House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIRST SESSION—EIGHTEENTH PARLIAMENT

The seventeenth parliament having been prorogued on the fifth day of July, 1935, and dissolved by proclamation on the fifteenth day of August, 1935, and writs having been issued and returned, a new parliament was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on Thursday, February 6, 1936, and did accordingly meet on that day.

Thursday, February 6, 1936

This being the day on which parliament is convoked by proclamation of the Governor General for the dispatch of business, and the members of the house being assembled:

Arthur Beauchesne, Esquire, C.M.G., M.A., K.C., F.R.S.C., the Clerk of the House, read to the house a letter from the Governer General's secretary informing him that the Right Honourable Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 6th of February, at 12 noon, to open the session.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada, until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the members being returned to the Commons chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Beauchesne, the thought which is uppermost in the minds of all hon. members as we meet at the beginning of this first session of the new parliament is, I am sure, the great loss which our country, in common with all the countries of the British Empire and indeed of the world, has sustained in the death of our greatly beloved Sovereign, King George V.

It would be our wish, at the earliest possible moment, to convey to His Majesty King Edward VIII, to Her Majesty Queen Mary, and to the members of the Royal Family, an expression of the deep sympathy of the House of Commons in their sorrow and bereavement and, also, to express to King Edward our loyalty and devotion. I have to remind hon. members, however, that the House of Commons has not a voice wherewith to communicate in these matters except through the Speaker of the house. The Speaker is the channel of communication between the commons and the crown. As yet, we have not selected a Speaker of the commons.

There is another duty of which I have also to remind hon. members, and it is that before entering upon any other proceedings we should hear from His Excellency the Governor General the reasons why His Excellency has summoned hon. members to meet him in parliament. We have just been reminded in another chamber that His Excellency does not see fit to disclose the reasons which have caused him to bring us together until the House of Commons has elected its Speaker in accordance with law.

When these two duties have been performed, I think it will be more than appropriate, and I know it will be the wish of all, that we then proceed immediately to pass an address to His Majesty the King and a message of condolence to Her Majesty Queen

REVISED EDITION

Mary. However, we are not yet constituted as a house; indeed, parliament itself cannot be said to be constituted until after the commons have chosen their Speaker. I therefore suggest that here and now we select and elect our speaker, and I wish to propose, as one who is a fit and proper person for that position, Mr. Pierre-François Casgrain, the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The applause which has just greeted the name of Mr. Casgrain would indicate that at least to the hon. members on this side of the house the choice will be eminently satisfactory. I hope it will prove to be equally so on the part of all members of the house.

May I say a word to hon. members of the practice which prevails in the election of a Speaker. In most matters, as all hon. members know, we follow at Ottawa the procedure and practice of the parliament at Westminster. At Westminster, however, the practice has been, with regard to the Speaker, that, once he is elected, he is done the honour, if he is still a member of parliament, of being renominated at each succeeding parliament. Indeed, until last year, the practice had been not to offer opposition to the Speaker of the British House of Commons in a general election.

A similar practice, however, has not been followed in Canada since confederation. The reason, I imagine, is that in our country the population is so largely drawn from those of English origin and those of French origin that it has been felt appropriate that the Speaker of one parliament should be one who is of English descent and the Speaker of the next parliament one who is of French descent. In three instances, however, Speakers of previous parliaments have been re-nominated—this was the case with Speakers Cockburn, Rhodes and Lemieux. Each of these gentlemen was re-elected at the first session of a new parliament succeeding the one in which they had, in the first instance, been chosen Speaker. At the time of their re-election they were in parliament. The occupant of the office of Speaker in the preceding parliament is not a member of parliament at the present time. Consequently such a possibility need not at the moment be considered.

There is another circumstance which I feel it is my duty to bring to the attention of hon. members. In Great Britain the practice has been to have the Speaker nominated, not by a member of the government but by a private member—this in order to make it perfectly clear that, whoever is chosen as Speaker, is the choice of the members of the commons themselves and not an appointee of the government. In Canada the practice since confederation has been different; the Speaker has been nominated by a member of the ministry, the prime minister, in fact, and I think the nomination has in all cases been accepted by members of the commons. It is but right, that the ministry should have at least an opportunity to make known its view with regard to the person it thinks should be appointed to the high office of Speaker. I wish to make it very clear, however, to hon. members, that the choice of a Speaker is the choice of the commons itself, and that hon. members themselves must elect the one who is to be the occupant of that office.

May I say a word as to the position of Speaker. It is, as we all know, the highest office in the gift of the House of Commons and the most honourable. Its occupant becomes the first commoner. He is the presiding officer of the house and, as such, has great responsibilities. To him is entrusted the custodianship of the honour, the rights, the privileges and the prerogatives of the commons. As presiding officer, he must, above all other qualifications, possess those of fairness and impartiality as between members of all parties in the House of Commons. Indeed, he is the protector of the rights of every individual member. It is also essential that, whoever be the occupant of that position should have a knowledge and a wide experience of the rules and regulations of the house. He must be familiar with parliamentary procedure, and he should also be possessed of a disposition which makes it easy for him to reconcile differences where they may arise, and at all times to see that the business of the house is carried on with the decorum that befits a great assembly such as this, which is representative of the nation.

I recognize that these are many qualifications, many virtues, to expect to find in any one man, but I do believe they are possessed in large measure by Mr. Casgrain, the gentleman whose name I have just proposed.

Mr. Casgrain has been for many years a member of the House of Commons—nearly twenty years, I think—and during most of that time has acted as one of the whips of his party, and for at least ten years as its chief whip. It may be thought by some that the position of chief whip would not necessarily be a qualification for the office of Speaker. I may point out, however, that the qualities which enable an hon. member to command the confidence of his own party are qualities which are likely to enable him to command equally the confidence of the house as a whole. The experience gained in the office of whip, in dealing with members of all parties in the house, in adjusting differences as they arise, and in doing what is necessary to facilitate and expedite the business of the house, should prove to be an invaluable asset to one who occupies the position of Speaker. The position of chief whip in the English parliament, and indeed I may say also in our parliament, is one which is recognized as being almost on a par with that of a minister of the crown. One who over a period of years renders faithful service in such a position, a service which is not to his party only, but to the whole house, has a right, I think, to feel that his services will, if the occasion arises, be suitably recognized by the House of Commons as a whole.

I might mention that Mr. Casgrain has had considerable experience in the practice of law, and has the honour of having been for many years a king's counsel. I am sure my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, will agree with me that a legal training, while not absolutely essential, is, nevertheless, of great assistance to one who occupies the position of Speaker. The questions that arise, the legal and constitutional points that have to be considered, the decisions that have to be quickly made, are all of a character which demand of the occupant of the chair a trained and disciplined mind and make of great advantage legal experience where it can be found.

With respect to any possible question of partisanship may I say that there is a noble tradition in the legal profession of Canada, as of other parts of the British Empire, that where members of the bar receive appointment to the bench they leave behind their partisanship and adopt a judicial character which is beyond question. That tradition, I think, is equally true of those who have been strong party men and have come later to occupy the position of Speaker in the House of Commons. I believe it will be equally true of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, when he leaves the floor of the house to ascend the steps which taken him to the chair.

May I mention that the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay also has what I regret to say most of us have not, a fluent command of both the official languages of parliament. Like so many of his compatriots, he not only has a perfect knowledge of his own language, but can put to shame many of his English-speaking associates in the facility of expression which he has in their tongue. That, I am sure, is a qualification which will be appreciated by hon. members of this house.

I might mention other qualifications, but I shall content myself with saying that I believe Mr. Casgrain possesses the character and has in his personality those qualities, which will enable him to discharge the duties of Speaker of this house to the satisfaction of all hon. members, and will perform those duties with impartiality and dignity. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Lapointe:

That Pierre-François Casgrain, member representing the electoral district of Charlevoix-Saguenay, do take the chair of this house as Speaker.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): "Sir, we are met together to exercise a very important privilege of this house." Those are the words of Lord John Russell; therefore we may take them as being singularly apposite to what I have to say.

It is a long established custom in this house—in fact it has become almost a rule of law—that a member of French descent should follow in the Speaker's chair a member of British descent, and that they should alternate in the holding of that high office. As the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, that rule has been departed from on few occasions. The rule is salutary; it should be observed, and on this occasion it is the right of a member of French descent to be elected to the chair of this house. That I think, cannot be gainsaid. And it is a matter of satisfaction to every member of this chamber that on the government side there are large numbers of men qualified by experience, by training and by knowledge to occupy that high office.

The duties of a Speaker are very onerous. In my short time in this house I have been frequently impressed by the fact that as yet we have not been able to appreciate the value of tradition. The newness of our desks, the surroundings of this building, are not conducive to memory of great traditions. The old House of Commons called up more traditions than this building does; it could not help but do so. When one thinks, in the great house at Westminster, of what noble traditions are called into being and what imaginary pictures must pass through the minds of the men who occupy seats in that chamber, one realizes that in a new country we suffer from many things, not the least of which is the lack of great traditions. But we are making traditions; as we make precedents we create traditions. The stories that are told from man to man; the tales that are circulated with respect to the sayings of this or that great member of the house, these are creating a body of tradition, even in this country, that has great value.

The Speaker of our house first of all has to preside over our deliberations. He must protect the person of the members from insult. He must maintain decorum. I believe some centuries ago there was an hon. member addressing the house who was not being heard because of the noise, and the Speaker indicated that while he could call upon the hon. member to speak he was not in a position to ensure that he would be heard. But that statement of the Speaker was called in question and was regarded as being entirely unsound. Every member of the house has a right to the maintenance of order. Nor is it his duty nor the duty of the members of this house to call upon the chair to maintain order; it is the duty of the chair to maintain order and decorum in this chamber. It will be within the memory of many, perhaps, that only a few years ago in the House of Commons when there was considerable noise being made by the opposition—which is not unusual—the Speaker turned to the leader of the opposition and asked him if that tumult had his approval or assent, whereupon the leader of the opposition said, "Far be it from me, sir, to indicate to you what your duty is, but I know mine too well to answer that question."

Therefore it is quite clear that it is the duty of the Speaker to maintain order and decorum in this chamber; that is provided for by the rules of the house. In addition to that he must put every question to the house that has to be considered by its members; any motion or resolution must be read by him. But he has a second duty which perhaps far transcends that which I have just mentioned. His second duty is to see that the conduct of debate is maintained in accordance with the rules and practices of this house. That is a difficult task. I think it was Mr. Gladstone who said, when Mr. Speaker Peel was leaving the chair, that no man in two centuries had had the difficult conditions to meet that had the then retiring Speaker. In this house the duties and the difficulties of maintaining the rules of order for the conduct of debate have become greater as the years have gone by. I do not know why. I am going to suggest one reason presently. But in the maintenance of the respect and regard for the rules of debate there are two considerations that a Speaker must always have before him. One is that he must have a knowledge of the written rules, that is the standing orders and rules of the House of Commons, which are embodied in the little volume which I hold in my hand. That, as we lawyers might say, is the lex scripta, the written law governing the House of Commons in the conduct of debate. But there is a great body of law which is not written. There is a great body of precedent which has to do with the conduct of debate. There is that accumulation which has come down, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, during all the ages, to which we must pay regard and respect.

Thus it is that the Speaker is the guardian of the powers, the dignities, the liberties and the privileges of this House of Commons. It will be recalled that in the time of King Charles I, when the king went down to arrest five members or have them arrested, the Speaker of that day said:

> I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak, in this place but as this house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here.

And the position of Speaker therefore becomes that of a servant or organ of the House of Commons. That I think is quite clear. I shall illustrate my point with respect to the question of the rules that are written and the unwritten rules that govern. For instance there is embodied in our standing orders a rule as to the length of time that may be employed in speaking to the house. I have no doubt some members are looking at the clock now. The time is limited, as is known, to forty minutes. That was because this House of Commons so desired, and no one else. The House of Commons makes its own rules and determines how long members may speak, and they have now embodied it in a written rule which was adopted by this house.

There is a rule also with respect to reading speeches. Sir Austen Chamberlain in his recent book, Down the Years, reviewing his life, refers to the fact that conditions in the British House of Commons have become steadily worse; he blames the two front benches largely for this, and refers to the fact that essays have taken the place of speeches, and that essays have been read in the house. I recall, although I am subject to correction as to my memory being accurate, that a Speaker pointed out that a Mr. Jeffrey was reading his speech. At the end of his speech the Speaker of the day spoke to Mr. Canning and Mr. Fox as to whether or not he should direct attention to it, and they said they thought he very properly should, and he did. Later when Mr. Jeffrey was closing the debate he undertook to read, and the Speaker called him to order because it was against the rules of the house.

In this house during the last few years I can recall very vividly the then leader of the opposition calling upon the Speaker to enforce order against a member who was dealing with a technical matter and was reading what he had to say, involving medical terms, and he replied, "I have to resort to my notes." Notes may be resorted to, which is an altogether different thing from reading a speech. If the rule is to be enforced, it should be enforced against all members of the house by the Speaker, and not by the members calling upon the Speaker, because the rules of our parliament contemplate that he himself should take notice of that fact.

I mention these things because they are merely illustrations of what you might call the unwritten and the written rules, and that great body of unwritten precedents which has come down through the ages is of the utmost importance in the rulings of the Speaker of the chamber.

It has not been usual for Speakers to be opposed when they are nominated in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister. But in England as late as 1895 a great conflict took place between Mr. Gully and Sir Matthew White Ridley, and it will be recalled that at that time the discussion became rather acrimonious on the part of both Sir William Vernon Harcourt and the then Mr. A. J. Balfour. But as a rule Speakers are unanimously elected to office. However, it will be recalled that away back in the days of 1835 a gentleman whose name is well known in this country, who had served as Speaker for seven parliaments, was opposed by Mr. Abercrombie and defeated by a majority of I think eleven in a full house, the votes being 306 and 317—a very full house indeed. The reason was one to which I am presently to refer, and it has great force at this time in this country.

It has been said that the position of chief whip equips one well to discharge the duties of Speaker. There was a speech in the British House of Commons dealing with the question of the Speaker in which it was said that a man may have been so closely connected with politics, so closely identified with party fortunes, that it would be impossible for him after long service in that regard to be an efficient and effective Speaker. However, one of the most eminent of English Speakers was chief whip of his party, and another English Speaker was an assistant whip. Therefore in my judgment it is no bar, although there is high authority for saying that never should the Speakership be looked upon as a reward for services, for technically the speakership is in the gift not of the government but of the house, and the house should not be concerned about rewards for party services, but only with fitness to discharge the high duties and responsibilities of the great office in question.

That being so, I regret to have to say that I am opposed to the election of Mr. Casgrain as speaker of this house. Before I proceed to state my reasons at length I am going to read what the gentleman whom Sir Austen Chamberlain describes as in his judgment the greatest Speaker England ever had, namely the late Lord Peel, conceived to be the qualifications of a great Speaker, when he was elected. Mr. Gladstone was then Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker Peel used these words:

> And I hope, sir, I will make no professions when professions may be so soon tested by experience; but I wish to say this to hon. gentlemen, that I know full well what is the greatest attribute and ornament of that chair. I know how necessary it is for any man, who aspires to fill that great office, to lay aside all that is personal, all that is of party, all that savours of political predilection, and to subordinate everything to the great interests of the house at large. Humbly, sir, trusting in that support, I shall endeavour to maintain and to sustain intact the privileges of this house; to maintain the rules and orders of the house; to maintain not only the written law, but, if I may say so, that unwritten law which should appeal to, as it always does appeal to, the minds and consciences of the gentlemen of the House of Commons. If I have that support, I trust that I may be permitted, not only to carry out the formal rules, but to enforce that unwritten law, and, sir, to promote and to hand down unimpaired, as they have been handed down by those who preceded the late speaker, to those who shall succeed me, the traditions of this house, and, over and above all, its most cherished and inestimable tradition—I mean, sir, that personal courtesy, that interchange of chivalry between member and member, which I believe to be compatible with the most effective party debates and feeling, and which I am sure is one of the oldest, and, I humbly trust, may always be, the most cherished tradition of this great representative assembly. Sir, with these few words—and I trust the house will not think I have unduly trespassed upon its time—I sit down, humbly submitting myself to, and placing myself in the hands and at the disposal of, this house.

That was the speech he made in accepting nomination, and before the house had expressed its will. When he left the chair eleven years later he made a speech to which I have not time this morning to refer, but which I commend to the reading of every hon. member in this chamber.

Bearing in mind what has been said, it is, of course, well known to most of us that for some time in the public press the statement has appeared that Mr. Casgrain was to be elected Speaker of this house. That was known. It has been the custom that that should, in a general sense be known, and I do not think that the first minister or any person connected with the government made any statement to that effect. Rather it was accepted as indicating what was to happen, because the first minister would not undertake to pledge the judgment of this House of Commons, which is the judgment of the whole house, with respect to something which is not a party matter but is one for the house itself to consider.

Under these circumstances I find it necessary to direct attention to the fact that there is a statute dealing with the position of Speaker in this chamber. It is not as though this were a matter not covered by law. It is not as though it were a matter in which the high privilege of parliament must be left to chance, to the imagination or to vain reachings after. They are known; they are provided for. And in every case where thanks have been given to a retiring Speaker of the British House of Commons they have always been thanks for maintaining the privileges of the house. It is my unfortunate duty to ask leave to refer to what was said by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier when in 1888 he had to deal with a somewhat similar situation. It is an unpleasant duty, but one which I must discharge in fairness to myself and fairness to those with whom I am associated. Those hon. members associated with me, although a small minority, have a right in this chamber to look for that measure of justice and that measure of impartiality which successive generations have declared to be the supreme test of fitness for any man to hold the high office of Speaker.

I find that in 1868 the parliament of Canada thought it necessary at once to deal with a situation which would arise in connection with employees of the House of Commons. The House of Commons is not, shall I say, a mere appendage of the government. Hon. members will realize that it is something more than a mere assembly. We are members of the highest court in the land, the high court of parliament, and it is our obligation to maintain intact the privileges of this court and to guard them from encroachment or attack, from whatever sources they may come.

I find that in chapter 27 of the statutes of 1868 a provision was passed respecting the internal economy of the House of Commons, and for other purposes. It provides for estimates, it provides for duties of the sergeant-at-arms, it provides for duties of the clerk, under certain circumstances, and indicates how moneys are to be dealt with. Then it proceeds to deal with the conduct of the administration of the House of Commons itself. In that connection section 9 is as follows:

> If any complaint or representation shall at any time be made to the speaker for the time being, of the misconduct or unfitness of any clerk, officer, messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons, now or hereafter to be appointed, it shall be lawful for the said speaker to cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person; and if thereupon it shall appear to the speaker that such person has been guilty of misconduct or is unfit to hold his situation, the speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger or other person has been appointed by the crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the governor, and if he has not been appointed by the crown then the speaker may suspend or remove such person, as the case may be, and such person shall be so suspended or removed, as the case may be, accordingly.

That you will find in the revised statutes of Canada, chapter 145, a later statute, the terms of which provide for the appointment of a commission of internal economy, to consist of four members of the King's Privy Council who are members of the House of Commons, and the Speaker. They constitute the commission of internal economy for which provision is made in sections 15 and 16 of Chapter 145, which deal with the House of Commons. The commission of internal economy has to deal with problems of administration in connection with the house. I shall content myself simply by pointing out that the sergeant-at-arms has certain obligations and that the Speaker has certain other obligations with respect to matters of expenditure and provision for payment to those who may be engaged for the purpose of conducting the business of the house.

Now, what do we find? We find this, that after the statement was made in the press that Mr. Casgrain was to be made Speaker of the House of Commons, on January 28, 1936 there was sent by the sergeant-at-arms to upwards of 120 employees of this House of Commons a notice reading as follows:

> I am instructed to inform you that it will be impossible to continue your employment on the staff of the House of Commons after January 31st next.
> Yours faithfully,

This document is signed by M. F. Gregg, sergeant-at-arms, and the name of the person to whom the notice was sent is written in. Those instructions came from Mr. Casgrain. He had the same right to give them as the youngest or most humble member of this house. He undertook to dismiss from the public service by his order permanent officials of this house—I say permanent officials, because the temporary staff had not been employed. In this connection I shall read the case which came before this house in 1888 when Sir John A. Macdonald was prime minister, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved an amendment against the Speaker's action, where it was pointed out that first of all it is provided, not by custom but by the lex scripta, by the written law of parliament, that no man can be taken from his position in this house unless a complaint has been made against him or before he has had an opportunity to be heard in his defence.

I pass by one employee of this chamber who had served under four sovereigns. He received that notice, and I have spoken to others who received it. Many of them were appointed by the right hon. Prime Minister—not by him personally, but by his administration. Sir, I ask the House of Commons this question: Can it be said that one who is capable of sending such a notice into the homes of men and women of this country indicating that they would not be employed after the 31st day of January can be looked upon with confidence by hon. members seated on this side of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the question. This is a painful matter for me, because I have to go on and refer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I will read what Mr. Laurier, as he then was, said under similar circumstances. I want to do more: I want to be fair to the Prime Minister and to his government. I believe that as soon as the Prime Minister heard that this had taken place he took immediate steps to stop it. I believe that a committee of this government took steps, because returned men with families were stunned over a week end by a notice of this kind. I am told many of those men are now living from day to day in a state of uncertainty. Many who had served nine or ten years, some longer than that, and who received this notice, thus found their households disturbed, their lives made unhappy, and their whole existence threatened.

I wish to acquit the Prime Minister of any part or parcel in this matter. In the bitterness of party strife, governments have to do many things. The pressure of their followers, the pressure of constituencies—all these things are known to all of us. But I will say this: I do not believe this was done with the Prime Minister's knowledge, and I was proud to think that the Prime Minister of this country, as soon as it was brought to his attention, took immediate steps in the matter. He did not pause; he acted at once and notices cancelling the earlier ones were immediately sent out. I congratulate him and I thank him, if he will permit me to do so, for having seen that such action was taken. It was creditable to him; it was creditable to this House of Commons that this should have been done because there is a statute governing such matters, and it was in defiance of that statute that action was taken by one who had not been elected to any office but who might very properly hope to be; but who, not content, as he might have been, with providing for the administration of the House of Commons by employing temporary help—and every session sees temporary help engaged, and everybody knows that temporary help is as largely as possible secured from among those who are friendly to the administration; I am not going to be hypocrite enough for a single moment to say otherwise—took action such as I have indicated. What, I ask, would be thought in England if any man would rise in his place and propose as Speaker one who had violated the provisions of a statute that he must have known of, one who is a king's counsel, a member of the legal profession, anxious to know what his position was, and one who must have known what was involved in taking the action that he did.

That raises another question. The Clerk of this House of Commons has made a statement to the press. I know not how accurately he was reported. I shall content myself by saying that according to the report he said that he was dealing with appointments on the political side, and that there had been a great misunderstanding in respect of these matters. I do not know how far this report in the paper correctly represents what the clerk of the house said, and I shall therefore refrain from saying anything more than that if he did say what he is reported to have said, there should be an instant inquiry.

Now I go further. It is quite clear, sir, to every thoughtful man that what has taken place with respect to the administration of this House of Commons must come before the committee on privileges. How can it be otherwise? The privileges of this house have been invaded. A statute has been overridden. Action has been taken that is in violation of all the dignity and privilege of this House of Commons—a violation not of the unwritten law, but of the lex scripta, the written law of the country. There must be an inquiry. And what position are we to be in if we have our own Speaker putting the motion, as he will be compelled to do, and as has been done in England, of course, for this matter to be inquired into by the committee on privileges and elections?

I wish to refer again to the case that engaged the attention of the house in the days of Sir John Macdonald after the election of 1887. The Hon. J. A. Chapleau, then Secretary of State, wrote a letter to the Speaker of the house in which he pointed out that three translators of the house had spoken very ill of him, and of other members as well. His complaint was corroborated by the Hon. W. B. Ives, a supporter of the government. These complaints were put in writing. They specified the language used by the translators, who had spoken of members of the house as having been guilty of hanging Riel at the instance of the Orange lodges, with many other sentiments of that kind which I shall not take the time of the house to read. But those sentiments were expressed by these translators; a letter of complaint was written to the Speaker, and the Speaker sent the papers down to the committee on debates. The committee on debates gave the matter much consideration and finally came to the conclusion that it should be sent to the committee on privileges; whereupon the Speaker called together the internal economy commissioners, Sir John A. Macdonald himself being one of them, and they met together. The translators gave their version of the matter and said: "We have a right to do what we please when we are not working on our translation because we are appointed not by the government but by the house, and it was understood that we could do as we pleased when our work as translators for the house had been completed." But in the opinion of all who spoke that was hardly a sound rule, and at any rate section 55 of our Civil Service Act covers the situation.

Then on February 28, 1888, Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, at the very opening of the house, said:

> Before the orders of the day are called, I beg to rise to a question of privilege. I am informed that you, Mr. Speaker, in the exercise of the power which you have assumed as Speaker of this house, have dismissed three of the translators of the debates from the positions which they had received at the hands of the house. I may say at once, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to your decision, and in my humble judgment, that I have not the least doubt that you have exceeded your authority and invaded the privilege of this house.

The matter again came to the attention of the house on the first day of March. Mr. Speaker having laid before the house certain letters and other papers relating to the dismissal of these translators, it became necessary to consider the matter further, and Mr. Laurier said that he would take this matter up just as soon as the opportunity presented itself. Later, on the eleventh day of April, the matter was considered carefully and Mr. Laurier used words which I should like to read to the house:

> Mr. Laurier: I now rise to bring up the question of privilege of which I gave notice a few days ago, in reference to the dismissal by you, Mr. Speaker, of some of the officers of the house. The last time it was brought up by me, it was understood that it would be taken up again after the close of the debate on reciprocity, and I think no more fitting opportunity will offer than this. I desire to bring this question before the house in order to test the action by which you have discharged what you considered to be your duty as Speaker of this house, in dismissing and depriving the house of the services of three of the officers whom the house had appointed for its convenience and service. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I regret exceedingly that I feel myself obliged, in the discharge of what I conceive to be my duty, as a member of this house, to bring this matter up. Certainly, I think it is the duty of everyone in this house to endeavour to support the Chair in any decision given by the Chair; but if one finds himself obliged conscientiously to differ from the view which the Chair may have taken, it is only right that an opportunity should at once be given to test the question, to see whether the Speaker, under the circumstances, properly or improperly exercised his duty. In this instance, I must say at once that, in my humble judgment, at least, it seems to me that you have taken an erroneous view of the duty with which you were charged in your position as Speaker. I regret it all the more, because it seems to me that the step which you felt it your duty to take was one of extreme hardship to the officers who were dismissed. The officers who were dismissed from the service of the house were Ernest Tremblay, Rémi Tremblay, and A. E. Poirier. All three were translators of the debates of this house.

Then he went on to discuss the matter at length, and among others who participated in that debate was one who afterwards became a justice of the supreme court, Mr. Mills; another who afterwards became chief justice of the supreme court, the late Sir Louis Davies; and one who still survives, the chief justice of Ontario.

Sir John A. Macdonald took the view that under the provisions of the statute these men were properly dismissed because they had had an opportunity to be heard, and that the Speaker was within his rights in taking the action he did. He moved an amendment to the motion of Mr. Laurier condemning the action of the Speaker. The amendment was agreed to by a vote of 113 to 61, and there the matter ended.

There is a precedent that has been established by the high court of parliament. In the course of the debate Mr. Mills spoke of the hardships which the wives and children of these men suffered and of the protection which these men had a right to expect and which they did not receive, but I am not going to take up the time of the house in dealing further with that case.

Let me point out that this is not the first time the privileges of the house have been invaded. There was another occasion when it became necessary for Sir Wilfrid Laurier to support the privileges of parliament. I wonder if there are any in this house who have forgotten what took place in 1906. I wonder if those who were here then recall the circumstances in which Mr. Foster, facing a powerful administration largely supported in the house, complained of the language which was used against him and other members of parliament in a certain article that appeared in La Presse. When Mr. Foster moved that Mr. Cinq-Mars be brought to the bar of the house, many jokes were passed and there was much laughter. One hon. member said, "This farce must end." The Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, asked why he did not go to the courts, what he was doing there. He treated it in that very cavalier fashion. Finally when it came up at a later date, a member supporting the government moved a motion, which was seconded, that the next order of business be taken up, saying that the time of the house should not be wasted with this matter. What happened? Sir Wilfrid Laurier rose in his place—I commend to the younger members of this house the reading of his speech—and pointed out that the privileges of parliament must not be dealt with so lightly. Although his Minister of Justice had taken the view he had, although his supporters had moved and seconded the motion to which I refer, he himself moved an amendment declaring that Mr. Cinq-Mars must be censured; that he was open to reasonable and fair criticism. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was followed by Sir Robert Borden, whose speech I also commend to the younger members of this house.

The privileges of this house are in our keeping. Can we condone the action of Mr. Casgrain? I am asked to condone that action. I am asked to support his election as Speaker of the House of Commons. How can I do it in view of what I have read? How can I do it when he has defied the statutes of Canada? How can I do it when he has forgotten these privileges, forgotten our rights? How can I do it when he has trespassed upon our rights and wiped them out in the way in which he has? Can I do it?

I have no amendment to offer in the form of suggesting anyone as Speaker. One who in this house represents a minority to the extent to which I do could not do so, and should not do so. But I do say to the right hon. Prime Minister that I propose to vote against this motion. Out of that great body of support that he has of men of French descent, highly qualified and trained to fill this position, I ask that he select one who has the confidence of this house as a whole, one who has not transgressed these rules, one who has not violated these privileges, one who has not defied them by undertaking to do that which would be not only a usurpation on his part but a clear violation of the law. Here we find the sergeant-at-arms instructed by him to bring hardship and suffering into the homes of men who should not thus be touched, because the statute provides how they can be dealt with—by complaint. Can I and hon. members of this house be asked to support and condone that conduct? That is the question.

I regret, sir, that I am compelled to take this position, but I would be recreant to every trust that is imposed upon every hon. member of this house by a long series of acts and precedents if I did not direct attention to these circumstances. I am acquitting the government and the Prime Minister in particular of any connection with it. The small committee that was appointed to look into the matter took immediate action when the matter was brought to their attention. Acquitting them as I do of all fault, I suggest that the Prime Minister nominate one whom we can support with confidence and who we know will be impartial and will administer fairly the duties of his great office.

Sir, how can we contemplate the future in view of what has transpired? How can we contemplate Mr. Casgrain being Speaker of this house and dealing impartially with us? How is it possible to do it? I know the Prime Minister could not possibly change his mind with respect to Mr. Casgrain. For ten long years he has been his close associate, he has been his chief whip. Having given a promise to propose him to this House of Commons, my right hon. friend was bound to do so. For once in my life I have great sympathy with one who occupies the position which the Prime Minister does at this moment. In view of the circumstances to which I have alluded, I think Mr. Casgrain would have done the proper thing had he said to the Prime Minister: "In view of what has transpired, I feel that my name should not be placed in nomination." I think that would have been the sense of this house if the matter had been left quietly to hon. members. Notwithstanding what has been said to the effect that the choice is in the hands of the house, the fact remains that when the Prime Minister stands to vote, the house will take the view that they will condone this conduct and support the election of Mr. Casgrain to the chair. Although the votes against it may be few, nevertheless I think that if you had the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier here, if you had any of the great champions of the privileges and traditions of parliament here, you would not have this situation. We cannot stultify ourselves; we cannot condone conduct such as this, and make a precedent that will ring down through the years. No matter how difficult it may be, no matter how unfortunate and how unhappy it may be, we have to take this position. Sir, we cannot support the motion that has been made.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Beauchesne, I am sorry I have to crave the indulgence of the house for the purpose of saying two or three words in answer to the right hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bennett). It is not customary to hold a debate on an occasion such as this. In fact, it is not appropriate that there should be a debate, but I feel that part of what the right hon. gentleman has said must not be left unanswered. With the first part of his remarks I am heartily in agreement. Indeed I was pleasantly surprised to hear my right hon. friend say that this House of Commons was not an appendage of any government. When we on this side were occupying the seats now occupied by the friends of the right hon. gentleman we tried to teach that, and I am glad that he has carried his lesson over with him to the other side.

It is my privilege to have been in this House of Commons for thirty-two years. Today I begin the first session of my tenth parliament. I have had some experience in what has transpired every time there has been a change of administration, and on almost every occasion complaints have been made. These complaints have not always been made on the floor of the house because some leaders of the opposition thought it better not to do so. However, complaints have been made on almost every occasion. I remember the old parliament building where the Speaker had an apartment in which he lived with his family, and I can remember an hon. member who was to be nominated as speaker coming and installing himself and his family in the apartment in the House of Commons before he was elected. We criticized this at the time, but our leader did not think it would be a good thing to raise the matter in parliament.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I think, sir, that confusion always arises owing to the fact that there is not a Speaker to look after the work that must be organized for a session. Many of the employees are purely sessional; they are temporary and have to be summoned to come to work for the ensuing session.

Mr. BENNETT: I made no comment upon that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are not permanent employees, and somebody has to look after that part of the work. In theory, my right hon. friend is right; the Speaker to be elected has no authority until he is elected. But in practice it has always been done in this way, to my own knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT: Permanent employees?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I mean sessional employees.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another thing.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I mean the organization of the work of the session by a staff—

Mr. BENNETT: I admitted that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —to be appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: I admitted that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course, the Speaker to be elected is not yet appointed. But, as my right hon. friend has said, the press usually mentions his name, and when that name is the name of a man who is so well qualified as my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain), it is no wonder that members of parliament and other persons who have someone to recommend send in these names to the gentleman to be elected. Well, would it surprise you, Mr. Beauchesne, would it surprise the members of the house if I said that my right hon. friend himself wired the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, recommending somebody to be appointed?

Mr. BENNETT: I had a note upon my papers to make a statement with regard to a former employee of the leader of the opposition, later employed by the Speaker of the house. I sent a telegram to Mr. Casgrain. She was to be a temporary employee, of course, on the sessional staff. I have said, and I repeat, I concede the right of Mr. Casgrain to organize the sessional staff. What I was dealing with—and I made that clear—was his dismissal of 127 persons not sessional employees.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not blame my right hon. friend for having sent that wire; and surely the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay paid him only a very ordinary courtesy in putting on a list the name of the lady recommended by my right hon. friend. And though Mr. Casgrain was not Speaker at the time, it was appropriate that he should do so, in the case of that person, as with respect to all those who were recommended by other members of the house. I think it is but a tempest in a teapot.

As regards employees, sessional or otherwise, who may have received or may receive notice that their services will not be required in the future, may I say that personally I do not favour dismissals, and it is always a difficult thing to do. But in some instances—and it has happened to my own knowledge in my department and in my own city of Quebec—where men were dismissed three or four years ago merely on political grounds, and have been waiting for four years to get common justice and to be reinstated in their positions, I say that I will recommend such men. It is also to my knowledge, Mr. Beauchesne, that most frequently the people who are louder than others in the bitterness of their complaints are men who were instrumental two or three years ago in having some people dismissed so that they might get their jobs.

I believe that when the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is regularly appointed Speaker of the House of Commons, as he will be in a few minutes, he will certainly exercise all the impartiality, the discretion and the tact which is necessary for the fulfilment of the duties of his office in the supervision of the staff of the house as well as in the observance of the rules.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Beauchesne, much as I regret having to do so, I feel that in this matter I must associate myself with the protest of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I do so in the full recognition of the fact that the little group I have associated with me, not having occupied office, cannot be charged with anything like a similar offence in the past.

I rather regret that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) with his great legal acumen, should have tried to make light of the charges which have been brought forward by the leader of the opposition, and has entirely evaded the issue. The matter is not one of temporary employees; the matter is one of permanent employees. Further than that, the minister would try to make out that the dismissal was for cause. I ask, why wholesale notices of dismissal? Moreover, if there was real cause for dismissal, why were these notices countermanded? That is an important question.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) emphasized the fact, at the beginning of his speech, that the choice of Speaker was the choice of the House of Commons. I think perhaps the position taken by the Minister of Justice, in view of that statement, was hardly a worthy one, that the choice of the government was to be pushed through at whatever cost and under any circumstances at all. The fact that the Prime Minister suggests that the choice is the choice of the commons implies that we are under a certain obligation and should have some voice at this time as to whether or not we consider the nominee suitable. If we pass this matter over in silence, then undoubtedly we shall be regarded by the general public as condoning something which has shocked the people of Canada.

There is no doubt whatever that Mr. Casgrain has many of the qualities which would admirably fit him for the position of Speaker. He knows the rules, that is quite true, or he should after all these years. He undoubtedly is a bilinguist and, I agree, that is an immense asset for the office he is to fill. I am not quite so sure, however, that the fact that he is a lawyer is an outstanding qualification. Some of us who are not lawyers sometimes wish that we had in the chair someone who does not belong to that profession. However, we admit many of his qualifications.

The Prime Minister went on to say that the occupant of the office must have fairness and impartiality, that he must be a protector of the rights of individual members. Further than that, he must leave partisanship behind him. Judged by the very criteria laid down by the Prime Minister I am not at all sure that the nominee possesses these qualifications. In this matter at least he has not shown fairness and impartiality; he has not been the protector of certain rights of some members of the staff of this house, and certainly he has not given any indication that he is leaving behind him a partisan spirit. I recognize that it may be extremely difficult for a man to resign the post of chief whip of a party and at one jump accept the more or less judicial position of Speaker of this house. But in any case I think we should have a statement from the Prime Minister dealing with the actual occurrences of the last week or two, and further we should have the assurance of the Prime Minister himself that no such action as this will be tolerated in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Beauchesne, I should like to say just a word to hon. members before the debate is concluded, first of all to remind them that the house is not yet constituted. In the course of his remarks my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) dealt at considerable length with what had taken place in parliament under previous administrations. He referred to discussions that had arisen as to the manner in which the Speaker had performed his duties and mentioned investigations or criticisms that had been made of the way in which the commissioners of internal economy had conducted affairs. All that my right hon. friend said, however, had reference to what had happened after parliament itself had assembled and the House of Commons had been constituted. What I should like to make perfectly clear to hon. members at this stage, is that we are assembled here simply as recently elected members of parliament, and that until a Speaker is chosen the house will not be duly constituted or in a position to conduct proceedings of any kind. Even if I wished to do so, I could not now act in the manner my right hon. friend has suggested I should act, namely give assurances on behalf of the government as to what action will be taken in the House of Commons later on, when it is properly organized.

As all hon. members well know, the practice has been for the Speaker of the House of Commons to continue in office for certain purposes until a new Speaker is chosen.

Mr. BENNETT: It is provided by statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is provided by statute. As my right hon. friend well knows, the Speaker who was in office when he was Prime Minister has not been returned as a member of the House of Commons and, so far as I know, has not been in Ottawa since the general election. Had the Speaker been here, it is quite possible that the privileges of the house, which my right hon. friend says have been so much violated, might have been protected to a greater degree than he says they were. I just point out that fact as a circumstance which hon. members might wish to take into account.

I take no exception whatever to the right hon. leader of the opposition and to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) drawing attention, as they have, to something that occurred before parliament itself met. I would, however, ask hon. members at this time, before voting on the election of the Speaker, not to judge the hon. member whom I have nominated by anything that may have taken place before parliament was in session at all and before he became Speaker, but rather to withhold judgment until he is actually in the chair. May I add that if I had not the utmost confidence in what I believe will be the impartiality and fair play of the gentleman whom I have nominated, I would not for one moment think of urging the house to take action immediately. I have, however, no hesitancy in saying that I believe that, once in the chair, Mr. Casgrain will be a worthy successor to those hon. members who have filled the high office of Speaker with great dignity and impartiality.

Mr. BENNETT: Debate is quite permissible on this matter. In 1852 the debate lasted a very long time, and many members spoke; the same thing occurred in 1895. In view of the observations that have been made by the right hon. Prime Minister I am content that this motion should be carried on division. I thank the right hon. gentleman for the assurance he has given, that notwithstanding the fact that the house is not organized he feels certain that minorities may look for reasonable protection and impartial administration of the rules, written and unwritten, that govern the conduct and decorum of this chamber. That, however, has nothing to do with the breach of the privileges of the house which certainly must be considered by a committee in due course and which I will see is brought to the attention of the house. When the question is put I am content that it should be carried on division, in view of the statement which the right hon. gentleman has, if I may say so, quite properly made to this chamber.

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, on division, and Hon. Pierre-François Casgrain, member for the electoral district of Charlevoix-Saguenay, duly elected to the chair of the house.

Hon. Mr. Casgrain was conducted from his seat in the house to the Speaker's chair by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT said: Ladies and gentlemen of the House of Commons, it is with a real sense of gratitude that I accept, in all humility, the bestowal of this high honour. Yet, gratitude is here tinged with anxiety. So many distinguished gentlemen have graced this chair that I would falter before the prospect of succeeding them were I not, while truly conscious of my own unworthiness, given assurance by my knowledge of the genuinely fair and considerate attitude of my honourable colleagues in this house.

Strengthened, therefore, by your enlightened advice and counsel; guided by the wise decisions of my eminent predecessors I dare hope to preside over the proceedings of this august assembly with impartiality and justice, to uphold British parliamentary traditions, to be, in truth, your worthy spokesman.

Long years of service in parliament have enriched my life with many precious and lasting friendships. I fully trust the future will bring the same pleasant experience with those welcome ones who, to-day for the first time, have crossed the threshold of this chamber.

I thank you most sincerely for this abiding testimonial of esteem and confidence, for the great honour you do me. It will be my unremitting endeavour to prove myself deserving of your trust. Ever mindful of your gracious cooperation, I shall strive always to discharge the duties of the speakership in a manner properly befitting the revered traditions of this exalted office.

Mesdames et messieurs de la Chambre des communes, c'est avec une profonde reconnaissance que j'accepte le haut poste que vous daignez me confier, mais ce n'est pas sans crainte. Tant d'hommes distingués ont occupé ce fauteuil avant moi que j'hésiterais à leur succéder si, conscient de mon peu de mérite, je ne savais que je puis compter sur votre générosité, sur votre droiture, sur votre sympathie. Eclairé de vos avis, aidé de vos sages conseils et guidé par les décisions de mes prédécesseurs, j'ose espérer que je réussirai à diriger avec impartialité et justice les délibérations de cette Chambre, à maintenir les traditions parlementaires britanniques, à vous représenter dignement.

Les nombreuses années que j'ai passées dans cette enceinte m'ont valu de précieuses, de solides amitiés et j'entends bien former avec les nouveaux élus des relations tout aussi amicales.

Je vous remercie bien sincèrement de l'honneur que vous me faites et de la grande marque d'estime et de confiance dont vous me donnez le témoignage. Je tâcherai de m'en rendre digne en remplissant, selon la tradition et avec le haut sentiment de ma responsabilité, les devoirs de ma charge.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move, seconded by Mr. Lapointe (Quebec-East), that the house do now adjourn.

Some hon. MEMBERS: To what time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hour is fixed by the rules. It is three o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 1.50 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate chamber at 3 p.m. on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber. Then the Hon. Pierre-François Casgrain, Speaker-elect, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons whose servant I am.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House, then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the throne.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to state that the house having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker, had fallen upon me, and, in your names, and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I meet you under the shadow of the loss which Canada, in common with all parts of the empire, has sustained in the death of our late beloved Sovereign, King George V. The sorrow so universally expressed is but one of the many evidences of the great regard in which his late Majesty was held by all men and nations. In no part of the King's dominions has the sense of national and personal loss been more deeply felt than in Canada. King George's patience and wisdom, his example of courage and devotion to duty, throughout a reign of unparalleled anxieties, will be held in all our memories as a great heritage.

I join with you in extending profound sympathy in their bereavement to King Edward VIII, Her Majesty Queen Mary, and all the members of the Royal Family. Toward the new King there already exists, on the part of the people of Canada, a feeling of personal attachment and affection, occasioned by His Majesty's visits to this country, and the many friendships and wide acquaintances formed during the years he was known to us all as the Prince of Wales. To these sentiments will now be added in increasing measure those of loyalty and devotion.

I am profoundly sensible of the great honour of having been chosen as the king's representative in Canada. I am pleased that my meeting with the members of both houses should be at the beginning of the first session of the eighteenth parliament. It is with the greatest pleasure that I look forward to the associations of the next few years.

The seriousness of the international situation has contributed to the world's anxieties. My ministers are confident that they express the conviction of the people of Canada in adhering to the aims and ideals of the League of Nations, and in seeking, in unison with members of the league as well as with other nations, to support by all appropriate and practical means the maintenance of peace, and the establishment of a world order based on justice and equity.

Unemployment continues to be Canada's most urgent national problem. While there is an increase in the number of persons employed, the number of those on relief shows no abatement.

As a means of dealing with present emergency conditions, you will be asked, with the approval of the governments of all the provinces of Canada, to make provision for the establishment of a representative national commission, which will co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed, and the supervision of unemployment relief. The commission, which will be assisted by a representative advisory committee, will aim at effecting nation-wide co-operative effort toward increasing opportunities of gainful employment.

Transfer of the camps established for the care of single homeless men from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Labour, is in process of being effected. Every effort will be made to close the camps altogether at as early a date as expanding employment opportunities permit.

A royal commission has been appointed to inquire into conditions in the textile industry, as the result of the closing down on January 18 of one of the textile plants in the city of Sherbrooke, thereby occasioning, in midwinter, and at a time of unemployment, great hardship to hundreds of employees and their families. My ministers are of the opinion that industries should recognize an obligation to cooperate in every manner possible in continuing and providing employment, and that labour and consumers have a right to have their voice heard, and influence felt, in the control of industrial policy. Where these ends cannot be effected through voluntary cooperation of all parties to industry, my ministers are of the opinion that there are the strongest of reasons for state intervention.

With a view of safeguarding the interests of consumers a full inquiry will be instituted into representations which continue to be made respecting monopolistic control of the importation and distribution of anthracite coal.

In order to determine the question of their validity, reference has been made to the Supreme Court of Canada of a number of measures enacted at the last session of parliament.

I am happy to be able to inform you that a trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America was concluded on Armistice Day, 1935, and that the trade dispute with Japan, which had seriously affected the trade of both countries, was adjusted before the end of the old year.

The Canada-United States trade agreement will be submitted for your approval. You will also be forthwith advised of the basis on which normal trade relations between Canada and Japan have been restored.

My ministers believe that the Canada-United States agreement will mark a great improvement in Canada's international economic relations; also, that the principles embodied in this agreement, extended and applied with vigour and determination, will contribute to the reversal of the trend toward extreme economic nationalism, which has been undermining standards of living, and embittering relations between countries all over the world.

You will be pleased to know that the policy of the Canadian Wheat Board in selling wheat at competitive prices is bringing satisfactory results.

A conference between the dominion government and the governments of the provinces of Canada was held at Ottawa during the month of December. Continuing committees have since carried on consideration of the more important subjects discussed.

Among matters arising out of the conference, which will be submitted for your consideration, will be a proposal for amending the British North America Act, 1867, in order to provide for certain financial arrangements between the dominion and the provinces. A committee of dominion and provincial representatives, appointed by the dominion-provincial conference, is engaged in the consideration of a method and procedure for effecting constitutional amendments.

It is proposed to restore to parliament its control over taxation and expenditure by ending all measures which have deprived members of the House of Commons of this control, and which have served to invest the executive with unwarranted arbitrary powers.

Every effort will be made to substitute stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs laws.

The control of credit, and the issue of currency, being public matters of direct concern to every citizen, it is intended, at the present session, to ask parliament to make such changes in the ownership and control of the Bank of Canada, as may be necessary to give to the government a predominant interest in the ownership as well as effective control of the bank.

You will be asked to consider amendments to existing legislation respecting the Canadian National Railways, which will serve to afford a greater measure of governmental authority and responsibility to parliament.

It is proposed to make the present position of radio broadcasting in Canada the subject of inquiry by a special committee of the House of Commons.

Steps have already been taken with respect to the reorganization and consolidation of government services, which it is believed will further their efficiency and effect much needed economies. These will be supplemented by legislative measures to which your attention will be invited.

A reduction from twenty-one to sixteen has been made in the number of ministers of the crown.

A bill to provide for the creation of parliamentary secretaryships will be submitted for your consideration.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts of the last fiscal year and the estimates for the coming year will be submitted for your consideration.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful consideration to the important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreeed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Casselman, Elliott, Mackenzie (Vancouver), Power and Woodsworth, be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house, under standing order 63.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable T. A. Crerar, Minister of the Interior, the Honourable Charles A. Dunning, Minister of Finance, the Honourable W. D. Euler, Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Honourable Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to present the report of the joint librarians of parliament.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move the adjournment of the house, but before doing so may I say to my right hon. friend opposite (Mr. Bennett) and to other members of the house that it is the intention of the government to reserve to-morrow for the consideration of the address to be presented to His Majesty King Edward VIII expressing our sympathy with His Majesty and also our loyalty and devotion, and a resolution of condolence to Her Majesty Queen Mary. This will be the only order of business for to-morrow. As hon. members know, the rules of the house require forty-eight hours' notice of any resolution, but the rules are there for the convenience of hon. members, and not to restrict them unduly. I am sure the consent of the house will be given to permit of notice of the resolutions being handed to the clerk this afternoon so that they may appear on what will be the order paper for to-morrow. It will be arranged that members have copies of the resolutions before the debate takes place. I would ask that consent be given that the rule of the house with respect to the time within which notice must be given, be in this instance suspended.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would make a motion to that effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend suggests that a formal motion might be made to that effect. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Lapointe (Quebec-East), that to-morrow the house take into consideration a resolution of sympathy and loyalty to His Majesty King Edward VIII, and a resolution of condolence to Her Majesty Queen Mary, and that standing order No. 45 with respect to notices of motions be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.20 p.m.

Friday, February 7, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

DEATH OF KING GEORGE V

MOTION FOR HUMBLE ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VIII—MESSAGE OF CONDOLENCE TO HER MAJESTY QUEEN MARY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move the resolutions of which I gave notice yesterday. The text of both resolutions appears upon the order paper. I shall propose two motions, each of which my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has kindly consented to second. For the convenience of the house the motions will be dealt with as one in the speeches that will be made.

In the last session of the last parliament, members of all parties in the House of Commons united in extending to His Majesty King George V, and to Her Majesty the Queen, the congratulations of the House of Commons of Canada upon the celebration by His Majesty of the silver jubilee of His Majesty's accession to the throne. A new parliament has since come into being. A new king is to-day upon the throne.

In the first session of this new parliament, as recently elected members, it is our duty, on behalf of those we represent, as, indeed, it is also our sad privilege, to convey to His Majesty King Edward VIII the expression of our profound sorrow at the bereavement His Majesty has sustained in the death of his beloved father, our late sovereign, King George V, and to express to His Majesty our own personal allegiance and loyalty; also to express our heartfelt sympathy to Her Majesty Queen Mary.

In the tributes paid His late Majesty on the occasion of the completion of the twenty-fifth year of his reign, there will be found the silver lining to the cloud of the world's sorrow to-day. It may truly be said of mortals, be their station high or low, that kindly words to the living are better far than many eulogies of the dead. There must be consolation in the heart of Queen Mary, in the heart of King Edward, as there is in our own hearts, that all that could be said to-day was said at that time, and said to better effect, and that, long before his earthly life drew to its close, King George knew how greatly he was beloved by all his subjects, and how universally esteemed he was by all men and nations.

At the close of the day there will often be seen, at the distant horizon in our Canadian skies, that silver light "that never was on sea or land," as the sun, in a blaze of glory, sinks to its rest. Such, it seems to me, will be the world's memory of the passing of our sailor king, as he left these shores for others beyond our ken.

I would not venture, in the presence of a sorrow so manifest as that we have witnessed in all parts of the world, to add anything at this time to the expression of our own grief. Nor shall I seek to repeat what was said in this house, and elsewhere throughout the empire, less than a year ago, and which has found new and deeper meaning in the events of the past few weeks. I shall content myself with expressing on behalf of the parliament of Canada, in common with other parliaments of the empire, our warm appreciation of the tributes paid our late sovereign by those in authority and others in foreign countries, making special mention, as having reference to our immediate neighbour, of the many fine tributes paid the memory of King George by the president, the press, and the people, of the United States. International feeling has never found nobler expression, nor have foreign nations come at any time into more friendly touch with our own, than in the sincerity and depth of the sympathy they have shown with the nations of the British Commonwealth in their sorrow and loss.

May I say just a word of the personality of King George V, and of our sympathy with Her Majesty Queen Mary, also of what seems to me to have been of greatest significance in His late Majesty's life and reign.

It is impossible, I believe, to overestimate what we owe, and indeed, what the world owes, to the personality and personal example and endeavours of King George. Had His Majesty been a different type of person, the course of current events in Britain and elsewhere throughout the empire might also have been vastly different. It was what King George was as a man, that accounts most for what he was as a king. His personality permeated all he said and did, and left its glow upon his words and actions. He was intensely human, simple and natural in his tastes, gentle and kind in disposition. He liked best those things which contribute most to human happiness—the joys of home, the companionship of friends, the quiet of the countryside. Sandringham meant much more to him than Buckingham Palace or Windsor Castle. In private and in public life he was highly honourable. He stood for rectitude. He had a profound sense of duty, and he reverenced truth and justice. Above all, he was "benignly vested with humility"; and he possessed that gift, which God alone can bestow, "a wise and an understanding heart."

There is something which will appeal to all men in the incident narrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury to his congregation only a few evenings ago. His Grace told them of a conversation he had had with the late king at the time of the silver jubilee, after its celebrations were over. His Majesty said to the Archbishop, "I cannot understand it all" —referring to the overwhelming outburst of public tributes that he had received—"I cannot understand it all, for after all I am only a very ordinary sort of fellow." There was something even more appealing, profoundly moving, indeed, in the words which we ourselves heard as we listened to the last of the king's messages, the one given by His Majesty from Sandringham on Christmas day. Referring to the silver jubilee rejoicings and the personal link between himself and the people, which he said he valued more than all else, King George also said: "How can I fail to note in all the rejoicing, not merely respect for the throne, but the warm and generous praise for the man himself who, may God help him, has been placed upon it."

It was the man thus revealed amid the trappings of royalty, and unspoiled by the pomp and pageantry of palaces and courts, which caused King George to be so deeply beloved. It was that which, in the words of His Excellency our new Governor General, will cause him to live in history as "a king who came closer than any other monarch to the hearts of his subjects." I believe it may truly be said that there never was a better king.

Here may I pause to say that, while King George's was a wonderful life, made great through real character, His Majesty was ever the first to acknowledge how much his power and influence for good was due to and enhanced by the beneficent influence of Her Majesty Queen Mary.

The life partnership of the queen meant everything to the late king. She was ever at his side in sickness and in health. Together they shared, for forty-two years, the joys and sorrows of married life, and for over a quarter of a century, the great responsibilities of the throne. By untiring devotion to duty, and self-sacrificing lives, they ever sought to give expression to their love for the people and their desire to serve.

In her great sorrow, the queen may well be comforted by the knowledge of what, throughout his life and reign, her tender ministrations and loving companionship meant to the late king. There should be comfort, as well, in the thought that the love of the people for the king was inseparable from that of their love for the queen.

In her sorrow and loss, I think I may honestly say that there is felt, for Her Majesty Queen Mary, by every member of this house, a personal sympathy which it would be impossible to express in words.

Of the contributions made, to the period of his reign, by King George's personality, and His Majesty's personal endeavours, the most apparent was that towards the unity and good will of all parts of the great empire over which he reigned.

The contribution began with His Majesty's early life at sea, and his subsequent visits to the outlying dominions and India. It was developed, after his accession to the throne, by the catholicity of His Majesty's interests and his close identification with the varied activities of the people. It received heightened emphasis in his immediate contacts with members of the defence forces, at the time of the great war. It was a constant factor at all the great conferences in London.

This contribution found its widest and most intimate expression in the addresses King George made to his subjects at the time of His Majesty's recovery from his severe illness six years ago, and as I have already indicated, in radio broadcasts delivered from time to time, and, more particularly on Christmas day, in the last two years. It was at these times that we all heard for ourselves His Majesty's voice, and were made to feel the friendliness and tenderness of his nature. We gained a new consciousness of the nearness of our relationship to each other, because of our deeply cherished common relationship to him. We felt ourselves drawn together as members of one great family, as he sought to have us share with him the joys and sorrows of his personal life, and as he pictured to us his conception of empire in terms of the loyalties of home and the affection of family ties.

A second great contribution, a contribution closely allied to the one first mentioned, was that made towards the position and permanency of monarchy. In the wise and conciliatory manner in which King George dealt with the serious problems which confronted him at the time of his accession, he won the immediate confidence of his ministers. This, during his reign, he never lost. While ministers and governments changed, all alike found in him a wise counsellor and friend. By the steadfast way in which, throughout his reign, King George upheld constitutional government, he won the confidence of parliaments and the people. All knew and felt that he would seek to see that government was carried on without fear or favour to any interest or class. Thus it was that under King George, monarchy and democracy were not only reconciled, but became allied in an effort to preserve what was best in both.

The events of King George's reign—the political and social unrest, a long war, and a difficult peace—were such that with a less wise and less popular sovereign, the throne itself might constantly have been in jeopardy. As it was, notwithstanding far-reaching constitutional and parliamentary changes, and swift and unprecedented change in the organization of human society, the British monarchy grew in public confidence and in international prestige.

There was another equally great contribution made to his day and generation by King George, through his personality and personal endeavours. It was the contribution of more in the way of a spirit of good will and mutual helpfulness between persons of all ranks and classes; a wider recognition of the common human lot.

Having regard to the troubled and unsettled nature of the times in which he lived, and in which we continue to live—to the changing social order—I believe it is impossible to overestimate the value of this contribution. King George, himself, saw in it not only the surest method of maintaining the blessing of peace, but the only means of effectively solving the economic ills which beset us. He hoped that the spirit of mutual helpfulness would grow and spread. By word and by example, he did all in his power to foster and develop it.

There is one more contribution which King George's personality and personal endeavours made to the world of his day of which I should like to speak. It constituted, I believe, the supreme aim of his life. It was the promotion of friendship among all men and all nations. In the quarter of a century during which he reigned, it was given King George to witness more of war, of strife, and of unrest than the world had known in any corresponding period of time, or, indeed, at any time. Perhaps this, more than any other reason, caused him to stress so strongly the importance of human friendships, and to believe that friendly relations with all nations should constitute the cornerstone of British foreign policy.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Whatever the cause, it was friendship between the peoples of different countries, and friendly relations between nations, that His Majesty sought most to keep before his own peoples and foreign states. This aim was expressed in deeply impressive words in the message of thanksgiving cabled to all parts of the empire in the spring of 1929, when King George referred to the sympathy shown him by unknown friends, in many countries, at the time of his illness.

> "I long to believe," His Majesty said, "it is possible that experiences such as mine may soon appear no longer exceptional: when the national anxieties of all peoples of the world shall be felt as a common source of human sympathy and a common claim on human friendship."

Even more impressive, as being a part of the king's last message, from which I have already quoted, were the words we heard expressed with so much feeling as we listened to his voice on Christmas day. Let me recall those words:—

> In Europe, and in many parts of the world, anxieties surround us. It is good to think that our own family of peoples is at peace with itself and united in one desire to be at peace with other nations—a friend of all, an enemy of none.

"A friend of all, an enemy of none." In these words we find the life purpose of our late king. It was the image he sought to impress on the nations of the British commonwealth, as clearly and distinctly as his own royal effigy is stamped upon their coinage. How largely he succeeded in fulfilling the great purpose of his life is apparent in the tributes which have been paid his memory by peoples of all races and climes, and by every nation under the sun.

"A friend of all, an enemy of none." It is, as such, that, throughout all time, King George will be remembered. What comparable epitaph has found its place upon a royal tomb!

Here we may well take our leave of him whom we knew and loved so well, and with thankful as well as loyal hearts hasten to declare our allegiance to our new king.

There are many reasons why we may with confidence welcome the accession of Edward VIII to the throne of his ancestors. The new king comes of a royal family which has inherited and been true to great traditions of public service. Many of us still vividly recall the passing of Queen Victoria. Four years before her death she had celebrated the diamond jubilee of her accession to the throne. Most of the generation of that day had known no other sovereign. It seemed, at that moment, as if the British throne would never again have so revered and illustrious a sovereign. That was thirty-five years ago. Since that time the son and the grandson of Queen Victoria have occupied the throne, and each has left a memory revered, not by British peoples only, but by all men and nations.

The death of Queen Victoria occurred between the dissolution in Canada of one parliament and the convening of another. By a rather remarkable coincidence, the first day of the meeting of the new parliament after the death of Queen Victoria—Canada's ninth parliament—was, as has been the first day of this the eighteenth parliament, on the 6th of February. Speaking, in 1901, as I am now speaking to the newly assembled members of the House of Commons, the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, referring to the new king, also Edward by name, declared that he who was a wise prince would be a wise king; that the policies which had made the British empire so great under his predecessor would also be his policies, and that the reign of King Edward VII would be simply a continuation of the reign of Queen Victoria.

In expressing our feelings toward our new king, I can think of no words more appropriate than words similar to those used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in reference to Edward VII. He who has been so beloved as a prince, will, we believe, be beloved in even greater measure as a king. We believe that the policies which have made for unity and friendship under his predecessor will also be his policies, and that the reign of King Edward VIII will be simply a continuation of the reign of King George V.

In his first public utterance as sovereign, Edward VIII declared to his privy council that he was determined to follow in his father's footsteps in upholding constitutional government, and in working for the happiness and welfare of all classes of his subjects. These words His Majesty repeated in a message to the British House of Commons, written in his own hand, and which contained, as well, a reference to the manner in which King George was ever actuated by a profound sense of duty.

We did not need to be thus assured that it would be King Edward's determination to follow in the way his father had set before him. Along more paths than one he has already followed in his father's footsteps. There is scarcely a part of the British empire King Edward did not visit during the years he was known to us all as the Prince of Wales. His knowledge of the empire and its problems is infinitely greater than was that of King George at the time he came to the throne. His personal friendships with his subjects are vastly more numerous. He is no stranger to government or matters of state. Time and again he has taken his part as representative of the crown on ceremonial and other occasions, and in all parts of the world. The British peoples in different parts of the world had come to look upon him, in his visits to foreign countries, as their ambassador at large. King Edward VIII comes to the throne to-day with a wide knowledge of his people and their problems.

Nor can there be any mistaking King Edward's deep interest in social problems, or his desire for friendship with all men and nations. All who have followed his career know that he has much at heart the condition of those whose struggle is against poverty and adversity. His visits to the industrial areas, his interest in the housing problem, his desire to rid the cities of Britain of their slums, his advocacy of other forms of social betterment and social service, speak for themselves. What he saw of war in France and Flanders, and, even more, what he knows of the legacies it has left, have given him a passionate desire for peace. To the interest and power manifested in these directions as Prince of Wales will now be added the authority and prestige of the throne.

It is not the new king's part in government, so much as our own, that, it seems to me, calls for concern at this time. That King Edward has a profound sense of duty, and that he will uphold constitutional government, and that at all times he will have uppermost the welfare and happiness of all classes of his subjects, there is not the least doubt. It must not be forgotten, however, that terrible as were many of the years of King George's reign, King Edward has come to the throne at what may yet be seen to be the most critical and difficult period in the history of the world.

Constitutional government, while it places great responsibilities upon a sovereign, places even heavier responsibilities upon his advisers. An ill-advised word, an error in judgment on the part of those in authority, may, in times like the present, precipitate the most appalling of situations. King Edward himself has foreseen this. He made it plain at the moment he was proclaimed king. Having given his pledge to uphold constitutional government, and to work for the happiness and welfare of all classes of his subjects, His Majesty concluded his address to his privy council in the following words:

I place my reliance upon the loyalty and affection of my people throughout the empire, and upon the wisdom of their parliaments, to support me in this heavy task, and I pray that God will guide me to perform it.

"The wisdom of their parliaments!" This is now the recognized foundation on which rests, not only the security of the crown, but the security of the peoples of the British commonwealth. Who will say that it may not constitute the security of human society and civilization?

As members of one of the parliaments of the empire, well may we join with our new sovereign in praying that God will guide us in the performance of our task.

With these words, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Bennett, that a humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:

To The King's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to express our deep sympathy with Your Majesty in the affliction and loss you have sustained by the death of the late King, Your Majesty's beloved Father.

Your Majesty's sorrow is shared by the people of this dominion, whose representatives we are. King George V, by His fidelity to duty, His public service, and His constant endeavour to advance the well-being and happiness of all classes, had greatly endeared Himself to His Canadian subjects. We remember with gratitude His unremitting efforts to secure friendship and peace among the nations of the world. In common with all parts of the empire, we shall ever deeply cherish His memory.

We welcome Your Majesty's accession to the throne of your ancestors. We desire, in so doing, to express to you our loyalty and devotion. It is our firm conviction that Your Majesty will ever seek to promote the happiness and to protect the liberties of all your people. As members of the parliament of Canada, we wish to assure Your Majesty that, in the discharge of these great responsibilities, it is our desire and determination to uphold and support Your Majesty, to the utmost of our authority and wisdom.

I would also move, seconded by Mr. Bennett, that the following message of condolence be sent to Her Majesty Queen Mary:

Your Majesty:

We, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, respectfully beg leave to tender to Your Majesty our heartfelt sympathy in your great sorrow and bereavement. We share Your Majesty's grief and loss in the passing of our late sovereign, King George V, who was greatly beloved by all his subjects.

We pray that, at this time, Your Majesty may be comforted and sustained by the remembrance of what your loving companionship meant to the late King throughout his life and reign; by memories of service shared; and by the sympathy and love that everywhere surrounds Your Majesty in your great sorrow.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the observations made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) represent the heartfelt expression of opinion of this house. He speaks not as the chief of a great party, but as the leader of the House of Commons, and lengthy observations on my part should therefore be unnecessary. But tradition necessitates my making at least a few observations on behalf of those who sit with me, and are affiliated with me politically, so that we may be associated with what has been said.

I do not suppose that in the history of our institutions as we have them there has ever been any such manifestation of popular emotion as that which followed the death of His Majesty King George V. In city, town and hamlet, and in remote sections of the prairie, men and women regarded the death of King George as a personal sorrow. So far as I have been able to read, never before has it been given to a sovereign to touch the hearts of the people as did King George V. As one observer has said, it is difficult to express the reasons why, but on the other hand it is not difficult to understand the causes.

The late king might well be said to have been the hereditary president of our empire. He was closely in touch with his people. When he succeeded to the throne, having travelled over every part of his vast empire, having circumnavigated the globe before he was heir apparent to the throne and having served in the navy with great distinction, he was acquainted with every part of his vast dominions. When he ascended the throne, he asked the people to permit him to follow in his father's footsteps, and he referred to the great anxiety of King Edward VII to ameliorate the conditions of his people. At that time, when our late king had ascended the throne, the duties of the sovereign were defined as safeguarding the treasures of the past and preparing the path of the future. All the glories, all the achievements, all the security of law and order, all the developments of ages—these treasures had to be safeguarded. But with changed conditions, with the growth of a new democracy, with the extension of the franchise, with the balance of power changed from what it had been, a new path had to be made; that pathway had to be prepared. Such was the obligation of the new sovereign.

I wonder if for a moment one could contemplate what has transpired since then? Shortly after his accession to the throne he had to deal with complex constitutional problems, the like of which no former sovereign had had to consider, although his father had dealt with them in part. Later, and only very shortly after his accession to the throne, the most desolating war of all the ages came upon us. In its aftermath we had a long, long struggle to get back to prosperity. We were faced with the necessity of a readjustment of our conditions, and painful effort to overcome the difficult situation that had been brought about. In all this the king was not only the head of the state but the inspired leader of his people, the wise and sagacious statesman, the man of broad vision who saw beyond the narrow confines of the day and who looked into the long to-morrows. In the industrial centres, in the great and teeming population he laid the foundation of affection and regard which made possible the development, the safeguarding, the securing upon a permanent basis of those institutions of ours as we have them to-day. What an achievement! The safeguarding of the treasures of the past, proving that it was not inconsistent with the maintenance of the great dignity of kingship to maintain the closest touch with the people in the freest democracy of the world. Never have men's liberties been more amply secured, never has freedom been upon a broader base than in the United Kingdom during recent years. This achievement, while it has been in no small measure attributable to the prescience of wise statesmen, must always in the last analysis be attributed to the dispassionate attitude of the sovereign, far removed from political parties, free from the partisanship of contending chiefs of parties in the state, and concerned wholly with the happiness, welfare and well-being of his people.

He had his reward, for when King George passed beyond, never was a throne more firmly established or more securely supported by the people's will; it had survived the struggles of the war, the internecine strife of parties following upon that great conflict; it had survived the days when the struggle for prosperity was still in the minds of the people and had emerged stronger, more enduring, than ever in its whole history. And so as he passed to his reward our late king was sure that he had preserved the treasures of the past and was able to hand on to his successor a priceless legacy, a legacy which cannot be defined in words, a legacy which he himself enriched by his toil, by his vision, and by his appreciation of his responsibilities.

The pathway of the future must be prepared. The statute of Westminster has secured for the autonomous dominions overseas an equality of status with the motherland herself, an equality in every particular in matters affecting domestic and foreign policies, all owing allegiance to the same crown and associated together in the commonwealth of nations. So far as we in this parliament are concerned, we may indeed say that constitutionally the pathway of the future has been prepared.

I should like particularly to associate myself with what was said by the right hon. the Prime Minister as to the terrible obligation and responsibility—and I use the word "terrible" advisedly—that rests upon the parliament of this senior dominion of that great overseas empire, a responsibility the contemplation of which is calculated almost to overwhelm one. Sometimes it well might be that a chance word, a wrong attitude of mind, a lack of appreciation and understanding, perhaps a desire to serve an immediate purpose, political or otherwise, might involve considerations of the greatest moment not to Canada alone but to every part of the British commonwealth of nations, and thus affect the welfare and peace and happiness of the whole world.

The predominant aim of the late king, as he himself has said, was to maintain constitutional government in all its strength and power. Many a time his advisers have not been slow to tell us that we have had a closer appreciation and understanding of advice given to our sovereign, and of action taken by him than we have ever had in any other age in our history. One cannot but realize that at times there have been acute differences of opinion between the sovereign and his advisers; but never was there a moment when the sovereign, having considered and discussed these matters with his ministers, did not follow the constitutional course of giving effect to the advice he had received. Frequently he was able to modify the views that were expressed. Frequently he was able by discussion and argument to convince those who were his advisers that other courses than those contemplated should be taken, but always in the end the action taken was the action of his ministers.

His influence we cannot to-day appraise. We should not attempt it; it will be for history to determine that. We are too near the picture. But this we do know, that those who had to deal with him in matters of state and those who from time to time had discussions with him of problems affecting the welfare of one-quarter of the world's population were unanimous in the view that he was a constitutional sovereign. By his wide experience, by his great knowledge of men, through the life of his contact with successive ministries, he had been able to achieve so detached a position and so sound a judgment, such great wisdom and sagacity, that his influence was at times decisive in matters of the gravest importance to every part of the world. That I think was exemplified particularly in the formation of what was known as the national government. The historian of even to-day has told us how great that influence was; but that sound constitutional sovereign was never unmindful of the fact that, although one-quarter of the world's population owed allegiance to his throne, there was a wider world than that over which he reigned, and the constant endeavour of King George was to maintain good relations between Great Britain and indeed the British empire and every part of the world, so that the influence of this commonwealth of nations might always be an agency for peace and for the happiness of mankind. That in itself was a great ideal. The accomplishment of it obviously is impossible for human minds or human men, but the effort to achieve it was never lacking.

There was a side of the late king which we must not overlook, and that was his influence on the national character and life, not only through his constant appearances with the queen before the public, but in the observations which from time to time he was pleased to make, not only in the Christmas day broadcasts but also by their example. And what finer example for the poorest or the most humble in the country could there be than that of the family life of King George V? He was a respecter of all the conventions of life, a religious man in the truest and best sense, tolerant of all, knowing that his subjects belonged to many races and professed many faiths. He kept the Sabbath holy. He maintained that regard for conventions that has made, as we all know it to be true, the home and family the keynote of our greatness; for the greatness of this empire, so far as it is reflected from its centre or from its overseas dominions, lies in the fact that its foundations are set in the homes of the people. No work was done on Sunday, the day of rest. Never was he lacking in religious observance wherever he might be, whether it was in the private chapel in a great palace or in the little church in the parish of Sandringham; whenever his health permitted he was there. The force of his example upon his people and upon the world of good living, of high regard for home and family, I would place as the greatest possible influence that has been exercised by our late king upon the world at large.

[Mr. Bennett.]

There is one word I might say and perhaps I will be forgiven for saying it. The Prime Minister referred to a statement made by the Archbishop of Canterbury. I was privileged to represent this parliament last May, and during the course of conversation the late king used words almost similar to those used by the Archbishop of Canterbury. He said to me that he could not understand why there was manifested such evidences of affectionate regard on the part of the people. He added, "I am a very ordinary man, but I have done my best." Never shall I forget the way in which those words were spoken. Not, "I have done my duty," but "I have done my best." Could anything be finer? Could anything better than that be held up to the youth of this or any other country? Vicissitudes, sorrows, the death of mother, sister, son, illness nigh unto death—all these things had crowded into that busy life—but he had done his best. Perhaps that thought was in the minds of his people when they showed such affection, affection as has never been shown to a mortal king so far as we have record. It was not reverence, or respect, or admiration; it was real love and affection. It was the reward for virtue, courage, dignity, toil, self sacrifice; for, in the words of Kipling, never asking a man to do other than what he himself would do. Was prohibition to be enacted, was the use of spirits to be denied in the kingdom, the king would also follow that course. Were there restrictions upon food, the king must subject himself to them. No sacrifice did he shrink from that his subjects had to bear. With the life of toil and sacrifice he reached the reward that he spoke of in those beautiful words, not in his last Christmas message but in the Christmas message of 1934, when he said:

> If I may be regarded as in some true sense the head of this great and widespread family, sharing its life and sustained by its affection, this will be a full reward for the long and sometimes anxious labours of my reign of well nigh five and twenty years.

Could anything be finer than that? Five and twenty years of toil and then his reward is sharing the life and being sustained by the affection of his subjects. There we might leave it, but something else was said that no man can forget. It was a great author who once said that of the four sweetest words in our language, "home" and "mother" were two. Of the king's devotion to his mother everyone is aware, but who can forget the words that he used on his accession to the throne with respect to his wife? Not "Queen" as we use the word, but this is what he said on that May day when he ascended the throne:

> I am encouraged by the knowledge that I have in my dear wife one who will be a constant helpmate in every endeavour for our people's good.

With all the pomp and pageantry surrounding the throne, the late king in ascending it spoke of his "dear wife." For twenty-five years she was his constant partner in joy and sorrow, she shared with him all the joys and all the woes of that great office. At the end, in the ancient hall at Westminster, I heard him utter these words:

> I have been blessed in all my work in having beside me my dear wife, of whom you have spoken so kindly.

I happen to know that one of the things that gave His late Majesty the greatest pleasure was the thought that on the day on which that speech with amplifiers and broadcasts was carried to every part of the kingdom, a workman, speaking to a fellow workman, said, "Why, Bill, he is just like you and me. Did you hear him? He spoke with feeling when he spoke of his wife; he felt just the way we do when we speak about ours." I happen to know that gave to His Majesty the greatest joy possible. One of his subjects, humbly illiterate if you will, living a life of relative poverty, recognized the choking accents of his sovereign as he spoke of his dear wife at the close of that memorable address. He said, "I have been blessed in all my work in having beside me my dear wife." What a tribute to home and mother!

Our hearts go out, not to the great queen who has ennobled her high position and filled it with dignity and honour to the pride of all subjects of the king, but to the widowed mother, bereaved of husband, mourning his passing, who has now become the subject of her son. It is in that sense I join with the right hon. gentleman in his moving reference to Her Majesty. It is in that sense that we adopt this address of condolence to her in her great loss.

There remain but a few words to speak of the young man who has succeeded to the throne of his fathers as Edward VIII. He is no stranger to us. Frequently he has visited our country. His democratic attitude toward life, his wide knowledge of men, his clear conception of his obligations and responsibilities, his extraordinarily fine training in all the obligations of kingship enable him to come to the throne equipped as was his father or, as the Prime Minister has said, perhaps better fitted by travel to discharge the great and onerous duties of his high office. We render him the homage of our grateful hearts. We offer him the tribute of our affection because when he came here in 1919 there was no human, however hardened, no citizen, however old, who could look upon that smile without emotion. It charmed, it fascinated, it commanded the respect and admiration of all.

With the lapse of time, with the growth of knowledge, and with wider understanding, greater wisdom and much greater sagacity, he succeeds to the throne of his fathers, equipped to carry on the work so successfully initiated and carried on by George V. We are his subjects; but we wish him well, not because of his kingly office, not because we owe him allegiance, but because he embodies in his person those attributes which we would have possessed by the head of our state, the head of Canada, speaking, as he does, in the terms of the British North America Act and of the statute of Westminster, through His Excellency the Governor General, the personal representative of that king.

But there is another side; and depressed as we are, as we contemplate conditions in the world around us, worried as we all are with the thought of grim realities that cannot be cast away with a few words, or dealt with in rounded sentences—the vast, grim realities of world conditions as they are—we thank God with grateful hearts that He has given us the great king whom we have had and who has passed to his reward, having had three score years and ten of active life, filled with anxiety and sacrificing toil for his people. We thank the Giver of all good and perfect gifts for that great life; we thank Him that His Majesty's Consort the Queen still lives, and that He has given us, in the person of our new king, one who will maintain the high traditions of a great office and will carry forward, as he himself has said, by every means within his power, the policies, the point of view and the ideals of his father who has passed to his great reward.

Here I close, hoping with all hon. members of this house, as all human beings must hope, for brighter and better days, hoping that an all-seeing Providence may direct men of wisdom so to advise their sovereign, that the dark possibilities to which the Prime Minister has alluded may never become actualities, but that with wisdom, fearing God and loving the king, we may serve our day and generation as our great departed king served his.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is for me a great honour and an important duty to second the resolution of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) expressing to His Majesty the King and to Queen Mary the sentiments of profound and respectful sympathy that the death of King George V has called forth from the hearts of the Canadian people.

Throughout his entire life, by his dignity, his universally known kindness, as well as by the conscientious performance of his duties, his devotion to the interests of the empire and his strict adherence to constitutional rules and practice, the sovereign who has just departed has merited the fidelity and affection of his subjects, while at the same time fulfilling the ideal of the monarch, friendly to peace and respectful of the liberty of individuals and of nations.

It is during his glorious reign and with his cooperation that Canada has evolved from the status of a colony to that of a nation, free but ever loyal to its king. This is for us Canadians a particular reason to honour the memory of him who thus accepted to become in a manner more directly the sovereign of this country of ours, which is gradually and peacefully progressing from adolescence to national maturity.

As a representative in this house of the French population, I am sure that I faithfully interpret the sentiments of my compatriots when I say that the departed king has instilled into the hearts of all of us feelings of respect, of loyalty and of love that only truly worthy, truly great kings can inspire.

In the family of the British dominions, George V has magnificently incarnated the principle of unity, of duration, that gives to the members of this world-wide association the inspiration and the means to accomplish their respective tasks and to fulfil their common destiny. In fact, as a French writer has said, the king "represents the nation in all of its characteristics that are continuous, unchangeable, eternal."

If Goethe was right in saying: "Nothing is great that does not endure," history will record that it is the reign of George V that ensured the survival of constitutional monarchy in the world.

Parliament honours itself this day in rendering, on behalf of every citizen of the country, its homage of just gratitude to him who has so nobly lived his life as a man and so usefully fulfilled his mission as a king.

To His Majesty King Edward VIII to Queen Mary, to the whole royal family so cruelly stricken, Canadians respectfully extend sympathies all the more sincere because of the profound grief they themselves feel.

I desire in addition to assure His Majesty the King that our loyalty and fidelity to him, our respect for his person and our attachment to British traditions will be the same under his reign as they have been under that of his illustrious predecessor.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it has been a great delight to me to hear the expressions of loyal devotion to our king and queen. I should like to add to those expressions just a few words on behalf of the people whom I represent, the loyal social credit people throughout the Dominion of Canada. We rejoice in our king; we rejoice in the British monarchy; we have rejoiced particularly in the good work of King George. I am reminded of the words of Tennyson in his great poem on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, wherein he speaks of—

> That sober freedom out of which there springs
> Our loyal passion for our temperate kings.

That sober freedom, difficult to define but nevertheless a remarkable characteristic of the race to which we have the privilege to belong, a sober freedom out of which there springs a loyal passion for constitutional monarchy. Starting in the last century, about 1820, there became intensified one of the greatest struggles for the liberty of man in this world's history. It first became really manifest in Great Britain when the reform bill of 1832 was passed. From that time on and throughout that century, culminating in 1917, there was an incessant and tireless struggle of the common man upward to freedom; a struggle to gain representative institutions, responsible government, freedom to vote as he chose through the secret ballot and universal suffrage. And through all that struggle, steadily with the people was the temperate monarchy of Great Britain, particularly through the years of Victoria the Good, when the greatest number of those battles were fought. Through all those years the monarchy of Britain was with the common man, with the people. I am reminded of a little poem which I shall modify slightly; I believe it expresses the thought as I see it:

> As to the bow the cord is,
> So to Britain is the monarchy.
> Though it bends her it obeys her;
> Though it draws her yet it follows.

A most remarkable condition, which I believe has not been known in all this world's history before, but a condition verily true.

Commencing in 1920, or perhaps a little before, the British people began to discover that they were engaged in another desperate struggle upwards towards freedom. The leaders had recognized it before. We are struggling towards economic liberty equal to the political liberty which we have achieved. In the struggle for economic freedom I believe I see, sir, a British monarchy true to its finest traditions as exemplified in His Majesty King George V, still bending the empire and still leading, yet still obeying and still following. We find His Majesty on June 12, 1933, making a statement in the following words. He was speaking before a great economic conference which but for those words perhaps have been hopelessly abortive, but which as a result of those words had an influence upon mankind. The words were:

> It cannot be beyond the power of man so to use the vast resources of the world as to ensure the material progress of civilization. No diminution in these resources has taken place. On the contrary, discovery, invention and organization have multiplied their possibilities to such an extent that abundance of production has itself created new problems.

I submit, sir, that in those words our beloved monarch, whom we mourn from one corner of this British Empire to its remotest bounds, recognized the great struggle which was then commencing and expressed his sympathy with the toiling millions of us who are striving upward towards economic freedom. And I rejoice that our new sovereign, Edward VIII, in whom I feel we are justified in placing such great hope, has already manifested on several occasions similar vision. At one time when he was visiting the mining areas in the north of England, as the king saw the out-of-work miners in their grim homes it caused him to exclaim, "What a ghastly mess it all is! It makes me positively sick. What is the cause of all this? It cannot go on. It is a blot on England." And again at a later time, speaking before the international congress on commercial education in July, 1932, he said; "Our urgent task is to bring consumption and production into proper relationship—not a simple but a quite possible task."

Mr. Speaker, I rejoice in those words. I look forward with confidence, and I pray, with you and the other hon. members here, that God will direct that man in ruling this country and will direct the statesmen who are called to advise him in the various great dominions of the British Empire, in such a way that all shall work together under God to bring consumption into harmony with production, and go forward in the great struggle for economic liberty. And may the Lord fulfil in King Edwards' case the promise made in His behalf by a great hymn writer:

> For I will be with thee thy troubles to bless,
> And sanctify to thee thy deepest distress.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on this special occasion our party desires to join with others in expressing our respect for the late king and our sympathy with Her Majesty, Queen Mary.

My memory goes back to the death of Queen Victoria. There was then a sense of profound personal loss, coupled with a feeling that the bottom had dropped out of everything. Perhaps it is because I am older in years, too nearly a contemporary of His late Majesty, that I do not experience just those emotions to-day. My own point of view, and I fancy that of many others, has changed. Many years ago, when a young man in England, I was profoundly stirred by the well known lines of Ebenezer Elliott:

> When wilt thou save the people?
> O God of mercy! When?
> Not kings and lords, but nations!
> Not thrones and crowns, but men!

This point of view has been too long neglected, but in expressing and emphasizing it perhaps some of us have hardly realized the place which the king has filled in the life of the empire. The king embodies, as it were, in himself the great British tradition. Those who have come under the spell of Westminster Abbey will know what I mean. From the figures of shadowy legend down through a long line of kings, some good, some bad; through victories and defeats; through constitutional changes, by incorporating ideals and institutions of other lands and civilizations, and again by sharply distinguishing our own type from others, this tradition has been built up. Not in disparagement of any other nation or culture, and not as though we had already attained, either were already perfect, we are proud to call ourselves British.

And again the king is a symbol of the unity of the commonwealth. I prefer the word "commonwealth" to the word "empire," because I detest the older imperialism and all its works. But the voluntary association of a number of politically self governing dominions is a great achievement. Indeed it encourages one to hope for a yet wider unity. Even in Victoria's day the poet laureate dreamed of the parliament of man, the federation of the world. It would be the crowning glory of England if she could give an effective lead in the establishment of world peace.

Further, the British king as a constitutional monarch represents the adaptation of old forms and institutions to new needs and new functions. "Compromise" in the sense of the sacrifice of principles is a despicable thing, but compromise as the discovery of a working arrangement through which various points of view are reconciled and some advance made in the difficult art of learning to live together—such compromise is essential to successful democratic government. Herein, perhaps, lies the peculiar genius of the British people. Without too violent a break with the past, the national life has again and again been revolutionized. In various countries monarchies have given place to dictatorships. In England, political democracy has broadened down from precedent to precedent. When I affirm that it must broaden still more I believe that I am in line with the best British tradition.

The king is a symbol, but much more than an inanimate symbol. He is flesh and blood as we are. To-day the empire mourns the passing of a man, a son, a husband, a father. Burns, in making a plea for the common man, declared: "A man's a man for a' that." One might thus plead for those who inherit high office—a man's a man for a' that. As one recalls the court life of an earlier day; as one thinks of the domineering, strutting heads of some modern nations, one cannot but be thankful for certain qualities exhibited in the personal and official life of our late king.

King Edward comes to the throne in days of strain and stress at home and abroad. He, and all of us, face an uncertain future. I should like to think that the sympathy expressed by the king, when the Prince of Wales, at the time of the miners' strike, to which reference was made by the last speaker, will characterize not only the new king but also his advisers in Great Britain and throughout the empire.

The proclamation "The king is dead. Long live the king!" is of little importance unless we set ourselves with determination to bring in the better day.

> Ring out false pride in place and blood,
> The civic slander and the spite;
> Ring in the love of truth and right,
> Ring in the common love of good.
> Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
> Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
> Ring out the thousand wars of old,
> Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that I would be derelict in my duty to the women of my beloved constituency in the north and to the women of Canada generally if I did not join my voice to the voices of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett). Her Majesty the Queen has set the women of Canada an example of devotion to home life, devotion to family and devotion to the business that comes up every day by which we must all profit, and I should like to be allowed to join in this tribute of regret and sympathy to that beautiful woman.

Motions agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: There is no necessity of any ancillary motions, since I understand identical resolutions were adopted in the Senate to-day. As this concludes the order of business for this afternoon I now move the adjournment of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps before the house adjourns the right hon. gentleman would indicate whether or not it would be possible to lay on the table a report of the dominion-provincial conference. I think perhaps we should have some official record before the debate proceeds on Monday. I recall the right hon. gentleman asking. me the same question in happier days—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And what was the answer?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer was that we did our business without keeping any minutes and disposed of it very promptly, with a unanimity that could have been hardly expected in view of the fact that the provinces were not all of one political faith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I recall quite well asking my right hon. friend if he would table a report of the dominion-provincial conferences held during his day, and his reply that he had no report to table. I am happy to say that my reply to him will not be the same. I shall be pleased to lay on the table of the house on Monday the report of the dominion-provincial conference, which I think will bring satisfaction to all members of the house including even my right hon. friend. If he wishes to have a copy before Monday, I shall be glad to see that one is sent to his office.

Mr. BENNETT: I should greatly appreciate it.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.35 p.m.

Monday, February 10, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay upon the table of the house the report of the Chief Electoral Officer, made in pursuance to section 58 of the Dominion Elections Act, chapter 50, 24-25 George V; also extract from the report on the eighteenth general elections held in 1935, published in advance by the Chief Electoral Officer, giving list of names of candidates; also the report of the Chief Electoral Officer made in pursuance of section 4 of chapter 54, 23-24 George V.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved, seconded by Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East):

That 1,000 copies in the English language and 500 copies in the French language of record of proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference, 1935, be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. members will have observed that I have already tabled the report in printed form. I took the liberty in advance of the meeting of the house of asking the King's Printer to have the report printed, believing it would be the wish of hon. members to have it available at the earliest possible moment. The motion will permit of the bill for the printing being sent in to the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

He said: The proposed bill seeking to amend the railway act has for its object the granting to the province of British Columbia of the same rates on grain and flour for domestic use in that province as are in existence from the prairie provinces to Fort William.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ITALO-ETHIOPIAN WAR

IMPOSITION AND ENFORCEMENT OF SANCTIONS AGAINST ITALY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenize King) lay on the table copies of orders in council passed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council which relate to the imposition and enforcement of sanctions against Italy? I would like to have copies of the original orders in council laid upon the table, and also any departmental instructions which were issued in pursuance of the terms of those orders.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to present to the house very shortly a white paper which will contain the essential documents with respect to sanctions and allied matters which have been before the government in regard to the Italo-Ethiopian war. The white paper will, I think, include what my hon. friend has requested. If, after looking over his remarks anew, I find it does not, I will carefully consider what he has proposed, and if it is appropriate to do so, will see that his request is met.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg-North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister what commitments, if any, have been made by Canada with regard to imperial defence?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would have to have a conference with my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) before I could answer my hon. friend. At the moment I am not myself aware of any commitments.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. A. G. SLAGHT AND SECONDED BY MR. SARTO FOURNIER

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament: namely,—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Baron Tweedsmuir of Elsfield, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honour, Governor General and Commander in Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne this year, as we all should expect, contains the following special references in its opening: first, to the loss our empire has sustained in the death of His Majesty King George V, an expression of sympathy to our young king, to Queen Mary and all the royal family, and an expression of our loyalty and devotion to King Edward VIII.

On Friday last the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) seconded by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in very simple and touching addresses, expressed for us the thoughts that were in our hearts, therefore my task on this occasion, in reference to that portion of the speech from the throne, will be limited indeed. May I recall and quote to you, from among the many beautiful expressions that have come from public men throughout the empire, just two lines which seemed to me the most impressive in that address delivered by the British Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, who said:

> King George, it is true, inherited his position on the throne—he won his own way to the hearts of his people.

If one might be permitted, sir, to speculate as to which of his varied activities His late Majesty was most happy to perform, I would suggest it was not when he wore the crown and the ceremonial robes of office but rather when he went in his own simple, human way to the hospitals of the motherland and, with a friendly arm around their shoulders, cheered his wounded men and those who were unfortunate enough to be disabled in the war. I think another duty which he and the gracious queen delighted to perform was when they went to those functions at which little children gathered. There, I believe and feel, he was often most happy in the performance of his public duties. If I might revert to schoolboy days I should like to quote you something that comes to my mind from the fourth reader of those days; I should like to give you four lines which seem to me perhaps better than any we could find to exemplify the two outstanding traits of our late beloved king. They are as follows:

> For whatever men say in their blindness
> And in spite of the fancies of youth
> There is nothing so kingly as kindness
> And nothing so royal as truth.

To our new and beloved King Edward VIII we of this house affirm our loyal allegiance, and in the storm of controversy and the heat of debate throughout this eighteenth parliament I think we cannot do better than always remember those lines, which have been left as an example to us, that there is nothing so kingly as kindness and nothing so royal as truth.

Before I proceed, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the speech, may I extend to you my congratulations upon your election to the office of Speaker of the House of Commons. I feel that I can do this with double sincerity because for some years past I have enjoyed the privilege of your personal friendship. I feel also that your long experience in this house and your knowledge gained from participation in the debates eminently fit you to uphold the traditions which we heard so well expressed last week and to carry out with fairness and impartiality the duties of the high office to which you have been called. I desire to express to you, sir, the hope that for many years to come you may preside over the deliberations of this house and continue, as you have begun, to perform in a fine and noble way the duties that fall to your office.

I understand that it is the privilege of the member performing my task to have a word to say about his own constituency. May I first offer to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to his cabinet, on behalf of my constituents of Parry Sound, their most sincere thanks for the honour you have done them in selecting me to move the address. The Parry Sound district which I have the honour to represent, I need scarcely tell you, is one of the most important districts in the Dominion of Canada. My people are engaged in the basic industries of agriculture, cattle raising, fishing and lumbering, and the district, which as you perhaps all know is some six thousand square miles in area, is situate on Georgian bay, with one hundred miles of waterfront, the beauty and scenic grandeur of which cannot be surpassed. The district is dotted with a myriad of small and sparkling lakes, with four great rivers which empty into Georgian bay. Because of the industries I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, my district of Parry Sound will be particularly and specially benefited by the cattle and lumber provisions of the treaty which will be submitted to this house shortly and as to which I shall have a word to say later on.

May I say also, Mr. Speaker, that because of its scenic grandeur and its wonderful fishing and hunting my district enjoys a great influx of tourists from both Canada and the United States. Not only are we blessed by the provisions of the new treaty; our blessings in Parry Sound do not come singly.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend apparently appreciates, as all hon. members may not appreciate, that I have the privilege of claiming as one of my constituents, and I believe even a supporter, the famous Doctor Dafoe, and just a mile outside the little town of Callander, where he lives, the five Dionne babies are nestled in their hospital. So I ask you, sir, if any constituency in our broad dominion could be more appropriately honoured on this occasion than my own constituency of Parry Sound. And lest I should be thought lacking in hospitality I convey to you now, sir, and to all hon. members of this house, an invitation to come to my beautiful riding this summer, to come to Callander and visit us. I desire to single out and render a special invitation to four members of this house in the persons of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). I assure these hon. gentlemen that if they will do us the honour of paying us a visit this coming summer I shall be able to introduce them to five of the most charming young ladies in the Dominion of Canada.

It is also with real sincerity that I desire to congratulate the right hon. former Prime Minister, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) upon his return to this house apparently greatly improved in strength and vigour. Sir, I count the house and the country fortunate that in the years immediately ahead of us we are to have the benefit of his courage, his industry and his wide experience in framing the laws of our country. It has been said that laws are best made when there is a strong and virile opposition. While the opposition in this house may not be numerically as strong as the right hon. gentleman would wish it to be, I am sure that in the able and brilliant veterans who survived the late struggle, and in the new blood which he finds added to his party, any lack in numerical strength will be fully compensated by their capable support.

Permit me also to felicitate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) on his return to this house at the head of his party. It is true that he has returned with a progressively diminishing following, but that I feel sure will not affect his indomitable optimism, his sincerity, and his fighting qualities, all of which are so well established.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a reference to His Excellency the Governor General. In the speech from the throne His Excellency declared himself honoured by having been chosen to represent the king in Canada. We in turn feel that for us the choice has been a singularly happy one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is indeed a privilege to be permitted to voice through you, sir, to His Excellency the Governor General in the person of Lord Tweedsmuir, a warm and most sincere welcome from the people of Canada on this auspicious occasion. Even before His Excellency reached our shores we knew we were receiving not a stranger but a friend. His distinguished career in the service of the motherland was known to us. The work he did while attached to the British headquarters in France and the unostentatious but very valuable service he rendered to our empire was a matter within our knowledge. And in another way we felt we knew him. His contributions to the field of literature have been read and reread in Canada, and both before and after his coming to us have been literally devoured in the homes of the Canadian people. These sparkling and vivacious stories of the secret service have charmed us all from youth to mature age. I must confess that when I came upon Greenmantle I sat up until the small hours of the morning bound to finish it. The King's Grace is a work of classic rank, and in the light of subsequent sad events it was given to the empire at a time of startling appropriateness. The sane, clear, inspiring literary works of Lord Tweedsmuir in their effect upon the building of the national character of Canada go far to justify the statement that the pen is mightier than the sword. And wherever he has so far been able to journey, whether it be the historic city of Quebec or my metropolitan city of Toronto or the outskirts of our mining fields of northern Ontario or Quebec, he has endeared himself to all our people. May I say that we look forward to a span of unusually happy years under the regime of His Excellency and his gracious and charming wife, the Lady Tweedsmuir.

I desire to congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister on becoming Prime Minister of Canada for the third time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I add to that the distinction that our Prime Minister holds office by the mandate of the people of Canada expressed in more overwhelming terms and supported by a greater majority than that accorded to any prime minister since confederation. Not the least of the reasons for congratulation is the high quality and personal character of those ministers of the crown he has selected to assist him in governing Canada. It may be truly said also that no political leader ever sought office on fewer preelection promises. No overnight policies were issued next morning; the Prime Minister in his campaign adhered steadfastly to the policy of his party. It was no one-man policy but the considered policy of the party enunciated by him as its leader in February, 1933, and adhered to by him throughout the campaign.

With equal truth may it be said that no political leader ever entrusted with office has made such a remarkable record of accomplishment in four short months or less. May we pause for a moment to see what I mean by that. The government has successfully concluded a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States of America, which is to be of far reaching benefit to our basic industries and to Canadian primary producers. The conclusion of this treaty is, I suggest, a personal achievement of our Prime Minister, of which he may be justly proud. I cannot but remind the house that he has brought to pass a measure which was very near the heart of a beloved former leader of my party. Just before entering this chamber I passed before the portrait of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I bowed my head, and the thought came to my mind that if he had been spared to see this day, and the consummation of a measure which with his clear prophetic vision he declared twenty-five years ago would come to pass, what warmth of emotion would stir him to know that his pupil in public life, his chosen successor as leader, if I may be so bold as to say so, had as a personal achievement brought his cherished dream to reality.

Next, the government has brought to a successful conclusion the trade dispute with Japan; normal trade relations between the two nations have now been restored. This is bound to be of great advantage to all of Canada and perhaps particularly to the great province of British Columbia.

Recently the government convened the most important federal-provincial conference in history, at which questions of profound national importance were considered, including methods of amending our constitution, our financial relations and responsibilities, the great problem of unemployment, problems of agriculture, problems of mining development, and the development of the tourist traffic. Then, again, a very important conference, one not so widely known, has been held in Ottawa. This was a conference of departmental experts convened to consider the possibilities of developing a system of transatlantic airways transportation. The experts of Great Britain, Ireland, Newfoundland and Canada agreed on representations to be made to their respective governments, and a subsequent successful conference was held in Washington. In other words the government has realized the national importance to Canada of this new and wonderful development, and due to the foresight of the right hon. gentleman's government we are taking our place and recognizing Canada as a pivotal point in the air transportation of the world.

Continuing committees have been set up by the federal-provincial conference. Under the guidance of the government many of them have come to well defined conclusions with respect to financial problems and constitutional amendments.

Reference of legislation passed at the last session has been made to the Supreme Court of Canada. Hon. members will recall that several measures as to the validity of which doubts had been openly expressed were placed on the statute books. The supreme court was directed to deal with these measures at the earliest possible moment, and they are now before that court for determination. Surely it should be a principle of law making that at least parliament be assured of the validity of its laws when they are enacted, no matter to what extent legitimate difference of opinion might arise as to the desirability for such laws. The present reference therefore is to remove uncertainty and to make for stability.

Again, a royal commission was promptly appointed and speedily solved a very serious unemployment situation in the textile industry.

All these matters have been actually accomplished in less than four months, and accomplished in addition to the heavy departmental business of the country, which is being carried on by sixteen instead of twenty-one ministers of the crown. Am I not therefore fully justified in pointing with pride to these achievements of the Prime Minister and his cabinet?

But hon. members have not yet heard the whole story. The speech from the throne outlines several important matters to be dealt with at this session by legislation—because they can be dealt with only by legislation. May I refer only briefly to these matters of unemployment and relief? One would expect no difference of opinion concerning the statement in the speech from the throne indicating that unemployment continues to be our most urgent national problem. There can be little room for difference of opinion when I state that heretofore the difficulties which beset this problem have been greatly magnified by the lack of cohesion and cooperation among federal, provincial and municipal governments. Where responsibility for spending money is divided it is almost an axiom that what is everybody's business seems to be nobody's particular business. In other words, in the past there has been too much scrambling to place the load on the other fellow's shoulders, and too little union of responsibility tending to bring about a strict and businesslike administration of the millions of dollars which unfortunately must be spent each month in Canada on some form of relief. After all, whether funds be supplied by the federal, the provincial or the municipal government, there is only one source from which they may be secured, namely out of the pocket of the taxpayer.

What I am about to say is not said in criticism of the late government or of the right hon. gentleman now leading the opposition, because I believe the provinces, the municipalities and perhaps to some extent the federal government have all been a bit to blame, perhaps innocently enough, for the condition which has heretofore existed. I suggest that if a citizen from Mars had looked down upon Canada's method of dealing with relief and unemployment during the past three years, he would have been reminded of what Lord Chesterfield said to his son: "My son, you will be amazed with how much ignorance the world is governed." The proposals outlined in the speech from the throne with regard to this all important problem seek to remedy the existing lack of cooperation. A representative national commission assisted by a representative advisory committee is to be set up. May I express everybody's hope that with the cooperation of hon. members opposite both the commission and the committee may be truly representative and accomplish great results.

The transfer of camps for single homeless men from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Labour is a reform which is perhaps long overdue. Last year I visited some of those camps, and I believe any hon. member who took the trouble to do so must have come to the conclusion that certain changes were necessary.

Further, we find outlined in the speech from the throne proposed changes to the Bank of Canada Act. Those changes foreshadowed in the speech from the throne are not new to the people of Canada. The Prime Minister, before taking office and as leader of the Liberal party, made it clear that in its present form the Bank of Canada Act was not acceptable to that party. The reasons were fully laid before the people as an issue upon which the major parties were clearly divided during the last campaign. The proposed legislation is in accordance with the platform laid down and insisted upon in order that these two important functions, the control of credit and the issue of currency, shall be administered by a Bank of Canada in which the government as owners has a predominant interest, and over which it has effective control.

The speech proposes an amendment to the Canadian National Railways Act whereby the government of the day may be responsible to this house and there will be a greater measure of control on the part of parliament over this publicly owned work, in which such an enormous amount of public money is invested and the financing of which has become a major problem. This amendment involves a serious question of policy. The question of employment is to some extent wrapped up with the problem of the Canadian National Railways. Under the present method of administration government authority and responsibility to parliament in connection with this great railway have been greatly lessened. The proposal is to restore them to a marked degree. The time at my disposal on this occasion does not permit me to deal further with this important problem.

Then we find a proposal to create parliamentary secretaryships, and this proposal will, I hope, meet with the approval of every hon. member of this house. It is established in the mother of parliaments and I believe is fully approved by British statesmen regardless of party affiliations. It should create the building up in this house of a body of men who because of the experience gained as under secretaries will be better able in the future to carry on the responsible duties attaching to cabinet positions. I fancy that the right hon. leader of the opposition and some of those who sit beside him will agree with me that it will afford a measure of relief to the ministers of the day who can very properly turn over some of the exacting details of their offices to under secretaries, and do so without impairing the efficiency of their work. From every viewpoint I submit to the house that this administrative reform is one that will be found of benefit to Canada.

May I crave the indulgence of the house for the imperfections of my presentation of this important motion. May I add that the government, and we its supporters, enjoying as we do a very large majority, carry with that privilege a very grave responsibility, a responsibility not to abuse the power that we possess, but to see that support is thrown behind only those measures which are believed to be for the benefit of the whole Canadian people.

In closing may I quote two lines from that much beloved and lately departed English poet, Rudyard Kipling, to whose memory I am sure this house will concur in permitting me to pay tribute. The lines to which I refer are from the poem "If", and perhaps they will serve as an admonition to our government with its vast majority, as well as a comfort to our friends of the opposition with their small minority. They are:

If you can meet with triumph and disaster
And treat those two imposters just the same;

I have pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in moving the resolution which I gave to you in opening, expressing the hope that the measures dealt with in this our eighteenth parliament may be of great benefit to Canada, and that better times may come upon our country, perhaps brought by providence, but by a providence assisting a government of which providence approves. May I conclude by expressing again the hope that in our deliberations and conclusions during this parliament we may bear in mind the fact that there is always a far horizon for onward looking men.

Mr. SARTO FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemount) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this parliament has opened in an atmosphere of mourning. In losing George V, we have lost a prince in whom all was kingly. Like Charlemagne, he deeply loved his people and his people deeply loved him. And what of his paternal solicitude for youth? Never shall we forget it. History will assuredly perpetuate the recollection full of love, admiration and gratitude in which we hold him.

Edward VIII succeeds him. He is known to all and all agree that he is a young man in whom high intelligence is combined with a deep knowledge of men and of things. On his head the British crown has lost nothing of its splendour, of its authority in the empire and of its prestige in the world.

I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that I interpret the sentiment of all your colleagues when I warmly congratulate you on your election to the speakership of the House of Commons. The difficult task you have assumed requires your fine qualities of heart and all the resources of your ability and of your great experience. May I beg of you to grant me your good will? I have such great need of it, especially at this moment.

Our acquaintance, becoming daily more intimate, with His Excellency the new representative of His Majesty in Canada, Lord Tweedsmuir, whose life is a continuous ascent, and of his gracious consort, Lady Tweedsmuir, convinces us once more of the great care London takes to send to us men who bring us their services, leave with us something of themselves and return home with our friendship.

When a patient realizes that he has made a mistake in changing his physician, he returns to his former one. After five years in opposition, the Liberal party is back in office. This was to be expected. The recollection of the past, the difficulties of the present, the uncertainty of the future, the increasing popularity of the Liberal leader, together with the excellence of the program which he put forth and which we upheld before the electors, all that explains the fortunate defeat of the other parties and the magnificent triumph of ours, to which my distinguished colleague from Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has just referred. There was no misunderstanding. The nation had to make its choice. It pronounced itself decisively and, in handing us the reins of power, it recognized and sanctioned once more the essentially liberal principal of freedom of trade, which has figured for forty years in the first article of the program of the Liberal party and which is founded on the reciprocal need that peoples and individuals have of each other.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOURNIER: Governments whose names are linked with periods of prosperity were composed, as ours is, of men who understood that the interdependence of individuals and classes of society, the international solidarity of peoples, becoming closer and closer according as the obstacles of time and place diminish, make it impossible for prosperity to be a local phenomenon and the exclusive lot of a single nation.

The disregard of this principle has led to the extreme nationalism that has brought us to our present sorry pass: a bitter experience that history will record as one of the greatest humiliations of the human mind. The government, as is proved by the speech from the throne, of which my distinguished colleague from Parry Sound has just proposed the adoption in a remarkable piece of eloquence that has shown him to be a master of the art of expressing his thought, the government, I say, has avoided falling into the error of this eccentric theory of ultra-protectionism and other similar doctrines that may come to us from the opposition and which sanction in their laws the vices that nature prescribes in hers.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOURNIER: If our civilization threatens to become synonymous with depression and misery, it is probably because it has called up more problems than it could solve; and the great error of the government which preceded the present one was to believe itself capable of solving them all at once and in a short time. Time has worked its revenge upon those who would proceed without its aid and, to-day, everything has to be begun all over again.

Among the problems that we are faced with to-day, the most important and most urgent one, to my mind, is the economic problem. The speech from the throne announces the government's determination to facilitate, in an effective manner, the economic recovery of the country in every sphere of activity, while taking into consideration all requirements of a natural, economic, social and political order.

The natural order requires that nations have economic relations with each other; that is why, I believe, they have invented and are constantly improving their methods of production and their means of communication and distribution.

Commerce has ever been the livelihood of peoples, a universal provider of employment, a valuable source of revenue for the state, as well as a serious guarantee of peace and prosperity. This theory is not a dream of things that are to come; it has borne the test of time and has become truer than ever. Prosperous years are always attended by great economic activity.

The treaty of reciprocity which the dominion government has just concluded with the United States the settlement of our difficulties with Japan and the negotiations which the government intends entering upon with other countries are steps that cannot but produce good results and that prove the perfect agreement to be found between what is said and what is done on the Liberal side of the house.

(Text) The government, Mr. Speaker, understands that if we want to keep Canada busy, if we want to realize that most marvellous formula of the Conservatives, "Canada First," the first thing we have to do is to step on business and do business with everyone who wants to do business fairly with us. This is the very condition on which we shall succeed in finding the proper solution of most of our national problems—unemployment, railways, trade and commerce, revenues and taxation, and so forth. And to make it easier and safe, as the speech from the throne indicates, the government is providing for the organization of the national condition on which we shall succeed in finding of Canada a national institution.

(Translation). But it would be truly regrettable, Mr. Speaker, that the government's efforts to insure increasing welfare to the population should redound to the exclusive advantage of a group of individuals who have no need of them. The government is guarding against this danger by warning all shameless exploiters that it will use the power of the state whenever it may become necessary to do so to protect the interests of the weak against the encroachments of the powerful. For its courageous and timely intervention in that regard, it deserves special congratulations.

Why should there be so much misery in the world at this time when the only change in the quantity and quality of goods has been for the better?

It is because too many of those who monopolize production and distribution commit grave abuses which they should hasten to correct, because to-morrow, should the misery that has existed in this country for five years continue, it will be too late; and that to-morrow is perhaps nearer at hand than we think it is.

It is not the government that threatens, it is circumstances that warn—circumstances that could easily be dispelled by the good will of those who create them if they would refrain from abusing the liberties provided for them by the system, if they would moderate their thirst for profit, if they would declare to the state their total income and pay to the treasury all they owe in taxes, in order that others may not have to pay in their stead; if they would be content with moderate profits, if they would pay reasonable salaries to their employees, in a word, if, instead of seeking power and admiration, they tried to make themselves better liked. It would be an honourable sacrifice, and I ask it of them in the name of the youth of my country; for if there is in our society at the present time a class of people who are to be pitied, it is the young people. The past has left them practically nothing but debts and obligations, and their future outlook is not much better. Most of them do not know what to do with their time. They stand before life mistrustful of everything, with nothing to hope for, somewhat as if they found themselves at the brink of a river waiting for it to dry up in order to cross it. We follow a generation that has done great things, but that has made serious mistakes, the most memorable of which is a war, a war, as some one has said, in which "man almost lost his name of man," a war that was more costly to the victors than to the vanquished, a war that profited only those who lived from it, a war that was to insure peace, but that has sown the seeds of war.

Such things sometimes inspire us with much bitterness. We know that the depression has been hard on everybody, but its after-effects, if we do not exert ourselves to soften their blow, will mean disaster and the triumph of anarchy and of communism. Five years ago, such a thing was possible; to-day it is probable, and the day when it will have become an established fact it will be too late to think of making amends and of consenting to the necessary sacrifices.

The Liberal party has always shown us a great deal of sympathy. The presence in this chamber of a score of young Liberal members and the government's intention to initiate us, in a serious and practical manner, to public administration in our country is further proof of this sympathy which the Liberal party has never withheld from us. It behooves us now seriously to prepare ourselves and to try to deserve it as much as possible.

The other reforms that the government intends to accomplish in the field of social and political economy, that is the establishment of a national and representative commission to supervise the distribution of work to the unemployed and the payments of direct relief, the amendments to the Canadian constitution intended to adapt it more closely to the present needs of the nation, which has grown in the last thirty years, especially when the Liberals were in power, are steps that will largely facilitate the return to the land and to a proper equilibrium. And further, Mr. Speaker, history will record that in 1935, as in 1896 and in 1921, the coming to power of the Liberal party, the true party of restoration, marked the end of a period of misery and the beginning of an era of prosperity, of justice and of peace. Thus, Mr. Speaker, the facts continue to vindicate the ability, the good sense and the spirit of enterprise of our two great leaders, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the right honourable the present prime minister.

Your patience, Mr. Speaker, has no doubt been tested by such a lengthy speech. Anybody else could have made it shorter and better, but certainly not more sincere.

It is with these sentiments that I have the pleasure and honour of seconding the motion of my distinguished colleague from Parry Sound.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I very heartily congratulate the mover (Mr. Slaght) and the seconder (Mr. Fournier) of the address for the speeches with which they have favoured this house this afternoon. The generous references of the mover to the leader of the opposition and the leaders of other parties were in the best form of those who practise at the bar; and the seconder's speech gives evidence of his having inherited a great name in law circles and indicates that he must, if he is given health and strength and opportunity, play a great part in the service of the state.

I could not but be impressed with the mover's speech when he referred to the glories of the community which he represented. I felt perfectly certain that he was contemplating a discontinuance of his service there as a tourist and taking up his permanent residence at Parry Sound, a contemplation which I am sure will be received with great joy by those who call him their member. But he fell into one grievous error, and one into which many members of this house have fallen during recent months. Not content with referring to the very great majority that the government has, a majority that I venture to think will become somewhat troublesome as the months go by, he also referred to the fact that it had behind it a support unprecedented in the history of this country since confederation. Surely he has not read the returns. I wonder if the hon. gentleman realizes that the government that sits opposite me to-day, with 171 members out of a house of 245, has been placed there by less than 35 men and women out of every hundred of the population of Canada who had the right to vote on the fourteenth day of October last. I wonder if he realizes that, according to the figures supplied by the chief electoral officer, 5,917,387 persons had the right to vote in October last.

Mr. BRADETTE: The dead and the duplications.

Mr. BENNETT: There were none. The list was issued on the first day of May, and is the most up to date list this country has had in recent years. In addition to that, of that number, out of every one hundred persons, men and women in Canada who had a right to vote, only thirty-five voted for the government—including the independent Liberals—that sits here with 171 members. That is an anomaly that cannot possibly endure if democracy is to last, for it has been said so frequently that majorities are the indications of a sound democracy; in other words that where the popular will is not represented there can be no sound or enduring democracy. That is a commonplace; it is said in every text book; it is spoken of on every husting; it is the philosophy of democracy, and yet the fact remains that there are 171 members in this house supporting a government representing only thirty-five out of every one hundred who had a right to vote in October last.

I do not mention that for the purpose of complaint, far from it, but for the purpose of indicating that the observations that were made a few moments ago by the mover of the resolution have no support in fact. It is one of the most precarious conditions confronting this country at this time, when we have grave and serious problems to engage the attention of the people, that the government of the day, entrenched in power in the way it is, not only does not represent a majority of those who did vote but has only a little more than one-third of the support of those in this country who were entitled to vote in October last. That means nothing as far as this opposition is concerned or those who sit to the left of the Speaker; it is not said for that purpose. I do say, sir, however, that it is a matter of profound significance as affecting the welfare of this nation; for there is a tendency to use the power of a majority which has manifested itself already and which was disclosed in this house the other day by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe): "Well, call up the guards." That is all; "call up the reserves; look at our majority. In a few minutes we are going to do so and so. We have the votes; we are going to do it. Never mind; call up the guards."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Minister of Justice never said that; those were Conservative words.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the hon. gentleman would become a little excited. "Never mind; call up the guards." The hon. gentleman is waving his arms unnecessarily.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is past language.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it was used as late as Thursday last. I mention this again because there is a tendency on the part of some members, especially the younger members, to think that because there is a vast majority you necessarily have the popular majority behind you. That is not so. Not only is this government without a majority of the popular votes in Canada, which is the negation of democracy; as I said a moment ago it has the support of only slightly more than one-third of the electors of this country who voted on election day.

What is to be done about a matter of that kind? In Australia they had this question to deal with and they dealt with it by compulsory voting. They increased their votes up to ninety-one per cent of the total vote in the first election after they enacted the compulsory voting measure, and they brought it up to ninety-five per cent at the next election. I have not the figures of the total vote cast in the last election, but I mention this because it is not a difficulty singular to Canada; it is a difficulty that has to be met with in new democracies. In the older countries the situation is not so acute; the difficulties are fewer, but in this and in other new democracies such as Australia these difficulties have to be met and overcome.

There is another method to which we will have to have recourse in this country, which has been found most satisfactory in Great Britain; that is the limiting of the cost of an election in each constituency. That will have to be provided for by some method such as that adopted in Great Britain to attain that end. When you look at the returns and see the avowed cost of an election—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I say the avowed cost; the smiles and laughter of hon. gentlemen opposite indicate that they know perfectly well that their returns do not show what their elections cost. In England the judges have been very careful, in administering the law, to insist that the slightest deviation from the rules laid down shall constitute an offence vacating the seat. There was one case in particular, shortly after the law came into effect, that had the result of vacating the seat. The admitted expenditures were a little too large, but they were able to show much larger expenditures in the end. As a result conditions are much improved as compared with those prevailing before this act was passed.

I mention these things on the threshold of my observations because I hope they are not wholly controversial. After all, when one has had experience one realizes that there are some questions that far transcend mere party considerations. I say to this chamber to-day that the result of the election, not viewed from the standpoint of party but viewed from the standpoint of its effect upon democracy, having regard to the number of votes cast, the number of those who had the right to vote and the cost of the election even as indicated by the returns, presents a situation that calls for a remedy. The two remedies I have indicated are those applied in Australia and Great Britain to improve the conditions that there existed. In England they had far worse conditions, before they remedied them, than we have had in this country. Sometimes we compare conditions in England to-day with conditions in Canada to-day. If we are to compare we must compare democracy at the age it was in England with the age it is in Canada, in order to arrive at a fair judgment, and I think it may be said that democracy in Canada has given a fair account of itself under the conditions that existed. But it is reasonably clear that there are improvements that should be made, and I merely suggest these two. In France they are severely logical; I remember on the last occasion I was there inquiring with great care as to how they carried on their elections. Strange as it may sound, sir, the truth is that in France no chamber of deputies is ultimately elected that has not been so elected by the majority of the electors. They have their vote; if there are three or four candidates and one candidate does not secure a majority there is a second polling, after those who are low drop out. If at the end of the second polling the majority has not selected a candidate there is still another polling. So in every case in France the member elected to the chamber of deputies is a member who represents the majority of the electors of that division, though it may be necessary to have several pollings before that end is attained.

I merely mention this in passing because of the observations made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) with respect to the support the government received throughout the country at the last election.

I desire now to point to what I conceive to be a somewhat more painful matter. We have endeavoured, with doubtful success, to do something in this country to attain a measure of unity. We have not always succeeded. There have been times when the representation from one great province was wholly for one party. In this very parliament there are provinces represented by members of only one party and none others. What I deprecate is the appeals that were made in the province of Quebec in connection with the war. "Canada to enter war." There is the sheet that on Saturday was circulated throughout that province. I should say further that I have before me the handbill that was circulated in the constituency of Argenteuil. This statement that Canada was to enter a war is supplemented by a dispatch not unlike the dispatch that appeared in 1930 with respect to the war in Egypt. "Canada can mobilize a powerful and fully experienced army within twenty-four hours," stated this official. This is from Ottawa, dated October 11, special:

> Canada will probably be drawn into the European war if Great Britain is forced in, and irrespective of what politicians, statesmen and economists say, the dominion will not be able to help herself.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Then follows a statement as to Canada's preparation for the war. It is quite at variance with what has recently been said. This is an indication that Canada is already prepared in other provinces to send its troops into the field.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What paper?

Mr. BENNETT: This is called the Montreal Reporter, and is dated October 12, 1935. That is only one; I have others. This handbill for instance was circulated in a little community in the county of Argenteuil. I have many others circulated in other parts of Quebec.

But there is something more to which I regret I have to direct attention; I refer to observations made by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in that campaign. Some few years ago, when the government of that day came into office, the leader of the opposition spent much time reading into the record many statements and extracts from my speeches. To-day I shall content myself by referring to one made by the Minister of Justice at a meeting at St. Roch market on September 7:

> Before 1930 the province had in Ottawa a unanimous representation. We did not disgrace the French Canadians. We had influence in the cabinet; I do not wish this influence to diminish. I want to be with Mr. King and I want the whole province to be behind me. I ask you to give me this support.

Further, when visiting his committee room on September 16, he is reported to have said:

> That's why I ask again our friends to unite, to put aside their petty quarrels, to assure us of a majority like the one we had in the parliament from 1921 to 1930. There is no question, it is we from the province of Quebec who led in the parliament during that period. It has not been the same thing since 1930.

That form of insularity does not make for national unity. And when the hon. gentleman refers to the united front of Quebec prior to 1930, and then says their voice was not as powerful because twenty-four voted for candidates of the then government in 1930, and appeals to them to strengthen their influence and their power by uniting and forgetting petty things—when they are not petty—I think it is doing an injury to the commonwealth. I leave it at that. But before I proceed to the next point let me say that what was so with respect to Quebec in this particular was so in other parts of Canada as well. The effort was made wherever it was thought it would be effective to have men and women, women mostly, believe that the Conservative party had wedded itself to war at the earliest possible moment. Mr. Speaker, that may have temporary success. It may. But there are not lacking to-day signs that the effect of those very appeals has been to lessen the strength of the bonds of confederation and to weaken the position of this dominion as part of the empire.

Once the party came into office, when the Prime Minister was called upon to form a government, we had evidence of the success of the appeal made by the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Justice. When the government was first formed the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) was not allocated to the position he at present holds. He was to be sworn in as Secretary of State. But the little corporal from Sorel was not thus to be denied. The support the party had received from the province enabled the little corporal to train his guns upon the Prime Minister, and in the words often quoted by Abraham Lincoln, "the coon came down." For we find that the little corporal had been able successfully to maintain his position. The little corporal from Sorel had become the emperor of the day. Quick advancement! But what was yesterday was yesterday, to-day is to-day. He was quite right. So you have the result that followed from the appeal thus made. Then of course there were other difficulties to overcome. The minutes passed into hours before finally my friend the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) became Minister of Public Works. In that position I am sure he will, in the words of the Minister of Justice, cast no reflection upon the people he represents and will discharge his great duties with fairness and with a sense of obligation that comes to one who is from a province that took the lead from 1930 and is now able to enforce its will upon the Prime Minister.

Then, of course, there are other striking changes. For instance we welcome the face of my genial friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Of course, the general elections did not bring him into the house; he had retired from politics. He has assumed another role. But think of the value of his experience to us now. He returns to the Department of Finance, and that genial smile comes only from the fact that for years he was manager of a very well known hostel of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which means of course "service," therefore a smile for all the guests. And then he has learned what many men have yet to learn, what my hon. friends from the west, one of them no longer here, have told us; as a director of a bank he would be able to tell you how every loan creates a deposit. That would meet with the warm approval of those hon. gentlemen, some of them at least. Of course there would be no difficulty at all in explaining the condition of the investments of insurance companies, because in the position of director of an insurance company he had great opportunities to that end. Then there was another matter which was somewhat interesting; he was the chairman of a reconstruction committee—no relation of course to the party of that name. As chairman he perhaps may be able now to enlighten us on what became of Laurentide. There are a lot of investors in England who would like to know.

Mr. DUNNING: It might embarrass you if I did.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it would not embarrass me, thank fortune. What became of Laurentide would be an interesting study, because these were purely provincial companies over which the dominion had no control.

Mr. FACTOR: He found the national debt increased by almost a billion dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen have a tendency to speak just low enough to be heard by me, but not by others. If their courage is as great as it should be, if they desire to ask a question, let them stand up and ask it, and I shall endeavour to answer at once.

The administration having thus safely been launched and the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Crerar) having once more found himself, not Minister of Railways as heretofore but in the possession of a combined department, he will I am sure be able to explain to the satisfaction of the house the operations of the grain exchange, his best beloved child, and how they are able now to sell on that exchange wheat that is supposed to be maturing in October next but which has not yet been sown. Perhaps he will be able to explain that to the satisfaction of the people of this country, but there is some doubt even as to that. I will deal with that presently.

Having thus established his government we are told by the mover that the Prime Minister at once began to show such action that in three or four months he did more than had ever been done in this country before. In so doing he made new trade agreements; he broadened human liberty, extended freedom to the downcast and depressed throughout the world, and gave to the name of Canada a place amongst the nations of the world that had never been dreamed of before. Well, it was a great achievement—a great achievement, as the hon. member for Parry Sound has said. Let us examine it for just a moment. The press indicated—and the press is always well informed as to the movements of the right hon. gentleman—that he was to leave for Georgia for his health, but that he would stay for a day at Washington. In twenty-four hours a trade agreement is made with the United States, and upon returning to Canada, after a session with the cabinet lasting a couple of hours on Armistice morning, all is over. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it is no wonder men smile. Either one of two things had been done; either the agreement in its essential terms and details had been done before, or it is an improvident one —one or the other. No man, however great he may be, can in twenty-four hours, forty-eight hours or seventy-two hours complete a trade agreement with the United States. And if he does—or did—it would have only one result, that he has been properly trimmed. I think the latter alternative will be the one which history will show fits the case.

Then there is the settlement with Japan. I am going to say only a few words in that connection, and they are these: We have not the papers before us, and therefore I shall reserve any lengthy observations until later, but if press reports are accurate, two years from now whoever lives that long will see the most humiliated government, if this government still survives, that there has ever been in this country. I say that with respect to the agreement. That is all. I have made a prophecy, an ordinary prophecy,—and you may mark it down.

These observations are merely of a preliminary nature before proceeding to deal with the speech from the throne as a whole. The document is wonderful, in one sense: it is going to restore responsible government for which our grandfathers died. It will bring to the people of Canada a freedom which they have never possessed, and parliament is once more to emerge in all its past power and greatness. Could anything, Mr. Speaker, be sillier than that? No wonder that intelligent men who have read that paragraph in the speech from the throne are asking themselves why any prime minister could ask a representative of the crown to make a statement of that kind. Does any one for a single moment say that at any time there has been enacted in Canada by order in council any legislation which had not been warranted by parliamentary action?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. BENNETT: Does any one say that this parliament—the Senate, the House of Commons and the Crown—have not agreed in enacting laws to enable any executive action which was taken by the late government? If so, name it. What was it? Wherein has the executive ever acted, except it had parliamentary power and authority given it to warrant the action taken? Name it. Here is the sentence:

> It is proposed to restore to parliament its control over taxation and expenditure by ending all measures which have deprived members of the House of Commons of this control, and which have served to invest the executive with unwarranted arbitrary powers.

Is that fair? It is proposed "to restore to parliament" its power—when, sir, since October this very government has been carrying on by executive action, sanctions, extensions of power, great extensions and alterations in our fiscal system, as declared by the Prime Minister himself. All these things have been done by executive action. Why? Because it is said there was parliamentary sanction for the action taken; because it was stated parliament had given power to the executive to do it. I ask again: Name a single instance in which the late executive passed any order which parliament had not given it power to pass.

I have no doubt that at the moment there may pass in the mind of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) the thought that the court has held as invalid an order in council in connection with dumping duties imposed upon certain importations from England. The court did hold that that was improper, and I am glad to say that the minister has taken an appeal. Why? Because once parliament confers upon an executive the right to pass an order in council upon any subject, and that order in council is passed, then the action thus taken is in many instances changeable or alterable only by parliament itself.

Mr. ILSLEY: The appeal is not on that ground at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it should be. At any rate that is one of the points upon which the appeal should be made. For instance we will say that a minister issues a proclamation stating that a certain act shall go into force on proclamation by order in council, that the order in council is passed and the statute comes into being: do you mean to say that by cancelling the order in council the statute ceases to be and is repealed? No one would suggest for a moment that that is so. And so when action is taken which imposes a given duty or price upon a certain commodity, under authority granted by parliament, the mere repeal of the statute cannot affect that item which has become an item in the tariff or one to be dealt with as I have indicated. I mention that in passing, because to most people it seems rather strange, but it is in keeping with the statement made by the right hon. gentleman on the night of the election. I do not think I shall do it, but I shall ask some hon. member sitting behind me to read the statement made by the right hon. gentleman upon his assumption of office. When that is read I think it will be regarded at least as an ungenerous document. However, leaving that for the moment I suggest this can be said about it, that he there indicates the matters concerning which he has had a mandate to deal and with which he must deal in accordance with the mandate he has received. Before the debate is concluded at least I shall ask to have that read and placed upon Hansard, so that it may be recorded as an indication of what the leader of the government regarded as his mandate, and the matters of importance which would engage the attention of this parliament.

At this time I think it is not necessary to make further reference to the death of His late Majesty King George V. That was done only a few days ago by the right hon. gentleman and myself, and it would seem unnecessary to make any further reference than that in the speech from the throne we might expect to find, and do find, reference to the universal sorrow of Canadians and people in all parts of the world at the death of the late king, and a further reference to the sorrow we have for the surviving queen. With that would go our earnest hope that His Majesty King Edward VIII may be long spared to reign over a free democracy, and to carry forward the great reforms which during the last twenty-five or thirty years have been made in every part of the British empire. I make only brief reference to this matter, and do not go into it in detail this afternoon because I believe anything which might appropriately be said has been said.

There is one point however I should like to make, and it is this: Nothing has more clearly indicated that our imperial existence—and I use that word deliberately—as a commonwealth of nations freely associated together is bound up with the monarch. Without the monarch there could be no common union of commonwealths such as we have in the British empire. The freedom and ease with which the change was effected is a striking tribute to the simplicity and strength of our institutions. Nothing I believe better indicates the strength of our great institutions and, if you like, our monarchical democracy, than the change which took place—the king is dead; long live the king. There was continuity and certainty, no fuss and no trouble. Everything went on regularly in every part of the world and in each of the hemispheres as though it had merely been something of a domestic nature, such as the vacating of office by a mayor. It was a wonderful tribute to the strength, the simplicity, the power and the continuity of our institutions as we now have them.

I will reserve what I have to say with respect to the League of Nations until the end of my remarks, but this I think should be said: It is very much to be deprecated, as the right hon. gentleman said the other day, that chance remarks should be made at this particular time by those who hold important places without due appreciation of their seriousness. When passing through the Panama canal I received the first news of conditions in Canada from a paper printed half in Spanish and half in English. I read of the rejoicing in Italy because of the statement made by the Minister of Justice. I wondered what it all meant. I confess that I would rather have read that there was rejoicing in Australia and Great Britain and New Zealand over those remarks than in Italy. I wondered why it was necessary to make the observations that were made. I made inquiries as soon as possible and I found that, as usual, the subcommittee of the League of Nations, eighteen in number, were discussing the question of sanctions, and the Canadian representative, than whom I have known no one in all my existence who was more careful not to take action without having authority to do so, had suggested, not for publication, that if Canada had to lose nickel, copper and various other things of this sort, why not put oil and steel and the like on the prohibited list? It at once became bruited abroad and the ungenerous suggestion was made that our representative in Geneva was acting at the instance of some of the representatives of the British government, that he was being urged to do something that the British government would not do but thought he would be a useful person to do. That sort of thing leaves a very bad impression in the minds of people abroad as to what really is the position of Canada. Twice on that steamship representative men who happened to be passengers asked what it meant that they had read in the press. Two days later at sea a radio despatch was received indicating what the Prime Minister had said, and there I think he must be doing himself an injury too that he did not object to what was done, but did object to Canada being regarded as having taken the initiative with respect to this matter.

Now, sir, let us examine our position. The Dominion of Canada is a member of the League of the Nations and was a member when the league came into being. It was one of the charter members of the club. The rules of the league provide that if one of its members is found to have been guilty of an act of aggression against another member, certain results follow. Some call these results punishments, some call them sanctions, some call them penalties, but the fact is that the league with practically no dissenting voice decided that Italy had been an unwarranted aggressor against Ethiopia, also a member of the league. I say practically unanimously decided, as there were two or three members who did not so decide because of reasons which they then gave. That being so, it was not for the league to impose the punishment because the punishment followed. Sanctions followed just as when a jury brings in a verdict of murder against an accused it is the duty of the judge to sentence him to the only penalty the law provides, just as when a verdict of guilty is brought in for assault or shooting or any other offence. Upon a verdict being recorded the duty of the judge is to award punishment. What that punishment shall be is defined by the criminal code of Canada. In this case the provisions of the league provided what the sanctions might be, not necessarily should be. A committee was set up which determined what the sanctions would be and we as members were bound to take appropriate action. It was not a case of whether or not we wanted to, we either had to be welshers or nobly keep our word. We had either to repudiate or to sustain our position, we had no option.

We have been going about this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, talking about the glories of the League of Nations. We have been appropriating moneys in this parliament and contributions have been made for the purpose of maintaining the League of Nations. In every part of Canada little organizations have grown up. Any man who understands anything about it realizes that being a member of the League of Nations is just the same as belonging to a club. A member is bound by the by-laws. If I do not like the club's by-law that provides for my being posted if I do not pay my bills, it is my duty to resign and leave that club. There is no sounder law than that laid down by Lord Elgin, that you cannot reprobate and approbate at the same time. We cannot talk about the glories of the League of Nations and our position in it, how great we are, the part we play in it; we cannot go there from year to year and take part in its deliberations, and yet when a crisis arises where one member is an aggressor against another, where one member has gone to war against another and has bombarded his towns and cities, fail to take the action which we ourselves have agreed we would take in that eventuality.

Why are we endeavouring to belittle our own position? Why are we not saying frankly to all the world, "Yes, we are members of the League of Nations and as members of it we have asked the Canadian people, in and out of season, during successive governments, to stand behind us." What results follow from finding Italy guilty? The results are written in the covenant itself; they are economic results. There are provisions for other results. It is true, as the Minister of Justice has pointed out, that Canadians should not be called upon from time to time to take up arms for the purpose of maintaining the territorial integrity of other members of the league. But we remained in the league, that is the answer. We remained in the league and having done so we must support the league or be regarded throughout this world as repudiators. That is the position; we have no option.

I regret more than I can say that the Minister of Justice saw fit to make the observations he did. They were made in a moment of crisis, at a moment of great difficulty, at a moment when we should have stood with every other member of the league. It weakened our position to give succour and support, not physical but moral, to Italy and she was not slow to represent our attitude to all the world. I wonder if the hon. gentleman has seen the editorial that appeared in one of the leading journals of the city of Rome, a journal supposed to speak with great authority for the government of the day. In that journal it was pointed out in terms clear and certain that all Canada was doing was repudiating Mr. Riddell, that he had overstepped the bounds of his authority and was being used merely as a tool by the British authorities for the purpose of doing something which they did not care to do. Obviously that is the wrong impression to have abroad, and that more than anything else is an illustration of just what the right hon. gentleman said the other day, and with which I agreed, as to the impropriety of statements such as that being made by one of his ministers in his absence. Not only the great impropriety of it, but the great injury it did to this country in the minds of people who had seen us as a young and vigorous power on the American continent, a member of the League of Nations which came into being with the idea of the United States being a member but which is now bereft of the membership of the United States, of Germany and of Japan. We occupy, therefore, a position of singular difficulty on the northern half of this continent, and that position has been made much more difficult by the fact that the Acting Prime Minister, in the absence of the Prime Minister, made a statement which Italians have taken as giving them succour and support—succour and support, not physical but moral, enhancing their spirit and morale at the expense of blame being attributed to British statesmen, when they had nothing more to do with it than children on the street. I made some inquiries. I spoke to Mr. Ferguson, who headed our delegation at the time, and what I have recited to this house as to the circumstances, I believe correctly represented the facts. I want to say this about Mr. Riddell. All the time I was in office he was at Geneva. He was, so far as I know, appointed, not by the late government but by my right hon. friend opposite. I think that is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By the Union government.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he was retained in office by my right hon. friend. I was not sure whether he had been appointed by the right hon. gentleman, but I thank him for the correction. At any rate, Mr. Riddell was retained in office by the right hon gentleman, as he was retained in office by the next administration; and the records will show that, with regard to every matter that came up, Mr. Riddell was so extremely careful about his vote that he wired for instructions to the Department of External Affairs, at times, I thought, in respect of matters which really did not necessitate such action.

Now, in this instance I believe I have correctly stated what really took place; and the fact that Mr. Riddell, in that committee, said, "Why not oil and steel?" should not have put Canada, through the humiliation caused by the statement made by the Minister of Justice, and in the position with the world, that we were really apologizing for what had been done and repudiating Mr. Riddell and his action with respect to this matter, the government of the day stating that he had acted wholly without auhority. I think that was calculated at that moment to have other than a beneficial effect upon the strength of our position at Geneva.

I shall not do more than say that I agree with what the right hon. gentleman has seen fit to say, in the speech from the throne, as to the seriousness of the unemployment problem. The number has decreased from a maximum of nearly 800,000 to possibly 400,000. Seasonal unemployment, of course, increases the number of the unemployed. The number was at one time 783,000; it fell to less than 400,000, and at the moment it is considerably larger than that by reason of winter conditions. But what is this commission going to do? I have read and re-read that paragraph in the speech from the throne and I am wondering just what this commission is going to do. At the last session of parliament we passed a statute providing for social insurance, and before we left office we appointed as chairman of that commission Colonel Harrington, who had a large experience in these matters—that is to say, in the principles involved in such matters —while Mr. Tom Moore, who was also appointed, had perhaps a wider experience of unemployment conditions in Canada than any other man in the country. These gentlemen we asked to take a census and they were organizing for the purpose of doing so. Well, all I can say is that the government of my right hon. friend saw fit to prevent this being done.

I repeat: what is the proposed commission going to do? What is the commission's power? Is it to be a commission that will have control, or is it merely to act in an advisory capacity?

The speech from the throne declares:

> As a means of dealing with present emergency conditions, you will be asked, with the approval of the governments of all the provinces of Canada, to make provision for the establishment of a representative national commission, which will co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed, and the supervision of unemployment relief.

Can they lessen the amount paid? Have they power and authority to determine how many shall be on relief? Have they power to appoint officers and to say who shall or shall not receive relief? Shall they have power to go into municipalities and provinces and do that? I do not know; but this I do know, that the provinces in days gone by distinctly and positively said that they would not agree to any such action; that so long as their provincial organizations existed, just so long did they themselves propose to determine these issues. And I repeat that unless a commission has power to deal with facts and not merely to give advice, to deal with realities by doing something instead of by suggesting something, that commission will not accomplish anything. It cannot, in the very nature of things.

How did we meet that matter? We met it by asking the provinces to appoint commissions, and in some instances they did so.

In a number of instances these commissions functioned successfully with the aid of the provincial governments. What will be done now? I should like the right hon. gentleman to explain whether this commission, when it comes into being, can determine as a matter of decision just what amount is to be paid for relief purposes to Halifax, for instance, or London, or Winnipeg, or Calgary. Is it going to determine the standard of relief? Will it see that there is uniformity in that standard? Will it determine how much milk will be given per head? Are these matters to be determined by the decision and under the authority and direction of the commission, or will they be left in the hands of provincial and municipal authorities, the commission simply giving advice? This paragraph does not make that clear. The house has a right to know; and if all the provinces have agreed, there is one province which in days past, represented by the government of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and sometimes by himself, certainly did not take that view. That is all I have to say in that regard.

With respect to the camps, I read the other day a report made by a committee appointed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to report upon them. I wonder whether he does not realize that the report they submitted was the expression of the very purpose for which the camps came into being. Why did they come into being? For some permanent purpose? No. Did they come into being to provide homes? No. They came into being for the purpose of providing places where men might find food, clothing and shelter until they could obtain employment; and, what is more, up to the time we left office the average period of time during which men stayed in these camps was ninety-five days. They passed through the camps until they got employment, and the greatest number in the camps has been only between 20,000 and 25,000. In the summer the number dropped to between 12,000 and 13,000, and when I last spoke in this house it was, I believe, 12,800 or 13,000. The very purpose is that which these gentlemen explain in their report as being, in their opinion, desirable; the only difference being, apparently, that they propose to make some payment to the men for the work they did, which it is true was not obligatory; in the sense in which that term can properly be used it was merely for the purpose of furnishing them with some exercise to enable them to live healthy and decent lives. One of the gentlemen on that committee was connected with Frontier college, which did a great deal of work in connection with the education of men in these camps. I have already explained, from another place in this house, what was done with respect to giving them religious services, in both the Catholic and non-Catholic faiths; I have pointed out that chaplains had been appointed and that an effort had been made to look after their morals and health and happiness. Magazines were collected to give them reading matter, and the camps, those at least which I visited, were decent and well conducted. But they were not permanent; they were intended merely to help the provinces, to relieve them of difficulties in relation to these younger men seeking employment. I shall speak of this later. At any rate, because of influences that got abroad in the camps, their value became less and less, as everyone knows; and these influences were such as to induce men to leave their work. I had evidence of men having left their work and I took the trouble to ascertain the circumstances under which they had left. They had been misled by agitators into believing they should make this concerted move against these camps. The hon. gentleman knows that since he came into office there have been evidences of the same thing. In the camps there have been strikes that have to be quietened, and the method by which they have to be quietened we can deal with when we get to the estimates; it is not well that we should refer to it now. In any event it is clear that these camps to which references have been made were camps that came into being for one purpose and one only, to provide temporary shelter and food and clothing to young men who were not able to take care of themselves and whom the provinces said they could not take care of, and the average period of time that they remained in the camps, at least until the end of the last administration, was something less than 100 days; ninety-five, I think, was the exact number, to be correct about it.

The next point made is the royal commission that the mover of the address said had already settled some textile difficulties in Sherbrooke. I think perhaps he read his brief rather hurriedly and overlooked the fact that it is not indicated that the difficulty has been settled but that it is to be settled. I wonder whether the Minister of Justice has given any attention to the legal side of the matter. I wonder whether he realizes that the set-up of a commission under the Dominion Inquiries Act to inquire into one industry in one province is beyond our powers. I wonder whether he has looked at a case in the privy council that came up from Australia. I wonder whether he has read the judgment of the court of appeal of Manitoba in connection with the grain inquiry, in which matter I was greatly interested, because I was then occupying the position which he now does. An injunction was obtained in Manitoba against the commission proceeding with their work. Mr. Newcombe, then Deputy Minister of Justice, went to Winnipeg and argued the case with great care; and the court decided the case after reviewing all the authorities, including authorities in their own court and one in British Columbia, and a privy council case in which Lord Haldane delivered the judgment, in connection with a sugar plantation, as to the right of the federal power to issue a royal commission to deal with purely state matters, and pointed out the difference between our constitution and that of other federal unions. I had not been following the case in the press at all, but when I read this in the speech from the throne I looked into it with some degree of care. There are two or three points in that paragraph which should not be overlooked:

> A royal commission has been appointed to inquire into conditions in the textile industry, as the result of the closing down on January 18 of one of the textile plants in the city of Sherbrooke, thereby occasioning, in mid-winter, and at a time of unemployment, great hardship to hundreds of employees and their families. My ministers are of the opinion that industries should recognize an obligation to cooperate in every manner possible in continuing and providing employment, and that labour and consumers have a right to have their voice heard, and influence felt, in the control of industrial policy. Where these ends cannot be effected through voluntary cooperation of all parties to industry, my ministers are of the opinion that there are the strongest of reasons for state intervention.

And so at last we have reached it—the point where the party opposite takes this attitude, the party which, sitting on this side of the house, in season and out of season condemned state intervention, condemned interference with anything that had to do with business. "Leave business alone," was the cry. That was the point: "Leave it alone." I know my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) smiles when he recalls how those vivid sentences of his found echo against the wall: "Leave business alone; give business a chance;" all those cries that went on from day to day. And now we are told that not only must there be influence felt in the control of industry, but where you cannot effect it through voluntary co-operation you are going to have the strongest reason for state intervention. I will give hon. gentlemen something to "state intervene" about. Why limit it to the textile industry at Sherbrooke?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is not necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: It says here "the textile industry." I will give him something else for state intervention. I suppose one of the most powerful contributors to the Liberal cause and the success of the Liberal party was Mr. Burton of the Simpson company, during the last election and the preceding one. All I can say is that during the two months of January and February the employees of that organization are to lose six days without pay, in order that the profits may be satisfactory. Six days in the two months of January and February each employee is to lose pay, which the $12.50 a week people find a little difficult. I suggest to the Minister of Labour that he extend the commission to cover that. Let us see what this means:

> Where these ends cannot be effected through voluntary cooperation of all parties to industry, my ministers are of the opinion that there are the strongest of reasons for state intervention.

Was this government consulted about that? Did they know it? Did the Minister of Labour know of it? He should. Does he know that these employees dare not complain because their places would be filled by others? Does he know that last summer this very same firm took advertising away from one newspaper because it dared to publish the truth as it came out before one of these commissions that have been sitting here? I suppose now these facts will not be known through the newspapers. That is the reason I am stating them here; they will be on Hansard at least. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman, a former Minister of Labour, with all his love of humanity, that he at once begin to care for those who are losing six days. They are no longer to find employment, but their work is to be done by their fellow labourers, that much extra. Six days in two months is to be lost. Not much, I suppose, at $12.50 a week; it is a good deal less than at $75,000 a year, but there is the principle. Let the commission be extended to cover that. Let it cover that if it is legal at all, and let the Minister of Labour inquire into it. Let him get busy on the telegraph and telephone wires and find out about it.

Further investigation with respect to the monopoly in coal meets, I think, commendation from everybody in this country, but how it is going to be done in Canada any more than it has been, I do not know.

Mr. DUFF: Take the duty off; that would be one way.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another way altogether. I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman has said that that might or might not, I do not know. I cannot say as to that. But this I do say: As far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, there has been the fullest possible investigation in this country with respect to the anthracite coal industry. As a result papers were sent to the attorney general of Quebec; a prosecution was carried on; convictions were secured; appeals were taken to the privy council, which of course were disallowed and the convictions sustained. Now I do not know whether or not it is suggested that in those criminal trials something was left out that should have come to light; I am in no position to know, but I think there will be no difference of opinion on the part of anyone in this house as to the desirability of any action being taken that will safeguard the interests of consumers with respect to these matters.

The next question raised in the speech from the throne has to do with the references to the Supreme Court of Canada as to the validity of a number of statutes that were enacted at the last session of parliament. Well, Mr. Speaker, I find it a little difficult to understand just why, suddenly, all these cases are referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. Was the Lemieux act referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, or was it on our statute books for ten, fifteen or twenty years? Was there a lawyer of repute who did not believe it was ultra vires of this parliament? Yet it was acted upon until a case was heard, and then it was decided alike in Canada and Great Britain that the act was unconstitutional. Why should these statutes have been thus referred? Let us see. In the United States they have a rule that you cannot refer a theory to the court; it must be an actual case under the act. In all their statutes that were declared unconstitutional there was no reference to the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. The cases originated by the proper action of somebody alleging a grievance; they were heard by judges in the first instance; the evidence was produced and ultimately the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon their validity. In this country we have a statute that permits a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. In most of the provinces they have statutes that permit references to the provincial supreme courts of doubtful questions in order that the executive may be advised. But long years ago some of the provinces maintained that it was unconstitutional to do this; that no such reference should be made of hypothetical cases. Lord Loreburn, speaking for the judicial committee of that day, decided that the point was not well taken, and he used these words:

> —but the answers are only advisory and will have no more effect than the opinions of the law officers.

He made it quite clear during the course of the argument, as well as in the judgment, that the court would not feel bound entirely by mere advice given in hypothetical cases that perchance might be modified by reason of the facts of a particular instance that might be brought before them for consideration.

Now what have we? Just let us look at the spectacle we have. Last year, standing here on this side of the Speaker, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) denounced these statutes as being unconstitutional. The privy council have said that is just as legal as the opinion of the court in a hypothetical case. He comes into office and he takes the very statutes that he said were illegal and sends them down to the Supreme Court of Canada, asking that court to say whether they are legal or illegal after he has said they are illegal. That is the position. I am bound to say that the argument of the cases was not left to the hon. gentleman himself; that they were argued with great care, great ability and great thoroughness by representatives of the federal power supporting the statutes. In other words we have this anomaly; on his reputation as a lawyer the Minister of Justice denounced the validity of these statutes; speaking as a lawyer he said, "These are invalid and unconstitutional." Now, as a minister, he employs counsel to go down to the Supreme Court of Canada and say they are legal in every particular.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have so much admiration and respect for the legal acumen of my right hon. friend that I wanted the court to decide the question.

Mr. BENNETT: There is an old saying, "Beware of the Greeks when they come bearing gifts," and when the hon. gentleman gives that as his reason I think he is pretty hard put to it for reasons. Here is the position: Will the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada end the matter? Will there be an appeal to the privy council? Hon. members will remember that representatives of at least two of the provinces appeared and said, "We want only to preserve our right to appeal." They did not argue; they reserved their right to appeal. That is what they said.

I do not know to what extent that meant that they had antecedently determined that the statutes were valid qua this court and that they were going to take an appeal in any event, but I do say that we have a very anomalous situation and one that has never arisen in this country before.

The Lemieux act, which is a striking illustration, was discussed in this parliament by eminent lawyers. Its constitutionality was always in doubt, but it never reached any reference to the Supreme Court of Canada or, in fact, to any court until a case came up in which the defendant pleaded the unconstitutionality of the statute. The judge of first instance, the late Mr. Justice Orde, decided that it was invalid, and the privy council ultimately upheld that view. Would that not have been a much nicer way to proceed? There would have been no difficulty in having a case brought up; there were those ready and willing to bring up a case. There were employers ready and willing to test the constitutionality of these statutes. It would have been a very simple thing to do, and then you would have had the facts developed, facts of which the judges may not take judicial notice. One of our great difficulties, as lawyers well realize, is that courts cannot take judicial notice of everything. There is a limited number of matters about which courts may take judicial notice, and the fact is that a court, having no knowledge of particular facts in a case, is unable to guess as to what the facts may be. Therefore the courts object strenuously to giving judgment in hypothetical cases. Shortly put, the case before the court is: is this statute constitutional in whole or in part? There might be illuminating circumstances brought out in the course of the examination of witnesses that would indicate that some of those statutes that upon their face might look invalid were valid and, conversely, there might be statutes that on their face looked valid which, by reason of circumstances and facts that might be developed in the examination of witnesses, would appear to be otherwise in point of law.

I only protest against this wholesale reference to the courts of large numbers of statutes when it is possible to determine their validity in the light of real circumstances. I am forbidden by the rules of this house, or at least by a precedent in Great Britain which, I take it, is binding here, to discuss cases which are sub judice. I would like to say something, for instance, as to the evidence that might have been forthcoming in connection with any case brought up under the marketing act, the evidence of those who had to do with the marketing act in British Columbia, the utilization of a dominion officer as an agent, the utilization of a provincial officer as the agent of the federal authority, and so on. All those matters lend themselves to exact evidence, as these were not statutes under which cases did not arise. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) knows quite well that out in Vancouver there has been a very great deal of difficulty in connection with matters that arose out of the provincial statute, and that the operation of the provincial and federal statutes together brought about a condition which many people thought highly acceptable, while others were equally strong in their view that it was undesirable.

I mention these cases; I think they indicate a willingness to refer to the court matters that are purely questions of theory, that should be tested in the light of facts. I need give only one more illustration. It will be remembered that the Canada Temperance Act was a statute about which there was great controversy. Finally in Russell and the Queen the privy council decided that the act was constitutional. You will remember, however, that the provisions of an act passed by this parliament at the instance of Mr. McCarthy, providing for a federal licensing system, were held to be ultra vires. There was no judgment given because the form of reference to the privy council was under an imperial statute, the provisions of which were availed of. On the other hand you had the provincial statutes with respect to licensing that were tested in litigation, not by the reference of theories but by real cases that had to do with the real judgment of the matters.

I wish to make two or three observations with respect to the paragraph dealing with the Canadian Wheat Board:

> You will be pleased to know that the policy of the Canadian wheat board in selling wheat at competitive prices is bringing satisfactory results.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think in fairness I must deal with that matter now rather than wait until the questions come up for consideration in committee of supply. Mr. McFarland, Mr. Grant, and Mr. Smith were removed from office by order in council. The Canada Grain Board Act passed this house, and the right hon. leader of the government, or at least his party organization, expressed approval of the act in part, because it represented a statute which had been dealt with by a committee of the whole house, which had been substantially amended by the committee, and which afforded an opportunity to the grain exchange to exercise the functions which they said they could exercise if they only had a chance. The new government came into office. They appointed a subcommittee consisting of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). That committee made a report to council that there apparently was under the then wheat board a distinct sales resistance to our wheat; that, in other words, Messrs. McFarland, Grant and Smith were persona non grata to the buying world, and that these three Canadians must be removed from office because their very presence developed a sales resistance on the part of prospective purchasers. That is the story that was recited in the order in council. That is the cause for which these three Canadians were removed from their position and Mr. Murray—the grain exchange Murray—Mr. McIvor who had been working with the pools and Dean Shaw were appointed in their places. Now is that statement true? If not, a grievous wrong has been done to three Canadians to please the grain exchange of Winnipeg.

Let us look at the facts. I am leaving out of the story altogether the fact that Mr. McFarland had served without pay up to the time the wheat board came into being, and that he was then to receive $18,000 a year, the vice-chairman getting $15,000 and the other member $12,000. I am leaving out any reference that may be made on the street corners or elsewhere to the fact that Mr. McFarland had bought some speculative oats that he owned when he took office, and that he lost some money on them; but he never owned a bushel of wheat, he promised he never would and swore he never had. But he did own some oats and barley, and that has been bruited around the street corners in the various parts of Canada in an effort to discredit him, because he owned some when he took office and he added to them and sold and lost money.

Let us look at the importance of this matter before I come to the facts. I wonder whether it is realized in this house that the average wheat crop in Alberta during the last ten years has been worth more than the entire gold production of Canada last year at $35 an ounce. I have not the inclination at this time to deal in detail with what other countries did, but why is wheat so valuable in Canada? It is because it is the easiest method known to produce new wealth. You sow in the spring and the new wealth is reaped in the fall. Gold, oil, minerals, metals, coal—all these things involve enormous outlays and long years of waiting for results. Cattle involve long years of waiting. But with respect to grain the situation is entirely different if the market is available. That is something important to keep in mind. I am not going over the ground I traversed last session, but under the conditions that have existed there has been a lessening of Canadian wheat sales abroad. Opinions differ as to that, but I shall show that this lessening has not been as suggested on the street corners nor by that order in council. I am going to point out what was the condition in November, 1930. At that time the reservoir of unsold wheat amounted to 1,325,000,000 bushels. I wonder whether the true significance of that is apparent. Including the quantity in ocean transit in November, 1930, there was on hand in Canada, Argentina, Australia, the United States of America, Russia and the Danube, 1,325,000,000 bushels, and four months of the crop year had passed. How many bushels were on hand on November 30, 1935, in those same countries? There were 625,000,000. That is, at the end of four months of the 1935 crop year the reservoir, which had contained 1,325,000,000 bushels of wheat, had been so diminished that it contained only 625,000,000 bushels. And from that reservoir all the purchasing countries of the world must buy their supplies for the next eight months. That is, if we assume the figures given by Broomhall as to Russian crops to be correct, the entire quantity of wheat in the reservoir to supply the wants of the importing countries of the world during the next eight months is 625,000,000 bushels, or 700,000,000 bushels less than it was in 1930.

Mr. DUNNING: For the next eight months?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, December to July; that is eight months of our crop year. We say the crop year ends July 31, and make our computations accordingly, and Broomhall makes his accordingly. July 31 is the governing date with respect to these matters. Of course Australia comes in—

Mr. DUNNING: And Argentina in February.

Mr. BENNETT: But that crop has already been anticipated in the statement, for it does not become marketable during that crop year.

Mr. DUNNING: The anticipated figures are included in your reservoir.

Mr. BENNETT: These are the figures supplied by Broomhall in his estimates, with which the hon. gentleman is familiar, for as indicating his improved fitness for his great position I omitted to state that he had also been president of a milling company. I express my regret.

Mr. DUNNING: I only yield to my right hon. friend in the amount of money he made out of the grain business.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is not much doubt that the Maple Leaf did not make much for its shareholders.

Mr. DUNNING: But the Alberta Pacific did.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly did. I sold my shares at $325. But that was not nearly so good as the shares of Canada Cement.

Mr. DUNNING: I never had any of those.

Mr. BENNETT: Now let me go a step further with this little story to show how these gentlemen were removed from office. I am now going to show the number of bushels that have been sold during the five years as compared with the preceding five years under hon. gentlemen opposite. I think perhaps they will afford rather interesting reading, because they will show that the sales resistance existed only in the minds of those who alleged it. It may be necessary to say, before I proceed to a further discussion of the matter, that during the five year period from 1930 to 1935 the Dominion of Canada produced two thousand million bushels of wheat. That was its production in the period I have named. That has been marketed at what has been described by those who criticize the late government at a price in excess of world prices, ensuring the farmers of the west a very much greater sum of money than otherwise they would have received.

Next we have to inquire as to the number of bushels sold in the period from 1930 to 1935 and from 1925 to 1930. Those figures are extremely interesting because they indicate that there was no sound basis for the action taken by the government. I do not suppose Mr. McFarland, Mr. Grant or Mr. Smith is particularly concerned about a job, but they were concerned about concluding a work which they had begun. They were concerned about having their reputations blasted by statements to the effect that because they were who they were they were obnoxious to people who had to buy something. I ask this House of Commons whether or not it is decent treatment of a Canadian to say that he is offensive to Joseph Ranke of England, and therefore that he has to be removed from his office if Joseph Ranke wants to buy wheat.

Mr. EULER: Nobody said that.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is exactly the effect of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I have the order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: Read the exact words.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to follow the thread of my discourse, and I shall read it when it suits me.

I say that this country produced two billion bushels of wheat in the period from 1930 to 1935. I say further that the figures supplied by the external branch of the bureau of statistics indicate that in the first five year period, namely from 1926 to 1930 inclusive, of a ten year period extending from 1926 to July 31, 1935, only thirty-two per cent of the total wheat imported by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was from Canada, and that in the last five years of that period, from July 31, 1930, to July 31, 1935, Canada's percentage of United Kingdom free imports had increased to thirty-four per cent. Those are the figures supplied by the department here in Ottawa. That was the increase, despite increased production in England for which the English taxpayer had paid in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000 in that period of time. Further, the United Kingdom actually imported 40,000,000 bushels more of Canadian wheat during the last five year period than it did in the first five year period. Never mind our percentages; never mind them. The fact is that during the time Mr. McFarland operated, from July 31, 1930, to July 31, 1935, the United Kingdom imported from this country 40,000,000 bushels more wheat than it did during the time the right hon. gentleman opposite was in office, namely, from 1926 to July 31, 1930. Those are not my figures; they are supplied by a department in Ottawa which prepares external trade figures.

Does that warrant the statement that buying resistance had been set up against these men? Does that warrant blazoning to the world that to appease and please people, comprising three great concerns, you are to blast the reputations of three Canadians as decent as any who may sit opposite me? I ask you: Is that fair treatment? Is that right treatment? Is that just treatment? Why should we endeavour to appease—and I will point out in a moment what has been done—why is it suggested that we should appease these alleged patriots who are clamouring to buy Canadian wheat if we would only give them a proper bow, a proper way or a proper person to deal with, and not the person now there? Is that not absurd?

Mr. DUNNING: It certainly is.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us go a step further. I am coming now to the four months before Mr. McFarland was dismissed. The smallest percentage of Canadian wheat imported in the ten year period I have mentioned was in 1929, and the largest percentage ever imported into England in that ten year period was in 1932. There you have it, the situation: The smallest in the ten year period was in 1929, and the largest in 1932. We now come to the four months ending November 30, 1935, when Mr. McFarland was chairman of the board, and Messrs. Smith and Grant were the remaining members. In that time what was our percentage of the wheat which went to Great Britain? It was 38½ per cent. But the average during the years the other gentlemen were running on a supply and demand basis, and the grain exchange was in control, was 32 per cent; yet it was 38½ per cent in the four months between August 1 and the time Mr. McFarland was dismissed. Is that sales resistance?

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. BENNETT: An hon. member says, "sure." I thought so. That is sales resistance, is it?

I am coming now to another side of the matter, to a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture during a by-election as to the quantity of wheat taken over from the co-operative organization, and the amount of available wheat in the country. I am asking him where the short interest is. Who benefited by the action taken on the grain exchange when Argentine wheat went up twenty cents? Who had the short interest on that day? Who had the 30,000,000 bushels of wheat that are not in the country, and which were taken over by the wheat board from the cooperative organization? Who were they?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was pointing out that when the wheat board took over the available wheat held by the cooperative selling agency, according to the statement made in western Canada by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) they had to purchase 298,000,000 bushels of wheat. When I say 298,000,000 bushels, I refer to the wheat and the contracts for wheat making up that total. The documents issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce presided over by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) indicate that at that time there were only 265,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat, including feed wheat, in commercial channels on this continent. I wonder if the minister was aware of that fact when he made that statement? Was he aware that the farmers then owned about 5,000,000 bushels of that wheat in public storage? Was he aware that the public, about which they speak so frequently as being buyers of wheat, were the owners of many millions of bushels of that 265,000,000 bushels which they had bought for future delivery? Yet in spite of all that we have 298,000,000 bushels of wheat and futures contracts taken over by the wheat board at an average price of about 85 cents. I think that was the blackboard price at that time. I ask this house and I ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar), who more than anybody else is responsible for the present condition, whether or not an explanation can be given of what became of the difference between the 298,000,000 bushels of wheat and futures and the 265,000,000 bushels which was the total quantity on the American continent, and which, as I say, included 5,000,000 bushels in the hands of the farmers and many millions of bushels in the hands of the public.

Why? Of course there was a short interest. There were people who had sold wheat that they did not own upon the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. That is a matter known to everyone. And what happened to them? In December last the Argentine raised the price of wheat over night by 20 cents per bushel. What happened to your short friends then? Were they protected on the Winnipeg market? How were they protected? Did they suffer? Did they cover? What happened? In Chicago the maximum price was increased the full five cents allowed by the exchange. Three cents was the limit fixed in Winnipeg by the exchange as the amount prices could rise in a day. As a consequence of a rise at Buenos Aires of 20 cents per bushel for Argentine wheat, wheat in Winnipeg rose a maximum of three cents per bushel. That did not represent its value; that represented an arbitrary rule passed by the grain exchange as to the maximum it could rise. Under those circumstances the shorts were protected. That is the position.

