the burden on the provinces, which, while perhaps not so good for the provinces, would ensure their checking very carefully every application for a pension.

I personally am convinced that if we in the parliament of Canada adopt this resolution we shall be expressing the sympathetic feeling of Canadians generally for the blind and carrying out the wish of an overwhelming majority of the people of our nation.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to say very much on this question because so much has already been so ably said. We all know that the minister who will have the spending of this money is sympathetic and will do his best, but when we read that there are men and women deprived of their sight who, because of lack of clothing, because of lack of health, are absolutely unable to leave their homes, it is enough to tug at the heart-strings of every man and women in this country. Private charity is called on to the utmost of its capacity, and we have to come to the government with our hands outstretched. Governments give money for raising the standard of grades, for raising the value of stock, and surely in some way the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) can find a little money to help these blind people.

For fifteen years past I have sat in the gallery of the house and it has been borne in upon me more and more that if you really want help; if you really want to be assisted, you have almost to commit a crime. If you do murder, if you commit a theft, you are taken care of; you are fed and clothed and kept warm; but if nature commits a crime against you, it is sometimes very difficult to get help, and so in all sincerity I ask the government to consider what they can possibly do for these poor people.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I feel it not only a privilege but a duty to say a word in support of the resolution that is now before the house. Coming as I do from the city of Halifax where we have an institution for the blind, and having passed it on my way to the city almost every day during twenty-five years of my life, I have seen many young blind boys and girls there; I have watched them grow up still in the same condition, and I have seen them later on in the evening of their lives almost forgotten, unattended, and having to be helped across the street by a stranger. We whom Almighty God has not so afflicted have an opportunity of seeing Him in the beautiful works of nature, but those who have been deprived of their sight have not that great compensation, for after all one of the finest things in life is to look out and watch the sun go down surrounded by tints of amber and gold. That is denied to these unfortunate people, and this resolution is but an evidence of our sympathy with them in their affliction.

I am not a member of the medical profession, indeed hardly one of the legal profession because nearly all my life has been spent in politics, but in my journeys I have observed that a large percentage of those afflicted with blindness do not live to the sere and yellow leaf. They pass off the scene before the allotted span, and if they do not, they might almost as well, because they are in many cases unnoticed as the rest of the world go by.

I would urge this one point, that these blind people as they grow older require care and attention; that they need to get out into the wide open spaces, to inhale the fresh air, and perhaps to hear the sea rolling in on the sandy beach. They may not be able to do all this unaided, but with the little pension that is proposed in this resolution they would be provided with funds which would make more enjoyable the evening of their lives, and I think parliament and the government would not have to strive very hard to find and place in the estimates a sufficient sum to care for the blind of this dominion from the age of forty upwards.

I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman who spoke a few moments ago and who said that the blind should be assisted from an early age, because it is always well to make a humble start. If we look after the blind from the age of forty upwards until they are called to that bourne from which no traveller returns we shall be doing much for that class, and then later on public opinion might be such that the government would be warranted in appropriating a larger amount to take care of the class on whose behalf the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) spoke.

My only reason for rising to speak to-day is that I am interested in any person or class of persons who suffer from any disability or have been deprived of the use of some of their senses which are necessary to enable them to go through life happily and successfully. Having seen the Institution for the Blind in the City of Halifax and noted the good work that is being done there, I am sure that the passage of this resolution will cheer the hearts of those who will benefit under this proposal and also of those who are assisting in looking after the blind. Therefore I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government led by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will be able to find a sufficient sum to place in the estimates to make a modest start so that the blind may see that a studied interest is being taken in them by hon. members of the house and by the government. I am sure that they will appreciate this and it will give them the thought that perhaps, after all, life is worth living.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have not very much to say to-day, but I should not like to let this opportunity go by without expressing my sympathy with and hearty support of this resolution. Actually there is no opposition which could be brought against this resolution, and my purpose in rising would be rather to state that I do not think the resolution goes far enough. I think we should do something more than provide pensions for the blind. Last year this thought was expressed most excellently by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). It is quite true there are many blind people who are helpless, some being invalids as well; it is true there are others who have reached an age where there is no possible chance of their being educated for anything, but on the other hand there are many able-bodied, intelligent blind men and women who could be educated and given something to do. It has been proven beyond question that blind people can produce the most excellent basket work, brooms and other things of that sort. I know of a young fellow who lost his eyesight in the war and who is now a skilled masseur in Toronto where he is earning a very good salary. The fact that a person has lost his eyesight does not mean that he should be helpless and hopeless for the rest of his life. A helpless blind person is the most helpless person possible, but there are many who are able-bodied and who, if given an opportunity, could provide for themselves. I certainly think the government should provide that opportunity by way of education and the provision of employment.

The mover of the resolution (Mr. Donnelly) discussed the definition of blindness. I believe a blind person should be considered as one who has not sufficient sight for the ordinary purposes of life. Whether he has half sight, whether he is totally blind, or whatever degree of sight he has, this should make no difference so long as he is unable to carry on the business of life. When he is in that condition he should be classified as blind. I think pensions for the blind should be national in scope. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler), the provinces are called upon to educate all blind persons up to the age of twenty-one years. If the provinces have this burden upon their shoulders, surely the federal authorities should undertake the other forms of relief.

I do not know that I have anything further to say. Every hon. member owes a duty to the blind people of Canada to speak in this house on their behalf. It is the business of the government to find the money to provide pensions for the blind; it is our duty to support them in their hour of need.

Mr. W. M. RYAN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with this resolution. I want to congratulate the mover (Mr. Donnelly) upon the splendid way in which he has presented his case and also upon again bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I am in hearty sympathy with the spirit of the resolution. However I think it is unfortunate that the resolution should be taken as a means to launch an attack upon the bankers of this country. I do not happen to have the good fortune of knowing any of the gentlemen in St. James street and I hold no brief for them, but I do not think there is anyone in the dominion, no matter what his calling may be, who is not heartily in sympathy with this resolution. If the government brings in legislation giving effect to the resolution, I for one will support it so far as it is possible for me to do so.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house very long, but I want to bring to the attention of hon. members the situation in which we find ourselves as representing this dominion. Every hon. member who has spoken to-day has endorsed the principle of this resolution. They agree that those who have been unfortunate enough to lose their sight are deserving of some assistance from their more fortunate fellow Canadians. It is admitted that something should be done at once, but nearly every hon. member who has spoken has brought up the question of where the money is to come from. As I listened to the speeches of hon. members I was reminded of David Copperfield. In that book mention is made of a person who was trying to write a history but who could not get around King Charles' head. It kept coming up and coming up. This problem of where to find the money keeps coming up in connection with every proposal made in the house. It is agreed that it is desirable to do something, but the contention is that we have not the money. We all know that if we were faced with war the necessary credit would be forthcoming. Great Britain considers that she is faced with the danger of war and she is able to make an immediate appropriation of $1,500,000,000. We know that if Canada were in the same danger we would have no difficulty in finding the necessary credit to carry on any defence plans deemed necessary.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ryan) who has just spoken has indicated that this resolution has been used by some hon. members as an excuse to make an attack upon the bankers. I think the hon. gentleman has misconstrued the attitude of that increasing number of men who count themselves as monetary reformers. They do not attack the bankers as individuals; they attack the system which has grown up during the last fifty years. They do not suggest that the bankers are any less devoted than is anyone else to the best interests of society, but they do say that the financial system is not working in the best interests of the people. I would point out that some of the greatest economists in the world to-day have come to the definite conclusion that in the twentieth century we are trying to do business under a financial system that, while it may have done fair service in the nineteenth century, is just as much out of date to-day as is the ox-cart when compared with the motor car. I hear member after member say that the financial system is too complicated for parliament to deal with, but I suggested that if they really want something done along the lines which have been just suggested, they should devote their study to the financial system and the banking policy.

It is a well recognized fact that the country is continually going deeper into debt. If we could not afford to do a certain thing last year, there is not much hope of our being able to afford to do it this year and there is less hope of our being able to afford it in the future. We are willing to speak soft words on behalf of and offer sympathy to the blind, but we have not the money to do anything for them. This reminds me of a certain saying in the bible: They asked for bread and he gave them a stone. It reminds me of the parable of the loaves and fishes at the time when the multitude were to be fed. The question was asked where the money was to come from, but the multitude were fed with bread and fish without money coming into the question. We as a deliberative assembly must devote ourselves to finding ways and means of doing what is physically possible, regardless of whether the financial system as at present constituted stands in the way. If we do not do this we are not doing our duty to the people of Canada.

What these blind people need is food, clothing and some of the other good things of life. If the financial system does not permit us to do those things which we as a Christian people realize we should do, which we know we have the ability to do, then it should be changed. If we refuse to study this problem can we say that we are as serious as we should be in our desire to do something for these people? That is the question I put to the house. This is the test that faces this House of Commons. Do we really mean these things? Do we want to have them done? If so, let us begin to study some of the ways suggested by the greatest economists not only of the English-speaking nations but of the world. Let us begin to give serious and sympathetic consideration to those suggested ways and means whereby in this twentieth century we may go forward and place at the disposal of these blind people the things that it is physically possible to put at their disposal. The things that are physically possible should be financially possible, and if under our present system they are not financially possible, although physically possible, then we are subordinating the best interests of the people to adherence to a system; we are refusing, by our adherence to an outworn system which no longer serves humanity to the best possible advantage, to benefit by the abundance which providence has given us. I am not now advocating any particular change in the system, but I know that every hon. member present would like to do something for the blind as well as for others who are unable to look after themselves. As the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) has said, fifty-four per cent of what we raise in taxation is going towards paying interest on our debt. That is where the money is going and it is in that quarter that we should direct the searching gaze of parliament to find out whether we cannot there save money and thereby serve the best interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. W. H. MILLS (Elgin): I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without saying a word in favour of the resolution, but before I speak to it, as this is the first occasion on which I have addressed the house during this session, I should like to congratulate you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the Speaker, upon your elevation to the respective offices which you hold, and I would also congratulate you, sir, upon the order which you maintain.

Just a word in reference to the resolution. I have seen a good deal of the work done by the unfortunate blind and it is truly wonderful to view their accomplishments. But in these times when there is so much competition in all lines it is very hard for these people to find anything to do to earn their living. People who bocome blind at an advanced age are particularly unfortunate in this respect. During my campaign I met a man who had become blind at the age of sixty-four. He was married but had no children. He had nothing saved up and it was necessary for his wife to stay at home to look after him. Apart from the little relief provided by the municipality, they are entirely dependent upon the kindness of neighbours. The question is: Where is the money to come from? But it seems to me that we have money for many other purposes; many other grants are made, and I do suggest that people who are blessed with their sight owe something to their less fortunate brethren.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): It seems to be my lot these days to meet deputations and to hear representations both in the house and outside it asking for one of two things, either more expenditure of funds from the public treasury or a reduction in the taxes which contribute to the public treasury. I suppose there is not a member in the house but is favourable to the principle of the resolution now under discussion, and I dare say that anyone who advanced the slightest argument against it from the standpoint of national desirability would be subject immediately to the accusation that he was placing property rights ahead of human rights. The debate however has been on a very high plane with the exception of the contribution of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Poole). I would suggest to him, with all respect, that if he has such a low opinion of this house of which he is a member there is one chamber at all events which is controlled by the members of his own party, and in connection with which there is no doubt whatever as to constitutional authority to deal with this matter; and I suggest that, lacking faith in this chamber and in this government, he might well address himself to that chamber which unquestionably has authority to deal with matters such as this.

And that brings me to this: The discussion which has taken place to-day would have been virtually impossible in this chamber twenty years ago for the reason that until quite recent times it was assumed, and properly so, that responsibility with respect to measures such as that contemplated by the resolution was provincial in character. All down through the years from confederation on the provinces of Canada had assumed responsibility for all such matters, for dealing with property and civil rights, for dealing with all matters of public charity; and indeed we recognize still that the dominion is merely a contributing factor towards what is really a provincial responsibility in connection with the old age pensions legislation presently on the statute books. There has been in the last twenty years a change to such a point, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) indicated, that the dominion is now contributing seventy-five per cent of the cost of old age pensions to the provinces, a recognition of a fact which is inherent in our constitution, that such responsibilities are first of all provincial.

The provinces have all down through the years recognized their responsibility with respect to the very matter now before the house, because they have set up institutions for the care of the blind and their education as well as for the care and education of various other classes of disabled people. I am not seeking on behalf of the government to put aside this question on constitutional grounds, because rightly or wrongly parliament has embarked upon the principle of assisting the provinces with respect to matters which are clearly within provincial jurisdiction. But when we hear remarks such as those which emanated from the hon. member for Red Deer I think it is well to point out these considerations.

The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), who introduced the resolution, made, I think, an admirable presentation, and with regard to the point I have just mentioned I might call his attention to a statement he made. He said that in the United States many states grant old age pensions. The United States is a federal country, similar to Canada. In the United States the federal authority has not yet assumed any responsibility with respect to pensions for the blind.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the hon. minister whether it is not true that the United States, in the new security acts recently enacted, are assuming the responsibility?

Mr. DUNNING: What acts?

Mr. HEAPS: Social security acts of the United States, passed this year.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I am not familiar with any recent enactment by which the federal authority in that country assumes any responsibility. In any event I am quite sure that such an assumption of responsibility would be in the same manner as is here proposed.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, by way of contribution to what is recognized as a state responsibility.

An hon. MEMBER: Dollar for dollar.

Mr. DUNNING: Dollar for dollar, yes. I just wish to make that point because of the fact, if I may be permitted to say so, that parliament has now sufficient to do in finding the necessary funds for those activities with which by the constitution it is charged. We want to be generous with respect to humanitarian objects of all kinds; we want to be generous by way of contributions to the provinces, I know; but is it not our first duty to look after those matters with which the constitution of this country charges this parliament?

With respect to the matter of age, I am not at all convinced that good arguments or particularly sound reasons have been advanced for setting it at forty. In England, I believe, the age is fifty; in Australia, some one said—the member for Wood Mountain, I think—that the age is sixteen; and if I look at the matter through the eyes of the finance minister I must of course regard age forty as merely the entering wedge. We all know perfectly well that in estimating future financial requirements one cannot possibly take age forty as the basis, because obviously there would be demands from time to time that the age provision be modified on account of what could easily be advanced in cases of people of thirty-five, thirty, or twenty-five years who were at least equally needy with those whose age exceeded forty.

I have on record from some of the blind organizations some objections to provision for the blind being made a part of the old age pension legislation, with, instead, the request that separate provision be made for the blind—I presume as a federal responsibility. I doubt very much if we can approach the matter from that point of view because of what I have been saying with respect to the responsibility of the provinces in connection with the question.

That brings me of course to a consideration mentioned by many speakers, that so far two provinces have not come within the ambit of the old age pensions legislation, and consequently, if the blind are added to that legislation, their receipt of pensions would be dependent upon the entry by the dominion into agreements with all the provinces with respect to the payment thereof. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made some suggestions as to the manner in which further revenues could be raised; he made suggestions of an interesting character. The liquor monopoly in Sweden was held up, I think, as a model for the extraction of money for governmental purposes from a monopoly, and I think the figure of $50,000,000 was mentioned. Well, I just turned over in my mind the amount of money which the governments of Canada, dominion and provincial, are now extracting from the liquor traffic, and from the standpoint of extraction I do not think we have anything to learn from Sweden. As to the method of extraction there might, of course, be some point to my hon. friend's remarks, but I am quite sure that with reference to the amount of money we can show the Swedes a few things at the present time.

Every question of this sort of course renders possible, although I think it is of doubtful order, a discussion of credit. But may I point out that this is not a question of credit at all. This is a question of extracting from the people of Canada each year money to spend on some of the people of Canada. It is not a question of borrowing the money; it is a question of taking it from all of us to give to some of us. No question of credit is involved at all. From year to year we must go on raising from all of us that which we spend either on all of us or on some of us. That is not a question of borrowing. No question of creating money alters the fact that we tax ourselves as a people for the discharge of our public services. I shall not pursue that question further. There will be other opportunities when I shall be much more in order than I am on this resolution to discuss matters of banking and credit.

On behalf of the government I can say that we shall, as this resolution requests us to do, consider it very carefully. We are favourable to it. The practicability of immediate action, of legislation at this session, is very doubtful, however; in fact I should not like to hold out hope that there will be legislation this session implementing this resolution. The government has given it consideration and that is the conclusion of the government at the present time. Naturally I should prefer to say immediately—it would be nice just for once to be able to say—yes, instead of having to say no to almost every request either for greater expenditure or for lower taxation. But I can only repeat what I said on a former occasion. The government believes that at the present time we require to keep a very tight hand with respect to new commitments, and therefore I cannot hold out hope to the house that we shall propose legislation at this session regarding this matter. While acknowledging the desirability of assisting in the discharge of provincial responsibilities with respect to it, we do not feel justified, in view of the state of the country's finances, in promising to do so at this session.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I was taking it for granted that every member of this chamber is in favour of the resolution. I also took it for granted that it would pass, and that the government would see that provision was made to take care of our blind. I had no intention of rising until I heard the remarks of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I received a telegram this morning from the Institute for the Blind at Winnipeg asking me to support the resolution. I want to say that I am supporting the resolution and believe that the money should be found to take care of our blind people.

An hon. MEMBER: They can find it for brass hats.

Mr. LEADER: I did not intend to go into the monetary question at all or to say anything about the huge taxes that the people of this country pay in regard to interest rates, but I want to say something along the lines of economy in administration. Every party in the election last fall had that as a plank of their platform; they were pledged to economy in administration. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the cost of administering the high commissioner's office in London has doubled in the last four years; that it now costs the taxpayers of this country over $500,000 a year to maintain that institution, including the $250,000 that is spent for advertising purposes. I want to point out that two or three years ago the taxpayers had to pay for a $200,000 building that was erected in Tokyo, Japan. There is no doubt that we can save hundreds of thousands of dollars, yes, millions of dollars in the administration of this country if we only apply ourselves to doing so. If one goes through the auditor general's report, as I have, one will find that in the last five years we have paid out nearly $18,000,000 in travelling expenses. I mention these things just in order to show how we could save a paltry $300,000 to take care of our sightless people. I have nothing more to say, Mr. Speaker, except that I am supporting the resolution and I am very sorry indeed that the government cannot find the money with which to meet this request.

Motion agreed to.

RETIRING ALLOWANCES

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF ADEQUATE ALLOWANCES AT AGE SIXTY AND OVER

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government be requested to take under immediate consideration the question of granting adequate retiring allowances to Canadian citizens of the age of 60 years and over.

He said: I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to continue the debate on this subject which was carried on in this house for almost two days only a few weeks ago. I know already the attitude of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in this connection; he asked his supporters to turn down a similar resolution. So it is my intention at this time to allow the matter to drop, but I wish to notify the house and the government that at another session of parliament we shall have on the order paper a similar resolution which we hope will receive more sympathetic consideration on the part of the government than was the case this year. Judging from the vast amount of correspondence I have received during the past two or three weeks there would seem to be a very strong, in fact, an almost overwhelming body of sentiment throughout the country in favour of pensions at sixty. Now that we have introduced a resolution of this kind we will continue to bring in similar resolutions until such time as parliament lowers the existing age limit and grants higher pensions than are being given to-day.

With these few words, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the permission of the house to allow this resolution to stand or be dropped, with the hope of resurrecting it on another occasion.

Motion dropped.

MARKET GARDENING

SEASONAL TARIFF IN THE INTEREST OF MARKET GARDENERS

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, Canada should study the question of immediately adopting a seasonal tariff in the interest of market gardening, particularly during the months of April, May and June of each year.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of gratification that, after five years of absence, I find myself again in this house. However, I notice that a great change has taken place. The Conservative opposition lacks the exuberance and vigor of former days. For the first time we behold a powerful government elected by a majority without precedent in Canadian parliamentary history. The people of Canada are entitled to expect great things from this government; above all, the financial and economic recovery of the country, the revival of employment, and the improvement of the agricultural situation.

I wished to make these few observations before broaching the subject matter of the motion, which is closely linked with the agricultural progress of this country.

Mr. Speaker, the question which I propose to examine is of national import. From the answers made by the minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to inquiries which I submitted to him recently, it is obvious that every province in the dominion is deeply interested in market gardening. According to information supplied by the Minister of Finance, the Ontario counties of York, Simcoe, Essex, Middlesex, Hastings, Grey, Waterloo, and Huron are specializing to a greater extent in this market gardening branch of agriculture. In the province of Quebec, the counties of Beauce, Bonaventure, Témiscouata, Champlain, Lake St. John, are included in the list, and I owe it to the truth to add the constituency of Laval-Two Mountains, which it is my privilege to represent in parliament.

The counties of Jacques Cartier, Mercier and the former constituency of Laprairie-Napierville are by no means unconcerned with market gardening; nor is Terrebonne, and many other Quebec counties will, in a few weeks, be real gardens.

I shall quote the latest statistics indicating the land area devoted to market gardening in the province of Quebec and the value of crops produced thereon in the years 1934 and 1935. Statistics, as the poet says, are the thorns of speech, and they compel me to keep referring to my notes. In 1935, the area thus cultivated amounted to 44,010 acres, representing an increase of more than 2,000 acres in a single year. In fact, in 1934, the area covered was 42,000 acres. That short period thus showed an increase of five per cent. What was the value of the vegetables produced for marketing purposes in the province of Quebec in 1935? $6,297,000.

And in 1934? $5,601,000. We have there an increase of 12 per cent. These figures clearly show the economic importance of garden marketing to Canada. However, it must be borne in mind that the figures which

I have just quoted refer only to purely commercial market gardening. If we further take into account the substantial contribution made by home gardens, we find in that interesting analysis unsuspected sources of wealth.

Let me now draw the attention of the house to a comparative statement of the different products of market gardening for the years 1935 and 1934, which I desire to have recorded in Hansard.

(1) B—Bushels. D—Dozens. Q—Quarts.

At the outset of my remarks, I referred hon. members to the answers made by the honourable Minister of Finance. Besides the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, several counties represented in this house by my honourable colleagues, are interested in market gardening. I may mention, among others, the counties of Queens in Prince Edward Island, Westmorland in New Brunswick and Lunenburg in Nova Scotia. As to the prairie provinces I might mention constituencies numbered 2 and 5 in Manitoba, 9 and 15 in Saskatchewan, 10 in Alberta, and 4, 5 and 6 in British Columbia. This enumeration brings home to me the fact that the vastness of our land gives rise to disadvantages, divergences of opinion, opposition of interests. Is that a reason for impairing the effect of a large investment? Indeed, can anyone say what market gardening in this country has entailed in the way of past sacrifices and hard labour? When we know that an undertaking is profitable, we stay by it; when we do not, we quit it. Too many of our people sometimes scorn our most valuable resources.

In these last few years we have witnessed the demoralizing spectacle of hundreds of thousands of our people subsisting on the dole. Why this degeneracy? Why this ruinous policy? Why this tragic anomaly in a rich country like Canada? Is it not largely due to economic nationalism? The present government has already taken steps to suppress this growing evil. It has demolished the barriers, and even now, as in the days of Laurier and King, the political horizon of the country begins to dawn with brighter hues.

However, in the discharge of this important duty of economic reconstruction, I am fully confident that the authorities will protect the market gardeners against any competition that may prove ruinous to them. Therefore, in the interest of Canadian market gardeners, I urge the establishment of a seasonal tariff during the months of April, May and June of each year. In urging this seasonal tariff, which is so important to agricultural progress, I cannot refrain from upholding once more the rights of the farming community, rights which have been ignored too long. At a time when the hardships and sufferings of a considerable section of the population induce the rulers of the nation to turn their eyes towards the land, it is essential to render all possible assistance to the farmers. The arduous task which they perform from daylight till dark should be generously encouraged by those who preside over the destinies of Canada. Agriculture must survive in this country. Our leaders cannot shirk the duty that devolves upon them to make farming more efficient, more profitable and more prosperous.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose, at six o'clock, I was discussing the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, Canada should study the question of immediately adopting a seasonal tariff in the interest of market gardening, particularly during the months of April, May and June of each year.

Having quoted statistics in support of my resolution, may I bring forward a few considerations of a general character regarding the needs of agriculture in Canada. For more than five years past, a most depressing term is heard on all sides. I will refrain from repeating it. It is synonymous of idleness, of inertia, of despair, of ruin. Let us oppose to it agriculture, the symbol of life, of tenacity, of wealth, in this country which is blessed with natural resources that many other nations might envy.

In closing my remarks, sir, I wish to say to the house that I am not moved by any petty interest; on the contrary, not only the county of Laval-Two Mountains, but every section of Canada is deeply interested in the establishment of this seasonal tariff. Speaking on behalf of a persevering, tenacious and hard-working class of people, I think I have shown to this house, ever imbued with a truly Canadian sense of justice, the rights of the market gardeners. As to the duties of our rulers, I feel confident that, as in the past, they will discharge them in the best interests of the country.

Firm action is required, especially in the domain of agriculture. Something should be done without delay to ensure a more generous and expeditious application of the Farm Loan Act. As soon as the practical working of the latter act is assured, the Farmers' Arrangement Act should be repealed, for not only does it affect property rights, but it exerts a demoralizing effect on both farmers and creditors. It has struck a fatal blow to the borrowing power of the farmers and has been a cause of apprehension to mortgage creditors, and even of anguish to small investors and widows who rely on the income from their investment for their maintenance. The act does not favour enterprise, but rather creates discouragement. I repeat, let us replace that nefarious legislation with the immediate application of a wider and more liberal Canadian farm loan plan.

Mr. WERMENLINGER (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) whether the resolution now before the house has reference to seasonal tariffs or to tariffs in general? I think the hon. member is out of order in so far as the last part of his address is concerned.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may put a question but that is all.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I think I am quite in order, inasmuch as my resolution covers the whole field of agriculture in this country. I am grateful to the hon. member for his observation. I trust that he himself will soon have an opportunity to discuss the farming question in the house.

Before bringing these few remarks to a close, I wish to draw the attention of the house to the ideal of survival that we must attain in this country. Should we not, in the first place, apply ourselves to the development of our splendid country? In that commendable pursuit, can there be found a more fruitful endeavour than that of the farmer? The back to the land movement, the tilling of the soil, are so many symbols of contentment in these troublesome days.

Dark clouds are gathering over Europe; may God preserve us from a catastrophe worse than the last one. To war let us oppose the bulwark of agriculture, and may the statement made by the right hon. Mr. Mackenzie King in the last election campaign, be entirely confirmed. No outside interests, whether in Ethiopia or elsewhere beyond our borders, whatever may be their nature, are worth the life of a Canadian citizen. Let us go on cooperating towards the building up of our great country. These are my concluding words, sir, and in the discharge of this important duty towards my constituents, I trust that I have acted in the interests of the Canadian people and in a truly national spirit.

Mr. WERMENLINGER (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the resolution of my hon. colleague the member for Laval-Two Mountains provides for the establishment of seasonal tariffs. The concluding portion of his address in no way refers to the question, and I should like to have more definite explanations on this seasonal tariff, because we are to consider the question of a trade agreement between the United States and Canada.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add, save to point out that in order to make a statement the hon. member should have at least invoked the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was not able to follow the speech of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) to the full as I missed certain phrases which I was not able to understand, but I notice that he is appealing to the government to study the question of immediately adopting a seasonal tariff—I am sure the motion means a seasonal tariff, and not a seasonable tariff —in the interests of market gardeners. I assume that the market gardeners my hon. friend represents differ in no way, except perhaps in degree, from those in other parts of Canada, and certainly they are all looking to the immediate future with considerable anxiety.

The hon. member asks for a study of the method of applying protection through a seasonal tariff. I am not aware that a seasonal tariff has ever been tried in Canada. In theory it has been discussed at great length, and in theory I have always thought it would apply beneficially probably if those against whom we must use it dealt in prices which had some definite relation to the cost of production. But unfortunately that is not the case. Unfortunately the competitors whom we meet in our markets are selling their produce at prices which have no relation whatever to the cost of production. Their desire is simply to remove those commodities from their own markets.

It appears to me that if at this late date the hon. member asks this government to study seasonal tariffs, it must surely be that his market gardeners are entirely ignorant of the facts which present themselves to them at the moment, and the hon. gentleman himself must surely be entirely devoid of humour, for I cannot see how the government can study seasonal tariffs with any probability of satisfaction when the Canada-United States trade agreement is presently before the house and contains in the schedules attached to the agreement items which show that the time has gone by when it was possible for the government to consider seasonal tariffs with the idea of being of any assistance whatever to my hon. friend's market gardeners or any other.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has proposed this resolution (Mr. Lacombe) will expect, I am sure, and quite properly, some statement on the part of the government with respect to it. Certainly Canada should study the question of a seasonal or a seasonable tariff. From my experience in the house it is very difficult to avoid studying the tariff in all its aspects as relating particularly to the commodities referred to in the resolution, commodities which are the product of the market gardeners of this country.

I scarcely agree with all the remarks of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) as to the effect of the Canada-United States trade agreement on the question now before the house, but I shall not anticipate that discussion of its provisions which must take place in committee of ways and means. I can only say to the hon. member who has moved the resolution that certainly the government has studied and will continue to study the question he has brought before the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROPOSED APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS TO OATS, BARLEY, RYE AND FLAX PRODUCED IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the provisions of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, should forthwith be made applicable to oats, barley, rye and flax produced in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia.

He said: In speaking to the resolution, Mr. Speaker, may I first of all say for the information of hon. members that representations were made last year to those in charge of the wheat board bill, and also to members of the committee to whom the bill was referred, that coarse grains should be included in its provisions. Strong representations to that effect were made on behalf of farmers and farmer organizations. Similar representations have been made this year by farmers and their organizations to myself, and, I believe, to the government also.

I might say that the Canadian Wheat Board Act provides for the inclusion of coarse grains after a recommendation has come from the board, followed by an order in council. Section 14 of the act reads:

> The governor in council may approve of the provisions of this act being made applicable to oats, barley, rye or flax produced in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, if the board recommends that such approval be given, whereupon the provisions of this act shall mutatis mutandis apply to such kind of grain as they apply to wheat.

Certain reasons were advanced last year for not including coarse grains in the act, the chief reason being that there had not been any stabilization operations on the part of Mr. McFarland with respect to coarse grains.

During the last two weeks in June there was a very good prospect for a bumper crop of wheat in western Canada and as the board would not have any coarse grains, the committee thought it advisable not to ask them to handle those grains for the particular season of 1935. It was also thought that coarse grains would not be coming on the market in very great volume due to the fact that with the large wheat crop in prospect the farmers might be encouraged to withhold the marketing of their coarse grains in order to have a year's supply on hand, so to speak. It is well within the knowledge of everyone that that bumper wheat crop did not materialize. The prospect petered out in July as the crop had been struck with rust, and there was practically a complete failure of the wheat crop in the southern half of the three prairie provinces.

When the committee was considering this matter last year, it was also thought that if the coarse grains were left to the open market the grain trade might handle them in such a way as to get a fair price, with the possibility of their even boosting prices. It was, however, suggested to the committee by different parties that there was a danger in leaving the coarse grains out of the act. It was contended that if these grains were left to the open market the grain trade might boost the prices to near those received for wheat, especially if the price fixed for wheat was not much above the average. In this way the spread between the prices of wheat and coarse grains would be narrowed and it would appear that marketing on the open market obtained better results than marketing through the board. But what happened? The average prices received for coarse grains during the season of 1935 were almost the lowest on record. In parts of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, oats were selling along the Canadian Pacific railway at thirteen cents, fourteen cents and fifteen cents per bushel net to the farmer, on the street. Barley was selling at seventeen, nineteen and twenty cents per bushel. I think we are all agreed that those are low prices for these grains. In the southern half of Saskatchewan, and I think also in the southern half of Manitoba, hundreds of thousands of acres of wheat were burned and the wheat was not harvested. The farmers in those sections were forced to realize on their coarse grains. Barley and oats matured earlier and there was some harvesting of these grains. The farmers were forced to sell in order to realize something, but they did not get anything from their wheat. I should like to quote resolutions which have been passed by farmers' organizations in western Canada supporting the principle of this resolution. I quote from the Western Producer of November 21, 1935, which reports on a meeting of Saskatchewan pool delegates as follows:

> Among other resolutions bearing on marketing questions adopted by the annual meeting of Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates last week was one urging that the Canadian wheat board should consider handling coarse grains immediately establishing a fixed minimum price for this class of grain.

A meeting of pool delegates held in Regina from November 5 to 14, 1935, passed the following resolution:

> This meeting of delegates believes that it is in the best interests of the grain producers of western Canada that provisions be made for the operation of the Canadian wheat board for a period of not less than five years for the marketing of grain including coarse grains, and further that sections 9, 10, 11, 14 and 16 of the wheat board act should be brought into force by proclamation prior to the movement of the 1936 crop so that all grains shall be marketed through the board.

May I say that these two resolutions reflect the considered opinion of 100,000 farmers in Saskatchewan. The next quotation is a resolution passed at the annual convention of the Saskatchewan agricultural societies in session at Saskatoon in January. The newspaper report, which is headed "Agro societies want wheat board always," reads:

> Saskatchewan agricultural societies went on record at their annual meeting in Saskatoon last week as favouring the continuation of a wheat board. The decision was unanimous. Coupled with this resolution was another putting the societies on record as favouring placing of oats, barley and rye under the control of the wheat board also, and asking that a minimum price be placed on these coarse grains in a similar manner and comparative with that now placed on wheat.

I wish hon. members would note that that resolution reads "comparative with that now placed on wheat." The price set by the board on wheat, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, was 87½ cents per bushel, and there is no doubt that that last clause was put in the resolution because the farmers realized that they were not getting for their coarse grains a price comparative with what they were receiving for wheat. I think it is important to bear in mind that what the farmers wanted was a comparative intrinsic value. The annual convention of Saskatchewan municipalities was held last week. From letters I have received I note that many delegates to that convention have been instructed by their municipalities to bring forward resolutions similar to the ones I have just read Since coming to Ottawa I have received many letters from farmers stating that they want some action in this connection.

I should like to give some figures with respect to the production of coarse grains as compared with wheat. I do not intend to burden the house with a lot of figures; I shall give the figures for just four years to show that the coarse grains have maintained their averages in production much better than has wheat. Of course this may be owing to the drought condition. At any rate, I will put on record the production for four years. In 1927 we produced 400,000,000 bushels of wheat and 250,000,000 bushels of coarse grains; in 1931 we produced 284,000,000 bushels of wheat and 240,000,000 bushels of coarse grains; in 1933 we produced 263,000,000 bushels of wheat and 228,000,000 bushels of coarse grains, and in 1934 we produced 260,000,000 bushels of wheat and 220,000,000 bushels of coarse grains. The coarse grains maintained their average of production possibly better than wheat did. In 1933 we produced 50,000,000 bushels of barley in the prairie provinces and in 1934 we produced 45,000,000 bushels. Those of course were drought years. Exports for 1933 were only 10,000,000 bushels of barley, whereas in 1932 we had one of our largest exports, about 25,000,000 bushels. We have never exported more than half the barley we have produced in the west, but there is every reason to believe that in the next few years we shall be exporting more of this kind of grain.

There is reason to believe that there will be an increase in the production of coarse grains. Under drought conditions more coarse grains than wheat can be produced. Coarse grains may be seeded later in a dry spring, because after it has become too dry for wheat, barley and oats as well, can be seeded, and a fair crop obtained. There is also the problem of soil drift to be coped with. Coarse grains can be seeded later in the spring after the drifting season is past. Then, in connection with cleaning lands, coarse grains are used to a considerable extent by farmers. There is no doubt that the farmers, after their experience of the last five years, will diversify their system in the west, and henceforward there will be a greater acreage seeded to coarse grains and less to wheat. The net price for coarse grains is of course ridiculously low; I have quoted some of the prices, and compared with the price of wheat the figures for coarse grains are low.

It is quite apparent that at this session no consideration is going to be given the question of a reduction in freight rates. The debate on that question has already taken place in the house, and though this may be somewhat out of order I might say how pleased I was to hear the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) say that after the house prorogues he will see to it that the appeal which is before the privy council in connection with freight rates will be heard. I might suggest to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that, if it is not heard, next year he ought to bring in a bill to provide that where such important appeals are not heard within six months they should lapse altogether and parliament be given an opportunity to deal with these matters as they should be dealt with.

There is no doubt that had coarse grains been under the operation of the act last year, the farmers would have received at least ten or fifteen cents more per bushel. I have under my hand information from one who has been closely associated with the grain trade—I do not care to give the name—and it is evident that coarse grains have been accumulated by the elevator companies at prices ranging from thirteen to eighteen cents for oats not graded higher than 3 C. W., and barley from seventeen to twenty cents. This grain is now moving out, and from now until seeding time it will be taken to the dried out areas in the country at the considerable profit to those who have accumulated it of from seven cents to twenty cents a bushel. Had coarse grains been under the operation of the board last year, the farmers, rather than the grain dealers or elevator concerns who have accumulated the stocks would now be reaping the increased price.

There is every evidence that in the next six or eight months grain will be sold at a much better price than even to-day. I might call the attention of the house to the fact that the open market to-day is paying only within about six cents of what the board is taking the grain in at a fixed minimum price, that is six cents less for No. 1 northern, basis Fort William. There is every evidence that we shall be able to sell wheat at a much better price. I have before me a little circular that sets out some of the factors tending toward an increase in the price of wheat. These are some of the factors: Many unfavourable reports in regard to European winter crops; anxiety over the United States winter wheat crops by reason of dust storms, sub zero weather and inadequate snow protection; the first estimate of the acreage in India being smaller than the figure of last year; wheat stocks in some parts of the continent being practically exhausted. These are a few indications that we may expect a better price.

I will not take up any more time. I think there are many sound arguments to be advanced in favour of the government's consideration of this resolution. Coarse grain should be brought under the operation of the wheat board at once because there is a considerable quantity which has not yet changed hands in western Canada. It is the only commodity which many of the farmers there have to realize on in the line of grain and some have been holding back for a better price. I have no doubt that all western members, especially those from Saskatchewan, will endorse this resolution, for they know that ninety per cent of the farmers all through that western country are in favour of it. I trust we shall get some action.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I wish to make a few remarks with regard to this resolution. It was not my privilege to be in parliament during the last five years, in which the then government, led by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), got Canada's wheat and grain trade into the greatest mess it has been in since confederation. When in 1930 the right hon. gentleman took over the government of the country there was some wheat on hand—I believe that in his election campaign he said, in the neighbourhod of 127,000,000 bushels—but there was a reason for that at that time. All hon. gentlemen who remember conditions in Canada prior to 1930, when the new government took over, will recall that the people of western Canada, the grain trade, the wheat pools and the farmers, refused in 1929 to sell their wheat at a very good figure. As a matter of fact it was the surplus of the 1928 and 1929 crops which was the carry-over in 1930, when the last government took office. The people of western Canada, the wheat pool, the farmers and the grain trade refused to sell that wheat at a price. It has been stated that that is not a fact, but anybody who knows the operation of the grain trade and the handling of grain on the exchanges knows that, if wheat is quoted at $1.50 a bushel, and wheat is offered at that price, so long as wheat is offered at that price it never will rise above that quotation.

In the fall of 1929 wheat was quoted on the Winnipeg grain exchange for the October option at $1.73 per bushel. At the same time cash buyers of wheat were offering a nine cent premium for wheat. In other words this meant that $1.82 a bushel was offered for cash wheat at that time, and the people of this country refused to take that price. I do not blame them for doing so; that was their own business; they were advised by people from one end of Canada to the other that wheat was worth more than that at that time. Hon. members will probably remember that the president of one of the great banks in this country stated then that wheat was worth more than that. So that when the government of my right hon. friend took over we had a surplus of wheat, not on account of any policy of a past government but because we in this country refused to sell wheat at a price of $1.50 a bushel and over.

Then prices started to fall, and throughout the five years that my hon. friend held office he put into effect in Canada policies that acted as a block to the sale of any wheat or grain or practically any other primary product from this country. At that time tariffs were jacked up, first of all on the schedules, then by devious methods of valuations for duty purposes, different discount rates, dump duties and everything else. Naturally our primary producers, in shipping their products, could not bring back their wages across the boundaries in return for the commodities that they shipped out. It was these policies which held back our wheat and other grains until, in the fall of 1932, Canadian wheat reached the lowest price at which it had been sold since we started to grow wheat. I remember in that fall selling my crop of No. 1 hard wheat at twenty-five cents per bushel at my point of shipment. I remember in that fall selling No. 1 northwest Canadian flax with a three cent premium and getting fifty-one cents per bushel for it. That is what happened to the farmer in this country while my right hon. friend piled tariff upon tariff to stop the incoming of payments to the Canadian farmer for these goods which he had to sell. Then, having got the country into that shape, he brought from Calgary Mr. John I. McFarland to endeavour to sell the wheat of Canada against the tremendous obstacles that he himself had put in the way of selling that wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. gentleman makes a statement so entirely at variance with the facts I think I must correct it. Mr. McFarland was not brought by the government; he was engaged by the Cooperative Wheat Producers, and that is a matter of record. I am bound to say that the other observations of the speaker are on the same level.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I may have been incorrect when I said that my right hon. friend brought John I. McFarland from Calgary. Probably my right hon. friend will say that he had nothing whatever to do with the appointment of Mr. John I. McFarland?

Mr. BENNETT: That is true. I was in England at the time.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Nevertheless Mr. John I. McFarland was much closer to my right hon. friend than he ever was to the wheat pools of western Canada prior to his appointment.

Mr. BENNETT: That also is inaccurate. Mr. McFarland and I had no business relations for years prior to that. He was president of the Alberta Pacific Grain Company and I was vice-president of it until I sold out. The purchaser of it is in this building.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I still maintain that Mr. John I. McFarland was a much closer friend of the right hon. the leader of the opposition than he ever was of the wheat pools of western Canada. He was brought down here to handle a proposition which it was impossible to handle in view of the policies that we had in effect in the country at that time. Things went on from bad to worse in regard to wheat in Canada until, in the last session of the house, action was put through by which a board could be formed, and that board was given leave to handle the wheat of Canada which our Canadian farmers wished to sell to that board. It was given the right to fix a minimum price for the sale of the wheat. The idea throughout the dominion was that a board was being created to set a minimum rate for Canada's wheat crop for 1935. What happened in actual practice? A board was formed, but until the opening-gun-of-the-campaign speech of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition the set price of wheat was not set, or at least if it had been set it was not given to the public. For about seven or eight days after that there was a set price only on No. 1 northern; there was no set price on a lower grade. Then it took some seven or eight days beyond that period before a set price was placed on feed wheat.

In western Canada this year we had until July the promise of the largest wheat crop that section has known since 1915. It was a beautiful crop, an even crop practically all over western Canada. But in July, rust, which had started in the southern states some time before, gradually found its way north until it struck the western wheat crop, and it did tremendous damage. In the western part of Saskatchewan, where the rust did not hit, frost came early in August and to a large extent ruined the crop there. A western Canadian crop when ripe must be harvested. In our section, where the fields of grain are large and there is danger of winds and early snow in the fall, the moment the crop is ready to cut the farmer must get into the fields and harvest it. We found in western Canada last year, long prior to the announcement of my right hon. friend of the set price of wheat, that many of the farmers of that section had to start to harvest their grain. It was of low grade and the yield was low. It started to move into the elevators and, with the uncertainty regarding the price, prices dropped in the country elevators and the farmers had to sell their wheat for what they could get at that time. It was not a case of holding it until later; it was such a poor crop, such a poor yield, that in order to be able to pay the wages they had to pay from time to time and in order to buy the gasoline and oil with which to run the engines of the combines and threshing machines to harvest the crop it was necessary for the farmers, as they threshed loads of wheat, to take them to the country elevators and sell them so as to obtain the money with which to buy supplies to carry on the balance of their harvesting. The result was that many farmers in southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba were forced to sell wheat, and especially feed wheat, for as little as twenty and twenty-one cents per bushel, eleven to twelve cents under the price later fixed by the board. So these people sustained a loss of from ten to twelve cents per bushel on a very low grade crop with a very low yield.

The intention of this House of Commons, when the bill was passed last year setting up a board, was that the board would be set up in time to fix prices before the crop was harvested, so that the farmers would receive the fixed minimum price for their grain. However, for some reason or another better known to my right hon. friend than to myself, that price was not set until the election campaign was on. These farmers in western Canada have lost many dollars because of the action of my right hon. friend in not having that price stated long before it was. This resolution asks that coarse grains be brought under the board. This is very late in the season, I would suggest. My hon. friend was in the house last year when the bill was before parliament. Why did he not use his influence then to have these coarse grains put under the board, and see that a price was set for them?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): How does the hon. gentleman know I did not?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Well, I know the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): That is an insinuation, too, and the hon. gentleman should withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the remark.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It was just a pleasant observation. I know the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): All right.

Mr ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member who introduced this resolution could have insisted at that time that the government have coarse grains brought under the board and prices fixed for them, but he did not do so. He does not need to say that I am insinuating now; I am stating the fact when I say that he did not do so at that time. Now he brings in this resolution at a time when he is sitting in opposition. So far as coarse grains are concerned, I would suggest that before any action is taken by parliament to have prices set on coarse grains, first of all the great loss which the western growers sustained through the delay of my right hon. friend in setting a price on wheat, or, if that price was set, through his not allowing the grain companies and the farmers of western Canada to know what the price was, should be refunded. I am willing to support any measure that will bring about that result, but I will not support the measure brought down by my hon. friend until such action is taken by this house.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what has been said by the hon. member who has taken his seat (Mr. Ross, Moose Jaw) with regard to the delay in setting the price for the crop of the year in question, but in the light of the fiscal policy of this country, the bonus, if you like to call it that, that is paid to the manufacturers—and it appears to me that we have resigned ourselves to a system of bonusing our manufacturers—the only complaint I have to make with regard to the resolution is that it does not go far enough. I think we should include all farm products. If we are to continue bonusing the secondary industries of Canada by all that is reasonable and logical we should also bonus the primary producers. It has been stated by one hon. member, a man who I think should know, that it has cost us, in the greater prices we have had to pay for the goods we consume, in the neighbourhood of from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 to carry on this system of bonusing. I think if we could analyze the ultimate load created in this way we would find that it rests very heavily upon the shoulders of the farmers of this country. So if the hon. member had brought down a resolution advocating a direct bonus to all agriculture, to everything we produce, I would heartily support it, but I think the resolution is perfectly logical in the light of the past experience of this country.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, this is probably one of the most important resolutions, as far as western Canada is concerned, that will come before the house this session. I did not think it would be reached to-night, and I know there are many members from the west who would like to take part in this debate. I know the interest that is being shown and that has been shown for some time in regard to this matter.

May I say that I subscribe very heartily to the remarks of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) with respect to the delay in establishing the initial payment on the 1935 crop, but I am also concerned in regard to the proposed settlement that was announced just prior to the election with respect to the 1930-31 crop. The government has already announced that it is going to introduce legislation to implement in part that supposed undertaking. I think we in this house, as well as the country at large, will welcome that opportunity of securing the additional information, and until that time comes I do not feel that we are in a position to deal adequately with this resolution. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO NEED FOR TECHNICAL TRAINING OF YOUTH, AND CREATION OF A NATIONAL YOUTH REESTABLISHMENT COMMISSION

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood) moved:

Whereas, a trained youth is indispensable to the future welfare of Canada;

And whereas, the unemployment of parents and heads of families, because of conditions for which they are in no way responsible, means that boys and girls, and young men and young women, have been denied the necessary training to properly and adequately equip them for a life's vocation;

And whereas, prolonged enforced inactivity has a debilitating and often disastrous effect upon the youth of our country;

And whereas, it is not enough merely to provide employment for youth who have suffered from the lack of training and preparation for vocational work;

And whereas, provincial schools which have reached a high standard of excellence and which yearly are increasing the sphere of their usefulness, do not provide adequate facilities for technical training;

Therefore be it resolved, that the government consider the desirability of investigating the broad question of the reestablishment of the young men and young women of Canada;

And be it further resolved, that, in the conduct of such investigation, attention be given to the possibility of making available, to those of our youth, who are adapted for such training and who would otherwise be denied it, technical training in various branches;

And be it further resolved, that, in the conduct of such investigation, consideration should be given to the feasibility of setting up and maintaining a National Youth Reestablishment Commission.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise for this the first time to speak in this house with considerable trepidation. I am not insensible of the extent and depth of the tradition that is bounded by these four walls. I think of those who have spoken here these many years past and of those who speak here now. I am here as a new member; I have come here—and I say it proudly—with a sense of humility, a sense of privilege—the privilege of association; the privilege of opportunity; and the privilege of responsibility. I have been sent here—and I am fully conscious of it—by upwards of seventy thousand splendid Canadian people who are dependent upon industrial activity for their livelihood. I have been sent here to represent them, and when I speak in this house I speak not as a private member only but as the representative of those people. During the course of my campaign I made a promise. I believe, sir, that promises are rather dangerous things during elections. But I made one promise, and that promise was to do my best.

As I have said, I honour and respect the traditions of this house; I respect its dignity, its decorum, and the purposes for which we are gathered here. So as I speak I am filled with a sense of privileged obligation and traditionalistic responsibility not only to those who sent me here but to my fellow members of this house, to my country, to the empire, and to my king.

To identify myself, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am a Conservative, and proud of the fact. I am proud of my party, its principles and its accomplishments. I have an intense loyalty to party, yes, but I feel that, in the words of him whom I honour as my leader, "a party is an instrument to effect a purpose," and this purpose is to advance the best and fullest interests of the Dominion of Canada.

The motion which it is my rare privilege to bring to the attention of hon. members is, I feel, vitally important to our national life. As I introduce it I am not under any misapprehension as to the magnitude of its scope. I realize that it must be treated as a national subject in the deepest and broadest sense. I feel that it is the duty of this parliament particularly, if I may say so, to bend our united efforts, of course with loyalty to party ideals and principles, to the common cause, the national welfare. We have been sent here for that purpose and to that purpose we must adhere.

This motion relates to a national matter that concerns the very life-blood of Canada. We face a most serious national problem. That sounds platitudinous. One who rises to speak in such days as we have passed through in this world in the past seven years almost feels it incumbent upon him to use such language. But when I say that we face a most serious problem, this is no platitude. It is not necessary for me and it is not my purpose to expatiate at length upon the burning question of unemployment occasioned by the economic world war of the last seven years. It is with a single feature, and a singularly important feature of it, that this motion deals; that is the problem of youth. I have been privileged in my contacts during the last eleven years, in that I have had very extensive contacts with the youth of one city of this province, particularly, and perhaps in a lesser way with the youth of Ontario as a whole. I have come into contact with scores of young men who have been good enough to come to me with their difficulties and problems. I have counselled them in their difficulties and disappointments. So I speak here to-night with some definite and practical knowledge of the subject with which I deal.

Prior to 1929 it seems to me that we did not pay much attention to the youth of Canada. It is true that in 1919 we passed a Technical Education Act, the purport of which was "to aid in promoting industry and the mechanical trades and to increase the earning capacity, efficiency and productive power of those employed therein." The need for such aid was expressed in the terms of reference of the royal commission which had previously reported to parliament, as follows:

Industrial efficiency is all important to the development of the dominion and to the promotion of the home and foreign trade of Canada in competition with other nations.

From 1929 to 1936 the world has passed through very difficult days, days of diminished salaries, lowered wages, apprenticeships discontinued, days of lost opportunities. The abuses of the system under which we carry on in this western so-called civilization have become very apparent and have been brought under the microscope. We found that we had made many mistakes and had permitted many mistakes to be made. The results were farreaching and simultaneously spectacular and tragic. Unemployment of heads of families left in its wake suffering hardship, and many casualties the like of which the world had not seen before. Single men and single women found no means of selfsupport. In this emergency agencies were quickly set up and the job of work called relief was comparatively well done—when I say comparatively I refer to other countries—but sometimes it seemed that we had forgotten that women too who had been employed and were then unemployed had to be taken care of. Did we ever see a woman in the bread line? But youth has paid the greatest price of all, for not only did youth lose the opportunity to earn but it lost also the opportunity to learn how to earn.

Education had to be curtailed, not alone because of the cost of education, but because it was necessary for those who were engaged in academic and scholastic pursuits to surrender them in order that such means as possible might be gathered together. Then came spasmodic and in some cases continuing idleness. Idleness, Mr. Speaker, is an ugly word. It is a word that one finds on the side of the incubator of national disaster. In so many instances, youth became discontented, youth became unbalanced, youth became despondent. Youth did not understand what it was all about. Youth, in some quarters—and let us admit it frankly—became unpatriotic and permitted some of itself to be gullible to the approach of the foreign agitator, violent and extreme and destructive, gullibility born not of desire but of a sense of hopelessness.

To deal with the problem of the reestablishment of youth is to deal with a practical, not a theoretical, problem. This is not the time to spend in extended discussions of our problem. This is not the time to wrangle upon a party platform concerning what is to be done. These are days of action. The voice of youth will be heard; the voice of youth has already been heard in many quarters.

There sits to my left in this house a group of seventeen young men, sent here to represent a party. I deprecate the attitude of some, if I may do so in all humility, who tend to laugh at this group. Why laugh? Experiments will be tried; youth will indulge in experiments. These young men, our fellow-members, have been sent here by youth. These are days of action, and not of petty, partisan political ponderings upon petty matters. I envy the government, if I may say so, the opportunity that is theirs, and particularly, if he will allow me, do I envy my good friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) the opportunity that is his, an opportunity that he may discharge directly and swiftly. His action must spring, it seems to me, not from any academic or any theoretical point of view, but from a regard for human values and human feeling. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), for whom I have the highest respect, is interested in a balanced budget, as he must be. Before him are figures, prefaced by the dollar sign, but the national dollar must be regarded only as it is related to national life.

For some days in this house there has been debated the matter of a trade agreement. The whole matter of this trade agreement, it seems to me, if I am in order, Mr. Speaker, is as it is related to jobs, and as it produces income for the primary producer. It is not enough for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) to present at the end of this or that or the other year a statement showing an increase in trade. But what does increase in trade mean in terms of jobs and of income for the farmers? If trade is increased and the number of jobs is not increased, then trade itself is not enough. The unemployed youth of this country are thinking in terms of jobs, not in terms of dollars of trade. Further, as the resolution states, it is not enough merely to supply jobs. Parliament has a wider and fuller duty to the youth of Canada, our national life-blood, than merely to supply jobs. It is the reestablishment of our youth, morally, educationally, socially, as well as occupationally.

Here is the problem. In 1926—and may I say, Mr. Speaker, that all the figures I am using to-night are taken from the bureau of statistics—the population of this dominion was 9,451,000; I am giving figures to the nearest thousand; in 1929 our population was 10,029,000; in 1934 it was 10,835,000, and in 1935 our population was estimated at 11,000,000. From 1926 to 1935 our population increased by 1,550,000; from 1929 to 1935 it increased by 1,000,000; from 1934 to 1935, in one year, it increased by 165,000. Let us consider the problem more intimately, more in relation to the resolution itself. In 1931 there reached the age of sixteen years 215,000 boys and girls; in 1932 there reached that same age 205,000; in 1933, 207,000; in 1934, 202,000; in 1935, 210,000, and in 1936 it is estimated that there will reach that age 217,000.

Now, what of employment? We are told that employment at the end of 1935 is slightly higher than in 1934, and essentially the same in 1931. In other words, about four million men, women, boys and girls, altogether, are engaged in gainful occupations. But since 1931 the population of this dominion has increased by approximately 625,000; from 1931 to 1935 1,049,000 reached the age of sixteen. Now, what has happened to these young people? Of those who were in school at the age of sixteen, fifty-seven per cent remained in school until they were seventeen, and forty-three per cent dropped out. Of those in school at the age of seventeen, fifty per cent remained until they were eighteen, and fifty per cent dropped out. Of those in school at eighteen, seventy-one per cent remained until they were nineteen, and twenty-nine per cent dropped out. Of those of all ages who attended school only two-thirds reached the final year of the elementary school. One-half did some high school work; one-fifth proceeded to matriculation, one-tenth to university, and three per cent graduated. Let it be borne in mind too that in 1931, for example, there were 469,000 boys and girls under the age of twenty who were working at some sort of occupation, with an average earning for those of the age of nineteen of $760 a year. May I ask hon. members if they think that state of affairs which I have so briefly sketched is desirable, and if it is in the best interests of Canada?

What are we doing to correct this situation? What are we doing to bring about at least some measure of equilibrium in this state of unbalance? As the motion states, our provincial schools are doing an excellent job of work in their own field and as far as they can go. Our technical schools are also doing an excellent job of work as far as they can go. In my own riding there is a technical school in which 1,800 are enrolled in the day classes and over 3,000 in the night classes. This school is admirably conducted by the principal, Mr. Ferguson. There is at present in this dominion an investment of $579,571,000 in educational institutions which are maintained at an annual cost of $140,000,000. Let it be remembered that the cost of education of one child through the eight and a half years of his or her scholastic experience, which is the average scholastic experience in length of time in this country, is no more than $750. To raise one child to the age of economic independence costs $5,000. Thus it is that six children can be raised and educated in the Dominion of Canada at a cost no more than it costs to raise seven children as illiterates. Against this is the staggering figure of $7,000,000 per month which is being paid to keep men and women in idleness under the name of relief. Seven million dollars per month! What might that not mean translated into terms of education? What price are we placing upon education? Why is it that we sit back and let our youth go out into the world to make their own way without adequate equipment?

It seems to me that right here is one of the most challenging, perhaps the most challenging, of all our national problems. Provide jobs? Yes, but are we playing fair with our youth who are going to fill these jobs? We listened the other evening with a great deal of interest and justifiable commendation to the Minister of Labour when he introduced his plan for closing the relief camps and putting some 10,000 men to work this summer on the tracks of the Canadian National railways and Canadian Pacific railway. That is very laudable, but what about this fall? I have in my hand an excellent editorial from the Toronto Globe, which I read occasionally—I also take Punch—dated February 10, 1936, headed "Skilled Workers Service," and reading as follows:

> There is something almost startling in the expressed view of industrial leaders in the United States that industry is faced by a shortage of skilled labour. At a conference recently of business leaders in Chicago it was stated that, though hundreds of jobs calling for technical knowledge were opening, trained men could not be found to fill them. This scarcity was described as most acute in the automobile and general machine trades, though it was experienced by industry in general.

The editorial concludes by saying:

> This situation is not peculiar to the United States. It is being discussed in this country. Here also there will be plenty of applications for jobs as they develop, but it is evident that for some years, if conditions continue to improve, employers will be obliged to get along with a large percentage of inadequately trained workers.

There is a record of an anomalous situation. What is the solution of this problem? In suggesting this motion to the government I realize that the whole question is too broad, too deep to find an answer in this chamber alone. It is a job of work to be concentrated upon by a discerning and active committee or commission. Hon. members will perhaps permit me for a moment to touch briefly upon some phases of this situation and to deal with some of the possible steps that may be taken to ameliorate the condition that I have endeavoured to sketch.

What have we done for youth these past many years? I have stated already that our provincial schools are excellent. I have stated already that our technical schools are excellent. During the last twenty years technical education has come into its own, for twenty-five per cent of all those now attending secondary schools in this dominion are attending technical or commercial schools. I have in my hand Report No. 3 of the International Labour Conference for the session at Geneva last year. This particular report deals with unemployment among young persons. What have we done in Canada as compared with what has been done in other countries in this regard? Under the chapter: General Education, Vocational Training and Social Service for Young Unemployed Persons, I find the following:

In Canada provision for the education and recreation of the unemployed is made in a number of places, largely by voluntary effort. Thus, in Montreal, for instance, rooms have been opened for games, reading and classes, and a library, concert hall and theatre have been placed at the disposal of the unemployed. The classes include general subjects and some technical subjects such as geology and mining. Instruction of a practical character is also given in boot repairing, clothes mending, etc. Moreover, in many prairie towns and villages lectures on literature, civics and music have been organized.

That is an excellent job as far as it goes, but how far does it go? Let us consider the recommendations of this same conference. I have before me a pamphlet entitled World Labour Problems, 1935. This is an account by an eye-witness of the Nineteenth International Labour Conference. These are some of the recommendations made in connection with vocational training:

Juveniles (of 15-18) unable to find suitable employment, i.e. occupations which are not "blind alley," to continue full-time attendance at school until such employment is found for them.

Juveniles not attending full-time school should attend continuation courses. Where such attendance is not compulsory for all juveniles, it should be at least compulsory for the unemployed, under pain of disqualification from unemployment benefit or relief.

For unemployed young persons of 18-25 vocational training centres with some general education should be organized, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations.

We have heard of the efforts put forward along technical and vocational training lines in Great Britain, Germany, Japan, Sweden and other countries, and yet we find, according to the Year Book, 1934-35 of the International Labour Office, that very little can be said about Canada. Compared with what has been done in Great Britain, Germany and other countries, very little has been done in Canada. There is in this publication one paragraph to which I should like to direct the attention of hon. members. It is headed: Workers' Living Conditions, and referring specifically to vocational training, it states:

During 1934 the effects of the economic depression continued to be felt in the field of vocational training: Further progress was frequently held up, expenses were cut, and there was a reluctance to promote reforms and fresh measures. Attention must however be called to a number of encouraging symptoms, such as the improvements made in the vocational training of skilled labour, the insistent demand that such training should be of an educational character, the efforts made to link up general and technical education, and to combine intellectual and manual training, and the steps taken to regulate the training and employment of juvenile labour and to ensure adequate protection for young workers through the concerted action and real collaboration of all competent persons and parties.

Our position in the family of nations as far as youth reestablishment is concerned, is not too creditable. The funds available under the Technical Education Act are essentially exhausted, and in many places evening classes have been discontinued. We are making little or no progress towards making available to our youth, who without help from some source are denied it, that vocational training which is such an invaluable asset.

I have before me The Year Book of Education, 1936, and I turn to a chapter contributed by Mr. Robbins of our own bureau of statistics. He says in part:

It will be seen, then, that the last twenty years have brought about a beginning in the direction of shaping the secondary school course to fit occupational needs, and that this adaptation has taken the form of a broader common highway from primary school to university rather than a forking of the road. But so long as fewer than a quarter of secondary students are in the technical courses, when more than half of all children are going into the secondary schools, it is difficult to believe that the present position represents more than a beginning, for only about 10 per cent of children are thus in their regular school career being trained specifically for either the offices or shops of industry. And this under conditions in which, as the census of 1931 showed, young people are not attaining economic independence before the age of eighteen, on the average. They were, of course, by no means all staying in school to the age of eighteen, but if trends of the last twenty years are continued, not more than one in four was preparing for a position in life in which he would not be on somebody's paylist. In the interests of the three-fourths there is room for a much closer linking up of the schools and industry.

This whole broad question which I have been attempting to discuss may be epitomised in one story. I take the story of a particular young man. Similar stories of young girls can be told to exactly the same purport. This young man spent nearly three of his four years in technical school; he topped his class for the two years he had been there and one term of the third year, but he was compelled by necessity to become the bread-winner of his family. He sacrificed his education and sought for and obtained a job. He told me not many days ago, "I have done pretty well but I am not going to get the promotion I expected because the other two fellows working alongside me have finished their course and are better equipped than I am." That is not fair; it is not good enough.

There are many suggestions offered for consideration to those of us who have been interested in this particular phase of our national development. I have under my hand a letter from the head of the Balfour Technical School of Regina, Saskatchewan, Mr. Blair, in connection with correspondence classes. I have before me a pamphlet ably written by Mr. A. E. Corrigan, in connection with national scholarships as a national investment. I have also a copy of Hansard dated Monday, February 17, and I turn to page 232, where I find part of the speech by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in which he discusses what the United States is doing in connection with reforestation. Then I turn a page or two to page 235, where I read a most capable speech by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), in which she discusses what the United States is doing to keep youth in the schools.