I put this further statement to the house. I wonder if hon. members of this house recall the investigation that took place in the railway committee room last spring. Do they recall the prices of Argentine wheat then? Do they recall the prices of Winnipeg wheat? Do they remember that because the spread between Canadian and Argentine wheat was so great it was said that the wheat was not being marketed as it should be, for the benefit of Canadians? Let us look at what the facts are now. I have here the prices of Argentine wheat at Buenos Aires. When I read to the house the prices in January of this year I think perhaps it will rather interest the house to see why it is that to-day Canadian wheat is being sold for less than the price paid for Argentine wheat. Let us see what the figures are. In January, 1935, the price of wheat in Buenos Aires was 57 cents per bushel and at the same time the stabilized price of wheat on the Winnipeg market was 84 cents. It will perhaps be recalled by hon. members from western Canada who listened to what took place in that committee that the contention was raised that the spread between Argentine and Canadian wheat was too great. The prices of Argentine wheat were given over a long period of years, not for just a few months but for a long period. So far as I have been able to ascertain there never has been a time that Canadian wheat did not command higher prices than Argentine wheat. Its value is greater. Its food value is greater. It is greater from any angle from which you may consider it. What is the position to-day? I gave the figures for 1935 when Argentine wheat was selling at 57 cents per bushel and Canadian wheat at 84. Now we find that the price of Canadian wheat on the Winnipeg market is around about 87½ cents to 88 cents per bushel while Argentine wheat was sold in January, 1936, for 93 cents per bushel. In other words the spread to-day in favour of Argentine wheat is five cents per bushel. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) shakes his head, but all I can say is that there are the figures taken from an official source to show that Argentine wheat was selling at 93 cents—the price fixed at a minimum of 90 cents—while Canadian wheat was selling—

Mr. DUNNING: In Buenos Aires.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I said that.

Mr. DUNNING: Quote the prices in Liverpool where the two wheats compete.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about the price in Buenos Aires and the price in Winnipeg. Those are both points of origin as far as the farmers are concerned. I will admit that for the moment I am not talking for the millers, I am talking for the farmers. That is the position, if the hon. gentleman wants to know.

Mr. DUNNING: Cheap.

Mr. BENNETT: Not cheap at all, because I shall show conclusively in a moment just what was behind the removal of these three men from their office and the substitution of three others whose position with relation to at least one or two members of the government is not unknown.

Let us go further. Here is the story. We here have the Winnipeg price less than the price in Buenos Aires for the first time, so far as I have been able to ascertain, in our history as exporters of wheat. But that is not all. I pick up the paper to-night and I read:

Prices Sell Off

A minimum of selling sufficed to send wheat prices lower in quiet, early trading on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange to-day. Unexpected weakness at Liverpool was bearish. Values near mid-session were three-quarter cent lower, May at 84½, July 85¼, and October 84⅜ cents.

October wheat, 84⅜ cents. Representations made last year to the government on behalf of the farmers were to the effect that October wheat should not be quoted on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. We told the grain exchange that it was not to quote October wheat, but since January of this year wheat not yet sown, wheat for which the seed has not yet been bought, is being sold on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, and the price is 84⅜ cents per bushel. That is the blackboard price for wheat to be delivered in October, 1936, from a crop that is not yet sown. Travelling over western Canada to-day the grain exchange have a paid advocate going about defining the difference between speculation and gambling. He is saying that gambling consists in taking a risk for the risk's own sake, but speculation is when you take a known risk in a commercial sense. It is no wonder the hon. gentleman laughs; that is calculated to make even angels laugh and the hon. gentleman is not that. At any rate, be that as it may, the fact is that here you have the situation I have described. Lectures are being delivered to service and other clubs in Vancouver, Calgary and other parts of the country by a paid advocate of the grain exchange who is pointing out that they do not have anything to do with prices, that they are not gamblers, that they are only speculators, and a speculator is one who accepts a commercial risk that is already existent whereas a gambler is a chap who takes a risk for the risk's sake and has nothing to do with commerce or anything else.

Day after day last year in this house the wheat board was denounced for its stabilization operations in connection with wheat, but to-day October wheat is being quoted on the blackboard at Winnipeg, a price is being marked up for wheat which has not yet been sown. Is that gambling or speculation? What effect is that going to have upon the crop, upon the future, upon the prospects of this country? The answer to all this, made by some hon. gentlemen, is, "Well this is what has existed all these years; this is what worked so satisfactorily in days long since past." That might well be, but we are not dealing to-day with conditions that existed in those years. To-day there is no such thing as a world wheat market, and almost everyone except those who desire to obscure the issue knows that fact. England, producing only sixty million bushels of wheat, has paid to date $100,000,000 or thereabouts as a bonus to her farmers, in addition to what has been done in connection with the processing taxes. In the United States stabilization operations have resulted in the expenditure of a couple of hundred millions, in addition to the processing taxes. In Germany, in France, in Italy, in all these countries, three of which used to buy 200 million bushels per annum, we find duties ranging from 85 cents to $1.35 per bushel. Therefore there is no longer a world market in wheat; there is no longer a free play of supply and demand, no longer the operation of that rule to which reference has so often been made; but we have on the one hand, on the part of people who are prepared to grow their own requirements, and on the other, on the part of those who have to do with the sale of wheat, the endeavour to sell against the bonused product of other countries.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Finance says that is right.

Mr. DUNNING: That is one statement that is absolutely correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, if they were statements made on the other side I would say that is a high average. Be that as it may, however, I desire to point out that in Australia, with a depreciated currency of 25 per cent, there has been a bonus that has cost them altogether about $60,000,000. I have pointed out the situation that exists in the United States; I have shown the state of affairs in other countries, and I will not do more than make this observation, that so far as the world is concerned, so far as dealing with wheat is concerned, there is no such thing as a world price and there never can be so long as the price is controlled, as it now is, and regulated by subsidies. About that there can be no doubt.

Under these circumstances the government came into office and desired to get rid of the wheat board. There would have been no difficulty if they had said to Mr. McFarland and those associated with him, "For political reasons we desire you to get out." They could have been frank, open and aboveboard about it. Mr. McFarland wrote a letter to that effect: "Say that you want to get rid of us for political reasons and we will go." But what happened? In the first place, having indicated their desire to get rid of these gentlemen, they gave reasons; and the chief reason they gave was that sales resistance had developed against the sale of Canadian wheat, attributable, according to the view held by the minister, to one thing, and that one thing was the personnel of the board.

I submit that that is not borne out by the facts, and I have already indicated the reasons why. They are contained at greater length in a communication which was sent to the minister by Mr. McFarland and his associates, and they indicated the figures as I have already given them. I brought them down to a little later date. The total sale of wheat in North America, excluding the quantity of 19,500,000 bushels bought by the United States, nearby neighbours who, knowing these gentlemen, bought that wheat from them, was 62,647,000 bushels, or something more than the ten-year average. Yet, notwithstanding that explanation and the objection made to the terms in which their end was sought, an order in council was passed on the third day of December, 1935, reading:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 3rd December, 1935, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, stating that the problem of the marketing of the Canadian wheat surplus has been engaging the earnest consideration of the sub-committee of the privy council, consisting of the Honourable the Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable the Minister of the Interior, and the Honourable the Minister of Finance, together with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which sub-committee was authorized to review and advise upon the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board.
> The minister further states that his opinion, concurred in by the other members of the aforesaid sub-committee, is that a definite and persistent resistance against the sale of Canadian wheat has existed and now exists in the world markets, which resistance is based on antagonism to the members of the present Canadian Wheat Board.

If they had stopped at sales resistance and said, "We desire your heads on a charger for political reasons in order that we may appoint our friends to these positions," one would have understood that. But that is not what was done; the basis was antagonism to the members of the present Canadian wheat board, not to a member but to the members.

Where was the antagonism? Was it in the United States, which paid duty on 19,500,000 bushels, or among those who bought 5,000,000 bushels that had not gone into commercial channels but was still afloat? Was it in Europe? If so, by whom? It is an elementary rule that when a charge is made against a man who holds office under the crown he has a right to be heard in his defence; he has a right to know the charges levelled against him. There is a decision in the privy council in a case that went from Australia. There is the case of a judge who was dismissed from his high office because he had declined to deal with cases against himself where he had given promissory notes he would not pay, and notwithstanding his bad conduct the privy council decided that he had a right to be heard.

In the present instance, on whose part was there antagonism? In a later letter Mr. McFarland refers to the fact that but one name was given to him by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he deals with that phase of the matter. Now, I ask, can we hope to have any sort of public service in this country where men are to be thus pilloried without having an opportunity to be heard, and when they are heard and put up their case, containing as it does a complete refutation of the facts as stated, they are just simply told to get out? The order continues:

> The minister is of opinion that it is inimical to the best interests of Canada in the circumstances that the present members of the Canadian Wheat Board should continue in office and, therefore, recommends that the said members, namely, John Irwin McFarland, Esquire, Chief Commissioner, David Livingston Smith, Esquire, Assistant Chief Commissioner, and Henry Clark Grant, Esquire, member of the board, be retired, the said retirements to take effect on the 3rd day of December, 1935.
> The minister further recommends that the following persons be appointed members of the Canadian Wheat Board in place of those retired, namely, James R. Murray, Esquire, George McIvor, Esquire, and Alexander Malcolm Shaw, Esquire, and that James R. Murray be appointed Chief Commissioner, and George McIvor be appointed Assistant Chief Commissioner of the said board, the appointments aforesaid to take effect as of the said 3rd day of December, 1935.
> The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

It must be within the mind and knowledge of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at least, the law officer advising the crown, that the wheat act provided, at the instance, to a very substantial extent, of members of this government, that the existing channels were to be utilized for the sale of wheat. They were to sell the wheat; and they were doing it. The wheat board had no agencies doing that at the moment, beyond the general way in which they were continuing to offer wheat for sale. These men were carrying on their business through the channels provided by statute, an act placed on the statute books last session, at the instance of, and if that expression is too strong, then with the approval and consent of the gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches. How then could these men be guilty of sales resistance, when the business was being carried on through the constituted channels of trade, the men in the business, the elevator companies, the brokers, the great grain dealers? They were the people who, by statute, mark you, had to have an opportunity to sell the wheat of the country, and they were doing it; and notwithstanding that, in order to accomplish their purpose, hon. gentlemen make this statement against these three men, who could no more be responsible for sales resistance than a page in the house, seeing that the sales were carried on through channels provided by statute.

What follows: There is a communication in which these gentlemen present before the government the facts with respect to sales, telling them what the sales have been and what has been done. And then, when they find that they are about to be removed from office, they send the following telegram to the government, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) on the 2nd December, the day before they are removed from office:

> Since receipt your telegrams of Nov. 29th by Smith and Grant we have jointly considered your letter of same date to McFarland. We deny that a sales resistance ever existed or now exists in world markets based on antagonism to the present board. We are of opinion that there is no evidence upon which the government could come to the opinion expressed in your letter and telegrams and that in fact all available statistical evidence is definitely to the contrary. If your request for our resignations were based on the desire of the government to have a board of members appointed by it and if the government will agree to pay to each of us in lieu of salary which otherwise we should have earned a sum to be agreed upon we are prepared on that basis and when such agreement is arrived at to tender our resignations but only if the statement in the second paragraph of your letter which in our view contains a serious reflection on the ability and integrity of all of us is withdrawn.
> McFarland Smith Grant.

That paragraph was the one to which I have referred with respect to definite sales resistance in consequence of the personnel of the board. That was the 2nd December. On the 3rd they were removed, and the minister so advised us. Now I put it to this house, sir, whether or not that is the sort of treatment that any one of you would like to receive at the hands of anyone? Just put the matter on that basis and no higher. The right hon. gentleman has frequently said that we should consider these matters on the basis of doing to others as they would do to us. How many members in this house would regard themselves as being treated with decency if they were treated in that way? And when the Minister of Trade and Commerce secured an order in council to pay to McFarland $9,000, the latter sent it back with a communication that he could not accept it with that reflection against his honesty and honour and integrity.

Mr. EULER: The others accepted it.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but he did not. They were men who had not been in this country during the preceding twelve months. Mr. Grant had been, of course, but he was connected with his university, and Mr. Smith had been in London. How could there be sales resistance against Smith who had been carrying on business in London, or against Grant, who had been connected with the university, or against McFarland, who is not allowed under the statute to carry on business, otherwise than through the channels which were heretofore provided for the sale of wheat?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, on the 4th, instructs Mr. McFarland, and, I assume, the others:

> By order in council yesterday December third you were retired from membership in the Canadian Wheat Board and Mr. James Murray appointed in your stead change to take effect immediately.

Mr. James Murray was president of the Alberta Pacific Grain Company. He is a man who is, and has been for years, closely in touch with the operations of the grain exchange. He represents, if any man does, opposition, violent, unquestioning, to what is known as the pool interests in western Canada. Was Lamont sent to England for the purpose of having it made clear that the pool would never more function? That statement is made as having come from a minister of the crown himself. I pay no attention to street gossip, but those are the facts as related.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: It is not the Minister of Finance who is thought of in this instance. Do not think that everything must emanate from him. He had nothing to do with him in this instance. At any rate that is the story of the operations of the grain board to which reference was made in the speech from the throne. To-day, as never before in recent years, you have the complete control in the hands of those whose apparent effort is to lose money for the Dominion of Canada; that is all. Wheat is being sold to-day for less than the price fixed to be paid for it. Eighty-seven and a half cents was the price fixed. Did the new board reduce that price? I understand they were advised by law they had the right if they so desired. Much of the wheat that has been delivered, which had been purchased by these men themselves, and for which 87 and 88 cents had been paid, they could go in now and fill orders for at 83 and 84 cents, and the country is supposed to bear the loss. Is this being done deliberately, to bring into disrepute the operations that have taken place? A well known trader in Amsterdam has said that there was no reason why Canadian wheat should not be ten cents higher than it is. If in the Argentine wheat is being sold for the price I have mentioned, why should Canadian wheat be sold to traders, to anyone who wishes to buy it, not at the price that is paid for it, but at a price that is fixed by whom, and why, and when? That is what I want to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar). That is what I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce should answer. Let them tell us why this is being done. One gentleman gave the other day what I conceive to be a correct and fair statement of the situation, and that is, that this is unappreciated philanthropy. Why, they have got the idea abroad that this country is going to sell at any price as long as it can sell, and every day sees them hardening in their unwillingness to pay the price. What was the attitude of the Free Press in 1929, I think it was, when the Argentine was selling its wheat and we were not able to sell? What did it say? It denounced the British milling trust in unmeasured terms. Those who have time and care to look it up will find what it said. Wheat was then being sold at $1.50. That is not the price to-day. Wheat that cost 87½ cents is being sold to-day at 84 cents, 85 cents or less.

What is the agreement that is being made by Mr. Murray with the great traders on the exchange? What is the bargain he had made with them? How can they fill their orders?

It is known all over the world; everybody is talking about it. With seven hours' difference in time between Winnipeg and London they make their sales, and they can fill them at a quarter of a cent above the previous day's closing market price. They go out and sell 100,000 bushels for 83 cents and buy it for 83¼ cents.

Mr. DUNNING: May I ask my right hon. friend why anybody who sold at 83 cents would want to buy at 83¼?

Mr. BENNETT: It may be the other way about, but in any event they are guaranteed that they can buy it at a quarter of a cent above the previous day's closing market. They are able to fill orders for wheat, buying it from the board under the arrangement they have made with Mr. Murray, on terms that involve this country in financial loss. Is that the deliberate policy of the government? Is it done for the purpose of casting disrepute upon a former administration? Is it done for the purpose of casting disrepute upon the pools? Is it for the purpose of trying once and for all to finish cooperative selling in western Canada? Is that the reason? Men are asking everywhere: is that the reason? I simply mention the boast that was made by the grain exchange and the members of it before the last election, a boast which was known to me, of course, as to what they would do in western Canada. They were going to see to it that Liberals were returned in those constituencies, and they saw to it wherever they could. And I would like to know if this is the price we have to pay for it; that is what I want to know. That is what the people, that is what everybody, wants to know. There you have, against all precedent, October wheat, not a seed of which has been bought, offered for sale for gambling purposes, and we have this arrangement made with this combination headed by a former president of that great grain corporation, the Alberta Pacific Grain Company. That is what is going on. That is what is being carried on in western Canada; and as Mr. McFarland says in his letter, and as these men say in their telegram: If you said you wanted our jobs and asked us to resign, we would do it; but when you say you are going to force it because of sales resistance developed out of personal antipathy to us, we cannot as self respecting men do it. For the first time in the history of Canada, so far as I know, a government that appealed to western Canada on the platform it did and that supported the wheat act as it did, have, because of the deep-rooted sentiment they have in their hearts against those who tried to protect Canadian farmers from exploitation, from gambling and from all the evils connected with it, openly sacrificed these men at the whim of those people abroad, the continental grain companies, the Dreyfuses and the millers of England, to make a holiday. I hope the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) are proud of their work; I hope they are pleased and proud of their operations in that regard.

Now we come to the next item in the speech from the throne, the conference between the provinces and the federal government. I am indebted to the first minister for his courtesy in furnishing me with a copy of the report, which was tabled to-day. It is a statement of speeches of good will, of loyal devotion to one another and to the cause of liberalism that would be amazing if it were not amusing. Let us look at it. I will say this about Ottawa and the Ottawa conference. The Ottawa conference deserves to be remembered by all men. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) was right; it was a great conference and hereafter Ottawa will always be remembered as the greatest health resort known in history, for while the first minister was bewailing the illness of the first minister from Ontario, the minister from Queen's Park was certainly enjoying himself in other parts of this country. With such a revival of health on a scale unprecedented, this city becomes the greatest known health resort. Those who are far removed in fancy find themselves suddenly in better health and able to take part in all the festivities connected with the gatherings without any difficulty at all. It is an amazing illustration of what unremitting toil will do in the way of restoring to health those who have thus found themselves overtired.

Perhaps that is the greatest tribute that can be paid to this conference. Then, of course, there was that delightful interchange of compliments between the Minister of Finance and the first minister of Ontario. Their unanimity of feeling and their common sentiment crystallized into that expression that, when my hon. friend came down to Ontario to find a seat, there was one province in which he would not be able to get it, as far as that other gentleman was concerned. All these things express that spirit of comradeship and loyal devotion to one another that indicates the unanimity of eight provinces of Liberal thought and a federal government of the same complexion.

It is an amusing story, but what have they accomplished? There is a printing bill charged to the House of Commons; we were told that this afternoon. There were glorious speeches of good will, but what has been accomplished? The British North America Act has not yet been amended; it is going to be, but the method has not been settled. There are differences of opinion with respect to that. What has been accomplished by this government? The loan council, is that in being? Perhaps before the debate ends the Minister of Finance will tell us the position of this young child. The hon. member for Parry Sound referred to the quintuplets. Perhaps he will be able to refer to the octuplets or something like that, because there were eight, not five, in this particular gathering, or nine if you include the federal government. But what has been accomplished? Look at it. Well, you know, it is an illustration of what can be done by just making and printing speeches.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are having that just now.

Mr. BENNETT: And judging by the very little impression it seems to make upon the hon. gentleman, I should judge that he would rank it on a par with this report of his conference. At any rate, I fail to find in this report any concrete proposals; I fail to find any resolutions agreed upon. I remember a conference at which we agreed that we would have a uniform companies act. Everybody agreed to it, but we did not get it. We did not print anything about it afterwards; we did not have any speeches of good will or otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They were not allowed to speak.

Mr. BENNETT: I will come to that presently; I have that before me to deal with. The only difficulty I see is to find out exactly what is the net result of this conference. At one place I notice that, providence being their guide, they builded better than they knew. Let us hope they have some epitaph better than that in view, for certainly there is no present realization of it. We will await developments in the future before we endeavour to make any observations upon concrete proposals, because it would be idle to discuss these speeches. When there is some crystallized legislation to consider, it might be useful to discover just what has been done.

One feature of this conference, however, involves a second paragraph in the speech from the throne, dealing with financial problems. We are going to deal with our difficulties with the provinces, and a committee is now engaged in consideration of a method of procedure in order to effect constitutional amendments. Obviously before one sees those amendments it would be improper to deal with them, but here and now I desire to say to the Minister of Finance that any assistance that can be given to him in dealing with the complex financial problems of this dominion we will give to him with the greatest possible alacrity and vigour, for we realize indeed that the problems of finance in this country are of the first magnitude. I cannot overestimate the seriousness of the situation. It is idle to try to make it appear to be simple; it is quite the opposite; it is complex and difficult, but there is one phase of it that I should like to urge upon the government. It is that by those well known methods of diplomacy of which they have so frequently held themselves to be masters they should induce the province of Ontario to realize that, from its size, its wealth and its importance, legislation that repudiates contracts, however trifling it may be apparently, has the effect of injuring the whole body politic. In other words it affects the national credit as distinguished from the provincial credit. If by the exercise of those qualities of heart and mind of which we are so constantly reminded the government is able to effectuate that purpose, it will not have lived in vain, and I do commend to it the desirability of endeavouring to accomplish that end, for never was there greater need for it.

I sometimes wonder whether our friends who have to do with local politics realize just how great the real effect upon our credit has been and will be of action taken by any province to repudiate its obligations, and I do urge upon the government that by the means I have indicated, if sterner means be not at hand, they endeavour to accomplish the end I have suggested. Any Canadian, I care not what his politics may be, I care not who he may be or where he may reside, who takes the trouble to familiarize himself with the whole problem of public credit, the sensitiveness of it and the effect upon that credit of actions, however trifling they may seem to be, that deprive men of the right to go into the courts to assert their rights, knows that such action is fraught with the gravest possible danger to our whole body politic. I say that with great seriousness, without in any sense desiring to become embroiled in any quarrel there may be between the provinces and the federal power, because I realize that "provincial rights" are very sacred words. But there was a government the minister of justice of which saw fit to disallow a statute from Nova Scotia because he felt it undertook to do something that was not essentially just and proper and wise. I am getting letters every day from sources that I had not expected, from people who have placed their money in Beauharnois securities and who, by the termination of that contract for the sale of power, find themselves in a position where their savings are jeopardized and ruin confronts some of them both at home and abroad. It is pathetic that this should be so. I say "pathetic" because there is a pathos about a matter of this kind that far transcends any mere party discussion. I assure this house on behalf of those who sit here at any rate that we hold the strongest possible view as to the desirability of some modus vivendi being arrived at that will assure the removal of this—the Minister of Trade and Commerce speaks of sales resistance—shall I say investment resistance on the part of those in Great Britain who have money to invest against finding here a home for their investments, by reason of that action that was taken. And to a lesser degree that same feeling obtains in other places.

I have already dealt with the paragraph that refers to the restoration to parliament of its ancient powers and vigour. I shall leave that for the present, and as the measures develop that have to do with the restoration of responsible government and representative institutions to this dominion I shall endeavour to make myself audible in considering and criticizing those measures.

An effort is to be made to substitute stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs laws. I take it that has something to do with so-called dumping duties and exchange values. Well, Mr. Speaker, I had considerable to do with these matters during a period of five years. It was the considered judgment not only of our government but of other governments with whom we did business that we were compelled by the economic conditions under which we live to take action to secure for Canada some sort of protection against inevitable destruction by the dumping of goods upon our markets at any price. There was no method by which that could be accomplished by an ad valorem tariff that would change from day to day or by specific duties that might or might not apply because of changed price lists from countries dumping goods upon our markets. So we took a method that achieved its end, that accomplished its purpose, and that preserved the integrity of this country. When I look at the trade returns; when I see Canada's position at the end of 1935; when I see Liberal journals rejoicing in the prosperity Canada enjoys and the position we occupy, I should like to ask them what they were saying during the long five years that we were endeavouring to attain those ends. Little by little, slowly and gradually we improved our standing until we reached the position to which reference is made by financial journals in every part of the world. Read the reports of the great banking institutions of the United States and see what they say about Canada. Read our own journals. I ask this house, as I have frequently asked other people: how was this accomplished? It was accomplished by meeting every situation as it arose from day to day in the manner we did, preventing dumping of goods upon our markets, maintaining the integrity of our country and the safety of our credit. That is what we did. Let me say this: the main market phenomenon we have to deal with in this country arises from the fact that over half our population is found in the cities and towns. For the first time in Canada's history the last general census indicated such a shift of population. It is no longer predominantly a rural population, the majority has now become resident in cities and towns. Whether or not the policy that we adopted of developing the industrial structure was a right one, I am not here to say; but having once started to develop that structure, having once moved into cities and towns and urban communities over half our population, we could not, in time of great adversity, in days of great depression, unless we were prepared to go bankrupt, do other than we did.

We pointed out at the time that these were temporary measures, as they were. The tariff was a temporary measure. Would there ever have been any American trade agreement had it not been for the tariff we imposed in 1930? I have it, not from hearsay but from the Americans with whom we ourselves negotiated, that our tariff of 1930 was responsible for the fact that they were negotiating an agreement with us. That is a case in which tariffs fought for Canada, fought for every class in the country, for every part of the country. That is known, it is known to every one who wants to be fair in dealing with this matter. I say that, with this great shift of population, this great industrial structure that we have built up over these years, that successive governments have protected, we could not, we dare not in days of depression let it die. When we imposed dumping duties against Great Britain and fixed the value of the pound at $4.40 because we anticipated that the increased cost of production would bring about a ten per cent reduction in the value of the pound in a short time, we found to our surprise it was not ten but only eight per cent, and we had it from the high commissioner at that time that he thought the rate fixed of $4.40 was extremely fair under the circumstances.

We applied the same principle to Japan. Japan first of all met us with a statement that I think this house should not forget. They said: We have been buying more goods from you than you have from us, and that has got to stop. We want from you an assurance that there will be no raising of your tariffs against us. Well, I did what those who live in British Columbia know best. The head of the organization that met me was himself a Liberal and he said he would have done the same thing under the circumstances. During the twelve months ended November, 1935, Japan bought from Canada 23·6 cents per capita in Japanese money. For the same period Canada bought from Japan 37·6 cents per capita in Canadian money. If you allow for the difference in exchange you have almost an equilibrium of purchases between the two countries. Yet they said: Because you are not buying enough from us we propose to take the steps we are taking, and they carried on an extensive propaganda hoping that Canadians would support the view thus taken.

Now what is the case to-day? To-day an agreement has been made that in my judgment—I may be wrong; I never undertake to speak with any sense of certainty in these days—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I have never undertaken during the last five years of flux and change to speak with any degree of absolute certainty about anything connected with trade, for the situation has changed from day to day and from night to night. I can recall an order taken by a firm in Canada to be shipped to the United States; the goods were packed and when they reached Windsor to go across, the rate of duty owing to another classification had been so increased that it made it impossible to ship them without losing thousands of dollars. These things happen from day to day. I can only say that if we have adopted, as apparently we have, the principles laid down in the papers tabled to-day, we shall find it to be a very sorry day indeed for this Dominion of Canada. For I assure you, sir, that at any time before October it would have been possible to arrive at that arrangement, but I would not make it. I stand here to-night and say that I would not make it; I stand here to-night and say that I condemn it. I believe it to be bad, and I am as certain as one can be in this changing world that the agreement which has been consummated will bring disaster to Canada.

I turn for a moment to the position in connection with the United States. I must say something in fairness to my colleagues and myself because in the twelve months ending December, 1935, Canada bought from the United States $28.83 per capita in Canadian money, and the United States bought from us $2.23. We had by constant and untiring effort reduced the commodity balance against Canada to the low sum of $34,000,000, at the end of December of last year. If you will allow for gold and silver that went to the United States as commodities you will find that at the end of 1935 there was a favourable balance for Canada of $60,000,000. That is a point of very great importance, and one of the reasons why to-day our dollar is at par or better; the reason lies in that changed trade balance. Under those circumstances and in view of what had been said we made proposals to the United States government as a basis for negotiations of which I do not believe you will find any similar record in Canada. I am going to take the trouble to place it upon Hansard, because I believe it is desirable that the Canadian people should realize the basis upon which we were prepared to negotiate.

On November 14, 1934, the minister at Washington sent to the Secretary of State a dispatch which had been prepared with great care not by one man, nor by two, but by the joint effort of those in the permanent Canadian civil service, and had been considered by the cabinet I believe on three occasions. It is as follows:

> Sir, the government of Canada for many months have been giving careful consideration to the means whereby the exchange of commodities between Canada and the United States might be increased, and I have been instructed to present a statement of their views for the information of the government of the United States. The government of Canada believe that the time has come for definite action and that the declared desire of both governments to improve conditions of trade between the two countries should now be carried into effect by the negotiation of a comprehensive trade agreement.
> You will recall that when the Prime Minister of Canada visited Washington in April, 1933, at the invitation of the President of the United States, the development of trade between the two countries was sympathetically discussed. On April 29, 1933, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bennett issued a joint statement at the end of their conversations, which concluded as follows:
> "We have also discussed the problems peculiar to the United States and Canada. We have agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between our two countries, and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent, but also the general improvement of world conditions."

At that time it was expected that at an early date the President would be vested with special powers to enter into agreements looking toward an increase in the exchange of commodities between the United States and other countries. Since Mr. Bennett's visit, informal discussions have been carried on, and several methods of improving trade relations between the two countries have been suggested and examined.

In the past eighteen months the governments of the United States and Canada have repeatedly manifested their determination to increase international trade, by declarations of policy and by the conclusion of bilateral trade agreements.

Within that period of time Canada has made trade agreements with several European countries.

The policy of the Government of Canada with respect to trade relations with the United States was again stated by the Prime Minister of Canada speaking in the House of Commons on February 19, 1934. Mr. Bennett on that occasion referred to the fact that the governments of the United States and Canada had agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between the two countries and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent, but also a general improvement of world conditions, and indicated that the policy of the government was to continue their efforts to that end.

On July 21, 1933, at the international Monetary and Economic Conference in London, the policy of the government of the United States was expressed by you in a resolution submitted on behalf of your government. This resolution declared that the governments represented at the conference should forthwith "initiate bilateral (or plurilateral) negotiations for the removal of prohibitions and restrictions and for the reduction of tariff rates; and declare that their aim in these treaties is substantial reduction of basic trade barriere, and not merely the removal of temporary and abnormal restrictions and increments imposed for bargaining purposes." The resolution continued: "In shaping its policy and in executing its obligations under any agreements, each government should direct its first and greatest efforts towards eliminating restrictions and reducing duties which most clearly lack economic justification, particularly:

(a) Duties or restrictions which not completely or almost completely exclude foreign competition, such as those which restrict importation of particular commodities to less than 5 per cent of the domestic consumption thereof;

(b) Duties or restrictions on articles the imports of which have been substantially curtailed since 1929, as compared with domestic consumption;

(c) Protective duties or restrictions which have been in effect a considerable period of time without bringing about a substantial domestic production of the protected commodities (say equal to 15 per cent of the total domestic consumption thereof)."

On December 16, 1933, on your motion, the Seventh International Conference of American States at Montevideo adopted a resolution which declared that the Governments of the American Republics would promptly undertake "to promote trade among their respective peoples and other nations and to reduce high trade barriers through the negotiation of comprehensive bilateral reciprocity treaties based upon mutual concessions."

On February 22, 1934, the Department of State issued to the press a statement concerning trade negotiations with Canada, which reads as follows:

"The Trade between the United States and Canada is larger in normal times than that between any other two countries in the world, and it is natural that both countries should desire to restore the reciprocal flow of commodities to normal proportions. We hppe to be in a position at an early date to take steps looking to the conclusion of a trade agreement with Canada which will further the interests of both countries. We hope thus to bring into practical application the 'good neighbour' policy between these two great countries which have so much in common." A few days later, on March 2nd, the President requested the Congress to enact legislation conferring on him authority to enter into trade agreements, in a message which concluded with the following words:

"I hope for early action. The many immediate situations in the field of international trade that to-day await our attention can be met effectively and with the least possible delay."

The legislation in question became law on June 12th. Since then your government has set up the organization necessary for the conduct of negotiations, carried on its preliminary investigations, initiated discussions with several governments, and proclaimed the conclusion of a trade agreement with Cuba. The objective of the United States in entering upon these negotiations was stated by you in a public address on November 1st to be "to break down all the artificial and excessive impediments put in the way of world commerce, not only in our own interests but for the benefit of all others as well, since only by restoring the whole world can individual countries hope to remain economically healthy long."

It is hardly necessary to stress the importance to both the United States and Canada of their mutual trade. For many years each country has provided the other with either its largest or its second largest foreign market. From 1927 to 1932 and again in the first nine months of 1934, the total trade between Canada and the United States was greater than the total trade between the United States and any other country. In the last ten years, according to the figures of the Department of Commerce of the United States, the aggregate value of the trade between the two countries was more than ten billion dollars, and in the single year of 1929 it reached the great figure of $1,451 millions. During the decade ending in 1933 Canada provided a market for the products of the United States larger by one-fourth than the whole of Asia, about twice as large as Germany or all South America, nearly three times as large as France or Japan, nearly seven times as large as China, and more than ten times as large as the Soviet Union. In spite of the considerable decline in trade from the high level of 1929, Canada still provided a market in the first nine months of 1934 only slightly smaller than all Asia, nearly twice as large as all South America or Japan, between two and three times as large as Germany or France, four times as large as China, and twenty-two times as large as the Soviet Union. Over 30 per cent of all exports from Canada are currently sold in the United States, and notwithstanding the great difference in population of the two countries, about 15 per cent in value of all exports from the United States are currently sold in Canada. The relative importance of the market of each country to the other, and the persistence of trading on a substantial scale throughout the changing phases of the business cycle, as revealed by the trade returns, demonstrate the inherent advantage of this interchange of commodities, and the tremendous potentialities of expansion under favourable conditions. But no useful purpose can be served by calculating the relative shares retained by each country in a total world trade that for four years has been steadily shrinking, until in 1933 it fell in value to approximately one-third of the level of 1929. If peace and prosperity are to be established on an enduring basis, it is essential to increase the absolute volume of world trade. No better beginning can be made than by taking steps to increase without delay the volume of trade between two countries which offer the most notable opportunity.

Recent trends in the balance of international payments emphasize the necessity of increasing the volume of trade between Canada and the United States. There are six major factors which chiefly determine the nature and extent of the current balance between the two countries. These are: (a) commodity trade; (b) interest and dividends; (c) freight payments; (d) tourist expenditures; (e) gold shipments, and (f) capital movements. On the first three items there has been for many years a heavy balance against Canada, which has been met by a favourable balance on tourist expenditures, by the shipment of gold, and by the movement of capital. An approximate annual balance between the two countries is normally achieved on such other items of international payments as insurance, advertising, royalties, and immigrant remittances, when these items are added together.

(a) Commodity Trade.

In no year since 1882 have Canadian exports to the United States exceeded in value Canadian imports from the United States. During the thirty years ending in 1933, Canada purchased in the United States almost 70 per cent of all her imports and sold in the United States only 37 per cent of all her exports. In the last decade, Canadians have spent over $1.60 in buying products of the United States for every dollar spent on Canadian products by purchasers in the United States. Canada has therefore been obliged to meet the debit balance thus arising by other means of payment. In the decade 1921 to 1930, according to the Department of Commerce of the United States, the balance payable by Canada to the United States on exchange of commodities averaged $287 millions a year. In 1932 and 1933—which were the acute years of the depression—the balance was more nearly equated; but in the first nine months of 1934 Canadian imports from the United States have increased more rapidly than Canadian exports to the United States, and the ratio between them currently stands at about 10:7.

[Mr. Bennett.]

(b) Interest and Dividends.

The long-term investments in Canada of United States capital have been estimated at a total of about four billion dollars, offset by about one billion dollars of Canadian capital invested in the United States.

The interest paid annually by Canada to the United States in excess of the interest paid by the United States to Canada now amounts to about $125 millions, without taking into account instalments of principal payments, which in recent years have averaged approximately $75 millions annually.

To this should be added an annual sum, amounting at present to between $25 and $50 millions, being the excess derived by the United States from dividends on investments in Canada over dividends from investments by Canada in the United States.

The United States investments in securities issued or guaranteed by the dominion and provincial governments is estimated at $1,218 millions. During the depression there has been no default in the payment of interest or principal on any of those issues, even in face of the discount on the Canadian dollar which continued from the latter part of 1931 until late in 1933. Interest payments have been, of course, a continuing charge, the real burden of which has increased with the decline in prices. The strain on Canadian economy has been heavy, and it has only been borne by the adoption of special measures for the equalization of exports and imports.

Right there I will point out that that had to do with the very dumping and other measures to which I have referred. We can maintain our position for the equalization of exports and imports only by special measures. I continue:

(c) Freight Charges.

Since the war, net freight payments have been favourable to the United States to the extent of between $25 and $50 millions annually, and this substantial sum remains a debit item against Canada.

(d) Tourist Expenditures.

The expenditures in Canada by visitors from the United States have been by far Canada's largest annual credit item. Canadian authorities estimate that the net balance on this account has been as high as $188 millions in one year, but since the depression the net Canadian surplus from this source has sharply declined, and amounted only to $60 millions in 1933.

If we adopt what Mr. Fielding felt he could not adopt, and what successive ministers of finance felt they could not adopt, namely, a provision to enable Canadians to bring back $100 worth of goods from the United States, even twice a year, that item will disappear entirely so far as these favourable factors are concerned. It is estimated that not less than fifty or seventy-five million dollars worth of free goods will enter Canada and to all purposes will constitute a Canadian payment to the American union. I continue:

(e) Gold Shipments.

In some measure, Canada has been enabled to meet the adverse balance of payments through the development of the gold mining industry and the shipment in recent years of practically all the new-mined gold to the United States. According to the figures of the Federal Reserve Board, the United States received a net balance on this account averaging $50 millions a year in the five years 1929-1933; in the first eight months of 1934, gold valued at $64 millions at the new valuation was received from Canada, an amount practically equal to the Canadian gold production during the period. Production in Canada has increased substantially during the depression, and its value in the United States has been enhanced by the reduction in the gold content of the United States dollar. It is impossible, however, to expand production rapidly. Even if the entire Canadian production were shipped to the United States, it would still be insufficient by at least 25 millions annually to meet the net interest payments due in New York. Further, it may not be found possible to continue the shipment of the entire Canadian gold output to the United States.

In other words, we may require it here. I read:

(f) Capital Movements.

It may be stated, in general terms, that in recent years the net Canadian credits from tourist expenditures and gold shipments have offset the net debits to the United States from interest, dividends, and freight, while the adverse Canadian balance on commodity trade has been met by the net movement of capital from the United States to Canada. Capital has moved both by new long-term investments in Canada and by the purchase of existing Canadian securities. In 1931 the flotation of new capital issues in New York virtually ceased, and the meeting of Canadian obligations in the United States became much more difficult; in fact, it was necessary in some instances to raise capital in Canada and transfer it to the United States to meet maturing obligations there. A reduction in imports therefore became urgently necessary if Canadian obligations were to be promptly and fully paid at maturity. The fall in commodity prices, the decline in Canadian exports to the United States, which was accentuated first by the United States Tariff Act of 1930 and later by the imposition in 1932 of a heavy tax on imported lumber, the discount against the Canadian dollar, and the heavy falling off in tourist expenditures, combined to make the situation still more difficult. Most of the factors responsible for this difficult situation still persist.

There has been a lessening of the movement of capital from the United States, and one of the reasons is the very one I referred to in connection with the Ontario situation. In fact, it is well known that the representations made by those who represented investments in this country of substantial sums of money, evidenced by securities which they had distributed over every part of the American union, are having a very considerable effect upon the willingness to bring further capital into this country. I continue:

Since the beginning of the depression, amongst countries heavily indebted to the United States, Canada stands almost alone in having promptly discharged in full its obligations payable in the United States. If this record is to be maintained, it is clear, in view of the uncertainty as to international capital movements, that the exports of Canadian goods to the United States must be increased or the imports of goods from the United States into Canada decreased.

It should be realized that certain formidable obstacles to the lowering of tariff barriers now prevailing in other parts of the world are not present between the United States and Canada. The opportunities of a new continent have resulted in a parallel economic and social development almost without precedent. Standards of living and working conditions are similar on both sides of the international boundary. The measures of protection which each government has imposed against the products of the other country have not been determined by a desire to exclude the products of cheap labour. In these difficult times, countries seeking to maintain high domestic standards of living have a common interest in expanding trade with each other. For the past year, also, the Canadian dollar has been close to parity with the United States dollar, and the disturbing effects of exchange instability have in large part disappeared. Even if the desired general revival of international trade should still be delayed for a considerable period, there is much to be said in favour of an immediate attempt to increase the volume of commerce between these two neighbouring countries, whose traditions and ideals of social and economic progress are so alike.

As I pointed out a moment ago, and as I repeat again, we were able through the efforts we made to reduce the adverse balance against Canada in commodities to $34,000,000 at the end of December, 1935, and after creating $95,000,000 of gold, there was a balance in our favour of about $60,000,000. I continue:

Attention has been directed to the trade agreements between Canada and the other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations signed in Ottawa in 1932. In some quarters the statement has been made that these agreements render difficult the negotiations of a comprehensive and effective trade agreement between Canada and the United States. An examination of the facts will demonstrate conclusively that such is not the case. The agreements concluded at Ottawa in 1932 have been of immense importance in increasing the trade between the several Nations of the British Commonwealth. The market of the United Kingdom in particular has been a most valuable outlet for Canadian products. In return for the market thus assured Canada has continued and enlarged the preferences which had been accorded the United Kingdom since 1897. The Ottawa agreements do not, however, preclude and in fact have not precluded the signatories from offering extensive and valuable tariff concessions to other countries, and it may be stated positively that the government of Canada is free to enter into an agreement with the United States covering a wide range of products.

The government of Canada is prepared to join the government of the United States in a declaration that their common objective is the attainment of the freest possible exchange of natural products between the two countries. It is recognized that this objective cannot be attained in the immediate future, as important interests in both countries would be disturbed unduly by the sudden removal of existing tariffs on all natural products. The government of Canada would therefore favour, as the first step, the reductions included in the proposals set out in the next paragraph, to be succeeded by progressive mutual reductions in the duties on natural products, leading to the attainment of the declared objective.

I am authorized to put forward the following outline as a suitable basis for the negotiation of a trade agreement:

(a) A mutual undertaking to maintain during the lifetime of the agreement the unrestricted free entry of commodities now on the free list of either country.

(b) The mutual concession of tariff treatment as favourable as that accorded to any other foreign country; this means that Canada would extend to the United States its intermediate tariff involving reductions from the present rates of duty on some 700 items, including both natural and manufactured products, together with a number of further reductions below the intermediate tariff rates through the extension to the United States of concessions made by Canada in trade conventions with foreign countries.

(c) The reduction by 50 per cent of the existing United States rates of duty, as authorized by the Tariff Act of 1934, on a specified number of natural products, including inter alia, lumber, fish, potatoes, milk and cream, and live cattle; a number of other agricultural products, and several minerals both metallic and non-metallic.

(d) The reduction of the existing rates of duty by the United States on a number of partly or wholly manufactured products of Canada, including some processed natural products and certain products in which hydro-electric power comprises an important element in the cost of production.

(e) The reduction of the existing rates of duty by Canada on a number of natural and partly or wholly manufactured products of the United States.

In view of the declared policy of the governments of the United States and Canada to improve existing trade relations, and of the progress already made in both countries in the necessary preparatory studies, there would appear to be no barrier to the immediate initiation of negotiations and their speedy conclusion. I am desired, therefore, to request that I may be furnished with a statement of the views of the government of the United States on this highly important question.

I have the honour to be, with the highest consideration, Sir,

Your most obedient, humble servant,
(Sgd.) W. D. Herridge

The Hon. Cordell Hull,
Secretary of State of the United States,
Washington, D.C.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I want to point out, sir, that I place that upon the records of Hansard in order that it may be there.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date?

Mr. BENNETT: I gave the date; it is November, 1934. I place it on Hansard because it furnishes the basis of the negotiations that were carried on by the last administration. We did not promise to give them anything nor did they promise to give us anything, but we did say, "Here is the basis for negotiations"; and when we found—and I want to make this abundantly clear—that we could not secure what we believed to be only a very moderate compensation for what we were asked to give, we declined to give it. Let there be no misunderstanding about that. We had settled questions of lumber; we had settled many other questions; but do you suppose for a single moment that any government in Canada is justified in giving the favoured nation treatment and the intermediate rates to the United States without the entry into their market of Canadian fish from the Atlantic coast? Does anyone suggest that we are justified in doing that? And yet that is what has been done, except as regards skates, and, I think, one other brand of fish.

Take agricultural products; take dairy products; look at the rates of duty provided for in the agreement, and we will discuss them item by item when they come before the house. I want to make clear only one thing, namely, that for what we could get we were not prepared to give what was asked. That is the story, stated in that simple sentence; and that is the reason I have read this, so that there might be no misunderstanding as to the basis of the negotiations on the broadest possible foundation, comprising everything. We were not prepared to see every treaty we made with twenty-three countries enuring to the benefit of the United States unless we obtained a quid pro quo that was worth while.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott), in the speeches delivered during the campaign, said that the President of the United States would not negotiate with the Bennett government, and the Prime Minister of this country said that he would negotiate a treaty in ninety days. Does that mean that they had an arrangement that no agreement was to be made with that government, or does it mean this—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Shame.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg your pardon?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say "shame" to the right hon. gentleman when he insinuates that a government with which he was dealing would enter into such an arrangement with another government.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am trying to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I say, "Shame."

Mr. BENNETT: The shame lies with the Postmaster General and the Prime Minister, as I am going to show, who went round the country making these statements. He said, "Put me in office and I will negotiate it in ninety days"; and the Postmaster General said, "Mr. Roosevelt will not make a treaty or a bargain with Mr. Bennett." That is what he said, as reported in the journals of the country. I ask this question: Did he make that statement by reason of having any arrangement with the United States government or anyone connected with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Shame.

Mr. BENNETT: If he answers no, then why did he make it? Is that fair political warfare, to have the people of the country believe he had an arrangement whereby, if he came into office, he could negotiate an agreement in ninety days? He did it in much less time, as I shall point out. The Postmaster General said, "We can do this, but he will not enter into a bargain with Bennett." Well, let me point out that during all that time the government of the United States was urging that, even though an election was pending, we should carry on our negotiations; and I decline to believe that the government of the United States was a party to any arrangement that would reflect upon itself. I say, shame; I agree with the Prime Minister; but the shame is to those who went about the country and tried to induce the people to believe that the United States would not carry on negotiations with the Conservative government of the day, but that there had to be a change of government to make a bargain with the United States. That is what I say.

I want to make it clear that under no circumstances was the late government prepared to enter into the agreement in question. I was not prepared to sacrifice Canadian ports; I was not prepared to sacrifice Canadian fishermen; I was not prepared to sacrifice the dairy products of the country to the manufacturing interests of the United States, and I am not now, nor do I believe the Canadian people are. I have it at least from one man, an ex-member of parliament,—well, one should not quote men without names, so that we will leave that by the way. What is thought of it by persons, by newspapers in the United States or in Canada, is not the issue. There are in this agreement many things which represent arrangements arrived at necessarily by the late government; for no government could negotiate an agreement in forty-eight hours. There are may items that are advantageous to the United States and to Canada; there are mutual benefits, mutual advantages; there are provisions that are helpful to Canada and to the United States. But you have to decide on balance, and the government with which I was associated decided, on balance, that we could not make that bargain. I will not go into details—magazines, manufactured products, the effect upon the income of the railroads of the country, fruit and vegetables. Already in western Canada commercial representatives of the manufacturing houses of the central west are offering their wares, prepared to pay the duty at the reduced rate, because the freight rate from central United States into western Canada is only one-third what it is from eastern Canada.

There you have again the old story of the struggle between east and west and north and south, the question whether we shall succeed in developing a Canada or not. Are the fishermen on the Atlantic to be sacrificed along with the dairy producer, the vegetable producer, and all these others that we will take up in detail when the schedule is before the house? On balance, I say, I was not prepared to ask that the government of Canada should agree to any such bargain. The favoured nation treatment and six or seven hundred items of the intermediate tariff were matters of such gigantic importance to the United States that I felt they should pay and pay handsomely before they got such an advantage; and if they got it without paying handsomely, it would be sacrificing the interests of Canada to a mere chimera. I was not prepared to do this, because on balance this bargain is against my country. It is against Canada; it is against its development, against its economic integrity, against its future, against everything we have builded all these years, the thing we have toiled and sacrificed to create. And I am sure that hon. members within sound of my voice will have reason to realize how true that is if they take these items schedule by schedule, item by item, studying every phase of the subject.

An agreement thus arrived at—fancy! Just a few hours and it is all over. My objection to Liberal policies in this country has been and is to-day that, unfortunately, they are concerned with the event of the day and not with the implications of their acts. I could give two or three illustrations, but I will not do so at length. One is the railroad situation. A third transcontinental came into being under circumstances that brought great glory for the moment, loud cheers, and a vast expenditure of public money. Look at the record and see the amendments proposed by Sir Robert, then Mr. Borden. The implications were not considered; he dealt with the implications; they considered to-day; that is all. Sufficient unto the evil is the day thereof. Take the western provinces—

An hon. MEMBER: Sufficient unto the day—

Mr. BENNETT: I put it, in this instance, the right way, not the way it is put in Scripture.

Now let me go a step further. I will give you a second illustration. What about our western provinces? In 1905 they came into being, and they were given a grant of money in lieu of their resources. Now look at the statute. I remember one who appeared at this interprovincial conference not long since, who said, "What do we owe to posterity? What we need is money." The immediate moment! And yet hardly had they come into being than day after day they began to feel crippled by not having their resources, and agitations were carried forward just as I pointed out they would be, that one day they must get their resources. What happened? They gave over to the provinces their natural resources in their entirety, with their subsidies as well, so that other provinces of confederation claimed that they had not been fairly dealt with; and the province of British Columbia received an interim grant of $750,000 to bring it to something like the same position as the other provinces. Not content with that, for the immediate moment, for the election moment, $4,000,000 was paid to Manitoba for the purpose of putting it on an equality with other provinces of the confederation. And then, not only were Saskatchewan and Alberta given their resources, and money in lieu of them; they were given a reference to an arbitration to decide how much they should get for the time when they did not have them, but during which they had the money. They got an award in their favour. Then you had the province of British Columbia complaining and you had the provinces by the sea complaining, and not improperly, because the government of the day had not considered the implications of their act. They were content with the choice of the day, the spoils of the day, in the way in which it brought strength and power for the moment in a general election. But the implications are there.

Here is a treaty, a trade agreement made in a few hours. They say: We were going to finish it in ninety days, and we did it in a few days. The very references of the Prime Minister are not to the terms of the agreement, but: We have been in office only a few days and look at what we have done; we have signed a trade agreement. The mere signing of the trade agreement was not a matter of importance. The matter of importance is: Was the agreement in its implications favourable to the Dominion of Canada? It is not pride in having done something in a day, or in having done something in an hour. A child may destroy in a minute a most complex piece of machinery, a watch that might take a man a week to build. Do you pat the child on the back because he can destroy the watch with a single stroke? He does not think of the implications of his act. Here we have a trade agreement, unbalanced, as I have endeavoured to show, highly detrimental to the highest interests of this dominion. Not only will it be found to be distrastrous in its operations, but it sows seeds of discord instead of promoting harmony in this dominion. Here you are, with great channels of trade that were built with such effort. I think of the taxes people have borne to establish channels of trade, east and west, but now we are going to supply these wants with a cheap rate from the western United States, where the big factories are, to western Canada, and we can look in vain for traffic. That is one side of the picture.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether hon. members realize how difficult it is for one, who as the head of a government might get some credit for negotiating an agreement which the other party was willing and ready to make, so far as I can ascertain from the statements made, not to do it, even though an election were pending, because he felt he dare not do it and be fair to the country in which he was born. I will admit that it is a nice thing to have the duty on lumber cut in two. Of course it is. I will admit it is a good thing to be able to sell Scotch whiskey four years old at a lower rate of duty. This will increase our trade balance for the moment. I will admit all that. But when I think of the fisherman who is not allowed to compete with the trawlers of Gloucester except on a basis that amounts to prohibition, although they both fish on the Grand Banks of the Atlantic ocean; when I think of the dairy producers in this country, unable to sell their cream, milk, or butter except on a basis of eight cents a pound duty to be overcome, eight cents of prohibition, as everyone knows; when I think of many, many other items that I might mention to this house now, but that it would be undesirable to do, perhaps, in view of the discussion that must take place, I can only say that on balance this treaty is disastrous to Canada.

On one point I mentioned, about magazines, I have a strong feeling, because of those unconscious influences that mould the character of a nation, that make the character of a people. We had to some extent stopped their sale; it had been reduced by one-half. The revenues had been added to by this duty where the advertising was more than 20 per cent. The standard of our magazines had been improved; the price had been reduced. We were getting a national consciousness. Who, listening to a broadcast, does not realize that there too is an unconscious influence that makes for a national character? What a difficult time, sir, in endeavouring to build up a nation! Yet, with one, just one stroke of the pen, after a few hours' consideration, all this is forgotten; the long struggles to maintain relations between east and west over that dismal area north of lake Superior are all forgotten. Now watch the progress. All you have to do is to read the speech of Mr. Hull, Secretary of State of the United States, on that point, and you have no difficulty.

I will not now deal with the effect upon our industrial life of the Japanese arrangement; I will do that also later.

As to the railway problem, I do not propose to say more than this: it is quite clear to me that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) has not grasped the provisions of the act under which the trustees operate; if he had, he certainly would not have made the speech he did. It is an elementary rule that when a private corporation engaged in the operation of railways does not meet its bond interest, applications are made to the board to appoint a receiver; the receiver no longer pays interest on the bonds, nor dividends; he accumulates the money for the purpose of bettering the financial structure, and then in due time a reorganization may take place. Now, the Dominion of Canada was behind the bonds of the Canadian Northern Railway; it had endorsed its guarantee upon them, and the provinces had done likewise. I wonder how many hon. members realize that if the provinces of Canada had to pay their guarantees that we now have accepted, those who had guaranteed in the west would be entirely bankrupt. We are paying the entire guarantee in British Columbia on the Canadian Northern. We are paying the entire guarantees on the Grand Trunk, Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. In Nova Scotia we are paying on the Halifax and Southwestern, and in New Brunswick we are paying on the section that runs through the centre of that province. How many have paused to realize what that means to the taxpayers of this country? When we were confronted with that situation, Mr., now Sir Edward Beatty, and the late Sir Henry Thornton thought it desirable that a commission should be appointed to investigate these matters, to investigate what might be done on the one hand to save from receivership the one privately owned road, and on the other to reduce the operating losses, the national losses I should say. This commission that was appointed, comprising as it did the ablest men available, presided over by the present chief justice of Canada, with Lord Ashfield, who was the leading authority upon transportation in Great Britain, went west.

When they made their first trip west they realized that the amalgamation of these roads, in the sense in which that term was used, was an impossible thing, and they advised methods and means whereby there would be the benefits of receivership from the standpoint of the properties themselves and, on the other hand, the closest possible relation between the government and the operation as far as finding capital was concerned. Had it been a private enterprise and that private enterprise had defaulted, the sale by the receiver of receiver's certificates would have provided the necessary money to run the road. So year by year the trustees asked this government or whatever government might be in power to find for them the money that otherwise would be found through receiver's certificates to enable the road to function until such time as conditions improved.

Naturally the one great object this commission had in mind was to divorce the operation of the railways from politics, not politics in the narrow sense but politics in the broad sense, to divorce the road from the pressure, as the situation was put by one of the English members of this commission, that is exerted for the purpose of inducing railways to yield to communities for special reasons, a branch line here and a branch line there, the pressure of a member here and of a member there. All these things were to be overcome by the appointment of a small commission that would take the place of any receiver on the one hand and be free from the exercise of political control and pressure on the other.

I think the minister has misunderstood the purpose of the act. That was the purpose. He is now going to modify and change that into some other system, one similar to that condemned by the commission. They said that it was no longer possible to operate successfully under the conditions that then obtained. I am not going to do more than await the legislation, making this short statement because I do not believe the minister has thoroughly appreciated and understood what has been said.

Then with respect to the creation of parliamentary secretaries, there is nothing new in that; it was done here once before. We had parliamentary secretaries here in this country, in this parliament. When Sir Robert Borden asked Sir George Murray to come here and make a report, he did so; he reported in favour of parliamentary secretaries and they were appointed. I recall this very vividly, and I recall the result. Somehow in this country, under the conditions that exist, it will be found that they will not function successfully. That is the experience of the past and I do not think times have changed in that regard. I wish it were otherwise, because personally I favoured such a system at that time and I favour it now if it were possible to make it work out successfully, but I am afraid it will not for reasons that are known to many members and that must be known to those who have studied conditions as they existed at the time it was tried.

I congratulate the Prime Minister and the government upon the consolidation of departments. With all deference I suggest to the government that the Department of Transportation had better be called the Department of Communications because it will deal not only with transport but also with broadcasting and wireless communications. The bill I had drafted contemplated the creation of a department of communications and that that department should deal with railways and canals, marine, radio, wireless and certain features of post office work that, as hon. gentlemen know, now come from abroad to that department in connection with broadcasting and communication of that kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Civil aviation.

Mr. BENNETT: I was coming to that. The other matter we thought should be dealt with by that minister was civil aviation, and in the bill I prepared I suggested the name should be the Department of Communications as being more in keeping with the functions the department would discharge. Any knowledge I have is available to the government should they desire to make use of it. I congratulate the minister on having given effect to that at once, because I say to him and to this house that if he had not done it at once he could not have done it at all. I learned by experience, in my effort to do it, that it would be possible to carry out that plan only immediately after an election. For the same reason I congratulate the minister on having dealt with the harbour commissions as he has. During my unsuccessful efforts to deal with that question in that way I realized that the only method by which it could be dealt with was to do it right away, at once. Then it is an accomplished fact, and as an accomplished fact it is res ipsa loquitur. At any rate I do congratulate the government and I assure them that in my judgment at least they have accomplished a very much needed reform. I believe the country will be the better for the consolidation of these services.

I may tell my hon. friends that the order in council had been drafted consolidating Interior, Mines, Immigration and Soldier Settlement in one department. From the information I received and which we all obtained, it was believed that the Department of Labour might deal with one branch I have named with more effect than could any other department, but at the time of dissolution we had arrived at no conclusion as to how the departments could be best divided in the public interest. At any rate this is a step in the right direction and in my judgment cannot but be useful.

I think the reference to the reduction in the number of ministers is hardly in keeping with the rest of the speech from the throne, for at the time the ministers without portfolio were appointed it was known that a reconstruction of the government would take place after the election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were just for election purposes?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not for election purposes but for the purpose of making it clear that they were men of capacity who would be available when the time arrived. It was for the same purpose, I take it, that the right hon. gentleman had recourse to somewhat similar methods on previous occasions.

There is one other matter about which I should like to speak, even though I may trespass unduly upon the time of the house. There is some fear being manifested in many quarters with regard to the administration of justice. The heated debate that took place in this chamber in consequence of the Regina riots is not beyond the memory of many who sit here to-night. Then, after that, certain legal proceedings were taken and certain men were sent up for trial, with a preliminary hearing before a magistrate. In the meantime one of them, Mr. Evans, and others met together and concluded that they would petition the premier of Saskatchewan, the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). So local citizens' defence committees sent out requests that each man should sign a petition to the hon. gentleman saying:

> I have been circularized by the Citizens' Defence Committee, of Regina, acting on behalf of the 38 arrested relief camp strikers now incarcerated in the Regina jail, on charges arising out of rioting at Regina, July 1st, to impress upon you the need for the immediate setting up by your government of a representative commission to investigate and place the blame for that affair.
> I do not concur with the citizens' committee of Regina on the above, nor on their further proposal, that any and all trials on charges arising out of the Regina riots should be postponed, pending the findings of the above mentioned commission.

That was widely circulated by this citizens' legal defence committee, which made striking charges against Mr. Guthrie, Minister of Justice at that time, and myself. The result was that after the defeat of the late government the provincial government at Regina set up a commission consisting of three judges, though our Judges Act does make reference to the fact that the dominion, having paid their salaries, has something to say about the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: They were set up the day after the riots.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, they were set up but they did not function until later. Now what has taken place? I have been in western Canada; for some time lately there has been a great deal of concern among thoughtful people—not the vocal people—as to what all this means. Here are three judges holding an investigation into a matter that has been referred in part to the courts. There is no reason why any province should not hold an investigation if its sees fit as to how its officers have discharged their duties or how other work has been done within the ambit of their powers. Chief Justice Brown refused to permit evidence to be given as to where the $500 came from that Evans received, and that is quite a substantial sum of money.

An hon. MEMBER: To some people.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, to all of us. He refused to permit that to be gone into. But this strange thing has happened; there has been called into that box a man, one of these trekkers, and he has sworn that he saw a mounted policeman smashing the head of Miller, who died. This is not a trial. Now what sort of trial are you going to have? Did you ever hear of an investigation of that kind while trials were pending? I can understand an investigation with respect to the circumstances leading up to it or with respect to it. Mr. Evans was in Calgary while this commission is still sitting, and it now threatens to go to British Columbia and Alberta to investigate matters that certainly are outside the province of Saskatchewan and beyond the commission's powers. It has now been sitting for many days; the whole morale of the police has been visibly affected, and the sentiment is abroad that justice is becoming political, which is a terrible thing. It is something I hoped we would never have happen in this country.

In that connection there is another matter to which I must refer, of which I read in the press of Ontario. Only a few days ago there appeared a report that the Minister of Justice had referred to the court of appeal the question whether a new trial should not be granted with respect to a matter that had been disposed of in 1925, I think, or thereabouts. There is one thing that I think we should be able to say, namely, that there is finality about justice in this country. This case has been before successive ministers of justice; it was made an issue in a provincial election and much talked about, but in the report made by the Department of Justice while the present minister was the minister, it was stated that any interference would be "a lamentable miscarriage of justice." Certainly the last Minister of Justice arrived at that conclusion, and certainly with my trifling knowledge of law I was wholly of his opinion. It does seem to me that to have in various provinces of this dominion the impression that there is uncertainty—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt? Does he think it is right to discuss this matter when it is before the court of appeal of Ontario and when on that account I cannot very well speak of the matters which forced the decision which was reached?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentlemen who applaud most loudly are of course least familiar with this matter. The Minister of Justice doubtless heard me say this afternoon that matters which are sub judice I do not desire to discuss. There are a great many things I would say if I did so desire. I have not even mentioned names; I have not discussed the merits of the case; I have discussed the principle of a reference being made by the minister, which is all I can do now. It is now before the court; what the court may or may not do, I am not going to discuss at the moment, but after the court has given its decision I think a discussion may be very desirable, in fact may be absolutely essential in the public interest. That is all I have to say with respect to that matter.

There remains one other matter that I cannot pass without some short reference, and that is the allegation made by the Prime Minister that I endeavoured to deprive or succeeded in depriving Mr. Vincent Massey of his position as minister at Washington. I refer to this with great regret; I do so not only with regret but with something akin to sorrow, because I cannot think the Prime Minister could possibly have appreciated his own position when he made the statement he did. According to the report in the Ottawa Citizen, at Winnipeg on October 11, 1935, Mr. King told an audience that after the Conservatives took office in 1930 Vincent Massey had been recalled from Washington in order that a relative of the Prime Minister could be sent to keep Mr. Bennett in the limelight. That is the statement as repeated in the press. Speaking in Toronto a few nights later I ventured to think that possibly the Prime Minister had confused Washington with London, because of what I shall presently say. But at Montreal the Prime Minister made the following statement:

> Another of Mr. Bennett's statements was a demand for withdrawal of Mr. King's charge that Hon. Vincent Massey had been recalled from Washington in order that a relative of Mr. Bennett's might be appointed.
> "The statement I made in Winnipeg I repeat to-night as absolutely true," Mr. King declared.

Now even though it may take a little time I have to read the order in council which was passed on July 24, 1930, by the government of the present Prime Minister. Here it is, P.C. 1684, and it reads as follows:

> The committee of the privy council, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, advise that the Honourable Vincent Massey, a member of His Majesty's Privy Council for Canada, be appointed High Commissioner for Canada in London from the 23rd July, 1930, under the act, chapter 92 of the Revised Statutes of 1927, in succession to the Honourable Peter C. Larkin, deceased; and that his duties include supervision over the various agencies of the Canadian government in the United Kingdom as described in the order in council (P.C. 330, 10th February, 1922) by which Mr. Larkin was appointed.
> The committee, on the same recommendation, further advise that His Majesty the King in respect of Canada be humbly moved to issue Mr. Massey's letter of recall from the United States, and to indicate that Mr. Massey has fulfilled his mission to the entire satisfaction of His Majesty in respect of Canada.

"Fulfilled his mission." Could anything be clearer. That was on July 24, 1930, and the government of which I was the head came into being on August 7 of the same year. But in the meantime correspondence had taken place between Mr. Massey and myself. He came to Ottawa and he represented himself to be the Canadian high commissioner at London. I saw him, heard his story, and he wrote me this letter:

> Batterwood House
> Near Port Hope, Ontario
> August 14, 1930
> My dear Prime Minister:
> I appreciate your courtesy in arranging our conversation of yesterday in answer to my letter requesting an expression of your wishes concerning my appointment to the high commissionership in London.
> I left the legation at Washington and accepted a transfer to London on the understanding that the office of high commissioner was an integral part of our service abroad differing, of course, in its procedure from our foreign diplomatic offices but akin to these in the qualifications of its personnel and in the relation of that personnel to the government which it serves. I now realize that our ideas regarding this are at variance. In our discussion on this subject you were good enough to make clear your view that the office of high commissioner should be held by someone in close political association with the government of the day, and I understood from what you said that you had in mind plans for this post as a result of which my own appointment could no longer stand.
> In these circumstances I, of course, at once offered you my resignation from the high commissionership which I now confirm—the resignation to take effect whenever you so desire.
> In resigning from this post in our service abroad, of which I have been a member for three and a half years, I should like to say that no one belonging to the service and who has been engaged in its work, could retire from a post in it without a feeling of having been greatly privileged.
> With kind regards.
> Yours sincerely,
> Vincent Massey.
> The Hon. R. B. Bennett, P.C., K.C., > Prime Minister,
> Ottawa, Ontario.

He told me he was going hunting, and I did not answer him until September 16, 1930, at which time I sent the following letter:

> Dear Mr. Massey:—
> I acknowledge the receipt of your communication of August 14th, and express my regret that absence from Ottawa for a period of nearly two weeks and great pressure of work since my return have prevented an earlier reply. I also recall that you did not expect to return from your hunting trip until this week.

During our interview on Augsut 13th, I informed you that the present Conservative government considered it proper to adhere to the spirit of the statute creating the office of High Commissioner for Canada in Great Britain, and to affirm the policy which has developed under it, by appointing as its representative one who through conviction could fully subscribe to the declared views of the government relating to the conduct of the affairs of this country in Great Britain; and that any departure from that principle could only be justified on the ground of the more effective prosecution of the policies which this government believes should, in the interests of Canada, be maintained and developed.

As it was agreed that you could not personally approve these policies, it therefore followed, in my opinion at least, that they should more properly be entrusted to one who sincerely believed in their effectiveness.

For this reason it has been determined to accept your resignation as High Commissioner for Canada in Great Britain, and in so doing I would ask you to receive the expression of my belief in the high service you have for some years rendered Canada in a position, which from many points of view cannot, as you suggest, be regarded as in purpose essentially similar to the one you now resign.

I may observe that you are in error in assuming that you were transferred from the position of minister at Washington to that of High Commissioner at London. The order in council distinctly appointed you High Commissioner under the provisions of a Canadian statute, and is also the authority for directing that application should be made to His Majesty for your letter of recall as Minister to the United States. Such letter of recall is actually dated the 5th of August last.

Yours faithfully,
R. B. Bennett.

The Auditor General's report shows that Mr. Massey drew his salary as minister to Washington until July 22, and that he drew his salary as high commissioner to Great Britain until the day he was relieved, through the acceptance of his resignation.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding and because the exact dates of these occurrences become perhaps of some importance, I believe I should give those dates. I find that Mr. Herridge was appointed to the position on March 7, 1931, and I believe that information makes the record complete.

I regret having to make these observations this evening, but in view of the certainty with which the right hon. gentleman spoke it does seem somewhat difficult to understand why he should have persisted in it. I turn to the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1931, Volume II, Part E, page 6 dealing with vote-credit 240, Canadian representation at Washington. Under this heading it is shown that the Hon. Vincent Massey, at $12,000 salary, drew from April 1 to July 22, $3,709.68. Then, on the previous page under vote-credit 239, high commissioner's office, we find that from July 23 to September 16, at the rate of $12,000 he received $1,823.65. Incidentally, his moving expenses were paid, the cheque being issued for that after the termination of his arrangements with our government. He had moved his furniture before the date in August on which he saw me in Ottawa. I mention that because I hope the right hon. gentleman will realize there was an error and that we had nothing at all to do with displacing Mr. Massey. He vacated that post, and the present Prime Minister had asked His Majesty the late King to signify his pleasure, on the basis of Mr. Massey having fulfilled his duty. Of course a recall letter is never presented until the new minister takes his place. The minister may have died, or he may have filled a dozen other offices, or he may have gone to St. Petersburg. The actual presentation of the letter takes place when the new man steps in, as was done here when Mr. MacNider was succeeded, and as was done even more recently, in the case of the United States. I mention this matter in order that there may be no misapprehension with respect to what might be thought to be, shall I say, an effort on the part of the leader of the late government to dispose of the services of Mr. Massey at Washington.

There is one other matter about which I should like to speak, one which is personal in a sense. Allegations have constantly been made, and I have not answered them, that the late government was a one-man government, and that there was no discussion in council. Well, for the information of the ignorant—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: —of hon. members, I should like to point out that I have taken the trouble to ask the clerk of the privy council for a record of the number of council meetings held during the term of office of the late government and that of its predecessor. Upon receiving that information I find this:

Date	No. of meetings
25th Sept. to 31st Dec., 1926	30
1st Jan. to 31st Dec., 1927	117
1st Jan. to 31st Dec., 1928	141
1st Jan. to 31st Dec., 1929	136
1st Jan. to 7th Aug., 1930	92
Total	516
7th Aug. to 31st Dec., 1930	73
1st Jan. to 31st Dec., 1931	238
1st Jan. to 31st Dec., 1932	248
1st Jan. to 31st Dec., 1933	201

In 1935, up to October 21, there had been 188 meetings. It is easy to say that at those meetings the opinion of one man prevailed. The oath of office prevents anything more than merely stating that those meetings were called to discuss with and to make known to every member of the council every matter affecting the conduct of government in Canada. I should like it distinctly and clearly understood that I occupied the position of president of the privy council, the same as does now the right hon. gentleman opposite. As the recommendations of ministers pass through the hands of the president of the council and as he submits them for the judgment of his colleagues and asks his colleagues who make the recommendations to indicate what is involved, if he has any training as a lawyer or as a business man he becomes familiar with every department of the public service. Reading the orders in council submitted by my colleagues, reading their submissions and orders based upon them, I was familiar with the conduct of business in every department of the public service. Perhaps I owe something of that to my training, but so far as the conduct of departments was concerned there never was a time in this country when there was greater freedom on the part of those conducting departments, or a time when men enjoyed greater latitude or greater opportunity to make their views prevail than during the term of office of the late government. The late Sir Richard Cartwright said of the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, "We fought like blazes." Perhaps many of those who heard Doctor Dafoe on Saturday—I was not in town—will remember that at page 333 of his book on the life of Clifford Sifton he makes this statement:

"I was not Sir Wilfrid Laurier's colleague for eight years without finding out that he is, despite his courtesy and gracious charm, a masterful man set on having his own way, and equally resolute that his colleagues shall not have their way unless this is quite agreeable to him. I had a good many experiences of the difficulty in getting my policies accepted and acted upon where they did not make a special appeal to him; I should perhaps never have been successful in giving effect to some of the things upon which my heart was set if I had not had in the cabinet three or four associates who backed me up, and whom I in turn backed up. At that 'with a smile and a laugh that was in part a chuckle,' the old chief was very frequently too much for us all. These colleagues upon whom I relied, are gone: If I went back now I should be pretty much alone. Upon that basis I'd be more useful to Sir Wilfrid, who doubtless has definite ideas of the services which he can command from me, than I should be to the causes and policies which alone reconcile me to public life. The situation, I am sure, would become impossible for me in a short space of time. But if Laurier will take in some new timber—men with fresh ideas with whom I can work and upon whom I can rely for cooperation—I shall be willing to take a chance. Not otherwise."

I mention that merely as indicating that even in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier there were those who felt that a prime minister must necessarily exercise some power with respect to the government over which he presides, but in connection with any matters in which I have been engaged there has never been a time when men have not had the greatest latitude to urge their opinion. Usually my own opinion was the last expressed with respect to any matter that had to be considered in council. But this I will say: I doubt if at any time, reading from history, remembering the letter of Sir John Macdonald as to the relations that existed between George Brown and himself, and the letters indicating the differences of opinion between Chapleau and Langevin, there ever were men who were bound together by a finer sense of common good, mutual loyalty and confidence than those who made up the late government, with of course one single exception. That is the position which I desire to make known to this house. I have been content to do nothing and to leave it at that during all these years, but the time has come when in fairness to my colleagues I must make some observations.

There was another matter that I must deal with, because it touches the national life of this country. It was said, not alone by hon. gentlemen opposite but by others as well, that Mr. Bennett was a man of wealth and, therefore, it was undesirable that he should occupy the position he did. I want to say something to the younger men. I have been more concerned about the young man in public life than any other person. Why? West of the lakes the men in the new communities usually have not much money. They commence to make for themselves a career at the bar, or in medicine, or dentistry, or business, or some other walk of life. They are drawn into public life and if they yield to the temptation very often they find themselves in middle or old age dependent upon public subscriptions of unnamed persons or of persons whose names are whispered to them, or to the guarantees of people that they will receive a given salary if they occupy an official position. Being dependent upon these things is of course ruinous to the whole body politic. Who will forget Morley's Life of Cobden? Who will forget the effect of Cobden having received £80,000 in the one case and £40,000 in the other? Who will forget when Lord Oxford and Asquith received that guarantee of an annual income? It was insisted that the names of the men who furnished it should be given to the press, and that list contained the names of at least three Canadians who had contributed to that end. Who will forget the time when Sir Wilfrid Laurier accepted a motor car from Lord Strathcona? He insisted that it should be stated in the press that he had received a present of a motor car. When the car was burned a statement was made that a new car had been presented by Lord Strathcona. I mention this because it is an intolerable thing. In my own case I might have been in public life much sooner than I was. In 1904 I had to make a choice between accepting the nomination for an almost certain seat and continuing my profession and accumulating a competence that would enable me to be independent if I were in public life. I remember that they adjourned the convention twice, but I declined the nomination. I remember that I then had the nucleus of a very small fortune, and between that time and the time I actively entered politics I accumulated sufficient to enable me to be free from the haunting fear that men have as to what is to become of them when they grow old after they have been in public life and find themselves defeated. On the one hand they may have sufficient means to enable them to discharge their duties without fear, while on the other hand they have the fear of having to appeal for alms. I say that it is wrong to have to make such an appeal, and we should encourage men of money and of worth to find for themselves an opportunity to make their contribution to the public life of Canada. I have to say this once more: Nothing has been of greater use and value to me in my effort to serve the state than the knowledge that I was entirely independent of any influence that might surround me. I make that observation because it is important that it should be known.

This raises one other issue, with which I am done, and that is: what is to happen to our own national bank, our own Bank of Canada? I knew at its formation as I had never known before of the pressure of politics upon a government with respect to an organization of that kind. I gave then to the committee and I gave to the house the reasons that induced me to act as I did, although I had not that opinion when I started to make this organization. The fact that this is a privately owned institution has nothing to do with credit in any sense, but it has to do with whether or not political considerations, geographical considerations, racial considerations, religious considerations and last of all, meritorious considerations shall be of value in determining who shall occupy positions in the bank. I do not know what the purpose of the government may be in the reference that has been made to dealing with the national bank, but I cannot forget what the right hon. gentleman said, and with my approval, when he was dealing with a resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He said:

> May I in the first instance ask this question of those who have moved this subamendment: If our financial system is to be nationalized, whom are you going to entrust with that work? Are you going to entrust the government opposite with it? Are you going to entrust hon. gentlemen opposite, who have dealt with the tariff in the manner in which they have, under the freedom which has been given them, to nationalize the finances of this country? Yet that is what this amendment is suggesting, because it is addresed to parliament as it exists at the present time. May I ask another question? Were a Liberal administration in office would you entrust a Liberal administration with that task? May I ask still another question? Were you in office yourselves, would you undertake the work of nationalizing the finances of the country? I do not believe that any group of persons who have given thought to these matters would attempt a task of that kind in Canada at this time. And, if we ourselves would not undertake a scheme such as this, what would be thought of Canada by other countries if it were announced to-morrow that this House of Commons had attempted any such task as the one indicated in the subamendment.

It is true the subamendment was somewhat wider than the reference in the speech from the throne. I know how strong are the views of some hon. members that the ownership of the bank should be in the crown and not in individual proprietors, even though we have safeguarded it in the way in which we have. I respect their reasons, but I certainly think that on analysis it will be found that these reasons are hardly ample to justify the conclusions at which they arrive. I know that that is not what is in the minds of most hon. members. They think of credit, and they think that this bank in the hands of the government is going to give them credit. Let us have that point cleared up. Let the government make it clear that a change of ownership of the bank, if that is what is contemplated, does not mean that money is to be handed out as credit to any one who may ask for it, or that the credit facilities are thus to be made available to every person in the country. I am sure that there is a misapprehension on the part of the country with respect to this, a misapprehension that should be cleared up. I do not believe and I cannot bring myself to believe that the government contemplates any such proposal as that, or any such proposal as that which may be read into the speech of the right hon. gentleman delivered in February, 1933, or which may be read into the declarations made by his followers in various parts of the country. If it means what many think it does mean, that the government is going to hand out money to all those who apply for it, I can hardly credit it. However, I am sure that that is not in the minds of the government at this time. I mention this point only at this time because it was referred to in the speech from the throne in certain terms. I can only say that of all the national banks that exist there are only six that are publicly-owned, and I happen to know that, with respect to one of them, the wish is that it were not so owned. That leaves but four, and I do not think we desire to learn much from the countries in which those four are situated. We will discuss that in due season.

I have not made reference to what the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) said with respect to that paragraph in the speech in which His Excellency the Governor General so delightfully informs Canadians that he comes among them to live for the purpose of enjoying himself and, I trust, of being of great value to them. I do not think anything I could say would add to what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he welcomed his excellency at Quebec. There seems at times to be great misapprehension as to what our position is with respect to the governor general. I had a letter a few days since from a person whom I thought very well informed, who seemed not to realize that the responsibility for the appointment of the governor general rests with the Prime Minister of the day. He recommends to the sovereign a particular individual, having first requested the sovereign to indicate whether the name of one or two or three would be acceptable to him; for after all the king gives his representative in this country his power of attorney, really, and he has first of all to determine whether or not the individuals who have been suggested for that high honour by his advisers in Canada are worthy of his confidence. Once that is done, it rests with the Prime Minister of the day to determine whom he shall recommend; and in this particular instance it is only well to say that the Prime Minister of the day consulted with the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister and that the appointment of the present governor general, carried not only the recommendation of the then Prime Minister but the approval of my right hon. friend opposite. I am sure that nothing I could say would add to the words used by the Prime Minister when he welcomed his excellency at Quebec. We welcome him as a man who has made for himself a very great place in literature, who had been a member of the House of Commons at Westminster for many years, and who has had wide experience and the benefits of a very fine education. He is a stylist in his writings; he is a student, as evidenced by his Life of Cromwell and his Life of Montrose, and he has a vivid imagination, as indicated by the books to which the hon. member for Parry Sound referred. I am sure that in this country, where he will have ample opportunity for the exercise of all his talents, he will find that response which Canadians always make to those who come among them and enjoy their hospitality, and live with those who have made for themselves a place in the great world in which they live. And the fact that he comes from north of the Tweed adds something to his position at this time in the life of this country.

I desire to make one further observation and it is this: Those on this side of the house for whom I speak to-night are few in numbers; the fortunes of war have brought about that result. As I said in Toronto—and I was greatly misunderstood, for I had no thought in my mind of a national government—I believe the conditions that confront this country to be serious in the extreme. I do not desire to magnify them, but I should be false to my position if I minimized them. But difficult though they are, and incapable, as apparently some of them are, of solution at the moment, I still have confidence in Canada. I do not think, however, that Canada can possibly extricate herself from her present position unless all are prepared to make some sacrifices and to have a clearer appreciation and understanding of what is involved in the issues which we are facing. I hesitate to do this, but even at the risk of being tiresome I will read these words, spoken by the senior partner of Price, Waterhouse & Company, in an address which he made a short time ago, and which I commend to every member of this house:

> England, with less natural resources, has been able to balance its budget during the depression though it has gone further than we have in social legislation because of the broad basis of its tax system and its repudiation of the false notion that the rich can be made to pay the bulk of the taxes. Statistics show that in 1928 England raised a far smaller proportion of its revenue from taxes on income and property, including inheritance, than we did, and that since that time it has made only small increases in the scale of taxation, a large part of which has already been remitted. To-day the highest income tax rate is 60 per cent compared with our 75 per cent and the highest estate tax rate 50 per cent compared with our 70 per cent. In 1930, the last year for which satisfactory comparisons can now be made, less than 6 per cent of our total federal income taxes were collected from persons with incomes of under $10,000, while England collected about 40 per cent of its total from persons with incomes below £2,000.

These words were spoken by Mr. George O. May, senior partner of Price, Waterhouse & Company, and quoted in the New York Sun. I do not say that they are wholly applicable to our country, but with our tremendous burden of the public service, with our enormous obligations with respect to railways, with our cost of governments in provinces, in municipalities and in the dominion, we are confronted with a situation which, so far as I know, has never faced any other country in the world. Our ability successfully to grapple with it depends upon some form of unity of action, if that is possible. Naturally, where there are acute differences of opinion, where you have the policies of the government enunciated in the speech from the throne, as they have been, and where there are those who believe that they do not correctly interpret the future of the country and do not make due allowances for the future, temporizing rather than dealing with problems on the basis which we should like, we offer criticism. But criticism does not necessarily mean that we do not desire to render any possible assistance we can to the government in the task that falls upon it. The task is the task of the government; with it rests the initiative. But so far as this opposition is concerned, small in numbers and, may I say, not inexperienced, we are only too anxious that the great country in which we were born and in which we make our home should receive the benefit of such knowledge as we possess and such experience as we may have derived through our activities in the past; and to that end we make them freely available to the government of the day for the purpose of advancing the welfare, happiness and prosperity of the land we love so well.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just said, that frequently throughout the last parliament and during the late campaign I did say, as many others said, that the government of the day was pretty much a one man government. After listening to the four hour speech which we have just heard from the leader of the opposition, the number of subjects on which he has touched, and the effort on his part to find nothing too small to criticize, I cannot but feel that the opposition in this present parliament is going to be pretty much a one man opposition.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): A half hour shorter than yours.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I will promise my hon. friend that there will be no more four hour speeches so far as I am concerned. I am afraid it is a failing that comes occasionally to those who are in the opposition. My right hon. friend has tried to excuse himself of the charge of monopolizing discussion by indicating to the house the number of meetings of council there were during the time he was Prime Minister. Well, it is not for me even to imagine what went on in council when my right hon. friend was presiding, but I do not think I shall be very wide of the mark if I assume that most of the talking was done by himself.

Mr. BENNETT: You are wrong this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And after all, the extent to which a government is a one-man government will depend in council as in the house on the amount of time devoted to its proceedings by the prime minister to the exclusion of others.

My right hon. friend has said there never was a government which constituted a more congenial, loyal and happy lot than himself and his colleagues; that they all knew about everything; indeed, that they were called by him to be told about everything. I see some of my right hon. friend's late colleagues on the benches in front of me at the moment —not many, it is true, but there are a few. I wonder whether any of them heard anything of the legislative program of last session until they heard about it over the radio. If they did, I wish they would tell the house so, and do so at once, because I have been led to understand—and I made this statement in the house at the last session of parliament—that the members of the government were never consulted with regard to that program; that they knew nothing about it. The statement was never contradicted by any of them. The members of his own party knew nothing about the program; nobody knew about it except two intimate friends of the Prime Minister who had to do with the drafting of it, and himself. In addition it was broadcast to the country over the radio after His Excellency the Governor General had summoned hon. members to meet together to hear of the matters that were to be discussed. Notwithstanding the fact that that summons had gone out from His Excellency the Governor General, the legislative program, the whole program in fact, was announced by the Prime Minister of the day to the country in entire ignorance on the part of his colleagues at the time. If my right hon. friend is not more accurate in his statements generally than he was in that one, I am afraid we shall not be able to put very much confidence in anything that he says.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement of the right hon. gentleman is not correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have my right hon. friend's word for that, but we have not anyone else's word for it.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, you will get others' too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made the statement last year at the opening of the session, and I did not hear it contradicted during the whole session. I made it time and again in public, and the conservative press of the country never contradicted it. It cannot be contradicted. My right hon. friend knows that perfectly well.

Mr. BENNETT: I will say at once to the right hon. gentleman that the speeches were not read to my colleagues, but the fact that the speeches would be made, and the general sense of what they would contain was made long before that, in point of fact, as early as the economic conference in London.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Three years!

Mr. KING: So long before, it had gone completely out of their memories, I am sure. However, we will leave the matter at that.

After all that my right hon. friend has said by way of criticism, I might appear to be wanting in gratitude if I did not seize the earliest moment to thank him for the little scrap of congratulation that he did give to the government in the course of his four-hour speech. He was good enough to say, "We shall have to congratulate the government upon consolidating certain services of the government and also upon having centralized the administration of the harbours." I thank my right hon. friend very sincerely for that extremely generous recognition. It was a little spoiled, perhaps, by the words which followed, namely that he himself had had ideas of the same kind. But if I remember rightly—and I think I have a fairly good memory on some of these things—I said to my right hon. friend, when he came into office in 1930, that there were, I believe, some things that might be done to advantage. I mentioned to him then the desirability of consolidating some of the departments which had to do with transportation and communications. I think he will remember that. So, if we are to run back into the past to where these ideas originated, I hope he will give me a little credit. The difference however is that my right hon. friend had five years of office and he had six sessions in which to carry out that reform, but in the course of that time he never got the proposal even as far as the speech from the throne. He has congratulated me, however, and I thank him for having done so, and as he said, for having done what has been done so quickly. Why was my right hon. friend not congratulatory on the same score in regard to the Canada United States trade agreement? Hon. members who heard him speak about the agreement with the United States will recall that my hon. friend's criticism then was that what was done was done far too quickly. The criticism was that the negotiation of that agreement should have extended over a long time. Again I say that my right hon. friend had five years in which to negotiate an agreement with the United States. If I had waited five years there would be no agreement at this time or any time to come. My right hon. friend made it extremely difficult for the incoming government to make the agreement by putting off so long dissolving parliament, by holding on to office two years, at least, beyond the time he should have continued having regard to the views of the people of this country, and bringing matters to the point where it was difficult, within the limited time that remained to the government of the United States before it would again have to appeal to the country, to attempt the negotiation of a trade agreement such as the one that has been put through. I will take another time to speak more particularly of the trade agreement. I just wish at the moment to point out to my right hon. friend, seeing that he knows a little of the importance of doing some things at one time if they are to be done at all, that the making of an agreement with the United States and Canada in the matter of trade was one of the most urgent matters a government could be confronted with, and if the moment had not been seized, and seized to the full by the government itself, it would, I believe, have been impossible at this time to effect any agreement with the United States.

My right hon. friend has spoken of one or two other matters that are of a personal nature. I had hoped perhaps he might have thought that as a result of the views expressed by the people, the evident will and wish of the people of Canada with respect to public matters, some things that had been the subject of discussion and debate in the general election, which lasted for four months or more, might have been left alone to-night. However, my right hon. friend, in connection with anything that touches himself, has a particular habit of not hesitating to take up other people's time in airing his grievance; and I hasten at once to say to him that if I have in any way injured his feelings, or made a mistake in anything I have said as to the appointment of Mr. Herridge to Washington being due to the fact that he was my right hon. friend's brother-in-law, of course I apologize at once. The leader of the opposition has brought this matter up himself. He has said that at Winnipeg I asked the question whether Canada had really gained by the recall of Mr. Massey and the substitution for Mr. Massey at Washington of someone who would keep his own name more or less to the fore. He has brought that up himself. I have not with me any statement of what I said at Winnipeg, but I recall very distinctly what I had in mind to say. The purport of my remark was this, that Mr. Massey did come back from Washington, was recalled from Washington just prior to the time my right hon. friend went into office. He had been appointed, it is true, to London. When my right hon. friend took office, he told Mr. Massey quite distinctly that he could not go to London. He knew that Mr. Massey would like to have returned to Washington; that the people of this country would have liked Mr. Massey to go back to Washington and continue in Washington.

Mr. BENNETT: Never even suggested it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes he did. He quite distinctly suggested it. My right hon. friend knows that very well.

Mr. BENNETT: Not only is it not correct, but Mr. Massey was aware of the fact that the right hon. gentleman asked that the king sign, as he did on 5th August, his recall, before I ever saw him at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That does not alter the point I am bringing out at the moment. The king would naturally sign Mr. Massey's recall when Mr. Massey was appointed to London, but this is the point I was making, and I repeat it to-night: My right hon. friend did not allow Mr. Massey to go to London. He knew Mr. Massey had done exceptionally well in the diplomatic service of Canada; that he had given up many of his own private interests and business to devote his life to diplomatic work; that he was available to be returned to Washington if my right hon. friend wished to have him go back there, and that the people of Canada would have greatly welcomed Mr. Massey's return to Washington. Mr. Massey would have served my right hon. friend just as loyally as he had served the government to which he had previously belonged. What took place? Mr. Massey was not allowed to go to London; neither was he allowed to be returned to Washington, but what happened instead? Mr. Herridge was appointed to Washington, but was not appointed, if I am not mistaken, until about a year after the time the vacancy was created at Washington, and Mr. Massey's letter of recall was not presented to the President of the United States until over a year after the king had signed the recall. In that interval of time my right hon. friend, had he wished to send Mr. Massey to Washington instead of having the position filled as it was filled, could have easily asked his majesty to allow the previous recall to be cancelled. It was entirely a choice between the two, as my right hon. friend well knows. The right hon. gentleman does not seem to see the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give it to him very plainly. My right hon. friend is fond of citing tradition and of standing up for ideals in public life. Let me tell him that I can recall a time when Sir Oliver Mowat, then premier of Ontario—and he was one of the most highly respected premiers any province ever had—appointed his nephew as a sheriff, he was almost defeated in a general election through the cry of nepotism that was raised against him. I say to my right hon. friend that, if he had possessed a more delicate sense of appreciation of what is right in public matters, and of the fitness of things, he would have thought twice before sending to Washington as the minister from Canada his brother-in-law, Mr. Herridge, in preference to a minister such as Mr. Massey, who had given such exceptional service in the diplomatic service of Canada.

I am prepared to leave myself to the judgment of the house as to whether or not my remarks have been warranted. May I say at once to my right hon. friend that, if as a result of his bringing up this matter, which made it necessary for me to say what I have said to-night, his feelings, or those of Mr. Herridge, or anyone else, have been hurt in any particular, I am exceedingly sorry for that; but, like himself, I have a public duty to perform as Prime Minister and leader of a party, and the criticism I made in regard to that appointment was made on just the grounds I have given to this house to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what was said either in Winnipeg or in Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the purport of it, and in any event that is what is being said now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that some hon. members opposite who have been behind their leader in previous years still carry on their old practice of interrupting and not hesitating to say insulting little things whenever they can. I do not think they will carry the practice to quite the same extreme this session as they have done previously, but to one who is occupying for the first time the position of whip of his party, I would say that if he wishes to receive the courtesies that are expected from this side of the house he will have to begin to extend them himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say that as I listened to the speech of my right hon. friend to-night I was reminded of his concluding remarks when he was occupying the office of Prime Minister at the opening of the first session of the last parliament, and was replying to myself as leader of the opposition. In concluding he said that he thought the people of Canada at least would agree that he had some business instinct and, being a man with great business instinct, he was not going to waste the time of parliament by replying at any length to the leader of the opposition; that what we were here for was to get on with the business. I do not know about private business, but as far as public business is concerned I think I can say to my right hon. friend that in four or five months I have done more than he did in as many years. However, I intend to follow the example he set at that time, and I will not waste undue time by taking too long to reply to what he has said this afternoon and to-night. There is much that is touched upon in the speech from the throne that one is not expected to take up during the opening debate of the session. The different measures there mentioned will all come before the house for review at length and in detail during the session, and there will be time enough then to touch upon them.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

But before I leave this question of business instinct may I say a word or two to my right hon. friend about another instinct, the political instinct. To listen to my right hon. friend to-night one would have thought nothing had occurred between the time he dissolved parliament some months ago, and the assembling of the present parliament. For the most part what we listened to to-night and what we have been listening to since half past four this afternoon, has been said by my right hon. friend ad nauseam during past sessions of parliament and on the hustings. There was very little in it all that was new. The manner was the same; the faultfinding, the scolding, the denunciation—all that was just true to form, with very little that could be in the least helpful. Let me tell my right hon. friend, because he will come to realize it more and more as the months go by, that he no longer has, from one end of this house to the other, a group of "yes, yes" gentlemen who are prepared to applaud every remark of his as it is made, and continue to do so for any length of time. He had better begin to adjust himself at once to new conditions, because he will find it very unpleasant if he does not.

May I now touch on one or two of the matters to which my right hon. friend has referred. First of all, I am always pleased of an opportunity to join with my right hon. friend in anything that is congenial and pleasant; the opportunity comes so seldom. He has been kind enough to extend his congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address, and I join with him most heartily in extending warmest congratulations, not on my own behalf alone but on behalf of all hon. members on this side of the house and, I think I may say, all hon. members of the house on the excellence of the speeches they have delivered to-day. The Prime Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad I made that mistake; my right hon. friend paid me the same compliment shortly after taking office, so now we are even.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be the influence of the yes, yes men.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend alluded to Dr. Dafoe's address on Saturday, not the Parry Sound Dafoe referred to this afternoon, but the equally sound and well known Dafoe from Winnipeg, the editor-in-chief of the Winnipeg Free Press. Doctor Dafoe said that years ago, in the old parliaments, the blue ribbon of the legal profession was generally given that man, or he was regarded as having earned it, who had won a foremost place in his profession and then won as well a seat in parliament. I think I may truly say that by the speech he delivered to-day, the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has already won the blue ribbon not of his profession only but also of parliament. He brings as an invaluable acquisition to this House of Commons the great abilities and talents which have become so evident to all in his profession, and indeed to the country generally, not only by the leading role he has so long played in the courts, but equally by the outstanding place he holds on the platform in the province from which he comes.

May I also congratulate very warmly my young friend the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemount (Mr. Fournier), who has charmed and delighted us all with his brilliant address in French, and in part in English as well. My friend was selected for this responsible duty as the youngest member on the Liberal side of the house. He has had some experience in business, but has given up business to enter one of the learned professions. He is now, I believe, engaged in studies at the university preparing himself for the practice of law. I think I may say to my hon. friend that, if he conserves his health and strength and continues with industry as he has done, he will achieve a very high place both in his profession and in the public life of our country. I extend to him not only my congratulations but my best wishes as well.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of joining with the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and with the mover (Mr. Slaght) and seconder (Mr. Fournier) of the resolution for an address to His Excellency, in saying how delighted we all are that His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir has been chosen to be the king's representative in this country. The fact that Lord Tweedsmuir had the close personal association he enjoyed with the late King George, that he had the honour of writing of the life and reign of the king as he has done so charmingly and effectively in The King's Grace,—and that he represented his late majesty as commissioner to the assembly of the Church of Scotland—all these associations with the late king, whose appointee he was, are additional links with himself which are much cherished by the people of this country. The warm welcome which has been extended to Lord Tweedsmuir since his arrival in Canada speaks for itself. It has made clear to him, I am sure, that his great achievements and his versatile gifts have been well known to the people of Canada for many years. We all appreciate his excellency's expression of pleasure at the association to which he is looking forward for the next five years. It is an association, with both himself and the Lady Tweedsmuir, to which the people of Canada of all classes and in all parts are also looking forward with great pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, as was natural enough, has sought to bolster up the position of his small army and himself by saying that a great many of the members on this side of the house were returned by a minority of votes. He sought in those words to create the impression that, perhaps, after all, we who are so numerous on this side do not represent to the extent that we appear to do, the people of Canada. May I say that, had it not been for candidates returned by a minority of the votes, there would have hardly been any one on the other side of the house at all, and our numbers would have been very much larger than they are. Let me give a figure or two in regard to the situation. We have on this side of the house 178 Liberal members. When I speak of this side of the house of course I include the best of the other side. In that regard I must apologize for having failed to mention that, when my right hon. friend was congratulating those who moved and seconded the address at the time he had a large following immediately behind him on this side, he said they were most deserving of congratulation because of what they represented of the feelings of the people of Canada towards his government. Well, if that was the case, what must my right hon. friend think of the extent of the congratulations which should be conveyed to the mover and seconder to-day, when he finds himself encompassed by the cloud of witnesses which surround him telling of what the people think respectively of him and of me? I am putting it in this personal way in order to keep company with my right hon. friend—what I should say, speaking to the house and the country, is what they thought of the respective policies of the different parties as enunciated by their respective leaders. There are 178 Liberal members. It is true that of that number 85 were returned by a minority of votes. But may I point out—and it was something which was stressed over and over again by myself and other Liberal speakers in the campaign—that one of the unavoidable effects of a large number of parties in a campaign is that candidates are bound to be returned in increasing numbers by a minority of votes. There has never been a campaign in Canada in which there were so many parties contesting the honours as we had in the last election. In addition to the old Conservative party, we had our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We had the new revolutionary army, the Reconstruction party; and we had our friends who came into being as a federal party after the election had been called, and who were fortunate in getting in at that particular moment, running for the first time as Social Creditors. Furthermore, we had some independent members. Altogether it was a great array. But the mere fact that there were so many candidates made it inevitable that a very large number of members of parliament would be returned by a minority of votes. It so happens that eighty-five out of the 178 of the Liberal party were returned by a minority of votes. But what about the other parties? Where would they have been if some of their candidates had not got in by a minority of votes? My right hon. friend has at the present time thirty-eight followers. Of that number thirty-five were returned by a minority of votes. Almost every hon. member opposite must be thanking the lord for being of the minority on this occasion. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition would not have had as many followers as he has fingers on either hand but for those of his followers who were returned by a minority of votes.

Take the other members of the house. I hope none of them will be offended if, for their convenience as well as ours, we speak of them combined as the independent members. They will not agree to support the government, I understand, and they do not want to support my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Supporting outright neither the government nor the opposition, I assume that, whether they are Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, or Social Credit or Reconstruction or avowedly independent, they will wish to regard themselves as independent members of the house. Unless they would deem it a mistaken way in which to speak of them all when I wish to speak of them collectively, I propose to adopt that designation throughout the session.

Mr. SPENCE: Where do you put Mr. Neill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is in the right place just where he is; my hon. friend need not worry about him. I say that it seems proper to refer to those who avowedly support neither the government nor the opposition as the independent members of the house. They have their groups, and unfortunately or fortunately—fortunately I think—they have their differences. There are twenty-seven independent members in the house. Of that number, seventeen were returned by a minority of votes. If we take a bird's eye view of the entire situation, we find that, of the Liberal party's membership in this House of Commons 47·7 per cent were returned by a minority of votes; of the Conservative party membership, 87·5 per cent were returned by a minority of votes; and of members of independent groups, 62·9 per cent were returned by a minority of votes.

Just in case there may be any doubt in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite as to what the country thinks of the government, since it has taken office, may I say that, in the short time we have held office, there have already been three byelections. In none of these was a candidate returned by a minority of votes. In two instances, the government's candidate was returned by acclamation. In the other case, where there was an actual election to test, among other things, the views of the people of western Canada with respect to the government's wheat policy, to which my right hon. friend has referred at such length, the minister of the crown, who was opposed on the platform by a supporter in this house of my right hon. friend, and by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, was returned by a majority of between 3,000 and 4,000 votes, 3,600 in fact. Whereas the Liberal member at the last election had received only 41 per cent of the entire vote, my hon. friend the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) received 66 per cent. So far as the government is concerned, hon. members may feel that numerically we represent the people of this country in a perfectly just and fair manner. If anything, we are fewer in numbers than we would have been had there been only two parties instead of the number there were.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 11, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1936-37

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1937, was presented by Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance), and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION RESPECTING UNLAWFUL ASSOCIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Will the Minister of Justice say whether it is the intention of the government at this session to bring in legislation with regard to the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): There will certainly be some legislation with respect to that section.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. A. G. Slaght for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): At the conclusion of his long address yesterday, my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said that he would like very much to offer to this side of the house his helpful cooperation in the difficult task with which governments of the present day are confronted. I think it was a fortunate thing for my right hon. friend that he made that statement at the end of his speech rather than at the beginning, because until the moment he made it there had been, I must say, nothing in his remarks which could have been construed as in any way helpful. They were, indeed, directly the opposite.

May I say to the leader of the opposition that he has had a long and exceptional parliamentary experience. He spoke very often from this side of the house of the great burden which rests on the shoulders of a prime minister, and the need on the part of the Prime Minister for the cooperation of hon. members in all parts of the house. I hope the right hon. gentleman will keep that in mind now that he is on the other side of the house. I shall welcome very much, the government will welcome, what he is able to give in the way of cooperation in dealing with the great problems which we have before us for consideration from day to day in these times. I hope that my right hon. friend will not again find it necessary to spend his time wholly in criticism or sarcasm, or in remarks that for the most part are facetious and in no way constructive or helpful.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends opposite are groaning a bit, but may I ask them just how, in seeking to be "helpful", their leader began his discourse yesterday. The first thing he did was to say that no doubt, as Prime Minister, I should find considerable difficulty in having so large a following. It was very natural that he should make a remark of that kind. Heaven knows with a very much smaller following he had enough difficulty to cope with all the time he was in office. The following he has behind him at the present moment is eloquent of the results of difficulties and discussions which he had at different times with some of his colleagues and members of his party.

The leader of the opposition was at particular pains to try to tell this house what had taken place during the formation of the present government. I heard him say repeatedly, when he was on this side of the house, that matters which pertained to the cabinet, and to his own party, were their business and nobody else's, and that it might be just as well for other people to mind their own business. I give him back his own words at this time. May I say that I think it ill became him, knowing the problems that face any first minister in the formation of a cabinet, to seek, at the very beginning of a parliamentary session, to create prejudice, not only as between different members of a party, but as between different parts of the country, by an appeal to race such as he sought to make in the remarks he offered at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I must inform the right hon. gentleman that I made no such statement, and the effort he is now making to create the very situation to which he refers is entirely out of order. I read from the statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not referring to that remark at all. That is one of many remarks. I am referring to what my right hon. friend said about my colleague the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). He undertook to tell this house what he assumed had transpired in the formation of the present government.

Mr. BENNETT: It is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend knows more, apparently, about the formation of the present government than its members do.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not the formation of it. It was a circumstance in connection with the men who were offered positions in the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend knows the rules of the house, and if he can just keep still for a little while he will set a better example to his own following and the rest of the house than he is doing at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, no hon. member of this house has the right to misrepresent another. My right hon. friend was misrepresenting what I said, and I claim the right to correct the misstatements made by the Prime Minister. That is a question of order which I have the right to bring to the attention of the chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. leader of the opposition to state what the misrepresentations are.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what I was doing. The right hon. gentleman made statements that were not in accordance with the facts as to what I had said, and I corrected him. I should have addressed the Chair in so doing.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A fine point of order!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Fortunately my right hon. friend's remarks are recorded on Hansard. Perhaps I may read to him just what he said. My right hon. friend intimated that one of my colleagues, who had been a colleague for many years, had gained the position that he now holds in the cabinet by "training his guns" on his leader. Does my right hon. friend deny that?

Mr. BENNETT: My right hon. friend has said that he would read from Hansard what I said. Let him do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I shall. My right hon. friend, referring to the hon. member for Richelieu, is reported in Hansard as follows:

> But the little corporal from Sorel was not thus to be denied. The support the party had received from the province enabled the little corporal to train his guns upon the Prime Minister—

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

> —and in the words of Abraham Lincoln, "the coon came down." For we find that the little corporal had been able successfully to maintain his position. The little corporal from Sorel had become the emperor of the day.

And then, bringing out the real point of the remark, which as I have said was intended to create racial differences if possible, my right hon. friend ended by saying:

> In that position I am sure he will—

Referring to the present Minister of Public Works.

> —in the words of the Minister of Justice, cast no reflection upon the people he represents and will discharge his great duties with fairness and with a sense of obligation that comes to one who is from a province that took the lead from 1930 and is now able to enforce its will upon the Prime Minister.

I ask if the remark, that one province in this country is able to force its will upon the Prime Minister, is not, in the relation mentioned, a deliberate effort on the part of the leader of the opposition to create prejudice against the province of Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you want the answer now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. My right hon. friend may keep still. He has done a lot of talking. I want to tell my right hon. friend that, while I have always had and expect always to have loyal and wholehearted support from the province of Quebec, I have in this parliament an even larger and equally loyal support from the province of Ontario, and an equally loyal support from all other parts of this dominion. And it ill becomes him, at the beginning of the session, to attempt to create prejudice in the minds of the electorate by seeking to convey ideas of domination on the part of any one particular province. May I say with respect to "the little corporal from Sorel," that he is at my side, as loyal and as helpful as he has been from the day he entered parliament up to this hour, and as loyal and helpful as he will be at all times. There has never been any difference between my hon. friend and myself. As the former Prime Minister knows, in the formation of any cabinet no positions are finally determined until the last moment. All sides and possible relations are carefully canvassed. Until a ministry is sworn, it is impossible to say what the final decision is going to be. In the formation of the present government there has been, I venture to say, less in the way of difficulty than there has been in the formation of any government in the past.

May I say speaking of the formation of a cabinet, that great difficulties confront every prime minister; not difficulties merely but actual hardships are encountered. I do not suppose there can be any position more embarrassing, more painful to one who has had loyal and faithful colleagues than to have to consider whether, when they have served in previous governments, they should continue to serve in another government. There are present in this house to-day at least two hon. members who were former colleagues of mine in the government. If I had been consulting my personal feelings, if I had been governed by personal wishes in the matter, those two gentlemen would have been members of the present administration. But, as the leader of a party, as the Prime Minister of the country, I have obligations to consider which are of a public nature. In these days youth as well as experience and advanced years is demanding its place at the council tables. My two formers colleagues who, because of their years, are not in this cabinet, were the first to recognize the reasonableness of that position. I mention the point because, so far as I am concerned, it is the only matter with one exception that caused me any real embarrassment in the formation of the government. The exception was that I found it necessary also in the public interest, to reduce the number of portfolios. Instead of having a cabinet of twenty-one, as my right hon. friend had when he went out of office and appealed to the people, I reduced the number, as I thought the country would wish it to be reduced, to sixteen. In this great gathering of the House of Commons to-day, there are any number of Liberal members who might well aspire to and feel themselves entitled to a position in the cabinet. Many of them have reason to feel that their abilities as well as their long and faithful service should have been recognized in that way. All I can say to them, and it must be apparent to all, is that when there are only sixteen positions one cannot take in more than sixteen persons. I think that situation is well understood. If my right hon. friend in the course of his address had spoken along these lines, he would have been more constructively helpful than he was.

Speaking of relations with colleagues, may I say to my right hon. friend that I have never had a band of colleagues who deserted me on the eve of battle. I have never had generals in my army train their guns on me the night before the conflict, and demand life positions somewhere that they might be secure and out of the public arena. Nor have I found it necessary at any time to appoint to office a very large percentage of my own party before I went into a general election. My right hon. friend, immediately before appealing to the people, had the following colleagues leave him: his former Minister of Finance, who was appointed to the senate; his former Minister of Justice, who was made chairman of the railway commission; his former Minister of Marine, who was made a judge; his former Postmaster General, who was appointed to the senate; his former Minister of Pensions and National Health, who was made a lieutenant-governor, and another minister without portfolio, who was appointed to the Senate. But that is not all. My right hon. friend has a colleague in the other house, the leader of his party there. What was the relationship between himself and his colleague when parliament was dissolved last July? His own colleague in the other house was opposing the legislation which my right hon. friend had brought into this house. During the whole campaign was the voice of the leader of the Conservative party in the Senate heard once in support of my right hon. friend? There was a complete silence. The leader of the Liberal party in the Senate came back to this country from a journey abroad in order to take part in the battle, and to show his loyalty to the party leader, and to the principles and policies which he himself had been supporting throughout his lifetime. But that is not all. I never had a general who raised an army of his own to oppose his leader, and did so, so successfully that even as late as yesterday his leader could not refrain from saying in this House of Commons that he had not yet forgiven him and virtually that he never will. As between my right hon. friend and myself, that is the position with regard to the relations of colleagues if my right hon. friend wishes to recall it.

What has been the result of my right hon. friend's leadership? In the last session of parliament he had the second largest following of any Conservative government since confederation. To-day he has the smallest following that any leader of a Conservative party has ever had in the history of Canada. From a great party with 137 members in this House of Commons last year, my right hon. friend at the present time has a following of 38; including himself the representation of the Conservative party in this parliament numbers only 39. From two provinces he has not a single follower; from each of four provinces he has only one follower, and from only one province has he more than five followers. That is the result of the way in which my right hon. friend has been able to get along with his colleagues and his following, and of the way he has carried on the administration of public affairs in this country. But that is not all. He had a Speaker, a deputy speaker and a number of ministers who took part in the campaign with him. The Speaker, the deputy speaker and twelve ministers were defeated under my right hon. friend's leadership. After this, I hope my right hon. friend will be a little more careful what he says about other people. Those who live in glass houses had better not throw any more stones than are necessary.

I have said that my right hon. friend began by seeking to stir up racial prejudice. He did it not only in the way I have already indicated, but one other of the first things he did was to produce in this House of Commons some anonymous publication that had found its way into the constituency of his deskmate on the last day of the campaign. No one is able to say where it came from; no one is able to point out whether or not it was the product of any responsible person, but it appeared to him to be sufficient to create a prejudice against those who come from the province of Quebec. The right hon. gentleman says, "See what is being done in the province of Quebec with regard to stirring up feeling by reference to war." My right hon. friend knows that the paper exhibited was never countenanced by any responsible person in the Liberal party, and he would much better have left that sort of thing unmentioned. If I wished to speak of circulars sent out by hon. gentlemen opposite to prejudice the friends of the electorate in the last campaign, I do not think I would get through this afternoon. I shall not take up documents that are anonymous and that found their way into some single constituency on the last day of a campaign, without having any influence whatever on the election; I shall take what was being done by my hon. friend throughout all western Canada by advertising paid for out of his funds. That was the case not only in the west; it was equally so in Quebec and elsewhere. I speak particularly of this one, which relates to western Canada. On billboards all over western Canada we read:

Stand by Canada. McFarland saved the wheat grower. Bennett stands by McFarland. Bennett gave the grain growers $150,000,000 and a wheat board. Stand by Bennett's grain board for higher wheat prices. Vote Bennett.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

There is no mistaking where that came from; no one but the leader of the party himself would have drafted a campaign document of that sort.

Mr. BENNETT: I will have to rise again to assure the right hon. gentleman that the statement he made is incorrect. I never heard the contents of that advertisement until this moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought that would bring my right hon. friend to his feet.

Mr. BENNETT: Then is the right hon. gentleman making a misstatement for the purpose of having that done?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has eyes as well as ears, and he must have been looking at the ground all the time he was going through the west or he would have seen this glaring poster in front of him in every corner of every village or town to which he went. When he says he does not know anything about this poster—

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was not up when I was in the west.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I guess my right hon. friend thought he would get out first. I have just been reminded that after my right hon. friend was out of sight other members of the party struck out the words "Vote Bennett" and had it read "Vote Conservative." Here is something that perhaps my right hon. friend does know a little about. Perhaps he will tell us he is incorrectly reported, but I find the following quotation which was sent pretty generally throughout Canada in the last week of the campaign, or at any rate very near the end of the campaign. Speaking at Sherbrooke—and I am sure my right hon. friend remembers that occasion—he said:

In the last session $1,000,000 had been voted as a stabilization fund to maintain the price to producers of dairy products. "I regret to say that the first cheques will not be paid until October 15"—

The election was on October 14.

—Mr. Bennett continued, "and I hope that you farmers within the sound of my voice, when you get your cheques the day after the election, will not have qualms of conscience because you voted against the government that gave it to you."

That is, the government that gave these cheques out of a million dollar fund; the implication being that if the government changed their might be no cheques. Does my right hon. friend mean to imply that members on all sides of the house who had to do with voting the appropriation that was made at that time were not entitled to any credit that might come from that appropriation?

Mr. BENNETT: It was opposed by members of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it was opposed and very rightly, for the reason that they were perfectly sure that my right hon. friend was putting through that million dollars for the purposes of an election, and no better evidence as to that could be adduced than I have pointed out. I might direct attention to other reports that were sent out, inspired or otherwise, to the effect that the bonus on wheat was expected to be paid on "Monday," the day of the elections, and so on. "Bribe" I think is not too strong a word—one bribe after another made to the electorate out of public funds by my right hon. friend himself. Yet he undertakes to find fault with some anonymous circular that he brings into the house for the purpose of creating racial prejudice.

That, Mr. Speaker, is not all. I think my right hon. friend knows something of the use to which the national radio was put by his party during the general election. I think he knows something about "Mister Sage" and his scurrilous and libelous misrepresentations over the government-owned radio. I say to my right hon. friend that as Prime Minister at that time he should not have permitted for one minute the use of the national radio in such a manner. He will have during the session plenty of chance to excuse himself on the score of what was permitted in that respect. It is true that there again his party sought to shield itself under anonymity. They had not the courage to come out and say who was supplying the money for these broadcasts. They had not the courage to say by whom they were written. They had not the courage or the honesty to say the broadcasts were political propaganda—propaganda of the worst type any party has ever put out, because it was most insidious in its nature and constituted an abuse in the use of national radio facilities during a political campaign. But he, as Prime Minister at the time, permitted all that to go on. I tell him now that that sort of thing will not continue under either the present or any other radio commission in Canada.

Let me come to the next matter to which my right hon. friend referred. He seemed to think it was an extraordinary thing that the speech from the throne should contain the following clause:

> It is proposed to restore to parliament its control over taxation and expenditure by ending all measures which have deprived members of the House of Commons of this control, and which have served to invest the executive with unwarranted arbitrary powers.

My right hon. friend asked if there was ever anything so silly. Well, it shows how far, long continued practice may come to influence one's attitude of mind. I am perfectly sure that five years ago my right hon. friend would not have sought to take away from parliament its control over taxation and expenditure and then term as silly an effort made to restore it. My right hon. friend asks what control was taken away. Well, I think that during the last parliament there was sufficient protest from the opposition side of the house against the use of the blank cheque and of the peace, order and good government clause of the relief legislation to enable him to know what is being restored at the present time. My right hon. friend knows very well that, as far as the control of taxation and expenditure is concerned, the only way in which this House of Commons can exercise that control is by having estimates brought down in connection with all public expenditures, and by having supply voted in the form of appropriations which give in detail the amounts required and the precise purpose for which moneys are to be used. I wonder if this country realizes how much money has been spent under the authority of the blank cheque, which was obtained every year from parliament under the allegation that it was needed to meet an emergent condition, and which was obtained in one instance under closure, and which would have had to be obtained in subsequent sessions in the same manner but for the desire of the opposition not to prolong discussion in this house unduly.

Let me give the figures. The total expenditures made by order in council under the relief acts, which gave the government this blank cheque and other arbitrary powers, up to November 1, 1935, just a few days after the present administration came into office, amounted to $192,000,000; in other words, more than the total expenditure of Canada in any fiscal year up to the fiscal year 1914-15, the year of the beginning of the Great war. That is to say, up to the time of the Great war this country's total expenditure had never equalled in any one year the amount of money that my right hon. friend paid out of the public treasury without appropriations during the time he was in office. Not a dollar of that amount was scrutinized in advance by hon. members of this house, or presented in a form in which it could be examined and voted upon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not a bit; I stand by every word I have said. More than that, loans amounting to $95,000,000 were made by my right hon. friend. This House of Commons was not asked to approve those individual loans. This House of Commons was treated as though it did not exist. The only people who received loans were those to whom the Prime Minister decided to give them between sessions and after parliament had prorogued.

But that was not all. Guarantees were given as well—guarantees to banks, to different interests of one kind and another, totalling how much, do you suppose, Mr. Speaker? On November first last, no less than $160,000,000. One railway company got a guarantee of $60,000,000 just about two days after parliament had prorogued. Not a word was said to parliament while it was in session about the necessity of giving any such guarantee to this road. Other guarantees were made on an extensive scale. I will not take time to put them on record, though I might well do so. The total amount of these guarantees outstanding on November first, however, is worth noting—$160,000,000. These are all obligations that have still for the most part to be met. In other words, in loans and guarantees and expenditures there was a total obligation upon the treasury of $447,000,000, or nearly half a billion dollars. Over the outlay of this vast sum the House of Commons as such had no real control. The people of Canada are talking about the size of the national debt, about the tremendous obligation there is on the shoulders of the people in the matter of taxation. Here is how $447,000,000 is accounted for. Will anyone tell me that any such liabilities would have been incurred if this House of Commons had had the right, which is its first right, a right and a duty above all other rights and duties of the House of Commons, to supervise in the most careful way every dollar of public expenditure?

I have in my hand an authoritative treatise on parliamentary grants by Durell. Let me read a paragraph or two to illustrate the truth of what I have been saying as to the rights and duties of the House of Commons. I quote from page 3:

> The most ancient, as well as the most valued, prerogative of the House of Commons is the right of supreme control over taxation, to which the right to control issues is a natural corollary. The prohibition of raising taxes without parliamentary authority would be nugatory if the proceeds, even of legal taxes, could be expended at the will of the sovereign. The right, therefore, of appropriation was a logical consequence of the right of levying supplies. The chain of historical evidence undeniably proves that a previous and stringent appropriation, often minute and specific, has formed an essential part of the British constitution.

All that was violated by my right hon. friend, not for one day but for every day for five years. Yet now he says: Isn't it a silly thing to suggest the restoration to the House of Commons of a power that will protect the rights of the people and enable the house to fulfil its constitutional duty to see that these rights are preserved? Let me give a further paragraph, as it appears at page 9:

> The supreme control of the Commons over public grants, as already mentioned, necessarily demands the complete right of control over the manner in which those grants are spent. This second right must be inseparable from the first if the control over the grants is to be effective.

Yet, what did my right hon. friend say when we asked that the grants being made to the different provinces be audited by the auditor general? He said that to propose anything of the kind would be an insult to the provinces. Let me read only one more brief quotation, as it appears at page 18:

> All the rules as to financial procedure are measures intended to protect the house against itself, to prevent hasty grants and ill-considered increases in the responsibilities of the people, while at the same time such rules are the best safeguard of the minority against the autocracy of the majority.

That is what we had during all of the last five years,—autocracy of the majority, and no real security or protection of the rights of the people themselves.

Of all the paragraphs in the speech from the throne, in my view the one which undertakes to restore to the House of Commons its control over the expenditure of public moneys is the most important of all. There was nothing which contributed so much to the return to this parliament of Liberal members in such large numbers as the knowledge on the part of the Canadian people that if we were returned we would see to it that once again the control by the House of Commons over expenditures and taxation would be duly and fully restored.

My right hon. friend next touched upon the textile inquiry. A little later in the day he took exception to any question being raised about the validity of certain laws which had been referred to the supreme court. He said he did not see why that matter had to be brought up, and that it would have been much more fitting if the statutes could have operated a little while until trouble developed somewhere and a suit was entered. However, when it comes to an inquiry into the conditions of employees in an establishment such as the one at Sherbrooke, when it comes to an investigation of the circumstances under which several hundred people without a day's notice were turned out in the middle of winter to shift for themselves, my right hon. friend says, "I wonder that the Minister of Justice did not see that that commission is unconstitutional."

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not say that; pardon me again. I said that I wondered if the Minister of Justice had looked into the question of the validity of it. I did not say it was or was not, and I gave the reference to the Manitoba case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am surprised that my right hon. friend was so keen to raise the point at all. If he had really been concerned with the well being of the employees of that great concern, and with the way in which the industry itself is carrying on, I think he would have been glad to see the inquiry proceed. The point I make is this: My right hon. friend was quite prepared to let the whole of his new deal legislation go into force at once, whether it was constitutional or otherwise, whether it was valid or invalid. Before the election he said, "I am so concerned with the well being of the working class in Canada that I do not care whether it is constitutional or not; I am going to see that this legislation is put on the statutes. Here, however, is one measure which is valid in every particular, and we find that at the first moment my right hon. friend is eager to take exception to the inquiry involved. If he had taken the trouble to look at the order in council—and I think he could have got it, if he had wished to have it, because I know he has a way of getting these documents from the privy council, whenever he wants them—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I must object to that statement. The statement is made that I have a method of getting documents from the privy council whenever I want them. The rule communicated to me by the Clerk of the Privy Council is that any orders in council passed during the five years we were in office he furnishes to me upon request, and that he had followed the same practice under the previous administration. I have received no document from the privy council, nor would I think of asking for any document of the privy council, except in the proper method, since the advent to office of this government. I must ask the right hon. gentleman to withdraw a statement which would leave the impression that I had some method of getting from the privy council documents to which I was not entitled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my right hon. friend has stated bears out what I have said. He has stated that he thought his practice was a correct one, and I am not taking exception to it. He knows the correct method, and if he had wished to have a copy of the order in council, had he not already seen it, he had but to follow the correct method, which he himself has just mentioned.

May I say to the leader of the opposition that he may rest his mind as to the validity of the powers given this particular commission. The commission has powers respecting not only one industry, or one province or any particular concern in one province. The language is broad; perhaps I should read it:

> The minister further observes that in order to determine the responsibility of employers and to enable appropriate action to be taken, not only with regard to safeguarding the interests of employees and of the public, but also of the industry itself, it is essential for the government to be fully advised with respect to all matters surrounding the operations and conduct of the industries immediately concerned and interrelated and allied industries.

That takes into account not only the textile industry at Sherbrooke but the textile industries throughout Canada; do not let that be forgotten. Let us not forget that the concern at Sherbrooke intimated that its action in suddenly thrusting out great numbers of employees was due to an arrangement between this government and Japan. If any arrangement between the Canadian government and Japan is going to operate in that way with respect to any industry in Canada, the sooner we find out the facts of the situation, the better. We intend to go very fully into the whole position of the textile industries in Canada, and to consider competition not only from Japan but from Great Britain and everywhere else. The company in Sherbrooke said it was necessary to take such action to save the situation. In other words, it seemed to be necessary to deprive the employees of their wages. The commission will be interested in attempting to ascertain if, during the time the employees were deprived of their wages, the bonuses, salaries and the like of officers of the company were also cut off. My right hon. friend talks about—yes, what is it?

Mr. BENNETT: I assume the right hon. gentleman in accordance with the rules will lay the order in council upon the table. Quotation by a minister from a public document necessitates its being laid upon the table.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I shall lay it on the table, with pleasure.

Mr. BENNETT: So that we all may read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; it has already been published in the papers. Possibly the simplest method would be to place it on Hansard. My right hon. friend may then feel that we are trying to do full justice to the situation. It is as follows:

Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 27th January, 1936.

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 24th January, 1936, from the Minister of Finance, stating as follows:

On the 18th instant the following telegram, dated at Sherbrooke, Quebec, January the 18, 1936, and signed by Ant. Deslauriers, city clerk, on behalf of the city council of the city of Sherbrooke, was received by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, and the Honourable the Minister of Finance:

"Special emergency meeting city council held to-day strongly ask that your government intervene immediately over the situation that has developed whereby our largest flat silk industries employing over a thousand hands has suddenly closed down leaving these people without employment Stop. Our city unable to cope with alarming situation and request your government take immediate steps to remedy this condition Stop. City cannot take care of such increased unemployment."

Also on the same date representations appeared in the press to the effect that according to word received from Sherbrooke uncertainty in the textile market, due in large part to Japanese competition in certain artificial silks, had forced the Dominion Textile Company to close its rayon plant at Sherbrooke, Quebec, and that the plant closed down would remain inactive until the present situation in the industry had been clarified. The Montreal Gazette of January 18, also contains the following relative to the foregoing representations:

"G. Blair Gordon, President of the Dominion Textiles, who is in the United States at present, last night confirmed the report in reply to a telegraph query. His message added 'Hope to reopen when we can see possibility of manufacturing goods which can be sold.'"

Upon receipt of the telegrams from the city council of Sherbrooke, an officer of the Department of Labour was immediately sent to Sherbrooke to report to the government upon the existing conditions. The report received by the government evidences the necessity, if the request of the city council of Sherbrooke is to be met and the present situation in the industry clarified, for investigation much more searching and extensive than is possible at the present time either by officials of any of the government departments or by the tariff board, and that it can most effectively be made by the appointment of a royal commission, clothed with powers to make the inquiry as searching and extensive as may be necessary.

The minister observes that the sudden cessation of operations in industrial establishments, especially in the winter season, at a time of widespread unemployment, cannot fail to render more acute the distress and suffering of wage earners and their dependents, and also places upon municipalities and governments additional and unexpected financial burdens for relief. He is further of the opinion that industry generally and especially an industry which has had for years the benefit of the protection afforded by the customs tariff, should recognize its responsibility to carry on operations with due regard to its obligations to employees and to the public, and not to arbitrarily shut down its plants.

The minister further observes that in order to determine the responsibility of employers and to enable appropriate action to be taken, not only with regard to safeguarding the interests of employees and of the public, but also of the industry itself, it is essential for the government to be fully advised with respect to all matters surounding the operations and conduct of the industries immediately concerned and inter-related and allied industries;

That in this connection it is essential that full and complete information be available to the government covering a period of years with respect to costs, profits, wages, salaries and bonuses, tariff protection, investment, volume of production, and all other matters and things which together with information already available to the government will enable sound conclusions to be reached regarding the position of this and other branches of the textile industry in relation to British and foreign competition, and in particular, the extent to which the employer can reasonably and properly be expected to maintain employment over periods of temporary difficulty.

The minister recommends that for the purpose of making the said inquiry and examination, including the causes of the existing or any other such sudden cessation of industrial operations as may be referred to him, the Honourable W. F. A. Turgeon, of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan, be constituted a Royal Commissioner, under Part 1 of the Inquiries Act, Chapter 99 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, for the purpose of making such inquiry and examination, and that such commissioner have the special authority specified under part 3 of the said Act.

The minister further recommends that the commissioner be instructed to make his report as speedily as possible.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

After having read the order in council, it is perhaps not necessary to table it, but I shall be very glad to do so if that is desired. I think the order makes perfectly clear the purpose and intention of the government.

My right hon. friend had a great deal to say last session about state intervention. Now that the election is over and an act of state intervention of the character set forth in this order in council is taken, he immediately busies himself with raising objection to the particular form of state intervention applied in this instance. I am inclined to think this is the most effective form of state intervention possible with regard to those matters which affect the lives of human beings. If any industry thinks it is being adversely affected by any act of this government, all it has to do is to make known its desire to have a full inquiry made into the way in which its activities are being conducted, and it will get an inquiry with expedition.

We heard on the eve of the general election from more than one head of a great industry in this country—and I might have cited these instances had I felt inclined to do so this afternoon—that if a Liberal administration were returned and anything were done with respect to the tariff, there would be as a consequence an immediate shutting down of the industry involved, with consequent loss of employment on the part of employees. In some instances, advertisements were circulated bearing upon them the names of the companies concerned, without question for the purpose of intimidating and of influencing their employees at the time of the general election. I gave my word at that time to the working men of this country that, if anything of that kind were attempted, it would not be long before the particular industry would be given every opportunity to show why it was necessary for it to take the action it did.

The day after this order in council was passed, the company at Sherbrooke found it possible to reopen. It issued a statement to the effect that, after all, it did not think the competition from Japan was going to be so serious. I can imagine what we would have heard from my right hon. friend to-day if no action of that kind had been taken. I personally should not have been the least surprised to have seen the closing down of this particular industrial plant followed by several others. My right hon. friend would have waxed eloquent indeed on the effects of the arrangement made with Japan. But all he could say yesterday was that he would prophesy that two years hence we would be a sorry lot for having restored trade relations with a great country like Japan. He said that was only a prophecy, but he would make it nevertheless. Well, I do not take much stock in my hon. friend's prophecies. Five years ago he told the electors that he would end unemployment, but he had to admit yesterday that unemployment in Canada was worse at the time he went out of office than it had been at any other time in the whole of its history. In the circumstances, I do not think my right hon. friend's prophecies amount to very much.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: His words will stand. We will see them in Hansard. I think I have given their purport.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is fortunate we have Hansard because I notice that my right hon. friend every now and then denounces the press for printing things he never said.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And there it ends; but, fortunately, the records of this House of Commons are kept where they are available to every hon. member, and we can see them for ourselves.

While on the question of our trade with Japan, may I say that the effect of the restoration of normal trade relations between Canada and Japan has been to put back to work thousands of men in the province of British Columbia and in other parts of this country. It has increased that purchasing power of which we have heard a good deal in recent years, which is so necessary to the people of Canada at this time. Instead of creating unemployment, it has been, along with another international agreement to which I shall refer a little later, a most important influence in helping to increase employment in industry, employment on the railways, and employment in many other directions.

My right hon. friend's next reference was to the legislation on unemployment. I shall not take up the time of the house at the moment in going into that question, because the bill itself will come before us very shortly. I should like, however, to direct attention to my right hon. friend's remarks with regard to the dominion-provincial conference, which discussed among other matters how most effectively the different provinces of the dominion and the municipalities might unite in solving the problem of unemployment. He said that he had never read a document so full of goodwill, so full of praise from one end to the other. May I tell my right hon. friend that good will is the basis of good work. The trouble with his administration in its relations with the provinces was that there never was a basis of good will. Good will is the thing above all others we have been seeking. We have it at last in this country as between the provinces and the dominion. Instead of ill will we have good will, in the effort to see what can be done to advance the commor interests of our country.

Mr. BENNETT: Ontario looks like it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not say more at the moment with regard to the work of the dominion-provincial conference. The record is there and speaks for itself. Any hon. member who looks at it will have reason, I think, to marvel not only at the number of subjects dealt with, but at the great care evidenced in the preparation of the agenda and the effective arrangements made for the consideration of the most important problems, as well as at the very successful manner in which the conference was carried on during the period of an entire week.

My right hon. friend also spoke about the wheat question. I am going to leave it to one of my colleagues to reply to him on this particular subject. All I want to say in a word is this, that, in nine and a half weeks following its appointment, the old board made net sales of only 12,500,000 bushels of wheat, whereas the new board, appointed on December 3, 1935, in the first six weeks of its operations, made net sales of 65,500,000 bushels. This accomplishment is all the more noteworthy, in that it was achieved without disturbing the price structure. May I here remind my right hon. friend of what he said last night as to his colleagues being fully informed on all matters. I remember our waiting in this house, not for a few days or weeks, but for months, until the right hon. gentleman could be here, where I am at this moment, and tell his colleagues as well as the house what he was going to do with respect to the matter of the sale of wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: What he was going to do, certainly, because we had not discussed the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was all solely in my right hon. friends head. And yet he says that his was a cabinet in which all members helped to make and control policy.

The Bank of Canada was another subject to which reference was made. A bill is mentioned in the speech from the throne in connection with the Bank of Canada and it will be time enough to discuss that matter when we reach it.

As regards the reference to the supreme court of several enactments passed at the last session of parliament, the leader of the opposition criticized the Minister of Justice for having appointed counsel to uphold the legislation. I wonder what his criticism would have been if the Minister of Justice had appointed someone to oppose it. The Minister of Justice was kinder to my right hon. friend than I was prepared to be. I suggested to the minister that we ought to ask my right hon. friend whether he would not accept a retainer, or, as he often generously acts without a retainer, whether he would not go before the supreme court and argue on behalf of his own legislation. The Minister of Justice said, however, that he thought that might put the right hon. gentleman in an embarrassing position. I must say I agreed with him, for if the legislation could not be supported it would be indeed very embarrassing to the right hon. gentleman. I should, however, have liked to see my right hon. friend trying to defend that legislation before the court, and that for two reasons: In the first place, he would have done it very well, and in the second, I would wish him to feel that the desire of the present government was to give the legislation every possible opportunity that could be afforded to have its validity proved. That step at least has been taken, and I think my right hon. friend will agree with me that the government has adopted the right course in endeavouring to uphold to the utmost of its power the legislation which this parliament put through. The fact that we have referred the legislation to the court, shows that we are carrying out what we had promised at the previous session we would do if we were returned to power.

I cannot agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that it would have been much better—nicer, I think, was the word he used—to have allowed all this legislation to remain on the statute books, until here and there actions were started and litigation commenced in the courts. I do not want to refer to a matter of domestic policy in another country, but I think that possibly it is appropriate to call attention to the confusion and the difficulty that have arisen in the United States as a consequence of legislation which had been on the statute books and had been administered for a period of years being declared ultra vires by the supreme court. We have tried to avoid anything of the kind happening in Canada, and in doing so I believe we have taken an entirely right step.

There are only two other subjects to which I will refer before I conclude; they are the two which I imagine are uppermost in the minds of hon. members. The first is the Canada-United States trade agreement. That agreement will come up for very full discussion in the course of another few days. There is at the present time on the order paper a notice of motion which I have given asking the house to approve of the agreement. There will subsequently be introduced bills which will provide the necessary legislation for giving effect to all of its provisions. In due course, therefore, we shall have ample time to discuss the merits of this agreement.

What I wish to touch upon this afternoon is the impression which my right hon. friend sought last night to convey, that this agreement, so far as Canada is concerned, was the result of hasty and possibly immature action. He resented very strongly the fact that the government should have concluded, in something less than a month after its return to office, an agreement so far-reaching in its nature. He began by referring to the negotiations having extended over a period of weeks. He then reduced the period to days, and finally got down to the point where the agreement had been arrived at in an hour or two. If my right hon. friend had been aware of the facts he would have known that in those three weeks no government ever worked harder on any measure than did the present administration with respect to this particular agreement.

The mover of the address (Mr. Slaght) was kind enough yesterday to make special reference to myself in connection with the negotiation of that agreement. He gave to me personally all but exclusive credit. This I desire immediately to disclaim. There is no man in this House of Commons who is more conscious than I am of the fact that any power which the leader of a political party has comes in the main from his following. His power comes from the men and women who are his supporters and who have been his supporters through the years. If I have been able, in connection with the negotiation of this particular agreement, to play a part that has been helpful, I attribute it above all else to the fact that it was known, when I went to Washington, that for nearly seventeen years I had had the loyal and wholehearted support of the Liberal party—a party which from one end of Canada to the other had advocated a reciprocal agreement with the United States —and that at no time had the leader of any other government in this dominion behind him such a following as I had at the time I began the negotiation of the agreement. In other words, there was a guarantee at once that we were in earnest; that we meant business, and that we were in a position to carry out effectively what we might undertake to do.

Contrast the position of my right hon. friend? He had a couple of years within which to show his bona fides. He had all the time required to make perfectly clear what his following would do, what he was able to do, yet weeks, months, years slipped by, with nothing or very little in the way of negotiation on his own part. Toward the end of last year there came the document which my right hon. friend put on Hansard last night. If that document meant anything, why did he not continue to proceed on the basis of negotiations that was laid down in it? He did not need to place that document on Hansard in order to have it known. He took good care to give it to the electorate at the beginning of the recent campaign. He took good care throughout the campaign to have it more or less inferred that he had been negotiating on the right lines: he was going to get concessions on lumber, on fish, on cattle, on milk and cream; he was going to get concessions on potatoes; he was going to get concessions on other things. It was all set out in this particular document. But in order to get it, it was necessary for him to get back into power. Now, was not that the fact?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is an inference, then, that is very apparent.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say, and I repeat, that my right hon. friend by his actions, in dilly-dallying as he did over a period of a couple of years in seeking to negotiate an agreement, gave the strongest reason to the people of the United States, and particularly its government, to believe that he was halfhearted about the whole project. Not only that: take his whole political life in relation to the matter of trade with the United States, and contrast it with the position of Liberal leaders in this House of Commons. He knows that since confederation up to 1911 an effort had been made on the part of both political parties to get a reciprocal agreement with the United States. He knows that under one Liberal administration, that of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, an agreement was negotiated but was defeated by the senate of the United States. He knows also that under another Liberal government, the great administration of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a splendid agreement was negotiated with the United States; and he knows, better than anyone else, that no one in Canada worked harder to defeat that agreement than he himself.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And he says, "Hear, hear." May I recall to him the words of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in reference to himself when he came into this house, I think it was—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In 1911.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —as a young member. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that he thought my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) would live to see the day when he would regret having opposed a reciprocity agreement with the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes, he did: he would regret having done it, and he would come to see the wisdom of an agreement being negotiated with that country. That prophecy came true. It is not like the prophecies of my right hon. friend. He shakes his head and says "No." Then he explains his whole position, because he now makes it perfectly clear that he never actually intended to try to secure an agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I must once more rise to a point of order. The right hon. gentleman has no right to misrepresent me. I said, when he stated that the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said I would live to regret it, I have not lived to regret the action I took in 1911, any more than Clifford Sifton did before he died. I have not lived to regret it. That, I repeat. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is a matter for a speech, not a question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a question of order.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a point of order to this extent, that he has no right to misrepresent what I said.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have just heard what my right hon. friend has said with respect to his zeal in making a treaty with the United States. I wonder whether he still holds to the sentiment he expressed at the time he was opposing the reciprocity agreement of 1911. My right hon. friend does not say.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to that treaty, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, let us see what my right hon. friend said at that time and see how his words would impress the government of the United States when my right hon. friend went to negotiate an agreement with them, or how they would impress the Canadian people as to his belief in the wisdom of an agreement of the kind. Speaking in this house on November 20, 1911, my right hon. friend said:

Mr. Speaker, the risk was real and the danger imminent. I doubt not that when the proposals to which I have referred were first introduced, they were regarded merely as trade proposals; but when it was ascertained that in their ultimate results they involved the whole future of Canada, then it was that the national spirit of our people was aroused. I venture to think that the right hon. gentleman who so successfully leads the opposition in this house would not have introduced those proposals if he could have foreseen that there would have arisen around them an agitation, the results of which were so vital to the imperial and national future of the country. While I mention the name of the right hon. gentleman, may I be permitted to tender to him my sincere congratulations upon his having attained another anniversary of his natal day, with the expression of the hope that he may be long spared faithfully and illustriously to serve the state in the position which he at present occupies.

Mr. Speaker, in that portion of this great dominion in which I am privileged to reside, a very substantial portion of our population has come from the great republic to the south, and one of the strongest reasons I had for opposing the reciprocity agreement was that it threw into the melting pot for solution a question that involved a problem in patriotism. When we remember that so large a portion of our population came from that great republic, where they inherited traditions that were at least not favourable to monarchial institutions; when they learned through the medium of the American press, that, however much their former political parties differed with each other, they showed unanimity in favour of these proposals, and when they found American public men preaching a doctrine that indicated that the consequences of this agreement would be the absorption of western Canada at least by the great republic, and at all events rendering impossible for all time the commercial and organic union of those overseas dominions and the motherland which comprise the British Empire, it was little wonder that these people allied themselves with those who were in favour of the reciprocity pact. But it is a pleasure for me to say on behalf of these new settlers that as soon as they discovered that the Canadian people were not in favour of the agreement, they responded to the prevailing sentiment, and made it apparent that they proposed to devote their time and energies to the upbuilding of this great country just as they had done in the land from which they came; and, as they are settlers who are accustomed to pioneer conditions, they are enabled, now that this question is settled for ever, to assist us in laying the foundations of a great state.

The question "settled forever"! No reciprocity with the United States as long as my right hon. friend had anything to do with it. That is the explanation of the remarks made by the present Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) in the course of the last campaign: that it would be impossible for my right hon. friend to negotiate an agreement with the United States. Anyone who had declared himself in those terms, and said he still held to them, would find it impossible to make a reciprocity agreement.

May I give another reason why there was strong cause for supposing that my right hon. friend would never succeed in negotiating an agreement. The people, not of this country alone but of other countries, know how he negotiated the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, and the kind of negotiator he was at that time.

An hon. MEMBER: Not bad.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not bad! It could not have been worse. I am not speaking for the moment of the terms of the agreement; I am speaking of the methods of my right hon. friend in negotiating it. It was generally known as well that my right hon. friend had gone out of his way to help to create, or at least to prolong, a trade war with another great country, Japan. One who thinks in terms of economic nationalism, who advocates that we must have at least some form of commercial conflict with other nations, is not likely to be the person whom any country is going to trust and in whom it will have faith when it comes to the negotiation of a trade agreement.

I was more than amazed when I heard the leader of the opposition suggest that the President of the United States, while negotiating with him, might be a party to an agreement with another political party in this country. I was amazed that he could even think of such a thing. I am sure the president must be relieved that his government did not get very far with my right hon. friend, if that is the sort of view he entertains with respect to the responsibilities of one holding the highest position in his land. It was not worthy of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, Mr. Speaker, I will have to raise the question. The question of order, neatly put, is this: Has any speaker the right to misrepresent a statement made by another? It is represented that I suggested yesterday that the President of the United States had some form of arrangement or agreement with the right hon. gentleman with respect to a trade agreement. I stated yesterday positively that I did not hold any such view and could not possibly hold any such view. I do suggest to you, sir, that the right hon. gentleman must not be permitted to make statements containing three-quarters of the truth and then make statements that are wholly inaccurate with respect to what I have said. I call upon the chair to say to the speaker, whoever he may be, that he must not attribute to other members statements they did not make.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the point of order, if it be such, may I read what my right hon. friend said last night as reported in Hansard at page 60:

> The Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott), in the speeches delivered during the campaign, said that the President of the United States would not negotiate with the Bennett government, and the Prime Minister of this country said that he would negotiate a treaty in ninety days. Does that mean that they had an arrangement that no agreement was to be made with that government, or does it mean this—
> Mr. Mackenzie King: Shame.
> Mr. Bennett: I beg your pardon?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I say "shame" to the right hon. gentleman when he insinuates that a government with which he was dealing would enter into such an arrangement with another government.
> Mr. Bennett: That is what I am trying to say.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: And I say, "Shame."

And I repeat it at this moment.

Mr. BENNETT: I say again that the inference that has been drawn from the statement is not the proper inference. On page 61 of Hansard my right hon. friend will also find this:

> Mr. Bennett: ... and I decline to believe that the government of the United States was a party to any arrangement that would reflect upon itself. I say, shame; I agree with the Prime Minister; but the shame is to those who went about the country and tried to induce the people to believe that the United States would not carry on negotiations with the Conservative government of the day, but that there had to be a change of government to make a bargain with the United States. That is what I say.

There is the statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I ought to have read the other statement made by my right hon. friend as reported at page 61, at the top of the page just before what he has now quoted:

> I ask this question: Did he make that statement by reason of having any arrangement with the United States government or anyone connected with it.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly; that is what I say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well, I shall not seek to say more. Let me say to my right hon. friend that I feel very much relieved that he now repudiates what he said yesterday, and that he has made it perfectly clear, that as the leader of a political party in this country,—he was not insinuating that the President of the United States had entered into an agreement with some other party while negotiating with my right hon. friend. I accept my right hon. friend's statement; I am very happy to accept it.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more I have to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen opposite may have a huge majority, but the rules of this house are going to be observed. We have rights in this chamber, and hon. gentlemen opposite may as well begin to understand that through force of numbers and power they are not going to take from us, however small we may be, any of our rights. My point is this: At page 61 I said yesterday positively that I made no such statement, that I declined to believe any such statement. When the right hon. gentleman says he accepts my statement of to-day, that was simply the statement I made yesterday, and the right hon. gentleman has no right thus to misstate what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to leave myself and the leader of the opposition in the judgment of the house and to allow the English language to speak for itself.

What I really desired more particularly to tell the house is something of the nature of the negotiations which took place. As I have said, my right hon. friend has done his utmost to create the impression that the agreement was reached in a hasty manner and without due consideration. The present administration was returned to office on October 23. October 24 was Thanksgiving day. I attended Thanksgiving service in the morning and like a good many others, in expressing my thanks to providence for its many blessings, I included thanks for the country's deliverance from the government which for the five previous years had been in office. In the afternoon of that very first day of office, I called on the United States Minister to Canada, Mr. Norman Armour. I told Mr. Armour that I had come at once to confer with him because my colleagues and I regarded as the most important of all the questions before the people of Canada that of the negotiation of a trade agreement between the United States and Canada. I asked Mr. Armour if he would assist me in arranging an interview with the President of the United States at the earliest possible moment.

On the following day in council my colleagues and I immediately began to go over the whole matter of trade negotiations between Canada and the United States. As my right hon. friend very rightly said yesterday, everything that could be known with respect to the effect of the United States tariff upon Canada, and of the Canadian tariff upon the United States, and what was possible in the way of an agreement, within certain limits, had been worked out with great care by the members of the public services of this country and of the United States. All that ground had been gone over during the preceding year or two, and the information was immediately available to the administration. Most of it, not all, but a good part of it, had been available to my right hon. friend for nearly a year before. It naturally also became available to my colleagues and myself the moment we came into office. I want to be the first to express my appreciation of all that was done in a preliminary way, and done with great efficiency and exceptional skill, by the officials of the public service of this country.

We went over all the material very carefully. We had many meetings of council dealing with the question. What was even more to the point my colleagues the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) along with myself were constituted a committee of the cabinet to go very fully, and in detail, along with members of the service into the different matters which had to do with the questions that would come up in discussion with the United States. Within a day or two after we had gone over the ground with the officials here and had seen, as far as it was permissible to see, what had been placed before our predecessors in office, we immediately sent the officials of the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, Trade and Commerce, and National Revenue, who had been dealing with these matters, to Washington to get into touch with officials in the United States. We pointed out what concessions we were prepared to make, and what concessions we thought we ought to obtain. After our officials had taken up matters there with officials of the United States government, keeping in touch with our government over the long distance telephone and also by telegraph, as the United States officials were keeping in touch with their government, I went to Washington myself to have the interview with the president which had previously been arranged for the earliest possible date. My right hon. friend says that the press stated that I was leaving Ottawa on account of my health. I do not think the press said anything about my health; I believe it was said that I was going to take a short vacation largely to get a chance to think over many matters after having had a very strenuous time in opposition, in a general election and in the formation of the government. I do not believe any one in the country thought that was anything out of the way.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But may I say this; I was determined to take no vacation until I was perfectly satisfied it was going to be impossible to effect a beneficial agreement with the United States or until an agreement had been secured. I might immediately upon the formation of the government have gone on a vacation. I admit I was pretty tired at the time, but I felt the important thing for the people of Canada, and the most important of all the immediate duties of the government, was to see if we could work out a mutually beneficial trade agreement with the United States. I knew that every day that passed was going to make it more difficult to effect an agreement. We all know that as a government approaches the time of a general election it is more difficult for it to carry on negotiations. We all know that as a government is about to meet its parliament or congress, its ministers and others are more busily engaged than at other seasons, and with congress about to assemble the first week of January, with the general election coming in the United States this year, I believed there was not a moment to be lost, and my colleagues felt the same. We therefore devoted our time to the work of this agreement to the exclusion of everything else that it was possible to exclude.

It is not the number of years, it is not the number of months that are taken to do a thing; it is the intensity of effort and the will and determination given to a task that count in negotiations of this sort. As I have said, every hour, every moment of my time and much of the time of most of my colleagues was occupied with these matters until the day I went to Washington to confer with the president, and pretty much all thereafter until I returned to sign the agreement. When I was fortunate enough to meet the president our talks together were in the nature of interviews finally to determine what could and would be done. Every phase of the situation had, as I have already said, been reviewed with the departments of government in the United States by their own ministers, matters had been reviewed with the different departments here by our ministers, I mean the departments immediately concerned with the questions involved in the agreement, and then by the cabinet as a whole. Before I left, we knew exactly what we were prepared to do. There were a few matters outstanding. These matters had an important bearing upon any final arrangement that might be made. It was these matters that above all others I had to discuss with the President of the United States.

After I had had my conference with the president, the committees which had been active here and in Washington came together again and worked as hard as they possibly could, night as well as day, until finally we were able to iron out all the difficulties that had presented themselves up to that time, and to reach the terms of a final agreement on the night of Saturday, November 9. My colleagues knew how far I was at liberty to go before I left. I wished to make perfectly sure that they would know every detail before the final agreement was effected. I therefore returned to Ottawa immediately after reaching the point where I had an agreement in such form that it simply awaited the approval of the government here, having had the approval of the government of the United States before I left. I asked members of council to meet me early Monday morning November 11, which was Armistice day. I do not often do public work on Sunday, but I did ask two or three of my colleagues to meet me on my return to Ottawa on Sunday night, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the others I have mentioned, so that I might at that stage go with them in detail into the different points that had come up for further consideration. When the cabinet met on Monday we were in a position in a very short time to give our unanimous consent to the agreement which had been arrived at. Thereafter it had to be put into final shape for formal signature, a not inconsiderable task in itself. I mention these things in order to make it perfectly clear that the agreement as it was arrived at was the result, first of all, of the work which had been done by members of the public service of Canada, work which had been done in part under the auspices of my right hon. friend, and the importance of which I wish to be the first to acknowledge; work which was materially aided, may I say, by the legations both here and in Washington. And that is another feature I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members. I do not believe it would have been possible to have made such an agreement in so short a time but for the good will which prevailed on the part of our friends in the United States legation here, the good will which prevailed towards the United States on the part of our representatives at Washington, and the fact that in these legations we were able to come into immediate touch with each other personally at a moment's notice instead of having to negotiate by correspondence.

I leave the matter there. When we come to the discussion of the agreement itself I shall then discuss its merits. But may I say to the house at this moment, that I believe the agreement which has been reached between the United States and Canada is one which will be productive of infinite good to both countries. I shall go further and say that I believe the action taken by the United States and Canada in negotiating this agreement will help to make for a better condition of things in other countries and other parts of the world. During these last few years the different countries of the world have been going mad through basing their actions on a false doctrine of economic nationalism, through having nothing to do with their neighbours, regarding trade as a species of warfare, instead of a matter of mutual interest. This agreement marked an improvement in that position, a complete change to another direction. I believe we will live to see the day when this agreement between the United States and Canada, will be held up as marking a new beginning in the relations between the countries of the world; a new beginning in the direction of more in the way of trade and of international friendship; and of less in the way of those things which make for ill to the world at large.

Before concluding I desire to say a word on the question of sanctions arising out of the Italo-Ethiopian war, and Article XVI of the Covenant of the League of Nations. Here again, I wish to reserve until a more appropriate time the discussion which this house will doubtless desire to have upon that subject. All that I shall deal with at the moment is the inference which I thought my right hon. friend sought to convey yesterday that Doctor Riddell, who is the advisory officer of the government at Geneva, in having proposed that oil and some other commodities should be added to those already included in the economic sanctions against Italy, was acting under instructions from the present administration. My right hon. friend went out of his way to say that he had had long experience with Doctor Riddell, and that he could think of no officer who had been more careful in the matter of taking directions from his government, who had been more punctilious about telegraphing for instructions and the like than Doctor Riddell had been. I am sure the impression left on the minds of those who heard my right hon. friend was that Doctor Riddell, with respect to this all important matter, at least must have communicated with the government and received substantial instructions from the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite the opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order to make the position clear may I give the house very briefly the main stages which have to be taken into account in considering this question of sanctions.

On October 7, 1935, the Council of the League of Nations concurred in the conclusion of the Committee of Six that Italy had resorted to war in disregard of its covenants. On October 11, 1935, the assembly of the league passed a resolution taking cognizance of the action of the council, calling attention to article 16 and recommending the establishement of a coordination committee to advise on sanctions to be applied. Between October 11 and October 19 the committee of coordination recommended the imposition of four economic and financial sanctions. Between the same dates, October 11 and October 19—all the dates are of course, in 1935—the Canadian delegation to the League of Nations concurred in the assembly resolution and participated in the committee discussion and recommendations. I ask you to notice, Mr. Speaker, that all the dates to which I have thus far referred were during the time my right hon. friend was Prime Minister and while his government was in office. The present administration did not take office until October 23. Prior to October 23, in fact as late as October 19, the Canadian delegation, the delegation which my right hon. friend had appointed and to which he had been giving instructions, concurred in the assembly resolution and participated in the committee discussions and recommendations.

When the present government took office we were immediately confronted with the recommendations of the committee, and our first duty was to say whether Canada would carry out these recommendations, whether we would apply sanctions with respect to the export of arms, credits to Italy, imports from Italy and the export of certain key products to Italy. On October 29 I issued a statement to the effect that Canada would apply these sanctions. The sanctions were enforced by Canada on the following dates: Embargo on the export of arms, October 31, 1935; prohibition of credits to Italy, November 15, 1935; embargo on imports from Italy, November 15, 1935; embargo on exports of certain key products to Italy, November 15, 1935.

That in a word is the whole story, apart from the feature to which special reference was made by my right hon. friend. He said that the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who was acting Prime Minister during the time I was absent, was wrong in having issued a statement to the effect that the proposal to impose an oil sanction was not the proposal of the government of Canada but was one which had been made by Doctor Riddell on his own responsibility. Let me say at once that I take full responsibility for what the acting Prime Minister did and said during the time of my absence. I would do so in any event; but I do so particularly because before taking the action he did my hon. friend and colleague communicated with me in Georgia where I was on vacation, and I expressly stated to him that I thought he should inform the people of Canada that the action with respect to oil sanctions taken at Geneva, which was being stated by the press to have been the action of the government of Canada, was not in fact the action of the government of Canada but that of the committee of the league itself.

That is the whole story, except as to whether or not it was a fact Doctor Riddell acted on his own authority or was acting under instructions from the government. Let me say at once that I agree with my right hon. friend when he says that Doctor Riddell is a very efficient public servant. I think on many occasions he has rendered Canada admirable service at Geneva. I have reason to believe that up to the time about which I am to speak he had been scrupulously careful about waiting until he had received instructions before taking action. I must say that having held that opinion of him, I had full confidence that nothing would be done at Geneva which might be construed as having been done in the name of Canada which the government of Canada itself had not authorized in the first instance. What was my amazement when on reading a morning paper I found that Doctor Riddell at Geneva was reported to have proposed to add oil, coal and steel to the list of commodities which by sanctions were to be prohibited from export to Italy. No instructions whatever had been sent to him authorizing anything of the kind. I immediately asked the under secretary of state if he could throw any light on the matter. I ascertained that a communication had come from Doctor Riddell saying that a question was likely to be raised at the league, with respect to the particular commodities to which I have referred, and asking what he was to do with respect to them. I recalled then having had this particular point mentioned and having directed that word was immediately to be sent that no action of any kind was to be taken by Doctor Riddell without specific instructions from the government. I asked whether that communication had been sent, and was informed that it had been sent within an hour after receipt of the communication from Doctor Riddell. So that so far as the present administration is concerned I say we gave specific direction to Doctor Riddell that he was to do nothing in the matter of extending sanctions without express direction from the government itself.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the date of the motion made by Doctor Riddell at the League of Nations?

Mr. BENNETT: It was not a motion; it was only a suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe I can ascertain the date, but may I say to the hon. member that it was a suggestion or motion made in the committee of coordination. Speaking from memory I believe the date was either November 2 or November 4, but I shall seek to advise the hon. member accurately.

Mr. HEAPS: Was the date of that suggestion by Doctor Riddell prior to the statement of the right hon. gentleman to the effect that he and his government were in favour of sanctions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already stated that the government's action on sanctions was made public by myself on October 29. It was November 2 or November 4, I am not positive as to the date that Doctor Riddell took the action to which I have referred.

Mr. HEAPS: Would Doctor Riddell's action at the League of Nations be equivalent to carrying out the intention of the government as expressed by the statement of the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; the action of the government had specific reference to an embargo on the export of arms, the prohibition of credit to Italy, the embargo on imports from Italy, and the embargo on certain key products to Italy, all of which were definitely named and set forth, and had been decided upon by the committee of coordination at Geneva.

May I say to my right hon. friend, because I understand his difficulty in appreciating the situation, that the committee of coordination at Geneva was not a League of Nations committee in the sense in which I have no doubt he regards it. It was not a committee of the assembly nor a committee of the council. It was a committee of representatives of different countries represented at Geneva who took under review the question of deciding what particular sanctions the different countries that were representatives of the league would agree upon. This committee set up a further committee of eighteen.

Mr. CAHAN: Was not that committee set up by the council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By the president of the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The president himself named this subcommittee of the coordination committee.

Mr. CAHAN: It was action agreed upon by the council, I understand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not contradict my hon. friend at the moment, but I am pretty sure I am right and that he is mistaken, and that it was not a committee that was approved formally by the council at all. However, the committee as I say took under review from October 11 to 19 in the manner I have described the question of what particular sanctions should be applied, and sought to ascertain through communication with the different governments represented at the league whether or not they would be agreeable to these particular sanctions. When agreement was found to exist between practically all the countries that were members of the league, then the different countries were notified of the decision that it would be desirable to have the sanctions imposed, and each country took its own action on its own authority, as my right hon. friend yesterday said it was its duty to do. In other words, there had been a violation of the covenant and the different members of the league had an obligation to impose certain penalties as a result of that particular violation.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the right hon. gentleman explain what Doctor Riddell said or did or moved or suggested?—because there is some doubt in my mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am coming to that. Doctor Riddell's statement of what he said was this. He had understood that the question of adding oil, coal, iron, copper—

Mr. BENNETT: Steel.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —steel and one or two other commodities was to come up for consideration on a particular day—I think it was November 3—and he sent a telegram stating that the question was likely to come up and asking for instructions. The answer was sent to him, as I have said, within an hour after this communication had been received, telling him to take no action at all, to exercise no initiative in any way in a matter of the kind; to wait for instructions from the government before acting on any of these matters. It so happened that within a very short time after Doctor Riddell had sent his first cable the question came up, wholly he says unexpectedly.

Mr. BENNETT: In the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the committee. He had thought it would be another day or two before it would come up, but coming up in this unexpected way he did not wait until he had received an answer to his first cable but took it upon himself to make the proposal that oil and certain other commodities should be added to the list of articles which were to be prohibited export to Italy.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it a suggestion or a proposal, may I ask the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think possibly much depends upon the value to be attached to either word. It was a suggestion; it was a proposal; I take the terms as being more or less synonymous. What I want to bring out very clearly is this, that Doctor Riddell as regards the action he took says, and I think quite rightly, that he was not in any sense to be regarded as acting for Canada, that he was simply acting as a member of a committee on which he had been asked to serve and on which he had been working with other members.

Mr. BENNETT: And whose proceedings were private, as I understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the proceedings, as my right hon. friend says, were private or rather were supposed to be private. May I say this, which I think should be made quite clear with respect to the question of oil being added to the list of sanctions. That matter had been proposed before Doctor Riddell proposed it, by one of the European countries. As a matter of fact, from what he says to me, it seemed to have been taken for granted generally that oil would be included in the sanctions, and apparently oil received at that time very little in the way of discussion or consideration at all. The discussion took place more particularly in reference to copper and in reference to derivatives of natural products. There seems to have been a difference of view between members as to whether the sanctions should be confined to natural products or whether they should also include derivatives, and in order, as it were, to equalize the matter between the different countries Doctor Riddell as a member of the committee says that he made the suggestion he did, and made it with the best of intentions and in all good faith.

That I think is the whole story. I believe that Doctor Riddell thought he was doing what was right, that his intentions were entirely right. I do not criticize him on that score at all, but I do say that he had no authority and no right to take any step that was at all likely to be of importance in a critical situation such as there was in Europe at that time without specific instructions and authority from the government of Canada, especially as it was impossible to have the action he took at Geneva interpreted otherwise than as part of the action of the government of this country. When the statement appeared the government immediately communicated with Doctor Riddell and reprimanded him for the action he had taken. He was told in plain language that he had exceeded his authority, that he should not have taken the step he did, and that he was not to take any further action without most careful and full instructions. I have since so expressed myself to Doctor Riddell in Ottawa. On receipt of the government's cable Doctor Riddell immediately cabled back regretting that he had by his action embarrassed the government. I think he embarrassed more than the government. I think his action served to embarrass the country as a whole, and to embarrass to some extent, although it may have been well intended, the whole situation in Europe.

My right hon. friend says that we should not have taken any further step in the matter. May I say that when we became aware of Doctor Riddell's statement and of what he had done, we considered very carefully whether we should not immediately publicly repudiate his act, and it was only because we were most anxious not to take any step which might possibly embarrass the situation in Europe or which might appear even remotely to indicate an exception on the part of Canada to what was being done by other parts of the British empire, that we refrained from taking any action of that kind. In addition to that we were anxious to hear from Doctor Riddell himself the circumstances surrounding his action and to know fully from him what it was that caused him to take the action he did. We wanted to know all the circumstances pertaining thereto. For these reasons—and I think they were good reasons, wise reasons—nothing further was said at the time about the matter.

If other countries had referred, as they should have done, to the action taken at that time by the committee as the action of a committee and not as the action of any member of the committee or of any particular country, or government, nothing further would need to have been said. But the situation wholly changed when after a short time the press of England and of Europe began to refer from day to day to the proposed application of an oil sanction as the especial desire of the government of Canada, and gave to it the designation of the Canadian proposal, and when representatives of the British and other governments at Geneva were being told that the proposal was Canada's proposal and that they should hasten their action because Canada was anxious and insistent in the matter. I do not know whether hon. members realize the extent to which that impression was being created throughout Europe. Let me read some of the references as they appeared in the British press. The News Chronicle of November 4 has the following:

> Far the most interesting event at Saturday's sitting of the committee was Canada's proposal that the list of key products to be barred to Italy should be extended so as to include oil, petrol, coal, iron and steel. We hope this body will proceed at once to examine and report upon how far general acceptance can be obtained for the Canadian proposal.

And on November 5:

> The ban on these exports proposed by the new Liberal government of Canada will not come into force ... until the conditions exist for making effective. The proposal originally made by Canada to place an embargo on these and other products ...

The Morning Post of November 5 carried the following:

> Oil and coal sanctions. Canada's proposal discussed.
> The Canadian proposal is in a way the touchstone of the practical value of economic sanctions.... It is also of interest that Chile made certain reservations this morning on the Canadian proposal.

I quote next from the Observer of November 4:

> Canada's new proposal. Serious effect on Italy.
> The most important proposal before the committee of eighteen to-day came from Canada, who brought forward the suggestion that petroleum and its derivatives, coal, iron, cast iron and steel, be added to the list of banned exports to Italy.

Mr. CAHAN: Are these cables from Geneva or are they editorial comments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are articles which appeared in the newspapers of England. I have quoted from the News Chronicle, the Morning Post and the Observer. I will give one from the Daily Telegraph of November 4:

Ban on coal and oil urged. Canada's move at Geneva.

Canada, supported by Great Britain, to-day proposed that exports to Italy and to Italian possessions of oil and its by-products, coal, cast iron and steel, should be prohibited.

Next I quote from the London Spectator of November 22:

No rapid results can be looked for unless the extension of the list of key products proposed by Canada is agreed on.

And on November 29:

Canada, very properly dissatisfied with a list of key commodities from which the master key was absent, proposed that petrol and coal should be added, provided that the non-league states were willing to cooperate.

These articles hon. gentlemen will I think agree, are not at all uncertain in the emphasis they place on the proposal being one, not of an individual, not of a committee, but of the government of Canada, and of the present federal government as distinguished from all preceding governments.

Mr. CAHAN: It is simply an exemplification of Geneva politics.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows a good deal about that, and he can speak with some degree of authority. He has asked about dispatches from Geneva. I have one or two which I might read and which appeared in our own Canadian newspapers. I quote the following dispatch from Geneva, dated November 5, which came through the Associated Press:

An official communiqué said a Canadian proposal adopted by the sub-committee provided that the list of "key products" barred to Italy should be extended by various articles "as soon as conditions necessary to render this extension effective have been realized."

Then there is a dispatch dated London, November 26, by the Canadian Press:

Official quarters mentioned that Britain already agreed in principle to the proposal at Geneva of Doctor W. A. Riddell of Canada, that coal and oil be added to the list of products not to be sent to Italy, when such an embargo could be made effective.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Then there is a dispatch from Geneva, November 26, Canadian Press—Havas:

League of Nations circles believed to-night an oil embargo against Italy will go into effect early in December, in conformity with Canada's proposal to the League sanctions committee.

I might quote a great many more, but I think that what I have quoted is sufficient to show why, when the press, not only of England and Europe but of all the countries of the world, began to refer to the matter of the application of oil sanctions as Canada's proposal, a proposal of the Canadian government, the time had come, having regard to the critical situation that was known to exist at that moment in Europe, to make very clear, so far as Canada was concerned, that it was not Canada's proposal, that it was not the Canadian government's proposal, but that it was simply the proposal of an individual member of a committee and should have been known, if it was to be designated at all as a proposal, as that of the committee which had been appointed to review these matters.

What did Sir Samuel Hoare say, speaking as Foreign Secretary in the British House of Commons, as to how this particular proposal should have been designated? I quote from a report that appears in the London Times of December 6, 1935:

As to the embargo upon oil, about which there has been so much public discussion, I need only say that, as in the whole field of collective action, so in this particular part of it, we are prepared to play our part. The League has already agreed to the embargo in principle. Great Britain has already agreed to it in principle. I should like to make it quite clear that no one government is any more responsible than another for this collective decision, or indeed for any of the sanctions proposals. These proposals are put forward by subcommittees on which many governments are represented. They are laid before the Committee of Eighteen on the responsibility of the whole subcommittee from which they come.

If that statement had been made some time before, it would not have been necessary for the Minister of Justice, in my absence, to make a statement which I would have made myself had I been here; but it was after the statement was made by the Minister of Justice, making perfectly clear that this proposal was not the proposal of the Canadian government or, in any particular of Canada, but was the proposal of the committee, that the British Foreign Secretary at the time saw the wisdom and the desirability of making that abundantly plain to everyone in Europe and elsewhere, wherever his utterance might reach.

What my hon. colleague the Minister of Justice did was exactly what the British Foreign Secretary did in the statement I have read. He issued a statement of fact, which made it perfectly clear, without commenting in any way at all on the merits of the proposal, but dealing exclusively with its origin, that this sanction proposal was not a Canadian proposal but was one of the committee of the league. He simply stated the truth.

Now I ask hon. members of this house: do they think it was not desirable for the Canadian government to make the truth perfectly clear, particularly at the time? After all apart from other considerations there is such a thing as a sense of proportion in international affairs as in all else. Do hon. members think that it is Canada's role at Geneva to attempt to regulate a European war and to say what other countries are to do with respect to the manner in which a European was is to be carried on? I think it appalling to contemplate the possible consequences of even such action being taken by any representative of this country in Geneva; and not desiring that Canada should appear in any such light or be placed in any such light, the government took good care to make clear the position, as it did.

Mr. CAHAN: Is there any difference between the responsibility of a suggestion being made by a member of this committee, who happened to be the representative of Canada, and subsequent acquiescence in and approval of the whole report or proposal of the committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a very great deal of difference, and my hon. friend knows there is. The question of approval is a matter for consideration. I am glad my hon. friend has interrupted me, because it will help to make the matter quite clear in an all important particular which is evidently in his mind and of which I have not spoken as yet. The question of oil sanctions has not yet been approved. There is as yet no acquiescence.

Mr. BENNETT: By anybody?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By anybody. I cannot make that too clear, that whether there will be an actual application of oil sanctions remains yet to be considered. When that proposal comes before this country, if it does come, it will be considered on its merits. Up to the present time there has been no proposal for application made and there has been no acquiescence in any proposed application. What we wished to make perfectly clear was the exact position of Canada with regard to the origin of a proposal which is still being considered.

May I add this: my right hon. friend has referred to what he read in a paper as he went through the Panama canal about the action of—

Mr. CAHAN: May I interrupt? I was probably mistaken, because I was away myself, and what I read I read in the papers. But I understood that after this suggestion had been made in committee, and made public, the leading nations, England, France, others, concurred in this sanction being applied, the only reservation being an inquiry as to the time and circumstances under which it should be applied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After the committee had considered this matter they communicated with different countries to ascertain whether they would approve an oil sanction. My hon. friend is right in saying that countries were circularized to that effect, but few replied.

Mr. BENNETT: The subcommittee of the co-ordinating committee actually reported in favour of it, and had the statement made by Sir Samuel Hoare been made by the Minister of Justice I do not think anyone could have made any complaint. But it was the terms in which the statement was made that I was speaking of yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my right hon. friend is changing his ground entirely. It is now a question of the terms. I am very glad, however, to have my right hon. friend say that all he objected to was the terms in which the matter was referred to rather than the matter itself. I am very glad to know that that is my right hon. friend's view. In other words, he thinks it was wholly proper that the government of Canada should have made a statement similar to that which was made by Sir Samuel Hoare, and which made it perfectly clear that this proposal was not Canada's proposal or the Canadian government's proposal.

Mr. BENNETT: I think what should have been done was exactly what Sir Samuel Hoare did—to say that any of these proposals emanating from the subcommittee in the report to the main committee were the proposals, not of any government, but of the subcommittee reporting to the committee. I think that would have been the proper thing. But it was vastly different from what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I was interrupted—

Mr. CAHAN: I beg pardon. I was simply seeking information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know that my hon. friend is always more than polite, particularly towards myself. May I say that when for the moment I stopped speaking I was referring to what the leader of the opposition said with regard to the effect on his mind of what he read in a paper as he was going through the Panama canal; the fact that something had been said in an Italian paper, drawing its own inferences and conclusions from the statement that had been issued at Ottawa. I would like to ask my right hon. friend and other hon. members of this house, knowing the very critical condition of affairs in Europe at that time, and that, by pressing the matter of oil sanctions at that stage, a situation might have arisen in Europe the like of which has not been known since the great war, whether this government would have been kept free from criticism if it had not made known that this was not a Canadian proposal but was a proposal of the whole committee. I am not at all sure that, when the whole story comes to be told, it may not be discovered that, but for the action of the government of Canada in this particular matter, at that particular time, the whole of Europe might have been aflame to-day. What would then have been said of "Canada's proposal"? That is a matter worth considering. I had all this very much in my mind when the other day I was speaking of the appalling consequences of the possible result of words spoken, or action taken, without mature consideration and due authority.

I think I have covered all that I wish to say on that matter at the present time. There is one further subject to which I ought to refer, because it was a promise made by my right hon. friend, and I am afraid it is one that he is apt to overlook. He was critical of the statement I issued on the night of the general elections, October 14, and he said he was going to ask some one of his followers to put this statement on Hansard. I have noticed very often that when my right hon. friend wants to evade a subject and not have it come up again, he states what he is going to do at some other time, and then it is not done. I do not want to have him trouble any of his immediate following, and on the other hand I do not want this statement to go unnoticed; so with his permission and that of the house, I will conclude what I have to say by reading the statement myself. I think it admirably sums up the significance of the recent campaign, and indicates pretty clearly the will and wish and views of the people of Canada.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the statement I referred to yesterday? Is it the full statement? The statement I had in mind seems rather longer than that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I know my right hon. friend will regret the length of this statement, but it is the one to which he referred:

I thank the people of Canada for the confidence they have to-day expressed in Liberal principles and policies, in the Liberal party, and in myself as its leader. The Liberal party has placed its trust in the people. The people to-day have reciprocated that trust in abundant measure. It will not be betrayed.

I congratulate the members of the Liberal party on the splendid campaign they have waged. We have been attacked on all sides, and we have won on all fronts. To-day's overwhelming victory is the response of the people made effective through organized effort in a great cause, which was begun the moment the Liberal party went into opposition in 1930, and which has been carried forward with increasing vigour and determination. In this great effort, men and women, young and old, have equally shared. It has been furthered by a strong and helpful Liberal press; and by efficient organization in all parts of Canada—from the headquarters of the National Liberal Federation in Ottawa and provincial Liberal associations in the provinces, to the committees of Liberal workers in municipalities and in the remotest rural polls.

The whole-hearted cooperation of the Liberal premiers and governments of eight of the nine provinces of Canada was an exceptionally significant feature of the campaign, and one which may be expected to contribute in no uncertain way to the solution of many of our country's perplexing problems.

To-day's victory is a victory for democracy. It discloses that the people may be relied upon to exercise their judgment clearly, in spite of innumerable and unscrupulous efforts to divert the electorate from the real issues before them. It constitutes a great deliverance; a deliverance of the people from one-man government, from mistaken policies, and from autocratic leadership. It is a triumph for broad principles and policies, as against promises and pledges recklessly and extravagantly made for the sole purpose of winning an election. It is a declaration that tradition, experience and achievement are still regarded by the Canadian people as one of the greatest assets a political party may possess. It is a direct response to the Liberal protest against all forms of dictatorship in Canada, whether they incline towards Fascism, Socialism or Sovietism, and equally against endless and dangerous experimentation in matters of government. It is a direct response to the appeal for the maintenance of British parliamentary practice and procedure. It proclaims the end of the superman idea. It is clear evidence of the desire of the people of Canada to maintain high standards in Canadian public life, and to enjoy a tone in the discussion of public affairs wholly different from that to which, both in and out of parliament, they have become accustomed during the last five years. It makes clear that the people of Canada have had enough of "blasting" methods, and of the "iron heel"; that they wish to see concord replace discord, and cooperation replace dissension within our own borders; and that good will and not ill will should prevail between Canada and other countries.

The results afford the strongest condemnation of the attempts made by the Bennett government to debauch the people with expenditures from the public treasury, and of the efforts made by Mr. Bennett himself to intimidate the electorate through fear, by raising the bogeys of communism, of the undermining of Canada's industrial standards by unrestricted oriental and other foreign competition, and of the wholesale destruction which he said would await industry under a Liberal government. They afford a conclusive condemnation of the unworthy means employed in the endeavour to effect a so called national government in Canada; to do, after an election, what no political party was prepared to sponsor in the campaign itself. It is proof of the folly of individuals, whatever their motives, summoning new political parties into being, giving them their names and programs, and expecting any appreciable measure of support. It is to be hoped that the campaign of 1935 will witness the end of hysteria, and a speedy return to sanity, in the discussion and administration of the country's affairs.

In the present campaign, the Liberal party concentrated upon the issues which it considered to be vital to the recovery of our national life, but it by no means restricted its discussion to them. It made its position clear upon all questions of immediate concern. The results of to-day's voting may, therefore, be regarded as an all but unanimous endorsation of the principles and policies set forth.

To-day's election discloses that the people share the view, which the Liberal party has all along maintained, that unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It is an endorsation of the Liberal proposal to deal with this question by means of a representative national commission, and by policies which will serve to revive industry and trade.

The results make equally clear that the people generally share the view, kept to the fore by the Liberal party, that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development; and that a Canadian government should do all in its power to negotiate trade agreements with all countries willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis. The results make clear that the people of Canada are opposed to planning for scarcity by the restriction of production, of trade, and of employment, and that they are not satisfied with the Ottawa trade agreements, and welcome the prospect of their early revision. Everywhere Mr. Bennett has said that the verdict of this election would be a verdict for or against the empire trade pacts of 1932. There can no longer be any mistake as to what the people think of those agreements and of Mr. Bennett's methods of their negotiation.

The election is an unmistakable verdict in favour of the liberation of external and internal trade; and in favour of a reciprocal agreement with the United States, and of the restoration of trade with Japan upon a mutually beneficial basis in the case of each of these countries. It constitutes a demand for the abolition of the extravagant increases in the tariff, together with the removal of arbitrary taxes and regulations, as imposed by the present administration, which have had the effect of strangling the commerce of the nation, exploiting consumers, and robbing railways of business. It is a demand for an end to the making and altering of tariffs by executive action, and for the substitution of stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs laws. It is an overwhelming condemnation of the policies of economic nationalism, economic isolation, and economic imperialism, upon which the present government has proceeded in all its legislation; and a corresponding demand for the substitution of policies which will make for economic freedom, national expansion, and international good will.

The election is an endorsation of the Liberal view that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only but of direct concern to every citizen. It is a verdict against a privately owned and controlled central bank, and in favour of a properly constituted national bank to perform the functions of rediscount and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need. There can be no mistaking the demand for a restoration to the government of Canada of control over credit and currency issue. As the campaign proceeded the issue of the control, by the people, of all functions of government, through their representatives in parliament, and not by any other power, became increasingly clear. The electorate has declared that a responsible ministry, not organized finance and international money power, is to control in all matters of state.

The election is an overwhelming verdict against amalgamation of the railways of Canada and against the creation of other monopolies, whether related to the agencies of transportation and communication, production, trade, industry or banking.

It is a verdict for the democratization of industry and the rights of labour and consumers to have their voice heard and influence felt in the control of industrial policy. It is a warning and rebuke to arrogant employers of labour who have sought to intimidate their employees and to prevent them from enjoying the free exercise of the franchise which is the birthright of every Canadian citizen.

Above all, the election is a demand for the restoration of responsible government in Canada, and government not by a single individual but by the collective wisdom of many minds. The people have expressed their determination to end one man government and to reverse the trend of the past five years in the direction of dictatorship. They have overwhelmingly condemned the present government and the abritrary and autocratic methods by which it has proceeded from the day it assumed office, and the manner in which it has persistently defied the unmistakable will of the people.

It is a verdict in favour of personal liberty, electoral reform, and of measures which will, among other things, prevent the national radio being surreptitiously used by any political party for the defamation of character.

It is a verdict in favour of the reduction of the burden of public debt and taxation, and in favour of the attainment of a balanced budget.

It is a verdict in favour of those courses in international relations which will make for peace and good will.

It is a verdict in favour of a more equitable distribution of wealth, with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

These are all principles and policies which the Liberal party has consistently and continuously espoused, and for which it has steadily fought. We began the fight for these policies and principles in the parliament of Canada. We carried our advocacy of them to the people in byelections and in provincial elections. The voice of the people, though clear and decisive, remained unheeded, and their will and wish ignored. We have now submitted our policies to the people in a general election. We have received their endorsation. We shall proceed to put these policies into effect.

A century ago Liberalism in Canada had its birth in the struggle for political liberty and responsible government. The existence of both has been threatened in the period of time that Mr. Bennett has been at the head of affairs. They have been maintained in the measure they have only by continuous and strenuous effort on the part of Liberals in and out of parliament. They will now be fully restored by a Liberal government.

In the new era which dawns to-day the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land. They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls as well as the minds and bodies of an ever increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

The people of Canada have made clear that, in their opinion, "present material interests," and a course of action which does not distinguish between materialistic and spiritual values, must make way for something nobler in the conduct of a nation's affairs; and that self-seeking and selfishness, however much they may appear to lead to worldly success, are not the paths of true greatness either for an individual or a nation. The people of Canada to-day have reaffirmed their faith in the ancient and beneficent precepts that it is only by sharing each other's burdens and doing unto others as we would have others do unto us that men and nations can serve their own best interest and the common good.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is quite unnecessary for me to attempt to cover the ground gone over by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), nor do I consider it necessary to repeat the formal compliments which have already been given. I might however express my appreciation of the very kind reference to myself made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght).

We have heard a good deal in the way of echoes from the last election and the general political situation. I do not intend to spend much time on that sort of thing. It may be inevitable that we should have some crowing by the victors, although I must say that the spectacle is not very edifying. While there may be something in the statement that we have been delivered from a one man government, we might ask whether we have been delivered from minority government. The point made by the leader of the opposition was not, I think, answered by the Prime Minister, the fact being that of all those who were eligible to vote only some thirty-five per cent did vote for the party which now is represented on the government side in such very large numbers.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): A lot of persons who were counted as voters were dead and buried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The fact that such a large number of members were elected by a minority of votes does not really touch the point, because the government, having such a large majority, is able to exercise almost complete control over legislation that may be proposed in this house, and certainly can determine whether or not any legislation shall pass. As a matter of fact, of the total vote cast, 4,392,227, the Liberals received 2,058,699. The plea used to be made that we should have representation by population. I have wondered, in view of the figures I have just given, whether there should not be some change in the electoral system that would give a larger measure of equity.

I have in my possession a document which is now worn almost thin. It is entitled Liberals and Labour, and was issued by the National Liberal committee in 1921, publication No 11. Resolution No. 10 therein accepts the principle of proportional representation. I do not know whether that is to-day a part of Liberal policy. We in our corner every once in a while for some fifteen years tried to bring that particular resolution of the Liberal party to the attention of the Liberals. For nine years of those fifteen the Liberals were in office, and it does seem to me that if they are true to the principles they enunciated and gave to the public some years ago we should have something in the nature of electoral reform brought down at this session of the house.

The Prime Minister referred to those of us in this section of the house and classed us all together as independents. I would almost have thought he would do us the courtesy of using the names which we have chosen and which have become familiar to the whole country.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the new democracy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Instead of that he rather arrogantly classes us all together as independents. We are not Liberals; we are not Conservatives, we are a strange assortment that has to be put all together.

Miss MACPHAIL: Thank heaven for that!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suppose if the Prime Minister chooses to adopt that terminology we shall have to submit, but I suggest that it does not add to the clarity of our discussions or the good will of an assemblage of this kind when one individual, even a prime minister, attempts for his own purposes to class together people who have just come through a campaign in which they have very clearly set out their differences one from the other, and to say that "although I put these all together in one group, it is manifest that these people differ among themselves."

But since we have all been put together I point out that one of the most significant features of the recent election is that over a million people voted for one or another of the groups or individuals that are neither Liberal nor Conservative. I think it is a remarkable thing that a million people in Canada should express dissatisfaction with the old historical parties and with that for which the old historical parties stand. I would remind the government that although they seem to be so firmly entrenched, those who are to be classed as independent, the riffraff as it were, do represent over half the number of votes that were cast for the Liberals who are now in the seats of the mighty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend what term he would use in describing the parties other than the official opposition and the government? What term does he suggest? I did not wish to be offensive; I was seeking what I thought would be the most acceptable term in referring collectively to those groups which are other than the official opposition and the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the Prime Minister must refer to them, possibly the phraseology which he himself has just now used might be acceptable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: "Groups other than the official opposition." It may be proper to group together those who are standing on more or less the same platform as the Liberals, but I repeat, it does not add anything to the understanding of our national problems to attempt to put together groups that have very little in common and then to proceed further and say that these groups differ among themselves. I just point that out in passing. My point is that these groups who are so classed together obtained from the electorate half as many votes as those obtained by the Liberals.

Mr. DUNNING: They do not agree as well as we do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: One of the most humorous slogans of the election in my judgment was this: "Elect King and get action." I wish it were true, because I have been long enough in this house to desire action above almost anything else. I would point out that the government have, as they boast, a very large majority in the house. Further than that, as they again boast, most of the provincial governments are of the same political complexion as themselves. Under these circumstances I would say that the government have absolutely no excuse for lack of action. It is clear that with a large majority in the house and with most of the provinces of the same political complexion the government have absolutely no excuse for non-action. Undoubtedly a large number of people voted for the Liberals in the hope of securing action. Now the Liberals have their chance. We in our small group will do our utmost to cooperate with the government in any sort of progressive legislation. We are small in numbers, but we represent a constituency of nearly 400,000 people. Our attitude in the house in the past has been and will continue to be that of giving support to a government on any progressive legislation, and we wish the present government well in the great task upon which they have entered.

I hold in my hand a leaflet which indicates the Liberal party's position on some immediate problems. It was issued by the National Liberal Federation of Canada, 114 Wellington street, Ottawa, just prior to the election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two years ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suppose the position would be the same to-day as it was two years ago. So far as I can see the leaflet is not dated. Additional copies of the leaflet may be obtained at a cost of thirty-five cents per hundred. As I read the speech from the throne my thoughts were directed to this leaflet. As a matter of fact, in that speech very little progressive legislation is adumbrated—very little. We have a very small legislative program before us. I may be permitted to call attention to several items, the absence of which is very significant.

The leaflet indicates, in the opening paragraph, that the Liberal party considers "unemployment of first concern." In the speech from the throne we find the observation that unemployment is Canada's most urgent problem. That being so, it is unfortunate the Prime Minister had not a word to say concerning unemployment in that short three and a half hour speech of his. As unemployment is one of Canada's outstanding problems, I say it is unfortunate the right hon. gentleman did not say something about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I must remind him that I did refer to legislation, and also mentioned the amount of employment which had been given as a result of one or two measures for which the government is already responsible.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: More employment may have been mentioned, but I believe hon. members will bear me out when I say that no statement was made as to what the government intended to do with regard to the great problem of unemployment. In the leaflet before me the Liberal party had stated that we should have a representative national commission. I believe that is promised in the speech from the throne. They had this further to say, however:

> As permanent measures the Liberal party is pledged to introduce policies which will serve to provide employment by reviving industry and trade—

Then I should like to draw attention to the following words appearing in bold type, "And to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance." The government may say that we already have such a system, and that its constitutionality is now being tested before the courts. I am aware of that; but we have no indication from the government as to what it proposes to do or what its attitude may be. We know very well that last year the Liberal party criticized severely indeed the proposals offered by the then government. What are we to expect in the next year or so? What are we to have by way of relief in the meantime? Those are the matters about which I am concerned. There is no definite proposal put forward by the government in the speech from the throne.

Again we find that this leaflet calls for the "control of investments," and the following paragraph appears in relation thereto:

> The Liberal party believes the financial mismanagement of industry is largely responsible for many conditions obtaining to-day.
> To prevent exploitation of the public through the sale of watered stocks and worthless securities, it believes an investment control board should be established, with supervision of issues of securities by companies incorporated under federal charters.

I quite agree with the idea behind that statement, but we have no indication in the speech from the throne that anything of the kind is proposed. So far as I know this matter is not before the courts. The constitutionality of a measure of this kind is not in question. Why does not the government propose to implement the statement of policy it gave to the country?

Further than that with regard to the democratization of industry, to which the Prime Minister referred even as late as the date of the leaflet, which was issued on the night of the election, we find this:

> The Liberal party believes that industrial reconstruction is the problem of the future. It will seek in industrial relations as opportunity offers to give to workers and consumers a larger share in the government of industry.

So far as I can see there is no indication in the speech from the throne that anything is to be done at this session to implement that promise. I wish something could be done. Meantime many workers are engaged in industries in which they have no chance for anything like freedom. It is not sufficient simply to pass pious resolutions of this kind—I will not say "to make promises," because the Prime Minister is supposed not to have made any promises. I say it is not sufficient to pass resolutions and send out statements of this kind without seeking to implement them at the earliest possible opportunity.

Then, in a reference to the "more equitable distribution of wealth," we find this paragraph:

> The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production, and believes that personality is more sacred than property. It will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice and to the promotion of the common good.

Those are fine sounding phrases with which we may all agree. But I must ask this: What indication is there in the speech from the throne that at this session any legislation will be brought down to carry out the statements contained in the leaflet?

Under the circumstances I should like to propose an amendment to the address in reply, seconded by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that the following words be added to the motion:

"We respectfully regret, however, that Your Excellency's present advisers have not indicated that they have any policy or intend to take definite and immediate steps to end the prevailing poverty and insecurity of the masses by making available to the people of Canada the great actual and potential wealth of the country."

I think all hon. members have recognized the serious nature of the depression through which we have been passing. I, for one, sympathize with any government called upon to administer capitalism under these conditions. Frankly, however, what I am afraid of is that with the slightest move toward an upswing in conditions, the government will refuse to take that radical action so essential under existing circumstances. On every side we are hearing talk about returning prosperity, and I suppose if some slight betterment in conditions comes to us there is no doubt that the government will take credit for having brought this about. That of course is the ordinary practice of politicians. I would say this, however, that as I analyze the situation, and as we have been trying in past years to place the case before parliament, I cannot believe we are going to have any permanent prosperity, and I am suggesting it is time to give attention to some of the more radical policies which we believe to be necessary. In the first place, we face a greatly increased productive capacity. In his book on Technics and Civilization, Mr. Lewis Mumford states that the average workman to-day has the equivalent of 240 mechanical slaves, and can do in a week what would need four years and seven months to do unaided. If the ordinary working man is capable with machinery of producing such a great quantity of wealth or new material, what are we going to do with the workmen who are not needed? Undoubtedly that is one of the main problems that face us at the present time. I do hope that in this house we shall not begin once more to say that either one government or the other is responsible for unemployment. Undoubtedly unemployment is due to grave economic maladjustments. The question is: How is any government going to solve this problem?

The federal reserve board in the United States recently reported:

In February last industrial production was 90 per cent of the 1923-1925 average, but the employment was only 80 per cent and payrolls only 64 per cent.

I fancy that conditions obtaining in Canada are very similar. What do those figures mean? They mean that production is up; that employment is lagging, and that payrolls are lagging still more. That is a serious situation from the strictly economic standpoint. Let me repeat: It means that production is up; employment is lagging, but payrolls are lagging still more.

The United States government has appropriated some twelve million dollars to make surveys into the trends of employment and production. Some of the facts which instigated the inquiry were these: From 1919 to 1929 volume of production in manufacturing industries increased 37 per cent, while employment dropped 2 per cent. Freight car loadings increased 6 per cent from 1923 to 1929, and employment on steam railways declined 10 per cent.

I will just interject that they have no Canadian National railway problem there, and that is one of the reasons I am using these American figures. Further, according to the statement before me, coal production increased 10 per cent from 1919 to 1929, while employment dropped 14 per cent. Despite an increase in production of agricultural commodities, 800,000 agricultural workers were displaced between 1919 and 1927. That the trend shown by the data given above has continued since 1929 is indicated by the fact that the output per man hour in manufacturing industries is estimated to have increased approximately 25 per cent between 1929 and 1935.

You see the seriousness of those statistics. In commenting on a similar situation in Great Britain, W. G. Gray, president of the British Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, says:

We are face to face with something entirely new in human experience.

My quarrel with Liberal doctrine is not that it advocates individual freedom and all that kind of thing, but rather that Liberal policies are essentially based on conditions that no longer exist. If we are to secure true individual freedom and true security we shall have to recognize the conditions that are here now and that are apparently permanent.

I should like to call the attention of the house, and particularly those members who do not read the New Republic regularly, to a very illuminating article by Mr. Chase which appeared in its issue of December 18, 1935. Mr. Chase admits that business is more active; that profit levels have improved; that the dollar volume of retail sales is substantially above what it was a year ago; that the annual income is increasing; that power output and machine-tool production are back to 1929 levels, indicating among other things an augmented flow of labour-saving devices with inanimate energy to power them; that new motor cars, most of them bought on the instalment plan, are filling the roads; that the stock market is becoming active.

Then he gives the other side of the picture: Car loadings tend to remain on the same plateau; unemployment remains; construction industry is still a third less than normal; commercial loans are declining.

Then he puts his finger upon the real difficulty. He says:

> Commercial loans are falling; government loans are rising.

It is curious that in the bank statements which appear in our papers that particular fact has not received very much emphasis. Commercial loans are falling; government loans are rising. Mr. Chase goes on to say:

> The whole balance rests not on a regained equilibrium in private enterprise, after a purging of capital claims, but on government credit. The private-capital market is not functioning, as it did in the upswing from all earlier depressions. Meanwhile, billions of capital claims have not been squeezed out. Outgo is padded with huge "unnatural" capital charges. The principal, including common stocks, of capital claims is still in the neighbourhood of three hundred billions, and a return is demanded as heretofore. Government debts are rapidly being added to the total. The amount of savings that must be promptly and frequently reallocated to preserve balance is enormous.

Then a little bit further on he makes this very significant statement which I confess I had not considered before reading his article. He says:

> "Balance the budget," cries the sound money camp, but to balance the government budget to-day can only mean to unbalance the dollar system.

I think that is a very, very important consideration. On every side people are urging the government to balance the budget, but I would venture to say that if the government does balance its budget the very people who are now urging this would be the first to be seriously affected because to do so would unbalance the whole financial system, for to-day an important sphere of investment is government bonds.

I see it is almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to emphasize that whatever party may be in power, it must face an economic situation that is unprecedented, and any prosperity that may come to us, if my analysis is at all correct, is bound to be of the most temporary character. We must build for the future.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the house rose I was endeavouring to point out some of the prominent economic trends which prevail to-day and which we must recognize if we would solve the problems that confront us. I pointed out that while production was going up, wages were not going up correspondingly, and that employment also was lagging behind. There are important consequences which of necessity follow from that situation. In the very first place we face the lack of consuming power; unless wages are paid we cannot hope that the goods which are produced will be bought. That is one of our fundamental troubles to-day, and under the capitalist system if goods are not bought there is a slackening of the machinery of production. People will not produce unless profits can be obtained, and the slackening of production, following a vicious circle, leads to a still greater measure of unemployment and still lower wages.

Further, there is one other economic result that is all important from the standpoint of the system itself; we reach a point where, if profits cannot be obtained, the system stalls. I think we are now very near that position. As I said once in the house last year, when I read some socialist economists many years ago I used to wonder exactly what was meant by the contradictions of capitalism. To-day, I believe, we understand only too well because we live in an era in which these contradictions are becoming apparent to us all.

Another of these trends about which I should like to speak is this, that expanding markets are not readily available and certainly cannot be depended upon to solve our economic problems. Five years ago when we assembled in this house the Conservatives stressed the possibility of unemployment being solved by higher tariffs. The years since then have demonstrated that their solution did not work. The Liberals now come into office and they emphasize the possibility of wider markets. I am quite confident that the next five years, and perhaps a much shorter period than that, will demonstrate that their scheme will not work either. The trouble is deeper than the question of protection or of lower tariffs.

I was very much interested in reading in the Manitoba Free Press of January 11, 1936, a letter from Miss E. Cora Hind, who, as everyone knows, is quite a specialist on agricultural affairs. Miss Hind writes:

> Having now visited Norway, Sweden, Germany, Poland, Roumania, Jugoslavia, Hungary, Austria and Czechoslovakia, and looked into the possibility of these countries for the export of Canadian wheat, I must frankly confess that I am disappointed at the outlook. Before leaving Canada, I in common with many others felt that a change in government, and more liberal customs and trade arrangements, would be practically all that was needed to reestablish much of the former trade to Europe. I feel now that the task, while not an impossible one, will be a more difficult one and will take more time than was anticipated.

Commenting on this editorially, the Free Press said:

> Miss Hind's judgment on this point, based as it is on personal investigation, will be accepted as authoritative.

The latter part of the editorial is less ingenuous when it suggests that it is easier to throw markets away than to whistle them back. It is not going to be easy to find markets for our wheat, and I suggest that it is not going to be easy to-day to find markets for any large export from Canada. I do not want to go into an argument which I have used previously in this house, but I would point out that in the earlier days of capitalism there was nearly always an expanding market. It was in those days that the trade of Great Britain flourished. Later on other nations came into the picture. They too began to export to countries that had once been consumer countries and had become themselves producer countries and thus competitors of Great Britain. Since the war that tendency has greatly increased. We witness perhaps the outstanding example in Japan, which a few years ago used to consume our goods but is now producing and exporting not merely consumable goods but capital goods as well.

I do not think the Liberal doctrine has sufficiently recognized the development which has taken place in the capitalist system. The Liberal party is still depending upon a constantly enlarged market to keep the system going and to bring back prosperity. I do not say that there cannot be developed or found certain markets; I hope there will be. But I do say that we cannot depend upon a constantly increasing market as an economic solution of our problems.

A change of government has taken place, but I submit that our pressing problems remain unchanged. Among these I would call special attention to the unemployment situation and the distress that prevails at the present time. According to a statement made about a month ago by the Canadian Welfare Association, while employment in Canada has reached its highest level since December, 1930 relief costs have not moved correspondingly downward, and there are still more than one million Canadians in receipt of direct unemployment relief. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is not in his place, but undoubtedly he can give us the very latest figures. I fancy, however, that the figures I have just given are substantially correct. Take my own city. In Winnipeg nearly 24,000 heads of families have registered since 1924. In 1933, the peak was 9,734 families and in September, 1935, it was 7,309.

I need not speak of the demoralizing effect of this situation upon families that for some years have been on relief. In the first place these families are being crowded into very narrow and inadequate living quarters. The whole standard of living is being lowered; for whereas a few years ago it was considered necessary, for a moderately sized family, that there should be at least three or four rooms, to-day the ordinary family is being housed in two rooms. This surely is not sufficient to maintain what we have regarded as a Canadian standard of living. And that is not in a few individual cases; it is a wholesale matter. Food, perhaps, is more or less adequate, but there are a great many things besides meat and potatoes that people need in order to have a proper variety in their food; and as regards extras of any kind, the people are very greatly lacking. Household supplies have run down during these years, and we are faced with a serious state of affairs throughout the country.

In rural Manitoba the director of public health nurses recently asked for clothing for 600 children who otherwise would not continue at school during the winter. The Junior League, which is not at all a radical organization, in offering assistance stated its belief that the responsibility for providing clothing for destitute children is a necessary government service and not one for private charity. I quite agree that it is a necessary government service to provide clothing for these 600 children. Think of it! In the small province of Manitoba there are 600 children who, unless they are provided for by charity, cannot go to public school. Surely that is a serious thing in this rich country of ours. I agree that this is a public responsibility, but behind that it is decidedly a public responsibility, a government responsibility, to see that such gifts of charity should not be required; that the need for them should not continue.

I would like to commend the government for its dealing so far with the system of the single men's unemployed camps. I think the evidence which has been brought forward in connection with the reports and investigations that have been made justifies what we said in this corner last year. I am glad to learn that we are to have these camps transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Labour department. This is a good move. We stated here that the difficulty was not primarily that of food, although evidence before the British Columbia commission showed that at that time there was very much to be desired in the way of the food; the real difficulty has been that of segregating large numbers of young people, who ought to be at regular work, who ought to be filled with hope, in these camps where they have remained year after year without any hope of anything better in the future. We have urged, and I would urge again—

Mr. SPEAKER: I might call the attention of the hon. gentleman that he has exhausted his time to speak.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, might I point out that a motion is before the house. The motion is technically one of non-confidence, and I have the right to speak beyond the forty-minute time.

As I have said, we have advocated again and again a program of work and wages. We should have real work, not a putting-in of time—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I call to the hon. gentleman's attention that he is too late now to move the motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The motion has been proposed, Mr. Speaker. A copy was sent to the Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member is quite right. It was read.

Mr. SPEAKER: Well, I did not hear it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think Hansard will bear me out.

Mr. SPEAKER: No motion was given to me.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But it was made on the floor of the house, and the records of Hansard will prove it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my hon. friend that the motion should have been sent to the Speaker.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was it read?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The motion was sent up to the Speaker. It was not my fault that it was not read.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not read it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I say it was not my fault that the Speaker did not read it. It was sent to the Speaker as well as to the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it had better be read and thereby regularized; my hon. friend might then take another forty minutes.

Mr. BENNETT: He reads the amendment himself, indicating that he proposes to move it when he concludes his speech. Then the Speaker reads it; that gives the hon. member the right to continue his remarks, and at the same time to speak longer than forty minutes. The Speaker will read it as an amendment to the original motion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I was going to call attention to the fact that that was the way in which the motion was moved yesterday for an address to His Excellency the Governor General. The mover read the motion when he rose to his feet, and after he had finished speaking the Speaker put the motion. What was good yesterday should be good to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was a different kind of motion. The motion yesterday was in the possession of the Speaker before the forty minutes had elapsed. To-day it was not.

Mr. HEAPS: I saw the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) send one copy to the Speaker, one to the leader of the opposition, and one to the Prime Minister. Whether the Speaker received it or not I cannot say, but I do not think it is stated anywhere in the rules of the house that the Speaker is bound to read the motion in order to allow the hon. member who is moving it to speak more than forty minutes.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rule and Forms, citation 376, states:

> No motion is regularly before the house until it has been read from the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would point out that the rules of the house are made, not to restrict the liberties of members, but rather to protect them; and in this case there certainly has been a misunderstanding on the part of some hon. members. The hon. member who has the floor unquestionably indicated at the beginning of his remarks that he had an amendment. He was kind enough to send one copy to myself. I have no doubt he sent one copy to His Honour the Speaker; but as an old member of the house he will recall that he should have waited until the Speaker had read the motion before proceeding with his discussion. It would then have been regular. But he did not do that, I am perfectly sure through an oversight. I think under the circumstances the matter would be regularized by the Speaker reading the motion now, and the discussion being then proceeded with.

Mr. SPEAKER: Moved by Mr. Woodsworth, seconded by Mr. Coldwell:

That the following words be added to the motion:

"We respectfully regret, however, that Your Excellency's present advisers have not indicated that they have any policy or intend to take definite and immediate steps to end the prevailing poverty and insecurity of the masses by making available to the people of Canada the great actual and potential wealth of the country."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the kindness of the Prime Minister in regularizing the action in this way. I would point out that since the Speaker had the motion in his own hand he might at least have read it before the forty minutes had elapsed. I was trying to point out that what was desirable in connection with the young men who are unemployed was real work and real wages. We shall have to wait until the legislation is before us to know just how far the government is prepared to act in this regard. I should like however to say now that, while there is so much work to be done in this country in the way of building and reforestation and so on, there is no reason whatever why the men cannot be given real work that will be of permanent value to this country. Further than that, since these young men are out of work through no fault of their own, there is no reason why the state should not pay them reasonable wages. I was rather sorry to find in the report that a good deal of stress was laid upon the danger of agitators in the camps. There may be agitators in the camps, but I think we all recognize that agitation does not get very far unless there is some ground for agitation. If conditions are not good, as long as men are not slaves they have a right to proclaim the evils that exist or to band themselves together in order to obtain redress from those evils. This was extremely difficult to do under conditions that prevailed during the last two or three years.

I should like to impress upon the house the necessity of our looking at these unemployed in an altogether different way from what we have been accustomed to do in the past. We have been too much inclined to think that they were near criminals, or that they should be treated as paupers. To-day tens of thousands of people are out of work through no fault of their own. If there is any fault, it is that of the governments of this country that have not been able so to adjust conditions that these men and women could find the work that formerly they had. They should not be penalized more than any other section of the community. They should not be regarded as paupers. There were some men who ran in this election, formerly members of this house, who were defeated. What happened to them? They were provided with jobs of various kinds. Some were found positions in the Senate; some were put on important commissions, and so on. There were other men who belong to the smaller parties in this house who were also defeated. To-day some of them are in the bread line. There is no fundamental difference between the man who is provided with a job in the Senate or on a commission, simply in order that he may be cared for, and the man who is in a relief camp simply because the state has not afforded any way by which he can earn an honest living. We need to get away from the idea that these unemployed people are either paupers or criminals.

There is another matter to which I should like to direct attention, and that is the huge debt which is hanging over our people. I am afraid the hysterical people of this country are not to be found only among the unemployed. I was interested to note this language in a recent issue of the Montreal Daily Star of February 6, 1936:

—this country is on the verge of disaster, nearer to a smash than it has ever been, nearer than it was in 1929, when the economic world rocked about our ears and it seemed as if we were plunging directly into the maelstrom.

And again:

The simple truth in that we are face to face with a crash which, unless it is averted, will blast this country's future and lead us into an economic darkness of such density and duration as to stagger the imagination.

Those are not my words. Possibly some of us will be rather reminded of the "whispers of death" of some years ago. However the facts are serious enough, and I am glad to note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) nods his head in approval. We have sometimes urged that sooner or later debts will have to be scaled down or the interest will have to be reduced and sometimes we have been told that this means repudiation in whole or in part. I do not like the word "repudiation," but I do say very definitely that just as international debts in practice have been repudiated, so I think it is only a matter of time until, whether under a Liberal or a Conservative government, these internal debts of ours will have to be materially scaled down. I do not see any other way out. The other day I came across a very interesting letter issued by Mead and Company of Montreal dated December 19, 1935. In making a plea for debt conversion the letter gave the burden of debt as follows:

Gross Funded Debt

	Direct debt	Contingent debt	Total
Dominion government..	$3,100,000,000	$1,100,000,000	$4,200,000,000
Provincial government..	1,500,000,000	130,000,000	1,630,000,000
Municipal government..	1,400,000,000	.....	1,400,000,000
	$6,000,000,000	$1,230,000,000	$7,230,000,000

In other words the direct debt of these three amounts to $6,000,000,000 and the contingent debt to $1,230,000,000, or a total of $7,230,000,000. Mead and Company continue:

> The direct internal funded debt of the dominion government is approximately $2,300,000,000. The total internal funded debt of the dominion, provinces and municipalities is estimated at not less than $4,500,000,000 and is probably nearer $5,000,000,000. School or other public debts are not included, nor are unfunded floating debts, etc., etc.

Later they urge:

> Compulsory conversion is, in effect, a capital levy; it is a form of conscription. "Capital" is surely sufficiently alert to its own interests to be willing to surrender a little to save a great deal. We have never succeeded in distributing the sacrifice of war evenly among our people—

I am delighted indeed to find a commercial organization taking that ground, which I may say we have taken again and again.

> We have never succeeded in distributing the sacrifice of war evenly among our people—

Listen:

> —there seems no good reason why people of means should be less willing, in emergency, to surrender a portion of their wealth than they would their own or their sons' bodies. Internal disruption is not less dangerous than foreign aggression whether we think in terms of liberty, social institutions or trade. If compulsory conversion is to be avoided, self interest may dictate what patriotism merely urges.

I commend that to business men in this country. I think it is rather important, and I delight to have it come from at least a few of the people who are recognized in the business world. Let me read it again:

> If compulsory conversion is to be avoided, self interest may dictate what patriotism merely urges.

I take it that the time is coming when we shall have to consider very carefully the burdens that rest upon the people of this country.

There are very serious conditions indeed among the farmers of the west. Last year for some weeks I was out among the farmers in southwestern Manitoba and southern Saskatchewan where I found the most deplorable conditions, due not to unemployment but very largely to climatic conditions coupled with the enormous debts which the farmers have to carry. I met families whom I had known thirty years ago, when they were in a fair way to success; to-day they are living on relief, and whole communities are desperate. I found some families who had moved to northern Saskatchewan—and there are members from that district who know these conditions as well as or better than I do—living in a destitute condition. What have we done for these people? We have handed them out a little bit of relief. It is quite true that some provision was made by this house some years ago for dealing with the drought situation. I believe a few ponds have been dug for the storage of water; I believe here, there and yonder a little has been done in the way of strip farming, but nothing has been done on a very extensive scale and certainly no adequate provisions has been made that would allow these farmers to maintain their standards of living and their self respect. I ask why these conditions should be perpetuated at a time when other people are living in comparative luxury. There is no reason whatever for such a situation.

Since taking office the government has been active along several lines. To-day we heard about the United States agreement. Personally I think it is good as far as it goes, but I should like to ask: What about the method employed? We are told it is an agreement rather than a treaty, and as such most of its clauses do not need to be ratified by parliament. That is the information we have been given. I am inclined to think that if the Prime Minister were sitting on this side of the house he would have a great deal to say about such an action taking away the rights of parliament. Some hon. members may recall what he said several years ago in connection with the Ottawa conference. In discussing the agreements there made he said, according to Hansard for 1932-1933, volume I, at page 41, in urging that the government should have made only a tentative agreement:

> We are no longer free to settle in our own parliament what our fiscal policy is to be because that has been settled for us by a meeting of the executives of different parts of the empire, and that without consultation with their several parliaments in advance.... Will this House of Commons have the right to alter one line of those agreements? Will this house have any opportunity of lowering or raising any duties as fixed in those agreements? Will the British government have that right? On the contrary, will not all legislative bodies be told, "These agreements were arrived at in the conference at Ottawa and they are to be put through without any change whatever." What then becomes of the freedom of parliament? What is the significance of parliament in that event? Why have a parliament at all, if executives of different parts of the empire can meet together and lay down a new imperial policy and compel its adoption by the imputation of a want of patriotism or a desire to bring about the dismemberment of the empire, as against those who are not prepared to support such measures?

Well, I personally do not worry a great deal about the method, but I should like the Prime Minister at his leisure to explain why it is that he complains so bitterly of the methods used at the Imperial conference in regard to the Ottawa agreements and yet feels free to bring to this house an agreement which need not be ratified in its details by the house, but which, we are told, is to go through as arranged.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not like to interrupt, but the two are entirely different. May I say that all that has been effected up to the present has been the reduction of certain duties under a statute that this parliament passed, which gave to the government authority to reduce duties at any time provided a like concession was made to it by some other country. The agreement to which I took exception and to which my hon. friend has referred was an agreement which increased duties, put additional taxation on the people of this country without parliament having authorized anything of the kind by statute or otherwise.

Mr. BENNETT: It did not become operative until passed by this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Neither will this agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: It is operative now, since the first of January.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, we may leave that to be threshed out in future. Personally I cannot see wherein the difference lies. I am glad it is in the direction of lower tariffs, but at the same time I do not see that the method in the two cases is so fundamentally different.

Then there is the question of Japan. The other day I read an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper which I try to read from time to time, in which the statement was made that the duty had been reduced from 176 per cent to 148 per cent. I am not sure whether that is true. The Free Press commented at that time that this was under a Liberal government; that the manufacturers of the east should not make a great fuss when they still have a protection of 148 per cent. There is, I believe, some question as to the rate, but I understand that in any event it is over 100 per cent. I should like to call this to the attention of my friend the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman) and ask whether he is altogether satisfied that under a Liberal government we should still have a duty of 100 per cent.

However I do rejoice to-night in the partial conversion of the Liberals. I congratulate them on calling the bluff of the textile people. I recall several years ago an excellent statement made by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), as to the enormous profits made by the corporation concerned. I think the Free Press in its editorial had a note that during the five years 1930-1934 the Dominion Textiles Company had distributed dividends amounting to $7,091,000, at the same time paying low wages. Undoubtedly the government has done well in calling the bluff of that corporation. But there is one further point. The Liberals are actually recognizing the need for state intervention. They are not as hopeless as I thought. I hope that in the future the precedent which they have adopted in this case will be carried out.

There is one other proposal in the speech from the throne to which I wish to refer, and that is the national loan board. Perhaps something of this kind is inevitable. But it is indeed an irony that it should be a Liberal government which proposes that the provinces should surrender their autonomy in financial affairs. If such action is taken there should be an assumption by the dominion government of a corresponding responsibility for social services. It is curious how we are quite willing to centralize the mounted police force, but not willing to centralize the giving of relief, the lack of which so largely accounts for the necessity of the mounted police, if indeed there is such necessity. The matter of unemployment is still considered primarily one for the provinces; old age pensions are still considered primarily a provincial matter, as well as health, education, and all those things. Yet now, without taking over any responsibility for these important functions, we are to have centralization in the realm of finance. It seems to me that is very serious indeed. As I thought of this I was reminded of an old Hebrew law, and I turned up the book of Deuteronomy, the fifteenth chapter, and I should like to read, in the revised version, verses 1 and 2; 12 to 14; and 16 and 17:

> At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor shall release that which he hath lent unto his neighbour; he shall not exact it of his neighbour and his brother; because the Lord's release hath been proclaimed....
> If thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou lettest him go free from thee, thou shalt not let him go empty; thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy threshing-floor, and out of thy winepress; as the Lord thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him....
> And it shall be, if he say unto thee, I will not go out from thee; because he loveth thee and thine house, because he is well with thee; then thou shalt take an awl, and thrust it through his ear unto the door, and he shall be thy servant forever. And also unto thy maidservant thou shalt do likewise.

Well, I suggest that the awl that makes people perpetual slaves may very well prove to be the national loan board. In all seriousness, there is a very great danger that we may stabilize our debts and by so doing place an impossible burden upon the great mass of our people.

In the resolution which I proposed I urged that there is nothing in the speech from the throne that would indicate that any definite or any immediate steps are being taken to relieve the poverty or insecurity of the masses by making available to the people of Canada the great actual and potential wealth of the country. Undoubtedly we have in this country great actual wealth, and we have still greater potential wealth. But the fact is that we have not done anything very definite in distributing this wealth. I do not think I can do better than follow the Prime Minister's example by reading a portion of a speech that I made on a previous occasion. About a year ago, on March 28, 1935, I spoke on the distribution of wealth as follows:

> Recently I had occasion to make a study, with the help of some friends, of some of the statistical information supplied by the Year Book and from the census. If the income tax returns are combined with the figures of earnings it is possible to show the distribution of income among a very large section of the population. I may say that we were not able to secure any information as to the distribution of farm incomes. But leaving out farm income, we have some 2,713,000 wage earners and other income receivers for whom it is possible to estimate the distribution of income for the year 1930-31.

Those were the better years.

> I have before me a table which gives the distribution of the number of income receivers, other than agricultural, and their income in Canada, for the year 1930-31. This is a short table, and with the permission of the house I will place it on Hansard in its present form.

Table 3.—Estimated Distribution of Number of Income Receivers (other than agricultural) and their Income, Canada 1930-1931

Size of income	Number of persons (male and female)	Per cent of total	Income (millions of dollars)	Per cent of total income
Under—$ 1,000	1,526,000	56.2	790.0	25.4
$ 1,000— 1,500	643,000	23.7	805.0	25.9
1,500— 3,000	448,000	16.5	896.0	28.8
3,000— 10,000	85,000	3.2	401.0	12.9
10,000—and over	11,000	0.4	219.0	7.0
Totals	2,713,000	100.0	3,111.0	100.0

From this table it will be seen that 56·2 per cent of the income receivers, both males and females, receive less than $1,000 per year. The total ernings of these workers constitute only one-quarter of the total income of all persons, although they form more than half of the aggregate number. Slightly less than one-quarter of the workers have incomes between $1,000 and $1,500, and the aggregate incomes of these persons are a little more than one-quarter of the total. The two groups receiving less than $1,500 per year thus form approximately 80 per cent of the total number, yet they received only a little more than half the total income. The other 20 per cent of the income receivers, those getting more than $1,500 per year, secured almost half of the total income. The group with the highest incomes, those getting more than $10,000, was composed of only 11,000 individuals, and yet this small group received an aggregate income equal to that of more than 400,000 of the poorest paid workers.

According to this statement, the great majority of the income receivers, that is, 1,526,000, receive less than $1,000 per year. I would point out that the family budget as published by the Dominion Department of Labour provides for $800 for food and housing for a family. On that basis a family would need an annual income of from $1,200 to $1,500 to meet the requirements for a decent standard of living, but according to the statistics of the government the vast majority of the people of this country are forced to live on a standard below what would be considered as reasonable. There is no need for such things in a country like this possessing such great resources and spendlid equipment.

On that occasion I went on to refer to a committee appointed a year and a half ago, I believe by the federal government of the United States, to consider what it was possible to produce in that country, with their present equipment, if the equipment were properly organized. The figure established was $4,400 per family. That is, without any additions to their present industrial equipment, and using what they have to full capacity, it would be possible to produce in the United States an income of $4,400 per family. I fancy that the conditions in that country are not greatly dissimilar from those in Canada. We will put the figure at $4,000, if you like, or even at $3.000. In contrast, the vast majority of families in Canada are receiving less than $1,000, a great many in the vicinity of $600 or $700, and many more are out of work and hence are receiving no regular income, only that derived from state or charity.

That is a serious condition. Are we not stupid if we continue a system whereby most of the people are receiving less than $1,000, when it is possible for us to double, treble or quadruple that amount? I put that before the government. We go along year after year after year, following the same old lines. I do urge sincerely that the members of this house very definitely insist that we seriously consider what can be done towards providing for the needs of the masses of the people of Canada. Everyone admits that we have great wealth; everyone admits that we have still greater potential wealth. We cannot see how we can let the government pass this address without urging our point of view, and stating that in failing to make some more definite provision for the needs of the masses the government is failing to perform its real task.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations concerning the speech from the throne. Last night the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated that he was in some doubt as to the stand which a number of hon. members in this section of the chamber were going to take with respect to the support of his government. I shall deal briefly with that point.

In a general way we feel that the speech from the throne is not quite full enough; that it does not go far enough and is not exact enough in the treatment which it prescribes for the grievous ills afflicting our country to-day. There is, however, one section of the speech from the throne which appeals to us strongly. Taken along with other pronouncements which have been made on the subject by the Prime Minister we feel that possibly this is sufficiently definite. We desire to be exceedingly definite about this particular part of the speech from the throne, namely, that part which appears as follows:

> The control of credit, and the issue of currency, being public matters of direct concern to every citizen, it is intended, at the present session, to ask parliament to make such changes in the ownership and control of the Bank of Canada, as may be necessary to give to the government a predominant interest in the ownership as well as effective control of the bank.

As we see it, if the Prime Minister and his cabinet intend to do the things we believe they intend to do, they will be taking a step which will require a great deal of courage on their part, because they will be doing something which has long been necessary and something which will be almost revolutionary. In their steps forward to this momentous reform they will find the social credit people solidly behind them at every step.

First of all, however, may I refer to some of the things we assume they mean by this statement. We want to make sure that it is going far enough, and that it would constitute a real solution of the difficulties confronting us as a people. May I read one or two further passages which we place alongside the statement in the speech from the throne? First I shall refer to some observations of the Prime Minister delivered on the evening of October 14, a speech which has caused me greatly to admire the right hon. gentleman. I cannot remember a time when a man has made an election promise so quickly after his election. Since he made the statement I have felt a great admiration for him. What he said has greatly increased my confidence in his leadership through the perilous times in which we are now living. These words are particularly impressive:

> The election is an endorsation of the Liberal view that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to every citizen. It is a verdict against a privately owned and controlled central bank, and in favour of a properly constituted national bank to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need.

Finer words would be difficult to find.

> There can be no mistaking the demand for a restoration to the government of Canada of control over credit and currency issue. As the campaign proceeded, the issue of the control, by the people, of all functions of government, through their representatives in parliament, and not by any other power, became increasingly clear.
> The electorate has declared that a responsible ministry, not organized finance and international money power, is to control in all matters of state.

We ask for nothing stronger than that.

Here is another pronouncement which greatly pleased me. It was made in parliament in 1934 by the present Prime Minister and restated in his platform on August 2, 1935. It is as follows:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. . . . . To regain for the nation what has thus been lost, will continue to be the first objective of Liberal effort.

May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that as we understand the clear meaning of those statements, if the Prime Minister proposes to follow out that policy step by step and do the things which he has pledged himself here to do, he will find the social credit people throughout the whole Dominion of Canada as well as those in parliament marching with him step by step all the way. We feel that there must be a general monetary reform—a genuine one. A new order must come in. I think plenty of evidence can be found for that. I do not wish to quote things which might be tiresome in order to show how much that has, I fancy, impressed every member of this house, but may I read an excerpt from the first radio address delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) on January 2, 1935? He said:

[Mr. Blackmore.]

In the last five years great changes have taken place in the world. The old order has gone; it will not return. We are living amidst conditions which are new and strange to us. Your prosperity demands corrections in the old system so that in these new conditions that old system may adequately serve you. The right time to bring about these changes has come.

That is exactly the stand of the social credit people throughout the dominion.

Here is another pronouncement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition which bears out the same general idea. It was made at the opening of the Imperial Economic Conference in Ottawa in 1932, when he declared, according to the record which I have, "International finance has broken down."

Again in his opening broadcast in January, 1935, he uttered these words:

> The truth is disturbing. The signs of recovery are few and doubtful. The signs of trouble are many, and they do not lessen.

In his rectorial address at Queen's university on February 20, 1935, he made the following very significant remark:

> With the Aladdin lamp of modern production at their elbow, with large sections of their population in want, tariff barriers are erected, quotas established, exchanges controlled in an ever-failing effort to restore the productive machine by creating a semblance of scarcity.

Again, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the stand of the social credit people throughout the world.

There must be some very grave reasons why these gentlemen of recognized authority and soundness of judgment have come to the conclusions which they have so effectively expressed.

There are confronting the world at the present time five grievous problems not one of which can possibly be solved by human intelligence under the present system. I shall name the five problems, and then I should like to crave your patience while I develop to some extent two of them. The five problems are: first, unemployment; second, debt; third, freedom from the menace of money power or international finance; fourth, war; fifth, foreign trade. I should like to discuss briefly two of these problems, namely, debt and foreign trade.

It is very necessary that we spend a little time on the question of foreign trade. I may be wrong, Mr. Speaker, but my judgment is this, based upon the best information I have been able to gather, that all our talk about increasing foreign markets by raising or lowering tariffs is idle. We may in that way ameliorate conditions to a slight degree, but we can never solve our problems by seeking for foreign markets. The debt problem is, if possible more serious still.

May I deal for a moment with debt? I do not know how many in this house are aware of these facts, which staggered me when I first heard them. Professor Rautenstrauch of Columbia university recently completed an investigation into the growth of the world's debts. He discovered, according to the information which I have, that in the sixteen hundreds the debts of the world increased 47 per cent; in the seventeen hundreds the debts of the world increased 466 per cent; in the eighteen hundreds the debts of the world increased 12,000 per cent; in the nineteen hundreds and up to the present time the debts have increased according to the curve established by the previous tremendous increase. Now if the debt of Canada has so appallingly increased, as we all know it has, and is destined to grow under the present system at so alarming a rate, can anyone with ordinary human intelligence see how it is possible to solve the problem of debt under the present system?

Let me point out something else which is very well worthy of note. Let us look at the debt situation in Great Britian. According to figures which I have Great Britian before the war owed £650,000,000. On March 31, 1919, after the war, Great Britain owed £7,434,949,429. Between 1920 and 1934, as a result of the most appalling taxes, taxes that veritably drained their life blood away, the British people were able to pay off their national debt the sum of £8,303,768,254, or a great deal more than the debt was to start with in 1919. Yet on December 31, 1933, the British people had to face this disheartening situation, that they still owed £7,947,000,000, or £512,000,000 more than they owed on March 31, 1919, when they started to pay off their debt, and they had already paid off one billion pounds more than they owed at the beginning in 1919. In other words, their debt increase was, after all those payments, 78·7 per cent of their total pre-war national debt.

Now if anyone with ordinary human intelligence can see how Great Britain can ever pay off that debt, especially when she cannot sell the goods which she is producing and must be a rival for trade in the world's markets, he must have phenomenal intelligence beyond what I have seen anyone possess. A similar condition exists to a greater or less degree in our own country. Now how are we going to solve the problem o debt if we continue with the present system?

Let us turn to the question of trade. I fancy some hon. members in this house will challenge this statement, that there is to-day in industry a deficiency of purchasing power; in other words, industry cannot at the present time distribute to consumers an amount of money sufficient to purchase the goods which industry is producing. Lest some hon. members make capital of this remark, let me hasten to back up my statement with some authorities and then they will be free to attack those authorities and not myself. General Hugh Johnson, administrator of the National Recovery Act in the United States, declares:

> The ability of the pepole to buy is not so great as the total cost of what there is to sell.

That is a pronouncement which, coming from an authority of his standing, ought to be sufficient. But let me read from the findings of the London Chamber of Commerce as published in the Trade and Engineering Supplement of the Times of Saturday, December 17, 1932, by A. de V. Leigh:

> If each nation gave to its own people full internal purchasing power, that is, ability to absorb its own production, none would have any objection to exporting ten, twenty, or fifty per cent of that production and receiving imports of a similar value; it is because each has insufficient purchasing power internally, to absorb its own production, that each is anxious to export and unwilling to import.

There you come to the point which I referred to a while ago, namely, that it is utterly impossible to solve our problem by means of foreign trade. That is the reason why we have tariff barriers erected; that is the reason why nations are all interested in economic nationalism; and it is a reason which until it is removed will not be substantially affected by the lowering of tariffs or by anything we can possibly do in that direction.

Another statement taken from the same issue is this:

> The position so brought about is that each nation has got millions of men unemployed, factories working to 25 per cent of capacity, and still a large surplus which, owing to inadequate internal purchasing power, must be exported; but as every other nation is in exactly the same predicament, also with millions of men unemployed, factories working to 25 per cent of capacity, and a large surplus which their internal purchasing power is insufficient to absorb, the first instinct of self-preservation is to build up high tariff walls in order to retain for their own use such insufficient purchasing power as they have. They then enter upon economic warfare with their neighbours, trying to thrust upon them under pressure their unwelcome though by no mean unwanted surplus.

I do not wish to occupy your attention longer, Mr. Speaker, on this point, though there are a great many other passages I might quote. With your permission, however, I would refer to some figures published by R. J. Scrutton in the April, 1935, number of the magazine Prosperity. He is using round numbers, quoting the American Bureau of Economic Research. He says that in the United States, in a given year, $60,000,000,000 worth of consumable goods, food, clothing, shelter and the like was produced by their industry, but that in that year, when they counted up all the money which was distributed in the United States in the form of wages, dividends, salaries, commissions, and in every other conceivable way in which men could get money with which to buy, there was only $45,000,000,000, and when you discounted $5,000,000,000, which was put into life insurance and thus taken away from the stream which could be used to buy goods, there was only $40,000,000,000. In other words, in the United States in that year there was $20,000,000,000 worth of goods which the American people did not have purchasing power to buy.

What would the United States do with that $20,000,000,000 worth of goods? The figures represent the condition, more or less extreme, which exists in every civilized and industrialized nation at the present time. If the United States undertakes to trade off this $20,000,000,000 worth of goods, receiving $20,000,000,000 worth of French goods, say, in exchange, how can the people of the United States buy that quantity of French goods when they were unable to buy their own? Here we see the secret of the difficulty in international trade.

Now the trouble is purely one of finance. As an indication of this may I quote an authority. Sir Basil Blackett, director of the Bank of England, has made this statement:

> When I think of what we have done with money, and what money has done to us, I think we are all fit for a lunatic asylum.

Again let me quote Lord Melchett, the former Sir Alfred Mond, director of Barclay's Bank, of Imperial Chemical Industries, of the International Nickel Company of Canada, and so on:

> The world gets 3 per cent richer every year. This gradual increase of the world's wealth is due mainly to the discoveries of science and the development of industry. We must learn the economics of plenty and forget the economics of scarcity. In the near future our currency and our economics will have to be based on quite different ideas from the past.

Now what are the things upon which our currency is to be based? That is the question, and I leave that for us all to consider. I have here another quotation which probably will be of interest. At the annual meeting of the Canadian Bank of Commerce of January, 1935, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of January 15, 1935, Sir John Aird, president, stated:

> No one now realizes more clearly than our legislators that the cost of public services is out of proportion to the population and its income. The situation cannot be relieved by increased borrowing, or by shifting part of the burden of the care of unemployed people from one legislative group to another. It is now quite generally agreed that continuous borrowing to cover deficits and to maintain social services on the present scale cannot go on indefinitely.

We must find, therefore, as a nation, some other way of getting money. The unemployment problem is increasing. The need of increasing power in order to enable our people to sell their goods both at home and abroad is growing more and more, and to solve the problem we need money. Our debt interest must be paid, and in order to do this we must have money. We cannot get money from the old sources, because even though we in Canada can produce tremendously we cannot sell and we are obliged to decrease production to keep up the price. How then shall we ever produce enough goods to get ourselves out of debt, to take care of our unemployed and to furnish purchasing power to buy our goods? The problem is staggering and beyond answer unless we find some other source of getting money.

Now what we assume the government means is that it is going to take control of the credit issue in this country in such a way as to do what the bankers have been doing for many years. The bankers have been manufacturing money without any cost to themselves, except perhaps clerical costs. Let me quote a few eminent authorities in this regard. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), the former Secretary of State, in an address before the Canadian Club of Toronto on November 13, 1933, is reported to have said:

> The cheque system which has been developed enables the banks to create money without the issue of their printed notes—to create credit money at will for many hundreds of millions of dollars in excess of their note issue.

Mr. CAHAN: That certainly does not bear out the statement of the hon. gentleman. Everybody knows that a bank may create credit money under certain conditions. That is admitted everywhere. But they do not create without cost or without undertaking liabilities to the same extent that credit money is created.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I submit that all that is perfectly true. At the same time, what banks can so generously do, and lend the proceeds to the government, and charge them good stiff interest for, I submit that governments ought to be able to find some way or another of doing for themselves. Here is another example. Mr. A. de V. Leigh, Secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce, in a statement reprinted in the Ottawa Citizen on June 8, 1934, makes the following statement:

The war was paid for as to 30 per cent by actual money belonging to the people—

Is there any one who can see any reason why, then, the people of Great Britain should be taxed almost to death to pay for that war, when they already have paid for it?

—earned by the people; which was invested by the people in war loans; —

Then note particularly these words:

—and 70 per cent of the total cost of the war was paid for by the banks very kindly making these book entries, costing them nothing except the ink, paper and the time of the clerk, and lending the result to the nation at interest. The nation owes them money in exchange for their promises-to-pay money which they have not got. Further we have been paying them interest on these promises-to-pay ever since. Interest on war loans amounts to something like five million dollars a day.

Now if the government is going to assert complete freedom for the Dominion of Canada, it is going to take control of such issue. It must be safeguarded, we will grant. It must be managed by men who are responsible and who are trained, men who will honestly and successfully manage that aspect of the nation's life in the interests of the people and not in the interests of any private group.

There is one more thing which must be very carefully considered, and we assume that the Prime Minister has this in mind. Up to the present time the backing for money has been gold. Men have got to the point where they virtually worship the gold standard. It is like a golden calf which they worship to their ruin, but the time must come when we will all realize that the backing of money is not necessarily gold. May I read here a statement by an eminent authority which none will presume to question, the Midland Bank, England, the largest bank in the world? Here is an extract from its monthly review, June-July, 1935.

In the past four years the progress of ideas has been rapid—the gold value of sterling has dwindled by forty per cent—neither the government nor the bank does anything about it, and no one is in the slightest degree disturbed, since the pound buys just as much goods and services as in 1931.

In other words, the gold standard has been gradually displaced in England as a backing for goods and services. In our country, with new machinery and scientific knowledge, a high degree of technical skill, and good organization, we can produce an almost infinite amount of goods; and we have hundreds of thousands of men in the country ready to render services; so there ought to be virtually an unlimited backing for what money wish to produce; at least there should be enough backing to give us the money we need.

Stability of the value of the pound in terms of goods has replaced stability in terms of gold.—At the heart of the matter is a change in the official conception of stability—internal stability is bringing us far greater benefits, in solid economic welfare, than the pursuit of fixity of exchange could conceivably yield.—Clearly this change is nothing short of a revolution,—it indicates an almost complete transformation of the monetary system.

The social credit group in this parliament believes that the Prime Minister favours the introduction of such a revolutionary change: First, that the dominion government will take control of the issue so as to manage it for the people's welfare; and, second, that little by little in so far as it is necessary they will gradually depart from the gold standard and substitute a goods and services backing; and that such other measures will be taken as will tend to the well-being and increase of the wealth of this country. I beg to assure the Prime Minister that if they step forward toward that goal they will find, as I declared a few minutes ago, the social credit group one hundred per cent solidly behind them in all their battles for this end.

Mr. RENE-ANTOINE PELLETIER (Peace River) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to begin the few remarks which I desire to express this evening in my mother tongue, in order to assert the rights of the race from which I have sprung and in which I take much pride. It, moreover, affords me pleasure to note that the youngest member on the government side—who so eloquently seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne—also belongs to this same race. As numerous French Canadians reside in the constituency which I represent, I equally thought it proper, out of courtesy to them, that my first words in this house should be expressed in the French language.

Being the youngest member of this house, I have been all ears since I have come here, and you may be sure I have taken in everything that has been going on.

An hon. MEMBER: Good.

Mr. PELLETIER: One hon. gentleman says, "Good." Possibly I did not find as much good as I expected I would find. One thing I have noticed particularly is this: The two leaders of the great political parties in Canada have spent several days now throwing at each other flowers which were not always very fresh. I am not the only new member here; there are quite a number of us; and I hope that conditions will be rectified and that in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole we will get down to business and do something that is really serious.

There is something more that I remarked which I cannot let go by without bringing it to the attention of this house. I am not going to take the chance of making statements without referring to Hansard, because I notice that if you do that here, people get quite angry about it. So, Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat here—from Hansard, be it understood—a few words which our leader said the other day when he was expressing sympathy at the death of our king. These are the words:

> Mr. Speaker, it has been a great delight to me to hear the expressions of loyal devotion to our king and queen. I should like to add to those expressions just a few words on behalf of the people whom I represent, the loyal social credit people throughout the Dominion of Canada.

It grieved me very deeply to hear some people sniggering and laughing when the words "social credit" were mentioned at that particular time. Our leader had it in mind to express sympathy with our great king who is now gone, and I do not believe that laughter was in the proper place.

There is not very much I can say this evening in regard to the speech from the throne, first of all because my leader has very ably set forth the things we hope to do in this house. The legislative program has yet to come before us, and it is difficult intelligently to criticize anything before it is brought down in the house. We know, for example, that the government intend to bring in certain measures, but until those measures are brought in it is difficult to say very much about them.

There is one thing, however, to which I should like to refer. That is the paragraph in the speech from the throne dealing with unemployment, in which it is stated that the Liberal party recognize the fact that unemployment is one of the gravest problems in Canada to-day and, that being so, it is their intention to set up a commission in order to find a satisfactory means of dealing with what they call an emergent condition. I hope this commission will do its work in a very short time; that it will not be one of those commissions that drag on endlessly, digging out a fact here and a fact there. I hope the results will be made known as soon as possible so that we may be able in some measure to better the condition of the people of Canada with the least delay.

We have heard a great deal about the trade agreement between the United States and Canada. We find some people not in accord with lower tariffs; on the other hand we find other people who are not in accord with higher tariffs, but I cannot see the use of either blasting or bargaining our way into the markets of the world if we are to starve at home. It seems to me that the very first thing to do is to seek out the markets that we have, and the most immediate and most convenient one is the home market. I should like to take some hon. members with me to some parts of my constituency; I am sure they would agree that there is a market for clothing and other necessities there; I see it myself, and other people have remarked upon that fact. We have a market in Canada. It is not necessary to seek for a market; all we need do is look after our own Canadian people.

I should like to say a word with regard to Doctor Riddell and the possibility of a war. We find the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) making an address not very long ago, last Saturday evening to be exact, and saying:

> "In this connection," said the defence minister, "I want to leave with you the profound thought that you will never have in the Dominion of Canada an adequate system of defence until you create a national sentiment in favour of such a system."

Does this mean that we in Canada are to be taught to uphold the sentiment of warfare and that we must be forever ready to take up arms, or is there some other meaning attached to that statement? This is significant at this time, when the question of Doctor Riddell's action is under consideration. According to the orders of the day it is the intention of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) to ask the government to supply him with the correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and Doctor Riddell. Now we find the Minister of Justice making a statement to the effect that we must always have an adequate system of defence and a national sentiment in favour of such a system.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I never said anything like that.

Mr. PELLETIER: I beg pardon; I mean the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). The point I should like to make is this: At about the same time an editorial appeared in the Montreal Star suggesting that it might be in the best interests of all concerned if the government should withhold this information. Of course I do not know what action the government will take; but let me say this: I know that every war in the past has been called a war of defence. I know also when it is supposed to be in the interests of the people generally that certain information should be withheld, that has been done. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I for one will not permit one drop of Canadian blood to be shed until the people of this country have been fully advised as to all the circumstances, and until they fully understand why they may be called upon to give up their lives.

That is about all I wish to say this evening. When the time comes, certain measures will have to be discussed, and I feel sure that then the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will certainly know we are an independent group. I am very glad the Prime Minister made that statement with regard to the independent groups. The first thing I was told when I came to the House of Commons was that I had to swear allegiance to a king. At first I did not know whether it was Mackenzie King or His Majesty the King, but I am glad the Prime Minister has cleared up that point for us. So I will now take my seat, assuring the right hon. gentleman of independent and fair co-operation and criticism when the time arrives.

Hon. J. EARL LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of some of the accusations levelled at my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) during the course of his remarks this afternoon, I feel it incumbent upon me to make some observations before this debate is concluded.

Before doing so, however, I would crave your indulgence to digress for a moment in order to congratulate the mover (Mr. Slaght) and the seconder (Mr. Fournier, Maisonneuve) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I trust that I shall not be considered invidious if I particularly congratulate one of my fellow practitioners of law from the city of Toronto on the eloquence, moderation and good taste of the speech he made in this house as his initial effort.

I had rather anticipated that the Prime Minister, banked about as he is at the present time by a vast majority which overflows from your right, sir, to your left in this house, would have proceeded with all dispatch to bring into being those measures of legislation which during the campaign we were led to believe would bring a great era of unparalleled prosperity to Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: They are already started.

Mr. LAWSON: I am glad to know that. I sincerely hope, in the interests of this country, that if an era of prosperity has started since my hon. friends came into power, it will continue. I for one, despite what was indicated by the Prime Minister in some of his utterances this afternoon, will be delighted to find this country enjoying prosperity, and I shall not try to decry any prosperity that we may attain simply because the Liberal party happens to be in power when it comes.

I said, sir, that I had anticipated that instead of the right hon. gentleman taking up the time of the house in criticism of the fact that some of the ministers of the former government had retired from public life and accepted office, something which has been done under governments with which the right hon. gentleman has been associated in the past, he would have gone on with the business of bringing in this era of prosperity. It seems to me, sir, that it is rather small business to criticize the retirement and appointment of one whose name, I believe, was mentioned, Mr. Guthrie, who was almost the dean of this house, who had rendered at least thirty years of public service to this country, because he saw fit at a ripe age to retire and to accept an appointment. I could say the same thing with reference to several of the other gentlemen who were named this afternoon or indicated by the right hon. Prime Minister. Though I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, yet mark my words that before the next general election in this country some of the hon. gentlemen who now sit in the government led by the right hon. gentleman will be retiring and accepting some appointments which are in the gift of this country.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Some are already waiting.

Mr. LAWSON: Then the right hon. gentleman had some slighting references to make to the smallness of the number of Conservatives returned to this house in the last election. I confess, sir, that we are small in number. But I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that if he brings down legislation which in the opinion of this small number is not beneficial to Canada, if he brings down legislation which contravenes the principles of that great party which I have the honour to support, he will soon find that the strength of our opposition is not limited by our numbers.

The right hon. gentleman attributed—I was not quite sure whether it was his great success in the last election or our defeat—in the main to three causes: one man government, all expenditures or commitments not approved by parliament before being made, and the organization of the Liberal party, which, he boasted, commenced on the first day after the defeat of that party in the 1930 election. Well, sir, with reference to one man government let me say this: I was not a member of the recent administration for a great length of time, but I want to make it clear that while I was, every matter of policy enunciated by the leader of this party was given every consideration, or opportunity for consideration, by the members who supported him in that government.

With respect to the expenditures under the blank cheque policy of which we have heard so much, it seems to me this is but reiteration and repetition time after time of something that in principle is very simple. This parliament has power to vote money and to make expenditures. Likewise this parliament has power to delegate that authority, under certain conditions and within the limits prescribed by parliament, to what I might term the executive of parliament, or what is known as the government. Now in our everyday lives we spend millions of dollars to provide hospitals for the care of our physical needs in case of emergency. During the past five years there were not many days when the government of this country did not have to face an emergency in connection with our economic life. And all this parliament did in granting power within the limits of the statute to the executive to expend money to meet economic situations which might arise to provide those emergency hospitals so necessary to meet such needs. Let us assume, for example, that it had been necessary for Canada to convene parliament when the United Kingdom went off the gold standard, before any action could be taken by the government of this country. Does my right hon. friend suggest that during the term the Conservative government were in power there were not emergencies, emergencies which had to be met not in six weeks or a month or two weeks but on the spur of the moment? Now, sir, this parliament, in anticipation of those emergencies which might arise in connection with our economic and financial and political system, delegated its power to the executive, and that executive was just as responsible to parliament to give an accounting of its actions and its expenditures on the first occasion on which parliament convened as though the whole subject matter of the expenditure had been discussed in parliament before the expenditure was made.

The third reason that the right hon. gentleman gave was that the organization of the Liberal party commenced the day after the election in which they were defeated. With that I will entirely agree. It must have been obvious in the light of events during 1933 and 1934 that the Liberal party set up an organization after that election, and I give them credit for their sagacity in realizing as they did that the then Prime Minister of this country, the present right hon. leader of the oposition, was the outstanding figure in the government. So they determined that by their publicity they would "destroy Bennett," and by destroying Bennett they hoped to destroy the Conservative party. And I am quite willing to confess that, immersed in the affairs of state and the affairs of Canada, our great leader at times may have paid too little attention to the political fortunes of his party. Well, if it gives my hon. friends opposite any satisfaction I admit that the organization which they set up on the day subsequent to their defeat in 1930, and particularly their publicity, certainly did a good job for them.

Then the right hon. gentleman attributed to the leader of the opposition knowledge or responsibility for a poster appearing in western Canada. I say to you here and now, sir, that the leader of the official opposition never saw the poster—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did you see it?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, I saw it and I take the responsibility for it. What is more, the poster was true.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why did you change it?

Mr. LAWSON: I did not change it. I was about to say that by the action taken by the Conservative government to protect and maintain the market for wheat for the wheat growers of western Canada, that government was responsible for putting into the pockets of the western grain growers at least $150,000,000. And when my hon. friends opposite see fit to bring down any legislation they may have with respect to the marketing of wheat or affecting the wheat board, I shall be glad, if necessary, to discuss the matter in further detail.

The Prime Minister alleged that the leader of the opposition was responsible for the campaign literature of the Conservative party. If that be so, surely the same thing is equally true of the right hon. gentleman opposite; he too must be responsible for all the literature appearing on behalf of the Liberal party. Had I known that I was to participate in this debate, or could I have anticipated that the Prime Minister would have taken the line he did take, I should have been delighted to have before me, for the inspection of any hon. members who did not see them, some of the pamphlets turned out by the Liberal party during the last campaign.

May I mention one, which was a gem—from their standpoint. How many hon. members remember the consumer pamphlet?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): The consumers' league?

Mr. LAWSON: No, not the consumers' league—and it was not the forgotten league, either. This was turned out under the auspices of the National Liberal Federation of Canada, and was directed particularly to Canadian housewives. On it appeared several pictures, one of which showed a can of baking powder. The text indicated how much a can of baking powder cost in Canada, and the cost in the United States. I think, too, there was a picture of a can of beans, and pictures of other household articles. The only thing that was prominently missing was a piece of buffalo bologna.

Mr. DUFF: Was there a can opener?

Mr. LAWSON: No; my hon. friends opposite felt that if they had supplied a can opener to Canadian housewives, the cans would have been opened and the emptiness, belied by the pictures, would have been discovered.

Mr. DUFF: Like some people's heads.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, we will leave that to the judgment of posterity.

Mr. DUFF: Thank you.

Mr. LAWSON: Down below the pictures there was the text to indicate that the higher prices for the commodities in Canada had been brought about by the Conservative government while in office between 1930 and 1935.

I say to you, sir, that I analyzed the tariffs indicated in the pamphlet, and if I had my papers with me this evening I could give you specific details. I am confident, however, that I am not overstating the misrepresentation contained in that pamphlet when I say to you that the tariffs in respect of over one-half the articles pictured had been placed at their then rate by the government of the right hon. gentleman opposite when it held office previously, or by governments which preceded his accession to power.

If we want to get into the field of misrepresentation and responsibility for campaign literature, I could give my hon. friends one or two further examples. I have in mind another gem, and although I have forgotten the exact wording of it, the effect of it was this: "King will restore the markets Bennett and Stevens lost."

Mr. DUFF: Bennett and Stevens what?

Mr. LAWSON: Bennett and Stevens lost."

Mr. DUFF: So they did.

Mr. LAWSON: I will come to that in a minute. If the right hon. gentleman is to take responsibility for the literature of his party, what do hon. members think of the fairness—and I use that word, for want of a better—of a gentleman who, for the purpose of a campaign couples with the present leader of the opposition the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), and then after he has won the election endeavours in this House of Commons to twit the leader of the opposition by saying that this very member had turned his guns upon him, the leader of the opposition, during the campaign? Then, sir, I would ask this further question: What market was lost to Canada during the regime of the late Conservative government? Will some one tell me which one? Possibly someone will say Japan.

Mr. REID: The market for salmon in France.

Mr. LAWSON: Tell me one country.

Mr. REID: The market for salmon in France was lost.

Mr. LAWSON: Every tariff that was raised against Canada had been raised before this party took office.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAWSON: Let me refer to another gem, "It is King or chaos."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: The old slogan.

An hon. MEMBER: The people decided it.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not complaining about the people's decision. Hon. members will never find me doing that. They may have observed that I happen to be one hon member in this chamber who sits in his seat and keeps his mouth shut, even when he has to take some punishment. I am not one who sits and cackles out once in a while, when someone else is speaking.

Mr. DUFF: In other words the hon. member is not a rooster.

Mr. LAWSON: I really thought my good friend, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), with his breadth of experience and wisdom of age would know that a rooster never cackles.

Mr. DUFF: Crows, then. I would not like to call the hon. member an old hen.

Mr. LAWSON: This afternoon some reference was made by the Prime Minister to a broadcast which he styled the Sage broadcast, and endeavoured again to place upon the leader of the opposition responsibility for it. I take this first opportunity to say to him and to this House of Commons that again I take the responsibility. We will see—

An hon. MEMBER: We saw.

Mr. LAWSON: I want to say this, that in the rush and hurry and grind of a campaign some of the manuscripts were never submitted to me. So far as my recollection goes, there were put into the mouth of one of the speakers in those broadcasts two statements which, had I seen them, I would have deleted. I say unhesitatingly to the Prime Minister that I personally regret exceedingly that they were made, and for this reason: I have always been, and I hope always shall be, one who in public life may criticize and assail my opponents with respect to their public actions and public affairs, but I do not believe I can be accused of ever having made a reference to their personal affairs or what they may have done in a personal capacity. Therefore I say that I regret two statements which were made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The references would have been all right if they had been true.

Mr. LAWSON: In justification for those who did use them, I just want to say this, that though you may not like the phrases, every statement made in the Sage broadcasts was true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You will have a chance to prove that before a parliamentary committee.

Mr. LAWSON: I hope so. The right hon. gentleman said at the time that he would appoint a parliamentary committee. I tell him that when that committee is appointed we shall be very glad—and when I say "we," I mean myself and those who may have had any part in the Sage broadcasts—to go before that committee, and then it will be determined whether or not the statements made were true.

Mr. DUFF: Why do you regret them if they were true? You regretted them a moment ago.

Mr. LAWSON: Apparently my hon. friend from Antagonish—

Mr. DUFF: Not Antagonish. I am not trying to antagonize anybody.

Mr. LAWSON: My hon. friend did not follow my statement.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, yes, I did. I listened very carefully. You apologized first, and then you swallowed yourself.

Mr. LAWSON: I apologized for what I said was my recollection of two of the statements made because they referred to some action taken by the Prime Minister in his personal capacity, and not in his public capacity, and that is why I said I regretted exceedingly that they had been made.

Mr. DUFF: I do not see the point.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, possibly not. Maybe my good friend is Scotch—I say this without intending any offence to that great race from which I come—and if he will go home and think the matter over the point may come to him by morning.

Mr. DUFF: The trouble is that my hon. friend is not making any point. He starts apologizing, and then rubs it in and makes it worse.

Mr. LAWSON: The Prime Minister in speaking this afternoon expressed great concern for the well being of the employees of industry and of the workers and consumers in the community. When he gets on that theme he strikes a responsive chord because I happen to represent a lot of them in this house. I know it has been a favorite theme for the right hon. gentleman in both his writings and speeches since the days of his book, Industry and Humanity, if not prior to that, to exhibit in speech great concern for the workers in industry. But, sir, may I make the suggestion that at a recent date he had a wonderful opportunity to demonstrate in a very practical way his interest in the workers in industry in this country. It will be remembered by all that during the campaign the right hon. gentleman went up and down this country telling us what a great day it would be if the Liberal party were returned to power in the Dominion of Canada because then, having Liberal governments in practically all the provinces of Canada, we would have one great happy family who would have no difficulty at all in agreeing. He repeated that sentiment to-day, if I recollect correctly, as to the happy associations of his government with those of the different provinces. It does seem to me that even though those of the Liberal party who were in the last house talked at great length against the constitutionality of the Unemployment and Social Insurance bill, and against the legislation respecting maximum hours of labour and minimum wages, I think ultimately, if they did not actually vote for those measures—and my recollection is that they did—at least they did not vote against them. Why? Because an election was coming, and they wanted to get the votes of the workers in this country. Well, when this happy family met, what a grand and glorious opportunity it would have been for the right hon. gentleman to say to the provincial premiers: Now, gentlemen, we are all Liberal friends; we are all members of the Liberal family; we have all a great desire to do something for the workers of this country; so just let us all agree that instead of referring these acts to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine the respective jurisdiction of dominion and province, we will all get together and have just one amendment to the British North America Act which will confer on the Dominion of Canada jurisdiction to pass these measures which are so very beneficial to the workers of this country.

In conclusion, sir, I say to you that when the right hon. gentleman demonstrates by some such action a practical interest in the workers of this country, I shall be much more prone to accept his policies and his preachings.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Lawson), I was quite willing to let the address be voted, but as he said that he intended to give the house some gems of the last election campaign, I cannot resist the temptation to imitate his example and not merely mention some of the gems but actually show them to the house.

Before doing so, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer my congratulations to my good friend the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) and to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemount (Mr. Fournier) for the excellent speeches which they delivered yesterday in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both are valuable additions to the house and we are pleased to welcome them here.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) yesterday made some remarks which I might have left unanswered if they had come from a less important leader, but coming from him they cannot be considered as being what Disraeli described as the harebrained chatter of frivolous irresponsibility. I have to take account of my right hon. friend's statements, and so perhaps I may be permitted to mention two or three of them. I do not see why my right hon. friend was especially interested in making me the target of his attacks yesterday. But perhaps this is an honour. My right hon. friend has his likes and his dislikes, and it would appear now that I am rather classed with the latter.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No? I am glad to hear that. I thank my right hon. friend. However I can assure him that if he ascribes to me any large responsibility for the reverses which he may have had politically, he is wrong because I had very little share in the responsibility, and I want to assure him that whatever differences we may have in politics I have nothing but the best of personal feelings towards him, feelings of respect and even admiration.

Mr. BENNETT: They are quite mutual.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The right hon. gentleman spoke first of the election campaign in my province, and he mentioned certain words of mine. I am quite willing to admit that I have said that my province before 1930 had sent a very considerable, almost a solid Liberal following to the House of Commons, and that they had given a good account of themselves, and I certainly made an appeal to the electors of my province to do the same in 1935, because they realized that they had made a mistake in 1930. They agreed with me when polling day came. There was nothing very wrong in that.

My right hon. friend is quite wrong about the war cry, and I think he knows this. He will admit that he even used my words at two or three meetings in Quebec, in Montreal, in Sherbrooke, words which I had taken the trouble to write in order not to be misrepresented in the other provinces, as was the case in former elections. I took the trouble to say that I was sure that the leader of the opposition shared my views as to trying to keep Canada out of any conflict if it were at all possible, so that even my words were repeated by the right hon. gentleman in that respect.

The little paper which he quoted yesterday, and which seemed to be published in English, could not have had a very great effect upon the people of the province of Quebec. What was said in that paper? There was a dispatch from Ottawa to the effect that Canada could mobilize a powerful and fully experienced army within twenty-four hours, and the statement is made:

Canada will probably be drawn into the European war if Great Britain is forced in, and irrespective of what politicians, statesmen and economists say, the dominion will not be able to help herself.

I do not see anything there against the Conservative party or in favour of the Liberal party, but I have something which is quite different. Here is a paper which was circulated from door to door in my own city of Quebec in the last days of the election. It is entitled:

Ouvriers et Cultivateurs pensez-y bien! Protegez-vous. Workingmen and farmers, think well about it! Protect yourselves.

I will not mention all the things that are said about Mr. Taschereau and the trusts and matters of that sort, but the last part of it reads:

Do not take a chance, and vote for Bennett. In case of war, who will protect your interests better? Do you know that Bennett has stated, "In case of a foreign war, not one cent, not one man, not one gun," while King contented himself with saying, "We will summon parliament and will decide afterwards." Do you know that Mr. Bennett was the irreconcilable opponent of conscription and that he has challenged the legality of it, as far as before the Supreme Court of Canada, while not a single Liberal member voted against the principle of that bill? In case of war who will protect your interests better? Do not take a chance, and vote for Bennett.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently they did not.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I wonder whether my good friend who has just spoken takes the responsibility for this.

Mr. LAWSON: I may advise my hon. friend that anything for which I take the responsibility was turned out—and it will be marked plainly and distinctly upon it—either by the Confederation Publishing Company Limited or by the dominion Conservative headquarters.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps my hon. friend will take the responsibility for some others.

Mr. LAWSON: I may, when I hear them.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The war issue was only a very small one in the campaign. In my own province my leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and I were described as the friends of the men who want to pull down the steeples, the men who protect those who walk on crucifixes, and so on. These things were published not only in leaflets distributed; they appeared in paid advertisements in the newspapers of the province, bearing the inscription at the foot, "Published by the central Conservative committee."

Mr. LAWSON: That was not published by the Conservative dominion headquarters, nor have we any knowledge of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, the Conservative branch in Quebec apparently enjoys its autonomy.

Mr. LAWSON: In that respect it is characteristic of all Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They have their autonomy and they seem to have their money too. Apart from this terrible thing there were many others. Let me show this picture of a terrible looking man.

Mr. DUFF: Enemy No. 1.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am mentioned as having stated my belief that when truth and error are being given a fair show to justify themselves, truth always prevails. That was described as a heresy, and the last words of course were, "Let us vote for Bennett," and "Published by the central Conservative committee," but that was a lie. Here is another one with a fine portrait of my right hon. friend:

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister of Canada. Protect our Canadian country against communism.

Then there is some terrible picture, and it concludes with these words:

Vote for Bennett, the only political leader who upholds the maintenance of section 98, the only leader of a state who understands the horrible threat which is on our country, the only leader able to protect the nation. A vote for Bennett is a vote for your home. A vote for Bennett is a vote for the respect of right, of religion, of tradition. Published by the central Conservative committee.

Well, that is the sort of campaign we had, and the radio was also used to spread this propaganda. On the Sunday, the eve of polling day, the radio was used in my own constituency to describe me as a terrible man, an enemy of all religion and virtue and everything, and it was stated that if the Prime Minister and I were returned to power the poor children would be forced to go to church and commit deeds of sacrilege, and that sort of stuff. Of course, the effect was that on the following day, instead of having a majority of 2,000, which was the usual one, I was elected by a majority of 6,000.

I wish to go very quickly over two or three matters relating to the proposed sanctions on oil, a subject which was very well explained by my right hon. leader this afternoon. I have been very much abused for having stated what was, after all, the truth with regard to the position of Canada. It was not properly a repudiation of any man; it was the repudiation of what was being stated everywhere in the world, that it was Canada that was proposing this oil sanction, when so many countries were disquieted and did not know what to do about it. We merely said that we had not given any instructions to that effect; that this was not a Canadian proposal; that Canada was quite willing to have the same responsibility as the other countries, to join in any collective action to try to secure the maintenance of peace, but that we had not gone out of our way to attempt to force the other nations of the world to apply this oil sanction against Italy. This has been misrepresented in many places, and, I must say, more particularly in the very good city of Toronto.

I hesitate to do this, but I desire to show another gem, a cartoon against which I wish to register a strong protest. The Evening Telegram, which is a newspaper very distinguished along certain lines, attacked me very bitterly about this question, as regards which I had done merely what I thought to be my duty, what I thought to be right. I did not mind the blame in the editorials; but when it came to this cartoon which I hold in my hand, entitled "His Master's Voice," where I am seen pulling the coat of Doctor Riddell at the League of Nations, and there is a priest in clerical garb, with a biretta, whispering in my ears, with the inscription "His Master's Voice," well, I think, after being thirty-two years in the public service of my country, if I had no right to take a stand on a public matter and to say to the people of Canada what I think is right, because I am French and Roman Catholic, we have not achieved in Canada the progress which we thought we had achieved, and there is certainly room for reform. However, things like that do not affect a man in such a way as to induce him to quit the service of his country. I am not a quitter; I always face those who attack me. But I did not mind so much even the campaign of the Toronto Telegram as the words I read in an article well written, broadly conceived, written by a gentleman for whom I have great respect, a fine Canadian, Professor Norman Mackenzie of the university of Toronto, an editorial in Saturday Night of December 21, entitled "Confusion in Canadian Foreign Policy." The article is impartially written, praising and blaming; but here are the words which show the necessity of the remarks I have just offered with regard to the Toronto Telegram. Professor Mackenzie says:

> While this statement may have been necessary, it has had most unfortunate results, both in Canada and internationally. Obviously, as a French Roman Catholic, Mr. Lapointe was the last one who should have made it, for it was immediately seized upon by the opposition as a repudiation of Great Britain ...

And so forth. Of course this does not represent, I know, the views of Professor Mackenzie; but as he told me afterwards, it represents the views of many people whom he meets almost daily in his own city. I have said enough on this subject. I hope that this question as well as any other public question in Canada can be treated on its merits, without anybody going down to the level of dealing with it on religious and racial grounds, as is done in this cartoon.

As to the references to the supreme court, I do not apologize for having made a recommendation to the government to that effect. My right hon. friend says that even if some of these acts were doubtful, or may be unlawful, the government should have waited until somebody took action before the courts to have them declared invalid. I do not agree with this method of proceeding. Possibly some of them would not involve very great financial commitments, but on some of these measures the people of Canada, employers and employees and governments, would have incurred heavy expenses even from the beginning. It is better to have the validity and the legality of these measures passed upon before incurring expenses than after they have been incurred.

Mr. BENNETT: Will it disturb the hon. gentleman if I point out to him that he has not grasped the point I was endeavouring to make? I stated the privy council had said that an opinion expressed by the supreme court would be no better than that of the law officers of the crown, and therefore there was no finality to the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Except that an opinion of the supreme court, and possibly of the privy council, because there is an appeal to the privy council in these matters, certainly would carry great moral weight with the people of Canada and with the interested parties. May I refresh the memory of my right hon. friend by reminding him that even his government resorted to this procedure of making references to the supreme court? The year preceding the enactment of this legislation the government referred to the Supreme Court of Canada the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. There was a second reference under section 110 of the Dominion Companies Act, and there was a reference on the tariff board. Apparently my right hon. friend and his colleagues thought a legal opinion given by the Supreme Court of Canada was of some value, and they obtained that opinion before enforcing the measures upon the validity of which they desired the opinion of that body. As my right hon. friend has said, we appointed the best available counsel to present the views of the dominion in the matter. I admit that I expressed contrary views on the floor of the house last year, but if my right hon. friend will remember, I told him at the time that I was not as sure of my views as he was of his; that I would be very happy if I could be. At that time both my right hon. leader and I suggested that these acts should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada; we asked that they should be, and we stated definitely that we would have them referred if we were members of the future government of the country.

Then my right hon. friend mentioned the commission which is investigating the unfortunate troubles which took place in Regina last spring. I must remind him that that is a provincial commission which was appointed by the government of Saskatchewan before the last general election.

Mr. BENNETT: It did not begin to function until after the election.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is true. The then Minister of Justice took the view that the province had no right to appoint these judges as commissioners; that the dominion should appoint them from Ottawa, and the commission was notified accordingly. Chief Justice Brown of Saskatchewan, Mr. Justice Martin of the appeal court and Judge Doak, the three commissioners, said that they would be only too pleased not to be compelled to serve on that commission, but that they could not see their duties as they were seen by the then Minister of Justice; they thought they were compelled to act. They offered their resignations to the provincial government and asked to be relieved from serving on the commission, but the provincial government refused to accept their resignations and stated that it had the right to appoint it. That was the situation when I took charge of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: But no judge has a duty to act. He is not bound to act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That was the position taken by Chief Justice Brown in the letters he wrote, which form part of the record. However I must say that my views in that respect differ from those of my predecessor. I had occasion to consider this matter in some instances prior to 1930. I had the legal opinion of the late Mr. Justice Newcombe, then deputy minister of Justice, who advised me at the time that judges could act on those provincial commissions. I merely followed the precedent which was created at that time and which was followed even by my predecessor in the department until this incident occurred in Regina.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no. The province of Ontario, for a long time, requested that the dominion should agree to the appointment of judges for these purposes; then it ceased to do so. Whatever it may mean, the statute says that the consent of the dominion should be sought and given. Mr. Justice Newcombe's view was that this did not have reference to a provincial commission. I recall the circumstances, but the difficulty is that judges cease to be judges the moment they accept a commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But they are commissioners acting at the request of the province and performing a public service. Of course the only knowledge I have of the matter is from the records, but I must tell my right hon. friend that in connection with the hydro commission inquiry in Ontario the minister admitted that this action was taken by the province alone without authorization from Ottawa, though he stated that this did not alter the fact that the authorization should come from Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): However, that is a matter as to which we must be permitted to differ. This commission is going on; its work is proceeding, I think, in a most effective way. I do not think there were any politics in its appointment. This is merely a means of getting at the truth of a matter which was debated between the provincial and the federal governments. What made it perhaps still more imperative that this should be done was the fact that Saskatchewan is policed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who receive their orders in provincial matters from the attorney general of the province and in federal matters, of course, from Ottawa. There was a conflict between the two authorities, and I sincerely believe that the work of the commission and its report, instead of intensifying this friction and conflict, may make it easier to reconcile the two views. My right hon. friend stated that the morale of the police has declined because of the appointment of this commission. Far from it. I believe the evidence that is being given before the commission will rather be a justification of what the police did, and will rather clarify certain issues which were perhaps dangerous, as to which the people did not have the best information, the information they should have had.

Mr. BENNETT: I was dealing with the effect upon the trial of the accused.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not think so. My right hon. friend referred to the fact that the chief justice permitted one of the strikers to say that the victim of the battle had been killed by one of the mounted police officers.

Mr. BENNETT: That he saw the officer battering the man to death.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. How could the chief justice refuse to hear that man? That is what that witness said, but there were scores of witnesses, both police and neutral citizens, who said otherwise. After all, the only way to get at the truth is to secure the evidence of all those who claim to have been witnesses to what took place at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree, only the matter should be in a court.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It should be in a court, but it is difficult to get a matter like that into a court.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is in a court now.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It could be in court only in connection with one special incident having to do with the accused on trial in that court. Now my right hon. friend said it is even stated that evidence would be taken in British Columbia. Possibly one of the commissioners is going there. But it is to serve the ends of justice and it may happen that the evidence given there might be far from injurious to the case of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not concerned about that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is exactly as I said already, to get the facts. Surely it is not a bad thing to get the facts and to find where the truth is, no more in this matter than in the reference to the supreme court, and even in the Riddell incident. Those strikers, or a committee representing them, came to see me since the commencement of this investigation. They asked three things: first, that we should appoint a dominion commission instead of that provincial commission which apparently they do not like; second, that we should change the personnel of the commission, increase it and put a representative of the strikers on it. Of course we could not very well agree to that. Their third request was that we should pay counsel for the strikers. Those three demands were submitted to me and to some of my colleagues, and after consideration we rejected them. We thought the present commission has all the necessary powers to secure what we want to have shown, and the facts. We did not give them what they desired, but they paid us the compliment of saying it was the first time for years that they had been received courteously when they came to Ottawa.

Now there is another matter which also relates to the administration of justice. I am prevented from referring to it except, without giving any names, to say that far from being actuated by politics in this matter, certain people had made the same demand before 1930. There had been a subsequent trial of another man, who had been acquitted in connection with the same matter, and the man who had been convicted claimed that this made a change and that there had been a mistrial. The attorney general of Ontario advised strongly against a new trial. I refused to recommend a new trial before 1930. Surely this was not because of politics, for the attorney general of Ontario then was a Conservative. But when I came back to the department this year there had been an investigation held by the present attorney general of Ontario, who had made a new report strongly recommending the granting of a new trial. This report had been submitted to my immediate predecessor in office, who was there only a short time, but he did not deal with it; he had no time, and I found it on the doorstep. Conditions were altogether changed. But, Mr. Speaker, even then I did not feel like granting a new trial. I thought the ends of justice would be better served by using the discretionary power which I have under the criminal code to refer the whole matter to the court of appeal of Ontario, and to let them decide what should be done. I thought, in face of the conflict between the two attorney's general of Ontario, the one prior to 1930 and the one of to-day, the best thing for the Department of Justice here to do was to refer the question for judicial determination in the province, and I do not think I deserve to be told by my right hon. friend that some people are afraid there are politics in the Department of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say politics. Look and see what I said.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, I hope it is not that, because if my right hon. friend said it he knows the gravity and the seriousness of such a remark.

Mr. BENNETT: I fully realize it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): However, I think I may close these remarks by telling my right hon. friend that I hope he will think well of me in the future as he did in the past. As far as I am concerned I wish him happiness and peace. My best and most earnest wish is that he may be brought to feel kindly about his political opponents.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to take this opportunity of congratulating you upon your accession to the position which you now hold. I wish also to congratulate the mover (Mr. Slaght) and the seconder (Mr. Fournier) of the address.

In rising to speak to this motion I feel that not only do I represent the constituency of Weyburn; that not only do I represent a group in this house which holds a particular social viewpoint, but that as one of the youngest members in this house I represent a class of people in Canada who hitherto have been unrepresented. Might I point out that there are perhaps more young men in this House of Commons than there have been for many years past. I feel we can say, because of the contacts which some of us have with youth organizations across the dominion, that through us to some extent a certain section of young Canada speaks.

I wish to draw the attention of the house to one remarkable phrase in the speech from the throne, a phrase which seems to me to be pregnant with irony. It is this:

> —in adhering to the aims and ideals of the League of Nations, and in seeking, in unison with members of the league as well as with other nations, to support by all appropriate and practical means the maintenance of peace, and the establishment of a world order based on justice and equity.

I should like this house to think for a moment of what that means and what steps the government has taken to maintain peace.

I need hardly remind hon. members that in 1919 at the close of the great war the League of Nations was formed, and that in signing the covenant of the league, for the first time in the history of the human race over fifty nations gave up their sovereign right to wage war. But in return for giving up that right these fifty-seven nations required that they in turn would be guaranteed collective security. That after all is the only way that you and I can ever hope to live in a law-abiding and peaceful world. Just as you and I within the state, by giving up certain privileges of attacking the person of another individual, receive certain protection and certain privileges, so the nations of the world began this noble experiment of giving up the sovereign right to wage war and in return were guaranteed collective security.

Following that, Italy is declared by the nations of the league to be an aggressor against Ethiopia. I want here and now to commend the present administration upon two things which they have done. They interpreted correctly the mind of the Canadian people, first when they decided that the people wanted economic sanctions, and, second, when they correctly decided that the Canadian people did not want to indulge in a world war. That is, they understand what I suggest is the basic psychology of the Canadian people to-day, namely, that we will not trade with a murderer while he is engaged in the act of murdering, and that we will not have any trade or traffic with any brigand while he is engaged in international piracy. That I believe to be the attitude of the Canadian people, and the government correctly interpreted it.

What happened? We went through the motions of passing economic sanctions—and I say "through the motions," because it is very evident that sanctions have only one aim and one purpose, namely, to prevent war. Sanctions are valuable only if they are made effective. For instance we know to-day that it is absolute nonsense to talk about passing sanctions against Italy or any other country if the sanctions which are passed have the effect of boycotting commodities which are not needed by that country for purposes of war. Italy can get along without Christmas trees, Christmas candles and teddy bears, but there are certain basic commodities without which she cannot wage a war.

I believe Doctor Riddell took the logical position that if sanctions are to be valuable they must be effective, and that the most effective sanction in this day and age would be oil. Napoleon said that an army marches on its stomach; the modern army marches on oil. Without oil Italy could not continue to fight. What happened? The Canadian government gave the impression throughout the civilized world that Canada was not prepared to stand behind the statement that had been made by her representative. This afternoon the Prime Minister explained that what was meant was something similar to the statement made by Sir Samuel Hoare. That however was not the interpretation placed upon it, and I believe the statement was open to the interpretation that Canada was not in favour of oil sanctions.

There are two sources from which Italy has been drawing her oil, namely, the Anglo-Persian Oil Company of Great Britain and the Standard Oil Company of the United States. When Mr. Lloyd George made the statement during the last general election campaign in Great Britain that aeroplanes flying over Ethiopia had Anglo-Persian oil in their petrol tanks, the reply of the president of that company was significant. He said, "We are keeping the sanction; we are making Italy pay cash." In other words the only crime that, in the minds of certain financial interests could be perpetrated would be that of giving credit to Mussolini. Because of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company in Great Britain and the influence that had been brought to bear in this country, we find to-day that oil sanctions are much further away than when they were first suggested. Why is that so? Is it because the oil interests have too much influence on the powers of government? Is it because those people who make their profits out of oil have a great deal more weight in the councils of the governments of the world than have the dictates of humanity?

The speech from the throne speaks about maintaining peace—peace to-day, when Canadian nickel is indirectly being shipped to Ethiopia. Peace to-day, when Italian aeroplanes are being flown with British oil! Peace! Mr. Speaker, if this be peace it must be like the peace of the Lord—it passeth all understanding. Hon. members in this corner of the chamber voice a logical protest. If the government is going to talk about sanctions, we urge that they be effective sanctions. The people of Canada are asking that we take a definite stand in the matter, a stand with the forces of peace rather than with those of financial interests desiring a greater sale of oil.

I would point out that the speech from the throne is notable not so much for what it says as for what it fails to say.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a good one.

Mr. DOUGLAS: If it ever becomes famous it will do so because it is the speech that forgot the forgotten man. I come from a part of Canada that knows something of destitution and poverty. Last winter the church of which I was minister distributed large quantities of clothing contributed by people in Ontario, part of which came from this city of Ottawa. Tons of clothing were distributed throughout the southern area. I am sure hon. members will realize that I am not drawing on my imagination when I state that last fall there were children going to school in Saskatchewan with only gunny sacking wrapped around their feet. We have gone into homes and found mothers and children lying on piles of bedding in the corner; they did not have the proper bedding equipment or the proper clothing to meet the rigours of a very cold winter. In those sections where necessity for food, clothing and shelter is dire and where people are faced with want and insecurity, what do we find? We find that in this entire speech there is hardly a reference to what is to be done for them. What has the government of the day to offer to these people harassed with debt, needing food and needing clothing?

I hold in my hand a letter from my constituency, one of hundreds which are received by members. This is one from Trossachs, Saskatchewan. I shall not weary hon. members by reading it all, but I would direct their attention to some words from this man whom I have known, a man who has worked for years to help build the province of Saskatchewan and the Dominion of Canada. Men like these are the assets of our country. He states:

> I have been trying to get relief. They allowed me $1.35 a month to live on, and would not allow me anything for clothes, and that is something that I really need. But I do not want to get anything I do not need, but I sure need clothes.

He wants only enough clothing to keep warm. I now hold in my hand a letter from one of my committee men. It is addressed from Montmartre, Saskatchewan, at which point he investigated a case, one which is by no means isolated. It could be duplicated again and again. The letter is as follows:

> There is a family of eleven persons here living on relief. They are getting eight dollars per month, and range in age from thirteen to twenty-six. This family is starving. Two of them are under the doctor's care through not having enough to eat. Will you please see what you can do for this family? I am helping them all I can at present, but that is not very much. I know families in this district that are getting more than eight dollars a month, with only three in the family. So would you please let me know what can be done for this family? I have just come from a visit there, and they had dry bread and potatoes for supper.

This may seem a very trivial matter to an august assembly such as this, but I want to tell you, sir, that watching the house this night are families all over the dominion who are facing conditions like that, men, women and children who are looking to this new administration, with its preponderant majority, to bring them some measure of relief from their present hardships. As the hour is getting late I shall defer what further remarks I have to make until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Douglas the debate was adjourned.

CANADA–UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the motion is put, I would point out that the government notice of motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister with respect to the trade agreement does not set out the agreement itself. It will be recalled that last year when we were dealing with matters of that kind we thought it desirable to put the agreement or convention or whatever it might be on the orders of the day, so that members of the house would have it before them when they came to approve the agreement. We printed for the convenience of the members the various conventions that had been signed at Geneva in order that they might have it before them when ratification or approval was moved. I suggest therefore that the trade agreement should be set out on the orders of the day so that it will be available to the members for we must insist on having before us the agreement before we approve it in some form or another.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course, my right hon. friend knows that the agreement, and especially the schedules, is a very voluminous document, and if it were put on the orders of the day and stood there for days, because it is not going to be taken up immediately, it would increase the size of the order paper. Perhaps it might be printed in a separate document, or in the votes and proceedings for one day.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will consult the Prime Minister about the matter.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Wednesday, February 12, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RINFRET: The purpose of the bill is simply to postpone for one year the annual revision of the lists.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Howe) if he can give the house any information as to when the Canada Shipping Act, passed in 1934, will be proclaimed.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, there is a question on the order paper.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On February 10 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked the following question:

May I ask the Prime Minister what commitments, if any, have been made by Canada with regard to imperial defence?

I answered at the time:

I would have to have a conference with my colleague the Minister of Defence before I could answer my hon. friend. I am not aware of any commitments, myself, at the moment.

I now give my hon. friend the answer, having taken up the matter with the Minister of National Defence:

While declarations on behalf of Canada on the subject of the defence of Canada have been made at various imperial conferences, as may be seen from the results thereof published from time to time, I am not aware of any commitments made on behalf of Canada with regard to imperial defence. At such conferences it has been expressly recognized that it is for the parliaments of the several parts of the British commonwealth of nations, upon the recommendation of their respective governments, to decide upon their course.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I reply, Mr. Speaker, to a question asked last evening by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) as to the distribution of the Canada-United States trade agreement. On the day of tabling the reports, I tabled the agreement in printed form. I thought it had been distributed to all hon. members of the house, but if any hon. members have not received a copy I will see that another distribution is made.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that is not the point I had in mind. I had in mind the supplying of information that would enable a proper discussion of the agreement to be had in this chamber. It will be recalled that when the British agreements were under consideration, and the agreements made with other parts of the British empire, we printed for the use of members a complete record of the tariffs and changes, showing what the tariff rates were and what the changes were. Inasmuch as the right hon. gentleman has indicated that the agreement contemplates a great alteration in the whole tariff structure of the country, it might be desirable, in fact it is desirable, that there should be in the hands of hon. members a statement showing what the existing tariff rates are that will be applicable to the United States, and what the United States tariff rates are that will be made applicable to Canada on the various items that are affected by the agreement in both countries. That is the information that was received by the house when the imperial trade agreements were under consideration; and it does seem to me that, in order that the agreement may be properly studied, such things should be available to the members of the house in convenient form. I think on that occasion we did circulate a copy of the whole tariff act, and supplied also several sheets that contained comparisons between the existing rates and the rates that were to come into force under the agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that that is not the request which he made last night.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the request I tried to make.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I read what my right hon. friend did ask for? He said:

Before the motion is put, I would point out that the government notice of motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister with respect to the trade agreement does not set out the agreement itself. It will be recalled that last year when we were dealing with matters of that kind we thought it desirable to put the agreement or convention or whatever it might be on the orders of the day, so that members of the house would have it before them when they came to approve the agreement. We printed for the convenience of the members the various conventions that had been signed at Geneva in order that they might have it before them when ratification or approval was moved. I suggest therefore that the trade agreement should be set out on the orders of the day so that it will be available to the members for we must insist on having before us the agreement before we approve it in some form or another.

There is no mention there of anything other than the agreement itself, and, as I have said, the agreement was tabled on Monday and I have been informed that it was distributed to all members on the same day in both English and French. The request my right hon. friend now makes is one I shall be very glad to take into consideration and with respect to which I shall give him a reply later.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. A. G. Slaght for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening I was pointing out that the speech from the throne had entirely overlooked certain elements in our population, not the least of which were those now facing dire poverty and distress on the western prairies. I was on the point of observing that in the district immediately surrounding the city of Weyburn alone we distributed last winter over two hundred babies' layettes where children had been born into the world to families without fitting garments in which to clothe them. It was not an unusual thing to find new born children clad in garments made from washed-out flour sacks. I draw these facts to the attention of the house because I believe those people have been totally overlooked in the deliberations of the present administration.

I should like also to draw to the attention of the house some other elements in our population that I think have been neglected as far as the speech from the throne would indicate. First I would direct attention to the large farming population. The income of the farmers, particularly those of the west but also those of all Canada, has declined steadily during the last five years, with the result that to-day the best authorities tell us that the average farm income is about $350 per year, and I know many who are living on less. The cost of living and the cost of farm operation have not declined accordingly. The fixing of the price of wheat last summer by the late administration helped a great deal, more I think than they were given credit for, but I want to suggest to the present administration that we need to go further. I would particularly direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to two things that need to be done if we are to help western agriculture. The first is to have that fixed price apply to all grains as well as to wheat; the second is to have that fixed price made retroactive. I know of an instance, and it is not uncommon, of a man who sold his entire wheat crop under economic pressure just six days before the price of wheat was pegged, with the result that he lost eleven cents per bushel on a fairly large crop. But there are farmers who had no crop at all, and who did not get the benefit of this fixed price. At the present time they are faced with appalling conditions. I can remember sitting in an audience in the city of Estevan and listening to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggest that he was in favour of some type of crop insurance. I have read the speech from the throne again and again but I fail to find any indication that we are to have crop insurance or anything else that will take care of the economic insecurity of those who, through drought, grasshoppers and other whims of nature, find themselves deprived of their livelihood.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another circumstance that is oppressing the agricultural community; that is the tremendous burden of debt that hangs about the necks of the farmers. The figures for last year show that the farm mortgage indebtedness of the Dominion of Canada is more than $671,000,000, while for the three prairie provinces it is $324,000,000. On July 1, 1932, the farm management department of the university of Saskatchewan published a statement edited by professors Allen and Hope concerning Scott municipality, which happens to be in my constituency. These gentlemen showed that there were eighty-four farm-owners in that municipality; that the average acreage of these farms was 628 acres and that the average debt against each farm was $14,700. In many cases that is a great deal more than the farms could have been sold for at that time, or even at this.

Of these debts eighty per cent were incurred when wheat was $2 or more per bushel. To-day these people are trying to meet their obligations with wheat at 87½ cents or less, because many of them had only a feed wheat crop last year. Therefore I direct the attention of the government to the fact that the speech from the throne contains no adequate solution of the problem confronting this great agricultural community, that is looking to this house for some type of assistance at this time.

Then I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that across Canada there is a great army of unemployed, with over a million people living on some type of government assistance or relief. What does the speech from the throne suggest that the government is prepared to do for this army of people? It suggests that we are to have a national unemployment commission. I have read the words, "They asked for bread and they were given a stone." The unemployed of this country have asked for bread and they have been given a commission. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is not commissions and supervision we need; what we need is to deal with the fundamental economic issue of the reorganization of our economic system in order to put purchasing power back into the pockets of the common people to enable them to buy back the things they produce. I suggest that these fundamental issues are not being met. What about unemployment insurance; what about the work and wages program about which the Liberal party have spoken so frequently in the past? The people of this country are asking about this; they want to know.

Then I would direct your attention, sir, to another class of people, men and women between sixty and seventy years of age, the people who produced the wealth of this country, who helped build the Dominion of Canada to all that it is to-day. Thousands of them have come to the place where they can no longer face the future with any degree of optimism. Large industries are no longer hiring them; many of them, salesman, commercial travellers, technicians, have been cast aside like a squeezed out orange rind. What do we propose to do for them? They produced the wealth of the country. I maintain that they have the right to a share in it. I maintain that legislation should be placed on our statute books to take care of men and women who, having served their day and generation faithfully and well, now look to society to do its part in giving to them a measure of economic security.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the plight of the great class of merchants throughout Canada. I hold in my hand an excerpt from a Saskatchewan newspaper reporting a telegram sent by the present Prime Minister to some of his constituents in Prince Albert, in which he said:

> I approve wholeheartedly of their recommendations in reference to report of price spreads commission.

From that I took it that the Prime Minister was opposed to rebates and discounts, to these unfair trade practices by which large mail order houses and chain stores have gradually and ruthlessly been driving down the business of the small merchants, yet in the speech from the throne I find nothing to indicate that concrete measures are to be placed upon our statute books to meet that situation. Are we to infer that the rule of laissez faire is to continue? Darwin said that the law of the jungle is the survival of the fittest; I wonder if my hon. friends think the law of economics is the survival of the slickest. One would gather that, as one sees the very noticeable absence of any legislation in this respect.

I draw attention to the fact that across this dominion there are thousands of ex-soldiers, burnt-outs, men who gave the best years of their lives in the great war, men who to-day are partly or wholly incapacitated in the race of life. They want to know what a grateful country—at least vocally grateful—is prepared to do for them now that they are no longer able to do anything for themselves. Some fine recommendations were made by a commission called the Hyndman commission; what does the government propose to do about those recommendations? I think the house has a right to know.

One of the most crying problems facing the Canadian people in all parts of this dominion is the tremendous one of public health. People need dental and medical and hospital care. We have all the facilities for rendering those services, yet there is not an hon. member who does not know that people who have money can secure those services and people who have not money cannot, and are not getting them.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not so.

Mr. DOUGLAS: My hon. friend says it is not so. But we know that to be true on the prairies, and there is no doubt it is true in other parts of Canada. While doctors and dentists have given of themselves until some of them are almost bankrupt, many people have had to go without the necessary dental care, the necessary medical care, have had to stay at home and have treatment in their homes, simply because they have not the money. I am not saying this condition can be rectified overnight, but I suggest that the dominion government take immediate steps to formulate a co-ordinated health policy for the Dominion of Canada. The greatest asset of the country is the health and welfare of her people, and that should be the first consideration of any government.

I am most interested in the problem of youth. It was a move in the right direction when the relief camps were transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Labour. I read with something of amusement that these camps are to be abolished at an early date "as expanding employment opportunities permit." In other words, as business absorbs these young men the camps will be abolished. Of course when business absorbs these young men the camps will not be needed. But that is not meeting the problem at all. What we need is the abolition of these camps; what we need is to place these young men in gainful employment and wholesome environment. In the report of the commission of inquiry, excerpts from which appeared in the press last week, we find them lamenting the subversive influences found in these camps. Let me say that there are other influences more subversive, for instance, the demoralizing influence upon young men of seeing the years go by and finding themselves without technical training or mental preparation for useful work, with the result that even if conditions do right themselves these young men will find that their places have been taken by those better skilled and younger than they are. There is the problem.

Last night the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) very proudly displayed some campaign literature. I do not know that it is worth while in an assembly like this to spend our time metaphorically thumbing our noses back and forth across the floor. But I would like to draw attention to some campaign literature that the people of Canada have not forgotten: "Jobs or doles, which? Vote Liberal." "Vote Liberal and get back from the poorhouse." "Tory policies cannot end unemployment; vote Liberal."

Mr. BRADETTE: Mention the big shots now.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen, and particularly the very courteous gentleman across the floor who keeps making noises that are not quite audible or quite intelligible, to the fact that the people of Canada are looking to this house to do something to implement the promises made during the campaign. I suggest that the time has come for action. We have a tremendous opportunity and a preponderant responsibility. The people of Canada look to us; the people of Canada trust in us; the people of Canada are counting on us; in heaven's name let us not fail them.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all congratulate you, sir, upon your election to the high office of Speaker of the House of Commons. May I also join with those who extended congratulations to the hon. members who so ably moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

It is not my intention to discuss the various matters to which reference is made in the speech from the throne. But it seems to me advisable and necessary that some reply should be made to the speech made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in relation to the question of wheat. I desire to deal as briefly as I can with some of the inaccuracies in that speech, some of the inferences with which I cannot agree, some even of the insinuations which I regard as unjust and unfair, made against a man and against men who have no opportunity here to defend themselves; and to say something with regard to the amazing attack—I would almost say the malicious attack—which was made upon the present chairman of the wheat board. I would conclude with a discussion of the method by which the members of the former wheat board were relieved of office, and finally, and most important of all, I wish to place on record the policy of the present government with regard to the wheat question so that the House of Commons and the country itself may not be misled.

This problem of the disposal of the wheat surplus of western Canada is no longer only a western problem. I am not saying anything to the detriment of the western farmer; indeed I have every sympathy with him when I say that eastern Canada has now perhaps not quite so great but a very substantial interest in the disposal of the western wheat surplus. Millions of dollars—yes, scores of millions of dollars are at stake in the operations carried on by the former government in connection with the accumulation and sale of wheat through Mr. McFarland and the wheat board, and the possible and probable losses must be borne by the whole country.

On Monday the right hon. gentleman made some references to certain rumours going about to the detriment of Mr. McFarland. I have not heard those rumours; I say now, and I think the right hon. gentleman will believe me, that they did not emanate from myself, as chairman of the wheat committee, or from any members of the government. I do not propose to pay any attention to them. He spoke about the blasted reputations of the men who were relieved of their duties as members of the old wheat board. With all good will may I say to the right hon. gentleman that I thought he might have reason for eliminating the word "blast" from his vocabulary, when he thinks of the unfortunate results of a statement he made in 1930 with regard to blasting his way into the markets of the world.

Mr. BENNETT: As we did.

Mr. EULER: The facts speak for themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: To come directly to some of the statements, inferences and insinuations of the right hon. gentleman, may I observe that at least by inference he charged that the present board, and I suppose for the present board the present government must be responsible, were trying to cast the pools of western Canada into disrepute—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: —that they were going to finish cooperative selling—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: —and I believe I am not putting it too strongly when I say the right hon. gentleman implied that the new wheat board is nothing less than a tool of the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a little bit strong.

Mr. EULER: I think I am not putting it too strongly. I cannot follow the involved processes of my right hon. friend's mind when he draws such unwarranted inferences from the mere fact that this government has made a change in the personnel of the wheat board.

Possibly I should make reference to the members of the present board, and I shall first mention Mr. Murray, designated by my right hon. friend as "grain exchange Murray." I am quite certain he had no intention of paying Mr. Murray a compliment when he used that expression. It would be just as fair and

I would mean no greater offence if I were to refer to the right hon. gentleman leading the opposition as "C.P.R. Bennett".

Mr. BENNETT: It has been done for twenty years.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, for twenty odd years.

Mr. EULER: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: It is now "C.P.R. Dunning" also.

Mr. EULER: I am quite certain however that while the appellation I have given with respect to the right hon. gentleman carries with it no prejudice and no thought of ulterior motives, the same feeling might not have governed him when he made references to Mr. Murray.

Mr. DUNNING: You might as well say "grain exchange McFarland."

Mr. EULER: Yes, we might as well say "grain exchange McFarland." I have not had the pleasure of an acquaintance with Mr. Murray for any great length of time, but I will leave it to the judgment of those who know him to determine whether or not he is one of the most capable, most honourable and public spirited men in Canada.

My right hon. friend made reference to Mr. McFarland, indicating that Mr. McFarland had been giving his services free for a period of nearly five years. I give him all credit for it; I think Mr. McFarland is a thoroughly reputable gentleman, and a public spirited citizen of Canada. We need not always agree with what he does, but it does not follow that we cannot have the greatest respect for him. It may be news to hon. members when they learn that Mr. Murray has taken a reduction in income amounting to $7,000 in order to serve the people of Canada.

Let us now consider Mr. McIvor, vice-chairman of the board. For years Mr. McIvor was with the pools, while Mr. Murray was engaged with a farmers' organization of grain growers. During the last five years Mr. McIvor was Mr. McFarland's right hand man, and I would scarcely expect the leader of the opposition to criticize him.

So far as Dean Shaw is concerned, I am very sure even the right hon. gentleman opposite would not make a reflection upon him. Let me say this: For five years the present leader of the opposition, together with Mr. McFarland, carried on secret operations by way of buying and selling wheat in western Canada, thereby accumulating a mighty surplus which has now become a problem in the hands of this government. No person knew what was going on. Questions were frequently asked in this chamber, but no answers were given. I question very much whether any hon. member, including the former Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture in the late administration, had any knowledge of what was taking place in connection with the operations carried on by Mr. McFarland. My point is this: In spite of that attitude, one which might have and was sometimes subject to criticism, not one member of this chamber ever impugned the motives, the public spirit or the desire for public service that animated these two gentlemen.

Mr. BENNETT: Charged with being gamblers, that is all.

Mr. EULER: I have never heard the charge made in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps speculators.

Mr. BENNETT: No, charged with being gamblers.

Mr. EULER: The gentlemen constituting the new wheat board have been in office only a few weeks. Would it not be generous and fair of the right hon. gentleman to credit them and this government with just as keen a desire to do right by the people of Canada as was credited to the right hon. gentleman and his board at that time?

Two chief charges were made by the right hon. leader of the opposition, the first being that someone was playing politics, and the second that we had practically handed over the wheat situation to the Winnipeg grain exchange. As to playing politics, may I reply to my right hon. friend and hon. members that I am not particularly adept at the game of party politics. I do not believe it is in the mind of even my right hon. friend that in the appointment of the new commission or the discharge of the old wheat board I have lent myself to the playing of party politics. The new commissioners were selected because we regarded their selection as a public duty. So far as I am concerned I did not know them, and for a certainty I do not know now the colour of the party politics of the members either of the old board or of the new.

Turning to Hansard I find that in speaking about the members of the Winnipeg grain exchange and the boast made prior to the last election the right hon. gentleman said:

> They were going to see to it that Liberals were returned in those constituencies, and they saw to it wherever they could.

Surely there is not anything necessarily sinister in the fact, if it is a fact, that the members of the Winnipeg grain exchange supported the Liberal party, because hundreds of thousands of other Canadians did the same, honestly believing that a change of government was desirable.

I spoke of some of the inaccuracies that appeared in the address made the other day by the right hon. leader of the opposition. Some of them are of very little importance, but they may assume greater importance than they inherently possess if upon them are based certain assumption and inferences, which are therefore manifestly unreliable.

For instance the right hon. leader of the opposition began his speech by speaking of the importance of wheat, and he said that the average value of the wheat crop produced in Alberta was greater than the average value of gold produced in this country. Well, I had that checked up and I find that the right hon. gentleman is out only about thirty million dollars; that after all the production of gold is thirty million dollars greater than the average production of wheat in Alberta in the last five years.

Mr. BENNETT: I said in the last ten years in the province of Alberta, and I repeat it.

Mr. EULER: I will verify my right hon. hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: Get the figures while you are at it.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend said:

> The average wheat crop in Alberta during the last ten years has been worth more than the entire gold production of Canada last year at $35 an ounce.

The value of the gold production in Canada in 1935 at $35 an ounce was $115,000,000, in round figures. The average value of the Alberta wheat crop from 1926 to 1935, ten years, was $85,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not correct.

Mr. EULER: I had it checked by one of the experts of the department—

Mr. BENNETT: I had it checked also.

Mr. EULER: —and I am inclined to accept what the officer of my department tells me. Of course, after all, thirty million dollars is not a very great deal in view of the fact that we have increased our debt in the last five years by some $900,000,000.

My right hon. friend also made the statement that in the last five year period, from 1930 to 1935, this country produced two billion bushels of wheat. I find again that he was wrong there by a mere half a billion bushels; that the actual figure is nearer 1,500,000,000 than 2,000,000,000 bushels. I do not believe that my right hon. friend made the incorrect statement intentionally, but rather he made the mistake of figuring that from 1930 to 1935 was only five years whereas it is six years. For the whole six years were included, both 1930 and 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: That was because the crop year ends on July 31. I included the crops coming in in 1930 and 1935, which made it six years. I made that clear when I spoke.

Mr. EULER: He spoke of a five year period.

Mr. ROWE: He said the end of July.

Mr. BENNETT: Hansard will show.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend admits it.

Mr. BENNETT: I explained what was meant by that in answer to a question by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning).

Mr. EULER: I am merely clearing up that misconception, and I assure my hon. friend that I am not attaching any great importance to the matter.

My right hon. friend spoke, and I think this is of some importance, of a world reservoir of 1,325,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1930, and went on to say that that had been reduced last year to 625,000,000 bushels. If that is true I do not think it is entirely accurate, but accepting for the moment those figures if the world surplus of wheat was reduced from 1,325,000,000 bushels in 1930 to 625,000,000 bushels last year at the end of July, what in the world were Mr. McFarland and the then prime minister doing that they did not get the surplus of wheat in Canada down in similar proportion to that of our competitors?

On July 31, 1930, we had a carryover in Canada of 127,000,000 bushels. The figure increased until on July 31, 1935, it stood at 215,000,000 bushels, and later in the year it increased, as members of the house know, to almost 300,000,000 bushels. What does that mean? Simply this, that our competitors in other countries were selling their wheat while Canada, to use street language, was left holding the bag.

My right hon. friend said the other day that he did not desire to deal in percentages; but they are sometimes very illuminating—and this bears directly on the reasons for setting up the new wheat board.

In 1930 Canada held 23 per cent of the wheat surplus of the four chief wheat exporting nations of the world. In 1935 Canada's percentage of the wheat surplus of these four countries had increased to 43 per cent, which again bears out and emphasizes what I said a moment ago. Again I ask, what was being done by those who controlled the Canadian wheat surplus, that they did not try to bring it down in proportion to the reductions by these other countries? Of the world carryover in 1930 Canada held about 14 per cent, and that was increased in 1935 to 24 per cent. I think that comment is unnecessary because the facts speak for themselves. There certainly was no active wheat selling policy in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: And we had four bad crop years.

Mr. EULER: Yes. The surplus cannot be blamed upon nature, because as a matter of fact in Canada during those six years we had virtually four crop failures and in only two of the six years was there an average crop. Nature, therefore, really assisted in keeping down our wheat surplus; yet it increased as I have already indicated.

While my right hon. friend did not draw any conclusions from the fact which he gave, that the world's wheat surplus had been reduced from 1,325,000,000 in 1930 to 625,000,000 bushels in 1935, what I think he intended to convey was that now, since we still control within measurable distance of half the world wheat surplus, we are, to use another street term, sitting pretty; that we can make the world come to us for our wheat and that we can dictate the price at which we wish to sell.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will read it he will see that that is not what I said.

Mr. EULER: I have read it, and I cannot see any other implication or reason for making the statement.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave the reason. It is on Hansard.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I am rather dull of comprehension, because I read it very carefully and I could not see that any particular inference was drawn by my right hon. friend. But perhaps this is what he refers to. He says:

> And from that reservoir—
> That is the reservoir of 625,000,000 bushels.
> —all the purchasing countries of the world must buy their supplies for the next eight months.

Meaning, of course, that we were in control and that we could, I suppose, exact any price we chose.

Mr. BENNETT: But we controlled only a portion of that reservoir.

Mr. EULER: We had nearly half of it, nearly 200 million bushels. My right hon. friend did not remember that while on July 31 last year the reservoir had been reduced to some 625 million bushels, the new crops of the Argentine, which I admit is not very large this year, and of Australia have since then become available. Russia and other European countries, France, Germany and Portugal, are shipping surpluses even now. It may surprise some of the members to know that one can never be too sure just how much the supply of wheat is. I do not know a great deal about the wheat business, but I find that there are many uncertainties in it and some things which are difficult to understand. I learned only a week or two ago that a new surplus of wheat had been discovered where it had never before been suspected, and that Portugal and Spain were now offering for sale 30,000,000 bushels of wheat. Then the 1936 winter wheat harvests in Europe and the United States will also be available before expiry of the eight months to which my right hon. friend referred. If his assumption is that because Canada controls a very large proportion of the comparatively small world wheat surplus and we can wait and receive a higher price for our wheat, which, of course, we would all like to see go to the farmers of western Canada, I have this to say: We have had the same rosy story told to us for some three or four years by the gentleman who was the chairman of the wheat board until a few weeks ago. We were constantly being assured that we were just about to turn the corner of wheat prosperity, but we never reached that point. As a matter of fact, the surplus of 127 million bushels in 1930, when he took charge, has been increased, as I said before, to nearly 300 million bushels in the last year. Suppose we have this year, as it is almost time we should have, a large crop in this country, and there are also large crops in the other wheat producing countries, how in the world can we hope to reduce this surplus of between 200 and 300 million bushels and to sell the wheat that we may produce, unles we deliberately offer our wheat in the world markets at competitive prices and give the people a real opportunity to buy it? This government believes in the policy of offering wheat at competitive prices and in clearing the bins as far as possible at fair prices —not at fire sale prices, as they have sometimes been described—before a new crop comes in. It seems to me that that is just ordinary business common sense; it is the practice any man in business would follow. It applies particularly in the case of wheat, because the longer you keep wheat the more it costs you to store it. Your storage charges are mounting at the rate of two-thirds of a cent per bushel per month.

I should like to say just a word with regard to the criticism voiced by my right hon. friend in connection with the protection of the shorts. It was here that I think the most serious criticism of Mr. Murray came from the lips of my right hon. friend. If it is any satisfaction to him to know, I may say that the present wheat board did make a temporary arrangement in order to encourage the sale of wheat and to protect overnight sales. Those who are familiar with the technicalities of the business will know what is meant by that, and I shall not go into it.

Mr. DUNNING: The previous board did too.

Mr. BENNETT: They did not do it in that way.

Mr. DUNNING: On occasion, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: They did not do it in that way.

Mr. EULER: If my right hon. friend sees anything sinister or wrong in the action taken by the present wheat board, I invite him to ask for an investigation by a parliamentary committee and I promise that he will receive it promptly.

Mr. BENNETT: I intended to ask for that.

Mr. EULER: It is quite all right; you will get it.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend referred also to the Argentine, and to the fact that some weeks ago, quite unexpectedly—

Mr. BENNETT: Not unexpectedly to those who were observing it.

Mr. EULER: I will say this: not unexpectedly to those who were observing it, they raised the price of wheat some twenty cents per bushel. My right hon. friend offered very severe criticism in connection with the fact, and it is a fact, that Argentine wheat was selling at slightly higher prices than Canadian wheat. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) complained to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He said that he was giving the higher price of Argentine wheat in Argentina as compared with Canadian wheat in Winnipeg, whereas a fair basis of comparison would be the prices of the competing wheats at Liverpool. That seemed to me to be very reasonable. I have had the matter checked up just to-day, and I have received the following note from my department:

> Re Liverpool prices Canadian and Argentine wheat. Argentine wheat has been rarely quoted since the new minimum price was established on December 13, 1935. On February 7, 1936, Argentine wheat was last quoted at $1.01¾ versus 98⅝ cents for No. 2 northern Canadian (Atlantic shipment). Since little or no business in Argentine wheat is being done, the spread of 3⅛ cents is meaningless.

That is exactly the point; prices do not mean very much if no sales are being made. The Argentine has very little wheat to sell, and what is sold is being sold in neighbouring countries, such as Brazil. As a matter of fact the reports I have received are to the effect that last week, giving a case in point, the Argentine sold in the United Kingdom, our chief market, only 18,000 bushels of wheat.

I should like now briefly to discuss the reasons—I have already given some of them, inferentially at least—why the former wheat board headed by Mr. McFarland was displaced. As was indicated by the order in council read by the leader of the opposition the other day, that board was displaced by this government. Our committee and the government believed that a certain sales resistance, as we called it, or antagonism had developed in the foreign markets, especially in Great Britain, as against that wheat board, or against the members of that board.

Mr. BENNETT: Sales were not being made by the board.

Mr. EULER: All right; we will say Mr. McFarland.

Mr. BENNETT: Or by Mr. McFarland. The act provides that sales shall be made through certain channels.

Mr. EULER: Mr. McFarland and my right hon. friend have been carrying on the business of buying and selling wheat for five years. They have been selling in Great Britain, and the board merely takes the place of the old—

Mr. BENNETT: No, the statute provides that—

Mr. DUNNING: They control the price.

Mr. EULER: We had become convinced that there was a certain antagonism and sales resistance in Great Britain against the sale of Canadian wheat, and we believed that was caused by the action of that board. In that there was nothing personal against the members of the board; I want to make that perfectly clear. I made some inquiries. I had conversations with more than one person with regard to the feeling in Great Britain, and I was assured that that feeling did exist. I should like to quote to the house something which may be perhaps more conclusive to hon. members. I quote from Broomhall's Corn Trade News, which is, I think, a fairly reputable publication.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a fine millers' publication.

Mr. EULER: The millers are the buyers of our wheat; they are our customers.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the most reputable international wheat authority there is in the world.

Mr. EULER: I quote from the issue of February 13, 1935, as follows:

We have never criticized the Winnipeg price minima as being unreasonably high. Our criticisms have been levelled at the policy in general, which has prevented free competition on the international market. Similar criticism is now heard in the dominion, where speculation is rife as to how the government will disentangle itself from its wheat commitments.

Then again from the issue of March 27, 1935:

It is, however, a very debatable point as to whether Canada's best interests are served by a policy of splendid isolation. If Mr. McFarland were to approach the trade in a spirit of friendly cooperation, and adjust his prices to a reasonably competitive level, it is quite probable he would be agreeably surprised at the amount of business waiting to be done.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the competitive price at that time?

Mr. EULER: That was in March of last year, and I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. BENNETT: That is March, 1935?

Mr. EULER: Yes. Again on September 11, 1935:

The Canadian wheat board, on whose advice the present price has no doubt been established, would appear to be taking a bullish view of the international situation. We would not care to say that, by holding back supplies, Canada has worked a corner, but we can readily believe that Mr. McFarland, who is the chairman of the wheat board, has advised his government that an increased price for Canadian wheat is justified on statistical grounds. The danger, of course, is that by anticipating a rise in international prices, the Canadian wheat board will further estrange overseas buyers. If there is sufficient strength in the statistical position to justify a price of 87½ cents for No. 1 northern wheat, would not that price be reached without naming it as a minimum? Possibly the wheat board would have better served Canadian interests by fixing a price more in line with current values of competing descriptions. It seems unnecessarily tactless to lose an opportunity of renewing friendly connections with buyers in the United Kingdom and other importing countries.

Then from Milling I might read an extract which appeared in the issue of December 14, 1935:

Canada is undoubtedly enjoying a larger share of the world's trade now that the McFarland policy of rigid selling has been abandoned. Prices of Canadian wheat are more competitive than they have been for a long time and consequently I expect that good quantities will continue to be bought by importers. It cannot be said that Canada is forcing sales—

Mr. BENNETT: That is, at the present time.

Mr. EULER:

—and thereby damaging the "bull structure" of the market. She is simply putting out offers in reasonable relation to the offers of other shippers.

I have been trying to establish in a reasonable way the fact that there was antagonism and sales resistance, in Great Britain particularly, against Canadian wheat. But the proof of the pudding, after all, is in the eating, and since the change in the board has been made we have the following results: in the nine and a half weeks the old board was in office they sold twelve and a half million bushels of wheat net. In the six weeks that the new board has been in office they sold sixty-five and a half million bushels of wheat. It is worth while to establish good will if you are going to do business with your customers. My right hon. friend made some reference to the fact that a man was sent over to Britain to try to reestablish contact with our customers in that country.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what Mr. Lamont went for.

Mr. EULER: That is exactly what he went for; and I am informed that he has been very successful. He has been in contact with the buyers of Canadian wheat in that country; and whereas in past years, for reasons which are apparent to everybody, the proportion of Canadian wheat going into British flour has been tremendously reduced, he now has some assurances at least that these proportions will be increased.

I would like to say in conclusion that the change has been made for one reason and one reason only. It was not a pleasant thing to do. It was made in the public interest, in order that the interests not only of the western farmers but of all the Canadian people should be served. I maintain that the change has been received reasonably well, even in parts of the press of western Canada, in the press of eastern Canada, and, I think, among people who like to see business done on business principles. If it were necessary to point to evidence that the change was not entirely unwelcome, even in western Canada, I need only refer to the by-election in which my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was returned by a tremendous majority, and in which the change in the wheat board, to some extent at least, was made an issue by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. BENNETT: Never had anything to do with it.

Mr. EULER: And the issue was the matter of the wheat board.

Just one word with regard to the treatment accorded to the old wheat board. I should like to make one thing plain. The leader of the opposition has stated, I think in so many words, that our treatment of the old wheat board, and the method of dismissing its members—if you like to put it that way—was hardly decent. The situation was this. The government having decided that in the public interest that change should be made, I was unfortunately chosen, as chairman of the wheat committee, to convey the news to the chairman of that board, Mr. McFarland. We had a personal conversation. I told him what was the feeling of the government. He said to me, "I won't retire unless you ask me in writing to do so." Naturally I wrote to him and gave the reasons, as I was bound to do, the reasons which I have given here; and the same letter, or a wire, was sent to his colleagues. They consulted and then decided that they would not retire. What was the government to do under the circumstances?

Mr. BENNETT: Add the rest of it—because of the condition imposed in the letter.

Mr. EULER: Very good; that is quite satisfactory. We then, believing that the change should be made, made it by order in council, and there again, very naturally and quite properly, gave the reasons for making the change. My right hon. friend says, and Mr. McFarland says, I think, that the integrity of the board was impugned. I leave to the judgment of hon. members whether the mere statement to certain gentlemen that sales resistance, and an antagonism to themselves have developed, constitutes a reflection upon the integrity and the honour and the honesty of such people. Surely the mere fact—if I might cite a parallel—that the people of Canada last fall developed a feeling of antagonism towards my friends opposite did not cast upon them any reflection of dishonesty or dishonour. There was no thought of casting any reflection whatsoever upon the integrity and the honesty of these gentlemen.

The leader of the opposition made some reference to the fact that we paid an honorarium amounting to six months' salary to the three members of the retiring board and Mr. McFarland had returned it. He said that Mr. McFarland had returned it, that he sent the cheque back with a communication that he could not accept it with that reflection against his honesty and honour and integrity. I may say to my right hon. friend that that was not the letter that was sent at all. The letter that was sent acknowledged the receipt of the cheque, and Mr. McFarland concluded like this—

Mr. BENNETT: Read the whole letter, please.

Mr. EULER: I will read the whole letter, if I have time. It is addressed to myself.

> I am in receipt of your letter of January 23rd, which was forwarded to me here from Winnipeg.
> I note an order in council was passed on January 22nd, providing for me a gratuity of $9,000. In the meantime, a cheque for the amount has just reached me, which I am returning you herewith.
> The fact is, under the circumstances, I cannot accept a gratuity on an order in council, because of the fact that a previous order in council provided for my retirement, and gave as a reason for my dismissal a cause which was clearly established as unwarranted.

But not a word, as the hon. gentleman says, as to his not accepting it with that reflection against his honesty and honour and integrity.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what is meant.

Mr. EULER: Mr. McFarland did not make that statement in declining to receive the cheque.

I have nothing further to say. That is the justification for the change in the personnel of the board, and the reasons that were given, and the manner in which it was done. We are not yet out of the woods. This particular problem is left on the doorstep of this government by the former government, and it is a difficult one to handle. This government does not pretend to say that because a new board has been appointed we are going to be out of this difficulty in a month—I am not going to set a term at all; that would be entirely unauthorized on the part of anybody. There are many factors that enter into the wheat situation: matters of drought, crop failures, and the restricted markets of the world. But we do believe that the right policy has been established, that Canadian wheat ought to be offered regularly at competitive prices and sold if those prices can be obtained. I have stated the policy. We have to await the course of events, but I am confident that our action will prove to be in the best interests of the farmers themselves and of the Canadian people in general.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to cover a very great deal of ground on this occasion, first, for the very clear and definite reason that, instead of three and a half or four hours in which to speak I have only forty minutes. The other reason is this: I have but one thought to which I wish to give expression to-day, and I will reserve for other occasions the discussion on various subjects that naturally come to one's mind. During this session I think there will be ample opportunity to discuss many matters of vital interest to this country, so if I do not mention them to-day it is not because I am lacking in any appreciation of their significance or their importance at the present time.

The government has come into office with an unusually strong support in this house. It is no false flattery for me to say that the government should be congratulated upon the expression of confidence that has been accorded it by the people of Canada. Any government or any party might well be proud of that expression of confidence, but at the same time I would suggest to the government and particularly, shall I say, to the new members of the Liberal party who are supporting the government in the house, that Canada is expecting great things from this government and this parliament, dominated and controlled as it is by the Liberal party. As far as I am concerned, in reference to any measures calculated to advance the interests of the people of Canada, I shall very gladly and freely cooperate with the government in passing such measures. I repeat, however, that the country expects much of the government. I would rather say, if I might do so without offence, that I think the country expects much of this parliament and I wish to start this session, as far as I am concerned, with the suggestion that it is parliament, the House of Commons, that should assert itself rather than that we should focus too much attention upon the administration, and I do not say that with the slightest sense of disrespect to the administration.

Before addressing myself to the matters with which I wish to deal, I should like to indulge for just a moment in what was indulged in by the leaders of the two major parties, that is, a little playing around with percentages. It is about the only comfort I can take out of the situation and I propose at once to arrogate to myself that modicum of comfort. I have made an analysis of the vote and I find that the Liberal party polled 2,061,000 votes, which means that each Liberal member in the House of Commons represents, on an average, 11,500 voters. Each Conservative member represents, on an average, 32,000 voters —not so bad, as someone says, and I quite agree. My Social Credit friends represent, on an average, 10,750 votes—not so bad again. Each Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member represents an average of 55,000 votes. The members of the Reconstruction party, however, each represent an average of 384,000 voters. So, Mr. Speaker when it comes to playing around with averages and percentages in connection with the voting, at least I can claim to be in rather a unique position. I think I am entitled to say—and I say it this once—that I am conscious of a very great responsibility in speaking for that large number of voters, though certainly in a numerical way I do not count for very much in this house of 245 members, a house in which I have been sitting for twenty-five years, so that I know something of its constitution, its habits and its practices; but, sir, I have a large measure of pride in the fact that I can speak for a large body of the free citizens of this country.

We met this year under a shadow, that of the death of a beloved sovereign. I think King George will be remembered through the ages and will be portrayed on the pages of history not only as a sovereign beloved by his people but also, I think, as one having the further unique record that in practically every country not belonging to the empire he was respected and admired. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that, meeting under the spell of this sad but inspiring circumstance, we in this parliament might forget partisan feelings and differences, unite in an effort to study the welfare and promote measures for the general well-being of this country, and contribute to the solution of our common problems. This, sir, is the House of Commons.

May I digress for a moment to say a word to that very large body of members who sit in parliament for the first time. I have not checked the figures with care, but I am told, sir, that there are more new members in this parliament than ever sat in any new parliament since confederation. That may not be correct, but it is certainly true that there is a very large number of members here who never sat in parliament before and, of course, the great majority of them sit with the Liberal party. It has occurred to me since the election, and since the house met, that a great many Liberal members who sit for the first time in this parliament have come here earnestly imbued with the doctrines, the old, ancient doctrines, of their party. I am going to offer a word of warning; it is this—and I speak from a recollection of my own entry into the House of Commons twenty-five years ago—you come to the house convinced that your great party—the Liberal party I shall address for the moment—stands for what you believe to be best in the political life of the community. You come here with a conviction that you as an individual will be able to contribute something to the solution of your nation's problems. And you will be, unless you fall under the spell of extreme partisanship and allow your better judgment, your convictions and your conscience to be dominated by the exigencies of the party whip. I am not saying that with any disrespect to the new chief whip of the Liberal party, a gentleman whom I respect and admire and whom I count as a friend. But it is part of the game. I venture to say that there is not an older member in the house on either side but looks back over the years and recalls that time after time he has subjugated his own best judgment to what was conceived to be for the moment the good of the political fortunes of his party. Now it does not necessarily follow—and I say this with some knowledge and experience—that a man must always separate himself from his party, but he can make himself heard and felt in the house, in debate, and in the party caucus if you wish, make his views known, his influence felt when he knows and is convinced that something proposed is not in the best interests of the community as a whole. I would plead with the house, not necessarily to break away from party, but, at least in these years of adversity and struggle, to endeavour to bring to the service of the country what is in the interests of the country and not simply in the party interest.

I said a moment ago that this is the House of Commons. It is not the house of privileged interests; it is not the house of power. We often hear about accession to power, as if mere accession to power gave some divine right to do anything you wish. That is not so. This is the house of the common people of Canada. It is often referred to as the high court of parliament; personally I do not like the term. Not but what it is in a sense true, but when it is used over and over again it seems to carry with it the inference that only a student of the law has any right to a voice in this house. This is not the high court in that sense; this is a forum for the common people, where their representatives may express their views; where, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has so often said, their rights and their privileges may be safeguarded. And the first duty of every member who comes into the house is to preserve to himself and herself the rights of those whom they represent, irrespective of what may be said by those who consider it to be other than a forum of the common people. Thank heaven, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is still a democracy, at least in name if not in fact. I think we might well pause to consider that. Let us ask: What is a democracy? I ran across a quotation from Kant, the philosopher; he used these words, indicating how a democracy should function, and I commend them to the attention of hon. members:

So to act as to treat humanity as an end and never as a means.

That is, a democratic institution like this parliament should at all times so act that whatever it does has in view the welfare of humanity before the welfare of special interests, and never think of or treat the individual as a means to an end. That philosopher was not a Christian, but in those words he epitomizes the very essence of Christian teaching as it relates to human beings.

Slavery is a denial of democracy. Slavery is a denial of freedom. It is an absence of freedom. I ask the house: Is there freedom in Canada to-day? Let us pause and ponder. The Prime Minister said the other day that the Liberal party had made great contributions to political liberty. So they have. One has but to read the history of politics in Great Britain, in the mother of parliaments, and in Canada and elsewhere, and one must recognize in fairness and justice that the Liberal party have made great contributions to political liberty. But that is not the issue to-day. The issue to-day is economic liberty, and I say very frankly that in my opinion there is no economic liberty to-day. Let me ask hon. gentlemen this—I will take only two general illustrations—has the farmer of Canada, whether in Quebec, the maritimes or the west, anything whatever to say about the price he shall receive for his butter fat when he takes it to the factory?

Mr. HOWARD: Yes, he has.

Mr. STEVENS: Nothing at all. He is told what the price of butter fat is that day; that price is named in Montreal by some unknown and invisible authority, subject to no public control and with no responsibility to the public. The farmer ships his hogs or cattle to the Toronto livestock exchange, or to Edmonton or to Winnipeg or Montreal, and he has nothing at all to say as to what he shall get for them.

Mr. HOWARD: Certainly he has.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Nothing, Mr. Speaker. The farmer will ship his cattle to these markets and what will he get? He will get a statement: loading charges, freight, unloading charges, water, feed, commission, stockyard charges; these will be taken off a price about which he has nothing to say, and he will get a ticket back saying: This is what you will receive. As an individual he has no more to say about it than has the man in the moon. But each morning there goes out a wire from Toronto indicating what shall be the price of cattle or hogs that day. I ask: Is there any economic freedom in that? I am not suggesting—I shall discuss this feature at more length later; I am using it merely as an illustration—that we should return to the old days when a farmer toted his stuff in and bargained with an individual over it; not at all. But I do say that if in the process of time and evolution of business certain conditions have arisen where the farmer has nothing to say about the prices of his produce, then some authority, some power, some influence ought to stand between him and those who do determine those prices. That is all I have to say about that.

Is there any economic liberty or freedom for the great mass of workers in Canada to-day? There is only one liberty I know about that is left to the ordinary salaried or wage earning class, or to the ordinary workman, and that is the liberty to go hungry. I do not know of any other. There is no security. Only a few days ago I read an analysis which indicated that one of the reasons men are not attempting to build homes to-day is that they cannot experience that security in employment which would justify them in even thinking of a home. That is true. We talk about the homes of Canada of which we are so justly proud and which most of us are privileged to enjoy. But how many are there among the toiling millions across Canada who have security of employment sufficient to justify them in taking a home?

A few days ago I heard about an eminent gentleman to whom were brought, as had been the daily custom, the cost sheets of his great plant. He was worth millions. Scanning the cost sheets, which indicated that he was making profits, he said, "You have got to cut down." His superintendent said to him, "That would mean throwing some of these men on the street, and we are not overmanned." The gentleman replied, "Cut five out of this lot and ten out of that, and make the others do the work." Out they went. Where did they go? They went out on the street, with no security. Have they savings? With the exception of an odd few here and there who have had the good fortune to have employment for a number of years, show me anywhere where those men have savings. I remember hearing an eminent authority saying not long ago that there were 5,000,000 deposit accounts in Canada, and the statement was made as evidence to prove that the great masses of the people had savings accounts. Well, I know this: I checked up at one factory, and although it is very difficult to get them to talk I found that out of 250 workers only twelve had bank accounts. Upon making a further check I found dozens of concerns having ten and twelve bank accounts which did not represent individuals. Practically every church in Canada has bank accounts for the board of trustees, the board of management, the missionary society, the Sunday school, the young people's society, and so on. There may be ten or twelve accounts in all. Yet we hear the statement made that there are 5,000,000 deposit accounts in Canada; I question if there are 2,000,000. Nobody knows. The point is that we do know there is no sense of security in employment, and as a result there is no economic freedom or liberty.

Mr. VIEN: Is this condition peculiar to Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all. In fact, I believe Canada is perhaps more blessed in that regard than is any other country, and to a greater extent than is the United States.

I am glad the question has been asked, because it forms the basis of an observation to which I should like to give expression, if I have time, that it is in the hands of this parliament in the series of sessions held this year, next year, the next, and so on, to pass those measures which will lay the foundation in Canada for economic freedom, for democracy and for the establishment of this great realm. Where? On the basis of the welfare of the agriculturist and the worker. If it does not rest there, then there can be no security for the so-called upper strata.

I wish to impress this fact upon parliament, although it may not be heeded: We hear a great deal of discussion about the constitutionality of this or that law. At the present time eight acts of parliament are before the supreme court awaiting decision as to their constitutionality. I am strongly convinced that if the parliament of Canada will speak firmly for the Canadian people, and the rights and interests of those people, we shall not need very much law. May I illustrate that point. Two years ago the price spreads committee sat in this building, and before it appeared one of the greatest corporations in Canada, the Imperial Tobacco Company. The facts disclosed that that company had cut the price of tobacco from around 30 cents per pound to from 14 to 16 cents per pound. They had reduced wages by a substantial percentage. They had imposed certain conditions upon retailers and had paid exorbitant bonuses to their executive officers. Those facts, and some information as to capital structure, were disclosed by the committee. What happened? Company officials appeared reluctantly, and at first I believe were very much annoyed in having the facts spread out. They were spread out, however, before the public of Canada. What happened? Almost immediately after the close of that session of parliament the Imperial Tobacco Company amended its buying policy. Hon. members from Essex, Elgin and other counties in western Ontario will know that I am stating the truth. Last year and the year before they restored the price of tobacco to from 27 to 30 cents per pound, thereby changing the state of the growers from that of abject poverty in 1932 and 1933 to comparative prosperity in 1934 and 1935. Next they restored the wages of their employees and, moreover, inaugurated a system of pensions and health benefits for them. They went further; they made new agreements with the retailers on an equitable and fair basis. All of that was done voluntarily—no law, no compulsion—only with knowledge of the fact that a committee of parliament had looked at and had permitted the public to look at the picture. That is what may result from a position parliament may take in connection with some of these matters.

When a week or so ago the government of the day took up the challenge of a great corporation which had closed its doors and turned its employees out on the street, what happened? They opened their doors. Why? Because public opinion would not tolerate such a situation. Do not let the house disregard the influence and power which parliament has, not by interfering in business, not by trying to run business, but by standing as the impartial umpire between selfish and unscrupulous interests and corporations on the one hand and those who suffer from their operations on the other. Let parliament stand as the champion of the rights of the common people, as the House of Commons by its very name indicates it is, and we shall see a great change. But there must be a clear-cut, forceful and definite expression of determination on the part of hon. members that these conditions shall not exist. Let them declare for a fair price to the farmer. I do not believe there is an hon. member in this chamber who knows better than I do the perplexities, difficulties and dangers involved in fixing prices. I am not asking for the moment that we fix prices, but I am asking parliament to declare, as one of the fundamental principles upon which the economic structure of this country was based, that fair prices shall be paid to the farmers, that body which forms one-half of our population. I ask that parliament shall declare, as an underlying principle of the economic life of this country, that fair wages shall be paid to the wage earner. I may be told that that is just a pious expression of opinion, but if parliament will bring before it those matters that do violence to the two principles I have mentioned, it will be found that employing authorities will try to conform to the view that parliament thus expresses.

Another point which I wish to emphasize is this: If we are to revive business in this country and relieve unemployment and all the other distresses that are prevalent in Canada to-day, we must take some action that will raise the purchasing power of the masses of the people. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), speaking a few moments ago, outlined some of the conditions that he had seen in the west. I recall, Mr. Speaker, a trip that I made when I was electioneering in the constituency of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. MacMillan) in 1933; he will recall meeting me there. I addressed some forty-seven meetings; I met literally thousands of farmers; I went on some of their farms and into some of their homes and I saw the conditions obtaining in that district. Then I went into northern Alberta and there I saw conditions such as my hon. friend described a moment ago in somewhat different form—many and many a home, I venture to say thousands of homes, where there was lack of clothing, and I was told by dozens and dozens that their children because of lack of clothing could not leave their door until the warm spring weather came. And that, Mr. Speaker, is in Canada where we know the great, the dominating proportion of the farming community is not getting a return to-day sufficient to provide those people with warm clothing, and decent blankets for their beds, let alone furniture. Raise their purchasing power. Increase the returns to the farmer, and when you have raised their purchasing power you will stimulate the production of goods for consumption in this country and thus contribute more to the rapid relief of unemployment than could be done in any other way, whether it be in the manufacture of clothing, boots and shoes, furniture, farm machinery, houses and so forth. These are the things that are necessary, but before that comes you must give to the farming community of Canada a reasonable purchasing power.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend allow me another question? For accomplishing that which is also our aim and purpose has he any specific method other than the expansion of our foreign trade?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I do not think the expansion of our foreign trade is the solution. I do not intend to discuss that to-day, but I will discuss it later when the estimates of the Trade and Commerce department are up or on some other occasion. I am not saying this in any critical way. I have given a great deal of study to external trade, and I will take second place to no one in desiring to see our trade expanded, but that is not a solution of this problem.

Mr. VIEN: What is the specific remedy my hon. friend would propose?

Mr. STEVENS: I wish I were over there and I would soon show you.

Mr. VIEN: You were here for a time.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and I got out. The economic problem is not a simple one. I would like, if I may, to say to hon. members, and particularly to the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien), who was in the house so many years ago, that I am not offering captious criticism. I am not desiring to criticize this government at all. I am not talking about the government at all. I am simply trying to discuss the problem for the purpose of laying at least a foundation from which to attack it. I am not saying that the solutions are here or there, but I do say that we in this parliament, if we will recognize the underlying and fundamental principles, upon that foundation can build and make a great contribution. The trouble is that we will not recognize these principles. I am not prepared to accept the doctrines of my social credit friends, but the hon. gentleman who leads that party in the house (Mr. Blackmore) last night made a speech that is challenging to hon. members. Not his solutions; I am not talking about them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Wait a minute. That light laugh is one of the things that makes me despair of parliament. I say to my friends on the government benches: Let them take the quotations which the hon. member for Lethbridge gave from their Prime Minister's speech, and not his views but the authorities he quoted, and they cannot but be impressed by the seriousness of this whole business. Let us at least try to get down to the fundamental principles underlying it all, and then whether the hon. member for Lethbridge has the solution or whether hon. gentlemen opposite have it, let us all work together to find a common solution. I am not willing to accept my hon. friend's doctrines yet. I want to be shown some things first, but I do say this, that credit and the control of credit lie very near the root of the trouble.