I realize that the suggestion is a dangerous one, but one might introduce at this point the question of subsidizing industry to allow for apprenticeships. I say that the subject is a dangerous one because I see in his place the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) Apprenticeships are not being provided for these days. The opportunity given youth in days gone by when times were good and money was plentiful is now denied them, through no fault of their own. We are compelling people to go outside Canada to buy certain commodities they require because we have not in this country the men trained to manufacture those commodities, whatever they may be. I think of one case in particular but I will not take time to develop the point. I have mentioned but a few of the thousand and one possible approaches to a solution of the problem, which is too vastly important to be covered within the limits of a forty-minute speech. All I have attempted to do is to speak to the motion itself, which urges the government to consider the advisability of setting up a national youth reestablishment commission.

In 1914 there was a state of war. Youth carried the burden; youth bore the brunt of it all. They came back from France shattered mentally and physically, and we were quick to set up a soldiers' civil reestablishment commission. From 1929 down to this day we have experienced the vicissitudes of another war, an economic war in which, thank God, there has been no rattle of muskets; there have been no long casualty lists published in the daily press; but there have been casualty lists carrying the names of those who have been "unwept, unhonoured and unsung," our unemployed. Again, it is the youth who have carried the greatest burden of this economic war. They have been deprived of the opportunity not only of earning but of learning how to earn. Should we then be slow in 1936 in setting up a national youth reestablishment commission?

It is an old adage that "he who pays the piper calls the tune." And youth has paid the piper. The next quarter of a century in this dominion is youth's ; youth has paid and youth will call the tune. We cannot be deaf to the voice of youth. Let us then act and act quickly, for God's sake, in the name of Christianity; for the sake of the crown in the name of devotion; for the sake of empire in the name of loyalty; for the sake of country in the name of patriotism; for the sake of youth in the name of humanity.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure the younger men in this house are very proud to-night of the able way in which the case for their generation has been presented by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Massey). We of this generation feel perhaps that there are problems that we have which the generation that is older than we are do not quite understand. There is to-night in Canada an army of young people who are looking to the future with a degree of uncertainty, in an attitude of bewilderment, and who are looking to those who call themselves leaders in the community to take some very definite steps in guiding them. Twenty years ago an army of half a million young Canadians went overseas to engage in a life and death struggle. As I remember those years we bent every effort to look after their comfort, to see to their well-being. Women gathered in groups to knit socks; parcels were packed; people worked long hours; no sacrifices were too great on behalf of the men who were holding the line. Now, twenty years later, half a million or more young Canadians are fighting another battle in which there is no glory; they receive no medals; there are no drums and no flags. Yet I submit that it is a battle which is leaving some severe scars and lacerating wounds, and it is on behalf of those who have been the victims of this struggle in the last five years that the mover of the resolution is pleading here to-night. I submit that this is no time for ornate rhetoric; it is one for several concrete suggestions which such a commission, if established, might use in dealing with the problem of youth.

I would divide the great army of youth into four major classes: Those who are in the student class, who have completed all or part of their studies and are now waiting to be absorbed into industry; those who have had some training but have never been gainfully employed; those who have worked at some time but are now unemployed, with very little immediate prospect of being again employed; and, lastly, that great army of young people about whom we think so seldom, the farm youth, scattered across Canada, living on farms with their parents, not able to establish homes of their own, with their initiative and their energy bottled up. If we are going to deal intelligently and adequately with the problem of youth we shall have to consider these four groups, because they present totally different problems and consequently will need totally different remedies. I am going to touch on them only briefly, Mr. Speaker, because I know there are many other young men in the house who will want to advance suggestions before the hour of closing draws near.

Of the first group, that group of young students, I think it might be well said that the provision of national scholarships might meet something of their need. Instances may be found in abundance; I quote one. I know of two young men who two years ago graduated from high school with the highest average that had ever been given to any pair of students graduating from that particular collegiate. For two years they have been staying at home simply because their parents were on relief and they were unable to get sufficient funds to go to university. Imagine two young men with an average mark of over ninety-three, passing a grade twelve examination and yet unable to go on and give to the state and to humanity the value of that intelligence, and of the knowledge that they had acquired! And yet they represent but a fraction of thousands of young men across Canada, gifted, brilliant, able—

Miss MACPHAIL: What about the women?

Mr. DOUGLAS: —but who, because of the fact that they lack funds, are prevented from going on. One of my colleagues says, "What about the women?" The same is true of thousands of young girls fitted for nursing, fitted for teaching, fitted for research work and post-graduate work, but who are unable to make the necessary progress.

Some advance has been made along this line with reference to national scholarships in other parts of the world. I quote here something that is quite familiar, no doubt, to many members, from a little book by Professor Barker, entitled: The Universities of Great Britain. Speaking of this subject he says:

> The state, through the Board of Education, grants state scholarships and other modes of assistance. The local education authorities grant local or county scholarships; these with other forms of public scholarships, give various forms of aid which enable poor students of promise to proceed to the university. It has been calculated, on the basis of official returns, that nearly one-half of the total number of students in British universities have obtained assistance in one or other of these ways on account of the promise they show either before entering upon a university career or at some point in its course.

Then this remarkable statement:

> The universities of Oxford and Cambridge, supposed to be the homes of the rich, contain 38·2 per cent of assisted students.

The author also points out that the British government has assisted no fewer than 73,000 university students.

I submit that many of these young men and women, either in their collegiate courses or in their university courses, have shown such a degree of brilliancy as would warrant any assistance that can be given them by a national reestablishment commission that might be set up.

Then there is that group of young men in the cities who are not particularly adapted to academic pursuits, unemployed who never have been gainfully employed, who need some type of technical training. There is a crying need throughout Canada to-day for enlarged facilities for technical training. While visiting in Winnipeg I had it drawn to my attention by some men who are connected with St. John's and Kelvin technical schools of that city, that when they opened a course for these unemployed young men their registration was flooded within forty-eight hours and it was necessary to turn away a great number who wished to enroll. I believe that if it were possible to set up the necessary machinery, a great many young men and women who are at present unemployed, and who are getting very rusty, would have an opportunity to develop certain techniques that, when good times return, if they do return, would place them in a position to become economically independent. A prominent British economist made the statement a short time ago that in certain areas of Great Britain in which some industries were picking up it was found very difficult to obtain trained technicians, solely because during the last five years there had been no training of these people to fill the vacancies that might occur. This is a splendid way whereby such a commission, if set up, could go about the task of rehabilitating youth.

The third class that I mentioned consists of those who have worked and who are now out of work. They divide themselves into two classes: Those who have been located in unemployment camps, and those who remain at home with their parents. I am not going to deal with those in unemployment camps. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has already made a statement; we shall know more about what is to become of them. But we should bear in mind that we cannot wash our hands of responsibility for these young men next fall; they cannot be left to wander, as they have done in days gone by, on freight cars across Canada. I was thinking, however, of the other group, not those in camps but those at home, staying with their parents, becoming restless and dissatisfied. Such a commission might consider ways and means of providing work and wages for those young men. They never have asked and they are not now asking for any type of charity, but if we have to continue year after year requiring them to live upon government bread, we shall come very quickly to the point at which the desire for work and the urge to work will disappear.

I come to the last class of these young men and women, and that is those who are living upon the farms. They are not banded together; they have no collective voice, and as a result they have been very largely forgotten. Yet there are thousands upon thousands of them. I know of homes where there are five or six grown sons staying with their parents on the farm. The farm does not require that many to work it; yet they have no place to go. Farmers who wish to hire them are not in a financial position to do so. It is just possible that by cooperation with the federal and provincial governments, steps could be taken, as they have been in some small measure in the west, to subsidize farming, to pay a small sum to the farmers and a small sum to these young men, because they are men to whom schemes of work and wages would not appeal since they have never done industrial work.

They cannot be cared for by camps. They have been raised on farms; their whole outlook is agricultural, and they desire to stay in agricultural communities. On the other hand I know of farm after farm on which old people are continuing to do the heavy chores for which they are not fitted; last summer some of them were putting up hay, because they simply could not afford to hire any help. I am informed that at Dundurn camp alone it was costing over $24 a month to maintain some of these young men; a questioner in this house in 1934 was told that it cost something like $39 per inmate. I have asked the present Minister of Labour what it cost in 1935; as yet I have not received an answer, but whatever the sum is it would be quite sufficient, if cut in half, to give half to the farmers towards boarding these young men and half to the young men themselves. That would do two things: It would rehabilitate them in an agricultural community with which they are familiar, and in the second place it would give them a small income which would enable them to buy clothing and set aside something in the hope of again becoming self-supporting citizens of an agricultural community. It might even be possible to have our present loan board take into consideration the fact that there are thousands of farms, particularly in southern Saskatchewan, that are not being operated. Many of these young men and women have come to the age when they want to marry and when, with some sort of government assistance, they would be prepared to go on these farms and set up house. In a measure they would be self-supporting; they would be reinstated in the community; they would not be a charge, as they are now, upon either their family or the state.

I submit that this is perhaps the most pressing problem facing the Canadian people at the present time. Some great sociologist has said that every nation gets the criminals it deserves. We shall get the criminals we deserve; we shall have the tramps, the transients and the vagrants we deserve, if we continue over a period of years to allow the young men and women, from whom we might create the finest Canadian citizens, to drift gradually into a state of dry rot.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, though not a young man I desire to speak on this subject. I should like to see Canada composed entirely of young men, and see how they would get on.

I should like to read some extracts from a letter I received only to-day which perfectly illustrates the need of the debate that is taking place to-night, and of some action being taken in this regard. This letter is from a mother in an Ontario town. It is beautifully written, and she tells that her husband died suddenly. They had some life insurance, but he had used it to change his business. He had been a blacksmith; the automobile had come and ruined his business, so he had gone into some other way of making a living and shortly had died suddenly, leaving her nothing. She received mothers' allowance until the last of the children reached the age of sixteen. In this letter she tells me the story of the family, and I should like to quote from it enough to place the situation before the house. She says that her eldest son is twenty-three; he has a first class certificate but did not get a school, and is working for $3 a week. Her eldest daughter is twenty-one; she is a stenographer in an insurance office, but the man who employs her is not busy. He has little to do, so he can give her work only three afternoons a week, and she is paid fifty cents an afternoon. The next son is learning to be an operator in a theatre, and gets only $1 a week. She says that there is nothing else to do in this town, because the two factories in it are closed. The next son is sixteen; he has a paper route and earns $1 a week. The mother continues:

> When I received the mothers' allowance cheque I could always manage.... I could keep their clothes clean and mended, cook vegetables and plain meals for them, but we cannot manage now. Lorne—

That is the eldest boy.

> —says he is going to leave home. Where can he go? ... Ruth's boss says he wishes he had enough business to keep her every day... I lie awake at nights. I worry so, sometimes I am sure I will lose my mind.

This woman lives in a very fine town. I do not know her, but I know the town and undoubtedly the member for that constituency would be interested in the letter, which I will pass on to him. What can be done for people like these? This woman is worse off now, with her children over sixteen, than she was before.

I am not going to make a long speech, because I am not prepared to do so, but I do want to say something about the necessity of giving youth a chance. They do not want to be unduly helped; they dislike that more than anything else. They want a chance to live; they want a chance to work. They do not want to be pampered and babied and subsidized, but they must be given an opportunity to help themselves. A quotation appearing in an article I saw in the New York Times a week or so ago by Aubrey Williams, director of the national youth administration of the United States, very well expresses just what I am sure we all feel. He said:

[Miss Macphail.]

> This is a task which we may begin for youth but which must be carried on by youth.

And again:

> We must not let a single spark of that spendid fire go out, in the boredom, hopelessness and actual want that unemployment brings to those who meet it at the threshold of their active lives.

That is the task we face. We have not attended to it well, and it will cost as much in relief, in illness, in one or another of our institutions and in the care of our criminals as it would have cost to give youth an opportunity. We have spent the money but we have spent it in the wrong way. I think youth is particularly idealistic. They like heroic living. They want to live for an ideal, for something bigger than themselves. Unfortunately that is why war appeals to them; it is something in which they can drown themselves, and they certainly made a good job of it the last time. They want now a social order under which they will have an opportunity to live. They want to live normal lives. I hear older people saying, "Well, these are hard times, and they can just go without this, that or the other thing." What we forget is that these people will never have youth again. They have only one chance at youth. They are trying to have some fun, and why not? They have a right to it. They are trying to find some place in life They are trying to set up homes. I suppose there is no need to enumerate all the things they want to do, but they do want work; they do want idealism; they do want an opportunity to care for somebody or something; they do want the fellowship of their kind. Why should they not want these things, and how much less would we think of them if they did not?

I believe we are just on the threshold of something being done to give young people opportunities. I do not mean particularly in parliament. I should like to be optimistic enough to think the commission will be appointed to study the problems of youth; I hope the minister in charge of the matter will rise in his place and so state, but I have been here a long time and I am not looking for this. However, here and there in Canada I do see worth while people who are taking hold of this idea and acting in regard to it. There is a scheme being carried out in British Columbia; the money is supplied by the provincial government, but the work is carried on largely by Mr. Eisenhardt. There are thousands of young people who come, without any charge at all, and play and sing together, develop their bodies and have a very happy and useful time. Hon. members can read about this in many papers. But it seems to me insufficient, good as it is, since it is physical development without relation to mental development. Then I find that in Montreal, Rosemount I think it is, they are doing something which is described in a very interesting pamphlet: One Way Out. It shows that they have organized the whole community and in one season have handled five thousand people, there being a very nice combination of physical and mental development. So there are in Canada two places in which they have taken hold of this problem and done something about it. Many teachers in technical and high schools have done a great deal to interest youth in study, manual training, et cetera, and have kept them from becoming completely discouraged.

But that is only a beginning; there will have to be a great deal more done. I feel sure that it will be done, but as we have the habit of doing in Canada, it will be started too late to be completely effective. If one compares our record in the treatment of youth with that of other countries it will be found that we are far down the list in our provision for the salvation of youth. I am thinking of Ontario which I know best; we need in the villages and towns and the open country adult education, education for the young people and the people not so young. The changes that have taken place in the last ten years and that are taking place are so terrific, so far-reaching and so rapid that people who do not follow the digests and magazines are unaware of what is taking place. We are most urgently in need of adult schools of some sort. When I think of the number of churches that are locked up in this province, and schools that are used only until four or five o'clock, I am appalled. The people built them with their money and it is their sons and daughters who need a place to which to go for fellowship, development and amusement; yet these buildings, which should be available to the young people for any worth while projects, are not being used. The church is too good and the school is too—well something or other; the trustees are so very careful lest someone should scratch a desk or something.

What are schools and churches for if not for the development of young people? It is time that some of the too-good people, the goody-good, got it through their heads that the churches and schools are for the development of the people, and they must adapt themselves to the times when young people and adults can come to these schools and churches and use the equipment in them, such as piano, library, et cetera. The young people whom I know in these country communities cannot afford to buy a piano to put in their community hall, if they are fortunate enough to have one. All this equipment, including libraries, is in these buildings which the people cannot use, and they cannot afford to equip other buildings. So we ought to lay down in unmistakable language so often that it will be heeded that, if the upstairs of the church cannot be used, possibly the basement or the school would not be too good, and here the young people can come for study in economics, citizenship, music, dramatics, manual training and all sorts of domestic arts. Much good comes from singing together, not only by way of training voices but in developing fellowship and the spirit of cooperation.

Then we must get, whether in this or some other way, some adaptation of the folk school, some place in which the philosophy and history of cooperation can be made known to rural people. What they have done in the four eastern counties of Nova Scotia is revolutionary; in very simple surroundings they have studied the philosophy and history of cooperation in relation to the needs of the community and then applied their knowledge to the meeting of their need. It is time our agricultural colleges and high schools—and perhaps, this would not hurt in the last class in public school—should consider very carefully the subject of cooperation. At any rate the high schools and agricultural colleges should be devoting themselves to teaching the philosophy of cooperation, because the competitive age is finished; we are rapidly moving into an age of cooperation. But the education which rural youth are getting today has nothing to do with cooperation; it is all "beat the other fellow and get to the head of the class, and the more people you overcome the more successful you are," which is certainly not the spirit of cooperation.

Youth in country places can be well served without anything being done by this parliament, although I want something done here, but if there are leaders in every rural community they can do much; the high school teacher, the continuation teacher, the preacher and all these people who have had a good education can lead classes in some subject in which they are proficient, and not very spectacular but really good schools can be set up. Some woman in a community who can do something in needlework very well could teach that; someone else who is good at making things out of wood could teach how this should be done. There are some very fine craftsmen in rural Ontario. As soon as people get it through their heads that this is not a depression out of which some government with a large majority is going to bring them overnight, but a condition which we are never coming out of because the machine is displacing more people all the time, they are going to prepare for a longer period of youth, for a longer period of retirement at the end of life and for increasing opportunities at both ends and, indeed, in the middle.

There is in Canada a movement of youth themselves. I do not know what they call it; is it the Canadian youth movement? Anyway, that is the sense of it and they have brought together the young people of all sorts of organizations, from those farthest to the left to those farthest to the right. They are hoping to have a convention in Ottawa this year, and are ambitious enough to think they might send some delegates to Geneva, if there is anything left in Europe by that time, to discuss the problems of the young people of the world. I received one of their publications just to-day, and let me state some of the things they think they need. They say that the most obvious need of the young people is work. Any legislation that will be useful to youth must provide for this; it is the central point, but work, they say, must be provided at a standard union rate of wages. Then they talk about new jobs; they suggest the rebuilding of slums and other projects which would absorb people who are out of work. They also speak of the apprenticeship system and say that they would like it to be possible to learn a trade while working, and they ask if young people could not be employed on government jobs as apprentices and get some wages for such work. They go on to speak about students and scholarships, a subject which has been well covered by the member who introduced the motion. I am sorry that I have not had time to read the leaflet very carefully, but I think I have mentioned the main points. I want to stress, Mr. Speaker, that youth themselves are organizing, and it is not only radical youth, shall we say, but youth that, until lately, did not think about these subjects at all, and possibly a good many of these young people still are not affected by the awful prospects of not having any work to do.

I notice a little item in the Ottawa Citizen of March 3 last which seems to fit into this, telling about a young man of this city who had graduated with highest honours from technical school and was being sent to take a short course with the General Motors Corporation of Canada, showing a close connection between the school and industry. Unfortunately until recently there has been a disposition in this country to have the schools quite apart from life. That did not work so badly perhaps in the days when the graduate was sure of a job anyway, but to-day when life has become almost terrifying so far as the future of the student is concerned, the closer the technical school and industry, the university and business and government, are brought together, the better I think it will be for those who are trying to prepare themselves for life.

I am sorry that I was not prepared to make a speech, and I have been very rambling, but I do wish to say to the House of Commons that we spend a lot of time discussing matters that are much less important than the one that is now before us.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey): If I had not seen him where he was sitting, and could have simply heard his voice, I would have said: There is a reformer from the west, because he speaks with practical, sound, Christian common sense. I am going to support this resolution because it leads in the right direction.

I had the honour to serve for six years on the board of education in our city, and we found this, that while it was necessary to teach our youth how to earn a living it was far more important to teach them how to live. I would like to give a few concrete examples of what I mean. I had a father come to me about three months ago and say, "What am I going to do with my boy?" That boy was just as fine an athlete as we had in the city of Fort William, and that was about the best in Canada. But he had begun to stay out late at night and would not get up early in the morning. He was irritable with his mother, and his father found it more and more difficult to be chummy with him. The boy was disgusted with himself. All he wanted was a chance to earn a living and not be a load upon his dad. He wanted to be of use and to develop his own gifts, earn his own way and not become an idle nuisance. You and I, Mr. Speaker, know that youth will not be idle. When we were young we were always busy, sometimes on something good and sometimes on something bad.

Let me give another illustration, of a young man in our city who was a splendid athlete, a graduate from our high school, taking his second year at the university. The best our country could offer him was a job in a camp at twenty cents a day, and so he became red, as we call it, and I would become red if I had to do the same thing. But influences were brought to bear upon him and he is now a credit to our city. All he wants is an opportunity to earn enough to finish his course, and if we are brothers to him we shall see that he gets that opportunity.

I can give another illustration similar to that cited by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), of a mother with five boys. She was getting quite a pension at one time and the family could live comfortably, but now the boys eat more; she is off the mothers' allowance, and she does not know which way to turn. What are we going to do with those boys? They must have an opportunity to develop and to get work. But to-day, as I see the situation, we are developing a band of youths who have not yet learned to work, and some of them do not care if they never work. We cannot expect them to remain forever idle, and I would say, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not take care of our youth in a proper way they are liable to become criminals and the care of the state.

The hon. member for Grey-Bruce says—and I believe that she meant it—that it is nicer for our young people to have homes of their own and choose mates in this life. She knows that is the natural and the proper thing to do if a young man finds one that he cannot live without. I had an invitation from a young man after he had been employed for about three months this summer. He said, "If you can guarantee me a job eight months in the year I have the finest girl in the world and we will get married, and you will get the job of marrying us." It is not a matter of getting empty buildings or getting buildings heated, because we have plenty of them. It is just a matter of having a heart to measure up to this task, and if we do, we shall find that it will pay us splendidly. Just let hon. gentlemen put themselves in the place of these boys. They graduate from our high school, and as we saw it on our board of education, our task was not so much to find good teachers and to raise enough taxes to meet the estimates, as to find something for our youth to do when they came out of our schools. Of course, they can go on the highways, ride the rods east and ride the rods west, and spend part of their time in different gaols, but that is not in keeping with this great country of Canada, which is the land of our birth or the land of our adoption. I congratulate the mover of this resolution upon the splendid way in which he has presented the matter to us, and I am sure that the government will endorse it.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the problem of youth is certainly one of the most important problems of the day, and this motion gives us an opportunity of discussing it in this House of Commons. The first paragraph of the resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas a trained youth is indispensable to the future welfare of Canada;—

A trained youth. Well, youth can be trained in different ways. Youth can be trained as Bible students; youth can be trained as good citizens; youth can be trained for a vocation in the world; youth can be trained for many good purposes, but it is not stated in this motion how youth should be trained. Now, that is most important. The training might be good or bad, but I assume that the sponsor of this motion desires to give a good training to youth. Of course the motion is only as big as its wording, and its language should be a little more precise.

The second paragraph of the resolution reads:

> And whereas, the unemployment of parents and heads of families, because of conditions for which they are in no way responsible—

Everyone knows who is mainly responsible for the acute unemployment now existing in this country.

> —means that boys and girls, and young men and young women, have been denied the necessary training to properly and adequately equip them for a life's vocation;

Before any one is trained for a life's vocation, he must choose the vocation he desires to follow. Every young person who grows up must decide whether he or she will go this way or that way. If a young man or woman wants to reap a success in life he or she must do the thing for which he or she is best suited. The decision must be made as to what is to be done before the training is started. In spite of the fact that unemployment has been so acute, very few boys and girls have been denied instruction. They have been offered the same facilities that were available at other times. The trouble is the plethora of clerks being turned out by the commercial academies in the different provinces. Every young man or woman wants to become a clerk of some kind and there are no more artisans. It is not dishonest to practise a trade. It is not shameful to be a shoemaker, a tailor, a mason, a carpenter or to carry on any other trade. There are many clever young men and women who are failures as clerks but who have a real inclination for a trade of some sort. This is a very serious part of the problem.

I should like to tell the sponsor of this resolution (Mr. Massey) and other hon. members what is being done in Quebec. Many sons of farmers have leisure time and the parish priests are holding evening classes for the young people. The young men and women meet in the community hall and receive instruction in English or geography or other subjects. This proves very useful. I know of one parish priest who is teaching the elements of commercial law, showing the young people how to deal with the banks. Most of these classes are conducted by the priest first giving elementary instruction on the subject matter and then asking questions of the students. The different matters are discussed among the students, and I know this method is meeting with great success. It keeps their minds busy. The resolution continues:

> And whereas, prolonged enforced inactivity has a debilitating and often disastrous effect upon the youth of our country;

I am very proud of the young men and women in my constituency. It is said that idleness is the mother of all vices, but I believe the young men and women of Canada have shown that that saying is utterly wrong. They have had no work but they have behaved very well. I think the records show that the boys and girls of to-day are not any worse and perhaps they are better than those of previous years who had not the temptations and the difficulties to face.

One thing that is comforting to the older politicians is the fact that the youth of our country are becoming interested in public affairs. Previously our youth left it to the graybeards to handle national problems, but now they have thrown their hats into the ring and are taking an active part in national affairs. In this present session there are more younger members than ever before. This does not mean that the old men should be put aside; it means simply that the younger men are interested in the national problems of the day and have decided to do their share. They have a right to discuss national problems and to pass judgment thereon. The resolution continues:

> And whereas, it is not enough merely to provide employment for youth who have suffered from the lack of training and preparation for vocational work;
> And whereas, provincial schools which have reached a high standard of excellence and which yearly are increasing the sphere of their usefulness, do not provide adequate facilities for technical training;

[Mr Pouliot.]

There are large technical schools in the cities, but there are no schools in the smaller communities to complete the teachings of the curates. There should be a small technical school in nearly every parish to give the young people an opportunity to learn trades which might prove profitable to them. This would be a decentralization of the teaching of trades. It is pretty hard for a father living in the country to pay board for his son to go to a technical school in Montreal, Quebec, Hull or any other large centre. Perhaps this is the reason why so many intelligent and bright young men and women prefer to take up commercial courses instead of learning trades. There should be a decentralization of the teaching of trades. The resolution continues:

> Therefore be it resolved, that the government consider the desirability of investigating the broad question of the reestablishment of the young men and young women of Canada;

That is what is being done to-night; the matter is being discussed in this House of Commons. This should be sufficient to direct the attention of the country to the matter. It is not within our jurisdiction to engage in the teaching of trades, although certain departments like the forestry branch of the Department of Interior carry on some educational work like the sending of samples of wood to the schools. It shows the boys the kind of timber that grows in Canada, and that is most interesting. The Department of Mines does the same with samples of minerals, and that also is good. This should be continued on a wider scale so as to afford the provinces and private institutions all the facilities that are at the disposal of the federal government. Considerable good can be derived in that way. The resolution goes on:

> And be it further resolved, that in the conduct of such investigation, attention be given to the possibility of making available, to those of our youth who are adapted for such training and who would otherwise be denied it, technical training in various branches.

This is very good and I agree with it, but I agree with it in the way it is stated. We do not want so many huge buildings, so many palaces to which to send our boys to learn trades. We want them to be familiar with their trades and to learn them but to learn them in such a way that they can apply them practically. Often when boys attend technical schools they see wonderful apparatus, the new devices of science. But what shoemaker is going to buy such apparatus in order to sole shoes? No; he has to begin at first on a very humble scale. He has not always very much money to start with, and this kind of education must be imparted in a practical way in order to show young men that without spending a great deal of money they may engage in any trade in the country, and afterwards become perhaps president of some large concern, as has happened in many cases in the United States and Canada. The resolution continues:

> And be it further resolved, that, in the conduct of such investigation, consideration should be given to the feasibility of setting up and maintaining a national youth reestablishment commission.

No, sir, never, and I will tell you why. We have enough of boards and of commissions. The great mistake that was made by the Conservative party in 1930 was the creation of paternalism in Canada. That was its great mistake and it is a stain that cannot be eradicated.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you not going to create a national employment commission?

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. gentleman will sit down and listen to my argument I will afterwards answer any question he has to ask. I have the floor and I do not wish to be interrupted. I wish to make my point first and afterwards I will answer any question he wishes to ask me. It is healthier for him to sit quiet now, healthier for a doctor. The point I am making is this: We have suffered perhaps as much from paternalism in Canada as we have from unemployment. What is paternalism? It is the preaching of this falsehood by one man: Come unto me and I will give you a job, every one of you. That was what was said in 1930. It was a terrific blunder; it was an awful mistake, a great error of judgment. Perhaps it was said in a jocular vein, but there should be no joking about it; the matter is too serious. By speaking that way the gentleman who used such language was killing private initiative in the youth of Canada; and if to-day the youth, although courageous, cannot do as much as they did before, it is because they believe that governments should do everything.

The reason why this country was more prosperous before 1930 than it was afterwards was not so much by reason of the measures that were brought down by the administration that was in office prior to 1930, but by reason of the fact that that government did not interfere with private business, and the youth of the country had every opportunity to earn their own living by themselves. They began at the bottom and worked up gradually until they attained satisfactory positions that enabled them to earn a reasonable livelihood and even to get married and to enjoy the comforts of home. But now who is the young man that can find a job? It is very difficult to find one, and though there is an improvement it will take a long time to restore the old condition completely.

Young men have to learn, too late perhaps, but they have to learn the truth about the matter. They have to learn that we are at rock-bottom and that it is impossible to give every one of them a job, however sad it is to be forced to tell them that their request, which is perfectly legitimate, cannot always be granted. At any rate, the youth of the country must be told the truth; they must be told that they were cruelly deceived five years ago, and that they can no longer believe that the state can do everything for them. Whenever confidence is fully restored in this country, the Canadian people will realize that private initiative on the part of good Canadian citizens at large, good Canadian fathers and mothers, good Canadian boys and girls, can do much more for the welfare of Canada than any government can do, provided that the government of the day understands this elementary truth that it ought never to interfere with private business nor kill private initiative. The youth of the country deserve every praise and everyone is ready to give it. But let us say to every young man and woman, "Do not be discouraged, for better times are coming, provided that in the future horse-sense and common sense are given the place they should have in the government of the country."

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I wish at the outset to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) upon the manner in which he has presented this resolution to the house. His speech was one which I am sure he may recall in later years with great satisfaction.

As one who has a special interest and responsibility in relation to unemployment, I wish also to express my indebtedness to those who have taken part in this discussion, not excepting my very good friend the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). He and I have the same objective in view, though our paths sometimes may slightly diverge.

The general objects set forth in the resolution are not in controversy. Certainly I do not propose to approach the discussion of the resolution in any controversial spirit. There is one observation, however, which I am compelled to make, and which my hon.

friend the member for Greenwood will not contradict. The resolution states that the government should "consider the desirability of investigating the broad question of the reestablishment of the young men and young women of Canada." That is not in dispute; but as I agree with him in that he must agree with me in this, that it would have been desirable that the government should have considered the reestablishment of the young men and young women of Canada during each of the previous five years. I say that because this problem in its very nature is cumulative, and I suggest that its gravity and complexity to-day are due in no small measure to our failure to realize its true proportions in recent years. I think it may be said in connection with this whole problem of unemployment that there is resting upon us now a necessity to reduce it so far as we can to manageable proportions, and that, I believe, means that we must so far as possible divide it into segments. I take it that one of the purposes behind this resolution is to direct attention to some peculiar features in the problem of youth in relation to this larger problem of unemployment, and I think we must all agree that the problem of youth does present certain peculiar features which call for special study and investigation, to be followed in due course by the formulation of special measures to deal with them.

This question of youth and unemployment has received a great deal of attention in other countries. It has also received careful study by a committee of the League of Nations. I was very much interested to observe the recommendations which came from a special committee of the League of Nations upon this question. Among these recommendations were the following:

1. The abolition of child labour.

2. The adoption of compulsory school attendance for primary education where this measure is not yet in force; and, in countries where it exists, the extension of the period of compulsory school attendance (a) by the addition of one or several classes to the primary schools, (b) by supplementary vocational courses, and (c) by the extension of the period of attendance at nursery schools.

3. The systematic transfer of unemployed families to rural areas; that is, internal colonization.

4. The institution of workers' allotments and suburban colonies.

5. Voluntary civic service in labour camps.

6. Voluntary organizations created by the young people themselves.

7. Vocational guidance and employment bureaus.

8. Technical training of a generalized character.

Now if hon. members examine these recommendations one by one it will become apparent that in a country such as this, in order to carry out even a limited number of these recommendations, it is desirable to secure the maximum of cooperation between the dominion and provincial and municipal governments. If one lesson has been brought home clearly as a result of our experience in dealing with this problem of unemployment during the past few years it is this, that unless we are able to find and create a medium through which that cooperation can be secured and continued we shall not be able to deal effectively with the problem of unemployment. This resolution is simply an illustration, I believe, of the imperative necessity of securing that cooperation. Whatever may have been our failures in the past, we are confronted with an existing situation, serious in itself, which demands our united efforts. And it is with this in view that the present administration proposes to set up a national employment commission which is designed to secure that degree of cooperation, not only between governments, but also between governments on the one side and private industry on the other, in order that we may attain a maximum of united effort along the whole front of our economic life.

I may say on behalf of the government that, in connection with this special problem of youth, it will be possible, in setting up a national employment commission, to provide for a special committee which shall investigate those peculiar features of the unemployment problem which relate to youth. I hope that as a result of such an investigation it will be found possible for this government, working in cooperation with other governmental agencies in Canada, to arrange for improved educational facilities and a better correlation of vocational schools and employment services than now exists. I hope too that it may be possible to revive in some degree an apprenticeship system in this country, although that will require also the cooperation of private industry and of labour organizations.

This government and previous governments have frequently received delegations from individual industries or from associations of industries in this dominion, and invariably these industries or associations have presented to the government specific requests which they believe must be granted if they are to carry on their business successfully. I wonder whether the time has not come when in connection with this whole problem of unemployment this government is not entitled to send delegations to industries and to associations of industries and commercial organizations in this country. I wonder whether we are not entitled to do that and to say to them that their active cooperation is vitally necessary if we, with them, are to deal constructively with this problem of unemployment.

One word more. If we are to deal with this problem of unemployment in a realistic way, obviously we must have something more than the bare statistics of how many men are unemployed and how many women are unemployed in Canada. It is of the utmost importance that we should know how many of these men are employable and how many are unemployable, and the same applies to the women who are on our relief lists at the present time. It is also important that we should know as far as possible the age groups and occupational groups of those who are on our relief rolls. I think I am correct when I say that the dominion government has not possessed that information up to the present time. At the recent dominion-provincial conference it was agreed that there should be a reclassification of the unemployed on relief. I wish to assure the house that no time has been lost in making out the requisite forms and in securing the cooperation of provinces and municipalities in order to obtain that information.

May I say this, too: the hon. member for Témiscouata, by his industry and persistence a year ago, laid the foundation for the work we are seeking to carry on now in that direction. No one can question the desirability of securing this information at as early a date as possible; certainly no one who has any acquaintance with the problems confronting social service agencies in Canada can doubt the wisdom of obtaining and analyzing this data. Already some of the returns have come in from the provinces. As soon as it is possible to summarize that information I propose to lay it before this house.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would repeat that the government is fully in sympathy with the reestablishment of the youth of this country and, like any government conscious of its responsibility in relation to unemployment at this time, we will take every possible step to see to it that young men and women are given opportunities within which they may realize their desire for remunerative employment. I do not believe the youth of this dominion expect ready-made jobs, nor do I believe that the solution for unemployed youth lies in public employment. If I did believe that I should have some misgivings for the future of Canada. It is our duty to create conditions within which our Canadian youth may once more, as in other years, find their own opportunities and make the most of them.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. members who have spoken for the kindly attitude they have shown towards this motion, and may I thank all hon. members of this house for the way in which they have listened to and absorbed that which has been said. Particularly may I thank the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for the words he has added to the debate. I am sure that what he has said to-night, not only the language itself but what lies behind that language, the thought, the earnestness and the sincerity of purpose, will bring hope and cheer to many who otherwise are rather hopeless and cheerless. I am sure that the cooperation of which he speaks between the federal and provincial governments can be achieved, and I wish him every success in his effort. Let me assure the minister that any part I can play, as a member of this house, in the accomplishment of his purpose in regard to this great question of youth reestablishment, I stand ready and willing to do.

THREE RIVERS-ST. ANGELE BRIDGE

Mr. LUCIEN DUBOIS (Nicolet-Yamaska) (Translation) moved:

Whereas the city of Three Rivers is the most important centre on the St. Lawrence river, between Quebec and Montreal;

And whereas (a) the said city being an industrial centre largely inhabited by the labouring class is the natural outlet for agricultural products of the region; (b) the farmers of the south shore are interested in that important city being easily accessible to them, both for the selling of their products and the making of purchases; (c) the ferry boat service is not always regular, chiefly in winter season and sometimes in summer months by reason of the very large number of passengers; (d) practical means of communication at all hours of the day would benefit the working-class population of Three Rivers and the farmers of the south shore; (e) from a tourist standpoint the regional highway of St. Angele de Laval via Sherbrooke is the shortest route between Three Rivers and the United States; (f) the construction of a bridge between Three Rivers and St. Angele de Laval would greatly facilitate communications between La Tuque, Grand'Mère, Shawinigan, Cape de la Madeleine, Louiseville, etc., and important centres on the south shore, such as the cities of Nicolet, Victoriaville, Sherbrooke, St. Hyacinthe, etc.; (g) the construction of a bridge would encourage the development of a large number of counties as it would improve transportation facilities and the amount of labour made available in the region; (h) St. Angele de Laval is one of the terminals of the Canadian National Railways on the south shore between Montreal and Quebec;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government should consider the advisability of appointing experts to look into this matter in all its aspects and report as speedily as possible.

Mr. Speaker, more than ever, the time has come for action. I therefore do not wish to speak at length, and quote all sorts of figures, and then prevent the house from passing as soon as possible the resolution which I have the honour to submit for consideration.

The resolution speaks for itself and its conclusion, which is as follows, is in no way embarrassing to the government:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government should consider the advisability of appointing experts to look into this matter in all its aspects and report as speedily as possible.

I trust that the government will view my request with due consideration. I believe it to be a reasonable one and I have nothing further to add for the present.

UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED REVOCATION OF LEGISLATION INSTITUTING AGREEMENT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, chapter 2 of 23-24 George V (1933) should be repealed;

That the trade agreement entered into between representatives of His Majesty's government in Canada and of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, copy of which is set forth in the schedule of the above mentioned act, should be revoked;

And that chapter 13 of 20-21 George V (1930), an act to amend the customs tariff, should be substituted thereto.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, much as I appreciate the compliment contained in the last paragraph of the motion, I think I must call your attention to the fact that this resolution is entirely out of order.

[Mr. Dubois.]

Mr. POULIOT: Then a pious wish is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will reserve my judgment until another day.

Motion stands.

On motion of Mr. Dunning the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, March 10, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF SOURIS

REPORT OF JUDGES DECLARING SITTING MEMBER DULY ELECTED

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from the Honourable Mr. Justice Prendergast and the Honourable Mr. Justice Richards, two of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, a report relating to the election for the electoral district of Souris, by which the sitting member was declared duly elected.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER MONDAY, MARCH 16

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday the 16th of March next to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, while I realize that Canada is not a signatory to the Locarno pact, in view of the critical situation which has developed in Europe, and especially in view of the statement made by Mr. J. H. Thomas, I should like to ask whether Canada, either as a member of the League of Nations or as part of the British empire, is committed either directly or indirectly to any defence policy.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend concludes his question with the words, "any defence policy." Does he mean any defence policy with respect to Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Empire defence policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rather imagined that some hon. member would ask a question with respect to what appeared in the press this morning as having been the answers made yesterday in the British House of Commons by the Right Honourable Mr. Thomas, Secretary for the Colonies, to certain questions asked of the ministry. Perhaps I had better anticipate possible further questions in connection with that press dispatch by making clear exactly what was said by Mr. Thomas: also what the position is with respect to Canada's attitude on the matters referred to by my hon. friend.

I received this morning from Canada's high commissioner the text of the exact words used by Mr. Thomas in replying to the questions asked him yesterday on dominion co-operation and policy arising out of the white paper on defence. The text is as follows:

The first and most important (question asked) was with regard to position of dominions and colonies. When, at the jubilee celebration last year, the whole of the dominion premiers were in England, the government took the opportunity of consulting them frankly and freely on the situation. They explained to the whole of the dominions the defence position, since which full contents of white paper had been communicated to them, and without a solitary exception every dominion not only acquiesced but felt that this was a policy that ought to be supported.

As far as collective security is concerned, the whole of the dominions are members of the League of Nations. They have given their support to the league. They are parties to every step taken by the government and, in addition, a number of them are taking steps for their own internal defence.

It will be observed that Mr. Thomas' answer deals with two distinct matters, first, with what transpired in London at the time of the jubilee celebration last year, and, second, with reference to Canada's position as a member of the League of Nations in respect of present day questions. With regard to the first let me read again what Mr. Thomas said:

When, at the jubilee celebration last year, the whole of the dominion premiers were in England, the government took the opportunity of consulting them frankly and freely on the situation. They explained to the whole of the dominions the defence position, since which full contents of white paper had been communicated to them, and without a solitary exception every dominion not only acquiesced but felt that this was a policy that ought to be supported.

There is a reference there to the contents of a white paper having been communicated to the dominions. Let me clear up a possible confusion that may arise in that connection. There has been issued within the last fortnight a white paper dealing with the British government's defence policy, but that is not the white paper to which reference is made here. As far as I am able to gather from the context, the white paper to which reference is made is a white paper that was tabled in the British House of Commons during the month of March of last year, just a year ago. I have a copy of it in my hand. It is entitled "a statement relating to defence"; it was issued in connection with the House of Commons debate in England on March 11, 1935. This white paper was communicated to the Canadian government on March 18, 1935.

In regard to actual or possible commitments of Canada at the conference at the time of the jubilee celebrations, hon. members will recall that when my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) returned from England I asked him, I think, on the first day he was in the house after his return, whether any commitments had been made by the Canadian government through him or through other ministers at the time of the celebration, and in reply thereto my right hon. friend made a statement which appears in Hansard of May 20, 1935. The statement is quite explicit and will I think answer any question that may arise with respect to the first part of Mr. Thomas's statement:

Mr. Bennett: I am grateful for having had the opportunity to represent this country at the recent jubilee celebration, about which I shall make some further observations at another time. To the other matters referred to by the right hon. leader of the opposition, in connection with the discussions that took place in Great Britain between the prime ministers of the various overseas dominions and the Prime Minister and ministers of the motherland, I shall also refer later. It is sufficient for my purpose to say to this house this afternoon that the European situation is one of great difficulty, and at times it gives evidence of being very dangerous. But I am hopeful that the efforts which have been made during all these years by the government of the United Kingdom to secure, shall I say, a collective security pact and peace with disarmament, may prevail. Great Britain has disarmed to the point of insecurity; at this moment she finds herself in a position of very great difficulty. I think that is not too strong a statement to make in view of the knowledge we have all obtained from the press as well as from other sources. At this moment I shall not do more than say that I think it very desirable that I should at once make it clear that so far as this dominion is concerned no commitments were sought with respect to the matters to which reference has been made, nor were any given. I say that because it is desirable that there should be no false conceptions and no misstatements or misunderstandings abroad with respect to matters of such importance to us all.

I might use, Mr. Speaker, exactly the same words with reference to any communications which the present government has had with the British government with respect to defence matters. A summary of the white paper which was recently laid on the table of the House of Commons at Westminster, describing the proposal of the government of the United Kingdom for the strengthening of its defence forces and the reorganization of the committee of imperial defence was communicated to us. The summary reached us at the same time that a full statement appeared in the press of the contents of the white paper. But we were not asked our opinion of the white paper, nor were we asked to give any approval of it or any commitment with regard to it. I shall quote the words of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and apply them as my reply to the representations of that part of the statement which might seem to refer to recent correspondence: "I cannot make it too clear that so far as this dominion is concerned no commitments were sought with respect to the matters to which reference has been made, nor were any given."

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who has just asked the question, addressed to me on the 10th of February last, a question in the following words:

> May I ask the Prime Minister what commitments, if any, have been made by Canada with regard to imperial defence?

To which I replied:

> I would have to have a conference with my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) before I could answer my hon. friend. I am not aware of any commitments, myself, at the moment.

Then on the 12th of February, two days later, I replied further, quoting my hon. friend's question and my previous answer, and added:

> I now give my hon. friend the answer, having taken up the matter with the Minister of National Defence:
> While declarations on behalf of Canada on the subject of the defence of Canada have been made at various imperial conferences, as may be seen from the results thereof published from time to time, I am not aware of any commitments made on behalf of Canada with regard to imperial defence. At such conferences it has been expressly recognized that it is for the parliaments of the several parts of the British commonwealth of nations, upon the recommendation of their respective governments, to decide upon their course.

I would say that my answer would be the same to-day. There are no commitments made that I am aware of or that the government is aware of on the part of Canada with regard to imperial defence.

As to the part of Mr. Thomas' question which refers to the League of Nations, may I read again what was said there:

> As far as collective security is concerned, the whole of the dominions are members of the League of Nations. They have given their support to the league.

No exception can be taken to that part. The last sentence reads as follows:

> They are parties to every step taken by the government and, in addition, a number of them are taking steps for their own internal defence.

I wish to say that so far as the government of Canada is concerned, as a member of the league we are responsible and take responsibility for only those steps which we have taken by ourselves and on our own behalf. What we have done we have done on our own, as a member of the league. What these steps have been was fully given to the house in the papers which were communicated to parliament in the form of a white paper only a few days ago.

As to the Locarno treaty and obligations arising under it, I might quote the following, which is article 9 of the Locarno treaty, signed on October 16, 1925:

> The present treaty shall impose no obligation upon any of the British dominions, or upon India, unless the government of such dominion, or of India, signifies its acceptance thereof.

A Liberal administration was in office at the time the Locarno treaty was under consideration and we took the position then that we had not participated in any conference with respect to Locarno and that we did not think we should be asked to sign the agreement. We allowed the final decision to stand over until after the imperial conference of 1926. The matter was discussed at the conference and Canada's position was made quite clear at the conference, that we were not prepared to sign the treaty, and that we recognized no obligations under it whatsoever. That expression of Canada's position was communicated to parliament at its next session here. There can be no question that as respects the Locarno treaty there is no commitment or obligation upon Canada through the action of its government.

I should add that we have made clear at various conferences that any action in the nature of military obligations of any sort would be entered into by the government of the day only after such had been recommended to parliament by the government and approved by parliament itself.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I think there was one statement made by the right hon. gentleman that possibly should be modified. He said with respect to the League of Nations that we were bound only by such action as we had taken. We are also bound, of course, by action that may be taken by the league of which we are a member, although we may not at the moment agree with what has been done, if it is done by the majority or by the requisite number as provided for by the covenant. That, of course, is the essence of it. I think it should be made abundantly clear that, although we may not ourselves be taking the action, if action were taken by the league as such or by a committee of the league as such, we would be bound by that action, although we might not personally agree with the action taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend will look at my remarks, he will see that what I said had specific reference to Locarno. I did not attempt to discuss our obligations to the league generally. We have our obligations under the covenant. I think we have recognized all of them, and will be prepared to consider each new obligation as it arises, in the light of the circumstances which may then be prevailing.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if the government will be represented at the annual convention of cities and towns and harbours of the great lakes in reference to the St. Lawrence waterway; also whether he will be shortly in a position to inform the house if there are any negotiations going on between the two countries for the seaway, so that when the depression is over there will be a basis of agreement.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): The government will not be represented at the meeting. We have had no notice of such a meeting other than that given by the hon. member in the notice of question he sent across a few minutes ago; and beyond that, so far as we are aware the meeting is entirely unofficial. In reply to the second question, I may say that I know of no communication of recent date between Canada and the United States in the matter of the St. Lawrence waterway.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed from Friday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 15th day of November, 1935, between His Majesty's government in the Dominion of Canada and the government of the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned Friday night I had just finished citing two opinions on this treaty, the one, as to how it might affect the United Kingdom agreement; the other, that of President Roosevelt as to how it would benefit the primary producers of the United States of America to get an entry into our Canadian market. Many opinions could be cited with respect to how it will affect our industry in Canada. However, I have not time in the few minutes at my disposal to do this; I prefer to take the considered opinion and the first hand knowledge of hon. members who have already spoken, particularly from this corner of the house, as to how the agreement may affect industry in their particular constituencies. If it operates as they believe it will, I am fearful that if industry is ruined in the east it will affect us very considerably in the west. From the experience of the past five years we know how closely the east and the west are bound together and we appreciate how interdependent they are.

When the agreement goes to committee we shall likely get some detailed information. I regret that so far the speeches from the government side have not given us much detailed information with respect to how it will affect us in many particulars. In that connection I might just mention the speech made by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell). This venerable gentleman usually takes his full quota of time, speaking especially to questions affecting agriculture; he is considered an authority on agriculture because of the experience he has had, and we expected something from him. But he took only twelve minutes in speaking on this important treaty, giving us a jocular tirade against protective tariffs. Then we had the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young); he took his time in giving us a dissertation on the tariff, but he did not refer to one single item of this agreement by which the producers in his constituency would be benefited. Then we had the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). We were watching and waiting for him to say something, because his department has to do with trade, and in some particulars this agreement is really a budget, as it deals with so many changes in the tariff. We expected from him some details as to how it would benefit the trade of Canada, but what did we have? We had thirty minutes of an attack on the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) which wound up in a dramatic conclusion, so to speak, that fell as flat on the ears of his followers as it did on the ears of those on this side. Certainly we had nothing from him.

I am going to make one comment by way of reply with reference to the speech of the Minister of Finance. It will be very brief. It is to this effect: It is true that many of the things in the treaty were based on the memorandum submitted in November, 1934, but to say that the agreement signed was in its terms the same as the leader of the opposition tried to get, just because both were based on the same memorandum, is not according to fact, is certainly incorrect, and grossly unfair. I think that is a fair statement.

In the minute or two that is left I desire to make a few observations with respect to the advantages and disadvantages of the agreement as I have tried to set them out. First let me refer to the advantages. I admit that the outlet for a limited number of cattle is a distinct advantage, but here, Mr. Speaker, may I remind you that we should take into account the fact that a considerable part of the quota was crossing the boundary before this trade treaty came into effect, and also the fact that the prices in the United States for cattle have decreased considerably. Second, there is a slight reduction in the price of automobiles. On the class and kind that the farmer has to purchase, the Chevrolet and the Ford, it amounts to fifteen and in some cases to twenty dollars. But it is probable that we should have got those decreases in any case. Then there is some assistance to the lumber interests in British Columbia. We will admit that there is certainly some benefit to lumber. Those are the three advantages.

Now, as to the disadvantages, there has been a sharp increase in the price of farm implements. It may or may not be the result of this treaty, but the fact is there, and I would just remind the house that every time there has been a reduction in the duty on agricultural implements there has been an increase in price. Certainly the reduction in the duty on United States pork coming into Canada from five cents to $1\frac{3}{4}$ cents is a distinct threat to the hog industry in Canada. The increased price of lumber as a result of this treaty is already in force in Saskatchewan—an increase of $2 per thousand feet. It is a distinct hardship on the farmers of that province, as lumber is their chief available material for building.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): May I ask a question at this point? Does not that increase in the price of lumber, if there is an increase, improve the condition of the lumber workers of Saskatchewan?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The amount of lumber produced in the northern part of Saskatchewan is very limited. It might help the workers a little, and as I have said, it is an advantage to the lumber industry of British Columbia. But to a hundred thousand farmers in Saskatchewan who have to buy lumber it is certainly a disadvantage, and we are looking at this thing from the broader standpoint.

This treaty is dangerous because it imperils the whole structure underlying the United Kingdom trade agreement. Great Britain is now buying our primary products, the flow that was turned back into Canada following the Hawley-Smoot tariff. In the United Kingdom we have a market of one-quarter of the world's population. There is also the danger of an adverse trade balance being created. I am not going to take time to discuss that, but we know it is a dangerous situation. Just here I might state that according to the trade returns for the month of January, the first month during which this treaty was in operation, there was a reduction of $400,000 in the sale of our farm products to the United States. That is something to keep in mind.

I understand that the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) is going to follow me; he said so last night, as some hon. members may remember. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman to point out to this house one particular in which this treaty helps the farmers of his constituency or of the province of Saskatchewan to sell one bushel of wheat or other grains, one pound of dairy products, one hog or one pound of pork products; and the hon. gentleman might also explain the increase in the price of agricultural implements. There is also the danger that we may lose our home market, which consumes ninety-five per cent of our primary products other than wheat. I happen to be a member of the committee considering the election and franchise act. A proposal was made before that committee the other day that each elector in Canada should have two votes, one for the party and one for the member. If I had three votes on this occasion I might cast one in favour of the treaty because of its advantages, but I would cast two against it because of its disadvantages.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I am not concerned with what Macdonald or Laurier did, nor am I concerned with what Bennett or King did. I am not concerned with the past; I am concerned with the present, and in connection with this agreement I am concerned as to what it will mean in the future to Canadian industry, Canadian agriculture and Canadian labour. I do not think we have had sufficient information from the government benches to vote intelligently on this treaty, and certainly no good reasons have been advanced as to why we should vote for it. Therefore I consider it my duty, representing an agricultural constituency in the great agricultural province of Saskatchewan, to vote against the agreement as it stands at the present time.

Mr. D. A. CAMERON (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am not the hon. member for Moose Jaw, though I happen to follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I am not familiar with what is of immediate concern to the constituency of Moose Jaw, but for a few moments I should like to state some of the reasons why I find it my duty to support this resolution. I should like to preface my remarks with the statement that I do not think I would serve any useful purpose by going over the various items in the schedules in detail. That has been done splendidly by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) from the point of view of the government, and I am free to say that from the point of view of those opposing the treaty the presentation made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) left nothing to be desired. I listened with a great deal of interest and attention to the speeches of both right hon. gentlemen as they expounded their different points of view with regard to this treaty. I propose to refrain from entering into any detailed discussion of the items for another reason which is abundantly clear; that is, we will have ample opportunity to present our views as each item is being considered in committee. I am therefore going to content myself with offering a very few general observations.

First, Mr. Speaker, I propose to deal for a few moments with two or three of what appear to me to be the outstanding criticisms of the agreement that has been submitted. The first point which strikes one is that much of the criticism of this agreement was directed to the fact that apparently it was consummated in too short a time and on an occasion when, according to the public press, the Prime Minister was taking an extended holiday after his strenuous work during the campaign preceding the election which took place October 14. Well, Mr. Speaker, far from that being a reasonable criticism of this trade agreement, which in my opinion holds such splendid potentialities, carrying advantages to this country which are bound to tell on the general trade and industry of Canada, I regard it as a splendid act on the part of the Prime Minister that he should take the time, so soon after coming to office, to consummate an agreement the negotiations for which had been begun by the late government.

The second criticism was that he completed the negotiations leading up to the agreement not only during a holiday season but in such a rapid fashion that it was impossible to give the various details of the agreement that consideration they should have received. If the Prime Minister had come to the consideration of this agreement as a new man, without previous knowledge of trade conditions in this country, I could understand there might be some considerable force in a criticism of that kind. But surely those who make it fail to realize that the Prime Minister has given his whole life to the study of international questions, trade matters, and particularly trade questions as they affect the welfare of Canada. It was not any new venture for the Prime Minister to take up the negotiations for this agreement as he found them on entering the office. It was a matter with which his study and experience had made him familiar; he had held the office of prime minister before, and had first hand knowledge of the probable effect of an agreement of this kind upon the trade of this country as well as upon our relations with other parts of the empire.

Another criticism made from this side of the house, particularly I think by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), was that the agreement is likely, in fact he practically went as far as to say it is almost certain, to affect injuriously the traffic on our great railway systems. The hon. member said that our railway systems were built for east and west traffic, and that if this agreement is ratified it is bound in its ultimate results to develop north and south railway traffic to the injury of our railways. My answer to that criticism is that if the agreement now under consideration will result in injury to our railway traffic, the agreement contemplated by the late government would be bound to have the very same effect. In fact, if we believe the criticisms from this side, it would have a still more injurious effect upon the railway traffic of this country. But I am not fearful of any such result. In my judgment the lowering of trade barriers between the two countries will in the end prove so beneficial to the general trade of the country that instead of our railways suffering through the consummation of this agreement they will be materially benefited. I am not afraid to venture that prophecy.

A third criticism, in which I am bound to admit there is some force, is that this agreement should have included in its scope certain fish products which unfortunately are not in the schedule. Coming from a county where fishing is a very large industry I am bound to say I regret that the Prime Minister was unable to secure the inclusion on proper terms in that agreement of the various grades and classes of fish. But as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has pointed out, in negotiating an agreement certain fundamental principles must be kept in mind, and if in order to include fish it would have been necessary to give concessions on something else the result of which concessions would have been injurious to this country, then I am bound to say that the Prime Minister exercised good judgment and good statesmanship in not making such concessions in connection with another industry in order that fish might be included. This is a country for which the formulation of generally acceptable trade policies is difficult, on account of our geographical position and climatic conditions. A general policy which in its essence may be beneficial to the whole country may in specific instances work a hardship on some localities or individuals. The best any person charged with the responsibilities of office can do is to make an honest attempt to accomplish a general agreement which, taken by and large, or, to use the expression used by the leader of the opposition the other day, "on balance," will mean the greatest good to the Canadian people as a whole. Notwithstanding the pessimistic outlook of the leader of the opposition, I believe that on balance this agreement is bound to work in the general interest of the majority of people of this dominion.

The other day the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), speaking to this resolution, was particularly critical because the agreement does not include fish. But if the inclusion of fish involved increased competition of American coal, then coming as I do from a constituency in which the coal trade is a very important factor, I commend the Prime Minister on the fact that under this agreement our coal industry will not be subjected to such increased competition in the Canadian market. In this connection I point out that in the conclusion of any agreement it is impossible for the wisest statesman to foresee all the results at the time it is entered into. There is a peculiar situation developing at the present time in connection with coal in what we call the St. Lawrence market, the Quebec market. I think it may be reasonably said that it is a direct result of the Ottawa agreements, and that the product of the Nova Scotia mines is at this time being subjected to keen competition from coal produced under peculiar circumstances in the British Isles. British coal is entering Canada under circumstances approaching those which would justify the imposition of dumping duties, and I am informed on reliable authority that it is competing with Nova Scotia coal to such an extent that it is likely in the present year to displace from 400,000 to 500,000 tons. I am sure those who represented Canada in the negotiation of the Ottawa agreements never anticipated any such result. However, that is the result facing the coal trade in eastern Canada.

Last Thursday evening the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) spoke as though the provisions respecting swordfish were a matter of minor concern. Well, it is true that the trade is not very great, but I suggest it is worthy of consideration. The provisions respecting this commodity represent a concession to Canadian fishermen which will mean something in dollars and cents. The trade is growing. Fifteen or twenty years ago along the coast of my constituency the taking of a swordfish was considered an event, but now a substantial fleet of fishermen is engaged in this pursuit for a month or five weeks each year. According to the bureau of statistics, last year we exported 14,780 hundredweight of swordfish to the United States, at a market price of $154,421. The saving on that item alone will mean a distribution of about $8,000 among the fishermen along the coast of Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia. This may be a small item, but it represents a substantially greater amount of money to be distributed among men engaged in a somewhat hazardous occupation.

I have noticed a considerable amount of ill advised propaganda against the trade agreement. No doubt some of it is done through ignorance, but some of it, I am afraid, is through design. In certain journals published in the maritime provinces the statement appeared last week that as a result of the trade treaty we would lose our trade with Bermuda. That was the statement which appeared in the Truro News of March 7. I am not in a position to say whether there is any basis for that statement or not, but it is an interesting fact, that, according to the bureau of statistics, in January, 1935, no potatoes were imported into Canada from Bermuda, whereas 658 hundredweight were imported in January, 1936. Apparently the propagandist of the Truro News is so anxious to score a point against the treaty that he has neglected to take the elementary precaution of ascertaining whether the situation in Bermuda was induced as a result of the trade agreement or as a result of conditions over which no government has any control. Possibly the extracts read by the hon. member for Royal from journals published in New Brunswick have just as little foundation in fact as that published in the Truro News. At all events they appear to be of a similar class and were no doubt designed for similar purposes. I am paying some attention to the observations of the hon. member for Royal, because he undertook to speak for the maritime provinces. That may be a large order, but the fact remains that he attempted to do it. Perhaps his undertaking was forced upon him by circumstances over which he had no control.

The hon. member suggested that the treaty did not benefit the lumber trade of the maritime provinces, but he admitted it was beneficial to the trade in British Columbia. Hon. members know that British Columbia is a better lumber producing country than any part of the maritimes, and we know that competition from British Columbia is felt in the markets of the old country. The United Kingdom has always offered a market to the lumber dealers of the maritime provinces. To the extent that the opening of the market in the United States will form a nucleus of a market for the products of British Columbia, to that extent will it ease the pressure on the market in Great Britain, thereby making it easier for lumber produced in the maritimes to hold its own in that market. Indirectly, if not directly, the trade agreement will be a considerable benefit to the lumber producers of the maritime provinces.

In my opening observations I indicated that I was not going to speak at length. I take the position that every move on the part of the government to remove shackles from trade is a move in the right direction. I am not speaking in a disparaging way about tariffs; rather I am associating myself with leading bankers and economists when I say that to the extent that we wisely, with prudence and with care remove shackles from trade, to that extent we are making it possible for Canadian producers and consumers to prosper in their respective callings.

I accept the doctrine propounded by Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, who stated here in 1932:

> What then should be the first aim of this conference? It should be to clear out the channels of trade among ourselves. For that purpose we need not measure too closely or too exactly the relative value of preferences given and received.

If we never negotiated a treaty unless we were able to say that the advantages were all on our side, that we had the best of the bargain all through, then we would never negotiate a treaty at all. I am not impressed with the quotations which have been made by certain hon. members from the remarks of Mr. Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State of the United States, and others in that country, who are in favour of this agreement. If we listened to what the former president, Mr. Hoover, and those associated with him, have to say, we would be convinced that Canada was receiving everything without giving anything in return. Those of us on this side of the line who support the agreement undertake to point out its benefits, while those who oppose it undertake to criticize it. In the latter case they base their arguments upon the fact that those in the United States who are in favour of the agreement point out the benefits accruing to the United States. Each critic is just taking a one-sided view of the agreement, but I prefer to look at it from the broad standpoint. I realize that we could never get an agreement without making some concessions.

I hold to the view that an expansion of trade will solve to a large extent the many difficulties with which we are confronted today. I do not believe we will get out of this depression or be able to take care of our unemployment by raising our trade barriers and confining our trade within ourselves. I believe that the opening up of new trade avenues will go a long way towards solving the unemployment problem. I listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). He gave to the house a picture of the terrible condition in which the youth of the country find themselves. He claimed that the youth of the country were not given an opportunity to learn how to work, and in many cases were not given an opportunity to work at all. I am not one of those who believe that trade alone will solve all our problems, but I believe that to the extent to which we open up avenues of adventure and new lanes of trade, so will we make it easier for new industries to open up and for agriculture to expand. In this way avenues of employment will be made available to the class to which my hon. friend referred.

I commend most heartily the courage of the Prime Minister in dealing with this problem as soon as the opportunity was afforded. I should like to close by quoting the words said of one of Scotland's heroes:

> He either fears his fate too much,
> Or his deserts are small,
> That dares not put it to the touch
> To gain or lose it all.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention this afternoon to enlarge to any extent upon the many presentations that have been made in connection with this trade agreement. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments that have been presented by both sides of the house. I listened to the presentation of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and also that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). We have been told by those on the government side that the negotiating of this agreement has been a marvellous achievement, and we have been told also that the agreement had its origin in the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). The leader of the opposition is given a certain qualified credit for having brought about this agreement. It has been said that the discussions he had with officials of the United States had considerable to do with the perfecting of the treaty, and he is given that much credit. However, in the next breath he is twitted with the fact that he was not able to bring the agreement to its final stages, that it required the ability of the present government to make this agreement an actual reality. As I say, all this has been very interesting to listen to.

It has been intimated by the Prime Minister that the agreement might not be all that was desired, that there are certain doubtful phases. I am entirely in accord with the statement with reference to the doubtful character of this agreement. The Prime Minister says that the agreement will assist our railroads and increase our purchasing power. He says it will bring us out of the depression in which we have been for a number of years. I believe this is the gist of what has been said by the right hon. gentleman and what is recorded in Hansard. I noted that the right hon. gentleman did not go back very far in tracing the causes of the depression; he did not go back to 1929 when he had so much to do with it. Hardly any reference at all has been made to all the warnings that were given by the right hon. leader of the opposition before 1929. They are all recorded in Hansard and have been rehashed over and over again in the daily press, so there is no necessity for my repeating them here; nevertheless they are facts which we should all do well to bear in mind.

The Minister of Finance, in approving the agreement, pointed out that if it requires correction in any particular the government can apply the remedial measures which are necessary. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that he admits there is a possibility of that, because I say to hon. gentlemen in this house who represent constituencies similar to mine that if I do not miss my guess there will be many remedial measures required to make this agreement effective. But I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite have been assured by the government that these remedial measures actually will be applied. Personally I have heard no such assurance up to the present time. The only thing I have heard in that respect was the rather evasive comment of the Minister of Finance that remedial measures were a possibility.

We have listened to some very able presentations of arguments against this agreement by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. I might mention the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), and many others. They have dealt with the interests of the basic and secondary industries of this country and have pointed to many considerations which I think the government would do well to ponder seriously. I know that the case which they have presented has made a very definite impression on my own mind. Are hon. gentlemen opposite turning a deaf ear to all the presentations from this side of the house, or are they seriously considering them? I wonder if they think that all the brains of the house are confined to one little group sitting on the other side.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOCKHART: That "hear, hear" is typical of the kind of criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite. But surely they must admit that men who have had long experience in government, and are just as conscientious as they are, are qualified to pass fair and constructive criticism on a measure of this importance.

We have been told that the leader of the opposition should receive a great deal of credit for his part in negotiating this agreement, but hon. gentlemen opposite say that he could not conduct the negotiations to the point of signing the agreement. I think the leader of the opposition has sufficiently well established his own position with respect to the agreement, and surely any intelligent member of this house will appreciate the explanation the right hon. gentleman has given of his part in those negotiations. And surely if we want to look at the matter in an unbiased way, what the leader of the opposition has said should have some weight when we are attempting to come to a conclusion.

To me as a new member of the house the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite seems to have been one of cheering and gloating over the fact that this government has been able to consummate this agreement. Their attitude is: You fellows over there had your chance—why didn't you make an agreement? From the benches opposite we have received very little comment that has been constructive, beyond the presentation of the Prime Minister and the evasive remarks of the Minister of Finance.

I come from the Niagara peninsula, which is of fairly good repute, I think, throughout this dominion, and I wonder how hon. members of this house who represent other fertile districts in this country have been viewing the lack of constructive suggestions from their own side. Think of those vast fertile tracts from the Niagara peninsula to Windsor, and then, north of that, of those vast areas in the St. Lawrence valley, the richest in the world, producing fruits and vegetables, and of those sections of British Columbia which are likely to be affected by this agreement. Do hon. gentlemen representing these districts want Canada to return to the conditions of 1929, to the conditions that prevailed from 1926 to 1930, as I recall them most vividly? Do my hon. friends who are interested in these rich tracts of country recall the flow of trucks back and forth across the border, bringing in the surplus crops of American fruits and vegetables to be disposed of in Ontario and other parts of this dominion? I wonder if they recall that the canning companies were compelled by the competition of American canners to resort to importing a portion of their requirements, and then their pack, much of it, probably went over to the homeland. I shall not read into Hansard figures from the bureau of statistics showing how these importations were reduced in the years from 1930 to 1935 when we had a Conservative government in power in this country. We have all had an opportunity to digest those figures and discuss them on the public platform and in private, and it is hardly necessary for me to repeat them here. I wonder if hon. gentlemen recall, as I do, the truck loads of surplus American produce coming into our own home market, as I saw them come into the St. Catharines market, and selling at a price with which no producer in Ontario could begin to compete. I have experienced those things, and I know something about them. The late government took steps to protect this particular industry—your industry and mine. It constitutes one of the greatest basic industries of this country. I recall that when the canning factories were assisted by the late government in respect to importations, imports of canned goods, which had been coming into Canada in thousands of cases, were reduced by seventy-five per cent. The statistical reports will prove that. A feeling of security was built up among the fruit and vegetable interests from 1930 to 1935. I know of one very large producer who spent a small fortune—and this point applies to Peel and other counties that have been referred to on the floor of this house—in building greenhouses in which to produce commodities for the households of this country, such as lettuce, early cabbage, and similar products which tend to foster our home markets. I recall that he was frightened almost beyond description when he was told by owners of trucks that came down from Guelph and Galt and Hamilton: "We may as well go a little farther east where we will get our produce for half the price that we can buy it from you." He replied, "I cannot produce it for any less, with all the costs of production here." They started to carry out their threat, and I well remember how the late government saw to it that that situation was relieved.

Nor have I forgotten all the invested capital and the immense amount of labour that is taken care of through that investment. I know of one place where over forty persons are working. It is one of the largest greenhouses in the country, growing plants for other growers and for the owner's use. I saw in 1931 cabbage being brought over wholesale from the United States, to the detriment of home production, but the late government saw fit to stop that kind of thing by applying the necessary restrictions. Are hon. members across the house satisfied with this new situation? While there may be provision for remedial measures, are they satisfied, in the light of experience prior to 1930, that those measures are going to be applied by the present government? If they are, I am not. We have no indication, no assurance to that effect.

Mr. WARD: Will the hon. member permit a question? Would he support a measure that would bonus all agriculture?

Mr. LOCKHART: No, I would not. May I refer to a personal experience last year? Hearing that there was a considerable crop in New York state, I visited that state, and I found that tons and tons of fruit and vegetables were being offered along the highways. I inquired as to the prices; they were 25 to 50 cents per hamper for the best peaches, and all kinds of fruit and vegetables of the first quality were being offered at proportionately low prices. I asked as to the reason, and they said that the major portion of their stock of produce had been consumed and this was more or less their surplus. The storage companies had refused to accept any more deliveries; the canning factories had said that they wanted no more produce of any kind. The highways were banked with this surplus produce, right in the midst of the harvesting of our own luscious crop in Ontario and other parts of Canada. I spoke to grower after grower and asked why they did not engage trucks and take it across to this steady, stable Canadian market as they had done for the previous four or five years. They shook their heads and said: "There is no chance of any such opportunity now as we had a few years ago. The present government of Canada sees to it that the home producer is protected." I wonder how many hon. members of this house can recall such conditions as I have related. Are all my hon. friends sure, I say, that the provisions of the law are to be put into effect and that we shall again be faced with these unfortunate conditions?

Let us go forward to June, July and August of this year, when our harvesting is in progress. Hon. members have been very silent on this point. I am wondering what alibi they will have when they go back this year to their constituents for their silence in this house if we are to be given no more assurance and no more definite statements of full protection in this respect than have already been forthcoming.

Mr. WOOD: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. In spite of all he says about the protection provided in Lincoln county—and I know something about it—is he prepared to say that the producer has enjoyed better prices in consequence of the policy of his party in the last five years? Has he disposed of his surplus? Was there no surplus at that time?

Mr. LOCKHART: The producers have had better prices in the last four or five years than they had prior to 1930. That is my answer to the question, and I can prove it. There are a great many implications in the terms of this agreement. What happens if our basic industries fail in any measure? The purchasing power of the producer is affected. The products of our secondary industries remain unsold. Unemployment follows. Then we have increased relief, and the urban centres come into the picture, where, we are told, fifty-two per cent of the population reside. Back come the authorities in the provinces and the mayors of the cities and towns to the doorstep of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, wanting increased assistance to take care of the increasing population in the urban centres.

An hon. MEMBER: They did during the last government.

Mr. LOCKHART: Why should they not? Of course. A large percentage have gone into the urban centres. That is the result when we break down the possibility of increasing our basic production and maintaining fair prices. My stand is going to be to protect our home markets as the late government did.

Then let us go further and foster these favoured relations through our empire trade agreements. I seem to recall that those agreements were strenuously opposed by about ninety-nine per cent of the then opposition, who are now the government. I wonder if they will now say that they were justified in that opposition. We must all think seriously on these matters.

There is another reference I desire to make before concluding. We have spent days in this house discussing the over-production of wheat and the multiplicity of ways by which we hope to dispose of that oversupply. I should like to refer to another basic industry, which will also develop into a secondary industry and which will be wiped out by the terms of this agreement. I should like hon. members from around Montreal, Chatham, Stratford and vicinity to pay particular attention to what I have to say. A few years ago an industry was started at Chatham on a very small scale; I refer to the processing of the soya bean. That factory met with certain financial difficulties brought about by reasons which I need not mention, but we will say it suffered from mismanagement. Recently new factories sprang up at Montreal and Stratford. The Montreal plant is capable of processing 200,000 bushels per year. So far I have not been able to get definite information as to what the Stratford plant can process, but I imagine it will be at least half that amount. In addition we have the parent plant at Chatham, which is being rehabilitated and which I believe will be able to process a reasonable amount of soya beans. This industry was fostered by the late government. Up to the present time, that is up until last year, only about 100,000 bushels of soya beans were produced in Canada. I am informed that the minimum average yield is about twenty bushels to the acre, and I am also informed on very good authority that the price is about $1.10 per bushel at Montreal.

The soya bean is very high in protein content, and from it is made a very valuable feed cake. An oil is also obtained which is being used extensively in the manufacture of soap and high grade paints. These are all commodities that are used to a great extent in this country. While on the train returning from Toronto Sunday evening I happened to encounter quite by chance a man who is very closely connected with the soya bean industry in the United States. He informed me that there are tens of thousands of acres of these beans being grown in the United States, and their high oil content is becoming recognized as one of great value. He informed me that the Ford Motor Company was using the soya bean oil almost exclusively in the manufacture of its high grade paints and that the soya bean industry had become so important that only last week the Chicago exchange had been asked to include daily market quotations on the soya bean and its by-products. I believe the soya bean has developed into an important competitor in the salted peanut market. It is a peculiar thing, but when I returned to Ottawa I encountered a government official in the Department of Agriculture, who told me that only the week before he had been given the opportunity of tasting a sample of soya beans passed through a gun, just as puffed wheat is manufactured. He had tasted a sample of beans that had gone through this new process, which I understand has been developed by a man living in the province of Ontario, and he gave it as his honest conviction that the product was far superior to any salted peanut he had ever tasted.

I mention these facts in order to show the possibilities of the soya bean industry. Here is an opportunity to build up a new basic industry which undoubtedly will develop into an important secondary industry as well, but what do we find under the trade agreement? Soya beans are placed on the free list and our market is opened to the competition of the tens of thousands of bushels produced annually in the United States. In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, I ask, is this encouraging a young Canadian industry, both basic and secondary. Is this going to help employment at Montreal or Stratford or Chatham? Is this going to bring about another invasion of the Canadian labour market? Is it going to help increase the tonnage of our railways? I wonder if the hon. members from those areas have overlooked the fact that soya beans are on the free list. I hope the government will see that these conditions are remedied, but from what took place prior to 1929 I again have little hope.

This agreement, as it has been executed, contains many implications, Mr. Speaker. I have given a good deal of thought to these questions as they concern furniture, cut flowers, fruit and vegetables, lumbering, beef, hogs, and so on, together with the quotas that have been established, and I cannot see anything equitable or nearly equitable in the agreement. I am opposed to sacrificing the recovery of Canada as during the last two or three years and which we enjoyed under the late government. I will stake my all on the preservation of our home markets, the protection of our basic and secondary industries and the further increase of our trade by continued empire trade agreements. Canada has unlimited natural resources, which must not be exploited by any nation that will not trade with us on an equitable basis.

Mr. J. J. DUFFUS (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention, nor do I consider it at all necessary for me in this my maiden speech to take any appreciable amount of the valuable time of the House of Commons in further support of this trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America. I shall endeavour to refrain from giving long lists of figures, averages, percentages, quotas, per capitas, and the like. We have heard these reiterated in this chamber time and again until I question whether any hon. member can recall them, with the exception perhaps of the hon. members who so ably placed them on Hansard. I am convinced that every hon. member of this house has long since come to a decision as to how he or she will vote on this important trade agreement. I think it is well, however, that the house and the country should know how the agreement is being supported by comment as well as by the recorded votes of the members; therefore I commend most heartily the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for his expressed wish that every hon. member be given the opportunity to state his or her views with regard to its details. This democratic suggestion is characteristic of the statesman who now enjoys the unique honour of being the first prime minister of Canada to hold that office for the third time. May I at this time publicly express and convey to the Prime Minister my humble congratulations, as well as the congratulations of all the splendid citizens of the constituency of Peterborough West whom I have the pleasure to represent in this house. The Prime Minister has attained an honour not hitherto achieved in the Dominion of Canada, and indeed only attained in two other instances in the history of the world. To-day the illustrious grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie is confronted with a concentration of power in industry and finance which is no less a menace to true freedom than the family compact which his ancestor confronted nearly one hundred years ago. Economic insecurity, poverty and fear are the negation of freedom. I am sure I am expressing a thought uppermost in the mind of every hon. member when I say that I trust a kind providence may grant the Prime Minister health and success for many parliaments to come.

Then I cannot let this opportunity pass without saying that I recall having read that the late honoured and much lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the happy faculty of surrounding himself with able statesmen as cabinet ministers. No one can deny that the present Prime Minister also possesses this splendid characteristic. All classes of people and many journals, Tory and Liberal alike, throughout this country and elsewhere, frankly admit that an abler cabinet than the one now conducting the affairs of Canada could not have been formed. With this statement I am fully in accord. Were I to attempt to extol in detail their outstanding qualifications it would take much longer than the time allotted to me.

Let me pause also to extend to the Speaker of this house my sincere congratulations on the confidence and the honour bestowed upon him. His long parliamentary experience, his impartiality and pleasing manner eminently fit him for the exalted office he now holds, and I wish him every success. I should like also to express my congratulations to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You and I have fought side by side in many battles in this province. You are fair, honest, and kind, attributes befitting an efficient presiding officer. I wish you, sir, every happiness and success in the well merited honour that has come to you.

This trade agreement between Canada and the United States involves many social and industrial problems. If it affected only the two great nations on this North American continent the question would be less complicated, but as it most certainly involves world problems it must of necessity be approached with the utmost care and consideration. And what transcends all else is that human problems are involved, and where human problems are involved the highest ingenuity and statesmanship must be exercised in order to preserve the health and life of the nations of the world, from a humanitarian, an industrial and an economic standpoint.

I have the honour to represent a constituency which comprises a large rural area as well as a beautiful and cosmopolitan city of twenty-four thousand of the finest people in the world. Some day, sir, I hope to have the opportunity of telling this house more about it. In that city we have nearly eighty industries, which may surprise some of my hon. friends who preceded me and who come from industrial centres. What are our Canadian industries? The basic industries of Canada and their annual production for the year 1934, both gross and net, were as follows:

Industry	Gross	Net
Agriculture	$1,033,000,000	$682,000,000
Mining	356,000,000	277,000,000
Forestry (including lumbering)	233,000,000	164,000,000
Trapping	8,000,000	8,000,000
Electric power	195,000,000	142,000,000
Fishing	44,000,000	34,000,000

The tourist trade is an ever increasing industry. In 1934, people coming from the United States spent in Canada $130,000,000 and tourists from Canada spent in the United States some $61,000,000; in other words, Canada's net income from tourist trade was $69,000,000. The figures for our secondary industries are:

	Gross output	Net output
Manufacturing	$2,400,000,000	$1,246,000,000
Construction	126,000,000	82,000,000
Custom and repairs	83,000,000	62,000,000

From a trade agreement as well as from a tariff impost standpoint every one of them will receive impartial consideration at the hands of the government. Otherwise the whole economic structure would continue to be out of bounds and unjust. I am confident the proper action will be taken by the government now holding office.

I realize that my responsibility differs to some extent from that of an hon. member representing a purely rural constituency, as many secondary industries are found in my constituency. It is a fact, however, that the trade agreement benefits the farmers. That is a point of major importance, for the good and obvious reason that agriculture is the basis of our dominion's welfare. Hence it must be clear to all hon. members that unless agriculture prospers our secondary industries cannot be in a healthy economic condition. Nearly all our wealth comes from the land, largely from the top six inches of our soil.

I have heard hon. members, and particularly those of the legal profession, of whom we have a generous quota in this parliament, say that they are not farmers but that they have a deep and abiding interest in farmers. No doubt they are and have every right to be sincere. Their attitude, however, calls a story to my mind. It appears that a certain legal gentleman named Jones lived in one of those small villages where one person's business is everybody's business. One morning, at a time when the gentleman was suffering a severe illness, a lady with his interests at heart called at his residence. The door was answered by the gentleman's wife, and the visitor inquired, "How is lawyer Jones this morning?" "Well," was the reply, "he is lying at death's door." Whereupon the visitor ventured the observation, "Well, isn't he the plucky beggar—right at death's door, and still lying!"

I am happy to say that I spent most of my life on the farm, and am familiar with some of its problems. No man knows them all. The history of agriculture is the history of man in his most primitive and yet his most permanent state. Unless and until we place the farmer and the labouring man back into positions of security there can be no increasing of enduring prosperity in Canada. Farming is not gilt edged any more than any other industry; yet we know that there is none more conducive to good health, comfortable homes and independence. No legitimate industry involves a greater element of risk, hard work and long hours, and none is slower in its accumulation of wealth.

I do not subscribe to the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) who said in this chamber a few days ago that our farmers have been "spoon fed long enough." On behalf of the farmers of Canada I voice resentment against that statement. I venture to say the hon. member has never farmed, or if he did it is so long ago that his knowledge of farming cannot be applied to present day conditions. It would appear to me that it is very much out of date. I am sorry the hon. member is not in the chamber at the moment, because I rather think he would try to get out of it. However, unless his was a flax farm, or one with an oil well on it, he could not possibly slip out of his statement, because he was quoted in the press throughout Canada.

To-day farming is just as scientific and technical as any other industry. Due to the efficient training, patience and painstaking efforts of Mr. A. E. Runions, agricultural representative for the county of Peterborough, four judging teams of boys and girls of that county in the last year won four provincial championships—one at the Central Canada industrial exhibition, held in this capital city, one at the agricultural college in Guelph, and two at the Canadian national exhibition at Toronto. One of these young boys, Mr. Eddie O'Toole, a neighbour of mine, won the highest award in Canada for horse judging. Will any hon. member venture to say that that training is not of inestimable value to those young people, as well as to Canada? Visualize their services as judges, and how their knowledge will benefit others both by word and by example. Think of their increasing pride in their chosen calling.

Agriculture is undeniably the pack-horse of all parasites, hence its need of scientific methods. It stands second in volume and in value, and yet our farmers are in a most deplorable condition. Unless they are given every opportunity to recover, all other industries will continue to suffer and go into bankruptcy. Consequently it is fundamentally important that all governments continue to lend every effort on their behalf.

With respect to secondary industries may I say that I deeply appreciate the difficulties under which some of our manufacturing concerns are operating. I realize that some are suffering from excessive overhead, high taxation, expensive sales and distribution costs, intensive advertising, unprofitable accounts and a very seriously diminished volume. From my observation of and contact with the manufacturing industry, I have sufficient confidence in their appreciation and loyalty to know that they are willing to make sacrifices and cooperate with this government in carrying out its trade policies, and its concentrated and prodigious efforts to avoid catastrophe by balancing the budget and thus arresting the present downward course of this country to bankruptcy, and in conducting its affairs in a manner that will mean the greatest good to the greatest number. In this I include everyone from the primary producer to the ultimate consumer.

We all realize and appreciate that it will be necessary to make some modifications of this agreement from time to time in the interests of some of our manufacturing concerns and other industries. It is not perfect by any means, but it is a step in the right direction. It is a sign of sanity in international commerce. It is a wonderful economic gesture to all the great nations and it is an example that all countries of the world might well consider in order that there may be a speeding up in the exchange of trade between the empires and nations of the world. It will occur to most hon. members of this house that this is the logical method by which to increase sales, increase employment and purchasing power and ultimately lower prices to the consumer.

Mr. WILTON: How does the hon. member suppose it will increase employment?

Mr. DUFFUS: It will increase employment in many ways. In the first place, it will give us more adequate markets; there will be a greater expansion of trade and consequently employment will increase. Without increased markets, without an expansion of trade we will continue to have an unemployment situation as acute as it is at the present time and as it has been during the past five years. I believe that this government is a reasonable government. I am confident that should this treaty adversely affect any industry, we as their representatives stand ready to accompany the owners and their associates to the tariff board, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) where they are sure to get a sympathetic hearing of their case and a satisfactory adjustment of their grievances if it is at all possible. I am sure that our manufacturers know and appreciate that every effort is being made to reduce the cost of the instruments and implements of production. This will assist very materially. It is obvious that lower production costs are essential, in fact they are imperative. Commodity prices must be reduced to the minimum in the interests of the consumer if he is to maintain a decent standard of living, which standard is not too high at the present time. These adjustments will bring about increased employment, a greater tonnage for our railways and transportation systems and an increase in our tourist trade. There will be greater profits in business and the people in all lines of endeavour will have an increased purchasing power. The lowering of commodity prices and the providing of adequate markets for our surplus products, not by blasting methods but by the exercise of good will, has been the policy of this government and has always been the policy of the Liberal party.

The first and most important step towards the elimination of this widespread depression is to make the farmer prosperous. He is the greatest buyer in the country. At the present time everything he possesses—I can hardly say everything he owns—is in a dilapidated condition. Restore to him his former purchasing power and our unemployment problem will be solved. If our farmers are prosperous, our merchants will be happy, our manufacturers will be busy and our lumbermen, fishermen, and miners will be working. In conclusion may I say that if we can obtain the cooperation of both sides of the house and the coordination of the thoughts and efforts of all hon. members it will hasten the time when all the citizens of this fair land will be enjoying the same measure of prosperity and happiness as has always obtained under a Liberal administration.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for this resolution on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread. I say advisedly, "on the principle" because I do not see even half a loaf; I do not see even a quarter of a loaf and it would take a microscope to discover even a crumb. However, consistency and logic demand that I vote for the crumb. Surely it must be clear to every impartial person that tinkering with tariffs will not solve our problems. If it would, the experimentation with tariffs during the last seventy years by both major parties of Canada would have accomplished something. I conceive it to be the inescapable moral and legal duty of this house to find a way to distribute the vast wealth of this country among the Canadian people. Everyone agrees that great wealth does exist in this dominion.

I was in the museum on Sunday looking at the tools and the culture of our Indians and Eskimos, and it struck me what an object lesson for the people of Canada this was, for these simple primitive people had at hand only their traditions, their folk lore and the simple culture of ages past, and yet what amazing skill and ingenuity they applied to the problem of living. We to-day have inherited the accumulated knowledge, culture and science of all past ages, and yet in the midst of an admittedly incalculable abundance of everything we have failed to find a way to distribute equitably, justly and fairly among the Canadian people the vast wealth that everyone agrees exists in this country. One might carry the metaphor even further and refer to the Scriptures: "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise." Surely we who have preached brotherhood for centuries and have even talked about a religion that is beyond the compass of the human understanding must admit that we have neither the morality nor the intelligence of insects because the ants and the bees have their co-operative commonwealths, their industrial democracies, in which each individual in return for the labour that he gives is guaranteed all the necessities of life. Under the present system, as has been amply demonstrated in the report of the price spreads commission, men, women and children are treated as a means to an end, and that end is the enrichment of those who by their privileges and by the power that is given them under the system are able to impose their uncompromising will upon the weak and the helpless.

Thinking along these lines, I wonder whether we could not take a more scientific and a more humanitarian attitude towards these problems. I think it is an unassailable truth that Canada has concentrated within her borders the greatest body of vital natural resources existing within the borders of any country in the world. Canada is more richly endowed with all that goes to make for a beautiful, happy and comfortable living for our people than is any other country in the world, and yet one and one-quarter millions of honest, decent Canadian citizens are to-day compelled to accept the bitter, heart-breaking degradation of public charity. Charity may be a lovely virtue if you are handing it out, but it is the bitterest of all pills to accept. In the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), "the dole is a condemnation, final and complete, of this system." I agree. I also agree with the poet Edward Markham, who, speaking of these matters, said:

> Down all the stretch of hell to its last gulf there is no shape more terrible than this, more tongued with censure of a world's blind greed, more filled with signs and portents for the soul, more fraught with menace to the universe.

I feel that to-day every member of parliament is standing at the bar of judgment, and I am wondering what the verdict of history will be. God forbid that we should fail to do the reasonable, the logical, the humanitarian and the Christian thing.

There was something rather ominous in the words of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) when, speaking before the Canadian Artillery Association at Ottawa on the 7th of February, he used these words:

> I want to leave with you the profound thought that you will never have in the Dominion of Canada an adequate system of defence until you create a national sentiment in favour of such a system. In my mind there are two cardinal and guiding principles to be borne in mind when establishing a system of national defence. First we must have the defence forces sufficient to control subversive elements from within, and sufficient also to repel attacks from without.

I want to suggest to the minister and the cabinet that if they would give consideration to a sane rational system of equitably distributing the products of this power-industry age, there would be no need of worrying about subversive elements within the country. Are we to understand, for instance, that the citizens of Pembroke, Ontario, who apparently driven to desperation by the sound-money scarcity philosophy of their government rose in anger, are to be classed as subversive? I am a citizen of Ontario; my people have lived here for generations, and I say that the gathering storms of anger at the futility and inability of governments—I do not care what name they go under—to solve this problem of poverty amidst abundance is simply taxing the patience of even the best Anglo-Saxon citizens of Canada. If I am told that I am severe in my language I say that the circumstances call for severe language. As William Lloyd Garrison says:

> The apathy and indifference of the people with regard to this great question is enough to cause every statue to leap from its pedestal and hasten the resurrection of the dead.

I am not equivocating. I will not retreat one inch. I will be heard on behalf of the people of this country who are looking to this house and to this parliament for a solution of their problem. You might as well say to me, sir, that I am predicting a revolution when I talk about the people rising in anger as say to the astronomer who uses his instruments to calculate the movements of the solar bodies and predicts that there is going to be an eclipse of the moon at a certain time, that he is to be blamed when that eclipse happens. I say that unless we take hold of this problem immediately and solve it, we are going to have trouble.

I want to ask the government a question or two. The first is this—and I am asking it of course in relation to the system; I have nothing whatever against this or any other government—Why do we, at great cost, train our young men in universities, give them the degree of Bachelor of Commerce, and send them overseas to drum up markets for goods which are needed here at home? I say that nothing could be more stupid or more grotesque. If we can demonstrate to other nations a scientifically planned economy in which all of our available natural resources are made to minister to our domestic needs, and if we contemplate the importation of only those commodities which could not advantageously be produced within this country, exchanging, for example, our surplus pulpwood and rayon silk for citrus fruits, tea, coffee, bananas and so forth, which we cannot produce in Canada, I say, Mr. Speaker, that such a spectacle would electrify the world. Infinitely more, it would remove from the world one of the most malignant and terrible of mankind's immemorial enemies, war, which I think most thoughtful people to-day agree is partly caused by economic rivalry and the struggle for markets. Once there was before the eyes of all mankind a concrete illustration of a great people emancipating themselves from economic bondage, no government on earth could resist the demand of its own people for the same thing to be tried and made to work.

I am not projecting here an unsubstantial shimmering mirage, an unattainable utopian dream. I want to give some facts. In the United States during the last two years a commission was set up, consisting of impartial industrial engineers. statisticians, accountants and economists. Their work was to survey the production plant of the United States, that is the productive capacity of the plant from an agricultural and an industrial point of view. They found that at the present time there is available to the people of the United States a living of $4,400 for each family. Who is there who will say that Canada is less richly endowed with vital natural resources than is the United States?

Mr. MOORE: Is the hon. gentleman referring to the report or survey of the Brookings Institution?

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): I am referring to the report of the National Survey of Potential Productive Capacity, which has just released its findings. It is published by Charles Loeb, director of the survey.

Mr. MOORE: May I ask the authority for the survey?

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): The authority is the United States government. I should like to put on Hansard, for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, a quotation about that. This is what Stuart Chase, the great economist and writer in the United States, has to say about it:

> This study is destined, I believe, to have historical importance. It has furnished comprehensive statistical proof for a possible era of abundance; proof which has long been wanted. It gives the lie to the scarcity men, the hucksters, gamblers, and financial jugglers who once promised the end of poverty, and who now, their system in reverse, foretell an America of industrial serfs, peasants, and belt-tighteners, into a bleak and undated future. Where are you going to get the money? they cry. If the abundance men can carry the findings of the National Survey to every hamlet in the land, there will be in the end no question of where the money is coming from. Americans will not be content to idle in semi-starvation because the rules of an antiquated money game demand it, when they know that the good things of life are theirs for the taking—and, mind you, the working. An income of $4,400 a year in sound goods and services is not affluence, but it looks like paradise to most families in this country to-day. And it is only a beginning; only the first indication of what the power age can do for mankind, if once it be given an opportunity genuinely to serve mankind.

Mr. MOORE: I am extremely interested in what the hon. gentleman is saying, but I would call attention to the fact that he is speaking of comment on the report, and not of the report itself. I think that is correct, is it not?

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): That is correct. Perhaps, in order to clear up this matter, I had better say a word or two about the source of this report. This commission, as I said a moment ago, was appointed by the United States government for the purpose of making a survey of the productive plant of that country. Mr. Harold Loeb was the director of that commission. The findings of the commission have not yet been released in the form of an official blue book. But Mr. Loeb, as chairman of the commission, has written this book and foretells and analyses what the report will contain, and there is a chart which shows the whole of the resources of the United States from the land, the factories and the distribution system. It is an exceedingly interesting chart, and I would recommend it to the hon. gentleman for study.

Mr. MOORE: I have read it. I think it would be well, though, that the hon. gentleman should take some other opportunity to undertake an analysis of it for the purpose of seeing that it brings out his conclusions.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): I was endeavouring to point out in a spirit of friendliness, amity and cooperation—

Mr. MOORE: Quite so. I accept that.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): —that we have a suggestion to offer and we are offering it sincerely to the government, that they should study this. I am going further. I have very great pleasure in seconding the resolution which is now on the order paper asking for the appointment of a committee, or rather, if the government so desires, of one of the standing committees, to make a similar survey of Canada's production plant. That resolution, very properly, is on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier), the youngest member of the house, and I think it is appropriate that the youngest member should bring it forward, because it is for the next generation more than for us.

Right on that point, I want to enlarge on the youth problem of this country. To the youthful fancy of the boys and girls coming out of our homes and schools and colleges, the future seems to lie before them like a land of dreams, so beautiful, so varied, and so new. But what have we to offer them? I say that it is within the power of the members of this parliament to see that their hopes are realized and that their dreams come true. Surely it must not be beyond the power of parliament to take cognizance of the wealth of Canada, to survey its resources, and to formulate an intelligent, rational plan for giving life and liberty and happiness to the young people of this dominion.

We have preached brotherhood for centuries. The time has now arrived when we can find a material basis for brotherhood. I think we have found that basis in this age of plenty and machine-made abundance. I believe we are actually nearing the borders of the long promised land. Mankind has wandered for thousands of years in the wilderness of racial hatreds and jealousies, of fear, insecurity and mass murder. It is not too much to say that the ushering in of the age of harnessed solar energy and mankind's inventive genius, the inheritance of the accumulated knowledge and culture of the past, will mark the fulfilment of mankind's age-old quest for freedom, security and happiness. In thinking of the problems confronting this parliament and this country I am reminded of the words of the great commoner, William Jennings Bryan, when he said:

> You shall not press down upon the brow of labour this crown of thorns. You shall not crucify mankind on a cross of gold.

I might add to that: You shall not crucify this generation on a cross of scarcity and artificially created poverty. It is just the same thing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member for Athabaska to confine his remarks to the question under discussion.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sincerely trying to suggest a plan to the government; that plan you have just heard, that we have a committee appointed by this house to make a survey of our wealth, and in that connection we undertake to work with the government. I do not think the people of Canada are in the least concerned about what party brings in this plan. The personal ambitions of politicians or the personal fortunes of particular parties are of no consequence to the Canadian people. What they are interested in is this: In their homes, with their children, they desire to have security, and I should like nothing better than to see the Liberal party bring in this plan. If they did so they would earn the everlasting gratitude of the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that sane men are at last resisting the subjection of the world's real powers to the world's most purely instrumental mechanism, the money system. Monetary restriction upon the actualities of the earth's fruitfulness is so nearly complete that the matter becomes one of life or death. In default of converting our leaders from their fantastic veto upon life there is only one common sense retaliation, and that is a temporary return to direct exchange of labour, or primitive barter. Indeed, I could give dozens of illustrations, from my own riding, of people now engaged in primitive barter, because they have no money. I say that a government—I am speaking not of this government particularly, but of any government—which is afraid to face a simple problem requiring only common sense and backbone, which will allow an inanimate mechanical bogey to strangle and smother the legitimate and normal aspirations and the inalienable rights of the Canadian people, is not worth its salt. It has forfeited its right to the respect of the people and its right to govern the country. The only purpose of government is to minister to human needs, to represent the people, to promote and safeguard their welfare. That is what people pay their taxes for. It may be that some of us here—and I would include myself, because I have seen something of the temptations to which apparently people succumb when they get a good salary and a good deal of comfort—forget the people who sent us here, the people who pay the taxes. Perhaps that is natural, but I am suggesting that we should bring to the solution of this problem all of our manhood, all of our sincerity and our energy, and work together to find the answer. I appeal to every member of this house, not as members of any party but as citizens of Canada elected and paid, as I am and as we all are, by the rest of the citizens of Canada to promote and safeguard their welfare, to consider earnestly and sincerely how we may together solve these problems for all the people.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, the people are not concerned with the fortunes of any party, but they are supremely concerned with whether we take hold of this job and do our duty like men. We may not meet with success immediately, but if we even start in the right direction and lay the foundation upon the principles of truth, justice and reason, those who follow will have not a jungle trail of selfishness, greed and hate but a broad highway of truth and knowledge along which to travel. This is not a political problem; it is an engineering and accounting problem. Let us get our committee appointed, let us get to work at once to assemble all the facts and then proceed together to work out the solution.

Mr. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to participate at all in this debate, but it has occurred to me that as the lone Liberal elected from the province of Alberta there is a responsibility devolving upon me at least to state my position in regard to this matter.

The merits of this agreement have been discussed thoroughly and exhaustively, and in my opinion no good purpose can be accomplished by further traversing all the arguments so ably put forward during the debate. There is one point, however, to which I should like to refer. The right hon. leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Cargary West (Mr. Bennett) has opposed this agreement and has led his party in opposition to it, an agreement in the making of which he certainly had a hand. I do not want any member of this house or any reader of its proceedings to get the idea that the right hon. gentleman speaks in any way for any measure of Alberta public opinion.

Mr. Speaker, if this treaty were to be submitted to a referendum of the people of Alberta apart from any political prejudice, I am very sure that not only would it carry overwhelmingly, but almost unanimously. I wish to report to the house what I believe to be the public opinion of that province that I am interjecting these few sentences.

The right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been criticized for the speed with which he has brought these negotiations to a successful conclusion. To us in Alberta that was a hopeful sign, a promise of action and an indication of a readiness to put quickly into effect the overwhelming mandate given him from all parts of Canada. So, on behalf of the great volume of progressive Liberal thought in Alberta—and one is wrong who thinks the limited Liberal representation in this house belies that statement—I wish to congratulate the right hon. leader of the government and his colleagues upon their achievement and to thank them for so quickly and so successfully bringing about this very excellent trade agreement.

Mr. FRANK BLAIS (Chapleau) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this being my maiden speech in the house, I am pleased to congratulate you on your election to the speakership and also to extend my congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for having proposed your nomination to this office and to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) for having seconded it.

As the representative of the constituency of Chapleau, I wish to voice my views on the reciprocity agreement. The county of Chapleau is already a very important one from the standpoint of agriculture and colonization, and I am free to state that, in the near future, it will be, of all the counties in the dominion, the one where agriculture, mining and forestry operations will reach the highest degree of development. No better news could have been conveyed to us than the announcement by the Prime Minister of the signing of this trade agreement with our neighbours to the south.

It was with great pleasure that I read in La Presse, of August 3rd last, that one of the principal features of the Liberal party's program was the negotiation of a reciprocity agreement with the United States at the earliest possible moment, in the event of it obtaining the confidence of the people on the 14th of October. As we hoped, the results were most wonderful. The triumph was without precedent in the history of Canada.

I therefore beg the hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues to accept the congratulations and thanks of my constituents for the prompt execution of their promise.

I am highly pleased with the reduction of $2 per thousand feet in the duty on Canadian sawn lumber exported to the United States. The production of sawn lumber in my county amounts to about 35,000,000 feet per year, and, thanks to this agreement, we shall be paid $2 more per thousand feet, representing additional receipts of $70,000, which will be highly appreciated by us. The increase of $2 per thousand feet on our sawn lumber enables us to pay to the men in our winter camps $50 and more per month, including their board; these wages are highly deserved by skilled woodsmen. The reduction in duty will prove generally advantageous to all lumber merchants who avail themselves of its benefits.

On the 5th of February last, at the Mount Royal Hotel in Montreal, a general convention of Canadian and American lumbermen met for the purpose of considering trade conditions and changes likely to occur as a result of the reciprocity agreement which, at the time, had been in force for thirty-five days. We asked a straight question to the American lumber merchants as to how they were affected by the treaty. The reply made by Mr. Kennedy, of New York, shows that the tariff reduction was in our favour. It enables us, he said to offer you $2 more per thousand feet; we are pleased with this lowering of the duty and we trust to be in a position to continue dealing with you.

Mr. Speaker, the general increase of $2 per thousand feet on approximately one billion feet of sawn lumber, which is the yearly cut of Canada, means for us a profit of $20,000,000. This tariff reduction alone, therefore, represents a substantial gain for Canada.

Some hon. members from the prairie provinces inform us that the cattle industry is the one that benefits most by this treaty; of that I am quite pleased. Two reductions alone, on cattle and on sawn lumber, will give us annual profits of over $40,000,000. Although they constitute the most important items, they nevertheless show how valuable to Canada the agreement is, without taking into consideration the numerous other items that will prove beneficial to us.

Some hon. members opposite seem to think that the treaty might have a detrimental effect on the prices of our vegetables, especially carrots, cabbages, etc. I may say that, on the contrary, these products have gone up ¼ cent per pound since the treaty has been in force.

They also speak of imports of American farming implements which are likely to harm our Canadian industries. I do not think that these gentlemen are in earnest. In the manufacture of farm implements Canadian hardwood is used, which is partly imported from Canada and therefore becomes fairly costly in the United States, the freight amounting to $14 per thousand feet, to which is to be added a duty of $2. So, I fail to see how unfair competition can be waged by American factories.

As to our Canadian companies, they are in part, branches of American concerns located here and they know quite well how to look after their own business in either country. Why then such prohibitive prices in Canada? I consider them unfair and detrimental to the purchasing power of our farmers. I note with a good deal of satisfaction that the government has arranged to investigate the increased prices of farm implements manufactured by these companies; such an inquiry should produce excellent results and be of a great benefit to our farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the members of this house who, realizing the importance of this agreement, have given it their unreserved support, mindful as they were of the fact that for years past we have suffered great hardships. Had this agreement been approved in 1911, the depression we are now going through would not have been so severe. We suffered from overproduction while having at our very door, a market for our surplus production. We could have benefited by it had we concluded a trade agreement with the United States. No longer shall we have to deplore that grave error. Great advantages have already accrued from this agreement which has been in force only a short time ago. We may then rest assured that within five years this arrangement will prove to be a great boon to our people, while being helpful to our neighbours in the United States.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) should support the measure and thus compensate to a certain extent the harmful effects of his five years of power, during which he sometimes wanted and sometimes did not want a reciprocal trade arrangement. Again, I wish to sincerely thank the right hon. the Prime Minister for the excellent work he has accomplished as well as for the splendid triumph he achieved on the 14th of October last.

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I rather hesitate at this late hour of the debate to inject into it what I have to say with regard to this trade agreement. First I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate you, sir, and your deputy upon your appointment to the high office that has been conferred upon you. Having known you both for a considerable length of time in this house I feel perfectly safe in your hands.

I have listened with careful attention to the debate on this proposed trade agreement. It appears to me that the problem before us resolves itself largely into deciding whether on balance we are securing favourable treatment or whether we are paying too much for what we get. In other words, are we not dropping the substance for the shadow? Trade arrangements in various forms, ranging from unrestricted reciprocity many years ago, have come down through various governments, each having the desire for freer trade with our neighbours. I have no intention of entering into a controversy as to who originated the idea of freer trade with our neighbours; I feel that for a long period of years all governments have had that desire. It is just a question of what business deal could be made. As I see the situation, the different arrangements that were proposed by those who negotiated for the United States were always such that were we to accept them holus-bolus we could never retain our self-respect, let alone the solvency of this country. When the Underwood tariff was in force in the United States we had a very fair trade arrangement. Under that tariff our exports to that country amounted annually to the very substantial sum of $503,000,000 worth of goods. Under the Fordney-McCumber and the Hawley-Smoot tariffs raised by the United States against Canada these exports dropped almost to the vanishing point.

We are asked to sanction a trade arrangement which to my way of thinking will practically sacrifice our industrial life—I say that advisedly—and in return we are to receive what at the most is problematical, some benefit to our primary producers. Far be it from me to say anything against the primary producers of Canada receiving all the benefits they can get. I happen to represent a riding which is very largely industrial but is also largely rural. We have in the county of Waterloo an ideally balanced situation in which between ninety-five and ninety-eight per cent of the produce of the farms is consumed in the county. The same condition applies also to adjoining counties. After a careful survey of this proposed trade arrangement, which I would like to support if I possibly could see my way clear, I believe it will not put a single dollar into the pockets of the industrial workers of Canada, except, as has been stated by many speakers, by the circuitous route of putting more money into the hands of the farming community and thereby raising their purchasing power. That is agreed by all; there can be no doubt about it. As I see the matter, this agreement will not put one dollar directly into the pockets of industrial workers of Canada. To the extent that it will put scores of thousands of dollars into the pockets of industrial workers in the United States making goods for exportation to Canada, to that extent will it take the same number of dollars from the pockets of Canadian working men and women. To the extent that men and women working on goods to be exported to Canada from the United States are taken out of the ranks of the unemployed in that country; to the same extent are men and women placed on the unemployed list in this dominion. Because I cannot bring myself to the belief that the agreement will in any material way assist the industrial workers of Canada, I cannot bring myself to the point at which I can vote for the resolution. I shall vote against it, for the good and sound reason that it is not in the interests of the industrial workers of this country.

For a few moments I shall direct my observations to one industry, one which I believe offers a fair example of what may happen in other industries which at present are supplying the demand in our home market. Although my observations might apply equally to many other lines of manufacturing I shall content myself with speaking about furniture manufacturing. The manufacturing of furniture is an extensive industry in Canada, and is located chiefly in Ontario and Quebec. The factories in Ontario are to a great extent found in the smaller towns and municipalities.

What will happen to the furniture industry as a result of the reduction in duty from forty-five per cent to twenty-seven and one-half per cent? This reduction means a decrease of forty per cent on the tariff which previously obtained. Any hon. member from a riding in which the furniture industry operates knows very well the serious difficulties under which it has operated during the last few years; there can be no doubt about that. Any other hon. members coming from constituencies where wood-working machinery is manufactured know very well the sad condition in which that industry has been for the last five or six years. I say therefore that anything tending to injure the furniture industry is not in the best interests of Canada. I hope to be able to prove that this industry is not represented by great accumulations of capital, nor has the industry exploited the consumer. I suggest that it is entitled to fair and honest treatment. It has been struggling against adverse conditions and, as stated by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), part of the difficulty—not all of it—is within the industry. Certain over-production and over-building have taken place. I suggest, however, that that is only part of the trouble.

This over-development and the consequent hardship brought about by mass buying of large departmental and general chain stores has resulted in a most unsatisfactory condition. This point was made abundantly clear before the price spreads commission. I had the honour to serve on the commission and to hear the witnesses called before it. It was established beyond question that mass buying resulted in squeezing down the producer's price to a point below the cost of production. This in turn had the result of lowering the wages of the workers.

The condition in this industry in its present form is bad enough, but if we are to be subjected to large importations from the United States this will mean greater hardships. I am satisfied it will mean the wiping out of many factories. According to the bureau of statistics 383 firms are listed as manufacturing furniture. When we analyze this we find that sixty-three firms are manufacturing allied lines; they are not making household furniture. Then about 230 firms are what might be described as repair shops. Boiling down the list we find that there are only eighty-one bona fide furniture industries turning out household furniture for the Canadian people. Of those industries sixty-eight per cent are in Ontario, twenty-five per cent in Quebec, and seven per cent in British Columbia. Many of the plants are located in the smaller towns. The hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), will bear me out when I say that many furniture industries are located in the smaller towns of Ontario, although some may be found in the larger centres. In the small towns these industries are, in many cases, the only means of livelihood for a great part of the population.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

COPYRIGHT ACT

The house resumed from Friday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Esling for the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) has announced that he intends to bring down a bill to amend the Copyright Act and he has asked me to let this bill stand. I am quite agreeable, but I should like to know if he can indicate when his bill will be brought down.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am hardly in order in replying to the hon. gentleman because I have spoken already to the motion for the second reading of this bill. However, with the permission of the house, I would say that I intend to bring down a bill within a very short time.

Motion stands.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The house resumed from Friday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Boulanger for the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Civil Service Act (vacancies, outside service, priority to returned soldiers.)

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the motion for the second reading of this bill, I desire first to congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), not so much upon bringing down the bill as upon the moderate way in which he has advanced his argument. This is a matter with which parliaments are faced from time to time. The Civil Service Act is a very complex and involved one. If hon. members will look back they will find that at regular intervals the governments of the day have been asked to review or amend the act. When I first came into the house in 1920 one of the first debates to which I listened was on this matter, and it has been coming up every three or four years since then. It might be noted that this matter is usually initiated by a member of the party in power, but I do not say that in any spirit of criticism; the motive for that appears quite natural.

There is in the act itself a spirit of amendment. The act leaves to the civil service commission the devising of regulations which are very extensive in scope. Under section 59 the commission has power to exempt a certain number of positions from the provisions of the act when it considers that those positions cannot be properly filled in the ordinary way. Section 59 reads:

> In any case where the commission decides that it is not practicable nor in the public interest to apply this act to any position or positions, the commission may, with the approval of the governor in council, exclude such position or positions in whole or in part from the operation of the act, and make such regulations as are deemed advisable prescribing how such position or positions are to be dealt with.

That is a very important section and it shows without any doubt that there was in the minds of those who framed the act the belief that it could not be applied one hundred per cent; that a certain number of positions should, if necessary, be freed from its operations. This being so, it is only natural that individual members, having a conception of their duties as such, should come before parliament from time to time with suggested amendments to the Civil Service Act. The former government amended the act in 1932 rather extensively, and on previous occasions the act has been modified or changed by preceding governments, either by straight amendments or by making use of this section 59.

The hon. member who introduced this bill has been careful not to make it a partisan one. In presenting his argument he has been careful to quote from all parties and groups and he has shown conclusively that there has been constantly in the minds of hon. members an anxiety to improve the act from year to year. He has pronounced himself in favour of the merit system and in that respect we are with him; we all desire to maintain the merit system. I can go even further—and I believe hon. members will be with me on this—and say that we desire also to take away from the ordinary business of hon. members and ministers the necessity of having to provide positions in a wholesale manner and in that respect waste precious time that could be much better consecrated to work for the general good. I am reminded of a remark once made to me by a visitor who found my office rather full with callers. He told me that he thought if I were able to bring down in parliament a single measure for the general welfare of the public, I would be doing more good and helping more people than by securing appointments for all those who called on me. Let there be no mistake as to how the government and I stand on this matter. We stand for the merit system and we wish to maintain it as much as we can.

However, I should like to quote a very eminent member of this house. When he was Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), dealing with a bill similar to this one in its general aspect, asked who was to determine merit. The act itself foresees that there may be cases where positions cannot be filled by examinations, where the appointments would have to be made in another manner. In an effort to maintain the principle of the act, one parliament after another has made an effort to improve it in certain of its particulars. Because the present bill is sweeping in character, I for one, and in the name of the government, would not suggest that the house should accept it in its present form. It is only fair to state that the civil service itself has been somewhat ill at ease over this bill. I could quote from many documents received from different associations of civil servants to show that there is no disposition on their part to accept the bill in its present form. I have before me a letter from the president of the Civil Service Federation of Canada, and I have also a clipping giving particulars of a long interview with the national secretary of the Amalgamated Civil Service of Canada. I could give many quotations—I shall not as that is not my purpose in rising to-night—to show that the civil service, and I believe a large portion of the public, are not satisfied with the bill as it is.

The bill deals with many different questions. It deals first with the outside service; then with returned men, not only those who served with the Canadian forces but those who served with the allied forces as well; it then deals with returned men who did not reside in Canada at the time of the war, with promotions and other matters. These are different questions that could form the subject matter of different bills, and there is a danger that if we should take action on this bill one way or the other, on the one hand we might be approving of too much, or, on the other, in disapproving of the bill as a whole we might be setting aside some of its features which seem more desirable. Having all that in mind, I would suggest that the house might pass the second reading of the bill with the understanding that it will be at once referred to a special committee for study, and I have such a motion before me. That committee would report during the course of the session, and I think the house would then be in a better position to judge of all the features of this bill. I therefore suggest that we adopt the bill on second reading so that I may move its reference to a special committee. I hope the hon. member in charge of the bill will be satisfied with that suggestion

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the adoption of the principle of this bill is the negation of everything that this house has declared for during a period of many years. I had assumed that probably some member representing the government would suggest that the bill be referred to a committee. That can be done only after the second reading; the second reading of this bill implies approval of the principle, and I regret that I find it impossible to accept the principle.

The first part of the bill is very simple, and the hon. gentleman who introduced the measure (Mr. Boulanger) took a considerable time to stress that part in order, I suggest, to make his references to the second part of the bill a little easier. This was good tactics, but I do not think it served the purpose because it is quite clear that the aim of this bill is to restore patronage in every sense of the term. That is what it is, purely and simply, and we might as well face that fact.

Now, is this house prepared to go back to patronage? I am perfectly satisfied that fresh from the people the government of the day is besieged by members who desire that some Conservative in the civil service of the country should be removed and somebody else appointed in his place who was more given to support the government of the day. There is nothing new about that; it has been going on for a long time, and I suppose it will continue to go on for a very much longer time because human nature does not change just because there is a change of government. Human nature is much the same to-day as it was yesterday. I fancy that there are in Canada thousands of people who say that the late government did not do their duty in removing men who were violently Liberal and replacing them by Conservatives, but on examination we found that these men had discharged their duties, done their work in accordance with the rules and regulations, and had never interfered in politics, because if they did they were removed from office on the certificate of the member, or an investigation might be held if it were thought desirable. Now, are we prepared to go back to patronage or not?

The hon. gentleman quoted from some observations made by myself when his former bill was under consideration and referred to a committee of the house. I said that the question was: who was to determine merit? I asked that question because of a certain appointment that I had investigated that was made in a certain town between Winnipeg and the head of the lakes. It turned out in the final analysis that the question of the fitness of the man who was the successful applicant for the position was determined not by the civil service commission but rather by somebody on the ground who said, "Of the applicants, he is the best man."

Mr. BOULANGER: That is the general rule, if I may point out, so far as the outside service is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. I pointed that out to the civil service commission and to the committee which was subsequently appointed for the purpose of considering the matter. It was at once seen that some improvements should be made, and an improvement was made. In other words, the civil service commission accepted responsibility to a greater extent than it had theretofore done, so that some local person who was favourable to the appointment of a particular individual was not able to ensure his appointment regardless of other considerations.

As the matter stands to-day, there is a competitive examination, and there are, we will say, half a dozen candidates. As a result of the examination A is first, B second, then C, and possibly D. D, being a returned man, gets the preference and secures the position. The objection to including in the category of returned men those who have served in other branches of the service than the Canadian forces is not one about which I think the house would worry. I should fancy that most of us would realize that under present conditions the necessity that induced the framing of the law in the terms in which it was framed has largely disappeared and that possibly if the preference is rather for Canadians, those who enlisted in Canadian units, the difficulties would be overcome. But there are still other difficulties that arise in respect of men from other countries enlisting in our forces in the earlier stages of the war. However, I pass that by.

But when it comes to a question of taking the outside service entirely away from the commission and putting it into the hands of the government and the members of the House of Commons, that would in effect be providing that whenever there is a change of government there is a change in the outside service of this country. Stripped of everything—and we might as well look it fairly in the face—that is just what it means. For my part I cannot bring myself to believe that is the proper thing to do, and I do not believe any hon. member, calmly and quietly sitting down and considering this matter from the standpoint of Canada, will conclude that that is a desirable thing to do; nor do I believe many hon. members on second thought will regard it as desirable even in their own constituencies that that should be done.

There is a third class which is dealt with by this bill which introduces patronage perhaps in its worse form, and that is with respect to professional and technical appointees. It is provided in reality that the minister of the day of any particular department can remove anyone in that department he pleases, and, having removed him, can appoint whoever he pleases in his place, certifying that the person is qualified for the particular duties of the position. Now, under existing law the governor in council determines whether a man should be removed from office for cause; that is, the governor in council takes the final action. But this bill would substitute for the governor in council the head of the department, the minister, and I do not believe, sir, there is any minister who desires to be charged with that responsibility. I know what the pressure would be; there is not a member of this house who does not know what it would be.

I go a step further. I turn to the last section of the bill on page 3, and although it is not within the rules to discuss the bill section by section when dealing with the principle on the second reading, it is quite clear that the only way in which the real significance of the proposed section 64 of the Civil Service Act can be appreciated by the house is to look at the section itself, which reads:

> Professional and Technical Positions
> 64. (1) Whenever, in the opinion of the head of a department, or the deputy head, the knowledge and qualifications required for a position in the civil service are, wholly or in part, professional or technical, the commission, on the request in writing of the head of the department, may appoint to the said position a person mentioned in the said request—

In other words, the commission is then bound to appoint the person named by the minister. The section goes on:

> —provided the head of the department has stated in his request that the person recommended possesses the required knowledge and qualifications and is duly qualified as regards health, character and habits.

In one case that I know of where an effort was made to obtain the appointment, during the last five years, of a certain person, this was suggested as a very desirable way in which to accomplish it; that is, that the appointment would still be made by the commission but that the minister would name the person to be appointed and he would be appointed forthwith by the commission. Now, are we prepared, sir, to do that? Is the house prepared to accept that principle?

I think I can speak with some degree of, shall I say, painful understanding of this matter, for if any man has suffered by reason of not yielding to that particular form of attack in connection with the civil service, that man was the head of the late government. The effort that was made to do away with what has been done during these years was very great, and it required a good deal of resistance on the part of members of the administration to thwart that effort. But why was it resisted? It would have been easy to introduce a bill such as this, have it passed through the house and thereby create a new patronage list for the outside service and professional technical men. Why did we not do this, and why do I suggest that this government will not do it?

First of all, we are endeavouring slowly to build up in Canada a civil service of which we can be proud. This has been a slow process. If any hon. members look back to the days when this country was formally established, from 1870 down through the eighties and the early nineties, and realize how difficult a task it has been to try to get into the minds of the people themselves the desirability of having a civil service that would be permanent in their positions, of supplying some provision for their old age, and of making the service a career, they will realize that we have made real progress. Having made progress up to this point, to compare our civil service with that of Great Britain is very much to our own detriment, because there it has reached the point at which no member of the British House of Commons would think of suggesting appointments in connection with postmasterships and matters of that sort in his constituency. Somebody might casually mention it, but that is not a matter that members deal with; it is entirely out of their hands; they do not desire to deal with it. How are we going to create in Canada a similar state of public opinion to that which prevails in Great Britain in connection with their service? We can do this only by frowning down measures such as this.

To give second reading to this measure at this time means that I, from my place in this parliament, have approved of the principle of patronage being restored in Canada. That is what it means. I suggest to the hon. gentleman who has introduced the measure that, if he were to abandon the latter part of his bill—the two should never have been put together—and keep the first part, there is something which the committee might discuss fully and carefully, and upon which it might arrive at a conclusion, one that would be in the public interest to arrive at and report to this house upon. But to ask us now to approve this means that the committee can do nothing more than say yes or no to it. A committee that is set up by the house to consider this question must be a committee that is going to say: We must have patronage returned. That is what it means, and that is the reason I say that we ought to look at it fairly. Do not let us blind ourselves with any specious reasoning about the matter, because there is no getting away from what it means. A committee such as the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) has suggested, if it were set up to deal with this bill, must of necessity say, if we give the measure second reading: There will be a return to patronage in the outside service and the professional technical services of this country.

Mr. GRAY: At what stage did the right hon. gentleman refer the Gagnon bill to a special committee?

Mr. BENNETT: At the very start of it, and the reason was obvious. I have already given the reason; I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has followed me. The Gagnon bill dealt with two problems. One of them was this: It dealt with the question of merit, and I undertook to point out why I was willing that the bill should go to a committee. The reason was that I was desirous to have it settled once and for all whether the civil service commission could divest itself of its responsibility by sending somebody off somewhere a thousand or twelve hundred miles from here to ask a question upon which the ultimate appointment would depend. We set ourselves against that as strongly as we could, not because it meant the return of patronage in the worst sense, but because it would be injurious and inimical to the interests of the service as a whole.

There is one way in which this matter might be dealt with. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to look up the proceedings—I have not looked up the debate since that occasion—we would be relieved from committing ourselves to a principle of the bill—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which was done on several occasions in the last five years.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but that was not what was before us.

Mr. GRAY: That was said by the Secretary of State.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the Secretary of State did not say that; he said quite the opposite. This bill could easily be brought within the provisions of such a suggestion. As it stands now it contains, as I say, two distinct principles, one of which is arguable and can easily be disposed of, the other of which will be disposed of ultimately in this house—this question whether or not we shall see a so-called return to patronage. By following this course the Secretary of State commits himself to no principle and relieves himself of any obligation. I know in how difficult a position a government is in regard to a question of this kind. I have been through the same difficulty. Do not think that I do not appreciate the position of members of the treasury benches with regard to this bill. If the members of the house commit themselves to no principle, with the understanding that they are not in any sense agreeing to the return of patronage or to placing the outside service in the hands of members of parliament or of the administration, I am not going to embarrass the administration by pressing the question of the principle involved in the second reading. I think it would be very wrong for me to do so, because during the last five years, when we were hurrying legislation through, frequently—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the right hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt, that very thing was done when the central bank bill went through the house. The leader of the opposition at that time said that we were in favour of the principle of having a central bank, but not of the principle of private ownership, which was contained in that bill.

Mr. BENNETT: There was the wheat board bill; I recall several of them. But it was stated that, if it went to committee, there was to be no acceptance of the principle nor acquiescence in the principle. I can only say for myself—I cannot speak for others—that I have no desire to embarrass the administration, but I wish to make it abundantly clear as far as this bill is concerned that I am unalterably opposed to its principles, as I was in regard to the Gagnon bill. At that time I made it abundantly clear both in and outside the house that we were not prepared to return to patronage in the outside service, or to abandon the technical men to the ministers, or to leave the appointment of deputy ministers to the caprice of any minister, however eminent he might be. If the suggestion conduces to the orderly conduct of business, and the minister makes this point abundantly clear, I personally, though I cannot speak for anyone except myself, would agree.

Mr. RINFRET: I desire to state that that is the very thing I had in mind. I tried to make it clear that we were not committing the house; that the house was not committed to the principle of the bill, but as some sections appear to be good, and others very debatable, I suggested as a means of understanding that the bill should go before a committee. I repeat again in the name of the government that there is no desire whatever to have the house committed to the principle of the bill except in so far as it is expedient to study further the matter of the civil service appointments.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I am astonished and dismayed to learn from the remarks of the minister (Mr. Rinfret) and the sponsor of the bill (Mr. Boulanger) that the government is even willing to entertain the idea of a return to patronage.

Mr. CRERAR: No; that is not right. That is not the case at all.

Mr. MacNEIL: As I read the bill, one section excludes from the jurisdiction of the commission the outside service; other sections deal with promotion within the service and the manner of appointment to professional and technical positions.

Mr. CRERAR: The government has not accepted this bill; let me make that clear to my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNEIL: As I understand the matter, second reading of this bill would commit the house to the principle of the bill. As explained by the bill certainly the principle thereof is a return to patronage in so far as it affects the outside service, professional and technical appointments, promotions within the service and dismissals from the service. The sponsor of the bill laid special emphasis upon the preference given former members of the allied forces. In that I think he dealt with a point of minor consequence. I find on consulting the records that in recent years comparatively few in this category have even attempted to claim the preference, and as I understand the situation, organizations of ex-service men would offer very little objection to some slight amendment in this regard. These organizations, however, are alarmed at this moment at the suggestion that the outside service should be removed from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Act. Such a step would abolish the principle of competitive examination with regard to these appointments, and the preference formerly extended ex-service men would not be applicable in anything like the same degree.

It is well known to those who have studied the statistics in this regard that under the patronage system ex-service men have not enjoyed the preference of which they have been assured by the government. I point out to hon. members that at this time, when Canada is faced with the grave problem of caring for physically handicapped men, for the government even to consider a step that would not give them the preference that enables them in a degree to overcome these physical handicaps, would leave little ground for an appeal to employing interests throughout the country to absorb at least a small percentage of those disabled through war service.

I am not in the least misled by the phraseology of this bill. It is polite fiction to suggest that in all instances ministers should make these appointments. Recommendations actually are made by political patronage committees, and it has been the sad experience of ex-service men seeking, through local patronage committees, employment in the public service, that the preference of which they have been assured under the order in council governing same has not been extended to them as generously as has been the case under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. As the bill is phrased it would work some injustice to quite a large number of men, because it suggests that those who had their domicile outside Canada when they enlisted should be excluded from the preference. It is a fact that some men with previous Canadian residence enlisted in the Canadian forces while abroad, and in my opinion they should not be excluded from the preference under the Civil Service Act.

It is true, as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) has suggested, that there appear in the estimates from time to time items providing for exemptions from the Civil Service Act, but it is noteworthy that in many of these instances the departments concerned have not exercised the authority so obtained but have actually referred such appointments to the civil service commission for selection through competitive examination. I might refer to the appointment of inspectors for drawback claims under the Department of National Revenue. The department referred these appointments to the civil service commission and secured excellent results from competitive examinations. I believe also that a number of appointments in the Department of External Affairs were made in this manner with excellent results, even though authority previously had been obtained by the department to make the selection without reference to the civil service commission.

The sponsor of the bill made some reference to delays and levelled some criticism against the manner in which the civil service commission has made appointments. If we study carefully how step by step parliament has endeavoured to accomplish civil service reform, how step by step it has established throughout the public service of Canada the merit principle based upon competitive examinations and how step by step it has endeavoured to assure civil servants of some security of employment, we must agree that it would be a serious, retrograde step at this time to abolish the merit principle to any degree and to place some 25,000 of these employees under the patronage system. I think it is not generally recognized that this bill would affect something like 25,000 employees of the outside service, and would abolish as far as they are concerned the assurances formerly given with regard to promotion on merit, dismissal only for good cause or for other than political reasons and so on, together with protection against appointments being made for purely political reasons. I suggest that at this time the proper step is to consider not the abolition of the merit principle but those steps that may be taken to improve and strengthen the facilities of the commission and to establish more definitely the merit system in appointments to the public service. Only in that way can that preference be assured which the country has generously extended to the ex-service men.