People in this country have been calling for the opportunity to work, but, Mr. Speaker, there is a strange condition developing right in this country and in the United States. I was in Toronto the other day and a manufacturer told me that he was having difficulty in getting skilled workers in his plant. I read an editorial in the Toronto Globe a day or two ago, on February 10, which is rather startling. It says:

> At a conference recently of business leaders in Chicago it was stated that, though hundreds of jobs calling for technical knowledge were opening, trained men could not be found to fill them.

It goes on:

> This scarcity was described as most acute in the automobile and general machine trades, though it was experienced by industry in general.
> Yet why should the condition be startling? Its roots may be found further back than the beginning of the depression. In the heyday of prosperity youth rather scorned the overalls occupations, and took to the white-collar jobs. There was plenty of money to be made; so why toil all day in machine shops? Trade apprenticeships did not appeal. When the depression came industry slowed down; so did everything else, and there wern't so many either white-collar or overalls jobs. There were fewer opportunities for learning trades; boys were not needed, and staffs were being reduced. Many aging mechanics, idle for five years, have grown too old to resume their former hard work. The consequence is that, with a revival of industry, there is no adequate supply of trained workers.

Is it not startling and challenging to this parliament that, with the stimulation of industrial activity, there is now developing in Canada as well as in the United States a situation where there is actually a scarcity of trained men, when we have hundreds of thousands of unemployed? It is all very well for industrialists and great commercial leaders to tell politicians to keep their hands off business, but here is something which challenges the business leaders as well as parliament, and in my opinion we dare not as a parliament ignore this situation. I should like to ask: Why should not a university graduate in mechanical engineering put on overalls and work at a machine? Is the legal profession more honourable than the calling of the machinist? Is the financier more noble as a man than is a carpenter? Cannot we in Canada get away from the idea that there is something inferior about a man working with his hands? I might ask this question: Is it coming to this in Canada that we are going to develop, if we have not done so already, a system of castes similar in effect to the castes of India, although they may be in another form? Is it to be that the workmen of Canada are to become the untouchables of Canada? I hope not. But unless parliament builds its policies—I am not talking about party policies; I am speaking of parliament—upon the foundations I have indicated, namely, the well-being of the great farming class and the working class, then the superstructure that we have erected will be insecure and in my opinion will topple and collapse sooner or later.

I should like to turn to some statistics which are published by the government, but I shall not go into them in great detail. These are analyses of income taxes made by the bureau of statistics, and any hon. member can obtain them. I shall not give all the figures but simply indicate certain percentages. During the five year period, 1930 to 1934 inclusive, the income of agrarians dropped 52 per cent. Earnings of retail merchants dropped 53 per cent in the same period, while those of wholesale merchants dropped 50 per cent. Earnings of manufacturers dropped 40 per cent, while earnings from natural resources, which include mining, dropped 17 per cent. Earnings of transportation and public utilities, which are closely allied to the producing and distributing elements, dropped 46 per cent. Earnings of all the producing elements decreased; farmers, industrialists, transportation, merchants, all experienced a diminution in income. But there is one class left, the financial. I find that the great financial group experienced in the same period an increase of 20 per cent. This is not a matter of someone saying: Oh, well, there is Stevens again attacking the bankers and the financial institutions. That is not the point at all. Wealth is produced by those who work in the soil, whether they be farmers or lumbermen, or those who work in the mines. It has to be produced out of the soil. What is capital? It is nothing more or less than what is left over after you have paid for the cost of producing real wealth and is available for reinvestment. That has been accumulating and has come under the control of a smaller and smaller number of corporations and persons. The point at issue in Canada is this: Whereas there has been an increase in the earnings of the great financial group, those who produce wealth or create wealth, if you like to use that term, have all experienced a diminution in earnings. How long can this go on? Let any logical or impartial man give the answer to that question. Of one thing I am convinced, it cannot go on indefinitely.

In case it may be suggested that I have rather stretched this theme, let me quote from a speech made the other day by Sir Edward Beatty. Sir Edward made the very definite statement that more production is the remedy for unemployment. That is a rather striking statement from Sir Edward Beatty and I agree with it. I do not believe in the so-called doctrine of scarcity; I never had faith in it and never did believe in it. Let me quote Sir Edward as follows:

> Men who came from farms, attracted by high wages paid by business institutions in the cities, and then abandoned to unemployment, had a legitimate cause for complaint against the skill with which private business is conducted.

Those are not my words; they are those of Sir Edward Beatty. That is no utterance of mine. In making that statement Sir Edward Beatty reflected what I believe is the conviction of every thoughtful student of modern business and economic problems. It is not sufficient for business men to warn governments and politicians to keep out of business. The long and short of the matter is the fact that the collapse of 1929 followed a period when private business was uninterrupted and unmeddled with, if I may use that term, by governments. My hon. friends will be the first to endorse that. Is Mr. Speaker going to call me to time?

Mr. SPEAKER: I was about to do so.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry, but I should like to make one brief reference in conclusion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. STEVENS: What I have to say I want to say with absolute courtesy. I should like to put a challenge to this government. I should like to challenge the Liberal party to be true to its ancient principles. I appeal to the new members who have come here imbued with the doctrines of Gladstone, of Bright and so on, of which we hear so often. In saying this I speak as one who has sat opposed to hon. members opposite. I recognize that there is a certain type of mentality which is peculiarly adapted to the exigencies that presently obtain. I believe the Liberal party, because of its history and its ancient principles, has an opportunity which is unsurpassed in scope.

This is the house of the common people. Let us respect not only the sanctity of contracts, but the sanctity of human lives. In saying that I am not disregarding the desirability of observing contractual agreements, but I place before that the sanctity of human lives. It is a case not just of safeguarding capital, but of preserving the rights and ensuring the well-being of the producers of wealth and those who make capital possible.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I rise for the first time to address, through you, Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons, and I do so with a great deal of trepidation, which I know will be understood by hon. members who recall their initial attempt at assisting, in debate, the legislative activities of a great body such as this.

I should like to take this opportunity to say that my riding of Peel joins with the rest of the Dominion of Canada in expressing appreciation of the good fortune which has come to this dominion by virtue of the fact that we have now governing us one of the most talented and most literary men from the old land, Lord Tweedsmuir. I should like to couple with that remark a reference to the fact that we are also extremely fortunate in having as the first lady of our land none other than the very charming Lady Tweedsmuir.

I would also at this time, following a custom which I have observed during my stay in this chamber, congratulate the mover (Mr. Slaght) and the seconder (Mr. Fournier, Maisonneuve) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I would congratulate particularly the seconder, upon his youthful appearance and also upon his great fluency in both official languages of the house.

May I direct a remark or two to the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) who moved the address in reply. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I take the same liberty which that hon. gentleman did on that occasion, in case the Dominion of Canada at large, through the reports and proceedings of this house, should gain the impression that the district of Parry Sound is the greatest district in the province of Ontario, to place just a little ahead of that district the greatest constituency in the Dominion of Canada, the county of Peel. I appreciate the tone of my hon. friend's address; it was kindliness personified. I hope, through the deliberations of this chamber, in which I may have a part, that that attitude will be not only continued but developed in the way we should all like to see it developed.

The hon. member made mention, Mr. Speaker, of what a great asset his riding had in the Dionne quintuplets, those very beautiful and charming young ladies whom he believed might be his supporters some day. The county of Peel, as I am sure the rest of the dominion does, also takes pride in these quintuplets; because was it not a plant, and a good plant too, in the village of Port Credit, Ontario, that supplied the food which made it possible for these quintuplets later on to be supporters of the hon. member for Parry Sound? I think that is worth recording on Hansard.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was accessory after the fact.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say, too, that we have in my county the largest flower producing centre in the whole world. One plant alone covers forty acres, all under glass. For the information of hon. members who are not familiar with the town of Brampton, may I say that the greenhouses, if placed end to end, would extend a distance of over nine and three-quarter miles. That florist industry gives employment to over six hundred people. For that reason the terms of the Canada-United States trade agreement, which is mentioned in the speech from the throne, and which is to come before the house, are most important in so far as that agreement affects the florist industry of the Dominion of Canada, and the cut flower business, in which so many working people are interested in our particular constituency. It is my great hope that the government will see fit to remedy any defect which may have caused concern to the working men of my riding, and that they will see to it when the time comes the remedy will be both swift and sure.

I would also like to point out that the agreement between the United States and Canada which will shortly come before this house for attention contains something which must be dealt with in detail later on, as it affects the fruit and vegetable men in the southern part of the riding which I represent. I am hopeful that the expressions in the speech from the throne do not mean that seasonal regulations and dumping duties will not be available for the protection of the farmers whom I have the honour to represent.

I am not going to take up the time of the house by a lengthy address; in the county from which I come we believe in short sermons, short editorials, and short speeches. But I should just like to point out that I wanted in this preliminary way to raise my voice on behalf of three particular sections of our community, the farmer, the workingman and his family, and the new generation, the youth of our country, which perhaps need as much attention as any other section of the community. The man on the back concession, the workingman in the poor home, and the young man who is not able to find a job in this peculiar world, are watching eagerly the deliberations of this first session of the eighteenth parliament of Canada. I hope they will not be disappointed. They ask for leadership. They have been seeking it through many different channels. Let us hope that the leadership which will be provided by the government of our country will be of a quality which will be worth something to these three sections of the people; that it will actually amount to something beyond mere words; that words will be translated into concrete action looking to instant and permanent relief.

Therefore I say to the government of our country to-day, in all honesty and sincerity, that I do hope something along this line will be accomplished. I hope that their efforts will meet with the success that they themselves hope for; and I trust that our Conservative party, small in numbers though it may be, may play some definite and valuable part in assisting to bring to the Dominion of Canada the better times which you and I, Mr. Speaker, are so anxious to see prevail. I should like to offer the cooperation of one of the humblest private members in the house to the end that something practical may be done, and that mere partisanship shall not occupy the attention of the house to the extent that some who have voiced opinions suspect has been the case in the past. I hope we shall be able to throw aside in some degree party prejudices and do something for the man on the back concession, the workingman and his family, and the young men and women who have just come out of school and are looking to the government of Canada to accomplish something worth while.

Mr. ELIE O. BERTRAND (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of this session, I cannot, as a representative of the French Canadian minority in Ontario, refrain from expressing the grief felt by the people of this province at the death of our beloved sovereign George V. I wish to offer to His Gracious Majesty Edward VIII our deepest sympathy and also extend to Queen Mary and her family our sincerest condolences in their misfortune, to the new king a long reign, marked by peace and justice for all the citizens of the empire.

We are pleased to find in the speech from the throne the following paragraph with reference to the international situation.

> The seriousness of the international situation has contributed to the world's anxieties. My ministers are confident that they express the convictions of the people of Canada in adhering to the aims and ideals of the League of Nations, and in seeking in unison with members of the league as well as with other nations to support by all appropriate and practical means the maintenance of peace and the establishment of a world order based on justice and equity.

The effect, sir, of the last war, our losses in men, the obligations we then assumed, the problem of pensions to veterans, our enormous war debt which is heavily burdening the Canadian people, all this obliges us to ponder seriously when a question of war crops up. On this score, I think we should, on behalf of our fellow citizens of Ontario, congratulate the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) for his admirable explanation of the Riddell motion at Geneva, in connection with sanctions against Italy on certain products, notably oil. The government is entitled to our congratulations on the attitude they took in this matter. Let our watchword be to avoid taking any responsibility regarding wars in foreign countries, and believe this will be a great step towards preserving peace all over the world.

Mr. Speaker, before going further, I wish to state that we of the Liberal party are highly pleased to congratulate you upon your appointment to the speakership. Your are eminently qualified for the high office you now occupy and the House will certainly benefit from your wide knowledge of parliamentary procedure and the fairplay which you have always shown during the many years when you were, so to speak, the guide of our party.

I wish to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), who so ably moved the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. In a sound and eloquent speech, he proclaimed the policy followed by our party and, he certainly did credit to the constituency which has just elected him. The entire representation of Ontario is proud to include within its ranks such a distinguished barrister.

I must also congradulate the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Fournier) on his splendid debut in the House, as an orator. He reflected honour on his compatriots and will certainly he the pride of his constituents.

I also deem it appropriate, sir, to congratulate the right hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King and his cabinet on the stupendous amount of work they have accomplished since the elections of October 14. We have already felt, in various parts of Canada, the benefit of the trade treaties concluded with certain foreign countries, notably with the United States. Carloads, even entire train-loads of cattle have already crossed the 45th parallel. The increased prices that have resulted to the producers have been a great boon to that portion of the farming community. Although we will not know before January, 1937, the tangible results of this trade treaty between Canada and the United States, which has been effective from the beginning of January, partial statistics are already available. In Alberta, the new trade regime was inaugurated by the shipping of a train-load of cattle at the beginning of January. Two other trains of 15 carloads have since been shipped. These are merely the most outstanding transactions; the treaty has also produced results in other domains for instance, in the prices of certain articles, even before it became effective.

This treaty was followed by a trade agreement with Japan which, imparting renewed activity to our lumber industry, provided employment to a large number of our workers.

Mr. W. R. Beatty, of Pembroke, Ont., who recently retired from the presidency of the Canadian Lumbermen's Association expressed himself as follows when presiding over the 28th annual convention of the Association, held recently at the Mount Royal hotel, in Montreal:

> The newly-signed trade agreement between Canada and the United States will mean increased shipments to our friends to the south of us, according as recovery advances.
> In normal times the United States need our lumber, and our lumber manufacturers need the American market; the treaty may gradually restore to us all of our lost markets. The renewed trade relations with Japan are also a reassuring promise, especially as regards the Pacific coast lumber industry which relies mostly on exports.

These are results which should rejoice us, they also prove that the Government's policy will find markets for the products which we cannot consume in Canada, and which must necessarily be sold abroad.

The speech from the throne also mentions unemployment, a national problem and one of the most pressing that faces the government. We were already aware that the government intended to allow more scope to the provinces and municipalities in this connection. This is confirmed in the speech from the throne it is stated that a federal commission comprising provincial and municipal representation will be created in order to study this problem prescribe remedies and find the best possible means of relieving the situation until the day when normal business recovery will entirely absorb the unemployed, who today number 400,000 but were far more numerous some time ago.

It is further stated that concentration camps will be broken up. All agree that these concentration camps should disappear at the earliest possible date.

The government would do well to take up such matters immediately and, with the cooperation of all interested parties, to find profitable work for the unemployed, as well as for those who are now in concentration camps.

Besides the agricultural problem to which I shall refer in a moment, we must take into consideration the large number of unemployed in this country. The government must not undertake to foster immigration to this country before the work and the development of our natural resources require it.

I wish to briefly broach the subject of amendments to the British North America Act. The question is certainly a very delicate one and we, the French Canadian minority, should give careful consideration to it. On more than an occasion and even on the floor of this house, the hard struggles which the French Canadians had to endure in order to safeguard their rights in Ontario have been discussed.

Some contend that the minorities of all country have had to undergo such struggles, that they are part of history throughout the various periods and that it will always be so. Nevertheless, the fact remains that, as a race, we certainly have our rights in this country and no amendment to the British North America Act must, in the future, prevent their recognition, both from the standpoint of religion and of nationality.

The speech from the throne goes on to say that necessary legislation will be brought down in the course of this session to control credit and the issue of currency through the medium of the Bank of Canada. This is another delicate question; however, the Liberal party has already stated its policy in this regard, and we are proud to note that a bill will be introduced in the course of this session which will put this country in full control of our credit and of the issue of paper currency. This will perhaps prevent certain classes of our population to loudly proclaim, as they have been doing for some time past, that capital and wealth is created through the development of our natural resources and that this wealth could be easily distributed among all classes of society by the simple expedient of issuing paper currency. We must have faith in the future of our country and save it from bankruptcy. We must congratulate the government, which will, at the first opportunity, assume control of this credit, but it must not be to the benefit of certain classes only; it must be distributed equitably among all classes of the community.

It will certainly prove difficult to attain such an object, because every member of this house is aware of the large number of pamphlets, newspaper articles, editorials, resolutions from boards of trade, groups of business men and financial institutions of all kinds throughout the country which insist that parliament and the government find the necessary means to reduce expenses in a manner such as it has never been done before in the administration of our dominion or of any province. If such a policy was carried out, the people would be the first to suffer. Such are the means proposed to save the country. In all these resolutions we are urged to practise economy; but whom are we to ask to do so? Certainly not the unemployed, nor the workers whose wages are insufficient to give them a decent livelihood, nor the agricultural classes which are on the threshold of bankruptcy. Who shall be requested to practise such economy? The government simply provides the bare necessities of these people.

We know that the Liberal party has always been recognized as the party that has most practised economy, while safeguarding the interests of all classes of the country's population. We hear among the people such remarks as: You Liberals are always elected when the Conservative party has expended all the revenues of the country and there only remains for you to foot the bills. We are perhaps entitled to such an heritage which is certainly a compliment to the Liberal administration.

[Mr. Bertrand.]

I cannot entirely agree with what the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has just stated in connection with currency; however, it might perhaps be appropriate to point out, notwithstanding all the propaganda that is now carried on, that Canada is actually indebted to the extent of $3,000,000,000; moreover, she has guaranteed the liabilities of railway and other organizations to the amount of $1,600,000,000, while municipalities are indebted to the extent of $1,500,000,000, forming a total of $7,100,000,000 on which interest has to be met. Actually there are other liabilities for which the people are responsible for instance those of school boards and other public utilities. And we are urged in all the articles I have mentioned, to maintain the present rate of interest, to meet our obligations, to keep the country's credit intact, to avoid repudiating our debts and the guarantees we have given. Thrift is preached to those who are in want, in order to safeguard accumulated wealth by continuing to pay the same rates of interest. The average rate of interest on the total debt to which I have just referred amounts actually to 4½ per cent. I base such figures on an article which appeared in "Saturday Night," entitled: Retrenchment, not conversion, the remedy. Note well that in this article it is absolutely urged that the 4½ per cent rate of interest be maintained; it was even higher before certain conversions were carried out last year. By reducing the rate of interest to 3 per cent an amount of more than $100,000,000 would be economized yearly. This would mean a mere trifle which, according to these people, should be disregarded, because the word conversion would mean repudiation.

I must frankly confess, sir, in the face of conditions such as have been prevailing since two years, the working classes cannot live as comfortably as they did a few years ago owing to the lack of work; the farming class is passing through a period of crisis such as it has never experienced in the past.

These people are urged to economize or to content themselves with the little they have, but when the government wishes to take over the control of the country's credit it is urged not to interfere; when it is a question of putting the lid down on the possessors of great wealth, the government is asked to prevent their income from falling to the level of those of other classes; it is even requested to protect them because, otherwise, it would be equivalent to repudiation and would, therefore, harm the country's credit.

May I be so bold, sir, as to state that something must be done, that I belong to the younger generation that want to see, in the near future, Canada grow, become prosperous and blossom out into one of the finest countries of the world; but may I also point out that there is a growing feeling among the younger generation that its chances of success are slight and that in the struggle for life, it is denied the advantages enjoyed by the preceding generation because we are handicapped by the fact that capital is given more protection than the people. I therefore beseech the government not to neglect this serious problem but, with the help of the Bank of Canada, and its own authority, to find the best solution in the very near future.

A few moments ago, sir, I stated that I would give some details in connection with the problems of the farming class. I wish especially to deal with the subject from the Quebec and Ontario farmers' standpoint. I want first to state that many factors favour the Quebec farmers, notwithstanding the criticisms directed against the Taschereau régime which has been in office in this province for a number of years. May I point out that the taxes levied on the farmers of Ontario are 250 per cent higher than those levied on the farmers of Quebec. I reside in a county where only an imaginary line divides Quebec from Ontario; this permits us to draw comparisons which I could furnish to the house. However, this would not settle the problem which we have to face. I shall, therefore, refer only to the taxes which are levied on the farming class. In doing so I shall even go back thirty years the better to set forth the agricultural problem and the difficulty of remaining on the land. It has been contended that colonization could settle the unemployment problem. It is an easy matter to state that this question may be solved by settling a large number of our unemployed on colonization land. I reside in an exclusively farming county, yet we have never succeeded in the past in settling our farmers' sons on lands located in the northern parts of Quebec or Ontario. They had to abandon their farms because they were unable to meet their obligations and thus they increased the number of unemployed in small towns located close to their abandoned homes. This is a problem which needs the attention of all governments, both provincial and federal.

Continuing the comparisons, may I state that school, municipal and county taxes on 100 acres of land in Ontario in the Ottawa valley, amounted to $38 in 1901; to $60 in 1914; to $175 in 1930, and to $193 in 1935. That is, in 35 years, an increase of 500 per cent for these taxes alone.

The dominion government taxes are levied on the entire population; however, when so levied, the farmers are included. I shall therefore add these taxes to the figures that I have just quoted in order to point out the difficulties the farmers have to contend with.

The taxes levied by the dominion government, per capita, amounted to $8.72 in 1901; to $16.56 in 1914; to $36.01 in 1930, which is an increase of 120 per cent. The provincial taxes, per capita, amounted to $1.85 in 1901; in 1914, to $4.49; in 1930, to $17.50, an increase of 300 per cent in the last 30 years.

So as not to delay unduly this debate, I shall simply quote the prices on farm implements required by the farmer. In 1914. a six-foot mowing machine cost $43.50; in 1935, $97.50. A six-foot binder was worth $102 in 1914 and $205 in 1935. A hay cart cost $60 in 1914 and, in 1935, $122. A fifteen-discs sowing machine sold for $69 in 1914 and for $160 in 1935. These are increases ranging from 125 to 150 per cent in prices of farm implements.

The index figures of agricultural products were, in 1914, as follows: farm products, 69; field products, 64; animal products, 79; making an average of 65·5. I have compared the figures between 1914, 1930 and 1935. In 1930, the same index figure was 86·6 and in 1935 it was 71. The value of farm products has therefore increased seven points on 64, or about 9 per cent, while the farmer's liabilities have increased 125 to 150 per cent on farm implements which he must necessarily purchase; 500, per cent in connection with school, municipal and provincial taxes; 120 per cent as regards dominion taxes and 300 per cent for other taxes. It is therefore obvious that the situation in which the farmer is placed, at present is so difficult that we fear he will be unable to survive in our section of the country.

The economic situation with which the farmer is faced is somewhat as follows: one-third of our population barely receives 58 cents from the sale of their products instead of the dollar which they received, for instance, in 1929, the year when the index figure was 100. In other words, their purchasing power has dwindled to 58 per cent and, when these people purchase in their turn, they realize that prices of articles they require, far from having dropped proportionately to their purchasing power, are still 90 cents instead of a dollar. The result is that the farmer refuses to make purchases or that he buys less than two-thirds of what he requires. The depressing effect of this depreciated purchasing power on trade as a whole is so obvious that it is unnecessary further to stress the point. It is unquestionably obvious.

I shall close my remarks, Sir, by requesting the government to realize the necessity of helping the farming class as well as the other classes I have mentioned. Since 44 per cent of our population are farmers, it behooves us to find the means to relieve the farmers as soon as possible. The new markets abroad will certainly help us to dispose of our products; as the demand increases, better prices will prevail; we all agree on this point. That is why we wish to congratulate the government for what it has already achieved and further encourage it to take all necessary steps to reestablish equilibrium between every class of our community, in order that all classes of citizens inhabiting Canada may earn a livelihood and prosper in our country which we desire to see great, for the happiness of all.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, those of us who have sat in this corner of the house during the past parliament and who are fortunate enough, if I may use the term, to be here again for this parliament, are in a fair position, I think, to watch the play and counterplay that takes place in this chamber between the two great parties. My mind goes back to the special session of 1930, when a similar debate took place. The proceedings of the last few days remind me forcibly of the early days of the last parliament. Anyone not acquainted with the prominent actors concerned would be at a loss to know what the debate was about. The present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is using language almost identical with that used by the leader of the opposition in 1930, and the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) is using, possibly in a little different way, language similar to that used by the leader of the government in those days. The results of the election were analyzed; it was assumed that because the Conservative party had a majority in the house in 1930 the people of Canada had endorsed the Conservative party. Now it is assumed that because the Liberal party have an overwhelming majority in parliament the people of Canada have endorsed Liberal principles. I think the assumption is not true in either case. The people of Canada have no idea what Conservative principles are or what Liberal principles are, because neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives have taken the trouble to lay before the people what their principles are and what the consequences of their principles would be if they were put into effect.

May I in a friendly way say to the members of the government party that they should not delude themselves with the idea that they are here because the people have endorsed Liberal principles. They are not here on that account; they are here because the last government failed to do what the people of Canada thought it should do, and what the government had said it would do. The votes cast in the last election for candidates of the Liberal party were not necessarily votes for Liberalism; they were votes against the Conservative party. They were negative votes. The people did not know and do not know now what the Liberal party had to offer them. But they did know what they had suffered during that period of five years, and as a protest against that, even a negative protest, they voted, almost as a matter of habit, for the other party, as alternatively they had voted election in and election out ever since 1867. So may I say to the leader of the government that the same fate awaits the Liberal government that overtook the Conservative government, if within the next few years they do not put into effect policies that will enable the people to avail themselves of the great actual and potential wealth of the country.

We heard during the last parliament a great deal about promises. The leader of the last government carried out at least one of his promises; he said he was going to end unemployment or perish in the attempt, and he has perished. It was not necessary for my Liberal friends to make promises; the people knew what had happened to them, and all they were waiting for was a chance to state their protest in the only way available to them. In order to impress that more clearly upon the minds of my Liberal friends may I draw their attention to the present plight of the Liberal government in the province of British Columbia.

That government was elected with possibly not quite but relatively as large a majority of members in the legislature as was the Liberal government here in Ottawa. After two years in office that same government is afraid to hold by-elections which by the laws of the province are due, because they are convinced that defeat is awaiting them.

Mr. HANSON: Who is going to defeat them?

Mr. MacINNIS: They, themselves, will be the cause of their defeat, coupled with the activities of the party in British Columbia that had the largest vote at the last election. My hon. friend knows which party that was. If he will read the Liberal organ of the city of Vancouver he will learn who is going to defeat the government. Let me read from the Vancouver Sun an editorial of recent date:

With five Liberal members British Columbia will have an audible voice in the new Liberal government—

That is, the Liberal government in Ottawa—

—but that voice will not shut out the fact that more than 89,000 people voted in anger and protest against their own interests for the socialists. Protest against what? Protest against Premier T. D. Pattullo who was returned to office on a disregarded "work and wages" program, and has since held his office under flagrant false pretences.

That is not a Cooperative Commonwealth publication. It is a Liberal paper supporting a Liberal government in the province of British Columbia.

As I listened last night to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) complaining about the tactics used against him in the province of Quebec my sympathy went out to him, because the same tactics were used in the province of British Columbia. In that province however it was not the Conservative party but the party to which the minister belongs which stooped to those unworthy actions. It was the Liberal party that stooped to anything. Nothing was too dirty; nothing was too mean; nothing was too sordid if it would bring them votes. When the minister is complaining about the tactics of the Conservative party in Quebec let him try to improve the tactics of the Liberal party in British Columbia, and we may get somewhere.

Mr. HANSON: Where did the Liberal party in British Columbia resort to the tactics to which the hon. member has referred? I should like to know that.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member lives in the far north; I believe he lives in the city of Prince Rupert, or somewhere in that vicinity, and at a point very difficult to reach and very difficult to get away from. Possibly the news has not yet reached Prince Rupert, but I have no doubt it will reach that point in due time. We are told the Minister of Justice was accused of being a communist and tearing down the steeples and walking on the crucifixes; I say to him that the very same accusations were made in the city of Vancouver. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) who is not now in his seat was the saviour—that is, outside of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) —the man who saved the country single-handed from the communists. He arrived here on a margin of six votes. His efforts reminded me of those of Horatius at the bridge. But this time while there was one other man who would hold the bridge with the hon. member, they could not find three. However that did not prevent the Liberal party from helping the communists in Vancouver East. I am told that the communist candidate in Vancouver East did not put in an account of his election expenses, and I understand his reason for refraining was, that the Liberal party had provided the funds and that it was up to them to put in the expense account.

Quebec is not the only province in Canada where racial questions are raised. A few days ago our representative at Geneva said he was glad to say that we did not have any minority problems in Canada. That is not true. We do have racial and minority questions. An article appearing in the Canadian Forum of December, 1935, and written by Professor H. F. Angus of the university of British Columbia is in point. So far as I know Professor Angus is not a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I believe, that he is a member of or adheres to the Liberal party. In any case I know he went into the province of Alberta either for or with the Liberal party in an attempt to stem the tide of Social Credit during the provincial election campaign. The article is headed Liberalism Stoops to Conquer. Although I am not going to weary the house with quotations, because I shall have something further to say on this point at another time, I shall quote what were indicated in British Columbia as being Liberal policies, and will ask the Liberal government here in Ottawa if they approve of what I shall indicate, and if they believe that that kind of thing is going to improve Canada's relations with the rest of the world. The article headed Liberalism Stoops to Conquer is in part as follows:

The sophisticated view that political parties are cynical conspiracies to capture or retain political power received some confirmation from the action of the Liberal candidates in British Columbia, who published large advertisements informing the electors that there were 50,000 Asiatics in the province and that the C.C.F. was pledged to extend the franchise to them. "A vote for any C.C.F. candidate is a vote to give the Chinaman and the Japanese the same voting right that you have."

If a Chinaman or Japanese is a Canadian citizen, born in Canada, is it British justice or is it Liberalism that he be denied the same rights as we have, simply because the colour of his skin or the slant of his eyes may be different?

Mr. HANSON: Do you mean that Chinese from the orient should have the same rights as whites in Canada?

Mr. MacINNIS: Absolutely—and not only Chinese and Japanese, but every man and woman to whom we extend the rights of citizenship. What do rights of citizenship mean if they do not imply the right to take part in the government of the country? These people are paying federal taxes, provincial taxes and municipal taxes. They were born and are living in Canada. They have fought for this country, and I believe it is the British viewpoint that regardless of the colour of their skin or who their forebears or ancestors were they should be treated in Canada the same as every other Canadian citizen. But more of that later on.

Mr. HANSON: Would my hon. friend be in favour of oriental immigration to Canada?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not the question now. I have a resolution on the order paper dealing with that, and I shall discuss it then. But I am speaking now of the tactics of the Liberal party in raising racial prejudices in the province of British Columbia. When my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who I believe is a good democrat in the best sense of the term, and believes I think in British justice and fair play, complains of the tactics of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, he should see to it that his own friends are not following the same kind of tactics in British Columbia or any other province. I quote again from the Liberal campaign advertisements:

> A vote for any C.C.F. candidate is a vote to give the Chinaman and the Japanese the same voting right that you have.

The article goes on:

> Against this enormity the Liberals undertook to protect the state.

Here is another quotation from the Liberal campaign literature:

> A vote for the Liberal candidate in your riding is a vote against oriental enfranchisement. The Liberal party is opposed to giving the orientals the vote.

Note that, sir—the Liberal party is opposed to giving the orientals the vote. That is the Liberal party sitting to-day on the other side of this house and up in the corner to your left, Mr. Speaker; the Liberal party which is the government of Canada at the moment. What a wonderful help such a statement will be in their negotiations with Japan to improve trade relations between the two countries.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Thursday, February 13, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Indian Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. CRERAR: The amendments suggested to the Indian Act are all of a minor character, as I recall them now; it is some little time since I have seen them. They relate to the disposal of the property of an Indian on a reserve to someone off the reserve; to the manner in which the council meetings of the Indians may be held and the giving of a casting vote to the presiding officer; and there are also some regulations to control what is termed a potlatch that still exists on one reserve on Vancouver island. As I have said the amendments are more or less minor in character and a fuller explanation will be given when the second reading is moved.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

DISMISSAL OF CERTAIN HOUSE OF COMMONS EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I beg to rise to a question of privilege. I am informed that this morning at ten o'clock, and thereafter, a number of employees of the House of Commons were called into the office of the sergeant-at-arms and summarily dismissed, without cause being alleged or given. In some cases this means a very great hardship. I wrote to the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) this morning as follows:

> I regret to have to inform you that I propose raising the question of the privileges of the House of Commons in connection with the dismissal this morning, under instructions from the Speaker, of a number of men who have been employed in the house for some years past.

Some of those persons thus dismissed have been employed for many years, some for six years or thereabouts and others for lesser periods of time. I am not discussing their fitness for their positions, because, as I shall point out presently, if they have been guilty of misconduct or if there is any charge against them, that charge must be investigated. If it is found warranted by the facts, then, of course, the statute provides that the Speaker may dismiss them.

The words with which I opened my observations are words which I have read in an address made by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this house on Tuesday, February 28, 1888. I mention that because later he presented a motion to the house, to which I referred the other day. A debate ensued and definite action was taken by the house, holding that the translators came within the ordinary rule and were not exempt from the provisions of the statute. This is the privilege of this house that I want to bring to the attention of this chamber: Our statute provides that the Speaker of this house shall exercise certain powers only under certain conditions. Section 21 of chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, which in terms is the same as the statute referred to by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1888, reads as follows:

> If any complaint or representation is at any time made to the Speaker for the time being of the misconduct or unfitness of any clerk, officer, messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons, the Speaker may cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person.
> 2. If thereupon it appears to the Speaker that such person has been guilty of misconduct, or is unfit to hold his situation, the Speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger or other person has been appointed by the crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the governor general, and, if he has not been appointed by the crown, suspend or remove him.

In other words no man serving this House of Commons is to be dismissed by the Speaker until he has been given notice of the misconduct charged against him and has had an opportunity to give his defence, and then only after action is taken in the manner indicated by the statute. Therefore there has been a clear breach of the privileges of the House of Commons.

There is the statute. This morning, without notice as to the cause, men were called into the office of the sergeant-at-arms and told that their services were ended. The Speaker is bound by the statute; the sergeant-at-arms, carrying out the directions of the Speaker, also is bound by the statute. Some of these men were returned men; one of them has six children and his wife was ill all summer. He is dismissed without notice, just told to go and check out. Obviously, not having had an opportunity to ascertain the fact because I could not ask either the sergeant-at-arms or the Speaker with relation to it, all I can say is that I was told on what I regard as good authority that a large number of these men have been thus dismissed from their positions, in this cold, winter weather, without warning, except as I understand, that notice was sent by one of the members of this house, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) some days ago that they were engaged only from day to day. But he was not the Speaker of this house at that time and I think it is quite clear that he had no authority to send any such notice.

In the case to which I referred, in 1888, the matter was discussed at great length. There seemed to be no doubt in the mind of anyone that an employee of this house could not be dismissed unless he had a chance to be heard, unless he had notice what his fault was. In that case Mr., later Sir Adolphe Chapleau, wrote a letter to the Speaker making his complaints against the individuals in question; the Speaker at once passed it on to them and they filed their defence; on the strength of that the matter was then sent by the Speaker to the committee on debates, and subsequently it apparently reached the committee on privileges and was dealt with. This is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said as to the method that was adopted:

> In fact the complaint which was made against them is not in reference to their services as officers of this house, but the charge is that they went out of their proper sphere of action and grossly insulted some members of this house. The charge was brought forward by my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, in a letter dated the 22nd May, 1887.

I will not read that because it is not pertinent to what I have to say:

> Upon receipt of these complaints, you, sir, very properly referred them to the officers themselves for their answer. They sent you their answers, and you afterwards sent the whole correspondence to the chairman of the debates committee. The debates committee investigated the matter and came to the conclusion that it had better be left in your hands to be dealt with. They reported to the house, but that report never was taken up, it never was even moved in the house. It must be regretted that this report was not considered by the house, because then the whole matter could have been dealt with by the house upon its merits, and the house could have determined at once whether these gentlemen had been guilty of such an offence as warranted their dismissal.

I am not going to do more than point out that in all the discussion that took place there seemed to be no doubt that the provisions of the statute in any event must be observed, that complaint must be made and when the complaint is made opportunity should be given to the person charged to defend himself, and thereafter the action mentioned in the statute may be taken.

Now, sir, I bring to your attention the fact that one of the privileges of this house has thus been violated. It was regarded by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by all those who spoke in the house then as a matter of first rate importance, not as something trifling and insignificant. That men could be dismissed without notice and without cause assigned seemed to be something that every member of the house regarded as impossible because of the statute—it was not then chapter 145, but I have taken the trouble to have it compared, and that statute still governs this house. How are we to deal with it? Obviously the proper course is indicated by the action taken by the House of Commons in 1888. And it must have been before this house since—I have not had time to look it up—because I observe this copy of Hansard is underlined with pen and pencil by some persons who evidently have been giving it careful consideration in years long since past—

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the question what was done in 1930 does not in any sense enter into this.

Mr. DUNNING: It certainly does.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot possibly.

Mr. DUNNING: We shall see.

Mr. BENNETT: I admit the hon. gentleman is right in saying he can call up his majority—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No one said that.

Mr. BENNETT: No one has raised the question of this statute in this house since I have been in it. I confess I was not, until I looked into it, aware of the fact that the provisions of the statute were as they are.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As the right hon. gentleman says they are.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not what I say the statute is; I am reading it. In order that there may be no misapprehension I again direct attention to section 21 of chapter 145, which says:

> If any complaint or representation is at any time made to the Speaker for the time being of the misconduct or unfitness of any clerk, officer, messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons, the Speaker may cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person.
> 2. If thereupon it appears to the Speaker that such person has been guilty of misconduct, or is unfit to hold his situation, the Speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger or other person has been appointed by the crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the govenor general, and, if he has not been appointed by the crown, suspend or remove him.

That is the relevant section of the act which governs this House of Commons, and any open and, shall I say, deliberate violation of it constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons.

Now I ask, What is to be done about it? In the case to which I have referred the Speaker said that the papers would be laid upon the table to-morrow. It seems to me that under the circumstances is all we can reasonably hope to have done. The matter then ended. But when Sir Wilfrid had brought the question to the attention of the house and said he proposed to have it discussed, the Speaker said that the papers would be laid upon the table, and I later observe that his language was this: "The papers will be brought down to-morrow." And on March 1:

> Mr. Speaker laid before the house certain letters, affidavits and other papers relating to the dismissal of Messrs. A. E. Poirier, E. Tremblay and R. Tremblay, who were up to a recent period employed as French translators of the official debates of the house.

It may be a matter of importance to the house in considering its privileges to realize that these gentlemen were not dismissed in that session of 1887, but in the early part of the session of 1888.

I merely suggest that, having regard to the terms of the statute, it is the duty of the Speaker to lay before this house at the next convenient session, it may be to-morrow or Monday, all the papers with respect to the dismisssal of any employees of this house in accordance with the practice adopted in the construction placed by the house upon the statute that governs our deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my right hon. friend has just said he was kind enough to send me a communication at noon to-day mentioning that he intended to bring up in the house this afternoon the question of the dismissal of some employees of the house, which in his opinion constituted a breach of the privileges of the house. In support of his contention that there has been such a breach of the privileges of the house, my right hon. friend has read section 21 of chapter 145 of the House of Commons Act:

> If any complaint or representation is at any time made to the Speaker for the time being of the misconduct or unfitness of any clerk, officer, messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons, the Speaker may cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person.

2. If thereupon it appears to the Speaker that such person has been guilty of misconduct, or is unfit to hold his situation, the Speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger or other person has been appointed by the crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the governor general, and, if he has not been appointed by the crown, suspend or remove him.

May I draw the attention of my right hon. friend and of the house generally to a distinction which I believe that section was intended to make? It distinguishes between employees who constitute the permanent organization of the House of Commons and its temporary employees. In the organization of this house for the purpose of enabling it to carry on its business there is a distinction to be drawn between the permanent organization that continues year in and year out, and the additional organization that is necessary for carrying on the business of individual sessions. Hon. members will realize that, regardless of periods of vacation and the like, it is essential that there be a permanent staff here, and that, in connection with many matters that affect the House of Commons, there are officers who must be regarded as permanent officials of the House of Commons. With respect to dismissals that have taken place to-day or yesterday, I am informed that there has been no dismissal whatever of any member of the permanent organization of the House of Commons. As I say, there is a second group of clerks, messengers and others, who are appointed for the duration of the session. That group of temporary, as distinguished from permanent employees, includes stenographers, messengers, pages, some charmen that are known as all-year charmen. A clear distinction has always been drawn between the two, one which in the past has governed the actions of the Speaker in dealing with members of the staff of the House of Commons.

My right hon. friend did not read the next section. I do not think he avoided doing so intentionally, but I submit it helps to bring out the meaning of the act. It is as follows:

The Clerk of the House of Commons shall subscribe and take before the Speaker the oath of allegiance, and all other officers, clerks and messengers of the House of Commons shall subscribe and take before the Clerk of the House of Commons the oath of allegiance.

2. The Clerk of the House of Commons shall keep a register of all such oaths.

I asked the clerk to have in the house this afternoon a record of the registration of oaths of persons included under section 22. The record is at present on the table of the house. I am advised that not a single one of these persons whose names are there recorded has been dismissed.

I am further advised, and I believe correctly, that in other sessions and other parliaments it has not been customary to have oaths of allegiance of temporary employees, of the class I have mentioned, taken before the clerk. The practice at the present time in that particular is exactly the same as it has been for some years past.

My right hon. friend referred to some action taken in 1888; at that time I believe the reference was to clerks whose position was that of permanent translators. They were permanent employees, as are the translators serving at the present time. If, on the part of His Honour the Speaker, there had been a dismissal of any persons belonging to the permanent organization, I think it would have been His Honour's duty to meet the obligation placed upon him by the statute. But clearly it could never have been the intention of the statute that the Speaker should report to the governor in council the suspension of every charman or charwoman, or the circumstances with respect to every page boy against whom complaint might be laid, or with respect to other employees performing temporary duties during the period of a session. I make that clear because I believe His Honour the Speaker has been most desirous of meeting every obligation placed upon him by statute, and has been anxious in no way to impinge upon the privileges of the house.

I now come to the question as to what is best to do. I thought my right hon. friend, when speaking a few days ago, was quite frank in stating that he would not for a moment be hypocritical enough to say that when there was a change of government all temporary employees should be retained by the incoming administration. He knew very well that almost immediately after he took office in 1930 there began to be a change in the personnel of the temporary employees of the House of Commons. I must say that I think it was perfectly reasonable that up to a certain point such a change should have been made. A Liberal government had been in office for several years. As a result a large number of pages, messengers, stenographers and all-year-round char people had been employed under the previous administration. In 1930 my right hon. friend had a large following in the House of Commons, and I must say that, having regard to the personal relationships of this class of employee with hon. members, he was quite right in feeling that there must be some recognition taken of the change of the personnel in the House of Commons, and that stenographers, messengers, pages and the like should be selected with some regard to political representation in the house itself. However, what was in his mind in that particular, I cannot say. It is true, certainly, that so far as the present administration is concerned, we would take the view, speaking generally, that an effort should be made to have the political complexion of temporary employees correspond in a general way with the political complexion of the House of Commons itself. I think my right hon. friend and members of his party should have a right to feel an absolute confidence in the persons they may have working with them as stenographers, for example, and that hon. members in other parts of the house and belonging to other groups should have equal confidence in those who are performing sessional services for them. Certainly members of the administration and their following should have that confidence. I do not think any hon. member would feel that the privileges of the house were in any way being infringed if observance along those lines were taken in the employment of temporary clerks and others for sessional purposes. Indeed, if that were not done, I can see where there might be considerable embarrassment to members generally.

My right hon. friend has inquired as to the best course to pursue. This is a difficult stage of the session at which finally to determine some of these matters. If the committees of the house were constituted, I would suggest that, immediately, there be a reference to the committee on privileges with respect to what is or should be the proper procedure to follow regarding the retention and dismissal of employees of the House of Commons when a change of government has taken place. The reference could be extended, if desired, to include the practice followed in past years. The inquiry could serve to furnish guidance not only to the administration holding office but also to administrations which may follow in subsequent years. The committees of the house, however, have not yet been constituted.

There is this further embarrassing feature, that as yet the house has not appointed a deputy speaker. As a result, His Honour the Speaker is in the embarrassing position of having to preside over a discussion which may take place between my right hon. friend and myself or between hon. members on this side of the house and hon. members opposite relating to his own action in this matter. I should think it most unfortunate if His Honour were obliged to preside over a debate or discussion of the kind. If a deputy speaker had been appointed, I would suggest that the deputy speaker take the chair and permit debate of any length necessary.

Having given the matter some thought, I would suggest to my right hon. friend and hon. members—and I hope they will concur, that, when the house is properly organized, the different committees constituted, and the deputy speaker appointed, a motion might be made to refer to the committee on privileges the question as to the right and proper procedure to be adopted with respect to the retention or dismissal of employees of the House of Commons. I would expect that on that committee hon. members from all parts of the house would have representation. A report from the committee might then be made to the house, at which time we might have such discussion as may be necessary thereon. In considering the matter I think it would be proper for the committee to consider fully what was done after the change of government in 1930 and also all that has been done since the change of government last year. I believe that would be the most effective way of dealing with the matter, and one which would best serve to preserve the privileges of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I must entirely disagree with the construction placed by the right hon. gentleman on sections 21 and 22 of chapter 145 of our statutes. If he had been trained perhaps in the practice of the law as he has been in the theory, he would have observed that section 22 does not apply to other than officers, clerks and messengers of the house. They must take the oath of allegiance. Section 21, to which I have referred, refers to the following persons: Clerk, officer, messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons. The distinction is so clear that it is not necessary to do more than direct attention to it to see what the obvious inference is.

But further, the right hon. gentleman has failed to observe that it is with respect to those officials appointed by the crown that the report is made to the governor general. Page boys, the char service, persons appointed for the session, stenographers—all these come within the powers specially granted by the statute to the Speaker himself, it being provided that if they are appointed by the crown the Speaker may himself suspend or remove them if they are guilty of misconduct, and if appointed by him he may suspend or dismiss them after inquiry. No one in this house has suggested at any time, so far as I know, that what is called the sessional staff, stenographers, messengers or page boys, and so forth, should not be employed by the government under such conditions as the government of the day may think desirable, exercising either a broad and generous attitude or a narrow partisan attitude towards the matter, as may be thought desirable. I said the other day that I am not questioning that that has been done and will continue to be done, I suppose, long after we have vanished from the scene. But the point at the moment is that the statute makes provision as to how those who are permanent shall be dealt with. The word "permanent" has two meanings. In the civil service the word "permanent" means one who comes under the civil service establishment, and cannot be removed from office except for cause. The temporary staff is a staff that does not fall within that category. But those who were dismissed this morning and yesterday were, many of them, men who had been here for years and who, if they were not removed, would continue to be here during the rest of their lives. One of them came here I believe in November, 1930, and has been here ever since. Another has been here since 1931, and there are some in exactly the same position in the char service who were appointed by my right hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes, in exactly the same position. That is, they were appointed by the government of the day, and they went on and are going on to-day, to-morrow and the next day. Those I refer to in the char service and messenger service, and doorkeepers, have been drawing I believe, some of them, $60 for two weeks' work, others lesser amounts, and some have been paid by the day a certain sum for six days' work in the week.

There is a clear distinction between the permanent staff of this house and those who come here for sessional duties. I agree with the right hon. gentleman that stenographers are in the latter class; they are sessional employees only. That is also true of the page boys and of many other employees of the house. But there is a year to year service to which the right hon. gentleman has referred in which the employees will go on from now until they cease by death or otherwise to carry on their duties, unless they are removed by the Speaker. The only point I am making is that they have a right to know why they are removed. The statute says so. The distinction is made clear between the two classes.

I do agree with the right hon. gentleman that it is not perhaps in the interests of the position that parliament should occupy that we should discuss the action of the Speaker at this moment, because we have not the papers before us. In 1888, however, the Speaker did table the papers, and I suggest that the papers should be tabled to-morrow. The right hon. gentleman is in error in assuming that the matter could not be dealt with before the committees are appointed because as a matter of fact, that is exactly what happened in 1888. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier brought the matter to the attention of the house the standing committees had not been appointed; in fact, the day before, Sir John Macdonald had made his motion that a select committee be named for the purpose of striking the standing committees. So the house was in exactly the position then as it is now; the committees had not been set up.

But I think what the right hon. gentleman has said about the method of dealing with the matter is not unsound, and if the Speaker will table the papers, which means that he will table, (a) the notices of dismissal that he had sent out by the sergeant-at-arms before the Speaker assumed office, and, (b) the notices that were sent out yesterday as to the dismissal of those who have been dismissed, with their names and the positions they occupied, I think that every end will be served. There are two things to keep in mind: first, that no injustice be done to people who have been serving this country in the various capacities I have named, and, secondly, that the privileges of parliament as provided by statute must not be, shall I say, violated.

If the Speaker will file the papers as the Speaker did in 1888, I think the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman that in due season we can name a committee to deal with the matter will be entirely satisfactory; for then we shall have before us, not information which may or may not be entirely accurate—and as I said at the outset I am not undertaking to guarantee that the information I have received is accurate, although I believe it to be accurate, that men have been dismissed; but we shall have the facts before us.

The right hon. gentleman says that certain people have not taken the oath of allegiance. I think it would be very strange if they had, because the statute names only three classes, the clerk, the messengers and the other class I named.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Officers.

Mr. DUNNING: And messengers.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, messengers, as I mentioned. But section 21 dealing with dismissals covers all those who are attendant on the House of Commons, meaning, I take it, all those who go on from year to year. The test would be this: How many of those men dismissed to-day or yesterday would have remained on had it not been for a change of administration? Were any of them guilty of misconduct? Were they proper persons to discharge the duties which they were fulfilling? —one a doorkeeper, another a charman, and so on. If the answers to these questions are satisfactorily given I think the matter can be readily disposed of. I do not think the position taken by the right hon. gentleman is an unfair one, and if as I say the Speaker will follow the practice that was followed by the Speaker in 1888—he was a Conservative Speaker—Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not at that time a Conservative, however much he may have been in his later days—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was never a Tory.

Mr. BENNETT: Then later we can deal with the matter in the light of the documents we shall have before us, and know what charges, if any, have been made against the persons who have been dismissed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to add anything further to the discussion, nor for that matter to shut it off in any way. I hope hon. members will feel free to express their minds on this question, but I would like to point out to the house that, if the house will follow the course that I suggest, we may avoid the kind of difficulty that I see we are getting into. My right hon. friend was out of order when he spoke the second time, and I am out of order now.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no, not on a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am out of order now. It is impossible to have the question settled except by reference to His Honour the Speaker. If His Honour were appealed to in regard to my right hon. friend being out of order, my right hon. friend might not view the ruling in the same light as other hon. members of the house. I do think that what I have suggested is the best way of dealing with this matter. It is the fair, the open and aboveboard method to pursue, not only as a guide to the house during this parliament but the best way to be of service as well to subsequent parliaments.

As to the laying of any papers on the table, I feel that a motion is required for that purpose which would give hon. members the opportunity of amending what is proposed by adding to, or subtracting from the motion or accepting it as presented. All papers that are necessary and all information that is desired can be placed before the committee on privileges under the reference that will be made. If the reference is not broad enough when it is submitted by the administration, and if it appeals to the house as being desirable to make it any broader, I give every assurance that the desires of the house will be acceded to.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be necessary for me to move for papers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend may move for papers, but—

Mr. BENNETT: Quite the opposite course was taken under Sir Wilfrid.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will have to add to his motion the request that all papers, including papers covering dismissals made at the time my right hon. friend was in office, shall be brought down and tabled at the same time.

Mr. BENNETT: Sir Wilfrid said that that was entirely beside the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend need not think that anything that affects his administration is going to be beside this question, because what has been done up to the present does not begin to touch what my right hon. friend did in this regard when he was in office. If I can, I want to avoid recriminations of any kind over these matters. I am taking a step which I think will appeal to all reasonable members of the House of Commons.

Mr. LENNARD: I should like that information to include the number of ex-service men who have been dismissed since the beginning of this session.

OLYMPIC GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the head of the government, an old cricketer and sportsman. This relates to a series of articles which have appeared in the papers. There has been some very bad advertising of Canada at the Olympic games by a Mr. Gilroy who says he is a representative of the government of Canada and will withdraw his team if he does not get his way there. I should like to quote shortly from the headlines in this morning's Ottawa Journal, as follows:

Canada Ready Quit Olympic Hockey Games
Claim Playoff System Will Put Team at Disadvantage
New Bombshell Hits Tournament
Maple Leaf Squad Will Withdraw Unless Rule is Rescinded

Some weeks ago this gentleman referred to the sportsmen of England in a manner far from complimentary saying that this sport in England was a "racket." His late majesty was the greatest sportsman in the world and this row comes at a bad time and shows poor judgment in a time of mourning. This government has appropriated $10,000 for these games and if they are to cause bad relations internationally, if they are to be bad advertising for Canada, I think something should be done. I ask the head of the government to have an investigation made of this matter. There are rows before they leave, rows when they get over there and there will be probably rows when they come back, after these games are over.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to come to the point and put his question.

Mr. CHURCH: There was no need of your interruption, Mr. Speaker. I had to lay a foundation for the question. I think something should be done to stop this bad advertising. With the unsettled state of Europe these Olympic games as conducted create bad international feeling. The reference of Mr. Gilroy about British sport was in bad taste at a time of mourning for his late majesty, and bad advertising for Canada. These votes should be confined to British empire games.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to look up Hansard before I can give my hon. friend an accurate answer. As I understand him, he is taking exception to someone at the Olympic games claiming to be a representative of Canada. People all over the world are only too ready to be that, and many are fond of expressing themselves in those terms. May I say to my hon. friend that if the one he has referred to is a representative of the government, he must have been so appointed by the previous administration. I think it is very doubtful that anyone participating in the Olympic games is a representative of the government of this country. Whether it is wise to vote money for the purpose of these games, or how such money should be voted, are matters that will come up for consideration should a like estimate be again before us. Such money as has been appropriated for the purpose mentioned by my hon. friend was appropriated before the present administration came into office and was recommended by the government of which he was a supporter.

Mr. CHURCH: The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has pacified Europe; he ought to be able to pacify the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association.

PENITENTIARIES COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he expects to be able to announce the personnel of the royal commission which he purposes setting up to make an investigation and study of penal affairs.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I believe I shall be able to announce the personnel of that commission in a very few days.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. A. G. Slaght for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned yesterday evening at six o'clock I was referring to some of the tactics employed by the Liberal party in British Columbia during the election campaign. I had not intended to bring this matter to the attention of the house until I heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) complain about what had been done in Quebec. I then came to the conclusion that if it was a bad thing for Conservatives to appeal to racial and religious prejudices in the province of Quebec, it was an equally bad thing for Liberals to do the same thing in the province of British Columbia, and consequently it ought to be brought to the attention of the house. In that connection I was quoting from an article by Professor H. F. Angus of the university of British Columbia which appeared in the Canadian Forum. I shall not dwell on that subject much longer, but I should like to make one short quotation from this article. Professor Angus in this article stated two suppositions upon which it was possible to explain this appeal to race prejudice, and he then stated:

> If this is the explanation of the novel trend of liberalism, it is possible to argue that it was justified by results from the standpoint of the party. For Mr. King's right bower—

He was referring to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie)— > —was elected by a majority narrow enough to be interpreted as consisting of people who have morbid sensibilities where orientals are concerned. And yet, with all respect for the winning card, one may grudge the price that was paid.

I agree with that statement. If we cannot win elections, if we cannot make our voices heard in this country without appealing to racial and religious prejudices, then the price is too great as far as I am concerned.

I wish to make a few references to the speech from the throne. It does not contain a great deal that one can deal with definitely at this time, and I would say that if that large section of the electorate that voted for the Liberal candidates at the last election can find in the speech from the throne any justification for their vote, then they are not asking for very much.

The speech tells us something which of course we knew already—that unemployment continues to be Canada's most urgent problem. We all agree with that; but it gives no indication whatever of any immediate, or for that matter prospective, solution of that problem. Referring to the unemployment relief camps, I am glad that the government is taking steps to transfer them from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Labour. I do not know that it will make any great difference, though it may do away with any suggestion of the militarization of the camps. What the men in the camps are complaining about is not so much that the camps are under this or that department, as that they are compelled to stay in these camps without any hope for the future; and merely transferring the camps to the Department of Labour will not obviate that objection.

I was wondering why the government did not put the unemployment relief camps under the Minister of Finance rather than under the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour is a university man, and as far as I know he has had no experience in dealing with the unemployed. I understand, however, that the Minister of Finance has been in charge of a camp for unemployed at Lucerne, Quebec, for the last five years, and because of that he would possibly be the person best fitted to take care of unemployment. There might be this difficulty, however, that if those with whom he would be dealing under the new conditions received the same consideration from society as those with whom he has come in contact during the last five years, they would not be satisfied to go back to the old conditions under which they have lived during these years.

The other morning in my mail I received two communications, and it was these that suggested to me the fitness of the Minister of Finance to look after the unemployed. The first communication was a letter from an old gentleman in the interior of Brtitish Columbia. His shaky handwriting was an indication of his age. He was complaining of having to live on $9 a month, which he was receiving in relief, and he referred to the items of diet on which he had to subsist—flour, rice, bacon and beans, a few prunes and tea and coffee. In the same mail I received the magazine of the Seigniory Club, a beautifully got up little publication, the best quality paper, a fine design on the cover, photographic illustrations of the very best; and I read in that magazine the qualifications for membership in the club. "Subject to social and racial restrictions"—this will appeal to my friends from British Columbia—membership in the club can be had, and it carries with it the privilege of hunting and fishing; whereas membership in other clubs that I have been referring to, the unemployment camps, carries with it the privilege of working for twenty cents a day. There is some difference. Life membership in the Seigniory Club costs only $2,000, the ordinary membership being $250 for initiation and $125 annually.

I looked up the relief allowance in Vancouver and this is what I found. If you take the total in relief allowed for a man and wife for one year, for food, clothing and shelter, at the end of the year they will have received $1 short of the amount necessary to buy a year's membership in the Seigniory club. A little further on in the same magazine I have mentioned I read the following:

> Nature in the raw this winter in the Seigniory Club forest will be a little less raw than usual, thanks to the distribution of several hundred pounds of bean and molasses cakes. The young deer get their proper number of vitamins from these, and then when normal feed has grown scarce and the snow is so deep they cannot labour through it, the guides and rangers cut brush and lay it on the trail so they can get it without difficulty.

The man who wrote to me about the difficulty of carrying on on $9 a month pointed out that he was not allowed any sugar. There was no thought taken of vitamins as far as he was concerned, and there is very little thought taken for the 1,200,000 people who are on relief in Canada at the present time—no thought as to whether or not they have the proper amount of vitamins. It is much better to be a deer in the forest of the Seigniory Club than a Canadian on relief in this country, because the one receives some consideration while the other gets very little.

I do not think I can be accused of wrongly interpreting the policy of the government when I say that its hope of bringing about an improvement in Canadian conditions is based largely on the extension of our foreign trade. The following reference in the speech from the throne leads me to that conclusion:

> Every effort will be made to close the camps altogether at as early a date as expanding employment opportunities permit.

It seems to me that if the men in the relief camps are to remain there until expanding production is brought about by an extension of foreign trade, their hope of getting away from the camps in the near future, or indeed in the distant future, is very remote.

Having touched on the question of trade, I will now take such little time as is left to me to deal further with that question, a question about which I believe there is a great deal of confusion at the present time. I am going to make a statement that to many members of this house may seem strange. I am not only going to make that statement; I also think I can prove it. The statement is this: Under our present capitalist system an extension of trade, or increased trade, will ultimately lead to a reduction in trade. That may seem a contradiction, but capitalism is full of contradictions, and, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the other day, these contradictions are becoming very apparent at the present time.

If we look over the history of the past hundred years, the development of trade and commerce, we find that there is hardly a nation on earth that has not increased its trade during that time. Indeed the last hundred years has been an era of universal trade expansion, and it goes without saying that this trade expansion has been universally beneficial. The question may be asked as to why this trade expansion cannot continue indefinitely. We might as well ask why a man cannot continue to grow in stature after he has reached maturity. Trade cannot continue to increase because through the extension of trade every country has become provided with the means that will make it more and more self sufficient. Whether or not there is a definite purpose there is a definite result which follows the trade expansion of the last hundred years; as I said a moment ago the effect of that has been to make the nations of the world more and more self sufficient in the matter of production. Following that I may say that what we are pleased to term "economic nationalism" is just as natural in the development of the nations of the world to-day as stiff joints are in old men. It is merely an effort on the part of the nations of the world, in an era of declining trade, to protect themselves, and whether we like it or not it will go on until we change our system of production and distribution.

Now let me give you an example of the development of trade, trade as we know it to-day, trade under the capitalist system, and when we refer to the capitalist system we have in mind that period beginning with the use of motive power to drive machinery. That form of production was first used in Great Britain towards the end of the eighteenth century, and I think it is correct to say that the textile industry was the first industry to be highly developed under the new method. That industry in Great Britain increased immensely from 1776 to 1913. We find that in the latter year the exports of British cotton reached the very large total of 7,075,000,000 yards. Sixteen years later, however, in 1929, British exports of cotton goods shrank to 3,765,000,000 yards, a decrease of 47 per cent. Coming down a little later, to 1933, we find the decrease still going on, with the exports of that year not up to the three billion yard mark.

What is the reason for this shrinkage in British exports of cotton goods? There is only one answer; it is that Great Britain not only exported cotton goods during that period; she also exported the machinery used to manufacture cotton goods, and that machinery was sent to those countries which formerly bought British cotton goods. As a result these countries are now able to manufacture their own cotton goods to supply their own markets. More than that, they are now competitors with Great Britain for a share of the foreign market still available, and this foreign market will continue to diminish—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I think his time is up.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will finish this sentence, with the consent of the chair. This foreign market will continue to diminish as each country in turn becomes equipped to supply its own needs. No more need be said except that what has happened in regard to cotton has happened in regard to a great many other things as well.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested by the social credit party, meeting in caucus, that I make the following statement, which correctly expresses the position we take with regard to the speech from the throne:

> We believe the time for cooperation has come, and we are supporting the motion because the speech from the throne indicates many great reforms, although it does not contain, in our estimation, an adequate and permanent solution to our economic ills.

I have a few things in mind which I feel should be said at this time. I conceive parliament to be a committee of citizens appointed and paid by the people to transact public business and promote and safeguard the welfare of the people of this country. If parliament continues to do that it merits the support of the electorate. When it ceases to do that it should be removed from office with the same unconcern as that with which a farmer would scrap a rusty plough that had ceased to serve.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the supreme task confronting this parliament and this country at the present time is the winning of industrial democracy. As a member of the Anglo-Saxon race I am glad that after a thousand years of struggle for political democracy we are in a far happier position than some of the other nations of the world. But political democracy, unless it is accompanied by industrial democracy—which means the right of all the people to share in the abundance of the earth—is a mere shell, formless and meaningless.

I want to refer to the passing of His Majesty King George V; I want to refer to the man and his identification of himself with human problems. My leader, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) quoted the other day these words from his late majesty's address on the occasion of the imperial economic conference in London in 1932:

> It cannot be beyond the power of man so to use the vast resources of the world as to ensure the material progress of civilization.

You will notice that he did not say, to ensure the progress of the Bank of England, or the Bank of Montreal; he said "civilization."

> No diminution in these resources has taken place. On the contrary, discovery, invention and organization have multiplied their possibilities to such an extent that abundance of production has itself created new problems.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, what manner of man is this who, while a king, can yet espouse the cause of the common people throughout the world? I thought during the days of official mourning here the king would expect something more than black draperies and expressions of sorrow; he would expect the people of his empire to remember his words and to act upon them. And it may be—who can tell—that somewhere within the shoreless vast of this universe he may be looking down upon us now from the luminous slopes of the stars, saying to us, in the words that the psalmist might have used, How long, O Lord, will men continue to pay lip homage and forget humanity; humanity and its struggle forward to a higher plane, a state of peace?

I wish to say a word or two about the situation confronting this parliament, indeed confronting all the peoples of the world. George Bernard Shaw in one of his recent plays says that the other planets use this world for a lunatic asylum. Thousands of years ago our ancestors, who lived precariously on the thin edge of starvation, often died because there was not enought to eat. If we could by some process of reincarnation bring back to this vale of tears some of those luckless progenitors of ours and let them see the spectacle of millions of men and women cold, hungry and miserable in the presence of huge piles of food and clothing, what conclusion could they reach other than that we are all crazy? The difference, I suppose he would say, is this, that in the ordinary lunatic asylum the inmates only are supposed to be crazy, but in this one the keepers as well are crazy.

I think there is a general recognition of the fact that the remedies proposed at the present time are not only unworkable, but, to use the words of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, leader of the Conservative party in the Senate, are archaic palliatives. I will quote Mr. Meighen's own words:

> But the naked and unassailable truth, which only stupidity can prevent anyone from seeing, is that if the United States were to be brought back to-morrow to the peak production of 1929, a production which the world utterly failed to consume or to purchase, there would remain in that country no fewer than six and probably eight millions of unemployed, representing virtually one-third of its whole earning population. What is true there is true in other lands, but the enigma is greater and perhaps the lesson ought to be clearer when one looks upon the situation as a phenomenon of the United States. That is essentially an immensely wealthy country, the greatest self contained country in the world. If it were a planet it would not need to trade with any other planet in order to multiply the wealth of man. It produces either all that mankind needs or effective substitutes therefor, and if it could devise a plan for putting to work those millions who are now unemployed it would be a happy land. When we see that country struggling in the throes of one of the most terrible depressions that any nation has ever had to face, when we see its people in such desperate straits that even the people of old England are prosperous in comparison, we are forced to think that something further is needed than mere amendments to tariffs and the holding of international conferences, or the trying of other and somewhat archaic medicines that have been applied to the body politic in the past.

I believe, sir, it is an easily demonstrable fact that the Dominion of Canada, perhaps the most richly endowed with vital natural resources of any land on earth, is not only capable of supporting its present population of eleven millions, and giving to them everything in the shape of food, clothing, shelter and cultural opportunities, but could support a population of probably five times that number. That statement I think cannot be challenged. Yet what do we find? We have unemployment, we have the dole, that humiliating and degrading thing, a blot on civilization. Here I should like to quote the words of our present king. When Prince of Wales, visiting the coal mines in Wales, he used these words; they were quoted by my leader the other day, but they will bear repetition:

> What a ghastly mess it all is! It makes me positively sick. What is the cause of all this? It cannot go on, it is a blot on England.

Those are the words of His Majesty the King of England. I can only say again that there is a general recognition of the fact that these contradictions are inherent in the system, as the speaker who preceded me said, and it is the work of this parliament to give constructive leadership in the solution of these and related problems.

I should like to refer to something that hon. members in this chamber, surrounded by comfort, everything that exalts and embellishes our civilized life, sitting in this comfortable room with messengers and servants, warmth and brightness, might be tempted to forget. There is a statement which I feel it my duty to make. I say more in sorrow than in anger that while the debate was proceeding yesterday, while the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) was describing some of the awful and pathetic conditions which prevailed among the poor people of the west, victims of this failure by the leaders of men to solve our problems, some hon. members in the chamber seemed to think that those conditions were a joke. I wonder if they have not forgotten the people who pay, or try to pay the taxes, who pay for the building and protection we enjoy, who have made every sacrifice, who have contributed to this country and its development and are now being left destitute.

I have thought it wise to place on Hansard some observations of the Hon. Senator Pascal Poirier, now deceased, but whom some hon. members in this chamber may have known. He said:

> As a result of these conferences our economic situation will very likely be improved. Improved, but not healed. The dreaded cancer will remain. Something must be found which will extirpate it, and this with no long delay, for the cancer grows alarmingly.
> The murmur that reaches parliament from the streets is now subdued, for things have not come to a crisis, and the dole appeases the hunger of the multitude. But when the public treasury is exhausted and the dole is no longer forthcoming that murmur will change into a malediction. Hearken to the suppressed rumble! It comes from gatherings of unemployed from Victoria to Sydney, from prisons like Portsmouth, St. Vincent de Paul, Dorchester, from everywhere. And what will happen, what can happen, if the rabble, so-called, run amuck and break all restraints?
> Remember what happened in France during the revolution of 1793. Look at what happened in Portugal not so long ago. Look at what is happening to-day in Russia, in Spain, in Mexico. The Czar of all the Russias, the grandees of Spain and Portugal, the clergy of Mexico, once all-powerful, were scattered like dry leaves in a hurricane when the people rose in anger.
> All that may be true, but are we, the governing class in democratic Canada, not in a position to quell insurrections? No, my friends, we are not, if lines are drawn and sides taken. Since the granting of manhood and womanhood suffrage, the majority governs, as it did before, but the axis of majority has shifted. There is even no necessity of a revolution in Canada to put the administration down and out. It can be done constitutionally, at the polls. Let all the malcontents unite, it is possible that later on they may secure a majority at the polls. What will happen then? They will climb up and we shall climb down, we senators as well as others. If, to use a vulgar expression, we kick, they will look upon us as disturbers of public peace, as insurgents, as undesirables; and, if they deem it necessary for the preservation of order and good government, they may confiscate our properties and show us the road to exile. Such things have happened elsewhere and are actually happening.
> Nothing like this is likely to occur in Canada, because our labouring classes have so far had no grievous charge to lay against their employers; they were never oppressed or wronged by them, and they, as much as we, favour the continuation of the present political regime. But let discontent grow, let the number of unemployed increase to dangerous proportions, let a crisis come, and no one can tell what may happen.

Those are not the words of an agitator, but those of a former member of the Senate of Canada.

I have one or two observations to make concerning the international situation of the League of Nations. As was stated a few days ago by the hon. member for Weyburn, the League of Nations is an organization of about fifty nations banded together to create among nations a state of law and order where formerly international anarchy had prevailed. As I see it, the league was designed to do for nations what criminal and civil courts were designed to do for individuals. For instance, several hundred years ago the institution of duelling was outlawed, and through the establishment of courts disputes arising betwen individuals were taken before an impartial tribunal and there, in the calm light of judicial detachment, were adjudicated upon. Passions were quelled; a judge would rule one man right and the other wrong, or partly so. But the institution of duelling which because it resulted in brutal killings and great injustice had been outlawed by the conscience of mankind was not a success for many years. We have record of many duels being fought after the practice was legally outlawed. Many thousands of years ago, before the dawn of civilization, tribes resorted to mass murder in order to settle disputes arising among them. The conscience of mankind crystallized in the League of Nations, a tribunal set up to restore order out of anarchy and to afford an opportunity to hear the voices of the smaller nations.

We cannot expect the League of Nations to be anything but a reflection of the institutions of nations composing it; it would not be reasonable to expect more. Therefore, while predatory individuals abused the courts we now find nations abusing the League of Nations to further selfish interests which certain small groups within those nations are trying to serve. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) made some observations about the Anglo-Persian Oil Company furnishing oil to Italian troops. While we endorse the idea of the League of Nations and believe it is the only hope of mankind for preventing war in the future, we deprecate the tendency on the part of certain nations to allow predatory or unscrupulous groups of interests within those nations to use the league for any such purposes, and our policy would be to strengthen the league by every possible means and to insist upon an impartial imposition of economic sanctions. I would like to commend the government for the stand it took in what conceivably was a very dangerous situation, which might have resulted, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said the other day, in a European conflagration which would have involved us all. We want to remember that the situation in Europe is largely the result of our own failures in the past, of our failures and the failures of diplomacy in general.

I think it could not be challenged with regard to war that the spectre of all the great wars in history will rise up in the day of judgment and point an accusing finger at the leaders of men, because it has been through their stupidity and ineptitude that the common people have been led to the shambles. The failure to recognize the equal worth of other peoples and nations, the failure to recognize the inalienable right of every nation to access to raw materials with which to build a civilization commensurate with our own, is one of the efficient causes of war. The balance of power is a political cause of war, because once any nation, actuated by whatever motives of self defence, assumes a position of superiority or desires to dominate, it is immediately challenged by every other nation and then we have an armament race. What is at the back of it? Simply this: We have here a country that is able to support fifty million people. It is not supporting eleven million people, and yet we are shipping out of this country our vital natural resources in the form of finished goods in a mad scramble for markets that do not exist. Then collisions occur between the nations, and then sometimes we are asked to go out and shed our blood. The system itself is the cause of this.

President Wilson said in St. Louis just before he died, and I do not think anyone here who has studied economics and the economic causes of war would disagree:

> Is there a man or woman, is there a child in this audience, who does not know that the seeds of war are sown in hot, successful commercial rivalry?

Then it has been found necesary to plunge the world into war as a result of the failure of the system, and the common people are led to the shambles because the leaders of men have not been able to formulate an intelligent policy for producing and distributing the wealth of the world.

What will our policy be? I would like to suggest one or two things, and may I say that I am here with an open mind, anxious to cooperate and to offer some suggestions to the government. As I came through Calgary on my way down here I picked up a copy of the Calgary Herald and read a report of an address to the Canadian Club given by Doctor Kerby, principal of the Mount Royal College, Calgary and I think this will be of interest to the right hon.

leader of the opposition because I noticed that he introduced the speaker. This is what Doctor Kerby says about our foreign policy:

Canada will come into a foremost place among the nations of the world not because of her unparalleled scenic beauty, her vast extent of territory, or her inexhaustible natural resources, but by virtue of the thought-power of her people and their leaders.

The hope of Canada lies in the quality of its life, the ability of the people to assimilate new ideals and standards, and to incorporate them into our national life.

It lies also in a national ideal—not founded upon wealth, or military power, but upon a broad concept of human helpfulness and human service, based on humanity and Christianity. There is no security for the nation, outside of goodwill; there is no impregnable fortress except brotherhood, no invincible armament except service and no prevailing diplomacy except the truth.

I submit that that is a sound basis for our foreign policy. I want to quote also from Victor Hugo's presidential address at the peace conference in 1849. He said:

A day will come when you, France—you, Russia—you, Italy—you, England—you, Germany—all of you nations of the continent—shall, without losing your distinctive qualities and your glorious individuality, blend in a higher unity and form a European fraternity, even as Normandy, Brittany, Burgundy, Lorraine, Alsace, all the French provinces, have become blended.

A day will come when war shall seem as absurd and impossible between Paris and London, betwen St. Petersburg and Berlin, as between Rouen and Amiens, between Boston and Philadelphia. A day will come when bullets and bombs shall be replaced by ballots by the universal suffrage of the people, by the sacred arbitrament of a great sovereign senate, which shall be to Europe what the parliament is to England, what the diet is to Germany, what the legislative assembly is to France.

A day will come when a cannon ball shall be exhibited in our museums as an instrument of torture is now, and men shall marvel that such things could be. A day will come when shall be seen those two immense groups, the United States of America and the United States of Europe, in face of each other, extending hand to hand over the ocean, exchanging their products, their commerce, their industry, their arts, their genius—clearing the earth, colonizing deserts, and ameliorating creation, under the eye of the Creator.

Well, the twentieth century is here, and I wonder if we in this parliament by the policies we initiate shall see the fulfilment of that prophecy uttered one hundred years ago. If it is true, and I believe it is true and is accepted by the leaders of this government and by everyone who thinks seriously about a solution of this problem, that the methods that are now proposed cannot solve it, why do we not change those methods? Why do we not dispassionately and detachedly study this problem? Why adopt the procrustean method of reasoning, chopping off the feet of theories that do not fit the facts and stretching out theories that do not fit the facts? Why not adopt the method of inductive reasoning, analysing the facts before us as a scientist would and reaching a conclusion after an examination of the facts? We try to find an open mind on this question, a mind that has striven conscientiously to rid itself of prepossessions and prejudices and to understand the elements of good in every one of these conflicting economic and political philosophies before commencing destructive criticism. At least a man should learn from experience. We have not got that mind. Perhaps I should put on Hansard a little poem which may throw some light on the reason why we change so slowly. It reads:

Said Life Force to Amoeba,
As she wiggled in the tide:
"It's time you're evoluting,
So get busy and divide."
But Amoeba, from Tradition,
Argued it is plain to view
Where there's been one organism
There can't suddenly be two!
But there were.

Said Changed Environment to Amphibian,
As he floated o'er the sand:
"You'll have to change your habits,
Go bone-dry and live on land."
Wet Amphibian, by Zoology,
Law of Fittest-To-Survive,
Demonstrated out of water
He just couldn't keep alive!
But he did.

Said Instinct to the Anthropoid,
"If you're to slug and roar,
It's time you learned to balance
On two feet instead of four."
Mr. Anthro proved by Physics
That if he should leave his rut,
He'd lose his equilibrium
And bump his cocoanut!
But he didn't.

Said Experience to the Cave Man,
"This rough stuff's going flat;
You'll have to rule your roost and clan
By subtler means than that."
The Cave Man cited Nature's Law
To prove he'd be a dub
For flabby Law—and Order
To scrap his solid club!
But he did.

Said Intellect to Modern Man,
"You settle this affair
Of stab and starve and slaughter,
Or you'll soon be rather rare."
Said wise, sophisticated Modern Man,
"It's up to me to die;
Old ways are suicidal,
And new ways I will not try!"
But he will.

We often hear the slogan: In time of peace prepare for war. I suggest that we change that slogan to read: In time of peace establish peace so firmly that it can never be successfully attacked again. I think of the founder of Christianity standing on the hill overlooking Jerusalem and uttering these words: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee. If thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace!" That is the question, the things that belong unto peace.

I have only a minute or two left and I should like to place on Hansard an item which appeared in the Review of Reviews entitled Can Britannia Rule the Waves? I make reference to this article because of the Japanese. Yesterday in Ottawa we met a gentleman from China and he suggested that we should do something to revert the status of Manchukuo so that it would not longer be recognized as a nation among nations. We must remember that when Admiral Perry blasted open the harbour of Tokyo in 1852 he put into the hands of the Japanese the instruments of modern warfare. The Japanese people have been watching the history and the movements of some of the other great nations in the west and they proceeded to build up a civilization founded upon force. Within the last few months the Japanese have overrun China and have subjugated about three-quarters of it politically. There is nothing to prevent Japan from training an army of fifty million in China and knocking at the gates of Europe within the next twenty years, fighting under the slogan of "The white man out of Asia."

I suggest, with Dr. Kerby, the writer of the article which I quoted, that there is no safe diplomacy but the truth. There is no impregnable fortress but good will. I quote from the article in the Review of Reviews as follows:

> At four o'clock on the morning of October 17, 1935, Premier Laval, in Paris, got Mussolini on the 'phone and asked for the best Italian terms. Mussolini replied that if the British did not change the dispositions of their fleet within twenty-four hours, Italy would attack the seventeen British war vessels lying in Alexandria bay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has elapsed.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on the address, but considerable has been said about wheat, and after listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) I think it is right and proper that I should make a few observations.

First, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Slaght) and the seconder (Mr. Fournier, Maisonneuve) of the address upon the spendid manner in which they acquitted themselves in making their first speeches in this chamber. Many important questions mentioned in the speech from the throne have been discussed already and I shall not give any time to these matters, paying more attention to the question of wheat. An opportunity will be presented later to deal with these other matters when they come before the house in due course.

I should like to clear up one misunderstanding. The charge has been made on two occasions, first by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and then yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the Conservative party was responsible for interjecting the wheat question into the Assiniboia by-election. I think it is well known that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was either in California or on the sea at that time. He was not in Canada. As the only Conservative member from Saskatchewan, I can assure the house that I never discussed that by-election with him at all. I admit that Mr. Turnbull of Regina and myself took some little part in it, but the first appearance I made was on January 2. The records and reports of the speeches made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will show that during the last week in December, and even at his nomination, he referred to the wheat question in addresses he made. At every address he made he referred to the wheat board and criticized Mr. McFarland and his operations. The wheat question was interjected into that campaign by the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—I should like to make this correction. I did not discuss the wheat question or Mr. McFarland at my nomination convention.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The reports show that the hon. member discussed it on many other occasions, and I shall probably refer to them later. The point I wish to make is that the wheat question was being discussed in that campaign long before I got there. I did not get there until January 2. I was in Winnipeg during Christmas week and arrived home on December 29. I found awaiting me there letters from all parts of Saskatchewan protesting against the action of the wheat committee of the cabinet in dismissing the advisory committee of the wheat board. I had telephone messages from different parts of Assiniboia; I heard from Manor, Arcola, Kipling and other places. I was told that as I was the only Conservative member from Saskatchewan it was felt that it was my duty to go down and defend Mr. McFarland, and I went down. I say that neither the Conservative party nor my leader had anything to do with that action. While I was in Winnipeg I gathered some information with respect to what had taken place during the first week or ten days that the new board was in action, and I may have something to say about that later.

There were, of course, many other issues in that campaign, but I will not take time to discuss them. We heard yesterday from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) the reasons for the dismissal of the McFarland board. Let me observe that anything I do say with respect to any member of the government is not spoken in a personal sense at all but purely from the point of view of criticism of their policy. I have the greatest respect for the Minister of Trade and Commerce and for other ministers to whom I may refer; I have the greatest respect for them as men, and I am merely criticizing their policy. I think that the country wishes us to criticize in a constructive way anything that calls for criticism, and certainly wheat is the most important problem in the west.

The minister stated that the committee believed that in Great Britain there was growing up a sales resistance. Possibly so; he quoted yesterday from editorials and newspaper clippings to that effect. But let us see what this new commission is; let us see who the persons are that constitute it and what has been their attitude. The new commission is composed of Mr. Murray, Mr. McIvor and Mr. Shaw. As regards the first two mentioned gentlemen, there is no doubt in the world that they have had wide experience in the marketing of grain. I believe they are capable in every way, and if they would direct their attention to marketing in the interests of the farmers they could possibly do a very creditable job. The point I wish to make however is that these three men are on leave of absence from the respective organizations or institutions with which they were formerly employed. They are on leave of absence for ten months or a year. Dean Shaw of the university of Saskatchewan is on leave for ten months. Now this fact I say indicates the policy of the present government towards the wheat board. I wish to direct the attention of hon. members to something which possibly they do not know and which I do not think the public generally is aware of. Bearing in mind the fact I have just mentioned, let us think of the amendment that was proposed by Mr. Ralston on the night of the first of July last, when we met in the railway committee room to put the finishing touches on the bill. The chairman having said, "This is the bill," Mr. Ralston proposed the following amendment which will be found in the records of the committee:

> Mr. Ralston, seconded by Mr. Stewart, moved an amendment to the bill as section 10, namely:
> The operations of the board shall not extend beyond the 15th day of August, 1936, except for the purpose of sale and realization of assets, collections, payments and generally for the winding up of the affairs and business of the board.

Compare that with the fact that these men are on leave of absence for ten months and, I submit, it is a fair indication of what the policy of the present government is towards the wheat board and that system of marketing.

Now what about the advisory committee? The farmers of western Canada are protesting very strongly against the dismissal of the advisory committee. The bill provided for a committee of seven, on which there were four representatives of the farmers.

Mr. EULER: Is it not a fact that a former member of the board, Mr. Grant, was also merely given leave of absence to act on the board?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): On the first board?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): That may be; I am not sure.

Mr. EULER: What does that indicate?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Well, so far as the policy of the late government is concerned, there is no doubt about that policy with respect to the board and its sale of wheat in western Canada. The farmers now have no representatives; they have been replaced by a committee of the cabinet: the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar). These are excellent gentlemen, and two of them have had wide experience in the grain business, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of the Interior; and the Minister of Agriculture has no doubt had considerable experience himself, having held a very important position in Saskatchewan.

I am not at all criticizing the intention of these gentlemen, but I will remind the house of a certain election that was held in Saskatchewan in 1934. It is well within the memory of many hon. members what took place on June 19, 1934, in Saskatchewan, where there was an election that returned the Minister of Agriculture with a splendid majority. We have heard in this house something about pamphlets used in the last federal election. Well, I have here one that was used in that particular election and it speaks about dollar wheat:

Dollar wheat will give you a job and enable you to own your own home. Dollar wheat will pay for your light and water and give you a telephone. Dollar wheat will pay your grocery bill and buy boots, shoes and clothing for the whole family. Vote Liberal.

On the other side I find this:

Dollar wheat will provide a surplus for a "rainy day." Vote Liberal.

That pamphlet did its work. It was found in every cream can in Saskatchewan for weeks before the election, and in every motor car on Saturday nights in the towns. But there is not a single thing there to indicate how the promised result would be brought about.

Mr. GARDINER: Read all of it.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): This is what it says:

Trade will bring dollar wheat.
Great Britain is willing and anxious to trade.

Of course; the Ottawa agreements make it possible for us to trade.

European countries are anxious to trade. The Liberal party is anxious to trade.

I have here a statement by the Minister of Finance that our trade was lost, our markets in Europe were lost, as far as wheat was concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: Read it now, the exact statement.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): This is what appears on the front page of the Saskatchewan Issue:

All major European markets are now closed to us as a result of prohibitive tariffs following the war.
Only one market remains—the British market.

The Minister of Agriculture asked me to read the pamphlet to which I have referred. Will he mention any action of his, or any word or deed since that was issued, anything that he has done that would help in any way to get dollar wheat? That was on June 19, 1934, and a little over a year later we find this hon. gentleman going up and down this dominion, in eastern Canada particularly, making attacks on the McFarland board, attacking the operations of the government in the five years during which Mr. McFarland was in charge, saying that we ought to sell our wheat at a loss in order to advertise Saskatchewan; and all the time wheat was pegged at 80 cents. That was his idea of dollar wheat.

As regards the other members of the committee that has replaced the advisory committee, I have nothing to say. I know that the Minister of Finance could be of great assistance, with the knowledge he has, and I hope he will direct that knowledge along proper lines.

Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce asked why Mr. McFarland did not get the surplus down. I think my right hon. leader has already put on record the fact that during the five years of his operations Canada contributed thirty-seven per cent of the world's import requirements, which was two per cent more than she had supplied, on the average, during the previous ten years. That increased to thirty-eight per cent during the last six months the board was in operation. I think that is a very creditable record, especially when we know that this was the most difficult period in which to sell wheat, having regard to the condition of the world market, according to the very statement of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) when he made his famous May day budget speech. According to a statement I have before me the old board sold more, during the period from August 1, 1934, to January 31, 1935, than was sold during the similar period from August 1, 1935, to January 31, 1936. I think that is very good, too. Just here I should like to say that they did not sell wheat at a loss to advertise Saskatchewan; they sold it when it was pegged at 80 cents at Fort William.

Yesterday the minister stated that on September 11, 1935, the statistical position indicated a rise in price. It certainly did, and Mr. McFarland knew that very well. The producing countries of the world were lower in their production; there was a very considerable decrease in the visible supply according to the figures given the other day by my right hon. leader, and everything indicated a rise in price.

I want to take just a moment or two to correct a wrong impression that appears to be prevalent in this house, that the new wheat board took over a surplus of 298,000,000 bushels. That statement has been made on two occasions already. I should like to recite the exact position, taking the figures that were presented to the committee last year. In 1930 the surplus taken over by Mr. McFarland was 127,000,000 bushels, of which 47 per cent was trade wheat and 53 per cent pool wheat. I directed a question to Mr. Milner, president of the grain exchange; I asked him to dissect this 127,000,000 bushels carryover, and he admitted that more than 40 per cent was trade wheat. So the pools should not be blamed, as they have been on many occasions, for the total surplus at that time. Taking June 22, 1935, the date that was taken by the committee as a cut-off, so to speak, the position was this: Mr. McFarland had 50,000,000 bushels of cash wheat, which he had bought and paid for. There was 143,000,000 bushels in all other positions in Canada, which he did not control. He held 178,000,000 bushels of options which, with the 50,000,000 bushels of cash wheat, makes a total of 228,000,000 bushels, which was the figure commonly used by Mr. Ralston and other Liberal members. To satisfy that 178,000,000 bushels of options there was only 143,000,000 bushels of wheat in all positions in Canada that could be delivered, which, together with the 50,000,000 bushels controlled by Mr. McFarland, made a total of 193,000,000 bushels. It has been said that the board took over 298,000,000 bushels. It may be quite true that they took over that quantity, but of that 100,000,000 bushels was new wheat that had come in on the new crop, which should not be considered as a surplus. That is visible wheat. At the end of the crop year you speak of the new wheat as visible wheat, and the surplus is only referred to at the end of the year as the carryover at that period. There may have been 298,000,000 bushels, but let it be understood that the board had power to take wheat at a fixed price, and possibly they had taken over 100,000,000 bushels, which would give that total.

The important thing to consider, however, was what that all meant to the farmers of western Canada. If you look at page 408 of the proceedings of the committee of last year you will find that I asked Mr. McIvor to state to the committee just what the operations of Mr. McFarland over the five year period had meant to the farmers of western Canada. He stated that they had made it possible for the farmers of the west to sell all the wheat they had produced during the five years, which amounted to 1,700,000,000 bushels, and that during that time the surplus had only increased by some 67,000,000 bushels. I think that is a pretty good record. Then I asked Mr. McIvor what he thought it meant in dollars and cents and he said his lowest estimate was 15 cents a bushel on 1,700,000,000 bushels. You can figure that out for yourselves; it represents a very considerable gain to the farmers of western Canada.

Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the policy of the government was steadily to offer wheat at competitive prices and clear the bins before the new crop comes in. I wonder if he thinks or claims that the change of ownership clears the bins. Mr. McFarland sold to exporters of wheat; the grain was actually exported at a price which protected the farmers. A great deal of the grain sold in the first three weeks of the operation of the new board was to protect the shorts. I think that could be easily proved.

Mr. DUNNING: You will have a chance to prove it.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): That is what we want.

Mr. BENNETT: We heard that in the committee last year.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): According to the bureau of statistics not fifty per cent of the wheat that changed hands in those three or four weeks has been exported. Where is the other fifty per cent? It is in the show window, so to speak; it is in the visible supply; it is in the hands of those who were short; it is in the bins. I venture to say that it is nestling in the bins in the terminal elevators. The Minister of Finance is laughing; maybe he knows something about it.

Mr. DUNNING: I will answer my hon. friend if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Some of it even may be nestling in the false bottomed bins of Fort William, about which the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crerar) may tell us. The point is that to-day it is in the hands of those who have it to sell in competition with the wheat still in the hands of the board.

Mr. DUNNING: It is in the same place it has been for years.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): If we have an investigation we will find out where it is, who owns it, how much they paid for it and when it was delivered. The whole question is, how much has been exported?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): May I ask the hon. member to explain how, when a man buys in wheat to cover a short, he has got the wheat?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): He is responsible for it; he has bought something.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Apparently my hon. friend does not understand the buying and selling of wheat, because a short is a sale of wheat, and when you buy it, it covers that sale.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Well, he was short and did not have the wheat, and having made the sale to an exporter he had to get the wheat to deliver.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But he did not have the wheat?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): He sold short. It is well within the memory of many hon. members who listened to the proceedings in the committee last year that the grain trade were short some 35 million bushels, and they were not very comfortable. Mr. McFarland could easily have made them dance to a nice tune.

An hon. MEMBER: Why didn't he?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): We shall find out what he did. There was a settlement made, certainly, and it will be interesting to the public to know what that settlement was.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, we will find that out.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Now the Minister of Agriculture stated that during the first two weeks the new board had sold 43 million bushels, and 23 million on one day, a great sale. It was the day following the Argentine action. The report of the clearings for export for the first three weeks of the new board's term of office show that there were 6,312,000 bushels sold or cleared for export. Where is the balance? That is what I want to know. Now how about this 23 million sold in one day? To whom was it sold? The position is this: cash wheat had closed on December 13 at 83 cents. The Argentine market opens many hours earlier, and the Liverpool market four or five hours earlier than Winnipeg, and the report was on the board in Winnipeg that Argentina overnight had increased their price 20 cents, equal to 90 cents in Canadian money. That would make our No. 1 northern in the neighbourhood of 99 cents; for No. 1 northern carries a premium of three cents over No. 2, and No. 2 compares with Argentine wheat, therefore with the premium it would make our No. 1 northern 93 cents, nad with the six cent preference under the Ottawa agreement it would be 99 cents. Liverpool cables were up six cents. What do you think the board did? The stupidest farmer in Saskatchewan would not have done what they did. With all that information on the board that would indicate a sharp advance in price, can you imagine any farmer who had a lot of wheat in an elevator saying: Sell it before the market opens up? But that is just what they did, although they had to make some little arrangement with the shorts. Now what did they do. It is claimed that they delivered a certain amount of wheat, eight and a half million bushels I think it was, to the grain trade at one-quarter cent above the previous day's close, and the balance was sold during the day, some of it at an increase in price but nothing to exceed the permissible three cents increase.

At this point I quote from the Wall Street Journal as to what they thought about the transaction:

> The allegation is that the present wheat board, under Mr. Murray, permitted the exporters to fill their contracts at a price one-quarter cent per bushel in excess of the previous night's quotation.
> The effect of this extraordinary concession on the part of the board is that the exporting firms who had contracted to deliver wheat at the closing quotation prior to the Argentine's "peg" were saved from substantial losses.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member tell us who is making the allegation?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): This is a report in the Winnipeg Tribune and the Regina Daily Star.

Mr. McLEAN (Mefort): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said "it is alleged," I want to know who is making the allegation.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Here is what the Wall Street Journal said:

> The Canadian grain board showed its co-operation with exporters, particularly the small ones that had made definite price contracts overnight, by allowing them to take in their hedges at one-quarter cent over the market's close. Had this not been done, the small shippers would have been in a plight, for Winnipeg wheat futures opened up the permissible three cents limit on the following day. Thus exporters who had sold wheat overnight would have been hard pressed to cover their hedges.
> As yet no Canadian government, irrespective of its political complexion, has recognized any obligation to succor the grain trading interests. The action of the Murray board, accordingly, constitutes an interesting precedent which is scheduled to be the subject of an important airing at the session to come.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I still ask the hon. member to tell us who is making the allegation, or else withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: He is reading a quotation from the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I ask your ruling. The hon. member said, "it is alleged," and he read the allegation. I want to know who the "allegator" is.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member said he was reading an allegation contained in a newspaper, which is a financial paper, giving a certain opinion. That is all.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): That excuse is made to justify the action of this board in selling 23 million bushels in one day, and when we take the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture that they sold 43 million bushels in two weeks, it follows that the sales for the remainder of the two weeks were only 20 million bushels. I think hon. members must admit that that is not a very consistent selling policy. However, they excuse the action of the board by stating that there was an order passed by the board whereby they could release wheat to fill bona fide acceptances of offers overnight. Now, I do not think that the old board passed that order. I am inclined to believe that it was passed by the new board; however, I may be corrected on that. But I was informed when I was in Winnipeg that the telephone wires were hot between Winnipeg and Liverpool, that when the boys went to their offices in the morning and found what had happened, that Argentine wheat was up and cables were up, they were in a precarious position and had to do something. I am informed—and I here use the language of the Hon. Mr. Ralston last year when he was making his charges from this side of the house: "If I am correctly informed, or if the figures that have been provided me are correct"—and I talked with members of the grain exchange who have been there for forty years, that the telephones were hot between Winnipeg and Liverpool to get an offer. And the offer came forward, and then of course they had to cable to accept it, and on that they presented the situation to the board and got delivery, or got wheat released to them to cover.

Mr. DUNNING: Does the hon. member believe that?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I believe it. I think it would be quite possible. The boys were in a jam and had five hours to do it, and it is quite possible. However when the investigation comes on we will ask for those cables and for that information.

Mr. DUNNING: And a lot more too.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): We will find out how they got the offer, the date of the offer and all about it. The "allegator" will know all about it. The operations of Mr. McFarland and the former board have not cost this country anything. If they had been allowed to carry on, in view of the possibilities of selling wheat their efforts should have been, to a considerable extent, in the interests of the farmers. If a wheat board can make ten cents, five cents or even one cent for a farmer, it should do so. What would this mean to those holding participation certificates? I think we are entitled to that information, and I believe we will get it.

We remember the evidence given last year before the committee, and the statement made to the effect that Mr. McFarland was battling big interests. He had to go into the pit and buy 15,700,000 bushels in one day to keep wheat from breaking below the pegged price, and we know from whom he was forced to buy this quantity. When we know that, and when we learn now that possibly these same interests are playing with the present wheat board, I think we should know and the country should know all about the whole procedure.

Mr. DUNNING: They will.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For the first time.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): If it turns out that these big interests are playing in that way, we should devise in parliament some way of excluding them—the Bungé, the Dreyfus, the Continental Grain Company, and the Canada Atlantic, two of which companies are on Wall street—from our markets altogether. Wheat is the life blood of the western farmer; he deserves a square deal, and I say it is up to this parliament to see that he gets it.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add briefly my felicitations upon your election as Speaker, and to express the hope that under your guidance and chairmanship the deliberations of this assembly may be conducted with impartiality and decorum. May I, too, congratulate those who initiated the debate.

Upon this, the first occasion upon which I have had an opportunity of addressing the House of Commons, I should like to discuss somewhat thoroughly the speech from the throne, but as I come from one of the banner agricultural communities of Saskatchewan, indeed of Canada, I feel that perhaps to-day I should devote my observations, as did the preceding speaker, to that problem uppermost in the minds of the people in the prairie provinces. As the days go by I shall endeavour to support anything emanating from the government side of the house which seems to be headed in the right direction. Conversely I shall oppose anything headed along the opposite road.

Conditions in western Canada to-day present a challenge to our intelligence and our statesmanship. I am familiar with those conditions. In the last few years I have travelled across that section of Canada, thousands and thousands of miles, and have looked down upon it. I have been into almost every nook and cranny of the province of Saskatchewan and into the homes of many of its people. There is an idea abroad that conditions facing western Canada, and indeed Canada generally, are the results of the war and the post-war depression. I would say that the situation in western Canada is not a war or post-war condition. The factors which lie beneath the surface of the present situation could be found prior to the war. It is true that the taking up of new land, the value of which was zero, and increasing its value by settlement and by speculation gave to the country a passing measure of prosperity, a prosperity which to a great extent was unreal. On the new equities thus created men and women on the plains were able to go out and borrow money. Credit was—and I place the term in quotation marks—"easy". But eight or more per cent soon had the producers within the toils of the banks, the mortgage corporations, the implement companies, and the financial system generally. Many people in western Canada even at that time realized the situation, and if one were to consult the records of the old Grain Growers' Association, and the various farmers' organizations meeting in convention from time to time in those years, he would find resolution after resolution directed against those conditions and against the difficulties under which the producers of western Canada were then marketing their grain.

When the war came, eliminating Russia the Balkan peninsula, and the Danubian provinces, from the production of wheat, the tremendous demand thus created caused new land to be brought under cultivation in Canada, in the Argentine Republic and in Australia. The result was that when the great war ended we found ourselves confronted with a serious situation. Let us remember that throughout the war years producers of primary commodities had been urged to increase their production in order to meet the needs of the armies in the field and the thousands of people who had been taken into the factories to produce the necessary munitions of war. Wheat was king. Wheat boards were instituted to prevent the price from sky-rocketting, and the agrarian population of Canada did not raise any serious objection to the price of wheat being limited at the top as a war measure. When the war ended they themselves asked for a wheat board again to stabilize conditions. On June 22, 1922, a bill was piloted through this chamber by the then government, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but that bill never became effective. The result was that the producers on the plains began to agitate for producers' pools, and as a consequence we have the foundations laid for the great pooling organizations now existing in western Canada. These pooling organizations in the beginning believed that mass pressure on the part of the producers would enable them to secure all that they required from any government holding office.

Once again the lesson has been learned that cooperation and competition are two opposing forces and that within a competitive society, cooperative institutions cannot function in the economic field without taking an active interest in the political field. That has been the experience of Great Britain, and to-day the great cooperative societies of the old land, the Consumers' Cooperative and others, are and have been for the last three years, ever since the Blackpool conference, part of the labour and socialist movement of Great Britain. Day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year, in season and out of season, groups of newspapers throughout the length and breadth of this land, and particularly in western Canada, have tried to discredit these cooperative institutions, and in addition we find that the same thoughts have been echoed from the political platform. We are told that the policies of these organizations have failed. I am not going to defend the policies of the late government in regard to those organizations. They have already been defended by hon. gentlemen who sit to my right. But let us examine very briefly some of the charges of alleged failure that have been made against our western producers' organizations.

First, we are told that we must put Canada's wheat back on the breakfast tables of the world, and that in order to do this it would be good advertising to sell our wheat at a loss. The preceding speaker (Mr. Perley, Qu'Appelle) said that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had made that statement in eastern Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: I would just like to say now that I did not make that statement in eastern Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to put on Hansard what the Regina Leader-Post, a Liberal paper, reported the Minister of Agriculture as having said at Ridgetown, Ontario, on September 7, 1935. Did I see the Speaker shake his head? I do not want to transgress the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member has a right to quote from that paper. He must accept the word of the minister who has stated that he did not use those words.

Mr. BENNETT: The report had not been read at that time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DUNNING: But he had quoted from it.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have not read the quotation, but after I have read it, if the minister denies it I will accept his denial.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. gentleman made a statement and I heard him make it over the radio on a previous occasion. I will send over to him the complete statement if he wants to read it.

Mr. COLDWELL: It does not matter what the Minister of Agriculture has heard me say over the radio; it is what I am saying in this house that matters.

Mr. GARDINER: But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just now repeated the statement in the house, and I say that it is untrue.

Mr. HEAPS: How can the minister say that it is untrue if the statement has not yet been read?

Mr. GARDINER: He made it just now.

Mr. BENNETT: What he said was that a statement had been made by the minister in eastern Canada, and the minister said, "I made no such statement." The hon. member is now going to read the statement which may or may not be the statement which the minister denies; then the minister can contradict the hon. member if he desires to do so.

Mr. GARDINER: What he said was that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) quoted a statement of mine, and then he repeated it. I have the statement here as it was made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. It reads:

> It would be good advertising for the people of western Canada to market their wheat at a loss.

I say that that purported statement of mine quoted by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and repeated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not precisely the statement that I have here. The statement is this:

> Speaking in the interests of Doctor James W. Rutherford—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: He has the right to read it.

Mr. COLDWELL: It reads:

> Speaking in the interests of Doctor James W. Rutherford, Chatham, seriously injured in an automobile accident Wednesday, but who was resting comfortably Friday night, Premier Gardiner urged the utmost be done to retain markets.
> "It would be good advertising for the people of Canada to market their wheat at a loss and win back the market" he said. "Western Canada will produce as much wealth in wheat in the next twenty years as it has in the past."

That is the report of the minister's statement at Ridgetown, Ontario, and what I say, Mr. Speaker, is that that statement appeared in the organ supporting the Liberal party, the principal paper of the Sifton press published in Saskatchewan, and if it did the minister an injustice I would be glad to see the Regina Leader-Post get any correction the minister might care to make.

We were told that we had to put our wheat back on the breakfast tables of the world. Let us look at a few figures. If we take the very worst period of the depression, from August, 1930, to August, 1934, the statistics show that of every 100 bushels of wheat placed on the world market, 35 bushels were Canadian; 20, Australian; 20, Argentine; 10, American; 8, Russian, and 7, miscellaneous. To Britain we supplied 22·7 per cent of her imports in 1929 and 1930 when hon. gentlemen opposite were last in power, as compared with 34·4 per cent in 1933 and 1934, and a higher percentage last year. It is true, of course, that Canada was accumulating a tremendous carry-over all through those years, but again let us look at some figures.

On August 1, 1921, just before the party of hon. gentlemen opposite first took office, the carry-over was 10,000,000 bushels; one year later it was 21,000,000 bushels; in 1928, it was 91,000,000 bushels, and when the attention of a former Minister of Trade and Commerce was drawn to the situation what did he say? He said that his department was not exercised over the sale of such commodities as wheat; that such commodities would find their own market. You will find that statement in Hansard. The laissez faire political philosophy of those days was laying the foundations for the difficulties that followed. When hon. gentlemen opposite left office in 1930, the carry-over on August 1, 1930, had been accumulated to 127,000,000 bushels, an increase of 117,000,000 bushels since 1921. Then there was a change of government and a change of policy. It is not my purpose, as I said before, to defend that policy or that government, but I would just point out that during the years that followed the accumulation rose to 204,000,000 bushels as of August 1 of last year. Now it is said that that was due to the holding policies of the wheat board. I want to say—and I think this is the fact and it will come out upon investigation—that there was always Canadian wheat for sale.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, certainly.

Mr. COLDWELL: It has been charged over and over again that Canada tried to keep wheat at a high price level. Well, in that part of the country which I represent, wheat for a time was selling at twenty-one cents a bushel at the country elevators.

An hon. MEMBER: What year was that?

Mr. COLDWELL: 1932. I may say that the price of other things was set largely by the price of wheat. I can remember buying a thirty-dozen crate of eggs, not from a farmer but from a store thirty miles from Regina, and paying only ninety cents for the crate. I put down a dollar bill and I was too ashamed to wait for the change. That was the situation. Why was that? It was because, as has been pointed out already from this corner of the house, tariffs, quotas, subsidies and monetary policies, both domestic and foreign, had all played their part. At one time when the Australian farmer sold his wheat in Liverpool for £1 he received 25 shillings in Australian money. That local currency enabled him to pay his taxes and meet his obligations in his own country. But the sterling-dollar exchange was against the Canadian producer.

We have the additional factor of the increase in the use of power machinery throughout the world. New industries have arisen in what were formerly backward countries, and it is now almost impossible for the great industrial nations to sell their products and set up those credits with which to buy the commodities which we produce. Consequently we are faced with a situation that is entirely new. We hear a great deal about tariffs. I am not a high tariff man; indeed, I do not believe in tariffs. The tariff controversy is out of date. The question to-day is not one of tariffs, but of exchange of goods. We must learn that the time has come when the only way in which we can trade is to exchange goods with those who will exchange goods with us. Heaven knows that we need the clothing, the boots and shoes and the blankets of old England, and old England needs the wheat, the bacon and the fruits that we produce.

In the province from which I come there are people who have produced vast wealth but who are living to-day under conditions that are a disgrace to our civilization. They have few modern conveniences, little clothing, little bedding and none of the sanitary conveniences that we consider essential to modern times. Let us not forget that this great building in which we are met to-day, together with the great financial buildings that we see throughout the length and breadth of Canada, particularly in the east, have been built by the toil of the people who have produced the primary products. Yet what do we find? I take the census figures for 1930 and I find that in that year in the three prairie provinces there were 288,000 farms. Of these only 5,036 had water piped into the kitchen of the farmhouse. Only one out of fifty-seven had what is regarded elsewhere as an elementary convenience. If we take other sanitary equipment as a criterion, only one out of seventy-three had modern bathroom facilities. In Saskatchewan the rate was one in eighty-five. Yet these people have produced great new wealth. Where has it gone? As I say, look around and see the sky-scrapers in Toronto and Montreal; look around and see the magnificent buildings scattered throughout the country and find your answer. We on our part urge that the government negotiate agreements with nations that will trade with us. If the government will undertake to do that we will support them at every opportunity.

An hon. MEMBER: What do you mean by "we"?

Mr. COLDWELL: I mean the little group with which I am associated.

Tariff policies are not a solution of our difficulties, even our marketing difficulties. I have under my hand a clipping from the Manitoba Free Press. I like to choose Liberal papers although from what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said a little while ago, I must not place too much reliance upon what appears in these Liberal papers. On January 11, the Winnipeg Free Press had the following editorial in connection with an article appearing elsewhere by Miss Cora Hind. They say:

"Miss Hind's judgment on this point, based as it is upon personal investigation, will be accepted as authoritative."

Here is what Miss Hind had to say in her article:

"Having now visited Norway, Sweden, Germany, Poland, Rumania, Jugoslavia, Hungary, Austria and Czechoslovakia and looked into the possibility of these countries for the export of Canadian wheat, I must frankly confess that I am disappointed at the outlook.

Before leaving Canada I, in common with many others, felt that a change of government and more liberal customs and trade arrangements would be practically all that was needed to reestablish much of the former export trade to Europe. I feel now that the task, while not an impossible one, will be a more difficult one and will take more time than was anticipated."

Those are the words of Miss Cora Hind.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite reasonable.

Mr. COLDWELL: The policies of the Liberal administration of 1921 to 1930 failed to solve the problems of wheat marketing and unemployment. The policies of the late government failed to solve these problems. When I look at the speech from the throne I am quite convinced that the policies enunciated therein will not solve these problems. I venture to make the prediction that three years from now the people of Canada will be as dissatisfied with the condition under hon. gentlemen opposite as they were a short time ago with the condition under the hon. gentlemen who are sitting immediately to my right.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Your previous prediction did not come true.

Mr. DUNNING: You have not been a very good predictor in the past.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of Finance says that I have not been a very good predictor in the past, but I think I have probably been just as good a predictor as he has.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not do any predicting.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): You did before 1930.

Mr. COLDWELL: I remember he made some predictions that did not just work out. I am still making the same predictions that I made ten years ago, that within the present system lies no cure for the present economic condition. That is the prediction I am making now.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a prediction.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think time will ultimately bear me out.

Under the last administration a wheat board was established, and that board was satisfactory to the producers of western Canada; the resolutions of the organized producers show that, I think, completely. But since hon. gentlemen opposite have taken office very disquieting events have occurred. I want the house to be quite clear about what I am going to say. I am not going to impute, and I never have imputed, wrong motives to any of the gentlemen who comprise the wheat board or the advisory committee; but I have said and I do say this, that we are the creatures of our environment to a greater degree than we care to admit, and that associations do mould ideas. Therefore, while there are to-day on the wheat board and on the advisory committee gentlemen who are perfectly honourable and good men, their associations do not command the confidence of the producers of western Canada. We are, I repeat, to a large degree the creatures of our environment.

Who are these gentlemen? There is Mr. J. R. Murray, who has been discussed, a former secretary of the grain exchange, on a year's leave of absence from one of our great line elevator organizations. The gentleman in charge of the selling agency of the pool is the son of a prominent grain merchant of the city of Winnipeg, Mr. Smith; and on January 14, an assistant sales manager was appointed in the person of Mr. Pethick, another grain exchange broker, replacing as he did Mr. Folliott, who was the eastern representative of the Alberta pools and who himself was engaged in the grain business. The men thus replaced had the confidence of our producers. Our people in western Canada feel, owing to the personnel of this board, unwisely appointed, I think, by the government, that they have been delivered into the hands of their enemies.

Mr. DUNNING: You have mentioned only one member of the board.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have mentioned three gentlemen, one member and two officials, all of whom were connected with the grain exchange.

Mr. DUNNING: But you have not mentioned the majority of the board.

Mr. COLDWELL: The other two members of the board were mentioned by a preceding speaker and I did not think it necessary to repeat their names. There is Mr. McIvor—

Mr. DUNNING: What have you to say against him?

Mr. COLDWELL: Nothing; and as regards Dean Shaw, I have nothing to say against him personally.

Mr. EULER: That is the majority of the board.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would point out, however, that Dean Shaw is not a grain man; he is a cattle man. Moreover, if I am correctly informed, Dean Shaw believes in selling wheat at whatever the competitive price may be, and that in 1932 would have spelt even greater disaster to Canada than the price at that time did.

An hon. MEMBER: It was sold then at whatever it would bring.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, wheat was always offered for sale. Our people are alarmed because they feel that they have been delivered into the hands of their enemies. Now the old advisory board consisted of seven members, four of whom, or a majority of the board, directly represented the producers' organizations. To-day the government has replaced that board by a committee of the cabinet.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: A cabinet advisory committee.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is quite wrong. The advisory board is simply not in existence; there is simply no advisory board.

Mr. COLDWELL: We will put it in this way—a committee of the cabinet in an advisory capacity.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not in an advisory capacity.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is it then?

Mr. DUNNING: The subcommittee of the cabinet is for the purpose of advising the government with respect to all matters connected with wheat, for the purpose of advising not the wheat board but the government.

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite right; but in so far as that advisory committee advises the government regarding the wheat situation, it is certainly an advisory committee on wheat. And if the board, as we are led to believe, is taking its instructions from the policies laid down by the government, then to all intents and purposes that particular committee is an advisory committee on wheat.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, when the house took its recess I was saying that our people are questioning the activities of the present wheat board. That questioning is becoming all the more insistent in the light of what transpired last December. Let me remind you that during the recent election campaign the policies of the wheat producers and of the old board were constantly under fire. It became customary to describe the policies of that board in terms that were not very complimentary to either the board or the government. The policy of the new administration and the new board, however, is being spoken of quite widely as a "fire sale" policy. The effect of the statements that were made by hon. members opposite during the campaign became apparent even before the campaign was over. For example, on October 5 the price of No. 1 northern wheat at Fort William was 96 cents a bushel. As the effect of the campaign became evident the market reacted so that on October 15 the price was 91⅝ cents. The next day, when the results of the dominion election were definitely known, the price of wheat fell to 88⅝ cents, a decline of 3 cents. On October 28 it was down to 85 cents, and on January 13, one month ago, it was 85·4 cents. It has fluctuated around that figure ever since. This has been the case, may I add, in spite of the fact that on December 12 the Argentine republic placed a set price of 90 cents a bushel on its wheat. What happened between the close of the exchange on the afternoon of the 12th and the re-opening of the exchange on the 13th is a matter of public interest which, I understand, will receive careful inquiry by this house. It has been alleged that some millions of bushels of wheat were sold during that short period at 2¾ cents below the opening pit price.

Speaking at Estevan, I believe, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said that 8,600,000 bushels of wheat had been sold for export and that some 45,000,000 bushels of wheat in all had been disposed of. Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) told us that 65,000,000 bushels of wheat had been sold during the first six weeks of the activities of the new board. The question that is being asked very widely is this: To whom was that wheat sold and why was it sold? In a public statement Mr. McFarland said that the speculators were caught in a trap. Were these sales made to get them out of that trap and, if so, to what extent?

In view of all the circumstances can it be wondered at that the producers of western Canada believe they have been delivered into the hands of their old enemy, the grain exchange? That is what they believe, and it will require careful explanation before they can be persuaded to think otherwise. The brief reference in his excellency's speech will do nothing to dissipate that feeling, nor, I am persuaded, will the speech delivered yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce do anything to alter the opinion that has been formed in western Canada.

There is one other point I should like to mention while there is yet time, and it is this: Another cause of great uneasiness is the delay on the part of the government in authorizing the 1930 equalization payments. It is my understanding that an agreement was reached some time ago between the Cooperative Wheat Producers' Limited and the late government in regard to this matter, and the producers believed that in a short time they would receive the payments that were due. We were told that the government were only waiting for the auditors' certificate. It should not take a long time to obtain that, and the farmers need the money that is due them in order to finance their spring operations. Moreover a date was set, later than that originally believed to have been set, and the price of wheat declined in the interval. As a consequence our producers are very restive in regard to this matter.

Then we have the news items in the press regarding the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of the Natural Products Marketing Act and other measures. May I say that I am one of those who have been brought up to believe that parliament is the supreme authority; that there is no higher court than the high court of parliament. That is the British tradition, and I am indeed sorry to think that we have departed from that British precedent. The government might have waited until some outside body questioned the validity of those acts. It might at least have waited until this House of Commons assembled, because it had no authority from the parliament which enacted the legislation thus to test the validity of those measures.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, you are just about to rise to tell me that my time is up, so I will resume my seat.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, before the conclusion of the debate I should like to make a few observations. May I first congratulate the mover (Mr. Slaght) and the seconder (Mr. Fournier, Maisonneuve) of the address upon the eloquent presentations they made to this house and upon the moderation of their remarks. Both of these new members have reflected great credit not only upon themselves but also upon the constituencies which they have the honour to represent.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I have been in public life for many years, in the provincial house and in this house, and I have never listened to the maiden speech of a member of parliament with greater interest than I did to the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I predict that this young man will go far in the public life of this country. One significant statement that he made was that associations and environment leave their impression. I am sure that a wider view of public affairs and the environment of this house will cause him to modify some of his views. One statement he made to which I must take exception is that he is not in favour of tariffs; that we want English manufactured goods to come into this country in exchange for our agricultural products. At the present time that would mean disaster to this country. We are living in a world of tariffs, and it would be madness for Canada to throw her market open as a dumping ground for the surplus products of other nations while our neighbours keep up their tariff barriers against our goods. If manufactured goods from Great Britain were allowed free access to the Canadian market this would destroy the manufacturing business of Canada and our farmers would be the greatest losers. I have been a farmer all my life, and I never was able to sell the produce of my farm to my neighbour. My market was found among men and women in the industrial parts of the country. The men and women engaged in the industrial life of Canada, if they have steady employment and good wages, have the purchasing power to buy my products. We cannot build up this country on a solely agricultural basis. The urban and the rural communities are dependent one on another; their interests are so inseparable that you cannot place upon our statute books laws affecting one without affecting the other. We prosper together or go down together.

Canada is just emerging from five years of the greatest depression the world has ever known; in common with every other country she has suffered severely, but I think it is generally conceded that she is coming out of this depression better than almost any other country, and that is due solely to the wise policies and statesmanship of the former government. Those years have been years of great depression, but also of great achievement. During the past five years more legislation beneficial to the common people has been placed upon our statute books than in any other five years of the history of this country.

What did the Conservative government find when they took office in 1930? They found the markets of the world closed to Canadian products; they found the markets of Europe closed to our wheat. When were they closed? Between 1921 and 1930 when the Liberal government with the present Prime Minister at its head were in office; that is when our markets were lost. In 1921, when the Liberal government took office Canada was exporting to the United States $175,000,000 worth of agricultural products. In 1930, when they left office Canada's exports had fallen to a little over $3,000,000. That calls to my mind a bill board that faced us all through the country last autumn. I spoke in many Ontario ridings during the last election campaign and wherever we went we saw the smiling countenance of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on a great billboard giving his benediction to the words that were under it; "Vote Liberal and restore the markets lost by Bennett and Stevens." There never was a statement more utterly void of truth. Those markets were not lost by those two hon. gentlemen; they were lost between 1921 and 1930 while the Liberal government were in office. When was the Fordney-McCumber tariff passed? When was the Hawley-Smoot tariff passed? These are the tariffs that shut the Canadian exporter out of the United States market; and they were passed during the time the Liberal government were in office in Canada. I do not blame that government for the tariffs of foreign countries; but why should they say, "Vote Liberal and restore the markets lost by Bennett and Stevens·" What we want in this country is truth and honour. I have been in public life, municipal, provincial and federal, since I was twenty-one years of age; I have tried to run my campaigns honestly and in a gentlemanly manner, and I think I have succeeded. I have never sent out literature that reflected on the personal character of anyone. Until we get away from making reflections of that nature we shall not have clean politics in Canada.

I take exception to a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) the other day. He stated that in the last election the people did not vote for the Liberal party; that they voted against the Conservative party. I believe the policies of the Liberal party or of the Conservative party had not much to do with the last election. The people were restive under five years of—

Mr. McPHEE: Tory government.

Mr. THOMPSON: —of depression, and they were willing to make any change. Had a Liberal government administered the affairs of this country for the five years between 1930 and 1935, they would have met at the hands of the electors the same reception as was received by the Conservative party, and they would have left the country in much worse shape.

I heartily agree with the statement made yesterday by the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) that the House of Commons is the house of the common people. This is the place where every member has a right to speak as representing a large body of Canadians.

Mr. McPHEE: We did not have it in the last five years, my dear friend.

Mr. THOMPSON: Of course we always hear some rooster crow.

Mr. ROGERS: We can hear you.

Mr. THOMPSON: I was somewhat amazed when I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of a great country such as Canada point to himself and say that the result of the election "was what the people thought of me, and what the people thought of you"—pointing his finger to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). Have we ever known such egotism in our lives, the egotism of a man drunk with power? Even if his observation were true, since when has popularity been the measure of true worth? What was the popular cry against the greatest man who ever lived? Away with such a fellow; it is not meet that He should live; crucify Him, crucify Him! Through all the ages, at different times democracy has not ceased crucifying worthy men.

I do not wish to make any observations concerning the leader of the opposition or the Prime Minister of Canada, but I should like to be permitted to read an account which appeared in the Calgary Herald immediately after the election. We find the following:

Mr. King declared: "The result is a victory for democracy. It constitutes a great deliverance, a deliverance of the people from one man government, from mistaken policies, and from autocratic leadership. It is a triumph for broad principles and policies, as against promises and pledges recklessly and extravagantly made for the purpose of winning votes."

Is anything further needed to show the spirit of the man? Had it been true it should not have been said. I say here and now that we never had a one man government in Canada and that we never had autocratic leadership. But even if it were true, what do hon. members think of a man who gives his opponent a kick in the head when he is down? Let me read further from the Calgary Herald.

Place alongside this rather churlish pronouncement the proclamation issued by Mr. Bennett: "The electors of Canada have decided they desire a change of government. Although from a large number of constituencies members have returned by a minority vote, the result is decisive. The Liberals have been entrusted wtih the responsibility of governing Canada. I wish them well. Although the electors have expressed their dissatisfaction with the services I have been able to render to Canada, I still regard it as a high privilege to have given my best to the dominion during the past five years. I sincerely hope that Mr. King may derive as much satisfaction from serving the country as I have done."

Comparing those statements we find that one is that of an unsportsmanlike politician, and the other is that of a good sportsman and a statesman. With your permission, sir, I shall read further from the comments in the Calgary Herald:

On the one hand we have an ill-tempered victor gloating over his opponent, and on the other the generous-minded, sportsmanlike statesman, cheerfully recognizing the will of the people, and wishing his victorious opponent success in the task which he is about to take upon himself. There is enough common sense and love of fair play in the Canadian people to register and remember the difference between the two men. Mr. King emerged from the test of victory in a discreditable manner. Mr. Bennett accepted overwhelming defeat at the hands of a forgetful people in a manly fashion that will stand to his credit for all time.

That expresses better than I could the feelings of the Canadian people.

Upon this occasion I shall not enter into any lengthy discussion of the speech from the throne. When the measures forecast in it are presented to the house for consideration we shall have an opportunity to discuss them. I should like again however to call to the attention of the house the statement made by the hon. member for East Kootenay, namely, that we are the House of Commons and that the Liberal party has been entrusted with administering the affairs of the dominion. I, too, wish them well, and if there is any way in which I can assist them I shall be only too pleased to do so. I care not whether it be a Liberal, a Conservative or some other kind of government; I know that the united effort and all the intelligence and brain power possessed by every member in this chamber will be required to bring us out of our difficulties. We have an unemployment problem to solve and a railway problem hanging heavily over our heads. There is another problem in the western provinces; they find themselves in bankruptcy and come here from time to time asking that their bills be paid. How long can this continue? If the western provinces have been unfortunate; if the grasshoppers have eaten the crops; if the drought has burned them out, or if they have been blasted by rust and frost, I would say that we might come to their assistance. But if they insist upon electing governments which squander their resources, which will guarantee bonds of railways and introduce social legislation involving expenditures they cannot afford, they cannot expect to come to Ottawa with their hats in their hands, asking for help.

Since this government has taken office two treaties have been arranged, one with the United States and the other with Japan. I do not wish to discuss them at length this evening, but I must say that so far as the United States treaty is concerned I am afraid that, like the small boy, we have paid too much for our whistle. While some advantages may come to the lumberman and the stock men, such advantages will be counteracted by the disadvantages which will be suffered by other industries. If Japan is allowed freedom to ship to this country goods manufactured by cheap labour in a country where the standard of living is very low, our industries will be crippled.

I believe in this parliament we should throw aside to a great extent our partyism and attempt to grapple with the great problems confronting this dominion to-day.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to warn the previous speaker (Mr. Thompson) that it is dangerous to quote from the book of sacred laws. We know that a far better man than the former Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was crucified, and that the people cried out, "Away with Him." But may I say emphatically that the Prime Minister has suffered his crucifixion, and like the great captain, his predecessor, has come back with a larger number of followers than ever before.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, to the many expressions of congratulations I should like to add mine to yourself, to the mover of the address (Mr. Slaght), and to the seconder (Mr. Fournier, Maisonneuve). I should also like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on his generous party following. In past campaigns he has repeatedly appealed to the people to give him a good, clear working majority in order that he might not be handicapped or held up by minority groups. Certainly his wish was gratified in no uncertain way on October 14 last, and with Liberals to the right, left, in front of him and behind, the Prime Minister need have no concern about minority groups handicapping him or minority gunmen threatening to shoot unless he brings down or repeals certain legislation.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of using this opportunity to suggest reforming one particular piece of existing legislation under which nothing less than an outrageous racket is being carried on throughout the dominion, and we are experiencing this particularly in British Columbia. I refer to the operations that are being carried on by what is known as the Performing Right Society, operating under the legality of the Copyright Act. We in Canada have no interest in that society. It is composed first of all of American authors, composers and publishing associations, and allied with them is the Performing Right Society of England. Allied with them are similar societies in eighteen countries of the world. They claim to hold and to own the copyright on two million pieces of music.

Now the basic principle of the Copyright Act is to protect the author and the composer, but through this Performing Right Society we are protecting, not the composer, author or publisher in Canada but only the authors and composers of other countries. Canadian authors and composers do not benefit one particle from this society; they are not members of it. The Canadian society represents simply an assignment of all the rights to this alleged two million pieces of music controlled by the society in England and the society in the United States. The society has no financial interest in Canada. The capital structure of this Performing Right Society is ten thousand shares of no par value, and there are just two shares held in this dominion. The one purpose of the society is to levy a toll upon anybody and everybody using what they allege to be portions of their repertoire of two million pieces of music. They started out in the first place with a minimum levy of ten dollars on every theatre, large or small, and on every hall, whether it be a community hall, a fraternal society hall or a privately owned hall; they made a minimum levy of ten dollars on every radio in a hotel and on every radio in a restaurant. But in January of last year they raised this minimum levy from ten to thirty dollars, and there is nothing in the world to prevent their fixing the minimum at a much higher figure.

The point I wish to make is that the tolls are first of all excessive. They have gone up from a minimum of ten dollars to thirty dollars, and there is an additional levy based on the number of seats in a theatre or the number of performances. The levy varies also with the number of dances held or the number of evenings that a hall may be used for giving an entertainment, concert or dance. This levy is applied to radios in hotels according to the number of rooms in which a radio is available. Now the radio owner, whether he be a hotel proprietor or just the ordinary individual, having bought and paid for his radio and paid for his licence, hardly expects to pay for the privilege of hearing the music which comes out of that radio.

But now the society is threatening to increase its tolls. They did increase them in January of last year, and nobody knows how much further they are going. The thing became so burdensome that last session His Honour Judge Parker, of Toronto, was appointed to make an investigation into the situation. The point about that investigation is that the society, fearful that it would result in new and more restrictive legislation, sent its agents throughout Canada, in an endeavour to collect this minimum levy of thirty dollars as quickly as possible, but advantage was taken of the restriction that so long as the matter was before a royal commission there could be no prosecutions. But innumerable threats were made against individuals that unless they paid these tolls in advance the society would withhold entirely its licence to them to perform any one of these two million pieces of music.

Is it not reasonable to say to this society that if they expect to exact a toll from every owner of theatre or hall they must publish a list of the pieces of music which they claim to control or to have the copyright of? But they absolutely refuse to publish such a list, and they apply their tolls on every kind of hall whether it be for charitable, religious or agricultural purposes; they make no difference at all. I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will speedily take steps to correct this unfair and unjust piece of legislation.

Before closing I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) on his intention, as indicated by the order paper, to introduce a resolution in connection with pensions for the blind. I know of no more worthy legislation which could be brought down. While many millions of dollars have been expended, primarily for relief purposes, for bridges, buildings, highways and public construction, those afflicted with lack of sight have certainly had no benefit by way of relief or otherwise from any of these expenditures. They do not know the pleasure of driving a car or playing golf or engaging in other outdoor sports, but they are readily reminded of their unhappy lot when unexpectedly their bodies are jarred in stepping down a six inch curb or in coming into contact with a partly opened door, and I cannot believe any hon. member will be adverse to such legislation. Certainly I am sure the provinces will join in it and the public will approve it, and the measure will have the everlasting gratitude of those who are so afflicted.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Permit me, Mr. Speaker, on first addressing the house to add my felicitations to you on reaching your high and responsible office, and to express the hope that your duties will come easily and agreeably to their accomplishment. During the many years in which I have walked and run along the road of life I have not come until these days into the privilege of sitting in a house where one is permitted by one's fellow citizens to deflect or to alter the course of the country's historical progress. I have however, always assumed that those who did so sit and discharge their duties felt a sense of real deliberation and responsibility; I have been mortified during the course of the last week's proceedings to listen to childish stone throwing and mud slinging, and I sincerely hope that these will be dissipated in the zeal and concern with which we shall address ourselves to our real duties. I am reminded of a quatrain which I wish to quote:

> Every little boy and gal
> That comes into this world alive
> Is either a little Liberal
> Or else a little Conservative.

Sir W. S. Gilbert gave those lines to one of his characters in that charming light opera, Gilbert and Sullivan's Iolanthe, and in doing so permitted that character to express a wholesome truth. The structure of man's mind ranges along a line of activity and expression which has at one end conservatism and at the other end liberalism. This description is true universally, wherever man is born into this world alive, and it varies not whether the man be white or black or brown or red or yellow. The hoi polloi—and I do not use that term with any disparagement—that mass about the point of demarcation between the definite Conservative attitude of mind and the definite Liberal attitude of mind constitute the real reason for the political trickiness and chicanery which so often mark and mar the progress of our institutions. They find themselves strangely subject to the influence of either party. They are indignant or they are pleased at the loss or gain of their vote because, forsooth, they have made their best guess as to who would be the successful candidate and as a matter of fact have assisted in doing what they could to bring about his success. To the extreme type at either end of this line of activity and expression, from which only the party politicians are selected or select themselves, there is a lake filled with good fish, teeming with innumerable suckers; and the bait which is presented to them, whether that bait be work and wages, or blasted markets, or the milk and honey of other countries overflowing into our own, is justified by the fact that they desire for their party the crown of office, the orb of the high political principles of their party, and the sceptre of party patronage.

It is a fact that will become more apparent the more it is studied that you cannot convert a Conservative structure of mind by a Liberal argument, and you cannot alter a Liberal structure of mind by a Conservative argument. And so there is presented the difficulty of our political situation in this and every other country governed by the ballot. Thus the two ends play always against the middle to the hurt of all. I do not question the high ethical principles which dominate our high political commands, nor the manner in which they marshal themselves to the attack of each other for the good of their country; but I do wish by my words at the outset of my speeches in this chamber to draw attention to one of the most serious political difficulties of our system of political life. For some moments there must have arisen in the minds of members of the house a question as to what position this group of seven holds in its deliberations. If the house is composed of Liberals and Conservatives, where does this puny group of seven orientate itself? The answer is really simpler than the question. For the first time in the history of this august parliament we have come to a truly foundational opposition by a coherent group; and we, sir, are that foundational opposition and that small group, the outgrowth of the long continued and persistent efforts of our respected leader. Alive to the oikos nomos, we are the scientific students of economics which in this day and age of the downfall and portending holocaust of capitalism must discover to the world the personal advantages, the national security and the universal brotherhood which underlie as foundation stones the social structures and the social culture and advancement of the system of society called socialism.

So we rise to our task definitely as an entering wedge to cleave apart the thoughts of the people of Canada and to awaken them to the fact that the old system of capitalism is dying and that the institutions of our country must be built up on the cooperative commonwealth. We do not fail to pay tribute to the tremendous advances of things temporal which have been brought about and are directly contributed to by capitalist exploitation and enterprise. But we firmly believe that no exploitation of any one man by another justifies the advance or progress of any system of society. We cannot however view without considerable alarm the hypocritical efforts of political, financial and industrial magnates to hoodwink the people and attempt to dispel their mental images of the onsweeping tide of human progress, of machine development, of constructional experience, of progressive efficiency, and of human savoir faire, which are continually advancing the conditions of our life—all this, I say, while the savings of the people are dwindling, while the Lares and Penates in our homes are being sacrificed, while men, women and children in our land are staggering toward the unknown over a desert route between the high limiting walls of relief, bringing nothing to the community but sorrow and blame, and nothing to themselves but the bitternesses of life, brought about by thwarted efforts and blasted beliefs.

It is pitiful to read, as we do in our daily papers, of the efforts of one of the sagacious minds of our country, a man gifted with amazing commercial acumen, who spends himself in the interests of one of the greatest transportation systems of the world, and who is compelled, by the limitations of his position, to gird himself always whenever an enemy to the advance of his great industrial system raises its head.

But apart from all this we are profoundly moved and disturbed when we learn that the single invention of two young men in another country bids fair to destroy the hundred and fifty year old occupation of the human cotton picker, and that in this year of grace 1936 it will almost abolish the customary employment of over two million people in one cotton growing area alone. We are profoundly disturbed in our economic studies by the fact that similar inventions in this Canada of ours are continually being advanced by the selfish and exploiting greed of those who govern our country, and we are always watchful that something should be done by this august parliament to face the issue and bring to our people a sense of satisfaction which it appears to be deliberately refusing them.

It is not my purpose to make a long speech. I find myself on my feet, shaking in every limb. At the same time I want to bring home my points, and I want the house to feel that I am earnest in what I am saying, and that this group represents an earnest desire to solve the difficulties of our country. We welcome by our side this already robust group of social crediters, not because there is anything in their work that would lead us to think they might be found on our side or might advance with us the standard of socialism, but because they are avowedly determined to study the position of the country and the difficulties of its people by addressing themselves to the economic aspect. In that respect, sir, we welcome them and wish them well. When they know us better they will fear us less and honour our cause more. But, sir, I do ask this honourable house and its members not to confuse the cooperative commonwealth federation group of seven with those who in present day colloquial speech are classed as communists and anarchists. To do that is all too common; but if you must do it, it will not ultimately harm us. Nearly two thousand years ago those who followed the Master heard the term "Christian" spoken in utter opprobrium, and it did not hurt his followers. But these terms are intended by many in the house and all through the country to bring into derision the cause we uphold.

I would respectfully call the attention of hon. members to the high ethical standard of a system of society represented in communism, where in harmony, and understanding of their difficulties, men and women hold all things in common; and I am quite sure that every member is aware of that nirvana of human society termed anarchy, a system of society in complete accord, in which the conditions of law will not be inscribed on statute books but written in the hearts of its men and women. But these glorious states of society are altogether too far off to be considered in our present day; we must remember that we exist amid entirely different conditions. Humanity is still wallowing at the bottom of the hill. I call attention to these facts in order that the house may thoroughly understand the position of this group of seven. I want hon. members to feel that we, in our efforts to bring to the deliberations of this chamber the economics of the situation, will always present these as against purely political contradictions. There is in all this a plea for some understanding. Understanding will bring tolerance and tolerance will pave the way for the removal of all abuses. Let there be a truce to hypocrisy and cant; a truce to talking for talking's sake; a truce to burying our heads in the sand while the people of the country are dying in misery and we are doing nothing to help them; a truce to ignoring the facts of this true opposition in the house, coherent at last, and dedicated in season and out of season to the cause of socialism.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I share the impatience expressed by some of the previous speakers at certain features of the debate, and the meagre promise given of remedial legislation designed to cope with the situation before us. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and members on both sides of the chamber have made brief but impressive reference to the seriousness of the situation, and it is gratifying that there is agreement on this score. As some of our national problems overshadow all other considerations, I had hoped that at the opening of this parliament we might dispense with the customary exchange of partisan pleasantries or recriminations and address ourselves soberly to the pressing problems of the moment.

The situation as I view it not only places a grave responsibility upon the administration but constitutes a most acute crisis for the majority of our Canadian people. In my humble opinion it is not quite so important that we should carefully observe the ritual of a bygone day, as that we should observe the democratic traditions of a British parliament, by which this house may become an instrument for imperative social change and the necessary adaptation of our political approach to rapidly changing social and economic problems.

During this debate uncomfortable revelations have been made indicating that party considerations are frequently placed before national considerations. Quite properly reference has been made by many speakers to the necessity of preserving in this house the principles of democracy—"government of the people, by the people, for the people." But may I point out that nothing so imperils the security of our democracy as those appeals to the electorate designed to arouse prejudice rather than to establish a sound political consciousness, or a sane comprehensive outlook on our national problems. I feel that it is a sad day for our democracy when any party, simply by commanding extensive financial resources, may control the facilities of propaganda and thus obscure the real issues. It is to be deplored that attempts should have been made to exploit, in a coercive manner, the relationships between employer and employee. In my opinion such methods ultimately create grave distrust in our political institutions and cause many of our people to seek political expression through means usually regarded as unconstitutional.

In this respect I regret that hon. members on the other side of the house have chosen to speak slightingly of groups sitting in this corner. Whatever differences of opinion may exist, I submit that we represent a large body of opinion, an important cross-section of the electorate, composed of decent, law-abiding people, with decent aspirations, who sought with the ballot, in a constitutional manner, to register their protest against conditions which may be rightly regarded as intolerable, and to express their firm resolution to establish in this country for our people a more satisfactory way of living. Any intolerant or contemptous treatment of these views is not consistent with the best parliamentary tradition in Canada. Of all matters arising during the recent campaign the one which I think might be discussed to the greatest advantage is the fact that an increasing number of people in Canada are restless, not only because of the chilling fear of insecurity but also because of a growing distrust of our political institutions. Far too many people regard this house as merely an instrument to preserve the status quo rather than as a medium through which they may obtain redress for social and economic wrongs. I hope we may have some assurance from the Prime Minister that due recognition will be given to the views advocated by this and other minority groups, for arbitrarily and contemptuously to refuse consideration of these views so strongly desired by so many people would accentuate rather than minimize the gravity of the situation.

I make these remarks in the light of recent experience. Before my departure to attend this session I took the opportunity to cross the constituency which I represent here in order to secure as far as possible some discussion of the problems which, in the opinion of the electors, should be brought to the attention of the house. In my opinion it was a wholesome sign that there participated in these meetings and discussions many who had not found it possible to support the platform on which I was elected. They were willing to lay aside partisan considerations and bitterness and to enter into these discussions. I found that they were not concerned in any great degree with party considerations or party aggrandizement but that they were mainly concerned with the solution of those problems that weigh most heavily at the present time on all sections of our community. I can safely say, Mr. Speaker, that in the constituency of Vancouver North but a very small percentage of the population enjoys any reasonable degree of economic security, and we have had to face some of the more ghastly phases of destitution and want.

Should I be suspected of exaggeration you need not accept my unsupported statement. Ask the doctors, the nurses, the social welfare workers in the more thickly populated areas. Ask such men as the Reverend John Antle of the Columbia coast mission and his assistants, who now must minister not only to the spiritual but also to the physical needs of the people facing great hardships along the coasts of British Columbia. If you could step on that mission ship to-night you would find it laden with clothing required for women and children who otherwise would be without. They are making a valiant attempt to cope with a situation for which as yet adequate provision has not been made by the state. All these people will tell you that they are facing conditions that may be described as nothing short of appalling and that constitute an ugly blot on our Canadian life.

In my effort to gain some insight into the desires of the electors of my constituency I found that it was these matters about which they were mainly concerned. They asked me what might be done to relieve the distress and degradation imposed upon their fellows in their communities. They asked me how they might regain some reasonable degree of security and escape the precarious modes of living which they must now undertake. They asked me what might be done more properly to equate consumption needs with their ability to produce the things needed for a satisfactory standard of living. Not once but several times I was reminded, "Mr. MacNeil, I hope when you reach Ottawa you will not forget us poor folk"— a very touching plea. I mention this now not for reasons of sentiment, but because it reveals a very general belief that too often in the deliberations of the house the interests of the common folk are relegated to the background.

I believe, sir, in the expression of its views the house should more clearly and definitely reflect this anxiety, this concern of the great majority of the electors of this country. It is of very little advantage to promote the temporary prosperity of the few while the many are permanently depressed, and I submit that unless we place these considerations above all others during this and succeeding sessions, not only the present administration but parliament itself will forfeit, and rightly forfeit, the confidence of the people.

I am especially interested in the reference made in the speech from the throne to unemployment. I find there scant comfort for those who must now endure the tragic consequences of a prolonged period of unemployment. Of these problems I may claim, sir, to have intimate knowledge, gained through painful personal experience. On numerous occasions I have been delegated to present the views of the unemployed before the local authorities, so I think I may claim to hold, to some extent, a special brief for the unemployed. I know something of the barriers that, under present conditions, confront men who by industry and thrift are attempting to rehabilitate themselves in our national life. My plea on behalf of the unemployed is not for more compassionate consideration of their needs, though heaven knows they need more compassionate consideration. My plea is that conditions at present existing among our unemployed in Canada should be dealt with more definitely from the standpoint of the public interest, for it is not in the public interest that we should any longer permit the perpetuation of conditions that have shattered so many of our Canadian homes and wrecked the lives of thousands of our young people.

The true nature of the problem is not revealed in the official statistics available; nevertheless these statistics give some inkling of the magnitude of the problem. We know that in Canada to-day there are over a million people so destitute of this world's goods that they must appeal for aid from the public treasury. We know that an equally large number are in almost as serious a plight, sometimes on relief and sometimes off, always on the fringe of destitution and subject to almost unendurable insecurity. We also know that prior to the end of December, 1935, a sum in excess of $500,000,000 has been expended from the federal, provincial and municipal treasuries under relief measures, and this vast sum does not include enormous amounts collected and disbursed by semi-public charitable institutions. We know that there has been serious exploitation of the unemployed by unscrupulous employers of labour, and this situation has tended to lower wage levels and in that respect has dealt serious injury to the working class in this country. The cumulative results of this prolonged period of unemployment, coupled with inadequate relief measures, are not generally understood. It is easy to say glibly that over a million people in Canada are destitute to the degree that they must accept public relief, but to understand the situation properly it must be thought of in terms of the lack in those homes of butter and sugar and meat and proper clothing, of living under leaky roofs and without proper sanitary facilities. We must recognize that due to the long continuance of unemployment people have been unable to replace articles of household equipment necessary for healthy living. In many sections of the constituency which I represent people are herded in slum housing conditions that will soon be as bad as those we read of with horror in the cities of Europe. This not only results in the impairment of physical health and a consequent national loss, but constitutes a grave threat to the national welfare, for if an epidemic should break out among people living under such conditions it would menace not only them but the entire community. In this and other respects unemployment is a threat to the welfare of the entire nation.

Another consideration that is generally overlooked is that prolonged unemployment has resulted in serious deterioration of manual skill. You see this as you observe men struggling to regain a foothold in industry after three or four years of enforced idleness; they find it extremely difficult to regain the skill demanded in modern industry. Many are falling by the wayside. This is particularly noticeable in the relief camps. Recently I spent some time visiting several of the larger relief camps in British Columbia. I was extended every courtesy. I admit that these camps are conducted as well as possible under the circumstances. They are often referred to as slave compounds; I am not inclined to use that description tonight, but my impression of them is one of human scrap heaps. There you find young men with no outlet for their talents, no hope of regaining their rightful place in the life of the community. It was suggested by one speaker that the average stay in these camps is only ninety-five days, but I found men there who have fallen into such a state of hopelessness, who have lost ambition to the extent that they have been in those camps two or three years without making any attempt even to reach the nearest city. I heartily concur in the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) that this atmosphere of hopelessness is something that should cause us grave concern. Men are scrapped, given no opportunity. It is suggested that educational facilities have been provided, but I ask any hon. member to explain to me how under such conditions the inmates of these camps can profitably pursue studies or even read. Let any one examine the supply of literature, the magazines, and he will realize that it is absurd to say that the men are being given educational or even proper recreational facilities. All these conditions tend to produce an attitude of apathy and hopelessness that in my opinion is terrible. I suggest that in considering further public expenditures beyond the staggering sums already disbursed we should insist that such expenditures should represent not so much a grudging dole, not so much a cheap form of insurance against social disorder but a genuine investment in the rehabilitation of human lives.

In this connection I deplore very much official statements sometimes appearing in the public press to the effect that relief has become a racket. This creates the impression that in the official mind the unemployed are regarded merely as a tiresome responsibility, as a group of people who have not jobs and so must be fed. I am in a position to give the lie direct to the statement often made that the unemployed consist largely of those who have no work because they will not work. Anyone who has made a careful study of the situation knows that the army of the unemployed is recruited from all walks of life, represents all trades, all professions, all occupations. Above all, they are human beings, and unemployment does terrible things to human beings. And they are not just an appendage to the nation, they are our own people; they are in and of the nation, and what touches one touches all. I have met many men who have lost members of their family in recent years; one man in particular lost his wife because she was unable to obtain adequate medical attention when required. He shook his fist in my face and said, "MacNeil, they murdered my wife," and when I considered the circumstances related by him I could not quarrel with that statement. We should consider the situation revealed in a recent statement by a mother in Vancouver, who found to her horror that her son, after having spent years moping around the home while the family was on relief, had become involved in the underworld. These conditions have engendered bitterness which I feel has some justification.

In the speech from the throne the government proposes stimulation of industry by various methods. May I point out that even if by trade agreements or other legislation industry could be restored to, let us say, the production level of 1929, yet by reason of the technological advance of industry there would still be no work for fifty per cent of our unemployed. It is proposed that a commission be established. I have a vision of how that message will be received by the unemployed. They will ask, as did the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett): What for? Is it for further inquiry, or is it for the development of a policy to deal with this serious situation? May I direct the attention of the government to the fact that the conditions of the unemployed have already been investigated to the last humiliating item and in the most intimate manner. The magnitude of the problem is already fairly known, in general terms, and no good purpose could be served by any further inquiry into the matter. The facts are now before the government. I submit further that the problem is of such proportions that no commission appointed by the government could possibly evolve a policy which would adequately meet the situation or assume the responsibility which in my opinion should properly be borne by the administration and by members of this House of Commons. Under the system which has prevailed in the past these, our people, have been scrapped; they have been left to rot, and rot spreads. For these reasons the unemployment which is permitted to exist in Canada to-day is undermining the very stability of our national life. I would urge that because of these conditions we should now engage in a unified and national effort to wipe out the social injustices which find expression in the tragedies of unemployment.

One of the greatest problems related to that of unemployment is found in connection with a large number of ex-service men. About 50,000 Canadian and imperial ex-service men will be extremely disappointed because in the speech from the throne no reference has been made to steps which might be taken by the government to implement the recommendations of the Hyndman commission. I submit that procrastination in the solution of this problem is the more costly procedure.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Able-bodied ex-service men must, of course, cast in their lot with their fellow workers. As I understand the situation, they do not desire any preferential treatment, but I submit that every consideration is due ex-service men who are physically handicapped but who are not eligible for benefits under the Pension Act or the War Veterans Allowance Act. Their problem has not yet been solved, and it would ease the general situation if certain well defined categories of ex-service men who are physically handicapped and have a special claim on the nation should be now taken off the labour market. I would urge upon the government that during this session an opportunity be provided for further discussion of this matter, and an examination of the evidence that has been so painstakingly prepared by large and important organizations of ex-service men.

The chief problem we must consider has to do with the security of our Canadian people, and using to some extent the words of a prominent United States business man I suggest that we will enjoy the wealth that is ours in Canada only as we endeavour to distribute that wealth equitably among all. We will enjoy security, that which so many of our people passionately desire, only as we establish security for all. We will enjoy economic liberty as well as the political liberty of which we boast, only as we liberate the masses of our people from the sordid and age-old struggle for food, shelter and clothing and make it possible for them to release their energies in the ways that are indicated by human aspirations.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne we find the statement that unemployment continues to be Canada's most urgent problem, and that the government intends to endeavour to put every man back to work. But to-day it is evident that unemployment is inherent in any system that does not deliberately make work, and it is therefore useless to hope that by increasing industrial activity it will ever be possible to reabsorb the total army of the unemployed. Under the heading of Sources of Unemployment, in the December issue of the Labour Gazette, page 1126, we find the following statement:

> The recent depression might never have reached such alarming proportions if the economic equilibrium of the world had not first of all been upset by the growth of unemployment right in the middle of a period of economic recovery and prosperity.

Stuart Chase, in dealing with this subject, points out that onward, from 1920 to 1929, in spite of the fact that the output of industry was steadily increasing and that we had an era of prosperity, unemployment was steadily increasing at the same time. The time has evidently come when industrial efficiency apparently has little use for more man power in the great primary industries, no matter how much the output of industry increases. However, surely that is not any reason for sorrow. For generations past we have been striving to increase the productive capacity of man by the use of scientific inventions, and to-day we find that we have been so successful that we are actually in possession of surplus productive capacity, both machine and man power. We have emerged from an era of scarcity into an era of abundance, and we have reached that stage where it is both possible and logical that we should engage in an era of greater leisure. As Major Douglas has put the matter, the best brains are endeavouring to put this world out of work, to create what is miscalled an unemployment problem, but which in reality is a condition of greater leisure. A viewpoint similar to that is expressed by the League of Nations World Economic Survey of 1932-33, which report, in dealing with wages and social policy, states as follows:

> Considering the mechanization of industry from the standpoint of history, it becomes evident that the age of abundance is the goal towards which mankind has been striving since earliest days. That we are prone to look upon facilitation of production as a curse resulting in poverty and idleness, and not a blessed relief from toil, is merely an indication of the defective nature of our present economic system.

I should like to repeat that last sentence:

> That we are prone to look upon facilitation of production as a curse resulting in poverty and idleness, and not a blessed relief from toil, is merely an indication of the defective nature of our present economic system.

In this regard we should remember the words of Irving Fisher, as they appear in his book, Booms and Depressions. He points out the fact that "the depression was not caused by unemployment," and it also follows suit that even if it were possible to do away with unemployment we would not necessarily do away with the depression. For example: If we were to borrow a sufficient sum of money to put every man to work on a program of public works, what would be the result? There would be a tremendous increase in fixed debt charges; there would be higher prices, and eventually we would be actually decreasing the purchasing power of the people. Then again, if we were to put every man to work in industry, would we have found a solution of our difficulties? No. The result would be a major catastrophe, because we would produce tremendous quantities of goods which the people would not have the purchasing power to buy. The final result would be wholesale bankruptcies, followed eventually by wholesale unemployment, and the last stage of the people would be worse than the first.

It is also true to state that the depression is not the cause of unemployment, because unemployment has been steadily increasing in times of prosperity. We must realize that to-day unemployment is a sign of progress, and the only reason we are not in a position to take advantage of this progress is because, as the League of Nations has stated, we are operating under a defective economic system. Upon an investigation of the economic system, as our leader has already stated, we find that owing to certain practices industry fails to distribute sufficient purchasing power to buy back its own production. If that statement is correct, what would we expect to find as a result? We would find that there would be a large surplus of goods produced that the people would not be able to buy, and as industry could not continue to produce a surplus of goods that it could not sell it would be obliged to dismiss some of its employees. That in turn would decrease their purchasing power and decrease the effective demand as against the supply of goods, thereby resulting in more goods remaining unsold, and industry dismissing more men, and so the vicious circle would steadily narrow.

Is that not exactly the condition that we find throughout the world to-day? In the days before the machine era the profits of individual workers were small and as such were available as purchasing power; but to-day, owing to the great mechanization and centralization of industry, we find that the profits of the corporations are sufficiently large that their beneficiaries, even though they explore every form of luxury, do not need to spend their entire income, with the result that a portion of it is saved, and so long as it is saved it is not available as purchasing power. If it is eventually spent on goods it becomes available as purchasing power, but if on the other hand these savings become reinvested in new production and used as working capital, then there will be caused a permanent deficiency of purchasing power equal to the amount of the reinvestment. If this were a matter of only a few hundreds of thousands of dollars I would not take time to deal with it, but as there are many millions of dollars involved I shall deal with it at some length.

Mr. P. W. Martin, in his book Unemployment and Purchasing Power, has this to say on the question of reinvestment of savings:

> So long as the circulating medium of exchange is put to its two uses of (1) inducing production (i.e. paying wages and dividends) and (2) buying the production thus induced, alternately, industry can sell all it makes. But it must be alternately. When part of the community's purchasing power is used not to buy goods but to add to the working capital, this necessary alternation is not being observed; purchasing power is being used twice running for the same purpose. The circulating medium has short circuited as it were. Money which should have been used to purchase goods is being used, for the second time in succession, to induce further production, and, as an inevitable consequence more production will be induced than there is purchasing power available to buy it.

To show the great extent to which this practice takes place I should like to quote from the Pollack Foundation, from a book entitled Profits:

> Profits from industry in the U.S.A. in one year were $6,700,000,000. Of this amount $3,900,000,000 was paid out in dividends, and $2,800,000,000 was reinvested in new production.

Now this $2,800,000,000 had already entered into the cost of one set of goods, and instead of being made available to buy these goods it was immediately thrown into the cost of producing more goods. One purchasing power cannot pay for two costs, and yet we wonder at the absence of purchasing power.

Without taking time to deal with very many of the causes of the deficiency of purchasing power I might refer to the fact that depreciation charges also constitute a large part of the deficiency. Interest charges and profit charges, becoming afterwards reinvested, would also cause a deficiency. Then there is deflation, the results of which we know only too well, so I shall not take time to deal with them.

In view of these facts it becomes evident that the income of the people cannot buy the country's total production. Orthodox economists attack this statement on the ground that it does not need to, as people are not interested in buying capital goods such as plant and equipment. So let us follow the argument along these lines: that the income of the people as represented by payment of salaries, wages and dividends from the production of capital goods, plus salaries, wages and dividends from the production of consumption goods, is inadequate to pay the total price of consumption goods, unless you can have a volume of capital production sufficiently great that the payment of salaries, wages and dividends from the production of capital goods is equal to the amount of the deficiency that exists as between the total prices of ultimate goods and the amount of purchasing power distributed in their production. Now, if in order to bring about this equation we carry out a program of production of capital goods, what are we going to do with it? If we ship these goods to other countries we would have to demand gold in payment, and immediately we would find that every other country was attempting to do the same thing, and we would very soon be faced with a vanishing market. If we attempt to bring about this equation through a program of public works, how is it going to be financed? In the past it has been financed by borrowing money which has had to be repaid by taxation and there would be interest charges that would also have to be repaid by taxation, so that in the final analysis we would be actually decreasing purchasing power instead of increasing it. In support of this statement I would like to quote from an orthodox authority, Mr. Jackson Dodds, who appeared as a witness before the standing committee on banking and commerce in 1934, and gave evidence. He was being questioned by Mr. Irvine:

> Mr. Irvine: I am trying to get at this as basically as possible. I want to know if we have a depression now. The witness says we have. He has told us how the bankers discovered that there was a depression. I am now getting at what brought it here, and I am trying to arrive at that by a process of elimination. He says there is plenty of wealth, plenty of goods, and with plenty of resources we can make more. Well then, the question is, is it because of the incapacity of the Canadian peoples' stomachs and backs to use these goods within the last few years that we have this depression?
> Mr. Jackson Dodds: No, I would say it is because we cannot sell these goods.
> Mr. Irvine: Why cannot we sell them?
> Mr. Dodds: Because people outside the country won't buy them.
> Mr. Irvine: What about the people inside the country?
> Mr. Dodds: Well, the people inside the country are also doing business on the basis of what is sold outside the country, and if there is no business going on outside the country, that is, if we are not doing an international trade, business must fall off within the country.

That statement very ably backs up the contention of Major Douglas that it does not matter how great a wealth of goods you have within a country; you may be able to produce a surplus of every kind of commodity imaginable, but unless you can sell a certain proportion of those goods outside the country so that the salaries, wages and dividends paid out in their production are equal to the amount of the deficiency of purchasing power that exists within the country it will be impossible for the people to buy the goods they require and that are available for distribution.

Borrowing money to finance a program of public works can be considered sound business only if the money can be borrowed without paying interest charges, and, second, if it never has to be repaid. In support of that I would like to go back to the year 1913 and follow the debt growth from that time on. We find that the total bonded indebtedness of Canada in 1913 stood at the figure of $2,132,000,000. By 1933 it had increased to $8,972,000,000, or an increase of 8 per cent compounded annually; in other words, an increase of 323 per cent in two decades. In 1913, it took 13 per cent of the net production of the country to pay the fixed debt charges. By 1933, it took 42·8 per cent of the net production of the country to pay the fixed debt charges. If we are going to continue in the future at the same rate that we have progressed in the past, it can be only a question of time before the fixed debt charges of the country will be greater than its total production. And then what will be the result? I suppose some members will tell us that, in order that the sacredness of the written contract may be maintained, the people of Canada must be prepared to starve, just as in the past some hon. members have told us that, in order that the sacredness of the written contract may be maintained, the people of Canada must be willing to tighten their belts. It would be interesting to know exactly what happens to the vast annual payment of debt. No doubt some of it will find its way into the pockets of the small investor and be used as purchasing power. But unfortunately by far the greater proportion of it will be lost as purchasing power by repayments of loans to the banks, cancellation of book entries, and also by being used for reinvestment purposes by the large investor.

The foregoing summary is sufficient to prove Major Douglas's contention that industry fails to distribute sufficient purchasing power to buy back its own production, with the result that there is a steady increase of unemployment, and also that there is a continual fight for foreign markets.

In view of these facts, what is the real problem before us to-day? Unemployment? No, because for generations past we have been striving to bring about an era of greater leisure, and the problem becomes merely one of bringing about a more equitable distribution of the work that there is to be done. Foreign markets? No, because we have in Canada a great market crying out for these goods, and the goods we do not require can be exchanged for those we cannot produce in Canada. No; the problem is: first, to stimulate the purchasing power of the people of Canada until it is equal to the capacity of industry to produce and deliver goods; second, as the capacity of industry to produce and deliver goods increases, to guarantee that the ability of the people to procure these goods shall be increased to a like degree. We claim that this can be accomplished only by financing consumption, and in order to do this it will be necessary to regain for the nation the control and issue of currency and credit. We should keep in mind that anything that is physically possible can be made financially possible; that the only real justification for production is consumption; that is, that the only real reason for producing goods is in order that they may be consumed. Therefore, before seeking foreign markets, let us be certain first of all that we have satisfied the requirements of our own people.

In closing I would like to remind the house of the words of Einstein regarding this subject, that:

> The purchasing power of the masses must never be allowed to fall below the collective prices of commodities.

In other words we must equate consumption with production.

Main motion (Mr. Slaght) agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of the house as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

ELECTION OF MR. FREDERICK GEORGE SANDERSON, MEMBER FOR PERTH

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The next duty of the house, Mr. Speaker, once the address to His Excellency has been agreed on, is to elect the chairman of the committees of the house, who will also be the Deputy Speaker. Standing order 56, under which this procedure is taken, provides that the member elected to serve as Deputy Speaker shall be required to possess the full and practical knowledge of the language which is other than that of the Speaker for the time being.

I desire to propose to the house, seconded by Mr. Lapointe:

That Frederick George Sanderson, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Perth, be appointed Chairman of the committees of the whole house.

May I observe that the duties of Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker are almost as important and onerous as those of the Speaker himself. The qualifications required of the Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees are similar to those which are expected of the Speaker of the house, and which I think we have already discussed very fully. I am quite sure that all hon. members who were in previous parliaments with Mr. Sanderson—he has been here for over ten years—will agree that in that time he won the respect and good will of the members generally. If appointed to this joint position, he will prove, I am sure, persona grata to all parties in the House of Commons, and will discharge the duties thereof with impartiality and dignity. I therefore beg to move the resolution I have just read.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Is this not a motion requiring notice?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. The rules provide that as soon as the address is disposed of the house shall proceed immediately to the appointment of a Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is that we had to give notice of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, never.

Mr. BENNETT: There never was a time, Mr. Speaker, when it was more important that those who preside over this house, whether the house is sitting as such or in committee, should be fair and impartial and not create a feeling of resentment on the part of those who comprise the minority. In the selection of Mr. Sanderson I have no fault to find with the government, because the responsibility must rest entirely with them, but those of us who have suffered from the violence of partisan attacks in the past in the house will hope that there will be such a measure of improvement in the hon. gentleman when he assumes the position of Deputy Speaker as will warrant us in having confidence in his impartiality and faith in his judgment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot allow my right hon. friend to say that any party in the house has suffered from any acts of partisanship on the part of any presiding officer.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can never find out what my right hon. friend does say. He says one thing—

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot be responsible for my right hon. friend's lack of intelligence, much as I may be responsible for other things. I have not said that. If anyone had taken the trouble to listen he would know exactly what I did say. I said that I hoped we would not suffer from partisanship such as we have had to suffer from the hon. gentleman who is now being asked to preside over the committees of the house.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As one who suffered so much from injustice in every shape, manner and form during the long five years while the right hon. gentleman who is now leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was leader of the government, may I say that at that time he did not know what fairness was. I was called to order at every opportunity, and most of the times when I was called to order I was in the right. I could hardly speak. When it came to a decision of the chair, the chair gave wholesale decisions instead of ruling on each point as it came up.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to a question of privilege. It is all right, Mr. Speaker, to endeavour to convert the House of Commons into a comedy, but when hon. gentlemen rise in their places and make reflections on the chair, I claim—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: —that it is the duty of the chair—

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. There was no comedy, but if there was, the right hon. gentleman was the actor and I was his manager.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the incident closed.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1936-37

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the message of His Excellency the Governor General received by this house on Tuesday, 11th instant, and the estimates for the year 1936-37 transmitted therewith, be referred to the committee of supply.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): On a question of procedure, must we not wait until the setting up of the committee of supply before that motion is made? The committee could be set up to-morrow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The committee of supply is a committee of the whole house. A motion was adopted to set it up, and my right hon. friend supported that motion.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman moved a moment ago that on Friday next a motion would be made to set up the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means. That was the motion put to this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion was put and carried to-day to set up these committees to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT: But the committees are not set up until to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that if the objection he raises would in any way assist the house in the matter of its business there might be some point to it, but it seems to me that when the committee has been established in the usual form and language it is quite proper that the estimates should be immediately referred to that committee. This has been done at every previous session of parliament, as my right hon. friend knows. However, I shall now move the adjournment of the house.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I was asking the question only for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion is that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. BENNETT: There was another motion before the house, and it was not disposed of.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I move that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to to-morrow's business I do not know whether my right hon. friend would oblige the house by consenting to our going into committee of supply to-morrow. I know there is a rule to the effect that on Thursdays and Fridays we cannot take up consideration of the estimates of any departments of which an item has not been called earlier in the week, but I will give an undertaking that no estimates will be discussed that—

Mr. BENNETT: The house has adjourned, as I understand the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was simply seeking to reach an understanding on to-morrow's business. Very well; the house has adjourned.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Friday, February 14, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1936-37

Hon. CHARLES A DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the message of His Excellency the Governor General received by this house on Tuesday, 11th instant, and the estimates for the year 1936-37 transmitted therewith, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MacINNIS

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege, in reference to a statement I made in the house on Wednesday last. I read the statement from page 151 of Hansard:

However that did not prevent the Liberal party from helping the communists in Vancouver East. I am told that the communist candidate in Vancouver East did not put in an account of his election expenses, and I understand his reason for refraining was, as he stated, that the Liberal party had provided the funds and that it was up to them to put in the expense account.