Some criticism was also directed against the commission with regard to their methods of conducting examinations. The sponsor of the bill stated that it was absurd to expect that three men could pass on all the applicants for any position in the civil service. It should be understood that the attempt is not made by three men to examine all these applicants. As a matter of fact, if we carefully analyze the work of the civil service commission we shall find that, to the extent that they have been provided with the necessary means, they have built up an expert examining staff. Provision has also been made for these examiners to visit various points in Canada to conduct either oral or written examinations. The manner in which improvement may be brought about is in the extension of these facilities rather than in their wholesale abolition as is suggested in this bill.

With regard to appointments to technical and professional positions, I think it is well to note that under the provisions of the Civil Service Act the commission from time to time has appointed advisory boards of experts, on which the departments have been represented. In this way departmental interests and the efficiency of the public service have been adequately safeguarded. I think if we take the long view of the situation we shall find that this procedure has resulted in the selection of the most competent men available for the positions and, in a very marked degree, has enhanced the efficiency of the public service.

Stripped of all its disguise, this bill suggests a return to the "spoils" system, and I am at a complete loss to understand why the government should even entertain a bill drafted in this form, definitely adopting the principle of patronage as applied to the outside service and definitely suggesting that political influence should dictate dismissals from the public service and the manner in which promotions should be made within the service. It would destroy for civil servants all semblance of permanency of employment, and would tend to drive away qualified young men by minimizing the attractiveness of a career within the public service. In my opinion this bill if adopted, even in principle on the second reading, spelling a return to patronage, would mean the undoing of the work of classification and organization which, at a cost of thousands of dollars, has put the service on somewhat of a businesslike basis. It would suggest the creation of unnecessary but highly paid offices to satisfy the demands of political workers, the result being greatly increased expenditures which fall upon the shoulders of the taxpayers of the country. It would mean extravagant salaries, out of all proportion to the services rendered. It would mean an inefficient public service. The merit system not only attracts candidates of the best calibre for government positions, but also, by fair competition, selects the best available persons.

The bill, if adopted, would mean the abolition of the preference now accorded to returned soldiers in regard to government appointments. Ex-service men are not fooled in this regard. If appointments to the public service are made through patronage committees, no one is made aware of the positions to be filled except the favoured few who enjoy the good will of the party in power, and unless positions are widely and fairly advertised the preference to ex-service men is ineffective. The adoption of the patronage principle would be in every sense a retrograde step. In this connection it is interesting to note that even that powerful political organization in New York known as "Tammany" most definitely supports appointments by the merit system. Even the charwomen scrubbing the floors of the city hall must be certified by the civil service commission of that city.

Going back over the years I note that practically every parliamentary committee dealing with the matter of appointments to the civil service has recommended that such appointments be based on merit only, and every one of those committees has definitely expressed opposition to the patronage system of appointments. It is recognized throughout the years that the efficiency of the public service clearly depends upon competitive examination of candidates and appointment by merit. It is interesting to note the history in this regard during the early years of con federation. As far back as 1877 a committee of this house stated:

> The practice of making appointments by political patronage was considered by most of the witnesses to be bad both in principle and in results.... This system has been found to lead to great practical evils....

It was suggested at that time that recommendations for appointments should be by an independent commission. That is important evidence when we consider that it was given in the days when patronage was rife and when if at any time they were in a position to recognize any merits there might be in appointments under the patronage system.

Subsequently in 1881 a committee made some very definite recommendations against patronage and in favour of appointment by merit. This was done again in 1892 and in 1908. Then there is the report of a committee dealing with the Spinney bill, and later still the committee of which the late Hon. James Malcolm was chairman, who said:

> Your committee is of opinion that the two fundamental principles of the Civil Service Act are the merit system and the system of appointment by competitive examination, and that both these principles must be preserved.

I have a note also of observations made more recently by our political leaders. Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden stated:

> We must not shut our eyes to the abuses that have arisen and to the general demoralization in the public life of the country when the reward of office is regarded as a fair exercise of the party power.
> We want in Canada a system of appointment by competitive examinations.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on a certain occasion stated that:

> The whole purpose of civil service reform was to remove altogether the possibility of ministers acting in a partisan way. If a measure of this kind (the Spinney bill) is permitted to pass it is setting back in a very real and substantial way the efforts of the past few years in the direction of civil service reform.

Again on another occasion the Prime Minister, speaking against the Spinney bill, said:

> It is a step entirely in the wrong direction.

On March 30, 1933, the Prime Minister, dealing with a suggested amendment to the act with regard to appointments to the penitentiary service said:

> This resolution involves the introduction of a bill which means a departure from the merit system and a return to the discredited patronage system with respect to appointments in connection with the penitentiaries of our country. In a word, it will make political machines out of the penitentiaries, and I want therefore to take very strong exception, at the very outset, to the passage of this resolution.

Again on the same date he said:

> Although there are certain distinct limitations with respect to the manner in which the civil service commission has operated, nevertheless if we weigh the advantages against the disadvantages, particularly in regard to the great majority of appointments, the argument would be wholly in favour of retaining the merit system and promotion under it, rather than introducing the old system of having appointments by patronage.

In view of all these recommendations of various parliamentary committees and these statements by the Prime Minister and others I find it very difficult to understand why the government should even entertain the suggestions in this bill. With some dismay I heard the remarks of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) this evening. There can be no doubt that the bill suggests a return to patronage with respect to some 25,000 to 30,000 appointments in the outside civil service. It deals largely with the Post Office Department and the customs service, large institutions which have achieved some efficiency because they have been freed in some degree at least from the interference of party politics.

For these reasons I find it impossible to support the bill on second reading.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) has been very ingenious in the bills he has introduced this year. In each case he has combined two separate bills. The first one was with regard to the post office services. I was in favour of one section of it, that referring to the possibility of doing away with the old tender system and having the carriers of mails paid on some regular basis. I think a good many of us were in favour of that aspect of the bill. But I have a suspicion that that was put in to cover up the other principle contained in the bill, that is the return to patronage, and some of us are so much opposed to the patronage system that we had to vote down the entire bill for that reason. We did not get a chance to discuss the first part which in my judgment was good.

Regarding the bill now before the house, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said that the hon. member for Bellechasse the other night spent almost all his time discussing one particular phase of his bill, that is as to what particular class of returned men would come under the provisions of the measure. I myself think what the hon. member for Bellechasse said had a great deal of merit. But it was only a little sugar-coating, as I think most hon. members recognized, in order that he might get away with the second part of the bill which is very vicious indeed. I am more than surprised that members of the Liberal party at large should countenance a bill of this kind. I think particularly of hon. members that I know from the west. I see the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar); he is actually willing to concede the point and let this bill go to the committee. I am astonished that he should take such a position. I look at some other hon. members. I know there are certain members of the Liberal party who are willing to go to almost any length in reverting to the patronage system. I had hoped, however, that there would be a large number of hon. members of the Liberal party who would not under any conditions accede to any proposal of that kind.

When I saw the bill I thought probably it was just one of those bills which from time to time come before the house, and upon which a few private members have a chance to air their views and possibly to secure some publicity. I am disappointed indeed that the government, speaking through the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret), whose remarks were to some extent evidently endorsed by other hon. members of the cabinet, can possibly consider anything of the sort. I know there are one or two members of the cabinet who in the past as private members have unblushingly advocated a return to the patronage system. As a matter of fact I now see one of them smiling at me across the floor of the chamber. We rather admired the frankness of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who, while a private member, expressed such views. I submit, however, that he must now remember that as a member of the cabinet he occupies a different kind of position, and has responsibilities which as a private member he could not possibly have felt.

I take it that in advancing to any degree the passage of a bill of this sort the government assumes a decided responsibility. The right hon. the leader of the opposition has referred to that section dealing with professional and technical positions which, under the bill, would be given over to patronage. I should like to deal for a moment with the possibility of doing away with the control of the civil service commission over outside service. If that is good for the outside services it is just as good for the inside services.

Mr. BOULANGER: Quite right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) admits that. I take it that this bill represents the thin end of the wedge, and if it could possibly be passed this year—I think that is almost inconceivable—or if it could even receive consideration in committee this year, or next year, or at a later session, we would undoubtedly have another bill to do away with the control of the civil service commission over inside services. As a people are we prepared to take a retrograde step of that kind?

I confess that when I saw Liberals in this chamber holding such a large majority I became fearful that at this session, if not indeed for the whole parliament, we would have a stand-pat policy. I confess, however, that I did not realize that they would lend themselves to retrograde policies of this kind; I could not have conceived it. I think there are at least a certain number of hon. members in the Liberal party who have higher ideals for the future of their country.

Let me read section 49 as it stands to-day? The first part of it reads:

> Promotion is a change from one class to another class with a higher maximum compensation, and vacancies shall be filled, as far as is consistent with the best interests of the civil service, by promotion.

Surely that principle is a good one.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If it works.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Someone suggests, "If it works." I am aware that our civil service commission has not been as efficient as it should have been, and one reason, as we all know, is the pressure of hangers on who have continually been trying to undermine the commission. We know that. It has not been as efficient as it should have been.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is the fault not in the commission itself, and in its organization?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think there have been faults in the commission, yes. One fault is the way in which appointments are made to the civil service commission. Very often people who are partisan in their points of view are appointed to that commission. That is one of the real difficulties.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does the hon. member wish to leave in the hands of partisans the appointments of all civil servants in the dominion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that one difficulty has been that appointments to the civil service commission have too often been made as a reward of party service. But I think it is quite possible that we may have appointments on some basis other than that of partisanship. If I may be allowed to mention one instance, I think our friend Mr. Bland is not partisan, but there are others who are. This has been one of the difficulties in the past. But if the personnel of the commission is not what it should be it is within the competence of the present parliament to see that we have better people on the civil service commission than there are at the present time or have been from time to time. There is no doubt about that. If the government does not feel itself capable of selecting any one who is non-partisan, I think some plan could be devised by which the house at large could make nominations, or whereby some body other than this house could make nominations in a non-partisan fashion. There are in Canada people who can be trusted to be fair. In times past that has not always been the case with regard to some members of civil service commissions.

Again, I quite frankly admit that in the conduct of its business the civil service commission has not always been efficient, but I do say that again and again to my knowledge they have been under considerable pressure from partisans outside the commission, and again and again we have had whole blocks of appointments taken outside the control of the commission, sometimes even with the nominal acquiescence of that commission. I should like to read another clause:

2. Promotions shall be made for merit by the commission upon such examination, reports, tests, records, ratings or recommendations as the commission may by regulation prescribe.

In the bill these clauses are to be entirely swept away. Promotion by merit is a fundamental principle, but the suggestion is now made that about 25,000 people are no longer to be allowed promotion by merit but are to be promoted simply because such promotions suit the whim of some individuals who for the moment hold power.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having expired, we will revert to government orders.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED APPROVAL SUBJECT TO LEGISLATION MAKING PROVISIONS EFFECTIVE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the tariff arrangements between Canada and the United States, and particularly their application to the production of furniture. I made the statement that many of the furniture manufacturing plants are located in the small towns and have developed as a result of years of thrift and hard work on the part of men of moderate means. This industry does not represent a great accumulation of capital. In many instances the furniture factories offer the only means of employment in certain municipalities.

May I place on record figures from the bureau of statistics indicating the importance of the industry. With the permission of the house I shall place on Hansard figures showing the number of employees in the industry:

Year—	Employees
1925	8,987
1926	9,800
1927	11,038
1928	12,539
1929	13,082
1930	11,980
1931	10,007
1932	8,348
1933	7,722

Index numbers of employment based on 1926 figures:

October 1
1930	110.1
1931	98.2
1932	72.9
1933	71.7
1935	76.9

It will thus be seen that there has been a steady improvement in this industry. It is quite obvious that if a flood of furniture, made in the southern states under conditions not similar to those pertaining here, is allowed to come into this country, this would have a devastating effect upon the industry. It may be argued that we have nothing much to fear from the furniture industry in the southern states, but I should like to disabuse the minds of hon. members by quoting Representative Lambeth, who made a speech in the house of representatives on January 17, 1936. Speaking on this agreement, he is quoted on page 596 of the Congressional Record as follows:

The most important Canadian concessions to the United States provide for direct duty reductions on items named in what is known as schedule 1 of the agreement. The grant to the United States on all other commodities of the lowest rates now or heretofore paid by any non-British country in place of the higher general rates is commonly known as the most favoured nation rate.

Referring to the arbitrary valuations, he said:

The south was especially hard hit by this system. Of particular interest to my own state of North Carolina is the reduction of Canadian tariffs on furniture of 40 per cent. Before 1930 the United States shipped to Canada furniture in the value of $4,667,000. This has fallen to $471,000, or a 90 per cent decrease.

If this forty per cent discount in the tariff is invoked, there is nothing to prevent a return of those conditions which prevailed prior to 1930. It may be said that furniture prices are exceedingly high, but I should like to point out some facts that were brought out by the price spreads commission. As was explained the other day by the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), whereas in 1926 there were 1,645 retail furniture dealers in Canada, by 1934 the number had been reduced to 1,157 largely through the elimination of the smaller dealers. The commission found that the monopolistic control of the large stores and chain units had placed the producers at the mercy of these fewer channels of distribution. I should like to point out that while wholesale prices were reduced substantially during the depression, retail prices did not follow suit. As a matter of fact the retail mark-up on furniture, which was formerly around sixty per cent, was brought up to 100 per cent to take care of the overhead costs of some of the larger places of distribution. The producers of furniture were exploited by the mass buyers and the consumer did not receive the advantage of the low wholesale prices. These facts were brought out before the commission and they can be verified by reference to the report.

In 1930 when the duty of thirty per cent was placed on furniture, the industry used principally native woods. Some mirrors were imported, mainly from within the empire, as well as a small amount of hardware. But conditions have changed and the demand to-day is for a different type of furniture. Furniture sold in Canada to-day follows closely United States lines and as a result large quantities of lumber indigenous to the southern states have to be imported. It is also necessary to bring in high grade veneers and fancy hardware. All these items must be brought in under a substantial tariff barrier to enter into the composition of Canadian furniture. The style of furniture has changed very materially. In this country we suffer from what is known as a lag. In the United States they are from six to twelve months ahead of us in design, and in many cases their discarded lines of furniture are thrown on the market at sacrifice prices. This forty per cent discount on the tariff rates on the discarded lines at reduced prices will prove a great hardship to the manufacturers of Canada. With the permission of the house I should like to place on Hansard figures showing importations of furniture from the United States for the last ten years. They are as follows:

1926	1,821,705
1927	2,149,867
1928	2,935,208
1929	4,136,410
1930	2,977,572
1931	1,356,994
1932	417,558
1933	414,475
1934	475,232

It will be seen that in 1929 importations were valued at $4,136,410, but by 1934 these had been reduced to $475,232. During the period from 1926 to 1930 the importations became so large that the government of that day put into effect regulations which were really equivalent to a forty-two per cent duty. These regulations were put into effect by the Liberal government then in power. Furniture can be made in the southern states more cheaply than in Canada because of their close proximity to their woods, because of the cheaper labour available and the larger units of production. For many years the furniture trade in the United States has been unprofitable, as is shown by a table compiled by an association of accountants. This table, which I should like to place on Hansard, shows a drop from a profit from 3·42 per cent in 1928 to a loss of 6·90 per cent in 1934. The figures are as follows:

1928	3.42 per cent profit on sales
1929	1.06 per cent profit on sales
1930	3.00 per cent loss on sales
1931	10.93 per cent loss on sales
1932	23.26 per cent loss on sales
1933	4.21 per cent loss on sales
1934	6.90 per cent loss on sales

This accountants' review of the industry in the United States shows clearly that the losses in the past five years have been sufficient to wipe out the operating profits of the preceding five years. The result is that for a period of ten years the industry as a whole has operated at a loss of $1.63 for every $100 worth of furniture shipped. In the light of these facts it is quite evident that the slaughter of discontinued lines at heavy discounts has entailed severe losses, and it is the sale of these goods that has worked such havoc on the business of this country.

I should like to say a word or two about wages. During the years 1931 to 1935 this industry, in common with practically all others, suffered from a tremendous drop in values and a reduction in trade. These factors brought about conditions whereby over thirty factories were closed, wages were reduced to a low level and a serious shrinkage in the reserves of various plants took place. It was not the wish of the manufacturers to reduce wages, but the exigencies of the times compelled this action. In the spring of 1935 the Ontario government passed the Industrial Standards Act. The furniture industry was among the first to negotiate an agreement with their employees under the provisions of this act, and I am pleased to be able to say that this industry is now operating under an agreement between employees and employers based on this act. Progress is being made and the standards have been improved. Stabilization of wages has been of great value to the industry, and it is now on a sound basis.

Under the Collective Labour Agreements Extension Act of Quebec the furniture manufacturing industry of that province is now operating on a collective agreement basis. In British Columbia the industry is governed by minimum wage laws, but there is at the present time no legislation whatever governing minimum wage rates in the United States. As the manufacturing industry of Canada represents about fifty per cent of the value of production of the country, as pointed out by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) at page 716 of Hansard of this session, surely the government should stop, look and listen before they interfere with the tariff on any industry without first having a thorough investigation.

I wish to make a few quotations from the report of the royal commission on price spreads with reference to the furniture industry. The commission says:

> The physical volume of production is estimated to have decreased from 1930-1933 by forty-four per cent, as compared with a decrease of sixty per cent in sales value. Even while demand was normal, the productive capacity of the furniture industry was not well balanced, so that this sudden drop in volume necessitated adjustments of the most painful kind. Surprising reductions have been accomplished in the overhead expenses, which are estimated to have declined over forty per cent from 1930-1933, but in spite of these economies the struggle for survival resulted in a heavy reduction in the return to labour. It was pointed out that during the depression nearly every furniture factory in the country was threatened with losses which could lead only to bankruptcy, and the efforts of the individual operators to remain in business resulted in the reduction in the general level of furniture prices well below the cost of production.

[Mr. Edwards.]

This is another quotation from the commission's report:

> A general adjustment in the price of manufactured commodities was, of course, necessary in view of business conditions, but there is little doubt that furniture prices have fallen more drastically than those of almost any other important industry.

The commission further says:

> The industry is not dominated by any one company or group of companies and as a result of extreme competition, efforts to maintain proper margins during the past few years have been conspicuously unsuccessful.

And in conclusion:

> In summary this industry presents an illustration of a completely disorganized body of producers, for the most part privately financed, dominated by no one organization or group of companies.

Just to show the house how serious the situation of the furniture industry is, may I quote from an article by Mr. Mihell, published in the riding of my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), in The Strathroy Age-Dispatch, dated February 6, 1936:

> H. Gordon Mihell, manager of the Middlesex Furniture Company, Limited, Strathroy, makers of bedroom, dining room and library furniture, yesterday gave this journal a statement concerning the effect which the new lowered tariff on furniture is having on the Canadian industry.

The article, after dealing with one or two other matters, proceeds:

> Mr. Mihell says: "The lowering of the tariff on furniture from the United States will certainly curtail production in this country to a great extent. Operations in Canada are not large enough to compete against the large American interests operating in the states, particularly the southern states, where wages are extremely low and where the firms are located usually in the centre of large areas of natural resources."

The article concludes by quoting Mr. Mihell as follows:

> Should this tariff remain unchanged, it will unquestionably necessitate curtailing our production, and this action will reflect back on our employees.

That I think is the exact position of the furniture industry, and I sincerely hope that before the government finally decides that this business will be subjected to a forty per cent decrease in the tariff, a thorough investigation will be made by the board that was set up for this particular purpose, namely, the tariff board, before which everyone who is interested can go and state his case, present the facts, and receive the judgment of the board. But to adjust the tariff schedules relating to a particular industry without first making a proper investigation is an entirely different matter from having a scientific adjustment of the tariff, as we had hoped we would have when this tariff board was set up.

The greatest problem of the day in industry outside the problem of unemployment—of course, that is our worst, and anything that tends to aggravate the unemployment situation is certainly to be deplored—the greatest bugbear of the industrialists of this country to-day—and I have some knowledge of industry—is the instability of the tariff. Industry is never sure from year to year just what is going to happen with tariffs, and it would be splendid if the tariff were taken out of politics entirely, as it should be. It should not be a political matter at all. Everyone should have an opportunity to present his case before the tariff board, and if he can show proof that the tariff should be lowered, well and good, or if he can show proof that the tariff should be raised, an adjustment should be made accordingly. But to make these tariff changes just for the sake of getting votes, for that is what the situation boils down to, to throw the interests of an industry into the political maelstrom, and without any proper investigation, arbitrarily to alter the tariff with respect to any industry, is not the way to do business.

That is all I have to say on this subject at the moment, but when the items in the tariff schedules come before the house and the bill is under consideration I shall have something to say on other lines of industry. In the meantime I hope the government will seriously consider, when it comes to bring down the budget, making adjustments in the tariff that will be satisfactory to this industry and give it a chance of success.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply interested in the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Edwards). We have been sitting here quietly now for some time, listening to this discussion back and forth across the floor of the house, on high and low tariffs, and if there is one thing which it has abundantly proved to me it is this simple fact, that you cannot change the tariff either up or down in this country without hurting just about as many people as you help. I think it is tragic to have that brought so vividly to the attention of this group of 245 serious-minded Canadians who have come here to try to find a solution of the difficulties which confront us, and to have that fact emphasized so many times.

One month ago I stood in my place in the house and said that I hoped that the promises which were either implied or definitely made either on the platform or through the press by the Liberal party during the campaign would be implemented in such a way that the credit of the dominion would be used for the benefit of the people. I visioned in that, Mr. Speaker, some sort of solution for the difficulties confronting us, but thus far I have seen nothing of the kind even hinted at in our proceedings up to date. We seem to have no thought of using our national credit to the advantage of this country. The fact that we take our tariffs so seriously has impressed me tremendously. When it is found that two men become exceedingly earnest over a question, so much so that each calls the other a liar and says that he is crazy and all that sort of thing, one can generally conclude that both are wrong and that the truth lies somewhere between them.

There are two parties here, made up of intelligent men; and may I, Mr. Speaker, express my appreciation of the type of men that we have in this parliament. I have great respect for them, on both sides; they are, on the whole, earnest, sincere men, anxious to do that which will help their country. To think that these men would be opposing each other with such vehemence over a matter like tariffs is to me a rather disagreeable thought. The truth lies somewhere between the two, or in some sort of adjustment.

This reminds me of a friend of mine who had periodically a serious attack of pains in the side of his face. Some of his friends knew something about doctoring, and they used to come in and say, "You must use this medicine, this ointment, this liniment; you must rub it in just right," all favouring external applications. He had some other friends who said, "No, take some herbs; take some internal remedies; take some drugs; they will cure you." And he tried first one set of remedies and then the other. Neither of them worked; and these men, evidently certain that a cure lay somewhere between the two, argued with each other and blamed each other for the patient's failure to recover. Each party listened to the other so much that gradually the men who believed in external applications began to think that maybe some medicine inside would help, and the men who believed in internal applications gradually came to believe that some liniment might be useful. Finally there came a time when the advice of one side was almost like the advice of the other.

We have reached this point in the Dominion of Canada at present. The two parties have modified their views until they almost exactly resemble one another. One advocates internal treatment and the other external treatment, neither being able to cure the patient. This man finally got into a distracted condition, just as Canada is getting into the same state, and he went to a chiropractor who, after giving him an examination, discovered that there was a dislocation in the cervical vertebra of this man's neck; he adjusted it, and the patient recovered.

I fancy that some sort of adjustment is needed in this our economic body in order that it may recover. I wonder what sort of adjustment is necessary. I believe the serious consideration of parliament should be directed to this question of adjustment. I have become convinced, whether other members of the house share these views or not, that a cure does not lie in either of these two treatments. I am very much in sympathy with the remark of the hon. gentleman who just sat down that if there is a truth regarding tariffs—and we will all grant there must be—that truth should be discovered by experts and not by partisans arguing with each other out on the hustings, through the press, each one a little less informed about the truth of the matter than the other and arriving nowhere.

In my own constituency I find some very striking illustrations of the truth of the opinion that tariffs counteract each other. There are a number of people in the constituency who produce fruit. If we cut down materially the duties on fruit and let it in free to Alberta, two-thirds or three-fourths of my constituents will be very happy, but the rest of my constituents who raise fruit will be ruined. That is a serious matter.

Again, in my constituency there are two sugar factories. If we should raise the duty on sugar a little higher this would help tremendously the men engaged in the industry of beet raising, but if we did that we should hurt terribly all the people who have to buy sugar. I do not know where you could go, Mr. Speaker, to discover a better illustration of what tariffs do and do not do than in that one little constituency of mine. I think it is probably typical of the whole Dominion of Canada. And I am prepared to ask, in all seriousness and earnestness, and with a cooperative spirit: Do you suppose that there is in Canada any tariff that does not hurt pretty well as much as it helps?

The nature of our problem has been pretty well developed by speakers on both sides of the house. I think everybody recognizes clearly this simple fact, that our task is to restore internal purchasing power to the hands of the people. The question is, how to get it there. Will trade do this? It is true that if we protect a given industry, the people employed in it will undoubtedly have added purchasing power put into their hands through the development of that industry. But if we protect that industry we hurt another; we take purchasing power out of the hands of people over here and put it into the hands of people over there. And the question is: Is that going to do any good in the long run? All that it does is to set one section of Canada against another. Really I cannot see, looking back over the last twenty years, that it has done very much except that.

Then, does trade necessarily increase or decrease purchasing power? Let us, as intelligent men and women, ask ourselves that question seriously. If you will pardon another reference to my constituency, there are in it two little towns; one is Raymond, the town in which I live and which is deeply interested in sugar manufacturing. Thirty miles away is another town, Coalhurst, which is primarily interested in the development of the coal industry. Years ago, when many more men worked in the sugar industry than now, since machines have displaced men, and when many more men worked in the coal industry than now, for the same reason, there was some advantage in trading coal for sugar. But to-day, when machines have largely displaced men, and purchasing power is not going into the hands of men and women, it does exceedingly little good to trade Raymond sugar over to Coalhurst for Coalhurst coal, because most of the people of Raymond have not the purchasing power to buy the sugar they need, and what is the good of trading sugar for coal, when Raymond people could not buy the coal when it was shipped to them? Now, if there were a tariff barrier between the two communities, and governments were able to put a tax through tariffs on the passage of sugar and coal from one town to the other, you might say that there would be some advantage to the governments, because it would give them an excuse for imposing taxation. Also if there were a railroad between the two places and money could be made by operating it, you might say that some purchasing power would result; but that is about all the advantage I can see that could accrue from that form of trade. I am open to be convinced on this matter, but it will take more than has appeared here in the last five or six days, because the arguments have been entirely aside from the real point at issue. If there is this tremendous advantage in tariffs, surely someone should have found it out during these many years, and we should have appointed, long ago, a tariff commission of experts to settle this matter once and for all and have taken it out of party politics.

The next question is, even granting that trade gives one increase of purchasing power: Is there any chance of materially increasing trade? When you remember that there are 1,250,000 people on relief in the Dominion of Canada, with hundreds of thousands of people out of work, your problem is going to be this, to find such lucrative avenues of trade as will give you sufficient purchasing power to take these people off relief and put them to work. You will then have to increase your trade to a most astonishing degree. I doubt seriously if you have any chance of increasing your trade anywhere near enough to accomplish that end.

In the first place, what caused this thing called economic nationalism? Why have the nations raised these tariff barriers? Why did they discontinue freer trade? We are all, or a great many of us, worshipping at the feet of trade, dreaming of the time when we can get back the Dunning budget and things like that which are going to be panaceas for us. Why did we ever depart from these advantageous ways? We can get some sort of idea by reading this little excerpt from which I quoted the last time I addressed the house. It is in the Times trade and engineering supplement, under date of Saturday, December 17, 1932. I read it because it indicates why nations in the first place began to limit trade:

> If each nation gave to its own people full internal purchasing power, i.e., ability to absorb its own production, none would have any objection to exporting 10, 20 or 50 per cent of that production, and receiving imports of a similar value; it is because each has insufficient purchasing power internally to absorb its own production that each is anxious to export and unwilling to import.

There is the difficulty. If lack of purchasing power caused the nations to put up tariff barriers, how will you, merely by lowering the tariff barriers, increase that internal purchasing power? It hardly looks reasonable, does it? Again there is this difficulty among the nations, that they all have a great need of self-sufficiency. Just here at this point I should like to read an excerpt from an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Citizen. I am going to throw the blame entirely on these newspapers instead of taking any myself. I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of Tuesday, March 3, 1936, which is rather recent:

> In 1929, Germany imported nearly forty per cent of the wheat it consumed. In 1934 the imports had been reduced to about ten per cent.
> It is one of the planks in the Nazi platform to seek German "self-sufficiency."

Will the mere lowering of our tariffs cause Germany to change that policy? I continue reading the editorial:

> Nor is the self-sufficiency policy in wheat confined to Germany. Italy, France and Great Britain have adopted policies along similar lines and are concentrating on "saving agriculture" and making their people self-supporting in the matter of food. Other nations are engaged to the same purpose, and that is the chief reason why Canadian wheat exports are not what they once were.

So those who are so free in laying the blame entirely on the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) might do well to read very seriously that passage in a good Liberal newspaper. Has the need for self-sufficiency changed? I submit that it becomes greater all the time because of the close proximity of war.

The next point is that every nation needs a favourable trade balance. I was much impressed, sir, with the remarks made so earnestly by the right hon. leader of the opposition when he pointed out that one of the dangers arising out of this trade agreement would be that in the course of a few years we might build up against ourselves an unfavourable trade balance by buying from the United States more goods than we could sell to that country, thereby placing ourselves in a difficulty from which it would take us years and years to extricate ourselves. The right hon. gentleman knows exactly how serious that matter is, because he was placed right in that position. There are many nations on the face of the earth that have found themselves in that difficulty; one of the greatest of these is Japan. Japan discovered that she had a very large unfavourable trade balance. It is a rule of the present economic system that a nation must sell more goods than it buys. Honestly, Mr. Speaker, if you have fifty-four nations in the world, each one trying to sell more than it buys, have you a possible situation at all? I submit that you have a thoroughly impossible situation. This is what gives rise to intense international rivalry over trade and thereby to war, and under the present system it is utterly impossible to avoid that situation. Japan realized very clearly that she had to reduce that unfavourable trade balance, and that is exactly the reason why Japan is encroaching so seriously upon our markets, underselling Great Britain right under her nose. I should like to quote some statements which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 10, 1936—

Mr. DUPUIS: The same good Liberal newspaper.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —in an article entitled: Japan Sets New Records, from the Christian Science Monitor. I notice some hon. member says that this is the same Liberal newspaper. I hope he heard me say that it was taken from the Christian Science Monitor, which no one would accuse of being a Liberal newspaper:

Japan's advance in commerce and industry proceeded steadily throughout the year 1935, and several new records were established in trade and production....

These facts cannot be challenged.

Figures up to December 25th reveal exports amounting to 2,547,625,000 yen, and imports of 2,566,762,000 yen. Almost an even balance of trade was achieved....

That is, after underselling the nations of the world and taking away our markets left and right, Japan has not yet arrived at an even trade balance. In other words, she has not yet begun to cut down that unfavourable balance. What will she do in order to achieve that end? She must cut down that unfavourable trade balance, or she faces extinction as a nation.

.. the excess of imports amounting to only 19,137,000 yen, a reduction of 103,932,000 yen by comparison with the corresponding figure in 1934.... Japan led the world in rayon production during 1935 with an output of 224,042,000 pounds, as against America's 210,000,000 pounds. By exporting 2,711,265,000 square metres of cotton cloth at a value of 491,458,000 yen Japan set all time records, both in volume and value. While Japan's main exports are cotton and silk goods, raw silk, rubber goods, canned food stuffs, bicycles, and a host of miscellaneous goods, the advance of the country's heavy industries should not be overlooked.

Like the Soviet union, Japan is going through a process of thoroughgoing industrialization. In 1932, Japan's imports under the general heading of machinery were more than five times greater than its exports. Now exports of machinery are about two-thirds of the imports. Japan is successfully competing with Great Britain not only in textiles but in textile machinery....

Japan is shipping abroad about ten times as many looms as it is purchasing abroad. Japan exported 539 motor cars in the first eleven months of 1935, as against 349 in the corresponding month of 1934. Exports of railway locomotives, railway cars and accessories during the first nine months of 1935 were valued at 20,000,000 yen. These figures are insignificant in themselves; but they point to Japan's probable future role as a purveyor of industrial and railway machinery, rolling stock and equipment for Asiatic countries.

I submit that in almost every one of those items Japan is competing with Canada for trade. My time will hardly permit me to give a number of other figures I have prepared, but I should like to mention a statement which I have taken from the Western Producer of July 11, 1935:

The Filipinos are gliding on the streets of Manila on bicycles made in Japan and sold in the Philippines at $5.65 each.

How are we going to beat that?

Russia has always been an importer of newsprint, cement and agricultural implements.

In 1934, Russia exported $36,000,000 worth of tractors, ploughs, mowing machines and other agricultural implements.

Again competing with Canada.

Russia no longer imports cement or paper and may at any time in the near future become an exporter to the world of these products.

Russia to-day is the largest producer in the world of plywood and the second largest in the world in the production of oil and pig iron....

She is competing with Canada in each of those items.

With Japan exporting lead pencils, matches, electric lamp bulbs, automobile tires, rubber boots, bathing suits, silk shirts, and stockings, along with a choice collection of rayon goods, toys, steel pipe, automobiles, bicycles, and even jackets for our "hot dogs," it behooves us to forget the open door in any other part of the world and to open the door to greater purchasing power at home.

That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly the contention I believe we all must be ready to support and take very seriously to heart. There are other extracts I should like to read, but I have not time to go into them all; they all point to the very rapid development of Japan and Russia in the export trade of the world, where they are coming into direct conflict with us.

The next point which I think we need to consider seriously is this: Is there any chance of recovering this trade? Let me read to you, Mr. Speaker, an extract from The Agricultural Situation and Outlook, published by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce in 1936. Let us mark these things very carefully and see what chance we have in this situation.

Agricultural protection in Europe has been increasing since 1925—

That was back in the days of the good old Liberal administration.

—and one of the characteristics of the depression has been the continuous narrowing of the free market open to exports of farm produce.

A summary of the increases in duties alone would be misleading as to the importance of restrictive measures, because the institution of quotas, milling regulations, import monopolies, licensing systems, and exchange controls operates even more effectively to cut off imports. The wide adoption of these barriers to trade was brought out by the Swedish publication Index, of February, 1935, in which it was shown that state trading monopolies were employed by two countries, import monopolies by seventeen, import licences by twenty-seven, import quotas by twenty-seven, export licences by thirteen, export quotas by sixteen, export subsidies by fourteen and exchange controls by thirty-six countries.

I submit that if the Liberal administration, or all of us working together, hope to solve the hopeless economic situation that exists in Canada to-day and put the unemployed to work by materially increasing our trade, against a situation like that, we have an optimism that is not justified.

Let me read something more, which is rather interesting as coming from the Secretary of the Treasury of the Roosevelt administration. I have always been impressed during the last two or three years by the fact that if there was anything to be gained in the way of export markets, the United States, having the great advantages that they have, and certainly being ready to go after any advantage that can be gained, would have obtained those markets. Now we find Mr. Morgenthau in a radio address on May 13, 1935, using the following words, which I submit should give us serious thought:

> In estimating our foreign trade in relation to our monetary policy, we may as well face the question whether we wish to sell abroad vast quantities of goods that the buyers cannot pay for, unless we lend them the money.

Those few words contain a very large meaning. That is the conclusion that this man has come to after a trial of both the blasting policy and the other policy.

Hon. members may ask me: What is your solution? It is not my purpose to-night to state the solution. At present I am discussing this proposal that so many hon. members seem to think offers a solution. I maintain, as two hon. members from our group have already maintained, that this matter of tariffs is neither here nor there; it simply does not make any serious difference to the situation. It is all right for us to work for an increase of trade, but to delude ourselves into thinking that is the way to solve our problems is altogether unbecoming to intelligent men and women. Let me read an extract from an article in Harper's Monthly for January, 1936, called The Fallacy of Conquest, written by Nathaniel Peffer. It may be that this man does not know what he is talking about, but he writes as though he does. He closes his article with this remarkable statement:

> For a way out of the economic dilemma it is better to turn back into ourselves—

That is the stand of the Conservative party.

> —reexamine our economic premises, and make the fundamental changes which are called for by the fact that the first epoch in the age of mechanization has irrevocably gone. The outlets must be found by reorganization at home, by making it possible for the disinherited at home to buy the goods we have hitherto counted on the heathen in the back woods to pay for.

At some later time I shall take the opportunity, if I am permitted, to say something about the sort of readjustment that, as I see it, should be made.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): I trust, Mr. Speaker, that my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) will not consider it unbecoming or unintelligent on my part if I do not on this occasion attempt to deal with the argument which he has advanced. My time is limited, and rather than endeavour to deal with the question whether or not increase of trade offers a solution for our economic problems I shall confine myself to a consideration of the particular trade pact which is now before the house.

Prior to the introduction of the resolution to approve the Canada-United States trade pact, I had anticipated that the government would come forward with the proposed agreement, point out its benefits and advantages to Canada, and on that basis ask its adoption. But that course has not been pursued. Some private members supporting the government have outlined some of the particular sectional benefits which they hope will accrue to some electors whom they represent. The government itself as represented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in their addresses have asked the adoption of this agreement on three grounds: First, that no one other than the Liberal party and the present Prime Minister could have made a trade agreement with the United States; second, that the former government through its Prime Minister offered to make an agreement in the same terms or practically the same terms, and therefore members of this party are estopped from opposing this agreement; and, third, that the government and those who support the trade agreement are actuated by pure motives and good intentions.

With respect to the first ground, that no one other than the present Prime Minister and the Liberal party could have made a trade agreement with the United States, it seems to me that the history of trade agreements and trade negotiations with the United States, outlined by the Prime Minister and subsequently by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) clearly demonstrated how untenable is the statement of the Prime Minister to which I have referred. From long before I was born down to 1932 or 1933 the United States have been selling to Canada vast quantities and values of goods far in excess of what we were selling to them, resulting in heavy adverse trade balances annually. They were selling to us manufactured or partly manufactured goods, and we in the main were selling to them raw or partly processed raw material. Despite that favourable trade balance to the United States, they in 1922 raised their tariffs against our comparatively small exports to that country. Why? I hope I do not give offence to our American neighbours when I answer my own question: It was because the United States have been the most aggressive exporting nation in the world, while at the same time they have endeavoured to restrict imports as far as possible.

In the face of the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922 we did nothing. For eight long years we did nothing. Every time a proposal to increase tariffs against the United States came before the house the then government, led by the present Prime Minister, took the attitude that we in Canada should not retaliate. We were told, "Do not let us provoke Washington." Now I ask: Why not provoke Washington? The question was asked then, and I think I correctly interpret the answer which was given by that government through the present Prime Minister when I say that the answer was: Do not let us retaliate or provoke Washington, because if we do they may remove from their free list some of Canada's products which are now going into that country. This is just the same bogey as is offered us to-day as a reason why we should make the vast concessions that we are asked to make in the present trade agreement. Eight long years of non-provocative action did not result in any reductions in the United States tariff against us, nor any suggestions from that country that a trade agreement should be made between Canada and the United States.

In 1930, just before the election, the United States further increased their tariffs against Canada and raised further barriers against Canadian producers. In July of 1930 there was an election, and in August of that year the Conservative party took office. In the fall a special session was called, and at that session some items in our general tariff were increased against all countries, including the United States. In the sessions of 1931 and 1932 there were further increases in our general tariff against all countries, including the United States. Was that provocative action? From the point of view of Liberals, they would say that it was provocative action. Did the United States then increase their tariff against us? They did not. Then, in 1932 the imperial trade agreements were negotiated by the Conservative government led by the present leader of the opposition.

The increases in our tariff of 1930, 1931 and 1932 impeded the flow of United States manufactured products into Canada, but the empire trade agreements made provision whereby part of that which United States interests had been exporting to Canada was supplied by the British empire. Then, and then only, for the first time was there talk from Washington about a trade agreement with Canada; then, and then only, for the first time did the American press carry reports suggesting that a trade agreement be made with Canada. This was caused, I submit, by pressure upon the Washington government from vast industrial interests in the United States whose export trade to this country was being transferred to the United Kingdom and other parts of the British empire. With that background to the picture I leave it to the judgment of this country as to whether the present Prime Minister or the present leader of the opposition, if both gentlemen were willing to make an agreement on practically the same basis, should be painted in the foreground as the person most likely to get a trade pact with the United States. I submit the statement that only the present Prime Minister could have concluded an agreement is but a vain boast.

I now turn to the allegation that the former government offered practically the same terms as those now embodied in the trade agreement, an allegation based upon a letter dated November 14, 1934, written by the Canadian Minister to the Secretary of State for the United States. To parts of that letter I shall refer, but as it has been read in the house I shall not repeat the whole of it. This letter, which has been called the basis of negotiations, suggested concessions which might be made mutually by each country, and then suggested further concessions in addition to those which were mutual which should be made by the United States.

Paragraph (c) stipulated a reduction by fifty per cent of the existing United States rates of duty, as authorized by the Tariff Act of 1934, on a specified number of natural products, including, among other things, lumber, fish, potatoes, milk and cream, live cattle, a number of other agricultural products, and several minerals both metallic and non-metallic. One need only examine the schedules of the present agreement to see that there has not been a fifty per cent reduction in the items specified, much less those included in the general words of that section.

Turning to paragraph (d), in the basis for negotiations we find provision for a reduction of the existing rates of duty by the United States on a number of partly or wholly manufactured products of Canada— and I pause to emphasize the words "partly or wholly manufactured products of Canada"—including some processed natural products and other items referred to therein.

As I said, the agreement before us does not give a fifty per cent reduction as specified in paragraph (c), except in respect of some few items, and we have not received the reductions with respect to the partly manufactured or processed articles to which reference is made in paragraph (d). I should like to ask where in the basis of negotiations there was any suggestion that Canada should forego her right to fix fair market values under section 36, subsection 2, and section 43 of the Customs Act, or where there was any suggestion that we should be restricted in fixing the rate of discount under section 37. There was not a suggestion. It is true that in a letter of December 27, 1934, written by the Secretary of State of the United States to the Canadian Minister, the Secretary of State said:

> I suggest that to the proposed outline of discussion—
> Outline of discussion.
> —there be added the question of methods of determining the value of merchandise for duty purposes in either country, a matter which I consider of importance in the proposed negotiations.

But where, sir, I ask you, was there any such provision in the basis of negotiations, or where is there any record that the former Prime Minister would have agreed to or considered the concessions asked? Then, I ask: Where is there any provision in the basis of negotiations for concessions made by the present Prime Minister in the trade agreement containing a provision such as he has included in a letter written by the Canadian Legation to the Secretary of State for the United States, concurrently with the execution of this agreement, in which in clause (d) it is agreed that in interpreting the words "of a class or kind made or produced in Canada" provision will be made to make it clear that the phrase "made or produced in Canada" in this context means "made or produced in Canada in commercial quantities." That letter does not clearly define what is meant by "made or produced in commercial quantities." But if we have reference to the notes exchanged between the government of Canada and that of Japan almost concurrently with the letter to which I have just referred we find there a definition, because in item 1 of the letter of December 26, 1935, we find the statement that "the classification 'goods of a class or kind made or produced in Canada,' as it appears in the customs tariff, will be restricted to goods which are of a class or kind made or produced in Canada in quantities sufficient to supply at least ten per cent of the normal Canadian consumption." The provisions contained in that letter which was signed concurrently with the trade agreement are just as effective, so far as they affect industry and the people of this country, as though they had been made a term of the agreement.

Find me in the basis of negotiations any suggestion of limiting our exports to the United States as to kind, such as the limitations in this trade agreement upon our exports of cod and haddock to the United States. It does seem to me that when as a necessary incident to the granting of the favoured nation treatment to the United States they obtained the benefit of direct shipment, thereby injuriously affecting our maritime ports, the government at least might have insisted upon some quid pro quo—although that expression is not liked by a lot of our Liberal friends—for those in the maritime provinces who were going to suffer.

Find me in the basis of negotiations any suggestions that Canada's exports to the United States should be limited to tiny percentages of the normal American consumption, such as the provision in this agreement with respect to cattle. How can it be said that this agreement is substantially the same as was proposed in the basis of negotiations?

If I were required to summarize the difference between this agreement and the proposals contained in the basis of negotiations of November 14, 1934, I would do so with one word—"Jobs"—"Jobs for our people in Canada." The basis of negotiations would have preserved the jobs of those now employed. The trade agreement as presented to the house will in my opinion—I hope to refer to this a little later—destroy some jobs which are now in existence. In my opinion the basis of negotiations would have created jobs for some of our unemployed. In my opinion the present agreement will not on balance serve that purpose.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. LAWSON: I will before I get through; just restrain yourself for a moment.

I come now to the third point: Pure motives and good intentions, as emphasized by my genial friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). The minister conceded, even to those of us who might oppose this agreement, pure motives and good intentions. I do likewise to all. I do not impute to the government that made this agreement a lack of good intentions, but at the same time I am ever mindful that it has been tritely said, "The road to hell is paved with good intentions." No trade agreement would be negotiated by the government of any country in the world if that government did not hope that it would bring some benefit to their country. In my opinion this agreement will unquestionably bring some benefit to Canada. I can readily appreciate that it may bring some immediate benefits to certain of the farmers of this country, but I do say that it will not bring any lasting benefits to the farmers because such benefits cannot be obtained from any mere trade agreement so long as the purchasing power of this dominion is so tremendously reduced by unemployment. There has been expressed in this house a thought which I think will bear repetition, that the finest market the Canadian mixed farmer will ever have is the hungry mouth of the urban and suburban worker, provided that he and his fellow workers have jobs and full pay envelopes. Unquestionably this agreement will bring some benefits, but in arriving at a conclusion as to its usefulness we must balance the detriments against the benefits. On balance, I, for one, find it wanting.

The two most important problems facing Canada, outside the field of pure finance, is finding markets for the disposition of our great surplus of wheat at a price which will bring something like a reasonable return to the growers, and finding jobs for our unemployed. When we realize that 82·9 per cent of our agricultural production is consumed in this country; when we realize that in 1929 Canada imported from the United States 68·6 per cent of all imports, imports which by far exceeded our exports to that country; when we realize that more than fifty per cent of our population to-day is not upon the farms but is in the cities and suburbs, it must be apparent to all that the primary purpose of any trade agreement which is to bring great benefit to this dominion should be not to make tariff reductions which would cause more unemployment, but to try to get for our exports tariff reductions which would aid unemployment. I cannot see where this trade agreement fulfils that necessity. True, it may create some employment in the lumbering industry; true, it may create a few more jobs in the fishing industry, but where is there any provision in the agreement that is going to provide more jobs in the manufacturing industry of this country?

For example, consider our printing industry. A term of this trade agreement which was not even considered in the basis of negotiations is that the tax on advertising in magazines printed in the United States shall be repealed. Do we realize that the printing of American magazines in Canada because of that tax on advertising resulted in an expenditure of $800,000 in the printing industry and brought in through taxes a revenue of $600,000? Do we realize that of that $800,000 which was spent in the printing industry, $320,000 was paid in printer's wages? Do we realize that already 320 members of the printers' union in this country have lost their jobs? By no means have all the American magazines yet taken their printing back to the United States, but they are doing so. Is that providing more employment or losing it? Take the factories manufacturing radio cabinets and equipment for radio. They have let out their employees by hundreds; I am sorry I cannot give the figures. The Minister of Finance, when this question was raised, said: Oh, but the factories that are closing are American concerns with branch factories in this country. Well, Mr. Speaker, does it make one iota of difference whether it is a branch of an American concern or not so long as it is giving jobs to Canadian workers in Canadian factories?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, he did not quote me fully, and consequently not correctly.

Mr. LAWSON: I regret exceedingly that I have not the hon. gentleman's words before me, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I accept any correction he desires to make.

Mr. DUNNING: I added something beyond what my hon. friend quoted, which changes the sense of it entirely.

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry if I have misquoted the hon. gentleman, and if I have a moment left at the end of my remarks I shall come back to that.

American statistics show that there are 1,800 United States branch factories in Canada, with an invested capital of some $4,000,000,000, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that the vast bulk of those branch factories were brought to this country by Conservative protectionist policy under Conservative governments. Now I ask: Does anyone think that Canada as a whole can get any new industries so long as an industry in this country cannot secure the benefits of the special provisions of our tariff laws for goods of a class or kind made in Canada until their production equals ten per cent of Canadian consumption? How on earth will they ever get started under those conditions? Obviously they cannot start with a ten per cent production, and so they are going to have a greater handicap against them in their infant stages than when they have learned to walk and have reached a ten per cent production. I say to the house that the detriments of this trade agreement are not only that it fails on balance to create jobs, but I fear that it will cause a loss of jobs to many now employed, and therefore, because the detriments outweigh the advantages, I shall vote against the agreement.

Now that I have a moment or two left I want to refer to some of the statements that have been made by hon. members in this debate. More than one hon. member who has spoken in support of this agreement accused the Conservative party of following a doctrine of economic nationalism, and even when I enunciate that now, they applaud. They alleged that this trade agreement would be the end of economic nationalism. Well, economic nationalism, as I understand it, is a national opinion on the part of the people in any one country that they should preserve their own domestic market for any products that can be made in their own country, and at the same time unload their exports on other countries of the world. No one realizes better than I do, the fallacy of the doctrine of economic nationalism. But the difference between the doctrine of economic nationalism and that of sacrificing the interests of one's country in order to develop trade is a matter of degree. I do not favour economic nationalism, but if opposing this trade agreement is economic nationalism, then, sir, I must stand convicted.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) introduced into this discussion a note to which I feel called upon to refer. He claimed that this trade agreement was the beginning of the end of economic imperialism. Economic imperialism, I suppose, I might define as a national opinion favourable to trading as far as possible within the British empire rather than with foreign countries. I believe that geographically the natural channels of trade and transportation on the north American continent are north and south. I came to a realization of that fact many, many years ago, but at the same time I concluded that the national cost of directing a large proportion of that trade and transportation east and west was part of the price we pay for the privilege, for the many privileges, of being part and parcel of the British empire. I for one am willing to continue to pay that price. Now, do not misunderstand me. I do not say that this trade agreement will give the United States economic domination in this country, but when I see that during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929, we purchased 68·6 per cent of all our imports from the United States, in 1930, 67·9 per cent, in 1931, 61·5 per cent, and so on, the percentage decreasing each year, and then when I see this trade agreement which is bound to increase again the imports of this country from the United States, I say that this trade agreement is making a serious contribution to the economic domination of this country by the United States.

I want to make a further statement, one that is frequently laughed at, but one which I think must be regarded in all seriousness. If this country ever comes under the economic domination of the United States it will be a question of only a very short time until we are one or more of the states of the American union.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAWSON: I thought that would cause comment, but I still say it and I still believe it.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is harking back to 1911.

Mr. DUPUIS: No truck or trade with the Yankees.

Mr. LAWSON: This is a very different agreement from the one that was proposed in 1911.

Mr. DUPUIS: Where were you in 1911?

Mr. LAWSON: I was right here in Canada, where I have always been. The statement which I made, I made in all seriousness. As individuals I like the people of the United States, but I do not want to come under their laws and under the administration of their laws.

Mr. HOWARD: Get the flag out.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not need to get the flag out, as the hon. member suggests. I am taking up the point of an argument of the hon. member for Selkirk, who wants to end economic imperialism. As I say, I do not want to come under the administration of the laws of the United States. So long as I am able I want to remain in, and promote trade within the British empire, and if so doing is economic imperialism I hope that the Conservative party will always continue in the path of economic imperialism.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house has been discussing the motion before it for nearly a fortnight, almost to the exclusion of everything else. In that course of time the subject matter of the resolution has been very thoroughly debated. It would be but occupying unnecessarily the time of hon. members to go over the ground that already has been traversed so well by other speakers. About all I wish to say at the moment is that, having regard to the importance of this agreement, it can truthfully be said that there has never been introduced before in the Commons of Canada an agreement of such great importance which has been so generally approved and so ineffectively criticized as the present one. The force of this observation is all the greater in view of the fact that this is the first session of a new parliament comprising in its membership groups not hitherto represented in this house.

The approval has been all but unanimous, if we except what is left of the old Conservative party in the house at the present time. I believe, with this exception, it might be said to be unanimous. I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the house is overwhelmingly Liberal, and that with respect to this agreement there has not been a dissenting voice so far as the Liberal party is concerned. That is the more remarkable when it is recalled that the Liberal following is drawn from constituencies of all kinds, rural and urban, and from all parts of Canada. There are members here of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party who were in the house during previous parliaments; they have in their ranks some new members. They, too, old and new alike, so far as they have spoken, have spoken favourably and approvingly of the agreement. There is another party which has come in with a considerable membership, the Social Credit party. In so far as its members have spoken their words also have been not of criticism but of approval of the agreement. There remains yet one other party, the Social Reconstruction party. It, too, has been unanimous in its commendation of the agreement. All that is left in opposition to the agreement is the remnant of the Tory party in the house at the present time. After listening to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite who belong to that party, one thing, I think, is clear, namely, that no agreement with the United States would ever have been concluded by that party, under any circumstances whatever. Their argument, from that of the leader himself (Mr. Bennett) and throughout its ranks, has been that an agreement with the United States meant trade north and south, meant the end of the building up of Canada, meant the breaking up of the British empire, meant annexation, meant getting away from the British flag, and all that sort of thing to which the country has listened from Tory speakers for half a century past. That has been the sole contribution of hon. gentlemen opposite to the discussion of this great measure. I do not purpose, therefore, to spend any time in commenting on the line of attack they have made.

One misconception, however, which I should like to point out is that stressed by the last speaker who addressed the house (Mr. Lawson) as he kept making comparisons between what was set forth as the basis of negotiation of an agreement and the present agreement, as if the basis of negotiation of the agreement had been the agreement that hon. gentlemen opposite would have secured or ever thought they were going to get. His own leader made it quite clear that there is a distinction to be drawn between the basis of negotiation of an agreement and an agreement itself. As has been so well pointed out by other speakers, it is not usual for parties negotiating an agreement to make the basis of an agreement less than or equal to what they expect ultimately to receive. In fact, they usually seek to have the basis of agreement cover demands far beyond anything they ever expect actually to receive. The comparisons of the hon. member for South York are all beside the question.

I do take exception, very strong exception, Mr. Speaker, to the right hon. the leader of the opposition saying that he could or might have secured an agreement, to all intents and purposes, very similar to or substantially the same as the one which has been obtained by the present government. I think my right hon. friend knows that that is not correct. He knows of course, as an old parliamentarian and as one who has had much to do with the conduct of international affairs, that we are both precluded from telling the house the actual state of negotiations under his administration and what followed when the new administration came into office. To that extent certainly I am very much handicapped in trying to review what my hon. friend has said. At different times, however, he has been able to give to the press, certainly to one or two particular journals, information which when published has come pretty near to hitting the mark. There have appeared now and then, as the occasion seemed to render opportune, articles in the press which were more or less inspired and which I think we may be justified in taking as representing fairly accurately the position as my right hon. friend has wished to have it known by the people at the time.

I have in my hand a copy of an article which appeared in the Mail and Empire of November 5. It is headed: Acid test for King. Ability to secure mutually satisfactory agreement challenged. It begins:

> Leaving on Wednesday afternoon for Washington to hold reciprocity conversations with President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, federal Prime Minister, is credited in political Ottawa with the courage to face at the outset of his regime the problem destined to rank as one of the acid tests of his administration, namely, the ability of his government to conclude a mutually satisfactory trade agreement with the United States.

Then it goes on to say:

> The question which official Ottawa is now asking—and which cannot be answered until a draft treaty is submitted—is whether Mr. King can secure better terms than Mr. Bennett was able to elicit.

I ask hon. members, and my right hon. friend in particular, to listen to this:

Mr. BENNETT: I am not responsible for that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; but I will ask my right hon. friend whether what follows—he evidently knows what it is—

Mr. BENNETT: No, I do not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —is not a substantially correct statement of the situation as he knew it:

> Under the late government the reciprocity negotiations with the United States blew up when President Roosevelt definitely and categorically declared his inability to extend any concessions on any terms to:
> The codfishing and halibut fishing industry of the maritime provinces.
> The potato growing industry of the maritime provinces.
> The dairying industry of Ontario and Quebec.
> The wheat growers of the prairie provinces.
> And anything effective for the cattle raisers of the west.
> Mr. Roosevelt was prepared to extend concessions to:
> Canadian lumber.
> Canadian alcoholic liquors.
> The haddock fishing industry of the maritimes to the extent of a limited quota arrangement which would extend but limited benefit to the fishermen.
> The live stock breeders of the west upon a combined quota and price arrangement which would mean but little to the industry.
> It is in comparison with these limited benefits, proffered to Mr. Bennett, that any arrangement negotiated with Mr. King will be judged.

I ask my right hon. friend if that is not pretty substantially the reason why negotiations were not concluded before he went out of office. I am inclined to think that it is. I would ask hon. members of the house, comparing what is reported here with what appears in the agreement that is now before the house for approval, whether there are not the following apparent additional concessions. Let me set them forth. Where I speak of imports, I mean United States imports from Canada by calendar years, based on figures of the United States Department of Commerce. First of all:

Halibut (fresh or frozen)

A 50 per cent reduction.

United States imports: 1929, $676,000; 1934, $261,000.

Potatoes

Seed potatoes, reduction on 750,000 bushels annually, from 75 cents per hundredweight to (December to February, inclusive), 60 cents per hundredweight; (March to November, inclusive), 45 cents per hundredweight.

United States imports: 1929, $600,000; 1934, $223,000.

Dairy Products

Cream, reduction on 1,500,000 gallons annually, from 56·6 cents per gallon to 35 cents per gallon.

United States imports: 1929, $5,182,000; 1934, small.

Cheddar cheese, reduction from 7 cents per pound (minimum 35 per cent ad valorem) to 5 cents per pound (minimum 25 per cent ad valorem).

United States imports: 1929, $1,818,000; 1934, $140,000.

Wheat

Wheat unfit for human consumption, by-product feeds and mixed feeds, and screenings, 10 per cent ad valorem rate bound against increases.

United States imports: 1929, over $8,372,000; 1934, $6,564,000.

Hulled oats, unfit for human consumption, 50 per cent reduction.

Cattle

Heavy cattle (over 700 pounds per head), reduction on 155,799 head annually, from 3 cents to 2 cents per pound.

United States imports: 1929, $9,900,000; 1934, $4,000.

Calves, (under 175 pounds), reduction on 51,933 head annually, from 2½ cents to 1½ cents per pound.

United States imports: 1929, $1,000,000; 1934, $3,000.

Dairy cows (over 700 pounds), reduction on 20,000 head annually, from 3 cents to 1½ cents per pound.

United States imports: 1929, (estimated), $500,000; 1934, (estimated), $2,000.

With regard to the concessions on cattle, there is no mention in the agreement before us of the price arrangement referred to by the Mail and Empire, which was a matter of maintaining a certain parity of price as between agricultural and manufactured products. Had anything of that kind existed in this agreement, it would have materially affected the whole agreement from the point of view of the benefit to be derived from its provisions by the cattle industry. There is nothing concerning parity price in the present agreement. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that just taking what appears to be a more or less accurate statement of the situation, which I should say was probably inspired, there is ample evidence that the agreement as it is before the house for approval goes very much further in the interests of Canada than anything my right hon. friend found it possible to obtain prior to the time he went out of office.

I might mention other features. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) took a characteristic line, when indicating what he termed the many concessions the United States got compared with what Canada secured. He started off with oranges. I think this is as good an illustration as could be used; he said:

> Let us see what Canada gives, as compared with what she gets. She gives concessions on oranges to the value of $21,000,000—

First, as to the meaning and accuracy of the figures used, what does my hon. friend mean when he says that the United States got concessions to the extent of $21,000,000 on oranges? I do not know where he obtained his figures; I am told that according to our own statistical department the duty collected on oranges since they were placed on the dutiable list by the late administration, that is for the four years combined, was less than $5,000,000, and that the value of imports of oranges from all countries in the peak year, 1929, was only $9,500,000, while the combined imports of the last four years totalled less than $21,000,000. Yet my hon. friend from Leeds says, "Look at the concession the United States got, $21,000,000 on oranges."

What I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, is this: In discussing this agreement hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have considered only the alleged interests of producers, even where, as in the case of oranges, there are no producers in Canada. They have not had one word to say for the poor consumer, all the way through. Yet so far as Canada is concerned every one is a consumer, and there is not a producer who does not also receive something from any benefit obtained by consumers. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat says, "Where is the help for the manufacturers in this agreement?" Well, if the consumers are going to derive the great benefit hon. gentlemen opposite would seem to imagine through the intermediate tariff being granted to the United States, that is going to be of assistance to every manufacturer in the country because it will increase the real wages of the workingmen of Canada, and whatever will help the manufacturers or producers lessen the cost of production and the cost of living is going to be of material help to the manufacturers and producers themselves. There is in addition the demand for manufactured goods which will come from the purchasing power derived from the sale of Canada's primary and other products in the United States. But for each single producer in the country it is difficult to say just how many consumers there are; we are all consumers, and the difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves is that we have been looking to the well-being of the consumers as well as to that of the producers. They have been confining their attention almost exclusively to what is going to benefit certain special or vested interests in the country.

I need not enlarge upon the benefits afforded by the agreement to consumers; the benefits run all through the agreement, but may I say that what might have been a substantial benefit to consumers five years ago through giving to the United States or other countries the intermediate tariff is very much less of a benefit to-day. In many particulars the intermediate tariff to-day is almost the same as the general tariff. During the time my right hon. friend was in office he hardly let a session go by, in fact, I do not think he did let a session go by, without jacking up the tariff somewhat higher, and in particular bringing the intermediate tariff nearer to the level of the general tariff. As a result, when to-day we speak of giving another country the benefits of the intermediate tariff actually we are giving it a tariff which to all intents and purposes is considerably higher than the general tariff was when the Liberal party was in office. In regard to this agreement let me repeat that as far as we are concerned one of its chief benefits is what we hope and believe it will do for the consumers of Canada. In helping the consumers we believe it is going to help all classes, and every family and household.

My hon. friend from Leeds also touched on a point that I do not think was mentioned by anyone else; just how he came to see it I do not know. My hon. friend spoke about the three escape clauses; he pointed out that there were in this agreement three clauses whereby its term could be shortened so that it might not run for the full three years. If someone from this side of the house had presented that argument with a view to having the condition remedied, there might have been something to it, but my hon. friend was arguing all the time that the agreement was a bad one, and I think in the circumstances he should have been happy that there were some clauses in it which would enable its term to be shortened if necessary.

Mr. STEWART: I was emphasizing the instability of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my hon. friend that as far as these escape clauses are concerned, they are there simply for the purpose of seeing that the agreement is carried out in the spirit in which it was entered into; that its main provisions are not defeated by some action, on the part of either the United States government or the Canadian government, which might follow upon failure to make the agreement itself, giving to either party the right, in the event of an injustice being done in that way, of remedying that injustice or, at all events, not suffering because of it. I think on that score my hon. friend should have said that whatever was done for the benefit of the United States on the one hand was done equally for the benefit of Canada on the other. That provision is on all fours with the rest of the terms of the agreement; it is an agreement for the mutual advantage of the two countries, not an agreement whereby one country seeks to get all the advantages on its side and to leave none of the benefits to the other country.

I need not again go over the point alluded to by the last speaker, as to what might follow were no agreement to be effected with the United States at this time. But I would repeat that there are grave results which might follow upon a failure to make an agreement with the United States at this time. Particularly is this the case when that country is making agreements with other nations in all parts of the world, which agreements, if continued and expanded, as they will be, will give to other countries the place in the markets of the United States which Canada as an immediate neighbour should have above all other countries.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that the hour is getting late. What the country is waiting for is to see to what extent this agreement is approved by the parliament of Canada. I doubt if the remaining twenty minutes can be spent to greater advantage than in securing that result.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was agreed to on the following division:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Wednesday, March 11, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) be substituted for that of Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw) on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization; and

That the name of Mr. Thorson be substituted for that of Mr. Beaubien on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH ANTHRACITE COAL

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I beg to lay on the table of the house the report of the registrar of the Combines Investigation Act on an investigation into an alleged combine in the importation and distribution of British anthracite coal in Canada. The investigation was completed in 1933 but the report was not made public. In this report certain of the tables have been supplemented by figures covering the years 1933, 1934 and 1935.

QUESTIONS

VOTERS' LISTS

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. What was the total cost of printing the voters' lists for the 1930 federal elections?
2. What was the total cost for printing the voters' lists for the 1935 federal elections?
3. What was the total cost of machinery specially installed by the dominion government for the printing of election lists?
4. How many linotype operators were employed on this work (a) what wage scale were they paid; (b) how many overtime hours did they work and what rate of wage were they paid for overtime; (c) was it necessary to bring operators into Ottawa to complete the work?
5. Were any of the voters' lists printed by firms not connected with the government (a) if so, what office did the printing; (b) what rates were they paid?
6. Are linotypes installed for the setting of voters' lists now working full time (a) if part time, how many hours per day?
7. What did it cost to revise election lists in 1934 and 1935?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. The total amount paid out for printing voters' lists for the 1930 federal election was $228,864.26. This was for the printing of the urban districts only, as under the act of 1930 the voters' lists for rural districts were not printed.

2. The sum of $83,769.68 was paid to the printing bureau by the dominion franchise commissioner for the printing of the revised list of electors, 1935. (Note: In connection with the revised lists, 1935 there was an additional expenditure of $13,775.36 paid by the dominion franchise commissioner for proof-reading the lists).

3. $127,074.93 (For voters' lists and regular work).

4. The number of linotype operators actually engaged on voters' lists work varied from hour to hour and day to day. (a) $40 per week of 44 hours, less 10 per cent during the fiscal year 1934-35 and 5 per cent during the fiscal year 1935-36, as provided by the Salary Deduction (Continuance) Acts of 1934 and 1935. (b) 8,555·5 hours. Overtime rates authorized by order in council P.C. 417-487 of March 1, 1929, as follows: "The rate of pay for the first three hours after regular quitting time shall be time and a half, then double time; all overtime work after 10 p.m. double time rate; for Sundays double time rate; for statutory and proclaimed holidays double time rate after what would normally be regular working hours." (c) Yes.

5. No.

6. Yes, 12 new linotype machines were obtained in replacement of a similar number of machines which had been in use from 15 to 23 years and which had become obsolete. These latter machines are operated from time to time as pressure of work requires.

7. The cost of the formation of the basic lists in 1934 was:

Paid to the printing bureau for printing the list of electors.. ..	$249,561 80
Salaries to proof-readers..	38,804 05

The cost of the revision of the lists in 1935 is covered in the answer to question (2).

CUSTOMS SEIZURES

Mr. HEAPS:

1. What was the total value of the goods seized by custom officials in Canada during 1935?

2. What are the classifications or nature of goods so seized?

3. What was the valuation of seized goods sold, and what amount was realized?

4. What was the valuation and nature of goods destroyed?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would ask my hon. friend if he would not withdraw this question in view of the fact that it would take so much labour to compile the answers. If he insists I will ask that the question stand as an order for return, but it may not be brought down this session.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no desire to put the department to all the labour entailed in answering the question. If it involves too much work, as the minister suggests, I will drop the question, but I do think that if the department were properly organized it would be a very simple matter to have at the end of each year a complete tabulation of the information asked for in my question.

Question dropped.

RADIO REFINERIES LIMITED

Mr. MUTCH:

1. Did the Radio Refineries Limited, located at or near Winnipeg, bring into Canada, during the period from 1930 to October, 1935, large quantities of gasoline without paying the duty thereon?

2. If so, why was the duty not collected?

3. If the government discovered that smuggling had occurred, when did such discovery take place and what action did the government take?

4. Did the government lay a criminal charge against the officers and directors of the said company, and, if not, was any reason assigned?

5. Did the government sue the Radio Oil Refineries Limited, in the Court of King's Bench in Manitoba for a large sum of money?

6. If so, how was settlement effected, and for how much?

7. What was the amount for which the government sued the Radio Oil Refineries Limited?

8. Does the present government propose to take action in the matter, and, if so, what action?

Mr. ILSLEY: Part 8 of this question relates to a matter of government policy and it has not been the custom of the government to answer such questions. Apart from that, the question is answered:

1. No—Importations were described as crude petroleum in its natural state but the department held it was not in its natural state.

2. Due to fact that entries were made under wrong tariff classification.

3. The goods were not smuggled. Following investigation it was definitely established to the satisfaction of the department early in 1934 that duty was being evaded and in May, 1934, charges were preferred.

4. No. A claim under the Customs Act for duties short paid and penalties was preferred against the company. It was believed that better results would be obtained in this way than by criminal procedure.

5. Yes.

6. Settlement was effected for $10,000, through an agent appointed by the Department of Justice.

7. It was charged by the department that duty and taxes short paid amounted to $19,-712.35 but amount claimed in suit including penalties and forfeitures was $178,942.70 and costs.

BILINGUALISM IN FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS

Mr. TREMBLAY:

1. How many federal civil servants in each department in each of the several provinces, except Quebec, speak and write only French?
2. How many federal civil servants in each department in the province of Quebec speak only English?

Mr. RINFRET: In reply to this question, I may say that no records are kept from which we can supply the hon. member with the desired information.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GEORGE WILSON

Mr. FLEMING:

1. Is George Wilson, barrister and solicitor of Kinistino, Saskatchewan, in the employ of the federal government?
2. If not so employed now, has he been in the employ of the government at any time, and in what position, and when were his services dispensed with?
3. If in the employ of the government during the years 1930 to 1935, what amounts of money did he receive?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

INSPECTORS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. HANSON:

1. How many inspectors are there in British Columbia under the following headings (a) seed; (b) feed; (c) grain; (d) fruit; (e) dairy?
2. What are the names, addresses and salary, respectively, of such inspectors, and what territory is covered by each?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

NORMANDIN MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—POST OFFICE

Mr. SYLVESTRE:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, telegrams and other documents exchanged during 1935 and 1936 between the Minister of Public Works and the municipal corporation of Normandin, regarding a proposed lease in connection with a post office.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED AGREEMENT TO FISCAL TREATMENT ACCORDED TO UNITED STATES PRODUCTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Dunning:

[Mr. Ilsley.]

That the fiscal treatment accorded to goods, the produce or manufacture of the United States of America, by the trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington, November 15, 1935, be agreed to so that there may be introduced a bill giving the said trade agreement the force of law in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Should not the motion be that it be referred to the committee of ways and means?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; I was going to move that the agreement be referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Mackenzie King moves, seconded by Mr. Dunning, that the resolution be referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the correct method is to move that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means "to consider the following resolution."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am advised by the clerk that the procedure I adopted at the outset is correct, that after the resolution is carried, I then move that the house go into committee of ways and means to consider the resolution.

Motion agreed to.

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize a deduction of five per cent from the amount of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1937.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Dunning moves, seconded by Mr. Crerar, that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the said resolution. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): No, sir, and I will tell you why I object to this motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that this motion is not debatable.

Mr. POULIOT: Then why do you say, is it carried? I say it is not carried; I am ready to object to it on serious grounds, and now you prevent me from expressing my views on it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government—

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a question of order: I have no desire to be constantly rising to refer to matters of order, but I heard your honour say that the motion made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that this resolution be considered by the committee was carried, and that the Speaker do leave the chair. If that is so—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not make a motion that the Speaker leave the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what was said, as far as I could hear. There was some noise in the chamber.

Mr. DUNNING: I made the usual notice of motion to make it possible for the resolution in question to be considered when the house goes into committee of the whole.

Mr. BENNETT: That was done by the Prime Minister.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I confess I do not quite follow the ruling—it may be a sad reflection on myself. The motion, as I understood it, was that Mr. Speaker should leave the chair and the house resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider this resolution. I understood your honour to say that such a resolution was not debatable. I personally am under the impression that it is debatable, although I confess I may be mistaken, and I think that, for the purpose of good order in the house, we ought to have that point made perfectly clear. I may be entirely wrong, but I should like your honour to explain just why that motion upon which the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) desired to speak is not a debatable motion.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, in the meantime may I ask the government if they have superannuated General McNaughton and Colonel Steel, the former a member of the national research council and the latter of the radio broadcasting commission, at the lowest rate of superannuation before imposing a cut of five per cent on all civil servants?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the question which my hon. friend has just asked was on the order paper and was answered some days ago.

Mr. POULIOT: No, it was not in that form, and I put it again in this very shape.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion to which the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) refers was a motion that the house go into committee of the whole at the next sitting of the house. This is the motion which I said was not debatable.

Mr. STEVENS: May I call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of accuracy, the fact that that form of motion was not properly put. I think the motion should have read, "at the next sitting of the house." Had it been done in that way I should not have taken objection.

Motion agreed to.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I notice in the public press a statement to the effect that there is to be appointed a board of harbour commissioners for the city of Hamilton. Does that mean that at some ports there will be harbour commissions, notwithstanding the decision of the government to abolish those commissions?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): The harbours of Canada are of two categories. There are seven ports which are definitely national ports, and in all of which the government has a very substantial investment. In addition to that there are some five or six other ports, such as Hamilton, Toronto, New Westminster—to name only a few—in which the government has no substantial investment, and in which the city has attended to the development of the particular port; these ports have been administered by harbour commissions, on which the city has representation, and in such cases it is not the intention of the government to make any change in the system of administration. The reason, and I think the only reason, why the government has the appointment in some cases of one and in other cases of two harbour commissioners is that the commission is charged with the carrying out of certain government regulations.

GERMAN CONSCRIPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the orders of the day are called may I point out that the afternoon papers carry a dispatch from Montreal that Ludwig Kempff, Consul General for Germany in Canada, announced to-day in Montreal that German citizens living in Canada and Newfoundland are to be conscripted for possible service in Germany. The statement said that Germans who have become naturalized British subjects are not affected, but it also went on to say that enlistments were to be invited. I should like to ask whether, if this dispatch is correct, such action is calculated to maintain good relations between different classes of Canadian citizens, and also as to whether or not the German consul would not be exceeding his rights here in Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before I answer my hon. friend I should like to make inquiries as to the actual communication made by the German consul. After having seen it, I shall reply to my hon. friend.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Resolved, that the fiscal treatment accorded to goods, the produce or manufacture of the United States of America, by the trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington, November 15, 1935, be agreed to so that there may be introduced a bill giving the said trade agreement the force of law in Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have a clear understanding as to procedure in committee at the present time. The purpose of the resolution is to consider, as I said, the fiscal treatment accorded by the trade agreement to goods, the produce or manufacture of the United States of America. The trade agreement contains a schedule of rates to apply to commodities specified therein imported from the United States. The consideration of the article to which this schedule is attached and of the schedule itself would of course cover the changes in the rates applicable to imports from the United States. There are other clauses in the agreement which I should imagine the committee would also wish to consider in connection with the schedules. They will have to be considered some time, either when the bill itself is before the house or now when the agreement is being discussed in committee of ways and means. If the committee is agreeable to taking up the agreement in its entirety clause by clause at this stage, I fancy it will shorten discussion in the long run and give to hon. members immediately detailed information they are desirous of obtaining in regard to many specific items as well as to the agreement as a whole. If that method is acceptable, I suggest that we consider the agreement clause by clause, and begin now with article No. 1.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is not within the purview of the resolution, but as there must be a bill founded upon it, and presumably the agreement will be attached as a schedule to the bill, and will be considered in committee of the whole house, the only question is whether or not it is desirable to do it now or when the bill is being dealt with. To me personally it is a matter of indifference. But it is clear that if the bill founded on the resolution is introduced and the agreement attached as a schedule, when the committee goes into committee on the bill the whole matter will be open for discussion. That may be the better place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the British house considered the Canada-United Kingdom agreement the Chancellor of the Exchequer before introducing the bill at all, moved the house into committee of ways and means to consider the tariff changes involved in the agreement. We are following that course because we think it the preferable one.

I should like to say to my right hon. friend, if he will pardon my doing it at this moment, that I think he was mistaken at an earlier stage in the debate in saying that his government had followed the same procedure.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not the same procedure as in England, the same procedure as adopted in regard to the treaty with France.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not the same procedure as we have adopted in connection with this agreement. I have looked up the journals and find that the following was the order of procedure in connection with the Canada-United Kingdom agreement: On October 12, 1932, my right hon. friend moved a resolution approving the agreement. The resolution was agreed to on November 3. On November 7, Bill No. 8 was given first reading. On November 8 it was given second reading. On November 21 the bill was reported in committee of the whole, and on November 22 given third reading. It was not until after third reading, namely on November 24, that the resolutions were adopted in committee of ways and means, reported, read the second time and concurred in.

I am proposing that we take up in committee of ways and means, before we introduce the bill at all, consideration of the fiscal matters referred to in the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: There is, I suppose, no point in discussing the methods that were adopted at other times. What we did with respect to the British agreement was the same as in respect to the French treaty. Last year we adopted a trade agreement with Poland, and we adopted one made with France the session before; the schedule was attached to the bill, the bill was introduced on a resolution, and the whole matter was then discussed as an ordinary measure. I am not sure but what the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman as to the desirability of separate treatment being accorded, in committee of ways and means, to the items that constitute the schedule may be the sounder method, but the method we pursued in connection with the Polish agreement was to discuss the schedules to the bill when the bill itself was in committee, and that we may do here when the bill founded on this resolution is introduced into the house. This resolution contemplates discussion at the moment of the tariff items only; there would still remain for consideration the various articles of the agreement. As I point out, those articles must necessarily be open for discussion when the bill is before the house, the schedule being part of the bill. If it is thought desirable to consider the agreement now article by article, I personally have no objection, but it would be competent to have the discussion over again when the schedule comes up as part of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: Whatever the right hon. gentleman thinks desirable is acceptable as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My thought is that we shall probably save time in the end by taking up the agreement now article by article. It is probable that hon. members in discussing the items will make reference to articles in the agreement, and I have no doubt that when we come to the bill itself the house will not wish to repeat a discussion which has already taken place.

On Article I:

Trade Agreement Between Canada and the United States of America

His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, in respect of the Dominion of Canada, and the President of the United States of America, being desirous of facilitating and extending the commercial relations existing between Canada and the United States of America by granting mutual and reciprocal concessions and advantages for the promotion of trade, have resolved to conclude a trade agreement as a step toward the lowering of the barriers impeding trade between their two countries, and for this purpose have through their respective plenipotentiaries agreed upon the following articles:

Article I

Canada and the United States of America will grant each other unconditional and unrestricted most-favoured-nation treatment in all matters concerning customs duties and subsidiary charges of every kind and in the method of levying duties, and, further, in all matters concerning the rules, formalities and charges imposed in connection with the clearing of goods through the customs, and with respect to all laws or regulations effecting the sale or use of imported goods within the country.

Accordingly, natural or manufactured products having their origin in either of the countries shall in no case be subject, in regard to the matters referred to above, to any duties, taxes or charges other or higher, or to any rules or formalities other or more burdensome, than those to which the like products having their origin in any third country are or may hereafter be subject.

Similarly, natural or manufactured products exported from the territory of Canada or the United States of America and consigned to the territory of the other country shall in no case be subject with respect to exportation and in regard to the above-mentioned matters, to any duties, taxes or charges other or higher, or to any rules or formalities other or more burdensome, than those to which the like products when consigned to the territory of any third country are or may hereafter be subject.

Any advantage, favour, privilege or immunity which has been or may hereafter be granted by Canada or the United States of America in regard to the above-mentioned matters, to a natural or manufactured product originating in any third country or consigned to the territory of any third country shall be accorded immediately and without compensation to the like product originating in or consigned to the territory of the United States of America or Canada, respectively, and irrespective of the nationality of the carrier.

Article I agreed to.

On Article II:

Article II

Neither Canada nor the United States of America shall establish any prohibition or maintain any restriction on imports from the territory of the other country which is not applied to the importation of any like article originating in any third country. Any abolition of an import prohibition or restriction which may be granted even temporarily by either country in favour of an article of a third country shall be applied immediately and unconditionally to the like article originating in the territory of the other country. These provisions equally apply to exports.

In the event of quantitative restrictions being established by either Canada or the United States of America for the importation of any article it is agreed that in the allocation of the quantity of restricted goods which may be authorized for importation, the other country will be granted a share equivalent to the proportion of the trade which is enjoyed in a previous representative period prior to the establishment of such quantitative restrictions.

In all matters concerning the rules, formalities or charges imposed in connection with any form of quantitative restriction on the importation of any article, Canada and the United States of America agree to extend to each other every favour granted to a third country.

Mr. STEVENS: In regard to this article and other articles of a similar character, I should like to ask whether it is clearly understood that it does not include concessions of arrangements between Canada and other countries in the British empire?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is covered by article XIII.

Mr. STEVENS: I know, but I want to make it abundantly clear that that applies in all these articles.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it clear as a matter of construction that article XIII does all that is suggested? It seems to me it would be better drafting if in article I and article II an exception were made and a reference to article XIII inserted, for the sake of clarity; "except as in this agreement otherwise provided." Here it says "like products having their origin in any third country," without specific exception.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The understanding on which the entire agreement was made is that as far as the British empire is concerned, rights within the empire are entirely a matter of our own business, and that nothing in this agreement shall affect any existing relationships between one part of the empire and another with respect to duties or anything else. The whole agreement is based on that understanding.

Mr. BENNETT: Article II introduces for the first time recognition of a quota system being applied in Canada. We have not heretofore generally accepted that as a governing principle in connection with our tariff legislation. This article recognizes that quantitative restrictions may be made by Canada in connection with our tariff legislation. Leaving that for the moment, there is a question I desire to ask which is a vital one in view of our experience in connection with quotas under the French agreement. The year that is to be fixed as the basic year is all important. This agreement does not specify that a given year shall be taken, but it says:

—a share equivalent to the proportion of the trade which is enjoyed in a previous representative period prior to the establishment of such quantitative restrictions.

In other words the period has to be hereafter fixed. On what principle is that period to be fixed? Did we arrive at any conclusion as to whether it would be a three year or a five year period? It would make a very great deal of difference if the period were a five year period prior to 1935 or a five year period prior to 1930. In the discussions that took place in connection with the quantitative restrictions under the French agreement we had some little difficulty in arriving at a year, but we finally arrived at a year which was applied to all countries, not to Canada alone, and that year having been applied to all countries our exports to France were based upon the application of a percentage rate to the figure for that year. It becomes a matter of tremendous importance, having regard to the discrepancies between the import figures of France and the export figures of Canada, for example. I suppose hon. gentlemen saw the last monthly bulletin of the Royal Bank of Canada in which attention was directed to the fact that according to French statistics the imports from Canada into France amounted to something over $16,000,000, whereas the exports from Canada to France were shown as something between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. In other words commodities shipped from Canada to the continent had been, probably during the progress of the voyage, directed to go to France. One of the notable items was wheat. In dealing with the question of quantitative restrictions we must exercise such extreme care in arriving at the basis upon which our percentages are predicated that I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether or not he has any information to communicate to the committee with respect to that matter.

Mr. DUNNING: The provision in article II was designed to cover any quantitative restrictions which might be imposed by either country in the future. The difficulty my right hon. friend points out is a very real one, but unfortunately it is impossible to decide now what a representative period would be with respect to each type of commodity concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: They do not do it that way.

Mr. DUNNING: After careful examination from the point of view of both countries it was thought that it would have to be left open to negotiation and arrangement in the spirit of the treaty itself, when such contingencies arise.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid that does not go far in answering my question. In the first place it is an incorrect statement, if I may be pardoned for making that observation, to say that you must take up each item in each year. You must have a given period. That period may be a year or a term of years, but once the period is arrived at the percentage of the imports during that year that shall be free to be utilized by Canada or the United States as the case may be does become of vital importance. For instance suppose the year 1934 were taken, then that year becomes the fixed term for the purposes of the agreement. And if it comes to say, commodity A, and the United States have determined that we shall not export to that country more than a given percentage of that commodity, and they fix it at eighty per cent, then it will be eighty per cent of what their imports from Canada were during the year 1934. But in the case of commodity B there would be no change to another year; nor could it be changed to another year for commodity C, because there is a base year established. Usually in quantitative restrictions, which are largely used on the continent, they take a term that is an average of a period of three or five years, or take a year absolutely; they say that the year 1926 or 1929, for instance, shall be the determining year, the base year.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to all commodities?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, with respect to all commodities. That was one of the difficulties that we had in connection with the French agreement. France said, we will take a certain year—I forget what year; my memory is it was 1928, but whatever year it was, that year applied to Sweden, Australia, Canada, the United States and all other countries, and each country was allocated a percentage of the total imports of goods during that year, having regard to the relation that the total imports bore to the imports from a particular country. That is, if Canada supplied twenty per cent of the imports of the given commodity to France during that year, and it was concluded that the allocation should be eighty per cent, we would have but sixteen per cent of that year's importations. I point out that you cannot have varying years for different commodities, because that might work an unfair advantage or disadvantage to another country as against our own. The reason the question of arriving at a base year becomes of such tremendous importance lies in the possibility of difficulties arising on account of an endeavour to get a most favourable year for your country, while the other party to the agreement is endeavouring to get a year which will not involve as large importations as otherwise would follow. I can see that probably nothing more can be done about it than to leave it in the terms in which it now stands, because the agreement has been made. I certainly think, however, that it is an invitation to difficulty, if quantitative restrictions are resorted to.

Thus far in Canada, if my memory serves me correctly, the Liberal party has been vigorously opposed to the making of quota arrangements, and it may not be necessary to rely upon quota arrangements. But if quotas are made this will become a subject of difficulty, and to anticipate it and possibly provide against it is preferable to waiting for the arrival of a difficulty which would be very real, I might say, in connection with matters in regard to which quotas have been suggested. That is the reason why in other parts of the agreement I take it that this government, as well as the negotiators on behalf of the American people, were so careful to provide not a quota which would fluctuate, but in the case of seed potatoes a quota of 750,000 bushels and in the case of cream 1,500,000 gallons. The same applies to the arrangement for some odd thousand head of cattle, which quota of course was arrived at by computation on the part of the parties who arrived at the figures. But they did not leave it to conjecture or doubt as to how this was to be done when the time arrived. The computation with respect to cattle is well known.

Mr. DUNNING: In that instance the method is indicated in the item.

Mr. BENNETT: It is indicated; in the cream quota it is not so indicated, and with respect to seed potatoes it is not so indicated. But those who were responsible saw to it that definite figures were used because they realized, as I now point out to the committee, that when you get into the realm of quantitative restrictions, which means the allocation of quotas to affect importing countries —and I could conceive of a dozen items I could mention which would be affected— grievous difficulties would be caused, having regard to the year which is selected as the base year upon which to make computations.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend has himself indicated the reasons why it was quite impossible to state this matter more definitely than is stated in the agreement. The finding of a base year which would be fairly applicable to all commodities was a great difficulty. If I may mention the difficulty in connection with choosing a base year for cattle, for instance, may I say that we could not take 1932, 1933 or 1934 as base years with respect to this clause of the agreement, because no cattle were exported from Canada to the United States during those years.

Mr. BENNETT: They are covered by special items.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, it is true that they are covered by special items. However I use that as an illustration of what may easily happen with respect to some of a large number of items constituting the trade between these two countries. I agree entirely with my right hon. friend that it would have been very desirable indeed if absolutely certain machinery could have been set up in this section of the agreement to deal with possible future quantitative restrictions. But after very careful examination by the negotiators who acted on behalf of both countries it was felt that this was as far as the matter could be dealt with at the present time. I appreciate the fact that there may and probably will be difficulties, if one country commences to set up quantitative restrictions against the other in connection with commodities dealt with in the agreement. This clause is inserted to give, if possible, a means to settle those difficulties.

Article II agreed to.

On Article III:

Articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States of America, enumerated and described in schedule I annexed to this agreement, shall, on their importation into Canada, be exempt from ordinary customs duties in excess of those set forth in the said schedule. The said articles shall also be exempt from all other duties, taxes, fees, charges, or exactions, imposed on or in connection with importation, in excess of those imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement or required to be imposed thereafter under laws of Canada in force on the day of the signature of this agreement.

Schedule I and the notes included therein shall have full force and effect as integral parts of this agreement.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the meaning of the word "ordinary" in the third line? The expression is, "be exempt from ordinary customs duties."

Mr. DUNNING: It is very difficult to describe the meaning of a simple word. I know the hon. member has the legal interpretation in his mind.

Mr. CAHAN: Of course; this is a legal document.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; it is a legal document. "Ordinary customs duties" is the expression which follows the language commonly used in the United States and Canada in the description of customs duties, and especially when qualified by the words "in excess of those set forth in the said schedule." Those words surely qualify the meaning so that there could be no dispute as to the intention.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask if there would be any question as to a dispute in connection with the imposition of excise duties on goods coming in? Would there be any possibility of misinterpretation of article III with respect to excise duties now imposed on goods entering the country?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member has anticipated something I was going to say, so after I have made my observations possibly the minister would answer both of us. If he will observe the language of the article he will find that in the third and fourth lines there is the expression "ordinary customs duties in excess of those set forth in the said schedule." That is, meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned, n.o.p., carry a duty of three cents per pound. That is the ordinary duty. But let us apply that to the following line: "The said articles"—meats—"shall also be exempt from all other duties, taxes, fees, charges, or exactions, imposed on or in connection with importation, in excess of those imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement or required to be imposed thereafter under laws of Canada in force on the day of the signature of this agreement." The amount imposed on the day this agreement was signed was three cents per pound, and there is no provision whatever for excise tax.

That has given me a great deal of concern with respect to the language of the agreement, the language to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North has referred. The article refers merely to "ordinary customs duties" in the third line, and then it states that you shall not impose anything in excess by way of duties, taxes, fees, charges or exactions, beyond those charged on the day of the signature of the agreement. In this instance the amount imposed on the day of the signature of the agreement was three cents per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: Read the next phrase.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not help. It says that it shall be free from anything that may hereafter be done or hereafter be imposed. That shuts the door tighter still. This makes it clear beyond peradventure that with respect to these items you cannot do more than impose the ordinary customs duties now imposed. My doubt is as to whether that left us free with respect to what we call our excise tax, or other fees, charges or exactions. When I look at the language I find it says that they shall not be higher than those "imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement—or required to be imposed thereafter." That is, it is made clear beyond peradventure that they cannot be raised afterwards. On the day this agreement was signed the rate on meats was three cents per pound; but if we brought meat in from the United States there would be a three per cent excise tax.

Let us go a step further and consider soya beans, which are imported free. Soya beans must remain free during three years. You cannot raise that; you cannot change it; it is under the intermediate tariff. I want to know whether soya beans are subject to the excise tax of three per cent or not. That is one of the difficulties I have, and it is one apparently to which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has had his mind directed as well.

Mr. DUNNING: As to the intention I have no doubt at all.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the intention?

Mr. DUNNING: I will answer as to the intention, first. I believe also that the legal draftsman did carry out the intention, but I cannot argue with my right hon. friend on a question of legal draftmanship. Article III reads:

The said articles shall also be exempt from all other duties, taxes, fees, charges, or exactions, imposed on or in connection with importation, in excess of those imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement.

Clearly, any tax which was in force on the day of the signature of this agreement represents the outside limit to which such charges can be imposed in the future.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister look at this very item of soya beans? Soya beans became free the minute we gave the United States the intermediate tariff, but now that we have made soya beans free for three years, can we charge the excise tax?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, because the tax was chargeable on that day.

Mr. BENNETT: It says:

The said articles shall also be exempt from all other duties.

The other duties are the ordinary customs duties.

Mr. DUNNING: But soya beans would be covered by the next phrase, "taxes, fees," and so forth.

Mr. BENNETT: But it says that they shall be exempt. Let us read it in connection with soya beans:

Soya beans shall also be exempt from all other duties, taxes, fees, charges, or exactions, imposed on or in connection with importation, in excess of those imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the point.

Mr. BENNETT: They were free the minute this agreement came into force.

Mr. EULER: Not free from excise.

Mr. BENNETT: Free from everything.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Not free from everything? They were free from customs tariff the minute the agreement was signed, and this document says that no other taxes shall be charged against them.

Mr. EULER: Other than those being charged on the day of the signing of the agreement, and the excise tax was in force on the day of the signing of the agreement. In future we cannot increase it, under this article, but I suppose we could reduce it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall article III carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No; the schedule has to be considered in connection with the article, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DUNNING: Before article III can be considered to be carried the schedule to which it refers should first be considered. Article III therefore stands, and we will proceed to schedule 1 of the agreement, reverting to article 3 when we have concluded the discussion on schedule I.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Article III stands.

On schedule I:

Customs tariff—10. Meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned: (b) n.o.p., 3 cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the minister what is the rate on similar goods, meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned, entering the United States? We have heard a good deal of talk about reciprocal arrangements, and I just want to know what the duty in the United States is after this agreement comes into force.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States rates on this item are not entirely comparable, but so far as it can be traced the meat item in the United States tariff reads:

Meats, bacon, hams, shoulders, et cetera, 3¼ cents per pound; prepared or preserved, n.o.p., 6 cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: Meats, preserved or prepared, would be the comparable item with the United States one on which the duty is six cents, I would think.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): In other words, do I understand that meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned, pay six cents going into the United States and three cents coming into Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: The n.o.p. item in the American tariff is six cents, yes, and it is comparable with our item 10 (b).

Mr. BENNETT: Which is the item in question. How much was our duty reduced in that case on United States goods coming into Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: From six to three cents.

Mr. BENNETT: And their duty was left the same, at six cents.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, this is entirely incidental to the granting of the intermediate tariff. The United States immediately gets the benefit of our intermediate tariff, which is three cents, whereas the general tariff is six cents.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): But the ultimate outcome of the agreement, so far as meats are concerned, is that our meats pay six cents going into the United States, and their meats pay three cents coming into Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has not quite stated the full effect of the agreement. During the currency of this agreement any meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned, that we desire to ship to the United States are subject to a duty of six cents at the present moment. They may reduce their rate, but we cannot increase our rate from three cents. That is a short way to put the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the amount of importations under this head during the last fiscal year?

Mr. DUNNING: We imported 700 pounds of pickled beef in barrels, all from the United States, valued at $70; 93,000 pounds of sausages, valued at $27,600; fifty pounds of other meat, salted, n.o.p. all from the United States, valued at $13, and 27,000 pounds of the n.o.p. item, valued at $7,700. The total of all the imports under that item amounted to 120,000 pounds, valued at $45,000. During the same year we exported pickled beef in barrels, chiefly to Newfoundland, to the amount of 322,000 pounds, valued at $25,000.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not affected by this agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave that just by way of information on exports and imports.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): How much did we export to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I can get that information.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one matter to which the minister has not referred. Under this agreement you have to consider importations from other countries as well. There is the Argentine, for instance, and that at once becomes a factor, although the largest part of the importations from the Argentine last year and the year before was canned beef, and it was estimated that the canned beef we imported from the Argentine last year represented many, many thousands head of cattle. We have now to consider that the rate on Argentine importations of meats, prepared or preserved, will be three cents. That is clear because the Argentine has favoured nation treatment with us, and the lowest rate we give to the United States we must give also to the Argentine. That is also true with respect to every part of the British empire. But the rate on meat from New Zealand and Australia is roughly three cents, and therefore the matter does not become important. I assume that the n.o.p. item covers products that carry a lesser rate than three cents, but I am not quite clear on that point.

Mr. DUNNING: The Argentine is not affected, because it has been under our intermediate tariff for longer years than I can remember by virtue of a very old agreement so no change is effected in respect of Argentine importations.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What were the importations for the fiscal year 1930?

Mr. DUNNING: These black books of mine hold a great deal of information, but I cannot possibly bring to the house the information for a series of years. However I shall be glad to get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The year that is quoted is very low so far as importations are concerned; it is the lowest year.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the latest available in every instance; I take the same year with respect to all of the information I give.

Mr. BENNETT: The 31st March, 1935?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, we have the figures for the last ten months.

Mr. SENN: Perhaps I could furnish the minister with the information asked for by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. In 1930 we imported, of meats of all kinds under this category, something like 14,000,000 pounds. That was before the Hawley-Smoot tariff came into effect and before the tariff changes in Canada became effective. Since that time these importations have been dwindling until last year they were the lowest in the history of the country. The danger is now that there will be a steady increase again. In 1930 we imported 11,000,000 pounds of pork in brine and there is grave danger that the same thing will happen again under this arrangement.

Mr. DUNNING: If I can comfort my hon. friend a little, I would point out that the rates under which the importations to which he refers took place were lower than the rate provided under this agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: The Secretary of Agriculture for the United States, whatever he may have meant, said that under this agreement the United States would send into Canada increased quantities of pork. He made that statement at a public meeting in Chicago and I read it into the record of the house. What it means I do not know, but that is his statement for what it is worth.

Mr. SENN: I made an error in my computation. It was in pork alone of different kinds that there were importations of 14,000,000 pounds in 1930, and if that is computed on the basis of hogs, it would require at least 100,000 hogs to make that quantity of pork, so that the figures are worse than they appeared at first.

Mr. DEACHMAN: For several years we imported from the United States certain classifications of thick fat hogs which were used and appreciated, I understand, in the mining camps and in the lumber woods of Canada; and because of the importation of that product, which we brought in at a lower price, we were able to make a corresponding increase in the export of high grade bacon to Great Britain. If we choose to use American pork and like it, and can by importing that pork sell our own product which brings a higher price in the markets of the world, I as a Scotchman see no reason why this should not be done.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Then we are to understand that it is the policy of the government to bring in through the back door a fat coarse type of pork while we send out of the front door pork of a better quality?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Would not my hon. friend do that if he had an opportunity?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I would propose a policy to produce the pork at home.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Even the coarse fat stuff?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): That is our trouble; we produce too much coarse fat stuff now. I have not the figures before me, but is it not a fact that the duty has been reduced on bacon, hams and shoulders from five to $1\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound under this agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: That is not in the schedule.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): In the intermediate tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): In the agreement with the United States we have reduced the duty on bacon, hams and shoulders, imported from the United States, from five to one and three-quarter cents per pound. It has been admitted by some hon. members, by the Minister of Finance himself, that this agreement has been negotiated at the expense of the industrial life of Canada, and the Prime Minister has emphasized its contribution to agriculture. I would ask hon. members whether they can find in the agreement any great advantage for the farmers, especially the bacon producers, of Canada, in view of the possible increase in production encouraged by the late government and still encouraged by the Department of Agriculture, seeing that those producers have now to face the competition of the United States, in which production is being increased by thousands and thousands. Indeed, production is being increased there by between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 extra brood sows. The United States destroyed more hogs three years ago than we produced at that time, and now the duty is being lowered three and one-quarter cents per pound on the product, with falling prices. It is no wonder that prices are cheaper for cattle and hogs to-day than before the trade agreement came into effect; nor is it any wonder that the farmers are alarmed, in view of the uncertainties of the situation, at the effect the agreement is going to have in every stockyard from coast to coast. If there is one glaring example of the serious effect of the agreement, it is in this reduction from five to one and three-quarter cents on pork coming into Canada, when we have been struggling for an export market. If the government has not yet done so, it should consider now the effect of this agreement on the renewal of the imperial agreement. As the leader of the opposition has said, Secretary Wallace of the United States, if he has not alarmed this government, has at any rate alarmed the hon. Mr. Elliot of the British government, who foresees difficulties in connection with the renewal of the imperial trade agreement with Canada. It is true that we have not provided our full quota under the imperial agreement, but it does appear to me to be very unsound business to reduce the rate by three and one-quarter cents on bacon, heavy bacon or whatever type of pork you like, while we are struggling to find a market for our good bacon.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps it will comfort my hon. friend, who apparently sees at the border line quantities of meat waiting to tumble into Canada, when I tell him that the figures for January, which are the latest available, indicate that we imported, of all meats, $10,000 worth in January, 1935, and only $7,000 worth in January, 1936. I do not think either figure is sufficient cause for the great alarm expressed by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I do not want to delay the committee, nor do I want to bore the minister with my alarms, but may I point out that you cannot produce bacon in a month.

Mr. DUNNING: This is not bacon; this is all meat.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Well, you cannot produce meat in a month.

Mr. DUNNING: The farmers have been waiting to produce it, have they?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The minister knows, because he was at one time a farmer, and he is now framing the farmers with an agreement like this. Everyone knows that the year before last the United States destroyed more hogs than Canada produced for the market, and since their prices for bacon and meats have started to rise they have turned now almost as strongly the other way and are planning for a greatly increased production. We have enjoyed higher prices in Canada every year, due to the imperial trade agreements. We have had the most stabilized price for bacon since confederation, because of those trade agreements, and while we have not provided the full quota yet, the effect has already been felt in the stockyards. Ask the stockmen who sell in the Toronto stockyards about the effect already, of the American trade agreement, and the uncertainty it has created. I only wish to point out that probably by this time next year matters will be serious, because the Minister of Finance and every other man who has ever farmed or produced any hogs knows very well that you can produce bacon very rapidly; in fact the former Minister of Agriculture from this side of the house was twitted very often by the ex-Minister of Agriculture from the other side with encouraging increased production of bacon. For two or three years we have been encouraging increased production in Canada, and the result has been felt here, and will be felt in the United States. I regard this as one of the most unfair parts of the agreement. I think we were entitled to a greater reduction than we have received in respect of our bacon going in to the United States, at such times as we might have it to market there.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Listening to the hon. gentleman's remarks in regard to this item makes one think of what weird arguments protection can give rise to in order to try to bolster up an old discredited policy that has been in effect in this country for some time. Imagine, Mr. Chairman, any man standing in his place in this house and telling us to-day that the United States are commencing to produce hogs for all they are worth—

An hon. MEMBER: Are they not?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): —throwing them on the Canadian market, and killing the Canadian farmers' market. And he brings up along with that the idea that a year or two ago many millions of hogs were slaughtered in the United States.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): So they were.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Why did they not put them on the world market in competition with Canadian hogs at that time?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Because we had a tariff against them. Because the present leader of the opposition raised the tariff to protect the producers of this country.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Then why did they not put them on the world market?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Because we had the imperial trade agreements, which the hon. member's party opposed. That is why.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We are told that a year or two ago the United States would far rather slaughter hogs than sell them. Now that we have a trade agreement with the United States we are told that they are going to use it to ship hogs and other commodities into Canada and thereby ruin the farmers of this country. As regards tariffs for our Canadian farmers, let me tell the hon. member and his friends that, after having gone across this country for many years and tried to sell a tariff policy to the farmers, they got the most terrible drubbing that any party ever received on that policy.

Mr. ANDERSON: And you will get it the next time.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You won't be here.

Mr. CAHAN: Your turn is coming.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That policy was never any good to the farmer of this country. We are exporting all the time bacon, beef, and other commodities, and we must take our price on the basis of the world price. All this business of telling the farmer that you are helping him by putting protection on farm goods is all a myth, an attempt to fool him. My hon. friends want to use that cry in order to put up high tariffs on the commodities the farmers buy. That is one of the arguments my hon. friends use all the time. As one of the farmers of this dominion, I am not a bit afraid of competition from farmers of the United States or any other part of the world provided you let me buy at a world market price the commodities I must buy for my production; then I will produce anything in Canada that should properly be produced in this country on a farm, in competition with anybody in the world. But I cannot do this so long as the policy of my hon. friends is in effect, and there is a great deal of it in effect yet. This agreement has only touched the matter of high protection for secondary industries, so that I must pay an excess price for the commodities I have to buy in order to produce on the farm, and consequently cannot sell in world markets and make any profit. But if the farmer can buy at the proper price the articles he needs for his use, he can produce farm products and sell them in competition with anybody in the world.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I would not rise except that the hon. member asked me why the United States had not shipped its hog products into Canada instead of slaughtering them in the United States.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I did not say that. I said: Why did they not put them on the world market instead of slaughtering them?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I may say that when our party was in power, had we reduced the tariff at that time three and a quarter cents, as the government now proposes to do, the hog producers of Canada would have taken for eighteen months three and a quarter dollars a hundred less for their hogs than they did.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That would be less than nothing.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): We enjoyed in eastern Canada, and certainly western Canada enjoyed, practically double the price the United States farmer got for his hogs, because there was in force in this country a tariff of five cents, which to-day is being reduced to one and three-quarters cents. when the United States was slaughtering hogs for which they could get less than half what the Canadian producer obtained. We received $8.75 per hundred pounds for hogs in the city of Toronto when the American producer was receiving $4.25.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): When was that?

Mr. BENNETT: 1932.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Every hon. member knows that. And when my hon. friend argues that protection is a myth, may I remind him that even though he opposed the late government, he cannot deny that during those years the farmers of Canada received over $36,000,000 more for their hogs than they would have received had we had the competition that he suggested here to-day. I do not think it is any myth so far as the farmers are concerned when they benefited to the extent of $36,000,000 a year from the protection which the late government maintained, and which is now being wiped off. I know that is the old stock-in-trade argument from the free trade element in western Canada; for years they have expressed just what the hon. member has expressed: Give them a chance to buy their implements of production cheaper and they can compete with the greatest producers in the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Why should the implements of production not come in free? Since I have been in this house I have heard that question asked over and over again. I watched the present government, when they were in power between 1921 and 1930, lower the duty on farm implements, and I watched those implements rise in price. I recall that after they had lowered the duties over that number of years, in 1930 farm implements were higher as regards every item than they were in 1921 when the Liberal party came into power. I have also watched the late government raise tariffs, giving encouragement to Canadian industry and employment to Canadian workmen, with the result that every article from a hoe to an eight foot reaper lowered in value when the duty was raised. It may seem a strange coincidence that since the present government came into power, since they have negotiated this wonderful agreement with the United States, farm implements have again risen in price. Surely, Mr. Chairman, three times is out, and the hon. member has seen it go three ways already. He has watched his own party lower tariffs and the price of implements go up; he has seen our party raise tariffs and the price of implements go down; he now watches his party lower tariffs and the price of implements go up. Members of his own party ask, why? The price spreads committee have investigated and reported, and hon. members will find in that report practically everything one can expect to get out of the commission as to the reason why prices have risen. So there are more myths than those of the protectionist.

Mr. DUNNING: May I just suggest, without being too rigid, that I think there is a rule which perhaps I as well as other speakers have somewhat transgressed in this discussion. I think the rule in committee is that the discussion must relate directly to the matter under discussion.

With reference to the last remark of my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), if it is true, as he states with respect to farm implements, that a reduction in the duty puts the price up, that rule should also apply to hogs, so his previous theories are ill-founded.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The two commodities are not manufactured in the same factory.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend says that the hog raisers of this country received $36,000,000. If they did so it was at a cost to the farmers of Canada of about $360,000,000 in other ways during the same time.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to point out that this item divides itself into two parts. I endeavoured to indicate that the rate on this class of meat going into the United States is six cents, while on meat coming from the United States or any other country covered by the most favoured nation clause the rate will be three cents, because the countries that have most favoured nation treaties with us will get the benefit of the lowest United States rate provided in this agreement. But there is another class of which I have not spoken and to which I desire to direct only a few words. The effect of giving the intermediate tariff to the United States is to enable their meat to come into this country for $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound where previously it paid the general tariff rate of five cents.

Mr. DUNNING: That is on bacon.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is on bacon.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in this item.

Mr. BENNETT: But it arises out of the intermediate tariff being given. I do not propose to traverse the observations made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw; I am only going to read what was said in that connection by the Secretary of State of the United States. He may have been entirely wrong and the hon. member for Moose Jaw may be entirely right, but this is what he said, that Canadian concessions on meats and meat products duties will open the way "for our farmers to get back a bigger share of the British pork market. The new agreement will permit American pork to go to Canada to replace Canadian pork exported to Great Britain, thus, in effect permitting increased exports of American pork to Great Britain." I hardly think anyone who has observed the history of the growth of the bacon and pork industry in this country since 1932 would make the observations that have been made in the house this afternoon.

One of the leading supporters of the Liberal party, a gentleman who prides himself on the fact of his notable contributions to it, Mr. McLean of Canada Packers, has issued a booklet which I think he has put into the hands of every member of this house. In that booklet he pointed out, rightly or wrongly, that the effect of the agreement made here in 1932 was to put into the hands of the farmers of this country not less than thirty-six millions of new dollars, not by reason of a tariff alone but because we had free access to the markets of Great Britain and Great Britain imposed a tariff against foreign pork products. The result was that the 1932 agreement prevented the farmers of the United States from selling their products in Great Britain without the payment of a duty, which was imposed by Great Britain and not by Canada; thereafter their products did not enter that market except to a very limited extent, and we obtained the benefit of that. Mr. McLean said that that meant some $36,000,000 to us. I do not know whether that is a correct estimate, though I am informed by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) that another packing firm, Wilsil's, of Montreal, made the same estimate. This I do know, however, that to a very considerable extent we supplanted Denmark in the British market because we had free access to that market. We fixed a quota so large that as yet we have not reached it, and as a result Canadian farmers have had a ready, stable and continuous market for their products in Great Britain. It has been the most stable market, according to the representatives of the packers, that we have had in Canada since we became a dominion. As a consequence we have steadily increased our exports; we have supplied more and more bacon to Great Britain, and because of the duty imposed by Great Britain the United States has been unable to send her products to that market.

Now I am merely pointing out that as a result of granting the intermediate tariff we have done two things: first, we have bound ourselves not to increase it on the item during the currency of the agreement. That is, the rate has been cut in two, from six cents to three cents, but the United States rate against our products still remains at six cents. There is no reciprocity in that, at least. Second, under the schedules of our country there was a duty of five cents on bacon and various duties on other kinds of meats. In the case of bacon this has been cut to one and three-quarter cents, not because we have taken direct action in that regard but because we have lifted the item from the general into the intermediate tariff. The result is that from January 1 last on the United States enjoys our markets by surmounting a barrier of only one and three-quarter cents per pound, whereas previously it was five cents.

The only point I desire to make is that Secretary Wallace has said that this is going to mean a great thing for the farmers of the United States. He, I believe, should be able to speak on that point with more authority than anyone in this chamber, and that is his view. I merely leave the matter at that, but I am grateful that at least the government have reserved the right to deal with the intermediate tariff and increase it if necessary with respect to meats other than the item mentioned in this schedule. They are free to take any action they like in raising the tariff, if need be, to protect the Canadian producer except with respect to this one item. This one item is bound, but this one item may be made very wide or it may be made rather narrow, depending, as the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) said, on the quantity of clear pork that is taken by this country. There was a time when we relied entirely on the United States for the clear pork that came in barrels and went to the lumber camps and other places. Latterly that has not been so to the same extent, and very lately, by reason of the tariff we imposed in 1930 and 1931, we have reduced importations from the United States until they have become practically negligible, though under a three cent rate they did go up as high as 14,000,000 pounds of pork meat alone. That is the position.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If, as the right hon. gentleman states, the dominion, under the agreement, obtained a larger market for hogs in Great Britain, I want to be one of the first to give him credit for having made an agreement that brought some benefit to the farmers of Canada. However, when we say that lowering the tariff on pork coming into this country is going to take away from Canadian farmers the British market for pork, we presuppose that the man in Canada cannot raise pork as cheaply as it can be raised by the man in the United States.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Certainly we cannot.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Of course we can, and if you will take your tariffs off other things we can produce it even more cheaply. If we have a better market in Great Britain for certain kinds of pork and pork products all the better for us, but as a farmer—and I have raised a good deal of pork in this country—I would say that we do not need any tariff protection on pork or pork products coming into Canada. What we do need is a reduction in the tariff on the things we buy, not on the things we sell, because we sell our pork and everything else in world markets. If we get a better market in England so much the better, but we must meet the competition of the United States in the markets of the world.

Mr. CAHAN: Where is the world market?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Anywhere you can sell pork, the same places as those in which the United States can sell it.

Mr. CAHAN: I challenge the hon. gentleman to find any world markets for either the meats or the agricultural products of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend challenges me to find any markets for meats or any other agricultural products of Canada. There is one great reason why we have not had a market for the last five years; it is that we would not take in return for those products the things we could bring into this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw speak kindly of the market Canada obtained in Great Britain as a result of the Ottawa agreements. I should like to hear him speak kindly also of the manufacturers, employers and employees of same, particularly in Quebec and Ontario, since they provide the very finest home market for the producers of farm products in Canada. I should like to tell him of just what the Americans think is the effect this agreement will have on the market for American farm products. I have under my hand a number of clippings from United States newspapers, and I should like to read some of the clippings that apply to this item. The first is from the Phoenix, Arizona, Star, and it states:

In no sense has it wiped out any existing tariffs. It has merely reduced tariffs. In the case of cattle, for instance, the tariff has been reduced from 3 to 2 cents per pound on animals weighing under 700 pounds, but only 155,000 such animals will be admitted at the lowered rate. As this number amounts to only three-quarters of one per cent of the total annual consumption of the nation the cattlemen have nothing to fear.

If the cattlemen in the United States have nothing to fear, neither have the Canadian producers of cattle very much to gain from that item. Now I should like to read another United States newspaper comment on this agreement, this time quoting from the Miami, Florida, Post:

With industrial payrolls up, the farmer and the dairyman will gain.

Of course they will. I do wish the representatives of the western farmers, for whom I have the very highest regard and whose problems I have tried to understand, could see these matters as I do. Perhaps if I were farming in the west I might be just as bitter as they are against producers in eastern Canada and against the workmen in the factories of the east, but I hope not.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to item No. 10.

Mr. MacNICOL: Very well, Mr. Chairman. But in any case I do not see that I am not addressing my remarks to item No. 10, since those employed in industry in Ontario and Quebec provide a market for farm products; naturally they must be the consumers of meats and other commodities, and I am anxious to convince my hon. friend, for whom I have a very high regard, that these workmen in Ontario and Quebec, yes, and in other provinces are a very great factor in the prosperity of the farmers of both the west and the east. As I pointed out the other day, the counties of Waterloo and Huron present a concrete example of that. So, if the industrial workers in Quebec and Ontario, numbering hundreds of thousands, are consumers of meats and other commodities—and they are—we should not do anything to injure the prosperity of those workers. A little later on, when the machinery items come up for discussion, I will read many editorials from United States newspapers showing that, in the opinion of the press, this agreement is going to be of tremendous benefit to industry in the United States, resulting in the engagement of thousands and tens of thousands of workers in the factories of that country. I have no fault to find with United States workmen getting work; I like to see men anywhere get work, but in this case it will interfere with the consuming power of workmen in Canada and will affect the farmers of Ontario and Quebec as well as those of the west because both Ontario and Quebec buy from the west. I have not the figures before me, but I know we buy thousands of head of cattle from the western provinces.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In reply to my hon. friend I may say that we from the west have nothing whatever against the manufacturers or the workmen of Ontario or Quebec. The hon. member says that we are bitter against them, but we are not. We never have been, but we do say that we should not be subjected to a tremendous exploitation for the benefit of those people, and that is what has been going on in this country for many years. As a matter of fact, if you will look up the report—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to item No. 10.

Mr. DUNNING: I would refer you, Mr. Chairman, to paragraph (2) of standing order 58, which reads:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I do not apply that to my hon. friend from Moose Jaw only; I apply it rather in a general way.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Very well, I will get back to the item, which deals with meats. Cattle are meats, I understand, on the hoof. My hon. friend said that Secretary Wallace or someone else had stated that this small amount of cattle going to the United States certainly could not affect their market to any great extent, and for that reason we could not expect much benefit from this item.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not what he said.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Just a couple of months ago I happened to take part in a by-election that was held in Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, and at that time I happened to meet some of the ranchers of that part of the country. This trade agreement had just come into operation, and I met a rancher who told me that he had just shipped some 248 head of cattle to the United States under this agreement. He said that he had gained $10 per head on those cattle, and he told me that if he had known, when he was shipping last fall, that such an agreement was coming into operation, he could have made that gain on some 2,400 head of cattle he marketed at that time.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What does he say now?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): He told me that this gain of $10 per head on those 248 cattle that he marketed helped greatly and, in fact, almost paid the expenses of running his ranch for this year. Surely that was a great benefit to a Canadian rancher, so I think we can say that already this agreement has been of great benefit to people in Canada who are in the live stock business, shipping cattle to the United States. Otherwise, why are there so many more hundreds or thousands of cattle going across the line to-day than there were a year ago?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Before this item passes I want to add another word, and I promise to confine myself strictly to the subject of hogs. I venture to suggest that the increased prices which have been mentioned come about because of the difference in the hog population of Canada. In 1911, according to the Canada Year Book, there were 3,600,000 live hogs on the farms of this country. In 1931, there were 4,699,000, and in 1932 there were 4,636,000. Every farmer in this house knows that in 1931 and 1932 prices for hog products in Canada were very low. Some of my friends in western Canada could not get sufficient for their hogs to pay for the cost of shipping them, and there was practically no market for hogs in western Canada under the government in existence at that time. Then the number of hogs was reduced, and in 1934 it amounted to 3,654,000. In connection with the increased consumption of hogs and hog products which must have taken place in Canada between 1911 and 1934 may I say that there must have been a substantial increase in the number of hogs consumed at home, because our population has increased. At the same time there was a decline from the peak years of 1931 and 1932 in the number of hogs on Canadian farms. Taking almost twenty-five per cent out of the hog population of Canada would cause an increase in the price of live hogs and hog products, no matter what government happened to be in power.

Mr. SENN: I should not like to have the remarks just made go unchallenged. For the past few years we have been marketing approximately 6,000,000 hogs per year. Whether the numbers on farms go up or down the numbers on the markets have remained fairly constant. Mr. McLean, who was mentioned as being head of Canada Packers, Limited, has said that in the first year of their operation the agreements raised the price of pork at least $3 per hundred. Although I may be getting away from the subject I think that statement ought to be made. On a two hundred pound hog the increased price would amount to $6, and I would remind hon. members that in that year, and in each year since, 6,000,000 hogs have been marketed. Whether or not the hog population has dropped off is apart altogether from the question.

There is another fact I should like to mention, namely, that during the last three years our exports of bacon to the United Kingdom have increased to a point at which they are almost doubled. It seems to me that the hon. member who has just attempted to show that the price of hogs is due to a lessened population of hogs rather than to the market we have in Great Britain is quite wide of the mark.

Mr. DONNELLY: I have listened to hon. members speak about the amount of money saved to the farmers of Canada because of the operation of the empire agreements. I believe the statement was made that $6,000,000 more was received by the hog raisers of Canada.

Mr. SENN: $36,000,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: As I have travelled round the country in the past five or six years I have wondered where that $36,000,000 has gone. I have tried to find some of the farmers who have received it, and when I have gone out to the farms and have told them this story they have begun to laugh. I have asked them to put their hands in their pockets and see if they could find that money. I have yet to find a farmer who will admit that he has received any of it. Surely the farmers in Ontario must have it, because we in the west have not that money. I assure hon. members that if they will go to the west and travel among the hog or cattle raisers they will not find that amount of money. I will tell hon. members right here and now that no class of people in Canada have suffered more than have the live stock men, whether they be raising cattle or hogs. They are just as hard up as are some of the wheat growers in western Canada. We know that for many years the market for Canadian cattle was in England. We know, too, that our natural market is across the border, in the United States, and if we are giving a preference to cattle exported to the United States we are giving an advantage to farmers in western Canada.

Hon. members ask what the situation is to-day. I want to tell them that if they have good butcher cattle they can get a good price for them across the line, but if they have only stockers and feeders they will not receive as good a price because their bins have not been emptied. If we were to wait another month or two, until spring opens up, and until a time when stockers and feeders would have emptied out the bins we would get a better price.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to the subject under discussion.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am talking about the price of live stock.

The CHAIRMAN: There is an item referring to cattle.

Mr. DONNELLY: Very well; with reference to prices for bacon and pork may I say that we know the price of bacon is set in England. However I want to say to hon. members that we did have a market in England for all the bacon we could sell; we always had that market. For years we had an open market. There is one point, however, which must be mentioned, namely, that in the English market we have never been able to get anything better than the Baltic price. Do hon. members suggest that Canadians cannot raise as good pork as is raised in Denmark or other European countries? Of course we can. Then, why do we not receive as good a price? We do not receive that price because of the way in which the pork is handled at the abattoirs. Our farmers go to the abattoirs and sell a thousand hogs as No. 1 bacon, but those thousand hogs are not shipped out under that grade. Possibly the abattoir will ship 2,000 as No. 1 grade. The poor bacon that is shipped to England sets the price. I would recommend that the Minister of Agriculture make an investigation as to why our abattoirs are allowed to ship out more No. 1 hogs or No. 1 bacon than they buy from the farmers. That is the difficulty so far as the price of bacon is concerned.

May I say that United States bacon does not compete with ours. We ship bacon to the United States, because the American hog is not a bacon hog. It is a fat, short hog which is raised for its fat, and is not produced for bacon. I repeat that they do not raise a good bacon hog, and we do not compete with them. All hon. members have seen coming from the United States pork on which there have been three or four inches of fat. That pork is found in the lumber camps, and it is a fair sample of the kind of pork raised across the line. That is the kind of stuff that would be coming into Canada. If we cannot compete with pork of that kind we are not farmers at all. Canadian farmers are not asking favours from anybody. We can compete with the world, but we do want markets in other countries and fair market conditions.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): It would appear unnecessary to answer the hon. member who has preceded me, because I believe the answers to his observations may be found in what he has said. However I must not leave unchallenged the statement that no farmer in Canada would admit he had received more for bacon or meat because of the imperial trade agreements. I tell him that practically every two or three months of the eighteen months to which I referred previously I received double the amount that farmers in the United States had received for a similar type of bacon.

The hon. member attempts to tell the committee that nothing but a coarse type of bacon would come from the United States. I do not believe the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) said that. I realize that in the United States pork can be produced more cheaply than it can in Canada. Whether or not the hon. member for Moose Jaw will agree, I think every other hon. member realizes that pork can be produced more cheaply in that country. In the western states the farmers can feed grass when it is forty degrees below zero, and the stock can be fed corn.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Where in western Canada can they feed hogs outside at that temperature?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): There are several states in the United States where hogs can be fed outside practically all the year.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On grass?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Yes, on grass, corn or rattlesnakes, if you like. In the United States hogs can be produced more cheaply than we can produce them.

The hon. member who preceded me has said that farmers in the United States do not produce good bacon. In making that statement he shows that he does not know much about the bacon trade. I realize it is hard for a man to be a doctor of everything, but surely he will admit that for years the Swift company in the United States was one of our greatest competitors on the British market. They produced as good export bacon as we did. I note what the hon. member said with respect to bacon shipped from Canada to the United Kingdom, and I realize that there is a certain amount of truth in his observation. However I suggest that it is unfair to charge the abattoirs with not shipping good bacon, because I believe some of the blame should be placed on the farmer. The quality of bacon is decided to a greater extent in the farm barnyard than in the abattoir. So far as shipping it out of Canada is concerned, I think in all fairness to the abattoirs we must realize that there is a demand in Canada for good quality bacon, and there are many members of this house, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning)—who will no doubt have quite an appetite to-morrow after all the hard work he is doing to-day in this house—who would be very much disappointed if they found on their breakfast table to-morrow morning only the type of bacon, what is called rattlesnake pork, that comes in from the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: I like my breakfast bacon very much.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Certainly, and thousands and thousands more Canadians want their breakfast bacon to be of high quality. Schneiders of Waterloo have a plant that has been producing high class bacon for years, and you cannot expect the packers at Toronto and other points in this country to send their best bacon out of Canada and retain only their coarser qualities to compete with Schneiders and other high class producers in this country.

Mr. MacRAE: Does the hon. member think it is good policy for Canada to send out poor quality bacon?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): No, I quite agree that we should send more of the good quality, but there is a constant demand in Canada for high class bacon. We consume in Canada from ninety-five to ninety-seven per cent of our pork and pork products. We have been struggling for many years to get a more balanced production, to produce more bacon and other finished products, using more of our own grain rather than having it left in the elevators, and it is bad business to encourage the importation of this product when we could be using wheat as feed and in that way get rid of some of our unsold grain. The principle is absolutely unsound and very dangerous.

Mr. DUNNING: Might I just point out that in this item there is not a hog, not a bit of pork, nor any cattle, with the single exception that sausage comes into it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Where do you get the sausage?

Mr. DUNNING: I think, Mr. Chairman, that we might now pass this item and have the different subjects come up for discussion on the proper items.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): As long as you have sausage in there, you have them all.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I realize that you are right and that most of this discussion is out of order. It is not my intention to violate your ruling; I simply wish to say that when the agriculture estimates are up it is my purpose to discuss this question of export bacon and the price of hogs, the part that is played therein by the packers, both in Canada and the United States, and other matters pertaining thereto. It would be entirely out of order, of course, for me to do so on this item.

In order to justify my position on this item I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that it provides that meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned, n.o.p., shall carry a duty of three cents per pound under the intermediate tariff, which is the tariff applied to the United States under this agreement. The reason I am prepared to support this item is simply that I think three cents is a sufficient duty, but it would be unfair to myself and others who might hold similar views to allow the impression to go abroad that I am entirely in favour of a very low rate of duty on imports of meats of all kinds. This, however, is not the proper item under which to discuss that, and I am simply serving notice to the committee that by acquiescing in this item I am not expressing approval of many of the views that have been expressed here to-day.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 47. Soya beans, n.o.p., free.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister explain why this item is made free?

Mr. DUNNING: Our imports of soya beans are not separately recorded. The only provision in our tariff at present is item 663. Prior to the coming into force of the treaty, soya beans could be imported free when imported for use in the manufacture of cattle feeds and fertilizers. The statistics of imports under this item cover a number of commodities and do not segregate soya beans. There is a limited production in Canada, particularly in southwestern Ontario, but so far the record of this crop in this country has not been an extremely encouraging one. In at least two or three recent years the crop has been disappointingly small with extremely high prices, the latter being in part a reflection of conditions prevailing south of the line, where demand has outstripped supply. The great natural source of soya beans up to the present time has been the orient, it being one of their staple products and one of the great necessities of life in China and Manchukuo. As the field of use has widened in Canada, the demand has grown, and in no sense of the word has production kept pace with the demand. In recent years various governments have been requested repeatedly for action by order in council whereby soya beans for this or that purpose might be imported free of the duty of two cents per pound which they had to pay when imported as beans n.o.p. Under the trade agreement, as indicated by the present item, soya beans are made free regardless entirely of the purpose to which they may be put in this country. The United States rate on soya beans is two cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: I just want to make a few observations on soya beans because my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) dealt with the matter very fully yesterday. If any member of the committee happens to enter Chicago at the central station and will go upstairs and look at the exhibit of soya bean products he will get a clear understanding of what soya beans mean in the economy of that country. It is estimated that 592 products can be produced from soya beans. I do not know how accurate that statement is; I do not pledge myself to its accuracy.

Mr. DUNNING: A very great number, anyway.