Since that time I have received information from Mr. Bruce, who was the communist candidate, that my statement was not correct. As he has no one here to make the statement for him, I wish to put that on record.

HYNDMAN REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. WILTON (West Hamilton): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Power). Is it the intention of the government during the present session to implement the Hyndman report in respect to providing employment for war veterans disabled or otherwise?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Wilton) was courteous enough to give me notice of the question, and I thank him for doing so. No doubt he is aware that the Hyndman report contains something like twenty-four recommendations with respect to ex-service men, of which eight deal with the problem of unemployment and sixteen with what is called unemployment assistance. Of these recommendations a considerable number were implemented by the late government, and some few have been implemented since. At the present time the remainder are receiving the serious consideration of the government, and I anticipate that within a very short time I shall be in a position to make a statement to the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES OF SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when we reach government orders it is my intention to ask the house to consider order No. 1, which relates to supply. That there may be no possibility of further misunderstanding between my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and myself with respect to the committee having been properly constituted by the action taken by the house last evening, I have asked the clerk of the house to let me have a memorandum which I could read to the house and which would set forth accurately the position with respect to the appointment of the two committees of the whole house, namely the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means.

The following is the memorandum I have received:

> There is only one way to appoint the committee of supply. It is done by moving that the house will at a future sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty. When this motion has passed, the committee is in existence. The same practice is followed in Great Britain, where standing order No. 14 states:
> "This house will, in future, appoint the committee of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Majesty's speech."
> May, page 520, says:
> "The action taken by the House of Commons upon the demand of aid and supply for the public service made by the speech from the throne is the appointment, pursuant to standing order No. 14, of those committees of the whole house, which are known as the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means. Motions setting up these committees are made immediately after the house agrees to the address in answer to the speech from the throne, and are put forthwith from the chair, no debate being permitted thereon."
> It was not merely a notice that was given last night, February 13th. It was the actual appointment. The committee is now in existence, but it cannot sit until a motion has passed for the Speaker to leave the chair except on Thursdays and Fridays when he does so under standing order 28.

I also looked up Hansard of last year to see what was done at that time with respect to the appointment of these committees, and the referring of the estimates to the committee of supply. At page 153 of Hansard it will be seen that the Minister of Finance moved:

> That the estimates tabled on the 23rd instant, together with the accompanying message of His Excellency, be referred to the committee of supply.

The motion was agreed to. This motion to refer the estimates was made immediately after the motion appointing the committees of supply and of ways and means. The motion reads as follows:

> That this house will at its next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

There was a similar motion with respect to the committee of ways and means.

May I point out that under the rules of the house, if the government calls the order with respect to supply, the Speaker on Friday leaves the chair without motion being put.

It is the desire of the government to proceed as rapidly as possible with government business, and the order respecting supply will be called immediately. When the house is in committee of supply and the deputy speaker is in the chair, the committee will have the estimates before it. As none of the estimates, however, have been considered in the early part of the week, that is to say on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday, unless the house gives its unanimous consent, the government cannot consider estimates of any department of which an item has not already been called at some previous sitting of the committee of the whole. It will be necessary, therefore, for us to obtain the unanimous consent of the house to take up any supply.

I hope hon. members will find it possible to give their consent to permit the house to proceed immediately with the estimates. If that consent is given, it is proposed this afternoon to give consideration to estimates of the Department of Public Works, and this evening to those of the Department of Agriculture. I should like to point out the importance of progress being made as rapidly as possible with government business. It is in the public interest that this should be done, and I am sure it is equally the desire of hon. members that at this session in particular we should proceed as rapidly as possible with the business of the session. The government sought to have the estimates placed before hon. members at as early a moment as was possible in the session. The estimates have been before hon. members now for some days. I hope, therefore, that when the house resolves itself into committee of supply, consent will be given to discuss the estimates of the departments to which reference has been made. In the event of there being any item called which is likely to be contentious, and which hon. members may wish to have held over for discussion at another time, it will not be proceeded with. I would ask the clerk to call order No. 1.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the right hon. gentleman has said I should like to direct attention to the fact that it is not regular to read an opinion of the clerk of the house with respect to these matters. Questions of procedure are dealt with by the Speaker, who, for the first time, according to a statement made by a Speaker of the British House of Commons, had the assistance of the late Sir Erskine May, Lord Farnborough, who had written a book on procedure. At that time the Speaker referred to the fact that for the first time he was able to command the assistance of so eminent an authority as the clerk at the table.

I do not in any way suggest that the procedure taken last evening by the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in any sense irregular. In fact, I agreed with the motion. He made two motions, one being as follows:

> That the house will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

And the further motion:

> That this house will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Both motions were agreed to without discussion. Those are the usual motions, as they may be found in the journals of the house for all these years. Those two motions having been agreed to, I merely asked, as a question of procedure, whether or not the motion to refer the estimates to the committee of supply was a proper procedure, before the committee was set up. As a matter of fact, my question was in these words:

> On a question of procedure, must we not wait until the setting up of the committee on supply before that motion is made? The committee could be set up to-morrow.

As a matter of fact, what the right hon. gentleman has said is correct so far as the committee is concerned. But there must be a motion, before estimates can be taken up, that the Speaker do leave the chair, usually with the deputy speaker taking the chair in committee. And as there was no provision for the Speaker to leave the chair on Friday, under our rules as they now exist, I was asking whether or not the committee should be set up. As a matter of fact that is hardly the correct way to put it. The committee was; it would be correct to say that it was not under our rules competent to move the Speaker out of the chair and take up estimates to-morrow. That is now admitted by the right hon. gentleman.

But I did not object; I merely asked a simple question, and the reason I did so was this: When I was in office a motion was made with respect to the estimates, and a question was brought to my attention by the clerk as to whether or not it was proper to make that motion. After my attention was directed to it I had some doubts about it, and communicated that to the house. I merely asked a question with respect to procedure, without any desire to impede or in any sense to interfere with the conduct of public business; but I am not unmindful of the fact that when for the first time I was charged with the responsibility for the conduct of public business the right hon. gentleman said that I should have had everything prepared, and that I should not ask the house to agree unanimously to certain procedure. It was suggested that the business should be ready, and that here we were, without any business. That was on the second day in which I occupied the seat now occupied by the right hon. gentleman. I was not even thinking of that when I asked a civil question with respect to the question of procedure.

Leaving that for the moment I would say that the right hon. gentleman now suggests that the motion be made unanimous, that the Speaker do now leave the chair, and that the house take up the estimates of two departments, namely those of the departments of Public Works and Agriculture. Certainly I have every desire to facilitate the business of the house, and I do not purpose raising any objection to such a motion being made, except to the extent that it may prejudice the rights of some hon. member who may desire to make a motion on the days he is entitled to do so with respect to the Speaker leaving the chair. After all, this house has made its own rules, and they cannot be disregarded without the unanimous consent of the house. I take it that if the motion is made unanimous that the Speaker do now leave the chair, any member who desires to express his opinion with respect to existing conditions, or desires to bring his grievance to the attention of the house before supply is granted, may do so as though it was a regular motion.

Hon. members on this side of the house have been endeavouring to familiarize themselves with the estimates for the purpose of carrying on an intelligent discussion, and I suggest that it might be well to confine the discussion of estimates to those matters which, while not statutory in form, must be voted as a matter of course to enable the public service of the country to be carried on. So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, there are some votes which might be passed without question, but they will be few in number. So far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, that being one of the departments in which a substantial change in the personnel has taken place, many questions will be asked, and inasmuch as every time a department goes into supply the opportunity is lessened of any hon. member bringing any grievance he may have to the attention of the country on the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair, I think it might be well to confine our activities in the estimates to those items which are plainly non-controversial and about which there can be no doubt that they have to be voted as a matter of course, even though they appear in the estimates in the form in which they do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, as my right hon. friend is so obliging I shall not refer further to any possible differences between us. The record will disclose as between us who was in the right and who was in the wrong. May I say, however, as respects quoting from a memorandum given to me by the clerk of the house that I think my procedure in that particular was wholly correct. I did not need to mention the clerk's name at all; I might have taken the whole credit to myself. Seeing, however, that I had asked the clerk to give me a memorandum, he being a recognized authority on rules and procedure, and knowing that very probably His Honour the Speaker, had I conferred with him, would have handed me the same memorandum, I thought I would give credit where credit was due and quote an authority that might appeal more perhaps to my right hon. friend at this moment than were I to have quoted the Speaker himself.

SUPPLY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public buildings—Nova Scotia—
Bridgetown—public building, $5,000.
Halifax — maintenance of immigration quarters, $25,000.
New Waterford—public building, $9,500.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, before going into the estimates in detail I think it is only proper that I should make the statement that these main estimates do not provide for any new work. We are providing only for the necessary amounts to complete works already undertaken, and we are asking the committee to revote also certain amounts of money which have not been expended. With regard to the first item of $5,000 for a public building at Bridgetown, work on this building has been carried on up to the present moment and a further amount of $5,000 is required to complete the building.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, before the item is carried I think it advisable, if the minister is in a position to do so, that he inform the committee of the general policy of the government in connection with public works. In the past there has been a program of public works with respect to buildings, and then a supplementary program with regard to other works. I noticed in the press this morning a statement that the government had under consideration an extensive program of public works of a kind perhaps different from those provided for in the estimates, and it seems to me that it would facilitate the work of the committee and the consideration of the estimates if the minister would outline what the policy of the government is for the coming fiscal year in connection with such works. I have gone over the estimates and I find, as the minister says, that a large number of items relate to the completion of buildings undertaken by the former government, and in so far as moneys for this purpose are necessary there will be no objection, I am sure, from those on this side, certainly none from myself, because I feel a responsibility in the matter of facilitating the completion of any buildings already under way.

I wish also to point out to the committee that during the last few years the late government undertook, as a combined measure for the relief of unemployment and for the improvement of our public buildings, a fairly extensive program of repairs and alterations. It does appear to me that the public buildings throughout the dominion must now be in pretty good condition.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Not in all counties.

Mr. STEWART: No, but in most, and I think the buildings in my hon. friend's county are in good shape; he has not been neglected, I am sure he will agree. I want to emphasize the necessity of continuing that policy, and so far as I am concerned any request for moneys which the minister might make for the purpose of keeping the public buildings in Canada in a thorough state of repair I shall be glad to support. It is false economy to allow buildings to get into disrepair. A stitch in time saves nine. Unfortunately in years of stress and financial difficulty there may be a tendency to overlook some necessary repairs, but as I say, we have pretty well overtaken those repairs, and I hope the minister will continue the policy of keeping our public buildings in first class condition. The work was undertaken during the late administration for the double purpose of supplying tradesmen and mechanics with a measure of employment—and I am glad to say that in a measure the program met that requirement —and of keeping the buildings in repair.

Coming to the vote before us, the first item of $5,000 for a public building at Bridgetown is a revote; there is no objection to that. The second item, $25,000 for the maintenance of immigration quarters at Halifax, is the same amount as last year. Is this just the regular maintenance, or what is contemplated?

Mr. CARDIN: Just the regular maintenance.

Mr. STEWART: Then there is an item of $9,500 for a public building at New Waterford.

[Mr. Stewart.]

This is a revote. Will this amount complete the building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I must apologize for not having made a general statement at the time of the constitution of this committee regarding the government's policy with respect to estimates. This would have answered the inquiry of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart). In the preparation of the estimates now before the committee it was the intention to present what might be called broadly the normal cost of administering the country, leaving out all those extraordinary matters to which my hon. friend has referred and which in past years have been dealt with by means of what has come to be described as the blank cheque method. It is the intention of the government to present further estimates which will be known, for lack of a better name at the moment, as emergency supplementary estimates, designed to provide for all expenditures of an emergency character which are necessary because of the condition in which the country finds itself at the present time. The emergency expenditures to which I refer are those connected with relief in its various forms; with programs with respect to work of any kind arising out of the necessity of creating work; with railway deficits and all other matters which might be described as extraordinary in their nature and which are not associated with the normal operations of the country. Our intention is to set forth to the house as clearly as possible what is required over and above the normal cost of running the institutions of government due to the conditions which prevail at the present time.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not know that a railway deficit was something extraordinary; I thought it was something quite ordinary so far as we in this house are concerned. I do think we should have some information from the government at this stage as to what they intend doing with regard to a building program. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has informed us that the government will bring down emergency estimates, but I think the character and extent of these estimates ought to be known to the people of this country. There is no part of our population that has been hit harder than those engaged in the building industry, and it is desirable at this time when we are discussing public works estimates that we should have an authoritative statement from the government setting out what they intend doing in the near future in this particular respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A building program is under consideration and it will be announced as soon as the government has reached a final decision upon it. I hope this assurance will serve to meet what my hon. friend has in mind. I give him the assurance that the government has under consideration such a program and it will be brought before the house at an early date.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—New Brunswick—
Perth—public building, $9,000.
Rexton—public building, $2,500.
St. Andrews—public building, $13,000.
St. George—public building, $19,500.
Saint John quarantine station—Partridge island—improvements, alterations and repairs, $7,000.

Mr. CARDIN: The observations made with regard to item 87 apply to this item. There is nothing new in the item; it is to complete works already undertaken.

Mr. STEWART: Take the Saint John quarantine station, Partridge island. This vote is slightly in excess of the amount voted last year. Would the minister explain what is contemplated to be done to this station? I thought the building was in good shape.

Mr. CARDIN: The amount of $7,000 is required for general repairs and improvements as requested by the deputy minister of Pensions and National Health in a communication dated December, 1935. The amount of $7,000 is made up of the following items:

To provide for leaks that may develop in water pipe line under bay, supplying water to station, $2,000.
Disinfection building: Replacing piping by copper in bath division, replacing three exterior doors. Shingling portion of rear exterior, renewing steps at rear, caulking windows and redecorating where paint damaged, $1,525.
Staff residences: Roof repairs and renewals, repairs to exterior painting, renewing heating, $1,900.
General: Installation of suitable boxes to water shutoffs, $400.
Laboratory: Exterior repairs and painting, $150.
Materials: Paint, furnace parts, etc., for station staff, $1,025.

Mr. STEWART: Will that put the building in a good state of repair?

Mr. CARDIN: That is the information I have received from the officers of the department who have made a survey.

Mr. STEWART: Is the building all in use?

Mr. CARDIN: My information is that it is all in use.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give the committee an explanation as to the relation between a sum voted this year, a sum voted last year and a revote? There are many new members in the house and I am quite sure that such information would be of interest to them if not to some of us who have been here for a number of years and who often get befogged with this question. Take as an illustration the public building at St. Andrews. Last year $45,000 was voted; this year $13,000 is required and $9,500 is shown as a revote. Are we to assume that of the $45,000 voted last year; $36,500 has been spent already and $9,500 is yet required to be expended, while $3,500 is required over and above the estimate for extras or for fittings or other things?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Your statement is absolutely clear.

Mr. CARDIN: The revote is the unused portion of the money voted the year before. In those cases where the amount seems to be higher it is because we need a little more money than was voted last year in order to complete a work which has been started. This is the explanation of the discrepancy to which the hon. gentleman calls my attention.

Mr. STIRLING: It does not necessarily imply that there are extras on the work estimated for last year, but rather that the work has been found to be more expensive.

Mr. CARDIN: That is the case exactly. When we find that we require an amount larger than the amount voted the year before, we ask for a revote and the amount is mentioned in the revote column. That is an amount taken from the estimates of last year.

Mr. PELLETIER: Am I right in assuming that there is $9,500 brought forward from last year and that in addition the sum of $13,000 is required, bringing this year's estimates to $22,500?

Mr. CARDIN: No. This year we require $13,000 instead of $9,500, the difference being accounted for by the changes made in the plans, or unforeseen expenses that were not contemplated when the amount of $45,000 was voted. If there were no extra costs involved, $9,500 would be sufficient; but owing to expenditures not contemplated at the time we are obliged to ask for the higher amount.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister explain why the item at the end of No. 88 is included, "Appropriations not required for 1936-37, $20,000."

Mr. CARDIN: There was money voted last year that was not expended, and we do not propose to go on with the undertakings covered by the amount indicated here as appropriations not required. There is $20,000 in connection with New Brunswick.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister itemize that?

Mr. CARDIN: The $20,000 is for an addition to the armouries.

Mr. STEWART: The minister's explanation as to the revote of the amount required is quite satisfactory to me, but it does not follow that in all cases the extra amount is for extras or changes or alterations. There may be instances in which the tenders invited publicly have exceeded the amount of the estimate, and that is the only omission, I think, which the minister made in his concise and very comprehensive statement. Some of these additional amounts, over and above the amount voted last year, may be due to the fact that the estimate of last year was insufficient to meet the amount of the public tender. As the minister will find out, and as he no doubt already knows from experience, estimates are often prepared and submitted to the house without that complete information which a greater amount of time would enable the department to secure. It is decided, for instance, to erect a public building at a particular place and the architect is asked to give an estimate of the cost. From his experience in matters of that kind he can roughly estimate what the cost of the building will be; but if the estimate is to be brought before the house and the work got under way he may not have an opportunity of going into the details and ascertaining local conditions—and local conditions do vary from time to time. So that, giving the chief architect and his staff credit for the best intentions and everything they can do to ascertain the cost, there may be factors which leave their estimate insufficient. They always try to keep their estimates down as much as possible. That, I think, is the only amplification the committee should have of the statement made by the minister. In some instances at least the amount of a tender, without changes or alterations, exceeds the amount of the estimate.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend is correct and I thank him for supplementing the observations I made on that point.

Item agreed to.

Dominion public buildings — improvements and repairs, $50,000.

Mr. CARDIN: That covers general repairs.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—Quebec—
Bagotville—public building, $4,000.
Bedford—public building, $26,000.
Dolbeau—public building, $9,000.
Dominion public buildings — improvements and repairs, $100,000.
Grosse Isle quarantine station—improvements, alterations and repairs, $10,500.
Montreal immigration building — improvements and repairs, $7,500.
Montreal — instalment on purchase of armoury, $15,900.
Montreal postal terminal building—additional amount required, $250,000.
Quebec Citadel—improvements and maintenance, $19,000.
Stanstead—public building, $10,500.
Westmount — instalment on purchase of armoury, $12,700.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister might explain to the committee in his pleasant way why it happens that Quebec is the only province in Canada that shows an increase in the estimates.

Mr. CARDIN: Well, I confess I have not given any consideration to that question; but as all these amounts are revotes, most of them are necessary to complete works already undertaken, and I may safely conclude, therefore, that the explanation is that the estimates of last year were a little higher in Quebec than in other provinces, so far as this general item is concerned.

Mr. STEWART: The minister's observation is quite interesting in view of the facts. Last year I thought it was the other way, that Quebec was getting altogether too little; that was what I heard. I am glad to hear now that my contention last year was right, that really Quebec was getting a fair share of the expenditures.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend is human, and he has too much experience of life not to realize that favours done do not seem to amount to very much.

Mr. STEWART: That is a thought I endeavoured to impress on many of my friends in the past, but without success. I do not know how far the minister will succeed with his friends in converting them to that theory. In connection with Bedford public building, I notice there is a revote of $21,000, and that means that $5,000 additional is required. Can the minister say what that $5,000 additional is for?

Mr. CARDIN: The reason given me for the increase is the difference in price in regard to the site. We are providing a larger amount because we are going to be forced to spend more for the acquisition of the site of that building.

Mr. STEWART: That is quite a proper explanation, and again it illustrates some of the difficulties that a minister and departmental officials have to meet in accurately estimating the correct amount to put in originally, because what a site will cost cannot be within their knowledge. It varies according to circumstances; it varies according to the site selected and the conditions in the town or at the site. The next is Grosse Isle quarantine station, improvements, alterations and repairs. This is a little greater than last year's vote.

Mr. CARDIN: Because we require a larger amount for the repairs and cost of maintenance this year. As my hon. friend knows, these figures are always based on the report of the engineers of the department.

Mr. STEWART: Are there any items of particular interest that the minister can give, or is it just general? Again I say I was under the impression that, substantial repairs having been made, these items might possibly not be as great this year as they have been in the last two or three.

Mr. CARDIN: If my hon. friend desires, I have a list of the items, but—

Mr. STEWART: Not if they are small.

Mr. CARDIN: Brick work, doors, repairs to boiler settings—

Mr. STEWART: I do not want to ask the minister to give all the details. Is there any large item?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Part of what I intended to ask in connection with the Bedford public building was asked by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart). In reply to the hon. member, I understood the minister to say that the difference of five thousand dollars in the total cost of the Bedford building was for the site. Looking at the estimates I note that apparently $2,500 has already been spent on the building. I am at a loss to understand how anything could be spent on the building unless the site had already been purchased. It seems to me a rather peculiar way for the department to carry on its business if it either commenced the building before it purchased the site, or on the other hand, arranged to erect the building without already having the site purchased and later has to pay $5,000 additional cost for a site it either contemplated buying and had not bought, but which it had afterwards purchased.

Mr. CARDIN: A certain amount of money, $2,500 was spent on a site which had been chosen last year, but it was represented to the department that that site is not satisfactory. Instead of building at the rear of a block there, it has been represented to the department that we should have the building on the corner of Main and Bridge street, and we are thinking of changing the location of the building by acquiring a section of property on the main street.

Mr. MacNICOL: Adjacent to the site that had been contemplated?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Before this item carries I would like to ask the minister about an expenditure of $250,000 on the Montreal postal terminal. What was the original estimate for the last cost of that building, and what is the amount already spent? Can he give us an estimate as to how much it will cost to complete the building.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that that building was started first under the Public Works Construction Act. It was not covered in the last session of parliament by the regular estimates of the department: it was money expended out of the Public Works Construction Acts of 1934 and 1935. The amount of $250,000 mentioned in this vote is for mechanical fittings for the building. But I will get the total cost of the building.

Mr. HEAPS: Then perhaps the item might be allowed to stand.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain what the item "Quebec citadel" means? Is it for the rebuilding of the crumbling walls of the citadel itself, or what is it?

Mr. CARDIN: No, it is for maintenance of the building, the governor general's quarters there.

Mr. HEAPS: How much money has been already spent during the past eight or nine years on this same project?

Mr. CARDIN: Well, practically the same amount, I am informed.

Mr. HEAPS: No; in past years there have been much larger amounts in the estimates for the Quebec citadel. I would like to have an idea how much it is going to cost the government and the country, including what has been spent in the past eight or nine years since the governor general has taken residence in the citadel for a few weeks in each year.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that this item stands.

Mr. HEAPS: No; perhaps the minister may have the information right at hand.

Mr. CARDIN: The expenditure in 1929-30 was $20,000; 1930-31, $15,860; 1931-32, $13,499; 1932-33, $13,483; 1933-34, $12,181; 1934-35, $11,449.

Mr. HEAPS: Are those the only expenditures that have been made on the Quebec citadel during the years mentioned?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed those are the only amounts during those years.

Mr. SENN: The amount of $215,200 for appropriations not required seems to be very large in proportion to the total vote.

Mr. CARDIN: Does my hon. friend desire a list of the items?

Mr. SENN: If they are not too numerous.

Mr. CARDIN: Amqui, public building, $19,000; Asbestos, public building, $8,000; Cap de la Madeleine, public building, $54,000; Montreal, addition to the 4th Division Engineers armoury, $7,000; Montreal, purchase of site for addition to 4th Division Engineers armoury and alterations, $7,000; Point Claire, public building, $25,000; Quebec, examining warehouse, repairs and renewals, $1,200; Quebec, immigration building, repairs, $33,000; Ste. Anne de Beaupre, public building, $25,000; Ste. Martine, public building, $17,000; Timiskaming, public building, $19,000. These were the amounts that were provided in the last estimates.

Mr. SENN: Are any of these projects that have not been gone on with, or is it because the contract price was left in the vote?

Mr. CARDIN: In these items I am informed there are certain things which might be considered only as bookkeeping entries required by the department. I confess I am not quite clear on that procedure. Take for example, the Amqui public building, $19,000; the amount spent up to the first of February, 1936, is $14,503. The note that has been handed to me is that this building has been completed. The Asbestos building is also completed. The Cap de la Madeleine public building site has been purchased, but the building is not being proceeded with at present. Montreal, addition to 4th Division Engineers armoury, not to be utilized because substituted by vote 338. Point Claire public building, site has been purchased but building not proceeded with. Quebec examining warehouse, repairs and renewals; this has been completed. Quebec immigration building; repairs are completed. Ste. Anne de Beaupré, public building, $25,000, not being proceeded with. Ste. Martine, the same thing. Timiskaming public building, $19,000, the same, not being proceeded with. That accounts for the total of $215,000 under the heading of appropriations not required for 1936-37. We have no vote and we do not propose to have these expenditures repeated in this estimate.

Mr. STEWART: In reply to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) in giving particulars of the expenditures at the Quebec citadel the minister gave the amounts for the different years. I think he is correct in his statement, except that possibly there may have been some expenditures under the Public Works Construction Acts that would not appear in the record the minister now has.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed by the chief architect that as far as he can remember no expenditure in the citadel has been made under the Public Works Construction Acts.

I have here some information in regard to the postal terminal in Montreal. The appropriation was $1,800,000 under the Public Works Construction Act. The actual expenditure up to December 1, 1935, is $1,268,542.93, and commitments and liabilities incurred up to the present time are $521,421.

Mr. HEAPS: Over and above the item just given?

Mr. CARDIN: No. The two items, $1,268,000 and $521,000 practically take up the amount of the appropriation of $1,800,000. Therefore the expenditures up to the present and those contemplated will not go beyond the appropriation for the building. There is an amount of $250,000 for mechanical devices and fittings in the interior. That was not included in the contract.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the contract price?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not have that in the present estimates, because that work is not covered by the estimates we are considering at present; it is an expenditure under the Public Works Construction Act. My hon. friend will have the opportunity of asking that question later, and I can give my word that if he wants that information I shall be quite ready to give it.

Mr. McGEER: Will a summary of all the expenditures under that act be presented as a supplement to this statement?

Mr. CARDIN: I believe a return has been made in the house. What I am reading from is a copy of a return which has been tabled relating to all these expenditures made under the Public Works Construction Act.

Mr. STEWART: The minister will recall that under the provisions of the Public Works Construction Acts the orders in council and all papers must be laid on the table. In fact they are laid on the table from time to time; the minister laid some papers on the table the other day.

Mr. HEAPS: That will be quite satisfactory if we get all this information later. There is another point I want to raise in reference to these estimates relating to the province of Quebec, and it may apply to other provinces as well. I notice two items relating to the purchase of armouries. Some time ago we had a discussion in this committee regarding the unusual way the government went about the building of armouries in different parts of the dominion. I see there are items here for Montreal and Westmount, "instalment on purchase of armoury," $15,900 and $12,700 respectively. I should like to know whether these armouries are being purchased from private institutions or have been erected by the government. If they are being built by private corporations for the government I should like to have the present standing of the agreements between the government and the private corporations.

Mr. CARDIN: In regard to the item, "Montreal, instalment on purchase of armoury, $15,900," that building was acquired under a lease. It was agreed that by the payment of a certain rental, after the expiration of a certain number of years the building will be paid for. That is, it is bought on a rental basis. It is being acquired from the Victoria Rifles Armouries Association of Montreal.

Mr. HEAPS: How long since?

Mr. CARDIN: Since 1931, I am told. The first appropriation was in the year 1931-32.

Mr. HEAPS: For how much?

Mr. CARDIN: For $15,140. In 1932-33 and in 1934-35 the amount was the same, and it has been the same all through.

Mr. HEAPS: How long has this agreement to run?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed it is for twenty years.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the one at Westmount being purchased on the same basis?

Mr. CARDIN: The same basis.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I raised this question a number of years ago when the former Minister of Public Works, who is now in opposition, had charge of the estimates. At that time he told the committee that personally he objected to this form of purchase by the government of buildings to be used for armoury purposes. I object to a government department entering into negotiations for the purchase of buildings as has been done in connection with armouries across the dominion. In my view if the government find it necessary to erect armouries they do not have to go to a private corporation and have that corporation erect a building at possibly a fabulous price, the government paying it off on the basis of a twenty year agreement or at so much per annum. The government is in a better position than are the private concerns to finance the building of armouries, if the necessity for such buildings arises. I do not know the original cost of these armouries, but I was told by persons interested in the erection of such buildings that an agreement to erect a certain building had been offered to the government, and that if the contract had been let by public tender and contract it could have been built at a much lower price than that stipulated by the corporation gracious enough to enter into the agreement with the government. I want that policy to stop. I should like to have this afternoon from the Minister of Public Works a definite understanding that if the government find it necessary to erect buildings, whether they be armouries or buildings of other kinds, they will undertake to put them up on their own account, and have tenders called for in the usual way.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a question about the rent being paid for the Montreal armouries. I remember being present when the Toronto armouries vote was under consideration, upon which occasion I had a few words to say. That was before any construction was started. My memory is that the rental was to be the same amount for each year, and I notice that at a later point in the estimates, where the Toronto armouries are mentioned, the amount was the same for last year as it is for this. I find however that in connection with the Westmount armoury the amount paid last year was $15,200 whereas this year it is $15,900.

The minister mentioned varying amounts for intervening years. Do the agreements not state what the rental is to be each year, or does the amount vary?

Mr. CARDIN: The contract shows that $15,140 is to be paid every year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then, why is it $15,900 for 1936-37?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that the larger amount covers fire insurance on the building.

Mr. McGREGOR: Who paid the fire insurance the year before?

Mr. CARDIN: The insurance is paid every three years.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to have a statement from the minister on the point I raised, namely as to the policy of his department and that of the Department of National Defence should they find it necessary to erect more buildings of this kind.

Mr. CARDIN: Of course my hon. friend cannot seriously ask me to state a question of policy on the part of the government.

Mr. HEAPS: Oh, yes.

Mr. CARDIN: Policies of the government are expresed in the form of legislation presented to the house, or by proclamation by the proper authority. I am not in a position to state what the policy of the government will be in the future, but if I may be permitted to say so I would guess that we are getting these properties at a much lower cost than would be entailed if we had to erect the building ourselves. It costs less money to acquire properties in this way than to erect the buildings.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister be good enough to state the reason?

Mr. CARDIN: I am stating what has been told me by an officer of the department, namely that in that case we were more fortunate in acquiring the property on the basis indicated than we would have been had we erected a building ourselves.

Mr. HEAPS: I have information with respect to a contemplated armoury which would be paid for on the same basis as the ones now under consideration. All some people wanted was an opportunity to tender for the contract. I was told there would be a considerable difference between the cost on the basis of public tender and contract, and the amounts stipulated in the agreements. If the minister and his officials believe that these buildings are being sold to the government at a cost lower than that at which the government could erect them, I should like to know on what basis that view is held. I do not think it is logical.

Mr. STEWART: I know the hon. member has criticized this method of acquiring armouries, and as some were acquired between 1930 and 1935 on this basis perhaps a statement from me is not out of place. The hon. member seems to think that this method is unsound. Let me point out to him that ordinary public works of the dominion are not paid for over a period of years. All buildings constructed in the ordinary course of events are paid for out of revenue. If in one year we undertook to pay the whole cost of an armoury we would be obligating ourselves to the payment of a large amount of money out of any one year's revenue. In the cities, or other places where there are regiments, there are associations of officers and others, public spirited gentlemen, who desire these accommodations. They feel that to ask a government in any one year to expend the amount necessary to construct a building constitutes a heavy demand. Therefore they have devised a scheme by which over a period of years a building will be acquired or constructed and paid for on the instalment plan. In entering into the transaction the department have an agreement with the association and have supervision over construction. It must be constructed according to plans approved by the department, and under public tender. There is no opportunity, such as the hon. member suggests, for an association to run at large or to construct a building at any cost and entirely without supervision of the department, afterwards calling upon the department to pay the cost. The plan is not as unsound as apparently the hon. member believes it to be. I know some purchases have been made on a very favourable basis. The reason for the plan, as I have indicated, is that if constructed in one year and paid out of revenue the cost would be a heavy burden indeed.

Mr. YOUNG: If the explanation of my hon. friend the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) with respect to armouries is sound, it is equally sound with respect to any public building. I entirely agree with my hon. friend over here that when public buildings are erected for Canada the dominion government can borrow money more cheaply than any private concern, and therefore can build the building more cheaply. I recognize that this is not the first time this has been done. I am not in favour of this method of building public buildings. It has been the method used particularly with respect to armouries; and there may have been some reason for using it with respect to armouries. I should like to ask the minister when this building was erected, what was its cost, how did the department supervise the cost and know exactly the final result in that regard, and also what rate of interest is being paid. I take it that the cost is amortized, and I am sure that if we went into these matters in detail we should find that we are not saving money by buying buildings in this particular way.

Mr. CARDIN: The agreement between the department and the Victoria Rifles Armouries Association was entered into on March 22, 1932. It was agreed that the association would erect the armoury, not to exceed $190,000 in cost, which included architects' fees and so forth. The dominion government agreed to take over the building on a rental-purchase basis covering a period of twenty years, with an annual payment of $15,140.

Mr. HEAPS: What will be the total amount paid in at the end of twenty years for this building?

Mr. CARDIN: That is a matter of calculation.

Mr. HEAPS: I have calculated it roughly, and it means that we are paying over $300,000 for a building erected at a cost of $190,000. I would ask the minister to answer the question put by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) as to the amortization rate.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, some years ago I opposed this plan of buying public buildings. When we had the responsibility of providing facilities for volunteer military organizations throughout the country in time of great depression it became apparent, when proposals were made by men who had put their own money into these things merely for the purpose of trying to assist their fellow citizens to have a place in which they could gather and train, that we could charge to revenue the ordinary sum that would be payable for rent or upkeep, and a very low rate of interest as things then were—though not low to-day—to complete the purchase of these buildings on a rental basis. No capital obligation was incurred on the part of the country, nothing was added to the debt, and no more money was expended than we would have paid by purchasing outright, except the trifling sum for rental if we had continued to rent them. The Minister of Finance will remember one instance in which I joined issue with him because I thought it was a wrong principle, but as a matter of fact in connection with armouries it was the only way in which facilities could be provided at all. It will be recalled that it was a Liberal administration which first fixed on this plan of dealing with them, and I must say that I believe it has turned out satisfactorily. I will give an illustration. There has been an extreme depression in the value of real estate in western cities. There was a building in one of our western towns occupied with stores in a military district. The building cost three or four times what it could be bought for to-day, and the owner said, "Instead of paying rent, take it off our hands. We are not getting anything out of it, and we would like you to have it at this figure," which was to be paid over a period of years and which amounted in reality to less than the rent that was paid a few years ago. The result is that the building at the end of ten years—it was then practically new—will belong to the crown without having added anything to the debt, without incurring any capital charge. The property will have cost just a little more than was being paid for rentals.

I have in mind another instance, outside of Canada, in which we had a building constructed through the public spirit of the gentleman who represented us in that particular country. Later we were able with improved conditions to pay the cost of the building. The interest rate at that time I think was four and a half or five per cent. I have in mind still another building where conditions were similar. The real fact is that in many parts of this country you can purchase buildings at a price very much less than cost. For instance, many of the banks have closed their branches in western towns, and we found it desirable to purchase for postal facilities, at a cost sometimes only one-third of the original cost, the bank premises in question. In these cases the amounts involved were small and we were able to buy the properties at once. There are other cases where owing to the depressed state of real estate, and the desire to get something out of the wreck, people have been induced to sell their properties at a very low price on a rental basis, capitalized at a very low rate of interest, in some instances lower than the going rate.

I mention these things because I was not at first friendly to this method, but when I came into office I found that it was admirably adapted to the circumstances in connection with many matters, but more notably in connection with the providing of suitable premises for those who are offering volunteer service and who might at any time be called upon to protect life and property in this country. It was largely from the point of view of that consideration that the plan was continued as originated by my friends opposite, without adding anything to the debt, and adding but very little to the annual rental charges. I think it fair to make that statement because the method has been limited largely if not wholly to armouries.

There are one or two cases other than armouries. Some years after I first came to this house I asked some questions about buildings in Ottawa. I think I am not saying too much when I say that there are buildings in this city that we have paid for two or three times over in rents. Had we had just the plan that is now being considered we would own at least three buildings in the city of Ottawa—I am putting it very low—which to my certain knowledge we have paid for three times over in one instance, two and a half times in another, and once, or more than that, I am told, in another. That is the reason behind this plan which was adopted some years ago by our predecessors. At the time I was not very friendly to it, but, as I told my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in practice I find that it has worked out very much better

Mr. DUNNING: As a matter of fact you gave me quite a ride on it.

Mr. BENNETT: Where was that?

Mr. DUNNING: In Regina.

Mr. BENNETT: It worked out very much better than I had expected. Because of the depression the cost of the buildings has been so low that in many instances it does not represent anything like the original cost, exclusive of the land.

Mr. STEWART: Do these contracts not contain a clause that permits the department to pay up the amount in full at any time they desire?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: The argument of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) does not seem to be as sound as his arguments usually are. In many cases it was possible to erect these armouries only because it was known that an agreement with the government was to be consummated. In reality these companies had behind them the credit of the government, otherwise the buildings could not have been erected. Many of these buildings are not old, the one we are now dealing with having been erected in the past two or three years. I should like some statement from the minister as to whether this practice is to be discontinued. The question has been asked as to the rate of interest at which these amounts are to be amortized over the period of twenty years; I wonder if the minister has that information before him.

Mr. CARDIN: In connection with Montreal, the rate is five per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: What about the one at Westmount?

Mr. CARDIN: That is six per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: The one at Westmount was built in 1931, and at that time I believe the government could have borrowed money at a rate of about four per cent. For twenty years we will be paying at least two per cent per annum more than we should be paying.

Mr. McGEER: Mr. Chairman, the principle of financing our militia by private means is thoroughly unsound. The militia should be considered as definitely under the control of the national government. I happen to have had the experience of being told by militia officers in Vancouver that a number of men could not turn out for the parade held on the occasion of the celebration of the king's jubilee because they were not equipped with shoes in which to march. I was told that this equipment was being supplied through contributions made by the officers, but the depression had hit the officers and their contributions were no longer available. If Canada has fallen to such a pitiful level that she cannot maintain her militia, then it is nearly time to close out this particular service. If this service is to be maintained by private contributions, the inevitable end will be the establishment of private armies in the dominion, to the disaster of the country. Armouries have been built with funds provided by private enterprise, and we are paying five and six per cent interest on this money. The building of these armouries should be an obligation upon this dominion, and I think the time has arrived when we should recognize the militia as a worthy unit of the institutions that form the fabric of the government of the dominion. Our armouries should be built by the government, and the government should supply the necessary funds to equip the men. The pitiful weakness of our whole scheme of government seems to stand out. We are a nation rich in natural resources; we have no standing army and we have no naval obligations, but in the matter of militia we have probably the lowest standard of any country in the British empire. It is a sorry reflection upon the administration of public affairs when we have to maintain our militia by means of contributions from the officers and other private individuals. I have been informed that the Seaforth cadets in Vancouver receive a contribution from the national government of only one dollar each per year. As one officer told me, this is equivalent to the cost of one belt for each cadet. This is only one of innumerable instances. Whatever militia service we intend to have should be maintained without resort to the unnecessarily costly system of assistance by private enterprise.

Mr. MARSHALL: Could the minister give the committee the names attached to the agreement in connection with the Montreal armouries?

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot give the names at the moment. My hon. friend understands, I think, that the deed was signed by someone personally on behalf of the armoury, the other party being the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MARSHALL: Who was the contractor?

Mr. CARDIN: Messrs. A. F. Byers & Company, Limited.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the present value of that armoury?

Mr. CARDIN: It would be very difficult for me to answer that question, but I should think the value would be what it was when the government entered into the arrangement. I fancy it was about $190,000—around $200,000. That was the basis on which the rental was calculated at the time, and as it was only a few years ago, I should not think the value has gone down.

Mr. MARSHALL: How long ago was it built?

Mr. CARDIN: About two years ago. We made the first payment in the fiscal year 1933-34.

Mr. HEAPS: It may be difficult for the minister to give the committee an assurance on behalf of the government with respect to future constructions of this kind, but to narrow the matter down, may I ask him whether he will, on his own account, assure the committee that he will object to more buildings being purchased by the government on the basis on which similar buildings have been purchased in the last few years.

Mr. CARDIN: I have no hesitation in replying to that question. So far as I am concerned, I am quite ready to review these contracts, and if it can be established that an appreciable economy can be effected, I purpose taking advantage of the clause permitting the government to pay off the whole amount, thus doing away with rentals.

Mr. HEAPS: Is not the government at this time obtaining money at three per cent?

Mr. CARDIN: The Minister of Finance might enlighten us on that point.

Mr. DUNNING: A good deal depends upon the conditions under which money is obtained. If the money is borrowed for a very short period, the government can borrow at 1·05 per cent, but it would be rather absurd to borrow for a short period where the expenditure is to run on for a considerable time. If my hon. friend is thinking of a period of, say seven years, I may say that yesterday government guaranteed debentures were sold to yield about 2¼ per cent. If he has in mind a longer period, for instance, seventeen years, yesterday we disposed of an amount of seventeen-year Canadian National debentures guaranteed by the government, yielding 3·19 per cent. My hon. friend will understand how difficult it is to say offhand what the government can borrow money at; this depends upon the length of the term and the conditions.

Mr. HEAPS: Assuming that these agreements have to run for seventeen years or so, and seventeen more payments have to be made, the government can obtain money at a little over 3 per cent; and if we are paying six per cent now, would it not pay the government to obtain an issue of bonds equivalent to the amount outstanding, so that instead of six per cent a fraction over three per cent would have to be paid?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman has just heard the minister say that he intends to examine, from the point of view of ascertaining whether appreciable savings can be effected, all contracts similar to the one under discussion. I know the minister well enough to be assured that if he finds such a condition to exist he will come to the treasury board and probably ask the Minister of Finance to raise the necessary money to bring about repayment and effect the economy to which reference has been made. I have no knowledge of this particular contract. One cannot in the course of a few months become fully acquainted with all the various ramifications of contracts and so forth which are in existence. I think my hon. friend might be content with the minister's answer, that he intends to review all such cases and bring about economy wherever that can be done.

Mr. HAYHURST: What is the reason for the words "Appropriations not required for 1936-37" at the bottom of these votes, with amounts indicated in the 1935-36 column?

Mr. CARDIN: I explained some time ago that the $215,200 appropriation not required for 1936-37, under this particular vote, represented for the most part sums of money which had been voted last year and are not being expended this year. For example, some amounts were voted for public buildings that are not being built.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—Ontario—
Belleville—building for entomological branch, $36,500.
Belleville—new gun shed, $1,500.
Campbellford—public building, $6,000.
Dominion public buildings — improvements and repairs, $125,000.
Dunnville—public building, $17,000.
Fenelon Falls—public building, $5,000.
Fort Erie—public building, $72,000.
Hamilton—addition to armoury, $30,000.
Kingston — R.S.A. and brigade building, $55,000.
Kingsville—public building, $14,500.
Kirkland Lake—public building, $75,500.
London—Royal School building, $15,500.
Meaford—public building, $5,500.
Ottawa central heating plant — improvements, $6,900.
Ottawa departmental buildings—fittings, etc., $55,000.
Ottawa—to provide for the acquisition of the Hope property at the corner of Sparks and Elgin streets, $155,000.
Powassan—public building, $16,000.
Richmond Hill—public building, $29,500.
Toronto—instalment on purchase of armoury, $29,400.
Watford—public building, $14,000.

Mr. WILTON: I was recently informed by the Department of National Defence that the question of providing rifle ranges for militia units in Hamilton and the surrounding district was being taken under serious advisement. This is a matter of considerable importance in connection with militia movements in that city and the surounding territory. I do not see any provision made for it in these estimates. Is there a possibility of the supplementary estimates taking care of it?

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any promise, nor can I make any statement in that regard, for the very good reason that work of that kind comes not under my department but under the Department of National Defence. My hon. friend can make his request when the committee is considering the estimates of that department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. gentleman's observations will be carefully considered by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. CARDIN: The item of $36,500 is required to complete the erection of an entomological laboratory at Belleville, the construction of which is being carried out under contract by Ross-Meagher Limited, of Ottawa, for the sum of $82,832; and also for fittings, grading, roadways and supervision.

Mr. STEWART: This is for the Department of Agriculture, is it not?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the amounts under the column headed "1936-37" the original contract prices of the buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: The estimated costs of the buildings.

Mr. BENNETT: The appropriation in the estimates.

Mr. CARDIN: The appropriation in the estimates; yes, that is right. But generally the appropriation is based on the estimated cost of the building.

Mr. MacNICOL: In reference to the building at Fort Erie, apparently last year it was considered that $50,000 would be sufficient. Now I note that the government is asking for an additional $28,000. Has the size of the building been changed?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $72,000 is required to complete the erection of a public building for postal and customs purposes in the town of Fort Erie.

Mr. MacNICOL: A difference of $28,000.

Mr. CARDIN: It is to provide for the erection of a new building sufficiently large to accommodate both customs and postal services on the site of the existing buildings. For that purpose additional land immediately west of the present site was purchased.

Mr. MacNICOL: The new building is to consist of a customs building and a postal building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: And that is why the additional cost is in. I would like to ask about the public building at Kingsville. While Kingsville is a very beautiful town, it is not very large. I notice this item calls for an additional $9,000. Will the minister please explain that?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount of $14,500 is required to complete the erection of a public building for postal and customs purposes. The building is being erected on a site at the corner of Division and Main streets. The total cost of the building will be approximately $9,700 greater than was originally intended, due to the lowest tender being $26,000 for a building which was first estimated at $17,000.

Mr. STEWART: These were public tenders, were they not.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, public tenders.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the chairman explain what is meant under the heading, "Royal school building, London"? What sort of school building is it?

Mr. CARDIN: It is a military school.

Mr. STEWART: There is an increase there which perhaps the minister might give us some light upon.

Mr. CARDIN: The appropriation of 1935-36 was increased as it developed that the sum of $25,000 was too small adequately to provide for the necessary fittings.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the minister explain the purpose of buying the Hope property at Ottawa for $155,000?

Mr. CARDIN: It has not been decided what use the government will make of this building, but it was decided that we should secure the property because it is in the centre of the city; it is one of the city's best sites; it is next to the park where the war memorial is going to be built, and it was thought undesirable that the property should get into the hands of some people who might put up a building which would not be in accordance with the general surroundings, nor accord with the plan for the development of that area in the centre of Ottawa.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understand from what the minister says that he does not know yet what this property will be used for, whether for the post office or for the Bank of Canada?

Mr. CARDIN: No; that has not been decided yet.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There was some rumour that the purpose of buying this property was to remove the building and not have another one there. I hope very much that there is no intention of doing anything of that sort. I like the park and the way it was arranged, but at the present time we have enough open land in the centre of this city.

Mr. CARDIN: Many suggestions have been made in regard to the use of the Hope property. It has been suggested among other things that the old building be taken down and that the Langevin block be extended along Elgin street, because we are receiving complaints from the department of the Postmaster General that they have not enough accommodation in the present Langevin block. Others have suggested that when the present post office is taken down it might be rebuilt on the Hope property. At all events nothing has been decided, and the government will welcome suggestions in regard to the use of the property.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was this property bought directly from Hope & Sons, or was it bought from someone else who had purchased it from them?

Mr. CARDIN: No; it was expropriated.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It has not yet been determined how much the government is to pay for it?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. STEWART: Could the minister tell me the frontage on Sparks street which the government proposes to expropriate?

Mr. DUNNING: It is almost three-cornered.

Mr. CARDIN: On Sparks street, 61 feet 2 inches, and on Elgin street, 104 feet.

Mr. STEWART: What is the assessed value at the present time?

Mr. CARDIN: It is $153,000.

Mr. STEWART: Of course the amount at which it is expropriated would be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund—

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: —rather than by an estimate such as this. I assume the minister is familiar with the modern practice with regard to postal service in cities. Long ago the department abandoned the idea of constructing large central post offices, and for the greater convenience of the public adopted the plan of having the mails distributed to outlying postal stations in different parts of the city. In order to place the new war memorial, I believe it is contemplated that the old post office should come down and the memorial be placed somewhere in that vicinity. Does the minister think in view of the policy I have mentioned and the construction of a postal terminal behind the union station where the mails will be sorted and distributed instead of dragging them to a central post office and back again, thus congesting traffic, that a large building is desirable for a central post office? I think the plan that the postal authorities had in mind when the policy I mentioned was adopted was to put small postal stations in different parts of the city. In fact there will be one in the new postal terminal. I suggest that a large post office on the corner under discussion is not necessary and not in keeping with modern practice. So it seems to me that if additional accommodation is required for postal administration which is carried on in the Langevin block, this site might be very suitable for that, and at the same time, as the minister says, protect that area from the construction of an unsightly building on the edge of what will be a very beautiful area in the city. I think that would be sound, but I do not think the construction of a post office there would be sound.

Mr. CARDIN: I quite agree with the former Minister of Public Works in that regard. In the conversation I have had already with my colleagues we are all in accord with the view that a big post office is not necessary in view of the building of the postal terminal at the rear of the union station, and I assure my hon. friends that even if I wanted a big building I am afraid I should be checked by the Minister of Finance, who is very severe.

Mr. STEWART: Ministers of Finance are always very severe with Ministers of Public Works.

Mr. BENNETT: I was heartily in accord with the acquisition of this property; in fact I think it might well have been acquired before. But I do not think a large post office building should, under any circumstances, be erected there. I had thought myself it would be an admirable location for the Bank of Canada and for the additional finance department staff that has become now necessary, and is in rented premises. The site lends itself admirably to that form of development, and certainly I had in mind that it should be acquired without delay so as to prevent it from falling into the hands of those who would erect on it a building out of harmony with the general development of that square.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. DUNNING: I appreciate what the leader of the opposition has said in that regard. Among the suggestions which have come to the government is the one to which he refers, namely, that the corner would be suitable for the Bank of Canada. In speaking quite informally to the governor of the bank about the matter, I know he mentioned two objections. One was that the corner is in the nature of things rather noisy for office purposes, and the other, which does him credit as governor of the bank, was that a less expensive property would be quite suitable for central bank premises. However, that suggestion among others, is still under consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: As regards the Powassan public building, $16,000, what is the reason for the extra cost?

Mr. CARDIN: The building will cost about $3,000 more than was provided in the appropriation, due to the lowest tender received, $10,640, being $2,640 more than the estimated cost, and we desire to add supervision and contingencies, $1,360.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the plans and specifications of the building the same?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The same question applies to the Richmond Hill public building, $29,500; that building is now to cost $7,500 more than the original estimate.

Mr. CARDIN: The site has cost $8,000 instead of $5,000 as estimated at first.

Mr. MacNICOL: When was the site purchased?

Mr. BENNETT: Last fall.

Mr. CARDIN: It was bought on August 14, 1935.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the purchase cost was $3,000 more than the original estimate?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That leaves another difference of $4,500. Is the building being changed, too?

Mr. CARDIN: No; the building is not being changed. I believe in my former observation I made a mistake in stating that $5,000 was to be the cost of the site. I have a note indicating that the site is going to cost $8,000, as against an estimated cost of $500. I said that the estimated cost was $5,000, but I find it was $500.

Mr. STEWART: It is not the same site.

Mr. CARDIN: No; it is not the same.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is an amazing circumstance. We find it was to be erected upon a site costing $500, but it is now changed to a much more expensive site.

Mr. BAKER: In last year's estimates there was an item respecting station K of the postal service in the northern part of Toronto. Why was it not left in the estimates for the present year?

Mr. CARDIN: The hon. member has shown keen interest in the postal station in question, but due to pressure by the Minister of Finance it was not included in preparing the main estimates. The minister wanted to economize as much as possible. As he has already explained we have tried to leave out all amounts which could not properly be spent during the present year. The construction of station K in Toronto has not been abandoned. I may assure the hon. member that the matter is still under advisement, which information may leave a little ray of hope in the mind of the hon. member. As the Minister of Finance has intimated, supplementary estimates will be presented and no doubt the hon. member will be interested in reading them.

Mr. BENNETT: That is encouraging.

Mr. BAKER: Is the minister prepared to state definitely that the department will proceed with the work on station K this year?

Mr. CARDIN: No, of course not, but my hon. friend may rely on my good will.

Mr. BAKER: I assume the minister is aware that the Post Office Department has declared definitely that the station is required.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BAKER: If it is being dropped from the estimates I should like to know why.

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot give a better reason than I have already given.

Mr. BAKER: That is very indefinite.

Mr. MacNICOL: With reference to the Watford public building, $14,000, I should like to ask a question respecting the difference in cost. As we are reaching the end of the item possibly I might be permitted to make some general observations. I note that work is being done at Fort Erie in the constituency of Welland, Kingsville in the constituency of South Essex, Kirkland Lake in the constituency of Timiskaming, Meaford in the constituency of North Grey, Powassan in the constituency of Parry Sound, Richmond Hill in the constituency of North York, and Watford in the constituency of Lambton-Kent. In connection with each of these items there have been increases to amounts greater than the estimated costs. As a business man I find it amazing to see costs of that kind mounting from year to year. On the other hand, of course I know politics has nothing to do with the matter. I might say that apparently fortunately for those ridings they returned Liberals to the House of Commons —fortunately, so far as the items are concerned, but I do not say fortunately in any other respect. I am wondering whether, if these respective ridings had returned Conservatives as they did in 1930, would they have been fortunate enough to have received these increases in costs.

Mr. BAKER: Perhaps the items would have been crossed out.

Mr. MULOCK: Is the hon. member in favour of having the votes to Ontario reduced?

Mr. MacNICOL: That question does not fit in with the political end of the discussion.

Mr. CARDIN: In this instance the increase arises because the lowest tender was $1,600 higher than the estimated cost of the building. It has been established by the officers of the department that it will cost $1,500 more for fittings than had been previously expected. Then there is a further increase of $900 in the estimated cost of supervision and contingencies, the amount having risen from $500 to $1,400. These three items account for the increased amount.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister referring to the public building at Watford?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Watford is a very small village, and I find it very difficult to understand why fittings in village post offices should cost $1,500 more than the original estimate. I should like to know why the amount is being voted.

Mr. CARDIN: The technical men in the department state that the fittings will cost $2,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: And that is $1,500 more than the original estimate?

Mr. CARDIN: The original estimate was $1,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: In my time I have had a lot to do with building, involving millions and millions of dollars, and I am surprised to find that in a small village building the item of fittings would be increased $1,500 beyond the original estimate. I am convinced that requires further explanation. I want to know why the fittings in a small village building are so expensive?

Mr. CARDIN: The fittings include postal boxes, locks, and so on. At all events public tenders are going to be called for when the fittings are required, and that would be the proper time to ascertain whether the prices asked by the contractors are reasonable. This is the estimate given to me by the officers of the department; I have to rely on their technical knowledge. When the tenders are opened we may get the fittings at a lower price, but it often happens that contractors ask a price higher than that estimated by departmental officers.

Mr. MacNICOL: The fact that Lambton-Kent returned a Liberal to parliament has nothing to do with the increased cost?

Mr. CARDIN: No, not a thing.

Mr. HANSON: We have had no consideration in the last five years.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are getting it now.

Mr. MacINNIS: Possibly the fittings would be more liberal, under the present administration.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—Manitoba—
Elkhorn—public building, $6,500.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that the total cost of the building?

Mr. CARDIN: That is to complete.

Mr. HEAPS: What will be the total cost of the building, and what was the estimated cost?

Mr. CARDIN: The total cost will be $30,644, and the preliminary estimate was $24,000.

Mr. BEAUBIER: What was the contract price for the building? Is it now completed and taken off the contractors' hands?

Mr. CARDIN: The contract was for $19,460.

Mr. BEAUBIER: Were there extras, fittings and so forth that sent the cost above the contract price?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that there were additions: a septic tank, $1,700; $3,500 for fittings; $1,000 for grading; $1,000 for contingencies and supervision.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. BEAUBIER: Is the building now completed and taken off the contractor's hands?

Mr. CARDIN: Not yet.

Item agreed to.

Rivers—public building, $5,000.

Mr. BEAUBIER: How far advanced is the construction of this building?

Mr. CARDIN: I could not say exactly, but the work is going on in the regular way.

Item agreed to.

Russell—public building, $23,500.

Mr. STEWART: Have tenders been invited and the contract awarded for this building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: What is the name of the contractor and when was the contract let?

Mr. CARDIN: The contract was awarded to S. Brown of Winnipeg for $20,224 on September 26, 1935.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—Saskatchewan—
Dominion public buildings — improvements and repairs, $25,000.

Mr. McNIVEN: Would the minister be good enough to indicate what is included in this $25,000?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to provide for ordinary repairs and maintenance of the buildings.

Mr. McNIVEN: Of all the public buildings in Saskatchewan?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Kindersley—public building, $32,000.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What is the reason for the increase in this vote?

Mr. CARDIN: The note I have before me is that the building will cost $12,000 more than was provided in the appropriation of $20,000 for the year 1935-36, because the lowest tender was $8,500 more than the estimated cost of $16,000; the fittings will cost $3,500 instead of $1,000, and supervision and contingencies will cost $3,000 instead of $1,000.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Has the estimate been changed because of the fittings?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Item agreed to.

Whitewood—public building, $3,500.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What is the reason for the increase there?

Mr. CARDIN: It is due to an increase in the cost of the site to $600 as against $500, and for supervision and contingencies, $1,400 instead of $500.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The minister says that there has been an increase in the cost of the site, but the site was purchased before the building was started.

Mr. CARDIN: It was estimated that it would cost $500.

Mr. GARDINER: When was the site purchased?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The site was not changed and I do not see how there could be an increase in the cost.

Mr. GARDINER: There should not have been, but you people bought it.

Mr. DUNNING: I think that is another question for the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart).

Mr. CARDIN: The site was not changed but the sum of $500 was only the estimated cost.

Mr. DUNNING: You paid $600 for it.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I think the minister is mistaken. I do not believe there has been any increase in the cost of the site. A possible explanation is that a well was dug. Can the minister confirm that?

Mr. CARDIN: I have no information.

Mr. McNIVEN: Will provision be made in the supplementary estimates for the federal building now under construction at Regina, and also for the extension of and additions to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police barracks at Regina?

Mr. CARDIN: The public building would be constructed under the Public Works Construction Act and would not appear in these estimates.

Mr. McNIVEN: Does that apply to the mounted police barracks also?

Mr. CARDIN: They will be constructed under the provisions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have been looking over these estimates and the amount provided for Saskatchewan seems to be very small for such a large province. Will amounts be provided under other acts, such as those mentioned just now by the minister? I have in mind certain bridges which I cannot find here and which are under construction.

Mr. CARDIN: Certain provisions are made in the Public Works Construction Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will those amounts appear in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—British Columbia—Hollyburn—public building, $37,000.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the contract in connection with this building contain a fair wage clause?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister be in a position to exercise such supervision as will ensure local labour being used as far as possible? I ask this question because of a communication I have received to-day.

Mr. CARDIN: As far as we can, we try to enforce that clause. If I am not mistaken this applies more to the Department of Labour, but as far as we can exercise our authority, we do so. If my hon. friend has any complaints to make I shall be glad to make the necessary representations to see that the clause is enforced.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice that there is an item, "To meet one year's interest at five per cent on mortgage of $400,000."

The CHAIRMAN: We have not reached that item.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like to make an inquiry in connection with the public building at Kelowna. Is it being proceeded with?

Mr. CARDIN: It is not being proceeded with at the present time, but it is under consideration.

Mr. STIRLING: Tenders for a public building at Kelowna and for a public building at Penticton were returnable either on the same day or within a few days of each other. It is significant that Kelowna is where I reside while Penticton is the home of my Liberal opponent. I do not think it is possible that any political colour has tinged the minister's decision in this matter, but I am extremely interested to hear why the public building at Penticton is being proceeded with when my Liberal opponent stated that he thought the erection of such a building would be an unwise action considering the state of affairs with which we were faced. I supported the erection of a public building at Kelowna because I did not agree with my opponent's statement that this was not the proper time to erect a public building at Penticton. In a way these two communities are twin cities; they are located in the same valley and are both centres of a very considerable expansion. The progress made by Kelowna is the largest of that made by any community in the valley. I should like an explanation why the building at Penticton is being proceeded with at this time while the building at Kelowna is not being proceeded with.

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. friend a reason satisfactory to him. The government has endeavoured to reduce the estimates of the Department of Public Works as well as those of other departments, and it was necessary to leave certain items out of our program. The public building at Kelowna has been put to one side, but I can assure my hon. friend that no politics entered into that decision. The question is still being seriously considered, and I think I can say to my hon. friend that he should not despair.

Mr. STIRLING: No doubt the minister will permit me to give whatever assistance I can?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, I shall be glad to have it.

Item agreed to.

Mission City—public building, $6,000.

Mr. BARBER: Could the minister give the particulars of the extra ependiture in connection with this item?

Mr. CARDIN: This building will cost approximately $2,500 more than is provided in the appropriation of $30,000 in 1935-36, owing to the fact that the lowest tender for the building was $990 greater than the estimated cost of $23,500. There was also the installation of a clock at a cost of $1,000, for which provision had not been made in the appropriation, and there is an increase in contingencies. These increases total $2,500.

Item agreed to.

Penticton—public building, $65,000.

Mr. STIRLING: What was the date of the order in council covering the contract for the Kelowna building and the Penticton building as well? The two have always been taken together.

Mr. CARDIN: As regards the Penticton building, the date is October 23, 1935. I cannot at the moment give the date for the Kelowna building.

Mr. STIRLING: So that the minister cannot tell me the amount of the contract?

Mr. CARDIN: In regard to Kelowna?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. CARDIN: No.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. STIRLING: The Kelowna building not having been proceeded with, was it necessary to pass another order in council cancelling the previous one?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. STIRLING: It just lapsed.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: Has the minister taken under consideration the erection of a public building at Powell River? I understand he has had an application from the local board of trade explaining the great need of a building in that town.

Mr. CARDIN: I have not in mind at the moment the representations referred to by my hon. friend. I can assure him that when considering further expenditures for the Department of Public Works I shall be pleased to look into the matter. I invite my hon. friend to come to my office and explain the situation fully. He will be welcome.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would it be possible to consider the matter in the preparation of the supplementary estimates?

Mr. CARDIN: I will consider it.

Item agreed to.

Sidney—public building, $24,000.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): What is the position of this transaction at the moment? Is it intended to proceed with the building?

Mr. CARDIN: The order in council accepting the tender was passed only on January 16. Construction will be proceeded with in the ordinary way.

Item agreed to.

Vancouver — instalment on purchase of armoury, $14,000.

Mr. HEAPS: I assume the minister will treat this item as he has promised to treat the others. The next item would come almost under the same category. I observe that the government is paying five per cent interest on a mortgage of $400,000. I do not know the circumstances, but it appears to me that if the government is able to obtain money at a fraction over three per cent, it would be good business to amortize the cost of the building, and the difference between three per cent and five per cent, over a period of years, would allow the government to obtain complete ownership of the building within a reasonable time. I would suggest, with regard to the last item in the British Columbia estimates, that the Minister of Finance look into all these mortgages or near mortgages outstanding at five and six per cent and see whether the government cannot save money in that direction.

Mr. YOUNG: How many armouries were purchased on the instalment basis in the last five years?

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot give that information offhand, but I will inform the hon. member as soon as I am advised by the officers of the department.

Mr. YOUNG: How many other public buildings in Canada were purchased on a similar basis?

Mr. CARDIN: I will give that information.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the government paying interest only?

Mr. STEWART: The building was purchased subject to mortgage.

Mr. CARDIN: We are paying interest.

Mr. HEAPS: Only?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. PLUNKETT: I should like to get some information with regard to the clause about appropriations not required for 1936-37. This is of great concern to me as the representative of Victoria. There was $300,000 voted in the last estimates and these appropriations not required amount to $451,000, so that the matter largely concerns my city. The building which was to be put up there was a general office building for dominion services. In it were to be housed the marine agent of the Department of Marine, the hydrographic surveys branch, the Department of Agriculture, the radio—

The CHAIRMAN: What item is the hon. gentleman discussing?

Mr. PLUNKETT: I am referring to the elimination of the $451,000, and I think this is an opportunity to lay the matter before the minister. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were also to occupy the building, as were the farm loan board, the Department of National Revenue, and one or two others. The old buildings are not fireproof, and they contain the records of the Indian Affairs department for all British Columbia. Any day they may be destroyed. The head office for Indian Affairs is in this building in Victoria. It is also the head office in connection with the radio service. I wish to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance and also of the minister representing British Columbia, because there is a very real necessity for this building. I will take the opportunity, if I can be given no guarantee of progress in this regard, of writing to the three ministers concerned—the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of National Defence, and the Minister of Finance—in the hope that the construction of that building will not be held up. Plans have been prepared, I know. I do not want to press upon the government anything that I think is wrong or that I think is unnecessary. The construction of that building would give workmen and mechanics in Victoria a large quantity of work. I am going to leave the matter at this stage. I purpose bringing it up later, and I would ask earnest consideration of my representations.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

STATEMENT OF INFORMATION TO BE SUPPLIED RESPECTING TARIFF CHANGES—MOTION FOR PRINTING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some days ago my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) asked if the house could be supplied with detailed information in connection with the tariff changes resulting from the Canada-United States trade agreement signed at Washington on November 15, 1935. I have endeavoured to have as full information as possible prepared. If the house will agree to its printing I shall be glad to move to have printed in tabulated form a statement containing the following information:

(1) Reductions in duty on Canadian goods imported into the United States—

(a) Present and previous rates of duty under the United States tariff on Canadian goods enumerated in Schedule II of the trade agreement;

(b) Present and previous rates of duty under the United States tariff affected by trade agreements concluded by the United States and extended to Canada in virtue of article I of the trade agreement.

(2) Reductions in duty on United States goods imported into Canada—

(a) Rates of duty applicable to goods enumerated in Schedule I of the trade agreement, together with the British preferential, intermediate and general tariff rates on the same items; the special rates under trade agreements with countries of the British Commonwealth when such special rates are lower than the British preferential tariff and the special rates applicable to such items under the trade agreements with France.

The most-favoured-foreign nation tariff treatment enjoyed by United States goods, other than those enumerated in schedule I of the trade agreement, is shown in the customs tariff and amendments thereto; which it is also proposed to table. Hon. members will be supplied with a copy of the customs tariff.

I believe in all particulars we have followed what was done by my right hon. friend at the time this house considered the Canada-United Kingdom trade agreement.

In order that the house may be supplied in printed form with the information indicated I move, seconded by Mr. Dunning:

That 1,500 copies in the English language and 500 copies in the French language of a statement showing tariff reductions resulting from the trade agreement between Canada and the United States be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF EXPENDITURES

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. How much has been spent since 1930 by the federal and provincial governments, and by the municipalities, in relief works?
2. How much for direct relief?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 2. Under the existing arrangement by which the dominion pays to the provinces a monthly grant-in-aid, the provinces do not report municipal expenditures to the dominion. Under previous arrangements whereby the dominion contributed on a percentage basis to the expenditures of the provinces, and through the provinces to those of the municipalities, relief expenditures were incurred by those bodies for items towards the cost of which the dominion did not contribute, such as medical assistance. There is, therefore, no complete information in the possession of the government respecting the extent of the relief expenditures of the provinces and municipalities.

The dominion disbursements under The Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, The Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, The Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, The Relief Act, 1933, The Relief Act, 1934, and The Relief Act, 1935, to December 31, 1935, are as follows:

5. If not, why was one of them not chosen for the position?
6. Who, at present occupies the position of superintendent in the Mail Contracts branch?
7. What was the experience in that particular branch of Mr. Anderson's successor, now serving in an acting capacity?
8. For what special knowledge and qualifications was Mr. Anderson's successor selected in preference to one of his assistants?

Mr. POWER (for Mr. Elliott, Middlesex West):

1. October 23, 1935.
2. Messrs, A. H. B. Potts and J. St. Germain.

3. A. H. B. Potts from July 7, 1921 (appointed to Toronto post office July 16, 1906). J. St. Germain from February 5, 1909.
4. No.

5, 6, 7, 8. The present acting superintendent, Mr. G. Herring, entered the Mail Service branch in February, 1909, after previous experience in the outside operating service. In 1912 he was assistant superintendent of rural mail delivery on the organization of that branch under Mr. Bolduc. In 1916 Mr. Herring was made assistant to Mr. Anderson and returned to the mail service branch. Mr. Herring took charge of the air mail branch in 1928.

On account of his long experience in mail service, rural mail and air services, Mr. Herring was made acting superintendent when the air mail and rural mail services were amalgamated in the interests of efficiency and economy on the retirement of Mr. Anderson in January, 1936.

On the motion of Mr. Heaps (Winnipeg North):

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, cables and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain or any other country, and also between the Canadian government and Doctor W. A. Riddell, Canadian representative at the League of Nations, regarding the Italian-Ethiopian dispute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, it is not the established practice to publish correspondence which is of a confidential nature between the government of Canada and governments of other countries, nor between the government and its representatives abroad, especially where the correspondence relates to matters which affect other countries or to matters that are pending. However, knowing the desire of hon. members to have the fullest information possible with respect to matters bearing immediately upon the Italo-Ethiopian dispute, and particularly with reference to the happenings at Geneva referred to by my hon. friend in his motion, I indicated some days ago that I would ask the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs to have prepared as speedily as possible a white paper containing the essential documents bearing on these matters. I hope to be able before the end of the present week to table a white paper which will contain the following documents:

The report of the committee of the council on the facts of the dispute and the recommendations made by the council in September for settlement, with the replies of Italy and Ethiopia;

The action taken in the council and in the assembly following these reports;

The setting up of the coordination committee and the committee of eighteen, with their recommendations;

The steps taken by the Canadian government with regard to these recommendations; and

A statement prepared by the coordination committee stating which members of the League of Nations have or have not taken action on the various sanctions proposals, the December peace proposals, etcetera.

The statement will also include the committee discussion on proposal 4(a)—the oil sanction proposal—regarding extension of the embargo on exports to Italy.

I think these documents will cover practically all that my hon. friend and other members of the house will wish to have. If, however, anything has been inadvertently omitted which should be included in the white paper, I shall endeavour, when the time comes, to make good the omission so far as it is in keeping with the established practice.

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister has referred to certain correspondence which is confidential in its nature. I should like to know if there is any objection on the part of other governments to this correspondence being published.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Up to the present the other governments have not been asked whether they would wish to have the correspondence published. I must say, however, after looking over the dispatches, that I should be much surprised if any government would wish to have very much of it published, having regard to its confidential nature and the number of countries it affects. But if my hon. friend has any particular correspondence in mind, I shall be very glad to discuss the matter with him personally and see if it is not possible to bring down what he wishes to have, or to let him see the correspondence privately if such is his desire.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I do not want any special privileges in that regard, but when there is so much at stake, I think that having been on the brink of war, we ought to put an end to these secret negotiations as between country and country and let the people know all the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This matter is probably not subject to debate in the way we are carrying it on, but in order to make it quite clear to the house that the present administration is not adopting a practice at all different from that which has always been followed, I would refer my hon. friend to an exchange of opinion on the matter of making public correspondence of the kind referred to, which took place between the right hon. leader of the opposition and myself when we were in opposite positions to those we occupy at the moment.

A request was made on June 1, 1931, as will be seen from the record of proceedings of that date, for:

A copy of all documents, telegrams and other communications exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada and Canada's representative in England, the Honourable G. Howard Ferguson, regarding the wheat conference held recently at London.

And the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) replied as follows:

I think it is a matter of common knowledge that the information here sought cannot be supplied. Communications between representatives of this country in England and the government here are privileged. Of course, any action that is taken is a proper subject of comment, but if communications of this kind were made public, government could not be carried on. I inquired this morning and was told that the communications could not be supplied, and that it had never been the practice in the past to request that such be done.

I thought it was proper, knowing what the practice had been, to supplement what my right hon. friend had said by making clear that my right hon. friend's representations did not indicate a departure from previous practice. I then said:

I agree with the remarks of the Prime Minister with regard to communications between this government and the High Commissioner in London. Such communications, unless quite evidently intended otherwise, have always been regarded as privileged.

I have only to add that anyone who is aware of the correspondence that necessarily takes place between the government here and its agent in London or at Geneva will see that it would be impossible to carry on business at all if it were understood that all such communications would have to be published. Some communications that are vital, respecting, for example, a decision or course of action, it would be perfectly proper to have brought down, but they would be drafted accordingly at the time. It is not a matter of secret diplomacy at all; it is simply a matter of carrying on government.

Motion dropped.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

POINT OF HEAD, GROSSE-ISLE, PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of paysheets respecting all work executed at Point of Head, Grosse-Isle, Magdalen Islands, Gaspé county, by the Public Works department in 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935, of which work Mr. Frank L. Prest was the foreman.

CAPTAIN JOHN S. SMITH

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the honourable the Minister of Fisheries, any official of the Department of Fisheries, and any other person, relating to the dismissal of Captain John S. Smith, of Lower LaHave, in the province of Nova Scotia, who was employed as chief steward on the Arras, and also to the employment in the same capacity of Captain Harris Himmelman, of Lunenburg, in the said province of Nova Scotia.

PAUL VEZINA

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents, departmental and otherwise, in the possession of the Marine department, relative to the dismissal of Paul Vezina, of Boischatel, Quebec.

RECONSTRUCTION POLICY

PROPOSED MEASURES IN RESPECT OF HOUSING, LAND SETTLEMENT, REFORESTATION; YOUTH IN EDUCATION, INDUSTRY AND EMPLOYMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, Canada should immediately adopt a comprehensive national housing, building, reconstruction, renovation, slum clearance, land settlement and reforestation policy adapted to its circumstances and also embracing as one of its main features a national policy for youth in relation to education and industry and employment, so as to get people off the dole and back to remunerative employment.

And further, that this house is also of the opinion, that in any such national reconstruction policy a lower rate structure for bank, mortgage and insurance loans is an immediate necessity. Such a reconstruction policy to also embrace protection for industrial workers in urban and suburban areas from forfeiture on the same principle as farmers and fishermen are now afforded by existing legislation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this motion was brought before parliament last session, although in another way. On January 23 and 24, 1935, this house considered my resolution on the whole question of reconstruction and housing and what could be done under the powers of parliament to get the people off the dole and back to work, and a select committee on housing was appointed. To-day is private members' day, and to the new members I may say that the private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate. When he ceases to function all parliamentary government is at an end. The great authority for this is Edmund Burke, who refers to this right as one of the oldest rights and privileges of a member of parliament under our parliamentary system. The rights and functions of the private member have been curtailed in recent years in many parliaments of the world by what is known as the party caucus. The private member owes a duty to his constituents, to function as a member in a free parliament and to do his duty accordingly.

The wealth of this country does not consist only of the natural resources of the sea, of the soil, of the forest, of the mine or of the lakes; it does not consist only of the grain in our great elevators or the shipping in our harbours; there is a more glorious treasure than that, it is in the character of our people. This character through unemployment is gradually being destroyed. The care of the young citizen is our most important duty. Several billions of dollars have been spent on the construction of our railroads, but only millions have been spent on our educational system. Our school boards are doing the best they can to educate the rising generation. I approach this question this year, as I did last year, from a non-political standpoint, because housing, reconstruction and unemployment are the greatest problems we have to face. Unemployment and distributism are two very important problems which still remain unsolved. While I am opposed to the government opposite in a general way I realize that they are a government of Canadians and I believe they will do their utmost for the people of the country, as they see it.

Another great problem facing this country is law reform, constitutional reform and cabinet and parliamentary reform. I have been talking to gentlemen who were members of the last parliament and they told me they did not desire to return because there was nothing left for a private member to do. Private members sit around their offices all day, and the time has come when they should be up and doing something for the people who sent them to parliament. We are sent here for specific purposes. I represent an industrial district now—Broadview—half of my old constituency of East Toronto, and I receive splendid support from the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), who has that part of my old constituency now, and who has done a great deal for the youth of the country. Thousands of my constituents are out of work and on relief. Skilled workers, carpenters, bricklayers, lathers, plasterers and labourers are now out of work, men who never before knew what it was to be without employment. Sixty-five per cent of the people in my riding used to own their own homes, but because of the intolerable conditions which now obtain in this country, these men are out of work.

Considerable progress has been made in the solving of this problem. In my remarks last year I gave a great deal of credit to the then government. I do not believe the late government was defeated because of its advanced policies; but because of the deep resentment the world over against all governments. They were the first government since confederation to bring forward a new deal for the average forgotten man. These matters have gone to the law courts but we should remember that one of the cardinal principles of the British constitution is that the courts are subservient to the legislature and that the people are the court of last resort. Hon. gentlemen who are private members have been sent here to try to get some relief from these intolerable economic conditions. Both the industrial and agricultural workers need this relief. The former Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made a brave effort to solve these great problems in his square deal and new deal for the forgotten man. He did not have the support in the house that he should have had from all the parties; nevertheless he did his best. Courts in other lands have taken certain action, such as at Washington, but the time is coming when the people will have something to say about these things. After all, under our constitution the court of last resort is the people, and parliament is the highest court in the realm.

Some progress has been made towards correcting these disgraceful conditions. I want to thank the former Prime Minister for having given his support to the appointment of a committee last session to consider housing and reconstruction problems. This committee sat for several weeks and presented its report to the house. Thanks are due to Colonel the Hon. H. A. Bruce, the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, for the splendid work he has done in this connection. He is a great physician and surgeon, and he realizes that the public health is closely connected with housing conditions. Unless you have proper housing you cannot have health for the rising generation. Considerable progress has been made in England. Our present sovereign, King Edward VIII, was one of the pioneers in this connection. He visited slums in London, in Wales and in other parts of Great Britain, and in 1933 he aroused the whole of England to the necessity of correcting this slum problem. What has been the result? There have been constructed in England a total of 2,600,000 houses under the auspices of various public and private bodies. As our sovereign said:

> There is, however, one municipal service, one local government service, of which I would like to say an extra word—one that I consider the most important of all that you authorities have to face—and that is housing.

Those were the words he uttered when addressing the one-hundredth annual dinner of the association of municipal corporations at the Guildhall in London. He also made reference to what has been done in this connection.

Canada was once a nation of property owners; practically every man owned a property of some sort, whether a small farm, a market garden, a grocery store, a mill, or something of that kind. We were all property owners, but I am afraid we did not notice how this condition gradually passed away. Canadians owned real estate; and that individual ownership, on the comparatively extensive scale on which it then existed, was the basis of Canada's national life at that time. But the politics of big business has practically destroyed pastoral Canada, and it is the duty of this parliament, it is the duty of hon. members of all parties, to take this question into serious consideration. We must dedicate our efforts to the solution of the unemployment problem, and one very effective means of bringing that about is to restore the condition that existed under Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and under Whitney and Beck. Then Canada was indeed a land of the free; Canada was the home of artisans and farmers. Canada was then a democratic country, its democracy resting on the basis of private property and individual freedom in the real sense. But there is no real freedom to-day, when working man and farmer alike are at the mercy of arbitrary economic factors that are altogether beyond their control.

Consider the condition in England only four years ago. Things looked black in the old country; England was the highest taxed country in the world. To-day we find a very different state of things there. What has been responsible for England's survival of the greatest of all depressions the world has ever known? Why is it that England has come through this trying period better than any other country? One reason is, Mr. Speaker, that twenty-three years ago she saw fit to institute a system of sickness and unemployment insurance; she took a census of the unemployed and, in a practical way, made provision for just such a situation as the whole world has faced in the last few years. Four years ago, I repeat, things looked hopeless in England; but the scene has changed, and the adoption of a sensible tariff policy together with a sound program in the interests of the working classes has worked wonders. England has built houses for her people and has emerged from the greatest depression in the world's history. She is no longer in a unique position in regard to taxation, for the United States and Canada are pretty well where she was four years ago. England decided that the only way to recovery was to take in more than she paid out, and so we see the miracle of the balanced budget.

In nothing is the determined spirit of the mother country more evident than in her program of construction of new homes. People who have been in England in the past two or three years have returned to Canada enraptured with what they saw over there in the construction of new houses; the spirit of the mother country has been particularly evident in what she has done in that direction. Large apartment houses are going up all over the countryside. Houses have been built by government subsidy, and England has shown her determination properly to house as large a proportion as possible of the poorer classes of the population. One man remarked to me that low cost housing there had ceased to be a political issue, and I submit that the same should be true in this country. Low cost housing is a permanent government policy in England; long may it continue. And it should be here as well. There is great need for construction of houses, not only urban but suburban and rural as well, the last mentioned being the most needed of all. Let me quote something I came across in the reading room the other day. This newspaper item is typical of many; it refers to Windsor:

> To-day is moving day in the historic and picturesque village of Coinbrook, on the Bath road, near Slough.
> More than 100 houses—practically the entire village—are to be demolished under slum clearance orders made by the Eton rural council, and tenants to-day moved to a new village which has been built some distance away.

At an early hour people brought their furniture into the street and it was conveyed to the new houses by all manner of conveyances.

Already the work of demolition has commenced, and this afternoon High street looked as it would after an air raid.

Whatever we do in Canada in connection with a housing scheme, however, we must take care not to hand on to posterity too great a burden of debt. Our debt is already large enough, the result of the war and relief costs, and we must not do anything beyond our circumstances. The object I have in mind is for the government to undertake an extensive housing and reconstruction program, on a sound economic basis, with the double purpose of providing jobs for the unemployed and of making provision for the underprivileged who are living in slums. England has led the way in this respect, having shown a real regard for the welfare of the common people.

I stand for property and contract rights, and these must be respected in connection with anything we do in the way of a reconstruction program; but I am also for human rights, first, last and all the time. There is no reason why a proper policy could not be set in motion, which would give fair play to the farmer and the labourer, the producer and the consumer, at the same time removing all the admitted abuses of the present system. We know what effect modern machinery has had on labour; every new process throws men out of work. Women can handle machines as well as men can, and Canada has become a nation of machine-minders. In my opinion, before the bar of history, the Victorian and Edwardian statesmen must take a large share of blame for not having foreseen the situation that would result from the introduction and development of science and the machine.

The welfare of the people should be our first care; there can be no remedy for the present state of things until the whole structure of our national economic life is so shaped as to produce stability. It is more important that heads of families should have remunerative work than that boards of trade should publish returns showing immediate profits. Our national and economic life must be so modelled as to aim at a national balance and stability rather than at the largest immediate profits. I hope that hon. members will get copies of the report of the housing committee set up in this parliament at the last session; they will find some very interesting reading in that report. I would refer them particularly to page 13 of the report:

From A Housing Program for the United States, by the National Association of Housing

Officials, we extract the following: "In time of industrial depression and consequent unemployment, low-cost housing provides one of the most effective and least costly types of relief works because:

(a) It does not displace work which would otherwise be undertaken by private enterprise.

(b) It expends the capital cost mainly in labour widely distributed among the branches of the building industry and others which manufacture the materials, equipment and furnishings.

(c) It transforms what are at such times idle credits into revenue-earning and self-liquidating assets, which may be regarded, therefore, as investments rather than as debts, and are likely over a long period to prove good investments."

The concrete and lumber industries, as well as labour, would benefit by a housing scheme. For social and economic recuperation and advance through the relief of unemployment, the fostering of housing for low wage earners now living in undesirable slum conditions is, the report says, the most promising as distinct from higher class houses for those who can be financed through the usual agencies. Evidence shows that financial institutions can assist at a capital cost line of $3,500 and above. The report goes on to refer to the fact that the amount to be paid for relief must be around $100,000,000 in the twelve months ending March last. There would be a large amount of that hundred million dollars saved by giving work, and that would be spent in wages and remunerative work for numbers of our population.

When I first appeared in this parliament, in the session of 1922, the coal, steel, and iron industries were in bad condition: thousands of people in Sydney were in rags, in distress and starving I then proposed a system of protection, because I am a protectionist. I am a protectionist for all the people, not for some of the people. I am a protectionist for the farmer, for the consumer, producer, industrial worker, and for labour. I brought in to parliament a coal policy whereby all the coal used in this country should be mined and coked under the British flag,—whether from Wales, the maritimes, Alberta, and so on. Sir Henry Thornton in the railways and shipping committee criticized me for my policy, and said I wanted a lunch counter system of freight rates, because of my policy, of bonus, subventions and subsidies for this national fuel supply policy and for steel and iron. Later the government accepted this subsidy policy after twenty years, and it saved a great many workers from a slavery worse than death. Under that policy in 1935 2,800,000 tons of coal have been moved economically to the head of the lakes by rail and water. Subsidies have been given and have been continued, and rightly so, and the subsidy policy extended to the poor grain grower on the prairies and the farmers throughout the country. I would extend that subsidy through housing and reconstruction to aid the municipalities. I would make a large direct contribution to the larger municipalities for the construction of small houses, because all indications show that for many years working men will need some form of cheap housing such as they have in the old country. I suggest that we should extend that policy by subventions, bonuses and subsidies to the large municipalities direct and to the smaller ones, the rural ones, through the provinces. That is what they are doing in Italy. Italy has been building municipal institutions and for the next twenty-five or forty-five years to help unemployment they will construct court houses, gaols, hospitals, schools, playgrounds, harbour improvements, irrigation schemes, breakwaters and projects of that kind by direct aid to the municipalities. Money has been granted to the muncipalities to enable them to continue their necessary and urgent program of public works, which was stopped by the depression and relief expenditures, and much money has thereby been made available to the muncipalities directly and indirectly for the relief of the unemployed through these municipal works, federally-aided by a third or half cost.

The Bruce report on Toronto is being given performance so far as some of these matters are concerned. I do not believe everything in the Bruce committee's report, but they certainly performed a great public duty, and now the wise and up-to-date policy of the city council this year will do untold good by compelling owners to put in conveniences and renovate, or the city will step in and do so; and also, the city can now lend the owner money for that purpose, thus, at one blow, helping the slum problem and carrying out the Bruce report.

One of the objects of my motion is to make the house and the country "housing minded." Many houses in Canada are occupied by industrial workers who are only on half time or part time. These dwellings they inhabit are not fit to be called homes or in many cases fit for human habitation. The landlord is exacting the last cent he can get. These slums are against all the laws of public hygiene. Workers of this class have always been the victims of bad housing and the high prices exacted by some landlords. One of the main reasons for better homes was given by the Prince of Wales, now King Edward VIII, in figures he quoted from the report of the housing committee showing the connection between better housing and a reduced death rate.

It was shown last session by the then member for Battle River that some shark insurance and loan companies incorporated here have been charging as much as forty per cent for second mortgages. Not satisfied with that what do they do? They take a chattel mortgage and bill of sale on all the furniture in the house, and often the tenant loses his last cent, and is put on the street. I say something should be done to reduce bank, insurance, mortgage and interest rates. The insurance companies are doing something in the United States. For instance the New York Life have advanced $25,000,000 to build houses at Gravesend Beach so as to do something for the working people of the city of New York. I am glad to see the progress made by the city of Toronto, which has been a pioneer in this housing and health work since the days of the great Doctor Hastings. I am glad that a by-law has been passed by the council, after checking up every house in the city, requiring the slum landlord, upon notice, to make necessary improvements, to put in sanitary appliances. If he does not do so the municipality will advance a loan for renovations of $50 or $100 or more and will get security. While we are waiting for parliament to do something on these lines, the municipality of Toronto is doing something by itself in the cause of its good government.

I am surprised that our friends the socialists in this house, who sometimes take up so many bad causes, have not pleaded more strongly the cause of the suburban worker and a suburban railway service. In that connection I may mention the case of London. By comparison with wasteful expenditure on the main roads which do nothing for the comfort or economic efficiency of the people, but rather subsidized the motor industry at the expense of the railway lines—I am not opposing proper good roads for the farmer, but some of these large road expenditures have been very wasteful, since they simply provide a right of way for the motor industry parallel with the steel rails built by the people of Canada, who have to construct their own right of way—the same thing should be done for housing as is being done in London, Philadelphia, New York and Montreal, where a suburban service of rapid transit has been built, and commutation tickets given, so aiding the housing system, and letting the people get out to the country.

I have only about fifteen minutes more, but one or two other matters should be referred to. The first one is the high rate for bank interest. With the addition of charges, a rate of seven per cent amounts to a lot more than that, and small workers cannot get much of a loan on small businesses. Something ought to be done by the government to straighten out conditions in this respect for the benefit of the worker. That is not a matter for the initiative of the private member; it is the business of the government. I wish to offer constructive suggestions. If they bring down any policy for the good of the country they will have my support. These loan companies have charged high rates for years, but the days of high money have gone by. The late government deserved a great deal of credit for the housing policy they inaugurated last session. At the time it was about as far as they could go, but with the money situation as in normal times, more can be done. The policy of getting loans through selected companies would be a good one. I believe that in the coming spring some of the 50,000 people in the city in which I live will want to move from the apartment houses back again into a house of their own, having been driven by the depression into apartments, three or four years ago. When they start to do that, if they can get $1,000 together I believe this 1935 act will be a very wise policy, and in the future it is going to be a very good thing for the building industry. I appreciate the fact that with the commitments the government had under the so-called new deal this was only a start in the right direction, but in my opinion they did not go far enough. The policy of moratoria should be continued; if they are abolished the workers are going to suffer. There may be some few whom these moratoria affect adversely, but those are the people who have been receiving 6 per cent, 6½ per cent and 7 per cent interest. I am informed that property is down from 25 to 50 per cent, and that has to be considered when you deal with an interest rate of 7 per cent or 6½ per cent. So I hope these moratoria will be continued, or many people will be ruined.

In conclusion I should like to refer to the manner in which the youth of the country are affected. On January 30 of last year I discussed in this house the question of scholarships in connection with our high schools and universities, and a national policy of economic protection for youth. I pointed out the amount of money spent in the city from which I come, some $11,000,000 or $12,000,000, in the public schools and high schools. The great industrial revolution of England was started by five or six young men, some of them entirely without education and with none of the advantages possessed by the youth of to-day. Yet that revolution converted England from an agricultural country into the greatest industrial country in the world and made it the workshop of the world. That great movement was started by the people themselves for the benefit of people of all sorts.

I do not believe the young people of this country are getting proper treatment, and I believe it is the duty of all men to concentrate on bringing about a better social order for the common good, instead of leaving it to the government alone. After all is said and done profit making alone should not be the basis of a christian society; the well being of all communities should be the aim of all men. We want to help the birth and development of a public conscience which will demand a decent standard of living, under which no citizen need suffer from hunger or cold because of the operation of economic forces. In time of war when the invader is at the door we mobilize and nationalize all our resources, our men, our railways, our food and so on; we go to meet the enemy at the gate and repel him. So in time of peace, when this foreign invader, unemployment, is at our door, we should resort to similar means. In war we are united, but with respect to unemployment we are divided as to what should be done and the best means of doing it. We have a war in Canada to-day as bad as or worse than the last war; a war between thousands of our people and poverty and starvation. Canada's enemy is hard times, and that is just as dangerous as a foreign enemy.

May I repeat what I said last year, that these young men are riding all over the country trying to find work. Many of their fathers are on relief, and these boys have no place to go. They have tried hard to get jobs, as we all know. When there is not enough food to go round they have enough courage to leave home, to ride the rods all over Canada in an endeavour to find jobs. Many of these young men are from the finest homes of this country; many of them are in the lockup to-day, and the only charge against them is that they cannot get work owing to the failure of our governments to come to their support. I believe the time is coming when something will have to be done. These youths, accustomed to a fair standard of living at home, now go for days without taking off their clothes; they sleep at night in unsanitary places; they suffer from cold and hunger; many of them are killed on the railways. In the towns they are given a night's lodging and then moved on to the next place.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that industry will have to do something for these boys. In the United States, Hon. Miss Perkins, federal secretary of labour, has adopted a policy of looking after hundreds of thousands of these bright high school and university students, which includes the payment of school fees, carfare and $1 to $2 a week, as well as the necessary books to enable them to continue their education. Something like this was done in Toronto fifty years ago; at the old grammar school on Jarvis street they used to give scholarship assistance of this kind, and I believe a similar system should be adopted in this country. But $100,000 is not enough; we should spend $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 for the further education of these bright students who otherwise may leave the country. We used to talk about the export of raw material; what about the export of brains? That great Canadian Sir Frederick Banting and others of our great university graduates, might have been lost to this country, and there are many similar cases. The educational authorities must take a leaf out of the book of the United States and the old land.

I should like to conclude by making the prophecy that within three years there will be an agricultural economic revolution in the old world, and I believe there will be an educational economic revolution as well. The other day I read a most interesting book written by some of the ablest men in England, including Mr. W. S. Morrison and Lord Eustace Percy, former president of the board of education. I should like to read one or two paragraphs from that book; it is from the section written by Lord Eustace Percy:

> The urgent need of the present day is to control the entry of juveniles into employment, to make the termination of full time schooling coincide with that entry, to modify or eliminate all regulations or examinations which are obstacles rather than aids to that transition, and to ensure that the first years of employment shall be treated as years of training and continued education. This policy involves, first of all, not a merely educational, but an industrial reform; the imposition on organized industries of a statutory duty to formulate their schemes of recruitment and training, or, in other words, a revival in a new form of the idea of apprenticeship as the path to a definite professional status.

I am not of those who advocate that further burdens should be placed on industry, because I believe they are already carrying too many. One of the main causes of unemployment is the trade barriers that exist at the present time, but the educational system of the future will have to take care of the youths of school age under twenty-one years of age who are not being looked after under the present absurd system. I quote further on this new policy for industry and education:

> It involves, in the second place, an extension of compulsory full time school attendance, not to some fixed and unalterable point dictated by the requirements of school courses, but to points corresponding with the various approved recruitment schemes of industries. It means, thirdly, a new cooperation between the state and industry in the establishment of a system of part time education, designed to assist the gradual transition from full time school to full time employment and to combine a continuation of general education with the training of industrial skill. It means, finally, the encouragement during full time school life of every contact with practical, including accupational, life outside the school which does not endanger health or unduly interfere with school work; together with a steady attempt to limit the scope, and restrict the significance, of purely school examinations.

And further:

> In our educational example, one of the chief weaknesses of the body politic is the dislike manifested by many of the most enlightened industrialists, who are really keen on education, for any organized system of part time education and part time employment. The problems of internal factory organization which such a system must create are many and serious; yet unless they can be solved, unless the inhibition can be removed, no thorough educational reform is possible. There is some obvious way of removing the inhibition; the five day working week, during which the employed juvenile would receive his specific craft training in the factory, with a universal system of Saturday morning continuation classes. This idea needs careful testing before it is put into practice, but in many, if not in most, industries Saturday closing night will be found to have positive advantages in reducing "terminal" costs, and again educational reform would be merged in a larger reform of occupational life, a reform which would be organic because it would be economic.

We know what they are doing in Denmark. They are getting the market by a proper system of marketing and transportation; they are getting the cream of the business in the old land to-day. They have a system of high school training for adult persons at night. We are away behind in our educational theories in this country; we have too many quack doctors connected with our educational system, and the whole thing is sadly in need of reform. The government cannot compel industry to take on more employees, because to add to their staffs might ruin many industries.

There are millions of acres of fertile land in Canada, which could be used to supply vegetables and food to needy families. This land would not be the means of bringing riches to our youth, but it would be better than camps, and the accommodation would be better than city flats or the old huts, in which our forefathers lived. Many young men around our cities would accept such shelter and wait for better days. In my opinion financial assistance should be given for two or three years. In this way young people would not be compelled to live lives of idleness.

Further, may I say we are behind times in matters of reforestation. I have before me a report which I should like to take time to read, which indicates what has been done in Japan and Germany and twenty other countries in reforestation and settlement. In Canada our forests are being ruined. We are losing a great deal of money in this way, and much of the money spent on a national system of highways and transcontinental railways is being lost through not having a proper forest policy along the route, creating work and settlement. We should be restocking our forests, thereby giving large numbers of our citizens work. For the preservation of our natural resources we could use graduates from our universities. Last year Mr. Gordon and the then Prime Minister did a commendable work when they set aside a vote of $2,000,000 for inquiries along these lines, and for mining surveys. We could learn a lot from Germany and other European countries, and I am trusting that something may be done. I regret having to bring this to the attention of the house, but the people in my constituency are interested in the matter. I believe one of the greatest misfortunes is that our rising generation, through no fault of their own, should be in the sad unemployed condition in which they find themselves today. It is against the law of God and man that this condition should continue. Hon. members sitting in this parliament should do something about it. Under our parliamentary system the private member has not a chance to take action in these matters; all he can do is to bring it to the attention of the house. I say all hon. members should rise in their places and tell their respective political parties what the people back home are saying, as to the need of solving the whole question of unemployment.

We have to reorganize our whole system of parliamentary government in Canada. Our system is based on the British North America Act, and is a relic of the ox-cart days. This act has the working class in a straight-jacket and unemployed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

[Mr. Church.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise not for the purpose of dealing with the specific proposals in the resolution but because I believe this is the opportune time to express the government's attitude generally towards resolutions which directly or indirectly involve expenditures of public moneys.

As most hon. members are no doubt aware, any resolution involving an expenditure of public money must be presented to the house by a minister of the crown, the authority of the crown having been previously given for the introduction of such resolution. While it is most desirable that hon. members should feel free as fully as possible to discuss all resolutions, and particularly resolutions similar to the present one, which relate to great social and industrial problems, I hope hon. members who have resolutions on the order paper which may be read as committing the government to additional expenditures will not feel that they ought to press for a division, unless there be a special reason for so doing.

The adoption of resolutions involving even indirectly the expenditure of public money necessarily appears to lead to commitments on the part of the government. I will be frank in saying that up to the present time members of the government have been unable to discover the number of commitments to which the country is already obligated. Every now and then, we have felt that we have reached a point where we are aware of all outstanding obligations, but to our amazement on a subsequent day some new obligation comes to the fore, and we find that in connection therewith the country has been committed to additional expenditures. It is our hope during the present session to bring before the House of Commons, and through it before the country, some understanding of the magnitude of the expenditures to which Canada has already become committed, as well as of what is involved by way of additional taxation to meet such commitments.

Before the house can wisely decide upon additional commitments to be made I believe it is necessary that hon. members have this bird's-eye view of the entire financial situation. It is for that reason, and that only, that I express the hope that hon. members will not wish to go the length of asking for a division on any of these resolutions, thereby involving should the resolution be adopted what might be construed as a commitment for additional expenditure on the part of the government. I do not make this request with respect to future sessions, but I do with regard to this one, until, as I have said, all hon. members have a chance to see just where we stand in the matter of expenditures and income.

There is one other point I should like to stress, namely that the government's policies with respect to these various matters will be announced from time to time, as the government has had opportunity to give to the various subjects concerned that careful thought and consideration which should be given before any public announcement is made. There are some matters which thus far we have not had an opportunity fully to consider. It is not very long since the general election was held. Since then many important matters have consumed much of the time of my colleagues and myself and this to an extent which probably very few are able to appreciate. The result is that in connection with some matters concerning which we would like to give an immediate expression of view we may have to take a little time for further consideration.

My purpose in rising is simply to encourage, if you like, as much as possible in the way of discussion, counsel and advice from hon. members with respect to what ought to be done in these various matters, while at the same time expressing the hope that hon. members in the next few months will refrain from pressing to a division resolutions which may be construed as involving additional expenditures. Should that course not be followed, the government might reluctantly feel it necessary in the public interest, merely because of not knowing the probable extent of necessary expenditures, though not through any lack of sympathy with the measure or cause being advocated, to take towards some resolutions an attitude which under other circumstances might be wholly different.

Mr. H. J. PLAXTON (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I wish to discuss the resolution moved by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I consider it my duty to speak at this time because in the constituency of Trinity, which I have the honour to represent in this chamber, the conditions of unemployment and relief are found in their most intense forms. As I hope to establish to the satisfaction of hon. members, these problems are definitely related to that of housing.

Of the 75,000 people found within the confines of my constituency I would estimate that about 25,000 are on direct relief. Of that number approximately 10,000 are unemployed. The significant fact is that the housing conditions respecting those 25,000 people in the constituency of Trinity typify the general problem throughout Canada. Having made a partial survey, and to that extent speaking with some authority, I say that in the past the great majority of those 10,000 unemployed have been identified in one way or another with the building industry. It may be safely stated that while many industries have enjoyed a sharp revival and general pick-up in business during the past few months, and particularly since the Liberal administration has taken office, the building industry has continued to lag far behind, in fact it is almost in statu quo, having regard to the last five or six years. It may be said with equal assurance that a revival of the building industry offers us our most potent weapon to reduce substantially the ranks of those who are to-day unemployed or on direct relief.

I might go further and point out that if we are to judge from the experience of older countries which have attacked this joint problem of housing and slum clearance, this government and this country would be well repaid by adopting an adequate national housing scheme and thereby effect a great reduction in health and crime costs in this country. It is almost axiomatic to say that where you have slum conditions obtaining you will also find disease and crime rampant, and I suggest that it is only by ridding the great cities of this country of these black spots that we can hope to check, much less reduce, the tremendous governmental cost in respect to these evils of society. Only the other day I was informed by Doctor Gordon Bates, president of the Health League of this country, that the people of Canada spend in one way or another approximately one billion dollars annually to check the ravages of disease, whereas we devote only five million dollars to preventive measures in that connection. These figures, which I assume to be approximately correct, are truly startling, and I say again that they are directly relevant to the question of housing.

I can only, for lack of information, hazard a guess, which I shall not inflict upon this house, as to the stupendous cost of the administration of criminal justice in this country, but it is significant that in the estimates which were tabled in this house only a few days ago there is an appropriation of $2,749,506 for the administration and maintenance of those few penal institutions which fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that if we revive the building industry only to the extent that we eliminate the slum conditions, we shall have set in motion a process which will effect a vast saving in respect of these major problems of crime and disease.

What I have had to say in respect of these vital aspects of the housing problem is lent some weight when I refer to the opening remarks of a report made by the National Housing Committee of Great Britain in 1934. Their statement is rather significant, and is found in the report of the lieutenant-governor's committee on housing conditions in Toronto:

> One fundamental principle lies behind all our discussions. The provision of housing accommodation, not below a minimum standard, for every family in the United Kingdom at a rent within the family capacity to pay should be accepted as a public responsibility and a national service. Fit and proper housing is a national essential, in the absence of which our existing social legislation must prove unfruitful. As long as overcrowding and slums exist, the doctor is attempting a cure without being able to touch the root of disease; the teacher has the full force of environment against him; the social reformer is fighting a battle in which he cannot hope for decisive victory.

But aside from these indirect major advantages which would accrue to us from the adoption of an adequate national housing scheme, there is the more vital question of unemployment and relief to be considered, with all their disastrous effects upon the morale of the Canadian people. That problem which we all agree to be our most vital national problem, is directly connected with the housing question; for I repeat that if we can revive the building industry, no matter how it may be accomplished, it will constitute our most effective means of solving the problem of unemployment and relief. The correctness of that statement I submit can easily be gauged when it is realized that out of every dollar spent in the construction of a home eighty-two cents finds its way into the hands of wage earners connected either directly with the building industry or with one of the many other industries directly allied with it. So I say that if we revive the building industry, not only to eliminate the slum conditions in this country but to supply the shortage of some fifty-five thousand homes which now obtains in Canada, then at one stroke we shall have drawn back into gainful employment thousands of artisans, who it is estimated constitute some sixty per cent of those we find at present in the ranks of the unemployed.

It should be of interest to members of the house who are not aware of the fact, that the building industry has long since been revived in England, where since the year 1919 over one-quarter of the population, amounting to some eleven million people, have been rehoused, and where in excess of 2,300,000 homes have been erected. To my mind it is more than merely a coincidence that in keeping with the progressive expansion of the building industry in Great Britain there has been progressively a marked diminution in the ranks of the unemployed and in the terrific burden of relief costs incidental thereto.

Let me add one further thought. I would say in the light of the experience of the British authorities that the revival and expansion of the building industry in that country has, more than any other single factor contributed to the mother country's return to prosperity.

Likewise we have to consider the experience and enactments of other countries outside of Great Britain. I refer particularly to Germany and Belgium, and in lesser degree to the United States. There in the light of investigation that we might direct into those channels we find that it has been established conclusively that it is the duty of the government as opposed to private enterprise and private capital, to initiate and revive the building industry. Thus I say that we here in Canada, if we are to follow the lead of older countries, must in this parliament accord to the building industry our profound attention and supply it with the financial support which is so vital to its expansion and growth.

Before I leave for your consideration these facts, which appear to establish conclusively the success of the building industry in England, let me point out that private finance, coupled with individual initiative, has accounted for the financing and construction of fifty per cent of the homes that have been erected in that country during recent years. I have not the figures before me, but I think we can safely assume that of the $2,400,000,000 of public money that has been directed into the channels of the building industry, private capital has matched it dollar for dollar. The action which private capital took in England in this connection constitutes a real challenge to the businessmen of this country. I say to them it is high time that they realized the seriousness of present conditions. In these times of national emergency they should follow the lead of their brethren in England and accord to this government the full weight of their financial support in whatever building program may be initiated. However, in keeping with the selfishness and timidity which has characterized their actions in the past, the businessmen of this country may refuse to assist the government. It may be necessary therefore, having regard to the emergencies of the time, for this government to do something which may be considered bad in principle, but which in the circumstances may be good business. It may be necessary for this government to induce private capital to enter the building industry by offering some concessions under the income tax act or other acts that may apply. I leave that thought for the future consideration of this house.

It is true that there is a housing act on the statute books of this country, known as chapter 58 of the statutes of 1935. Upon reading that act I am obliged to commend the previous administration for at least having recognized the problem to the extent which the existence of this act would indicate. However, I have several criticisms to make of this act which I believe hon. members will consider logical. The act has been in force since July 5 of last year, and although it provides for a $10,000,000 fund to be directed into the channels of building, it has become effective or operative only to the extent of a few transactions involving less than a million dollars. To be more specific in my criticisms, let me say first that this act apparently is not designed to promote the work of slum clearance. I think that any national housing scheme which does not provide for slum clearance is, ab initio, incomplete and inadequate.

Second, I criticize this act on the score that it offers no assistance to the many owners of tenement and other houses throughout the country who might desire to renovate or reconstruct. I think this criticism has considerable weight when you consider the fact that there are many houses in many of our large cities which are approaching a condition which will finally result in their being classed as slums. If the owners of these buildings received from the government some incentive to reconstruct or renovate, to that extent such an act would have some real effect.

Third, this act would appear to contemplate that the private citizen who wishes to build a home must contribute in land and/or cash at least twenty per cent of the cost of construction or of the assessed value of the completed property after construction. From my own experience and knowledge I can say that among the thousands of people who are in my own constituency it would be the exception rather than the general rule to find one who, desirous of building a low cost home, is possessed of sufficient assets to meet the requirements of this act.

Fourth, I criticize the act on the ground that the twenty per cent contribution to be made by the government is merged or blended with the sixty per cent contribution which it is contemplated will be made by the private lending institutions. I think this provision of the act creates a barrier over which private capital will refuse to jump in any substantial way. I would make an obvious suggestion by way of amendment: I would suggest that the contribution of the government should rank separately and secondly to the major contribution of the private institution.

To summarize my views with respect to this act, I may say that in a broad way I criticize it because it is not designed to permit of the government contributing to a real building scheme. It seems to me that the government is only participating along with the private corporations. If a definite program is to be established, I maintain that the government must accept the primary responsibility. If I may use the analogy, it is much like priming the well. If the government will accept the initial responsibility, a building program once set in motion will by its own momentum revive the building industry and its allied industries. Private capital will be drawn into the fold in spite of itself and happiness and prosperity will be brought to thousands of Canadians who are now out of work and on relief and who are found invariably to be poorly housed.

In concluding I should like to take this opportunity of paying a tribute to my old friend, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), for raising this question at such an early day of the session. I should like also to pay a tribute to the present mayor of Toronto who has waged such a doughty battle in the cause of slum clearance. I desire also to pay a tribute to the lieutenant governor of the province of Ontario, whose illuminating report on this matter has focused the attention of many thousands of Canadians on the problems of housing, rehousing and slum clearance.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to congratulate the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) upon having the courage to speak on the resolution moved by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), after listening earlier in the day to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). If we fell in line with the suggestions of the Prime Minister it would only be necessary for us to sit down and write a letter to the government setting out our opinions with reference to these various resolutions.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. MacNICOL: I intend to speak on two or three of the items mentioned in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Broadview. The first item to which I shall refer is forestry. Last fall I made a survey of a number of forestry camps which had been opened up in the United States I wanted to find out how they were organized and the calibre and standing of the young men in the camps. I must confess that I was more than pleased with what I saw being done in the camps I visited. The young men selected for these camps are the sons of men on relief living in the respective towns and cities from which they come. Their ages run from sixteen to eighteen years. Each camp consists of 206 young men, and sixteen local men, generally men on relief, are chosen to instruct and advise the young men on the work they are to do in any particular camp. The local men are supposed to have a knowledge of whatever is to be done by that camp—ditching, road work, or forestry work. In addition to the sixteen men who might be called instructors or foremen, there are two military men, retired and on the reserve list. During the working hours of the camp all the men in it are under the control of civilians, but after hours they are under the control of the military men. In the evening they are instructed in the ways of life; they are taught how best to get along in life. I took great interest in that. In one camp I visited, a batch of young men had just arrived—perhaps about thirty-five or forty—and I was struck with the apparent lack of discipline among these young fellows. Perhaps I should not speak of incivility, but I might say that there was a lack of courtesy in their general demeanour. The gentleman who was showing me around told me that these young men had just arrived; "and now I will take you to a camp where young men have been in training for three months," he said. There was a great transformation visible in the general demeanour of these other men. I was highly pleased with this second group of young men who had been in training for three months. They were very civil, they were courteous, and they gave ample evidence of their training. The instructors told me that at night they taught these men along various lines, and in the daytime they were instructed in the work they had to do.

I found that forestry, the replanting of trees and reforestation was apparently one of the primary objectives of the government at Washington. After visiting the camps I went to Washington to interview the Interior department, where I talked with heads of the forestry branch. There I learned a good deal about the object they have in view.

The whole of the territory adjacent to the great lakes in particular has been deforested to an alarming extent since 1830. There I saw figures that indicated that in 1830 the estimate of standing timber in the state of Michigan alone was 150 billion feet, and by 1880 it had been reduced, by fire or by wanton destruction, but principally by the cutting down of timber, to approximately 35 billion feet of standing timber, board measure. In 1903 in the state of Michigan 500 million feet board measure were cut down in lumbering. The result of deforestation has had a tremendous effect on the water levels of the great lakes. In connection with the water levels of the great lakes, a subject which I shall discuss more extensively at a later date in the session, I believe that the Canadian government has a great work to perform. Anyone visiting northern Ontario, Muskoka, Parry Sound, on our own side of the line, will find just as great a deforestation as there has been in Michigan. The effect of that vast deforestation adjacent to the great lakes, in both the United States and Canada, according to a very eminent engineer who has written on the subject, Mr. R. E. Horton, has been a reduction in the rainfall on the whole St. Lawrence-Great Lakes area, of from three to eight per cent; and the concrete effect on the lowering of the water level on our great lakes, it is stated, has been a lowering of lake levels of from five to eight inches. Anyone can calculate what a tremendous volume of water that represents; we may get a proper idea of it by considering lakes Huron and Michigan, which are on the same level and are adjacent. Their combined area is 45,000 square miles.

I believe that the government has the ability to deal with the situation. I have great regard for a number of the ministers of the present government, in whose ability I have faith; and if they fully realize the menace involved in the lowering of the water levels of the great lakes, to the extent that it has been going on, one way in which they can make a great national investment in this connection is through reforestation. In the United States there are 2,427 camps, and there are already in these camps approximately 500,000 young men. These men are paid $30 a month. Thousands of them have been used in the work of reforestation. If we followed a similar scheme, thousands of the young men in this country could be put to work similarly. The salary, I grant, is small, $30 per month, but these men get their keep and clothing and a certain amount of education; and if they were not there they would be on the street corners—and anything is better than that. When they go into the camps they agree to send to their parents on relief $22 a month out of the $30 they receive. In Washington I saw figures showing that 80 per cent of these young men sent home an average of $25 per month to their parents.

Many of the men later find positions. I learned from the chamber of commerce that there is on the part of the firms associated with that institution quite a demand for the young men trained in these camps, because people know that they will be civil and energetic and will have had the benefit of a certain amount of training. It is stated that thirty-nine per cent of the young men enrolled in these camps receive positions outside the camps. The enrolment is for a period initially of six months, and they are allowed two additional periods of six months, or a total of eighteen months in all. I was informed that the maximum of young men discharged from the camps for not behaving themselves was less than five per cent.

I am convinced that the government has a great opportunity to perform a national work and to take a step towards raising the water levels of the great lakes by means of reforestation on our side of the line; the United States, I have no doubt, would take care of its side if there were collaboration.

Other speakers have referred to the young men. I am very greatly concerned about the young men in this country, for we have as fine a young manhood in Canada as can be found anywhere in the world. When the members of this house—at any rate those past forty—were young men there were jobs of various kinds for all; I can remember that when I was a young lad there were numerous jobs open. The young men to-day are up against it; they have nothing to do; they cannot possibly get positions. But they all have in their hearts the same desire that we had when we were young men; they want to do something for their parents. They cannot get anything to do, however. I take great interest in the young men, and it has been my happy privilege to assist many. But I regret my inability to serve them in the way of obtaining positions for them as I would like to do. It is a tragedy. These young men might be far better engaged in what I believe is a great national work, the reforestation of deforested land that surrounds the great lakes watershed, than in doing nothing. For doing that they would not receive what might be called a dole; they would receive a certain amount of wages for rendering very necessary and efficient service. Something has to be done to restore these water levels. When the subject is up later I will go into it more elaborately.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) referred to Great Britain. Anybody who has been to that country within the last few years will be fairly well informed as to why Great Britain is coming back. Britain abandoned the free trade fallacy that is advocated in this country as well as in some other countries; all over England I saw, upon my visit a few years ago, factories that appeared to be the better part of a mile long, and there are hundreds going up. If one goes to Manchester and to Birmingham, particularly, they will find great areas of factories that have been erected in the last few years, factories that are now making for Great Britain what was formerly imported into that country, principally from continental Europe.

I am tremendously concerned with the trade agreement that this government has entered into with our cousins to the south. In my time I have had much to do with industry and have visited many factories. I called on some recently, and in several cases I found that quite a number of employees have been laid off. How far that process is going to continue I do not know at the moment, but I cannot for the life of me see how Canadians can be helped by importing millions of dollars' worth of manufactured articles from our cousins to the south for use in Canada and at the same time displacing Canadians in our cities and towns who could have work making these same lines of material. If, as the previous speaker said, England is coming back—and certainly it is—and we know the reason, why does our own government depart from that same line of reasoning and lower the bars to admit into this country millions of dollars' worth of manufactured products that could be made by Canadians here in Canada?

If the government goes on with a program of public works I trust that some regulation will be enacted to prevent "chiselling" in connection with construction in the cities. I cannot quote them at the moment, but a number of cases have come to my attention where men on relief were compelled to work for a few days a week at a lower rate of wages than that at which otherwise they would have worked; that is what they call chiselling. The various trades, carpenters, bricklayers and others who work on the construction of buildings, should not be up against the temptation of chiselling and should not be encouraged to do so in order to obtain a few days' work per week. In adopting regulations along this line, I hope the government will see to it that labour receives its fair and just reward for service rendered.

There is another angle to it. I am convinced that industry never again in our time will get back to the former number of working days per week. I am convinced that before very long five days a week will be the maximum not only in this country but in other countries. In that manner more men will be given employment. It will then be the duty of the authorities to find something for them to do in their leisure hours, on Saturdays. I recently paid a visit to Rouge River, a suburb of Detroit, where the great works of the Ford Motor Company are located. I was informed the property belonging to the company occupies 11,000 acres. I was taken over a considerable acreage.—I have forgotten the size—which contained thousands of small gardens, and on asking for information I was informed that, as the company was operating on a five day week basis, it had taken steps to provide land so that every employee who desired might have land to work on on Saturdays. I cannot help but feel that something like that has to come here before very long, that owing to shorter work days, which will likely be the rule in the future, men should be provided with an opportunity to grow things. In connection with that, and having served in industry a long time, I am convinced that few men over fifty years of age will again obtain jobs unless former employers feel disposed to take them back. We have to provide for many men who are over fifty years of age, and I know of no better way, when factories do not want them, than to provide land on which they can raise what they require for themselves; and if there should be any surplus they would have the opportunity to dispose of it in the adjacent cities. I believe that the government have a great opportunity in the very kernel of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Broadview if they take it wholeheartedly into consideration.

There is one other item of the resolution about which I should like to say a word, although I do not know how it should be handled. During the last few months many of the people I represent have lost or are very near to losing their homes owing to the high rate of interest and their inability to keep up payments. I believe that it is the duty not only of the federal but of the provincial governments to make an honest effort to do something worth while in this connection. There is no use fiddling while Rome burns; we must do something worth while to stop the conflagration. Men have put their little all, saved over many years, into their homes, and have lost it. I do not know whether anything can be done to help those who have lost their homes, but surely something can be done for those who are on their way to losing them. How interest can be lowered I do not know. How arrangements can be made to save their homes I do not know. But it presents a great problem, and it is one that it is the duty of this government and the other governments to wrestle with. The homes of the common people in the cities are just as worthy of protection as are the farms in the country. We have heard in this house a lot about farming, and I for one believe in giving the farmers more than is coming to them; I would almost go so far as to say that I would compensate them for staying on their farms. But a city has its problems too and one of the greatest, perhaps, is the saving of the homes of the average workingmen. A few days ago someone spoke in this house of conditions on the farms of the west. I could tell tales from now until next Christmas, if I wished, with respect to conditions in the cities, but that would not help anyone or do any good. I know the government are seized of the importance of the matter. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has had a good deal of experience. He has come up from the bottom; he should be qualified, and I believe he is qualified, to wrestle with problems of that kind, and I look forward to something along that line being done. Representing as I do a riding of sixty-five or seventy thousand people, many of whom are out of work and in jeopardy of losing their homes, I appeal to the Minister of Finance, who is going to be in office for four or five years—provided the government does not go to the country in the meantime—to do something in this direction. The problem is an important one. Do something for the workingmen in the cities and towns. They are just as worthy of consideration, in the saving of their homes and in the lowering of interest rates, as are the farmers. Do something to help the man in the city to save his home. If he cannot be given work, this opens up another method of helping him.

Let me conclude with what I said in opening, in reference to reforestation. There is an opportunity for the young man, if there is nothing else for him to do. He can render splendid service there. I repeat this because I believe it worthy of repetition. The young man engaged in this work will do something for Canada; he will aid in raising the water levels of the great lakes, the principal artery of trade and commerce by water for the eastern part of the continent of North America. I concur in what has been said by the hon. member for Broadview and only wish I could support him more effectively than I have been able to do.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak very briefly on the resolution offered by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). Before doing so, however, may I say how much I appreciate the work done by the hon. member for Broadview in this house. This is by no means the first time the hon. member has brought forward resolutions having to do with subjects that are of interest to the people of Canada.

I am interested in each part of the resolution, though I do not intend to speak to each part. I have often wondered why, when there is the need for better housing, for the renovation of existing buildings, and for reforestation, we have not done all these things before now. We have the need; we have the material; we have the skilled and unskilled workers necessary, and all that is required is to bring these together. The essentials for doing so are credit, or money, and leadership by the federal government, but I believe we are going to see more public projects in the future than we have seen in the past. There has been a beginning in housing already.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to have such building projects as I hope we will have we should not forget the need for agricultural construction. It is very difficult for the agricultural people to come under any of the housing schemes yet devised; in fact it is impossible. If the housing or building scheme is to serve agriculture, then it must be extended to include agriculture so that if the farmers want new buildings they can secure money for that purpose at low interest rates. That should apply also if they want to repair existing buildings, because in Ontario the problem of the farmers is not so much the construction of new buildings as it is the roofing, renovating and extension of buildings already in existence. In Canada we have something like 728,000 farm homes, of which I believe hardly one does not need something done in the way of renovation, construction or extension. It is true that many farmers need new buildings, but they also need to be able to get money at low interest rates in order to make their present buildings of greater use to them.

Since the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member who sits before me at the moment (Mr. MacNicol) have spoken in glowing terms of projects on the other side of the line, I will venture to do the same. I should have hesitated to do so otherwise, but now I am quite sure it is all right. I was extremely interested in two projects that are being carried on in the United States, and I think it worth while taking the time of the house to describe them briefly. We are all concerned with the number of young people, not only young men—though sometimes in listening to debates in this house I wonder if the whole population is composed of men—but young men and women of Canada who go part way or all the way through high school and then, at the end of that time, want to pursue their studies further but are unable to do so. Since in most cases they are unable to get jobs it would be very much better if they could pursue their studies further if they are qualified and ambitious. I feel that if something could be done to make it possible for these young men and women—some of them only boys and girls in years—to go to school it would for a time at least lessen the strain of unemployment. It might also—and we would hope it might—enable these young men and women to evolve a philosophy by which to live.

Under what is called the national youth administration the United States has started to do some things that I think we must soon begin to do also. Starting first with the students in the high schools, eight per cent of the total attendance of the high schools of the United States may be employed by the high schools to do various tasks at wages which range from $6 to $8 a month, the object being only to provide them with sufficient money to keep them in school. The work they have to do must be such as will not interfere with those already employed, like shall we say, the janitor. These students, however, may be set to work as assistants to the janitor, as waiters in cafes or cafeterias, as teachers' assistants or as stenographers for the teachers. I saw some beautiful projects that have been carried out in connection with the beautification of school grounds, under expert supervision, by students working under this plan. They have done much to encourage and plan inter-class sports, to build tennis courts and other sports grounds for schools, to repair books in the libraries, to assist with translations, if they were senior students, and in keeping the records of the schools.

It is true, of course, that whether or not this project works out well depends very largely upon the ingenuity and resourcefulness of the principal of the school. The principal of one college, not a high school, told me he had heard of a friend of his who had wired the president beseeching him to send ten tons of leaves, since those they had on their lawns were already worn out. I suppose it is true that some principals were unable to supply jobs which were purposeful and constructive, but on the other hand I think a great many were able to do so.

They carry that through into the universities as well. Twelve per cent of the total enrolments in universities may be students who have been recommended by high school authorities but who have not money sufficient to take them through the universities. For doing work of a higher type than that I have indicated, they are paid $15 a month, which is sufficient to enable them to stay at school. However, at least one-quarter of the twelve per cent must be students who have not been in college the year before. Students who have graduated with a bachelor of arts or some other degree, but who want to take up post graduate work, can do very valuable research work, for which they are paid $40 a month. In the different schools and colleges I visited, I asked many questions about this system and I believe it has done a great deal towards enabling ambitious students to continue their studies. Further, it has done something which I believe is necessary in Canada, and I am sure just as necessary in the United States, namely, combined the work of head and hand, and brought about a new respect for hand work. In Canada I believe we have been too prone to divide sharply the two spheres of activity. Too often there is a feeling that people who work with the hands are not capable of working with the head, and that people who work with the head are a bit too good to work with the hands. The plan I have indicated has done something towards breaking down this absurd notion.

There are other phases of national youth administration which possibly have not worked out as well or, because they require more resourcefulness, have not been tried as extensively. In some places however vocational guidance centres have been established, at which attempts are made to guide young men and women toward the studies in which they are most competent and toward work for which they will be best qualified. In order to afford them further assistance a system of apprenticeships has been set up, giving high school and university students an opportunity to get into the work they would like to do, and for which experts have decided they are qualified. Going into apprenticeship they gain practical experience of the work of their choice. I do not know very much about how the system has worked out, having heard only general statements made by people who were not very closely connected with it.

I have thought for some time that something definite concerning scholarships should be done in Canada. Only lately a pamphlet was issued discussing the subject at length. I shall not cover again the ground indicated in the pamphlet, but it serves to illustrate the point that many countries have encouraged young people desiring to acquire higher education, and have provided them with the means of doing so. Unless Canada follows the procedure adopted by Great Britain, Japan, the United States, Australia, New Zealand and in another way Denmark, we are going to be placed in a very unfavourable light and naturally hinder our development.

One other point, although possibly not strictly proper at this time, might be mentioned. Three times in the last two years I visited the Louisiana state university and on each of my visits I heard professors talking about the possibility of having scholarships on much more extensive scale. This year they are launching what would seem to be a tremendous scheme. They are increasing their farm, which is already very large, to an area of 4,750 acres, and they are taking 1,000 students on it. A complicated plan, which at the moment I shall not describe, is involved, but briefly they work on the farm for one semester, taking two subjects in the evening classes at which the teaching is done by university professors, and the following semester they go to the camps and take the full course. These alternate between different camps. It seemed to me that it was a common sense arrangement. It may be too extensive, but it is a common sense plan.

I believe the resolution offered by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has similar merit. In my view it is extremely important that we undertake projects like this. I think all hon. members realize that the relief camps now existing cannot long continue. The work given the men in the camps is not varied; some of it may be very useful, but the variety is limited and it is not very interesting. Almost no hope is held out to them. I think it would have been much better if from the beginning we had paid the men a living wage and to a greater extent put them on their own resources. The conditions under which they are living is in my opinion very bad for their morale. I believe a change will have to be made, and the resolution offered by the hon. member for Broadview offers a good basis for an ambitious and extensive program of public works. While we may not now undertake it I believe that before very long we will do so. Unemployment is not to be cured, even if purchasing power were to come back to the 1929 level or beyond that point. Displacement of labour by machinery will make it impossible for us to absorb our unemployed in ordinary industry, and some great projects of a national character are bound to come.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to express my appreciation for the opportunity that has been afforded us by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) to discuss this problem. I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which followed, and while this motion may not be pressed to a division, nevertheless I think it is well that we should have an opportunity of placing before the government our views on the matter. It is, of course, not a new problem. I recollect that one of the first things I ever heard about the present leader of this group, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), was in connection with a survey of housing and living conditions in western Canada. That was many years ago. Since then at various intervals we have had commissions sitting and placing before the people of Canada their conclusions regarding the housing situation.

May I point out that it is not merely a problem of housing; it is a problem of health. Overcrowded living conditions both in the country and in the urban communities mean ill health and large expenditures in sanitaria of various types throughout the dominion. I was looking up some records a few days ago and I found that as early as 1911 a report was submitted to the health department of the city of Toronto stating in part:

> There are few conditions found in the slums of Europe or in the greater American cities that have not been revealed in the city of Toronto, the difference being only of degree, and the conditions of lesser degree to-day will, if not corrected, become those of greater degree to-morrow.

Then we have Sir Clifford Sifton saying this at Ottawa in 1916:

> We are to-day reproducing some of the worst things that have characterized the old lands. We are getting slums in our cities. But we are doing worse than that. Apparently we are failing utterly to get to the root of the problem which makes slums.

And, Mr. Speaker, we have to get at the root of this problem, and, as I said the other afternoon, the root of it is not something of recent planting or recent growth, but something that has been growing and developing during the years that have gone by. I might quote further from the records but I shall content myself with one more statement that was made in the 1935 report on housing and slum clearance for Montreal:

> The elements of the population of Montreal which are now compelled to find their abode in the slums or near-slum areas are not large in proportion to the whole population of Montreal, nor are the slums of Montreal as bad as those of many north American cities. However, they constitute a heavy burden, and the fact that they are widely spread to-day and rapidly extending calls for serious effort towards what has been called 'the new day of housing.' The depression has brought the Montreal housing problem to an acute stage and has emphasized the unsoundness of our existing working class housing schemes.

May I add that I found myself in sympathy with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) when he suggested that something had to be done for those who are to-day losing the homes which they occupy and which they have built. That problem is an exceptionally serious one throughout the length and breadth of Canada; seldom a day passes but I receive a letter from one of the many people whom I have met in the past few years asking me to advise them what they may or may not do in relation to the pressure that is being placed upon them, and I believe my experience is probably the same as that of many other hon. members.

A few moments ago I was quoting from old reports, but I have before me now one which is very recent, issued so recently that it bears upon it the name of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). It is a report issued by the bureau of statistics and deals with the seventh census of Canada, 1931, and the housing accommodation of the Canadian people. I would recommend to every member of the house a perusal of a copy of this analysis of the census returns on housing in Canada. I find on page 3 of the report this statement:

> Nearly sixty per cent of Canadian households occupy from four to seven rooms, and almost twenty per cent live in three rooms or less. Only 3·5 per cent of households occupy more than ten rooms.

We have heard a great deal about the cities; what of the rural areas? This report is exceedingly interesting to me because it confirms some of the statements I made in the course of the discussion on the address in reply to the speech from the throne last week. It says:

> Distribution of the number of rooms in homes throughout the prairie provinces is quite different from that in other parts of Canada, particularly in rural areas. Over sixty per cent of prairie rural homes contain four rooms or less, while the number of such homes in Ontario is less than 23 per cent. In Alberta and Saskatchewan there are more rural households occupying two rooms than in any other room group. Prairie urban areas also contain proportionately more small homes and a lower percentage of large homes than is found in eastern Canada, although the typical size is five rooms.

That gives some idea of housing conditions in the prairie provinces. It may be due in part, as the report says, to the fact that the prairie provinces have been more recently settled, but, Mr. Speaker, I would say that it is not only because of recent settlement but because of the wide areas that are more or less subjected to frost, crop failure and drought, and the large number of farms that have been established on submarginal land in areas that never should have been opened for settlement. I have seen conditions in the northern part of Saskatchewan that made one's heart bleed, people inhabiting homes, tiny log buildings, where there were no conveniences of any description. I remember just about a year ago I was speaking in the town of Spiritwood in northern Saskatchewan, and an English lady there came up to me and said, "Can't you do something to bring to the attention of the authorities the condition of the people in this area? I have just come from attending at the birth of a new baby, and in that home there was nothing but a mattress made of gunny sacking stuffed with straw, and the only cover the mother had was the heavy coat her husband wore around the barn." Those are conditions of real poverty. It may be said that that is an exceptional case. That may be so, but I have seen and heard of a number of such exceptional cases.

I quote further from the census report. It goes on to say of prairie dwellings:

The smaller prairie dwellings doubtless are associated with the relatively short time the western provinces have been settled. The accessibility and cost of building materials is another factor which appears to have exerted a considerable influence.

And yet the condition which I have just been describing is one which existed, not in the southern part, but in the northern part of Saskatchewan where there were mills and where lumber was comparatively cheap.

I find this, too, from the census report, that the large six-room dwelling is predominant in the maritime provinces and Ontario, where there is the least evidence of crowding, and, conversely, that in the prairie provinces, where three-room and four-room dwellings predominate, there is definite evidence of inadequate living space, particularly in the rural areas. The report continues, referring to certain figures quoted:

From these figures it appears that the great majority of households of more than six persons was inadequately housed. The fact that this was true of Toronto is particularly significant, for space available per person in that city compared favourably with most other Canadian cities of over 30,000 population.

The report contained one statement that was particularly interesting to me as a former member of the municipal administration of the city of Regina. It says:

The amount of space per person in 1931 was characteristically less than one room in households paying $15 rent or less per month. In this rental group, the average number of rooms per person centred around 0·7 and 0·8 in the twenty largest Canadian cities, varying from the lowest average of 0·5 for Regina to as high as 1·2 for Victoria.

Conditions of overcrowding, therefore, are not confined wholly to the older communities like Montreal and Toronto, but are also particularly acute in newer western cities like Regina. Under conditions of relief and poverty which now exist, suffering is becoming aggravated. In the years to come we shall suffer as a people from the ill health and poor physique of the rising generation which consequences such conditions are bound to bring about. The report ends with these words:

These facts do not furnish conclusive proof of crowded conditions where the number of rooms per person is less than one. There is good reason to believe, however, that families in which earnings average $14 per person, paying less than $15 per month rent, and living in less than one room per person, are inadequately housed. In 1931, there were 51,778 or 15·7 per cent of all tenant households in Canadian cities over 30,000, who were paying less than $15 per month rent, the majority of them averaging less than one room per person.

That is an independent analysis of the census returns made by our own bureau of statistics. This should place the problem squarely before the government at this particular time. I know the government has many difficulties, but we must make progress. I look around and I see raw materials such as clay, with brick works nearby lying unused and idle. I go into the forest areas and I see the noble spruce trees standing there while mills within easy reach are lying idle. I am reminded that the members of building trades are out of work, that skilled workmen are walking the streets seeking relief. We have the labour; we have the materials; we have the need; it seems to me that all we require is the initiative and the intelligence to work out a plan that will meet these conditions. I am not so much interested in balanced budgets as in a balanced human welfare.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What explanation can the hon. member give of the fact that people who have materials such as cheap lumber and other commodities do not build larger homes for themselves?

Mr. COLDWELL: To begin with, the people who need the homes do not control the mills nor have they access to the hardware which is necessary. If they are going to build a log home, they endeavour to build it on a small scale because of their inability to purchase sufficient stoves to heat a larger building. The whole matter comes back to the basic defect in our economic system.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is not for lack of material for building?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it is not lack of material; it is not lack of ability to build and it is not lack of intelligence to turn our raw materials into buildings. The whole matter is an inherent defect in our present economic set-up which makes it impossible for them to do the things that they otherwise would do.

The resolution contains one or two other suggestions which I should like to discuss briefly. One is in connection with land settlement. It all depends upon how such land settlement is to be undertaken and for what purpose. I have before me a statement showing the condition of certain settlers who have been settled for a long time upon the land in the province from which I come. I should like to quote from a bulletin issued by the farm management department of the university of Saskatchewan in 1934. It reads:

> Indebtedness continues to be a problem of great concern. To pay interest on the present farm debt of Saskatchewan would have required about four-fifths of all wheat available for sale from the 1933 crop; and for the payment of farm taxes two-fifths of this wheat.

In other words, for those two items alone, in 1933 it would have required six-fifths of all the wheat produced, twenty per cent more than was actually produced in Saskatchewan. Professors Allen and Hope go on to say:

> From our survey of last summer information is now available concerning the debt of 238 farm owners located in some of the oldest farming districts of Saskatchewan, operating about 44,000 acres of land, of which 37,000 acres were used for crops and summer fallow. Twelve of these farmers were free from debt, the remaining 226 having obligations amounting to one and three-quarter millions of dollars, and averaging $7,686 per farm, or $7,298 for the 238 farms. For the 238 farmers this debt averaged $18.64 per acre of cropland. Since the summer of 1931, because of crop failures, the debt per farm had increased by $1,414, or $707 per farm per year. Most of this debt (77·3 per cent) was associated with farm real estate, 39·3 per cent being in agreements of sale, and 38 per cent in farm mortgages. Chattel mortgages amounted to 2·7 per cent of the total; implement debts, 3·1 per cent; taxes unpaid, 3·3 per cent; bank obligations, 3 per cent; and miscellaneous debts, 10·6 per cent.

If we are going to embark upon a land settlement scheme, how can we expect that people taken from our cities, people who are not familiar with conditions as they exist, will be able to make a success when men of long experience, such as these, cannot? This report covers a number of municipalities, including, I believe, that of Scott, in which are located Yellow Grass, Milestone and Lang. This is one of the finest areas in southern Saskatchewan and yet those people have been unable to make a success of their agricultural activities. How can people without capital and without experience be expected to succeed?

I view with a good deal of misgiving the propaganda now appearing in the press in various parts of Canada in connection with a land settlement scheme and a new immigration policy. I see that the quota from central Europe has been doubled since the new government came into office and I deplore this action. A short time ago I noticed that General Hornby was endeavouring to persuade various counties in England, such as Derbyshire, to embark upon a migration policy under which British workers would take up land in various parts of Saskatchewan. I felt that the government of Canada should not only not lend any encouragement to such a scheme but should prevent the putting of it into effect, because our problems can only be greatly aggravated by it.

I know it is sometimes said that our western farmers have been extravagant; but if you travel over the prairies you will find the condition outlined in this census, showing what actually exists in the form of a home—often nothing but a thin board shack, tar papered, standing on the windswept prairie. And if you will go into that shack you will find few of the amenities of life, few comfortable chairs; it is heated by a primitive stove. Extravagance! Why, not even ordinary comfort.

People sometimes say that the prairie farmers bought automobiles. Well, in western Canada, with the long distances between town and town, between the village and the farm, the automobile is not a luxury but a necessity, and moreover it is a labour-saving device, because it enables the farmer to get from his farm quickly to town to secure whatever is needed. If you go into one of the villages or towns on Saturday night and see the cars lined up along the sidewalk, you will find that many of them are rather ancient models, and most of them are of the cheapest make. Fords, Chevrolets and Plymouths are the cars you will find the farmers using mostly on our western plains.

We have been told too that they have spent their money taking trips to California. I am fairly familiar with many farmers in some of our best areas, and I know that very few of them took such trips. But on that score, I may say in passing, that after a man and woman have lived on the wind-swept prairies for fifteen or twenty years they are entitled not only to a trip to California but to a tour round the world and back again, if they feel inclined to take it.

In the resolution there is mention of the problem of youth. I have been particularly interested in that problem because of my life work and my long association with young people. I have watched with a great deal of alarm and sorrow young people whom I have known, who have passed through my hands, who have graduated from high school, who have gone to university and returned. They are on the street corners to-day or they are in relief camps. We are utterly destroying the young people who are growing up. Last summer I had the privilege—I regard it as such—of meeting some of those young men, the relief camp trekkers, who came to Regina. I had been told before they arrived that they were rather a tough lot. I met many of them and found among them some young men of high school education, other young men of university education, even young men very much like my own boy, who is about twenty. True, there were a few of a different sort; but on the whole they were a very decent bunch of young men, youths who desired to place their problems squarely before the people of this dominion and its government in the only way available to them.

Many of these young men feel that they are unwanted and forgotten, and if the government of Canada to-day can do something to institute a widespread public works program of housing, reforestation, building of roads and bridges, elimination of level crossings, and so on, then such young men may have an opportunity of at least feeling that they are of some use in the society in which they live. I remember speaking with some of the trekkers, a week or so before the regrettable riot; they were assuring me that there would be no trouble, but one young fellow said, "No; I would not start any trouble at all, but if trouble started I would be there; for after all, Mr. Coldwell, what is the use of living if there is nothing for you to do?" And then another added, "I am twenty-four; I should like to be able to get a home and to choose the girl I should like to marry." That was a very natural and human desire, and throughout the length and breadth of Canada to-day there are thousands of young men in exactly that position.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, we have a problem of housing; there are thousands of people living in one roomed shacks. Now we have the material; we have the skilled men; we have the sawmills and the brickyards and everything we require. All we need to do is to use the intelligence we have and we shall find ways of bringing all these things together so that we may improve the conditions under which our people live.

Briefly, I wanted to contribute something to the discussion, and I feel grateful to the hon. member who introduced this resolution, because it has given me that opportunity. I hope that the ministers of the crown will carefully consider the suggestions that have been made by various speakers this afternoon and will give effect to at least some of them in the present year.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I wish to express my own sense of obligation to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and to others who have taken part in the discussion of this resolution this afternoon. It was the purpose of the resolution, I take it, to direct the attention of the house to the problem of unemployment and to advance certain proposals for dealing with the problem.

During the past week we have listened to many references to unemployment, and that was to be expected; the seriousness of the problem is self-evident. We should be forgetful of our duty as members if we sought in any way to minimize its importance. In much of our discussion of the question of unemployment, however, there has been a lack of any definite proposals for providing new employment, and I think the hon. member for Broadview is deserving of congratulations upon making certain suggestions having in view the creation of work for those who are now unemployed.

Before discussing the terms of the resolution, perhaps I may be permitted to say a word about our approach and attitude to this problem of unemployment during the present session. Behind some of the references to this question in recent days there has been a veiled imputation that the present administration has not been sufficiently impressed with the gravity and urgency of the problem. In every case however the only apparent ground for such a suggestion has been the failure of the government to adopt outright some sovereign remedy advanced by some particular group or individual as the one and only path to economic recovery. Let me say, as one who has a special responsibility in relation to unemployment and relief, that members of the present administration are fully seized of the gravity of the problem, and are prepared to study carefully any and all proposals which have as their object the amelioration of the hardship and distress which have been the lot of so many of our people during the past five years. If we appear to be indifferent to these special panaceas which are advocated by certain groups in the house, it is not through any suspicion of the motives behind them, nor through any lack of appreciation of the sincerity of those who propound them. In dealing with this whole question of unemployment it is well, I think, that we should begin this opening session of a new parliament with the recognition that all of us, regardless of our political affiliations, have as a common duty and a common objective the progressive reduction of unemployment and of its serious effects upon the fabric of our social and economic institutions. Our differences are not those of human sympathy, of compassion, or of social responsibility; they relate rather to the methods by which we hope to achieve the object which we all have in common.

For more than five years we have been dealing with unemployment as an emergency situation. It came upon us almost unawares. Naturally the task of dealing with it became a very difficult and disagreeable duty. Our policies have been improvised quickly in response to immediate pressures, and there has been on the whole a conspicuous lack, I think, of objective study and adherence to fixed principles in the various measures we have adopted for the liquidation of unemployment and relief. In the case of the late administration I believe certain things were done which ought not to have been done, and certain things were left undone which ought to have been done. But no doubt that might have been said of any administration in power at that time. While recognizing fully the difficulties confronting the late administration, I think the course followed by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was more erratic than it need have been. That, however, is a question that can be discussed more properly at another time. I suggest now that we have reached a stage where it is possible and certainly desirable to take a careful inventory of our present situation, and either return to old principles or adopt new ones which are recommended by reason and confirmed by recent experiences of our own and other countries.

This is a very comprehensive resolution; it is framed in generous terms. For that I am grateful to the hon. member for Broadview. He could scarcely be brought to order for wandering from his subject, nor, I hope, shall I be brought to order for a similar reason. Much of the discussion hitherto has been concentrated upon one of his proposals, namely, that of housing. I propose simply to address myself to the first paragraph of his resolution, and instead of taking particular suggestions contained therein, to deal rather with some of the broad questions of policy which I believe are implied in his resolution.

The first question raised by the resolution is the utility of governmental expenditures as an aid to unemployment and a stimulus to economic recovery. Although the resolution does not state this in so many words, the phrase "national housing, building, reconstruction, renovation, slum clearance, land settlement and reforestation policy" suggests that what the hon. member has in mind is the provision of funds for this purpose out of the dominion treasury. Whenever in recent years a national scheme has been proposed, there has usually been behind it the thought that the dominion government should assume either a larger share of financial responsibility or full financial responsibility in carrying out such a scheme. Certain of these proposals will be within the memories of members present in the house. Associated with all such proposals, moreover, is the assumption that the dominion parliament, unlike other governmental agencies under the federal system, is possessed of unlimited resources to meet the costs of additional works projects. Undoubtedly there is some excuse for the prevalence of this view, and for the consequent pressure upon the dominion government to assume a steadily increasing share of financial responsibility for relief works of one description or another. The provinces and municipalities have restricted powers of taxation. The municipalities have restricted borrowing powers. There is no such legal restriction upon the taxing powers of the dominion, and none with respect to its borrowing powers. It is well to remember, however, that while the dominion is not subject to any legal restriction upon its taxing and borrowing powers, it is subject at all times to what I might describe as a prudential limit in the exercise of both these powers. Moreover this prudential limit is not confined to the dominion parliament. It applies as well to provincial legislatures and to municipal councils. The hon. member for Broadview does not need to be reminded of this fact. He has served for several terms as chief magistrate of a great Canadian city, and he well knows that extravagance or misdirected expenditures may so increase the debt and tax rate of a municipality as to discourage commercial and industrial expansion through the natural channels of private and corporate investment. That consideration is one which we must at least have in mind in dealing with this problem which has been brought before us this afternoon.

If the mover of the resolution has in view the encouragement by governments of private investment in housing and building construction, I would support him wholeheartedly in his advocacy of such a policy. If he has in mind the close cooperation of dominion, provincial and municipal governments in slum clearance projects, I would agree with him that such a policy should receive the sympathetic examination of the various governments concerned. If, however, he proposes a scheme under which the dominion government should at this particular time assume an immediate or contingent liability in relation to any large scheme of this character, I would suggest that we should see our way very clearly before entering into any such commitment. I do not yield place to any hon. member in my desire to see slum clearance projects undertaken. I realize fully the social evils that follow in the train of slum and bad housing conditions. I feel, certainly, that we must do what lies within our power to remedy these conditions as soon as possible. I simply put it to the house at this time that in any long view of the problem we are compelled also to consider how far it is desirable to commit ourselves to large public expenditures if—and I shall deal with that point later—by so doing we discourage or deter the natural flow of savings into housing through private and corporate investment.

I submit this view, as I have said, not with any lack of sympathy for the object which the hon. member for Broadview has in mind, but solely because it seems to me that we have reached a point in the state of our public finances when we are compelled to consider the deterrent effect of large governmental expenditures and increasing deficits upon the flow of savings into productive investments. Savings for investment are notoriously sensitive to conditions of public finance. The even flow of savings into private and corporate investments depends in very large measure upon confidence in the national credit. I do not believe in giving national credit precedence over human need. To do that would be a gross perversion of the objects of government. We must all agree, I think, with Edmund Burke that the true purpose of government is the provision of human wants. Without exaggerating the importance of the national credit, however, this like every other government, is compelled to recognize the relationship between public finance and private investment if it is to discharge faithfully its duty to reduce unemployment by the encouragement of private enterprise and the steady promotion of production and exchange. We must go as far as we prudently can with public expenditure, but at all times we must keep in view the effect of mounting debts and unbalanced budgets upon the normal expansion of private employment.

A moment ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that he was not particularly impressed with the importance of balanced budgets. I have already said that at all times human need must be the first end and purpose of government, but I do suggest that, circumstances being as they are, it is taking a short view of the duty of the government to the people of Canada to assume that we can continue with unbalanced budgets and at the same time expect the cooperation of private and corporate enterprise in supplying more employment in this country. I do not think it is possible for any government to spend its way out of unemployment by vast expenditures on public works. I am sure, however, that it is possible for a government to spend its way into chaos by a policy of this character, continued over a long period of time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the relation of public spending to private investment, and had suggested that with a housing or any public works program it was necessary to keep in view the necessity of maintaining that degree of confidence and financial stability essential to the flow of savings into private investment and productive enterprise. It is legally possible; the power is here, to adopt a program of relief works which would employ every able-bodied person now on relief, and to pension the remainder at sixty years of age. I wish I could honestly advocate such a policy. I wish this government could put every able-bodied man to work to-morrow, and I am quite sure that desire is shared by every member of the government. However I cannot advocate such a policy because I do not believe public employment through a vast scheme of public works is anything more than a palliative for our present economic ills. I believe that ultimately it would create far greater economic distress than that which now exists.

Upon this point I should like to offer in evidence statements from two very reputable sources. The first is the statement by the British government in its reply to the League of Nations inquiry of October 31, 1934. The statement is in these words:

> His Majesty's government have on a number of occasions stated their view that the expansion of normal activity will most surely and rapidly be brought about by the creation of confidence by steady policy—in particular, financial confidence by a balanced budget, the lowering of rates of interest with resultant cheap and plentiful capital and, in so far as government action is possible by the creation of facilities for and the removal of hindrances to trade. Public works—

And I wish particularly to bring this to the attention of hon. members:

> —are a part of the normal activities of the state and of local and public authorities and they are continuing and will continue in this country subject to the test of their value to the community; but the experiment of large scale public works as a method of dealing with unemployment has been tried and has failed, and it is not intended to repeat it.

These are faithful words and worthy of our acceptation. I shall follow that statement by the testimony of General Hugh S. Johnson, former administrator of the NRA of the United States and one who, I believe, might aptly be described as a friend of the people. These are the words of General Johnson:

> There is no sound solution of unemployment, except restored business activity. The elements of a solution of unemployment become clearer every day. Real public works are shown not to be a device for employment. "Invented" WPA works are proved to be a disguised dole costing three times what straight relief should cost.

These statements are deserving of respectful consideration and they support the view I have indicated.

Let me direct the attention of the house to another fact. Heads of financial institutions and industrial corporations in Canada have expressed grave misgivings regarding public expenditures and mounting public debt. Let me make this point perfectly clear: If these men feel that they have ground for apprehension it is reasonable for this government to expect of them that they will do their full duty in providing the maximum of employment possible, and cooperating with the government in meeting the challenge of the present situation. If they do not do so, then in all fairness they must recognize that governments may have to go much further than they have gone before in the provision of public employment for those who are now without work.

This government does not believe that it can end unemployment by its own unaided efforts. It is not composed of supermen. Hon. members in this chamber know that as well as we do. It is neither all-wise nor all-powerful. In a time of crisis a government may be likened to the general staff of an army. Its first duty is to give coherence and direction to the scattered forces of economic recovery. This government is ready to meet its responsibilities and in due course to accept the judgment of the country on its record of leadership in meeting the present crisis. At the same time it is determined to enlist the active service and support of organized industry and private citizens in dealing with the crucial problem of unemployment. When an appeal is made for the effective cooperation of industry and commerce I have faith that the response will give us new ground for courage and confidence.

The second broad question raised by the resolution is the necessity for close and continuing cooperation between dominion and provincial governments, municipalities and private industry in the formulation and execution of any far-reaching scheme for re-employment. I would suggest that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) might have served the purpose he has in mind had he suggested what has been suggested during the past five years by hon. members now sitting on this side of the house, namely, that there should be set up in Canada a national employment commission which would provide the coordination and correlation of all activities in relation to unemployment which have been needed so much during the past five years.

At this time I do not wish to anticipate the precise terms of legislation which will be introduced at this session to establish such a national employment commission. I desire however to point out that the subjects which would properly receive study and close examination by this commission are those which have been included in the resolution of the hon. member. At various times it has been stated clearly that it is the intention that a national employment commission should deal with housing, slum clearance, reforestation and land settlement. In the very terms of his resolution the hon. member recognizes the fact that if we are to carry into effect a policy of this kind it can be done only upon a basis of cooperation between provincial and federal governments. For example he has suggested that Canada should immediately adopt a comprehensive scheme of public works. He has recognized that it is not the duty of the dominion government alone to deal with this matter. He realizes, as indeed he must, that under our federal constitution there is a division of responsibility in relation to all these matters, and it is quite clear that if we are to have a comprehensive and successful scheme it can be only upon the basis of prior investigation by some body representing not only governments but private industry, labour organizations and welfare organizations. After being made the subject of this investigation such a policy should receive the continued direction and supervision of such a coordinated agency.

Another proposal in the resolution refers to the necessity for a national policy for youth in relation to education, industry and employment. In the course of the debate several references have been made to the relief camps which have been under the administration of the Department of National Defence. I have no doubt that hon. members will be anxious to learn the attitude of the government toward these relief camps. In the debate on the address the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made a reference to relief camps which, I believe, stands in need of correction. Referring to the camps he is reported as follows:

> Why did they (the relief camps) come into being? For some permanent purpose? No. Did they come into being to provide homes? No. They came into being for the purpose of providing places where men might find food, clothing and shelter until they could obtain employment; and, what is more, up to the time we left office the average period of time during which men stayed in these camps was ninety-five days.

The leader of the opposition then went on to suggest that the report to the Labour department of the committee which was appointed to investigate conditions in the relief camps had on the whole approved the policy of the late administration in relation to these camps. I wish to take direct issue with any such inference. Condemnation of these relief camps lies not in the domain of administration, but in the realm of policy.

My right hon. friend said that these camps were not designed to provide work. Let me quote his words as follows:

> The very purpose is that which these gentlemen explain in their report as being, in their opinion, desirable; the only difference being, apparently, that they propose to make some payment to the men for the work they did, which it is true was not obligatory; in the sense in which that term can properly be used it was merely for the purpose of furnishing them with some exercise to enable them to live healthy and decent lives.

I wish my right hon. friend were in his place this evening because I am sure he would wish me to correct that impression. If, as he states, it was the purpose of these relief camps to provide exercise for those who were in them, I would suggest that the provision of that exercise has been very expensive for this country. Under the 1933 act there was expended on these relief camps $6,204,980.98; under the 1934 act, $7,856,174.40; under the 1935 act the total net estimated expenditure at the end of the present fiscal year is $8,784,000. Let us remember that the average number of men in these relief camps for an entire year would not be in excess of 15,000.

I would like to put this problem in other terms. The same amounts would have kept a large number of men on farms, if placed there under a scheme whereby the federal government would pay $10 per month per man, which is $5 per month per man more than is now being paid under the farm placement scheme. Roughly, the numbers would have been as follows, and I am quite sure they will be astonishing to members of this house: On the basis of the 1933 expenditure which I have given it would have been possible to maintain upon the farms of this country, 51,000 men at $10 a month during that entire year; in 1934 it would have been possible to maintain 65,000, and in 1935 it would have been possible to maintain 73,000.

Mr. BAKER: How does the minister know that the farmers were prepared to take these men or wanted them?

Mr. ROGERS: I cannot answer as to that, of course, but I do know that under the farm placement scheme some thousands of men have been placed on the farms of western Canada. Up to this time there has not been a very large placement in other provinces. It must however be borne in mind that under the existing scheme only $5 per month per man is paid, but according to the figures I have just given $10 per month per man might have been paid to secure employment for that number of men.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the minister made any inquiry how many farmers are in a position to board these men even with the $10 per month?

Mr. ROGERS: We are making continuous inquiries along that line, working in cooperation with the provincial governments, and we have made it clear to them that sufficient sums are available to provide for large numbers of these men being absorbed in the western provinces. I do not suggest, and I do not think it is necessary for my argument to suggest, that these total numbers could have been absorbed at any one time. What I do say is that the condemnation of the relief camps is that they have not actually provided the maximum of relief, if you will, or of work, if you will, for these single homeless men.

Mr. HEAPS: What alternative has the government for the relief camps?

Mr. ROGERS: In answer to that question I may say that I have given very serious thought to the whole problem of relief camps. I am not always sure of my judgment, but the more I have looked into the situation which now exists in the relief camps the more firmly have I been convinced that it is a wise policy to close them as quickly as may be possible, and I may say that when these camps are closed, as I believe they can be within the present year, it will be upon the basis of measures which I am certain will carry the confidence and support of the country and I hope, as well, of the vast majority of men who are in these camps.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not want to interrupt, but would the minister be good enough to state to the house any precise ideas he may have as to what is going to be done with the young men when they come out of the camps?

Mr. ROGERS: I can assure my hon. friend that the measures by which we propose to achieve that objective will be announced to the house in due course. I have no illusions myself as to the difficulty of the problem, but as I have stated before the only conclusion that can be drawn from any impartial study of the relief camp situation is that, whatever we may do in the future, this chapter ought to be brought to an end, and I have sufficient faith to believe that if a thing ought to be done a way can be found to bring this about.

I have suggested that the true condemnation of the relief camps is that the government, so far as relief is concerned, has not obtained fair value for its money, and that the criticism of these camps lies essentially in the realm of policy, and not in the domain of administration. One great difficulty is that the men who went into the relief camps brought nothing in with them and took nothing out with them. At the same time they were expected to work, because it is clear that one of the intentions behind this relief camp policy was to obtain public works through the instrumentality of the blank cheque legislation. I have not at this time a full statement of the public works that have been carried out under this policy, but I shall be pleased to bring it before the house at a later date. There can be no doubt whatsoever that one of the objects behind the relief camp policy was the provision of public works, and I am not at all convinced that these public works were in every case justified. I am inclined to think that in some cases they were somewhat in advance of the requirements of this country for the needs of national defence.

Possibly the house will be interested in a statement that I received some time ago regarding the age distribution of the men in these camps. The hon. member for Broadview spoke of the necessity of a policy for youth in relation to industry, education and employment. When I first became responsible in relation to these camps I was very much impressed by the ages of the men who were there. Upon the basis of a return made for this purpose I give to the house the following information:

Ages 18-21	2,416
Ages 22-30	4,698
Ages 31-40	4,556
Ages 41-60	6,425
Ages 61 and over	804
	18,899

I may say that these figures are for December 5, 1935. The present strength of the camps is in excess of 20,000, but there would not, I think, be any great variation in the age distribution. There can be no doubt that the relief camps were designed originally to take care of one aspect of the problem facing the youth of this country. I am satisfied that they did not serve that purpose.

I see that my time has almost expired, but in conclusion, I should like to say a word or two on the general question of unemployment. As I said a while ago, we have reached the stage where it is possible and desirable to take an inventory of the existing situation. The taking of that inventory has not been simplified by what has happened during the past five years. I believe what is required above all else is visibility, a clear national focus on the entire problem. The Department of Labour is now taking a census of the unemployed on relief with a view to determining not only the age distribution but the occupational character of the unemployed at this time. I think that will at least put us in a position to establish our policies upon a much sounder basis than has been the case in recent years. What is also required in relation to this whole problem of unemployment relief is a new sense of direction which in the last resort is dependent upon better visibility.

The national employment commission will not be a body behind which this government will seek to hide from its responsibilities in regard to unemployment relief. Rather, it will be a body representative of the interest of the entire country in this vast problem. I believe firmly that this commission will be able to give us the direction which hitherto we have lacked. The house may rest assured that this government will not seek to conceal from hon. members or from the country at large the truth of the situation however unpalatable the facts may be. For my own part I think it is far better to summon courage to meet a task which we know to be difficult than to generate false optimism by underestimating the difficulty of the task that lies ahead.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with more than ordinary interest to the speech just delivered by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). This is the first time he has spoken in the house and as he occupies a very responsible position, I must say that I listened to his remarks with a great deal of disappointment. Although his speech was well put together and contained many fine phrases, when it is stripped of all that, I wonder what hope it contains for the unemployed of the Dominion of Canada. I do not think all the hope he held out to-night will provide work for one man. Apparently his main idea is to allow private enterprise to have full sway, not to interfere with what private enterprise is doing, and to balance the budget. He believes that balancing the budget, at the behest of the heads of large companies and large corporations will partly solve some of the problems from which we are suffering at the present time. If the budget were balanced to-morrow I believe conditions would be worse than they are at the present time. Decreased expenditures on the part of the government is likely to put more men and women out of work.

Mr. POULIOT: Explain.

Mr. HEAPS: When you spend less money there is bound to be less employment.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But incomes might be higher.

Mr. HEAPS: Even though the government may be quite sincere in their efforts to balance the budget, I do not think they can do it. It cannot be done. To put the situation more precisely: If they intend paying out of current revenue all expenditures that should be charged against current expenditures, they cannot have a balanced budget. I do not think I am wrong when I say that during the past five years most of the expenditure for unemployment relief has been made from borrowings.

Mr. ROGERS: I did not say that balancing the budget must be placed above all other considerations, and I am in the judgment of the house when I make that correction. What I did say was that we should not ignore the ultimate consequences of continued unbalanced budgets. I repeat now that we have a clear recognition of our obligations with regard to this whole matter of unemployment.

Mr. HEAPS: There was difficulty in knowing precisely what the minister said because his speech was so full of high-sounding phrases and what might be called self-contradictions. At the beginning of his speech he said—I stand to be corrected if I am wrong—that if the old methods would not suffice, then we ought to look around for something new. Words to that effect were used by the minister. The only new thing he suggested was a balanced budget, which is to be balanced at the instigation of the heads of the large financial institutions. The government have faith in the heads of these large corporations that they will ultimately find some way of providing employment for people out of work at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say that.

Mr. HEAPS: I think Hansard will show that he made a statement to that effect. I have jotted down some of the words he used. If a balanced budget would solve our problem, I would be in favour of a balanced budget. However, it will not do anything of the kind. Before the government speak of balancing their budget, they should remember that there are hundreds of thousands of heads of families who would like to see their budgets balanced. In fact, there are hundreds of thousands of heads of families who have no budget at all to balance, but who are to-day recipients of the dole in probably its worst form.

There is nothing in what the minister said that affords a ray of hope to these people. He said that we should put our faith in a commission, but I have no faith at all in commissions. If the government cannot find a solution for this problem, then no commission under the control of the government can find a remedy. Have not the government enough statistics? Have not the government enough facts before them with respect to the unemployment situation? It should not be necessary to appoint a commission to find out how great this problem is. Five or six years ago the government of the day could not see this unemployment problem forming, but during the past six years every hon. member has been fully conversant with the situation. I think any government, no matter of what party, that takes control of the destinies of this nation should have a definite policy in this connection. Instead of a policy of action, we have at the present time a policy of inaction. We cannot find any policy of action in what was enunciated this afternoon and evening by the Minister of Labour. The proposal has been made to-day that the government should proceed with the erection of homes, but evidently the minister, speaking for the government, is opposed to this. He says that this should be left to private enterprise and initiative and that if necessary the government could come to the assistance of these private capitalists who might do something under the circumstances.