Mr. BENNETT: Next to coal tar products it is one of the most remarkable products we have in the number of derivatives that may be produced from the beans themselves—duco for example, for painting cars; oil for soaps, cake for feeds, and oil refined for other purposes. That will give the committee some idea of what is involved. During all these years we have been endeavouring in this country to secure variety of crops, and the late government was asked very particularly to see what might be done with respect to soya bean production. Last year we had ten thousand acres sown to soya beans in Canada; roughly five thousand acres went for ensilage and so forth, and the other five thousand acres produced beans. There is a small factory at Stratford which had many difficulties, but is now in a better position, and there is a factory in Montreal, that extracts the oil from the beans and sells it to the soap factories. This was one of the most fertile fields for development that I know of in this country. Now it has gone.

[Mr. Dunning.]

There will be no development of it with the free entry of soya beans into Canada; in the very nature of things it is quite impossible. In the first place the greatest field of production is in the orient, in Manchukuo where the beans are grown in larger quantity than anywhere else. In the valley of the Mississippi in the United States the production has increased very rapidly, but so great has the demand grown that it was with difficulty we could secure any quantity of soya beans from the United States, and the price became very high. The protection given to the farmers of the United States in the production of soya beans is two cents per pound, if my memory serves me aright. We did give the same rate of protection in our general tariff with a slight reduction—I think the rate was 1½ cents—on the intermediate, and it was free under the British preference. Now it becomes free to the United States, but that means that it is free to Japan and to all other countries that enjoy the most favoured nation treatment. I take it that it is free to Japan.

Mr. DUNNING: It always has been, under the intermediate, for certain purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no question about its being free in any event to Japan and to all the other countries that enjoy the most favoured nation treatment. A great many of these items were free, but all countries that now enjoy the most favoured nation treatment in Canada will have the same protection as we accord to the United States. I do think it was a mistake to bind this item. In the first place it is a leguminous plant; as a matter of fact it is cut with binders in the field. In the next place production has been very high per acre where the soil is suitable; and the variety of products made from it rendered it highly profitable. I do not know that any field ever offered a greater opportunity to the Canadian farmer, in the sections where it could grow, than did soya beans; and when I saw that it was on the free list and bound, I confess I felt it was rather unfortunate. My hon. friend was wrong about the intermediate. The intermediate was 1½, except where the product is used for specified purposes, namely, for food, and then it was free across the board. But soya beans, for the general purpose I have mentioned, the extraction of oil and the production of various derivatives to which I have made slight reference, carried a duty of 1½ intermediate and 2 per cent general and was free under the British preference. It is now free to the United States and thereby free to twenty-seven other countries. I had hoped that it would not be, for the reason I have indicated. It offered the greatest opportunity for development in connection with our farm industry. My interest in it came about in a very accidental way. Many years ago, passing through the central station at Chicago, waiting to change trains, I happened to go upstairs to the news stand and went over and looked at the exhibit. I do not know whether it is there now, but it certainly did give me a most remarkable insight into the possibilities of the industry.

Mr. DUNNING: It was first in the exposition and was afterwards in the station.

Mr. BENNETT: Then my hon. friend has seen it; he is familiar with it.

Mr. DUNNING: It is very remarkable.

Mr. BENNETT: It is indeed very remarkable, and what does rather distress me is the fact that we shall lose the chance to develop that industry in Canada. In the first place it cannot be done with the United States having a two cent duty against importations, when we now find countries enjoying the favoured nation treatment having free entry. We cannot develop the industry under such circumstances. The United States found it essential, against eastern competition, to place the tariff at two cents and that is still maintained. But there is another reason, and that is that the definition with respect to class or kind not made in Canada at once arises and the producers have not been capable of supplying ten per cent of the oil necessary for soap making. The little factory at Stratford did not succeed; with respect to the one at Montreal I cannot say anything at the moment, but we were asked to permit machinery to come in at a lower rate of duty or free in order that the industry might be established. I am told that about 5,000 acres of the product was used for ensilage. There is also the secondary market which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln. It has taken the place of peanuts when roasted, and its sale is larger than that of peanuts because it is regarded as a more delectable food. The effect is nothing more or less than to prevent, during the currency of this agreement, the establishment of what I should regard as a very important industry in that section of the country where soya beans may be grown, it being of course, as my hon. friend says, an agricultural product.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I do not wish to take issue with everything my right hon. friend says, but after all this is a crop that is grown in more or less tropical countries.

Mr. BENNETT: Canada is not tropical.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It grows principally in semi-tropical countries, in China and in the southern states. My right hon. friend says that it will interfere with the development of an industry that might be built up in Canada. Well, if Canada is adapted to the growing of soya beans we shall start to grow them, provided they can be grown in the ordinary way. But are we to bolster up a new industry again, thereby charging the people of the country a large amount for, as he says, some 592 products required by the world? We should be careful about what we are doing in this regard. We are not trying to protect one of the infant industries which we have been protecting until they have grown hoary with age. This is a new one we are talking about and there are no vested interests in Canada in connection with it. Let us not start setting up in this country more vested interests, which have to live on a dole from the people of Canada as a whole, in order that one section may be given pap from the Dominion of Canada for the benefit of a few people. Perhaps a little corner of the Niagara peninsula might grow these beans.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just a word or two in reply to the hon. gentleman. I should not have expected him to oppose this item, because as far as I know the manufacturers—if he were alluding to them—are not opposed to it; it is the farmers who should be opposed. I was told by one of the men in the business that there are approximately 10,000 acres in western Ontario to be put under crop for the raising of soya beans.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mostly for feed.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is a farmers' item, not a manufacturers' item. As the leader of the opposition has said, there are a great number of commodities made from soya beans. I visited in Dearborn, Michigan, a research plant built by the Ford interests where there are displayed a large number of the products made from the soya bean. I will read, for the information of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, something that will indicate that it is not merely a tropical product. The Review of Decatur, Illinois, in supporting this item in the agreement, says:

> This year Illinois farmers have produced more than 18,000,000 bushels of soya beans, half the crop of the country. The uses being made of soya beans are growing. Canada does not grow soya beans, at least not on a commercial scale such as the crop has developed in the middle west.

Apparently, in the framing of the agreement, someone at Washington was under the impression that Canada does not grow soya beans, but we are going in for it now, and it should be of benefit to the farmers in western Ontario. From this article I would conclude that they are now raising in the state of Illinois the largest crop in the world, outside of Manchuria, of course.

Mr. CAHAN: And Illinois is not a tropical country.

Mr. MacNICOL: For my part I should imagine that the manufacturers would not oppose this because they would welcome having their beans come in free provided they could not obtain all they required in Canada. But for the farmer who wants to get into it, I want to support anything that will help him in Ontario, in British Columbia or any other province, for that matter. I am now speaking of those who I know were engaged in this business in western Ontario. If the soya bean helps them I am for it, because when the farmer has prosperity we all have prosperity.

Mr. DUNNING: I should appreciate it if the committee would allow me to pass the soya bean item. I would then suggest that the committee rise and report progress and endeavour to arrange for my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Power) to get into committee of supply some time before six o'clock. I have only this to say with respect to the remarks of the leader of the opposition. The soya bean is certainly a fascinating bean—I mean that seriously. I do not know of a commodity that grows for which a greater variety of uses has been discovered by man. Broadly one may say that it will grow where corn can be produced commercially. Those areas of Ontario which can produce corn commercially—and they are very small—have a chance, I am advised, to produce soya beans commercially; but the fact that during recent years of very high prices for soya beans the area under cultivation devoted to this purpose in the whole of Canada has not grown beyond ten thousand acres, at least half of which was used for feed, indicates something of the difficulties. I might point out with reference to soya bean oil that it has been free under all tariffs for years past, and soya beans themselves have been free for years for use in making cattle foods and fertilizers, which are among their most prominent uses in this country. During the last five years the finance department has had literally scores of applications for the free entry of the beans, the oil and the meal for various purposes, including foods for human use, oil for industrial uses, soya bean flour for various uses, and it is a moot question whether by having access to all the uses that can be made of soya beans grown elsewhere the Canadian citizen would be better off than he would be as a result of an attempt to develop on any important scale the growing of soya beans in Canada. I should be pleased to be able to believe that we could add another product to what is produced from the top six inches of our soil, and particularly so important a product as the soya bean, but up to now—

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman allow a question? Is he sure that soya beans can be raised only in a country that produces corn commercially?

Mr. BRADETTE: Surely. Any farmer knows that.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly in Manchuria they are producing soya beans in large quantities. They have a country very similar to our own northwest, very similar indeed to Alberta.

Mr. DUNNING: I was endeavouring broadly to indicate the kind of farming country in which it can be produced. I cannot say definitely to my hon. friend that Manchuria is or is not capable of producing corn. Of course I do know that it does produce large quantities of the soya bean.

Mr. CAHAN: Enormous quantities.

Mr. DUNNING: I have enough confidence in the enterprise of Canadian farmers in every province to know that, with the aid in connection with this matter that has been given by experimental farms from one end of Canada to the other in the last twenty years, if it had been practicable commercially, enterprising Canadian farmers would have been growing soya beans at the high prices that have prevailed and are likely to continue to prevail during the next few years.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister any report on the results the farmers have had in western Ontario—Essex, perhaps, Elgin, Norfolk and Lambton—in raising soya beans?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not sure that they raise them in all those counties, but a gentleman to whose little factory the leader of the opposition has referred told me that quite a number of farmers in western Ontario are now raising soya beans, and I wondered whether the minister could say what quantity is being produced.

Mr. WOOD: I think I can answer the hon. member, not statistically but from a practical standpoint. A few years ago a neighbour of mine tried the experiment of growing soya beans. He had very good success in, I believe it was, the year 1930, because it was a very warm summer, a protracted fall, and a dry season; everything was favourable to the growing of soya beans. He became very enthusiastic. But since then his attempts have been a failure, and I have seen many failures in my own community in the last five years. I would say that you cannot get an average of one crop in five years. You can grow crops for ensilage purposes, hay and feed—and it is valuable feed—but you cannot produce it as a bean proposition. You might be able to do so if you confined it to the two counties of Essex and Kent, but I doubt whether it would be considered a valuable farm crop elsewhere.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Grant to Canadian Legion, $9,000.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): This is an item which was inserted in the estimates of 1928 as a result of a report of a parliamentary committee of that year which provides that the Canadian legion, for the purpose of looking after its service bureau, should receive a grant from the government, of, at that time, $10,000, since reduced to $9,000. The Canadian legion make a report annually indicating the amount of money which they have expended. They are supposed to put up dollar for dollar.

Mr. HEAPS: Do they put up dollar for dollar on this account?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the minister if any other returned soldier organizations do similar work and receive grants from the government? Is the legion the only body that receives a grant, or have requests been made on the part of other soldier organizations for similar grants?

Mr. POWER: No such requests have been made to me since I came into office.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Last Post fund, $60,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister explain how this fund has been administered during the past year?

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. gentleman wish me to give him the details of how the fund was started?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I think we know that in a general way. I had reference to the recent administration.

Mr. POWER: As the hon. gentleman knows, this is a voluntary organization subsidized by the government. It looks after the burial of ex-service men who die without funds, and it also looks after the placing of markers on their graves. It was started in 1922-23, and the amount paid out in that year was $9,271.59. In 1931-32 it rose to $40,000, and I think in the supplementary estimates of 1934-35 an additional sum of $20,000 was provided. This work is carried on under regulations laid down by order in council. I have not the order in council with me, but it is rather lengthy, containing all the regulations governing the subsidy paid by the government to this organization.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister say how many cases are covered by this expenditure?

Mr. POWER: During 1934-35, the latest figures available, there were 606. As my hon. friend can well imagine, the number of burials is gradually increasing. The number has increased as follows:

1922-23	83
1930-31	362
1931-32	430
1932-33	523
1933-34	539
1934-35	606

I have not the figures as to the number of burials from March 31, 1935, to December 31, 1935, but they are very easily procurable.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister say whether these burials have reached their peak now, and whether the number is likely to decrease?

Mr. POWER: No, I am afraid not. We all have to go that way pretty soon—

Mr. HEAPS: Which way?

Mr. POWER: I hope to be with my hon. friend; I do not know just where. The number of deaths among ex-service men is increasing very rapidly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who are eligible or what class is eligible, to take advantage of this fund?

Mr. JACOBS: The dead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not intend to make light of this subject at all.

Mr. POWER: The Last Post fund will pay a maximum of $50 for the funeral and a maximum of $25 for the grave to provide a respectable sepulchre for indigent veterans, that is, veterans who cannot be buried otherwise. As the hon. gentleman knows, the department looks after the funeral expenses of indigents who die in departmental hospitals, and this fund has to do with ex-soldiers who are indigent and who die outside of the hospitals.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could the minister give us the number of those to whom this assistance had to be given during the past year?

Mr. POWER: I have not the figures for 1935 but I have them for the fiscal year 1934-35, when they totalled 606.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just one other question in regard to this item. Christie Street hospital, Toronto, was in my riding, though it is not in it now. The cemetery largely used is the soldiers' plot in Prospect cemetery. I was just wondering what means the government uses in directing from whom the caskets shall be purchased, or does the government make any direction in that regard? If so, what is the standard of the caskets used for the bodies of those whose families have to obtain this relief?

Mr. POWER: When soldiers who have no other resources die in departmental hospitals the department looks after their burial. The choice of the casket and of the undertaker is left to the relatives of the soldier. A certain amount of money is provided, I think $75, to look after the expenses of the funeral.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand that if a soldier dies at the hospital his relatives are permitted to send for their own undertaker? My information is to the contrary, that the undertaker is selected by the department.

Mr. POWER: My information is to the effect that the relatives of the soldier are allowed to choose the undertaker. Perhaps my hon. friend will remember that in 1932 or 1933 General Ross, the then member for Kingston, discussed this question at great length. I think at that time the minister, Hon. Murray MacLaren, laid down the rules which were to be followed. I have not those rules before me, but my recollection is that the relatives of the deceased soldier were permitted to choose their own undertaker and that the department simply furnished an amount of $75. Perhaps my hon. friend will remember that General Ross objected to the practice which had existed up to that time of calling for tenders from undertakers. I think his resolution was along that line.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. MacNICOL: I am very glad to hear that it is the practice of the department at the present time to permit the relatives to select their own undertaker.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to ask as to the time within which an application must be made after the death occurs, in order to take advantage of this fund. I recall that a few years ago the application had to made almost immediately, and if that was not done no benefit was obtained. I was wondering whether or not that regulation has been changed, because it has worked a great hardship on many people who were not aware of the existence of the Last Post fund, and by the time they obtained the information it was too late to take advantage of it.

Mr. POWER: Of course my hon. friend will understand that this fund does not operate under the control or jurisdiction of the department; it is a voluntary organization. There are local committees set up in different towns and districts, having their own regulations governing applications. I should say that in the normal course of events an application for assistance from this fund must be made immediately. I speak subject to correction, but I am under the impression that it does not very often happen that a refund is made to the relatives after the funeral has taken place. I should not think that would be the case, because it must be remembered that this is a fund for persons who die indigent.

Mr. BROOKS: That is exactly the point. Everyone who dies has to be buried. Whether the friends or relatives of a deceased soldier have funds or not, he is buried, but it is too late then to take advantage of this fund. I know of a number of cases in my own province. As the government is making a contribution to this Last Post fund, there should be a regulation allowing persons to take advantage of it even after the burial. I think the regulation is too strict.

Mr. POWER: I shall be very glad to provide my hon. friend with a copy of the regulation.

Mr. BROOKS: I have seen the old regulation.

Mr. POWER: I am informed that there have been some changes; I will provide my hon. friend with a copy.

Mr. WOOD: I represent a constituency in which there are some five thousand Indians.

My attention was recently drawn to the fact that the right of participation in the Last Post fund has been withdrawn from the Indians owing to the fact that they are wards of the government. I should like to know why that was done. These men did their bit; when they were asked to go over the top they were not asked whether they were Indians or what they were. They were just British.

Mr. POWER: Representations have been made to the Last Post fund along the lines mentioned by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood). Without being able to be definite on the subject I assume that the reason for some distinction being made between Indians and other ex-soldiers is that, the Indians being wards of the government—

Mr. CAHAN: And already provided for.

Mr. POWER: —and already provided for by the Department of Indian Affairs, the administrators of the Last Post fund did not consider they were indigent. But I know that the Last Post fund has always provided $25 for a marker, the funeral expenses presumably being looked after by the department which has the special care of the Indians. I may add that recently the matter has been brought to the attention of the department, and discussions are going on with the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. McIVOR: I have officiated at funerals at which the type of burial outlined by the minister was quite in evidence. It was a comfort to the wife and family to know that their husband or brother or father having been overseas and his earning ability considerably lessened, and it having been perhaps impossible for him to get any pension, at any rate he did not have to be buried as an indigent. It was a little bit of comfort and perhaps an evidence of appreciation on the part of the government to give at least a funeral of a much lower standard than that of the ordinary artisan.

Mr. BROOKS: My understanding is that it is not the government that gives the funeral; it is the Last Post fund.

Mr. STEWART: I understood the minister to say that this is an organization to which the government makes a contribution, and that these payments are made from the funds of the organization. Could the minister tell the committee what other sources of revenue the organization has besides the contributions from the government, also whether they render a statement of their expenditures to the minister or the department?

Mr. POWER: I am informed that they are not asked for a statement, but I know they have other sources of revenue. In Ontario a grant has been made by the legislature for the past four years to cover the cost of administration, and so forth, and each municipality is required to pay $15 towards the cost of burial of anyone residing in the municipality for a period of not less than three months who would otherwise have been a public charge. In the cities of Montreal, Westmount, Outremont, Verdun and Lachine, twenty-five per cent of the cost is paid in similar circumstances by the municipality. In Quebec the provincial government has made a special grant for the purchase of the "field of honour" of $1,000 per annum for ten years from 1928. This is extraneous to and not applicable to current burials. In Manitoba the provincial government makes a grant of $500 a year applicable to administration. In Alberta $400 a year for the same purpose is divided between the two branches, north and south. No other branch has any grant so far.

Mr. CAHAN: There are private subscriptions to this fund?

Mr. POWER: Oh, yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Have the government had a statement of receipts and expenditures from the organization?

Mr. POWER: There is a representative of the department on the board, Mr. Scammell, the secretary of the department. We do not receive any statement as far as I know.

Mr. HEAPS: No check is kept of the money that the government gives to this organization?

Mr. POWER: The statement of the fund is audited by chartered accountants, and the representative of the department checks it.

Mr. STEWART: Can the minister give the total expenditures of the organization during the year, without the details?

Mr. POWER: I have no doubt I could readily obtain it from the headquarters of the fund.

Mr. STEWART: It would seem that as the government makes the contribution it might naturally and without any discrimination expect to receive from the organization a copy of its annual statement, or some information as to whether the whole amount is needed, and so on.

Mr. POWER: As far as I am aware this vote has always been considered a very excellent thing. I have never heard any criticism of the grant. I do not think any government since 1922 has considered it advisable to ask for such a statement, but if the committee thinks it should be had, I will take great pleasure in asking for a report.

Mr. STEWART: I do not want the minister to think that I am criticizing the expenditure at all. It has been made all these years, as he has said. I think it is a very worthy and proper thing that the government should make this contribution. But in the ordinary course, without desiring to limit their activities or be critical in any way, and there being a representative of the department on the board, one would think that the department for its own satisfaction, not necessarily to disclose it to the house, would like to have some report or statement of the activities of the organization. I want it to be understood distinctly that in speaking in this way I am not criticizing the work of the organization or the contribution that is made; I merely suggest that it might be well to have some statement. I know my hon. friend's leader lays down very strictly the principle that parliament should have supervision of the expenditure of moneys voted, and it is a sound principle. So that without limiting their activity or interfering with their discretion, which I am sure is wisely exercised, I think it would be well for the minister's own satisfaction if he had a statement of their receipts and expenditures and their activities and methods.

Mr. JACOBS: That is, you do not expect the declaration of a dividend.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us anything about the regulations for the administration of this fund? Is it possible, after the death of a man in an outlying district, to obtain funds from the Last Post fund, and if so under what conditions?

Mr. POWER: Application is made to the officers of the fund, and the matter is considered by them, without reference to the department. I am not aware of what principles guide them in their decisions, but I do know that there are regulations, a copy of which I shall be pleased to give the hon. member.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe I am a life member of the Last Post fund in the city of Montreal, and I am sure that the funds of the organization are administered with the utmost efficiency and care. There is a careful audit of the expenditures, and I believe there will be no difficulty in the officials of the department gaining access to the audited statements of expenditures for each branch of the Last Post fund. In fact I understand that expenditures are brought to the notice of government officials, and, perhaps tacitly, passed or approved by them.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is my understanding that after a funeral it is impossible to get any amount from this fund. I suggest that the minister would do well to look over the regulations and ascertain whether or not it would be possible to have certain amendments made. There have been instances of funerals in connection with which the need for assistance was apparent, and I believe in such instances some funds should be distributed. Justice should be done in those cases.

Mr. HEAPS: Are moneys from the $60,000 allowed only to ex-service men who served overseas with the Canadian forces?

Mr. POWER: My understanding is that it is allowed to men who served in the imperial forces, and I believe also to those of the allied forces.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Shall we receive a copy of the balance sheet of the Last Post fund?

Mr. POWER: I shall be pleased to forward it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): As a matter of principle I suggest it should be left with the department. There should be information indicating the manner in which the $60,000 is spent.

Mr. POWER: At a later time when I am dealing with estimates, I shall produce a document giving the information.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What is the procedure with respect to the burial of indigent soldiers? A number of officials of the legion have not known the proper steps to take, and as a result many indigent cases have had to be referred to local charitable institutions.

Mr. POWER: In every province and in most large municipalities there are committees of which members of the legion usually form a part. I am afraid it would not be possible for me offhand to tell the hon. member just what person he might call on the telephone in the event of an emergency, but I imagine at all points in Canada, with the exception of a few outlying districts, the committees must be readily accessible. Although Saskatchewan does not subscribe to the fund, I believe Alberta does. I have no doubt that before entering into a commitment they must have assured themselves that committees in the province were functioning.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I know of instances where officials of the legion experienced difficulty in obtaining assistance, in some cases not being able to get it at all. I know that imperials have been refused assistance from the fund. Of course there may have been some technicalities, but the officials did not seem to know the proper procedure. Action had to be taken by local charities.

Mr. HEAPS: In view of what the minister has said, may I take it for granted that men belonging to the imperial forces are eligible?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to have a definite answer, in case of any difficulties arising in the future.

Mr. POWER: I shall check up in the matter, but I am almost certain. One can be sure of nothing, except death. Upon looking up the record I find that the Last Post fund was organized under a dominion charter to prevent the pauper burials of any persons who had served in His Majesty's or allied forces. I believe that answers the hon. member.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I officiated at the funeral of a person who died in Weyburn, but for whose funeral we could obtain no assistance. This man was a member of the imperial air force, but local contributions had to be raised to meet the necessary expenditures.

Mr. POWER: If the hon. member will give me the information privately I shall be pleased to forward it to the officers of the Last Post fund, and ask for an explanation.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I shall be pleased to do so.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Conciliation and Labour Act, $30,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: How is this money spent?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is to meet the cost of printing and publishing the Labour Gazette, which, as hon. members are aware, is the official organ of the department, and also to pay the salaries of persons employed as Labour Gazette correspondents. The salaries of these persons, most of whom are in the lower category, range from $120 to $300 per annum. At present there are forty-three Labour Gazette correspondents. Other small payments are made from the vote for wage surveys and statistics, and for the conciliation of labour disputes. The vote covers certain other publications of the department.

Mr. HEAPS: In the last fiscal year how many disputes has the department attempted to conciliate?

Mr. ROGERS: Does the hon. member refer to the number of disputes investigated?

Mr. HEAPS: And the number of boards appointed.

Mr. JACOBS: That has nothing to do with the cost of the Labour Gazette.

Mr. HEAPS: Possibly not, but it has to do with the Department of Labour.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member's question might more properly be answered under the vote for the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. That is to say, this item covers only incidental expenditures connected with the work done by conciliation officers of the department. It is the policy of the department by that means to settle as many disputes as possible through the good offices of the conciliation service. Under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act boards are set up from time to time, but I would remind the hon. member that that is a separate item.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask who are the persons employed? Are they officers of the trades and labour councils, or just how are they appointed?

Mr. ROGERS: Does my hon. friend refer to the correspondents of the Labour Gazette?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: Where possible the correspondent has some connection with the employment service in the place where he resides, but there is no rigid requirement in that respect.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is, they are usually government employees of a province or under this department?

Mr. ROGERS: In a number of cases the correspondents are directors of employment offices in the various provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the department in any way, shape or form restrict the character of its investigations? For example, a request comes to the department in a case where a dispute is likely to occur. If the men or women employed by such a concern do not strictly come within the limits of the Lemieux Act, does the department take any action?

Mr. ROGERS: As I pointed out a moment ago, this item does not cover the work done under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I think, however, I understand what my hon. friend desires in the way of information. When the department receives notice of a threatened dispute, the conciliation officers of the department are placed at the disposal of the parties to the dispute. We have, for example, a chief conciliation officer in Ottawa; we have a representative in Montreal, one in Toronto and one in Vancouver, each operating within a particular geographical area, and whenever a dispute occurs the services of these officers are made available if the parties are agreeable thereto.

Mr. HEAPS: Irrespective of whether they come within the jurisdiction of the act or not?

Mr. ROGERS: They need not necessarily come within the jurisdiction of the act.

Mr. JACOBS: I have always been mildly opposed to this expenditure for the printing of the Labour Gazette. I do not know any person in Canada to-day who reads it.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one here.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, I suppose we have to consider my hon. friend as a person, but does he think we ought to spend $30,000 to contribute to his education?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, I think it is worth it.

Mr. JACOBS: Multiply that by ten million and we would have quite a large expenditure. No person, I say, talking by and large, really reads the Labour Gazette, and I have always been opposed to the cost of it. If we had cut out this item when I first opposed it we probably would have saved half a million dollars by this time, which we could use to very good purpose. I think the information which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) gets out of the Labour Gazette he could easily get out of the daily papers if he reads them every day, which I know he does. There is nothing new in it, so far as I can see. I have never learned anything from it, and I am amenable I suppose to some form of education. I receive it on my table every Saturday, or whenever it comes out, and I understand it comes out very regularly; but I have yet to learn that it contains any information for the people of this country which would justify the expenditure of the large sum which has been expended upon its publication up to the present time.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want to hold up this item, but I do not notice any salaries for conciliators included in it.

Mr. JACOBS: We are talking now of the cost of printing the Labour Gazette.

Mr. MacNICOL: Pardon me; I heard the minister say something about the salaries of conciliators, and I wondered if any of them received salaries under this item.

Mr. ROGERS: The salaries of conciliation officers are under another item—civil government salaries.

Mr. MacNICOL: This item is largely for printing the Labour Gazette?

Mr. ROGERS: Very largely for that and certain other publications—the annual report, a report on labour organization in Canada, and a report on labour legislation in Canada.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the circulation of the Labour Gazette?

Mr. ROGERS: The number of free copies issued in 1935 was 5,086, and paid copies 4,676.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that to regular subscribers?

Mr. ROGERS: For the most part to free subscribers, representatives of labour organizations, universities and libraries. Those who subscribe pay twenty cents a year. I do not know whether my hon. friend is one of them.

Mr. JACOBS: No, I pay nothing.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no objection to the passing of this item. May I ask what is the cost of printing the Labour Gazette each year?

Mr. ROGERS: The cost of printing in 1935 was $18,538.73.

Mr. JACOBS: That is the cost of printing? That does not take in the editing or the correspondents.

Mr. ROGERS: That does not cover the amount paid to the Labour Gazette correspondents.

Mr. JACOBS: The cost is $30,000 all round, as I understand it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are the payments to the correspondents made to the body with which the correspondent is connected within the province, or are they paid directly to the correspondent?

Mr. ROGERS: They are paid directly to the individual who is the correspondent in each particular case.

Mr. COLDWELL: In Saskatchewan civil servants are forbidden to receive remuneration for work they do outside of their regular duties, and I was wondering how you got around that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am afraid my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) is not very well acquainted with the Labour Gazette. He says he gets it every week—

Mr. JACOBS: I never read it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand that it comes out once a month, at least the edition I get is published monthly. I am quite satisfied that it can furnish to those who read it a liberal education—I do not mean an education in the affairs of the Liberal party.

Mr. JACOBS: A C.C.F. education.

Mr. MacINNIS: It contains a great deal of valuable education, and if proper use is made of it I do not think that $30,000, or whatever the amount may be, is too much. I am glad that the minister has handed a copy to the hon. member for Cartier, so that he will now be better acquainted with it than he was before.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I can see no more reason for cutting out the Labour Gazette than for cutting out other publications, such as the Commercial Intelligence Journal, for example, which goes out to the business men of this country, and above all the Canada Gazette, which contains so much padding that one never knows where to find anything.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 12, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald) presented the first report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, as follows:

Your committee recommends:

1. That 500 copies in English and 200 copies in French of the minutes of the proceedings and of the evidence before it, together with the papers, documents, and records to be incorporated with such evidence, be printed from day to day; and that standing order No. 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

2. That it be empowered to appoint and employ and pay counsel to assist in the investigation now before it, and also to employ and pay auditors and such experts as may be considered necessary.

3. That it be given leave to sit while the house is sitting.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald) moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I dislike taking exception to the adoption of a report of this kind, but I believe I am correct in stating that when a report from a committee contemplates expenditure, notice is required to be given. I believe, if I heard correctly, that the first report of the standing committee on agriculture contemplates the authorizing of certain expenditures in connection with the printing of reports and the taking of evidence.

Motion stands.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald) presented the second report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, as follows:

Your committee is of the opinion that no advance in the price of agricultural implements should be put into effect pending consideration of the subject matter of the order of reference, namely, the consideration of the high prices of agricultural implements for 1936.

QUESTIONS

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. McCULLOCH:

1. How many applications were made in Nova Scotia under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?

2. What was the total amount of the liabilities involved in said applications?

3. How many applications were made for loans in Nova Scotia from the Canadian Farm Loan Board?

4. How many of these applications were granted?

5. What was the total amount of moneys advanced on these applications?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. 84 to March 1, 1936.

2. $279,858.88.

3. 1,315, from inception of business to February 29, 1936.

4. 373.

5. Loans disbursed to date, $488,865.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to an address made in Detroit last evening by Senator Pittman, in which he quoted a letter addressed to him by the president of the United States with regard to the St. Lawrence waterway. I desire to know whether or not any modifications of the existing agreement signed by the United States and Canada are contemplated or have been under discussion. If it should be difficult to answer the question without reference to documents I should like the right hon. gentleman to accept this as notice of the question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend spoke of a letter addressed to him; he meant a letter addressed by the president of the United States to Senator Pittman?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall answer my right hon. friend at once. We have been advised, as was intimated in the president's letter, that the United States government are seeking a new approach to some of the problems involved in the projects for the development of the great lakes-St. Lawrence system, but thus far we have not been advised of the details with respect thereto. When they are received they will be examined.

GERMAN CONSCRIPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the government a question with reference to a statement which had been made by the German consul general. Since that time, according to the press, he has supplemented his statement by an explanation in which he says that possibly one hundred persons will be affected by the decision of the Reich to conscript all German citizens living in Canada and Newfoundland for "possible service in the German army." He gives a quotation from the regulations, as follows:

—in 1936 all male German nationals in Canada and Newfoundland—

That is, those born in the three years he referred to.

—are being called up for active military service, the class of 1916 first for the Reich labour service.

[Mr. Dunning.]

The consul's statement continues; he says the three classes mentioned—

—have to report immediately, until March 31 at the latest, to the competent German consular authorities.

Further than that, when asked whether men would be compelled to go, he said, "Well, I think they will go anyway. Yes, I guess they will be compelled to go." Further he says that failure to report is punishable. I think we might well ask how punishment is to be meted out in this country by a German consul. The statement continues:

Those desiring to volunteer for service, belonging to the classes of 1911-1915, can apply for enlistment as from October 1, 1936, and the classes of 1912-1919 as from October 1, 1937. Such volunteers may apply to the above consular authorities for further particulars.

This is a most extraordinary statement, and I think we ought to have a very full explanation from the government as to what it is proposed to do under the circumstances.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that after he addressed his question to the government yesterday I had word sent to the German consul general in Montreal stating that I should like to have an exact statement of what he did say. I have received from the consul general, Mr. Kempff, a telegram saying that he has sent the government the exact statement he made. That statement however had not been received up to the time I came into the house this afternoon. I shall therefore have to ask my hon. friend to let his question of yesterday, and also what he has read to-day, stand over for reply until to-morrow.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be technically the correct procedure, but this statement of the consul general, following my question of yesterday, has gone throughout the length and breadth of Canada. It is published in quotations by a reputable newspaper, the Montreal Gazette, and I think we should know the action of the government on a statement such as I have read.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my statement will go throughout the length and breadth of Canada as well.

CUBAN TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Before the orders of the day are called I desire to inquire of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) with regard to a press report appearing in both the Halifax Chronicle and the Halifax Herald of March 7 to the effect that Cuba would apply the maximum tariff to Canadian imports because of Canada's failure to purchase in Cuba even twenty-five per cent of the value of that island's purchases in Canada. Under the tariff system prevailing there another nation must buy fifty per cent or more to get the advantage of the lower tariff. This announcement was made by Mr. T. E. Palma, Cuban consul in Halifax. Does the minister accept the imputation that we do not purchase in Cuba twenty-five per cent of the value of that island's purchases in Canada? Would other countries be affected? Does the prohibition include codfish? Is a solution being sought for the difficulty, which is of serious moment to the business interests of my constituency, as regards both present conditions and future prospects?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of the questions which he has just submitted.

It is rumoured in the press that Cuba has applied or is about to apply the maximum tariff to Canadian exports to that country. On March 10, two days ago, we received a cable from the Canadian trade commissioner at Havana, as follows:

> Cuban government decree 3rd March published 10th March imposes maximum tariff Canadian goods shipped after latter date.

I may say that the maximum tariff of Cuba is double the minimum tariff which Canada has enjoyed for some time past. Last year Cuba passed a law which gave the president power to grant the minimum tariff where purchases from Cuba were at least fifty per cent of the sales made to Cuba. Further, if the purchases by Canada, for example, from Cuba were only between twenty-five per cent and forty-nine per cent of their purchases from us, a surtax of another twenty-five per cent would be added to the minimum tariff. If the purchases by Canada from Cuba are less than twenty-five per cent of the purchases by Cuba from Canada, then we were supposed to go under the maximum tariff. Apparently that is what has been done. We have enjoyed the privilege of the minimum tariff for some years.

I might add also, in reply to my hon. friend, that trade statistics as between the two countries are very greatly at variance, and if we accept the Cuban trade statistics we certainly fall below the twenty-five per cent limit. That discrepancy arises to some extent at least from the fact that a good many Canadian purchases from Cuba are made through agents or merchants in the United States. This applies more particularly to pineapples and tomatoes. However, we have instructed our trade commissioner to make representations to the Cuban authorities in an effort to establish that our purchases from Cuba are a great deal larger than they are represented to be.

With regard to the item of codfish, we have not been able to ascertain whether or not that item is included and whether or not in future it will come under the maximum tariff. Among other rights the president has been given authority to exempt certain articles of which they stand in greater need than of other importations. That was the case in the past, but the privilege of exporting codfish under that tariff may expire as from April 2 of this year. We are trying to ascertain now—we have not yet been able to get the information—whether a similar exemption is to be made in regard to codfish. I may add in conclusion that the government are watching the matter; we shall certainly exert every effort to re-establish the minimum tariff as far as Canadian exports to Cuba are concerned.

Mr. KINLEY: It includes other countries as well, but not Newfoundland, I understand.

Mr. EULER: It does not include the United States. The United States have a special trade agreement with Cuba which is not extended to any other country. Their rates fall in many respects below the minimum tariff.

Mr. KINLEY: But Newfoundland?

Mr. EULER: I cannot answer at the moment.

PRIVILEGE—MR. JACOBS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. A Montreal journal in its issue of yesterday carries a dispatch from its correspondent in Ottawa which states that I was not present and did not vote on the Canada-United States pact. The records of the house will show that I was present and did vote, so that the person who was absent was no doubt the correspondent who sent the dispatch. It may be, however, that he was in the gallery but that his low visibility prevented him from recognizing the members of the house who were present.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Some three weeks ago I placed a question on the order paper in reference to the Canadian Farm Loan Board. I wonder when I may expect a return.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I assume it was a question which was made an order for return?

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know what the present position is, but I shall be glad to check up on it.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA–UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Customs tariff—54a. Indian corn, not including Indian corn for purposes of distillation, when imported or taken out of warehouse by manufacturers of starch or of cereal products for human consumption, for use exclusively in the manufacture of starch or such cereal products, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister: free.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand there is no change in this item; it merely makes it bound?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, merely binding free entry.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—55. Indian corn, n.o.p., per bushel, 20 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: This is binding the intermediate.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—57. Oatmeal and rolled oats, per one hundred pounds, 50 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: The effect of this item of course is to bind the intermediate rate of fifty cents per one hundred pounds during the life of the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to know what is the rate of duty on oatmeal and rolled oats entering the United States under the existing Hawley-Smoot tariff, and what it was under the Fordney-McCumber tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the existing tariff, which is the only one I have before me, it is 80 cents per one hundred pounds.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the references that have constantly been made to 1929 figures it is obvious that we want the 1929 tariff rate. In the figures that have been given recently statements have been made as to the amount of business with the United States in 1929, that is before the Hawley-Smoot tariff, which is the tariff at present in force. We had long lists of figures given with respect to trade in 1929, in which year the Fordney-McCumber tariff had not been repealed. My desire is to see what relation these new rates have to the rates that prevailed in the United States prior to 1930 and in 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry the information is not here, but I will send for it and see that it is available.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What was our duty against oatmeal before, 80 cents?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes—free, 50 and 80.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): It is reduced from 80 to 30?

Mr. DUNNING: This is binding the intermediate, which is 50 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—71a. Timothy seed, per pound, one cent.

Mr. BENNETT: This, I understand, is a reduction by fifty per cent on timothy seed coming from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: A reduction from two cents to one cent a pound.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the United States tariff rate on that in 1929 and 1935?

Mr. DUNNING: As I have said, I cannot answer with respect to 1929. But the United States tariff was two cents and under this agreement it has been reduced to one cent, so that with respect to timothy seed the tariff is now the same going either way, from Canada and from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 73. Broom corn seed, when in packages weighing more than one pound each, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 74. Parsley seed, non-germinating, when in packages weighing more than one pound each, imported for use exclusively in manufacturing or blending operations, 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The questions that I think we should like to have answered in respect to all these items are very few. We cannot modify this agreement; that is obvious. Nothing we can do will change any item in the schedule. That is of course a matter of policy, and the government's majority ensures that will be so. We must therefore content ourselves with asking, so that there shall be a record of it, what concessions have been granted with respect to existing rates, and we desire to test the extent to which reciprocal arrangements have been made by knowing what the tariff rate in the United States now is, and what it was in 1929. That is the year with respect to which figures have been given so frequently in the debates.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope to have the 1929 tariff figures.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the present tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: Not having used the list to which my right hon. friend refers, I have not the comparable figures.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will recall what I referred to only the other evening. All hon. members were given the 1929 figures. That year was prior to the passing of the Hawley-Smoot tariff. My point is that what we have received is not even what we had before the passing of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. That is the reason we desire to have a record of these figures. The main point is that we desire to make clear just to what extent reciprocal concessions have been made. Thus far only one item, timothy seed is on the reciprocal list.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend will appreciate that schedule II has more to do with this question than has schedule I.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. DUNNING: However, I shall get the information.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BENNETT: Subject to that proviso, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—75. Lettuce seed, non-germinating, when in packages weighing more than one pound each, imported for use exclusively in manufacturing or blending operations: 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that a rate of 10 per cent? Item 75 in our tariff refers to seeds, namely cabbage, radish and so on, with rates of ten cents per pound. I notice this item refers to 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a reduction to 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Whether or not it is a reduction would depend entirely upon the value. The former tariff on item 75 is ten cents under the intermediate rate, ten cents under the general rate and free under the British preferential. It is now being made 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no evidence as to whether it is more or less.

Mr. DUNNING: The old duty ran pretty close to 100 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wanted to know.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—82(e). Nut trees, being seedling stock for grafting, and buds and scions for grafting such trees: free.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the changes?

Mr. DUNNING: These commodities have been dutiable up to the present time at the rates of 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 30 per cent. They are not produced commercially in Canada at all.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—83(c). Sweet potatoes in their natural state, per 100 pounds: free.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose that is a reduction of 100 per cent?

Mr. SPENCE: What does the term "natural state" mean?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not follow my right hon. friend in the matter of percentages; I prefer to speak in actual terms. Up to the present the duty has been free under the British preferential rate, 10 per cent under the intermediate rate and 15 per cent under the general rate.

Mr. STEVENS: It should be ten cents per hundredweight.

Mr. DUNNING: There may be a typographical error in my notes in that regard. I believe the hon. member is correct. Last year the imports, which were practically all from the United States, amounted to 52,700 hundredweight, valued at $110,000. They are not produced in Canada commercially.

Mr. BENNETT: Did we not receive potatoes of this kind from the West Indies?

Mr. DUNNING: Only a few hundred dollars' worth, a trifling amount.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the business was just starting.

Mr. SPENCE: What are sweet potatoes in their natural state? None that are any good come in from the United States in their natural state. They are what are known as kiln dried, and in order to have them keep they must be kiln dried. Will the 10 per cent be charged on the kiln dried?

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon. member will look at item 83 (a) he will find that the term "natural state" is in contrast with "dried, desiccated or otherwise processed."

Mr. SPENCE: I understand that.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a common term in our tariff items.

Mr. STEVENS: One of the expert valuators or appraisers of the Department of Customs upon finding that potatoes were kiln dried would say they were not in their natural state, and the first thing we know we would have a ruling by customs authorities that these are not admissible because they are not in their natural state, although the intention under the item is clear.

Mr. SPENCE: That is the type of legislation which keeps business people worried and makes them fight with customs officials. The difficulty is that if they are kiln dried a different ruling might be given in Toronto, at which point many come in, and appraisers would have difficulty in deciding whether or not to charge a duty.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change in the wording. It has been administered by customs authorities in precisely these words for a number of years, and the difficulty my hon. friend envisages is entirely new.

Mr. STEVENS: It has been overlooked.

Mr. DUNNING: Apparently the difficulty has never arisen.

Mr. SPENCE: Just get into business some time and see what you have to do with the customs office; then you will understand.

Mr. WALSH: I assume that last year a revenue was derived from customs duties on this and other items.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. WALSH: The assumption is that the government will require the same revenue this year as in other years, and that revenue will have to be raised by some other means. I do not know whether I am as a voice crying in the wilderness when I speak about raising revenue through a protective tariff, but I must say that I feel keenly in the matter. Here is one article, in particular, in which the poor man has little interest. He is satisfied if he can have ordinary potatoes, and when we remove the duty we are removing just that amount of revenue. I feel that the revenue feature of the protective tariff in this instance should prevail. I should not like to have the Minister of Finance worried all day and late into the night trying to find ways and means of raising revenue to make up for what is lost under this item. I would urge upon him to give consideration to the emphasis which formerly was placed on a protective tariff as a means of raising revenue, and particularly revenue on commodities which are consumed by people well able to pay customs duties.

Mr. BRADETTE: What about soya beans?

Mr. DUNNING: Naturally I have no desire to enter into an academic debate, and I do not wish to delay the passage of a schedule which I am trying to pass through the committee stage. The consideration mentioned by the hon. member of course can never be absent from the mind of a minister of finance.

I have before me information with respect to estimated loss of revenue involved in connection with each of these items. In the present instance the loss of revenue is estimated at $7,750, judging by last year's importations. Of course in this instance the loss of revenue would be absolute, because the item is made free. In many instances it is quite impossible to estimate accurately the loss of revenue, because there is always the presumption that if the article is not made completely free the larger volume of importation might adjust the balance of revenue in connection with the item.

Mr. HEAPS: It appears to me from the few words spoken by the minister that he himself is not quite sure as to the correct interpretation of the wording of this item. Personally I always feel that there should be an interpretation which should not permit of the department ruling in a sense different from that intended by parliament. I feel sure that if a shipment of potatoes came into this country under this item, the Department of National Revenue would be entirely justified, if the potatoes were not in their natural raw state, in charging the duty. They would not come in free under this clause. If the minister is not satisfied in his own mind that the item carries out the intent of the agreement, the wording should be made clear and definite so that it would not admit of two interpretations.

Mr. DUNNING: Apparently, Mr. Chairman, I did not make myself clear; I will try again. During the years efforts have been made under succeeding administrations to secure standard wordings with respect to various items of the tariff in order to avoid just the difficulty my hon. friend mentions. There is no change in the wording. It is a wording which has been administered in connection with not only this item but a number of others for many years past. Item 83 of the present tariff deals with potatoes in their natural state; with dried, desiccated or dehydrated potatoes; with sweet potatoes in their natural state, and sweet potatoes n.o.p.

The whole of item 87, for instance, includes vegetables, fresh, in their natural state, as distinct from vegetables dried, desiccated, and so forth. I know of no case of complaint or difficulty with respect to the application of the law by the customs authorities. If any member of the committee knows of any such case, of course we can endeavour to meet it. But experience appears to indicate that this wording has been well and generally understood over a long period of years.

Mr. HEAPS: Is a dried potato interpreted by the department as being a potato in its natural state?

Mr. DUNNING: If it is not dried, desiccated or dehydrated, it is in its natural state.

Mr. STEVENS: Does not dehydrating mean drying? Therefore would not a dried potato come under the dehydrated item?

Mr. DUNNING: It is included in the same classification. In item 83 of the tariff potatoes in their natural state, and dried, desiccated or dehydrated potatoes, are all grouped together.

Mr. SPENCE: May I suggest to the minister that he eliminate the words "natural state" and just say sweet potatoes in any state?

Mr. BENNETT: I was just going to point out the difference. There is no provision for dried, desiccated or dehydrated sweet potatoes except under item 83 (d). It does appear to me that the suggestion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) is a very sound one. Take item 83 (c), sweet potatoes in their natural state; the intermediate tariff is 10 cents per 100 pounds. That is the present rate, but we are going to make them free under the intermediate tariff. Then item 83 (d) says "sweet potatoes, n.o.p.," that is, sweet potatoes not in their natural state. That would mean dried potatoes, and the rate on them is 1¾ cents per pound under the intermediate tariff, as against 10 cents per 100 pounds on ordinary sweet potatoes in their natural state. The natural state sweet potatoes carry a duty of 10 cents per 100 pounds, whereas the dried potatoes carry a duty of 1¾ cents per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: That is as it was.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am talking about. We are now putting sweet potatoes in their natural state on the free list, but we are not putting sweet potatoes n.o.p. in item 83 (d) on the free list. It seems to me it should be abundantly clear that a sweet potato in its natural state is not a dried or desiccated sweet potato. I had not thought the difficulty was real until I heard what the hon. member for Parkdale said.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish I could see it as a difficulty.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Sweet potatoes could not come into Canada unless they were kiln dried. I think that was the point of the hon. member for Parkdale, that they had to be kiln dried before they could be imported. They would rot if they were not kiln dried.

Mr. SPENCE: I did not mean anything of the kind. Many thousands of barrels and hampers of sweet potatoes come in that are not kiln dried, but the kiln dried get the preference because they are much better.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend from Parkdale has answered the question for me better than I could answer it myself.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—84. Onions, in their natural state, including onions grown with tops, shallots, and onion sets: 30 per cent.

Provided that in no case shall any value for duty established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on such goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister tell us what duty there is against Canadian onions going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: The duty is 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. STIRLING: What quantity has gone into the United States from Canada in the ten months?

Mr. DUNNING: I have the figures for last year, 1935.

Mr. STIRLING: What were the Canadian shipments to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: They were 28,000 bushels, valued at $37,000.

Mr. STIRLING: I notice that the tariff item remains the same except that it is no longer possible to describe the duty as one not less than three-quarters of a cent per pound. That goes by the board, so that the reduction, roughly speaking, is from 75 cents to 30 cents on a dollar crate of 100 pounds.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think my hon. friend can state that as a fact. The computation would depend on the value in any particular year.

Mr. STIRLING: I am speaking of the average valuation of a 100 pound crate. This is the first item to which is attached the proviso with reference to a special duty. I wonder if the minister has any statement to make with regard to the use which the government proposes to make of this special duty.

Mr. DUNNING: No, Mr. Chairman. I think I must adhere to the decision made by the government some time ago not to anticipate the budget in connection with any of the items under discussion. Under the agreement there is attached to the item an undertaking that any value for duty established under section 43 of the Customs Act on imports of onions from the United States shall not exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per cent of the lowest advance imposed on such goods during the period from 1933 to 1935. I should not care to state now any more than that provision does exist.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister if he has information as to what was the lowest advance during that three year period in connection with the onion item?

Mr. DUNNING: The lowest advance has been three-quarters of one cent, applicable the year round.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not understand what connection there is between the application of this power that the government takes under the treaty and the bringing down of the budget.

Mr. DUNNING: I misapprehended my hon. friend's question in that regard and corrected my answer later.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister does not feel he is in a position to make a statement with regard to what use the government may make of this provision under section 43?

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend realizes that it is impossible to make any such statement in the month of March. The former government had such powers and I assume they exercised them in their own discretion from time to time according to the circumstances which existed.

Mr. BENNETT: That applied the year round on onions.

Mr. DUNNING: It was exercised the year round, but of course the government need not have exercised it the year round. I assume it was exercised the year round because in the opinion of the then administration the conditions prevailing warranted such a course being taken. This government will have to consider, after consultation with the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Revenue, what shall be done in the administration of items such as this.

Mr. LENNARD: Why is a duty of 30 per cent being placed on onions when the rate of duty applying to almost every other vegetable has been reduced to 15 per cent? I should like to be assured by the minister that this is not being done in order to pacify a certain famous onion grower in south-western Ontario.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean Mr. Gott, the former member?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. SPENCE: He does not grow them; he just talks about them.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the minister has quite apprehended the point raised by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). One fact has been established by what the minister has said. We know that the increase in the invoice value of onions during 1933, 1934 and 1935 was three-quarters of a cent per pound. This agreement provides that the increase in the invoice value shall not be beyond 80 per cent of three-quarters of a cent per pound, which is three-fifths of a cent per pound. Therefore onions will enter this country subject to a 30 per cent duty, which may be increased to a maximum amount of three-fifths of a cent per pound. The hon. member for Yale asked when that surcharge was to be put into operation, as the surcharge which was in operation during the last year is now no longer in force.

Mr. DUNNING: It is.

Mr. BENNETT: How can it be ?

Mr. DUNNING: It is in force.

Mr. BENNETT: I am referring to the three-quarters of a cent per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: The three-fifths of a cent per pound is in force.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Yale was trying to ascertain when the government put into force the three-fifths of a cent per pound surcharge on the 30 per cent tariff on onions.

Mr. DUNNING: It just remained in force but was reduced to that point. I understood the hon. member was stating a general principle.

Mr. STIRLING: I was.

Mr. STEWART: Has a new order in council been passed giving effect to the three-fifths of a cent per pound?

Mr. DUNNING: No new order.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Then the old order in council still stands.

Mr. DUNNING: As authority, yes, but reduced by this treaty to three-fifths of a cent per pound.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister mean that the order in council still stands and yet its conditions have been varied?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what it means.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will remember that the order in council was merely an enabling order under which the minister could act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am under the impression that I have not made any change. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) stated, the order in council does not change; it is merely an authorization for the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. BENNETT: That was for three-quarters of a cent per pound.

Mr. ILSLEY: In connection with most vegetables, the practice in the past has been for the Department of Agriculture to keep in very close touch with the Department of National Revenue. These valuations have been put on and taken off by the Department of National Revenue pretty much according to the wishes of the Minister of Agriculture. In connection with the valuation on onions, I think the situation is that no cancellation has been made. I speak subject to correction, but that is my understanding of the situation.

Mr. DUNNING: The three-fifths of a cent per pound is now applying.

Mr. ILSLEY: I withdraw my last statement; the three-fifths of a cent per pound is applying at the present time.

Mr. STEWART: Under what authority is this being done?

Mr. DUNNING: The original enabling authority still exists and the agreement undertakes a certain modification of the use of that authority. That modification is now automatically in effect. Instead of its being three-quarters of a cent, as it was on December 31, it became three-fifths of a cent per pound on and after January 1.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): It might interest hon. friends opposite to know that the real competition for the onion growers of the part of the country which I have the honour to represent comes from an agreement made by them with New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. STEWART: What are the imports from the sources just referred to by the hon. member?

Mr. DUNNING: In 1935 the total imports into Canada were 12,235,000 pounds, valued at $181,000. From Australia came 3,600,000 pounds; from New Zealand, 3,000,000 pounds; from the United States 1,960,000 pounds; from Spain 1,775,000 pounds; from Bermuda 767,000 pounds, and from Egypt 675,000 pounds.

Mr. STIRLING: Under what rate will Spanish onions now come in?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the intermediate tariff; there is no change in connection with onions from Spain.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Will the same principle of valuation apply to all vegetable items?

Mr. DUNNING: I have the information before me with respect to the other vegetable items, which I can give as we come to them.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The same principle will apply?

Mr. DUNNING: It is applying.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The three-fifths of a cent per pound?

Mr. DUNNING: The valuations may be different, but the same principle applies.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—85. Mushrooms, fresh, 15 per cent.

Provided that in no case shall any value for duty established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on such goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an industry in which our people were developing a very substantial trade. Mushrooms grow up in the night, I think we are told in scripture; we know it also in other ways. That being so, we have now changed the duty by reducing it 12½ per cent on mushrooms coming from the United States. Mushrooms were carried at a 27½ per cent rate on intermediate and 30 per cent under the general tariff; United States mushrooms paid 30 per cent. They will now be reduced to 15 per cent, which is a reduction of 50 per cent, and there is the further provision that if there is an increase under section 43 of the Customs Act over the invoice price, it shall not be more than 80 per cent of the lowest advance imposed during the years 1933, 1934 and 1935. Would the minister tell us what the importations were last year, the sources from which they came, and the extent to which the price is increased under section 43 of the Customs Act?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of fresh mushrooms are not separately classified at present, but they are part of a total of $10,393 representing imports of mushrooms and truffles, fresh or dried. Of this total, $5,804, or more than half, came from Hongkong and $1,300 from the United States. Mushrooms and truffles in cans—that is a different item from the one we are now discussing—value $43,800, came almost entirely from the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Some came from France.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, a small amount from France. With reference to the last part of the question, the value for duty under section 43 on fresh mushrooms has been five cents per pound, effective the year round. The maximum under the treaty will be four cents per pound, which is at present in effect.

Mr. SPENCE: I think it is very unfortunate that this item should be reduced, because a number of people in this country have put a lot of money into mushroom beds. There are miles of mushroom houses in this country which did not exist ten years ago. These people have developed a perfectly safe mushroom, packed in many cases in pound boxes with transparent paper so that anybody can see the contents and nobody need be afraid to use them. I think you are killing a promising industry if you reduce the duty from 27½ to 15 per cent. You should raise it 15 per cent instead of lowering it 12½ per cent.

Mr. STEWART: What is the rate of duty on fresh mushrooms going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Ten cents per pound and 45 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. STEWART: And that remains?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Can the minister tell us what principle governs the tariff range with reference to mushrooms relative to the item that has been already passed, sweet potatoes? We find a reduction in sweet potatoes to free, a reduction in mushrooms of 50 per cent, and still the duty is maintained on onions, a much cheaper food product. If we are concerned with the consumer and interested in revenue, I suggest that the sweet potato and the mushroom are more or less delicacies so far as many people are concerned. Onions are a staple and a cheaper foodstuff, and yet we find the duty on onions maintained at its full 30 per cent. I have no objection; I admit I am very glad that it is maintained, but as was pointed out by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) it is the only item in the vegetable list on which the duty is maintained where it has been. It will certainly meet the approval of some prominent onion growers in western Ontario. I know that the minister has a deep concern for producers.

Mr. BENNETT: Consumers.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): But so far as foodstuffs are concerned, onions are more or less of a necessity; sweet potatoes and mushrooms are luxuries, yet the tariff on the latter is substantially reduced while that on onions is maintained. I know that onion producers have made great progress in certain parts of western Ontario, also in parts of my own riding. With reference to the production of soya beans involving 10,000 acres, some hon. members said that that was only a small district in Canada, and probably even our onion producers have a very limited area. I think the largest in western Ontario is in the district of the Minister of Finance's friend, the premier of Ontario. I should like to know why a reduction has been made on practically every other item of from 30 to 15 per cent, while the cheap and necessary onion is maintained at its full 30 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: One important factor which must always be borne in mind in considering what was done by way of rates is that we always had to give attention during the negotiations to what our treaty arrangements were under the British preference. In the case of onions we had to keep in mind particularly the West Indies and New Zealand.

Mr. BENNETT: They are free.

Mr. DUNNING: I would point out further with respect to mushrooms and truffles that the total imports last year were only $10,000; half of these came from Hongkong under the intermediate tariff, and Hongkong remains on the intermediate tariff. So far as the comparative values of crops are concerned the onion crop is an important one, as indicated in the figures which I gave. True, its commercial production is confined to a relatively small area in Canada, not nearly so small as the soya bean area mentioned by my hon. friend, but I hardly think it is practical to compare commodities so widely apart, from the standpoint of the producer as soya beans, mushrooms and onions.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Well then, is this more or less protection for the producer rather than concern for the consumer?

Mr. DUNNING: We are trying to keep both in mind.

Mr. WILTON: If I am in order I should like to ask whether the present tariff arrangements provide for a duty on meal of the soya bean.

Mr. DUNNING: I can give my hon. friend the information, although the item has been passed.

Mr. WILTON: I know it has been passed.

Mr. DUNNING: The item dealt with under the treaty refers only to the soya bean.

Mr. WILTON: It does not refer to the meal?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. WILTON: I have just had a long distance telephone call from a company in Hamilton which is arranging to erect an establishment in the town of Dundas for the handling of soya beans. They are vitally interested in this matter, and request that a tariff of some kind be put against the meal at least, as a protection to the Canadian grower of soya beans.

Mr. DUNNING: I have had several wires this morning commending the government for allowing the bean in free. It depends entirely upon the business in which the sender of a wire is engaged as to whether he advocates free meal or a duty on meal. I have had a number of such communications today, so that I can confirm what my hon. friend says as far as representations are concerned. It is the old question as to where we shall start. Every industry is anxious to get free raw material and as high a tariff as possible on its own finished product. Unfortunately in many instances the finished product of one industry becomes the raw material of the next. That is one of the problems of tariff making.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(a) Asparagus, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I think it would facilitate the discussion a very great deal, Mr. Chairman, if we took each of these vegetable items and passed it separately. If no one objects I think that will be very much better.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be good enough to tell us the duty against our asparagus going into the United States, and what quantity we have exported?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the United States tariff this is in their n.o.p. item; it is not specifically provided for, and therefore would carry a tariff of fifty per cent ad valorem going into the United States.

Mr. STIRLING: Against our 15 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, under the treaty, subject of course to a valuation.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Is there a quota on that also?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STIRLING: I think we imported $61,000 worth in 1935, did we not?

Mr. DUNNING: We imported 1,128,000 pounds valued at $61,000, all from the United States.

Mr. STIRLING: And did we succeed in shipping any to that country?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not separately classified going into the United States, so I cannot give that information.

Mr. STEWART: As I understand it the power is still retained on the part of the government to fix a value for duty purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The existing situation in that regard with respect to asparagus is that the advance on invoice value existing at the time the treaty came into force was 5½ cents. The maximum therefore provided by the treaty is 4⅘ cents, being not more than 80 per cent of the former advance.

Mr. STEWART: Does not that perpetuate a principle in this tariff which was very roundly condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite, the power to fix values for duty purposes? Are not the government retaining that element of uncertainty in our tariff which they were pledged to remove and entirely get away from?

Mr. BENNETT: I want to point out to the Minister of National Revenue, who administers this section of the act, as well as to the Minister of Finance, that these impositions now of three-fifths of a cent, 4 cents and 4¼ cents must be wholly illegal and improper. If the ministers will do me the honour of directing their attention to the language of the proviso they will find this:

Provided that when imported under the general tariff rate, from April 15 to May 31, inclusive, the duty shall be not less than 3 cents per pound.

All these items confer power upon the minister to fix the value under section 43, but these items deal with the general tariff. The minute these items are shifted from the general to the intermediate tariff there is no power, unless you pass a new order in council. I do not doubt for a moment that the Minister of Justice, if he were here, would agree with me. The Minister of National Revenue is an eminent lawyer, and I am sure he will admit that. As it stands now on page 28 of the office consolidation of the tariff, it reads:

Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty: (a) asparagus, free; 27½ per cent; 30 per cent.

We have now cut the duty to 15 per cent, with this proviso:

Provided that when imported under the general tariff rate, from April 15 to May 31, inclusive, the duty shall be not less than 3 cents per pound.

That has to do with section 43; there is an absolutely statutory provision with respect to it in this tariff. Now we take it out of the general tariff altogether and put it into the intermediate tariff, but under the intermediate tariff the provision inserted here is:

Provided that in respect of the goods dutiable under tariff item 87 no value for duty shall be established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act except in the case of the sub-items indicated thus—

That is, there is an absolute prohibition against the establishment of it at all. It is a little different from anything we have had heretofore. Then it goes on:

—and in no case shall any value so established exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on like goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

That surely contemplates action being taken by this government, not the action taken by some other government. That surely contemplates, if language can be used for any purpose, that there must be an absolutely new departure. I know how anxious the Minister of National Revenue is that the difficulties which have arisen in the past should be avoided in the future, but one of them is contained right in this paragraph. There can be no exercise of power under that old order in council, none whatever. I think the minister will see that, but here you have been calmly and quietly going along and using an order in council which you abused when it was passed, for the purpose of receiving three-fifths of a cent instead of one cent, 4 cents instead of 5 cents, and so on. You have been going along blithely, imposing that obligation, when there is no authority in the world for it; you have been standing behind an order in council which this very agreement says shall not be regarded.

That is the point I am trying to make. This agreement contemplates a new order in council by this government, without relying on what was done by another government. This authority is determined by one factor, namely the lowest level in 1933, 1934 and 1935, and when you reach that the only power you have is to impose 80 per cent of that level. But you cannot apply 80 per cent to what was done some other time by somebody else, when the order in council which was passed by somebody else was for an altogether different rate. You can pass an order in council saying it should be 80 per cent of that rate, but you cannot shelter yourselves behind that order in council for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: If I had section 43 before me I would have no difficulty in answering my right hon. friend, for the reason that the power there given authorizes the government to enable the minister to set values for duty purposes. It is a general enabling authority under a well understood section of the tariff. No one has raised that question in an administrative sense since the end of the year, but if there should be any question about it there would be no difficulty in taking such steps as might be necessary. Here we have section 43:

If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council on a report from the minister that goods of any kind are being imported into Canada, either on sale or on consignment, under such conditions as prejudicially or injuriously to affect the interests of Canadian producers or manufacturers, the governor in council may authorize the minister to fix the value for duty of any class or kind of such goods, and notwithstanding any other provision of this act, the value so fixed shall be deemed to be the fair market value of such goods.

That has relation not to the general tariff or the intermediate tariff, but to goods coming in under any tariff excepting the British preferential or any lower tariff.

Every order of the governor in council authorizing the minister to fix the value for duty of any class or kind of such goods, and the value thereof so fixed by the minister by virtue of such authority, shall be published in the next following issue of the Canada Gazette.