What has happened? Seven months ago the house passed a housing act, giving to private capital the incentive to build homes in Canada. Have they built homes? Have they gone ahead with a construction scheme in any part of the dominion? Certainly not. From a report tabled this afternoon I find that the total of loans approved since the act became operative amounts to approximately two-thirds of a million dollars. That does not mean that construction has proceeded to the extent represented by that sum. In other words, the government of the day gave to the private loan companies money at four per cent as an incentive to build homes; twenty per cent of the value of the homes was to be mortgaged by the federal government at the rate of interest referred to. We were told in the housing committee last year that the mortgage companies would supply funds at the rate of five and one-half per cent, and the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), who was piloting the bill through, expressed the hope that $20,000,000 worth of construction would be proceeded with by reason of the government subsidy to private interests as an inducement for them to finance home building. And yet, when we get the figures that have been tabled, we find that practically nothing worth speaking of has been done in the way of the construction of homes.

Private enterprise has got us into the chaos in which we find ourselves to-day, and now we are looking to private enterprise and initiative to get us out of it. This cannot be done, and sooner or later the government will be forced to the same conclusion as the previous government reached, that it is a case of control or chaos—government control or economic chaos. You cannot escape the necessity for more control rather than less control, as is evidently the policy of the present government.

Mr. DUFF: Does the hon. gentleman know how much private money was invested in homes in this country in 1935?

Mr. HEAPS: I cannot answer that question, but I remember very well that the representatives of the mortgage companies came to the housing committee last year and said that they were prepared to lend money at the rate I have mentioned, providing the government were willing to come through with a rate of four per cent, as they did. But since the money has been available very few have taken advantage of it, for the simple and obvious reason that no private company to-day can take care of the existing situation in regard to housing. There is at present an enormous housing deficiency from one end of the country to the other. Private enterprise cannot afford to erect these homes at such cost as the average person can pay; and in this country, if we are to tackle the problem, we shall have to tackle it in exactly the same way as it is dealt with in other countries; that is to say the government will be compelled to provide cheap money or we shall have to do without the homes.

Mr. DUFF: Does the hon. gentleman know how many homes were erected in Canada in 1935 and who paid for them?

Mr. HEAPS: No; perhaps the hon. member can tell the house.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I can.

Mr. HEAPS: Proceed.

Mr. DUFF: No, it is your speech.

Mr. HEAPS: I know the hon. gentleman so well and the kind of questions he asks; that is the reason I asked him to answer his own question.

Mr. DUFF: You cannot answer me, can you?

Mr. HEAPS. All I know is that very few homes have been erected. I am told that one house was erected in Regina last year, and perhaps there may be one or two more in the maritimes from which my hon. friend comes. At any rate, with the money available, only two-thirds of a million was asked for by the loan companies in Canada in the past six months.

Mr. DUFF: People do not want to take government money.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish the hon. gentleman would reserve those remarks for his own speech, and make his own speech in his own way. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to tackle this problem it will have to be done by means of government money at a low rate of interest. In 1919 an act was passed in Canada with respect to housing, and that act I greatly prefer to the one passed in 1935. The unfortunate part of the 1919 act, however, was that when the money was loaned by the federal government to the provinces there was not sufficient federal supervision over the expenditure. In my opinion the government of the day ought to provide funds for housing purposes at a rate not exceeding three per cent. There is no reason why the government should not do so; I do not think there is any other self-liquidating project which governments can undertake than housing. The collateral in a housing scheme would be well worth the consideration of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in collaboration with the officials of the Bank of Canada. If money were available at three per cent there would be witnessed a boom of construction right across the dominion; but if private mortgage companies are to loan the money at the rates they now ask of five or five and one-half per cent, then I am afraid very few houses will be built in this country.

The minister has said that the government realize their responsibility to the unemployed. I wonder to what extent they appreciate that responsibility. Is that responsibility discharged by the appointment of a commission to investigate matters that have already been many times investigated? I do not think that is the way to deal with the problem. The problem can be dealt with in one of two ways: either the government ought to provide work, or, if it is not in a position to create employment by means of public works, then it ought to find other methods of increasing productive employment and distributing the work among those who are willing to perform a useful function in society. That would mean a drastic reduction in hours of labour and a notable increase in productive capacity, and when we have reached that stage of increasing productive capacity we ought also to increase the consumptive opportunities of the people in proper ratio. Whether the government will do that, I cannot say, but for the dim and distant future they have some policy of coping with the situation.

The minister admits that it is the duty of the government to reduce unemployment. Quite true; but what is there in his speech that would indicate what policy the government have for reducing unemployment? None whatsoever; and I think, as was indicated in the speech from the throne and as well this evening by the Minister of Labour, there is no greater responsibility that rests upon the government and this house than that of dealing definitely and without hesitation with this great and growing menace of unemployment in Canada.

The problem of youth has been mentioned —a very important aspect of our whole national problem. Was there a ray of hope for the youth of the country in the speech delivered by the minister? None at all, except the ultimate closing down of the camps. That is something regarding which I am in hearty agreement with the minister, but at the same time I should like to know what alternative there is for these young men when the camps are closed down. Again, we are told that if we only wait, if we only have patience, in the distant future we shall get some idea of what the government's policy is in this regard.

And then the minister wanted an inventory of the whole situation. I think we have a pretty good idea of what the situation is. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking in the house last week, indicated that there were about 400,000 men out of work. If that was the estimate given, and if it is our duty as a parliament to grapple with the problem of unemployment, what are we going to do with the 400,000 who are out of work at the present time? A section of them comprises the construction industry of this country, men engaged in the building trades, vast numbers of whom have not had a day's work probably for years. They had hopes and visions that by a comprehensive housing scheme something might be done on their behalf. But no, not even a housing scheme is to be considered, because we have to take into consideration the financial standing of the country. Speaking this afternoon from his seat in the house, the first minister made what I may describe as an unusual kind of statement. It was very terse, probably to the point, and I do not know whether it did not even contain the semblance of a threat. He told the house that we have to consider the commitments of parliament and that very soon these commitments will be submitted to the house, and he left the impression on my mind and probably on the minds of other hon. members that there was something in those commitments that would almost make our flesh creep when we knew the actual facts. He warned the house further that these private members' resolutions ought to be spoken to but not voted upon; that if we went so far as to vote on these motions, the question whether they were in order would have to be considered; that they were recommendations for money expenditures; that resolutions involving expenditures were the prerogative of the government, and that only a government member was allowed to bring in resolutions dealing with money expenditures. In other words, if we did not behave ourselves and if in particular the private members of the Liberal party did not behave themselves, they would not have the opportunity of even discussing these questions, because possibly they might be asked at some time on a point of order to vote against themselves and put a gag on themselves. I do not know whether I have correctly interpreted the statement that was made by the Prime Minister. If I have not, of course I will apologize to him.

There has been talk from the Liberal side of the house about clearance of the slums. So long as we have poverty we are going to have slum conditions; the two are inseparable. And while I am anxious and desire to see slum conditions ended as soon as possible, I think the cheapest and quickest way of doing away with slum conditions would be to build cheap homes, wholesome homes, homes that could be rented at a very low price, one within the reach of the average man who is compelled to work for wages. That means, of course, something fundamentally different from what we have hitherto done in the House of Commons. I realize it would be a complete departure from many things we have formerly done. I know of some municipalities that would be quite willing to undertake a scheme of this character if cheap money were available. When I say cheap money I mean money at about three per cent; even at three per cent there would be a good profit for those who handle the money end. After all, money can be handled by banks and similar institutions for, I think, one half of one per cent. All above one per cent is profit, for I know, with the housing schemes we had in Winnipeg under the act of 1919, and a differential of one per cent between what the city was able to borrow the money at, and the rate the money was loaned to prospective owners of homes, the Winnipeg housing commission was able to show each year since the inception of the scheme, fourteen or fifteen years ago, a profit, even during the depression period, of about $12,000 to $14,000. So if money were available at three per cent, as compared with the six per cent that was paid for it in 1919 and 1920, I think a success could be made of any housing scheme.

I am extremely sorry to have observed the attitude which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has taken toward this particular issue this evening. I hoped, as others on this side of the house hoped, that he came into the house with some radical leanings. His speech this afternoon could have been given by a good Tory, and a Tory would not have had to object to what he said. It was a type of speech which I did not expect from the Minister of Labour, because, having read some of his writings and known some of the things he preached in the past, I hoped for something better from him when he came to deal with labour problems. I know his heart is as sympathetic to the unemployed as my own or that of any other hon. member. It is not sympathy that the unemployed of the country are looking for at the present time; it is action, and action they have not received. There is all the difference in the world between the two. I want to see this government take action. I will support any measure that it proposes which means doing something toward solving or helping to solve the problem of unemployment. But the speech we listened to this afternoon contained very little in the way of encouragement for people who are out of work. I hope the slip the minister made this afternoon and this evening is just temporary. I think he has been awed somewhat by the newness of his surroundings. What the Prime Minister said this afternoon about the commitments of this country and the balancing of the budget must have overawed the Minister of Labour and got the better of his sympathies and even of his judgment.

Mr. FAFARD: I think it did spoil your own speech.

Mr. HEAPS: It could not spoil my speech. But I am rather disappointed. I feel that the government, after all that was promised in the election, with all the hopes that its members held out about action if they were returned to power, has dissipated those hopes through the speech made to-day by the Minister of Labour. I hope this is only temporary, and the next time he comes to the house and deals with labour problems he will show not only a more sympathetic attitude toward those problems of the workers of this country, but also a greater preparedness to do something definite on their behalf.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Unlike the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) should be sincerely complimented upon his maiden speech. He has shown a true knowledge of the actual situation; he has shown depth, width and breadth. The hon. member for Winnipeg North is sitting very close in the house to a group of men who I have no doubt are very sincere, but who have made promises which it will take them a very long time to live up to. The times of promises are passed. We are getting action from the present government.

I want to say a few complimentary words in regard to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), for giving the house an opportunity of speaking in a general way on matters pertaining to the nation as a whole, matters in which not only every hon. member but every citizen of this wonderful country are deeply interested at the moment. First of all I want to say a few words about housing. This is not a new thing in Canada. Immediately after the war, in 1919, a housing scheme was inaugurated, and we have the experience gained at that time to guide us now. That was not absolutely without flaws, however; no later than last Saturday I received a letter from a friend of mine, a good doctor who practises in the town of Cochrane, who built a house under that 1919 scheme. He told me that a writ was going to be issued for the sum of $1,225, representing back payment under that housing scheme, back interest and municipal taxes. In a word that man is going to lose his home, all because the scheme of 1919 was not properly studied, and because the costs of building material were too high. The same situation exists in many other cases. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) say that the housing scheme had been a complete success in Winnipeg.

Mr. HEAPS: Absolutely.

Mr. BRADETTE: It was not a success in a good many cities and towns in Ontario.

[Mr. Heaps.]

I could mention many constituencies represented by hon. members in which there were many failures, and that applies perhaps more particularly to my section of the country. No doubt the late government took a step in the right direction last year in inaugurating a housing scheme; no doubt that scheme could be enlarged and improved, but that will never be done by promises or the waving of hands.

This afternoon the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) mentioned that the housing scheme in England had been a huge success, and was one of the main reasons why Great Britain is on an even keel at the present time. That is only partly true; we all know there is a great difference of opinion among those who have studied the housing scheme in England and grave errors were made when that scheme was inaugurated, and the same applies to Canada. No doubt the discussion here to-day, which has been maintained on a very high plane, will bring about some good results. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) this afternoon rightly mentioned that the farmers and settlers of this country should also be included under any such scheme. It is all very well to visualize the slums of the big cities; it is easy to put our fingers on them. If it were possible, however, to get the poor little habitations of the rural sections of northern Ontario grouped together you would see much worse slum conditions than you have in any city of Canada, and I believe those people deserve consideration under any housing scheme.

In this connection we also ask the government whether it would not be possible to help the dwelling situation among our farmers by extending the operations of the farm loan act. In my files in my office in this building I have hundreds of letters from farmers who have their deeded land in northern Ontario and who have made application to the farm loan board. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they have been turned down, for no apparent reason at all. In some cases they received letters two or three months after their applications were filed; after that lapse of time their fees were returned and they were told that, after inspection, the government did not find it possible to loan them any money. I remember last year when the then Minister of Finance, presenting an amendment to the farm loan act, asked parliament to vote $90,000,000, and at that time he said that if this amount should become exhausted another $90,000,000 would be voted. We supported that measure with both hands, but I do not believe it has been of as much benefit as it was expected to be. I will take another opportunity to place before parliament and the country the actual situation that has been created among the farmers of this land.

I should like also to say a very few words with regard to reforestation, with which I should like to combine the preservation of our forests. In the Ontario legislature, whether on the opposition or on the government side, I always maintained that the Ontario fire rangers should be employed all the year round. I believe the same principle that is applied to medicine should be applied to our forests, that prevention is better than cure. It should be possible to have thousands of our young men employed in the preservation of our forests during the dangerous time of the year, and to have those young men also employed in replanting and reforestation in every province of this confederation. I also fervently hope parliament and the government will find it possible to bring about fair prices for our forest products. It may be a revelation to a good many hon. members to learn that, except in the years 1917 and 1918, so far as northern Ontario is concerned there never has been a settler, a farmer or a small forest owner who has made any money out of forest production. The moment that you are able to create new markets or the moment you make it possible for these farmers to develop their own forest holdings at remunerative prices you will find that they will need very little protection, because they will see the advantage of looking after their holdings, and will husband every tree on their holdings.

I should like to say a few words also with regard to the land settlement scheme which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview. That is a moot question, not only in this but also in every other country throughout the civilized world. We realize that our civilization has tried to expand in only one way, industrially, and this statement applies with great force to Canada. Only two years ago I read an article in Saturday Night which asked whether it would not be better for Canada to become more and more an industrial rather than an agricultural country. As far as nature and climatic conditions are concerned, kind providence wants this to be primarily an agricultural country. That fact cannot be denied, but we have falsified the true state of affairs. See what has happened in this, as well as in every other country, in the last twenty years. The young people from the rural communities have found their way to the urban centres, and to-day all governments are putting their ears to the ground and thoroughly studying the agricultural situation, in an endeavour to get people to go back to the land.

I well remember when in 1930 the then Minister of Labour, who by the way is a personal friend and neighbour of mine, inaugurated a back to the land movement. I told the minister at that time that I was absolutely in favour of such a movement, but when in 1931 he told the House of Commons that thousands of people had been placed back on the land without the expenditure of public money from either the federal or the provincial treasury, I told him the thing was absolutely impossible. In that year, however, the government inaugurated the Gordon plan, and in very large measure I have upheld the principles of that plan. I believe in my riding this land settlement scheme has progressed further than in perhaps any other riding in Canada. I have hundreds of these people near Matheson, Iroquois Falls, Cochrane, Kapuskasing and Hearst. I am primarily a pioneer myself; I went to northern Ontario over thirty years ago, so I am reasonably familiar with the present situation. These were very fine people who were taken from their former surroundings under a movement inaugurated by the federal government and assisted by the provinces and municipalities, but their troubles are not over. It is true that the federal government, the provincial government and the municipality each contributed $200 to establish each family on the land, but let me remind the house that two years ago I told the then Prime Minister that when this money was spent these people would be worse off than they were before settling on the land, and that the federal government would find it necessary at the end of that period of time to continue to help these settlers. These people who have been affected by the back to the land movement are practically the wards of the present government. Many of them, unless help is given to them will have to give up what they have begun and lose the fruit of their work of the last three years. It will be found absolutely impossible for ninety-five per cent of them—and I make this statement deliberately—to get along, and they will have to get away from their present holdings. At the present time the municipalities have washed their hands of the situation, and the responsibility is placed on the door step of the federal government.

We are living in strenuous times. Sometimes we are astonished to hear statements such as that made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), for example, who said only a few days ago in this House of Commons that for the first time young people were represented in parliament. Surely he did not mean that. Surely a member of parliament worthy of the name represents not only the old and the young people in his constituency, but all classes including youth, middle age and old age. Every man sitting in the House of Commons is fully seized of the exact situation.

Miss MACPHAIL: What about the two women?

Mr. BRADETTE: They are certainly included, I must assure the hon. member, with great gusto, and I sincerely regret the involuntary omission. We are seized of the facts as to the serious situation of the people, and we all agree that if there is one class in full contact with all classes then certainly it is the members of parliament. I am leaving no one out of the picture. Each of us receives dozens of letters every day from people who are suffering. We do not throw these letters aside; we do not say that we represent only one class. We represent all classes of people, the whole population in our respective constituencies.

I shall have further opportunity to speak about the land settlement scheme, but there is one thing I should like to make clear: So far as northern Ontario is concerned we want no more people from southern Ontario, under either the Gordon or any other plan, until such time as we rationalize colonization and agriculture, and make the present occupants prosperous. Farming is a vocation; it is a calling from the heart. A man's inclination must be natural; he must be ready and willing to sacrifice if he is to become and remain a farmer. New people were brought to the land under these schemes, and the present holders of new sections in our own country, although they were courageous and enterprising, are not prosperous. The primary duty of a government, whether it be provincial or federal, is to render prosperous the actual settlers on the land. That would be the best possible kind of advertising, and the best possible scheme. I believe that principle could be easily applied. So far as I am concerned, using my own energy, directing my attention to the present provincial government in Toronto and also making application to the federal government, I believe we must of necessity rationalize our viewpoint and our policy, so far as colonization and agriculture in Canada are concerned.

I believe it would be worth while if the federal government would create a central fund whereby it would be possible to foster land clearing and ploughing. That would be the best possible way to keep our settlers off the relief lists. In the past we have dealt artificially with our industries. Every one knows that we have exempted them from certain things, and have given them the protection of high tariff barriers, concessions, privileges and tax exemptions. During all this time, in most cases agriculture and colonization were left to themselves. To-day if we wish to have prosperity back in Canada we must deal properly with the primary producers, the farmers of this country. If they cannot be prosperous we can never have prosperity. That problem is possible of solution, because we are working with a class of people who are most reasonable, most thrifty and most industrious. All they want is a chance. They want a chance—not to have luxury, not to have great comforts, but only to have a decent living, and a chance to succeed.

I wish to make only one or two further observations which are in my mind at the present time and which can easily be coupled with the back to the land movement. I have spoken about immigration. I was highly elated this afternoon when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to immigration and stated that he was against it. At this time there is a movement on foot to bring in more fine people from some other lands. The time has not yet arrived for such a movement; I do not think it will arrive for many years to come and as far as I am personally concerned I never want it again. I know the rural situation, and I can well remember the protestations of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) and other hon. members in the group to which she belongs when my party maintained an extensive policy of immigration years ago. Sitting in the far corner of the house, as a new member, I protested. No matter what any hon. member may have to say about bringing thousands of new immigrants to this country, I say that we have no place for them at the present time. What would we do for them? I remember a previous immigration policy, when we had people coming from central Europe and from Great Britain. At that time we tried to put them on the land, but I wonder how many of them stayed there. Not two per cent of them stayed on the land. Ninety-eight per cent of them found their way to the industrial centres of Canada, and many reached the United States. I well remember the late Minister of Trade and Commerce, for whom I have the greatest respect, deploring the fact that our university graduates and craftsmen and artists could not find fruitful occupations in Canada, and had to go to the United States, a condition which was brought about to a great extent by the immigration policy of the government. All parties in the past sinned in that regard, and I fervently hope that these actions will not recur.

Last fall I attended a meeting of a board of trade in northern Ontario. It was held in the Porcupine section, where at the present time we have the greatest gold mining development in the world. In that section thousands of people are finding fruitful occupation. At the meeting the question arose as to what would become of the young men and young women in the Porcupine section, one of the most prosperous in Canada and possibly in the whole civilized world. Mr. John Knox, general superintendent of the Hollinger mine, made the statement that that mine had been in existence for a quarter of a century. Mr. Knox considered it was the duty of the administration of the mines primarily to find employment for the young people in the Timmins district, for the sons of those men who had given many years of good service. I say that it would be unfair to Canadians if we were to entice people from other countries to come to Canada, unless we found it possible to give to our present population plenty of fruitful occupation, also means to build homes and the opportunity to live as they would like to live.

A few days ago I happened to be present to witness the progress of a great movement which, I believe, is a step in the right direction. I never like to make comparisons between provinces, because after all we are all Canadians. However I happened to be in the province of Quebec and to witness a trainload of men being sent to the new settlement in northern Quebec. When I looked at those men I thought to myself that history was being written in big black letters; that our present civilization was trying to rectify conditions and to place back into its proper setting that part of the population which should never have gone into the urban centres. Later on I went to the Abitibi section, to Timiskaming, and to lake St. John. There I saw what the government was doing for these settlers. Not that I am in love with too much paternalism. Some might be inclined to ask what has become of the pioneer spirit of the Loyalists who colonized Ontario, and my ancestors who colonized the north shore of the St. Lawrence river. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that their descendants have just as much courage as their forefathers, but they are facing a different situation to-day, and in the new centres of colonization we now find the government providing employment, building churches, Protestant and Catholic, paying the priests and ministers, building schools, all out of the provincial treasury. I have been a settler myself; I know the struggles that these people must go through until they begin to prosper on their new holdings, and I am speaking of them to-night because I want parliament to be fully seized of their situation. I believe there is hope in the present situation. Humanity has suffered much in the last five years, and I want to give all due credit to the late Prime Minister. Nobody can accuse him of being asleep at the switch for he has worked twenty-four hours a day for the last five years. But just the same there is not a Canadian who is satisfied with the present situation. We are all wanting a solution of our problems, and we know that it cannot be brought about by any simple formula. But when you see provincial governments working in cooperation with the federal government and know that this government is fully seized of the situation—and we all remember its back to the land movement of a few years ago—I believe, knowing our fine population as I do, that if we will all combine our energies our country will eventually emerge from this depression, regain the prosperity she enjoyed in previous years, and experience fuller days of progressiveness, of self-reliance, and of a fuller life for the whole nation.

Mr. WILIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to speak from this corner of the house this evening. It is a new experience for me to address the house, and I venture upon it with diffidence and modesty. But we feel that we in this part of the chamber have a new philosophy to offer.

My sympathy is with the government in the problems with which it is faced, and I should like to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) most heartily upon the very able manner in which he has put forward his ideas, but at the same time I feel that they will not solve the problem with which we are faced, that of scarcity in the midst of plenty. As was said by the great Shakespeare, "The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars but in ourselves, that we are underlings." It has been said by the Dean of Canterbury that the social crediters embody the best aspirations of the Conservatives, the Liberals, and the socialists, and so I would say that we are sitting in a very enviable position in this house inspired as we are to carry out the great ideals enunciated by the Dean of Canterbury.

The nations that feed and clothe and shelter their inhabitants will stand out as shining examples to the rest of the world.

We believe a new age is being ushered in, and because of that we believe Canada should adopt the new idealism or the new economics, that we may usher in a new philosophy whereby this enigma of poverty in the midst of plenty may be solved.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has said that this government does not believe it can end unemployment by its own unaided efforts. We believe that also. We contend that we should combine our forces against scarcity. The minister also said that the relief camps should be closed. We also think they should be closed and the men who have been living in them should be given a more decent and a better standard of living. We are all of us striving for a higher standard of living, and that is what the social credit people stand for.

Speaking at Kingston the Minister of Labour used these words, as reported in the Whig Standard:

> Unemployment is not going to vanish in the twinkling of an eye, and it is impossible for any government to deal with it on that basis. Recovery rests on the primary industries and on raising the purchasing power of the workers in those industries.

In reply to that I would say that unemployment has increased even in times of industrial activity. As the president of the Bank of Nova Scotia said in his annual address to the shareholders, we cannot begin to absorb the army of unemployed, even if we went back to the degree of industrial activity that we had in 1929. We are firmly convinced that unemployment has been brought upon the world by the industrial and mechanical genius of man; that this scientific age has brought us into a new era, and that we need a new economics to solve the problem of unemployment.

That large numbers of people will never be able to find work is probably true. We do not think work is necessarily a virtue. We believe men and women should have more time to think out their problems and leisure is something for which we should all strive. Our scientists have been working day and night in order that we might be relieved of unnecessary labour and drudgery, and we believe in ushering in an age of leisure, rather than an age of employment as it is often spoken of, believing that man must not necessarily work, but that he should be paid, and that instead of employment we should use the term "empayment." We believe everyone should be paid. We believe in citizenship; that men and women, boys and girls, are the real asset of any nation; that we should do what we can in this great dominion to release them from the idea of scarcity, from the fear regarding to-morrow's dinner pail, and that they should be provided with housing accommodation such as is recommended in the resolution now before us. We have the materials, the lumber, and the men. All the materials are at hand, and all we need to do is to put them together.

The present monetary system is suffering from a lack of tickets. It is a system controlled by a certain policy which is in the interests of financiers. We believe we should control the money policy for the welfare of mankind. It does seem ridiculous to me that we, an intelligent people, should allow financial autocracy to rule us when all we need to do is to control this ticket system.

The Minister of Labour has said that we should not spend our way into chaos. We believe it is ridiculous, of course, to think of debt creation, if that is what he means by spending our way into chaos. Chaos was a a great word used by the Liberal party in the campaign in Alberta, where their slogan was, "Vote for King or chaos," and I suppose that is what the minister is thinking of. We believe the debt creating system, as it is understood to-day by modern financiers, leads to nothing but chaos. If we control our credit we can give everyone the necessities of life. We have solved the problem of production and the only trouble to-day is that we have not solved the problem of paying people. We believe every individual as a citizen of Canada is entitled to be paid, whether at work or not. Lord Bryce said that money power was man's most dangerous and insidious enemy. Many of our great economists, including Arthur Kitson and some of the great German economists, have said that international money power as controlled by the international bank of settlements at Geneva must cease, otherwise we shall always live in poverty, or large numbers of our people will be living in poverty with their children in neglect. I have been a school teacher most of my lifetime and I realize that many of our young people have no opportunities whatever under the present silly system. Our young people should be our real wealth and they should be given opportunities in life. The older people should be pensioned off. We believe real wealth consists of goods, lands and property and that should be monetized if we are to use the term "money."

There seems to be dawning a tremendous era of money manipulation. For instance, in England they are planning to manipulate their money system in order to bring into being a two billion dollar war machine. Where will they get the money from? We know it will be merely a debt creating system upon which they will be expected to pay interest. Such subtle money manipulations will lead ultimately to disaster. We believe we are at the crossroads of history and we must go forward or go under. We have struggled for political liberty; we have struggled for personal liberty, but we feel we are endangered to-day by the possibility of financial slavery. We should struggle for financial liberty and freedom; that is our business here. We are ready to cooperate with anyone who will look into the future and endeavour to free mankind from this slavery to the banks.

Unemployment has been mentioned this evening. It would seem that the proof of scientific progress is the increasing mastery of man over nature in order to put men out of work. Ideas sometimes can become as powerful as chains of steel. As we see the situation, the world to-day is in the grip of a nightmare and unless we break away from this evil spell of false convictions, the nightmare will continue. We feel that to-day we have a wastage of youth, a wastage of commodities and a wastage of machines. Hon. members may not believe this, but I ask them to go out to Alberta and see the tractors lying idle behind the barbed wire fences. There are more machines idle to-day than there are idle men. We are talking about unemployment but we should be thinking of putting our machines to work and giving our people more liberty. What is physically possible should be financially possible. To-day we feel that the big fish are eating the little fish; the little fish eat the minnows and sometimes I think the farmers in the west are the minnows.

We agree that the slums should be abolished. I have before me a little article on the abolition of these slums. In reviewing the progress made in housing, one hon. member mentioned Great Britain. Sir Halton Young has said that although between 1918 and 1933 the number of inhabited houses had increased by 1,363,000, this did not produce the expected filtering of population and the automatic disappearance of the slums and overcrowding, the reason of course being that the slum tenants could not pay the rents. This slum problem is a good example of the glaring defects in our economic system. There is something peculiarly dreadful in the thought of these acres of squalor in the large cities. It is not only in the large cities, because in the rural areas of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta you will find some of the most appalling conditions. You will find men and women living in habitations not fit for their dogs. Such a condition should rankle in the national conscience; it should rankle in the minds of all good thinking people. We must do something to solve this problem. I do not think there is one hon. member who does not believe we have the labour, the materials and the mechanical skill necessary to do this work. In fact, we have all the resources at our command, but still the slums remain. It is only a matter of a little bookkeeping, but because of our curious habit of charging capital costs into prices we cannot build houses to rent at amounts within the spending power of the poorer classes. However, by adjusting costs and distributing national dividends to the tenants by means of new material created for the purpose and not issued as a debt to the banks we could solve the slum problem with the greatest of ease. What did Major Douglas say with regard to the control of finance as we have it to-day? We have two systems, the productive and the financial, and this is what Major Douglas has to say:

> Most people thought that, in some mysterious way, when wealth was produced money was produced. On the contrary, we could produce real wealth of every kind until we were black in the face and we would not produce one penny of purchasing power. This separation of the economic system into a production system and a financial system was the first step toward an understanding of the situation.

It is a delusion that money of itself is something of worth—the real wealth is goods. People have the idea that money is something born of blood and tears, and therefore it is valuable. Being a new speaker, I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the house, but I should like to give a few words of Arthur Kitson upon this great subject:

> The post-war period ushered in an entirely new era, unlike any former period of the world's history; a period in which man's inventive genius has placed within mankind's reach boundless wealth, sufficient for every inhabitant of this planet to enjoy life without encroaching upon supplies needed by any of his fellows; a period in which nature's powers have been harnessed to machinery for furnishing all the necessaries and most of the so-called luxuries of life. And yet amidst all this abundance, we are inundated with myriads of starving, ragged people living in hovels, all because our officials have not the intelligence to see that the old economic theories have become fallacies, the old monetary and banking systems unworkable, and that just as our productive methods to which we owe this age of plenty have been revolutionized, so our entire economic system must be reorganized.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Being of a retiring nature, I am always hesitant about entering any debate. It certainly was not my intention to say anything on the resolution presented by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), but after listening to his presentation and the words from our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I am inclined to think this is an opportune time for any member who represents a part of this dominion to bring his views before the house.

I am not going to discuss a number of questions, many of which have been brought before us this afternoon and evening, but I do want to say something about a certain matter with which I am very intimately connected. At the same time I want to offer friendly if not valuable suggestions to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I take it that this policy of the present government is only in its formulative stage, and that they will welcome any suggestions that any member can bring forward which will help them in drafting a proper policy.

I think I should be remiss in my duties if I did not take advantage of this opportunity to speak to-night, and the particular phase of the subject which I would discuss is the farm placement plan. Hon. members may not know it, but I would inform them that I am what is called a working farmer. I have lived all my life on the farm and I should know something about the conditions. Now as regards unemployment, that has never given me very much concern personally; I was always able to find employment on the farm; in fact, the problem that bothered me was to find time to perform the work I had set before me. At the same time I realize that unemployment is the greatest problem we have to deal with in Canada to-day, and so I will say something about the farm placement plan which I believe was inaugurated by the late government.

As hon. members know, this policy provides $5 a month for any man willing to take a chance and work for a farmer. Originally I believe it provided $5 a month also for the farmer, to compensate him for the man's board, but that was discontinued; I do not know why, but I have heard it suggested that it had become a racket. I do not know whether that is true, but I have made inquiries in my own province, and so far as Manitoba is concerned I am informed by the government that there was very little abuse connected with the farm placement scheme as it affected that province. But even if a little abuse did exist, all the benefits that have been derived from that policy counterbalance any abuses that could possibly creep in. At any rate, the policy of paying the farmer $5 a month was discontinued and so we have only the policy of $5 a month for the man who will work on the farm. From my information I gather that this is the most effective and most economical form of farm relief; that was the information disclosed to the convention of United Farmers at Portage la Prairie last fall.

I would therefore submit a suggestion to the Minister of Labour, who referred to this subject this afternoon; indeed, I would not have entered the debate had he not said that the government could pay $10 a month to these men and save money in connection with the expenses involved in the maintenance of the relief camps. In my opinion we could pay a man $10 a month to work for a farmer and the farmer $10 a month for boarding the man. Some may question the wisdom of allowing the farmer $10 a month for board. Well, I come from a farm and I know conditions there; as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) suggested there are many farmers who cannot afford to board a man, and board is worth at least $10 a month even on a farm. That is why I suggest that the government, when taking this policy into consideration, should not only pay $10 to the man going to work on the farm but also pay the farmer $10 for boarding the man.

We learned at the convention at Portage la Prairie that approximately 4,000 farm hands were placed on farms in Manitoba last year. I believe we could place 10,000 farm hands among the farmers of that province if the scheme I suggest were carried out. To those who would object to paying the farmer $10 a month in compensation for board, I would point out that this would add that much more purchasing power to the farmer, whose purchasing power was never at a lower ebb; and this money would be spent in the local districts to pay store bills and to carry on business in their own districts throughout Canada, instead of the money going, as most of it now does, to some wholesale firm or some other concern where it is more centralized and not distributed over the whole country, as it is very desirable it should be.

Now, how would this affect unemployment? I think it would cure unemployment in so far as you would keep these men out of the cities. And I would not limit this to the man who never was on a farm in his life. Under the present form of relief these men must declare, in the document they are required to sign, that they have no homes; that they have no places to go; that they have no money; and then they are taken care of. If they have made money during the summer they are precluded from enjoying the benefits of this scheme. If they are under sixteen years of age they are prohibited from enjoying its benefits. I had a case up at Portage la Prairie where the farmer appealed to me, saying that his application for a sixteen year old boy was turned down, although he was, the farmer told me, one of the best men he ever had on his farm. The boy had no other place to go; his parents were on relief; and just because the farmer put in his age at sixteen the application was denied. I am glad to say that after the matter was taken up with the Manitoba government, they in turn perhaps having submitted it to this government at Ottawa, he was allowed to stay on the farm where the farmer thought he was the best man he ever had.

There should be more elasticity about these applications. I had another case submitted to me in which a farmer's application was turned down simply because the man had made $120 during the summer. That should not be held against a man. If he was industrious enough to get out and earn $120 during the summer he had a perfect right to be taken care of during the winter time; and I know from information I got that $60 of the money he had earned had gone to his father and mother to help them. Yet his application was turned down. I have not heard whether the government has since been able to accept that application, but I think it is a crime if a man who is willing to work is not allowed to take advantage of this plan.

I said a moment ago that this is the most economical form of relief. Take 10,000 men; give them $10 apiece; pay the farmer $10 for boarding them, and it would cost you about $200,000. At any rate, it is $20 per man. I was not a member of this house last year, but I took Hansard; I tried to read it religiously and I found out that the cost of keeping each man in the relief camps was at least $39 a month. It has been said that the relief camps are not desirable, and I believe it is a blot upon this nation that we have to maintain them. But we can pay these men $10 a month and the farmers $10 a month for boarding them, and yet cut in two the cost of keeping these men.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask my hon. friend a question: how many thousand men did he say?

Mr. LEADER: Ten thousand.

Mr. MacNICOL: Twenty dollars a month for twelve months would be—?

Mr. LEADER: Ten thousand men at $20 apiece would be $200,000. But the point I wanted to make was that by taking these men out of the relief camps and putting them on the farms we would be maintaining them at just half what it is costing the taxpayers of this country at the present time. That is a consideration. I commend this plan to the Minister of Labour and I want to tell him that there is lots of power behind him. I have talked to hundreds of farmers in my district who would be willing to take one and perhaps two of these men, but who cannot afford to board them; and I know whereof I speak. When you consider that last year most of the province of Manitoba had scarcely a bushel of wheat; that thousands of acres were burned up on their fields, that for many of these men it is the only cash crop they have every year and that they did not get a dollar, I know it is the absolute truth that they cannot afford to board these men. I submitted this resolution to the United Farmers of Manitoba at their convention held in my own city of Portage la Prairie and I am glad to say that it was adopted unanimously. I say to the Minister of Labour that I believe this plan is well worthy of his support. If we can cut the cost of maintaining our single unemployed on relief and keep them on the land we shall be doing good business for the men and the people of this country.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): It seems to me that in many ways this is a rather important debate. Possibly the terms of the resolution are too broad; but the resolution does seek to bring together two important phases in our present life; that is, the public services which we should have in this country, and the great question of unemployment. These two ought to be linked together. That is the underlying principle of the resolution. Further than that the resolution is important because it has drawn from the government some little indication of the attitude of the government with regard to these outstanding problems. I am not sure that most of us are very well satisfied with the position of the government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was quite willing that we should study the situation. That is precisely the attitude which he held during the nine years the Liberals were formerly in power. I am glad in some ways that we had an opportunity of studying a number of questions in that time—unemployment insurance, old age pensions, minimum wage and so on. We discussed a number of those questions in the house. Study, study, study! Committees brought in reports; with regard to other matters commissions reported, but very little was done in those long nine years. Conditions grew steadily worse with regard to unemployment.

Members who have been long in the house can remember very distinctly how just before the Conservative government came into power we emphasized the need of solving this problem of unemployment. At that time the government took the position that there was not really very much unemployment, and what there was could be readily looked after by the provinces and the municipalities. So we waited, and because of the long delay the people grew tired. They said: It is time for a change, and the Conservatives came in. During the Conservative regime, while the present government was in opposition, hon. gentlemen opposite had ample time to study this great problem. It is quite true that they did not put forward in any very concrete form what their alternatives to the government policies really were, but surely they had time to study the question; they had time to gain some idea as to what they would do under present circumstances. Yet now at the beginning of this session, after the government has been in power for some months, all we can get from the Prime Minister is that we are to have an opportunity of studying the question somewhat further and that it would not do to embarrass the government; we must give them time.

Mr. VIEN: Is it not a fact that in 1922, when the Liberal government took office, there was a crisis, but that conditions gradually improved until we reached a wave of prosperity in 1927, 1928 and 1929, and that the crisis of unemployment began to be felt only late in 1929?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is quite true that there was a certain period of relative prosperity, but I hope the government will not take full credit for all that. Then, as we all know, the depression came on, and during all that time there was acute unemployment in large sections of this country.

Mr. VIEN: Not before 1929.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, before 1929.

Mr. VIEN: Not acute and not widespread.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was very widespread latterly; it gradually grew, but we had unemployment, as will be shown by the appointment of committees to study the question at that time. That was very clearly recognized by all members.

Again the Prime Minister would suggest cooperation between the dominion government and the provinces. That is all very well, but we have had attempts at that in the past, and when we come to matters of this kind we all know that a number of the provincial governments are on the verge of bankruptcy and that a number of the municipalities are actually bankrupt. So cooperation will not get us very far unless we have some way of financing these undertakings. As I understood the matter the Prime Minister had gradually come to the point of regarding unemployment as a national problem; he so announced it, yet apparently now we are to be thrown back on the idea that in some way, through cooperation between the dominion and the provinces, we are going to solve the problem.

He tells us now to wait until the government see what their commitments really are. Well, supposing we do wait and then discover that the government have very heavy commitments, as we all know now without waiting any longer. What then? What does the Prime Minister propose to do then? It is barely possible that there may come a little bit of temporary prosperity, a slight upward rise of the curve, but I think anyone who has studied the matter carefully will not consider that any such slight increase in prosperity will solve this problem of unemployment. Then what are we to do? That is the question, and we might as well face it now. It seems to me that it is obviously the duty of the government not to wait and not to ask the house to wait before attempting to outline a program that will solve these problems.

I looked forward with a great deal of interest to the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I think we all recognized his sincerity and his ability. I was glad that he suggested that none of us should impute motives to others; that we should all recognize that we are anxious, each in his own way, to solve this problem. But he further suggested that certain people in this house were rather inclined to look to some set panacea. I submit to him that we must have some working hypothesis, some working theory, in order to place things in their right perspective. I think if anyone has a working theory of that kind the minister has it, the old Liberal theory of allowing things to work out in their own way, so in holding that view his position is no more to be commended than that of some of us who may believe in a definitely planned economy.

The minister says, and I have no doubt whatever that he quite believes, that the national credit should not be given precedence over human needs. By "national credit" I do not think he means at all what my friends to my left mean by it; he means that our position in the money markets of the world should not be impaired. But while that is a very laudable desire, he suggests that we should not allow that consideration to blind us or prevent us taking action in order to meet the pressing needs of the people. I agree with the minister in that; I think that is absolutely true, and it is because I believe in that statement I insist that the government should now face this situation, because by delaying week after week and month after month we are simply making matters worse. Think of these young fellows who have been in the camps, unemployed, for three, four and five years. I take it that this question should be dealt with at once; that their welfare should be given first consideration, whatever that requires. I take it that this is really what we have in mind when we say human needs should come first. Whatever it may cost us and whatever our other financial commitments may be, we must care for the people of this country.

The minister states his faith in and reliance upon the natural channels of private and corporate investment. Well, personally I am sure he is doomed to disappointment. We have too long trusted those so called natural channels of private and corporate investment, and they have failed us. It was by trusting them in the past that we got into this chaotic condition, and merely continuing to trust them is not going to get us out of it. We must recognize, if we are to carry out the principle that human needs must have priority, that we must begin at once to meet the needs of the million people who are now on relief. Those needs may be met not by giving more adequate relief than is being given to-day, but by setting the men at real work, at certain types of work which are needed in this country and which would greatly enhance the real wealth of the nation.

Other countries have adopted some of the projects that are mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I recall visiting Germany years before the war and being delighted with the reforestation that had been going on there along the Rhine. I also remember later going to Japan a country poor in natural resources and seeing the hillsides clad with splendid stands of timber almost to the very top. In this country we have sacrificed our forest wealth. As I was thinking of this to-day I went to my files and found a diagram which I wish I could show everyone, depicting the situation in British Columbia. When man entered British Columbia some seventy years ago he found 125,000,000 acres of forest stands containing 1,500,000,000,000 feet board measure of timber. Prior to 1918, according to the conservation commission here at Ottawa, fire had destroyed about 665,000,000,000 feet board measure; in the seventeen years from 1918 to 1935 fire destroyed another 230,000,000,000 feet board measure, making a total of 895,000,000,000 feet board measure destroyed by fire, or considerably more than half the entire timber resources of British Columbia. Several years ago I remember being in the southern part of the upper country and seeing forest fires raging there with no effort whatever being made to check them. It was said that the administration at that time did not feel that they had the finances necessary to give adequate fire protection. Then this diagram goes on to show the enormous losses through logging wastes, insects, rot, wind and so on. According to the forest branch there is left only 350,000,000,000 feet board measure of workable timber, of which only 111,000,000,000 feet board measure is accessible, according to the statement of the chief forester.

Mr. BENNETT: But the federal government had no control over that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad the right hon. gentleman called my attention to that, but I am not blaming the federal parliament. The point I want to make is that we have an enormous amount of work to be done in this country, and reforestation or afforestation is one of the subjects mentioned in the resolution now before the house. If British Columbia does not feel that it has the financial ability to protect its forests, then it seems to me that this becomes a matter of national concern, and we might very well turn loose some thousands of the young men we have in the camps of British Columbia to protect the timber of that province. We cannot forever rigidly draw this line between what is within the jurisdiction of the province and what is within the jurisdiction of the dominion. I have not the slightest doubt that in a matter of that kind the provinces would be willing to cooperate.

And so, all along the line. Take this housing suggestion, which has been so much emphasized to-day. As the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) said, in recent years splendid work has been done on a very extensive scale in Great Britain. Some hon. members may have read of the very large housing schemes carried out in Vienna some years ago. It was done through taxing; they practically taxed the rich of that city out of existence, but they provided for the needs of the poor.

We know something of the way in which some European countries have been making strides towards recovery. I have not time to go into the facts concerning Sweden, which country I believe offers a first class example of what may be described as practical socialism, of taking the ideals of human needs and recognizing that the resources, equipment and credit essentially belong to the people. Or perhaps I might even venture to point to what has been accomplished in a comparatively short time in Russia. A few years ago one could hardly mention that great country without finding many people ready to tear one limb from limb. I notice in the last number of Canadian Business an article by Sir Frederick Banting—

Mr. BAKER: Russia is behaving much better now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The article is by Sir Frederick Banting, and as the publication is issued by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce I suppose I might be permitted to read it without fear of corrupting the minds of hon. members. I can recall some years ago suggesting in the house that if gold were as important as we seem to think it is, we should send some of the unemployed into the northern gold fields to dig gold which, in part, could be used for the payment of our debts. What has been done in Russia in this regard? I quote Sir Frederick Banting:

> The same problem of buying in foreign countries led the Soviet Union to send her geologists and mining engineers to search for gold for export. In 1928 the new Soviet gold was worth $31,000,000; in 1933 it was worth $93,000,000; in 1934 it surpassed Canada and the United States in producing $150,000,000 in gold. The latest reports indicate that in 1936 the Soviet Union will exceed the $400,000,000 production of South Africa. The Soviet Union has paid off nearly $700,000,000 of foreign debts during the past four years. It is estimated that their foreign debt is now less than $150,000,000. She is not interested in gold reserves and thus her gold alone will give her $500,000,000 foreign credits during 1936.

I commend this article to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). It may offer one way in which to help balance our budget.

Mr. DUNNING: What wages did they pay?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The article does not state what wages were paid. Since the minister has raised that point let me proceed to some further observations. My friend who sits behind me suggests that probably it was twenty cents a day.

Mr. DUNNING: Are you sure it was as much as that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me go on to quote from the article by Sir Frederick Banting. I think it is rather enthusiastic, but I give it for what it is worth:

> The life and activities of their great commercial and industrial men do not greatly differ from the life and activities of industrial men in our country—nor does the financial man—banker and organizer of industry differ so much from those that perform this service in other countries. There are privileges and luxuries that our financial leaders buy. In the Soviet Union these privileges and luxuries are given to him by the people. They honour service. Honour, appreciation and trust of comrades spur and inspire men to plan and work for the common good of all. Man cannot exploit his fellowman. There is no unemployment in the Soviet Union. Conditions are improving very rapidly. Everyone is tremendously enthusiastic. The health of all is cared for by the state. All people have the opportunity to rise as high as their talent and industry will permit in whatever field of endeavour they may select. Every persons's future is invested in the state. The state in turn provides for the education of children and an old age pension. This sense of security brings happiness and peace of mind and permits true culture.
> Pasteur, the great French scientist, said, "The future belongs to science and woe to the nations that close their eyes to this fact." The Soviet government is building a gigantic structure on the solid rock of science and research. For this reason there now remains not a vestige of doubt as to the future success of the Soviet Union.

I give that as an example of a nation which has deliberately planned its life and has used the resources at its command to minister to the needs of the nation. I am not sure how they have financed. Their banking system is rather complicated. But they have controlled their own credit and have had natural resources at their disposal.

In this connection I should like to quote a statement by Stuart Chase in the January issue of Common Sense. Speaking of developments in Russia he said:

> Occasionally, I answer them by telling them about Russia in 1927. In that year, I spent some time in the offices of the Gosplan in Moscow, watching a thousand technicians prepare the charts and figures for the first five-year plan. It was proposed to invest the equivalent of thirty billion dollars in new capital improvements—dams, transmission lines, railways, factories, apartment houses, oil wells, schools, coal mines, steel plants. Having a "sound" business training back of me, I was perplexed and a little sceptical. Russia was a poor country. She had no capital, no borrowing power, not a nickel of credit. "Where are you going to get the money?" I asked. Ossinski, one of the best statisticians alive, regarded me with pity. "You should learn, my friend, to look under the veil of money at the real world. Wait and see." Five years later, in 1933, behold the dams, the transmission lines, the factories, the apartment houses, standing solidly—thirty billions worth, as planned. No money, no credit, no confidence, no profit, no "incentive"—yet there they were.
> How can you explain that, Mr. Businessman? Your oracles and taboos do not permit of any such performance. But three superior forces do permit it, namely:

Human labour,
Natural resources, including inanimate energy,
Technical skill.

Russia had the labour and the resources; she managed to import technical skill to add to her own not inconsiderable stock. The three cardinal factors for the creation of wealth were present. The power dams and factories rose. About them she threw a film of rubles, created as the tangible wealth was gradually created. The rubles only shadowed what the real agents were producing. Wealth came first and money came second. For new public industries in the United States, we have the unused labour of the unemployed, materials in abundance, and a plethora of technical skill. If they can be linked up, a huge amount of new wealth is ours for the taking.

To a certain extent I think I agree with the analysis offered by my social credit friends, and with the phrase which they are so fond of using, that what is physically possible is financially possible. I believe that is sound reasoning. However I cannot agree with their theory as to how this is to be done. Fundamentally, what is physically possible is financially possible. We can do it, if we really set our minds to it. In this article Stuart Chase states:

The first question which comes to mind is how new industries have been monetized in the past. In the last century, scores of industries made their appearance, and slid into the financial picture—railroads, bicycles, motor cars, bath tubs, radios, aeroplanes. Where did they get the money? Most business men can tell you only that they borrowed it from banks or investors.

Then he goes on to say that we can finance, just as banks have financed in the past. He states, however, that there have to be some new rules in the game. He suggests three: first, the use of income tax on the higher brackets as a prime method for financing public business. As I have said before, as long as there is wealth in this country, as long as there are people drawing large incomes from the wealth of this country, there is no reason why any single unemployed man should suffer. I would call that to the attention of the minister and if he means, as I think he does, that human needs must come first, then the welfare of these unemployed men must be looked after, even though it may mean very heavy taxation on those whose incomes come within the higher brackets. The second rule that Mr. Chase suggests is the use of non-interest bearing revolving funds of publicly created credit for additional financing of public works. Why not? If the banks can extend credit for profit, the nation surely ought to be in a position to do this in order to meet real human needs. Further this housing scheme might very readily become self-liquidating. Why should we not use national credit for such a purpose?

And thirdly Mr. Chase suggests the socialization of money and credit to prevent sabotage by private bankers, and to keep compound interest in its place. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this large group to my left is an indication that the people are insisting that something should be done to meet the real needs of the people. It may be that we cannot meet these needs in the way that the social crediters advocate. Personally I cannot follow their arguments, but nevertheless I think the principle that they hold, and that we in this part of the house hold, that the needs of the people are paramount, is fundamentally true. I take it that the government now have to decide whether they will place financial interests, the service of the debt and so on, in first place, or whether they will place first adequate provision for the needs of the people. I am glad that we have been permitted to have this discussion so early in the session. As the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) has stated, the plans of the government are in a formative stage, and we offer these suggestions to them in the hope that they may see fit to take advantage of the opportunity which the people of this country have accorded them.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches that have been made relative to the resolution before us. Before speaking to the resolution I should like to refer to one or two remarks that have been made in previous speeches which we have been privileged to hear.

The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) has suggested that the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) is being influenced somewhat by the environment in which he finds himself, but he was not satisfied to leave the matter at that. He went further and suggested that we in this corner of the house were elected upon promises that never, never would be fulfilled.

Mr. BRADETTE: I certainly said that.

Mr. HANSELL: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. gentleman confirm my understanding of his remarks, but I challenge him to state a single, solitary promise that this group in this corner of the house ever made in order to be elected. I was hoping that I might hear from the hon. gentleman, but apparently he prefers to remain silent.

Mr. BRADETTE: As the question has been put to me, I may say that the party to which

hon. gentlemen in that part of the house belong has, as I understand the situation, made a definite promise of at least $25 per month to every man and woman in the province of Alberta.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the hon. gentleman who interrupted deny that?

Mr. HANSELL: Is the hon. gentleman thinking of some other group?

Mr. BRADETTE: There are two groups of social crediters? Then what group is that over there?

Mr. HANSELL: I will attempt to answer the question if the hon. gentleman will please tell me what he thinks twenty-five dollars means.

Mr. BRADETTE: I know what it means because I have none too many of them, and I have never promised to distribute any myself.

Mr. HANSELL: I think the hon. gentleman is evading the question. If the hon. gentleman thinks any man in Alberta ever promised to hand out twenty-five dollars in new, crisp greenbacks once a month, he is wrong, but if he does not understand the matter correctly I am sure that if he comes over to this side of the house some time or another we shall be able to instruct him more fully.

Mr. BRADETTE: Thanks very much. I should like to get twenty-five dollars, too.

Mr. HANSELL: The resolution, as I look at it, resolves itself into a suggested remedy to take people off the dole and put them back into remunerative employment. The plan for housing, building, reconstruction, renovation, slum clearance, land settlement, reforestation and so forth, is only incidental. Therefore it behooves us to deal for a few moments with the unemployment situation.

In much of the discussion to-day we have heard about slum districts and crowded areas, and about sickness and disease. These conditions are more or less confined to the cities, and throughout the discussion the western farmer has more or less been left out of the picture. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hayhurst), however, has spoken along that line. I am wondering whether the western farmer who lives with his wife and children in perhaps a one-room shack, or in one of two or three rooms, should not have some consideration in a scheme of this sort.

There is one question I should like to ask in connection with the entire discussion, and perhaps it might be called the proverbial question: Where is all the money coming from?

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in the second part of his resolution suggests that the money might be borrowed on a lower rate structure. I would like to point out that the entire discussion which has ensued upon this resolution has revolved about the present financial system. The logic of all the speeches has been an attempt to run our twentieth century civilization within an eighteenth century financial structure.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has made the statement that for five years we have been trying to deal with the unemployment emergency. That is just the trouble; we have been dealing with unemployment as an emergency problem. We have not regarded the unemployment situation as being the result of some fundamental principle that is in error. Perhaps it might startle some hon. members if I were to suggest that we are not in a business depression. I might suggest that we are in a stoppage or short-circuiting of our laws of progress. I think all will agree that in no matter what field of science we delve there are certain laws of harmony to be found which must work one with the other. Take astronomical science and let us imagine for a moment that the stars in the heavens would say, "Well, boys, we have been going along at this rate for a good many millions of years; let us stop or turn round and go the other way." Something in the nature of a catastrophe would happen, and the same thing is true of mechanical science, physical science or any other branch of science. Yet it seems to me that we have overlooked this fact with regard to the science, if I may put it in that way, or the laws of progress. The age has progressed to a point where we need a new economic system that will care adequately for this very highly progressive and productive age. We are attempting to straddle with one foot in an ox cart and the other in an aeroplane. I should like to read a short quotation from a paper entitled To-day and To-morrow, published in Edmonton. In the issue of January 13, the editor says in part:

> Public, or non-productive works, involving borrowing, will provide wages, but those wages must be taken by taxation from those engaged in productive work. This is a method of sharing the poverty of the people, and does not divide up, share, or make available, the machine-made abundance. There is, obviously, only one way out of the difficulty.
> If we decide to keep the machines, then we must set up a method of giving people the wages of the machines which do their work. Incomes must be based on wealth produced and not on human labour performed.

I should like to refer a little later to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with which I heartily agree. I admire his splendid spirit in making those remarks. I should like to quote from a little book entitled From Debt to Prosperity, by J. Crate Larkin. Speaking of the present world crisis the author says:

> Of the present world crisis Major Douglas has written, "the break-down of the present financial and social system is certain." A comparatively short period will probably serve to decide whether we are to master the mighty economic and social machine that we have created, or whether it is to master us;

I want to emphasize the next few words. I continue:

> —and during that period a small impetus from a body of men who know what to do and how to do it, may make the difference between yet one more retreat into the dark ages, or the emergence into the full light of a day of such splendor as we can at present only envisage dimly.

On his return to England after visiting Canada last July, Major Douglas spoke at a banquet given in his honour on his return. The Calgary Herald of July 20 contains the following article:

> Calling for a big electoral compaign in the United Kingdom to break the bankers' monopoly of credit, Major C. H. Douglas at a banquet given in his honour on his return from Canada declared the world was facing an economic crisis of such magnitude that the next five years would fix the future of this planet for hundreds of years to come.
> "Either the outcome must be the beginning of a virtual new epoch of economic freedom," he said, "or else there will be catastrophe and loss of all the freedoms and privileges on which the British empire has hitherto prided itself."

I wonder whether in the phrase in my first quotation, "During that period a small impetus from a body of men who know what to do and how to do it," I cannot see the little body of men who sit around me. Speaking to this resolution, the Prime Minister said that he desired cooperation and constructive criticism; that he was willing to accept any light upon any given subject that would enable the present administration to manage affairs in the interests of the people. I wish to say that hon. members sitting in this corner admire that spirit. I ask hon. members: How many of you have constructive criticisms to make? How many of you have suggestions of help instead of hindrance, suggestions of construction instead of destruction to make? We in this corner of the house desire to help by suggestions which may enlighten matters a little. We desire to help the present administration to solve the problems that confront us in this parliament.

I suggest that three things are absolutely necessary: first, we must have an absolute and correct diagnosis of the disease. While we are not debating the speech from the throne, perhaps I may refer to it for a moment. I suggest that there was nothing in it to indicate the exact disease. In thinking over the speeches which have been made to-day, I doubt whether they would indicate to us the disease. The first thing necessary for the present administration to do is to diagnose and arrive at the proper disease. The next thing necessary is to discover the remedy to be applied. I have heard several statements made to-day, and in other days, concerning action. We are told that we need action; that we want action, but what we want is the proper kind of action. Third, we need a correct application of the proper remedy. We in this corner desire to contribute to the discovery of the disease, to the suggestion of a proper remedy and to throwing some light upon the proper application of the remedy. We do not desire to see any administration fail. We have no political axe to grind and we trust that the present administration will prove valuable to the country and that within a very few years this country may be taken out of the position in which it stands to-day, on the brink of chaos, to a place of economic, commercial and industrial security.

Mr. VIEN: The government has been criticized because it has not outlined all the remedies for the situation that is complained of. Is my hon. friend ready to give us his proper diagnosis, the proper remedy and the proper application thereof?

Mr. HANSELL: I understand there are several other speakers who would like to take part in the debate. While I wish to be most courteous I would suggest that as parliament pursues its duties this session many matters will come up in their turn, and I believe we shall be able to contribute to a very large extent in our endeavour to find that remedy as the days go by. I do not wish at this late hour to engage in any particular economic discussion. I believe we in this corner know the remedy; we have diagnosed the disease and we know something of the way in which to apply that remedy. At the proper time that will be revealed.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend allow me to suggest that if complaint can be made against the government for not having taken action earlier, it would be constructive criticism if he would give us that diagnosis and that proper remedy which he tells us now is in his possession.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not suggesting that the government have erred in any way so far. I believe we must give them time; certainly we cannot expect them to divulge all their plans in one short week.

Mr. VIEN: But if you have a specific remedy ready, why not give it to us now?

Mr. HANSELL: This corner of the house is not on the spot; it is those on the other side who are running the country.

Mr. VIEN: We invited you to help us. You have criticized us for not having taken action earlier—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order; the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has the floor.

Mr. HANSELL: I am sorry if my remarks have been incorrectly interpreted. We do not desire to criticize destructively but to offer constructive criticism. And now, Mr. Speaker, I will close. By profession I am a clergyman, one of only three, I believe, in the present parliament. Now, as a clergyman, I marry people to make them happy; as a clergyman, I bury people when they are dead. A few months ago we witnessed, I think I can say, the pre-nuptials in the glorious election; I believe last week we perhaps arrived at the place where we witnessed the marriage ceremony, and hon. members opposite have begun to sail the seas of political matrimony in perfect harmony. How they do love one another! I offer them my sincere wishes, as I offer many young couples health, happiness and prosperity and, of course, the proverbial "May all your troubles be little ones." We desire to contribute something to their happiness and welfare; but I do trust—and I am saying this in all seriousness—that in the next five years I shall not have to suffer the embarrassment of having to take part in the funeral service.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I shall detain the house but a few moments. I wish to congratulate my old friend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) upon retaining his old time ability to draft an omnibus resolution which would permit the house to discuss almost anything under the sun, also upon his manner of presenting his resolution and upon the general tone and temper of the debate. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) contributed constructively; but naturally, occupying a seat on this side of the house, I listened with great pride to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton), in his maiden speech. The house gave him the usual respectful hearing accorded a first effort, and I feel sure that everyone, regardless of which side of the house he sat on, was pleased, that the hon. gentleman acquitted himself so well. May I also say that in my opinion, as the Hansard of this house of to-day is read in future years, it will be generally conceded that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in his maiden speech made a notable contribution indeed. In fact, the debate as a whole has been on a very high level, if one excepts the somewhat partisan remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). There is evident in the house a sincere desire on the part of all members to contribute something constructive toward the solution of problems, the existence of which we all recognize, and in connection with which we all assume our due responsibility for offering something, during the period of our presence here, to bring about improvement.

I only desire to say one or two words by way of information with respect to last session's housing act which has been discussed by several speakers. The hon. member for North Winnipeg was rather reproachful of the previous government and of this one as well, because greater progress had not been made. He spoke very disparagingly of the fact that less than a million dollars has yet been advanced out of the ten millions appropriated by parliament for this purpose. Of course, the less than a million advanced does involve five times that amount of construction. One should bear that in mind, and it is well also to bear in mind that while the legislation was passed in July of last year, we were already entering upon a general election. The legislation depended for its successful operation upon acceptance, by a variety of interests, of various responsibilities under the terms of the law.

Business interests generally are not inclined to assume new obligations just created by an expiring parliament. There was very definitely a waiting tendency on the part both of those who were expected to supply part of the funds, and of the construction industry generally in relation to the dominion housing act. The present government found that condition on coming into office, but it has decided that the housing act now on the statute books is worth a fair trial. No one in the house would claim perfection for it. I am sure the sponsors of it would not. We certainly do not regard it as perfect, but we do believe that the experience which the government and the house and the country generally may gain by operating it in its present terms will give us the surest possible lead as to the manner in which it may be improved and made more effective. The number of applications coming in is steadily increasing. The number of loaning institutions, life insurance companies and the like, who are taking advantage of its provisions, signing the agreements provided for in the law, is increasing. Some companies are even advertising for business under the terms of the act.

Someone mentioned the desirability of widening the terms of the law in order to create machinery whereby renovation and repair of existing properties might be made possible. Whatever merit there may be in such an idea, it is very doubtful if the machinery of the dominion housing act is the best means of effecting that end. We are watching very carefully the experience in the United States with respect to legislation of this character, that is legislation having to do with the repair and renovation of existing properties and also with respect to slum clearance. In the discussion last year it became quite apparent that no one expected the present housing act to effect what is described as slum clearance. That is a far greater and wider problem than the provision of new moderate priced houses.

As to the other subjects discussed, reforestation and the like, I can only repeat what I said a day or two ago with respect to the supplementary estimates, that each department of the government and each minister are now studying with the utmost care the possibility of providing productive public works expenditures. Perhaps I should not have used the term "public works." What I mean is expenditures to create employment which will be productive and self-sustaining rather than expenditures of such a type as to create further expenditure. To illustrate: We would like, if we could, to get away as far as possible —we cannot get away from it altogether—from building that class of building which, while adding to a certain public facility, let us say a post office, does not increase the revenues of that facility one iota but does operate to increase the expense of operation. When you build a fine new post office in a small community, that is merely the commencement of the expense in connection with it, because for ever after you must keep it up; you must clean it; you must provide caretakers with salaries and so forth to look after it. That is an illustration of what I call relatively unproductive public expenditures, and I know those who have served in previous governments will agree with me that it is rather difficult to provide a sufficiency of the other type of public expenditure. That question is engaging the attention of all the members of the government at the present time, and I think it is a little early in the session for the hon. member for North Winnipeg to reproach us so bitterly because we have not now, within two days of the conclusion of the debate on the address, brought down a full-fledged program to solve all the problems to which he referred.

We know the country is expecting much of this parliament; it has a right to. We will attempt to discharge our responsibilities. And we appreciate the manner in which hon. members generally have discussed the resolution now before the house. Probably the purpose of the resolution has been served by the discussion which has taken place. Perhaps my hon. friend who moved it will not agree with me, but to my mind the great advantage of these private members' resolutions is that the government is given an opportunity to learn publicly the constructive ideas brought here by every member of the house, no matter from what part of the country he may come or to what particular party he may belong. That is a great advantage. As to whether it is desirable to have a vote, of course that is in the hands of the mover of the resolution.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to exercise my right to close the debate. I shall only take a minute.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to draw to the attention of the house that if any hon. member wishes to participate he should do so now, because after the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has spoken, the debate will be closed.

Mr. FAIR: I should like to ask the Minister of Labour how many cents of each dollar spent on relief are used as overhead.

Mr. ROGERS: If the question would be put on the order paper I should be very glad to see if the information could be secured for my hon. friend.

Mr. CHURCH: In the eleven years I have been in the house I have never before exercised this privilege of closing the debate, and I shall be only a few minutes. But I am dissatisfied and disappointed to-night at the reply offered in the name of Liberalism by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Let me tell him that ten years ago, long before he came to the house, I presented a resolution here for an employment commission after the fashion of Senator Couzen's inquiry into unemployment on behalf of the United States senate. Down there they get the senate to pass things: they do not take three weeks' holiday, doing everything by fits and starts. I may tell my hon. friend that his government voted us down when we asked them three or four sessions running what they would do for unemployment. Mr. Heenan was a real working man, and I believe a minister of labour ought to be a real working man. Working men sit in the British parliament, but it seems to me that as Liberal ministers in this country we have professors and chemists and doctors and last, but not least, judges. If any of these four classes of citizens start investigating anything, it is good-by and good-night, and it is put into cold storage at once. As to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), I have every regard for him. I will accept his suggestion and withdraw the motion, though I would rather have it lost on division. There will be another chance another day, but I can tell the Minister of Labour that his announcement in the house will disappoint not only labour throughout Canada but the municipalities who have such a hard time to meet their taxes.

This parliament created a day known as Labour day for the protection of labour. Allow me to say to the Minister of Finance that it is all right to put money in the estimates to protect farmers and fishermen, to protect coal and iron and steel, but have we no right to ask for a measure of protection in the two central provinces where forty-seven per cent of the people of this country have been engaged in industry, and where the homes of so many have been sold? The reply we have had from the young professor from Queen's university might be all right for a mock parliament or an intercollegiate debate, but it is hardly fitting to be addressed to the high court of parliament. As I said before, I admire the nature of the real Liberalism which inspired the miners of Cornwall to march to London town on behalf of Trelawney, in protest against the tyranny of King James II. I admire the spirit of the freeholders of Buckingham in supporting Hampden against the tyranny of Charles Stuart. But I am not in love with the academic Liberalism of the young Minister of Labour's reply. As I said, it may be all right for a mock parliament, but as addressed to parliament and to the workers of this country I think it is an absurdity. The minister says further that his commission, when it is appointed, will be appointed to coordinate measures to handle unemployment. Who will handle unemployment? Probably a professor of economics. The unemployed will all be dead before they get through with the young minister's program.

[Mr. Church.]

The minister says that he is not in favour of public works. Funds voted for public works may have been misspent in the United States, but in England this scheme has been a unique success, so much so that England has come out of the depression much better than any other country in the world. The minister is against any scheme of public works; he is in favour of allowing private and corporate business to expand employment. Let me ask this young minister if he is aware of what the oil ring are doing now, working their employees sixty-three hours a week as a result of the references to the supreme court. These sweatshops are doing a land office business now. They were shown up by the price spreads inquiry, that did something for the working classes of this country. For the last two or three weeks the oil ring have been working their employees sixty-three hours a week, and nine hours on Sunday. Where is the sweat shop and the alien labour laws? I am going to find out whether or not this department is functioning, because we want some measure of protection for the industrial workers of Canada. They are not going to be fooled any longer. We are not going to have some measure of protection for some classes in the community and no protection for others. I am for protection first, last and all the time for all the people of the dominion so that we may have a happy, contented country.

The minister has said that he does not want government finance to retard the expansion of private enterprises. Did you ever hear such nonsense in your life? We had a housing commission which sat for three months, long before the minister was ever a member of this chamber. That commission found that the government should help workingmen build their homes, and I believe that plan will be carried on long after the minister and all the rest of us have passed on. I gave the reason this afternoon, from government reports in England, which may be seen in Hansard to-morrow.

I am very much disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that all these matters have been referred to the law courts. Under the Liberal party we had first of all ambassador cure for unemployment; now we have the professor cure; again we are going to have the under secretary cure and last but not least the commission cure. Then there was this reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, judges who know nothing about employment, unemployment or economic matters. Half the trouble we have in this country is due to these economists. Political economy is not an exact science like physics, chemistry or biology. These scientists can argue from facts, but our professors and political economists cannot do that. They give their opinions, and they are not worth a scrap of paper, neither is the opinion of the minister with regard to unemployment worth a scrap of paper. Let me tell you, Mr. Minister, that when your commission takes a Cook's tour of Canada and sees conditions in this country, it will open its eyes. If you just go round the city of Toronto or the other industrial cities in this country and see the workingmen losing their homes because of the inefficiency of the Department of Labour you will have something to think about.

This is not the first time I have had something to say about this department. I do not wish to criticize the young minister; he is a young gentleman of great ability, who is very well liked, but I was very much disappointed in listening to a minister of the crown from his place in parliament give an answer such as he gave. If that is all the unemployed have to expect from the present government, unemployment is going to increase by leaps and bounds and you will see a great exodus of our young people. If that is all, these young people, these high school and university students, who are out of work, have to expect, there is not very much for them in this country. Why is parliament called to meet anyway? Are we a lot of office boys or rubber stamps called here to receive an academic reply like that one we heard to-night? I am sorry the industrial worker is not better supported in the house. I intend to ask leave to withdraw this resolution, but I shall do so with great reluctance; I would rather see it lost on division. However, this is only the preliminary hearing at this stage; we shall have a real trial of this case later on.

I hope we will have a proper Liberalism in this country along the lines I have suggested. The Minister of Labour in the previous Liberal government, the Hon. Peter Heenan, was a real workingman who was respected by the working people, but Mr. Heenan told me in the house that there was no unemployment, and that if there was it was a matter for the provinces and municipalities. At that time the government declined to contribute one-third of the cost of relief. They refused the application of the city of Toronto, which I presented in parliament some eight or ten years ago, but later on the government was forced to contribute. When the new government came in it gave fifty per cent of the cost, and I want to commend the new government upon giving seventy-five per cent. I hope before long the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will be able to go the whole distance and give one hundred per cent.

I have represented an industrial city in many spheres of activity. I have seen the suffering there; I have visited homes in which four generations of families have been out of work. That is an intolerable condition, and something should be done. Unemployment is the great scourge of the human race and it is going to engulf society unless something is done. Things have been going from bad to worse and the unemployed are getting disgusted with the whole performance. Something should be done for Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver and the larger cities of this country, which are suffering so severely from unemployment. Every municipality I have named, from Vancouver to Halifax—and I saw his worship the mayor of Vancouver here a moment ago—has had to put into relief work most of the money raised by taxes. They have not had a dollar to spend on necessary public improvements. This afternoon I referred to the fact that in England they are constructing all the necessary improvements for the next forty years in order to tide people over the depression, and that is going to help the farmers as well.

I hope there will be some reconsideration of this problem between now and the time the estimates come up. The other day the government announced that $25,000,000 would be devoted to reconstruction. The highly industrialized provinces of Ontario and Quebec are paying eighty per cent of the cash taxes of this country, but the industrial workers are getting no protection at all. We have had a commission on maritime rights, a commission on Pacific coast rights and a commission on prairie rights. I tell you the time is coming when we shall have to ask for a commission on the rights of central Canada.

So with great reluctance, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw this resolution. I would rather see it lost on division. It should be lost on division; the government is straight against it. What is the minister going to do about these shark loan companies, incorporated by parliament, which are charging forty per cent on second mortgages in the city of Toronto? What is he going to do about these trust companies, these insurance companies, and so on? I would ask that he use his good offices to see what can be done in that regard. I do not know whether or not they contribute to campaign funds, but they have a way of doing business around parliament. We all saw something of that in the days of Beauharnois; I know they drove me out of parliament. I would ask the Minister of Finance, also, if he will not use his good offices to stop these foreclosures and give the industrial workers a chance to protect their homes, as the farmers and fishermen have been given chances to protect theirs. With that, Mr. Speaker, I ask your leave to withdraw this resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 18, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

WHEAT POOL

EQUALIZATION OF 1930 PAYMENTS ON WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government if the report of the auditors made necessary by the order in council of October 10 last, dealing with the equalization of the 1930 wheat pool payments on wheat, has been referred to the government, and if so, what action is the government taking.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Some days ago my hon. friend told me that it was his intention to ask the question which he has just asked, and I requested him to delay until the government had had further opportunity to consider carefully its policy in this matter. I am now in position to give him an answer. The auditors' report has been referred to the government. It is the opinion of the government that the report of the auditors does not justify the government in making payment under the authority of the order in council passed on October 10, 1935. The government is of the opinion, however, that in view of the policies followed under the previous government in handling the 1930 wheat pool surplus, the producers of wheat who accepted an initial payment of fifty cents a bushel or fifty-five cents a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, are justified in expecting those payments to be equalized at sixty cents a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William. It is, therefore, the intention of the government to have legislation introduced without delay to provide for the equalization of the 1930 pool payments on wheat at sixty cents a bushel basis No. 1 northern, Fort William.

[Mr. Church.]

VIMY PILGRIMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret). Has the government decided what leave of absence is to be granted to the returned men employed in the public service who wish to take advantage of the proposed pilgrimage to Vimy this year?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his question. On January 10, 1936, an order in council was passed dealing with the granting of special leave with pay to ex-soldier civil servants and their immediate relatives who are eligible to take part in the Vimy and battlefields pilgrimage in 1936, and who desire to do so. The order in council provides that eleven days be added as special leave with pay to the three weeks usually allowed as statutory leave, such special leave not to be counted as a charge against the employee's special leave credit. The order in council further empowers the deputy heads of departments to grant such additional time as may be necessary for travelling to and from the point of embarkation. The point was raised as to whether this was intended to apply only to civil servants who are under the Civil Service Act. I may say the intention is that the order in council shall apply to all civil servants, whether they are under the Civil Service Act or not.

REGINA RIOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if his attention has been drawn to the publicity given to and the inferences being drawn from a remark which he made in this house last Tuesday, as follows:

> I believe the evidence that is being given before the commission will rather be a justification of what the police did, and will rather clarify certain issues which were perhaps dangerous, as to which the people did not have the best information, the information they should have had.

In view of the inferences which have been drawn, I should like to ask the minister if he desires to amplify that statement in any particular.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have no such wish.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does not the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) consider that the statement he made on Tuesday last, appearing on page 125 of Hansard, prejudices the entire relief inquiry?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order in putting such a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to transgress the rules of the house, and I should like to know in what respect I am out of order. I am asking the minister a question based on a statement he made to this house and which appears on page 125 of Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement has been made and I do not think it is proper for the hon. member to criticize a speech. He should have made his criticism when the speech was made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have nothing to add or subtract from what I stated on that occasion. I am not responsible for the inferences.

TRACTOR PARTS PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) based upon a circular letter which was sent out by the International Harvester Company to its dealers in my constituency. This letter is dated at Saskatoon, February 5, 1936, and reads:

Dealers: General letter No. 12. Repair prices for ball and roller bearings, bolts, nuts, washers, screws and rivets—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. gentleman should read the letter; he should put his question directly.

Mr. TUCKER: I must read the letter in order to make my question intelligible. It is a very short letter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to read a letter. He should put his question directly as to what the government intends to do.

Mr. TUCKER: This letter indicates that effective immediately the prices of parts necessary for duty free farm tractors will be increased 33⅓ per cent. The letter states that this increase in price is made necessary on account of duty now being paid on these parts. Could the minister advise whether there has been any increase in the duty on parts necessary for duty free tractors? If there has not been any increase, will the government take some action in regard to this increase in the price of parts which are so important to the farmers of western Canada?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I know of no increase in duties whatsoever. If my hon. friend would place his question upon the order paper I would have a better chance than I have at the moment of answering accurately the latter part of his question.

Mr. TUCKER: I spoke to the Minister of National Revenue about the matter, and I believe he is ready to answer my question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should put his question on the order paper.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): There has been no increase in duty whatever since the new government assumed office. There is a duty imposed on the parts mentioned in the letter under other items in the tariff, but they have been in effect for several years past. If the letter is taken to mean that the increase in price is due to an increase in duty, the implication is not justified at all.

SUPPLY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Health of animals, administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $1,900,400.

Mr. SENN: Mr. Chairman, I have thought sometimes that the manner in which these agriculture estimates are brought down is such that they do not convey as much information to the committee as they should convey if we are to have an intelligent discussion. Quite a large sum is involved in this item, and it would add very much to the conduct of debate if the minister would state briefly why these expenditures are to be made and what particular functions are performed by this branch of the department.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): It will be noted that the estimates submitted for the year 1936-37 show a slight increase over those of 1935-36, the total estimate being increased by $12,484. The different purposes for which this money is to be expended are:

Communication of services, $14,050.
Equipment, acquisition and maintenance, $11,000.
Compensation, largely having to do with the checking of tuberculosis in cattle throughout the country, $413,937.
Lands, buildings, acquisition and maintenance, $6,500.
Miscellaneous current expenses, $13,300.
Personal services in connection with staffs, $1,120,693.
Special personal services, $1,100.
Rents, $10,220.
Supplies, materials, printing, stationery, etc., $54,000.
Transportation of things, $6,600.
Transportation and travelling expenses of persons, $249,000.

Mr. BARBER: Is it the intention to bring any new areas under the tuberculosis test this year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. There is the new area in New Brunswick, which I think completes the bringing of that province into the district there. Then there is a new area in Ontario, taking in certain counties around Toronto, from the county of Northumberland through to the county of Halton. There are three new areas in Manitoba, and there are under consideration one or two others that have not yet been passed upon.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the serious epidemic which occurred among horses in western Canada at the end of August and in September this year, has any additional provision been made in this particular estimate to deal with that matter?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the opinion of the department that that was a disease which was due partly to conditions on both sides of the international boundary—that is, the drought conditions that have prevailed for a number of years. We do not expect that there will be any new outbreak this year and therefore there is no provision for it. Of course, that is something that would have to be dealt with at the time if it developed.

Mr. THOMPSON: What is the policy of the government regarding the checking of tuberculosis in dairy herds throughout the country? That is a vital question to which more attention should be paid. A closer check should be kept on dairy herds, because I believe a great deal of milk offered for sale to-day comes from diseased herds.

Mr. GARDINER: There are three different schemes for checking tuberculosis generally. There is the accredited herd system; there is the restricted area policy in which all cattle are checked over the whole area; and there is the supervised herd plan. In connection with the first two the government pays compensation for stock destroyed, but it does not in connection with the third. All these plans are applied in the attempt to eradicate tuberculosis from dairy and other herds throughout the country.

Mr. BARBER: I have in mind particularly the anti-tuberculosis area in the Fraser valley district. What percentage of reactors was there in the last test, or is that district cleaned up completely?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that it can be said that any district has been entirely cleaned up, but the trouble has been reduced to such an extent in some districts that the reactors are only one-half of one per cent of the cattle tested, which shows that there has been a marked diminution in the disease in the different districts. The reduction sometimes has been from five per cent to one-half of one per cent, and in other instances from an even higher percentage. There has been a considerable reduction as a result of the policy.

Mr. THOMPSON: Is it the policy of the government to extend the testing system further than it has been carried in the past? In my opinion it has not covered the ground as it should.

Mr. GARDINER: My information is that the maritime provinces, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are now restricted areas; that is, they have been set out as an area in which an attempt is being made to eradicate tuberculosis. The government is extending areas in other provinces as rapidly as the funds available will make this possible. The efforts of the department are limited only by the amount of money which this house sees fit to vote from time to time to take care of that matter.

Mr. SENN: Is the amount to be voted for indemnity for cattle in connection with the tuberculosis test more or less than it was last year?

Mr. GARDINER: The total amount is $6,063 less than it was last year.

Mr. SENN: In my district a disease, not new but one that has become prevalent within the last two or three years, needs looking into. It is known as shipping fever, the technical name being hemorrhagic septicaemia. It is a very infectious disease and has resulted in a good many fatalities among herds that have been infected. Has any notice been taken of it by the department? If so, what is being done to eliminate it?

Mr. GARDINER: The department is not touching it. It is an infection that is widespread throughout the country and one that is somewhat difficult to deal with, but the department is not dealing with it at the moment.

Mr. SENN: Is the bacteriological department taking no steps at all to investigate the matter?

Mr. GARDINER: The information of the department is that the disease is due usually to bad handling of stock and to poor feeding. It is a disease that is likely to develop in connection with the shipment of cattle, and likely to develop anywhere. Investigations have been made, and it is generally considered to be caused by bad handling and poor feeding, and of course that cause can be removed only by more education among the people in connection with feeding and shipping conditions.

Mr. SENN: A good many of the cases that have come under my notice have been contracted while cattle were being shipped on railway cars. Even at the Toronto exhibition cattle have been infected with the disease, with serious consequences. If the department have not taken any steps towards investigating the matter I advise that they do so, because I believe the disease is spreading, and it is very serious, in some districts at least.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be very pleased to take the matter up with the department.

Mr. COLDWELL: With respect to the question I raised a few moments ago, the minister said it was considered in the United States and Canada that this was a drought disease among horses.

Mr. GARDINER: Not exactly a drought disease, but one that develops as a result of conditions of hardship that prevail in the area.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was just going to ask the minister if he is aware of the fact that this disease was quite prevalent in the districts around Rosetown where drought had not been particularly severe, and what steps were being taken to study it. I think it is something that should be watched very carefully by the department.

Mr. GARDINER: I would only say in reply that it just depends upon how large an area the member for Rosetown-Biggar would take in around Rosetown. He says there have been no drought conditions around Rosetown. My information is that the drought conditions extended north, south, east and west of Rosetown, and of course you would have the development of any disease that resulted from that in areas which were comparatively small, where they might have fairly good crops. Right around Rosetown it is fairly true that in some years, when we have had drought elsewhere, the crop has been comparatively good, but parts of that district have been very much affected.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said "not particularly" affected. Does the minister or the department consider that this is an infectious or contagious disease?

Mr. GARDINER: The department is inclined to think that it is not contagious, but it is not in a position to state definitely. The disease has not been confirmed by those who have been investigating.

Mr. THOMPSON: Is it the policy of the government to test dairy herds upon application of the farmers, irrespective of the number of pure bred animals that may be in that herd?

Mr. GARDINER: The supervised herd plan takes any number at all, but the accredited herd plan requires that five of the live stock be pure bred.

Mr. THOMPSON: I think that, in checking up on disease, to limit them to five pure bred cattle is a mistake. There are many splendid grade herds in the country, and it is just as important that the milk coming from a grade herd should be pure as that coming from a pure bred herd.

Mr. DOUGLAS: What provision is made to protect consumers against disease in cattle that have been butchered? Oftentimes they are butchered outside and peddled in the town. I know of cases where that has been done, with very serious consequences.

Mr. GARDINER: That is handled under public health in the different provinces.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the minister find it possible to establish a tubercular zone over the Porcupine and Cochrane area—most of the northern area? This is very important on account of the amount of milk that is being used in that section.

Mr. GARDINER: In order to have that done it will be necessary in the first place for two-thirds of the cattle men in that area to petition the government to make that an area.

Mr. BRADETTE: They have done that.

Mr. GARDINER: And after that is done the matter is investigated by the department, and if sufficient funds are available other areas are added as we think it is necessary to add them. At the moment I think that what are already in will require practically all the money that is being voted in this fund. I am informed by the officials of the department that there is no petition in from that area.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is very important that this should be done. The minister will readily understand what it means. In a section of the country where the farmers are really established farmers they get compensation for their losses; but in most cases around the mining areas they are beginners, and when this disease occurs they do not get any compensation whatever: it is a dead loss to those settlers. Their plight is a very different one from what you will find in the older settled sections of Ontario, Quebec and other provinces. The minister will understand that it is impossible to bring raw milk in from outside, from Toronto for instance. We have to produce milk around these mining sections, and the minister will appreciate the plight of these poor settlers when the whole of their cattle have to be destroyed.

Mr. STEVENS: Have any steps yet been taken to give effect to recommendations made in the report of the price spreads and mass buying commission in connection with the administration of the Meat and Canned Foods Act? It will be recalled it was discovered that certain abuses existed, not only abuses but perhaps inadequate standards and provisions for containers. I am referring now particularly to canned goods, although reference is made also to other classes of goods. On page 241 of the report, dealing with this question of grading and so on, I find these words:

> Nowhere are simple numerical grades used for consumer products, and even in one of the best grading systems, that of canned foods, the grade names do not indicate in themselves the position of any one grade in the series. These designations are "fancy quality," "choice quality," "standard quality" and "second quality"; "second quality" being, in fact, fourth grade.

It goes on to say, elaborating that a little further:

> It is recommended that all grade designations be numerical, as grade 1, grade 2, etc. Should this prove impossible for some products, alphabetical grades might be used, as with eggs for export trade.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Referring to the question of grading canned goods, it has been noticed, and I think commented upon quite widely by those who are interested, that the use of those terms, "fancy," "choice," and so forth, is really meaningless, that there ought to be a standard; and I believe in the department the officers or the inspectors have certain standards. I am not for a moment complaining about those standards, nor am I criticizing the department in respect of its examination of the goods. What I am calling attention to is what we discovered on that occasion, and as I say it has been widely commented upon, that the consumer may be very easily grossly misled. Furthermore it constitutes an unfair competition between different manufacturers. A given manufacturer may have an article which he describes as "choice," "fancy," or something else. What is required in the interests of the consumer is that in canned fruits, canned peaches if you like, or strawberries, there shall be a standard No. 1, No. 2, No. 3 or No. 4 grade, as the case may be, and that these numerical descriptions be set forth in clear, outstanding type which will indicate clearly to the consumer the standard that is being sold. I know perfectly well from my knowlege of the subject that often a secondary grade, known to the departmental officials as secondary, is described on the label in such a way that an ordinary purchaser could not possibly understand that he was buying a secondary grade, and he might really be, and in fact often is, deceived into thinking he is getting a really superior article. And inasmuch as there are different types of labels and descriptions by different firms the competition of price becomes the main competition while actually there may be a great deal of unfairness in connection with the quality.

On that point—and there are other points to which I shall refer later—I should like to ask the minister if any steps have been taken since last session, when the price spreads report was presented to this parliament, to carry out the suggestions contained in that report or to correct the present practice, which in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of many others, is more or less deceptive to the consumer.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member will agree when I say that some of the matters he has brought forward and the question he has asked would have to be considered not only by the Department of Agriculture but also by the Department of Health. Most of the questions asked by my hon. friend really have to do with another vote so far as they concern agriculture; that is the vote having to do with canned goods.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to place myself right; this vote refers to the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Of course meat would naturally come under this item, but I think most of my hon. friend's questions had to do with canned vegetables and canned fruit. However, I do not object to giving him the information now; I am just directing attention to that fact. The only reply I can make is that the different branches of the Department of Agriculture, together with the Health department and others concerned, have been giving consideration to those recommendations, and an effort is being made to work out some better plan of grading and marking which will meet as far as possible the recommendations of the committee. Nothing definite has been done up to the moment, but the whole matter is under consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: There is another point to which I should like to direct attention; that is, the sizes of packages. I think this is one of the most flagrant abuses prevalent in the distribution trade to-day. Passing along the street—you can see it in Ottawa as you can see it everywhere else—I frequently see advertised in the windows, usually of a chain store, certain articles, canned meat, canned tomatoes or any article of common use, at a price that is startlingly low. It is very skilfully done; the inference is that this particular institution is able to sell canned tomatoes, we will say, at a price much below its competitors. Then passing along the street I have seen in another window, of a competing store—perhaps an independent merchant—a can of tomatoes that seems to be exactly the same size, but the price of which is two or three cents higher. Immediately the unsuspecting purchaser will note the question of price, and of course he is drawn to the first store. On examination of the cans, however, it will be found that one is half an inch shorter than the other. Half an inch is not readily discernible to the unpractised eye, but it means a difference of perhaps ten per cent, which of course means that in one can you get ten per cent less than in the other, and therefore the price, although it appears to be lower, may be just the same, possibly higher or perhaps very slightly lower.

Again this is a deceptive thing. My own view, frankly and candidly, is that it was designed to deceive, because it was introduced only a few years ago. Formerly there were standard sizes, although I do not know that there was a law or statute forcing merchants to sell only certain sizes. By common practice over the years, however, certain sizes were accepted and recognized. The old size for tomatoes was a two pound tin, if my memory serves me aright. Now you can buy tomatoes in a number of different sizes, and I am convinced that this is a flagrant abuse. I may say further that the evidence before the committee two years ago, and I think before the commission last year, indicated that some of these large and powerful distributing agencies or institutions were able to buy a certain standard article in a size slightly smaller than the size furnished to others, and this size container was prepared especially for them. Later I believe the same privilege was extended to others, but at first undoubtedly it gave the one institution that was successful in getting the special size a distinct advantage over its competitors. It was a deceptive thing; it was not fair competition, and the consumer obtained no advantage.

There is another form that it takes. What I have said applies particularly to canned goods, but let us consider bottled jam. I do not know whether samples are available now, but samples were available which demonstrated that a bottle of jam was put up in such shape and form that it appeared to contain actually more than it did. It was scientifically designed to deceive the eye, without doubt; in fact it was one of the triumphs of science, the optical illusion that was created by just looking at the jar. Yet the net contents of that jar were very much less than those of a jar used by a competitor.

The minister will please accept this assurance from me, that I am not directing these remarks in any sense as a criticism of his administration of the department; this is a question for parliament, but at the moment he is responsible for the administration of this part of the country's affairs. To my mind it is the duty of parliament to see to it that no such deception is allowed, that that practice is eliminated. There should be standardization of sizes of bottles for jam and of cans for canned goods so that there may at least be some uniformity. I think it would surprise the minister to know what a great variety of sizes there is. For canned fruits and vegetables, peas, corn, tomatoes, peaches, plums, strawberries, about two sizes would be ample to cover the requirements of the trade. This variety of sizes is not in any sense a contribution to efficiency in merchandising. I do not think anyone here who has had experience in merchandising would say I am wrong in that. I am convinced that there is but one object in having this variety of sizes, and that is the object of cajoling—or I would use a stronger term, deceiving—the consumer. I am willing to make all reasonable allowance to the minister for the short time he has been in office, but after all, these things were brought out two years ago, and while I am not inclined to press any criticism of the minister I suggest to him that the permanent officials responsible for the administration of these acts might well, shall I say, be brought to task, or at least be asked to explain why they have not made to their minister recommendations for the elimination of this kind of deception practised upon the consumer on the one hand and constituting on the other hand a grossly unfair form of competition. I strongly urge upon the minister the necessity of early and prompt action for the correction of these matters.

Mr. GARDINER: I appreciate the attitude of the hon. member towards myself as the present head of the department. I can assure him that I am informed by the officials of the department during the short time I have been its head that consideration is being given to the matters he has brought before the committee this afternoon. Again it is a question of dealing with two departments, that of trade and commerce, which my hon. friend understands much better than I do, having himself been in charge of it for a considerable time, and, since we are charged with the administration of the act, the department of which at the moment I happen to be the head. As I said in regard to the other matter so I say in regard to this, that it is under consideration at the moment. I have much in common with my hon. friend in the views I hold in regard to the methods that have been followed in the putting up of packages. Of course I do not know what was the intention of those who first put food products up in these packages. Many people who purchase from chain and other stores where these goods are sold have known for a considerable time that the packages are not as large as some of those purchased in other places at higher prices. There are different reasons why persons purchase smaller packages, I need not discuss that; but it is the desire of the department and of myself as its head that everything which tends to deceive the public should be done away with, and that as quickly as possible. So far as I have charge of the department that will be done.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister referred to the fact that for some years I was presiding over the Department of Trade and Commerce. I imagine he inferred I might have done something while I was there. The long and short of it is that it illustrates a clash of jurisdiction. When I was minister I sought urgently and strenuously to get some action, and I tell the minister frankly I could get no action because of the attitude of the Department of Agriculture. I am not desirous of going into any discussion of that phase of the situation, but it indicates this—and that is one reason I am glad that I am addressing a minister who comes fresh to his task—that the administration should be in the hands of either one department or the other; there should not be this clash of jurisdiction. I am certain the interdepartmental correspondence will show that the permanent officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce have long been of the opinion that there is need for amendments to the act. If the Prime Minister were in his seat—for after all it is the Prime Minister who must decide on matters where there is a dual responsibility—I would appeal to him to give consideration to that phase of the subject, so that there can be no evasion of responsibility.

There is another abuse that I wish to emphasize. The department in the administration of these acts requires that the net weight be shown on the label, but I invite any hon. member whose family is keeping house to go into the kitchen, pick up any canned goods and look at the minute figures in which the weight of the contents is shown —16 ounces, 14, 13, or whatever it may be; the figures should be clear and such as can be read. Furthermore, as this report suggests, they should do away entirely with these odd weights such as 14 1-2 or 13 ounces. The report definitely suggests that the quantity should be 4, 8, or 16 ounces, definite divisions of what the housewife knows as a pound, not 15 ounces, for instance—there was that size; I do not know whether it is still put out—and 14 and 12 ounces.

May I refer to another point in this report which I think is very important. I commend this particularly to the attention of the minister:

> It is our opinion that legislative provision should be made for the standardization by order in council of the quantities in which any packaged commodity, whether a food product or not, may be sold.

And that the act should be amended accordingly. I believe the practice at present is this—and I invite the minister to correct me if I state it inaccurately; I am speaking from memory, nearly all these provisions are made by regulation under order in council. I am not one of those who seek, and I am not seeking now, to tie the hands of the administration, but I do think we sometimes lean towards an abuse of that privilege. There are certain things that might well be statutory. The act might very clearly state, for instance, that there shall not be more than such and such a number of sizes, or, as I mentioned a moment ago, that all grades shall be designated numerically, one, two, three, four, and so forth, or A, B, C, D, et cetera. Furthermore, we might clearly provide by statute that there shall not be any division of a pound except as indicated here, 2 ounces, 4, 6, 8 ounces, and so forth. These are things that could be fixed by statute. I am anxious, Mr. Chairman, that what I have to say shall not be lost on the desert air.

Mr. GARDINER: I am listening.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid the minister is listening with one ear and talking with the other.

Mr. JACOBS: Are you sure you are not?

Mr. STEVENS: I say that the statute ought to determine many of these things, and then the governor in council would be limited in the powers he has for stretching the regulations to cover a variety of things such as I have dealt with. I would very earnestly plead with the minister that in connection with this whole subject the recommendations of the price spreads commission should be given careful consideration and an effort made to eliminate these abuses. I am quite aware that the various acts we now have contain elaborate provisions respecting a variety of matters, but these abuses are obviously present, and it is our duty in the face of past experience so to amend the act as to eliminate them if possible.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the Toronto board of health for some years and I saw something of the enforcement of these acts. I would ask the minister to tell the committee what cooperation or coordination there is between his department and provincial health officers regarding the administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and the Meat and Canned Foods Act. We have had many complaints about canned goods, about the cheap stuff that is worked off on the working class. The city of Toronto and the county of York have spent a large sum of money in setting up a modern health department. What is this parliament doing? The government proposes to spend $1,900,000 on the health of animals and only one-fifth of that amount on the health of human beings. It is a wonderful country, Canada, is it not? I agree with the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that there is a great deal of inefficiency in the administration of these acts. Every person who has been interested in public health must know that there are abuses. When I first served on the board of health in Toronto there was no health inspection, although there was some kind of inspection of food. But the great Doctor Hastings, former medical officer of the city of Toronto, was responsible for having the milk supply of the city of Toronto inspected for sixty miles around the city, and that operated for the welfare of the people of Toronto, children especially, and helped to cut down contagious diseases among animals. I think the minister should tell the committee what he intends to do to provide for a more efficient administration of these acts. I was told by one health inspector that you could not enforce the act. He said "the federal department has taken it over now." That is how they get away with it. The chain stores sell cheap and they dump canned goods into their windows. Prosecutions in Toronto are few and far between, although a lot of these goods are afterwards found by the street cleaning departments. I agree with the former minister that there is great inefficiency, and a lack of cooperation and coordination between the federal department and the public health officials in the large cities. There is room for much improvement in that direction, and I think the minister ought to call a conference of the health officers of the large cities throughout the country with a view to bringing about closer cooperation and coordination.

Then as to prosecutions, we were told last session by the Minister of Justice that all federal law enforcement is in the provinces, and that the federal department has nothing to do with federal prosecutions. I was told a few sessions ago to see the attorney general of the province. I would like to find out what the minister proposes to do along this line. The enforcement of all these acts under the Department of Agriculture should be the duty of the minister, who should see that prosecutions by him are instituted in Toronto and other police courts for violations of the acts. The summons is laid under the act, but the person in charge of the summons has no power. He is only a food inspector for a municipality, and the result is that the consumer is getting the worst of it. I sympathize with the producer because he is having a hard time of it in many ways, but here we are dealing with the health of our people, and we have this government spending only $475,000 on the health of human beings and $1,900,000 on the health of animals.

Is that Canada's conception of the worth of human beings, many of whom are unable to get employment and some of whom are starving? Yet the government appoints inspectors, and inspectors of inspectors, and inspectors of inspectors of those who are the chief inspectors. What they do I do not know. There is a great lack of coordination between the health officers in the cities and this department, and it is these local health officers who are most familiar with the situation. They are local men, right on the ground, and they know the conditions in the abattoirs where cattle are killed and where the food is put into cans. They know the operations of the canning companies. The late government did a great thing for public health when it appointed the price spreads commission, and the work of that commission was most commendable from the point of view of public health. If the minister wants a proper administration of these acts he should coordinate with the medical officers of health and with the police departments or police chiefs of the large cities, and his inspectors should see that there is an efficient inspection. Probably the minister has not been long enough in the department to become familiar with it or to do much as yet, but I hope that in the recess he will visit Toronto and try to bring about closer cooperation between the local boards of health in the province and police officials and federal officials so that the consumer will get some benefit from the expenditure of these large sums of money.

Mr. NEILL: Is the minister prepared to inform the committee what the policy of his department will be regarding pullorum disease in chickens? It is rather a serious matter in British Columbia, and I know that the minister has received representations from a number of people. I have made them myself, but so far without any reply. I hope others have been more successful. The present regulations are founded apparently upon the belief, which is contradicted by some people claiming authority, that the disease is wholly hereditary, and so we are not allowed to sell our day-old chicks in Alberta or Saskatchewan or anywhere outside the province unless we can produce the pedigree of the chicks' fathers and mothers and aunts and uncles to quite a remote degree. This is very expensive.

There are three complaints made in British Columbia of the manner in which these regulations are enforced. First, the complaint is made that it is very expensive and is calculated to injure the laying qualities of the birds. It puts them off their laying, and when a bird has been put off its laying it is a long time before it gets back again. It is alleged also that there is another method, known as the quick method, which does not have this effect. This need not be carried out by government inspectors, but can be done by the poultry owner himself at a tenth of the cost. It is claimed that this method is equally effective. The poultry men want to know, and I do not think they will be quiet until they do know, why the more modern, cheaper and equally effective method has not been adopted. Special provision was made last year, probably on account of the trouble which arose, under which the dominion government paid part of the expenses, but that was only an emergent action.

The second complaint is in connection with the contention that this disease is an hereditary disease. I have seen articles in some of the poultry journals by people who claim to know, contradicting the idea that this disease is wholly of an hereditary character. It is said that too much emphasis is being placed upon that phase of the matter. It is claimed that the diseases may be contracted because of local conditions, because of poor surroundings or improper sanitation, and so on, and that it is not entirely an hereditary disease. The regulations are based entirely upon the idea that the disease is hereditary, that it is conveyed from father to son or from mother to daughter, so to speak. The results of these regulations have been very injurious to the poultry industry in British Columbia. In the past the price of eggs has been low and the price of feed from the prairies has been high. These things have mitigated against the success of these men, and yet the government comes along, no doubt with the best intentions, and states that they must conform to certain regulations before they can sell their day-old chicks. A great many people have been forced out of the business. Not only has it been necessary to test the parents of the chicks, but it has been necessary to test the more remote relations; the whole flock has had to be tested. It is an expensive procedure and the benefits are doubtful. There is another method known as the quick method by which a drop of blood is taken from the chicken and a test made immediately. The laying qualities of the bird and its general health are not interfered with.

This matter is of great importance to British Columbia. I was unable to get a reply from the department as to what their policy would be and the only thing left for me to do was to bring up the matter here. I know the minister has not been long in office and has not had time to familiarize himself with every detail of this branch, but I ask him to undertake to look into the matter to see if some redress cannot be given to the poultry owners of British Columbia.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, there has been considerable correspondence from British Columbia with regard to the difficulties to which the hon. member (Mr. Neill) has just referred. I may say that these regulations were really set up as a result of the activities of the live stock branch, under which hatcheries are controlled. However, I think it would be just as well to deal with this matter at this time as we have been discussing live stock diseases generally. The general impression in the department, an impression pretty well established by experience, is that this disease is not wholly hereditary, but rather it is one which is transmitted by infection. The objective of the department is to try to prevent the spreading of the disease. The regulations set up do not automatically come into force in the different parts of Canada; they are made applicable in a province only when that province asks that they be applied. The three prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and two of the maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have applied to have these regulations put into force within their boundaries. As I understand them, the regulations require that any one who is supplying eggs to a hatchery, the chicks from which are going to be sold to the public, is required to have all his hens blood tested. Objection to these regulations has been taken in British Columbia. That province has not asked that these regulations shall apply there, and in so far as chicks sold within the province are concerned, the regulations do not apply. However, when they undertake to sell chicks in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, or the eastern provinces of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, they are affected by the regulations.

At the time of the dominion-provincial conference Alberta intimated that they had no objection to chicks being shipped into Alberta provided that the hens in the flock used for hatchery purposes were segregated from those not used for hatchery purposes. In other words, if a poultryman has 1,000 hens of which only 300 are used for hatchery purposes, if he segregates those 300 and has them tested, Alberta is prepared to accept chicks that are hatched from eggs laid by those particular hens. Saskatchewan and Manitoba insist that the entire flock shall be tested, as regards both chicks raised and sold within the province and chicks brought in from outside. British Columbia is, therefore, excluded from selling chicks in Saskatchewan or Manitoba, unless such chicks are raised from eggs taken from flocks all the hens of which have been blood tested.

Mr. NEILL: The whole flock.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the whole flock blood tested. I understand that in some cases, probably in all cases, this has raised the cost to the poultryman. Some misunderstanding has arisen between the poultrymen of British Columbia and the department administering these particular regulations. Everything possible is being done to have the regulations applied in all provinces in order that a disease which has been affecting poultrymen everywhere may be eradicated with the least possible cost to the individuals concerned.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has shown a very thorough knowledge of this subject, but there is one point upon which he did not touch. He stated that Alberta and Saskatchewan demand that imported chicks comply with the regulations, but he did not state that these regulations were formulated at Ottawa and Alberta and Saskatchewan had to accept them holus-bolus. If they wanted certain tests applied, the only way they could get them was by adopting the dominion formulated rules. If the dominion rules were less stringent, or, as we might say in British Columbia, more reasonable, Alberta and Saskatchewan would still adopt them and the situation would be eased. These rules were formulated by the dominion at a time when the officials were less informed about the matter, and it was decided that this longer and more expensive method should be used; but since that time there has been devised a quicker test which can be carried out instantly by taking a drop of blood from the bird. Not only is this test cheaper, but it is less dangerous. If the dominion would change its rules I am sure Alberta and Saskatchewan would adopt them; as a matter of fact they would have to adopt them. If the minister would look into this point I think he would see where many of our objections could be met.

Mr. GARDINER: In the short experience I have had in the department, I did take into consideration, at the request of British Columbia, the change that has been suggested by the hon. member; but I found very quickly, after attempting to make that suggestion to the other provinces, that the pressure is coming not from Ottawa but from those provinces; that is, they absolutely refuse to be governed by any other regulations than those to which they now conform and which they regard as proper regulations. I still have some doubt as to whether exactly the same rules should govern in all cases in view of the differing conditions. Saskatchewan is a province where most of the poultry producers are also farmers in a rather large way, and their problem is perhaps somewhat different from that of the man who makes his whole livelihood out of the production of poultry. To begin with, they have smaller flocks and it is probably not a matter of great expense to them to have the test made that is now being carried out. On the other side of the question, however, I am informed by those who have knowledge of the subject that the quick test is only approximately forty per cent effective. This test was known at the time the other one was accepted, and it was known at that time to be only approximately forty per cent effective. Of course, it is the desire of the department as far as possible to eliminate disease, and we take the most effective means to that end. Consideration might be given to some changes in the regulations as we gain further experience, by segregating hens in such a manner as to make the test effective, but up to date we have nothing more effective than we are now doing.

Mr. SENN: I agree with the minister heartily as to the desirability of having baby chicks hatched from eggs coming from blood-tested flocks, for it is very desirable indeed that disease should be stamped out as quickly as possible. But there is another question in this connection that seems to me to be of great importance to the poultry industry. Under the terms of the trade agreement now in effect between Canada and the United States, the hatcheries of Canada will be subject beyond question to very severe competition with chicks coming from that country. I do not know how the department is going to see to it that chicks coming from the United States come from blood-tested flocks. I should be glad if he would explain how that will be done, or why the people of the different provinces in Canada should be subjected to this way of doing things while eggs and particularly chicks are allowed to come from the United States without undergoing that inspection and supervision.

Mr. GARDINER: I can only say that we are governed more or less by the action of the provinces. For example, in the provinces I have mentioned, where these regulations have been adopted, it is a comparatively simple matter to make arrangements at ports of entry for a check to be made on the hatcheries from which chicks come, and with regard to the regulations governing them in the United States. But in a province which has not come under these regulations it is more difficult to control the situation, as one can understand. As regards the other question, under the tariff arrangements as they were before, I think the set price from the United States, upon which the tariff was based, was about 30 cents a chick. Of course, the price of a chick in the United States is around 5 cents, while on this side it is 8, 10 or 12 cents, and it can be readily seen that a set price of 30 cents would be prohibitive. In connection with the trade agreement, under the intermediate tariff, the duty on a chick coming across the line is about 5 cents.

Mr. SENN: Is that settled yet?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I beg your pardon; there is an ad valorem of 17 per cent based on the price, which probably in some instances, on the lower priced chicks, would figure out at a little lower than one cent a chick. Chicks would come across the line under that arrangement much more freely than they did under the previous system, but the request that has been made by the hatchery people is that a definite duty of so much per chick be imposed, and the rate suggested is very much lower than that proposed before. The house is not bound, even if the trade agreement is accepted, to abide by the present rate; we have the power to raise the duty or to do whatever we wish to do in connection with it. That, however, is a matter which I cannot discuss this afternoon; it is something that will have to be discussed when the budget is down. Representations have been made by the hatchery people to have a change of rate on chicks from the United States.

Mr. LENNARD: Has the department considered making it compulsory to grade farm products packed for export and, if approved, to have them so marked?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know how far afield I am allowed to go under the rules in discussing this item. That is a matter entirely outside the items we are now considering, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would let it stand until a more appropriate time.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I thank the minister and those hon. members who have spoken with regard to the poultry question for the excellent information which has been given the committee and recorded in Hansard. This is a matter that closely affects my own constituents in Nanaimo. I am pleased that I shall be able to pass on to them from the proceedings in this committee much valuable information.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I supplement the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) with reference to the question of inspection. I do not think that any direct answer has been given by the minister. It was my privilege a short time ago to go through one of the packing houses in Toronto and I observed then that a great many carcasses were being rejected on account of tuberculosis. My hon. friend has referred to cooperation between the federal and provincial departments. As regards carcasses that are stamped as completely affected by tuberculosis, does the minister feel sure that the provincial department of health is cooperating to the extent of preventing these carcasses from reaching the hamburger and hot dog stands or finding their way into the canned goods sold in Ontario and throughout the dominion?

Mr. GARDINER: Replying first to the last question, I can assure the hon. gentleman that carcasses condemned by the dominion inspectors go into the tank immediately, under the supervision of the officials of the department. In connection with the other matter brought up by the hon. member for Broadview, and which has been referred to by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), I would point out that under the British North America Act the matter of health comes within provincial jurisdiction. We have really very little legal control in that regard. The department, however, has always assumed that one of its main duties is to see to it as far as possible that commodities produced in this country can be sold abroad. For that reason we have attempted in the first place to keep our live stock particularly clear of disease, because other countries will not admit that live stock if disease is prevalent here. The same idea has followed into the matter of killing and the inspecting of abattoirs where meat is killed, and in the matter of canning and all that sort of thing. As a matter of choice, most of the abattoirs in Canada do require inspection by the department. The department make that inspection; they pass the meats that go out from the abattoirs, and municipalities and provinces alike have the benefit of that inspection. But when it comes to a matter of enforcing the law in that regard, it is in a little different field, and in some cases we are not in a position to act as suggested by the hon. member for Broadview. There are certain things that probably we could not do, that we would have to leave to the municipalities and the provinces, because we have not the authority to enforce. But we have followed the practice of going just as far as we can possibly go in cooperating with municipalities. Probably I should put it the other way round: we have been going as far as the constitution, the laws and regulations of the provinces and municipalities themselves, and the cooperation of abattoirs and people interested in marketing their meats will go, in order to try to enforce all over Canada the same kind of regulation in connection with the marketing of these products. I think probably the best answer I can give as to whether or not we have that cooperation is the fact that the great percentage of the meat that is going out from these abattoirs is government inspected. That would indicate that municipal bodies, provincial governments and the abattoirs themselves are inviting cooperation from the federal government in seeing to it that any meats that are sold to the public are meats that are fit for human consumption.

Mr. LOCKHART: That covers the matter of carcasses that are going out for consumption over the retail counter. But is the minister sure they do not go into canned products and things of that kind? That was the point I was more concerned about.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, that would not be possible in any of the plants where inspection is carried out by the federal government. With regard to some others, it may be.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not a fact that in the inspected abattoirs, for example, when hogs are slaughtered and there is found to be disease in the heads of the hogs, the heads alone are condemned and the carcasses are sold for human consumption.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; with regard to certain diseases, where local infection takes place, that would be true.

Mr. SENN: Are the same standards of health required for meat that goes into cans as for meat sold by the carcass? May I point out that canned meats were imported into this country last year equivalent, I believe, to some twenty thousand head of cattle. What supervision and inspection, if any, are undertaken when that class of goods comes into the country?

Mr. GARDINER: Official certificates are supplied from the governments of those countries, just as we have to supply official certificates from this country to other countries. We get the same kind of official certificate as others require of us, which gives just as good security as we can possibly have in respect of these countries.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not also a fact that if farmers bring into these inspected areas carcasses that are in any particular diseased, the whole of the carcass is destroyed? Why should not the government enforce the regulations upon the big packers as well as upon the farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: May I get the intent of the hon. member's question? Has it to do with carcasses brought in?

Mr. COLDWELL: Carcasses slaughtered on the farms, say, and brought in for consumption in an area where there is inspection.

Mr. GARDINER: They are under exactly the same regulations as the abattoirs.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not see just how that can be. If part of the carcass is diseased the whole of it is destroyed should it come from the farm into the city. I believe that to be the case from my own association with a municipal body where we went into this problem very carefully. One of the reasons why we did not adopt meat inspection was just exactly the one to which I have referred. If the animal is slaughtered in the abattoir, then, in the case of certain diseases, only the part of the carcass affected is destroyed. I wonder if the government has considered the making of regulations to ensure equality to all concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that the regulations in so far as they are applied here are the same. Of course there may be regulations in towns and cities or provinces that I cannot speak of from this place at the moment.

Mr. WILTON: What is the official disposition of a condemned or diseased carcass? The minister made the remark a moment ago that it went into the tank. I am not sure, and many who are not familiar with the butcher business do not know, just what that means. Is it put in there to purify it before it is sold? The thing I am particularly interested in is the final disposition of a condemned carcass.

Mr. GARDINER: It is put into tanks and rendered, and as I understand it, it is not used for human consumption. Most of it goes for fertilizer.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. DOUGLAS: I asked the minister a question a short time ago, and I want to pursue it because of the two questions that have been asked. In replying to the questions the minister dealt with meat going over the retail counter and meat going into cans, but what about cattle that have been condemned for dairy purposes and a strong suspicion remains in the mind of the government veterinary that it has been butchered and peddled through the town? Of course he has no authority to act, but is there any way by which the matter can be reported to the provincial and municipal authorities and be taken care of? I know of government men who have strongly suspected that that was going on, but it is not within their jurisdiction to do anything about it.

Mr. GARDINER: Provincial and municipal.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I was wondering if the machinery set up could be correlated so that that could be taken care of. It is not the function of the man in charge, and yet it is a tremendous menace to the public health.

Mr. LEADER: Before this item carries I would like to ask the minister a question that has often been asked of me. Is it the intention of the government to investigate the prevalence of Bang's disease? Following that up, is it their intention to carry out tests, and if the cattle are found diseased, to slaughter them, and will the owners of the slaughtered animals be compensated as in the case of tuberculosis?

Mr. GARDINER: The department has been investigating the spread of Bang's disease and has been doing a good deal in order to check its spread among cattle. As a matter of fact as I understand it we would be compelled to do so, whether we desired to or not, because of regulations particularly in the United States with regard to the export of cattle. All the cattle that are shipped to the United States for dairy purposes have to be tested for Bang's disease, and they are tested by the government here in order to prevent infected stock going to that country, which in the end might affect our trade with the United States.

So far as the question of destroying the animals is concerned, I do not think there is any regulation at the present time requiring that this should be done. There is a regulation which requires the marking of animals which have been tested and are found to have Bang's disease, in order to safeguard those who may purchase breeding stock, so that they may be protected against purchasing an animal that has this disease. So far, however, no provision has been made for paying for any animals destroyed, and I think I am right in saying that there is no regulation which compels the destruction of these animals.

Mr. LEADER: I believe the minister is right, but the day may come when the government will have to do something in regard to this disease. From my experience, in some states not only dairy cattle but beef cattle as well must be tested for this disease. I ship cattle to the United States, and I always have my cattle tested for this disease. When the time comes that the government must undertake work of this nature and compel a test, I think for the protection of the live stock industry of this country and also for the protection of the human race, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) pointed out to-day, animals found to be suffering from this disease should be slaughtered and the owners should receive compensation.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to direct a question to the minister with regard to something he said early in the consideration of the estimates this afternoon with reference to a proposed tuberculosis free area around the city of Toronto, including the county of Peel. I do not wish to embarrass the minister by asking a question which he may not be able to answer at the moment, but I should like his undertaking that he will let me know what progress has been made towards bringing the county of Peel, which I represent, within that area.

Mr. GARDINER: It is already established in that district. The counties covered are Halton, Peel, York, Ontario, Durham and Northumberland, and I understand that the tests are starting this week.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask another question. Is any provision made for assistance to veterinary surgeons who are working on these problems in the dried out and drought areas? I have in mind men who gave a great deal of service in connection with the new disease in horses last year. They covered hundreds of miles, and I know they found it very difficult indeed to get payment from the farmers who had been afflicted with drought, grasshoppers, and so on. I wondered if the department had anything in its estimates this year which would enable something to be done for veterinarians, just as some of the provinces and municipalities have done something for the medical men. After all this is a dominion matter, concerning the health of animals, and some provision might be made here.

Mr. GARDINER: There is an amount of $45,000 in the estimates for part time veterinary services across Canada, but of course the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will understand that there would not be a very considerable portion of that amount to be applied to the area he has in mind. From time to time I have received communications from veterinarians and others in that district indicating that the farmers are unable to pay the veterinarians anything for their services. Some of these veterinarians have been maintaining themselves with difficulty for four or five years, but have continued to render their services. The municipalities, the provincial government and to a certain small extent this government, have been cooperating in attempting to maintain some of these services, but the number that could be helped would be very limited.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the amount greater or less than in former years, or the same?

Mr. GARDINER: It is about the same as last year. Of course the provision that is made for medical men, that was mentioned a moment ago, is not under any regular vote of any department of government either here or in Saskatchewan. That is under the relief program, for which moneys were provided by this parliament, but those moneys were distributed largely by the provincial government and the municipalities.

Mr. THOMPSON: I understood the minister to say a moment ago that the diseased carcasses went to the tank and were largely used for fertilizer. I should like to ask if it is not a fact that when cattle are inspected and found to have tuberculosis, tickets are put in their ears marked "T.B." and they may be sold to drovers and go into the market and be used for human food.

Mr. GARDINER: The animals that are tested and found to be reactors in any of these areas or under any of the schemes of which I have been speaking go to the abattoirs under a licence which keeps them under the control of the department. When the animal is killed it is just possible it may be found that the disease does not exist at all in a form that will affect human beings, and that animal may not be condemned in the same sense as animals found to be full of the disease. After the animal is actually killed and examined by those competent to examine it, it may be found that the disease, if it was present at all, would not affect human beings by whom the meat might be consumed.

Mr. MacNICOL: The answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), as to just what happened to the carcasses that were marked "diseased" and sent to the tank, was hardly full enough for me. I have it in mind that the minister said the carcasses were rendered, which conveys the impression that lard was manufactured out of them, or greases of some kind. What is done with the products thus obtained?

Mr. GARDINER: All the condemned animals follow the course I indicated a few moments ago. If they are actually condemned they go into the tank and, as I understand it, every part of the animal follows the course I have indicated. It does not go into human consumption at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then when the minister made the statement a few moments ago that they were rendered, that really had no significance?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it has significance, but any greases that are there would not be used as human food.

Mr. MacNICOL: What would they be used for?

Mr. McCANN: How much of this estimate was appropriated for prevention of these diseases? It appears to me to be utter folly to continue from year to year to spend large amounts of money on contagious diseases among animals unless at the same time a positive effort is put forth to ascertain the causes of these diseases and discover some method of prevention. I should like to know also whether farmers are supplied with vaccines and other means of prevention free of cost.

Mr. GARDINER: I can only say this department does not handle vaccines for that purpose, but the provincial departments do. That is true at any rate as far as Saskatchewan is concerned; I am not so sure of other provinces. Saskatchewan has been distributing vaccines free for many years. That comes under the provinces. As to what we are doing to eradicate disease, the whole system of dividing the provinces into districts and killing the animals afflicted with disease is for that purpose.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Is it the intention of the government to impose regulations against Bang's disease similar to those the United States impose against our cattle, or is it now in operation?

Mr. GARDINER: We have done that.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the report of the auditor general for 1934-35 under these several items I notice that some $80,000 or $90,000 worth of motor cars were purchased for the department. Is there anything in this particular item for the purchase of motor cars?

Mr. GARDINER: In order to answer that question for the whole department I would have to go through all the branches. If it will suit the convenience of my hon. friend I will have that done for another day. For this particular branch there is $7,000 included.

Mr. MacNICOL: That answers my question with reference to this item. I see it was $85,000 for all in 1934-35; we have not as yet the figures for 1935-36. And now we are going to buy some motor cars again this year.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Referring back to the importation of breeding poultry, is it the intention of the department to impose similar regulations with reference to the importation of chicks to those with reference to other breeding stock? Personally I think it is of great economic importance to consider that very carefully in view of the recent trade agreement with the United States, realizing that many hatcheries, at least along the border in the different provinces, are fearful that they will be driven out of business under that trade agreement.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think the hon. member is in order in discussing anything in regard to the trade agreement under this item.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I submit to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I am certainly not discussing any trade agreement; I am only pointing out that the prospects are that the importation of chicks will be greatly increased, at lower cost than the cost of production in Canada, and that regulations should be imposed and strictly enforced that will give protection not only to the producers but also to those who buy the chicks. The matter is of national importance, and anyone who understands anything about the poultry business will agree, that only blood-tested chicks, as in the case of cattle, tested for Bang's disease should be admitted, because it is only by such careful inspection that any flocks are made profitable. It is of great economic importance to those in the poultry business in Canada that they be protected to that extent; it is just as important as protection against tuberculosis. Is it the intention of the minister to see that these regulations are put into effect?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the intention of the department to try to prevent disease of that kind being brought into Canada through the importation of chicks. As I explained a few moments ago it is rather difficult to carry our intention into effect in provinces that have not adopted wholly the regulations that this department would like to see them adopt.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Has Ontario adopted the regulations?

Mr. GARDINER: They have not adopted them, but they are considering the matter at the present time.

Mr. SENN: Could we have assurance from the minister that while Ontario and other provinces in which regulations are not adopted are making a serious attempt to stamp out pullorum, chicks will not be allowed to come into this country from the United States or elsewhere unless they are free from the disease?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that in order that we might be able to do that, a change in legislation would be required. If I understand the question it is that since we are controlling the coming in of live stock, such as dairy cattle, we should also control the coming in of chicks; that if we have the power to do the one we should be able to do the other.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): You have the power.

Mr. GARDINER: Under the present legislation the department has not the power to do that.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): This house surely has the power to control importation, and I suggest it is ridiculous if we do not impose such restrictions on the importation of what, I repeat, promises to be the greatest number of chicks we have ever had coming into the Dominion of Canada in any one season.

Mr. MUTCH: How many veterinary surgeons are temporarily employed in connection with the health of animals branch in Manitoba, and what has been the length of their term of temporary employment?

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. gentleman will put that question on the order paper, I will get the information for him.

Mr. STEWART: I am interested in the activities of the department in connection with bovine tuberculosis. I understand that certain areas have been established in which the disease has to a large extent been eradicated. One such area I have in mind is the eastern part of Ontario, from the Quebec border to the Rideau river, and I understand that the county of Prince Edward is another. I should like to know what areas in Ontario have been established and treated in that way for the purpose of eradicating tuberculosis.

Mr. GARDINER: The list I have before me is not complete. It covers the areas in which the disease has been reduced below one-half of one per cent of those tested: Carleton county, townships of Gloucester and Osgoode; Glengarry county, Leeds county, Prince Edward county and Russell county. I shall be glad to have a complete list before another meeting of the committee.

Mr. STEWART: I should also like to know the compensation allowed to owners of cattle in such areas, the amount allowed for a pure bred animal and for grade animals, and whether the compensation is fixed by statute or by order in council.

Mr. GARDINER: The compensation is fixed by statute, the maximum being $100 in the case of a pure bred animal, and $40 for a grade animal.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not know whether they are true, but representations have been made to me regarding the effect of the present regulations in connection with Bang's disease. In districts in which it is felt that the disease may exist, the farmers get their cattle tested, and if animals are found to be suffering from the disease they are tagged. Then there is a tendency, it is said, for these farmers immediately to try to get rid of such an animal, with the result that the disease is spread more widely than it otherwise would be. It is also said that this attitude follows when an animal is tagged: The farmers say, "This animal has been tested for Bang's disease." They see it is tagged and nothing is done in regard to it, so they conclude that it is now free from the disease, when exactly the reverse is the case. Does that correctly represent the situation, and, if so, is any attention being paid to it by the minister?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not quite clear whether the hon. member for Rosthern is speaking of all herds that may be tested by any authority. Of course an individual may test his own herd, but if the testing is carried out under any of the schemes which I have outlined and for which this department is responsible, animals are tagged and in the case of tuberculosis are followed through by the department, and compensation is paid in respect of these animals. There is just a possibility that some people may have their animals tested without making the fact generally known to the public, and then dispose of animals reacting to the test, but that would not happen under any of the schemes for which this department assumes responsibility.

Mr. SENN: I was very much interested in the statement the minister made a moment ago that in restricted areas only one-half of one per cent of the cattle are found to be still suffering from tuberculosis. There are, however, throughout Ontario and other parts of the dominion several accredited herds which have been under that scheme for some length of time, and I would ask whether the same percentage prevails in accredited herds as in restricted areas.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the same percentage would prevail in pure bred herds anywhere within the restricted area.

Mr. SENN: But there are accredited herds outside the restricted area.

Mr. GARDINER: In fully accredited herds there are 7,225 cattle free from the disease; under process of accreditation, 1,384; not tested, 114.

Mr. SENN: It comes within my knowledge that herds that have been free from tuberculosis for some length of time under the accredited herd system have been found to be again infected when the annual test is made. Could the minister give us any figures showing the number of accredited herds that have been re-infected?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that about twelve percent of the herds that are accredited afterwards fall down under our test.

Mr. SENN: And they lose their certificate?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and the process starts over again.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Has the appropriation for free tuberculin tests been increased or decreased?

Mr. GARDINER: It is just about the same.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Does the minister think it will be sufficient adequately to take care of the applications for testing that are likely to be made on the basis of last year's figures?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, as the Minister of Finance explained to the house the other day, these are the general votes which are considered to be sufficient to carry on the usual, general activities of the department, but if it is found advisable—and a decision has not yet been made upon this point to go on with this work more rapidly than the present vote would provide for, additional funds would have to be provided in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. RICKARD: Do the farmers get a bonus from the government for all cattle that react?

Mr. GARDINER: The owner of the animal is compensated to the extent of two-thirds of its value, the maximum value of grade cattle being $60, making the maximum compensation $40, and the maximum valuation of pure bred stock being $150, making the maximum compensation $100. That is the compensation for stock that is destroyed as a result of the test.

Mr. RICKARD: Does that apply in the tuberculosis tested areas as well as in the accredited herds?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: The minister was kind enough to give at the outset the figures in detail of this vote, but he read them rather rapidly and I was unable to get them all down. Would he give the committee the reason for the increase of $12,000 odd in the total vote?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a decrease in some sections and an increase in others, bringing the net increase to approximately $12,000. There have been increases in equipment and maintenance, $3,000; personal services, part of which is accounted for by annual salary increases, $28,927; special personal services, $100; rents, $220; supplies, materials, printing and stationery, $3,000; transportation, $300. That makes an increase of $35,547, but against that there are decreases as follows: compensation, $6,063; lands, buildings and maintenance, $10,000; transportation and travelling expenses, $7,000, or a total decrease of $23,063, making a net increase of $12,484.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What is included in personal services, $28,000?

Mr. GARDINER: That is for all the staffs in this particular branch.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): I notice that the item for personal services is increased by $28,000, yet transportation is decreased by $7,000. I assume the increase is in the number employed.

Mr. GARDINER: Not altogether. Some of it is caused by statutory increases.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): Has the minister the number of employees for each year?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not that information for the branch as a whole; it is given only by divisions. If the hon. member would place a question on the order paper I should be pleased to give that information, or perhaps it could be given at the next sitting.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Could the minister give us any information by provinces as to the prevalence of contagious diseases of animals? At the same time he might give the amount paid to each province by way of indemnity for losses from tuberculosis.

Mr. GARDINER: I could not give that information offhand. If the hon. member will make a motion for the necessary papers I shall be glad to furnish them. It will take some time to compile this information.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I think this information is important. We could let this item stand and take up the next.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to know whether arrangements are being made in New Brunswick for retesting, and whether compensation is to be paid in the event of reactors being found?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that this will depend upon conditions found when the first test is made or when succeeding tests are made. When the disease is reduced to about one-half of one per cent of reactors, no retest is made for a period of three years. When the percentage is considerably larger, retests are made more often.

Mr. BROOKS: Is the same compensation paid to the farmer in the case of reactors?

Mr. GARDINER: The compensation in connection with every test is the same.

Mr. SENN: There seems to be some conflict between two statements made by the minister with regard to tuberculosis. He made the statement that in restricted areas the number of cattle affected was one-half of one per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: No. I gave certain information in connection with a group of counties in Ontario in which the number of diseased cattle had been reduced to that figure, but that was only after restricted area regulations had been in effect for some considerable time.

Mr. SENN: I understand that an unrestricted area becomes a restricted area just as soon as operations are commenced. I understood the minister to say that in accredited herds 12 per cent of the cattle would become reactors at some future time. Does that mean that the test is only 88 per cent perfect? To what degree does the minister consider these tests approach perfection?

Mr. GARDINER: An accredited herd belonging to one farmer may be subject to contamination from herds round about, but when you have an area comprising several counties, an accredited herd in the middle of that area is much better protected. The proportion of reactors in accredited herds taken right across Canada is much higher than in the case of protected areas.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister say that this test is 100 per cent perfect?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not an authority on these matters, but those who are tell me that no test is 100 per cent perfect.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I think this item should stand until the minister can give us the information requested. In the meantime we could go on with another item.

Mr. WALSH: Are the inspectors appointed under the Meat and Canned Foods Act under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. GARDINER: They are under the Civil Service Act. I have the figures asked for by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). The total for 1936-37 is estimated at 534 permanent employees while the total for 1935-36 was 492. In the case of temporaries, for 1936-37 the total is estimated at 188 and for 1935-36 it was 215. The temporary staff is down 27 while the permanent staff is up 42.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): What is the reason for the increased number? What extra services are to be performed?

Mr. GARDINER: One reason would be the matter which we have just been discussing, namely, the extension of the district in New Brunswick from a fraction of the province to the whole of it. This will require an extra service. The same thing will be true of the large district which is being added in Ontario. Additional abattoirs are coming under departmental inspection. These additional services require the employment of additional staff.

Mr. SENN: I think the minister told us that the amount set aside for indemnities was $6,000 less than for the previous year. If additional officials are to be employed in connection with additional restricted areas, how does the minister propose to pay for the cattle which cannot pass the test?

Mr. GARDINER: In answering my hon. friend, I think I can repeat the answer I gave, I believe it was to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). Our hope is that in connection with this matter we may be able to go much further than these estimates would indicate. If we can go only half way through the season we shall have to let part of these staffs go; if we can secure additional money to permit our going right through the season, we can carry these staffs right through the year. Of course this money would have to be voted in the supplementaries. We are making provision to carry these staffs, but if it is found impossible to do the work, then naturally we shall have to cut down on it.

Mr. SENN: In former years the amount voted for this particular matter has been absorbed before the end of the fiscal year and proceedings have had to stop, and in some instances farmers who had cattle slaughtered were not indemnified until the new vote was brought in. That was rather an injustice which the minister should take into consideration.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Do I understand that where an animal has reacted but the carcass has not been condemned, the owner is allowed to sell the carcass for what he can get and is given full compensation in addition?

Mr. GARDINER: I did not quite hear the question, but I believe the hon. gentleman wishes to know what happens in connection with compensation, and how much an owner is able to get if the animal is slaughtered. Compensation is paid and the owner is allowed to dispose of the animal at the abattoir for whatever it will bring; but it is disposed of under the supervision of our officials, the department being thereby assured that in connection with the matter nothing is done that may result in the owner obtaining money to which he is not entitled.

Mr. RYAN: What work is being done by the temporary employees?

Mr. GARDINER: In the great majority of instances this is not a matter of temporary work; the employees are still classified as temporary, and eventually some will become permanent. There may be a few of them who are doing temporary work, but some of these people classified as temporary employees have been on the staff for years.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): How does the minister hope to increase the service, how does he hope to increase inspection and take in new areas, adding 42 to the permanent staff, while reducing their transportation by $7,000 and reducing by $6,000 compensation for the reactors they inspect?

Mr. GARDINER: My information is that in connection with transportation, certain economies are possible which the department hopes to be able to make this year; and it will be easy, of course, in a service that requires the expenditure of some $423,000, to effect a saving of $7,000 in operating cost. That should not be difficult if the service is given proper supervision.

Mr. STIRLING: Do the owners of cattle that are tested pay fees for the service?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. RYAN: How many employees in New Brunswick are working in a temporary capacity, not under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot give that information offhand but I could probably secure it.

Mr. WALSH: Are there any regulations with respect to these temporary employees? In my own district there are some temporary employees who have been acting as inspectors for at least two or three years. Are there governing the conditions of their temporary employment, any regulations which prevent them from becoming permanent employees of the department?

Mr. GARDINER: As hon. members know, I am more or less new in the administration of a department at Ottawa. I have been accustomed to administering a department in which there is a definite line of demarcation; there comes a time when it is necessary for the government to consider whether they will keep certain persons on the staff or make them permanent. I find, however, that there is no such regulation here. I am told that it is difficult to establish a regulation of that kind in a service so extensive as the federal service. Departments depend to a large extent upon recommendations from the civil service commission.

Mr. RYAN: Will the minister also give me the number of temporary employees in New Brunswick, where they are working, and the names?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member might put that question on the order paper if he wants all that information.

Mr. STEWART: I understood the minister to say that if the owner of a herd of cattle desires to have it established as accredited he must have five head of pure bred cattle in the herd; then the herd is tested and, if it is found free from tuberculosis, the owner receives a certificate that the herd is accredited. Is any compensation paid to the applicant for such a certificate for any cattle that may be destroyed in his herd?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the same compensation as in all other cases.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): If the minister cannot give the information I have asked for, he might allow the item to stand.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be absolutely impossible to bring down in committee the information requested by the hon. gentleman. If he will put a motion on the order paper I shall be more than pleased to submit all the information he asks for, but I am informed by the officials that it would take days to compile it.

Mr. WALSH: I understand that in the various packing houses and abattoirs there are two classes of inspectors, one a qualified veterinary and the other a lay inspector. Does the lay inspector come under the civil service commission or is he appointed by the minister?

Mr. GARDINER: The lay inspector as well as the veterinarian come under the civil service commission.

Mr. BARBER: Do all veterinary surgeons in charge of these tests belong to the permanent service? In British Columbia how many under this item are there in the permanent service of the department?

Mr. GARDINER: They are all in the regular service, but they may be classed as either permanent or temporary in accordance with what I said a moment ago.

Mr. BARBER: How many are there in the permanent service in British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: The full number of the field full time service in British Columbia is ten.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do I understand the minister to say that all the veterinaries who perform these tests are members of the permanent staff under the civil service commission?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I am informed that all the men, even part time men, are under the civil service commission.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the part time men are often the local veterinary surgeons, are they not?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, quite often.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope that if the temporary staff is to be reduced and the permanent staff increased, many of the local veterinaries who have been enabled to keep going by the assistance of the government in this way will not be replaced by new men; that if anything is to be done they will have first consideration.

Mr. SENN: The minister was kind enough a little while ago to give us the number of accredited herds that come under this branch of the department at the present time. There is also what is known as the supervised herd plan. Will the minister tell us how many supervised herds there are in the dominion; also how often those herds are inspected, and if possible the figures showing the number of herds that have been supervised and found free, and later found to have reacted?

Mr. GARDINER: I will give all the information that is before me; I think it covers most of the points raised. Herds tested, 44,450; herds awaiting test, 2,992; total, 47,442. That includes all the provinces. Then the record of testing: Cattle tested for the first time, 122,149; total tests made, 255,123; number of reactors, 1935-36, 3,249; reactors slaughtered, 3,238. That covers the supervised herd plan.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Civil government—Salaries and contingencies, $647,209.20.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain the reason for the increase of four in the number of employees?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The increases are almost entirely due to statutory increases in salaries.

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand the minister to say that an additional chief clerk was required due to an increase in statutory requirements?

Mr. EULER: The item is in connection with chief clerk Davidson, who went to the wheat board. The position was reclassified later on. That is why the item still appears in these estimates.

Mr. STIRLING: As indicated on page 102 of the estimates there is an increase of one clerk, one stenographer—there are three more employees to account for, because there is a total increase of four.

Mr. EULER: There is a reduction of one clerk grade 1. There is an increase of one stenographer, grade 2, from 28 to 29. There is an increase of one clerk, grade 2, from 45 to 46. I think those are all the increases. There is only a net increase of one on that page, if I read it correctly.

Mr. DUNNING: The total of four is for the whole staff.

Mr. EULER: For the whole staff, yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: I see there is one man, director of trade routes and steamship subsidies, who draws $4,260. Who is he and what does he do?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Bawden. He looks after subsidized steamship services.

Mr. DONNELLY: To see that the steamships get government subsidies, or what?

Mr. EULER: To see that they do not get any more than they are entitled to, for one thing. Supervision over the service, to see that the steamship companies carry out the contracts properly. He has been on the staff for twenty years. Subsidies have been in effect for a good many years in this country, perhaps unfortunately.

Mr. REID: There is an increase of $100,000 for the Canada-New Zealand service. Would the minister be good enough to explain that increase and tell the committee when these subsidies expire and when new contracts must be signed?

Mr. EULER: This is a one year contract, and it constitutes practically the only increase in subsidies. It is a service carried on by the Canadian-Australian line of which the Canadian Pacific railway is half owner. I think the Union Steamship Company owns the other half. This company has very strong competition from heavily subsidized United States lines, and representations were made to the department that in all probability the service would have to be discontinued unless the subsidy was increased. I think it is the intention of the company next year to provide new steamers on this service, when possibly they will apply for a further increase. In view of the importance of the trade that we have with New Zealand it was thought necessary to make sure that the service would be continued. I admit to the committee at once that it is not very much to my own liking to make any increase. In some cases decreases have been made, which have been emphatically protested against. In this case, however, we thought the increase was justified because of the tremendous competition to which this company is being subjected and more particularly because of the importance of the trade carried on between Canada and New Zealand.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there not also pretty severe competition with regard to the China service, where there is a reduction of $149,000?

Mr. EULER: There is competition, yes; I must admit it. To be quite frank, the reduction occurs in that subsidy because of the desire to decrease the expenditures of the government all along the line wherever possible: We have been saying and many people have demanded, although not everyone agrees with this, that we ought to make some attempt to balance our budget, and I think about the only way that can be done, unless it is desired to increase taxation, is by decreasing expenditures. This particular decrease was made for that reason.

Mr. STIRLING: What company has this service?

Mr. EULER: The Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. STIRLING: The China service also?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When representations are made seeking an increase, may I ask what statement is required from the company? Does the department receive an itemized statement as to the cost of the service, and so on?

Mr. EULER: Yes; we ask for and receive the financial statement covering the operations of the previous year, showing what their loss or profit may have been. In all cases, I may say, in connection with these larger services quite heavy losses have been shown, especially after allowing for depreciation. As far as depreciation is concerned, one has to use one's judgment as to whether the amount estimated for depreciation is correct and whether the loss as shown is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Lloyd's settle that for ships under their classification at four per cent per annum.

Mr. EULER: Nearly all these services show losses after allowing for depreciation. Practically all these services, the Atlantic service, the China service, the New Zealand service and others, carry mail, and if we did not grant a subsidy we would have to pay them a certain amount through the Post Office Department. I should be better pleased if the Post Office Department rather than the Department of Trade and Commerce had to pay for this, but in any case there would be some expense for carrying the mails, though the expense would not be as great as the amount of the subsidies.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask the minister how many ships this company has in operation, what is the size of the ships and how frequently they sail between Canada and New Zealand.

Mr. EULER: The New Zealand service has two ships, the Niagara and the Aorangi, sailing every four weeks.

Mr. COLDWELL: How large are these ships?

Mr. EULER: The gross tonnage of the Aorangi is 17,491 tons and of the Niagara, 13,444 tons.

Mr. PELLETIER: They both belong to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are they of Canadian register?

Mr. EULER: No; they are registered in London, England.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before any subsidy was granted, was any investigation or any report required by the government as to wages and working conditions on these ships?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I must tell my hon. friend that there is no such specification in the contract and, so far as I know, there has been none. We might be able to insert something of that kind in future, but as yet there has been no stipulation with regard to wages.

Mr. MacINNIS: I raised this question several years ago with a former Minister of Trade and Commerce, and on one occasion it was stated that the matter would be looked into. It is very important that when this government grants a subsidy or any other assistance to a private institution, some stipulation should be made as to wages and working conditions involved, just as is done in contracts for public works.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to follow that up with another suggestion. This subsidy is fairly heavy, and it seems to me that the department might inquire into the kind of labour that is used on these ships, inquire into the conditions as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver East and inquire whether British subjects benefit from these subsidies in the receipt of wages and salaries. That is an important point. We are paying these subsidies and we should endeavour to see exactly how the money is spent, and what the working conditions are.

Mr. MARTIN: Does the subsidy for the service between British Columbia and South Africa apply to travel both ways? That is to say, does it apply in the case of travel from South Africa to Canada?

Mr. EULER: It applies only one way. This is a three year contract not yet expired.

Mr. MARTIN: Am I to understand that it applies only to travel from Canada to South Africa?

Mr. EULER: Yes; the boats return by way of India, I understand. There is no subsidy for that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Regarding working conditions and wages, we have had this matter up from year to year, and from time to time we are informed that it will be looked into. I do not think that is good enough. We have the Canadian Pacific Steamships on the west coast operating a number of boats manned by Chinese crews instead of by Canadians. I have nothing in particular against the Chinese if they are paid reasonable wages, but the Chinese are employed because they work more cheaply than do Canadians.

Furthermore the complaint is made to me again and again that when these ships need repairs, instead of their being repaired in the dry dock at Vancouver the repair parts are frequently put on board the ship and taken to China and the work is done in China. I do not see why we should give these huge subsidies to ships of British register, manned almost entirely by English officers although again I have no objection to Englishmen; but what is more serious than all is having people of other nationalities working at a very low wage. Just as we recognize that there should be a fair wage clause in contracts for public works, so surely there should be as a condition of any subsidy a provision for fair wages and labour conditions, and I think we should have some assurance from the minister that there will be.

Mr. REID: I hope the minister will not take all the remarks of the last speaker very seriously, because I strongly object, even if Chinamen were being paid the same wages, to hiring Chinamen from Hongkong. I have a resolution on the order paper for discussion later, but I do object to hiring men from foreign countries for Canadian or British ships.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the hon. member for New Westminster will back me up in insisting that we should have control over conditions of labour on board these boats.

Mr. REID: Yes, I will.

Mr. JACOBS: How can he back you up when he says you are not to be taken seriously?

Mr. EULER: I suppose the subsidy is given on the basis of service rendered. Perhaps the government in giving Canadian money to these steamship people should have something to say in regard to the wages paid. Of course this is a factor; if we did insist on this point, these ships would not employ Canadians, because they are not ships of Canadian registry. And if it were insisted upon that Canadians be employed undoubtedly the operating expenses would be much greater and doubtless a higher subsidy would be demanded, and would be justified. So we enter the field of what is the right and proper thing to do, whether the government of Canada should constitute itself the guardian of wages generally. I am not prepared to say as to that. There is something in what my hon. friends say, that we should insist that higher wages be paid and that white labour be employed, but I am credibly informed that it is practically impossible to obtain all white labour in the service of these vessels. Oriental labour could not be replaced by white labour without greatly increased expense, and I am told that it is absolutely impossible to obtain white labour to do some of the work on these vessels. I am perhaps not as familiar with this as I might be, but I shall be glad to look into it again. I cannot give any undertaking at the moment that I would be disposed to hold up the subsidy if these boats did not accede in every respect to the request that my hon. friends are making. I say that with all respect to their opinion.

Mr. KINLEY: I quite agree with the sentiment expressed by the hon. member from British Columbia. This is a vital question in Nova Scotia as well. Any government in paying a steamship subsidy should protect its own nationals. We should protect our seamen upon the sea; other countries are doing this. We are subject to competition which as a young country we cannot face. Perhaps the Merchant Shipping Act is more to blame than is the Department of Trade and Commerce; that question will come up later. But I want to assure the hon. gentlemen that I shall be behind them in every effort to protect the interests of our Canadian seamen.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which I have introduced and which is before the house this evening has been brought before the house by myself for the fifth time, I believe, since 1930. Having on previous occasions gone very fully into all aspects of the appeal which we in British Columbia have been making for equality in freight rates, it will perhaps not be necessary for me this evening to go as fully into the matter as I have done in former years. Nevertheless it might perhaps be well for me to mention some of the salient points connected with the fight which we in British Columbia are now and have been waging for many long years past.

It might not be amiss for me to say—and I do not believe I am over-optimistic—that we are expecting during the next four or five years some better results than we have had in our fight on this question from 1930 to 1935.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, let me assure you and the house, for the benefit of the new members particularly, that in the appeal which British Columbia is making through the medium of this bill we are not asking for any special consideration. The people of British Columbia are asking simply that they be granted that equality in the matter of freight rates which has existed in the other provinces since the railways first came into existence.

I would ask you, sir, and also hon. members, why it is that when grain is hauled from Calgary or Edmonton eastward it is designated simply as grain, and yet when similar grain leaves the prairie provinces and heads towards the Pacific coast the railway experts or the railway companies classify it as either grain for export or grain for domestic use. They are, in other words, actually saying to the shippers: Is this grain going to be consumed in British Columbia? Because if it is we are going to charge you twice the freight rate that we charge the people of Japan or Great Britain for transporting similar or better grain. That, in fact, is what the railways are saying to shippers and users of grain, and they have persisted in saying it for many, many years.

Now this differentiation and inequality cannot be based upon the ground that it costs more to haul grain into British Columbia than it does to haul grain eastward either to the maritime provinces or to Fort William, for might I point out that the cost of hauling grain into British Columbia is not any greater. As a matter of fact, the actual evidence which was produced in the different appeals which have been heard on this question shows that there is no railway expert competent enough to tell exactly what it costs to haul one ton or one pound of grain.

Then again, there has been in the minds of many people that old story about the mountains; that due to the extra grades and extra engines required, and so forth, the people of British Columbia must necessarily pay a higher freight rate than do the people of the east. I shall not go into that question in detail, but I have before me records to show that not only were construction costs of the railways into British Columbia less than in other parts of the dominion, especially into Fort William, but maintenance and upkeep costs, pusher mileage and all that goes into railway operation are much less in British Columbia than in the eastern provinces. It cannot be too often repeated, that the Canadian National railway line into British Columbia has the lowest grade in the Dominion of Canada. I want to repeat that: The Canadian National railway line into British Columbia is the lowest grade of any in the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Mountain grade.

Mr. REID: Mountain grade or any other grade. I can give the grades if the right hon. leader of the opposition wants them. I can give the grades into Fort William. It is a low level water grade, and the question just interjected compels me to repeat what I have said because it would seem that not all members believe or fully realize the truth of the statement I have made. I repeat that we have into British Columbia over the Canadian National railway the lowest grade, mountain grade or prairie, in the Dominion of Canada.

I am now going to make the strong statement that the freight rate structure of Canada is antiquated and should be thrown overboard. The railway experts in my opinion are actually blocking the progress of this country by always raising the question of through rates, export rates and such like. They do not seem to realize that we are living in a day of progress with motor transport, and the people of this or any other country are not interested in these special arguments that experts bring forward. What the people of this dominion are primarily interested in is how much or how little it will cost them to transport their produce. It is service they are looking for to-day, and I want to repeat that in my opinion the railway experts are just blocking the progress of this country, and indeed, to the detriment of even the railways themselves.

I am glad that at the dominion-provincial conference the transport question was considered. True, it was not the railway problem which we have that was under discussion but the question of transport, and I was pleased to note in the bulletin which was placed in the hands of every member of the house the following recommendation with regard to the regulation of traffic:

> That the Minister of Transport arrange to collect information regarding rates prescribed or charged by public carriers of freight and passengers in the various provinces and rates charged by the railway companies and communicate such information to the provinces to the end that a fair and equitable basis may be arrived at for the establishing of uniform rates for highway transportation of passengers and freight.

I wonder how the Canadian people would feel if different rates existed in this country for hauling passengers over the same route or over routes of a like distance. Just to show how idiotic some of the freight rates charged are, I shall give the rates on only a few products. Take coal, eggs, butter, dressed poultry, fresh meats and canned goods hauled from Calgary or Edmonton into Vancouver or New Westminster. The rate on eggs from Edmonton to Vancouver is $1.10, but if a shipper wants to ship back those same eggs from Vancouver to Edmonton over the same route and by the same train, the cost of transport being no greater, he is charged $1.13. And the same is true with regard to butter. The rate from Edmonton to Vancouver is $1.37 per 100 pounds, but if you wanted to ship that back to Edmonton, oh, it would be just too bad, for the railways would say: We will charge you $1.49. And so on down the list. One could mention five hundred different commodities going over the same route and over a like distance where one rate is charged going to the coast and a higher rate coming back. These railway experts have a fine system. They will tell you that that is the through rate, or advance some other argument, and so we find ourselves blocked always by these so-called railway experts.

I shall give only one or two more instances because I have dealt with the matter very fully on previous occasions. I quite realize that this is not the place to make a complete new freight rate structure for this country; I admit that quite frankly. I quoted what I did with a view to bringing home to hon. members a realization of the idiotic, chaotic and archaic system which has been in existence in Canada for many years. I maintain that the continuance of such a system is blocking progress and is hindering trade. I warn the railroads, as I have warned them before, that if they do not wake up and get rid of some of these railroad experts they will find their rail traffic will have completely disappeared and gone into the hands of motor transport companies. The railroads should consider what has been done in other lands, particularly in Great Britain. In that country a great advance has been made during the past year in railway transportation, but here it seems that the railways are not inclined to make any progress. We have the same old system that was in existence in 1867. The people are now, however, demanding a service at a reasonable price and they are not interested in through rates and expert excuses or arguments.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If general freight rates cannot be discussed in the house, how can the hon. member contend that a particular matter can be brought before parliament and discussed regardless of the general freight rates structure?

Mr. REID: If I understand the hon. member rightly, he is asking whether it is right to discuss one particular freight rate when general freight rates should not be discussed. This I might say is a very particular rate and, besides, parliament has dealt with the question already. In 1897 the Crowsnest pass agreement was put into effect by parliament. This matter was taken up again in 1925 when parliament dealt with the hauling of grain and flour. While there may be something in the argument that this is not the place to discuss general freight rates, the fact remains that parliament dealt with this matter back in 1897 and affirmed it in 1925 when certain amendments and changes were made to the act. I think it is quite proper to bring up in the House of Commons a matter pertaining to the hauling of grain and grain products, a subject which has been dealt with by previous parliaments.

There are one or two points I should now like to make clear for the benefit of those new members who were not here when this argument was advanced previously. The distance from Calgary to Vancouver is 642 miles, while from Edmonton to Vancouver it is 776 miles. The railway board have, however, laid down the rule that freight rates must be computed on the same distance, although the Canadian Pacific railway have an advantage of over 134 miles. Grain leaving Edmonton or Calgary for export, say to Japan or China is carried the 642 miles for 20 cents per hundred pounds. The same grain is carried from the same points to Fort William, a distance of 1,242 miles, for 26 cents. If the grain routed westward is intended, however, for consumption within British Columbia, then the freight charges are quite a different story. Until some small change was made in the tariff arrangements we were called upon to pay, not 20 cents per hundred pounds but 41½ cents per hundred pounds. That is what we have to pay on our mill feed requirements which constitute 50 per cent of the needs of the poultry farmer or the dairyman.

I well remember when I introduced this bill for the first time. There were certain members from the maritime provinces who took the view that if British Columbia was given any concession they would have to rise in their places and demand some concessions for the maritimes. Let me say to the various members from the maritimes that if we had the same rates enjoyed by the maritime provinces I do not think they would hear much of a kick from us.

I should like to give one or two further instances of haulage distances and freight rates in an effort to show the injustice which British Columbia has suffered for many years. The distance from Fort William to Quebec is 1,142 miles and the rate is 18¾ cents per hundred pounds. Compare that with the 41½ cents paid for 642 miles from Edmonton and Calgary to the Pacific coast. The distance from Fort William to Halifax is 1,723 miles and grain is hauled this distance for only 26 cents per hundred pounds. Do the railways use cheaper labour, less coal or are their running expenses lower for hauling to the maritimes than they are for hauling to British Columbia? The fact is that the crews receive practically the same wages in both instances and other expenses are the same. As I have pointed out before, grades are lower over the Canadian National Railways into British Columbia and maintenance costs are less than is the case on many divisions around Montreal or Quebec or Fort William. The construction costs in the first instance were also much lower.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the domestic rate on western grain to the east?

Mr. REID: I believe the domestic rate is some 46 cents for the 1,723 miles, but we are paying 41½ cents for 642 miles.

Mr. RYAN: Is the hon. member comparing the home consumption rate with the export rate?

Mr. REID: There is just one rate from Fort William to Quebec, but there are two rates applying from Fort William to Halifax. The export rate is 26 cents while the domestic rate is 46 cents. The export rate to British Columbia is 20 cents as compared with 41½ cents, domestic. When I previously introduced this question the then Minister of Railways, Mr. Manion, had a great number of figures before him and he insisted upon comparing rates charged in Canada with those charged across the line in the United States. Apparently the railway experts had let him down on that occasion, because I pointed out then, as I am going to point out again, that rates from the wheat fields of Montana to the poultry and dairy districts of Washington are more reasonable than those from the prairie provinces to British Columbia. I would point out also that in the United States the grades are far heavier because of the lay of the land on the Pacific coast. The further south you go the higher are the mountains. Edmonton is 1,800 feet lower than Calgary and Seattle is about as much higher than Vancouver.

Let us now see what poultrymen in the state of Washington are getting in the way of rates. I intend to take distances almost comparable with those I have quoted already. The distance from Montana to Seattle is 732 miles and the rate is 30½ cents. Poultrymen and dairymen in the state of Washington are able to obtain their feed requirements much cheaper than we can in British Columbia. This afternoon we were discussing poultry. Let me point out this interesting fact, that the extra cost we are called upon to pay when we purchase grain for domestic purposes, as compared with that which our competitors have to pay, is equal to two cents on each dozen eggs. That is how it works out on the average per year per hen —I am taking 132 eggs yearly as the basis of my calculation. If we in British Columbia enjoyed the same rate as is accorded export grain, we should save at least two cents a dozen on our eggs.

Again, take Bozeman in Montana, a distance of 764 miles. Grain is hauled there for 31½ cents, a greater distance than in the case of grain coming from Edmonton and Calgary; and what is more, it is hauled over higher and steeper grades, because coast grades into the state of Washington are far greater than grades into British Columbia.

I have not, at this time, gone very deeply or at any great length into the question of freight rates as affecting grain and grain products. I could go quite fully into the subject, but I do not wish to weary the house; having introduced this bill for the fifth time, I do not want to be considered a nuisance by discussing the matter at great length on every occasion. As I have said, however, each time I have brought it in, I intend to keep at it until we in British Columbia obtain some measure of equality of treatment. I intend to keep up the fight, not from a personal point of view, but on behalf of our people in British Columbia who have been called upon to pay extra millions of dollars as compared with what people in other parts of the dominion pay, and rates they have enjoyed for many years.

The few remarks I have made with respect to comparative rates should bring home to every hon. member the idiotic system under which this country labours. The railways want trade, and they could build up trade if they went about the matter properly; but they will never build up trade unless the rates are better adjusted. Moreover, as time goes on, they will have to meet more serious competition on the part of the truck. I know that two years ago and last year trucks were hauling apples from Okanagan into Vancouver to the disadvantage of the railways, and as roads improve motor transport will certainly steal more traffic from the railways so long as they keep within the shell that surrounds them, sticking to the old system instead of meeting competition squarely or giving to the people service for the money paid out for transportation.

Let me say this to the new Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe). It would be well for him when investigating the railways to note that in the United States better consideration is given shippers of mixed cargoes, and manufacturers as well, than is given the people of this country in the matter of railway freight rates. Almost, if not quite, on every occasion that I have brought up this subject I have been told that this is a matter not for the House of Commons, but for the board of railway commissioners. Well, I have stated previously and I state again that British Columbia can never hope for justice from the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. HEAPS: Why?

Mr. REID: Why? I can tell you why; it is because the board is always, in the words of Edward Bellamy, looking backward. Every time we go before the board of railway commissioners with our plea for justice the statement is made—I have it under my hand—"Well, judgment was rendered on this question away back in 1917 and later and so we cannot alter that decision." How in the name of heaven can you overcome an attitude like that? I am not unmindful that the present interrupter would have liked to support the measure, but he was afraid that if freight rates were lowered the railway men might suffer a reduction in wages.

Mr. HEAPS: I have never made a remark of that kind. I am not, as the hon. member implies, objecting to a lowering of the freight rate structures, but I do object to parliament being a freight rate fixing body.

Mr. REID: Just the old, old story. This is an old story and I suppose it has to be told until it is taken in. The hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), in a speech this year, said that this was the court of the common people, the highest court in the land. Having found ourselves up against a stone wall in the shape of past judgments rendered by the board of railway commissioners, we now come into this house, the court of last resort, with the cry of the common people of British Columbia that steps be taken by this parliament and by this government to remove the injustice that was done long years ago and repeated in 1925 when the act was changed and we in British Columbia were left out and discriminated against while those in the east were allowed to enjoy a measure of reasonable freight rates.

The railways usually put up the old argument: If we reduce rates we shall go out of business; times are bad. That cry was made in 1925 and in 1926, but anyone who will look at the records will find that when export rates were reduced, Pacific coast ports became the chief exporting ports of the dominion, and trade increased. It may interest the new members of the house to know, if they are not already aware of the fact, that in 1933 through the ports of Vancouver and New Westminster more grain was exported than through all the eastern ports put together.

I realize the objection put up by milling companies, boards of trade and other bodies, but I submit that it is time we had a real confederation of provinces in this land, and there can be no real union or confederation so long as one province is kept out and treated like a stepchild.

Mr. VIEN: Is it not a fact that the movement of grain towards Vancouver, which the hon. gentleman has just informed us has increased considerably, has been the result of the decision of the board of railway commissioners in 1927, in the general freight rates investigation, wherein rates on export traffic westbound to Vancouver were lowered to the same basis as rates on the same traffic moving to Fort William?

Mr. REID: Before I answer that question may I say that I am very glad to have in the house a former member of the board of railway commissioners; I am particularly pleased, because this discussion should become interesting indeed. And let me say to the commissioner, now that I have him in a place where I can speak to him—

Mr. VIEN: Former commissioner.

Mr. REID: Former commissioner. The rates were presumably lowered, and if any reduction was given by the board of railway commissioners it was only after a great deal of fighting and the expenditure of a lot of money, but they are not yet down to the Fort William rates. On their face they are, but mile for mile they are not.

Mr. VIEN: May I correct the hon. gentleman? They are on exactly the same basis through Edmonton except that there is a constructive mileage through Calgary on account of the higher grade.

Mr. REID: Yes, that is the kind of statement we hear from the railway experts. We have 642 miles for 20 cents, Calgary or Edmonton to Vancouver; 1,242 or 1,238 miles from Edmonton to Fort William, 1,242 miles from Calgary, for 26 cents per hundred pounds. Is there any man with pencil and paper who is good at mathematics? We have 642 miles, 20 cents; 1,242 miles, 26 cents. And then the hon. member said that we have had export rates as in existence to Fort William. Perhaps I am wrong, but I have to be shown.

I see my time is going on, and I want to close before my forty minutes are up. I make an appeal to the government and to parliament to give serious consideration to this bill of mine. It is not something in the nature of favoritism for British Columbia. It is a question of equality, to allow our poultrymen and our dairymen to have a chance in the markets of the world as against the producers of other countries. It is certainly galling to find, as we did last year, that there was a time when we could have sent to Japan, bought good Canadian grain, brought it back into the Fraser valley and saved twenty-five cents a ton over grain brought directly from the prairies. Just think that out. Grain that had left the prairies, was hauled to Vancouver or New Westminster, and shipped across to Japan, and we could have sent to Japan, bought that grain, brought it back into the Fraser valley and saved twenty-five cents a ton. We ask that this grievance be investigated and rectified so as to give us justice and equality. The plea is generally raised that these are through rates, and this rate, and the next rate. It is just about time we examined very minutely some of the railway experts who have been giving such advice to the heads of our railway companies.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outremont): I did not intend taking any part in this debate, but I would like to correct a few misconceptions which apparently exist in the mind of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) who has just resumed his seat. I think that I can boast of being as sympathetic as any man in this house to the claim of British Columbia for equal treatment. I am not here as a railway commissioner to defend the board, nor even indeed my own decisions. But these questions of freight rates dealt with by the board involve many and very complicated factors. In the first place, the fundamental principles underlying rates on freight for export are not the same as those underlying rates on freight for domestic consumption. If you do not give to the Canadian exporter a rate enabling him to compete in the markets of the world you simply shut him out of those markets. Grain and other products reach foreign markets from various countries where a shorter rail and ocean haul, and sometimes cheaper labour conditions obtain.

In the course of the general freight rates investigation, rates affecting the movement of traffic for export to Vancouver were considerably reduced, and I may say to my hon. friend that rates on grain from any points in the prairies to Vancouver for export are today exactly the same as those applying to the same product moving to Fort William. These rates, however, were predicated upon the mileage through Edmonton. The mileage from Edmonton to Vancouver, if my recollection is correct, is 768 miles, and from Calgary to Vancouver, 644 miles. There is a network of railways in the prairie provinces; our two railway systems compete for the traffic originating there, and there is interswitching on their lines at many points. If rates on grain to Vancouver were fixed on the mileage of the Canadian Pacific railway from Calgary to Vancouver, that is 644 miles, on account of the competitive condition existing between the two systems, the Canadian National Railways would be obliged to assume the Canadian Pacific mileage.

Mr. REID: Would the hon. member let me ask him a question?

Mr. VIEN: With pleasure.

Mr. REID: If that is the case, why did that not take place in connection with freight rates from Fort William to Montreal, where the Canadian National charge 11 cents as against 30 cents charged by the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. VIEN: I do not know of any rate of 30 cents on the Canadian Pacific railway as against—

Mr. REID: Those are the figures I got.

Mr. VIEN: —as against 11 cents on the Canadian National railways, unless my hon. friend refers to the all-rail rate and the lake and rail rate from Fort William to Atlantic sea ports. This is a very different question which on some other occasion, I should be glad to discuss. For to-day it should suffice to say that rates from Fort William to the seaboard are controlled by statutes enacted in this parliament, namely the Grand Trunk Pacific and National Transcontinental Railway Acts, whereunder an expenditure of $330,000,000 was authorized to provide that rates on grain and grain products for export should at no time be higher via Canadian channels than rates via United States ports. That was the reason why the board directed that rates on the National Transcontinental railway from Fort William to Quebec in summer to Saint John and Halifax in winter, should never be higher than the lake and rail rates on similar goods via United States north Atlantic ports. I repeat that this is an entirely different problem having no bearing on the question before the house.

The purpose of this bill is to extend the Crowsnest pass agreement rates on grain and grain products moving from Fort William to Vancouver and it sets aside the fundamental principles governing the differential which should exist between rates on traffic for domestic consumption and traffic for export.