There has been no change and no necessity for a change with respect to that enabling authority.

Mr. BENNETT: But the mere reading of section 43 conclusively proves what I have said. It does not require any further discussion. I think the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), as a lawyer, realizes that it is completely proven. Here is an order in council outstanding that fixes the rate, and that rate has not been varied. The authority for the minister is the order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: Fixes a value, not a rate.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the rate is based upon the value. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I am talking about the increase added to the invoice. Section 43 authorizes that to be accomplished in one way and one way only, and that is by order in council. You cannot get away from that.

Mr. DUNNING: A ministerial order.

Mr. BENNETT: Read what it says.

Mr. DUNNING: "The governor in council on a report from the minister"—may do what? May authorize the minister to fix the value for duty. And that authority exists.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, but the rate is fixed by order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: But the rate was in these cases. I do not know about them all, but I know the minister was authorized to fix a rate not exceeding or not less than a certain figure. Some were fixed absolutely. One of the difficulties we had—the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) will recall it—was that the order in council empowered the minister to fix a valuation and define the valuation, and the minister fixed it in accordance with that authority which he received from council. Having done that it was of course found that it was too late, or in one case it was too early. That is the reason you find these orders in council for the entire year. My hon. friend I suppose has been told by the officers of the department the reason that was done was that it was found necessary to make it applicable to the whole year in order that no difficulty might arise in connection with, for instance onions—that is one item I remember; I do not recall others. But the position is that the government at the moment is utilizing an order in council which it roundly abused when it was passed. That order in council does confer upon the minister certain powers, but those orders in council in some cases are very restrictive, and define the rate which he must fix. That is the point I was trying to make. In such cases it is clear there is no power in the minister to change it. I gather from what the Minister of National Revenue says that what has happened is that the collectors of customs have automatically applied it to eighty per cent of the lowest figure.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand the application of section 43 it is this: the governor in council first authorizes the Minister of National Revenue to fix the valuation for duty purposes on a certain class or kind of goods.

Mr. BENNETT: In certain conditions where Canadian interests are prejudicially affected.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but it is not contemplated, nor is it necessary, that the governor in council should go further and fix the rate itself.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was done in some cases.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether the governor in council did that or not, but it was not contemplated by the section. It was contemplated that the minister should have discretion to fix the rate after being so authorized by the governor in council. Pursuant to that authority ministers have from time to time fixed rates on certain kinds of fruit and vegetables.

Mr. STIRLING: Fixed a value.

Mr. ILSLEY: Fixed a valuation for duty purposes on certain kinds of fruit and vegetables. Under our agreement with the United States, by these items in this schedule it is agreed that hereafter the minister, acting I assume under the same orders in council, shall not fix a valuation more than eighty per cent of the lowest valuations that have existed at any time in the last three years. I am at a loss to see where there is any impropriety in acting under the existing orders in council. There is no particular reason why action should be taken under existing orders in council if it is improper or illegal to do so, but it is not apparent to me that it is either improper or illegal.

I was not, I am afraid, able to understand the argument based on the provisos of page 28 of the customs tariff. That appears to be another branch of my right hon. friend's argument which I was not able to follow.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is, that no longer applies.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Therefore we have reliance on a new departure, which must be authorized by order in council.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: This is a very interesting statement from the Minister of National Revenue, because the procedure that was adopted of fixing the value for duty purposes was condemned as unsound, autocratic and taking the control away from parliament and placing it in the hands of the governor in council. Now the minister goes further. Notwithstanding that under the procedure that was adopted the hon. gentleman admits that the minister reported to council and an order in council was then passed fixing the rate of duty, or limiting it to a certain amount—

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not rate, valuation.

Mr. STEWART: The minister used the word rate, but we are all wrong in using it; it is the valuation. The minister now says that he himself has the power, that he does not even need to consult the governor in council. Surely that is autocracy. Surely that is going the limit; surely that is taking the fixing of the value for duty out of the hands of parliament and even out of the hands of the governor in council and placing it in the hands of the minister. If that procedure has been adopted I submit it is the essence of autocracy. It is all wrong; it is contrary to the principle of the act and contrary to the practice that has been followed.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEWART: Yes. I think I know what took place.

Mr. DUNNING: But the same order in council exists at this moment with respect to this item.

Mr. STEWART: That is just what I am coming to. I say that order in council cannot have any effect—

Mr. ILSLEY: Why not?

Mr. STEWART: —that there should be a new order in council, and I am going to ask the minister to bring down the existing orders in council that have been made with respect to these items.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no new order in council.

Mr. STEWART: Let us have the old ones, and we will see just how they were made.

Mr. EULER: If they have not been repealed why are they not in force?

Mr. STEWART: Because I submit the provision here made makes those orders in council inapplicable.

Mr. EULER: When my hon. friend states that this is a new departure by this government or this party he is entirely wrong. When the former Liberal government was in power section 43 was already on the statute book with regard to fruits and vegetables, and that is what we are discussing right now.

Mr. STEWART: But in the discussions I am very sure the hon. gentleman did not point out that use had been made of it. He was criticizing and condemning the former government for the use of this provision before the amendment of the statute to permit it, and if any pledge was given it was that it would be abolished. Now it is being perpetuated.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend is wrong if he refers to me as having condemned the application of section 43 to fruit and vegetables. I will admit that I condemned applying that in the extreme way in which it was applied to other commodities. But section 43, so far as fruits and vegetables are concerned, as the leader of the opposition knows, was on the statute book, and having been placed there by a former Liberal Minister of Finance, the Hon. Mr. Fielding.

Mr. STIRLING: Item 37(a) as it was then?

Mr. EULER: Yes, applying only to fruits and vegetables.

Mr. BENNETT: Natural products.

Mr. EULER: But used largely for fruits and vegetables, as everybody knows. And I did condemn the extremes at which valuations were fixed on other commodities, because I did not regard it as necessary. On fruits and vegetables there was a real reason for doing it.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member recall a delegation in the railway committee room? Does he recall his Prime Minister standing up and repudiating him and the Minister of National Revenue who attempted to exercise his discretion to impose duties upon importers of this country? Is his memory so lost that he cannot recall the circumstances under which a great delegation came here, and when he said he was in favour of duties upon natural products, or valuations on natural products? Does he recall in this house the circumstances before the dissolution of 1930? Does he remember how all over this country it was said it was never intended that one man by the exercise of his discretion should impose new duties upon the importers of this country? Does he remember that?

Mr. EULER: It was never done.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the government would not permit it to be done on the ground that it was taking away the liberty of the subject and the rights of parliament.

Mr. EULER: It was never done, except by orders in council passed by the government itself.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is what I am coming at. The hon. member's memory is very short this afternoon; for those of us who sat on this side of the house then, as we now sit, can never forget the circumstances of that great gathering downstairs, and then in the afternoon hearing in measured tones the condemnation of a parliament that would part with the right to impose tariffs, and what terrible conditions would result if by any chance it was given to any one man to determine what the value for duty purposes should be upon any product, be it natural or otherwise. Who could forget that warning to beware lest principles which were established in centuries gone by might be lost by this action? Does the hon. member forget it?

Mr. EULER: It is perfectly clear.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it would be. It was clear to all of us that when the government which succeeded came into office it passed an order in council under the provisions of section 43. It applied only to natural products. It was put into operation, and had reference to exactions with respect to vegetables and many kinds of fruits. In some cases discretion was left with the minister; in other cases it was embodied in the orders in council themselves. So the whole responsibility for executive action was accepted by council as being preferable to leaving it to the discretion of a single man to impose a duty. We know amout the promises in the press which indicated that these fixed values under section 43 were to disappear, and I remember reading not long since that orders in council had been passed abolishing them. Why was not the public told that instead of abolishing them what they are doing is taking them and saying that they are authorized to maintain them to the extent of 80 per cent of the lowest level. I am perfectly satisfied from what took place this afternoon that when the Minister of National Revenue said he spoke subject to his memory being correct he did not know it was being done. He took the view that it was not being done.

Mr. ILSLEY: My memory was incorrect. I agreed to the order myself on December 27, with respect to certain classes of fruits and vegetables. In order to provide a 20 per cent reduction in the fixed value under the United States trade agreement a new bulletin, No. 4461, was issued by my order on December 27, 1935, amending the previous bulletin, to provide for fixed valuation of three-fifths of a cent per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: And that is for the whole period of twelve months?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just for the time being, I think. They are subject to cancellation at any time.

Mr. BENNETT: But was there any period expressed?—because there is a suggestion in some of the orders in council authorizing the minister to make the order for a twelve months period. Then that order to which the minister has referred is a ministerial order for any length of time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Again I speak subject to correction—

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the minister for his full statement about it, because it is exactly what I thought would happen. It is presumably the exercise of a new discretion for the purpose of giving authority to what I conceive to be an incorrect exercise of power.

Mr. STIRLING: There is no date.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get the information, but I do not think so.

Mr. STIRLING: Does it apply only to onions, or to other articles?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was applied in regard to all fruit and vegetable valuations in effect on December 31, 1935.

Mr. STIRLING: It qualifies them to the extent of eighty per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: On all fruits and vegetables on which values were in effect on December 31, 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: I have been saying that.

Mr. SPENCE: Before the item of asparagus passes let me say that I think we have here made another great mistake, because a big industry has been built up in Canada by Canadian people at great cost. Their season lasts only a month or six weeks, and great care of the ground has to be taken. The whole question is as to what is done with the California asparagus coming into this market, and we must decide whether we are willing to put a dumping duty on it and stop the importation before our own is ready for the market. As a rule asparagus comes in and destroys the sale of our own product. No date can be set for valuation, because its growth depends entirely upon the soil and the heat of the sun. The variation is sometimes as great as three or four weeks. We know that in some seasons it comes in three or four weeks earlier than it does in others. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that in the business world we wish to God that the minister's wings were clipped so far as fixing values for duty purposes is concerned, because it is impossible for a man doing business to know when the stuff will come in. I am not particularly condemning the minister, because he would be advised by some understudy who does not know what he is advising and would not know the best sources from which to get information. I hope the minister will take steps towards a solution of the difficulty.

I do not know why the Minister of Finance did not have a discussion of all these commodities at one time, because had he done that we could have passed them all. The proposed action is against the interests of the people of Canada, because on account of their more favourable climatic conditions it is impossible for us to compete with the United States in growing articles of this kind. In some states they can grow two or three crops a year, whereas in Canada we grow only one, and that with a great deal of difficulty. How is it possible for us to compete with them? If the government wish to protect the primary producer, about whom they do so much talking, let them begin right here. They say they wish to protect the wheat grower, but they have forgotten all about the fellow in Ontario who digs in the soil from sunrise to sunset and who works harder than any man in the west ever worked.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: You know nothing about work. Go and watch the truck farmers between Toronto and Niagara Falls work from sunrise to sunset—and they work during the whole of a working day; they are not sitting on a machine, as does the man who is ploughing a field. Very few hon. members do any hay pitching; they have machines to do everything.

Mr. DUNNING: Before this Donnybrook goes any farther may I suggest that we are talking about asparagus. I know what will happen in a very few minutes.

Mr. SPENCE: I did not intend to talk about other things, but hon. members injected some remarks which caused me to reply. I protest against the cut from 30 per cent. What is the necessity for it? There is no demand for it. Thirty per cent means nothing; it simply means a percentage on the net cost in Texas, or Tennessee, or wherever it comes from. This year we have thousands of boxes of good red carrots—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. memmer must confine his remarks to the subject under discussion.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. SPENCE: Why did we not discuss all of them? They are in the same category. I suggest that the committee is losing time. However, I shall obey your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and will not mention carrots. It will all depend entirely on what the government does, whether they intend to impose a dumping duty on asparagus before our own comes in, and do it at the proper time, upon advice from proper authorities. May I ask the minister whether he intends to impose a dumping duty to save our asparagus growers?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is, I know, an expert. Does he think such a valuation should be imposed now?

Mr. SPENCE: No, but we should know what the minister's intention is.

Mr. DUNNING: What would be your intention?

Mr. SPENCE: My intention would be that you should tell us right now what you are going to do, so that the people in the industry would know what to do and how to speculate. But to-day everything is so uncertain from the point of view of the government interfering and tinkering with tariffs that nobody knows what to do, and you are putting people out of business by the hundreds by the system you are following.

Mr. DUNNING: I was asking advice, Mr. Chairman, from an acknowledged expert as to what date he thinks a value for duty purposes should be imposed with respect to asparagus. I am asking for that advice from him now.

Mr. SPENCE: I could not tell you the date, and no man is wise enough to know it, unless you can tell me what the good Lord is going to do in the matter of weather. Asparagus will sometimes shoot up as long as that pencil on some hot nights and has to be cut immediately. If you leave it to me, I can give you definite information within two days, but you won't ask me, and nobody else in the house can give it to you except myself.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I do not want to start any controversy between one part of this country and another, but now that we are on these items it might be well for the committee to remember that there is a large section between the great lakes and British Columbia which grows very few vegetables, asparagus or any other vegetables or fruits. If this house wants to impose a high value for duty purposes or a high tariff on these commodities, the people of Canada do not want them imposed for the purpose of exploiting the people of the west. If you want to protect these commodities for the sake of your own growers I am entirely in agreement with that, but I am not in agreement with people in one part of Canada using the protection that is given them to exploit a large area of this dominion. These duties that are being imposed and these valuations that are being established are placing that large section of western Canada in such a position that they are unable to purchase these things at all to-day, and the consequence is that the people in this part of the country cannot sell them, nor can the growers in British Columbia sell them to a large extent because of the excess prices that are forced by tariffs and duty valuations. Not long ago, during the last administration I believe, whether it was done by the government or by the Minister of National Revenue I do not know, the system of applying tariffs was changed to a system of regional tariffs on certain fruit and vegetables. So far as I am concerned, as a western member, I would say let us have more of that. Take the three prairie provinces and make them one region in which no tariffs shall be imposed on fruits or vegetables, and let the rest of Canada have their tariffs if they want them.

Mr. SPENCE: A lovely spirit, to kill your brother.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): To keep your brother from being exploited.

Mr. SPENCE: You want to kill the fruit and vegetable man.

Mr. McGREGOR: I do not see any reason why they cannot grow asparagus in the west; then they would not have to import it.

Mr. DUNNING: They can and do grow it.

Mr. McGREGOR: Then what is the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) talking about? If they grow it, they do not need to import it. It has been very amusing to hear some hon. gentlemen discuss this question. With all due respect for my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence) I would point out that he is talking from the point of view of a commission man.

Mr. DUNNING: You mean a dealer's point of view?

Mr. McGREGOR: Call it a broker, then. I have been in business as a grower of vegetables all my life, and it is amusing to hear some of the arguments put up in this house. Surely the minister knows how many people are interested in the vegetable growing business in this country. He must know that no one in this country works harder than the vegetable grower, that he, his wife and children do not even get a chance to get a decent education, that they have to work from daylight to dark producing vegetables. Then when I pick up this schedule and see that the duty on vegetables coming into this country has been decreased fifty per cent, I just wonder what this government is going to do. Surely they do not intend to put these people out of business. There are thousands of market gardeners in my constituency who are on relief, even with the protection the industry has had during the last five years, so what can they expect in the next five years? Let us forget about politics. I hope the minister will give this matter serious consideration, and that when the time comes the duty will be imposed as it has been in the past.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend from East York (Mr. McGregor) is a vegetable grower, and I understand also represents a large number of them. With respect to his fears, I have before me a quotation from an address by Mr. L. F. Burrows, the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Horticultural Council, which I believe speaks to some extent at any rate for a large body of fruit and vegetable growers. He says:

> I am satisfied that from the standpoint of the producer of fruit and vegetables in Canada the provisions of this agreement offer with few exceptions ample protection to our industries, provided the values for duty are fixed as contemplated and are effective early enough to protect the market prior to our products becoming available.

I think one can take that as an average expression of view.

Mr. BAKER: What was the date of that speech? Was it before this agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: It was an address made at the recent annual meeting of the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association in Toronto. I have not the date.

Mr. McGREGOR: I should think the first thing we had better do is to inquire just who this man Burrows is and who pays him, and how many different salaries he is getting throughout this country. I understand he is paid by this government to start with; he is also paid by certain commission houses in Toronto, and I do not know how many other salaries he is getting. When this gentleman gets up and ventures an opinion he certainly is not speaking for the fruit growers of this country. He is backing up the opinions that the government wants him to back up.

Mr. DUNNING: I certainly repudiate, Mr. Chairman, any suggestion that any member of the government conspired to get this utterance from Mr. Burrows. I am assuming that the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association consists of growers of fruit.

Mr. McGREGOR: Mr. Burrows is not speaking for the fruit growers, and furthermore—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is out of order. The Minister of Finance has the floor.

Mr. DUNNING: I know of nothing either to the detriment of Mr. Burrows or to his credit, but a man who is secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Horticultural Council presumably must have the confidence of the growers. At least I remember, back in the days when I formerly occupied this position, the growers very frequently waited upon me headed by Mr. Burrows. If Mr. Burrows does not have the confidence of the growers, I am quite sure they are capable of dealing with him. I do not think we should make personal attacks upon individuals who have an official standing with associations of the industries concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has not been in the house the last five years to hear the opposition talk about Mr. Burrows.

Mr. McGREGOR: How much does the government pay Mr. Burrows?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know; I do not pay him anything.

Mr. McGREGOR: I am asking how much the government pays.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman has a copy of the estimates in his desk and if he will refer to it he will find that a grant is given to the Canadian Horticultural Council, of which Mr. Burrows is secretary. This grant is the same as has been paid for years.

Mr. LENNARD: With all due respect to Mr. Burrows, I cannot see how a man can serve the commission men and the growers of this country at the same time.

Mr. STIRLING: This gentleman is not here and I think it is only fair to give one or two facts with regard to the Canadian Horticultural Council. The minister will remember that this council was brought into being, during the régime of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) when he was Minister of Agriculture, in order that the government of the day should have available information which would be collected from all parts of Canada in connection with the matters in which the council was interested. It was intended also to provide a channel through which information could pass from the government to these industries. The name of the secretary-treasurer has been mentioned this afternoon. He is employed by the council, not by the government. For excellent reasons, in years past as in this year, the government has contributed to the funds of this council. The council obtains other revenue from different associations throughout Canada. In the statement of Mr. Burrows which the minister has just read, I am of the opinion that he is voicing the considered opinion of those interests which combined together made up the horticultural council. I think I can confirm the statement which has been read, that if the government proposes to continue to use the dumping clause, the producers of Canada will know they have a measure of protection under which they can attempt to carry on. The future will prove whether or not the tariff is sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a very fair statement.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): I want to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I think the whole situation depends upon the application of these dumping duties. There has been some controversy over the secretary-treasurer of the horticultural council, but as far as I know he is handling his job in the best way it can be handled under the circumstances.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Are we to understand that there will be an application of the dumping duty?

Mr. SPENCE: They will not tell you anything.

Mr. DUNNING: You can be assured of the exercise of the best judgment of the government from time to time.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): We know that, although we may be doubtful of it at times. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) has almost pleaded with the minister to tell him at what time he will apply the seasonal tariffs. Another hon. member has said that it all depends upon the time that these tariffs are applied. I recall how vigorously hon. gentlemen on the government side opposed, when they were in opposition, the principles now being applied, and they went around the country promising their abolition.

Mr. EULER: Not on natural products.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Promises of the abolition of seasonal tariffs were made in this house and throughout the country. Promises were made of the abolition of the dumping duties and the fixed valuations. Read the Prime Minister's speech at Woodstock. If hon. members of the government have a mandate to negotiate a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States that does not give reciprocal advantages to Canada, then I submit they have an equal mandate to abolish the dumping duties, the seasonal tariffs and the fixed valuations. That was part of their preelection pledges.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you want that done?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I certainly do not. I am only pointing out that it might be considered as one of the first recantations of the government. That argument certainly was used on every platform in Ontario. I have received letters from vegetable growers in my district who are growing asparagus and other vegetables. Eight or ten thousand acres of marsh land have been reclaimed at very great expense and they are wondering what the government is going to do. These men want to know what the government's policy will be in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is out of order. He must confine his remarks to the item before the committee, that dealing with asparagus.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Surely asparagus is either a fruit or a vegetable.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not sure which it is.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The minister says he is not sure which it is, and I am not surprised at his saying that.

Mr. DUNNING: Are you sure yourself?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I think I know as much about it as the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: Which is it?

Mr. STIRLING: A vegetable.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The government is maintaining the principles which it condemned so vigorously before the elections. If this is being done for the protection of the fruit and vegetable growers, I commend the government.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must confine his remarks to asparagus.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The minister has told us already that these fixed valuations will apply to vegetables such as asparagus.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it a vegetable?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Certainly it is.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it?

Mr. BENNETT: It is so classified.

Mr. DUNNING: Are you sure?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The fruit and vegetable growers in the district to which I have referred are having their livelihood threatened, so much so that they are considering whether it is worth while to sow a crop this year. If we are to be assured that the government is going to do the opposite to what it said it would do before the elections, then the fruit and vegetable growers can have some assurance.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend wants an assurance that the government will do the opposite to what it professed it would do, I can tell him that he will get no such assurance. Section 43 was placed upon the statute books by a great Liberal Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding. The attitude of the Liberal party with respect to natural products is as it has been always. We recognize the special circumstances and difficulties which surround the production of these commodities. We recognize the need of special machinery which may not be required in the production of other commodities. The machinery is there and the government intends to use it for the purposes for which it was placed on the statute book.

Mr. SPENCE: Now you are committed to something.

Mr. DUNNING: That provides an excellent illustration of the impossibility of giving positive assurances with respect to this from year to year, and my hon. friend from Parkdale tells me he does not know at what date action should be taken.

Mr. SPENCE: I was not asking for the date.

Mr. DUNNING: I think he said also that he was the only expert in the house.

Mr. SPENCE: I did not intend to say that.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend takes it in good part. I acknowledge at once he has special and peculiar knowledge with respect to this matter, and his statement was helpful in that it indicates the very difficulties which do surround the administration of section 43 with respect to natural products. I can assure him, and I am sure the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) can also assure him of the best and closest attention of the government to the matter as time progresses.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to endorse what my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has said. I should like also to give the committee a few figures, which perhaps may be of interest, on this matter of protection of fruits and vegetables.

Mr. BENNETT: Stick to asparagus.

Mr. SPENCE: You are getting away from asparagus. You would not let me get away from it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give the figures with regard to asparagus only, if the committee thinks fit. On an assumed invoice value of six cents for asparagus, the ad valorem equivalent of the duty imposed prior to December 31, 1935, was 149 per cent, that is when we take the general tariff rate plus the dumping duties. Under this arrangement with the United States we have agreed, as I said before, that the advance on the invoice value shall not be greater than eighty per cent of the advance which previously existed, the lowest advance in the last three years. Taking into account the new tariff rate of 15 per cent ad valorem and the dumping duty, if imposed up to that maximum, the protection at the present time is still ninety-nine per cent ad valorem.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We are going to be ruined!

Mr. ILSLEY: And that is not an isolated instance. I may say that I have no sympathy with the contention that the rates as provided for in the United States trade agreement are insufficient. I have a list of them before me, and certainly they would supply ammunition to those of my friends from the west who contend that the rates are too high, rather than to those of my friends opposite who contend that the vegetable growers and the fruit growers have been sacrificed by this agreement. For instance, if we apply in the future eighty per cent of the advance applied in the past, and the new rates of duty provided for in the agreement, the following are the ad valorem equivalents on fair invoice values which will apply:

	Per cent
Apples	76
Apricots	61
Canteloupes	203
Cherries	80
Cranberries	20
Grapes	76
Peaches	95
Pears	61
Plums and prunes	107
Raspberries	61
Strawberries	45
Asparagus	99
Beans	91
Beets	148
Cabbage	195
Carrots	152
Cauliflower	169
Celery	61
Cucumbers	145
Lettuce	76
Mushrooms	33
Onions, n.o.p.	108
Green onions	149
Peas	61
Peppers	84
Rhubarb	134
Spinach	61

[Mr. Dunning.]

You will understand, Mr. Chairman, that these are the maximum rates which the government is permitted by this agreement to impose. The point I am trying to make is that when my hon. friends contend that the fruit and vegetable growers have been sacrificed by the agreement, that certainly is not borne out by these rates. If the committee is interested, I can give the rates that have—

Mr. SPENCE: What has that to do with the item we are now discussing?

Mr. ILSLEY: I can give the ad valorem equivalents of the rates that have heretofore existed for the same list, and I ask the committee to note the size of these:

	Per cent
Apples	106
Apricots	80
Canteloupes	283
Cherries	105
Cranberries	25
Grapes	100
Peaches	150
Pears	80
Plums and prunes	160
Raspberries	100
Strawberries	83
Asparagus	149
Beans	138
Beets	208
Cabbage	280
Carrots	213
Cauliflower	250
Celery	150
Cucumbers	204
Lettuce	166
Mushrooms	60
Onions, n.o.p.	150
Green onions	171
Peas	95
Peppers	128
Rhubarb	186
Spinach	95
Average	135

Mr. BRADETTE: It should be enough.

Mr. ILSLEY: These do not all bear on the item before the committee, but they are illuminating, I think, when we are considering the question whether by this agreement there has been a sacrifice of the interests of the fruit and vegetable growers in Canada. There has been nothing of the kind. The margins are so great that there is room for the exercise of governmental discretion within the maximum, but certainly if the maximum were imposed the protection would be adequate.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Before this item carries I should like to thank the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) for urging the government to reduce these dumping duties or to abolish them entirely at the present time, when the item of asparagus is before the committee. I wish also to thank the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) for giving us these figures, showing the tremendous burden that is being borne by those who have to buy and consume these goods.

Mr. SPENCE: You do not need asparagus on the prairies. You can grow it there and it will cost you nothing.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Surely. We can do a lot of things there, but why should we waste a dollar's worth of time in producing twenty-five cents worth, when we can use the same time to produce a dollar and a half's worth of wealth? Would it not be foolish for parliament to compel us to squander our efforts in doing a thing like that? The point I am making is that I wish to assure my hon. friends that the people of this country are intelligent enough, if they are left free, to use their time and energy to the best advantage.

Mr. MacNICOL: Talk about asparagus.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member who has the floor that he must confine his remarks to asparagus.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I was dealing with asparagus and pointing out that under the old regulations there were imposed on invoices, duty and taxes of 302·3 per cent which has now been reduced, including duty and taxes on invoices, to 202 per cent.

It would be folly to compel the people of western Canada, as my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence) suggested, to grow asparagus when they ought to be using their time and energy and the resources of the climate they have at their disposition. My hon. friend told us that his vegetable growers, who are protected by a duty and tax running up to 320 per cent, are now on relief. I am glad he is willing to help us abolish that condition by enabling us to buy those vegetables and sell them to consumers in other parts of Canada at a much smaller price. In connection with the sale of asparagus I find many resolutions like this:

> That the climatic and geographical situation of the prairie provinces creates a sufficient natural protection for Canadian producers of fruits and vegetables—
> Including asparagus.
> —and any further protection constitutes an unwarranted burden on our consumers.
> It further recommends:
> That the prairie provinces be constituted a zone where dump and seasonable tariff duties in fruits and vegetables should not apply.

I want at this moment to support the plea by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) that there should be a separation of tariff zones or a differential between tariff zones in Canada, and that that area in which sufficient protection is afforded by climatic, freight and other conditions to the fruit growers, should be left free, should not be included.

I find that last year fixed valuations and dumping duties were applied on asparagus from April 25 to July 9. At that time supplies of asparagus from British Columbia were not available, and I do not think they were going out from Ontario. Why, then, should the people of that section of the west be penalized between April 25 and July 9? Last year asparagus was available in British Columbia from May 2 to June 10, or for just more than one month, so the dumping duty was applied to that section of the country for a period of thirty-six days during which no adequate supplies were available, and anyone who wanted to buy asparagus at that time had to pay that protection and tax amounting to 320 per cent, which has been reduced now to 202 per cent including the dumping duties, the taxes and the other charges. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and through you this committee if it is reasonable to say to the people of a large section of Canada that they either must do without the vegetables, asparagus if you like—I am keeping to the one item—or that they must pay a protection of 320 per cent to the people who are producing or trying to produce it and who, as my hon. friend has said, are almost on relief.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to say just a word in reply to the hon. member for Melfort and the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I believe they are presupposing—and I think they are trying to be fair—that because there is a considerable tariff protection for fruits and vegetables, particularly asparagus, at certain seasons of the year, the price they must pay in those sections of western Canada is increased accordingly. The information I have, from a constituency in which there are many fruit and vegetable growers, including asparagus growers, is that the internal competition afforded by the growers of these commodities within Canada is sufficient to assure to purchasers in other parts of Canada a reasonable price. I think if my hon. friends will look up the information they will find that purchasers of these commodities are not being penalized in the way that perhaps might be taken from their remarks. I would not like to think that any considerable part of the purchasing public in Canada was being unfairly penalized by virtue of a protection given to a particular section of our growers. I am sure that is not the idea even of the growers themselves. I have a good deal of sympathy with the remarks made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. McGregor), who said that the fruit and vegetable growers were having a very difficult time even with the protection they have been given. I am hopeful that the Minister of Finance will see to it that proper protection is given so that the growers will not be penalized in any way by virtue of the change.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In connection with the remarks of my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Graydon), I think he is taking a fair view of the matter. As I said a moment ago when I began my remarks in connection with asparagus, I do not think our people should be exploited. These people who are endeavouring to get protection for the asparagus growers of the different parts of Canada should realize that the very fact that they have put on that protection has lost them a large market in our part of the country among people who are unable to buy these commodities, and that the tariff that exists to-day is of very little value to them as far as our section is concerned. That is why I ask that we zone this thing and take our part of the country out.

One hon. member says, "Kill your brother." You have killed almost all your brothers in the west as far as asparagus goes. It is impossible for our people to buy it. My hon. friend says he does not want to see prices raised on that account, but they are raised on that account, in our part of the dominion at any rate. The result is that to-day we cannot purchase many of these articles we purchased formerly; prices are so high now that we are not able to pay them. By putting our part of the country into a zone to which the tariff will not apply you will be helping us and you will not be hurting yourselves, because you have not a market there to-day in any case and you never will have a market there if you keep prices so high that our people cannot buy these commodities.

Mr. McGREGOR: I do not suppose our western and eastern brothers will ever get together on the prices of vegetables, so we shall have to leave it to the minister to do the best he can. I feel satisfied that the minister is going to look after this tariff question satisfactorily in this connection.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the Minister of National Revenue who administers this.

Mr. McGREGOR: I just want to say that the time when these tariffs should be applied is a matter of great importance. If they are not applied on the exact day they should be, the market will be flooded with American goods, so when the first Canadian goods come on to the market they will not bring any fair return, and it is only on the first products on the market that the growers make any money. We are talking about asparagus. Probably many hon. members do not know that it takes four years to produce asparagus beds. Let us not forget that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Depending on where you are.

Mr. McGREGOR: It does not make any difference where you are. My hon. friend probably knows something about growing wheat but he does not know anything about growing asparagus. I say that it takes four years to produce asparagus beds, and I hope the minister will bear that in mind.

Mr. STEWART: I should like to clear up the matter with the Minister of National Revenue. An order in council was passed or orders in council were passed authorizing the minister to fix the value for duty purposes on asparagus. I am not sure whether there was a limit in that order in council. I want to ask the minister whether the government are operating under that order in council at the present time or whether any instructions or rulings have been given in any way modifying or changing it. From what the minister said I gathered that some departmental instruction or ruling had been given, not about asparagus because the time for that has not come yet, but about other commodities. Are these orders in council fixing these values all standing as they were or have instructions been issued varying or reducing them?

Mr. ILSLEY: The orders in council are still outstanding; they have not been changed or repealed or rescinded in any way. With regard to the valuations made under those orders in council, we made the changes necessary to bring the valutions in accord with the trade arrangement with the United States. We did that in the latter part of December. That is the explanation of the reduction in the advance on invoices in relation to onions, for example. With regard to certain fruits and vegetables upon which the valuation for duty purposes exists for part of the year only, some of those orders have been cancelled. I cannot give my hon. friend the particular ones that have been cancelled, but in any case they are all seasonal and they have been cancelled for that reason.

In the past the procedure has been for the Minister of Agriculture to write to the Minister of National Revenue stating that the season has ended or the season is beginning, as the case may be, and unless the Minister of National Revenue has some reason for not following the advice of his colleague, that advice is followed. That has been the practice of the two departments in the past. I wonder if I have answered what my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. STEWART: I want to thank the minister for his statement. He has said that action has been taken to bring the orders in council in line with the provisions of this agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: The valuations.

Mr. STEWART: Very well; to bring the valuations in line with the provisions of this agreement. Was that done by order in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it was done by ministerial order.

Mr. STEWART: Then I should like to have a copy of that order, if there is one.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will furnish my hon. friend with copies. They are very short, consisting of only two or three lines.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask the minister how these valuations for duty purposes are arrived at. For example, what relation has the valuation to prices either in the United States or in Canada? We in western Canada are very much interested in that point, because we have a very short season for these commodities and we are paying very high prices for imported vegetables. Just how is this valuation for duty purposes arrived at?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not fixed any, and when it is necessary for me to do so I suppose I shall have to formulate principles on which to proceed. The only changes I have made are such as to bring the valuations into accord with the agreement we have entered into with the United States. That is to say, the advances on invoiced values of certain fruits and vegetables have been reduced to eighty per cent of what they were before the agreement. What principles will be followed in fixing any new values is a matter of ministerial or government policy to which consideration will have to be given. I am not in a position to formulate those principles at this time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope that when the time comes the minister will bear in mind that we frequently see an abundance of cheap vegetables across the line just to the south of us, while very high prices prevail in western Canada and we are unable to buy them. Cauliflower, brussels sprouts, asparagus and all such commodities are away up in price as compared with those across the line.

Mr. BENNETT: If the electors of this country could have heard the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon I think they would have found it a little difficult to understand the position the Liberal party is now taking. They have confessed this afternoon that with respect to asparagus we are eighty per cent right. They have confessed that the principle is one hundred per cent right.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What principle?

Mr. BENNETT: The principle of valuation for duty. They have admitted that, yet on every platform in western Canada where they could gather together they pointed out that the effect with respect to asparagus was to increase the price to a great extent, and that this valuation for duty purposes should be wiped out, and they told the electors it would be wiped out.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No; they did not.

Mr. BENNETT: The impertinence of the hon. gentleman does not add anything to the value of his observations.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Chairman, I would ask the right hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he is not going to.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think the right hon. leader of the opposition should withdraw his remark.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, I cannot. "Impertinent" is a proper word meaning "not pertinent," and the observation the hon. member made was not pertinent. I have had that up before, and I know what I am talking about. I am sorry I cannot do what is requested.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the language of the right hon. gentleman was unparliamentary and it should be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: With all due respect to the leader of the opposition and his long parliamentary experience, I think he should withdraw the remark.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, as an old member of this house I owe a duty to the Chair, and I accept the ruling of the Chair. That is all I say. I am bound to do that, but if you, Mr. Chairman, will be good enough to look up the rules I think you will modify the statement you have made. A flat contradiction, such as was made by the hon. gentleman as a basis of any observation, is out of order; let us have no misunderstanding about that.

I was pointing out that the statement was made that the Liberal party when in office would remove these valuations. I have the speeches that were made in parliament from time to time, and time and again that was stated by the Liberal party in opposition.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On asparagus?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and on other kinds of vegetables. It will be found in the record of the last five years. The point was made with respect to asparagus, that it was a vegetable which matured early in the United States, the surplus could be shipped here and the people could utilize it, and that the fixing of a valuation made the price so high that the people did not get asparagus as early as they otherwise would have. That was the contention. Against that was the large investment in glass and in asparagus beds. The hon. member for East York (Mr. McGregor) has pointed out that it takes four years to develop asparagus beds. Be that as it may; I do not know, but I do know that in western Canada I have seen very fine asparagus beds, some of the very finest beds I know of, developed over the last few years, and this takes several years.

But this point is clear: If in this country you are to permit the climatic conditions of the United States to destroy those who are engaged in the production of asparagus, all you have to do is to pursue the course which in opposition the Liberal party said that it proposed to do. Now we are told this afternoon that the minister himself has made an order, and under the rules of the house, he must, being a minister of the crown and quoting from a document, table that document. I am curious to see how he made his computations. They must have been based upon the value. What was the value? If the valuation was too high or too low the computation would be affected accordingly. Those computations with respect to asparagus and all these other matters must, under our rules, be laid on the table.

Mr. ILSLEY: Six cents a pound—I said that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the price on the invoice.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the price. I happen to know something of it because one session a very vigorous attack was made with respect to these matters, and on the platform the same thing took place. Here is asparagus at six cents; that is the price offered at the end of the season in the United States. Mark you, to-day is the twelfth of March, and asparagus has been on the market in Ottawa for at least this last week or more. I do not know at what price per pound it came in, but I do know that it has come in from the United States and has been offered on our market. The price gradually diminishes because it is a seasonal crop, and there comes a time when you can no longer cut the asparagus from the bed. But up to the time that they can no longer cut it from the bed it is shipped to this country from the United States at steadily decreasing prices until, at last, the final cut taken from the bed is shipped to Canada at a very low price, and that is the reason we have a seasonal tariff. That is the reason this country has imposed a tariff upon asparagus cut from those beds, with our beds not yet or just about coming into production, and our asparagus growers would not be able to meet that foreign competition unless provision were made in our tariff. Provision was made in our tariff originally by Mr. Fielding. It is true that it was not utilized by him. The present Prime Minister repudiated the action of one of his colleagues with respect to it and said: The very thought that a man should be charged with the power and discretion to deal with tariffs in this way was offensive to the very idea of parliamentary institutions. That was said time and time again; it will be found in Hansard prior to 1930. Some hon. members will remember the great delegation that met in the railway committee room and the discussions that took place on that occasion.

Asparagus is sent to this country early in March. It is now being sold in Canada. Our beds will not be able to be cut until April, and our tariff said that from April 15 to May 31 inclusive the duty should not be less than three cents a pound. It contemplated that at least until this period elapsed, from April 15 to May 31 inclusive, the period in which asparagus would be cut, the duty should not be less than three cents a pound. When do we come into production? If the season is late we come into production in the early part of May or the end of April. If the season is early we come into production in the early part of April. But if during the six weeks preceding that our markets are swamped with asparagus from other countries there is no possibility of selling our own product that enters our markets in the middle of April or the first of May.

That is the reason this legislation is on the statute books. That is the reason asparagus is dealt with in this way. That is the reason asparagus and other vegetables have been dealt with as I have indicated. If six cents a pound is the invoice price as the asparagus is shipped from, we will say, the Carolinas at the present time, then the very minute the supply becomes greater the price becomes, I repeat, lower, until there comes a time when asparagus is sent to Canada at any price the grower can get for the last cut off his beds in the Carolinas. The climate is the determining factor.

When the late Mr. Fielding had enacted the provision to which I have referred he made certain observations which are to be found in his speech. It is not, as has been said, a dumping duty. The minister used the term "dumping duty," but I do not think he intended to use that term.

Mr. ILSLEY: They call it a special or dumping duty.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is a dumping duty which is entirely different from that. I wish to make it clear that that is not what was intended; it was this special duty under section 43. Mr. Fielding did not yield to that easily. A Liberal government accepted it, because it had to choose between two things, namely, between the extinction of the asparagus business in Canada or the maintenance of it by the only method through which it could be maintained. That is what the Liberal party had to do, and they chose this method of doing it. But they did not put it into force; the late government put it into force. We put it into force. I know of no case in which a Liberal government put it into force, except that one case where it was about to be put into force, and then the gathering took place and steps were taken which resulted in its not being put into effect.

The issue is a simple one. It is a choice between the maintenance of the asparagus industry or wiping it out altogether. The government say that protection offered is adequate. They say that the protection offered by the late administration was excessive to the extent that the special duty imposed was too high by twenty per cent—

Mr. ILSLEY: But the rate was higher, too.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall come to that—and that the rate which was formerly higher should be now reduced to fifteen per cent Time will tell what the effect will be. I cannot do more than point out that during the years which have passed no one will say that asparagus growers in Canada have waxed rich under the tariff. I have yet to find any man in that business who has made more than an ordinary, commonplace living, and hardly that in most cases. I can say further that the evidence of the work they put upon their beds and the hours of their labours indicate that they have not received a decent wage for the services they have rendered, if they had been employed on a wage basis.

If as a result of the reduction consumers are to get asparagus at a lower price and there is to be no injury to the producer, as the minister has indicated, then there will be an advantage for consumers of asparagus in Canada. But if on the other hand the government jeopardizes the economic existence of producers, realizing that asparagus coming in during the early months of this or any year is to some extent a luxury, then I say that it has done a serious injury to the producers, and one against which the late Mr. Fielding directed his legislation.

Section 43 as it now reads is in broader terms than when it was passed by him. As hon. members may recall, it was limited to natural products, and there were certain other limitations to which I need not now refer. So far as this item is concerned I am content to leave it on the statement that has been made as to what the government believe will be, as they say, a sufficient protection. Mark you, I am glad to hear them accept that view of protection. So long as they say that the grower will be adequately protected, then that is all we have ever contended for. From season to season during the last five years there have been variations depending entirely upon the supply offered for importation into Canada. If the supply from abroad—and only one country, namely the United States, furnished it—was a very large quantity, then obviously the price in Canada was reduced accordingly. But if the supply was scant and the season late the necessity for the utilization of section 43 to the extent we utilized it was not so great. That is and has been the position.

It is only fair, however, to point out that we now find the government of Canada, which during months and weeks abused the late administration for the utilization of the section in the manner in which they utilized it, now availing themselves of it and saying, as one of the ministers said, that automatically the provisions have been continued. The Minister of National Revenue issued a ministerial order. One man issued a ministerial order that placed asparagus where it was subject to a special duty of—

Mr. DUNNING: Reduced it.

Mr. BENNETT: —four and a half cents; that is what that order did.

Mr. DUNNING: It reduced it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; it was subjected to a special duty of four and a half cents a pound. The principle has not changed. The principle is that one man did this. We have heard these walls resounding against the exercise of that power—but it has been exercised. What I say is that such hypocrisy at least should be disclosed to the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no "order" to the use of the word "hypocrisy." Take your dictionaries and look it up. If you find out about it you will find an exemplification of it in your own party.

We have tried to point this out with respect to asparagus. In the last five years we have endured attacks by men who have gone to their constituencies and made them ring with the idea that one man had been setting up special duties with respect to asparagus and other commodities, but to asparagus, in particular. Now we are confronted with what? We are confronted with a situation wherein they themselves are doing that which they condemned, and are glorifying the provisions made by the government of the past, because they are employing the order in council passed by the late government as the basis for their action. It is not a new order in council; it is an order passed by the late government and it is now exercised in the discretion of one man. We must condemn such double duplicity as that.

They say that the principle is right. They say: Mr. Fielding introduced it, but we never practised it. Now they say that not only is the principle right but the practice is right. The whole thing resolves itself into this, that in the exercise of ministerial discretion under the provisions of orders in council passed by the late administration, and reductions in duties under the provisions of the agreement, the grower is subject to a form of competition to which he was not previously subjected. What the hon. member for East York has said is quite true.

Has anyone ever realized what the competition is among dealers themselves? Go to the markets and watch the efforts of dealers to sell asparagus, as soon as our season opens. Watch the competition between our growers, cut-throat competition, in some cases, because they are trying to sell in a market in which the demand has been substantially satisfied by importations prior to the time our beds were in a condition to be cut. That is the reason we regard this matter as important, because it involves the acceptance of a principle which we believe is the only one that will save the industry of this country from destruction by unfair and unjust competition.

Mr. DUNNING: It should be pointed out, quite dispassionately that the present section 43, in so far as it relates to natural products, was placed there by a Liberal finance minister, Hon. W. S. Fielding, in special recognition of the facts of which we have heard this afternoon. I suppose the same statement has been repeated in every session of this parliament during the last fifteen years, that there are such tremendous climatic variations which must be dealt with. It is incorrect to say that the Liberal party in office did not give effect to section 43. It did, and the machinery of operation was the same then as it is to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: Name the cases. It never operated.

Mr. DUNNING: The Department of Agriculture was consulted by the Minister of National Revenue with respect to conditions prevailing in the particular industry, asparagus in this case, and with respect to the times and the current values of imports, and on the basis of such consultation the Minister of National Revenue, having been previously authorized so to do, sets the value for duty, and did set it during the period of office of the former government.

Mr. BENNETT: Name a case.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot offhand.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I guess you can not.

Mr. DUNNING: But there were many such.

Mr. BENNETT: There was not any.

An hon. MEMBER: A flat contradiction.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 43 is still on the statute books. The Liberal party does not condemn the fair and equitable use of section 43 of the Customs Act with respect to natural products.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what it was put there for, its fair and equitable use with respect to natural products. But we do condemn and have condemned and will continue to condemn what we regard as the unfair and arbitrary use of section 43. We have abolished many artificial valuations.

Mr. BENNETT: How many?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot name the exact number.

Mr. BENNETT: Were there ten?

Mr. DUNNING: Far more than ten.

Mr. BENNETT: Name them.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I have not such an encyclopaedic mind as has my hon. friend, but I assure him seriously that very many valuations under section 43 were abolished.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked for a report from the department and I received it before I left office. It did not contain any such number.

Mr. DUNNING: In the document now before my hon. friend is a list which greatly exceeds ten in number. I am a little anxious to get asparagus passed, and I am trying not to be provocative myself. I think the record of this afternoon's discussion with respect to section 43 in its application to asparagus will probably be satisfactory to all parties to the controversy. Can we now get along to green beans, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to asparagus I do not think anybody will disagree with the statement of the minister that it was a Liberal administration that inserted the dumping clause in the Customs Act, or that it was a Liberal administration that inserted clause 37a, now 43. But I must differ with the minister when he says that Liberal administration of the past ever operated under either of them. I think the correct statement of fact is that not until the Conservative government came into office for a few months in 1926 were orders in council passed under which valuations for duty were set up. The Liberal government carried those orders on until they cancelled them all in 1928, and did not renew them. I shall be interested indeed if the minister can dispel our doubts on the subject by bringing down copies of any orders in council passed during that régime under section 43, or 37a as it was before, relating to fruits and vegetables.

Sub-item (a) agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the question of order, I am certainly desirous of conforming to the views expressed by the chair. In this parliament words have been used from time to time of a very general character without anybody taking exception to them, including the words "impertinence" and "hypocrites." That is not desirable. In the British parliament the words would be out of order; in this parliament I think at times such words have been held to be out of order and at other times not. In deference to your ruling I withdraw the statement, although the provocation for using it was very great. I desire to make it quite clear that at all times I will as far as it is reasonably possible conform to the rulings of the chair. When I was speaking an interruption was made of a character which I think was wholly unwarranted, and I used the words I did under those circumstances, which words I now withdraw.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(b) Beans, green, 15 per cent.

Mr. SPENCE: I think if the Minister of Finance had accepted my suggestion and taken all these items together the discussion over the whole lot would have been finished long ago. However, in connection with beans, I said a few minutes ago that in many states they grow two or three crops a year. Two years ago in Florida, where green beans were coming from at that time, they had a bad frost which froze all the beans, and in six weeks they had a new crop. Can that be done in Canada? It is impossible for this country with its climatic conditions to compete with that situation.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be good enough to give the duties on our beans going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: "Beans not specially provided for, and black-eye cowpeas, green or unripe, 3½ cents a pound."

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister yet received the 1929 figure?

Mr. DUNNING: One-half cent a pound in 1929.

Mr. HEAPS: Did we export any beans last year to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no record of green beans. I do not want to reintroduce soya beans, but it happens that these green beans are in the same statistical class as soya beans.

Mr. McGREGOR: What were the imports of beans?

Mr. DUNNING: No record of imports separately.

Mr. LENNARD: I would not be doing my duty to the people I represent if I did not protest against any reduction of duty on any of the early vegetables. In that respect, and dealing with green beans in particular, I have received many protests from people in my constituency during the past several weeks, and a large number of those protests have come from followers of the present government. I might draw to the minister's attention the fact that all the vegetable growers in Wentworth county do not belong to any one particular party.

Sub-item (b) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(c) Brussels sprouts, 15 per cent.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Would the minister give the rate going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not specially provided for in the United States tariff; therefore they would come under "all other vegetables." at fifty per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BAKER: What is the money value per annum of brussels sprouts brought into Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no record of that separately. It was twenty-five per cent in 1929 prior to the imposition of the Hawley-Smoot tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the last one?

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty-five per cent under the Fordney-McCumber tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: We want it prior to the Fordney-McCumber tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: That was applied in 1922 and was in effect until 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: The Hawley-Smoot was put into effect in 1930, pardon me.

Mr. DUNNING: You want the figure for 1930, after the increase?

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. STIRLING: Twenty-five per cent before and fifty per cent after.

Mr. BENNETT: We want the present tariff rates for the entry of our goods into the United States, and the rates in effect prior to the Hawley-Smoot tariff. Brussels sprouts are not subject to the special duty.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not look very much like reciprocity when you give the United States a fifteen per cent tariff while they have a fifty per cent tariff against our goods. I understand that this country has been producing increasing quantities of brussels sprouts.

Mr. DUNNING: I dislike to get into a controversy with my right hon. friend, but I would point out that no valuation for duty purposes was imposed last year on brussels sprouts.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the average invoice price per pound for brussels sprouts?

Mr. DUNNING: It is difficult to get that information. Perhaps some hon. member could tell us. It is under the general item of other vegetables and I cannot answer my right hon. friend.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(d) Cabbage, 15 per cent.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I think it would expedite the procedure if the minister would give us the United States tariff rates without our having to ask for them.

Mr. DUNNING: The present rate on cabbage going into the United States is two cents per pound; it was formerly twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. STIRLING: Our protection is ·15 cents per pound while the American duty is two cents per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot confirm my hon. friend's percentage figures. I would point out that this item is qualified by the valuation feature, which may amount to two cents per pound.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): That would be about 100 per cent tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: I prefer to deal with actualities, not percentages.

Mr. HEAPS: What is cabbage worth a pound?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know.

Mr. STIRLING: One cent per pound.

Mr. HEAPS: I am told it is worth one cent a pound. In that case a two cent duty would be 200 per cent.

Mr. McGREGOR: I understand that cabbage is selling at the present time for six and seven cents per pound.

Mr. SPENCE: Ontario had a very poor crop of winter cabbage and numerous shipments were brought in by truck from Montreal to Toronto. Unfortunately many of the growers around Toronto had large numbers of cabbages in their pits on January 1 when the fifteen per cent duty came into effect, and tons of cabbage were dumped because the people preferred new cabbage. My contention has always been that an embargo should be placed against these fruits and vegetables for certain periods. So long as the people can buy new stuff, they will do so no matter how high the duty may be. The government would be better advised to take the advice of men who have been in this industry for forty or forty-five years. They contend that an embargo would be of more benefit to the grower than would seasonal tariffs or anything else. While I was in Toronto the other day I saw loads of cabbage being taken to the incinerator to be burned. The new cabbage is coming in from Texas where the grower is receiving a price even lower than that received in Canada. The freight is not too high and the people are ready to pay ten cents a pound for new cabbage rather than two cents a pound for the old, which has the same food value. People do not like to buy old potatoes or old cabbage when the new stuff is available. They will buy strawberries at Christmas time if they are in the stores.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(e) Carrots, 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister state the duty in the United States for this item, and what the duty was before 1930?

Mr. DUNNING: Fifty per cent at the present time, and twenty-five per cent before 1930.

Sub-item (e) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
Beets, n.o.p., 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the position with respect to this?

Mr. DUNNING: Seventeen per cent. The same under both United States tariffs prior to 1930 and at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: What about the shipments?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of beets, n.o.p. from the United States, 1,732,000 pounds, valued at $38,891, in 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: Exports?

Mr. DUNNING: No exports.

Mr. STIRLING: Did we export any?

Mr. DUNNING: They are included generally with fresh vegetables exclusive of onions, potatoes and turnips, the total exports of which were $33,000.

Sub-item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(f) Cauliflower, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Fifty per cent going into the United States at the present time, twenty-five per cent prior to 1930.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In referring to cauliflower, I should just like to say that the people of the western provinces, especially Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, find that, due to present tariff conditions, not only is there protection to British Columbia, but there exists what amounts almost to an embargo preventing the prairie provinces from getting these vegetables. I have taken this item and worked it out so that it will be seen that the protection afforded is not merely protection but is in fact an embargo so far as those provinces are concerned. Supposing we take the weight as being 42 pounds—this is a specific case worked out—the invoice price of that would be eighty-five cents. Then there is the fixed value added to that for invoice purposes, which amounts to four-fifths of a cent per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is wrong, I think, when he says four-fifths of a cent. Under the old arrangement prior to the agreement it is not four-fifths of a cent, but four cents.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That makes a value for fixing duty of $2.10 for that particular item. Then there is the duty of fifteen per cent, which would amount to thirty-three cents. Then there is the dump duty, a duty not to exceed fifty per cent value for duty purposes; that would amount to 1·095. Now, the per cent duty of the invoice would be 176·4. That duty is exceptionally high, but when you consider that there is a freight differential coming by British Columbia into the prairie provinces, your freight coming from California, for instance, would be ·78 on that. Then you have the freight per case coming in from British Columbia, which would be ·18. That would make a differential, a freight excess if you like to call it, of ·60. When you take into consideration that your freight differential is practically a protective duty, that gives a protection on that particular article of 247 per cent. If it were just the regular duty of fifteen per cent, along with the differential of freight, that would be ample, but when you consider the dumping duty as well, which that really amounts to, it practically puts us in the western provinces into a position in which we cannot buy that stuff at all.

As the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) said a little while ago, if some arrangement could be made whereby regional duties were imposed, that would be overcome. I have no objection whatever to British Columbia being protected. If she thinks she should be protected, then I say, by all means give her that protection, but I do not think we in the prairie provinces should be penalized because of British Columbia. It must also be remembered that British Columbia cannot raise any more than sufficient for her own local markets. When we want those vegetables in Alberta or Saskatchewan or Manitoba they cannot be brought in from the coast in sufficiently large quantities to take care of our market; only a few cases, in any car of produce, are allowed to come in. I think the tariff is out of all proportion when one considers that tremendous differential in freight, which alone should be sufficient protection.

In the matter of cauliflower British Columbia is over-protected. If the benefits were restricted to Canadian producers the situation would not be quite so bad, but cauliflower is raised in British Columbia mainly by orientals. If you do not count the freight, the protection would be somewhere around 174 per cent, which amounts practically to an embargo, and the protection goes almost entirely to orientals. I contend that it would be much better to have something like a regional duty, as suggested by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, and allow British Columbia protection if she wishes for it, but I do not think it is right to ask that the three prairie provinces be put practically on the embargo list in respect of that item.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): In the discussion that has taken place this afternoon two factors have, I think, been lost sight of—the high price of the land, and the high suburban taxes that are paid by those men who are engaged in growing vegetables and small fruits. I am told that in Ontario land is as high as $2,500 per acre and that taxes are as high as $100 per acre. It is not fair that growers of vegetables and fruits should try to unload that heavy overhead on the Canadian consumers. We in the west thought we could grow wheat on $50 per acre land, but we found that this could not be done. Now that we have good roads and rapid transportation my advice is that market gardeners and small fruit growers should move further out in the country and get cheaper land. Let them not try to make the Canadian consumers pay that impossible overhead. In any case I do not think these high prices do very many people much good.

Mr. McGREGOR: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what the men growing fruit and vegetables at the present time will do if they are unable to sell what they produce.

Mr. DUNNING: We are talking about cauliflowers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BEAUBIER: I should like to direct attention to the fact that Manitoba grows plenty of cauliflowers to supply the west, and the only protection necessary would be seasonal protection.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Most of our cauliflower in Alberta comes from British Columbia. It is strange that we never get it from Manitoba if my hon. friend's statement is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister indicate the imports of cauliflower?

Mr. DUNNING: Statistically they are included under vegetables, n.o.p., and not separately recorded.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the added value under section 43 at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: The maximum will be 3½ cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the rate?

Mr. DUNNING: The maximum value was four cents.

Sub-item (f) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
Eggplant, free.

Mr. McGREGOR: I should like to ask the minister just why eggplants come in free.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no particulars of production in Canada; it is so small as to be not of record.

Mr. McGREGOR: I will admit that until the last few years very few eggplants were produced in this country, for the simple reason that the growers did not think the season was long enough to produce them. In the past two years, however, they have been very successfully produced even in my own riding, which is in the vicinity of Toronto, and there are other places in the country much better fitted for the growth of these vegetables. They have been produced very successfully, but certainly they will not be produced, because of the short season we have in Ontario, if the duty is taken off entirely.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the rate of duty on eggplant entering the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: It is 1½ cents per pound at the present time. Before 1930 it was twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Sub-item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(g) Celery, 15 per cent.

Mr. BAKER: What was the value of celery imported from the United States last year?

Mr. DUNNING: In 1935 we imported 12,014,000 pounds valued at $357,000. The rate of duty going into the United States is two cents per pound; before 1930 it was twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BAKER: There is one point that has impressed me in listening to this discussion, but we are speaking about celery now, so I will confine my remarks to that subject. The government are lowering the duties on many vegetables. We have not been given all the figures, but no doubt they would total millions of dollars. The celery we import is consumed largely in the cities and large towns of Canada; generally speaking the farmers do not buy much celery. In these cities and large towns where the celery is consumed we have hundreds of thousands of unemployed, able-bodied men. Adjacent to these cities and towns we have thousands of acres of land practically idle. To me it appears very inconsistent—and I submit this idea to the government and the Minister of Labour—to go on in this way. Would it not be better to increase the duties on celery and these other items and, instead of importing these vegetables to the extent of millions of dollars, put these men to work growing vegetables? I submit that this is a reasonable suggestion, and I offer it to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In connection with celery also, I should like to point out that this is a matter in which the west is vitally concerned. It is true that some of our celery comes from the east, but experience has shown that even though the celery is sent to the west in refrigerator cars it will not stand the transportation, and as a result we in the west are penalized. In British Columbia the same condition exists in connection with celery that exists in connection with the other article of which I spoke; here again there is such excessive protection that we are practically prohibited from having celery. It is true that we raise a certain amount of celery ourselves, but the production is very much limited and is not nearly sufficient to take care of the demand. Some celery may be grown in Manitoba, but there is not sufficient to supply our markets at the time we demand it. Celery is not a luxury any more; it has become almost a necessity, and I do not think we should be penalized in this regard. Some is grown in the Okanagan valley of British Columbia, but that supply lasts for only a short period, and when we in the west are urgently in need of that vegetable it cannot be secured in sufficient quantities to supply our market; in fact, when the merchants send for it they can secure only three or four boxes out of a carload shipment, and that is not sufficient to maintain our markets. I should like to point out how utterly impossible it is for us to carry on under these conditions. This is how it works out: Taking the weight as fifty-five pounds, at the same rate the invoice would be $1.25. I may be a little wrong in my figures, but this serves just as an illustration.

Mr. DUNNING: Prior to the agreement the advance in invoice value on celery was one cent per pound maximum, applied last year from July 10 to November.

Mr. BENNETT: The minimum, not the maximum?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the agreement the maximum would be four-fifths of a cent per pound.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If it is less than one cent it would aggravate the case still more, but taking it at four-fifths of a cent there is a duty value of $1.69. Then there is the regular duty of fifteen per cent, which would amount to twenty-five cents. Then there is a dump not to exceed fifty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no dump where there is a special duty.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite correct. In his previous illustration my hon. friend was in error when he used the dump.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It amounts almost to that.

Mr. BENNETT: No; there is no dump duty where there is a special duty.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If it were carried out it would be forty-four cents. Then you have the excise duty of three per cent, which is six cents; total tax, seventy-five cents. Then there is the present duty on the invoice along with that, which would be sixty cents. Then there is the freight. One of the greatest difficulties, which has been overlooked in estimating the protection for British Columbia, is the freight. The freight from California would be $1.02 and the freight from British Columbia twenty-three cents, a difference of seventy-nine cents, in addition to the other protection. That gives them a protection of 123·2 per cent, a tremendous protection. It is not a protection but an embargo on that article as well as on the other of which articles we spoke. If we assume it to be true that there is no dump duty, this would lower the percentage a little, but even at that it is entirely out of reason. It makes it so that we in the western provinces are practically prohibited from using this article. There is another sound reason why we should have a regional protection. If British Columbia wants protection I have no objection, but I say that we in the prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, should not be penalized to that extent.

Mr. BRADETTE: I cannot accept the statement of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Baker) that celery and similar vegetables are eaten only in cities and towns. He does not know his own province. Does he not realize that the settlers and miners of northern Ontario eat celery?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BAKER: Consumed mostly in cities and large towns.

Mr. BRADETTE: In northern Ontario we have such towns as Timmins with over 20,000 people; we do not produce celery in that northern section and we are being penalized. Settlers in northern Ontario and northern Quebec are paying through the nose under seasonal tariffs. We do not want our own farmers to be hurt, but our settlers, the working men, the miners, must also be considered. Apparently there is a class of people in this house who will be satisfied with only one situation; they do not look at these things nationally. They mentioned soya beans yesterday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) covered the whole field before recess.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item under discussion, which is celery.

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, I will keep to celery, which includes all vegetables. I say again that as far as the farmers in every section of northern Canada are concerned, in most cases under the seasonal tariff they have to pay higher prices than they should, and not for their own protection, for they have no protection whatever. In this matter we should take a national point of view, and not see it only from the point of view of those sections in which vegetables and fruit are produced.

Mr. POULIOT: After dinner celery is better than pork and beans.

Mr. BAKER: I stand by what I said.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(h) Cucumbers, 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the rates?

Mr. DUNNING: Three cents a pound under the present United States tariff; twenty-five per cent ad valorem under the tariff prior to 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: And the extra duty value at present is how much?

Mr. DUNNING: Prior to the agreement, 3½ cents; under the agreement, 2⅘ cents.

Mr. BENNETT: For what period of time? The whole year?

Mr. DUNNING: Last year under my right hon. friend's administration it was from May 6 to October 12.

Mr. STEWART: Could the minister give the imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of cucumbers from the United States were 770,000 pounds valued at $45,100.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): They could all have been grown in Canada.

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, and bananas too.

Sub-item (h) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(i) Lettuce, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Rates of duty on lettuce entering the United States: two cents a pound at present; prior to 1930, twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. HEAPS: In computing the value for duty are the boxes and the ice still taken into consideration?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am advised that the ice is not taken into account in reckoning the duty, in this particular case.

Mr. HEAPS: That is, the duty on the boxes and ice is now being removed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the practice is not to reckon the duty on the value of the ice. Is that the question?

Mr. HEAPS: No. A shipment of lettuce coming from the United States contains a large amount of ice, and if I understand the matter correctly, at the present time in computing the weight for duty the whole box is weighed, lumber, ice and everything, and the duty charged on that. I want to know whether in the fifteen per cent to be charged under this item the crate and the ice are to be taken into consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: That is covered by the item in the tariff, No. 87: Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state, weight of package to be included in weight for duty. Of course, where it is ad valorem it is on the value of the goods, not on the packing.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister tell us, if he knows, why the duty on these articles going into the United States was changed from an ad valorem duty to so much a pound? Also has he made any analysis of the change, and is not the result to increase the duty as compared with the former basis?

Mr. DUNNING: It depends on the value from time to time whether an ad valorem or a specific duty would be higher, but I think it fair to say that the change in the United States tariff in 1930 with respect to these items tended to increase the duty.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. STIRLING: In the case of lettuce, before 1930 it was, roughly speaking, one-half cent and now it is two cents.