Mr. PELLETIER: If that is the case, and the hon. gentleman is defending this proposition on a mileage cost basis, can he explain why to haul grain 283 miles from the Peace River country to Edmonton costs 24 cents per hundred pounds, but if you ship that grain to Vancouver the additional cost is only two cents, though the distance is so much greater?

Mr. VIEN: I imagine that the rates to which my hon. friend refers are the rate from the Peace River district to Edmonton, a domestic rate, and the rate to Vancouver, an export rate. I was just addressing myself to that very question. If you built your rate on goods for domestic consumption on the same basis as your rate on traffic for export, our railways would soon be bankrupt, because there would be nothing left to take care of their overhead expenses and fixed charges.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VIEN: Some of my hon. friends do not agree with me on that point. I repeat that I am sympathetic to the case of British Columbia, but I am trying to explain that rates for export are intended to help the Canadian producer to reach his markets abroad. These rates should never be so low as not to allow the railways to meet their out of pocket expenses and a little more. Then you enable the Canadian producer to reach his foreign markets, and the railways without losing any money, get a little towards their overhead and fixed charges.

Mr. REID: I do not like to interrupt—

Mr. VIEN: I welcome my hon. friend's questions. I am trying to explain a very complicated problem.

Mr. REID: If the 20 cent rate on export grain from Calgary and Edmonton to Vancouver is a paying rate—and the railways have not denied this—why should British Columbia be charged 40½ cents? If it is not a paying rate why should the people of British Columbia have to make up the deficit?

Mr. VIEN: We have to distinguish between a paying rate and a not losing rate. If they get their out of pocket expenses following a shipment, our railways, in a sense, do not lose money, but they do not make any. If, however, you predicated your whole rate structure on that principle, where would you get your overhead expenses and fixed charges? Some traffic must contribute to the overhead and fixed charges of the railway. The same principles do not apply to freight for domestic consumption and freight for export. Freight for export would not move at all unless you publish an export rate; freight for domestic consumption must move even at that higher rate. If you had the same rate structure on goods for domestic consumption and for export you would shift the load from the shoulders of the railway users to those of the general taxpayers of the country. We did our best for British Columbia in the course of the general freight rates investigation. We were even accused of having flattened the Rocky mountains. We ordered the railways to publish, on freight moving to Vancouver from any points on the prairies, the same rates as applied to traffic moving for the same distances to Fort William, except that because of competitive conditions, the Canadian Pacific, from Calgary to Vancouver, was authorized to assume the mileage of the Canadian National from Edmonton to Vancouver. The Canadian Pacific had a 2·2 per cent grade in the mountains, as compared with a maximum grade of one per cent on the Canadian National. But they had a shorter mileage of 124 miles. If this had not been done, the Canadian National Railways would have been obliged to reduce its mileage from 768 to 644 miles in computing its freight rates. This would have entailed a considerable loss to the two systems.

I therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the rate structure on grain for domestic consumption cannot be predicated upon the same principle as that applying to rates on grain for export, and that the constructive mileage which was permitted to the Canadian Pacific between Calgary and Vancouver is amply justified.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): While the argument of the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien) was presented with all the ability of a clever lawyer and also the experience of a railway commissioner, yet we must regard it as rather an ex parte statement under the circumstances. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and we other members from British Columbia will be apt to take the attitude of the man we read of in the bible whose sight was restored; the Pharisees gathered round and tried to get him to admit, first, that he had never been blind, and, second, that his sight had not been restored. But he swept aside their sophistries and said, "All I know is that whereas once I was blind now I see." So when we have passing our doors on the railways, trains with forty cars of feed of which twenty-five are going to the orient, hauled at a rate of 20 cents per hundred pounds, and the remainder which are coming to British Columbia, costing under identically the same circumstances 41½ cents per hundred pounds, we see the matter as does the hon. member for New Westminster.

There are one or two facts that I want to mention before nine o'clock. The hon. member who spoke last referred to export rates. I would ask this question: Is the export rate profitable to the railways. One would think it is, because they are very anxious to get that traffic. If it is profitable for export it must be equally profitable for domestic use.

Mr. VIEN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me—

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry, I have not time—no discourtesy to the hon. member. Then we have this evidence, which is perhaps not known to many people: In the gallant fight put up by the late Hon. John Oliver, premier of British Columbia, aided by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), who is with us to-day, the export rate to Pacific coast ports was twice reduced in the last ten or twenty years, but on neither occasion was the domestic rate reduced in proportion; therefore, if the differential was correct before those reductions were made, it cannot be correct now. Then we have other evidence that our claim is just, because we had the late government putting pressure on the railways two years ago to make a partial reduction. The question was brought up on the estimates and we were objecting that the Conservative government of that day, following the precedent set by the Liberal government before them, had not given a decision. That is, the question had, as provided by law, gone to the cabinet on appeal from the railway commission, and the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said that even if they had dealt with it their action would probably have been to send it back to the railway board, because he did not think that a body such as the cabinet, made up of men having the political viewpoint, was as well able to deal with that sort of thing as the board of railway commissioners, who have trained experts at their command. And I agree with that view; I think the appeal should be not to the cabinet but to the supreme court of Canada, where these matters could be threshed out without any suggestion of politics and with all the facts before the court.

Perhaps I may relate what is possibly just a matter of gossip, and which may be news to the leader of the opposition; but the gossip at that time was that he, being then Prime Minister, was so impressed by the merits of our case that while he took the attitude I have indicated and said that the cabinet would not decide the question, yet it is rumoured that he met Sir Edward Beatty and said to him, "Beatty, if you don't do something about that rate, we will." At any rate we know that shortly afterwards there was a getting together of the railway men and the then Minister of Railways, but unfortunately the minister was not a practical railway man while Sir Edward Beatty and the Canadian National men are thoroughly practical, and they put it over Doctor Manion, aided, I am sorry to say, by the acquiescence of the premier of British Columbia, Doctor Tolmie. The reduction was that half the differential between the two rates was taken off. Had this applied to all grains and grain products, that would have been a substantial measure of redress, but it applied only to grain, and only to certain classes, No. 4 wheat I think, and lower; it did not apply to mill feed, bran and shorts, which constitute the greater proportion of the trade. When I brought that up in the house I was confronted by the Hon. Doctor Manion with the statement that the premier of British Columbia had acquiesced, which I am sorry to say was true; he either did not understand the question or did not take sufficient interest in it. Had he held out to have the reduction apply also to mill feeds, this would have helped a great deal.

So while I am of course supporting this bill, because that is the only method of redress we have, I submit that if the government of the day cannot see their way to let it go through they should at least act along the line I have indicated, have a meeting with representatives of the two railways and get a substantial reduction in the rate on No. 2 wheat and lower—that is higher numbers but lower quality. I would not ask it for milling wheat because there are factors involved concerning competing shipments to Seattle, but on No. 2 tough wheat, which makes good chicken feed, and lower grades of wheat and coarse grains and all mill feeds, such a reduction would be a great relief to British Columbia.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): There were two terms used in the debate so far that interest me very much; one is Fort William and the other is Doctor Manion. Doctor Manion was the former Minister of Railways and I pay my tribute to him as a clear-headed and able man.

The present Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) comes from a place which in the minds of some people is of even more importance than Fort William, namely, Port Arthur. I look to the present Minister of Railways for fair play, which I think is all the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) seeks. I do not know whether he is an athlete; I used to do a little in that line and the thing we appreciated was fair play. We in Fort William and Port Arthur are not so much interested in freight rates on wheat as in rates on flour; they are practically the same thing. Why is it that you can ship flour from Winnipeg to Toronto or Montreal at as low a rate as from Fort William? Why can you ship certain types of goods from Toronto or Montreal to Winnipeg as cheaply as to Fort William? Why is it that we find it cheaper to ship a certain type of goods from the east to Murillo, which is a small town out of Fort William, and back again cheaper than to Fort William? I know these things will be straightened out by the minister, and I am going to bide my time because I can trust him and have trusted him all the way through.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills having expired the house will revert to committee of supply.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr Sanderson in the chair.

Mail Subsidies and Steamship subventions—Atlantic ocean, Pacific ocean, local services, $2,086,850.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was on the point of asking the minister a question in reference to a statement that had been made that Canadian ships plying between lower British Columbia ports and ports in northern British Columbia and receiving a subsidy are manned by oriental crews. My question is based on some information that came out last session before a committee of which I was a member, that quite a number of these oriental members of the crew are not Canadian orientals but were signed on at Hongkong, Shanghai and other asiatic ports. Is there anything that the department can do to ensure the employment of Canadians on these ships in preference to asiatics signed on in Asia?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I might make reference to the report of a committee, the chairman of which was Mr. Turnbull, of Regina, that was appointed last session to inquire into this subject. I shall read not the whole reference but what I think is the important part:

That it be resolved that the question of employing greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry the owners of which receive a grant of money from the treasury of Canada be referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations.

That committee sat and took evidence, and I shall read what is pertinent in their report and which, I think, will answer partly, at least, the question asked by my hon. friend. The committee reported with respect to subsidies on the trans-Pacific route, and I take it that my hon. friend referred to that.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, to the coastwise trade between Canadian ports on the Pacific.

Mr. EULER: I will read that part of the committee's report:

It appears from the evidence that there is no contract between any department of the government and the steamship lines engaged in such trade requiring the employment of any proportion of white Canadian citizens. It was represented by witnesses from the departments of government concerned that with respect to freight traffic, Canadian lumber is being carried into a highly competitive market in competition with subsidized American ships carrying American lumber, and that any change that might result in increased cost might endanger that portion of Canadian export trade; and that with respect to the passenger trade there is the additional difficulty in employment of white Canadian citizens where a substantial portion of the passengers are oriental.

The report continues, and this perhaps touches more closely the question my hon. friend was asking:

The evidence submitted establishes that the ships engaged in the coastwise trade, the owners of which receive subsidies, are required by contract to employ British subjects to the extent of two-thirds of their full personnel but these British subjects are not required by the contract to be white Canadian citizens.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the minister say two-thirds?

Mr. EULER: Yes. The report goes on:

This term of the contract is being fully carried out in all cases and as a matter of fact it appears that more than the required two-thirds are white as well as British. The evidence established to the committee that no change in the contracts with respect to employees has been made in recent years.

I might perhaps read the next paragraph, which replies in a measure to the representations that were made by my hon. friend from Winnipeg and some others:

Your committee are of the opinion that while in view of economic conditions and the keen competition existing for international trade the carriage of freight and pasengers should not be unduly hampered and while it appears from the evidence that owners of ships referred to are making reasonable efforts to comply not only with their contracts but with the spirit of the resolution referred to the committee, nevertheless the departments of government concerned should be urged to continue to keep close check on the operations of such ships so as to secure the employment of as many white Canadian citizens as is reasonably possible.

So far as the department is concerned I shall certainly be glad, without attempting absolutely to dictate, because I think that would not be a successful effort, to use such influence as the government may have, to induce these people to employ on their boats British subjects of the white race. I do not know that I can say any more with regard to that at the moment.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the New Zealand government also give a subsidy to these same ships plying between Canada and New Zealand?

Mr. EULER: Yes; the New Zealand government gives a subsidy of £20,000, or $100,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to make this further observation. We have had a great deal of discussion on this particular point, and a number of matters have been raised on which no information can be given at the moment, as to labour conditions, the type of labour employed, whether white or coloured sailors are employed, and to what extent it is necessary to use one class or the other. This afternoon the minister said that it was almost impossible to obtain white labour on these ships. But I would point out that plying from Great Britain to other parts of the world there are ships of similar type manned by white seamen, and consequently I do not think that argument holds good. In view of this very large subsidy that we are being asked to vote, $300,000 a year for two ships sailing to New Zealand, I think this item should stand over until we have more definite information regarding the matters that have been raised and as to the conditions surrounding this subsidy.

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that any particular purpose will be served by allowing the item to stand for further information. There is no question at all that a good many Chinese are employed on these vessels. Perhaps I can give my hon. friend some of the information he wants now. The total number of Chinese employed on the Empress of Russia and the Empress of Asia is 871. These are the two ships of Canadian registry, the other vessels being registered in London. There are about eighty white men employed on each vessel, and on the average a few more than 400 orientals, Chinese.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Has the minister any idea what it would cost to establish a mail service to New Zealand if this steamship service was stopped?

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend mean on government boats?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister said this afternoon that if this service were to stop it would be necessary to spend some money on a mail service, and I am asking what it would cost approximately.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend mean what it would cost to put on new boats?

Mr. DOUGLAS: No, merely to establish a mail service in the event of this steamship service being stopped if the subsidy were decreased.

Mr. EULER: We would probably have to use United States boats, and I do not know what sort of arrangement could be made with them to carry the mails. The cost of carrying the mails on these boats is about $100,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that in addition to the subsidy?

Mr. EULER: No, that is included in the subsidy.

Mr. MacINNIS: Referring to wages and working conditions on these boats for which a subsidy is being asked, evidently the department knows nothing about wages and working conditions, and I do not think it is enough for the minister to say that he will try to have as large a number as possible of white Canadian citizens employed on these boats. I am concerned not only about working conditions but about wages paid on these ships, and I am quite satisfied that if reasonable wages were paid, the class of white labour that could be employed would give the steamship company a much better service than does the class of oriental labour which it is now employing. We are not going to improve conditions by merely substituting low paid white labour for low paid oriental labour. That is not getting us anywhere. When we insist upon working conditions that Canadian citizens, whether they be white, yellow, black, brown or any other colour can accept—I am interested mainly in the fact that they are Canadians—then we shall be getting somewhere. Before this matter is finally settled I think the minister should be in a position to give us some information as to wages paid and working conditions on these boats.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am absolutely opposed to the whole idea of subsidies. Members of this government went through the country stating that they were opposed to state intervention; that they believed in individual initiative, in ruthless competition and the law of supply and demand. However, the moment a company finds that it is not in a position to finance itself a request is made to the government for a subsidy of $300,000. When the minister was asked this afternoon as to working conditions aboard these ships he stated that as these two ships were under British registry, he doubted whether we would have any control over them.

Mr. EULER: The employment of Chinese does not enter into the question of this New Zealand service, which is the one asking for $300,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The minister was asked this afternoon as to the wages paid and the type of labour employed by these ships, and he replied that he doubted whether we could control them because they were not Canadian registered. I maintain that no matter what registry they may be under, if they come to parliament asking for a subsidy of $300,000 we should have something to say about the type of people they employ, the wages they pay and the conditions under which they expect men to work. If they are not willing to comply with these requests, I am sure that ships of Canadian registry could be found to take over the service.

Mr. KINLEY: Mr. Chairman, before the committee rose at six o'clock a suggestion was made to the minister that it be made a condition of subsidies granted to ocean going steamers that they hire Canadian sailors. This suggestion seemed to receive support from many hon. members. It is a policy which would be most advantageous to the maritime sections of Canada. Since I entered the house I have heard it said many times by members of every shade of opinion that the greatest problem facing this country is unemployment. I represent Queens-Lunenburg, a typical maritime constituency. While central Canada has a problem of unemployment in its cities, our problem is one of finding employment for our seamen. Most of our men have followed the sea since their childhood, and it seems to me that when we are considering unemployment we should consider the sailors who go down to the sea in ships. This matter has received the attention of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. That organization held its fifty-first annual convention in the city of Halifax from September 16 to September 20, 1935, and at that time maritime labour received the endorsation of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. The following is from the report:

The Nova Scotia seamen's union won the support of labour throughout Canada with their resolution calling upon the dominion government to prohibit non-Canadian labour from being employed on governmentized ships in the marine trade. A trades and labour council resolution, of similar intent, but having to do with Dominion Coal boats, went back to the committee after the mine workers delegates stated that, so far as they knew, the Dominion Coal boats did not come under the freight subventions on coal.

The next day they passed the following resolution:

Resolution No. 37

The Halifax District Trades and Labour Council; the committee reported having amended this resolution by deleting all the words in the preamble following the word "seaman" which made specific reference to the employment of British seamen and chartering ships of British registry and recommended concurrence in the resolution reading as follows:—

Whereas the dominion government has been subsidizing the coal industry as carried on by the Dominion Coal Company, Limited; and whereas, these subventions have resulted in the sales of over 1,000,000 tons of additional through the St. Lawrence districts and west of Montreal, thus enhancing employment for the miners and datal men in and about the mines; and whereas. these subventions do not accrue to the benefit of the seamen. Therefore, be it resolved, that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada bring this injustice strongly to the attention of the government with a view of having any further subsidies to aid in the promotion of the coal business made contingent upon the Dominion Coal Company, Limited, employing Canadian ships manned by Canadian seamen and paid the fair maritime wages obtained in Canada for such class of work for the said transportation of coal from the mines under their control to any points in Canada or Newfoundland.

When every industry in Canada is seeking protection of one kind or another, the seamen should come under the protective policy of the dominion. When the government grants a contract for supplying goods the contract contains the condition that Canadian goods shall be first and British goods second. Why should not the seamen of Canada be treated in the same way. While we support Canadian industry and Canadian manufacture by insisting that Canadian goods shall come first —I subscribe to this stipulation—we should also see that above all, Canadians should come first, in the coasting trade and, as far as possible, in the ocean going trade. It would be greatly to our interest if the minister could give us an assurance of this kind, but the road does not seem to be perfectly clear. In 1931, by the statute of Westminster, for the first time Canada obtained control over her men and ships upon the sea. That statute provided for the exclusion of the dominion from the provisions of sections 735 and 736 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and thus for the first time Canada obtained control over her shipping. However, concurrently with the passing of that statute Canada signed the British commonwealth merchant shipping agreement. This agreement was signed at London on December 10, 1931, the day before the passing of the statute of Westminster. I should like to quote part IV, which reads:

Article 10

Each part of the British commonwealth agrees to grant access to its ports to all ships registered in the British commonwealth on equal terms and undertakes that no laws or regulations relating to seagoing ships at any time in force in that part shall apply more favourably to ships registered in that part, or to the ships of any foreign country, than they apply to any ship registered in any other part of the commonwealth.

Article 11

While each part of the British commonwealth may regulate its own coasting trade, it is agreed that any laws or regulations from time to time in force for that purpose shall treat all ships registered in the British commonwealth in exactly the same manner as ships registered in that part, and not less favourably in any respect than ships of any foreign country.

Article 12

Nothing in the present agreement shall be deemed—

(i) to derogate from the right of every part of the commonwealth to impose customs tariff duties on ships built outside that part; or

(ii) to restrict the right of the government of each part of the commonwealth to give financial assistance to ships registered in that part or its right to regulate the sea fisheries of that part.

It is clear that under the statute of Westminster—and I am speaking as a layman, because I cannot argue this highly technical legal matter—we for the first time got control of our ships on the seas. But in the British commonwealth merchant shipping agreement, made concurrently with the statute of Westminster, we reverted to the status quo, and we have reciprocity in men and ships with the British empire.

Now the British are eminently efficient on the sea. Britain is a country with a maritime tradition, with years of service and achievement behind it as regards seagoing vessels; and if there is one game the British know it is the game of the mercantile marine and shipping. Therefore, when this or any other government in this young country asks us to compete, absolutely without any protection, with the greatest shipping country in the world, we are doing something that will not help Canada to become a great shipping nation in the near future, or relieve unemployment which is of national concern.

The United States is also a great shipping country; it protects its ocean-going ships. Subsidized ocean vessels must have, for the first two years, one-quarter of their crews American citizens; for the third year one-third must be American citizens; and for the rest of the time one-half of the crew must be Americans. I submit, speaking in the interests of maritime Canada and especially of Nova Scotia, that something should be done to relieve unemployment among our men, men with captains' certificates and with long experience on the sea, who are on the beach with nothing to do. I receive numerous applications for positions on government boats; I am flooded with applications from men who have no employment. We have no great farms such as there are in central Canada, nor have we large manufacturing industries; and as a maritime people what can we do if our men are denied the opportunity to go on the sea? Our people must go on the sea, and they are efficient and can serve the country well.

I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the members of the government that parliament and government should do something to relieve unemployment among our seafaring men. Apparently we are bound by this agreement, and the minister's hands are tied with respect to the condition in connection with government contracts. I was surprised to hear him say that something had been done in British Columbia, and it occurs to me that perhaps there may be a way out of the difficulty. Provision is made for our giving subsidies, and if that gives us the privilege of stipulating, as a condition of any subsidy, that there shall be a larger number of Canadian seamen on the ships, then that should be done as quickly as possible. If a commission is appointed to look into the matter of unemployment, it will be my privilege to appear before that commission and point out that the people in distant parts of the country deserve some consideration and that the much talked of policy of "Canada First" should find its application in this regard.

Mr. BENNETT: I hesitate to trespass in this discussion, but in view of the experience that the late government had in connection with matters of this kind I think it desirable that I should make a statement with respect to some of the questions that have been discussed this afternoon and evening. The minister is new to his position and is perhaps unaware of the fact that the difficulties we have experienced in maintaining steam communication between Australia and New Zealand and Canada have been very great and have been considerably intensified by subsidies granted to the Matson line and other lines sailing from United States ports to New Zealand and Australia, stopping at Honolulu en route.

The real truth is that the late government held the same views that the minister expressed this afternoon and that have been expressed by members of the committee this evening, namely, that lesser subsidies should be paid and that the necessity for paying increased subsidies certainly had not arisen. But in view of the trade that we have been carrying on with Australia and New Zealand, we had to face a position that was very simple: Could we or should we maintain communication between the Pacific coast of Canada and New Zealand and Australia, or should we have to abandon the service?

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not come into this matter originally. As perhaps is known by members of the committee, that company purchased, on a valuation of £1,000,000, a half interest in the line plying between the antipodes and our own country. Little New Zealand gives a grant of $100,000 a year, roughly speaking, for this service. We have subsidized it all these years, and we increased it some years ago under the following conditions. It is a service of one ship of sixteen knots and another of about seventeen or eighteen knots, one a motor ship and the other a steam turbine ship. The tonnage was given this afternoon The United States has a line known as the Matson line. That line built three large passenger ships running from San Francisco and Los Angeles to the antipodes. As Honolulu is a United States community, part of the United States republic, they can do coastwise traffic between San Francisco and Honolulu and Australia and New Zealand, and thereby derive the advantages that accrue from being able to pick up traffic at San Francisco and to deliver it at the Hawaiian islands. The three ships that the Matson line built, one in 1931, one in 1932, and another in 1933, were vessels to which the American shipping board lent over seventeen millions of dollars at one and a half per cent interest, and the subsidies that were paid to the Matson line for the antipodes service in all amount to over $1,300,000 per annum, part of it for the freight service from Los Angeles, part of it for a mail service, and part of it for a general service, based upon speed. The subsidies have been based largely upon the speed of their ships. For instance, if we paid a subsidy on the Empress of Britain, sailing from Quebec through one season, at the same rate that the Americans pay for equal rates of speed and tonnage from New York, we should pay to that one ship alone practically three-fourths of all the sum we paid last year as subsidies for the services across the Atlantic.

Getting back for a moment to the Pacific service, I think it must be within the memory of every member of the committee who has followed empire discussions in connection with handling seaborne traffic that both Australia and New Zealand have been greatly perturbed over the situation that has arisen in connection with the maintenance of communications between their islands and our Pacific coast. I suppose it must be within the knowledge of members of the committee who have been following the matter that within the last twelve months those countries made very strong representations as to what must be done if they were to save their situation at all. Possibly some hon. members have read what Mr. Forbes, then Premier of New Zealand, was compelled to state with respect to the condition of his island and his government in connection with the handling of traffic by sea. The Royal Mail Company is interested in this service. Those hon. members who are accustomed to reading railway reports and the reports of steamship companies will perhaps recall that the Royal Mail acquired its interest for preference shares in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and, so far as my memory goes at the moment, has had no dividend on them since. So they have not received any benefits from their investment in this service as yet. There were no dividends paid to these companies for years; in fact there has been a very distinct loss. I recall the former Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Hanson, presenting to me a memorandum which he had made in consequence of information he had received as to what the real conditions were. I think the minister (Mr. Euler) must have it amongst his files. Those documents will show that before setting up depreciation in recent years, notwithstanding the subsidy, this line has not made its way, and after allowing for depreciation, which on ships of that age and that speed is calculated at five per cent, not four—the four per cent rate applies to another type of ship—a situation is disclosed of great loss in the operation of those vessels. Under those circumstances the late government felt that the representations made were of such a character that it could not possibly do other than maintain that subsidy. I have always felt that we would reach a time when our ships would not require subsidies. But in view of what I have said as to the subsidies which the American shipping board is giving to its ships, and in view of the fact that the Matson Line received from that board in respect of one of its large passenger boats two-thirds of her cost at an interest rate of, I think it was, three-eighths of one per cent, the committee can get some conception of the character and type of competition that this Canadian company has had to meet.

I support that subsidy. I support it because, reluctantly, we were compelled to give it or else see the service vanish. The Peninsular and Oriental line has an interest in the Union Steamship line that makes close connection with this line at New Zealand. The Royal Mail, as I say, have an interest with the Canadian Pacific in the service we are now considering.

One other point. It was suggested that we should have a faster service. I think they have a 21-knot service out of San Francisco to Australia and New Zealand by the three new boats that were built by the Matson line. The Mariposa, the Monterey and the Lurline have each, I think, a sea-speed of 21 knots, and they cost somewhere in the vicinity of 25 million dollars, the sum advanced by the shipping board of the United States being something over seventeen million dollars, if my memory serves me aright. I was trying to look up the figures in my papers this evening, but I have not had time to verify them, and I speak subject to correction in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: A very low rate of interest.

Mr. BENNETT: I have already said that —one and a half per cent, and in one case the interest charged was only three-eighths of one per cent. Under those circumstances I believe we can do nothing other than vote this subsidy. One hon. member suggested we might build the ships ourselves to take care of the mail service. Well, we put $80,000,000 or thereabouts into ships. It is now written off as, shall I say, a non-active asset of this country at this time.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the kindest way to put it.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact some of these ships did make a little money last year on the Australian service, as perhaps the hon. gentleman knows better than I. But let me finish.

We are now confronted with a simple problem. Shall we maintain a service that connects Canada with Australia and New Zealand through Canadian ports, or shall we be compelled either to dispatch our mails through San Francisco or to ship them to England and have them sent through the Suez canal? The situation gets down to that.

Mr. DUNNING: Our goods, too.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to the goods as something separate entirely. I am leaving them out for the moment. I am talking about our mail communications for the moment. Last year we received from other countries, for mails of theirs that we handled through our boats to New Zealand and Australia, something over $50,000. I do not carry the figure in my mind, but at one time it reached as high as about $96,000, so that in any event that is to be credited against the subsidy. It consists of sums we received from Great Britain, the Irish Free State and other countries for handling mail that originated in their countries and passed through our ports on subsidized ships to Australia and New Zealand.

That is the mail service. What about our goods? What about our export trade? What about our imports from New Zealand and Australia? What about the agreements that we have made with them, and their beneficial effect upon our country as a whole, so much so that, if my memory serves me aright, Australia during the past year has been within the first five of countries trading with Canada. How otherwise, mark you, can we maintain this service for what are called perishable products, unless we take the steps I suggest? No subsidy is paid for the purely freight boats that go down to that country. The Union line, in which I think the Peninsular and Oriental line is interested—it was at one time—do not ask for and have not received a subsidy for the carriage of goods, but perishable products, in which we are so deeply interested by way of both export and import, are carried in these ships that are specially provided with refrigerator chambers to deal with the proper carriage of such commodities. Under the circumstances I do not see how we can do other than vote this subsidy, or else face an alternative that no Canadian cares to face.

That is all I have to say with respect to that, but I do want to say one word more with respect to shipping generally. I recall that there was a time when the Canadian merchant marine occupied a very important place in the world, and when our ships sailed the seven seas. We have fallen off in that regard; nowadays one will very seldom find our flag in the great shipping ports of the world. I notice a very substantial cut in the subsidy given the Atlantic service; I have not the details before me. I remember the presentation that was made of the case to the previous minister because he brought it to my attention later, as to what had happened on the Atlantic ocean. I wonder whether it is in the mind of members of the committee to pause and consider for a moment the real position of Canada. We have this vast orient which apparently is just beginning to come back to life. The east was the cradle of civilization; apparently the circle is being completed and it is moving back again in that direction. There are hundreds of millions of people in that part of the world, and there we look for some market, or, shall I say, for markets. When Sir William Van Horne, away back in the nineties, when his company was poor and this country certainly was not rich, put three yacht-like steamships on the Pacific ocean sailing to the orient, people wondered at his courage. Those ships have been replaced, as we all know, by great steamships, the greatest on the Pacific ocean. Those ships are subsidized, and generously subsidized, by the dominion government, because we are thus able to divert, over Canadian rails, through Canada on through bills of lading, a large quantity of traffic that otherwise would travel in another direction. That service is valuable from the standpoint not only of the revenue it produces, but of the employment it gives to men on the railways. In addition it does much to enable us to maintain the efficiency and effectiveness of our relations between Great Britain on the one hand and China and Japan on the other, to say nothing of the close relation that exists between that service and the service to the antipodes.

I mention that because the Atlantic service is a part of that other service. On through bills of lading from Great Britain or France or Germany to the orient you have shipping moving by one of the many lines that come into Canadian ports, across the country by one or other of our lines of rail, and on to the orient. Sometimes, it is true, it travels by other lines than ours, the Dollar line or some other, but it becomes essential, if we are to maintain our lines, that they receive the assistance that we have been so generously giving them. On looking at the estimates I notice that a very much smaller sum is being given on the Atlantic this year than formerly was the case. I can readily understand the attitude of the minister with regard to this problem of subsidies; I might say that I understand the attitude of both ministers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance. It is not improbable that the Minister of Finance has more to do with cutting down the subsidies than has the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. EULER: He did not in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: Usually I have found it to be the Minister of Finance who asks, "Where are we going to find the money?" That is his difficulty and his job, and therefore very frequently, though he may desire to do so, he is unable to provide the necessary money for the subsidies in question.

The service on the Atlantic, apart from the fact that one of the ships is extraordinarily speedy, ranking of course with other ships of her class and tonnage that travel out of New York, has been a very great advantage to this country. I frankly admit that it is difficult to justify the expenditure involved in the construction of such a ship in these days, but I wonder whether the committee will pause for a moment to realize just what it means to Canada, as compared with the United States, to have that ship sailing from our ports, going over to Southampton, returning and sailing regularly every fortnight during the season, giving this country a form of advertising that it would be very difficult to obtain otherwise even by the expenditure of much more money than is involved in the subsidy. The same type of ship sailing from the port of New York, carrying the same type of mail, with the same class of accommodation, the same speed and the same tonnage, if my memory serves me aright would be receiving something like $17 per sea mile as a mail subsidy. I was looking for the figure among my papers, but I cannot find it at the moment. The minister gave it to me last year; I think it was $17. At the very top speed it runs in the United States as high as $24 per mile per voyage. That is what we Canadians are competing against; that is what we Canadians have to meet if we are to maintain our position among the nations of the world. Our very geographical position has imposed upon us obligations and responsibilities. If we are going to maintain our integrity or, in the language of the modern newspaper, if we are to keep up with the Joneses at all, we must provide this assistance. I can only say that I sympathize with ministers who have to deal with this question. Certainly for one or two years I declined to provide the subsidy, but when I saw what was happening; when I saw the returns and balance sheets, I realized that even though economic conditions were difficult this had to be done if we were to maintain our position as a shipping nation or our position midway between the occident and the orient among the peoples of the world.

Now I should like to say a word with respect to accommodation on ships, the seamen, the number of seamen and the food. All these matters are regulated by our Merchant Shipping Act, which is a reproduction of the British Merchant Shipping Act, and the board of trade regulations of England are practically those in force here. Hon. members who are familiar with our parliamentary history will recall the long, long story of Plimsoll and his struggle in the British House of Commons with the shipping owners to secure for sailors their rights, to secure for them proper food and decent accommodation, to ensure them against overloading and the destruction of vessels that were unseaworthy but which were put to sea for purely insurance purposes. Only the other day I was reading of the terrific scene that took place in the British House of Commons when Plimsoll made his eloquent appeal. Not because of what he was able to disclose but because of the scene he made public attention was rivetted upon the conditions that existed, and Plimsoll lived to see every ship that left a British port have on her side that loading mark to which we refer as Plimsoll's mark. There is no man who sees any of our ships to-day as they go out to sea who does not realize that this is an enduring monument to the memory of one man's patience and persistence, for every ship bears his mark upon her sides, winter and summer, when she has a deck load and when she has not. Now all accommodation is regulated by that; the number of square yards, the amount of air space, the food requirements, the right of the sailor to have conditions put upon the log, the duty of the master to enter them on the log, his right to go to any British consul and complain of conditions—all these things are matters no longer of uncertainty but of certainty; they are written right into the laws of the country. We have reproduced here substantially the same provisions as exist in Great Britain. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) referred to the fact that we made an empire agreement with respect to shipping. If we had not we would certainly have been in a difficult position, for if hon. members look at the number of deep sea ships we have upon our register they will realize how glad Canadians were, as were Australians and New Zealanders and South Africans, that we could have reciprocal arrangements with respect to shipping between the various parts of the empire. And many of the sailors about whom complaint has been made to-night are Chinese British subjects from Hongkong. They are not foreigners; they are British subjects.

Mr. REID: That has not been proven.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been proven in regard to a substantial number, if my hon. friend will permit me to say so. I was careful not to say all, but I know that substantial numbers of them are, as is indicated by the reports made on inward and outward voyages. The nationality of the Chinese became known to me in another connection while I was in office, a reason connected with another branch of the public service. I think it can be established beyond doubt that a large number are British subjects from Hongkong and other parts of the world.

Mr. KINLEY: Is it not a fact that in Canada you can ship a man of almost any nation in the world, under our merchant shipping laws?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no doubt that, as long as they are sailors, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg is correct. And when he speaks of English ships being manned entirely by Englishmen I think he must forget that the ships that ply to the far east are largely manned, so far as sailors are concerned, by Lascars. And while a substantial number of them in certain classes of the complement of the ship—

Mr. KINLEY: I rise to a point of order. I did not say that English ships were manned wholly by Englishmen. I said that they had equal privileges in Canada with Canadians. I said that considering conditions in Canada; that Canada is a young nation and that the English are eminently qualified on the sea, our Canadian sea-going trade should not be expected to compete with those who are so eminently qualified. When it comes to a question of goods we weigh almost to a milligram as between other countries and ourselves, and I said that we should have the same principle apply to our seamen.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: I was concluding what I had to say. As the hon. gentleman is a new member, although he is experienced in a local legislature, I had no desire to shorten his observations. The rights that we grant under the agreement to which the hon. member refers are nothing comparable to the benefit and advantages which we have obtained. One has only to compare the two to realize how greatly the balance is in favour of this country and how much greater our advantages are than the benefits we have given under the agreement to which reference has been made. I well recall the circumstances connected with the signing of that agreement, and the discussions that took place between representatives of all parts of the empire. The whole question of shipping is one that has given very great and anxious concern to British public men. Members of the committee who are familiar with the political history of the Right Hon. Walter Runciman will recall something of his recent speech in which he pointed out that the granting of subsidies and bonuses by the United States, and by France, Germany and other continental countries was driving England rapidly into a position where it would appear that there was nothing for her to do other than to follow the same course. As a result of representations which were made to him he was able to convince his colleagues that such action should be taken, and to a limited extent it has been. I mention this because perhaps we have little appreciation of all that is involved—at least I speak for myself when I say I had little appreciation and understanding of all that is involved—in the maintenance of this form of communication between the antipodes and the orient and the countries of Europe and our own country. And while I knew the difficulty of finding money for that purpose, reluctantly I felt compelled to recommend to my colleagues that we should find it in order that this service might be maintained, because it is so vital to the economic and commercial life and the very existence of our country as a trading nation among the nations of the world. These at any rate were the factors that influenced the late government in arriving at the conclusions which they reached. I know the difficulties of the minister, and I suggest that the more closely he examines the situation, the more complete will he find is the case under present conditions for bonuses and assistance to maintain during these dark and troubled days communication between far-off countries and our own.

Mr. McGEER: There is a decrease of $149,000 in the item: Canada, China and Japan service. What is the reason for that?

Mr. EULER: Merely in the interests of economy.

Mr. McGEER: There is no change in the service?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. McGEER: Then what was the reason for the increase of $100,000 in the Canada-New Zealand service?

Mr. EULER: If my hon. friend had been here this afternoon he would have heard the reason. It is that there was a serious probability that if the subsidy were not increased the service would be discontinued entirely.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the minister sure that with respect to the Atlantic service the decrease in subsidy will not result in the deterioration of the service?

Mr. EULER: I rather anticipated that question. To be quite frank, the reason the subsidy is cut in half, reduced to $250,000, is merely that by examination of the statement of the company I find that their position last year improved by about $2,500,000. I thought that was a sufficient reason for making a substantial cut.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the steamship company?

Mr. EULER: Yes. In that there is an amount of $150,000 which we would have to pay in any case for carrying the mails, so that the actual subsidy is only $100,000.

Mr. RYAN: What company does that decrease refer to?

Mr. EULER: The Canadian Pacific.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I find myself very much in agreement with the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I am satisfied that in these days we must resort to subventions and subsidies in order to keep open the ocean routes. But I notice at least two that have not been mentioned to-night: the route to South Africa and the route to the British West Indies. These would appear to be new subsidies, or at least subsidies which have not been given for many years.

Mr. EULER: No, they are not new.

Mr. BENNETT: But the hon. member is right; they are only a few years old.

Mr. EULER: A three year contract.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should like to be assured that every effort is being made by the minister and the Department of Trade and Commerce to ensure that as far as possible Canadian bottoms are used on these routes. Can the minister give me that assurance?

Mr. EULER: There are no Canadian owned ships in that service. They are, I believe all of British or Dutch registry.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Should we not make some effort to obtain Canadian registry for ships going out of our ports and receiving a subsidy?

Mr. EULER: I suppose we might ask it of them, but I do not know that they are under any obligation to do what we ask.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): If we are Canadians we should make every effort to see that our worth shows itself in everything we do. It would be a very simple matter to deal with the matter at the proper time and in the proper place.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the reason the minister has given for reducing the appropriation for the Canada-United Kingdom service on the Atlantic the same as he would give for reducing the Canada-China-Japan service by $149,000?

Mr. EULER: I think I gave the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) a reply to that question a moment ago. The reason for cutting down the subsidy for the service to China and Japan was, as I said, in the interests of economy. My good friend the Minister of Finance, to whom reference has been made by the leader of the opposition, was rather insistent that we should get our estimates down. He had no particular influence, I might say for his benefit, in regard to these estimates, but the general principle was that the main estimates were to be reduced all along the line; we had to cut here, there and in the other place, and this was one item that was cut for that reason. So far as I am concerned, if this is of any interest to the committee, I am opposed to subsidies. I do not like the idea of subsidies at all, but we have to adopt ourselves to conditions as we find them. I would like to compliment the leader of the opposition upon the assistance he gave and the clarity with which he expressed his view on the question of subsidies. I agree with him. That of course does not mean that the principle of subsidies is particularly sound, but if it is necessary, as it is, to maintain our trade routes and all the rest of it, we have to adapt ourselves to conditions as they are. For my part I do not desire to go into the granting of subsidies to any greater extent than is absolutely necessary, and from that it follows that any action that might be taken will be in the direction of cutting down subsidies, if that is at all possible, having regard to the service necessary for the Canadian people. I make that observation just by the way. My inclination would be, in the language of the street, to let every tub stand on its own bottom. After all, these are private businesses conducted for a profit, although in most cases these companies are not making any profit; in fact they are suffering losses. But in a general way I should like to save the treasury just as much as possible on subsidies.

Mr. CAHAN: I quite understand the position which the hon. gentleman takes with respect to subsidies. That is a large question, but parliament has voted subsidies for steamship services for many years; whether a Liberal or a Conservative government was in office, both initiated such votes.

Mr. EULER: I hardly regard that as a good reason.

Mr. CAHAN: No; but certainly the hon. gentleman does not suggest to the committee that he is reducing the subsidies on two of the most important services of Canada, one by $250,000 and the other by $150,000, without taking into consideration or entering into such negotiations as would assure him that the services will not deteriorate or in fact become obsolete if these subsidies are reduced.

Mr. EULER: I am not very much afraid of that.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister is not very much afraid of it, he says. Well, I suggest that he is not as astute as he usually is because if he would look into the facts with regard to both these services I think he would have very grave doubts whether they will be maintained as efficiently without these subsidies. Take the Pacific service. I remember that when it was up before our own government a year ago I looked into the Pacific service which is carried on by the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company. I found that they were operating under enormous losses at that time, if my memory serves me aright, and I regard a reduction of $149,000 in the subsidy for that service as likely to deteriorate the whole service and render it impossible for an efficient service to be carried on. With regard to the Atlantic service I was astounded to hear the suggestion from the minister that it is being operated at an enormous profit.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that. I said that they were two and a half million dollars better off than they were the year before.

Mr. CAHAN: That depends on what "better off" means, and with what the comparison is made. Can the hon. gentleman lay on the table the figures from which he deduces that there has been a more profitable operation to the extent of two and a half million dollars?

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I might answer my hon. friend if he wants the answer now. I may have taken the committee into greater confidence than I was entitled to do because these figures are confidential. The reason for making the cut in the Atlantic service was that the company, while still operating ostensibly at a loss, operated at a very much smaller loss than they did the year before. While I am on my feet, I might also say although I do not desire to interrupt my hon. friend, who is rather vehement in his language with regard to the cut on the China service that from 1920 to 1931, as the leader of the opposition very well knows, there was no subsidy at all for that service. They are still being allowed $600,000, so that is not dealing so very harshly with the company.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not talking about dealing harshly with the company.

Mr. EULER: Well, I am.

Mr. CAHAN: I am just asking what ground the hon. gentleman has for concluding that with a reduction of this large amount the service can be efficiently operated either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific. I have dealt particularly with the Pacific.

Mr. EULER: I have given the reason. Let me speak about the Atlantic service for a moment. I am certainly justified in believing that when that company by its statement shows that it is three or four or five or six times better off than the amount of the cut in the subsidy, it will be able to give at least as good a service as it did before when its loss was much greater.

Mr. CAHAN: But it is still run at a loss.

Mr. EULER: I gave the figures a little while ago. Surely there is no reason to assume, when their loss is now so much less, that they are going to give a worse service than when their loss was greater; that when their loss has diminished they are not going to give as good a service as before.

Mr. CAHAN: I should think otherwise. When a company has been operating at a loss for so many years it comes to a stage when such losses can no longer be incurred, and if the company has been making an effective effort to overcome that loss I should think it might be encouraged by granting the subsidy until such time as it has made up an income which will meet the current expenses for carrying on the service.

Mr. McGEER: I had not intended taking part in this debate until I heard that the only reason for the reduction of the subsidies to the Pacific coast services was one of economy. That kind of economy will not prove to be worth much to the dominion. If that is the kind of economy necessary for the purpose of balancing the budget, apparently we are going to have a balanced budget at the expense of the Canadian people, at the expense of Canadian trade expansion and at the expense of Canadian institutional services advancing with, from the Canadian government, some measure of assistance such as other national governments throughout the world are giving to similar services. Such action will not prove to be an economy; it will prove to be an effective way, not of balancing the budget, but of continuing an unfavourable balance to Canada and the suffering of losses on the part of companies and seamen.

If there is one place where we should be acting to meet intensive competition made possible by national activity, it is on the Pacific ocean. We should not forget that during the last fifty years Japan has risen from a place unknown to the position of one of the leading nations of the world. By appropriating to their own use all that has been developed in western civilization in the way of culture and education, in politics and finance, in industrial and productive activity, in commerce and diplomacy, and in war power, the people of Japan have risen to the first rank of the leading nations.

Mr. BAKER: Therein lies the danger.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend says, "Therein lies the danger." What are we in Canada, as part of the British empire, doing to hold our place of leadership in the world's greatest theatre of potential development and trouble, the Pacific ocean? We have in British Columbia and Alberta two of the richest provinces in the dominion. The Canadian section of the north Pacific is richer in natural resources than are Australia and New Zealand combined. What are we doing to fulfil our responsibility on the Pacific ocean? We should realize what is being done by the motherland in Singapore and Hongkong and by our sister dominions in the antipodes and do likewise. But all we do is to reduce a rather niggardly subsidy that should be increased to encourage development on the Pacific. That kind of economy is not going to help the Minister of Finance to gather the taxes necessary to meet the obligations of the dominion. It is not going to help the cities of Vancouver, Prince Rupert and Victoria to gather the taxes necessary to meet their municipal obligations. It is not going to help British Columbia and Alberta to distribute their grain, lumber, minerals and innumerable other products to Pacific ocean markets. These products should be flowing into these markets in much greater volume than they are at the present time and this volume will not be increased until this country recognizes that it must maintain not only an internal but an external transportation service to all the markets of the world.

I appreciate that these are times of great difficulty, but it seems rather extraordinary that a nation like Japan, with fewer resources than the dominion, or a country like Great Britain, with fewer resources than we have, can find the money and the means to build and develop a shipping service for commerce and at the same time maintain a naval program costing far more than its ocean shipping service. We in Canada have no naval service to maintain and yet we cannot continue to pay a niggardly subsidy for the development of our shipping services. Just recently the shipping service of Great Britain was recognized as being in need of assistance and an extensive program of subsidies was brought into effect.

I should like to point out one other matter to the committee. Japan has adopted another technique; she has appropriated to herself that of Great Britain in establishing protectorates over Egypt and India by establishing control over Korea. It is not a question of what Japan may do to-morrow; we know what she has done already in the way of expansion. Unquestionably she is moved to establish the government in Manchuria, and she has now arrived at the point where she can establish a measure of authority over northern China. She has devised a form of Monroe doctrine and has sufficient authority to say to London that she will not approve a sterling loan to the Nanking government. We in western Canada feel that there are great opportunities as well as great responsibilities for the empire on the Pacific ocean. These opportunities and responsibilities are not confined to western Canada; they are not confined to the dominion as a whole; they apply to Canada as a nation and as one of the members of the commonwealth of nations known as the British empire. We should not overlook the fact that there are only about 70 millions of people of British extraction in the 500 millions of people who make up this empire. The position of leadership which the people of the British empire have held in a world of 2,000 million people is something that has been challenged before, is being challenged to-day and will be challenged in the future.

If in our desire for economy we allow ourselves to be bound by the outworn, impossible, impractical and absurd conventions of orthodox economy and orthodox finance, which have been abandoned by every country that appreciates the future, then having put the wealth of our nation in pawn we are now sacrificing the possibilities of progress to pay the pawnbrokers' exactions. It may be that this is the way in which we are going to manage the currency and credit of this nation so that it may be issued in terms of public need. But if we are going to sacrifice trade on the Pacific ocean in the name of economy, we are going to repudiate the most important promise that ever was made by any government to the people of a nation, namely, that currency and credit would be created and issued in terms of public need. The kind of economy involved in this reduction, will prove to be a ghastly expense to the people of Canada, and it is not the kind of economy that they expected they were going to receive after the last general election.

Mr. DUNNING: While the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not need support in view of the fact that he takes the responsibility and has been kind enough to absolve me from it in connection with these reductions, I think, after the very eloquent and informative remarks to which we have just listened, I should at least indicate my full support of him in what he is trying to do in the way of economy in this matter. I do so for the reason that the committee might reach the conclusion that some great disaster is about to fall upon the trade of Canada across the Pacific ocean as a result of the reduction of $149,000 in the subsidy to be paid for the Canada, China and Japan service. I did ask every one of my colleagues to endeavour to secure the discharge of the various public services under their control for the least amount of money. If that is orthodoxy, then I am orthodox. I believe it is my duty to the taxpayers of Canada to ask all my colleagues to endeavour to secure the discharge of the public services under their control for the least possible expenditure of money, and I am prepared to stand on that. I am sure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce assured himself that no detraction from the service now being rendered on the Pacific ocean would take place as a result of the saving to the public treasury of this $149,000.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the assurance we desired to have.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. DUNNING: The minister can base his views with respect to the matter only upon information which is supplied to him, as my hon. friend well knows, confidentially by the companies operating.

Mr. CAHAN: That was quite sufficient.

Mr. DUNNING: On the basis of that information he makes up his mind and makes his recommendation to the government of Canada, reasonably sure, as I say, that the service will not be impaired and merely desiring to secure for the people of Canada the maximum of service for the amount of money voted. Now that is a simple matter. It does not relate itself to a world crisis; it does not really relate itself to the rising power of Japan; it does not really relate itself to a world war. It is a question of whether in the judgment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce of this country the service now being given to Canadian trade across the Pacific can be performed for a lesser subsidy than was paid during the last year. I am standing by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. McGEER: There was no assurance of that kind given at all. When I asked the minister the reason for the change he gave the curt reply that it was merely economy. With respect to the Atlantic service he gave the other reason, namely, that there had been an improvement in the general returns made, warranting his opinion that no harm would be done to that service. But in reply to my question—and that is the only reason I spoke—he said, "Well, we have decided to economize on the Pacific," quite irrespective of what is going to happen on the Pacific. Well, we have had a little intimation of what has happened in discriminatory freight rates and a great many other matters, and in British Columbia we feel, at least as the representative of one of the constituencies of that province, I feel that we have to make ourselves heard a little bit; and I can assure the Minister of Finance that if he is going to economize by paring things on the Pacific, things which I think we need out there and which I do not think he should pare, then I will use not only Japan but anything else I can think of to convince the committee that the minister is wrong in that regard.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite sure that the minister is at liberty to make a statement in this connection. Has he received any information from the company which is given this Pacific subsidy that the service will be curtailed somewhat by the reduction? I recall very well that two years ago, when a larger reduction was proposed than was actually made, it was stated that the service would be somewhat curtailed, I believe by extending the service from two to three weeks, or cutting out one voyage in connection with each of the ships, or a portion of a voyage, or one voyage on two or three ships. In any case, if this results in cutting down that service then it simply means that the traffic will go to the Japanese ships or the President line, that is, the Dollar line, running from China to Japan to Seattle, San Francisco and so on. It means something similar to what has happened in the competition on the Australian route, which I notice the minister has recognized by an increase in subsidy, that is, competition of the Matson line with the Canadian-Australian line. That competition has become so real that I venture to say that a very substantial proportion of the Australian business that used to come through Canada is now diverted through San Francisco and Los Angeles. That is a distinct loss to Canada and I am glad to see that the minister has increased that subsidy. It was originally $100,000. Then it was increased to $150,000, then to $200,000, and now he has increased it to $300,000, which is away below what the United States government pays to its lines. The China-Japan route is the old main route, on the Pacific, of the Canadian line. The Canadian Pacific, of course, was the pioneer on that route; I remember forty years ago when the old Empresses, little vessels of 5,000 tons, were looked upon as the most wonderful ships on the Pacific. They look very small to-day. Then there was a gradual development to the larger vessels. I will venture this statement, that there will be a curtailment in the service commensurate with the reduction in subsidy, and I would ask the minister whether he has any assurances as to the maintenance of the service.

Mr. EULER: I am very glad my hon. friend has asked that question. I have no intimation whatever from the company that there will be any curtailment or that any curtailment will be demanded on the basis of this subsidy. I may say this, that the company concerned is not pleased with the cutting down of the subsidy; I hardly expected anything else, but I will say also to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) that although I am not able constitutionally to go into heroics, I am just as much concerned about the prosperity of this country as is perhaps, any other hon. member. I am not doing anything by way of cutting down subsidies with the knowledge or hope or belief that the trade of Canada is going to suffer. Further, I am not afraid to retrace my steps if I find I am wrong. If I should be convinced, as I am not—and I do not think I shall be—that by reason of cutting off $100,000 or a little more from a certain subsidy the interests of this country are going to be vitally affected, I shall not be afraid to alter my course. This action might still be taken. I do not think it will need to be, but if it must be I am perfectly prepared to take it. As I say, however, I cannot go into heroics and assert that because of a small cut in the subsidy the whole of the trade on the Pacific is going to be ruined. But if such a danger should arise, I think we could take steps to avoid that terrible catastrophe. I desire that if possible the vote be passed. If not, I would make a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. McGEER: There was not any desire on my part to go into heroics. I wanted to give the committee some facts on the situation with regard to trade development. One feature to which I did not refer at all but which the minister might look into, might induce him, instead of decreasing the subsidy, substantially to increase it to the benefit of the people of Canada. We know that as a result of competition on the Asiatic coast much of the work of repairing and improving and reestablishing ships is done on the docks on the other side of the Pacific. Much of the employment that is given on the ships is governed by the same conditions. I feel that the time is coming when we should be prepared to recognize the necessity of developing a Canadian merchant marine service that will permit us as a nation to help the British empire to enjoy during the future the same kind of leadership in the Pacific theatre of trade that the British empire has enjoyed in the Atlantic during the last 200 years. We have in Vancouver a port that is not only competing with every other port on the Pacific ocean, but definitely competing with the port of Seattle; and if the minister would take a trip along the Pacific coast, as I have done recently, look at what the United States government is doing in Honolulu, in San Diego, in San Pedro, in San Francisco and in Puget sound at Bremerton, which is part of the port of Seattle, and note what is being done in the establishment of a naval and airplane base in Alaska, he would find that although Vancouver enjoys the unique position of being the largest grain shipping port in the world, it is not securing anything like the measures of assistance that ports of the United States competing with Vancouver, and ports in China and Japan and Australia and New Zealand are now securing. If I spoke in a way that could place my utterances in the realm of heroics beyond the constitutional capacity of the minister, may I say to him that I am only beginning, and if I have worried him to-night he is going to have a rather bad time in the future.

Mr. EULER: Go as far as you like.

Mr. McGEER: I appreciate the attitude that the minister has taken, because I think there is an opportunity of doing something in the development of Pacific ocean trade; that we can possibly advance subsidies to the benefit of Canadian seamen, Canadian dock workers, and Canadian trade generally.

Mr. McNEVIN: Mr. Chairman, I think that the Canadian taxpayer—

The CHAIRMAN: Order, we have a motion to rise.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no, the minister did not make a motion.

Mr. EULER: My suggestion was that the item might carry, but, if not, I would make that motion.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister made the motion he made it before the member for Vancouver-Burrard spoke. Therefore that member should not have spoken. Since he has spoken, the hon. member who now rises to speak has the right to speak.

Mr. EULER: I did not make a motion. I merely intimated to the committee that if the debate were to continue I should prefer to make a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. McNEVIN: The Canadian taxpayer will recognize that an expenditure of almost $2,087,000 is a substantial amount to grant as a shipping subsidy. The minister is to be commended for making this reduction, and, with the expectation of increased trade, we would be well advised to pass this item.

Mr. STEWART: I submit that we will make better progress if we take these items one by one, as we did the items on Public Works. We have been running backwards and forwards from one to another. If we call one item and deal with it and finish it, we will get on more rapidly.

Item stands.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Chargeable to Income—Miscellaneous—
Board of Railway Commissioners: maintenance and operation, $230,000.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister explain the items that go to make up the decrease in this appropriation? Have any services been discontinued?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Railways and Canals): The items are as follows:

Salaries of staff, $185,000.
Official reporting, including amount of reporting contract, $4,800, $8,800.
Official car, operation and maintenance, $3,000.
Printing, $5,000.
Stationery, $4,000.
Telegraph and telephone, $1,000.
Travelling expenses of board and staff, $18,000.
Contingencies, $4,568.

I may say that while there is a reduction of $15,854.04 from the amount voted last year, the amount actually expended last year was about $11,000 less than the amount voted; in other words the amount expended last year was $234,854.04.

Mr. STEWART: There is some reduction in connection with the car. How is it proposed to bring that about?

Mr. HOWE: The expense of the car is entirely a matter of its use, and it is not anticipated that the car will be used as much this year as it was last.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous services, $38,500.

Mr. STEWART: There is a decrease of $13,500 in this item. Would the minister explain, for the information of the committee, what is covered by this expression "Miscellaneous services"?

Mr. HOWE: There is a decrease of $1,500 in administration expenses. There is a decrease of $2,000 in the maintenance and repair of official government cars. There is a decrease of $5,000 in repairs and alterations to the governor general's cars. There is a decrease of $6,000 in Beauharnois surveys and investigations, due to the abolition of the position of resident engineer, and a further decrease of $800 due to the abolition of the board allowance for the resident engineer. Then there is an increase for Beauharnois surveys and investigations, amounting to $1,800, to provide for carrying out flow measurements by head office. That makes up the net decrease of $13,500.

Railway employees' provident fund: to supplement pension allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1936, to March 31, 1937, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $27,300.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe this is the item that deals with the employees' provident fund. Would the minister be good enough to explain to the committee the position of this fund, how many employees are affected and how long he expects to continue paying out this money?

Mr. HOWE: The number of retired employees in receipt of pensions is 1,764. Employees contributing to the fund during September, 1935, the latest figures available, numbered 8,603.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand that this is a contributory fund in which the employees and the railways participated?

Mr. HOWE: This is the Intercolonial fund, and it is contributory. I will give my hon. friend the explanation. The Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund provides for the payment to retired employees of a monthly allowance of one and one-half per cent for each year of service of the average monthly salary received by each employee for the eight years immediately preceding his retirement, such monthly allowance to be not less than $20. Because of the fact that the cost of living greatly increased after the passing of the act in 1907, the minimum rate of $20 per month was found to be inadequate, great hardship and even privation being suffered by those who had retired under the provisions of the act at that minimum rate. For the purpose of affording a measure of relief to these former employees of the crown an appropriation has been provided in the parliamentary estimates since 1921 to make the minimum pension allowance $30 instead of $20 per month as provided by the provident fund. That is the purpose of this vote, to increase that payment of $20 to $30 to meet the increased cost of living.

Mr. HEAPS: It seems to me, just from the casual statement made by the minister, that approximately one-eighth of the employees are on pension. Could the minister inform the committee as to the state of the fund on an actuarial basis?

Mr. HOWE: This is only one of several funds of the Canadian National Railways. It is a fund of the old Intercolonial. It is a closed fund, closed a number of years ago. The purpose of this vote is to raise the minimum payment from $20 to $30 per month.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the minister stated a few minutes ago that something like eight thousand employees are still paying into the fund.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. HEAPS: I was under the impression that it was from moneys contributed by the present employees, plus the amount given by the government, that the existing pensioners were deriving the benefit. Now I am told that the fund has been closed. I should like to have that point cleared up.

Mr. HOWE: It is closed to new entrants. The people who are in the fund are still contributing and will contribute until they become pensioners themselves.

Mr. HEAPS: Then I take it that the old employees are pensioners under the old arrangement between the company and its employees, and that in the old fund there was sufficient money to permit payment of $20 per month to existing pensioners.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is not quite right. The hon. gentleman is asking how the fund is made up. I happen to come from the section in which it originally started. Contributions were made by these people; the fund is now closed, and there are some eight thousand people contributing. In 1921 the monthly payment of $20 was found to be inadequate and was increased to $30, and since then we have been paying about $27,000 every year for the purpose of maintaining the fund in its integrity and enabling $30 a month to be paid.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the number of pensioners decrease yearly, and, if so, how much less is the number under this estimate than it was under the estimate of a year ago?

Mr. HOWE: I have before me the amount of the expenditures, indicating that the fund reached its peak in 1931-32 and has been getting slightly less each year since then.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the number of pensioners in 1931?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry I have not that information. I will get it if the hon. gentleman so desires.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 19, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What is the total amount of interest that has been paid on our national debt since confederation or as far back as our records of borrowing show?
2. What is our present national debt?
3. How much of this is original principal and how much is interest?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. $2,823,245,404.93 to January 31, 1936.
2. Net debt at January 31, 1936, $2,895,-124,262.99.
3. Borrowings are not allocated to particular purposes under consolidated fund system.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce):

1. How many farmers of Beauce county applied for a loan since the Farm Loan Act became law, giving the number of such applications for each year separately?
2. How many inspections were carried out for which the farm loan board received $10, in connection with each such inspection, giving the number for each year separately?
3. In how many cases was the inspection carried out without the $10 being paid, giving the number for each year separately?
4. In how many cases was the loan application granted and the loan made, giving the number for each year separately?
5. What was the amount of the loan made in each case and in each year?
6. In how many cases did the farm loan board require two inspections, giving the number for each year separately?
7. In each case where a loan was made, on what date was the loan application presented and on what date was said loan granted and documents completed, giving the figures for each year separately?

Mr. DUNNING:

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. The following answers are furnished by the Canadian farm loan board: Records of the Canadian farm loan board are not kept by counties and the information asked for is not now available.

Mr. GOLDING:

1. How many applications were received from the province of Ontario for a loan under the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act during the year 1935?
2. In how many cases was the loan application granted and the loan made?

[Mr. Howe.]

3. How many applications were received from the counties of Huron and Perth, Ontario, for a loan under the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act during the year 1935?
4. In how many cases was the loan application granted and the loan made, in these two counties?
5. What are the names and addresses of the persons who secured loans in this manner in the two counties?
6. What was the amount of each such loan in the counties of Huron and Perth?
7. What has been the total cost to the government for the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act from the time it began to function to December 31, 1935?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. 2,484 from May, 1935, to January 31, 1936.
2. 607.
3, 4, 5 and 6. The records of the Canadian farm loan board are not kept by counties and the information asked for is not now available. Moreover, the transactions between the board and borrowers are regarded as confidential and it is not considered in the public interest that information revealing the names of persons who have obtained loans should be given.
7. $840,562.88.

(Answers 1 to 6 furnished by Canadian farm loan board).

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

VANCOUVER—LEGAL SERVICES

Mr. REID:

1. What lawyers and law firms, if any, of the city of Vancouver, British Columbia, were retained by the federal government of Canada during the period from August 1, 1930, until December 31, 1935?
2. What sums were paid by the federal government and all departments thereof to each such lawyer and law firm?
3. What services were rendered by each such lawyer and law firm for the amounts so paid to each?
4. What sums, if any, are still owing, or claimed for such services, and to whom?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. According to the records of the Post Office Department, how many postmasters at present occupy their position because they brought about the dismissal of their Liberal predecessor?
2. Is a postmaster who secured his position after having informed against his predecessor and brought about his dismissal, guilty of political interference or of an injustice which may justify his own dismissal?

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. According to the records of the Post Office Department, from August 7, 1930, to October 29, 1935, how many times did the Postmaster General exercise the discretionary powers vested in him under Section 67 of the Post Office Act, whereby mail contracts are not always awarded to the lowest tenderer?

2. According to the records of the Post Office Department, from August 7, 1930, to October 29, 1935, how many mail contracts were awarded to persons who, not being originally the lowest tenderers, were allowed to reconsider their tender and reduce the figure thereof?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ARMAGH, QUE., RURAL MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of the complete file respecting the contract for mail delivery on rural route No. 1 of Armagh Station, awarded to Georges Roy, April 1, 1932, expiring March 31, 1936, and renewed on October 9, 1935, for a period of four years.

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of the complete file respecting the contract for mail delivery on the Armagh rural route awarded to Mrs. J. A. Blais, January 11, 1932, expiring December 31, 1935, and renewed September 24, 1935, for a period of four years.

WABASSO COTTON COMPANY

On the order for motions:

Mr. WILFRID GARIEPY (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, there is a matter of great urgency which I should like to bring to the attention of the government. In my constituency is located the Wabasso Cotton Company which under normal conditions employs around 2,000 people and operates day and night. I am informed that last night a strike was declared. A strike had been declared last fall on the eve of the general election, but the differences were settled after some negotiations. The men now claim that the conditions of labour, wages and other matters have not been complied with; serious trouble has arisen, and the matter is one which should receive immediate consideration by the government. I gave this information this morning to the Department of Labour, but I should like to know if the government is possessed of all the information and if it intends to take steps to remedy the conditions obtaining in respect to this plant at Three Rivers. Both parties should be protected, especially the labour element, which are likely to suffer most if these conditions are allowed to continue.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that my answer is in order. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Gariépy) was kind enough to give me this morning notice of his question. I immediately took up the matter with the chief conciliation officer of the Department of Labour, who communicated with our representative in Montreal. I hope to receive a report on the whole situation very shortly.

RETIRING ALLOWANCES

PROPOSED ALLOWANCES AT AGE SIXTY AND OVER

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North) moved:

Whereas there exists in Canada an acute unemployment situation;

And whereas, it is desirable that as many as possible be absorbed into the useful industrial life of the dominon;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting adequate retiring allowances to all citizens over sixty years of age, thereby giving an opportunity to large numbers now unemployed to be reabsorbed into useful productive activity.

He said: As I rise this afternoon to propose this motion I cannot help being reminded of the fact that it is just about ten years ago that the house passed the existing old age pensions law. Even at this late date I would express my own appreciation and that of my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) of what was done by the then government, many members of which are in the present cabinet, and thank them for the kind and courteous reception we were given in 1926. I trust that on this occasion we shall receive the same sympathetic consideration as we got about ten years ago.

Mr. JACOBS: The majority is a little larger now.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, I know that; I realize quite well that conditions to-day are not exactly what they were in 1926. Two votes are perhaps not as important in this parliament as they were ten years ago. Nevertheless, I say again that we appreciate the kindly sentiments expressed on that occasion, and I do hope that the resolution now on the order paper will meet with the same sympathetic consideration. For, after all, a principle is the same, whether it is endorsed by a majority of two or of one hundred; and I assume the principle underlying the question of old age pensions is the same in 1936 as it was in 1926.

The scope of the present act is rather wide; it takes in, I believe, seven of the nine provinces of Canada. There are at present two provinces in which the old age pensions scheme has not yet become operative, but in those provinces where the act is an established fact we can regard that piece of legislation, in my opinion, one of the most important in the way of social legislation which the house has ever enacted, as a permanent part of their social laws. I do not think any government, whatever its political complexion may be, will ever see fit to repeal the act once it has been in operation.

I was rather surprised to discover that, in the seven provinces in which the scheme is in operation, there were prior to and including March 31 of last year, 101,051 persons in receipt of old age pensions. That number was exclusive, of course, of Quebec and New Brunswick. When those two provinces come under the provisions of the act we shall have, I am satisfied, a considerable addition to that number. I understand that in New Brunswick legislation is pending in that regard, and I am also led to believe that in Quebec legislation is likely to be introduced in the near future to extend to the old people of that province that long needed relief which I know many of them have been looking for in the past few years. The situation in Quebec at the present time is somewhat similar to the state of affairs that existed in this house in 1926; they have not a stable government there, so that the old people in that province are likely to come into their own at an early date.

The constitutional difficulties that have so often been thrown in the way of the passage of social legislation in Canada seem to have been successfully overcome so far as old age pensions are concerned; and to-day, I am pleased to say, there is no question about the validity of this particular law in this country. Further, I think it can be asserted that, considering it was a new piece of legislation in this dominion, and presented difficulty in many ways because it was a dominion statute operated by provincial authorities, the act is working fairly well, with one or two exceptions which it is not necessary for me to go into at this time.

One point which during the past few years must, I think, have become obvious to practically every member, irrespective of his party affiliations, is the necessity for a much lower age limit than that which applies at the present time. I believe we must all regard seventy as too high an age limit for pension after a person has served the state in one form or another practically throughout his life. In other countries—and I am referring now to countries within the British empire—the age limit is much lower than it is in Canada. In Great Britain it is sixty-five, and in Australia it is sixty-five for males and sixty for females, while in certain instances, in the event of incapacity, the age limit for men in that country is sixty. Practically the same age limit is in force in New Zealand; therefore it is much lower than it is in Canada.

There is to-day a very large volume of opinion, not merely in this country but in other parts of the world, in favour of reducing the age limit at which people receive pensions, not only because such a measure is humane, not only because it is an act of humanity to take care of the aged and the needy, but also on account of the problem confronting us from the economic standpoint—the problem of unemployment. In the last election the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) came out in favour of old age pensions at the age of sixty; he thought it would be a good thing. In the United States there is a large and growing body of opinion in favour of paying old age pensions at the age of sixty. I am not referring at the moment to what is commonly called the Townsend revolving plan; I am not sufficiently familiar with it to be able to discuss it at all. In addition to that plan, which is taking a firm hold on the people of the United States, we find one of the prospective candidates for the Republican nomination for president there, Mr. Borah, in favour of granting old age pensions at the age of sixty, the pension to be between fifty and sixty dollars a month.

The reasons that can be given why we should grant pensions to persons of sixty and over are very many, but I shall discuss only a few of them. To-day we are living in a competitive age, an age which is different from any former time. We are living under conditions that are different from anything we have known heretofore. The struggle for existence is becoming keener and keener, and men to-day at the age of sixty find themselves in a position in which it is practically impossible for them because of their age to obtain the means of livelihood. In the second place, when a man has worked under such keen conditions as those under which he is compelled to work, he is practically of little value in the industrial field when he reaches the age of three score. There are very few employers of labour who employ men when they have reached the age of sixty. The consequence is that when a man has reached that age he has either to shift for himself as best he knows how, or become the recipient of either public or private charity. There is very little opportunity to-day for men to save out of their earnings anything to put away for what we may term a rainy day, or for old age. I know of many firms in this country who will not employ men when they are even over forty years of age. At fifty, positions become extremely precarious, and at sixty it is almost impossible for men in these days to find work; in fact a man at sixty or over becomes a drug on the labour market.

We often ask ourselves the question: What is the nation's greatest asset? It has been asked in the house during the past few days. Some might say it is property; it is buildings, or it is natural resources, but I believe if we ponder the question a little further we shall arrive at the same conclusion, that the greatest asset we have in the Dominion of Canada is the people themselves, our Canadian people. Then, if we come to determine the question whether we should look after the rights of property or the rights of our Canadian people, I think our sympathies as well as our interests will lead us to assist the human beings who comprise our Canadian population. It is often stated that the individual has a duty to the state. I believe that, but at the same time I believe the state also has a duty toward the individual. For after a person has worked and given of his best during his life time to help in building up the country and making it a proper place to live in, when he reaches old age; when he has arrived at the age of sixty, he is entitled to receive something in return for his services. There ought to be between the state and the individual as reciprocal relationship which does not exist to-day. An individual can give of his best until he is sixty or sixty-five years old, and all of a sudden he finds that he is cut off without any means of subsistence. The duty of the state as well as that of the individual is to promote the well-being of all concerned. Is it fair to ask the individual at times so to humiliate himself or herself as to become the recipient of either public or private charity? We have at this time in the dominion 1,200,000 men, women and children in receipt of public relief. That figure does not take into account the vast number of men, women and children who are recipients of private relief in one form or another. There must be in these days a very large number of these people who are sixty years of age or over and who find themselves on the bread line through no fault of their own.

I think I can state with a certain amount of assurance that practically every hon. member would say he is sympathetic to the idea of pensioning people when they reach the age of sixty. But I suppose those same hon. members who will tell me they are favourable and sympathetic to this idea, will come along with a very hoary and musty question: Where is the money to come from? If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) were in his seat, I would ask him whether we have in this country enough in the way of foodstuffs to give to all the people in Canada who are sixty and over, a reasonable amount by way of food, and I believe the minister would reply to me that we have more than sufficient for that purpose. Then, if I were to turn to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), I would ask him, if he were here: Have we in this country sufficient clothing and shelter to satisfy all the reasonable requirements of our people over the age of sixty? I think I should receive from the hon. minister the answer that we have more than sufficient for those purposes. Then I would turn to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), whom I see in his seat, and I would say to him: Have you enough money to satisfy the requirements of those over the age of sixty? And I would be met with a most emphatic "No." There is the contradiction. Enough food, clothing and shelter in the Dominion of Canada to satisfy all the reasonable requirements of these people of sixty and over—no doubt that would be admitted by the members of the government—and yet when it comes to trying to give to these people of sixty and over those requirements which in our corporate capacity we have produced in this country, we say: You cannot have them, because there is something that stands in the way of your being able to receive those things to which you probably have a right. When I ask the question whether the money will be forthcoming, knowing as I do that I shall receive that negative reply from the Minister of Finance, I feel like inquiring whether that same question was asked in the years 1914 to 1918, when this country spent approximately two billions of dollars. Was ever the question asked when that money was being spent, not to conserve or to preserve human life, but for the very reverse purpose: Where is that money coming from? The money was there for the very simple reason that we had its equivalent in the way of goods and services that we could give either to the people of this country or to those who required it. So if to-day we have in Canada the goods and services to maintain our population of sixty and over, there should be no difficulty, if only there is the will to do it, to find ways and means of providing for those people that reasonable standard of living which they have a right to expect. Between 1914 and 1918 approximately half a million people were taken out of productive work in this country, and were engaged in destructive work. Yet in spite of the fact that half a million of the flower of the country's manhood were taken out of productive employment those who were left behind were able to maintain that half million in the work they were doing and to provide for themselves a decent standard of living. We can go even beyond that. During that period there was no shortage in Canada either of men or of money to carry on the work of the war.

If to-day everyone at the age of sixty were taken out of productive employment this would have a twofold effect: First, it would provide for people many of whom are hardly able to give a proper day's service in industry, and then it would give to our young people an opportunity to do some useful work, an opportunity which has been denied to thousands of them since they have left school.

The government also must find money with which to carry on the services of the country, and part of that money is obtained by borrowing. I remember very well—and I want to bring this incident to the attention of the house—that in the fall of 1930 we had a session of parliament lasting only a few weeks. We were called into session in order to provide the means of giving relief to large numbers of men and women who at that time were out of work. The government of the day came to the house and asked for a large appropriation, out of which $20,000,000 was set aside for the provision of food, clothing and shelter for the unemployed in Canada. What happened? The first thing done by the government of the day, as by both previous and subsequent governments, was to go to New York where they obtained a loan of $100,000,000. In the meantime there were vast numbers of people anxiously awaiting relief, but until such time as that money was obtained from the bankers of New York the people of Canada were unable to obtain the relief that was so badly required. The farmers of the west, together with the workers in the cities, had produced wealth in abundance, food, clothing and shelter; yet before our people could eat that food and before they could obtain that clothing and shelter we had to go to a foreign country for permission to do so. If there is anything more topsyturvy in our economic structure than a situation of that kind I should like to know where it may be found. In other words we must get permission from the bankers of New York before we can eat the foodstuffs we produce in our own country.

I realize, further, Mr. Speaker, that to give a pension of $50 a month, which is the sum I have in mind, to people sixty years of age would probably require half the total revenue of the dominion. I know the minister could not afford that; I know it would require a vast sum of money, but we must bear in mind that this sum of money would go into circulation in this country in the purchase of food, clothing and shelter, because as a rule the workingman lives to the limit of his income, and the same would apply to those in receipt of a pension of $50 a month from the government. To take care of such a situation I am in favour of a limited form of controlled inflation. Some hon. members may be afraid of that. I know in Great Britain people thought the whole country was going to collapse when a few years ago it was feared that she was going off the gold standard. An election was fought and a government was returned on that issue, to keep Great Britain on the gold standard, but it was not long after that election before she went off the gold standard. In those countries which have gone off the gold standard and where there has been a limited form of inflation, nothing very serious has happened.

Perhaps at this point, while dealing with that aspect of the question, I might give the figures relating to the older population, as prepared for me by the bureau of statistics. In 1931 the number of these people in Canada was as follows:

Age	Number
60 and over	870,428
61 and over	792,936
65 and over	575,831
70 and over	344,697

At the present time slightly less than one-third of the people of seventy or over, numbering 344,697, are in receipt of the old age pension. When Quebec and New Brunswick come under the scheme, naturally that proportion will be materially increased; it may be nearer one-half than one-third. I shall assume, however, that of the 870,428 people over the age of sixty probably not more than twenty-five per cent would be eligible for or entitled to a pension, when all things were taken into consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Evidently I have misunderstood his resolution, because I thought it called for adequate retiring allowances for all citizens over sixty years of age, and I have been preparing to deal with that question.

Mr. HEAPS: I knew the minister would try to find a little loophole on which to argue. Let us take the intent of the resolution rather than its exact wording, and I am giving the intent now. I am sorry if I have punctured the minister's argument.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend want all citizens to be pensioned or does he not?

Mr. HEAPS: It is just as I have said.

Mr. DUNNING: The resolution says so.

Mr. HEAPS: In any measure enacted by parliament there are always regulations saying who may be entitled to come under the act, and so it would be with a measure granting pensions at sixty. There are many people in executive and other positions who, at the age of sixty, might well be allowed to remain in their position, who would still find something to do. As I am pointing out, less than one-third of the people of over seventy years of age are receiving old age pensions at the present time, and we can base our arguments in connection with this matter on a somewhat similar mathematical calculation, except that on the average there would be fewer people requiring pensions at sixty than there would be at seventy. I think that is quite obvious, because at sixty a person has an opportunity of putting something away to provide for himself and those dependent upon him, but when he lives to the age of seventy, what he may have saved in the interval will have disappeared.

I am free to admit that this problem of old age is becoming more important as the years go by. Medical science has made such rapid strides that the average span of life has been greatly increased during the last few generations. Unfortunately the application of our economic laws has not kept pace with our knowledge and application of the laws of medical science, with the result that the percentage of our old people to-day is greater than it ever has been. I was surprised when I received these figures from the bureau of statistics, showing the large population of what I might call elderly people here in Canada.

Now we may speak of the cost. Many things may be offset against that. At the present time it is costing us a large sum of money in the way of relief to maintain our people, to maintain them in institutions for the care of their health, or even in our penal institutions, for it has always been found that in times of unemployment penal institutions are filled to overflowing. I venture to say that if we set off against the cost of pensions at sixty the advantages that would be gained, the cost would be much less than it would at first appear to be. I mentioned a few minutes ago that in 1914 and the following years we spent approximately two billion dollars on a war in Europe and all that that entailed. The product of that war was little other than misery. I believe few people in Canada would ever again be willing to have this country become a party to a war in Europe or anywhere else. But if we could afford to spend that enormous sum for human slaughter, disease, misery, and all that follows from war, does not the house think it is far better in this day to spend some money, not for the slaughter of human beings but in a war that will preserve life, a war against poverty and disease? May I quote what the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said recently; I do not do this very often. Speaking on the night of October 14, after the election results were known, he said:

> The struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land.

Those are fine sentiments; they sound even better to me because they were spoken after the election instead of before. I say to the Liberal party: Carry out to the very letter that statement of the Prime Minister. I want to see the Liberal party in this house war against those evils which the Prime Minister mentions, against poverty and adversity, and fight for the economic liberty and security of the masses of the people of this country. What security have they to-day? What security has the man of sixty, or even the man of fifty, to-day? None whatsoever. To-day, as I know and as most of us know, there are innumerable instances of men who have worked ten, fifteen, twenty years for a large corporation; then at a moment's notice a man may receive a slip stating, "Your services are no longer required," and he has to go out on the street and shift for himself as best he can. Yet these same large corporations use horses and when those horses have done their work and are no longer required they are not told to go out and shift as best they can. No; they are kept in the stable; they are fed and sheltered for the rest of their days. It is in the very nature of our modern industrial life that these large corporations treat human beings much worse than they treat their old horses.

I may be told that the statement of the Prime Minister will be lived up to by the Liberal party. All I can say is that I hope they will do much better in future than they have so far. May I say to my friends of the Liberal party that although they won the last election by a very large majority they have not yet achieved victory. Far from it. Victory will be achieved by the Liberal party and by this parliament only when we have eliminated those conditions of which I have spoken, when we have given to the people of Canada that economic security, that liberty to which every Canadian citizen is entitled.

So far we have heard very little as to what the future policy of the government will be. We are told that it will be unfolded from time to time during this and other sessions of parliament. I am free to admit that some of us are rather impatient; we want to know with as little delay as possible what the policy of the government is going to be in regard to giving our people that economic security which they have a right to expect. The mere lowering of trade barriers between this and other countries is not a remedy for the evils from which we are suffering, for if all the trade barriers between the nations of the world were thrown down to-morrow we should still have a tremendous unemployment problem. I do not believe in sending our foodstuffs and other goods of which we are supposed to have a surplus to other countries when our own people are compelled to go without them; we should first satisfy the needs of our own people. I say to the government: Adopt a bold and definite policy. If they do that they will receive the support not only of the small group I have the honour to represent in the house but of a large section of public opinion outside as well.

The motion I have proposed has a number of specific objectives. First, it aims to take out of industry people aged sixty and over and so give to the younger people the opportunity of doing something useful instead of being recipients of public relief. It aims at putting into the hands of the people a much larger volume of purchasing power than they have at present. For any minister or any hon. member to rise in his place and say that this or that is impracticable is not sufficient in the circumstances in which we live. We look for something definite and positive from the government. If this is not the right way of going about what we seek to do I hope the government will show what is the right way. Instead of meeting this resolution with negative criticism I hope the house will deal with it constructively, and if this is not at least a partial way out of the difficulty I shall be only too happy to support something which will show better results.

Mr. E. J. WERMENLINGER (Verdun) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, with your leave I wish to discuss the resolution of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I promise that my remarks will be brief.

[Mr. Heaps.]

The hon. member moved:

Whereas there exists in Canada an acute unemployment situation;

Every one realizes this fact and I, perhaps, more so than the majority of members in this house, owing to my association with the school board and city council of Verdun.

And whereas, it is desirable that as many as possible be absorbed into the useful industrial life of the dominion.

Such is the wish of all; however, a paragraph seems to be missing between the second and the last one. The hon. member for North Winnipeg concludes:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting adequate retiring allowances—

I agree to this. In fact, in a greater degree than any other hon. member have I the privilege of representing in this house a constituency whose population is composed entirely of workers, who find themselves today in dire straits. However, I only wish that, between the second and third paragraphs of his resolution, the hon. member for North Winnipeg had inserted: "Unless work can be provided," either revenue-producing work, useful work or necessary work; for it might be dangerous, at present, to grant pensions to people over sixty years of age. I do not know, Sir, whether I am transgressing the rules of the house, but, representing a constituency made up in equal parts of people of English and of French descent, one half of which are artisans such as bricklayers, carpenters, joiners and plumbers, at present unemployed, the other half belonging to the so-called "white-collared brigade," it strikes me that, at this stage, our main object should be to provide legitimate and remunerative employment for our people.

I fully endorse the speech delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church); I did not hear it in full, but I read it with pleasure in hansard. However, I am not ready to express an opinion on the questions of housing and of slum-clearance.

On behalf of the workers of my constituency may I say, Sir, to the hon. member for North Winnipeg that I should have preferred to find an additional clause in his resolution, between the second and third ones, for I agree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) that it is work that our labouring classes seek. I shall not stress the point further, as I shall have an opportunity in the near future to deal more thoroughly with this important question of remunerative work.

May I point out that during the past forty years Verdun has suffered from numerous floods; we have been constantly compelled, in order to protect ourselves, to raise the level of our embankments. These floods are due to works carried on by the dominion government down stream. either in Montreal harbour or at Victoria bridge, where the piling up of the ice in the spring raises the level of the water. Because of its low-lying ground, the city of Verdun is in a unique situation and has always suffered from floods. We have never asked for aid; we have perhaps shown ourselves too-self-sacrificing.

I do not wish to discuss any further the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I wish the house to understand that I am in favour of pensions being granted at a reasonable age, but before fully endorsing this resolution I would like to see our artisans obtain remunerative work.

In closing, I wish to thank the members of this house for the courtesy shown me, especially the members of my party, who have so cordially welcomed me in their midst.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much time in discussing this resolution, but because many meanings could be comprehended in so many words and because some hon. members may attribute to the motion meanings different from those intended by the mover, I think it would be well to look at one or two aspects of the matter, and to review the underlying philosophy governing the thought of those supporting the proposal.

The resolution states that it is desirable that as many as possible be absorbed into the useful industrial life of the dominion; then it proposes to take out of the industrial life of the dominion a great many men who have become expert in their respective lines, and whose labour has been most useful not only to themselves but to the communities in which they have been employed and to the country at large. The resolution contains these words:

> Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting adequate retiring allowances to all citizens over sixty years of age, thereby giving an opportunity to large numbers now unemployed to be reabsorbed into useful productive activity.

The argument is advanced or implied that by this method large numbers now unemployed would be reabsorbed into productive and useful activity. I notice however that while the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), who moved the resolution, gave the numbers enjoying old age pensions in seven of the provinces of Canada, and while that burden is such as to bear very heavily upon many of those provinces, he gave no estimate, at least that I could hear, of the number of citizens who are not suffering from old age, the number who at sixty years and beyond that are young men and women and are usefully employed. He did not give an estimate of the number who would be withdrawn from useful occupation, or the cost to which the country would be put in giving adequate retiring allowances as a result of legislation to be passed immediately by this chamber. No evidence either in numbers or in money was given as to the cost of such retirements. No evidence was given as to the capacity of the country to pay such retiring allowances, nor did we hear any evidence deduced as to the wish of individuals to retire from useful employment.

I know that at one time the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) suggested the payment of a retiring allowance to people over sixty years of age, and the country overwhelmingly rejected that idea.

An hon. MEMBER: No, they did not.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Absolutely. Wherever one went he heard that young men of sixty, like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), and many other young men—and I was going to say young women, but the plural would not be in order; I will content myself with saying young people of both sexes—

Mr. MacNICOL: Why the singular?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member suggested that the plural would not be in order. Why use the singular?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am afraid that for the moment I ceased to address Mr. Speaker, and was addressing the house. However, young people of both sexes—

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to correct the hon. member, because he has not correctly stated what I said.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should be glad if the right hon. gentleman would correct me.

Mr. BENNETT: I corrected it once. I did not suggest that anyone at sixty years should be compelled to retire.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not think I said that. I believe Hansard will bear me out in my statement that I did not say the right hon. leader of the opposition insisted that it be done compulsorily. I said that the right hon. gentleman some time ago gave support to a proposal to retire people at the age of sixty, on an adequate retiring allowance.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not to retire them —to provide for their retirement if they so desired.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I leave it to the legal or literary purist to say how much difference there is between what I have said and what the right hon. gentleman has indicated as to the meaning of what he said. No evidence was given as to the capacity of the country to absorb this added load, and to compensate it for the loss of material, physical, intellectual and mental wealth which would be entailed if this change were brought about. Furthermore, no evidence was given that such a change would result in increased employment for the younger men, or increased production in those industries about which the hon. member for North Winnipeg has spoken.

Let me go a little further and give the house my opinion of what is the underlying philosophy of our friends of the socialist party in their attitude toward this and similar questions. After listening to their proposals for the past few years it seems to me that they are of the opinion that the principal trouble to-day with this country is that we are overwhelmed with wealth or the means of producing wealth. Because we have so much, they say, we are suffering from a state of poverty. There is no truth at all in that philosophy, as I see it. I listened very carefully to see if my hon. friend would attempt to prove that this country was suffering from an overproduction of wealth or from the capacity to overproduce wealth. During the last few years the socialist party has sent its members up and down this country spreading this theory abroad. They have contended that the main trouble is the fact that we are able to produce or have produced an overabundance of goods. The hon. member for North Winnipeg touched upon that theme to-day. He said that he left it to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to say that we had far too much food in this country, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) to say that we had far too much goods in this country.

Mr. HEAPS: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I leave it to the judgment of the house and of those who read Hansard.

Mr. HEAPS: If the hon. member will allow me, that is not what I said.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I leave it to the readers of Hansard to decide the meaning of what the hon. member said when he addressed the Minister of Agriculture and asked if there was not much more food in this country than we could use. I made a note of what he said. He said that we were sending foodstuffs to other countries while our own people were suffering. Since I have been challenged, I should like to point out that our people are not suffering from a lack of foodstuffs, because we have too much foodstuffs. Many of the people are suffering because of the lack of certain kinds of food or certain kinds of clothing, or a certain kind of wealth. We have not in the past produced, we are not producing and we are not likely to produce in the future, any large quantities of these foods—

Mr. LANDERYOU: How about coal? The farmers in the western provinces are not getting enough coal.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Where?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Right in the province of Alberta.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There must be a reason. It simply means that they are not producing coal or are not producing some other form of wealth to exchange for coal, or that the facilities for exchange are absent.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is it necessary to ship coal out of Alberta when the farmers cannot buy it and when the coal miners are on relief?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If my hon. friend produced a ton of coal and I went to him and said I was his neighbour living only twenty miles away; if I told him I had no coal and would like to have some, he would ask me what I had to exchange for it. If I told him I had nothing to give him for the coal, and someone from Saskatchewan came to him for his coal and had something to exchange for it, to whom would my hon. friend give his coal?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to point out to my hon. friend that the farmers of Alberta were producing pork which could be turned into bacon at a time when the coal miners were on relief.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That argument is quite familiar to me. It is one of the falsities that underlie their philosophy. Their argument is that so much wealth is being produced by the coal mines of Alberta that they ought to go and give it to everyone, whether or not they have anything to exchange for it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the hon. member aware of the fact that three years ago the miners in southern Saskatchewan were practicaly starving beside their coal mines at a time when the farmers were unable to sell their meat, their eggs and their produce and yet had no coal with which to keep themselves warm?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friend's question is put in the form of an absolute statement. I do not know whether his statement is correct. However, I do know of some people who have been living in northern Saskatchewan, in the midst of the forest. These people have suffered from cold because of lack of fuel, and yet they were living in the midst of the woods. There were so many trees they could not see the forest. The other day the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I think it was —I will apologize if I am wrong—stated that in the wooded areas of northern Saskatchewan he had seen people living in small one-roomed log shacks. These people had gone in to hew out homes for themselves and make farms. At that time I asked him why they did not build larger shacks when the logs were so abundant. Hon. members will remember the answer I received—because they did not control the saw mills. All around me in this chamber are hon. members who know that you do not have to have a saw mill in order to build a log shack.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I correct the hon. gentleman?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have no intention of letting my hon. friend correct what I say.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not interrupt unless the hon. member who is speaking gives his permission.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member has said that I stated that these people could not build larger log shacks because they did not control the saw mills. That is an incorrect statement of what I said, as will be shown by Hansard. Am I permitted to state what I did say?

An hon. MEMBER: Hansard speaks for itself.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I hope a note is being made of these interruptions so that I may be given a little extra time if necessary. However, I do not expect that I shall require any extra time, because I believe I can demolish this argument in less than my allotted time.

The hon. member stated that he had seen these one-roomed shacks, and a little later I asked him why these people had not built larger shacks, and he replied, because they did not control the saw mills. The fact remains that he stated that these people were living in these one-roomed log shacks in the midst of the woods. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of the coal miners at Estevan not having enough coal for fuel. I should like to make a statement which any hon. member may correct if he thinks it to be wrong. There are only one or two things to be done by the people of this country in order that they may have a comfortable supply of material things. One is that they shall produce the goods or wealth that they are most fitted to produce from the resources which the country possesses. If they produce more wealth than they can use, the quantity over and above what they require can be exchanged with their neighbours, whether they be in the same town, in the same province, in the same dominion or across the seas, for the goods that they need but cannot produce. If institutions such as this parliament, the provincial legislatures, the town and city councils, the school boards, the banks and trust companies and all other lending agencies refrain from charging, or if the people refrain from agreeing to pay, an undue amount for such services as may be rendered, then with the initiative and energy of our people, with the industry and equipment that we possess, we cannot help but prosper. This country has the climatic conditions—even in Saskatchewan where it sometimes touches sixty below zero—the resources and other things necessary to the creation of sufficient wealth for the people. This statement must be amended to the extent of saying that there are bound to be exceptions. There will always be people who cannot earn a living, and our governments have taken cognizance of the fact that there are always the sick or injured, the aged poor and the helpless young to be taken care of.

I should like to go a step further and refer again to the underlying philosophy of our friends who move such resolutions as this. You who have been in this house so long, Mr. Speaker, know it. I want to give an instance that came to my notice. I am going to quote from a gentleman who is a leading member of the socialist party and endorsed by the present titular head of the Saskatchewan socialistic party.

An hon. MEMBER: Name?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not know that I should name him; I do not wish to bring him into notoriety nor have I any desire to cast any reflection on him. He has never done anything to me; in fact he has helped me and I want to thank him for it. But he came to the village near which I live and addressed a meeting, and he had distributed this blue-coloured pamphlet. One of these pamphlets came into my possession legitimately and I will quote a few lines as indicating the philosophy that underlies the argument of my hon. friend to-day. I know that my hon. friend does not mean this resolution in its entirety; I know him only too well to know that he does not intend it, in its entirety, to be taken practically, but politically. It may be all right at times to say some things, and that is one of the troubles at the moment in this dominion—people taking advantage of conditions to make statements which in their sober moments they might hesitate to make. In any event, this booklet was distributed; it was sold to anyone who cared to buy it. It is entitled, Co-operation or Catastrophe, and as I say, it is written by an eminent member of the socialist party who occupied a seat in this house for many years. It is:

An interpretation of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and its Policy, by William Irvine, M.P.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friends say, "oh," and perhaps they think I should not demean myself by quoting such a pseudo-economist. But I want hon. members who say "oh" to remember this. While they are familiar with the value of these theories, while they know them for what they are worth, there are hundreds of thousands of people who find themselves in a difficult position when my friends come along with these pseudo-economic theories and tell them that unless they follow these theories something disastrous is likely to happen. That is the cause of a good deal of our trouble. These pseudo-economists tell the people that the reason we are hard up is that we have produced too much and exchanged too much and that governments take too little from us, whereas the opposite is the truth so far as these three conditions are concerned.

Let me read a few lines from this pamphlet—and remember this is not a newspaper. The argument is intended to show that there is no way in the world whereby Canada can exchange her surplus commodities for the surplus commodities of other lands and so enjoy the benefit both of the things that nature has endowed us with in this country and the things that nature enables people in other countries to produce—people in other lands more favourably situated with respect to the production of certain commodities. I quote from page 13:

Every country has a surplus of almost the same kind of goods. There are no new countries left for capitalism to exploit. There is not in the entire world a foreign market sufficient to keep capitalism going. In other words, capitalism cannot exist without foreign markets and there are no foreign markets.

I would point out that in this paragraph "capitalism" is used interchangeably with "private ownership." There is no market for the things produced under private ownership; there is no market in the world for goods because too many goods have been produced or could be produced. And here is the proof—I quote:

Take, for instance, automobiles. Someone has estimated that the United States of America could make a sufficient number of automobiles to supply eight worlds the size of our world at the same ratio of users to the population of the eight worlds as now applies to users in the U.S.A. to-day in relation to the population of that country. With such a capacity output the U.S.A. must try to sell its automobiles to all the other countries of the world. But at the same ratio of users to population Canada can produce automobiles for three worlds the size of ours, so she must also try to sell her automobiles outside of Canada. Great Britain can make enough automobiles to serve five worlds as large as our world, so she also must find a market; then France, Germany, Czechoslovakia and Japan, etc., can all make more automobiles than the world could use. Where, then, is the foreign market for automobiles? Obviously no such market exists, nor is there a foreign market for all the other commodities which are produced in common by the industrialized nations of the world.

I do not need to enter into any argument to convince the house that all industrialized countries have not the same kind of goods in the same abundance; and as my hon. friend has pointed out, even in Alberta, coal is not common under all circumstances and in all places, because he said some people there suffer from lack of that commodity in Alberta, and in southern Saskatchewan, where some coal fields are located. But let us follow the argument; let us try to get at the truth or the fallacy of it. I realized at once the ridiculousness of the argument. If it were true, then the Liberal philosophy of trade and exchange would fall to the ground absolutely. If every country were self-contained, if every people had within their own surroundings all the wealth they needed, there would be no necessity for them to exchange anything with any other country; they could supply all their own requirements from within. If all industrialized countries had the same wealth in the same quantities, there would be no point in seeking to exchange one form of wealth for another, so long as men with health and intelligence cared to work.

If I do not put anything else on Hansard, I certainly wish to have this go on record as an indication of the fallacy of the argument of this economist, formerly a member of the socialist party in this house. I find that in the United States to-day there are a little over 125,000,000 people. The population of the world is estimated at something over two thousand million people. These figures, of course, are not exact. At best they are but estimates, but they are the closest that we can get. There are in the United States over 25 million motor vehicles, one to every five of the population. If the United States had to produce automobiles for another world the size of this, at that ratio of users to cars, there would have to be built in that country 400 million cars. To supply eight worlds the size of this world with motor vehicles the United States motor industry would need to produce 3,200 million motor vehicles.

An hon. MEMBER: Some production.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That would be some production. Now coming to Canada, I find, according to this statement which I have quoted, that Canada could produce cars for three worlds the size of this world, as compared with a possible production in the United States of cars to supply eight such worlds; consequently Canada would produce three-eighths of the automobiles produced in the United States if she supplied the people of three worlds. That would mean 1,200 million automobiles to be produced in Canada if this dominion had to fulfil the prophecy made by Mr. Irvine on behalf of his party.

I have inquired what the life of the modern vehicle is and I have had various estimates of four, five and six years. Suppose we put it at six years. That means that the Canadian automobile industry would have to renew the supply of cars for these hypothetical worlds at the rate of 200 million a year.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say that in Alberta.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No; he was all right in Alberta as long as he could get away with it. But when he came to Saskatchewan the people there did some mental arithmetic and they took pencils and made their own calculations. At the rate of 200 million automobiles a year, it would seem that the industry in Canada has been very lax during the last few years, turning out 250,000 per annum—many of these cars assembled in Canada from material manufactured across the line. Many of the cars coming into this country, moreover, have been imported entirely from other lands. Taking the weight of materials in modern motor vehicles, we find it requires an average of about 3,500 pounds apiece. That is a ton and three-quarters, equivalent to 350 million tons of material that have been fabricated into them without any allowance for waste; 350 million tons of steel, rubber, copper, and other materials of that nature. And the statement is calmly made here to those who will accept it without thinking that the Canadian automobile industry could easily turn out and use 350 millions tons of material in a year in turning out 200 million automobiles. Possibly some people would still believe that that was true. In looking for the truth or falsity of that argument I was not satisfied to use my own judgment completely. I took up a little booklet, which I hold in my hand. It is called America's Capacity to Produce, a digest of a study made by the Brookings Institution, Washington, D.C., published in 1933-34, and this is what I find. I want to give it to my hon. friends opposite who really believe that industry in this and other countries could do the things that they have been saying they should do and could do if properly organized. I want to tell him, what everybody will acknowledge, that the industries of the United States have been efficiently and effectively organized to turn out large volumes of wealth. I find on page 18 of this digest of the studies made by the Brookings Institution an article regarding automobiles, and this is what it says:

> The magnitude of the motor vehicle industry and its growth during the period under review give it particular interest. By and large, production has trod hard on the heels of capacity from the birth of the industry up to 1923. An apparent recession in 1918 was due to the transfer to war work. The slump in the depression of 1921 was succeeded by an even faster rate of growth in the two following years. After 1923 there was a pronounced flattening out in the rate of growth, whereas the building of additional capacity continued.

The percentage of utilization was comparatively high up to 1923, but since that time it has shown a clear trend downward, averaging 83 per cent of practical capacity for the period from 1925 to 1929.

Our friends who use this booklet in their campaign, and the gentleman who wrote it, argue that the United States should be able to turn out 500 million cars a year. They have been turning out 3 to 5 million annually, and the Brookings Institution says that that is within eighty-three per cent of practical capacity. Is it reasonable to believe they could have turned out anything like the numbers that the speaker says? When you find the principal witness in a case or a plaintiff coming to the bar of justice and making a statement which the jury, the judge and all the spectators can demonstrate to be notoriously false and inaccurate, is it reasonable to place much dependence on anything else he may say? I submit it is not.

We find that other statements made in campaign gatherings by our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are just as inaccurate. I hold in my hand a press report. If I am not allowed to read it, I will quote it from memory.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin): You are out of order, anyway.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I know I am out of order. If I were in order I would do a whole lot better than I am doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that he is not in order. He must confine himself to the matter under discussion.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I want to rectify something that I had forgotten—to congratulate you on your elevation to the chair. I do it now with the greatest of pleasure, because I know, sir, that I myself and every other member of this house can look to you confidently, knowing that we will receive the utmost courtesy and the utmost consideration.

An hon. MEMBER: Justice.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And justice will also be part of the courtesy and consideration which will be given to new members like myself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, there is no rule, I believe, that prevents the reading of an article such as that to which the hon. member refers. But I do submit that for the last quarter of an hour the speaker has not been confining himself in any degree to the resolution before the house. If we are to throw this debate wide open, all very well; we on our side will claim also the right of the widest discussion. But I submit that the purpose of the resolution is to discuss a concrete proposal, with which, I also submit, the present speaker has not been occupied for the last quarter of an hour or twenty minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the point of the hon. gentleman is well taken. I have just called the hon. member (Mr. McLean) to order, and I think he is now abiding by my decision and directing his remarks to the resolution before the house.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, I am anxious and determined to obey the rules of the house in every respect. I am surprised that during the speech of the sponsor of this motion my hon. friend's attention was not drawn by other members to the fact that he was out of order. He told the house that trade was no solution at all; that we are sending foodstuffs to other countries when our people are suffering—many similar extracts from his speech may be taken out of Hansard. I submit that I have not been within a mile of being so far out of order as he was, and for the leader of the socialist party to take up two or three minutes of my time in suggesting that I am out of order is, may I say, scarcely courtesy.

An article from which I wish to quote very briefly is directly linked to the resolution now before us. The resolution asks that people over sixty years of age should be retired with an adequate allowance, thereby giving an opportunity to large numbers now unemployed to be reabsorbed into useful employment. The mover referred to that as the reason for the proposal. I have here a news item entitled, "Outlook hopeless for young people, says Garland,"—that is Mr. E. J. Garland, who was the representative of an Alberta constituency at the time this speech was reported. It says:

Mr. Garland emphasized the tragedy of the hopeless outlook for the rising generation, stating that the youths of to-day were being simply poured out into the world, with no prospect for any kind of jobs.

I submit in that case it was not fair to these people to say that there was positively no hope for the young people of the country. I submit there is much more hope for them to-day than if the socialist plan were adopted. I hold a chart of that plan in my hand. The idea is to put all the unemployed in the civil service, to divide society into seven groups——and the particular function of our price fixing and adjustment board is to fix the remuneration for services rendered, to each of these groups of society so that an equilibrium may be maintained as nearly as it is humanly possible to do so.

In the civil service they would put the third group, and——this includes our unemployed, who are already maintained by society as a whole.

They are to be given the same remuneration as farmers, industrial workers and other people of this country.

I submit that the resolution before us is not wise, that no evidence has been submitted that it would be a good thing for the country or a good thing for the people. I said a while ago that many people of sixty feel that they are in the prime of their lives, that they are able to turn out better work than they were able to do before. I know that there are many over sixty among our returned men who have the right, perhaps, to expect more generous treatment than they are receiving at the present time. The law provides for them at sixty the same old age pensions as it provides for others at seventy, and it may be that it is desirable to extend special consideration to them; but to say that for all the workers who wish to retire, even if it were not compulsory to do so, adequate retiring allowances should be given, I think is a mistake.

We are sometimes told that the trouble with the world is that there is so much of everything we might have and that we are not using. I remember, and I wish to quote from memory, the words of one of the greatest economists in Europe to-day, Doctor Gustav Cassel, of Stockholm. He says: "We are told to-day that the trouble is that this is an age of plenty, that we cannot distribute it. It is not yet an age of plenty. In 1928, when production was at its height, when the factories were open for longer hours than they were before, and when the machines were running faster than they ever did before, we were turning out barely as much wealth as was required to satisfy the people of the world on the scale upon which they were accustomed to live at that time." That being true of 1928, when the wheels of industry were running at their fastest and when there were no unemployed at all who were able and willing to work, if this economist was correct—and I submit that there is no greater name in the economic science of Europe to-day—we were producing barely enough for the needs of the people on the scale to which they had become accustomed.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask a question?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Just a moment and I will be through. Why is it, then, that to-day we are living on a poorer and lower scale? There are three principal reasons. One is that we are not producing the wealth we were producing at that time; we are not producing the amount of wealth this country could produce. Why is that so? One principal reason is the mistaken policies of this and many other countries that have not allowed us to exchange our surplus wealth in the markets of the world in order to bring home our wages. It is not enough to sell our wealth; we must be allowed an opportunty to bring home our wages in the form of goods or services we wish to buy from other countries, and during the last five years in particular in this and many other countries we have not been allowed to do so. There is another difficulty, to which I have already referred. Many governments have provided services at which our forefathers would have scoffed. These services may be and in some cases are desirable, but many of the things that have been done were neither imperative nor essential. That is another factor contributing to present conditions.

Now I want to give my hon. friend, who wished to ask a question, and who was courteous enough not to interrupt me, an opportunity to put his question.

Mr. LANDERYOU: If it is true that we are in an age of scarcity I should like to ask the hon. member why we do not put the unemployed to work to create more.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is a fair question, and I will try to answer it. It is absolutely true that to-day we are in an age of relative scarcity in Canada. Let me give an illustration. I was going to say that for the last five or six years providence has failed to shine, but that is not what providence has failed to do. Providence has failed to rain on southern Saskatchewan, Alberta and parts of Manitoba, and because providence failed to weep on that land it did not produce the wealth we had been accustomed to see there. The grain was burned up by weather conditions, and the people in that part of the country are hard up to-day principally because they were unable to produce that wealth. That is true in many other lands. It is not possible to put the unemployed to work to remedy that situation. I do not know how many unemployed it would take to water even an acre of wheat. We have no rain producer, like Mr. Hatfield, who came to Alberta and took a good deal of money from the farmers of parts of that province on his undertaking to produce rain. I have no doubt my social credit friends are quite sincere; they think they have found something that will be helpful. I hope they have, and that they will have an opportunity to apply it, but the real reason we are poor and hard up is that we have not produced wealth to the extent to which we were accustomed. Take the grain production of the prairie provinces; my hon. friend knows as well as I do that for five or six years we have not produced anything like the amount of grain we formerly did, and as a result we have not had it to sell or exchange for the things we cannot produce ourselves to advantage.

It is another fallacy, I think, to say that this is not an age of scarcity, that we need not suffer for the lack of things we might like to enjoy. Anyone who has produced plenty, who has used it carefully, who has exchanged the surplus for something produced by his neighbour, who has not had too great a toll taken from him by any institution and who has not suffered misfortune, injury or ill health, knows that he is well off.

Another favoured assertion of my hon. friends is that to-day we have an age of machines as against men. This is not an age of machines at all; this is the great age of men, and machines are only the evidence of it, machines that have been made to take over the physical labour, the drudgery, the slavery, the long hours, to take them from the human frame and put them on the machine, where they belong. Do any of my hon. friends think machinery is going to come down from above like manna, that it can be made without physical labour? You cannot find the machinery that is needed in Canada in the drop of ink that lies at the point of a fountain pen. Machines have to be made. Machines do not produce wealth; they simply process further the wealth that men have produced from the resources of nature.

I think my time is almost exhausted, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to thank you and the house for the very courteous reception you have given my argument. It has not been delivered, perhaps, in a very eloquent way, or as clearly as I might like to present it, but when hon. members investigate it they may find that the kernel is there and that if they take advantage of the opportunity of chewing that kernel it will be to their economic enlightenment.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us looks in the direction of extending the Old Age Pensions Act. It is perhaps rather unfortunate that the administration of that act has been transferred from the Department of Labour to the Department of Finance. I suppose the transfer is very natural; the actual administration is so largely under the provinces that so far as the dominion is concerned it is almost entirely a matter of finance, but still I think it puts this kind of legislation in rather an unfortunate position. It makes us think in terms of finance rather than in terms of the needs of the people, and it is to that latter point of view that we should direct our attention to-day.

This is not quite the place or the time to discuss the failings of the present act, but in passing I should like to point out that a great deal of hardship has been caused because of the long residence in Canada that is required. There are many people who came from Great Britain as bona fide settlers who have not lived in this country long enough to qualify under the act. Further, there is an even greater difficulty in Canadian citizens passing from one province to another, which often means that for a good many years they cannot qualify in the province to which they finally removed. I hope the time will come when we will consider Canadian citizens as such irrespective of the actual part of Canada in which they have been living. Again, I think, because of the property qualifications, a good deal of hardship has been caused in the actual administration. A great many people find themselves unable to qualify because of tiny bits of property which perhaps to-day are liabilities rather than assets. In addition we all recognize that the amount of $20 a month is a very, very meagre allowance. I wish that could be increased.

In the resolution now before us we speak of adequate retiring allowances, and there are two points that we should keep in mind. The first is that the amount we give the old people should be adequate to maintain them in a respectable way. It is hardly adequate to-day. Further than that, I am glad to note that my colleague has adopted the phrase "a retiring allowance." As it is to-day, frankly, the old age pension is more or less on a charity basis. I hope the time will come when we will consider that during their working period the older people of this country have done enough work to enable them to claim this allowance as a right rather than as mere charity. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution links up the necessity for a lower retiring age to the present situation of employment in this country, in these words:

Whereas there exists in Canada an acute unemployment situation—

The debates of the house during the last few years will, I think, make clear to anyone that we have had an acute unemployment situation in this country; at the present time some 400,000 people are out of work.

And whereas it is desirable that as many as possible be absorbed into the useful industrial life of the dominion.

The very question that we were discussing on Monday; I do not think it necessary for us to traverse that ground again. Various solutions have been proposed, among others shorter hours. I think that would be a good thing. If there are 400,000 people unemployed there is no reason why the work should not be distributed more equitably so that everyone would have something to do; that is one line of attack. And we have in this resolution a second line of attack, that is reducing the working forces. Now it is quite evident that a good many people at sixty are well able to carry on; on the other hand many people at that age are not in their prime. At the other end of the age scale we have tens of thousands of young people for whom there is no opportunity of work. It is to those young people that we seek to give a chance. I have known homes in which the father, a man of sixty to sixty-five years of age, half-crippled, is working in the shops while his young healthy son of twenty-five is living on the family simply because he cannot get work. Surely it would be a good thing if the father should receive a retiring allowance that would take him off the labour market and give that young man a chance to go to work. That is the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: Does the hon. member intend that such a man should be compelled to retire?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; we do not intend to compel him to retire any more than under the present Old Age Pensions Act we force men to retire at seventy. But if a man wishes to retire or is incapable of carrying on, then we give him an opportunity to retire.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Would the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation be agreeable to retire at sixty?

Mr. HEAPS: Let the hon. gentleman put that question to his own leader first.

Mr. DUNNING: How much has my hon. friend in mind as "an adequate retiring allowance," in the terms of the resolution?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think my hon. friend who proposed the resolution suggested $50 a month. I do not mean that that would bring great luxury, but it would be an advance on the present $20 a month. We are attempting to set a certain standard by suggesting an "adequate retiring allowance," a high standard if you will. In the actual working out of legislation a great many factors would have to be taken into consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think it is very high.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is a great deal higher than the present $20 a month, and we think it would be more or less adequate, having in view the ordinary salaries and wages being paid to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: When I said that I thought it was not very high I had in mind the argument which my hon. friend was making previously, which I am sorry I interrupted, in which he was developing the idea of making it sufficiently attractive for the old men to retire in order to make room for the sons.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think at the figure suggested it would do that. Perhaps both my colleague and I are thinking more particularly of the great masses of the people engaged in manual work. There are large numbers of those people who would gladly retire on $50 a month.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Does the hon. member include women in that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. Any individual—man or woman—should have the right to retire. I fancy that in working out legislation of this kind in the case of a man and wife, we might give the wife a smaller amount, say $30, so that the total for the family would be $80 a month, something of that nature. At the present time a very large number of wage earners in this country are receiving only $600 or $700 a year. If we offered a family $50 to $80 a month this would make reasonable provision for their old age and I think a great many would be willing to accept that retiring allowance and thus give their sons and daughters a chance to take their places.

I do not propose to follow the speech of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean); I hope the line of attack which he has taken is not going to be characteristic of the approach of the Liberal party to this subject. He made quite an elaborate disquisition on what he regards as the position of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. He said our position is that we have too much wealth in this country. None of us has ever taken that position. We do believe that there is in this country an enormous amount of potential wealth which is not being fully developed. I am quite familiar with the pamphlet of the Brookings Institution from which he quoted, but may I point out that the Brookings Institution were speaking of the machinery of production as we now have it, and its utilization to full capacity. With that we can produce a great deal more than is being produced to-day.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On a question of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the hon. member, who raised the point of order as to myself, is now in order in traversing my argument.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. gentleman is absolutely out of order. Considerable latitude is being given in the treatment of these questions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The arguments of the members opposite, if you can call them such, were put forth long before we called attention to the point of order. I say that we believe there is great potential wealth in this country. Referring to the document of the Brookings Institution which was quoted, I point out that the consuming power mentioned was limited to what economists call effective demand, that is what the people can pay for. Undoubtedly there never has been any very great surplus over and above what the people can afford to purchase. But if you take another document issued in the United States by a group of economists and technicians, to which I have referred before, that report to the president not long ago clearly showed that if the machinery of production that exists in the United States were used to full capacity it is quite possible to produce the equivalent of $4,400 a year income for every family in the United States. I do not need to go further along that line.

These contentions of ours may be characterized as pseudo-economic theories. I submit, however, that in view of the actual situation and in view of the great need of finding markets for our products, and the huge number of unemployed, it is high time that the Liberals should revise their theories and adopt some plan that would enable them to take care of the present situation. The hon. member for Melfort said that there was no evidence as to the numbers eligible and the cost. That reminds me strongly of the arguments advanced ten years ago when some of us proposed that there should be old age pensions at seventy. It is true that one can make only a guess at these things; that was true in England when old age pensions were first proposed, but the population of the different countries conforms to certain general laws, and other countries which have had social legislation of this character for some years are now in a position to advise us as to what the numbers and approximate cost would be. My colleague referred to those figures.

As I have said, there is nothing in the resolution suggesting that any person would be compelled to retire at the age of sixty. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) received a delegation from the Trades and Labour Congress he passed off somewhat lightly the demand made along the lines of this resolution when he suggested that if every person over sixty were bound to retire this would affect both himself and the leader of the delegation, Mr. Draper. That may be quite true. As a gentleman to my right said a few moments ago, it might be that I would have to go, because I have gone beyond the sixty mark. It would probably mean that the Prime Minister would have to go and it would certainly mean that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) would have to go. But such a pleasantry does not answer the question. Some of us may be able to carry on for a few years longer, especially those of us who have been engaged in intellectual work.

No one wishes to force a man capable of carrying on to retire, although sometimes I think it would be to the advantage of our country if we had a larger proportion of young men in this chamber. We might get some new blood which would bring something of greater value than we have been able to give in the past. I suggest however that such a reply as that given by the Prime Minister does not solve the problem. If some of us were forced to retire, without adequate superannuation, I rather fancy a good many of us might find it extremely difficult to obtain suitable employment. University presidents who are retired at sixty or sixty-five sometimes find it extremely difficult to find other suitable positions. I need not stress that point to hon. members. Any person who has been away from his own profession for ten, fifteen or twenty years and suddenly finds himself thrown out, without any reserve, would, even though intellectually acute and able, find himself in grave difficulties when he went about securing another position. I have known only too many people who have been in that position.

I am not thinking however so much of the intellectual workers, but rather of the manual labourers. To-day in many industries men are being laid off not at sixty but at fifty, and sometimes forty years. Certainly no man is taken on in ordinary industry after he has reached fifty years of age. A great many people find themselves in very distressing conditions when at sixty years they are laid aside and cannot hope to obtain old age pensions until they reach the age of seventy. I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that with the exception of the farming population five-sixths of the working class population in Canada are employees. That means that with the wages they have been receiving they have had no opportunity to lay up very much by way of reserves. Further, we know there is a considerable turnover in the personnel in nearly all our factories, which means that many of our people may have worked in ten, twenty, thirty or forty different establishments between the ages of, shall we say sixteen and sixty. No one particular establishment has any responsibility for such an employee who reaches old age. The last firm which employed him has no special responsibility when he reaches the time he must retire. Some employers who may have a greater sense of responsibility and are more humane than others may seek to keep employees in their service after they have passed the period of greatest efficiency. There should be some general provision, however, and industry as a whole, or the state, should have the responsibility of seeing that a man who has done good work between the ages of sixteen or eighteen and sixty should be decently looked after in his older days.

There is nothing very radical in the resolution, notwithstanding the observations of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean). There is nothing particularly socialistic in it. I say it is an honest effort fairly to meet one of the outstanding practical and personal problems facing us to-day. I would hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who since this affects his department will undoubtedly reply, would give the matter serious consideration. The resolution is not offered by way of criticizing the government for what it has not done in the past. We have a new government to-day. The resolution is not put forward as a result of any special theory, unless it be this, that the needs of Canadian citizens should have priority, and that in a country potentially as rich as Canada there is no reason for elderly people suffering hardship. That is our plea for reducing the age at which old age pension or retiring allowance may be received.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Would it suit the purpose and carry out the intention of the hon. member if the present act were amended, or if the age were changed to sixty years instead of the present seventy years?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It would go quite a long way, but not the whole distance, because I believe the present allowance is too low and under present arrangements the old age pension is virtually a charity. I should like to have it on a basis whereby a man reaching the specified age and otherwise qualified might receive the pension without any sense of humiliation. We have retiring allowances for judges, for members of the civil service, and for certain other classes of employees. I do not know why we could not have an arrangement whereby others might receive retiring allowances without suffering humiliation thereby.

Mr. BAKER: Does the hon. member not think that the age of sixty-five would provide sufficient change?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Certainly if we cannot have sixty we would welcome a compromise of sixty-five.

Mr. BAKER: Many men are young at sixty-five.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so.

Mr. WILTON: Is it assumed in the resolution that the federal government will take full responsibility for the added cost or is it to be added on the percentage basis, as now exists, a certain proportion of the cost being placed on the municipalities, many of which are now in a very unsatisfactory financial condition?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are not drawing up a bill, but simply advancing a plea that the age be lowered. I believe there is much to be desired by way of revision of the present act. Personally I should like to see a larger proportion of the cost borne by the federal authorities. I realize that the municipalities are in no position to contribute more than they are contributing to-day. Further than that, it may be advisable to include old age pensions as part of a still wider scheme of social insurance. If I understand the Prime Minister's position I believe it has been more or less in his mind through the years that old age pensions would simply form part of a wider scheme including disabilities of different kinds.

Before taking my seat may I suggest that among other things I should like to see included provision for the blind, because blind people are virtually old from the time they become incapacitated. However may I repeat that we are not drawing up a bill, but merely urging a principle.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, with your kind permission, before saying a few words about the subject under discussion may I offer congratulations to the hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) upon passing another milestone in life. Perhaps I may be permitted also to express the hope that he has many years ahead of him and that many of them will be spent, not on this but on the other side of the chamber.

I would not intrude into this debate did I not realize and appreciate that a new member making his initial effort is given every possible consideration by older members who have had more experience. My main reason for taking part in this discussion is my long experience with young men and young women. I concur with the mover of the resolution (Mr. Heaps) in his expression of sympathy for the young men and women of this country because of the position in which they find themselves to-day. That position is not of their own making; they have been called upon to suffer intensely because of conditions prevailing at the present time. I gained further encouragement from listening to the very able address made earlier this week by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I offer him my sincere congratulations upon his address. I hope that some of the principles which he enunciated will be brought down in the form of legislation in the very near future so that we shall have something concrete to discuss and not have to continue to deal with abstract problems.

For the past eight years we have been going through a period of distress, but this is not the first time in the history of the world that a period of distress has overcome us. I look back to the latter part of the seventeenth century when our forefathers were changing over from hand to machine labour and think of the distress that followed in the wake of that change. I look back to the social revolution that followed immediately the change in the economic life of the people of that time. Conditions which prevailed then were similar to those which have prevailed during our own lifetime. We have seen a remarkable economic change in the adoption of electrically driven machines and other types of machinery which have largely relieved man of heavy labour. Between the industrial and social revolutions occurred the Napoleonic wars which aggravated a rather unfortunate situation. In our own day the great war accentuated conditions which would have occurred even though the war had not taken place. We are in the midst of change and we must readjust the social fabric of this country to meet the changes that have taken and are now taking place. The main trouble and difficulty in Canada is the fact that compared with other countries of the world we are many years behind in social legislation. We have not kept up with the economic and industrial changes which have occurred during the past twenty-five years.

I should like to point out one peculiar fact in connection with conditions which prevail in this country. During the early part of this century we entered upon a period of tremendous expansion. I recall the words of that great Canadian statesman, a man who led this house for many years, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he said that the nineteenth century belonged to the United States of America, but the twentieth century would belong to Canada. That statement was true then and is true to-day; the only difficulty is that we started to build on the expectation of an immediate realization of that statement. The development of Canada has been impeded by the war and by industrial conditions which developed after Sir Wilfrid made that statement. We are overdeveloped in our railway system; we are overdeveloped in our industrial system; we are overdeveloped in our governmental system, and the result is that we find ourselves unable to cope with a situation which at its best would have been bad enough but which was further aggravated by this period of tremendous expansion.

We have considerable unemployment in our midst to-day. The other evening the remark was made from the other side of the house that unemployment began to be felt only after 1930. Unemployment actually made its presence felt in this country in 1925; it was only accentuated and forced upon our attention in 1930. Government reports show that in the heyday of our prosperity, in 1928, the number of unemployed in Canada was actually 146,000 people. That figure did not take into account those who are usually unemployed, such as the indigent class which we have with us always, or those who are seasonally unemployed. The figure shows that the unemployment situation began to develop long before 1930 when it was brought home to us so forcibly.

It would be useless for me to attempt to inquire into all the various causes and reasons which might be advanced for the depression out of which we are striving to find our way at the present time. It will be sufficient for me to direct the attention of hon. members to some figures. Lack of income on the part of our Canadian citizens is responsible to a large degree for the over supply of materials and commodities with which we find ourselves. I notice that in 1929 the total income of the Canadian people was $5,500,000,000; in 1932 this had shrunk to $3,181,000,000, a shrinkage of over two billion dollars. When you take out of circulation in this country a purchasing power of over two billion dollars the natural consequence is a lack of employment and a lack of ability on the part of the people to get the wherewithal with which to enjoy life.

There is another point I should like to raise, one with which all hon. members on this side may not agree. A year ago my faith in the Conservative party was emphasized and re-established in no uncertain degree by the series of addresses given by our leader. The statements that he made at that time were implemented by measures passed by the house, which measures represented considerable progress in social legislation. It is my hope and expectation that something further will be done along that line and that the legislation passed last year will be found to be in order and will be supplemented by additional legislation introduced at this session by the present government. We are in dire need of advanced social legislation; the Canadian people are clamouring for that type of legislation, and rightly so. I feel that they have a right to demand it, for in my opinion it is the first duty of the state to provide for the sustenance of the people living within it. The statement I wanted to make, with which many members might disagree, I would put in these words: We have reached a point where we know there is a surplus of labour. I am going to say this, and I am open to contradiction and correction if I am wrong in my line of reasoning and the conclusions I have reached: Never again in the history of Canada are we going to have a balanced budget in respect to labour conditions in this country. There will always be a surplus of labour in the labour market not only of Canada but of the world, and for that reason I am keenly urging that some action be taken in relation to social legislation in order to meet a necessity which has arisen and is bound to remain with us. This surplus of labour must be looked after; it is our duty to look after every class of citizen living in Canada. And these people can be taken care of only by means of legislation such as is proposed in the motion before us and legislation of a similar type.

As I said in the first place, I am expecting great things from the new Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Although he sits on the opposite side, I admire his capacity; I know his ability and I feel that if he is given a free hand by other members on his side of the house he will bring in legislation that will tend to alleviate some of the distress with which we are faced at the present time.

In conclusion I wish to emphasize this fact as forcibly as I can: Social legislation must immediately be introduced and we must take cognizance of the fact that there is a surplus of labour in the labour market; we must take cognizance of the fact that there will always be a surplus of labour, and we must adjust our social legislation to meet a circumstance of that kind.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): The resolution brought forward by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) will not increase the total number of men employed. One section of the working army is to be retired and a new section is to take its place, but the unit strength of that army will remain the same. It will not increase the total amount of production and therefore will not increase the total amount of purchasing power. I go further: it will decrease the wages paid.

My friends are a bit uncertain as to the cost, one mentioned a total army of 870,000 which was to be retired, and another suggested a payment of $50 a month or $600 a year. There would therefore be a total bill to meet of $120,000,000 a year. That sum must be met; it must be paid out of total production, and therefore there will be a smaller total to distribute, and as a result a lower net or real wage going to the worker. I go further; it will decrease the total number of men employed, for the simple reason that when you add a burden of this kind you have greater taxes to pay; and in the matter of taxation there is even now in the dominion a burden too great to be borne. Certain industries under pressure now would decline, fail and go out of business.

It would add a greater burden to the industries which are competitive in the export market of the world, and therefore they would not be able to produce in the same volume as before, and so there would be a decline in the total number of men employed.

I know that my hon. friends who have spoken this afternoon represent largely the labour interests. It is most astounding that we should see standing up in this house to-day leading representatives of labour bringing forward a proposal, which can do nothing but reduce the wages of the employee and decrease the total number of men employed. I wonder if this is the greatest constructive suggestion they can offer. I leave that baby on their doorstep; it is their own. I ask them, if the opportunity comes and they may have the chance, to explain in what way this is going to improve the position of the worker, either in so far as numbers are concerned or as regards the wages paid to the individual.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): In seconding this resolution proposed by the hon .member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), I felt that I was merely supporting a resolution that would direct a certain matter to the attention of the government, asking that a certain principle should receive consideration. We did not nor could we lay down the exact terms in which this matter could be carried into legislation. That will be the function of the government if and when they feel that the resolution has merit. Before going any further I wish to quote very briefly from a statement made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this house in the session of 1925, which can be found in Hansard of that year. Old age pensions were being discussed at the time, and this is what the present Prime Minister, who was also at that time Prime Minister, said:

> There is need for society to assist in the protection of its members against a condition which simultaneously places burdens upon the workers whose day's work is done, and on the worker whose day's work is just beginning. If the young are to be given a fair start in life, the care of the aged should not be their first responsibility.

That principle holds true to-day in a far greater degree than in 1925, because the conditions that exist to-day, which put a greater responsibility on the young as well as on the aged, are intensified. There was never a time when it was more necessary than it is to-day to make provision for people for whom industry has no use. There was never a time when this could be more easily done, because there was never a time when the means and the material with which to do it was as great as it is to-day.

The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Deachman) asks whether we have taken the expense into consideration. Yes, we have taken expenses into consideration, and we know what they are. All the expenses involved are the labour it requires to bring those material things into being. All other expenses are merely those that arise because of the property relationship that exists in human society to-day. When one set of people own and another set of people do not own, every single item that enters into the lives of those who do not own must come out of the property and income of those who do. So as long as this property relation exists the question of expense will be always with us. But once we overcome that question of property, the matter of expense will disappear, and we can go on and develop the resources of this country so as to provide not only for the necessities of life but for the comforts and luxuries as well. To-day, because of the profit system, the masses of the people are living in poverty, in misery and in insecurity in the midst of plenty. That is the situation.

So far as we in this corner of the house are concerned, we ask the government to do, not the limit that we should like to see done, not the things that we believe are possible to be done, but the things that we believe are within the ambit of their own program. That is where we stand on the matter. I have been a member of the working class all my life. I know that there are many men to-day over the age of sixty who would be very glad to retire on a pension of much less than fifty dollars a month. I know also that there are many people in industry whom their employers are keeping at work, although they realize that their industrial efficiency is gone. There are various reasons for this. In some cases they do not wish to throw them on the scrap heap of unemployment; in others, some protection is afforded to the employee by trade union regulations and such things as that. Recently the province of British Columbia made a survey of unemployment in that province. It shows very clearly how unemployment increases with advancing age. In examining figures for a ten year period experts find that there are 4,300 persons on relief between twenty and thirty years of age, 5,188 between thirty and forty, 5,636 between forty and fifty, 6,526 between fifty and sixty and 4,345 between sixty and seventy. I think that gives an indication of how difficult it is for people who are getting up in years to find employment in industry at the present time. In British Columbia employers in the lumbering and fishing industries do not want men over the age of thirty-five. In the lumber industry they can get all the active young men they want below that age. I visited quite a number of plants in British Columbia this year, particularly the works of the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company in Trail, and it was really amazing to note the youth of the employees as a whole. It appeared to me that there was not a man over fifty years of age working in the whole of that huge plant.

Something must be done to take care of these people. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) said that the means of overcoming the situation that confronted us to-day was quite simple. All we had to do was to go on producing all we could produce and then clear away trade barriers and exchange our surplus goods for the surpluses of other nations. That is quite a reasonable and a logical thing to do. But the fact of the matter is that it cannot be done; that is, it cannot be done at the present time and under the present system. Let us take as an example the largest free trade area in the world. The United States of America, with its 130 million people and with an enormous territory where they are capable of producing almost every known commodity, is to-day the largest free trade area in the world, and if free trade in itself could effectively distribute the fruits of industry, why are there eleven million people unemployed in the United States? Why are there approximately 21 million in the United States on relief? You cannot settle the question by declaring that it can be solved simply through clearing away trade barriers. The reason it cannot be done in that way is that certain people in the world to-day, even in the Dominion of Canada, are receiving so much of the total pool of production that they do not know what to do with it; they could not exchange it and use the commodities that they could get in exchange even though they wanted to do so.

During 1934 and 1935 we had a commission sitting on price spreads and mass buying. I am not going to take up the time of the house with any extensive discussion of this report, but I would like to call your attention to one of the industries investigated at that time. It was found that the average wages in the tobacco industry were $555 a year. Reference was made in the investigation of one of the tobacco firms to others beside the workers who produce the wealth by manufacturing the raw material into saleable commodities: others were getting income as well. The president, Gray Miller, was receiving in those years of depression, from 1929 to 1933, $25,000 a year. Besides that salary he received as a bonus in 1929, over $45,000; in 1930, over $61,000; in 1931, over $40,000; in 1932, over $32,000, and in 1933, over $44,000. How can people receiving incomes of that size exchange the values which that income represents and consume the values received in exchange? It cannot be done. Going on a little further: the vice-president, D. C. Patterson, was receiving a salary of $40,000 a year. Compare that with the average wage of the employees, $555 a year. And besides that salary of $40,000 he received a bonus each year: in 1929 it was $75,000; in 1930 it was $102,000; in 1931 it was over $67,000 and in 1932 it was over $53,000. Do you wonder that there is a surplus of commodities that cannot be consumed, although there are people who are ready to consume them?

Now I shall take up another tobacco manufacturing plant, the Macdonald manufacturing plant.

Mr. DUNNING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think you once ruled that this discussion should relate to old age pensions.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to the subject matter of the discussion. We have wandered a little too much in the discussion to-day.

Mr. MacINNIS: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will try to keep within the rules of the house, but the question has been raised as to where the money is to be found and I am trying to show the house where the money can be found. I have referred to the Imperial tobacco company; I refer now to the Macdonald tobacco company. One man took out income at the rate of $5,000 a week or $260,000 a year. It would take an individual employee of that factory 468 years to take out of the industry as much as the owner took out in one year. That is where the money can be found. I do not find very much fault with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) for trying to stop the discussion there, because it does not look very well, but still these things will have to become known.

Mr. DUNNING: I must object, Mr. Speaker. I merely raised the point in the interests of compliance with the rules of the house, and with no other motive. My hon. friend cannot impute motives to me, and I must ask him to withdraw that imputation.

Mr. MacINNIS: I accept the minister's explanation and withdraw—

Mr. DUNNING: There is no explanation at all; my hon. friend must withdraw the imputation of motive which he has attributed to me.

Mr. MacINNIS: I said on the explanation given by the minister I was willing to withdraw. The minister said he was calling your attention merely to the rules of the house, with no other motive, and I am accepting that.

There is not very much more I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, except to express the hope that the government will take this matter into consideration, having in mind not merely the wording of the resolution but also its intent. If they cannot go all the way I am sure that those of us in the little group in this corner will be very grateful if they can go any distance at all.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr Speaker, I am opposed to the proposal enunciated in this resolution; I am opposed to putting any more burdens or artificial barriers on business to-day in the two industrial provinces of Canada. The other night, it is true, I did support the expenditure of public money, and I am prepared to support it again. To-day we are spending $100,000,000 on relief in this country, federal, provincial and municipal, and it was shown before the housing committee last year that about two-thirds of that amount, or $60,000,000, if distributed among the carpenters, bricklayers and labourers of all kinds in wages would get thousands of people off the dole and back to work. I believe an economic arrangement of that kind could be made.

Let us have a look at the cause and effect of this resolution. It is simply state socialism, to which I am absolutely opposed. I do not think it will afford the unemployed any more relief than the special academic pleading of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) the other night, when he had before him the example of England and the United States as to what could be done in regard to reconstruction and housing within the ability of this country to pay. This question of unemployment is a matter exclusively for this parliament. Here we make the tariff, the immigration laws, the banking and commerce laws and so on, and for that reason we must be responsible for unemployment. One of the glories of the Victorian era was the fact that the people kept the state. If the socialists both in and out of this house go much further it will be a case of the state keeping the people, first, last and all the time. William Pitt was prime minister of Great Britain at twenty-three—

> A sight to make surrounding nations stare,
> A kingdom entrusted to a schoolboy's care.

—but every age does not produce a Pitt.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this resolution would have the very opposite effect to what I think is intended by the mover (Mr. Heaps). I am sorry I did not bring down with me the return asked for by the late Mr. McCrea, an old member of the house for Sherbrooke, which showed that eighty per cent of the cash taxes of this dominion were paid by the two central provinces. The heavy burdens and artificial barriers placed upon business to-day in Ontario and Quebec are driving many business men to the wall and are one of the main causes of unemployment and unrest. Let me say to my socialist friends that the right to possess private property such as a job is derived from nature, not from the state or from man. That is a principle that has been known for many years, and is not the title to a job property? This parliament of Canada and the state has no authority to abolish that right, but only to control its use and bring it into harmony with the public good. The state has no right to abolish private property; a man's job is his private property, and the government has no right to take that away from him.

Last year the party to which I belong provided a new deal and a new future for the people. I cannot speak for this corner of the house officially all or any of the time but I can say that we are just as much opposed to state socialism as we are to the laissez-faire policy of the Liberty party and to economic liberalism and state and social credit socialism. As it is, this country is burdened with debt to an almost impossible extent owing to the war and the cost of daily increasing social services, so that we are threatened with a condition in which no one would be working and the state would have to keep not some of the people some of the time but all of the people all of the time. We are consistent protectionists; we believe in protection all the time for all the people, not some of the people some of the time. We favour protection for the iron, the coal and steel industries for the farmer and for all classes, and for the industrial worker who is foreclosed, the same as the farmer and fisherman. Who but the former Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) would have done the work he did for this country for the past five years? What man of sixty or under could have done this so efficiently? This party is just as much opposed to economic socialism as we are to the economics of the Manchester school and economic liberalism held by the Minister of Labour. We do not want mob coercion. Modern capitalism shares a great deal of the blame for economic conditions in this country and must clean house and adopt a new set of rules—every living game has to have new rules from time to time and the capitalistic system requires a new set of rules to bring it up to date. But in any system the principle must be retained of every man working for himself, instead of state socialism as called for in this resolution. We in this country will never become slaves; the state will never take away our freedom. We must cure these evils of unrestricted competition, starvation wages, sweat shops, long hours, monopolies, child labour and all such things; we should be better employed in giving our attention to these matters rather than to the proposed resolution, which will get us nowhere and destroy every industry in central Canada which pays the bills mainly for all Canada.

Who is going to pay for all this? It would just go on the taxes of the industrial provinces and industry would practically have to close up. This whole idea started about twenty years ago. Most of us remember a distinguished citizen of Toronto, Sir William Osler, who graduated from McGill and went to the great Johns Hopkins hospital in Baltimore and became professor of clinical medicine there and afterwards went to Oxford. The hon. members for West York (Mr. Streight) and North York (Mr. Mulock) represent the ridings in which the father of this celebrated man lived. In 1905 Sir William Osler made a speech in which he said that men at forty are inefficient and at sixty are useless. That has since been proven to be wrong; the war proved it wrong, and conditions after the war have proved it wrong. If we took away from the arts and sciences, from literature and medicine what the men over forty or even over sixty did, we should be back in the middle ages. Of course there are exceptions. Sir William Osler's idea was that the man over sixty is settled in a rigid mental groove so that he no longer has imagination enough to develop new ideas and adjust himself to new conditions. Henry Ford declared recently that men of middle age are stable and experienced and do better work, calling for endurance, which is often shirked by younger men. Had the experience and judgment of the older men been heeded in 1929 the world might have been saved some of the consequences of the stock crash disaster. They gave warning against the vast speculation. The value of their judgment is incalculable, especially in industrial affairs. If all the men over sixty were withdrawn from the financial institutions, banks and insurance companies and labour generally in this country, I do not know what would become of it.

The first duty of the government is to solve the problem of unemployment and distribution and I regret that the government of the day in the speech from the throne have not brought down some measures for the help of what Disraeli called the suffering millions. Those people—the entire working classes—have little to hope for from the statement of the purely academic Minister of Labour in this house the other evening. If that is the best that twentieth century liberalism which put him in the cabinet can do, we have little to hope for from them. I have studied this matter for some time. Twentieth century liberalism is content to sit back and leave these great economic problems to solve themselves. The young Minister of Labour the other night gave a learned treatise of special pleading which might well have been delivered to a mock parliament or in a debate between McGill, Queens, and Varsity, and his announcement to the unemployed was: We can do nothing. Economic liberalism calls for wider markets, which are not available in a world in which there is only economic nationalism. Where are the jobs to come from? Instead of having a real labour man to find jobs in Canada for Canadians, are we to continue the policy of the government that was in power from 1921 to 1930, when over 750,000 young men had to go to the United States to find jobs, many of them returned soldiers who had fought for this country in France and Flanders, at the hazard of their lives, owing to the free trade policies of the government of the day.

In conclusion I want to read a few words bearing on this subject from an article in the English Review for November. The editor of this magazine is a noted economist in the old land, the famous Douglas Jerrold. The writer says:

> As examples of physical as well as mental strength in old age, we have Von Moltke, who was chief of staff of the Prussian army at eighty-eight; John Wesley, who was constantly travelling and who preached almost daily at the same age; and Gladstone, who began his great Midlothian campaign at eighty, and became prime minister, for the fourth time, at eighty-three. Two great artists and a noted actor close the record of aged yet efficient workers. Michel Angelo at eighty-nine was busily engaged on his immortal frescoes; that other master, Titian, painted his Battle of Lepanto at ninety-eight, and Charles Macklin, the Shakespearean actor, performed at Covent Garden theatre as Macbeth at eighty-four and as Shylock at ninety-nine.
> The list of the mentally virile in old age is fairly lengthy; too long to quote with any approximation to completeness, but a few instances extending into our own times may be added.... Among soldiers the most notable were Lord Roberts, and Maréchals Joffre and Foch.

Referring to Thomas Edison the article states he died in 1931 at the age of 84. He produced inventions that benefited the whole world when he was well past 60 and worked in his laboratory till his last illness:

> He declared that a man ought to "work with increasing efficiency" between thirty-six and sixty. Robert Dollar, the founder of the Dollar steamship lines, who died recently at the age of eighty-eight, was convinced he had accomplished more in his later years than before he had reached sixty. Of those still with us, and still at work, the most prominent, perhaps, are President Masaryk, the efficient head of the Czechoslovakian Republic, now eighty-four, Mr. Henry Ford, the poet Rabindranath Tagore (who is still busy conducting his college at Shantiniketan), and that outstanding example of indefatigable physical and mental energy, George Bernard Shaw, who, vigorous at seventy-four, recently circumnavigated the world. His opinion of Sir William Osler's incautious and unreasonable condemnation of all above forty, as partially or wholly incapable, has not, I think, been made public, but it would be worth hearing.

At another point the article reads:

Bacon, it is said, outlined his Novum Organum at the age of fifteen—a statement difficult to believe—but completed it for publication at fifty-nine. Kant wrote his Estimate of Living Force at twenty-three, but published his Critique of Pure Reason when fifty-seven. Handel and Meyerbeer, both precocious composers, wrote, the former his oratorio The Triumph of Time, at seventy-two; and the latter, at the same age, produced his opera, L'Africaine. Verdi, at seventy-one, composed his masterpiece, Othello, and his other brilliant work, Falstaff, in his eightieth year. Isaac Disraeli published his Amenities of Literature at seventy-five, at which age Bismarck was deposed from his chancellorship by the egotistical ex-Kaiser. Victor Hugo, at seventy-five, wrote The History of Crime; at seventy-seven Le Pape; at seventy-eight, L'Ane; at seventy-nine, Les Quartre Vents de l'Esprit; and at eighty, Torquemada. Humboldt began to write at seventy-six his great work Kosmos, and finished it at eighty. Lamarck completed his famous zoological treatise, the Natural History of the Invertebrates at seventy-eight. Goethe completed his Faust when eighty, and Ranke commenced at this advanced age his History of the World, and actually lived to complete it. He died at ninety-one. Tennyson was eighty-three when he wrote Crossing the Bar. Walter Savage Landor wrote his Imaginary Conversations at eighty-five.

What right has the mover of the resolution, an hon. member of the house, to interfere with industry in this way? Why should the house pass a resolution of this kind without first knowing how industries stand? Only last session we had information as to the number of unemployed in the country. We would have to see the cause and effect of the suggested change, and I suggest the cause and effect would not be that which the mover suggests. If we were to develop our natural resources, the products of the sea, the soil, the forests and the mines, there would be work for everybody. A few nights ago I referred to what the Hon. Miss Perkins, Secretary of Labor in Washington, has done for the high school population. In Denmark high schools have been erected which will give adult education and will have the effect of creating work. When speaking on Monday of this week I referred to a former president of the board of education, sitting as a member of the Baldwin government, and indicated he had said that within three years there would be an agricultural economic revolution in the old world, Lord Eustace Percy.

I do not wish to assume responsibility for talking this resolution out, which I can do in three minutes more, because undoubtedly some reply will have to be made by the government. I will state, however, that we should consider seriously cause and effect. Legislation such as is suggested in the resolution would involve greater taxes, and would amount to a restraint of trade and commerce and increase unemployment a hundredfold. I would state further that the government should consider seriously the problem of unemployment, because it is the most important one before us. The very basis of society is at stake, unless we find some up to date solution.

I am in favour of liberal pensions for those who are incapacitated, but I do not favour pensions for people such as I have mentioned, people who are efficient and who are able to work for many years after they have reached the age of sixty. I do not believe there is any demand or agitation from industry that the resolution be accepted. I should like to hear from labour unions and business men before the government would accept the suggestion contained therein.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to assume responsibility for talking this resolution out. I rise to support the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I trust however that we shall not have an organization such as that existing in the United States, because I would hate to see a Heaps plan with the slogan, "everybody for Heaps and heaps for everybody."

I have been amazed this afternoon to hear the variety of subtle objections raised to the resolution. Naturally I expected there would be an objection to the expenditure of the large sum of money involved, but I was more amazed to hear some of the other objections voiced. For instance I was surprised to hear the last speaker deal with state socialism when, after all, the reform suggested in the resolution has been in effect in Denmark since 1861, at which time there was a beginning of a system of non-contributory pensions. If I remember correctly, listening to the radio speeches of the right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) of the last speaker I heard him make a proposition very similar to the one contained in the resolution. It was similar at least in some of the details and would have helped the same people.

The hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman) made an even stranger objection. If I remember correctly he left the baby on our doorstep; I hope the hon. member will not make that a habit, because it is a most unbecoming one. The suggestion he made that we were advocating lower wages and a decrease in employment and production is beside the point, in view of the fact that in 1927 the party to which he belongs, headed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested this very thing, but with an increased age limit. In the present instance we are asking simply that the age limit be lowered and the amount increased; we are not asking for state socialism or for any legislation which would increase unemployment. It seems to me therefore that the arguments advanced by these hon. gentlemen have been beside the point. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean), too, advanced some objections.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 20, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce a bill to repeal 24-25 George V (1934), chapter 25, an act respecting the bureau of translations.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. POULIOT: The explanatory remarks will be brief and to the point. I leave this child on the doorstep of the government.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): It is not my intention to prevent discussion of this matter, which can be discussed in many other ways, but I must submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman is not in order in proposing a bill of this kind. This bill deals with government officials, salaries and the expenditure of money, and it is a well known rule of the house that such a bill can be introduced only by a member of the government after receiving the approval of the governor general. Another point that makes it a bill which it is not in order for a private member to introduce is the fact that its adoption would mean the transfer of authority under which appropriated money is to be spent. The salaries of translators have been voted with the estimates of the Secretary of State's department and have been included as such in the appropriation bill. If this bill should carry it would mean that the estimates would have to be transferred from one department to several other departments. For both these reasons I submit that this is a money bill that cannot properly be introduced by a private member. I may say, however, speaking to the point, that full opportunity will be given the hon. gentleman and the house to discuss this matter in another form.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said that this is a money bill. What are understood, in the standing orders of this house, by money bills, are bills that contemplate increased expenditure. This bill does not propose one cent more of expenditure; the salaries now paid to the translators will not be changed by this bill. But the control will be different. This is the main point; what we are fighting for is parliamentary control over the officers of this house. It seems most absurd that when, for instance, there are mistakes in the translation of public papers issued by this house, we have to go to a minister of the crown instead of to you, Mr. Speaker, to have the error corrected and the wrong redressed. On the other hand—always speaking to the point of order—I submit that a distinction should be made between a bill involving an increased expenditure of money and a bill that deals with the control of civil servants. In my humble view the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) was wrong when he said that this was a money bill. In fact, there is nothing of that kind contemplated in the bill, everything is left to the governor general in council. Personally I am opposed in principle to that form of legislation, but the bill was drafted in that way in order that that very thing should not be complained of. The greater the control we have over the translators the better we follow the general parliamentary rules in force not only here but in all democratic parliaments in the world. Therefore I submit to you that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, although I regret to say so, is entirely wrong. This is not a money bill and it should be considered on its merits. What I said was not only for the benefit of my colleagues in this house but also for the benefit of the government, because the government is interested in having a better control over the translation work which is done here. I was not surprised at all to see an hon. gentleman on the other side of the house laughing when the matter was brought up, because he has shown a great ignorance of all parliamentary principles since I have been sitting here.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely that is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: Are there any other members who would like to speak to the point of order?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not imagine that I am in favour of the bill, but I should like to support the contention of the hon. member who seeks to introduce it. It seems to me that the house has a right to have the bill placed before it. We as members have no idea as to the terms of the bill. We cannot judge whether it is a money bill or not; in fact I do not know whether the Speaker has been given the bill and whether he is in a position to say that it is or is not a bill involving money. It seems to me that when we come to matters of policy, the principle ought to be generally accepted that the house itself should be the judge as to whether or not a bill should be introduced.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order? I will reserve my decision until another day.

Motion stands.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code (fines and penalties).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The object of this bill is to provide that a magistrate or a judge who under the criminal code imposes a fine on a person may give the accused time to pay, or the opportunity to pay by instalments, after inquiring into the ability of the accused to pay. Owing to five years of depression many people on relief and out of work, or on part time, cannot pay their fines and have to go to gaol, many of them first offenders with families, and some returned soldiers, which is another way of imposing imprisonment for debt. The first section of the bill is partly new matter; all the other sections are entirely new. The bill follows the provisions of the law of England, 1935, 25-26 George V, chapter 46, known as money payments (justices procedure act).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*WHEAT DELIVERIES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the equalizing payment for the 1930 wheat deliveries been made?

2. If not, why, and about what date are the arrangements for these payments likely to be completed?

Mr. EULER: With regard to the equalizing payments on wheat, reference to which is made in question No. 1, may I say that since the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made an announcement with regard to the matter perhaps no further reply is necessary. As to the probable date when the payments will be made, it is obviously impossible to give a definite date since the payments cannot be made until after legislation has been passed, but I think I may assure my hon. friend that payments will be made promptly just as soon as the authority is given by parliament. I would therefore suggest that the question be dropped.

Question dropped.

NATURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Which schemes have been approved under the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, and the Natural Products Marketing Amendment Act, 1935, and what are (a) their titles; (b) the dates of their publication in the Canada Gazette; (c) the dates of the adopted amendments, if any?

2. How many convictions have been imposed at the instance of the local boards for violations of their orders?

3. What is the total amount of fines collected?

4. Which restrictions of imports and exports of natural products have been adopted by the governor in council, and what dates were they published in the Canada Gazette?

5. Was any investigation made under Part 2 of the said act?

MARKET GARDENING IN CANADA

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. In what counties of Canada is market gardening most highly developed?

2. What is the approximate value of market gardening products in Canada?

Mr. EULER:

1. In 1930, the counties of Canada which had the greatest value of market gardening products were as follows:

In Ontario: York, Simcoe, Essex, Middlesex, Hastings, Grey, Waterloo, Huron.

In Quebec: Lac St-Jean, Beauce, Témiscouata, Bonaventure, Champlain.

In New Brunswick: Westmorland.

In Prince Edward Island: Queens.

In Manitoba: Census divisions Nos. 2 and 5.

In Saskatchewan: Census divisions Nos. 9 and 15.

In Alberta: Census division No. 10.

In British Columbia: Census divisions Nos. 4, 5 and 6.

In Nova Scotia: Lunenburg.

2. In 1930, the value of market gardening products was $12,695,920.

SPINY LOBSTER TARIFF

Mr. KINLEY:

1. What is the Canadian tariff on South African spiny lobster, so-called, which is known as a crayfish?

2. What quantity and of what value were the importations into Canada of such spiny lobster during 1935?
3. What is the quantity and value of such importations in 1936 to date?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Imported direct from the Union of South Africa or from a country enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff, into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, 17½ per cent less a discount of ten per cent.

2 and 3. While there is no statistical classification item provided for this particular class of fish, an examination of all entries of imports from British South Africa recorded under the general item "Fish, prepared or preserved, n.o.p.," in which these fish are included shows the following imports of canned crayfish entered for consumption in Canada:

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—OVERHEAD

Mr. FAIR:

How many cents of each dollar spent on relief in 1935 were used up in overhead?

Mr. ROGERS: If the hon. member who placed this question on the order paper is in the house, I would ask him to change its terms slightly. As it is now worded it asks for information which is not available in the Department of Labour. We do have information dealing with the proportion of cents in each dollar spent on direct relief, and I would suggest to him that the question might be framed in this way: how many cents of each dollar spent by the Dominion government on direct relief in 1935 were used up in overhead.

Mr. FAIR: That will be acceptable to me.

VETERINARY SURGEONS—MANITOBA

Mr. MUTCH:

1. How many qualified veterinary surgeons are employed by the Department of Agriculture in the province of Manitoba?
2. What are their names?
3. When were they severally appointed?
4. How many qualified veterinary surgeons are rated temporary employees, who are they and when were they severally appointed?
5. Is it proposed to bring these temporarily employed veterinary surgeons under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. GARDINER:

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

G. C. ANDERSON

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Was the Civil Service Commission requested to hold a competition in connection with the replacement of Mr. G. C. Anderson as superintendent of mail contracts?
2. If so, when will such competition be held, to whom is it open and what is the time limit for the filing of application forms?

PUBLIC WORKS CONSTRUCTION ACT, 1935

Mr. STEWART:

1. What public works, consisting of buildings, harbour and river works, provided for in the main and supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936, or by the supplementary Public Works Construction Act, 1935, have not been undertaken or been abandoned?
2. What is the reason in each case for the failure to commence said works, or for the discontinuance of same?

PUBLIC BUILDINGS—PURCHASES OF COAL

Mr. STEWART:

1. How many tons of coal produced in Canada were purchased by the Department of Public Works for use in public buildings in Canada during each of the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935?
2. How many tons of coal produced in the United States were purchased for use in the public buildings of Canada in each of the said years?
3. How many tons of coal produced in Great Britain were purchased for the same purpose during each of the said years?
4. How much fuel oil was purchased for use in public buildings in Canada in each of the years above mentioned?
5. How much coal under the above classifications was purchased by each of the other departments of the public service in each of the said years?

PENSION REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) with reference to order in council, P.C. 91, which was tabled by him last Friday. Is it the intention of the minister to bring this order in council under review by the house or a select committee of the house before it becomes operative, inasmuch as it appears that benefits previously awarded to former members of the forces are seriously restricted?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of the question. As to whether it is the intention to submit the order in council to a committee of the house, it is rather difficult for me to reply at the moment because no committee has been set up, but I may say that it is the intention of the government to set up a committee on pensions and soldier problems. As to whether the order in council itself would be inoperative until such time as the committee has time to propose legislation, I regret to say that I do not believe it has been either the custom or the usage of any government to submit administrative orders in council to committees or to the house. But if it is shown either in the house or in the committee that injustice has been done to any returned soldiers or to any class of returned soldier, there will be no difficulty whatsoever in amending the order in council to bring it in line with the requirements of the persons who are under the care of this department.

RETIRING ALLOWANCES

PROPOSED ALLOWANCES AT AGE SIXTY AND OVER

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Heaps:

Whereas there exists in Canada an acute unemployment situation:

And whereas, it is desirable that as many as possible be absorbed into the useful industrial life of the dominion;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting adequate retiring allowances to all citizens over sixty years of age, thereby giving an opportunity to large numbers now unemployed to be reabsorbed into useful productive activity.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I have no wish unnecessarily to prolong the debate on this resolution, first, because I would like to hear the views of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) on this resolution—I believe that is what we are waiting for; second, because the next resolution on the order paper is one that I consider to be of great importance. When the house adjourned last night I was pointing out that some of the objections that have been raised against this proposal are absolutely unsound. I pointed out that the argument of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), in endeavouring to wave aside this entire resolution by labelling it state socialism, was beside the point. His own leader last year in a radio broadcast made a proposition which in principle was somewhat similar. When I made that statement I noticed the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) shaking his head. I have a great deal of admiration and respect for the right hon. gentleman; and so when he shakes his head I stop and ponder. Consequently I looked up the second of his radio broadcasts, and on page 16 I found these words:

There is another time in the worker's life which must not be forgotten; that time is when, because of old age, he is no longer able to work. As a citizen, he should have security.

[Mr. Power.]

It should be a normal and essential function of the state to see that its people, who have contributed to the productivity of the state, who have given their best to the support of the industrial machine, who have spent their vigorous manhood in labour, are not in want when their working days are over.

In the next sentence the prime minister of that time points out wherein he differs from the resolution. He says:

This system of insurance should be on the same social and economic principle as that of unemployment insurance, involving the recognition of thrift on the part of those who will provide for their old age. The present Old Age Pensions Act is unscientific and obsolete and must give way to something which will serve you better.

I do not read that because I wish to tie the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) up to this resolution but because I want to point out to the hon. member for Broadview that while in detail it is not the same, in principle it is the same; that it is simply beside the point to try to wave away this important matter by labelling the whole thing state socialism.

Then the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) tried to wave this proposal aside by attacking the underlying philosophy of the motion and saying that this was an age of scarcity rather than an age of abundance. I had understood, sir, that there were antediluvians who still believed in an age of scarcity, but I hardly expected to find them in the House of Commons. I am not prepared to go into a lengthy discussion of this matter because it is irrelevant, but in this day and age it is hardly necessary to point out to any group of individuals the fact that in every line of industry the power to produce has progressed tremendously even in the last ten years. The hon. member for Melfort based his assumption on a statement made by a well known Swedish economist, to the effect that in 1928 production and consumption were running very close together. But it should be remembered that he referred to effective consumption, and we know that effective consumption was possible only because of instalment buying and the mortgaging of the future; that even in 1928 it was very difficult to distribute sufficient purchasing power to consume the large quantities produced. But here is the remarkable fact, that even since 1928 we have gone a long way. In a recent radio speech the President of the United States pointed out that if we could return industry to its peak of 1928 there would still be in the United States six million men who would find no employment because their places had been taken by machines. In other words we have progressed so far that in 1936 we are able to produce as much as we produced in 1928 without the services of six million men who were employed at that time.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In Canada?

Mr. DOUGLAS: In the United States, but the same principle applies here. In all the world to-day there are more than thirty million men who are unemployed, yet we are able to feed the people of the world and keep them up to some standard of living, which is adequate proof of the fact that we are producing far more than we produced a generation ago.

The hon. member for Melfort also attacks this resolution on the ground that the whole difficulty in Canada to-day is the fact that providence has not wept. After listening to a statement like that I think providence ought to weep. May I point out that providence wept in Ontario, providence wept in the British Isles and in France, Germany, Italy and Japan. Providence wept in other places, but in spite of that fact they had an economic crisis. If the entire problem that we are facing is due to the fact that we have had no crops and that this is an age of scarcity, then, Mr. Speaker, in Canada to-day we should have a shortage of wheat. Instead of that, however, the government is wrestling with a surplus of over 200,000,000 bushels, and if the crops had been normal for the last five years the surplus would be nearer 800,000,000 bushels. Therefore I think the attack upon the underlying philosophy is simply an attempt to throw up a smoke screen in connection with this matter.

I do think, however, that the argument advanced by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman) is one about which we ought to think. It brings up the problem of finding money, and that is something that will interest the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), as it ought to interest every member of this house. It is a remarkable thing that whenever one brings up legislation involving the welfare and happiness of the people of Canada, someone wants to know where the money is coming from, yet in this country we find money for a great many other things. In the Dominion of Canada we have a governmental service and governmental machinery that is preponderantly heavy. One prominent United States social scientist said to me in Chicago university some time ago, "In Canada you have enough government machinery to run Canada and the United States put together." In addition we have innumerable commissions, a great many of which—or so it would seem to the public at least—are designed to provide jobs for people who are supposed to deserve their reward. It is costing the people of Canada millions of dollars every year to provide comfortable pasturage for worn out political war horses who have entered upon their reward. We also have a judicial system that has become heavy and complex, that overlaps and is expensive, yet no one asks where the money is to come from for that. In Canada we pay millions upon millions of dollars in interest on bonds. Much of that money was invested when money was cheap, but the interest is being collected to-day when money is dear, when the purchasing power of that money is much greater. Yet we keep on paying those interest charges and no one asks where the money is to come from. The other day we voted an estimate of almost $2,000,000 to look after the health of the cattle of Canada. No one asked where the money was coming from, but when we come to talk about looking after the old people someone wants to know where we are to get the money.

I want to suggest that in my estimation there are three ways by which money could be secured for this purpose. On looking over the past records I find that in 1931 some 63,000 people were receiving old age pensions, costing the country about $14,000,000. In 1935 that number had increased to 82,000 persons, which cost the country some $16,000,000. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a paltry sum compared to the service that is rendered, and compared to the huge sums of money that we spend elsewhere for services that are far less valuable to the people of Canada. I submit that we might find money first of all by curtailing certain expenditures, certain appointments and certain commissions; by reshaping our whole governmental policy in order to cut down duplication; by refunding or reconverting some of our loans at lower interest rates, and collecting income tax on government bonds. I believe in these ways sufficient money could be raised to meet the cost of this undertaking. It might even be possible that the Minister of Finance would be prepared to go so far as to institute, through the Bank of Canada, a national credit fund by which we would be prepared to issue credit against the security of the Dominion of Canada. If it is possible for the government to issue credit against government bonds deposited by financial institutions it should be possible for the government of Canada to issue its own credit against the security of the people of Canada. Of course the cry immediately is "inflation," yet I need hardly remind hon. members that the most orthodox economists admit that the quantity theory of money shows that inflation takes place only when money is issued in excess of goods produced. For the last five years we have had deflation, very rapid deflation, the withdrawal of currency and credit coincident with increase of goods produced, the result being that the relationship between money and goods is out of balance. It would be possible to-day to set up a very large national credit account without in any way upsetting the proper relationship between currency, credit and goods produced.

I ask, therefore, that the house give to this resolution its most urgent attention. We support it not because we wish to place the government on the spot, not because we wish to stick on this detail or that, but because we know that all across Canada to-day there are thousands of men who have been replaced by younger men, salesmen, for instance, who five years ago were receiving fair incomes but whose places have been taken by young university graduates. Two months ago I stood in a foundry in Winnipeg among men who work beside a great electric furnace with a temperature of 2,500 degrees Fahrenheit, men who have served their day and generation, and who at sixty years of age are prematurely worn out. We heard of one man who after thirty-four years of service was told he was no longer required. His work had never been steady; it had been seasonal; every winter some men were laid off for at least part of the time. They had never been able to lay aside any large amount of money, and in the case of this man the result was that it meant resorting to public charity for himself and his wife. I ask hon. members most earnestly to give this resolution sober and thoughtful consideration, keeping in mind the men and women to whom Canada owes a debt. Let us do our best to see their need and meet their problem.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, first let me extend to you my humble congratulations on your elevation to your present position. The first time I had the opportunity of observing the deliberations of the House of Commons it was under the speakership of the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, and at that time I was filled with admiration at the wonderful way in which he presided over the house. Since the opening of this parliament I have watched the manner in which you, sir, have presided over our deliberations, and in my opinion you have attained fully to the ideal and worthily followed the traditions honoured in this house by the Hon. Mr. Lemieux.

I do not need to tell hon. members, especially those who have sat in this house before and have gone through the experience of rising in this chamber for the first time, how nervous I feel and with what diffidence, Mr. Speaker, I address the house through you. As I look back over Canadian history and consider the great men who have sat in this House of Commons since 1867; as I have read from time to time the speeches of those who led both the great historic parties from confederation to recent times, and as I consider those who to-day are leading all parties in this house, their patriotism, their devotion to public affairs, I am satisfied that never before have we had men more capable and more devoted to the best interests of the people. So it is with diffidence and humility and deference that I rise to advance any ideas before this house. Each of us, however, has an obligation to express his opinions and to voice the wishes of the constituents by whom he was sent here.