Mr. DUNNING: That is going into the United States.

Sub-item (i) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(j) Parsley, 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Why is there no valuation? Why is there to be no increase in value with respect to parsley whereas there is with respect to others? Because it has not been done heretofore? Because there is a substantial reduction? The duty is cut in two at the present time. It was thirty per cent, and it is now fifteen per cent. What was the duty on entering the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: It is now fifty per cent entering the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Ad valorem?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and prior to 1930 it was twenty-five per cent.

Mr. McGREGOR: How much parsley came in.

Mr. DUNNING: We have no separate record of parsley imports.

Mr. McGREGOR: I think the committee will find that all the parsley that has been shipped into Canada has come in during the winter time. No parsley is shipped in during the summer. The amount of duty would make no difference, because parsley is very light and if a duty were placed on it according to weight it would not amount to anything. If it were put on according to percentage it would not mean anything because the parsley comes in to compete against parsley grown in greenhouses in Canada in the winter time.

While I am on my feet I would say that one of the reasons we have a big holler about the cut flower arrangement is that the people who are growing parsley, watercress, lettuce and radishes in their greenhouses must grow flowers to-day because they cannot sell the vegetables. Therefore they are all growing flowers. If any duty could be put on, this would help a great deal.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(k) Peas, green, 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to have the three questions answered.

Mr. DUNNING: I was looking up the information, and shall attempt to give it. The Hawley-Smoot tariff provided for three cents but by presidential proclamation it was increased to 3·9 cents, and under the agreement it is reduced as against Canada to two cents during the months of July, August and September. It is one of the items on which concessions are obtained for the entry of Canadian products into the United States market.

Mr. BENNETT: That is per pound?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the rate prior to 1930?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the Fordney-McCumber tariff prior to the coming into effect of the Hawley-Smoot tariff, it was one cent.

Mr. STIRLING: Nearly four times as much.

Mr. BENNETT: What are our imports of green peas from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no separate figures for them. They are included in fresh vegetables, which total $33,000.

Sub-item (k) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(l) Rhubarb, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: It is fifty per cent going into the United States at present, and prior to 1930 it was twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister the importations, or are they given separately?

Mr. DUNNING: We have not the separate importations.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the special duty value?

Mr. DUNNING: Formerly it was two cents; now it is one and three-fifth cents.

Sub-item (l) agreed to.

[Mr. McGregor.]

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(m) Spinach, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: It stands at fifty per cent entering the United States, and prior to 1930 it was twenty-five per cent. Last year importations from the United States amounted to 4,588,000 pounds, valued at $138,591.

Mr. STIRLING: Did we ship any?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no separate record of it.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the value?

Mr. DUNNING: Formerly one and one-quarter cents and presently one cent per pound.

Sub-item (m) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(n) Tomatoes, 15 per cent.
Provided that the duty under any tariff less favourable than the British preferential tariff shall at no time be less than two cents per pound, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall give the usual information, after which the discussion may proceed. At present the rate is three cents per pound on tomatoes going into the United States, and prior to 1930 it was one-half cent per pound.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): May I point out a specific case to show how utterly impossible it is for people in the prairie provinces to enjoy this commodity, one which no longer is a luxury but can be named among the necessities. The situation is such that it amounts to practically an embargo. I have before me the figures of a specific case of tomatoes coming in from California to Alberta, the point of destination being Calgary. By the time a case costing seventy-five cents is laid down in Calgary it costs $3.04. That includes a total protection of $2.15.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but from his previous use of figures I must say that I am afraid he has made an error in calculation. Possibly he used a particular item of duty twice over, and of course for the purposes of this discussion it is quite impossible to consider the cost of railway freight in connection with the tariff on the item. From my hon. friend's point of view, speaking for the consumer, of course freight enters into the picture, but with respect to the percentage of duty applicable freight certainly cannot fairly be calculated.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think that substantiates my point that in setting the duty the differential in freight should be considered, because that in itself is a protection.

Mr. DUNNING: But it will vary throughout Canada.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): This is just for the prairie provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and I am speaking particularly for Alberta. I think the point is clear that if the other provinces wish that protection and the freight does not enter into the matter, all well and good. However, we in Alberta certainly have to consider the freight, and when we find that the protection which would in this way be afforded comes up to between 100 per cent and 200 per cent, surely we should have special consideration. Possibly I should go further and say that the three provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta should have it. A regional duty should be put on in that case. Let British Columbia and the eastern provinces do as they wish; if they do not want regional protection, that is their own funeral. However, I do not see why we out in the west should be made to suffer because British Columbia does not wish to consider the difference in freight.

I shall give the figures I have before me, and if they are wrong I should like to be corrected. The invoiced price is seventy-five cents on a crate weighing thirty-five pounds. The quotation is given as of June 30, 1934. The minimum seasonal duty of thirty per cent would be all right, but if thirty per cent of the invoice value was less than the amount realized from two cents per pound, the weight of the package included, the latter would apply. This would make a total of seventy cents. There we have a duty of seventy cents on a case originally costing seventy-five cents, or almost 100 per cent. The value for duty invoiced was seventy-five cents. Then, there is in addition three cents a pound on thirty-five pounds, or $1.05. That makes a total of $1.80. I am coming to what my hon. friend referred to as the dumping duty. The set valuation, according to that, would be $1.80, which would exceed the invoice by $1.05; that is, if you subtract the one from the other you get $1.05. That is fifty per cent more on the value for duty, or fifty per cent of $1.80, which would be ninety cents. That would be the dumping duty on tomatoes. If this is not correct I should like to be informed. I say that there is ninety cents of a dumping duty, and there is an excise tax of three per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I may tell my hon. friend that, worked out actually and on a fair average over a period of years, the duty prior to January 1 per crate of tomatoes would be approximately $1.65, whereas the duty on the first day of January under the agreement, on the same crate of tomatoes, would approximate sixty-eight cents.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Not taking into consideration the question of freight.

Mr. DUNNING: We are talking about duties, not about freights.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I understand that. But does the minister not realize also that, missing that point, he is penalizing us in the prairie provinces?

Mr. REID: If the hon. gentleman's reasoning is correct, why was it that last year we in British Columbia paid more for British Columbia tomatoes than he did in Alberta?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That will be something for you to work out internally.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman undertakes to give us the answer; let him answer that question.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The growers in British Columbia are protected; we in Alberta pay through the nose all the way round.

Mr. REID: I am giving the hon. gentleman facts; let him also give us facts.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is a seasonal duty of seventy cents on that article; the dumping duty is ninety cents; excise tax, four cents, and there is also the freight differential of 51 cents, which makes a total protection of $2.15 on an article which originally cost seventy-five cents. If you call that fair dealing with the western provinces then I want to be shown.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): Coming from the earliest producing district in Canada I should like to give some figures. The average selling price of an eleven-quart basket of tomatoes in 1935 was 41·5 cents. That was through the largest cooperative in that early producing district.

Mr. BENNETT: How many pounds?

Mr. CLARK (Essex): Fifteen. The hon. member for Bow River is mistaken in one respect. The duty on natural products is not added on to the Canadian product. We still sell in a supply and demand market, as is shown by the price we receive for our products.

In connection with semi-manufactured articles possibly the tariff is added on; but natural products still sell in Canada in a supply and demand market, so that this is protection and not a bonus.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why is it then that most of the tomatoes we get from British Columbia are field tomatoes, though they raise but a small quantity of tomatoes in that province? Theirs are hothouse tomatoes raised by orientals, and there again we find protection for orientals in British Columbia. Field tomatoes are shipped by way of British Columbia and we get them in Alberta and are soaked again.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not know where the hon. gentleman gets his figures, and they are extremely difficult to follow; but I do know with regard to tomatoes that prior to 1930 there was against our tomatoes going into the United States a duty of a half a cent a pound. There is a duty of three cents a pound now. The duty is reduced from thirty per cent to fifteen per cent, and I notice that there will be no added duty in the future. Is that a statement of fact?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend forgets the two cents specific duty in connection with this item by reason of the imperial agreement commitments.

Mr. STIRLING: It is to be not less than two cents a pound.

Mr. DUNNING: Two cents a pound.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the actual meaning of this phraseology: "Provided that the duty under any tariff less favourable than the British preferential shall at no time be less than two cents"?

Mr. DUNNING: That means what it says; it includes the rate applicable to the United States, and it shall not be less than two cents. That preserves the agreement made with the crown colonies under schedule F of the empire trade agreements.

Mr. STIRLING: And in that they are free.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. In order to preserve that preference the two cents per pound minimum had to be imposed in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: The tariff for tomatoes is item (n) under vegetables, provided that when imported under the intermediate or general tariff the rate of duty shall be at no time less than two cents per pound. What has happened here is merely a continuance of that.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

[Mr. S. M. Clark.]

Mr. BENNETT: But there is no longer any special duty to be added under any circumstances.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice in this item that the boxes in which tomatoes are crated are valued for duty purposes. I do not mind paying a duty on tomatoes as they come into the country, but why should the consumer be compelled to pay a duty on the containers? Can the minister give any good reason why there should be a duty on the containers?

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of National Revenue will answer that question.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure that I heard all that the hon. gentleman said, but packages have been included in the past. If he will look at the customs tariff he will see that in reckoning the weight for duty purposes the packages are included, and this simply continues that practice.

Mr. HEAPS: That is what I am complaining of; I see no reason why the containers should be valued for duty purposes. I do not think we should pay duty on them and I am wondering whether there is any good reason for the practice.

Mr. ILSLEY: In this case we cannot help ourselves, because we agreed to preserve this margin in the empire agreements and it would be impairing the margin to make the difference which the hon. gentleman suggests.

Mr. HEAPS: How many tomatoes did we import last year from England?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not a matter of importations from England; it is with respect to the crown colonies that the preference was created.

Mr. HEAPS: Were the West Indies agreements a part of the agreements of 1932?

Mr. DUNNING: Schedule F of the imperial trade agreement.

Mr. HEAPS: What tomatoes were imported from the different parts of the empire in the last fiscal year?

Mr. DUNNING: From Bermuda, 68,697 pounds.

Mr. HEAPS: How many from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: From the United States, 11,290,000 pounds.

Mr. BENNETT: Prior to 1930 we had to pay one-half cent per pound if we desired to send tomatoes into the United States, and we have to pay three cents per pound at the present time. We have cut the duty from thirty per cent to fifteen per cent on imports from the United States. There is no provision for added value under section 43, but the rate must be a minimum of two cents per pound if that exceeds fifteen per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The two cents per pound is the minimum.

Sub-item (n) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(o) Watercress and whitloof or endive, 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the figures for this item?

Mr. DUNNING: Fifty per cent to enter the United States at the present time, twenty-five per cent prior to 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: Our present reduction is fifty per cent. Is there any provision for added value for duty purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is with respect to peppers.

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Sub-item (o) agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
Peppers, green, 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the figures as to peppers?

Mr. DUNNING: Two and one-half cents per pound entering the United States at the present time; before 1930, twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the present added value for duty purposes under section 43?

Mr. DUNNING: There was a value of three cents per pound, but it was not applied in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any value to be applied now?

Mr. DUNNING: No. Of course my right hon. friend understands that it could be two and two-fifth cents under the agreement, but none is being applied and none was applied in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: It can be applied if the minister so desires.

Sub-item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
Radishes, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Radishes entering the United States at the present time pay fifty per cent; they paid twenty-five per cent prior to 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: What were the imports?

Mr. DUNNING: No separate classification; they are in that $33,000 item to which I have referred several times.

Mr. BENNETT: Any increased value for duty purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Sub-item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
Artichokes, free.

Mr. DUNNING: Fifty per cent to enter the United States at the present time; prior to 1930, twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What was our duty?

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty-seven and a half per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the intermediate, the general is thirty per cent. We have cut the rate fifty per cent.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): One hundred per cent.

Mr. SPENCE: Do they come in free the year round?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the minister think that is fair to our growers in Canada?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): In other words, we are paying 100 per cent more to enter the United States than we paid prior to 1930, and we take 100 per cent less.

Mr. SPENCE: It is ridiculous.

Mr. GRAYDON: What quantity of artichokes were produced in Canada last year?

Mr. DUNNING: There was no commercial production. I am advised that there are no figures.

Sub-item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
Horseradish, free.

Mr. McGREGOR: Surely there is no reason why horseradish should come in free. This is grown all over the country and has been for years, and the same can be said for artichokes.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the rates going in to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Three cents per pound at the present time and twenty-five per cent ad valorem prior to 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any increased value for duty purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: No. The imports are negligible and are not shown separately. They are included in the one item which is not very large when they are all put together, only $33,000 for all other vegetables.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What was the previous duty on horseradish?

Mr. DUNNING: It was 27½ per cent and thirty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: We reduced from thirty per cent to free.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Sub-item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
Okra, free.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the present duty on okra?

Mr. DUNNING: Free, 27½ per cent and thirty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That comes under the n.o.p. item?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: We have reduced it from thirty per cent to free. What are the United States charges?

Mr. DUNNING: At present fifty per cent ad valorem; prior to 1930, twenty-five per cent ad valorem. They grow it, of course.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and so do we.

Sub-item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(p) N.o.p., 15 per cent.
Provided that in respect of the goods dutiable under tariff item 87 no value for duty shall be established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act except in the case of the sub-items indicated thus (*); and in no case shall any value so established exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on like goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

Mr. BENNETT: This item is reduced from thirty per cent to fifteen per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

[Mr. McGregor.]

Mr. BENNETT: This would include all vegetables that are not specified in the details with which we have been dealing?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The rates going into the United States were fifty per cent and twenty-five per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course the n.o.p. items of the two countries are not comparable.

Mr. BENNETT: The n.o.p. items with respect to vegetables are comparable because many of the items with which we have been dealing are in the United States n.o.p. items. The item at the present time is fifty per cent ad valorem, and prior to 1930 it was twenty-five per cent.

Sub-item agreed to.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:
(a) Beans, baked or otherwise prepared, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: The effect of item 89 is to bind the intermediate tariff.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What is our duty on those articles going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Beans are three cents per pound on entire contents of container entering the United States. Prior to 1930, thirty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. STEWART: Could the minister give the imports of beans? These are under a different classification. I suppose he would have statistics as to imports from the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: Forty-two thousand pounds valued at $2,700. From Italy, 8,000 pounds, $550; and from Belgium, 6,300 pounds, valued at $486.

Mr. STEWART: The minister is speaking of beans only?

Mr. DUNNING: Beans, yes.

Mr. STEWART: And that was in what year?

Mr. DUNNING: 1935.

Mr. STEWART: According to some information I have, imports in the years 1928 and 1929 from the Untied States were about $2,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: I will see what we have in our suitcases to confirm that or otherwise. It sounds big to me.

Mr. BENNETT: As a result of the tariff of 1930 the importations were less of Campbell's soups and Heinz's beans.

Mr. STEWART: I was giving the figures of canned fruits and vegetables. I do not know whether the minister has them separately or not, but they seem to have been a very considerable item in 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no reduction in the United States on three cents a pound?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STIRLING: Will European countries to which the minister referred just now enjoy the two cents a pound?

Mr. DUNNING: They always have, if they come in under the intermediate tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: Italy had the most favoured nation treaty.

Mr. DUNNING: The statistics we have available go back only to 1931. In that year $38,000 worth of canned beans were imported from the United States.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The duty on canned beans has been reduced 33⅓ per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: We have reduced it from three cents to two cents, incidental to the granting of the intermediate tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: That is 33⅓ per cent, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: I prefer to state it in actual terms.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that "actual terms"? The minister has very strange views about this. He uses percentages very frequently. A reduction from three cents to two cents is a reduction of 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my right hon. friend let me tell him a little story to lighten the tedium of the committee's work, and to explain my objection?

Mr. BENNETT: The chair would have to be consulted about that.

Mr. DUNNING: The point being percentages, which is of course akin to this item of beans. Perhaps I had better not, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STIRLING: Instead, would the minister tell us what the exports were to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I gave the import figure of 58,600 pounds. We exported 4,000,000 pounds.

Mr. BENNETT: Thanks to the British preference.

Mr. WALSH: As regards this item, during the course of the debate preceding these items, I voiced an objection in connection with specific and ad valorem duties. I want to express my opinion that the specific duties are not fair and reasonable. To-day, a specific duty of two cents a pound might represent a protection of twenty-five per cent. Next year, one cent a pound might represent a protection of fifty per cent. The percentage varies. I would rather have something more stable.

Another point I would like to make is that I consider this is one item at least on which we could put on a very heavy, in fact a prohibitive duty, because surely we can grow a sufficient quantity of beans in this country to provide work for our own people in growing them and in canning them. Moreover, this would stimulate a certain amount of business in the manufacture of cans and other incidentals in connection with the canning industry. I urge upon the attention of the Minister of Finance whether it is not possible to introduce into our tariff system a prohibitive duty that would not in any way increase the cost of the commodity to the consumer, but at the same time would force production in Canada sufficient to meet our own needs, and stimulate industries that are indirectly interested in this particular feature of our tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: In Canada last year we produced 34,000,000 pounds of baked beans, which are dealt with in this item. Our imports from the United States were 42,000 pounds. We exported to the United Kingdom last year 4,000,000 pounds. Our bean producers and packers are evidently able to deal with the situation pretty effectively.

Mr. BENNETT: The British preference gives them the market. They did not have it before.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The minister has said that we exported about 4,000,000 pounds and we imported only 42,000 pounds.

Mr. DUNNING: Canned beans, yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Why does the minister think that is a sound reciprocal agreement, to reduce the duty 33⅓ per cent, when we have plants at Collingwood, Leamington.

Aylmer and other points in this country, when we are already on an exportable basis, and yet still have to pay the same duty on 4,000,000 pounds to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: No; the United Kingdom, principally.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): But I mean that in this agreement we still pay three cents a pound.

Mr. DUNNING: We do not export any to the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly; the tariff prohibits us.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The more reason why, when we are exporting 4,000,000 pounds and importing 42,000 pounds, the industry should have the same advantages as has the industry in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, of course we do not agree. That is really the answer to that. I cannot make any other.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we shall agree on this. The reduction of this duty between us and the United States is either for the purpose of enabling the United States to send beans into this country, or just a fake proposal. And inasmuch as it does make the reduction in question, and the United States retain their duty of three cents a pound, while we have reduced ours 33⅓ per cent, it is difficult to understand that there is much reciprocity about that. The minister says that all this does is to give the intermediate tariff and bind it, which is true. But the effect upon our business either is at once to invite further imports into this country, thereby lessening the sale of our goods, or else has no value at all.

Mr DUNNING: I shall answer only the expression "fake proposal." This was in no sense a fake proposal; it was entirely incidental to the offer to the United States of the Canadian intermediate tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not an accurate statement, if I may be pardoned for saying so, for this binds that item whereas all other intermediate items may be raised by this parliament. This may not.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I meant to say, and what I do say yet. Either it tends to increase the imports of beans into this country from the United States by reducing the tariff between us by 33⅓ per cent, leaving still a tariff of three cents a pound against us, or it has no value at all. I admit that the word "fake" is not a nice word to use; we will say "window-dressing" instead.

Sub-item (a) agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:

(b) Corn and tomatoes, per pound, 2 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: The same remarks apply to this.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What are the duties?

Mr. DUNNING: On canned corn entering the United States the duty at present is thirty-five per cent ad valorem and it was thirty-five per cent ad valorem prior to 1930. On tomatoes the duty is fifty per cent ad valorem at the present time and it was fifteen per cent ad valorem prior to 1930.

Mr. TUSTIN: I should like to ask the minister how many cases or pounds of these articles were exported to the United States during 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: Our exports of canned tomatoes were chiefly to the United Kingdom; I have been trying to find the United States figures. Our exports of corn were 5,100,000 pounds in 1935, chiefly to the United Kingdom, and of tomatoes—pulp and puree is the item—8,240,000 pounds, also chiefly to the United Kingdom. Our exports to the United States were quite small, $2,500 worth of corn and $1,200 worth of tomatoes.

Mr. TUSTIN: What were the imports from the United States in 1935?

Mr. DUNNING: We imported 35,000 pounds of corn, valued at $2,500 and 7,400 pounds of tomatoes, valued at $1,200. Exports to and imports from the United States were both negligible in connection with those two items.

Mr. BENNETT: What were our total imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Our total imports of tomatoes were 872,000 pounds valued at $70,000, of which 850,000 pounds came from Italy.

Mr. BENNETT: There is just one question I should like to ask. Tomatoes, canned, are classified as pulp or puree. I take it that this is what is known in ordinary parlance as tomato juice, or is that covered by the ordinary n.o.p. item? When the minister read the word "puree," I took that to be the term which has been used with respect to tomato juice, and I understood that tomato juice would carry the rate with which we are now dealing rather than the n.o.p. rate. I am rather curious to know under which item it comes.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer that question positively at the moment, but I will get the answer. The term "puree" is used in the export returns for Canada, but it is not clear whether "puree" means juice.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister told the committee just now that Canada had made these cuts in duty in order to give the intermediate tariff to the United States. Can he point out any instance in these items in which Canada has received the fifty per cent cut in the United States tariff which the president was empowered to give?

Mr. DUNNING: On vegetables? No, I cannot.

Mr. SPENCE: A moment ago the minister said that there were certain imports of tomatoes from Italy. In what state do they come from Italy? Are they canned? I have never seen a can of Italian tomatoes in my life.

Mr. DUNNING: This comes in mostly in the form of tomato pulp and puree. We imported 850,000 pounds of it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): That is included under the n.o.p. item?

Mr. DUNNING: No; under this item.

Sub-item (b) agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:
(c) Peas, per pound, 2 cents.

Mr. BENNETT: Could we have the same information with regard to this item?

Mr. DUNNING: In the United States the tariff is exactly the same, two cents per pound, and it was two cents prior to 1930.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister what the general tariff was on these three items, beans, peas, corn and tomatoes, prior to the revision of 1930 or 1931, when I understand the duty was raised to the three cent mark.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean under the tariff of May, 1930?

Mr. GRAYDON: I assume that would be it, though if my information is correct I think the year was 1931.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the tariff which came into effect in May, 1930, beans were free under the British preference, 1¼ cents under the intermediate and 1½ cents under the general tariff. Corn and tomatoes were free under the British preference, 1¼ cents under the intermediate, and two cents under the general tariff. Peas were one cent under the British preference, 1½ cents under the intermediate and two cents under the general. The n.o.p. item was free under the British preference, 27½ per cent ad valorem under the intermediate and thirty per cent ad valorem under the general tariff. No change was made in those items in September, 1930; in June, 1931, they were changed to the rates prevailing prior to this agreement coming into force. All three items were free under the British preference, two cents under the intermediate and three cents under the general tariff of that year. The n.o.p. item in that year remained the same, no change.

Mr. TUSTIN: May I ask the exports and imports of canned peas to and from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: We imported from the United States $340 worth last year and we exported $330 worth. A pretty near thing that!

Sub-item (c) agreed to.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:
(d) N.o.p., 27½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Binding the intermediate.

Sub-item (d) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(a) Apricots, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Duty entering the United States, one-half cent a pound at the present time, and one-half cent a pound prior to 1930. Imports include two items, (a) and (i) together, that is apricots, quinces and nectarines grouped; 278,954 pounds from the United States valued at $13,179.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the increase for special duty at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: Prior to January 1 the advance in invoice value was two cents. It can now go as high as 1⅜ cents a pound.

Sub-item (a) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(b) Cherries, 15 per cent.

Mr. SPENCE: One thing I object to taking any more of is cherries. In fact I am opposed to every cut that has been made in the whole list of fruits and vegetables. Away back in the twenties when my hon. friends were in power before, they put through a French treaty which hit cherries in this country badly. At one time we used to sell hundreds of thousands of baskets on the Toronto and Montreal markets to the canning and extract people. Since the French treaty became effective they were able to buy, from France and Italy, cherries in barrels, cured ready for use, which killed the cherry market in Canada, and scores, yes thousands of trees were pulled out between Toronto and Niagara Falls; they had to throw them away, and from then on the cherry market has never recovered. Now you are hitting them another punch and driving them into a hole. It is only five per cent, but why insist on all these changes so that no one in the business world knows what he is doing.

Mr. DUNNING: It may comfort my hon. friend to know—

Mr. SPENCE: There is always some excuse for everything, I never saw such a place.

Mr. DUNNING: I want to help my hon. friend if I can. There is a concession in the United States tariff with respect to cherries from two cents to one cent a pound. The Fordney-McCumber tariff was two cents.

Mr. SPENCE: We do not get much chance to ship many to the United States.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I think the minister should be complimented upon this; it is the first item in the whole list on which we have had a fifty per cent reduction.

Mr. DUNNING: You are forgetting peas.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): No; they stayed at two cents.

Mr. DUNNING: No; fresh peas were reduced from two cents to one cent.

Mr. BENNETT: For a limited period of time.

Mr. STIRLING: What are the exports of cherries?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not separately recorded.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the imports?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Total cherries, n.o.p.., is given here: 50,000 pounds exports from Canada, practically all to the United States.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this mean that the government expects that we shall greatly increase our shipments of cherries?

Mr. DUNNING: With the variety of opinion among fruit growers I prefer not to express an opinion.

Mr. SPENCE: What is the amount of cherries, cured, coming from Italy and France at the present time.

Mr. DUNNING: I will get it in a moment, though of course cured cherries is a different item.

Mr. SPENCE: The extract people are buying them now instead of buying our own. The importation may have dropped off recently, but it was very heavy at one time.

Mr. DUNNING: Cherries in brine from Italy last year: 182,000 gallons, valued at $133,000.

Mr. HEAPS: They are on the sanction list now, are they not?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not coming now.

Mr. SPENCE: Could the minister give the amount from France?

Mr. DUNNING: If the committee will wait a minute, or if my hon. friend is the only member interested perhaps he could get the information from me privately later. The hon. member need not worry about France; we imported 165 gallons last year.

Sub-item (b) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(c) Cranberries, 15 per cent.
Provided that the duty under any tariff less favourable than the British preferential tariff shall at no time be less than two cents per pound, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BENNETT: What is our position in respect to this?

Mr. DUNNING: One and a quarter cents per pound—when the hon. member for Parkdale and the leader of the opposition settle between themselves who is asking the questions.

Mr. BENNETT: Why should the minister make that observation? I was not asking anything. The hon. member for Parkdale rose and the chairman noticed him and said, "The hon. member for Parkdale," and he sat down. The hon. member for Parkdale has just as good a right to ask questions as has anyone else. I said to him, "He is recognizing you." Do not drag me into the matter unnecessarily.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, my right hon. friend will permit me to say that I shall have to insist that he speak loudly enough at all times for me to know whether or not he is asking a question. I had no intention of being discourteous, but when two people are trying to speak at the same time and I make a jocular reference, immediately my right hon. friend thinks I am insulting him.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that I had been insulted; I have no intention of doing so.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not see our maritime righters rising to defend themselves. Both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are developing big cranberry swamps and are competing very strongly with Cape Cod in the United States. Why are they not complaining about new industries in that country, where there is no seasonal tariff.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SPENCE: Go on; both sides say something; I want to hear the maritimes say something.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the rate of duty on cranberries entering the United States under the present tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: One and a quarter cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: And under the Fordney-McCumber tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: One and a quarter cents per pound; no change.

Mr. BENNETT: What imports were there from the United States or from other countries last year?

Mr. DUNNING: There were 1,659,000 pounds, valued at $155,000.

Mr. BENNETT: And we have reduced the duty and are bound for the life of the agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: The duty is not to be less than two cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to ask whether that proviso applied only to cranberries, or does it apply to the three fruits? I was not quite sure.

Mr. DUNNING: The specific applies to cranberries only.

Sub-item (c) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

(d) Peaches, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States tariff is one-half cent per pound at present, and was one-half cent per pound prior to 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the present rate?

Mr. STEWART: What about imports of peaches from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports from the United States amounted to 4,821,000 pounds valued at $149,000.

Mr. BENNETT: And we have reduced the duty by twenty-five per cent; that is the story, as I take it. There is no question about the two cents there.

Mr. DUNNING: The advance on the invoiced value of peaches was one and three-quarter cents per pound; the limit to which it can go now is one and two-fifth cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that in force to-day?

Mr. LOCKHART: How far back has the minister records of imports of peaches from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: For five years.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I have the imports of peaches for 1931, and succeeding years?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of peaches from the United States in 1931 amounted to 11,836,000 pounds; in 1932 they were 10,335,000 pounds; in 1933 they were 3,613,000 pounds; in 1934 they were 2,568,000 pounds, and the figure for 1935, which I gave a few moments ago, was 4,821,000 pounds.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give the production of peaches in Canada in the same period?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot. We cannot bring the whole department here. However, I believe I can give the production for last year. The estimated production in Canada for 1935 was 715,000 bushels.

Mr. STIRLING: I believe there are fifty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. LOCKHART: Were any peaches exported to the United States in those same years?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no separate record of them.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am quite sure there were not.

Mr. DUNNING: It is in the item of $150,000, but it is not recorded separately.

Mr. STEWART: Would the Minister of National Revenue be good enough to table to-morrow a copy of any ministerial orders or directions which may have been given since this government took office, with respect to valuations for duty purposes?

Mr. ILSLEY: If I furnished them to my right hon. friend would that not be just as good? There is however no objection to tabling them.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the rules require that when a minister reads a document it should be tabled.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall see that the hon. member gets them in one way or another.

Sub-item (d) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(e) Pears, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States duty is one-half cent per pound now and was one-half cent per pound prior to 1930.

Mr. STEWART: Were there importations of pears from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Importations of pears from the United States in 1935 amounted to 13,432,000 pounds, valued at $412,000.

Mr. BENNETT: And I suppose the exports were nil?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not separately reported, but would be part of the large item of $150,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the spread in the special duty rate?

Mr. DUNNING: One and a quarter cents prior—

Mr. BENNETT: No, no; the special duty, not the tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: It was one and a quarter cents prior to the coming into force of the agreement, and the maximum now will be one cent.

Sub-item (e) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(f) Plums or prunes, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The duty entering the United States is one-half cent to-day and was one-half cent prior to 1930. Imports of plums or prunes from the United States in 1935 amounted to 4,783,000 pounds, valued at $156,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the special duty valuation?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: The same as in the previous item. One and a quarter cents could be added to the invoiced value prior to the coming into force of the agreement; now one cent is the maximum.

Mr. TUSTIN: Has the minister separate information as to what was exported to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no separate record.

Sub-item (f) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(g) Strawberries, 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States duty was a cent and a quarter per pound, but a concession of three-quarters of a cent per pound on Canadian strawberries entering the United States is effected by the agreement. The rate was 1¼ cents per pound under both the recent American tariffs, but it is reduced, as against Canadian strawberries, to three-quarters of one cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What were our exports last year?

Mr. DUNNING: We exported 180,000 pounds, valued at $20,000, all to the United States.

Mr. STIRLING: And what were the imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Strawberries, raspberries, loganberries and edible berries, n.o.p. are all lumped together in the import statistics, and the total amount from the United States was 6,042,000 pounds, valued at $422,000; that is, of all these berries. With respect to the valuation, two cents was effective prior to the agreement; it will now be a maximum of one and three-fifth cents.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Can the minister tell me what protection will be given dried loganberries? The agreement now entered into appears to affect the price at which loganberries are valued for duty purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: All these items deal with fresh fruits.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): But I am pointing out that the agreement affects the price for duty purposes of all fruits.

Mr. DUNNING: Dried loganberries are not in this schedule to the agreement and hence are not really properly before the committee, but I can give the information. The present tariff on dried fruits, including the article to which my hon. friend refers, is free under the British preference, 22½ per cent under the intermediate and twenty-five per cent under the general; therefore the duty from the United States will be 22½ per cent under the agreement.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): But is there not a price fixed for duty purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): So I am informed.

Mr. DUNNING: It was cancelled.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I have an extensively endorsed resolution passed by the Saanich Fruit Growers' Association, who want to protect a dehydrating plant established on Vancouver island. Can I have an assurance that it will be assisted?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot give that assurance.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should like to submit the resolution to the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: With pleasure.

Sub-item (g) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(h) Berries, edible, n.o.p., 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States duty is 1¼ cents, and previously it was 1¼ cents; that is prior to 1930. There is no change.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the same for raspberries and loganberries?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: Blueberries are marked thirty-five per cent ad valorem, former rate, and twenty-five per cent new rate; that is blueberries prepared or preserved or frozen but not in brine, and not dried, desiccated or evaporated. Does that include fresh blueberries going to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Fresh blueberries are in the n.o.p. berry item now before the committee.

Mr. KINLEY: I am referring to item 736.

Mr. DUNNING: Is the hon. gentleman referring to blueberries entering the United States?

Mr. KINLEY: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: In schedule II of the agreement, blueberries prepared or preserved or frozen but not in brine, and not dried, desiccated or evaporated, and not specially provided for, will be twenty-five per cent entering the United States; but that does not include fresh blueberries.

Mr. KINLEY: I cannot find fresh blueberries.

Mr. BENNETT: Fresh blueberries are covered by (h): Berries, edible, n.o.p.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, coming this way; but the hon. gentleman is interested in berries going the other way.

Mr. BENNETT: That is covered by the basket item.

Mr. DUNNING: It is 1¼ cents per pound entering the United States.

Mr. KINLEY: What are the exports?

Mr. DUNNING: Last year there were 3,670,000 pounds, valued at $205,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in the duty entering the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg seems to be under a misapprehension. There is no change in this agreement in the existing rates on blueberries, fresh, entering the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: I said so.

Sub-item (h) agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:
(i) Quinces and nectarines, 15 per cent.
Provided that in respect of the goods dutiable under tariff item 92, no value for duty shall be established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act except in the case of the sub-items indicated thus (*); and in no case shall any value so established exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on like goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister give the figures?

Mr. DUNNING: With reference to the United States, the duty is thirty-five per cent ad valorem at present, and it was thirty-five per cent ad valorem prior to 1930.

Sub-item (i) agreed to.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—93. Apples, fresh, in their natural state, 15 per cent.
Provided that in no case shall any value for duty established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on such goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

Mr. DUNNING: Entering the United States, the rate prior to the treaty was twenty-five cents per bushel of fifty pounds. By this treaty that rate is reduced to fifteen cents per bushel of fifty pounds. Twenty-five cents was also the United States duty under the Fordney-McCumber tariff. Added in this value under the former arrangement was a one cent maximum addition. Entering Canada under the treaty it will be four-fifths of one cent per pound.

Mr. HEAPS: What quantity of apples do we import free under the British preference?

Mr. DUNNING: Our total imports last year from all countries were 22,137 barrels, of which 15,589 barrels came from New Zealand. That I think is the closest I can come without a considerable calculation, so far as quantities from British countries are concerned.

Mr. HEAPS: Those coming in from New Zealand would be exempt from duty?

Mr. DUNNING: Free of duty.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What were our total exports?

Mr. DUNNING: Exports to all countries were 2,060,000 barrels, valued at $8,220,000. The United Kingdom was our principal customer, taking 1,807,000 barrels. To Belgium we shipped 77,000 barrels; to Egypt, 33,500 barrels; to The Netherlands, 33,000; to Germany, 26,000 barrels; to Newfoundland, 18,000 barrels; to France, 17,000 barrels; to New Zealand, 7,000 barrels. We imported 15,000 barrels from New Zealand and exported 7,000 barrels.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a seasonal demand?

Mr. DUNNING: We exported to South Africa 7,000 barrels; to the Argentine, 5,500 barrels; to Sweden, 4,700 barrels, and to the United States, 4,500 barrels.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The minister made no mention of India.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no record of any exports to India.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): There is a considerable consumption of apples in India and the Americans are taking all the business.

Mr. BENNETT: Proximity has something to do with that.

Mr. STEWART: Could the minister give the imports from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: That again is a seasonal matter. We imported 6,548 barrels, mostly from the United States, and exported 4,500 barrels. In connection with India, I would say to my hon. friend that we have no preference in that country.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I think a little work on the part of the minister in charge of that particular department would ensure the consumption of Canadian apples. I have a little information which I should be glad to disclose to the minister.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—94. Grapes, fresh, in their natural state, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty, 1½ cents per pound.

Provided that in no case shall any value for duty established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on such goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States duty at the present time is twenty-five cents per cubic foot, and it was twenty-five cents per cubic foot prior to 1930. Canadian imports were 18,400,000 pounds from the United States, valued at $738,000; 114,000 pounds from Spain and 55,000 pounds from the United Kingdom. There are no separate statistics available for exports. The estimated Canadian production for 1935 was 39,350,000 pounds.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I have the imports of grapes from the United States for the same five years as in the case of peaches?

Mr. DUNNING: In 1929 we imported 32,366,000 pounds; in 1932, 17,636,000 pounds; in 1933, 16,959,000 pounds; in 1934, 15,636,000 pounds, and in 1935, 18,400,000 pounds.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has the minister the exports to the United States for the same five years?

Mr. DUNNING: There are no separate statistics available for the export of grapes.

Mr. STEWART: Did the minister give the estimated Canadian production?

Mr. DUNNING: Last year it was 39,350,000 pounds.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister the figures for the preceding years?

Mr. DUNNING: The preceding year the production was 46,800,000 pounds.

Mr. BENNETT: And for 1931?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not those figures.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the present added value for duty purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: Prior to the agreement the advance on invoice value was one cent and the maximum can now be four-fifths of one cent. It was never applied in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: The general tariff, however, provided that it shall not be less than three-fifths of a cent per pound, so there has been no reduction.

Mr. DUNNING: The general tariff was a specific duty.

Mr. BENNETT: The general tariff for grapes is two cents; intermediate, 1½ cents and British preferential, free. I was referring to apples.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—95. Cantaloupes and muskmelons, 15 per cent.
Provided that in no case shall any value for duty established under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act exceed the invoice value by more than 80 per centum of the lowest advance imposed on such goods under the authority of said section during the calendar years 1933 to 1935, inclusive.

Mr. DUNNING: Thirty-five per cent ad valorem entering the United States to-day, and thirty-five per cent ad valorem prior to 1930.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): No reduction?

Mr. DUNNING: No change in the United States duty.

Mr. SPENCE: Will there be any seasonal protection for our own growers?

Mr. DUNNING: There is a provision in the item that the value for duty shall not exceed the invoice value by more than eighty per cent of the lowest advance imposed on such goods.

Mr. SPENCE: Does that really mean anything. What are you going to do about it?

Mr. DUNNING: The fixed advance on the invoice value prior to the treaty was four cents maximum; the advance possible under the agreement is three and one-fifth cents per pound.

Mr. TUSTIN: What were the imports last year.

Mr. DUNNING: The imports were 6,763,000 pounds, valued at $163,000.

Mr. TUSTIN: What were the exports to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not recorded separately. There is no change in the United States duty prior to 1930 and at the present time; the duty is thirty-five per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—95a. Melons, n.o.p., 2½ cents each.

Mr. DUNNING: Entering the United States, thirty-five per cent ad valorem at the present time, and it was thirty-five per cent prior to 1930. Imports from the United States were 955,000 melons, valued at $139,000. In giving these figures I am leaving off the odd numbers and I hope no hon. member will want to hold me to strict accuracy in this regard.

Mr. SPENCE: Does that include watermelons and muskmelons?

Mr. DUNNING: No; muskmelons would be included under the previous item. This item covers all other melons.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—96. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state, n.o.p., 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The corresponding item in the United States is thirty-five per cent ad valorem at the present time, and it was thirty-five per cent prior to 1930. Total imports last year from the United States were valued at $7,631. The effect of this item is to bind the intermediate tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: By a reduction of twenty-five per cent on the general.

Mr. DUNNING: By a reduction from 20 per cent to 15 per cent.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The American tariff remains the same?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 96. Avocados or alligator pears, free.

Mr. DUNNING: An extra item.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not know why you need them at all. There is no real demand for alligator pears in this country, and I do not know why there is any necessity to cut the duty off them.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a luxury used as salad. What is the United States duty?

Mr. DUNNING: Fifteen cents a pound. It was formerly thirty-five cents ad valorem.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We do not grow them!

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—100a. Grapefruit, n.o.p., per pound, ½ cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the amount of grapefruit imported from empire countries in 1935 and the amount imported from the United States, and I should like to ask the same two questions with reference to item 101, if I may take the two together.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to get mixed up by taking both. Imports from the United States of grapefruit, 29,000,000 pounds, valued at $777,000, in 1935. From Honduras, which would be British Honduras, I presume, 1,460,000 pounds, valued at $31,000. That is an error. The Honduras I just mentioned is not British Honduras.

Mr. SPENCE: Spanish Honduras?

Mr. BENNETT: No; it is an independent state.

Mr. DUNNING: Jamaica, 1,173,000 pounds at $25,000. British Honduras, 815,000 pounds at $20,000. That is the total of the imports.

Mr. BENNETT: Did not some come from Palestine? I had some myself.

Mr. DUNNING: Too small to be shown.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that grapefruit coming in under the British preference was free of duty. Is there any reason why there should be a duty of half a cent a pound on grapefruit coming in from the United States? Could it not be put in the same category as the subsequent item, oranges?

Mr. DUNNING: We are precluded entirely from considering that, because of the agreement to maintain the British preference.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): It is reduced fifty per cent now, is it not?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 101. Oranges, during the months of January, February, March and April, free.

Mr. DUNNING: The figures of imports are given in cubic feet.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us figure it down to boxes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is in accordance with the tariff item, cubic feet of measurement. From the United States in 1935, 3,744,000 cubic feet, valued at $4,900,000; from Japan, 228,000 cubic feet, $488,000; from South Africa, 222,000 cubic feet, $273,000; from Spain, 129,000 cubic feet, $98,000; from Jamaica, 90,700 cubic feet, $65,000; from Palestine, 82,000 cubic feet, $81,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing from Australia?

Mr. DUNNING: There were 14,000 cubic feet from Australia.

Mr. MacNICOL: I supposed there were some from Australia, because I have a friend who sells fruit at his store, and I heard him say that the oranges came from Australia. I should like to make an observation or two with reference to those items. As I understand the situation, importations from empire countries in connection with the two items I have mentioned, are larger as a result of our empire agreements. I heard the minister say that we are importing from such empire countries as South Africa, Australia, Jamaica, and Palestine.

Mr. DUNNING: Palestine is not an empire country.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would strike me that the result of these duties on these items will be to reduce importations from empire countries and transfer that trade to United States shippers. That opinion is borne out in a couple of editorials I have before me which I should like to read, contained in a book called Reciprocal Trade, just published and sent out from New York, covering the whole forty-eight states as regards the benefits they expect to obtain from these trade agreements. In an editorial, the Enterprise, published at Riverside, California, says this:

California is vitally concerned in the proposal for a reciprocal trade agreement, for the movement of fruits from this state into Canada has been hampered by the tariffs erected by Canada in connection with the Buy Empire movement . . .

I particularly wish to stress that part of this article, the Buy Empire movement.

The California viewpoint will be on the side of elimination of as many tariffs as possible, for this state has little to lose and much to gain.

Another article, from the Bulletin, of Walla Walla, Washington, states:

Fruit and vegetable growers of this valley and adjoining early crops districts see considerable hope in provisions of the treaty between this country and Canada.... It will possibly require time for Canadian business to reestablish connections on this side of the line to the profit of all concerned. There is no belittling the fact that several years of nationalistic propaganda, "Buy British Empire products," has had its effect north of the boundary.

Another editorial—

Mr. DUNNING: I hope my hon. friend will stick to oranges. There was not much about oranges in the last quotation.

Mr. MacNICOL: This may be regarded as referring to items that went before the item under discussion. What I am trying to point out is that a number of these items are going to interfere, in my opinion, with empire trade. Let us stick to the orange item. I for one would much sooner trade with empire countries than with other countries.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) with regard to oranges entering this country from California were correct, I should think that when the trade agreement was made the whole year would have been covered, in all probability, by the free entry provision, instead of the four months specified in the agreement. As I understand the matter, the restriction to four months is for the purpose of keeping out competition from the United States with empire countries. The large crop of oranges in the United States is of the navel orange. The small crop of oranges in the United States is of the Valencia orange. These months of January, February, March and April are the months of the production of navel oranges in Florida and other states, including, to some extent, California. They would not compete, probably, with empire oranges; therefore those oranges come in at that time. But the Valencia orange, which is the same orange that is grown in Australia, in British Honduras and in Jamaica, comes in during the other months of the year, so I think it will be found that the agreement is made in this way in order to avoid competition as between United States and empire oranges. Personally I can see no reason why the people of Canada should be made to pay more for oranges, in any case. When my hon. friend speaks of Washington, of course no oranges come from that part of the country. I do know that no one produces oranges in Canada, and I see no reason why we should have any tariff against them at any time.

Mr. HEAPS: One of the countries from which we expected to receive very large shipments of oranges was Australia, but according to the statement of the minister it would appear that Australia has not been in a position to ship any large quantity of oranges to Canada; I think he said that only 14,000 cubic feet of oranges came from that country. Therefore I take it that Australia is not in a position to supply us with any large share of the vast quantity of oranges we consume in this country. During the same year the United States supplied us with over 3,000,000 cubic feet of oranges, while the quantity we received from empire countries was rather small and limited. Personally I am glad to see this item in the agreement; it gives the United States quite a large concession, and I hope we receive equal concessions from them in connection with other items. I should like the minister to tell the committee if he has any information as to how many oranges were imported from the United States during the four similar months of last year. The minister gave us the annual shipments.

Mr. DUNNING: During the four months which are of interest because of the nature of this item, from January to April, 1935, inclusive, imports from the United States totalled 1,410,000 cubic feet.

Mr. HEAPS: As against a total of what?

Mr. DUNNING: As against a total of 3,744,000 cubic feet for the fiscal year.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any conflict between this agreement and the West India agreement? The question has been asked as to why we should buy empire oranges. It will be remembered that under an agreement negotiated with the West Indies by a former Liberal administration it was provided that there should be a preference of one cent under the general tariff on grapefruit, and I think there was also a preference with respect to oranges though I have been unable to find it.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: None at all?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the effect of this arrangement would be to subject Jamaica oranges to competition they previously did not have to meet.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Of course there is a greatly diminished supply from the West Indies principally because of the disastrous effects of hurricanes and also because of the premium nature of the United Kingdom market for Jamaica oranges, which resulted in a very large diversion of the Jamaica crop to that country. This is perhaps of doubtful importance, but I should mention it: The introduction into the Canadian market of Palestine oranges under free entry granted by the legislation of 1933 might have had an effect, because importations from Palestine have steadily increased since that time, amounting to 82,000 cubic feet in 1935.

Mr. HEAPS: There is quite a difference between the oranges we get from the different parts of the empire. Jamaica oranges do not compete with Palestine oranges any more than they do with California oranges. All these oranges are of different grades, and people who like a good orange of the navel type probably would not care for the other types of oranges sometimes put on the market coming from other parts of the world.

Mr. DUNNING: That is true.

Mr. HEAPS: Consequently, while they may come in at the same time of the year they are not necessarily in competition with each other, because they are completely different in character and quality.

Mr. REID: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue in connection with this item. Do Japanese oranges come in under the name of tangerines while other oranges come in at the same time under the designation of oranges? I understand that Japanese oranges evade the duty because they are called tangerines.

Mr. ILSLEY: They come in almost entirely as mandarins and tangerines.

Mr. REID: Is that a ruling of the department, that they are designated as tangerines?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is entirely a question of fact.

Mr. BENNETT: Was not a special arrangement made in connection with importations last season? I think they come in about December, and I understand they come in free under the Japanese treaty.

Mr. MacINNIS: My information is that a small orange coming from California is called the tangerine and that Japanese oranges come in as such.

Mr. DUNNING: There is only one tariff item, in any case.

Mr. STEWART: I think I should make a statement to the committee about oranges. In speaking on the resolution I used a figure which I took from what I believed was a reliable source, a financial paper which I think is quite friendly to the government or has been so in the past. I stated that the value of our imports of oranges, as taken from that periodical, was something in the neighbourhood of $21,000,000 a year. In his reply the Prime Minister very properly pointed out that these figures were greatly exaggerated. Ever since that time I have been busy counting the oranges, the lemons and the grapefruit in an attempt to find out just where I made the mistake. I think perhaps if I have a little time I shall be able to build up a figure not very different from the one I quoted, but it may not be composed entirely of oranges. I should have included oranges, lemons, grapefruit and all the other fruits necessary to make up the total of $21,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: We will allow you a few vegetables if you need them.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. SPENCE: I should like to make just one comment. The minister will find that importations for the four months of this year will not exceed those for the four months of last year although the duty on oranges has been cut down. Cutting down the duty simply stopped the sale of oranges, and in the last three months we have not done the business in oranges that we did last year.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—101a. Lemons, free.

Mr. BENNETT: How does that affect empire shipments of lemons? I think last year we did get some from the antipodes.

Mr. DUNNING: The shipments were very small. We imported 200,000 boxes from the United States, valued at $680,000; from Italy we imported 172,000 boxes, valued at $418,000 and 3,100 boxes from the United Kingdom, valued at $11,000. Of course they obviously were not produced there; they may have come from almost any country.

Mr. BENNETT: Transshipped?

Mr. DUNNING: Transshipped.

Mr. BENNETT: This is only to bind the item, I take it.

Mr. DUNNING: Just to bind the item. This is important in reply to my hon. friend: 2,800 boxes from Australia.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 105b. Olives, ripe, in brine, not bottled, 10 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Any change in that?

Mr. DUNNING: Reduction in rates.

Mr. HEAPS: I see this item has been put on the same basis as those coming from empire countries.

Mr. DUNNING: They are not separately recorded in the import statistics, but would form part of the item classified as olives, in brine, not bottled, of which 244,000 gallons came from Spain, valued at $173,000; from Greece, 29,700 gallons, valued at $15,500; and from the United States, 22,800 gallons, valued at $25,800.

Mr. BENNETT: Spain will also get the new rate, I take it?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: That makes the British preferential rate and the rate under this agreement the same.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: The United States is put on the same basis as the British preferential, including Australia?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not a factor in the trade at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Does it conflict with the empire trade agreements?

Mr. DUNNING: No, positively not.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—106. Fruits, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:
(a) Apricots, peaches and pears, per pound, 4 cents.

Mr. BENNETT: This item reduces the duty on canned fruits by twenty per cent. The most serious competition that Canadians have had to meet with respect to one of these items has been the competition from California; I think that is generally known. The West Indies production of pineapples marketed in this country, and the Singapore production, will also be affected. I cannot speak about the n.o.p., but the effect is merely to reduce the duty from the United States by twenty per cent and to bind the item at four cents, which is the present intermediate tariff. What I desired to know in the light of those facts was: What is the duty against our shipping canned fruits into the United States? We have already dealt with raw fruits.

Mr. DUNNING: On apricots, peaches and pears, thirty-five per cent. It was thirty-five per cent prior to 1930. That is an ad valorem tariff purely.

Mr. BENNETT: And there is no change?

Mr. DUNNING: No change.

Mr. HEAPS: I think this duty is somewhat unfair in its incidence; that is, the cheaper fruits, or fruits that might be lower priced, will be paying the same ad valorem duty as those of high price. Canned goods valued at twenty cents a pound will pay four cents duty, and the same article worth seven cents a pound will still pay four cents duty, that is four cents on seven cents worth as against four cents on twenty cents worth. The cheaper canned fruits, which are largely consumed, will have to pay a much higher rate of duty under this item. I think it would be much wiser if this duty were on a percentage basis. I would like to know why it should be as it is at present rather than on a percentage basis.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change in the item. It has been administered in this way for a long time. I need not tell my hon. friend that it is very much easier to administer in this form in connection with this class of commodity. The question of value for duty of different grades of canned fruits is not an easy one. I think it had better remain in the present form, although there is a great deal in the argument of my hon. friend, which of course applies to specific duties wherever used.

Mr. HEAPS: This appears to be a specially bad one. A can will weigh about a pound on an average, possibly more. The value of the goods might be six or seven cents wholesale. I believe the duty on the lower priced fruits on this basis may be as high as 100 per cent. It may be true, as the minister has pointed out, that it has been in this form for a long time, but that does not excuse continuing something which is admittedly wrong. I know this agreement is now in effect; it is the law of the land practically; the goods are coming in on this basis at the present time, but I hope that when the opportunity arises the house itself will see that the unfairness of a tax of this character is removed and it is put on a more equitable basis.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) attaches much importance to the weight of the can.

Mr. HEAPS: No, the fruit.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, I thought he was about to ask if the weight of the can was any consideration, or if the value of the can was to be included in the valuation of the canned article. The syrup or the sweet water that is with the canned fruit weights more than the can. I wonder if the minister could tell the committee what is the weight of twenty-four empty cans as compared with the weight of the syrup contained in those cans.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid that question is beyond me.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, it is the same kind of question.

Mr. TUSTIN: What were the imports of this item during the past year?

Mr. DUNNING: Peaches and apricots together, from Australia, 2,275,000 pounds, valued at $143,000. They came in at the one cent duty under the British agreement, of course, which constitutes another reason why it would be impossible at this time to apply an ad valorem basis of valuation, because the preference is based upon the specific duty. From the United States, 171,300 pounds of peaches and apricots, valued at $11,370, and from the United Kingdom, 29,360 pounds, valued at $2,476.

Mr. BENNETT: That is domestic production too.

Mr. DUNNING: In England?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, strange as it may sound.

Mr. DUNNING: In my part of the country there are some extremely fine peaches, but I did not think they exported them; they are too good.

Mr. BENNETT: I have seen some.

Mr. POULIOT: Is there any split hair in canned fruit?

Mr. HEAPS: There is in this house.

Mr. TUSTIN: Were there any exports from this country last year?

Mr. DUNNING: Exports of canned pears amounted to 10,650,000 pounds, valued at $675,000, and went chiefly to the United Kingdom. Exports of canned apples amounted to 7,471,000 pounds, valued at $330,000, and went chiefly to the United Kingdom. Other canned fruits amounting to 6,753,000 pounds, valued at $445,000, were shipped chiefly to the United Kingdom.

Sub-item (a) agreed to.

Customs tariff—106. Fruits, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:
(b) Pineapples, per pound, 4 cents;
(c) N.o.p.. per pound, 4 cents.

Sub-items (b) and (c) agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 109. Nuts of all kinds, n.o.p., but not including shelled peanuts, n.o.p., one cent per pound.

Mr. POULIOT: We are now discussing not the cans but the shells.

Mr. BENNETT: We do not produce any nuts, I take it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 114. Nuts, shelled, n.o.p., but not including shelled almonds, peanuts or walnuts, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did we carry sub-items (b) and (c) of item 106?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; the item was carried as a whole.

Mr. POULIOT: Would item ex. 114 include salted peanuts?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: In both these cases we reduced beyond the intermediate tariffs?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Even for salted peanuts.

Mr. STEWART: In this instance I notice a striking reduction. Item ex. 114 refers to "nuts, shelled, n.o.p., but not including shelled almonds, peanuts or walnuts, per pound, two cents," and the British preferential rate is three cents. Under the tariff which existed before the agreement the general rate was four cents, and the intermediate rate, three and one-third cents. In this instance we take it far below the intermediate and the British preferential. What is the reason?

Mr. DUNNING: The new rate automatically goes to Great Britain.

Mr. HEAPS: How many nuts were imported from British countries and from the United States in the past fiscal year?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no record of any importations from British countries.

Mr. BENNETT: But there were some.

Mr. DUNNING: We must remember that the item includes shelled nuts, with the exception of shelled almonds, peanuts and walnuts. The imports of all other shelled nuts from the United States amounted to 634,000 pounds, valued at $195,000; from Brazil they were 441,000 pounds, valued at $85,000, from Spain there were 353,000 pounds, valued at $53,000 and from Mexico 126,000 pounds, valued at $32,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—116. Halibut, fresh, pickled or salted, one cent per pound.

Mr. HANSON: That is the same duty as obtained before, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: No; it is a reduction.

Mr. HANSON: There was one cent on American halibut coming into Canada before, and two cents on Canadian halibut going into the United States. May I say that the greatest part of our halibut is shipped from the Pacific coast, and Canadian fishermen were operating under a handicap of two cents per pound, as compared with American fishermen. Since the agreement came into effect, Canadian fishermen have had the benefit of a rate of one cent per pound, and this means between $60,000 and $70,000 a year to them. Their catch is between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 pounds. May I congratulate the government upon at least cutting the rate in half, and I hope that in time they may be able to wipe it out altogether. When the cut in the rate was announced I received communications from fishermen on the Pacific coast who told me to bring a message to the Liberal chieftain and the government stating that they were pleased to see the adjustment brought about for which they have been working for the past few years. I hope the government will make further efforts towards removing the duty altogether, and putting halibut on the free list.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the rates under the new arrangements with the United States for the importation of fresh halibut?

Mr. DUNNING: One cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The same as our own?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a reciprocal rate?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What was it previously?

Mr. DUNNING: Two cents.

Mr. BENNETT: And before the Fordney-McCumber tariff, what was it?

Mr. DUNNING: Two cents.

Mr. BENNETT: What are our exports? I believe all the halibut from this country went to the United States, and no halibut to speak of is shipped from the eastern coast. Practically all of it comes from the Pacific coast.

Mr. DUNNING: Last year there were 26,205 hundredweight shipped to the United States, valued at $230,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Fresh?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, fresh halibut.

Mr. STEWART: Are there any imports of halibut?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; my figures are reduced to pounds. From the United States we imported 40,000 pounds, valued at $3,000, and from Newfoundland, 208,000 pounds, valued at $18,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Did Newfoundland get the benefit of this rate?

Mr. DUNNING: The British preferential is free at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: But the minister will recall that there is some question about Newfoundland. Does Newfoundland get the benefit of the free rate or the cent rate? I should think it would be free.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not sure about it.

Mr. DUNNING: All products of the fisheries of Newfoundland are free.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the minister will remember some question was raised about it. There is not a very firm foundation, but I assume it is on a free basis.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: From which coast do importations come, the Pacific or the Atlantic?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no way of identifying the ports at which the 40,000 pounds entered.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is admitted that practically all the exports go from the Pacific coast.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: As I heard the hon. member I thought he said that the value of exports of halibut amounted to $230,000.

Mr. DUNNING: I said $230,000 represented the value of exports to the United States only. To the United Kingdom we exported 22,516 hundredweight, valued at $208,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That would total what amount?

Mr. DUNNING: It is $447,000 worth, or nearly 50,000 hundredweight.

Mr. BENNETT: Nearly $450,000 worth?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, in total exports.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not the hon. member for Skeena in error when he states that it means $70,000 to the fishermen? The total value is $450,000, and the reduction of duty is from two cents to one cent, or a fifty per cent reduction.

Mr. HANSON: The total output of Canadian fishermen is between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 pounds. Whether it is sold in Canada or the United States or elsewhere they have been under a handicap of two cents per pound, as compared with American fishermen. That amount of fish could not be consumed in Canada and consequently has to be exported. I am not saying what we shipped to the United States, but the fact is that we had to look to that market or to Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it costs the consumer a cent a pound more?

Mr. HANSON: The fishermen will get one cent per pound more.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): And perhaps that will help the consumer?

Mr. HANSON: At least it helps the producer.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 123. Lobsters, prepared or preserved, free.

Mr. BENNETT: Lobsters now enter the United States free.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and they are bound on the free list under the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: We are now reciprocating by giving them free entry into our market. That is the story.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; that is the story, and the particulars are these. We imported last year from the United States 367 pounds of lobsters, valued at $116; we exported to the United States 8,523 hundredweight, valued at $453,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Are the closed seasons the same in Canada and the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I have not that information. I should add the figures respecting lobsters canned, because they are included in the item. Our production was 116,000 cases of 48 pounds, valued at $2,380,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is production. How much of that was exported?

Mr. DUNNING: I gave the exports to the United States. To the United Kingdom we exported 27,521 hundredweight, valued at $1,232,000. We have a small export to quite a number of countries, the total export of canned lobsters being 52,912 hundredweight, valued at $2,500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Practically half of that went to the United Kingdom?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, approximately half.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the Minister of Fisheries whether the closed seasons are the same in Canada and the United States, I mean as regards the time at which they begin to catch lobsters? That is very important if the season is not the same in the United States as it is here in this country, the trade with the United States will not interfere at all with our own.

Mr. BROOKS: Is what is known as the spiny lobster included in this item?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: This is the only lobster item.

Mr. ILSLEY: The spiny lobster has been ruled as a crayfish and is not included in the item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 123a. Shrimps, in sealed containers, 27½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Imports and exports are not separately recorded.

Mr. BENNETT: It merely binds the present rate.

Mr. DUNNING: No; it is a reduction in duty. It is dutiable under the present tariff at 17½ per cent, forty per cent and forty per cent. The new rate is 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—124. Oysters, shelled, in bulk, 5 cents per gallon.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction. The former rates were seven cents under the British preference, nine cents under the intermediate and ten cents per gallon under the general tariff. Under this item New Zealand has by virtue of her trade agreement a fixed rate of five cents per gallon, but with no guaranteed margins of preference.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the United States duty against our shelled oysters?

Mr. DUNNING: Free.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole year?

Mr. DUNNING: They have agreed to bind the free entry presently accorded to oysters.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: What quantity of oysters do we import from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: In bulk, shelled, 105,000 gallons, valued at $162,000 in 1935.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Personally I should like to see an absolute embargo on the entry into Canada of the bluepoint so-called oyster, not because of competition—I am not afraid of competition—but because they are a misrepresentation and a fraud upon our famous Buctouche and Aldouane oysters. They are really not oysters at all. They do not taste like oysters. They look more like quahaugs or clams, and when people eat them they say, "If those are oysters we won't buy any more." They are therefore injurious to our Buctouche and Aldouane oysters.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 133. Lobsters, fresh, free.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction. The present duties are fifteen per cent under the British, twenty per cent under the intermediate and twenty-five per cent under the general tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: Do we get free entry for lobsters?

Mr. DUNNING: We get free entry for Canadian lobsters.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the rate?

Mr. DUNNING: They are free. We imported from the United States last year fifty pounds of fresh lobsters, valued at $15, and we exported to the United States 99,000 hundredweight, valued at $1,629,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not this the issue? Why should we have done this if we do not expect the Americans to do some more trading in lobsters in our market? There is no purpose at all.

Mr. DUNNING: The purpose is to ensure the continuance of the free entry of our lobsters into the United States for three years.

Mr. BENNETT: Although they did most of the buying last year. We bought only a trifling quantity from them.

Mr. STEWART: How long have we had the right of free entry into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer that offhand.

Mr. POULIOT: This is most important, because the United States could get deep sea lobsters from Bermuda and other places. They encourage our trade and they should be given consideration therefor.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it not a fact that very few lobsters are caught in the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BROOKS: The maritimes and Newfoundland are the main sources of supply. The United States want our lobsters.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; and if they want free entry, what is the matter?

Mr. BROOKS: They have nothing to enter.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 133. Scallops, fresh but not frozen, free.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction. Scallops are at present dutiable, fifteen per cent under the British preference, twenty per cent under the intermediate and twenty-five per cent under the general tariff. Under schedule II the United States guarantee the free entry of Canadian scallops, fresh but not frozen, the product of Canada. Our exports to the United States last year were 584,000 pounds, valued at $103,000.

Mr. STEWART: What were our imports of scallops for the same period?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports are not separately recorded; they are included in a bulk item.

Mr. STEWART: From what countries do we get them?

Mr. DUNNING: We do not.

Mr. STEWART: No imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Nothing to speak of.

Item agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: I think we have made fair progress and I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister be prepared to give us evidence of values and information of that kind in connection with the next item?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall try to be as fully prepared as possible.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

END OF VOLUME I.