As I consider this motion I am satisfied I should not be doing my duty to my constituents did I not express in this house my unqualified support of the resolution—with this exception, that it calls for immediate legislative action. I quite realize, sir, that the question where the money is to come from cannot be left out of consideration. The government must have time to adopt policies which will enable them to provide the money before we can expect them to bring in such legislation. That is only responsible government. I will deal with that in a moment, but here I should like to say that as far as old age pensions are concerned, if there is anything that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has done that above all else has earned the grateful thanks of large numbers of people it is the legislation that he introduced providing for old age pensions. Furthermore, the country has not overlooked those who supported that legislation, no matter in what part of the house they sat. Many old people have had the evening of their lives made happier by their action, and above all by the leadership in that regard of the Prime Minister. When the time comes that the Prime Minister finishes his work, one of the outstanding things for which he will be remembered in history will be the fact that he took one of the first steps to make things a little more economically secure for people who were unable to look after themselves.

Something was said in the course of this debate of which I desire to express my disapproval. It was suggested that one reason the party of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was not successful in the last election was that he expressed the idea that something of this sort should be done in Canada, that the people of Canada expressed their dissent from that view by not returning him to power. I suggest that the Conservative party was defeated not because he expressed that idea, but for other reasons, and in spite of his having taken that stand. I believe that the majority of the people of Canada expect this parliament to take steps to restore economic security to people who are unable to look after themselves owing to economic conditions over which they have no control.

As I see it, this resolution has to do with three types of people. First there are the old people between sixty and seventy who by reason of being physically unfit cannot get a job to enable them to look after themselves. I submit it is our duty to look after those who are unable to take care of themselves. If there is one thing that Christian society has recognized as its paramount duty ever since there has been Christian society it is that of looking after those who cannot look after themselves. I submit that the time is coming nearer and nearer when we shall refuse to leave those people to be looked after by charity, and shall recognize that we must use the resources of the state to care for them. That applies to returned soldiers who are now unable to earn a living. It certainly applies to those who are afflicted with blindness and cannot provide for themselves. As far as I am concerned I shall not be satisfied if before its life is over this parliament shall not have taken some real steps that will cause it to go down in history as having done more to this end than any parliament that has preceded it.

There is another category of people to whom the resolution would apply, namely those doing casual work, people who are eking out some kind of existence by competing in a precarious sort of way in the labour market, people who are preventing younger men and women from obtaining work. Although we do not know just what proportion of the total they constitute, we do know that many of them would gladly accept $20 a month rather than have to go on living partly through the charity of friends and partly through smashing down wages to a level at which a young man cannot possibly work and earn a living for himself and family. When we extend to those people the benefits of a measure such as the one before us, we are achieving two objects: first, we are looking after people who have served the state faithfully and well for a period of possibly forty years; and second, we are furnishing a large measure of employment.

As in a humble sort of way I have studied public affairs for many years and have read about people who have been fortunate enough to obtain government positions, people who, having served the government for a certain number of years, eventually have arrived at the age of superannuation, and as I read about ordinary government employees being superannuated at $3,000 a year, my mind goes back to the pioneers who settled the country. I think of the people, for example, who went out to western Canada, men who, taking their wives with them, settled miles and miles away from medical assistance. They took the very lives of their children in their hands when they went to those areas. They worked and slaved for years and years. They did the work of the nation, because they were growing the food of the nation. When I consider that we say to those people that we cannot give them even $20 a month but that we can give $200 or $300 a month to people who have been more fortunate because they have secured government jobs, and did not have to face those vicissitudes, I am convinced that it is not fair. In doing that I submit we are giving less than justice to the people who settled the country, and endured great dangers and privations in doing so. We must do something more than simply dismiss their claim; we cannot be content with saying that we have not the money.

There is another category of people who would be affected, namely those between the years of sixty and seventy who are well able to make a living for themselves, who have no desire for this legislation, and whom, I understand, the legislation as explained by the proposer would not affect. With considerable hesitation I suggest that there is growing up in Canada among our young people a feeling that the older people are prepared to hang on to their jobs, even when they have reached eighty years, thereby keeping their grandchildren on the bread line, and in a position where they cannot get married and establish homes for themselves. In other words they are beginning to feel that their fathers and grandfathers are not treating them as if they were of their own flesh and blood. As the average longevity is increasing, due to the advance of medical science, we must give consideration to this problem. If a man who has reached the age of seventy-five years and has made a real contribution to the society of his day and age continues to hold his position for another ten years, he is thereby depriving some other man of the dearest thing in the world, namely the chance to make his contribution to his day and age. As the resolution does not suggest any solution for this condition I say we should do something about it. One could not reach any conclusion in the matter without first giving it a great deal of serious thought and consideration. It is a fact however that the circumstance I have indicated is in the minds of our young people.

One now comes to a consideration of the cost of a pension scheme. According to the Canada Year Book there are 525,731 males and females in Canada between the ages of sixty and seventy. Assuming half those people were paid $20 a month, the cost in round figures would amount to $63,000,000. Suppose half the applicants for pension were able to compete on the labour market—and that is putting it at a very high figure—and that that half were given a pension, thereby leaving only a half of the total number to deprive others of work, we would provide jobs for 131,000 young people.

As the relief camp at Dundurn is in the constituency of Rosthern, which I have the honour to represent in this house, I am keenly interested in the young men in the relief camps. I realize that I represent those boys at Dundurn camp; I have visited them, and believe I know something of the attitude of the young people in Canada. I know what they expect; I believe they expect some real, wholesale measure of relief, and they will not be satisfied with any nibbling. They want jobs—lots of jobs. As I have indicated, the measure before us could be made to provide jobs for 131,000 young people. That would be worth while, and the people of Canada would be in a position to say, "Well, at least this parliament is doing something to justify its existence; they are not talking, and doing nothing else."

I do not intend to discuss the cost at great length, but I shall lay only a few facts before hon. members for their careful consideration. Although the facts I am about to detail are not new, I feel it my duty to state them. I do so without a chip on my shoulder; I do it in all humility and for the sake of the future of Canada.

First, I hear the statement on every hand that our public debt is due to the war. That is a popular suggestion. My figures, which I suggest are reliable and worthy of consideration, are taken from the report of the royal commission on banking and currency which sat in 1933 and reported to this chamber. According to the report I find that in 1914 the total debt in Canada, dominion, provincial, municipal and public corporate debt—that is, the debt of us as a people, not including our private debts—was $2,232,000,000. In 1919 it had risen to $3,749,000,000, an increase of approximately $1,500,000,000. I was surprised, however, when I read that in 1929 the debt had risen to $7,445,000,000. In other words during a period of real prosperity in the ten years between 1919 and 1929 it had increased to twice as much as it had been immediately following the war. What have those people to say who urge that our debt is due to the war. I find that by 1932 the debt had risen to $8,652,000,000. What does that mean? It simply means that from 1919 to 1932 the public debt of this country increased by more than one million dollars a day. And that was happening all over the world. We are told that that debt increased because people were saving up money and lending it out. I would like to know where the wealthy people are in Canada who have been saving a million dollars a day to lend to the government outside of what they lend to private corporations. I shall show, Mr. Speaker, that when the banks lend money they do not lend solely the savings of the people. It is true they lend the savings of the people, but they lend also credit which they themselves create.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely the hon. member must be wrong, because hon. members in the southeast corner are applauding him.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not hear what the hon. member said. I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee on finance and industry, what is generally known as the Macmillan report, which was made to the British government. I do not know whether hon. members will regard this as an authority or not, but it is signed by people whose opinion I think should carry some weight with anybody who is interested in these questions. Let me read the names of one or two of the gentlemen who signed this report: Lord Macmillan, one of the outstanding jurists of the British empire; T. E. Gregory, one of the outstanding economists in the British empire; J. M. Keynes, the man who foretold that the peace treaty in its financial provisions could never be made to work; Reginald McKenna, once chancellor of the British Exchequer, and now head of one of the largest banks in England; and other leading economists. I do not intend to quote at length from this report, but I wish to refer to one paragraph from page 34, and I would ask any hon. member of this house if he would not be inclined to pay some attention to the opinions of these people no matter what may be his present ideas and predilections. If we have been going into debt at the rate of a million dollars a day surely we must consider how we are going to pay off that debt in the future. If during the days of our greatest prosperity we went into debt at that alarming rate, how are we going to pay off the debt from now on. That is something we should all consider. I quote from page 34 of the Macmillan report:

> It is not unnatural to think of the deposits of a bank as being created by the public through the deposit of cash representing either savings or amounts which are not for the time being required to meet expenditure. But the bulk of the deposits arise out of the action of the banks themselves, for by granting loans, allowing money to be drawn on an overdraft, or purchasing securities, a bank creates a credit in its books, which is the equivalent of a deposit.

I would ask hon. gentlemen to note those words. The report says that the bulk of the deposits arise out of the action of the banks themselves, and that is the opinion of the greatest body of experts, I submit, that has ever been set up to study this question. There is no use laughing at it or sneering at it; there are their findings. The report goes on to explain how the thing works. It says:

> The bank can carry on the process of lending, or purchasing investments, until such time as the credits created, or investments purchased, represent nine times the amount of the original deposit of £1,000 in cash.

I have heard, as every hon. member has heard, a great deal about the tremendous stability of the banks of this country. Well, if you or I could borrow $1,000 at 2½ per cent and then proceed to extend credit to the amount of a further $9,000 at five or six or seven per cent, we would be stable too, and a lot of us would not bother working and struggling the way we do.

I should like to quote from the Macmillan report on banking and currency in Canada as to the banks lending several times the amount of their cash deposits. Here is what I find on page 44:

> In so far as the loans and investments made by the original bank return to it as deposits—

They practically all do within a very short time.

> —it will be in a position to make further loans or investments. Through this process of lending, investing, and depositing, the increased cash reserve is distributed among the banks and the volume of loans and investments and deposits is increased by an amount several times greater than the amount of the original increase in cash reserve.

There is the finding of the Canadian Macmillan report, that the banks purchase securities and make loans to the extent of several times the original increase in their cash reserves. I would just like to remind hon. members how that works out under the Finance Act, and how it can work out to-day under the Bank of Canada Act.

I find by this Macmillan report, Mr. Speaker, that in July, 1933, the average daily borrowings of the banks under the Finance Act was $48,552,000. What does that mean? It simply means that, under the Finance Act, if the Bank of Montreal or any other bank had one million dollars' worth of government bonds which were paying at that time in the neighbourhood of 5½ per cent, they could go to the Minister of Finance and get one million dollars' worth of new money for which they paid at that time 2½ per cent. They get that new money against the credit of this country; then on the basis of established banking practice they are able to buy nine million dollars' worth of government bonds. Let us trace what happens. The bank pays 2½ per cent on one million dollars, but, mark you, it is drawing 5½ per cent on ten million dollars' worth of bonds. And they call that wise public financing! There is no doubt about it at all; it is right here in this Macmillan report.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it just isn't so.

Mr. TUCKER: I have the greatest respect for the Minister of Finance, but I have read this report with what intelligence has been given me, and I have given the house what I have found in this report. If the Minister of Finance or anybody else can prove that it is not so, I shall be right there listening with both my ears wide open to hear the explanation. The fact is that, according to this report, the banks borrowed from the Minister of Finance $48,000,000, and they can lend out nine times the increase in their cash reserves. Is there anything wrong with that? If they lend out nine times any increase in their cash reserves—and remember when they got that $48,000,000 from the Minister of Finance they put it in their cash reserves—then I fail to see how it can be otherwise than as I have stated; for the banks can lend several times the amount of their cash reserves, or they can buy bonds with the money. If I am wrong I hope the Minister of Finance, who is a good friend of mine, will enlighten me, but in the meantime I adhere to my view that that is exactly what happens.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot understand why there are so few banks in Canada if the making of money is so easy as that. Perhaps my hon. friend will give a little attention to that phase of it.

Mr. TUCKER: I have, and I find that the banks in the past made ridiculous loans to people who never could repay them. In that way the banks have thrown away millions of dollars; they have put up buildings such as no other industry has been able to build; they have made twenty per cent on the amount of their original invested capital every year of this depression, when everyone else has gone in the hole, and after concealing every profit they possibly could. That is my answer to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to submit to him that that is not an answer? The question I ask is, why in the world are there not more banks if it is so very profitable a business, as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. TUCKER: My answer is this. I am not sure, but I believe it takes $500,000 to start a chartered bank, and there are not many people who can get together $500,000. I know it could not be done in western Canada, if they got together all the farmers in the west. I hope the day will come when the great co-operative enterprises of western Canada will have their own bank and share to some extent in these profits. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you and the house will pardon me if I speak with rather more heat than I should. I am a new member, and I must ask you to overlook my over-anxiety, if I may put it that way, to place my views before the house. I do so in all humility, in spite of appearances to the contrary, and I am ready to hear any correction which I think is due.

Now if it is all right for the Bank of Montreal to take government bonds, if it is all right for the banks to take $48,000,000 worth of government bonds and obtain new money against those bonds, then it should be all right for the Bank of Canada to advance whatever money this country needs against dominion, municipal and provincial government bonds. To-day, as I understand the Bank of Canada Act, the Bank of Canada will give credit in its books, dollar for dollar, against dominion government bonds. What should be done when the time comes that this country needs more credit and there has not been enough credit saved up to finance the government, as happened during the war? The credit of the country was extended and extended. Suppose we need to borrow some money; what happens? Suppose there is not enough saved up—and there will not be enough saved up to finance us if we continue the way we are going. We shall have to go through this process. The banks will want to buy some dominion government bonds. They will take some of their present bonds to the Bank of Canada and get credit against those bonds, dollar for dollar; and on the strength of that credit they will be able to turn round and buy nine times as many bonds as they deposited in the first place. What has happened? We have used our credit and in effect we are paying interest on it at the rate of probably 30 per cent.

Is it any wonder that we have no money to take care of old people? Is it any wonder we have no money to look after the unemployed? Hon. members of this house will have to consider this question: Are they going to sacrifice the future development of this country, are they going to sacrifice the unemployed, the old and the sick, are they going to neglect to do the things which a civilized country ought to do, in order to be able to pay interest on a basis such as that? That is the question that must be settled. If the present financial system is cramping us, if it has this country in a strait jacket, which is more important—the financial system or the people? I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is up to this parliament to remove that financial strait jacket; it is the duty of this parliament to explore new avenues. I know that there are some people—the Minister of Finance is in that class—who takes the attitude that the suggestion I make is not feasible. Well, I say to him, let us have a trial of it. The present system is not working so satisfactorily that everyone should be ready to die fighting for it, and if some other method is advanced by great thinkers, why can we not at least have a trial of it? And if it works, let us extend it; if it does not work we can abandon it.

In that connection I would remind the house of what was done by the government led by the leader of the opposition; we have not forgotten it. The leader of the opposition will probably find fault with the way in which I am putting it, but in essence this is what was done. They took to the banks $35,000,000 worth of treasury bills of this country, $35,000,000 of obligations of this country, bearing interest at, I believe, 4 per cent. They said to the banks, "We want you to advance us $35,000,000 worth of credit against these obligations of ours, and you shall take these obligations to the Minister of Finance and he will issue against them $35,000,000 worth of new money on which he will charge you 3 per cent." In other words, we borrowed in that way $35,000,000 worth of credit which cost us only one per cent, and I submit that it should not have cost us a cent if we had set up our own central bank and financed that business for ourselves.

Let me say this to my confreres, the members of the Liberal party—because I am a Liberal—I believe that liberalism has the future of this country in its hands, and if liberalism does not meet this problem, if it does not solve it, the people in their desperation may do we know not what. I venture to stand in my place to-day and make these suggestions as a Liberal, because our great leader has taken the attitude that people of all shades of opinion will be welcome within the ranks of the Liberal party; and if we can persuade the majority of the people in that party that our views are right, then they will adopt those views. I suggest—and I think I am right in this—that I have a better chance of persuading my friends of the Liberal party that these views are right than my friends down there to the left have. They may be better speakers than I am, they may be more able in their presentation of a case, but I know that in the hearts of my fellow members of the Liberal party, from the Minister of Finance down, there is after all a wish that we should be able to get together on this question and in some way meet the views of those for whom I, one of the humblest members of the Liberal party, venture to speak. I am sure there is more of a wish to do this than if I were fighting outside that party. That is why I stand here to-day, without apology, advancing these views as a member of the great Liberal party of this country.

As regards the expansion of credit, some people seem to think that if you work through the banks it is not inflation, but that if the country did it through its own banking institution it would be. I could read excerpts from both these reports which indicate this, that when the banks create credit and lend it against government bonds or deposits available to be checked out, they are creating the equivalent of currency just as much as if they had printed it, because more than ninety per cent of the business of this country to-day is done by cheques on deposit accounts. In other words we turn over to the banks ninety per cent of the control over the purchasing power of this country. They have the right to say how much money the people shall have to purchase with. If the banks do it, it is just as much inflation as though the government turned on the printing presses—just as much and no more. In that connection I would like to read from the Financial World of New York one or two paragraphs, which I found in the Magazine Digest, and which illustrate better than any words of mine what I would like to say:

> In a democratic capitalistic country like the United States some 90 per cent of the total business is done through the medium of net demand deposits in banks. Actual currency is used to but a moderate degree. Therefore, if there is to be a great recovery movement, there is required as a base (1) a large volume of net demand deposits and (2) the will to use them.
> In times past great changes in the volume of net demand deposits have been due to expansion and contraction of bank credit. In other words, during periods of rising optimum banks have been prone to expand loans and with each loan expansion create a deposit. In this instance, however, we are witnessing the greatest and fastest expansion in net demand deposits in the history of this country with practically no contribution from the banks.

I would like hon. members to note this:

> The 1919 boom was financed with a peak of less than 14 billion dollars of net demand deposits. These dropped to around 10 billion dollars in the spring of 1933. On October 30, 1935, they totalled $16,657,000,000.

That is a rise from the peak of over two billion dollars.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): I wish to congratulate the new member from Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who has just taken his seat. I am not sure that he knows how courageous he has been, but I venture to say that if he keeps it up, he will. I am beginning to think that if a majority of the Liberals sitting in the northeast corner share his views, the thorn in the flesh which the southeast corner has been to the government will be nothing compared with the thorn in the flesh that the northeast corner is going to be. It is very encouraging to hear a member within the Liberal party who takes at their face value the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that all kinds of people are welcome in the Liberal party and that that party is to be the fold for all shades of liberalism. If that is so, and there are many hon. members like the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, this government may be just what we have been looking for. I am waiting to be convinced.

An hon. MEMBER: Why spoil it?

Miss MACPHAIL: I am afraid hon. members might take me seriously. The hon. member for Rosthern gave the Prime Minister today all the praise for the present old age pension bill. I was in the house in 1926 when an old age pension bill was passed, and if I understand that situation aright, the present and then member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) really was the man who got old age pensions. At that time the government needed votes, and they paid a high price.

I wish to say only a few things about the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). First, I think that everyone in this house realizes that it is very difficult in these days to save enough to provide for adequate care in old age. There are two or three reasons for this difficulty. Wages are low, as are prices to the primary producers, and the savings which people have made are bringing in little at present rates of interest. It is almost impossible for people to put aside enough out of wages or out of the sale of primary products to provide for their old age. Undoubtedly every member of this house knows from his own correspondence that the most difficult time for people of small means is the period between sixty-five and seventy years. In this highly competitive age, this age of machinery, it is almost impossible—one might eliminate the word almost—for a man or a woman out of employment at sixty-five to find work again or even to retain a place in the workaday world; he is almost sure to be retired before that time. So that while we may not do anything about pensions at sixty for the moment, we are going to have to do it before very long. As one sits for some time in this place one gets to know that changes come gradually, and it is not likely that we shall secure a pension law for people of sixty until we have got one for those at sixty-five. It will be a gradual process, but undoubtedly as time goes on the age limit for pensions will be lowered.

As I listened to the excellent speech of the previous speaker I thought of this thing we call inflation. It always seems so odd to me that if a government does anything to put more currency into circulation it is inflation, but if the banks do anything about getting more money into circulation, that is prosperity; anyway it is never inflation.

I want to emphasize the great need of doing something for two groups of people; one the blind, and the other those who are incurable invalids. There are not many countries that have done nothing about invalids; yet I know, and I am sure every member of this house knows, of many people who have been bedridden for many years, who have no sort of income, and no provision is made for them. So that while the matter is not, strictly speaking, included under this resolution, the house ought to set itself seriously to the task of providing for that group. I should like to see provision made at this session, certainly in this parliament, for pensions for the blind and for those who are invalids. We almost got old age pensions for the blind reduced last year to the age of forty. A Conservative member, Doctor Cotnam, introduced a resolution asking that that should be done. The number of blind in Canada, as registered in the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, is 6,543. I have never felt very comfortable about the fact that we as a country have not been able to do anything towards taking care of our blind fellow citizens. I think that we as a parliament and as a country ought to be ashamed to say that we cannot afford to take care of the blind when they need care. The same might well be said of those persons who are invalids, incurably ill and unable ever again to earn for themselves. Surely both the blind and those who are ill and suffering pain are bearing enough without being required to worry and fret for lack of the little consolation and comfort that they would have if their bread and butter and their shelter were secure for them. One can get very easily—I hold one in my hand—a list of what has been done for the blind in other countries. I am not going to take many of the countries—

Mr. DUNNING: May I be permitted to interrupt? There is a resolution on the order paper dealing specifically with the blind. I know my hon. friend will not take long, but I am quite sure if she proceeds to deal with this question someone else will think he has the same right.

Miss MACPHAIL: Quite so; it does not really come under this resolution, so I will leave it at that point.

Everyone is worrying as to where the money is to come from with which to extend the idea of pensions. I do not believe pensions will be given at the age of sixty at the present time, but people worry where the money is to come from in connection with any extension of pensions. I have always had a couple of ideas as to where money could be obtained, not a great deal but still certain sums. In the estimates at page 24 you will find two items I should like to see struck out. One is an amount of $368,400 for the Royal Military College and the other is $150,000 for cadet services. You might be able to get something out of the non-permanent active militia also. Then there are a great many other things which could be done away with or reduced. There, however, are two concrete suggestions as to where money could be obtained, and that would be sufficient to extend pensions to those who are invalids, at any rate, whether or not we went any further than that.

Mr. H. E. WILTON (West Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is a safe assumption that every member of this house is heartily in sympathy with any movement or any legislation which might help the man or woman who is in need. I think that is a foregone conclusion. I also think, however, that it is a good thing for Canada that we who are so frequently referred to as that small minority are sitting between the Amoses and the Andys. After listening to the addresses yesterday and to-day in connection with this resolution I am reminded of those radio broadcasts in which Amos and Andy talk about seven million dollars, ten million dollars, forty billion dollars and so on. One would almost think we could just reach up in the air and grab off money.

An hon. MEMBER: Where does it come from?

Mr. WILTON: It is hard to say. I sympathize sincerely with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who must realize that he is in the presence of a great deal of superior ability in the matter of financing the country. As I said a moment ago we are all in sympathy with anything that will help the men and women who are in need; that is a natural thing, but after all the question of financing these propositions is important, though some of the speakers have referred to the financial end of it as a mere trifling thing. It has been suggested that we float further loans or that we do something to increase our credit. Credits have been widely responsible for much of the financial problems existing in this country to-day. Speaking from the point of view of the municipalities I believe it would have been better for many of them if they had not been allowed the extension of credits they have enjoyed during the last few years, when many of them spent money like drunken sailors.

There is another angle to this matter, aside from the question of helping those between sixty and seventy years of age. In connection with all social legislation a certain percentage of the cost goes back to the municipalities, the urban centres and the counties. Everyone knows as well as I know that at the present time every municipality throughout Canada is taxed to the very limit. If that taxation is further added to it means a greater burden on the man who is trying to pay for his house so that he may have a place to call home. It is all very well to talk about doing these things and to put to one side the real argument as to where we are going to get the money. The only answer we have had to that question is, float more loans, sell more bonds and debentures, raise the tax rates in the municipalities so that home owners will not be able to pay their taxes and will be forced out. This thing, while good on its face, in my opinion will have a boomerang effect that will do more harm to home property owners than the good it will do those between sixty and seventy years of age.

I want to repeat, and I do not want to be misunderstood, that I am always heartily in favour of anything that can be done to help the men and women who need help, but I do not believe in doing that in such a way that it will react to the detriment of a larger number of people in some other sphere of life.

I am not going to take up more of your time on this question, Mr. Speaker. I notice that most of the speakers take their full forty minutes. I want to put myself on record now: if I am ever heard speaking in this house for more than fifteen minutes I hope someone will ring the bell.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to say just a few words in behalf of the older generation in the Yukon? There an allowance of $20 a month is given by the federal government to men when they are absolutely unable to work, and that allowance is not limited to men of any particular age. I think all hon. members will agree when I say that men who went to that country in 1896, 1897 and 1898, who have worked out when the thermometer was 60, 70, and even 75 degrees below zero, and who have lived on the food on which they had to live in those days, have pretty well exhausted their physical endurance. If it is within the power of this government to make that allowance to men in the Yukon at the age of sixty, or even sixty-five, it would save these old timers a great deal of the humiliation they must endure when they apply time after time for a little help. That help is often given them, but at other times the commissioner has to say, "My hands are empty; I have nothing to give." We in the Yukon will all appreciate it if the minister is able to give this matter favourable consideration.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): I am glad to have this opportunity to speak for the first time in the House of Commons. I have been rather struck with the procedure followed here, the things that are done and the things not done. It appears that every question brought up on the floor of this house revolves around one outstanding point, and that until such time as we can get beyond the framework of the present financial system it is useless to speak of extending social services; for unfortunately we have uplifted the question of finance and have submerged human rights.

I have listened with some interest to the discussion of unemployment relief. I can quite appreciate why many hon. members may not understand the depth of the poverty that exists in this country, because it is seldom one sees poverty on parliament hill. But if you go into the highways and byways of the west you will find to-day both old and young living in poverty, not because they are old, not because they are inefficient, but because governments refuse to recognize their responsibility by doing away with financial monopoly. Why should there be any debate on the question of old age pensions? Is there any man who has scratched below the economic surface who does not recognize that there are thousands of people who are physically and mentally below par and cannot be absorbed into the industrial life of the country because the field is narrowing and industry is choosing only the best? It is the duty of the government to make available the natural resources of the nation to aid those who have passed the age of sixty years. But again we are told, "It cannot be done; we have not the money and we cannot tax," and the question is asked over and over, "Where is the money to come from"? I believe that the members in this corner of the house can well answer that question. I know there are those in this house who smile at the new economics, who have grown up with the traditional outlook, but if you want to know where the money is to come from to do these things, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) gave the answer when he said: You can make it just the same as the bankers make it. But unfortunately most hon. members in this house do not understand the functions of money. If the people of Canada understood the functions of money, its purpose and how it is brought into being, I am convinced that this monetary system would have been changed long ago. I have in mind the message of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the night of the election; it carries some hope. He said:

> In the new era which dawns to-day the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land.

But "where is the money coming from"? The first duty of this government is to take from those who have the control of money and place it back in the hands of the state, and to provide, not only for people who have reached sixty years of age but for every human being in the Dominion of Canada, economic security. Then hon. members may ask: What will you base your money on? Exactly the same as the bankers base theirs on; first, the natural resources of the nation; second, the ability of the people to produce, and third, the natural demand for goods for consumption. The only purpose of money is to distribute goods.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear—exchange.

Mr. POOLE: Exchange is the purpose. But to-day people get it only through wages, salaries and dividends, and therefore the total purchasing power of the nation does not at any time equal the total price values. The situation is aggravated by machinery which produces more goods with less manual labour and so displaces wages, salaries and dividends, with the result that as the nation produces more goods people become more and more poverty stricken, because wages, salaries and dividends are becoming less.

Turn again to the west. When we speak of the conditions of the producers there we are told that we must expand markets for their produce. Let me say again to this government that if they are depending for the future prosperity of this country upon expanding export markets on the same basis as in the days that are gone, prosperity will never come, The problem is internal and it is a financial one. The only purpose of an export market is to receive in exchange for goods which we cannot consume at home such goods as we cannot well produce in Canada. So we see as time goes on more men no longer needed in the industrial field. We have old men, men who have given their best to this country; yet when they say: Give us a pension, give us at least a pittance, some kind of security, they are told: No, it cannot be done; the money must come first—do not tax anyone else. But I say to you that what applies to the old of this country applies also to the youth of this country. Why do we measure everything in dollars and cents? There is a moral cost which this country will some day pay and pay in full.

I do not intend to speak at any length now because at some future time I intend to deal with these questions on an economic basis. This is not a matter to be dealt with merely on compassionate grounds; for I know that within the next four or five years, during the life of this government, they are going to face a crisis such as was never before faced in this country, and these things which we are advocating will be thrust upon them or they will go to the wall. I say to the hon. member for Rosthern: I appreciate what he said; I think I understand his philosophy; I know he is sound, and if liberalism does not carry out the things for which hon. gentlemen on the government side were elected, my hon. friend will find lots of room in this corner, because we shall be the next government. We are here on the basis of co-operation, of course; we are here to help all we can. You may express all the sympathy in the world, you may shed many crocodile tears, but that will not feed one man or one woman in Canada. It costs money to feed people. You have the power to extract it. The first duty of this government is to feed its old people; that is the first step to greater things that must come later.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to get up in the clouds about theories of finance and banking practice; I merely want to see if I can catch the spirit of this resolution and say a word or two from that point of view. I was not backward in saying on the public platform before I came here that I believe the age at which the old age pension now begins might reasonably be lowered, and I say that here. I believe the present age limit of seventy might be reasonably lowered to sixty-five, and I make that suggestion to the government. I am one who believes that we can find a way of financing a proper practice or principle; I believe we have been a good deal up in the clouds with respect to many of these questions.

As the resolution stands I do not believe I could give it my support. For instance, I see the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in his seat; under the terms of the resolution he would be retired and would receive some sort of compensating allowance for his compulsory retirement. I do not believe the right hon. gentleman would require that. The resolution goes so far as to say that all persons would be retired at the age of sixty, thereafter receiving some sort of compensation. That may not have been the spirit of the resolution, but I believe I have correctly indicated the wording of it, and for that reason I do not think hon. members could support it as it is drafted.

I believe the principle of giving old age pensions is a proper one, and as a member of the House of Commons at the time the bill was passed I was delighted to support that principle. I cannot agree with the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago, but is not now in the chamber, in his statement that the principle of old age pensions was introduced by a private member from his corner of the house, because I do not believe they were in power at that time. Further, I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member say that that was the price we had to pay in order to gain their support. I have never put them down to a level quite as low as that, namely to a point where they could be purchased. I believe they supported the bill because they believed in the principle of it, the same as the Liberal government introducing the measure believed in its principle. I believed in it then and believe in it to-day. The age limit set at that time was seventy years, and under the circumstances I believe it was the best we could do. Since that time I have met many men and women, and from talking with them I have learned their problems and their difficulties. From this experience I have come to the conclusion that with a great measure of justice we could lower the age limit from seventy years to sixty-five. Perhaps not this year, but I hope not later than next year or at least before this parliament dissolves, the government will have the affairs of Canada in such satisfactory shape, not simply by lowering the age limit to sixty or sixty-five years but by the introduction of proper policies and by proper administration, that conditions will be immeasurably more prosperous than they have been. I believe we will be so prosperous that we will not be worrying about where the money will come from to give those older people that pittance to which, in my humble judgment, they are justly entitled.

I commend to the government the suggestion that they look into the matter, and that they have the age limit for an old age pension reduced from seventy to sixty-five years.

Mr. W. M. RYAN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words in connection with the resolution. Like the previous speaker (Mr. Young) I am heartily in sympathy with the principle of extending the age limit at which people may receive pensions, but I do not believe I could support the resolution as worded. If it did not leave the impression that it might be interpreted as compulsory I might be in a better position to support it. Under the circumstances, however, since it appears to be compulsory, I do not believe it should receive my support. On the other hand if it provided for voluntary measures I should be only too glad to vote in favour of it.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not an easy task which I face on an occasion of this kind. It is very pleasant to be free to the degree hon. members are free to advocate in this chamber whatever they deem to be in the best interests of their constituents, and of the people of Canada. I question the sincerity of none. I do however deprecate a little the habit of some of putting those of us charged with responsibility in the position of valuing property rights more highly than we value human rights. May I say to some of the self-righteous members who always adopt that attitude that to my mind it is not ignoble to be charged with the duty of conserving the funds contributed by all the people of Canada. That does not constitute the guarding of property rights to the exclusion of human rights, because as a matter of fact every matter which comes before this chamber affecting the economics of the people of Canada or affecting the taxes they pay has a direct relation to their human rights and their human opportunities.

The resolution itself was not supported by its mover. On the records of the house appears the resolution:

> That in the opinion of this house the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting—

Granting what?

> —adequate retiring allowances to all citizens over sixty years of age, thereby giving an opportunity—

And so on. I repeat the expression "adequate retiring allowances to all citizens over sixty years of age." Mr. Speaker, that will appear in the socialist propaganda, from now on, as the policy of the socialist party in Canada. The people of Canada will be asked to believe that if the socialist party comes into power that resolution represents the policy they will put into effect. Witness what happened, however, when the mover of the resolution rose to address himself to it. He indicated that it did not mean what it said, at all. In order to clarify the situation I asked a question as to whether he meant all citizens. "Oh well," he said, "of course there would have to be regulations"—and he was delightfully vague as to that. I was a little more successful in getting him to state what he regarded as an adequate retiring allowance, because he gave the figure of $50 per month. I believe I am correct in stating that he gave that figure as being an adequate retiring allowance under the terms of his resolution. If we assume that the resolution means what it says, and that under it $50 a month would be considered an adequate retiring allowance, the plan it suggests would cost this country $500,000,000 per year. That is what it would cost, if the resolution means what it says. Of course the hon. member has protected himself against that by stating that it does not mean what it says, except I assume for propaganda purposes to indicate the policy of his party, if the country should ever be unfortunate enough to have it in power.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe it is against the rules of the house for any hon. member to impute motives to another. I would say that hon. members in this corner of the chamber are probably just as honest as the minister, and if I made a statement before the house I meant what I said.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course the hon. member meant what he said. If it will satisfy him at all I will say that if any word of mine imputed motives to him personally I withdraw it here and now. But will my hon. friend tell me this: Will not that resolution be printed and scattered broadcast across Canada as the policy of his party? Will he tell me that? I pause for a reply.

Mr. HEAPS: I will answer my hon. friend when he gets through.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, it will either be printed as the policy of the party or it will not, and we shall judge by what happens in that regard. However that may be, the resolution as on the order paper and as it will remain upon the records of this house, interpreted in terms of adequacy, as put forward by my hon. friend himself, of $50 a month, would cost this country at least $500,000,000 per annum. It is my right, sir, to give the house that information.

Now as to the necessity. Of course I do not think one should say or even imply that members in any section of this house desire to withhold from the sick and the needy in this country the wherewithal to live. That is an unfair imputation against any member of this house. It is unfair for my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) to point to two million dollars spent on the health of animals and then to imply that this house is not sympathetic in expending money on human beings, when in the very estimates from which he quoted there is no less a sum than $70,000,000 that I was able to pick out in just a few minutes to help human beings live and carry on. Of course, that is due them. But why is it necessary for members to stand up and put one another in the position of apparently being willing to spend money on animals and not spend it on human beings? Surely we can carry on the debates of this house without that sort of imputation against each other.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask if the minister considers $70,000,000 enough to take care adequately of human beings in this country?

Mr. DUNNING: No amount would ever be enough, but may I point out that all the money paid by Canada to people incapable of sustaining themselves must come from those other Canadians who are sustaining themselves. I know that that is not according to my hon. friend's economic philosophy, but that is the way things work. Those who are sustaining themselves in this country provide in reality the funds necessary to sustain those who are not, and I venture to say that it will be a long time before we improve materially on that state of society. Of course I know there are various theories. It has been suggested in this debate where the money could come from, and the terms "credit" and "money" are constantly mixed up with each other and juggled around as if they were the same thing, when every hon. member who studies the question knows perfectly well that there is a wide distinction between them.

Without going into any exposition of banking, of which I assure you, sir, I am quite incapable, and without going into it for the other reason that it would not be in order on this resolution, may I say that broadly speaking the term "credit" involves something which has to be paid back, and perhaps it would be as well for hon. members to bear that in mind when they speak of credit as distinct from money. Money is something which one has; credit is something which can be secured, but on terms that it be paid back. Constantly in this house and elsewhere I hear credit discussed as if it were something which one secured and then the process was over, and you could go out and spend it and have a good time, and that is all that would ever happen. That is just an elementary point in connection with the suggestions that have been made.

I congratulate my hon. friend from Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) upon his courage and vigour of utterance and upon his study of the matters to which he referred. I hope he did not think my question was one intended to embarrass him, but when he made the statement that the bank formerly could borrow from the Minister of Finance under the terms of the Finance Act at 2½ per cent, and then multiply the amount they had borrowed by nine and lend the sum total out at five per cent, really, Mr. Speaker, that was too much for me. I shall not go into a detailed explanation now but I will simply state to my hon. friend positively that it is not so, and if it were possible under present conditions, then I am quite satisfied that within the walls of this House of Commons we could very soon get the capital together to start a bank and it would certainly be quite a profitable enterprise. That does not mean, of course, that there is not very much of value in the reports from which my hon. friend quoted in a fragmentary fashion; there is. We in Canada are making forward steps constantly with respect to our control of public credit and the like, and I believe that we shall have to proceed further through the machinery which has already been set up by this parliament, but we must proceed further safely and wisely—safely and wisely, I repeat. When I say safely and wisely, let no one within the sound of my voice get the idea that I believe that by printing money a nation can make itself rich; it cannot do it. Everywhere and always the history of inflation, continued to its logical conclusion, has been to reduce the real wages of every worker in the country, to reduce the real savings of the people of the country, and to bring about a last condition very much worse than the condition it was designed to cure.

In these times of grave world difficulty, Mr. Speaker, we must always recognize this, that something which might be quite unsound for one country to do alone because of its international trade relations with other countries might become the sound thing for that nation to do, assuming that all the other nations with which it was doing business did the same thing. I do not suggest that as a hint at all in the direction of inflation, but I would call the attention of members of this house who study these matters to what has taken place in that regard, to the difficulty which occurred in this country and in other countries so long as we were out of step with each other in a major way in money matters, and how much easier matters have become in international trade since we returned to a more reasonable relationship with each other so far as concerns the value of our currencies in terms of other money.

To get back to the resolution on the order paper—and I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that you have not called me to order for talking finance on a question of this sort—I stated a few moments ago that to carry out literally the terms of the resolution would cost this country $500,000,000 per annum or thereabouts. Now I want to be more reasonable. I want to speak of what my hon. friend says the resolution means, and show what it would cost if we take his interpretation.

From the bureau of statistics I obtained the information that if the proportion of the population over seventy who are now receiving the old age pension were the correct proportion in the case of those whom my hon. friend would pension over sixty—in the absence of other data it is rather difficult to form any other estimate, and in any event any change would not materially affect the result—the present proportion of those over seventy who are now receiving the old age pension being 28·5, if the proportion were the same with respect to those over sixty and the payment were the same as that now made to those over seventy, the added annual cost to the country's pension bill would be approximately $32,600,000. I thought the house would desire to have that information, because in deciding to undertake even humanitarian projects it is good business to count the cost and figure out in advance where the money is coming from, not on the basis of any theory or any idea or experiment which still remains to be proved, but on the basis of knowing that we have to take the money out of the pockets of the Canadian people somehow, somewhere, and that those who are now self-sustaining are charged with the responsibility, financial and otherwise, of supporting those who are not.

Now just a word as to the need. We hear in this house mostly of those over sixty who need and ought to be supplied with some sustenance by the state; and, of course, we all have the habit of exaggerating from the particular to the general; we take a particular case and develop it to portray a general condition. But fortunately we have a very good, a very useful census bureau which does give us information upon which it is possible to base some idea of general need as contrasted with particular need. I concede at once the principle that particular need in this country should be cared for, and I would point out that, since the beginning of government in this country, it has been a municipal and provincial responsibility to take care of particular need as regards indigents and so forth. It is only when problems of this kind assume such great proportions that they must be dealt with nationally that the federal government comes into the picture. There is provision for taxing people locally to take care of particular cases of need in their own municipality. That it is now inadequate we all know, and it is now being supplemented from this federal treasury to the amount, in excess of the figures I quoted a little while ago, of around $50,000,000 per annum in various ways.

This federal parliament has never put property rights ahead of human rights as long as I have known parliament; human rights have always had a sympathetic hearing from all sides of the house, and the house has always been desirous of going as far as is economically wise at the time; indeed, its tendency is if anything to go further. Now, with respect to the need, there are a large number of men over sixty, and I am sure it will surprise some members of the house to know that the average earnings of men at present living and working, who are over sixty years of age, are $1,072 per annum, compared with a high mark at age fifty, for all those living and working, of $1,208 per annum.

We may all argue that neither sum is great enough, but I would suggest that the decline in earning power from $1,208 per annum, which is the peak at age fifty, to $1,072 at age sixty, is not an indication that a majority or any large number of those over sixty years of age would wish voluntarily to retire on a pension of $50 a month. My experience too of men over sixty is that you do not usually prolong their lives by arranging for their retirement. That is the experience of superannuation funds and of employers and trades unions not only in this country but the world over. It is the experience that to deprive a man of his job while he is yet physically capable of carrying it on, work which has meant something to him down through the years, which some of us might consider drudgery but which to him means something, because it is his occupation in which he takes pride,—it is a well known fact, I say, that to retire such a man from that occupation very frequently shortens his life.

It is interesting to know that men over sixty, the group which as I said a little while ago, average $1,072 per annum, earn as much as the age group of thirty-four; that is to say, a man has to pass thirty-four years of age in this country before he can earn more than a man of sixty earns. Again, I do not want to make the mistake of confusing the general with the particular. This, of course, is an age group in each case, but it is significant that industry in this country still values the services of men over sixty as highly as it does the services of men of thirty-four, in terms of actual money.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister the figures as salaries and wages, distinguishing the one from the other?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the figures of the bureau of statistics are by groups. He has been to the bureau, as I have, to get information. There is not that distinction.

Mr. HEAPS: I have not been there at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The word should be compensation, not wages.

Mr. DUNNING: The leader of the opposition is right; I should have said compensation, which covers all classes of remuneration. But I am assured by those who study these matters that such a distinction, even if it could be drawn, would not materially affect the average figure I have given, for the reason that after the age of sixty a man is being paid for something which he has not when he is thirty-four: he is being paid for experience and ability and technique developed down through the years. The position of that large group over sixty as a whole is not so bad as the particular instances given the house would indicate that it is.

When I say all this, please do not think—I say this once more—that the government is not sympathetic to the extension of the old age pension provision as the position of this country will enable it to be extended. When we introduced the legislation into this house, as the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) will remember, the house then laid it down as a principle that we should make a start at the age of seventy and that we would watch the progress of the legislation and economic condition of the country and would advance, in connection with that particular piece of social legislation, as fast as the circumstances of the country would permit us to do so. That is the position taken by the government to-day.

We do not believe, in the face of the known condition of this country, that we should at the present time embark upon what the resolution calls for; I am satisfied that the house would not want us to do so, in the actual terms of the resolution; nor is the government prepared at this session to go further in the field of old age pensions—not because we would not like to, but because we are convinced that this country must hold tight for a while until we can see more clearly than any of us here can see to-day. When I say "any of us here," I mean any of us in the government. There are members in the house who can see more clearly than we can; that is evident from the discussion. There are members to whom it would be easy to raise the money required. There are methods which this country has not yet adopted and which they say would be good. We regret, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot see that inflation on the scale and in the manner proposed would be good for the Canadian people; if we could, we would propose it.

Every member of the government is as much concerned with the welfare of every Canadian citizen as any member who has spoken. Those of us who are not bachelors are fathers; we have feelings, and we think pretty much in the same terms as other men think. And I say that our reasoned conclusion about this matter is as I have stated. We shall have to ask, therefore, that the resolution be voted down. We will ourselves vote against it for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, may I place on record the reasons why I shall have to vote against the motion before the house? The hon. member (Mr. Heaps) who introduced it, if I understood his argument, sponsored the motion partly in any event as an unemployment relief measure. I for one do not agree that unemployment can be solved by the government going into the employment business; nor do I agree that it is economically sound that any government can spend its way into prosperity. It is my opinion that the only cure for our present unemployment problem is to place men back in profitable employment in industry.

I am in favour of an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act which would reduce the pension age from seventy to sixty-five, not as an unemployment relief measure but on purely compassionate grounds; to pension men not because they cannot get employment, but because I believe many of our people in Canada to-day are physically burnt out at sixty-five years of age and so unable to earn a living for themselves and their dependents. I quite agree with the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that our people are already burdened down under an almost intolerable load of taxation, but I suggest in all sincerity that if the members of the house, and more especially the private members, would withhold their applications to and their demands on the departments of Finance and Public Works for expenditures of money, and come forward instead with sincere and honest recommendations and proposals as to how public expenditures can be reduced without curtailing the efficiency of the different departments, we should have plenty of money to take care of proper old age pensions.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): I had not intended to speak to this resolution, but I should like to deal with some of the remarks that have been made with regard to

it. I notice that yesterday the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) stated that we are in an age of scarcity, and he referred to Alberta as being frowned upon by providence. May I bring to this gentleman's attention the fact that that province, according to a report which appeared in a periodical published in Alberta, produced last year a total of $152,778,000 worth of agricultural products, including grain, fodder crops, root crops, dairy products, live stock and miscellaneous; that in addition Alberta had a fine crop of honey of over a million and a quarter pounds; that her coal mines produced about $27,000,000, and her oil production amounted to $3,800,000, the total figure being $222,078,000. I have also some other figures to draw to the hon. member's attention as to wealth produced in that province. In 1925 Alberta produced $261,000,000; in 1926, $298,000,000; in 1927, $378,000,000; in 1928, $341,000,000; in 1929, $233,000,000. It has been estimated that the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia combined have produced total wealth amounting to over $3,000,000,000 in a period of five years. If that is so, and Alberta being a part of this great dominion which has produced more than $10,000,000,000 of wealth in a period of ten years, why is it that Alberta is at the present time bankrupt? Why is it that the health facilities of the province are being undermined, and our educational institutions threatened? Why is it that the municipalities cannot meet their obligations? All these problems have come about simply because of the present obsolete monetary system. I would point out that the problem of unemployment is prevalent not only in Alberta but in Ontario, in Quebec, in any place in this world you care to go, and I would suggest that that is not because providence has not shone upon us. Our late king said:

> It cannot be beyond the power of man so to use the vast resources of the world as to ensure the material progress of civilization. No diminution in these resources has taken place. On the contrary discovery, invention and organization have multiplied their possibilities to such an extent that abundance of production has itself created new problems.

That statement was made by our late king at the opening of the world economic conference in 1934. The statement of our late king that science, invention and organization have multiplied to such an extent our ability to produce that new problems have been created, is substantiated by a study of history. We know that in the age of hand labour, men, women and children worked for long hours under great hardships to produce the fundamentals of subsistence, the bare necessities of life. But the king and many others have declared—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to bring the name of the king into a discussion.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I want to keep within the rules of the house. I suggest that many great economists recognize that we have solved the problem of production and we must now solve the problem of distribution.

I wish to refer to the remarks made yesterday by an hon. member on the other side of the house with reference to a question I asked regarding the coal situation in Alberta, dealing with the resolution I am discussing at the present time. It is estimated that Alberta contains fourteen per cent of the entire coal deposits of the world, yet we have coal miners on relief and farmers who have not sufficient coal to keep themselves warm in the winter time. Is the only solution of the problem this: We must have an outside market for the wheat and an outside market for the coal before these people can exchange their commodities inside the province. Where is the money coming from to enable the farmers of Alberta to buy the coal that we can produce in that province? The difficulty is that there may be sufficient credit available for this purpose, but those who have control of it are afraid to invest it in the creation of new wealth because they know the people to whom they desire to sell have not sufficient purchasing power to buy. There is not an hon. member who would invest money in the coal mines of western Canada, because they recognize that the farmers of Alberta, the closest potential market, have not the purchasing power to buy this coal. So I suggest that the community which is faced with this difficulty must appeal to the government responsible to see that credit is made available to producers and that it is distributed in such a manner that those who contribute their labour to the production of wealth shall receive a fair wage and that those who furnish the raw material necessary for the production of wealth shall receive a just price for that raw material. In this corner of the house it is recognized that there is not sufficient paid out in wages, salaries and commissions to equate the cost of goods for sale, so we suggest that the government should not only issue a dividend that will adequately maintain men over sixty years of age but issue a dividend to all men, women and children in this country so that we may make up this deficiency in purchasing power which is so apparent in our economic structure to-day.

In regard to giving pensions to men over sixty years of age, Mr. Speaker, surely we recognize that many men at the age of sixty are capable of rendering and willing to render more to society than they are at the age of thirty, forty or possibly up to fifty. We recognize that many men do not like to go out of employment or cease their contribution to society at the age of sixty, but we recognize also that many men are incapable of contributing anything to society at the present time. In many of our industrial enterprises the field has narrowed down until only young men are required. So I would suggest that we consider this resolution in that aspect, that to these men who at the present time have reached the age of sixty we grant an adequate allowance, the money not to come out of the taxpayers but to be created by the government as a new issue and to be given these men to take up a portion of this lack of purchasing power which is so apparent.

I feel that we should place a proper interpretation upon this resolution and weigh it without technicalities. I do not see the word "compulsory" in the resolution and I do not believe it is the intention of the mover to compel anyone to retire at the age of sixty. I believe the intent is to have this allowance given those who have reached the age of sixty and who find themselves no longer able to maintain themselves in proper food, clothing and shelter, and I commend the hon. gentleman for his resolution.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to be placed between the horns of the dilemma presented by this resolution. It does not matter what hon. members seek to read into it, I agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in his exposition of what it really says; in fact I think he might have gone further. It not only proposes a retiring allowance to "all" citizens, but I would direct attention to the fact that it says:

—the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting adequate retiring allowances—

I assume that the word "adequate" would have reference to the man's previous income, so that if the man being retired at the age of sixty had been receiving an income of $5,000, it would be appropriate to give him an income of perhaps $2,500, because certainly an adequate retiring allowance for that man would not be $20 a month or anything like that. What the resolution says, however, is: "Adequate retiring allowance to all" citizens.

I do not propose to be placed in the ridiculous position of demanding that the government spend a sum approximating $500,000,000 a year. On the other hand during the campaign I willingly pledged myself to vote for a reduction of the age at which the old age pension might be obtained to sixty-five or, if possible, to sixty. I still wish to adhere to that and, if I vote against this resolution, I do not wish to be placed in the position of betraying the pledges I made. I am not called upon to be placed in that position, and I resent the scheme which is put forward—clearly for political reasons—to place a number of us in that light. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would direct your attention to the fact that the resolution is entirely out of order, inasmuch as it is well known that it involves a large expenditure of public money, and any resolution having that effect may be brought forward only by the government of the day.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If any hon. member wishes to speak he should do so before the hon. gentleman closes the debate.

Mr. NEILL: I raised a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this motion is properly before the house; I do not think the point of order raised by the hon. member is well founded. It is not proposed in the resolution that the money be expended immediately; the resolution states that in the opinion of the house the government should be requested to immediately introduce certain legislation. The hon. member who moved the resolution does not say that he wishes to bring in that legislation himself. He says that the government should introduce the legislation, and it would be competent for the government to do so if they saw fit. For these reasons I think the motion is in order.

Mr. NEILL: May I be allowed a further word? I did not elaborate my point of order because I thought it was so obvious. Time and again similar motions have been deemed out of order. It is not a question of whether this hon. member wants to do anything; it is illegal and out of order to introduce in the house a resolution which is mandatory on the government to spend a large sum of money.

Mr. HEAPS: On a point of order—

Mr. NEILL: I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. HEAPS: You have given your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to know whether the hon. member is appealing from your decision.

Mr. NEILL: Unless Mr. Speaker halts me I think I might be allowed to elaborate my point. I do not wonder that the hon. member seeks to interrupt me, because he knows I am right. The government, and only the government, has the power to introduce resolutions involving the expenditure of large sums of public money. The resolution, if it passes, demands or requests the government to immediately introduce legislation that will involve an enormous expenditure of public money. I defy anyone to look up the rules and the precedents that have been established for many years in the house and say this is not out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my decision.

Mr. NEILL: Then I will appeal from your decision.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): May I suggest that your honour look at the precedents, because I was looking at the matter casually and I think there is much to be said for the argument presented by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I think the language of the resolution is what causes the difficulty. A resolution might be formulated that would come within the rules of the house, but I say with deference that I think if your honour would look at the language of the resolution possibly you would think it well to consider the matter further, perhaps during the recess.

I do not rise for the purpose of making any extended remarks. I desire merely to read to the house what was said in the course of the broadcast I made last fall, to which broadcast reference has been made by several hon. members. I am quoting from the manuscript from which I then read; therefore I will have to read it:

By intelligent management, with the aid of business, in cooperation with the provinces, by the splendid support of citizens in every walk of life, both those who could afford to contribute and those who could not afford to contribute, we have made definite headway. We have reduced unemployment. Unemployment which reached the high figure of approximately 783,000 in the low point of the depression in 1933, is now under 500,000, substantially where it was in June, 1931.

Now I will ask you a question. Suppose that we were able to return this country to the conditions prevailing at the peak of the boom years, would we by so doing succeed in reducing our unemployed to the numbers as of that time? I say no. And it is vitally important that you should understand why. And this is why. The great employment of more efficient machinery in the last five or six years, the introduction of new economies, the development of labour saving devices, the elimination of duplication, growing concentrations of business, have made it impossible under the same conditions to employ the same number of people. It is calculated that, in the last five years, there has been added to our workers—the white-collar worker, the farm worker, the industrial worker—about 800,000 persons. Assuming we were to return to the level of 1929, the lag in the present volume of unemployment would not be taken up by more than fifty per cent.

But the business of this country has not increased to this extent, for the basic reason that the business of the world has contracted, and even if it had, it would have been necessary to put a stop, during the interval, to all concentrations of business, all economies in operation, all labour saving devices, which would, of course, have been as unwise as it would have been impracticable.

So, either way, you see it was utterly impossible, and so it will continue to be. For science and invention will not submit to a straight jacket, and to the rate of recovery of this shattered world, even assuming we could now look forward to recovery, there is a very definite maximum.

Now there is nothing particularly new in all this, and I am not suggesting that the proposal I have to make is one the soundness of which is supported only by very recent events. Its soundness in principle was apparent some time ago. But experience in the past year emphasizes the urgent need of its adoption.

Therefore I come to my proposal. In my opinion and in the opinion of my colleagues, the first step to be taken by way of a permanent solution of this problem is to remove from the labour market all those workers who have reached the age where, especially under conditions of to-day, the worker's social interest, the state's economic interest, equally sugest the wisdom of retirement.

It is, of course, clear to all of us that the old rules governing hours of labour and years of labour can no longer apply, because we live in changed economic conditions. That fundamental truth forces gundamental changes in our whole economic system. These changes embrace changes in conditions of work, hours of work. They also embrace changes in the age of retirement from work.

This new economic trend has already influenced the retirement schemes of certain private enterprises. And these enterprises, after careful estimate of all the factors involved, have met the new conditions by determining upon a retirement age of sixty years.

The government recognizes this principle. And, in conformity with it, will introduce into parliament legislation to make it effective.

Mr. YOUNG: I rise to a point of order. The other day the right hon. gentleman spoke about reading speeches in the house, and now he is reading his speech to the house.

Mr. HEAPS: He is quoting from a document.

Mr. YOUNG: I take it that we all have the same privileges here. The right hon. gentleman may say that this is not the speech he is making at the present moment, but certainly it is his speech which he made some time ago, or if it is not his speech perhaps he will be good enough to tell us whose speech it was.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I am reading from a speech which I made over the radio last year. I am within my rights in so doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the right hon. gentleman is not out of order.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is running true to form:

> This scheme has two basic merits. It provides the only possible means by which the youth of the land can secure employment when by age and training they are ready for employment. It provides the only means by which all people may obtain security and leisure and a chance for recreation and pleasure, when they have moved beyond that age where, in any Christian state, the workman should be forced to continue at his labours.
> Let me make this proposal clear, because, as I say, while the idea is not novel, its operation will be enormously far-reaching. It is a bold, and, I believe will prove to be a triumphant, attempt to put an end to this curse of unemployment, to free the labour market from the dead weight of the unemployed, to put purchasing power in the hands of a greater number, to effect, in a sound and equitable way, a measure of redistribution of the wealth of the land.
> The application of this principle will mean, in the first year of its operation, the withdrawal from the labour market of 120,000 people, and provide that number of jobs for younger workers.

I shall not read beyond that, Mr. Speaker. That statement which I made publicly last fall was made for the purpose of directing attention to what has been alluded to this afternoon by one hon. gentleman, namely conditions in the United States, where the president recently pointed out that if the high state of industrial activity that existed in 1928-29 were to return in that country there would still remain six million idle persons with the existing population. That, I figure, would represent in this country at least five hundred thousand, allowing that we have one-twelfth the population of the United States. It need not be a matter of surprise to hon. members to realize that this is so; all one has to do is to look at the labour-saving devices that have been developed, to go into any factory and observe where work that used to require seven or eight men is now done by a machine operated by one man or sometimes two. The other day I saw in operation a machine doing work which at one time was done by a very large number of men. There have been improvements by which the number of men required was reduced and further reduced until we have half a dozen men doing work which at one time was done by a hundred men. The inventive genius of man has operated to prevent men from finding employment, so that even if the conditions of employment which have been referred to were to return in Canada we should still have a vast number of unemployed.

That situation could be dealt with in two ways. The method that was suggested by me last fall is the one which the larger institutions of the country have adopted. For example it is well known that the banks are retiring their officials at sixty years of age. Some of their highest paid officials are being retired at sixty, and the pensions they receive are often large. The financial institutions throughout the country in addition to the banks are doing the same thing, and other organizations are following the same practice.

Mr. HEAPS: Might I ask the right hon. gentleman whether these retirements are compulsory?

Mr. BENNETT: I was coming to that. In regard to those who contribute to the superannuation funds of their respective institutions the retirements are compulsory; about that there is no doubt. I know of half a dozen cases that have come to my immediate attention in which officials, having attained that age, have been retired compulsorily, but having paid in to the pension fund they are receiving in many cases the maximum they would receive if they remained on, and their places have been taken by younger men. That is true in many institutions.

I will give the house the other side of the picture. The other day when I was in Calgary a man and his wife came to see me; she was sixty-six and he was sixty-eight. So far as I know he never in his life received as much as $1,800 a year. I think that is too high a figure, judging from inquiries which I made. They had brought up a family, bought a small house or two, and had saved during the period of his employment, and they asked me to be the medium of communication by which the sum of $11,400 in cash was paid to the government to secure for them on their joint lives an annuity of $1,000 per annum. That indicates what may be done under one set of conditions.

A few days later another man came to see me, a man whom I knew rather well, who had been in the same employment as the first man. He had reached the age of sixty-eight. He had been retired from work; he received no pension, and he told me that all he had between himself and absolute privation was $200. He told me why he was in that condition. He had been receiving substantially the same wages as the first man, but almost every year sickness had dogged him and his family. An operation here, an illness there, a child laid aside for months, and at the end of his period of work with the corporation that had employed him, retiring without any pension, he had been able to save only $200. He had a little real estate which he had obtained by purchases in buoyant days, but I think probably the city is now the owner of it for taxes.

Those are illustrations of two sets of conditions which have to be considered. I am not going to elaborate upon them this afternoon. I had, before making that statement last year, prepared a definite plan for dealing with this matter. That is not of importance now, because it is no longer possible for me to give effect to it. However I do believe a contributory system of pensions should be enforced in Canada. I believe every man, beginning at a fixed age, should make such a contribution, and I had prepared a plan whereby a person would be able to obtain stamps at every post office, such stamps to be placed in a book. At the end of a given period of time, whether it be sixty or sixty-five years, or whatever period might be agreed upon, the annuity thus earned by the savings of the citizen, with interest computed as we now have it, at the high rate of four per cent, would determine the extent to which pension would be received. I had proposed that the state would bear the cost of administration, and certain other features that need not now be discussed, because there were certain actuarial figures which were not complete. However I do not think it fair to ask the state to bear the entire burden, looking to the long future. There is a lag, which must be taken care of. Some hon. members will recall the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England when introducing a consolidated measure for social relief involving what is now called the dole. That term is applied erroneously in some instances, because it is a sum payable to individuals for which they themselves have made provision—they making a contribution, the employer making a contribution and the state making a contribution. It is a payment, not by the state covering the whole sum, but by three parties, namely, the state, the insured or the individual who is to receive the benefits, and the employer. That of course applies only to industry or, in the broader sense, to where there is a relationship between employer and employee. But where the relationship between employer and employee does not exist, and it is one merely of a citizen to the state, it does appear to me to be reasonably clear—and I am told that the proposals I had prepared were sound—that the citizen and the state together would commence, early in the life of the citizen, savings of amounts which at a given age would enable him or her to receive just what his or her savings amounted to. This should extend alike to farmers' sons and daughters, and to everyone. Everyone should be given the widest possible opportunity to avail himself of the provisions of the proposals which I had formulated.

This proposal contemplates the state paying the whole amount, and that it should be payable to everyone. I ask the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) whether he has given any consideration to the effect that would have upon the character of the people of Canada. I mention that merely in passing, because after all we know that all these social measures—and it has been the experience of all countries—have a profound effect in, shall I say, creating national character. The first social insurance measure on a large scale of which we have any ready knowledge, that of Bismarck in Germany, it will be recalled was a contributory scheme. In other parts of the world the same is true. This is a proposal to have a pension paid without regard to any contribution being made by any party other than the state, and regardless of any consideration other than those of age and want, and, in fact, as the resolution reads it does not even include want.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether judges make any contribution to their pension, and whether that has a very serious effect upon them?

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the hon. member has mentioned judges, for this reason: It is part of the contract by which men abandon large practices, from which they have been receiving large compensation, usually amounting to many times the salaries they are paid, that at the end of a given time they shall receive certain benefits by way of superannuation or pension. They make a contribution that is far greater than that. For instance in the legal profession there is a tradition which has prevailed for a long while in Great Britain, and I am sorry to say to a lesser extent in Canada, that the leaders of the profession should not more than once refuse the request of the Lord Chancellor to abandon a highly lucrative practice and accept a small salary to serve in judicial positions, it being part of the contract between the state and the man who accepts a seat on the bench that he shall receive certain benefits at the expiration of fifteen years or upon the attainment of a given age.

If hon. members would look at law reports of recent date they would find that men have been appointed to the bench, at least one of whom I know was making not less than from $175,000 to $250,000 per annum and who is now receiving the sum of only $40,000, because he felt it was part of the great tradition of his profession and his duty to abandon his private practice for the purpose of rendering service to the state as a judge. Part of the contract was that without payment of any part of the premium he was to receive from the state a pension to the extent I have indicated. Of course that is not the rule in Canada to the same degree. Nevertheless in this country there are cases where men have abandoned lucrative positions, in which they have been receiving a very large annual compensation, to serve the state for a much smaller sum, on condition that in their old age, when they are no longer fit for service, they may receive the compensation I have mentioned. They have made a distinct contribution, a very distinct one, for the purpose of obtaining a pension.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the right hon. gentleman not say that people who have worked hard and long in almost any walk of life have made a proper contribution? Is it not merely the contract that is absent, and would not the passing of legislation contemplated by the resolution constitute a contract through which, if they had worked faithfully, at the end of a certain period they would receive security in their old age?

Mr. BENNETT: I would answer the hon. member in this way: He contemplates their working faithfully, but under the working of the resolution there is no incentive to work faithfully or unfaithfully. All they have to do is to attain the age mentioned in the resolution, and they will get the money. That is the reason I suggest to the hon. member and to people within sound of my voice that the effect upon the national character of this country would be so apparent within at least the life of one generation as to make it extremely difficult to forecast the ultimate result.

Then, there is one other matter I should like to touch upon. I have heard several hon. members say that the age at which pension could be received should be sixty or sixty-five years, or something like that. One of the difficulties in connection with old age pensions has been this: It must be within the knowledge of everyone that fundamentally the question is one within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that to overcome the difficulty of jurisdiction contributions are made by the dominion under the terms of agreements made between the dominion and the provinces. The pension is paid by the province, not by the dominion. It is amazing to hear some hon. members speak as though the pension were paid by the dominion. The pension is in fact paid and distributed by the provinces. They become responsible for all investigations preceding payment, and although the awarding of the pension is subject to investigation by federal authorities, it is an act of the provincial and not of the federal authorities.

Mr. DUNNING: It must be so.

Mr. BENNETT: The general view is that it must be, although I think there is some doubt as to that. The provinces were originally assisted to the extent of fifty per cent, and under the late administration the amount was increased to seventy-five per cent, and it would have been increased to the whole one hundred per cent if the financial position of the country would have warranted any such action being taken. The time has come, Mr. Speaker, when it is desirable in the interests of Canada that the government should give very careful consideration and attention to the question of a broad national pension system. I have very strong views upon the subject. I think such a system is feasible. It must be a system that is contributed to by every man who will seek the benefits of it. I would go further and say that if we are going to do anything to develop the character of our people, we should provide that in the event of such contribution not being made by any citizen, he would not have any claim upon the state for relief or other purposes under certain conditions that need not be gone into now because they are matters of detail. But the essential fact is that if we had a system based upon a broad national appreciation of our situation—and our numbers are only between ten and eleven million people—we would be able to provide against the contingencies to which attention has been directed this afternoon and yesterday. In Great Britain, with a population of forty million, they deal with this problem in a national sense; also in Germany, with a population of many more than forty million, perhaps sixty million at least, they do the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Sixty-seven million.

Mr. BENNETT: Sixty-seven million, my hon. friend suggests. Germany deals with it in a national way, and the cost of administration has not become so great as to make it burdensome upon the people.

There is just one other thought that should be mentioned, and that is this: How to keep national pensions out of politics has been a matter that has engaged the attention of statesmen of older countries ever since these pensions were begun. There was an election conducted in one country upon the sole, simple issue whether the age for pensions should be reduced by five years; and without any regard for the actuarial facts, without any regard for the effect upon the finances of the country, the election was conducted on that issue. I am bound to say that there are always more people ready and willing to accept benefits than there are willing to pay for them, and the result was, of course, that the lower age carried, but unfortunately the finances did not warrant the providing of the money, and so for the moment they were not any better off than they were at the start.

I did not rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of doing more than clarifying the situation to which reference has been made during the present debate. I appreciate the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I have been compelled myself to make such a speech and I recall that in the position which I then took I had not the support of those who then sat to the left of the Speaker. I found an entire unwillingness to appreciate conditions, and talk about human rights as against property rights could be heard reiterated and reiterated in this chamber by those who then sat to the left of the Speaker. Now it is some consolation to realize that those responsible for the formulation of government policy—

Mr. McIVOR: Might I say that my right hon. friend's remark does not apply to all those who now sit to the left of the Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, I was referring to those who sat to the left of the Speaker from 1930 to 1935. So far as my memory serves me, the hon. gentleman was not one of them but I may be mistaken in that. At any rate I point that out only because it indicates how difficult it is in office always to be able to express just the views that were held in opposition. It shows the wide gulf that is fixed between a declaration of policy in opposition and a declaration of policy in office. It represents the difficulty that a minister finds in providing money for the purpose of meeting what seemed to be a simple matter before the responsibility had to be met. Of course the minister himself was not here in those years.

Mr. DUNNING: My memory of my right hon. friend goes back to the days when he stood where he stands now.

Mr. BENNETT: But the hon. gentleman was not here between 1930 and 1935; he was engaged in far more lucrative business. I have no doubt that he realizes, as I said the other day, how easy it is to suppose that all that is necessary to be done is to have the banks lend enough money and the country would be provided with sufficient assets to make any payments that might be required. There are not lacking those who would be perfectly willing to accept loans, and there are others who perhaps would not so willingly accept the benefits that accrue from the assets thus created.

There has been some little consolation in listening to the observations of the Minister of Finance, and I would suggest to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that having brought about this discussion, having found, as he said, that there are varying opinions, and this being a private member's resolution on which opinions have been expressed by members on all sides of the house, he might deem it well to afford the government an opportunity at least to consider its first budget before pressing to a division a resolution such as this. The government has not yet been able to present its budget to the house. We know not what its taxation proposals may be, and while such consideration was not extended to me, I do think in the light of my own experience, my own knowledge and my own unfortunate difficulties in dealing with these problems, it is not quite fair to ask the government immediately to introduce legislation granting an adequate retiring allowance to all citizens over sixty years of age. I ask my hon. friend whether he would regard that as just the sort of resolution he would like to have pointed at his head if he had just assumed office and had not yet been able to formulate his financial proposals for the year. He has brought about a discussion that I think has been useful, and that has indicated wide differences of opinions existing between members of the house on financial matters having nothing to do with pensions, and perhaps that has served his purpose.

In listening to the speech of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), one could not but be impressed with the fact that his simple solution, if it be a solution, of this difficulty is one that should not leave us in difficulty very long. We should be able to create in the house a bank, and having created a bank we would then be able, by multiplying by nine the cash reserves, to pay for all services. I hardly think he analyzed the Macmillan report with that care which is essential for the purpose of arriving, shall I say, at a working theory with respect to these matters. I have heard all these doctrines propounded and I have read them, as I think most members of the house have. I quite disagree with the hon. gentleman's definition of credit. I think credit is merely the ability to borrow.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that his is the usual interpretation nowadays.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps a more reasonable interpretation to put upon the word "credit" is that it is a man's ability to borrow because he has no use for credit except to the extent that he may borrow. That is obvious, is it not? I agree with the minister that every borrowing implies a repayment unless it be a perpetual annuity, and so far as I know we have not sold many of them in Canada. There are, for instance, outstanding in this country by both railway systems perpetual four per cent debenture stocks, the principal of which is never payable but the interest, of course, has to be met. Sharing the views of the minister with respect to credit in a large sense, I do say that it is not quite fair for hon. members to conclude that because a government is unable immediately to formulate legislation to do something we think desirable, therefore it prefers property rights to human rights. I have listened to that charge against myself and I am most sympathetic with the position the minister has to take this afternoon. Some of those who made these observations may now realize what they sounded like when they were directed against somebody else.

Mr. DUNNING: I never did that.

Mr. BENNETT: Far be it from me to accuse the hon. gentleman; he was too orthodox to do anything of that sort. At any rate, I again suggest to the hon. member for North Winnipeg that he should withdraw this motion, not because it might not be advantageous in a political sense to see supporters of the government vote against it, nor because I might feel that I should vote for a resolution embodying that principle, though not in those words, but rather because the purpose to be served is something higher than mere advantage for the moment. It is something nobler than the mere effort to secure a division or lack of unity or unanimity on the part of the house; and feeling as I do—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. The leader of the opposition, it seems to me, is going altogether too far in imputing to members certain motives in bringing forward this resolution or in putting it to a vote.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I had about concluded what I desired to say at this time, except to point out that in addition to the objection that was made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) as to the resolution being in order, there is another point to which I had not expected that it would be necessary to direct attention, but in view of present indications I think it is desirable to do so. This resolution is not within the competence of parliament so far as giving effect to it is concerned. If adopted by parliament, it would be futile because it lies within the powers of the provinces in dealing with property and civil rights—a matter that must be known to most hon. members on this side of the house in view of the opinions that have been given from time to time by the law officers of the crown. I had not intended to raise that issue, but inasmuch as the discussion has assumed the character it has, I think it may be desirable to point that out.

The resolution consists of two preambles and a conclusion. Preamble number one relates to the unemployment situation. Preamble number two says:

> And whereas, it is desirable that as many as possible be absorbed into the useful industrial life of the dominion.

That is, the resolution by the preamble deals only with the industrial life of the country. The operative part reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting adequate retiring allowances to all citizens over sixty years of age, thereby giving an opportunity to large numbers now unemployed to be reabsorbed into useful productive activity.

It will be observed that the government is requested by this resolution, if it is passed, to immediately introduce legislation. It is an expression of the opinion of the house, not that the matter might be considered, but that the government should immediately introduce legislation. To immediately introduce legislation of the character indicated by the resolution would be to introduce legislation beyond the legislative competence of parliament, beyond its jurisdiction. Therefore I submit that the motion is out of order on that ground also.

Apart from that I desire briefly to point out contradictions between the preamble and the operative part of the motion, to which some reference has been made. It is desirable to absorb into the useful industrial life of the dominion as many as possible. To accomplish that end, allowances are to be granted to all citizens over sixty years of age; and the character of the retiring allowances is described as adequate. Adequate to what? Adequate to their present salaries, or compensation—to use the word I suggested this afternoon—or how otherwise? I do not know. But at any rate opportunity is to be given to large numbers now unemployed to be reabsorbed, not into industry, as pointed out in the first preamble, but into useful productive activity. I am not going to do more than say again what I said this afternoon, that if the resolution were to be adopted as it stands now the government would have either to introduce legislation or to resign. If it introduced legislation, that legislation would be futile, because it is beyond our legislative competence, and I think the rules of the house provide that parliament should not be asked to adopt a resolution that is beyond our power to pass. So far as that is concerned I will leave it at that.

There was one point, upon which I was interrupted this afternoon, that I should like to make clear. I pointed out that in my judgment this had to do with a large measure of social reform, and that whenever that measure is adopted by the house, as some day it will have to be, it will be along the lines I suggested, by contribution being made by all parties, the state, the employer and the employee in cases where the relationship of employer and employee exists, and by the state and the insured, if you will, or the annuitant, or the pensioner, if you may describe him as such, in other cases. But there will be a lag of those who cannot avail themselves of any such provision. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when social legislation was being considered in England, pointed out that they have to make a yearly grant to take care of that situation, and that yearly grant represents the capitalized value of the enormous sum of 750,000,000 pounds sterling. That will give the house some conception of what is involved in a matter of this kind. From year to year in Great Britain the state finds the sum necessary to take care of that lag until such time as the fund created by the joint contribution of employer and employee with the aid of the state is sufficient to meet the demands that may be made upon it. I hesitate to do so, but in the event of your honour concluding that the resolution is in order I would suggest the following amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart):—

That all words after the word "that" in the fifth line in the said resolution be deleted and the following substituted therefor:—

Whereas there exists in Canada an acute unemployment situation;

And whereas it is desirable that as many as possible be absorbed into the useful industrial life of the dominion;

Therefore be it resolved, that the government be requested to forthwith take appropriate measures for investigating, considering and determining the extent to which, under existing conditions, useful productive employment may be made available for the unemployed, if employed persons of the age of sixty and over are retired from their employment, and paid an annual pension or allowance during their lifetime, of such amount and on such terms and conditions as may be determined.

That would enable the government, if it thought desirable, to refer this matter to a committee of this house for investigation or inquiry or to take other means that may be thought desirable to that end. I move this amendment with some hesitancy, and I move it only in the event of your honour concluding that the motion is in order.

Mr. DUNNING: Does the right hon. gentleman move the amendment if the motion is in order?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before six o'clock the point of order was raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) as to whether this resolution was in order. At that time, it may be, I was under the impression that because the debate had been going on for two days the motion before the house was in order and that it was only a suggestion that was made to the government to decide whether it should be taken up or not. Now the point has been raised by the member for Comox-Alberni that the motion is not in order, and the right hon. leader of the opposition stated that he himself thought it was not in order. I have reconsidered the decision I rendered before six o'clock. I find in Beauchesne's

Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 167, under paragraph 562, that—

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that this resolution appears to be one which, if it was to be properly introduced, should have been proposed by resolution assented to by the Governor General, and I think accordingly the resolution is out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out that it is only a short time ago since you gave a decision—

Mr. SPEAKER: I did.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —in favor of its being in order? There was no appeal taken against your decision.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, there was.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That decision stands. I think it is an unheard of thing in the house that the Speaker, merely on the suggestion of a very highly placed member, should reverse a decision once given. We have had no opportunity whatever of arguing the point of order. I would point out, that, according to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, in paragraph 558:

> Motions advocating public expenditure, or the imposition of a charge, if the motion be framed in sufficiently abstract or general terms, can be entertained, and agreed to by the house. Resolutions of this nature are permissible because, having no operative effect, no grant is made or burthen imposed by their adoption.

This is a rule which, ever since I have been in parliament, has been observed in matters of this kind. When any specific question or motion involving a grant has come up, of course it has naturally been ruled out of order, but it has been the practice for many years in this chamber for members to make suggestions as to changes in policy, or the adoption of new policies by governments. There is practically no sort of policy which can be thought of which does not directly or indirectly involve some expenditure of funds, and so in these motions we have been particularly careful not to place the burden directly upon the government, but rather to express an opinion of the house. The resolution is so framed that it is merely an expression of opinion by the house. Of course it will not be passed, with the government having so large a majority, but if it were passed it would not be obligatory upon the government. Again and again we have had instances where much more specific resolutions have been put before the house, and adopted thereby.

In the present instance it is an extraordinary procedure, I submit, when Mr. Speaker, without having had any appeal against his decision, but simply on the suggestion of a member, should completely reverse that decision, and before having declared his reversal of it, give no opportunity whatever for an argument on the point of order. I would rather appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it is a serious matter if we are not going to know when we are in order or not in order, and if decisions can so readily be reversed.

As I have been trying to emphasize, the government does not have to carry out the terms of the resolution. I can look back over dozens of resolutions put forward in these very terms, as requests to the government, and those resolutions have been accepted. We have been here two days debating the resolution, and when one member confessedly states he does not want to face the vote then, forsooth, we have to have the decision of the Speaker reversed. I protest against this.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat in regarding as a serious matter whether or not motions before us are in order, particularly when a question of order arises out of the very consideration I brought to the attention of the house only a day or two ago when speaking on the first of these resolutions. I was careful to say to hon. members that while the government would welcome the fullest possible discussion of all private members motions, it was important hon. members should note that any motions which involved the placing of a charge on the treasury or the expenditure of public money, or which involved immediate action would not be motions which were in order unless recommended by the crown and preceded by consideration in committee of ways and means. I hoped by making those observations to the house at the time they were made that hon. members would be particularly careful to observe the precise wording of motions which might be brought up for discussion. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has quoted a citation from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, section 558, bearing on standing order No. 60 as follows:

> Motions advocating public expenditure, or the imposition of a charge, if the motion be framed in sufficiently abstract or general terms can be entertained and agreed to by the house.

This motion is not in sufficiently abstract or general terms. It is a very concrete motion, and in very definite terms. The operative part of the motion states:

That in the opinion of this house the government be requested to immediately introduce legislation granting adequate retiring allowances,—

And so on. That is not general; it is specific.

Mr. HEAPS: May I point out that we have had similar resolutions couched in the same words, previously.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not as specific as that. We have had resolutions which have asked the government to consider the advisability of doing certain things, and those resolutions have not been questioned. Often I think a degree of latitude which was questionable has been permitted. Certainly, however, so far as the present government is concerned, there would be every desire to allow the fullest latitude in the discussion of general motions. But when a motion is as concrete and specific as this one I submit that the citation which the hon. member for North Winnipeg has just quoted makes it as clear as possible that as worded the motion is out of order.

Let me go a step farther.

Resolutions of this nature are permissible because, having no operative effect, no grant is made or burthen imposed by their adoption.

The words are "no operative effect." Will hon. members say that a motion stating that the government should "immediately introduce legislation" is a motion which if carried does not place upon the government an obligation?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out that there is merely a suggestion that "the government be requested" to do this; it is a request.

Mr. BENNETT: But the house makes it an order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the resolution carried it would be an order of the house. If it carries it is a demand on the part of the house to the government immediately to introduce legislation which will provide adequate retiring allowances to all citizens over sixty years of age. One has only to repeat what the hon. member for Winnipeg has said to make it clear that the ruling of His Honour the Speaker which has been given after consideration is sound in every particular.

I was not in the chamber before the dinner hour, but if I am correctly informed the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) did raise the question of the motion not being in order and did indicate that if any immediate ruling were given declaring it to be in order he would wish to appeal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But a ruling was given. My point is that a ruling was given, and without any appeal made at the time—with no definite appeal against that ruling—we have a reversal of the decision.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I repeat that I was not in the house but I gather from hon. members who were here that Mr. Speaker's decision was qualified, and that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had it in his mind to appeal, if necessary. However as one of the older members of the house, my hon. friend knows it is customary for Speakers carefully to consider decisions when the house is not in session, and to give to the house the benefit of their mature thought immediately after it has assembled.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But Mr. Speaker made no attempt to reserve a decision; he gave it immediately.

Mr. MACKENZE KING: His Honour the Speaker has given his decision now, and I submit the house ought to support the Speaker in the decision he has given. If not, should they so desire, let hon. members appeal from the Speaker's ruling, as it is now given and let us vote upon it. I should add that the Speaker's ruling is not debatable.

Mr. HEAPS: I think this discussion is somewhat out of order, but as some latitude has been allowed other hon. members I would crave the same indulgence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I think we have not settled this point of order. If Mr. Speaker persists in maintaining his position, then I appeal against his ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all the hon. member can do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He cannot discuss it.

Mr. HEAPS: All I am saying is that other hon. members having been allowed a little latitude, I think I ought to be allowed to quote one or two precedents where resolutions have been brought before us in other years and have been accepted by the government, upon which occasions no objections were raised from any quarter of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I shall refer to one resolution which occurred to me—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has appealed against the ruling of the chair and with all due deference I submit there can be no further discussion.

Mr. HEAPS: May I point out—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I was pointing out—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Put the question.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned the other evening I had nearly finished. However, like my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), when I get a little time something more always comes to light. We in this corner appreciate the tribute that has been paid to you, Mr. Speaker, this evening. We have been wondering why we were placed to the left of the Speaker, unless it is because we have here a better opportunity to get inspiration than have those on the other side of the house.

After having listened to the oratory in this chamber, for my own sake I quote again the words of Thomas Carlyle, who said:

A wise old owl lived in an oak;
The more he saw the less he spoke;
The less he spoke the more he heard:
Why can't we all be like that bird?

In order fully to understand freight rates, and to speak with authority, an ordinary member would need much time and considerable data. The only reason I am supporting the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is that I want to see fair play, and if that is granted Fort William and Port Arthur will get their fair share of it.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a word or two to-night in connection with this bill, which I think is very important to hon. members from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There are many members of the house who did not expect this bill to come up this evening; most of them thought it would not be reached until Friday evening at least, and I know one or two who wish to speak to the bill. Therefore I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

STEAM TRAWLERS

On the motion of Mr. Kinley:

For a copy of all orders in council passed since the 1st of January, 1929, dealing with or referring to otter or steam trawlers.

Also a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, passing during the same period, to or from any minister of the crown or other officials and corporations or persons with respect to steam trawlers.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the first paragraph of the motion, but the hon. member may not have realized the expenditure of time and effort that it would take to comply with the terms of the second paragraph. I am informed that it would involve perusing twenty-four volumes of files and copying 2,500 pages of correspondence. So I would suggest that perhaps the hon. member would consent to the motion being amended to delete the second paragraph, and the files of the department will be available to him for whatever information he may desire that is asked for in the second paragraph.

Mr. KINLEY: Mr. Speaker, this is rather an important matter. I realized when I put the motion on the order paper that it would entail quite a bit of work, but at the same time it is a matter of public concern, and of importance to a large class of people, However, in view of the minister's suggestion I ask the permission of the house to delete the second paragraph of my motion.

Motion as amended agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES ON GRAIN

On the motion of Mr. Perley (Qu'Appelle):

That, in the opinion of this house, the domestic freight rate on grain and grain products moving from any point in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, to a point in any of the said provinces, or from any point, to another point, in any of the said provinces, be adjusted or reduced to at least not more than three cents per hundred pounds over the existing export rates.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I suggest that this resolution is very much in the same terms as the bill which was called a few moments ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was just going to draw the attention of the house to the fact that this resolution is in somewhat similar terms to the bill, the discussion of which was suspended a few moments ago. In my humble opinion discussion of this motion cannot take place before discussion on the bill has been completed. I would say that the bill has precedence and that we cannot have discussion of this resolution of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I would quote Campion's Introduction to The Procedure of the House of Commons, page 152, where I find this under the heading Anticipation of Debate:

The anticipation rule, which forbids discussion on a matter standing on the paper being forestalled, is dependent on the same principle as that which forbids the same question being twice raised in the same session. In applying the anticipation rule preference is given to the discussion which leads to the most effective result, and this has established a descending scale of values for discussions—bills, motions, amendments, et cetera. Thus a bill or other order of the day must not be anticipated by (or more shortly "blocks") discussion of a motion, amendment, or subject raised on another motion, such as that for the adjournment of the house. A motion standing on the paper for leave to bring in a bill blocks discussion of a motion (except for the presentation of a bill), amendments, et cetera.

In my opinion the discussion on the bill that has been introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) anticipates this resolution, and the resolution cannot therefore, in my opinion, be made the subject of discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, it is usual for opportunity to be given for discussion of a point of order before the chair rules upon it. By a singular coincidence I was looking up May on the question of anticipation about another matter when you called this order.

If your honour will look at the bill and at the resolution you will see that they are entirely different. It may be that in both cases arguments may be used that are somewhat similar. The bill proposes to amend the Railway Act by striking out the proviso to subsection 5 of section 325 and substituting therefor the following:

Provided that, notwithstanding anything in this subsection contained, rates on grain and flour shall be governed by the provisions of the agreement made pursuant to chapter five of the statutes of Canada, 1897—

That is the Crowsnest pass agreement, which this resolution does not touch at all:

—but such rates shall apply to all such traffic moving from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William to Fort William or Port Arthur, and to all such traffic moving westwardly from Fort William, and from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William, to Vancouver, British Columbia and to ports on the Pacific coast, over all lines now or hereafter constructed by any company subject to the jurisditcion of parliament.

In other words, if your honour will do me the kindness to look at the proposed amendment to the Railway Act you will find that it does not touch the question in the resolution of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) at all, for he proposes that the rates shall be adjusted or reduced to at least not more than three cents per hundred pounds over existing export rates. There cannot be any similarity between these two things.

I dislike raising an issue on this question except to point out to your honour that it is usual for hon. members to direct attention to the rules with respect to points of order of this character. The rule with respect to anticipation might be raised against the bill because the bill is anticipated by a motion, but this motion deals with something entirely different, and it cannot possibly be said to be governed by the rule with respect to anticipation because this is not anticipation; this is after the event and could not under any circumstances be made a part of the bill. I point this out to your honour only because I am anxious to assist rather than to do otherwise in regard to the conduct of public business. On looking at the section of the bill and the resolution I am sure that your honour will observe that one is not in any sense a duplication of the other. I think what might be done, in view of what has been done, would be to permit the motion to stand on the order paper without losing its position, if that is agreeable to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, for it is quite clear that the two things are not similar.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I certainly think the point is well taken by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and I am willing to allow the motion to stand without losing its position on the order paper.

Mr. POWER: The point of order having been raised, and having listened to the observations of the right hon. leader of the opposition, although I am not quite prepared to agree with him in every respect, I am willing to admit that the point raised by him is well worthy of the consideration of the Speaker and the postponement of any decision by the chair. Under the circumstances, if the house consents, I would suggest that we allow the order to stand without losing its position on the order paper.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

MOTION TO EXCLUDE FROM CANADA CERTAIN CLASSES OF IMMIGRANTS

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East) moved:

Whereas it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada that there should be in the country groups to whom, because of race or religious beliefs, we do not extend all the right of citizenship;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take the necessary measures to exclude from the country all persons belonging to those groups to whom we do not grant the full rights and privileges of citizenship.

He said: In the uncertainties of the situation I rather hesitate to get up for fear I may find that I am not in order even with this resolution, though I think it is a matter that has been discussed in the house on other occasions. But in spite of that discussion the problem remains pretty much the same. I can assure the house that I gave the whole subject a great deal of thought before putting the motion on the order paper, because I am convinced that it is one that should be considered and it is much better that it should be discussed on the floor of the house where we can, I hope, give it that impartial and serious consideration which we could not do in the heat of an election, on the hustings where passions and prejudices can be brought into play.

The resolution asks parliament to take immediate measures to exclude from the country persons to whom, because of race or religion, we do not extend all the rights and privileges of citizenship. I realize that even if this were done it would not meet the situation that exists in British Columbia, with which I will try to deal to-night. Of course, when I speak of persons to whom we refuse to extend the rights and privilèges of citizenship, asking that they be excluded from the country, I refer to such persons as come here to stay permanently; the resolution does not refer to persons who may come into the country for a stated time.

In British Columbia, unfortunately, there are persons who are deprived of citizenship rights because of racial origin and religious beliefs. In the Franchise Act of 1934 the Doukhobors in British Columbia were deprived of one of the ordinary rights of citizenship, the right to vote. They were denied that right in British Columbia although they still have it in all the other provinces. I do not however wish to deal to-night with the Doukhobor situation, the present government, when in opposition, took a very decided stand, and in my opinion rightly so, against the disfranchisement of Doukhobors in British Columbia, and it is only reasonable to suppose that that discrimination will be removed from the Franchise Act when it comes up for amendment, as I assume it will before the next general election takes place. There are however in British Columbia other racial groups who are in the same position as are the Doukhobors in regard to the rights of citizenship. I do not know what the attitude of the government would be with respect to those groups, but I do know the attitude of some of its supporters. I refer now to persons of oriental origin, Japanese, Chinese and British subjects from India. These people are not allowed to vote in British Columbia, and they are debarred from other rights and privileges because they have not the right of the franchise. I may refer more specifically later on to these other deprivations.

If the number affected by this discrimination were insignificant, if there were only very few of them, I realize that the moral aspect of the matter would be the same; but the practical consequences would not be so important. I think it is unfortunate that this oriental question affects British Columbia more than it does the other provinces. I believe it would be correct to say that the other provinces have no oriental problem; yet the other provinces, through their representation in the house, cannot avoid responsibility for the situation that now exists in British Columbia.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Before I put the case as I see it, I think it would be well to give the house an idea of the situation in that province by indicating the extent of the oriental population. I will deal first with the Chinese. The number of Chinese in the province at the time of the census in 1931 was 27,139; that was not in the dominion as a whole but in British Columbia alone. Now there is an assumption, which has been very assiduously spread, that this population is growing rapidly. So far as the Chinese are concerned, that is not true. According to the statistics I have received from the bureau of statistics the number of Chinese births since 1931 to the end of 1934 was 488. The number of deaths in the same period was 693, and there has been no Chinese immigration, that is, at least no legal entry of Chinese during the last few years. We can see that the Chinese population is decreasing rather than increasing. The natural decrease for the period I have mentioned would be about 200, and I am told that there are quite a number of adult Chinese who have returned to their native land during the period. There are however no accurate statistics with regard to this category.

When we take the Japanese into consideration the situation is different; the population is growing. And it is for that reason that I say that even though those who are now coming in by immigration were excluded, as I am asking to have done, the Japanese population would continue to grow. I come now to the figures showing the number and the growth of the Japanese population in the province at the present time. According to the census of 1931, there were 22,205 Japanese in British Columbia. Births from the time of the census to the end of 1934 numbered 2,341. There was an increase by immigration during that period of 618, and the number of deaths in the same period was 503. Deduct the number of deaths from the number of births, and add the increase by immigration, and we find that the Japanese population of British Columbia is larger now by 2,456 than it was at the time the census was taken in 1931. The rate of natural increase, however, is declining. The number of births has been decreasing each year from 1929, as shown by the years for which I have statistics, until 1934. The number of births in 1929 was 842; in 1934 the number was 614. As I have pointed out, however, there has been a substantial increase in the population during the three and a half years for which I have given the figures.

The statement was made by one of the Liberal candidates in order to frighten the people of British Columbia that in 28 years the oriental population of that province would be greater than the white population. If that is correct, the situation with which I am dealing is even more serious than I believe it to be. We are adding yearly to the population of Canada by natural increase about 650 Canadian-born children who under present circumstances can never become Canadian citizens. That is true not only of children now born; it is true of those children's children for generations unless we deal with the matter in a better and, I would say, a more British way than we have dealt with it so far. I would quote from a speech made to the house by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) on June 30, 1934. He was speaking against the exclusion of Doukhobors from the franchise in the present Franchise Act. I am quoting the present Minister of National Defence because I agree with what he said at that time. I believe the stand that he took on that occasion was the right one. This is what he said, as reported in Hansard of that year at page 4530:

> The province of British Columbia has punished these men and properly so but it is a pernicious, vicious and iniquitous principle to single out any race by name in any legislation of this country and to deprive them of the franchise because this will affect not only the people there to-day but their descendants to the third and fourth generation.... But here we are to-day as a parliament representing all free peoples within this country, saying that any man because he is a Doukobor is absolutely deprived of the franchise and his sons and daughters and their descendants unto untold generations are also to be disfranchised. That is the most Tory measure I ever heard of in any parliament.

It was pointed out that the reason these Doukhobors were to be deprived of their franchise was that they would not observe the laws of this country. If it is a pernicious, vicious and iniquitous principle to deprive the law-defying Doukhobor of the franchise, how much more so is it so with regard to the law-abiding oriental?

I have a number of other statistics with regard to the Japanese population. Those statistics, however, are taken from a private source; I wish to make that clear. They have been gathered by a survey made by a number of university students of Japanese origin in the province of British Columbia. There are approximately 24,000 Japanese in British Columbia at the present time. Over 11,000 of them are Canadian-born and are consequently in my opinion Canadian citizens, and 135 of those are Canadian-born children of Canadian-born parents. It is also shown by this survey that 3,685 Japanese were attending educational institutions, most of them being in the public schools of the province. It should also be noted that, of the Canadian-born Japanese of ten years and over, 41½ per cent read English only. Even if it were possible, which in my opinion it is not, to return these people to the land of their origin, they would be as much out of place there as if they were Canadian-born children of white parents. Forty-four per cent can read English and Japanese, and 14·3 per cent read Japanese only. From the same survey it appears that only 0·2 per cent of Canadian-born Japanese of ten years and over are illiterate. It would seem that according to these figures literacy among the Japanese in British Columbia is very high indeed. I have given the house those statistics in order that we might have, as far as population can show, a picture of the situation that exists in my province.

Mr. WOOD: Would the hon. member be prepared to include Canadian Indians in his proposal? They are law-abiding citizens.

Mr. MacINNIS: Canadian Indians, I believe, come under another classification. I do not think there is any discrimination as regards Canadian Indians when they become citizens within the proper meaning of that term. So long as they are wards of the government I understand that they are not allowed the franchise, but if they leave the reserve I think the franchise is granted to them in the same way as to any other Canadian citizen. I think those are the regulations, if you like to call them such, with regard to Indians. However, I have no objection to including them in this.

Mr. WOOD: May I ask another question then. If my hon. friend classifies Indians as wards of the government, how about those people we are keeping on relief? Are they not also wards of the government? Would he also disfranchise them?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not germane to the point under discussion. The Franchise Act of 1934 specifically allowed those who were receiving relief to vote, though they might otherwise have been excluded from the franchise. I agree with the principle, and if I had my way I would extend it much further. However it is not germane to the question I am discussing.

The question may very properly be asked, I believe, as to the way in which this relatively small racial group constitutes a problem that should be discussed in the house. That question can be answered definitely and clearly by saying that these people, citizens of Canada, are deprived of the right to vote, and that they are thus segregated from the rest of the population of British Columbia. They feel that they are in an inferior position; they feel that they should not be placed in this position, as intellectually and in every other way they are the equal of other races or national groups. Recent history has given ample proof of the dangers of discriminating against racial minorities. Canada has prided itself on the fact that there is no racial discrimination in this country. I am told, and I think I saw it somewhere in the press, that our representative at Geneva—and if my memory serves me aright it was the government leader in the other house—recently said that in Canada we had no racial problems. I am afraid that before making that statement the hon. gentleman did not see the advertisements of the Liberal party in British Columbia during the recent campaign; I am afraid he did not listen to some of the radio broadcasts dealing with racial problems in that province. I am quite satisfied that if he had done so he would not have made the statement he is supposed to have made. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is anxious to promote friendly relations between this country and the rest of the world and also that he is anxious that we should not have racial prejudices and racial antagonisms created within this country. For that reason I wish him to note the advertisement to which I am going to refer now, and which appeared in Vancouver newspapers during the last federal campaign. This advertisement appeared in the Vancouver Province of October 7, and it states at the bottom of the page that it is published by the Vancouver Liberal council executive committee. At the top in black type one inch deep or perhaps more it says:

50,000 Orientals in British Columbia

C.C.F. stands pledged to give them the vote. The Liberal party is opposed to giving these orientals the vote. Where will you stand on election day?

The deciding issue in British Columbia was your attitude towards the orientals, whether or not you were going to give them the vote. I should like to impress upon the Prime Minister that it was stated as the policy of the Liberal party that they were opposed to giving the vote to orientals, that they were opposed to giving the vote to these British subjects, these Canadian citizens, because of the colour of their skin. Then they go on:

A vote for any C.C.F. candidate is a vote to give the Chinaman and Japanese the same voting right that you have! A vote for a Liberal candidate is a vote against oriental enfranchisement.

When the Japanese were members of the League of Nations did not they and the Chinese have in that body the same voting right that any other nation possessed? That was in the League of Nations, the greatest body of its kind this world has ever known. There they stood, the equals of all the other nations in the world, yet the Liberal party in British Columbia felt the need of securing votes so desperately that they had to appeal to low racial prejudices of that kind in order to secure election. I think that is a most unworthy motive. I am sure that there was enough, even if I do not agree with it, in the platform of the Liberal party to secure their election without making appeals of this kind. I wish to suggest to the Prime Minister that at some future time this sort of thing may create a very serious situation in Canada. As I have already pointed out, the oriental population is growing. They are an intellectual, proud people and they will not tolerate reflections of this kind without a protest.

This advertisement is flanked on either side by pictures of the six Liberal candidates in greater Vancouver. Here we have the picture of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). There is a short biography under each picture. I am not going to take the time of the house to read them, except to note that the Minister of National Defence is said to be a national figure and the right bower of the Prime Minister. I am sorry that the right bower of the Prime Minister had to stoop to something like this in order to secure election. Then there is the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), the Liberal candidate for Vancouver East and the Liberal candidate for Vancouver South, who has since been made a judge. I am just wondering what may happen if he has to deal with matters concerning both whites and orientals. Here is the picture of the Liberal candidate for Vancouver North, and the picture of the Liberal member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). In another advertisement directly below we find the picture of the Minister of National Defence again, along with that of an assistant speaker, Mrs. Nellie McClung, the noted author. I understand, however, that Mrs. McClung did not help their election, at least as far as this slogan was concerned, because she put herself on record as being in favour of extending the vote to orientals. I am sure that is very much to her credit.

I could show the house other advertisements of a similar kind. The whole issue was: where will you stand on election day? The determining factor was the stand on the oriental question. Of itself that would not be quite so bad. But it was not left at that. I have in my hand now a radio address delivered on October 4 by a man named J. Edward Sears, barrister at law, which was published by the Vancouver East Liberal campaign committee. Let me quote from this. Do hon. members who are living side by side with other races in eastern Canada, French and English, think this is likely to promote racial accord in British Columbia?

Maybe you have asked yourself, Why has the C.C.F. promised votes to the orientals? It certainly did not emanate from the ordinary white citizen of the province.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members apparently are not ordinary white citizens.

Is it love of country that has prompted such a promise? Is it personal love for the oriental that has caused the promise of the gift of the franchise? Or is it because the orientals have paid for the promise of such a gift from the C.C.F.? That is the question that I dare the C.C.F. leaders to answer.

I did not think the franchise was a gift; I thought for British subjects and Canadian citizens it was a right, and consequently people did not have to pay in order to get it. Then comes one of the filthiest things to which anyone could possibly stoop. It goes on to say:

White girls procured for orientals.

You mothers of young girls, wake up, when some one asks you to vote for a C.C.F. candidate in this election. Look behind the solicitor for a C.C.F. candidate and you will see an oriental leering over his shoulder with an eye on you and your daughter. Remember the terrible evidence that came out during the trial of the men of foreign extraction a few months ago, who procured and drugged innocent young girls and forced them into a life of shame.

Can hon. members imagine a great party stooping to a thing like that? It is true that trials were held and certain people were convicted and sent to the penitentiary. But they were not orientals; they were other Canadian citizens of foreign extraction who have the rights of citizenship. And in any event what did we do in this country? We brought thousands of Chinese men here; we kept them here; we did not permit their wives and families to come with them, and we should have known that Canadian women and girls would have to pay for an immoral act of that kind. Now it is time that something should be done to rectify such a situation, but surely the way to do it is not to make these low appeals to racial prejudice.

May I also point out that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is not the only organization in British Columbia that has gone on record in favour of giving the vote to orientals. The United Church of Canada in British Columbia has gone on record to the same effect. I wonder whether those members of the Liberal party when they went to their churches on Sunday and the minister preached to them, would see an oriental leering over his shoulder with an eye on their wives and daughters. I wonder! I quote again from this thing, although I am sure I have quoted enough:

Mr. Woodsworth, the leader of the C.C.F. party in Canada, had the effrontery and heathenism to announce in the Canadian parliament on the 22nd day of June last year that it was the policy of the C.C.F. party to grant the franchise to the orientals of this province and he gloried in it.

Well, he will be glad to find that at least he is in good company as far as his heathenism is concerned, because he is here associated with the United Church of Canada, and also with the Women's Christian Temperance Union, some more heathens I suppose!

Here is another one, very typically Liberal I believe:

C.C.F. would have orientals elect candidates.

I want you to stop and think what might happen in a few years if the oriental is given the vote. Maybe you want a small concession from the government, a job, or a small contract of some kind, or a piece of land—

How typically Liberal!

—or to have your child given a little special attention at school. It is necessary to make a trip to Victoria and see the minister directly concerned. You go into his office in the parliament buildings and you see three or four orientals in the anteroom waiting. Finally you are ushered into the presence of the minister and find yourself gazing into the eyes of a yellow man. You state your business and are then politely told that the others waiting in the outer office are also asking for the same concession. What would be your chance of obtaining any help?

I will not quote any more from the vile thing. But that is what we have to contend with in British Columbia. I think I have shown sufficiently where we are heading if this appeal to race prejudice is going to continue. We know how easily clashes can be brought about by such appeals. As I have already pointed out, the oriental population in British Columbia will keep on increasing for a considerable number of years. As I have also pointed out, the orientals are an intelligent and proud people and they will not forever put up with vilification and abuse of the kind I have just read.

What I would like to put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is this: First, I ask that the agreement between the Canadian government and the government of Japan by which a certain number of Japanese come to this country each year should be terminated at the earliest possible date. If the Japanese cannot be given full rights of citizenship in this country then we certainly should not allow any more of them to come into Canada. We also should take steps to return to the land of their origin as many as possible of those who are here. But this in itself would not be a solution of the problem. The orientals are in our midst; why they are here, who brought them here I am not going to discuss to-night. The important point is that they are here, and as far as I can see they are here to stay. It would be very much more to the point, now that they are here, to do everything possible to make them good and loyal citizens, having pride in our institutions, than because of their colour to try to create race prejudice against them in the minds of the ignorant.

Speaking recently to the advertising bureau, I think it was, of the board of trade of Vancouver, Professor Angus of the university of British Columbia made this statement. He had pointed out that there was no possible practical alternative, so far as our oriental population was concerned, to giving them the franchise. Then he said:

> It is the best thing to do from the selfish interests of us who are not oriental. We have to live with them, and it is much better to live with good citizens than bad citizens.

Some little time ago I was talking to a principal of one of the Vancouver schools at which there is an attendance of children of, as he told me, twenty-eight different races. He stated that there was no difficulty whatever, so far as racial grounds were concerned. The children played together; they worked together and so far as he could see race made no difference. My home in Vancouver is near one of the Vancouver high schools, and any day one can walk along the street and see Japanese girls accompanied by white girls, or Chinese girls and white girls walking arm in arm along the sidewalk. The same is true of the university.

Quite recently a farmer from the Fraser valley came to my home to talk over with me the necessity for the exclusion of orientals. During the interview he made this amazing statement: "It is not the vices of the orientals to which we object; it is their virtues." By a proper approach to this question I believe the government of Canada could turn the virtues of our oriental citizens to good account, and I implore the Prime Minister, in whose sincerity on questions of this kind I have the greatest trust, to try to find some way of dealing with the matter. I am not asking that at the moment the franchise be extended to orientals, but I am asking that if it is not extended some other solution of the problem be found.

With the statement of Professor Angus I am in complete accord. As these orientals are in Canada I think it is much better that we try to make good citizens of them because it is better to live with good citizens than with bad. I believe the time at my disposal has expired. I trust that any hon. member speaking on the resolution will endeavour to see the situation as it affects British Columbia. This matter does not affect other provinces to the same extent, but I believe it cannot be settled without the assistance of the dominion as a whole.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been following with great care the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). May I say to him immediately what he has been kind enough to say to me, namely, that I greatly respect his sincerity in everything he has said.

In listening to the hon. member however I found some difficulty in understanding his real objective. As I listened to his observations it seemed to me that they were directed towards the advocacy of the franchise being given to certain orientals in the province of British Columbia. I find however that the operative portion of his resolution asks the house to do something wholly different, and I believe it important to bring that difference to the attention of hon. members immediately, so that if the debate goes on for some time, hon. members will not be confused with respect to the real issue in the resolution as drafted.

May I point out that the resolution is divisible into two parts, the first constituting the preamble and the second the operative portion. The preamble reads:

> Whereas it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada that there should be in the country groups to whom, because of race or religious beliefs, we do not extend all the rights of citizenship.

Hon. members will notice that the preamble relates entirely to citizenship, a question which is wholly domestic. It is intended to deal with that phase of citizenship which the hon. member has emphasized, namely the right of the exercise of the franchise.

Mr. MacINNIS: Without unduly interrupting the right hon. gentleman may I state I pointed out clearly that while I was anxious to exclude all those to whom we could not extend the rights of citizenship I felt that would not be a full solution of the problem which now exists.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I now come to the operative portion of the hon. member's motion:

> Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should take the necessary measures to exclude from the country all persons belonging to those groups to whom we do not grant the full rights and privileges of citizenship.

That portion of the resolution makes it one for the exclusion of orientals. That is what it is, and my hon. friend agrees. We are perfectly clear on that point; as a consequence, I believe there will be very little difficulty in deciding the proper course for parliament to follow.

I agree with the hon. member when he states that questions of this kind can be discussed to much greater advantage in a deliberate assembly, such as the House of Commons, than on the hustings, and I am therefore glad the hon. member has brought the matter here for discussion. May I revert to the preamble, which deals impliedly with the question of the franchise, and say that if it is a question of granting the franchise to orientals resident in British Columbia, the province to which he has made particular reference, then the matter is one which it seems to me might come properly before the legislature of that province, in the first instance, and might come properly before this chamber during the consideration of our Dominion Franchise Act. If I am not mistaken, the party to which the hon. member belongs constitutes the opposition in the legislature of British Columbia, but I am not aware that the co-operative commonwealth federation party in the legislature has preferred any request to the government of British Columbia to give the right of the franchise to the orientals of that province. I would say that that would be the proper place to begin. As long as I can remember, with respect to the franchise, we in the federal parliament have felt it our duty to respect the points of view of the provinces in matters of this kind.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that true in regard to the votes for women in the province of Quebec?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking in the broad sense.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is a very broad sense.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are exceptions to every rule, and I am quite prepared to grant my hon. friend the exception. But certainly so far as orientals in British Columbia are concerned, any portion of our legislation respecting the franchise which touches on that question has been dealt with in parliament out of respect for what we believed to be the wishes of the people of that province. However may I state immediately in this connection that there is on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) a notice of motion reading as follows:

> That a special committee, the members thereof to be selected at a later date, be appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act 1934 and amendments thereto and the franchise act 1934 and amendments thereto and to suggest to the house such amendments to the said acts as they may deem advisable, and, furthermore, such committee shall study and make a report on the following subjects:—

And so on.

I have no doubt that the house will adopt that motion and that the Franchise Act will come before the special committee, and there would seem to me to be the proper time and place for my hon. friend to present his proposal that orientals in British Columbia should be granted the franchise. So far as his motion has to do with the franchise in its relation to orientals, the two courses I have mentioned amply cover all that could possibly be desired with regard to settling a domestic question pertaining to citizenship and the exercise of the franchise by orientals in British Columbia, namely, to have it dealt with in the first instance in the provincial legislature of British Columbia, and in the second place dealt with here by a committee of this House of Commons appointed specially to consider what amendments to the Dominion Franchise Act may be necessary.

May I say just in passing that I am not aware so far as British Columbia is concerned that the orientals themselves who reside there have been agitating for this right of the franchise, nor am I aware that the public generally have been advocating that particular step. However, I mention that only in passing.

The important point to consider is what my hon. friend actually proposes in his resolution, and here I think I can almost quote him in support of the point of view that I am about to set forth. The substantive portion of the resolution, as I have mentioned, is:

That the government should take the necessary measures to exclude from the country all persons belonging to those groups to whom we do not grant the full rights and privileges of citizenship.

The groups referred to, as mentioned by my hon. friend, are four: the Doukhobors, the Japanese, the Chinese and the Hindus.

My hon. friend says that so far as the Doukhobors are concerned, they have not been coming to this country for a long time past and therefore the question of excluding them does not arise.

My hon. friend also mentioned one other point, which was that members on the government side of the house at the present time opposed very strongly the denial in the Dominion Franchise Act of the right of the exercise of the franchise to Doukhobors residing in the province of British Columbia. I know that I opposed that provision very strongly at the time, and I am opposed to that section as it stands at present. I have no doubt that particular clause will come before the committee for consideration. So as far as the Doukhobors are concerned, they can be ruled out of the present discussion altogether.

The Chinese, I heard my hon. friend say, were diminishing rather than increasing in numbers in Canada, and from that point of view it would seem that exclusion of Chinese was hardly a step that it would be wise for this country to take at the present time even if there were not other very strong reasons for not taking action of that sort.

My hon. friend did not make quite clear just what he meant by exclusion, whether he meant to take the orientals already in the country and have them removed bodily back to their own native land, or whether he wished to exclude others from coming in. I think he did say that he thought they could hardly be sent back. He did not make the statement too positively, but he did think it would not do to send them back. I think I am right in saying that such at any rate is his view. If that, then, is the case, what the resolution narrows down to is simply the exclusion of others from coming in. We are agreed on that. So far as the Doukhobors are concerned we have seen that the resolution has no bearing as they have not been coming in. As far as the Chinese are concerned, the hon. member himself, as I have pointed out, states that their numbers in the province are diminishing, and he admits that none have come in at all within the last couple of years; so exclusion there would not be very much to the point. There remain then but the two nationalities, the Japanese and the Hindus—the British East Indians, spoken of colloquially as the Hindus. That raises, Mr. Speaker, the very large question of the exclusion from our dominion of some of those who are British subjects and also the exclusion of citizens of a great friendly power such as Japan is. These are days when the world is severely troubled with its problems. I should think it very unlikely that hon. members would wish to add to the world's problems to-day by raising at this time the question of exclusion from this country of the foreign peoples of the orient and of British subjects from India. I cannot imagine a single question which at this time would create more difficulties to governments, and which was calculated to provoke more in the way of hatred and strife than the proposal of exclusion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does not the Prime Minister think the election propaganda of the Liberals in British Columbia was just as bad as exclusion itself could possibly be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Like my hon. friend I deplore very much anything that is calculated to stir up racial feeling, but fortunately so far as political propaganda is concerned it is more or less localized. What my hon. friend forgets at the moment is that people in the orient who have never heard of our political discussions will read his resolution in the morning as a resolution that is being discussed in the House of Commons of Canada, and that makes it a very serious question indeed. I do not imagine that anyone in India has heard a single word of what was discussed in British Columbia during the last campaign with respect to East Indians, but if this resolution were to carry to-night I venture to say that the press of India to-morrow would be full of what this House of Commons had done to exclude British subjects in India from the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are excluded now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not excluded now. My hon. friend is quite wrong when he says that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why move to exclude them if they are already excluded?

Mr. MacINNIS: There is another class that is not excluded; that is the reason for the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that this is a question which has caused all governments in Canada for many years past great concern. It is a question to which I personally have given a good deal of attention and investigation. I have in my hand a report which I prepared for the government of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as long ago as the year 1908 after a mission to England to confer with the British authorities on the subject of immigration to Canada from the orient, and immigration from India in particular. Having taken up outstanding features of this problem, so far as Canada was concerned, with the British Government, I subsequently visited India and took the matter up with the government of India. Later on I took up the same question with the governments of China and Japan. I have had much to do with subsequent negotiations. So I think I can speak with some degree of authority as to the significance of this great question. May I be permitted to quote just one paragraph of the order in council under which I was appointed to go to England to discuss the matter with the British government and subsequently to India. It is as follows:

> That moreover the whole subject of oriental immigration is one of first concern to Canada, and affecting, as it does, the relations of the dominion with foreign powers, and the relations of our people with fellow British subjects in India, involves considerations of the highest importance, not only to Canada, but to the British empire as a whole.

That was greatly true in 1908. Some twenty-eight years have elapsed since that time. I venture to say the problem has become infinitely more significant in its world aspects in that interval of time. It behooves this House of Commons to move very warily and carefully in whatever it does that might be interpreted by the great peoples of the orient and of India as something that is offensive to them as a people, and which reflects upon them as nations.

My hon. friend in speaking to-night said that the orientals as he knew them were a proud people; that they did not like the reflection on their race and their country involved in their being deprived of the franchise and were offended by it. I think he is right in regarding them as sensitive and proud, and just because I think he is right in that I feel we have to be very careful as to anything we say or do in this House of Commons which will be regarded as a reflection and as offensive, not merely to the few orientals who happen to be in Canada, but to the peoples of the orient in their respective countries whether they be in Japan or China or India or other parts of the world.

That is why I have thought it advisable to intervene at an early stage in this debate rather than to wait for the discussion to run on for some time. As, I said, speaking in the house some days ago, I do not believe that those of us who are members of legislative bodies can begin to appreciate the possible significance of our words and above all of our resolutions at a time like the present, when the feeling of unrest among the nations of the world is what it is. This is one resolution which for this reason I trust the House of Commons, if it should come to a vote at all, will vote down in the most emphatic way. I have not the least doubt however that my hon. friend, when he has discussed the political issues of the last campaign in British Columbia, will feel that his purpose has been served and will withdraw the resolution.

May I point out that, the question being the important one it is, every government that has held office in this country has had to give very careful consideration to the best method of dealing with it. There are only two methods that can be adopted with respect to immigration from the orient to Canada. One is the method of exclusion, which reflects upon the entire peoples of those countries, which is offensive to them and which is certain to create bitterness as between the orient and Canada, and the other method is that of diplomatic negotiation—frank and direct communication with the countries concerned, pointing out aspects of the problem as they are of concern to us, and seeking by negotiation in a diplomatic way to effect arrangements which will achieve what is necessary by way of effective restriction and avoid what is so objectionable in exclusion.

The governments that have been in office in this country for thirty years past, whether Liberal or Conservative, have followed precisely the same method in dealing with this question; they have met those in authority in the other countries and explained the situation here, and have succeeded in securing arrangements in the nature of effective restriction. What my hon. friend has said to-night makes it clear that while there have been times when the number of orientals coming to Canada has been considerable, there has never been a time when the numbers coming in have been fewer actually than they are at present. So far as immigration from the orient is concerned, my hon. friend has chosen, from his point of view, the worst possible moment to introduce a resolution looking in the direction of restriction, to say nothing of exclusion. One of the chief reasons this country had for opening a legation in Japan was that we might avoid precisely the sort of discussion that threatens to arise in the house to-night in considering a question which means so very much to nations that are sensitive in matters of this kind. It was thought that if Canada had a legation in Japan and Japan a legation here, we could meet the representatives of Japan here and the Japanese could meet our representative in Tokyo and these matters could be talked over and a friendly arrangement reached. That has been done and done most successfully. The agreement we have with Japan at the present time is being carried out very faithfully by the Japanese. We have no reason to complain at all of the honourable manner in which that country has acted in the last few years with respect to the fulfilment of all the obligations arising out of the arrangement we have with her.

Again, so far as India is concerned, I should think it would be very unfortunate indeed if we attempted anything in the nature of exclusion. I think my hon. friend himself will agree that the number of East Indians coming to Canada at the present time is so small as not to make it a consideration; indeed, the hon. gentleman's remarks have been pretty much to that effect. So that the whole matter narrows to the adoption of an act of exclusion towards Japan.

May I say to my hon. friend, that quite apart from the more serious and important considerations of which I have spoken, interested as he is above all in his own province of British Columbia, he surely must appreciate the importance to British Columbia in the development of its trade on the Pacific, of maintaining the friendliest relations with the countries with which Canada hopes to trade. Within the last few months, we have fortunately settled a trade difference between Japan and Canada in a manner which has avoided much bitterness of feeling, indeed has, I believe, ended it, and established in its stead friendliness and good will that will be very much to the advantage of both countries. Certainly, in the little time that normal trade relations have been restored, there has been evidence as a result thereof, of a very considerable development of industry in British Columbia. Many men are to-day employed who only a few months ago were out of work; wage bills are being paid out at higher rates and more extensively in several of the industries in British Columbia as a result of restored trade with Japan. That is a development that means very much to our country at this time, and will mean more and more as time goes on. Any act of exclusion against orientals would pretty soon put an end to trade relations with countries against which that act might be directed.

I do not think I need say more. I believe that my hon. friend is truly desirous, as are all members of the house, of promoting good will as between the different nations of the world and this dominion; and particularly desirous are those who come from British Columbia and from the western part of Canada, of promoting the friendliest relations with those great countries that are across the Pacific. We shall be making no mistake if we continue by direct negotiation to seek to appeal to what is reasonable in the minds of others in effecting the agreements that are necessary to the succesful and peaceful management of our own affairs; but we shall certainly be creating ill-will, the consequence of which no one can foresee, if we adopt at this time any act of exclusion.

May I add this word in conclusion. I do not think that any country would for one moment take the view that immigration is not entirely a matter for each country to settle for itself. So far as the British empire is concerned, at the imperial war conference of 1918, if I am not mistaken, a resolution in quite definite terms was passed to the effect that as between different parts of the empire it was recognized that each part had sovereign right in the matter of regulating the entrance of people into its own domain and that this carried with it the right to restrict immigration from any other part of the empire. As regards our recognized right to do as we please with respect to immigration there can be no question whatever. But what it is best to do, and how it can best be done is something which no government can consider too carefully. I hope therefore that, having served his purpose in bringing out what he regards as deplorable features of the last campaign in British Columbia, my hon. friend will, when the time comes, withdraw the resolution, so that there may be no possible misinterpretation of Canada's attitude towards orientals, whether they be foreigners in the usual meaning of the term, or fellow British subjects in the wide sense of that phrase.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): The resolution now before the house deals with a matter, as the mover (Mr. MacInnis) stated, peculiar to British Columbia. I was rather disappointed—and I say this kindly—that the mover of the resolution, although he started off upon a rather high plane, remarking that this was a question which should be discussed in the House of Commons, and without heat, rather than on the hustings, before long exhibited quite a little heat and brought in matters that occurred during the last election.

Let me say at the outset that perhaps no Liberal candidate can wholly disclaim the propaganda and advertisements which appeared in the press on behalf of his party. I am not adopting a "holier than thou" attitude, but I can assure the mover of the resolution that from one end of the campaign to the other never by word or inference did I mention the oriental issue. It is true that my picture and my name appeared in the newspaper exhibited, but I think in fairness my hon. friend will have to admit that I, although having nothing personally to do with it, must I suppose accept some responsibility. I am however actually no more responsible for it than he is for every speech that was uttered by every Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member throughout the campaign. In bringing up the matter as one that affects the best interests of Canada, the hon. member shows the house, and rightly so, that it is of vital concern and interest to the people of British Columbia particularly.

The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated the matter very clearly, I think, when he pointed out that the federal parliament was merely carrying out the wishes of the British Columbia government. What annoyed many people in British Columbia and some British Columbia members of the house was that during the last provincial election in that province the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidates, knowing that it was an acute question, and a touchy one, invariably ducked the oriental question when they were asked about it. When the subject of the Doukhobors came up in the house the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) came out with a straightforward statement to the house and to the country that so far as he personally was concerned and his party likewise they, if elected to power, would give the orientals in British Columbia the vote.

Coming to the resolution itself, however, it is threefold. The first part I certainly do not agree with. It says

> Whereas it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada that there should be in the country groups to whom, because of race or religious beliefs, we do not extend the rights of citizenship.

Again, to quote the words of the Prime Minister this evening, there are many groups in British Columbia who are being denied the vote who are not as much concerned about it as is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I have met many Chinese; I have met many Japanese and Hindus. Let me say frankly that they are more concerned with making a livelihood, and so long as they can make a little money in British Columbia the vote does not interest them very much. Yet we have members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation who seem to be losing a lot of sleep over oriental groups in British Columbia who have not the franchise.

It is my desire to keep the discussion on a fairly high plane. First, however, I want to make some remarks regarding immigration into this country and some of the races which have been mentioned. The mover referred to Japanese, Chinese and Hindus. I think I am stating the matter fairly when I say that if there is any race that has a grievance against Canada it is those who came to this land from China. In looking up records I find that this race have contributed a total of $13,000,000 to the treasury of this country for their admittance to make a living. I would also draw to the attention of the house that they are the only race which has a special act designed for their control. None of them, generally speaking, is admitted unless he comes under what is known as the Chinese Immigration Act. In view of the opening up of the orient and particularly of that great country, China, I think this is a matter of which serious notice should be taken. It is not that I am advocating the taking down of the barriers, because I quite agree we have had enough of these orientals, and I would like to see many more of them going back; for as has been pointed out, Chinese in large numbers have been returning to their own country. If my memory serves me correctly, many hundreds, if not a thousand or two, were taken back last year in accordance with some understanding with the Chinese government. Napoleon said, referring to that large country, China, "She sleeps, and it is well." But with her teeming millions beginning to awake I think it is about time we took serious note of the present discrimination; and if we are going to bar Chinese altogether, let us bar all orientals. Of course at the moment I am not going into that matter, nor am I now advocating such a step much as I would like to. But I say it is very unfair that this one country should have legislation specially designed against any one nation in the orient and then, by some agreement with a nation living alongside, allow that country's nationals into Canada.

I could have wished that the mover of the resolution in his remarks had spoken about the unassimilable races. Let me point out to hon. members that there is more behind this matter than mere voting power or the economic life of people in this country from the orient and from India. My personal view is that we should view very carefully if not with alarm the presence of thousands of an unassimilable race, and until the time comes when we either marry them or they marry amongst our people and begin to assimilate, I think we should go very carefully indeed before granting them too many rights and privileges. In saying that I am giving my own personal views.

In view again of the statement of my hon. friend who moved the resolution that he wished to keep the discussion on a high plane, I wonder that he did not draw the attention of the house to the fact that even the gentleman's agreement with Japan is a little one-sided. At any rate that is my view. We allow their nationals, also Chinese and Hindus, to come into this country, to own land, to make a living and to go about their economic and everyday life without let or hindrance. It is hardly necessary to point out that these groups in various phases of our economic life have been the means of keeping wages lower than they should have been. Again, in Japan, I understand, no one has the right to own land or to vote. So Canada's refusal to grant them just the vote is not wholly one-sided. Japan has made no effort to allow any foreigner to own land within her borders, and I say that when any new agreement is negotiated that fact should be laid before the Japanese government and a little fair play asked from them before her nationals demand too much from us. I doubt however whether the Japanese in Canada are demanding the vote in very large numbers. It is true that one or two students have gone around saying it is an insult to the race that they are not allowed to vote, but taking it by and large I think I am making a correct statement that they are not so much concerned with the vote as they are with making a living in this country. I think it also fair to state that so far as their standards of living are concerned they are making a wonderfully fine living, in the province of British Columbia at least.

I note that many orientals, when they start in business, are very loath to engage Canadian help if at all, though Canadian industries, paying the same wages in many kinds of work, give them every preference in employment. Japanese concerns in British Columbia, either logging or fishing, do not hire one Canadian, and that is a very serious problem, which we view with some alarm. We see them encroaching on our fisheries, our farms and our forests, and now the statement is made in the press that Japan is getting tired of buying lumber from Canadian lumbermen and is beginning to acquire large tracts of forest land in British Columbia. I venture to state that if they do so not one Canadian will be given employment there; all the workmen will be Japanese, born either in Canada or in Japan.

Under the old act Japanese born in this country could renounce their citizenship only with the consent of their own country. No one knows how many have done so, but under the new law Japanese can retain their citizenship by simply registering with the Japanese consul. I have no inclination to quarrel with them for not giving up their citizenship; it is their birthright; but why pretend that all Japanese in Canada, either born here or coming from Japan, are entirely British subjects or Canadians? We have no real data as to whether they belong to Japan or whether they are really Canadians.

The Doukhobor question was an entirely different matter. When it came up in the house I voted against the Doukhobor being given the franchise, and I am not apologizing for having done so. As is well known, the Doukhobors came to this country—after having been given every encouragement, it is true—and were allowed to live their own lives and go their own way. But when they refused to be registered; when they burned down our schools; when they tore the clothes off the policemen who went in to administer the law, and chased them; when, as the Prime Minister pointed out, they became the first race in this country successfully to defy the law, I have no apology to offer for voting against those people being permitted the franchise until they learn to obey our laws. In connection with the franchise, Mr. Speaker, I am more particularly concerned about our own people. I would rather see wider education in regard to the franchise and something more done to arouse our own people to the importance of voting, so that instead of only about seventy per cent of the registered voters taking advantage of the franchise at a general election we would have as nearly as possible one hundred per cent. When one remembers that we have to bring out practically all our voters or many of them will not come at all, I say that it would be far better to spend our efforts in educating our own people to the value of the franchise rather than to lose any sleep over the orientals not having votes because, as I say, they are not particularly concerned about that. They have enough power now without the franchise; I do not know just what more they want, unless it might be that a little later they would put up candidates of their own. Then we might witness one of them, either in Victoria or in Ottawa, presumably representing all his electors but—and I say this without fear of successful contradiction—really representing a great group of their fellow nationals, and perhaps being guided from abroad.

I want however to keep to the resolution. If it were simply a matter of keeping out orientals I feel that I could support this motion but—and I say this in all kindliness—I do not think the principal wish of the mover of the resolution is so much to keep out orientals as to deal with those who are already in the country and who are not allowed to vote, to the end that they be given the vote.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will not accept my own statement surely he must accept the resolution as it stands. I think it has been decided already this evening that it is the resolution, and not the intent behind it, that counts, and what is in the resolution is quite clear.

Mr. REID: I may be a little dense, Mr. Speaker, but I assure the hon. gentleman that his remarks were not directed to the resolution, and of course I was going more on his own statements than on what is in the resolution, because I thought what he said was what he really meant. In the first paragraph the resolution states that it is detrimental to deny the vote to these people. With that I cannot agree; I do not believe it is detrimental to deny the vote to these classes of people. It is the inherent right of any country to deny the vote to any class it sees fit to deny it to. When I find certain countries denying the vote to citizens of Canada I ask: What kick have they to make when they themselves deny the vote to our nationals? In addition, of course, I do not think very many of these orientals are losing much sleep over the fact that they cannot vote in this country.

I should like to say a word with regard to our naturalization laws, because this resolution also touches that point. Some serious note should be taken of the fact that anyone born on a British ship becomes a British subject. My opinion is that we should not lightly give citizenship to people just because they are born on a British ship, irrespective of the nationality of the parents. Citizenship should be given carefully, and if that were done I think we might have more pride in the fact that we are Canadian citizens.

Mr. RINFRET: If my hon. friend will allow me, he should make a distinction between British citizenship and Canadian citizenship. A person born on a British ship would be a British subject but not necessarily a Canadian citizen.

Mr. REID: I understood that we followed the British law, which provides that anyone born on a British ship is a British subject.

Mr. RINFRET: British citizenship applies to the whole empire. That would not necessarily make a person a Canadian citizen.

Mr. REID: I shall have to accept the word of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) as to that. Then, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be going just a little too far to deny the right of entry to those people simply because we do not give them the franchise. In the course of his remarks the mover of the resolution gave some figures which I think he said were given to him by Japanese university students. The figures as to orientals in British Columbia form another bone of contention, and are not always correct. Only two years ago it was discovered in British Columbia that many Japanese who had birth certificates presumably showing them to be born in British Columbia really had been born in Japan. The whole problem is a very serious one. I might point out that in British Columbia we have some sections that are almost entirely Japanese. In my own constituency there is a school having fourteen rooms, of which in eleven the children are entirely Japanese, in two they are mixed and in only one they are white. Not long ago—I quoted this a year ago and I quote it again—I passed near my own district a school in which there were nine boys at play, seven Japanese and two white. One cannot but realize that with the great increase of births among those people in British Columbia this has become a very serious problem indeed, and I believe their numbers should not be allowed to increase by further immigration. However I realize that one's remarks might be wrongly interpreted abroad and by other countries, so I am not going to dwell on that aspect of the matter.

I say again I disagree with the first part of the resolution. Personally I do not believe it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada that the vote should not ge given to certain groups of nationals and secondly I object to barring any class of people from the country simply because we do not grant them the vote.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I have only a few remarks to make on this matter. It has been so well summed up by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that I wish to add simply one slight observation. I would have had a great deal more respect for the introducer of the resolution (Mr. MacInnis) if he had framed it honestly, and particularly—

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I submit it is quite out of order for the hon. member to say I have not framed my resolution honestly. I think he should withdraw that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should speak to the resolution.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. member had waited until I had finished my sentence he might not have been so hurt.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the hon. gentleman going to withdraw the statement?

Mr. NEILL: What statement? I have not made a statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, he said that I have not framed my resolution honestly.

Mr. NEILL: I did not say that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I heard that statement.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then it was not made?

Mr. NEILL: I was going to make it but I had not made it. I will take it all back and begin again. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is in two parts, and the hon. member certainly took advantage of his peculiar and unique wording of it to hang on to it an argument in favour of votes for orientals. There is no law against our discussing, or reason why we should not discuss votes for orientals in this chamber if we are so minded, but if I had been moving this resolution I would have begun honestly with votes for orientals and stuck to that and not mixed it up with the suggestion that we should exclude some. I timed the hon. gentleman; he devoted thirty-five minutes to speaking in favour of votes for orientals and in the last five minutes in one feeble sentence he made a casual reference to excluding them. The Prime Minister, as I say, summed up the matter so excellently that I can only endorse what he said. He said very truly that we should go to British Columbia if we want votes for orientals in British Columbia. That seems reasonable, does it not? It is on record that the party to which my hon. friend belongs is the official opposition in that province, and they have sat through two sessions of the local legislature and have not opened their mouths about it. Why not go to the source where you can get redress instead of whining about it in another place where you cannot get redress even if you wanted it?

The hon. member alluded to the Liberal party making an attempt to raise low racial prejudice. There stands the man—or sits—who introduced the low racial prejudice. The matter was dead. He says that the Japanese race will not tolerate this; well, they have tolerated it for thirty-three years, so why dig it up now? Who is digging it up; who is starting the low racial prejudice again? Surely not the people who are asking that things remain in statu quo as they have been for thirty-three years, as I shall show in a moment. I have before me the Law Reports, Appeal Cases, 1903, and at page 151 and following is the report of an appeal which was taken to the privy council of England, the highest court in the empire, by a gentleman of the name of Tomey Homma. He applied to the local courts for a mandamus to have the registrar put his name on the voters' list, and I believe he succeeded. Then the matter was taken to a higher court and he won there. Then the Attorney General of British Columbia took it to the privy council and in these pages is recorded the judgment of the privy council, delivered I think by Lord Halsbury. I will not quote it all, but among other things he says:

> The extent to which naturalization will confer privileges has varied both in this country and elsewhere.

Then he goes on to state that:

> From the time of William III down to Queen Victoria no naturalization was permitted which did not exclude the alien naturalized from sitting in parliament or in the privy council.

Does my hon. friend know that we do not even go to that extent? We do allow a Japanese to sit in parliament, that is, there is no law against his being a candidate, although we do not allow him to vote. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation can run a Japanese candidate at the next election; let them see how far they get.

Then the judgment goes on to discuss political rights. My hon. friend said earlier in the evening that the Liberal propaganda sheet asked whether the promise of the franchise had been made in return for some quid pro quo, and he said he did not know that the right of the franchise was a gift. Well, it is.

> The term "political rights" used in the Canadian Naturalization Act is, as Walkem J. very justly says, a very wide phrase, and their lordships concur in his observation that, whatever it means, it cannot be held to give necessarily a right to the suffrage in all or any of the provinces.

Then they go on to cite the history of the matter in Great Britain:

> In the history of this country the right to the franchise has been granted and withheld on a great number of grounds, conspicuously upon grounds of religious faith, yet no one has ever suggested that a person excluded from the franchise was not under allegiance to the sovereign.

The reference to religious grounds is that I believe for many years Roman Catholics were not allowed the vote, but nevertheless they were British subjects.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the Catholic Emancipation Act was passed about 1830.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. Now to put this into the common language of ordinary people the privy council decided that British Columbia had the right to pass any kind of franchise act they saw fit. The franchise was not a privilege inherent in the fact of being a British subject; they can and do exclude British subjects now unless they can qualify in certain regards. They could exclude people with red hair; I heard it suggested that they might exclude Scotchmen. They have that privilege. That decision was given, as I have said, thirty-three years ago; it has never been challenged since; it could not be because it is a decision of the final court of appeal. The Japanese, being loyal subjects, accepted that decision and we have never had any trouble about it since. It has never been a matter for diplomatic exchanges with Japan; they have accepted the situation. But now it is dug up out of a clear sky—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEILL: I should have said pulled down from a clear sky. My friend says, very unfairly I suggest, that we seek to discriminate against them on account of their colour. Not at all; it is not on account of their colour, but on account of the well known fact, admitted by the Japanese themselves, that they are not assimilable with us and, more than that, they do not want to be. They do not wish to intermarry with us. They regard themselves as the proud Japanese race. They are proud of their race, and have a right to take that attitude. They do not want intercourse with us; they do not want to intermarry with us, and for that reason they remain aloof. In many respects they claim they are superior. It is because they entertain these different ideals and ideas and because they maintain adherence to their own emperor, and so on, that we do not think it desirable to give them the vote. It is a local matter with which the people of British Columbia are surely best qualified to deal.

In his closing remarks the hon. member said that he is not asking that the oriental be given the vote. If he was not doing that, what was the whole purpose of ninety-nine per cent of his remarks? He said that he was not asking that they be given the vote, but only in his closing remarks did he make a suggestion to the Prime Minister that he do away with what is known as a gentleman's agreement. Look at the delightful consistency of the suggestion. On February 12, speaking on some other subject, he quoted the Liberal party as stating that they were opposed to giving votes to orientals. He used these words:

> Note that, sir—the Liberal party is opposed to giving the orientals the vote.

I am glad to hear it; I hope they stay that way. Then he goes on to state:

> What a wonderful help such a statement will be in their negotiations with Japan to improve trade relations between the two countries.

On the 12th of February he twits the Liberal party, stating that they are against giving orientals the vote, and that their attitude will handicap them in their trade negotiations. Now, if this resolution means anything, the last paragraph would exclude orientals altogether. As the Prime Minister has properly said, that will not facilitate good feelings between the two nations. The Prime Minister and hon. members generally know how bitterly I have opposed immigration from Japan, and how at last after a great deal of negotiating it has been cut down to 150 men, women and children in any one year. That is not as far as I wanted the Prime Minister to go, because I wanted it made exclusive, but for the reasons he mentioned to-night, namely, that we are not legislating for British Columbia alone, that was the arrangement made. We have to take into consideration international and world-wide conditions to which the Prime Minister referred, and for that reason I acquiesced in the reduced immigration which, I say, is a great improvement on the open door policy arising from the gentleman's agreement which existed previously, and under which as many as 1,700 in one year came in. Although I know it would be popular in British Columbia that we upset the present agreement, I am not asking that we do so. I would ask that it be rigidly adhered to and enforced and, for the reasons stated, not enlarged. I earnestly hope the house will turn down the resolution with its ostensible suggestion of excluding these people, but with the real object of giving votes to orientals in British Columbia.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) suggests that the mover of the resolution is responsible for digging something out of a clear sky. I am afraid his reasoning is almost as mixed as his metaphors. He deplores the introduction of racial prejudices and the stirring up of questions which, he states, are or have been dead. May I point out that in 1934 when we were discussing a bill to disfranchise the Doukhobors of British Columbia I pointed out incidentally that we had already gone too far in the way of regional disfranchisement and instanced the case of disfranchisement of the orientals in one province. My friend immediately jumped up and asked whether I would advocate the enfranchisement of orientals—

Mr. NEILL: That is not what I said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —or was it the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver)? Yes, I think it was the Minister of National Defence. His question was not germane to the question, but it was thrown in, so far as I could see, for purely political purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: However that may be, that was the question. I said immediately, "By all means, if otherwise qualified." In our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation manifesto, although we have not dealt definitely with orientals we have stated that our organization stands for equal rights to citizenship irrespective of race, colour or religion. I could not go back on the terms of that platform. Then the hon. member for Comox-Alberni went back to his constituency and published in the local press an advertisement in which he quoted from Hansard, and stated that we of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation stood for all sorts of things. Then the Liberal party took up the hue and cry and tried to make it one of the main issues in the last campaign. I am not surprised that my colleague from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) should get a bit excited when he recalled that in the last election campaign, in connection with a matter which should have been considered in a dignified way, a direct attempt had been made by the great Liberal party to discount another party by an appeal to race prejudice—all over a question which we had not raised except incidentally, but one upon which they sought to capitalize.

I believe Professor Angus was justified when in a recent number of the Canadian Forum he stated, "The Liberals stoop to conquer." The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) have undoubtedly conducted this discussion on a high plane. I wish that could have been done on the hustings. I believe the Prime Minister should have stated to-night, and perhaps earlier on the hustings, whether the Liberal party stand for an appeal to race prejudice. Further, he should have told us to-night whether the Liberal party stands for enfranchisement of orientals or of Doukhobors. He skilfully avoided questions of that kind and sought to direct attention to other matters.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has stated that we come here whining; that we should not come here at all, and that we should go to Victoria. Let me say to him that the Dominion Franchise Act was not passed in Victoria. It was passed in Ottawa, and if we are to get any redress from conditions imposed by the Dominion Franchise Act we must get it here, and not in Victoria. Further, we know that immigration regulations are laid down not by provincial legislatures; but by the federal parliament, and if the mover of the resolution urges that for certain reasons there should be an exclusion he is justified in coming here and advocating his views in this House of Commons. It is not his duty to try to pass the question on to the British Columbia legislature.

Mr. NEILL: He did not advocate it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister has said that generally speaking we have followed the provincial franchise. Let me point out, as was suggested by my colleague, that that was not done in the case of the women of Quebec. It has been clearly demonstrated again and again and again, that the people of Quebec do not want their women to have the franchise.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, no, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No? Well, the present government does not want them to have it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think members of this house from the province of Quebec are all in favour of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Again and again deputations have gone to Quebec asking for the franchise for women, but they have been turned down by people who are supposed to represent that province. Notwithstanding that fact we in this House of Commons insist that the women of Quebec should have a vote in federal affairs, and I think we are right. By the same reasoning, as I tried to point out two years ago, whatever may be done by the people of British Columbia in withholding the provincial franchise—that is their right, I suppose, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asserted—we in the federal parliament have the right to determine who is going to vote in a dominion election. I urge that it is not a good principle that we should discriminate in that regard between the provinces.

The same is true in connection with the Doukhobors. I have not time to go into detail to-night, but I recall that when a bill was introduced by the Conservative government here two years ago executing the Doukhobors and their descendants from the vote in British Columbia, it did not exclude them from the vote in Saskatchewan. I do not think that is a good sort of legislation. I said so then, and I say so again to-night. I think it is an outrageous piece of legislation. I have a friend, a descendant of a Doukhobor, a prominent lawyer in Saskatchewan. His wife was the daughter of a former lecturer of Queen's university. He has two very bright children growing up. If those children should move to British Columbia they would automatically be excluded from the franchise simply because on one side of the house they are descended from a Doukhobor. I say it is an outrageous piece of legislation and I would think a Liberal government that is true to Liberal principles would see that that piece of legislation does not remain on the statute books.

Mr. JACOBS: Will my hon. friend permit me to say that there were quite a number of Liberals who voted for the resolution he presented, and I had the pleasure of supporting it myself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So did I.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to acknowledge that and to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) say that he also supported it. My appeal would be, now that the Liberals are in power, that they should repeal that legislation that is so out of keeping with British traditions. That is one phase of the matter. In the case of the Doukhobors, we legislated against people because of their religious beliefs.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not correct.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, that is correct; pardon me. There are certain groups in the Doukhobors—I do not think they form ten per cent of the whole body of Doukhobors—which misbehaved in this country. They call themselves the Sons of Freedom. They have done all sorts of things that nobody could condone, and they caused a lot of trouble to the government.

Mr. REID: Is it not the case in British Columbia that the Doukhobors are practically confined to one section?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Very largely, but we also find them in Alberta and Saskatchewan. I do not want to go into the whole question to-night, but I say the Doukhobors are not a race. The Doukhobors constitute a religious sect, and the legislation is to exclude them and their descendants from the franchise.

I am glad the Prime Minister takes the ground that we have a right to do as we please here in Canada. The question is: What is right for us to do? I for one do not want to add to the world's problems, as the Prime Minister suggests would be done, by excluding any one race, but I think that is not primarily the idea that lies behind the resolution. What the mover had in mind, and what I think he said clearly, was this: Is it going to be the policy of Canada to let people come in here to whom we do not propose to give full rights of citizenship?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But is not the effect of the resolution to exclude them?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On the face of it, I suppose it would be to exclude them, but I would say we are here called upon to consider whether we should adopt a policy of allowing people to come into this country to whom we do not propose to give the rights of citizenship. That is a general matter of policy and my colleague here (Mr. MacInnis) has tried to state it as a general matter of policy. If we have in Canada a fixed policy that we exclude orientals from the franchise, then we might well consider whether it ought not to follow that we should therefore exclude them altogether from the country.

There are three or four different things mixed up in this question. There is first the problem of immigration. No one proposes to bring more people into Canada. We are told that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation wants to flood this country with orientals. That is not so. Under present conditions I am opposed even to immigration from the British Isles. Then there is the other question, that of naturalization. A great many of these orientals are naturalized. Certain regulations are laid down. They have to know one of the two languages, and so on. That automatically excludes a great many of them even from becoming naturalized. The third question concerned those who are naturalized Canadians or who were born in this country, and our position is that if they are naturalized citizens it ought to be the policy of this dominion to give them the fullest rights of citizenship.

I visit Stanley park every time I go to Vancouver. In the park there is a beautiful monument erected to the Japanese soldiers who fell at the front. A great many of them enlisted, and the ones who enlisted were given the franchise. Other Japanese, just as loyal, did not enlist and have not the franchise. Among the white people are we going to exclude all those who did not go to the front? We do not do that. Further, the sons and daughters of the men who fell at the front are not given the rights of citizenship. We have a monument to those who fell; we give the franchise to those who came back, but we refuse the rights of citizenship to their sons and daughters. Is that how a grateful country treats those who have been willing to lay down their lives for their country?

I have visited several times one of those schools in Vancouver in which there are many oriental children. I was there last Christmas. I listened to their program of Christmas carols and patriotic songs. The principal said to me on one of my visits as we looked over the large number of bright Chinese and Japanese boys and girls, "Mr. Woodsworth, when are you people at Ottawa going to give these young people the vote?" Some people say that the orientals are more interested in the right to live than in the right to the franchise. That may be true, but the unfortunate part is that the refusal to give them the right to vote restricts greatly their opportunity to earn a living. Is it nothing in itself that a man should have the right to vote? We were told that the Boer war was fought very largely because Englishmen did not have the fullest privileges of citizenship in South Africa. Yet we are denying to certain people in this country the full rights of citizenship. I am thinking particularly of these second generation Japanese, people who were born in this country. Half of them cannot read Japanese; most of them can talk Japanese more or less, but they cannot read Japanese. They are brought up in our schools, sing our Christmas songs, go through our patriotic exercises, and yet when they grow up they cannot vote. They attend our high schools and universities. They are absolutely cut off from Japan. I remember being in Japan just about a year ago and meeting some American and Canadian-born Japanese who had gone back to Japan with their parents. They were like fish out of water in Japan. There was no place there for them. They were Canadians and Americans. These young people do not want to go to Japan because there is no place there for them. They say that this is their country; they think they ought to have the rights of citizenship, and I heartily agree with them.

Just look at what this legislation means. I quote from a summary of an article by Professor H. F. Angus in a publication of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs. He points out that the Revised Statutes of British Columbia of 1924, chapter 76, section 5 (a) disqualifiies "any person of Japanese race, naturalized or not," from voting at any election. The effect of this statute which discriminates against oriental Canadians purely on the ground of race does not merely exclude these British subjects of oriental race from voting at municipal, provincial and dominion elections but also restricts them from various fields of occupation by the use of voters lists, provincial or municipal as the case may be, as the basis of qualification. It is by this method that Japanese-British subjects are excluded from:

1. Election to the provincial legislature;
2. Nomination for municipal office;
3. Nomination at an election of school trustees;
4. Jury service.

Other legislative provisions result in effective exclusion of British subjects of Asiatic race from:

1. The legal profession;
2. The pharmaceutical profession;
3. Obtaining a licence for hand-logging;
4. Becoming a contractor on any public work;
5. Purchasing crown timber or logging such timber.

In addition to these statutory and regulatory restrictions against oriental Canadians, there are "de facto" exclusions from:

1. Being employed as specialists in public service;
2. Holding municipal offices.

It seems to me a serious matter to allow people to come to this country and compel them to remain in one or two particular kinds of occupation, and I do not know why they should be allowed in these any more than in the legal or the medical profession. At any rate, we exclude them in practice from certain higher positions which they are well qualified to fill. I do not think this is fair.

Not only is it unfair to these young Japanese born in Canada but it is unfair to the Canadian people. Let this continue and what shall we have? We shall have here a subordinate race whose lower standard of living will be a constant menace to the standard of living of other Canadian people. We shall have here a large group of young people educated in our schools, trained in the ideas of democracy but denied absolutely the right to exercise their democracy. Is that a good thing for Canada?

Let me again appeal to Liberal traditions. Surely it is not a good thing to have in our midst a subject race, as well educated as we are, many of them better educated, because the Japanese are not an inferior people—it is not, I say, a good thing for us to have such people here trying to earn a precarious living while excluded from a great many occupations, and with a rankling sense of injustice because they are not granted full rights of British citizenship. I would make this suggestion. All of us have been drawn more or less into political considerations in our discussion to-night. I am not going to lay the blame on anyone but I would make a suggestion that this matter be discussed in a freer atmosphere.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have just a few more words to say. We face a real problem The government might refer a matter of this kind to the committee on industrial and international relations to study and report on some possible solution. That could be done without necessarily talking about exclusion or otherwise complicating matters. Let us try to solve this vital Canadian problem.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 21, 1936

The house met at three o'clock.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General) moved:

That the select standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table copies in English and in French of a tabulated statement of tariff changes under the Canada-United States trade agreement, signed at Washington on November 15, 1935.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

PROPOSED BILL TO REPEAL 24-25 GEORGE V, 1934, CHAPTER 25, RULED OUT OF ORDER

On the order for introduction of bills:

Mr. Pouliot—bill intituled "An act to repeal 24-25 George V (1934), chapter 25, an act respecting the Bureau for Translations."

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to this bill, I suspended my decision yesterday, and I have considered this matter most carefully and am prepared to render decision in the matter.

There are only two clauses to this bill:

1. Chapter 25 of 24-25 George V is hereby repealed.
2. Hereinafter each translator shall be under the head of the department concerned.

Under standing order 76, every clause of a bill must be considered by the committee of the house in its proper order. If clause 1 of the proposed bill were passed, the result would automatically be the abolition of the positions of nearly all the translators in the civil service, as they have been practically all absorbed by the bureau for translations.

When the house would reach clause 2 of the bill, there would be no bureau for translations. New appointments would have to be made if each department were to do its own translating. Clause 2 therefore provides for the appointment of additional civil servants. Such a bill cannot be introduced by a private member. Its introduction must be moved by a minister of the crown on the recommendation of the governor general, and it must be preceded by a resolution in committee of the whole.

I may quote as a precedent a ruling of Mr. Speaker Rhodes who on May 17, 1918, decided that a motion to amend a bill so as to provide for the appointment of additional government officials is out of order as it involves an increased grant of public money.

On March 17, 1933, Mr. Jean moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act so as to provide for a joint superintendent of bankruptcy. Mr. Speaker Black moved it out of order on the ground that the bill provided for the appointment of an official and would therefore entail a charge upon the revenue. Such legislation, he stated, could be introduced only by a minister on the approval of the crown.

Another element which places this measure in the category of money bills is that its adoption would mean the transfer of the authority under which appropriated money is to be spent. The translators' salaries have been voted as part of the estimates of the Secretary of State's department. This was done by resolution in committee of supply and it was subsequently embodied in the appropriation bill. When money is voted, the main conditions imposed on its expenditure are embodied in resolutions. All the circumstances concerning its destination form part of the appropriation with which they are considered, and if any alteration is to be made it must be by the same process as the original resolution.

A money bill is defined in the British house as a public bill which contains only provisions dealing with, inter alia, the "custody" of public money. The custody is undoubtedly the placing of an appropriation under a certain minister. The translators' salaries, which cannot be separated from the proposed bill, have been placed in the custody of the Secretary of State, and the bill provides that it be given to several other ministers.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking on an alleged money bill in the session of 1911-12 (Hansard, column 3633-3641), said:

[Mr. Speaker.]

The time when we should dispose of the manner in which the money is to be expended is when the money is appropriated and therefore it should be first of all introduced by resolution where any objections which may properly be urged against the resolution should be urged.

This opinion of Laurier goes to show that the circumstances under which an expenditure is to be made are indivisible from that expenditure. The choice of the minister responsible for paying out the money is a material condition of an appropriation, and in order to change it the house would have to amend the principal clauses of a money bill.

I am therefore of the opinion that the proposed measure has all the earmarks of a money bill and cannot be introduced by a private member. I declare it out of order.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT ON AMENDMENTS TO ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE ACTS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a special committee, the members thereof to be selected at a later date, be appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act 1934 and amendments thereto and the Franchise Act 1934 and amendments thereto and to suggest to the house such amendments to the said acts as they may deem advisable, and, furthermore, such committee shall study and make a report on the following subjects:—

(a) The proportional representation system;
(b) The alternative vote in single-member constituencies;
(c) Compulsory registration of voters;
(d) Compulsory voting;

and that the said special committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and report from time to time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution is self explanatory and requires very little comment. I think hon. gentlemen will agree that if changes are to be made in the election laws of the country it is better that they should be made in the first days of a parliament rather than immediately before an election, because then there are suspicions of ulterior motives.

The committee to be appointed will consider the recommendations made by the chief electoral officer and the franchise commissioner and will study any suggested amendments to these acts as they are to-day. That is general. The four subjects which are mentioned do not subtract anything from the general aspect of the question. The proportional representation system is the first subject to be sent to the committee for consideration. This has been discussed and debated in this house on various occasions, I must say with indifferent success as to the support it has been given. The other method, the alternative vote in single member constituencies, seems to have enlisted more favour on the part of hon. members, to such an extent that at one time or another both major parties have proposed it in some form. As Minister of Justice in a former government, prior to 1930, I introduced a bill to establish the alternative vote in single member constituencies, but the bill had to be withdrawn because it met considerable opposition and would have kept the house sitting for a very long time. Then last year, just before the expiration of the last parliament, a proposal was made in the form of a bill to experiment with the alternative vote system in one province, Saskatchewan. The objection raised at that time was very strong; first that it was late in the day, and second that it was thought undesirable that there should be a special system of voting in one part of the country which would be different from that in other parts of the country. I submit, however, that immediately after a general election is a propitious occasion for the consideration of the whole question of both systems, proportional representation and the alternative vote in single member constituencies.

As to the two other questions that are submitted, compulsory registration of voters and compulsory voting, these were referred to the other day by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). They are in force in Australia. I do not know that they are applied in any other country. It would be of interest to have the committee study them and consider whether the conditions in that country could be applied with the same success, if there has been success, to Canada. However, I submit this motion to the house, and if it is carried we will select at a later day the members to serve on the committee.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question before he quite concludes. I notice that the resolution limits the number of subjects that the committee may consider to the four enumerated. Does that preclude the committee from considering any other type or form of voting than those mentioned?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The idea is to make it as general as possible, and I think the first part of the motion will permit that.

Mr. STEVENS: As long as that is understood.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is understood.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with what the minister has said as to the desirability of a committee considering possible amendments to the Franchise Act and the Dominion Elections Act at the beginning of a new parliament. The hon. gentleman will perhaps recall, as will the house, that owing to the census having been taken in 1931 many matters of this kind could not be dealt with until it was possible to determine upon a redistribution measure. The circumstances in connection with the introduction and passing of the Franchise Act are known if not to all hon. members of the house at least to some; for from time to time we had been endeavouring to secure some form of lists in this country for elections. We abandoned the preparation of lists something like twenty years ago, except just prior to an election, and now that we have reverted to the method that prevails in Great Britain and other countries, the method that formerly prevailed here, I think it is important that we should have a report made to this house as to whether or not this method has been found satisfactory.

As to the methods of voting, as long as the committee has a free hand to consider such methods I do not see any particular objection. The enumeration of three particular methods, with a suggestion as to compulsory voting, may have the effect of directing attention to them only; it will be observed that the resolution provides that the committee shall study and make a report on "the following subjects," and then these subjects are set out. However, from what the minister has said I take it that if it is thought desirable by the committee that the scope of its activities should be enlarged, that may be done without coming again to the house. There is one other matter that I suppose can be discussed without its being specifically referred to in the motion, and that is the date of elections. It will be recalled that as the law now stands the election day is fixed for a Monday, and owing to one Monday falling upon a holiday —not a general holiday as is provided for in the act, but a holiday to certain people in this country—we were compelled to postpone the election for a whole week. I suppose we can consider that as something that arises out of the submission of the franchise act and elections act to the committee.

The minister has not indicated anything as to the number he might have in mind for the committee. That may or may not be important. I thought probably he would have referred the whole matter to the committee on privileges and elections, but perhaps under all the circumstances a special committee will obtain better results and give the matter more consideration. As long as it is clear that there is no limitation proposed or intended by specifying particular subjects, and that the fullest possible opportunity will be given the committee to consider every matter that arises out of the operation of the franchise act and the elections act, I heartily support the submission of this matter to a special committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Would my right hon. friend give me his views as to the number of members who should sit on the committee? I think it should be a fairly large committee, in order to give representation to all the provinces and the various sections in the house—perhaps nearly thirty; twenty-nine or twenty-eight? I am told that the last committee consisted of twenty-nine members.

Mr. BENNETT: As long as the quorum is fixed low enough. It has been found necessary I observe in other legislatures dealing with public matters recently to provide for a small quorum because of the difficulty of getting attendance. As long as the quorum is reasonably low I think a committee of between twenty and thirty would be satisfactory.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I quite agree with the proposal that this matter should be introduced early in the life of the parliament. We have made many attempts since confederation to get a proper basis; we have amended the law over and over again, both as regards the franchise and as regards the composition of the house. As I see it, there are two most important features to be considered. One is that we have in this parliament a large number of members who represent a minority of the electors in their constituencies. That should be remedied, so that the man who is elected represents an absolute majority of his constituents. The other is that we should aim to place upon the voter a sense of responsibility, a realization that the election of a member of parliament is a matter of concern not only to the candidate, but that the elector himself is called upon at that time to fulfil the greatest obligation and duty which devolves upon the citizen, the election of a government to administer the affairs of the country. That will give the new committee plenty of work, and I hope that a change will be brought about so that a large vote may be assured and that those who are elected will really represent the people of their constituencies.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether there will be any opportunity when the bill is presented to discuss and correct any irregularities that occurred in the last redistribution bill? I venture to suggest that the minister be not too decided in his answer. I wish a loophole could be left so that we can discuss some glaring irregularities which should be corrected. I agree that these matters should be discussed not on the eve of an election but before there is any thought of an election.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The subject mentioned by my hon. friend, if it is to come before the house, would be better dealt with by a separate committee, because I am afraid it would be discussed more from a political angle than the various subjects which are being referred to this committee. It would be quite a different question. I do not say it should not come before the house and be submitted to a committee, but it would have to be considered quite independently of the subject matter of the present motion.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION REGULATIONS

CHANGES IN MAXIMUM MONTHLY HOSPITAL ALLOWANCES FOR CERTAIN CLASSES OF EX-SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. P. MULOCK (York North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) in reference to dispatches appearing in the newspapers this morning to the effect that drastic cuts are being effected in payments to ex-soldiers in hospitals. Would the minister be good enough to tell the house whether the statement carried in the press to the effect that lower hospital allowances to war veterans and ex-service men other than privates come into effect as of March 1, and if so can he give us some information on the subject.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The reports carried in the press, although quite true, are perhaps of a nature to alarm needlessly the interested parties. The situation is this: from the termination of the war down to the present day any ex-soldiers who were taken into hospital on account of their pensionable disabilities were immediately placed on pay and allowances of the rank which they held during their service in the army. That is to say, a private soldier was placed on pay and allowances approximately equal to those which he received as a private soldier in the army, and a general or colonel was placed on the pay and allowances of the rank which he held in the army. The divergence has always appeared to me to be pretty wide, and after considerable study the officers of the department and myself came to the conclusion that perhaps at this time, twenty years after the war, we should not perpetuate the system of pay according to rank which existed during the war. So that by order in council which comes into effect March 1, an attempt is being made to equalize in some degree the rates being paid. Under the present system, which will be changed on March 1, a private soldier when he goes into hospital receives $45 per month. If he has a wife and say six children his pay can run to $137 per month. After March 1, he will still receive $45 if he is single and $137 if he is married and has six children. There is no change whatsoever made in the rate of pay to private soldiers. At the present time a colonel, if he is single when he enters the hospital, receives $228 a month. After March 1, he will receive $127. At present a colonel who is married and has six children receives $288 a month; after March 1 he will receive $219. For a major general—which is perhaps an extreme case, though if I may be permitted I might say that we did have in the hospital some years ago a gentleman who, at the rate of pay he was drawing together with the pension he received from the militia department, was being compensated at the rate of about $14,000 a year for lying in the hospital with a very minor ailment—

An hon. MEMBER: He would never get better.

Mr. POWER: At the present time a major general in hospital receives, if he is single, $670 a month, and if he is married and has six children, $722. It is proposed through this order in council, which is to become effective on March 1, that a major general who is single will have to get along on $195 per month, while if he has a wife and six children he will receive $287. Those are the rates which will become effective on March 1. In no case has the rate of compensation for private soldiers, who compose 90·7 per cent of the hospital population, been touched. However there are perhaps some adjustments which might be made with respect to persons who have been in hospital for some considerable time. A sudden or drastic cut in their allowances might effect some hardship. We are prepared to go into that question. If it is shown that delay is necessary in order that readjustment may be possible, perhaps that could be arranged. The other ranks, however, other than private soldiers, will in no case receive less than if they were placed on one hundred per cent disability pension less the usual amount deducted to cover partial cost of maintenance. That is to say, the amount of money which they receive while they are in hospital will never be less than if they were outside hospital on a one hundred per cent total disability pension, less $30.00 per month.

With respect to other sections of the order in council in question, there has been some misunderstanding between officers of the department and officers of the Canadian Legion, chiefly with respect to the interpretation of certain phrases, and to the definitions of certain legal terms contained in the order in council. It is my hope, in fact I am quite confident, that after some discussion with officers of the legion it may be possible to iron out these difficulties. It will be found that, with the exception of the decrease in pay and allowances I have pointed out, the order in council does nothing more than clarify and carry out existing practice?

The following table summarizes the figures I have given:

Maximum Monthly Hospital Allowances For Certain Classes

	Present rate	Rate, Mar. 1, 1936

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farms, including investigations concerning plant diseases, $2,015,900.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask about the number of experimental farms in each province. I note that there are two in Prince Edward Island, two in Nova Scotia, one in New Brunswick, six in Quebec, two in Ontario, in addition to the experimental farm for all Canada here in Ottawa; two in Manitoba, six in Saskatchewan, two in Alberta and four in British Columbia. Then there are additional stations doing somewhat similar work, one of which is in Quebec, two in Saskatchewan, four in Alberta and one in British Columbia. I am wondering on what basis experimental farms are allocated to the various provinces. With the exception of the one in Ottawa, which serves the province of Quebec and in fact all of Canada, as well as Ontario, we have in this province only two small experimental farms.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is inquiring as to the basis of distribution of experimental farms, in view of the fact that there are only two in Ontario, two in Nova Scotia, and so on?

Mr. MacNICOL: There are six in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason there are not more in Ontario is that work of that kind for western Ontario to a great extent is done by Guelph college, which is supported by the provincial government. Much of the work done by the experimental farms in other provinces is done for Ontario at the college I have mentioned. There are three different ways by which the department brings information and develops lines of education in different areas; one is by establishing such stations, another by establishing demonstration farms or illustration stations, and the third by establishing experimental farms. If the entire list is studied it will be found that posts of one kind or another are distributed throughout all the provinces, and that they assist by carrying on work somewhat similar to that done at experimental farms.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does this item include an appropriation for the forestry farm at Indian Head?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, for the two stations, one at Indian Head and the other at Sutherland.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that only recently the department has established experimental reforestation areas in Saskatchewan. What arrangements if any have been made for their supervision?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member's question could be more properly discussed under another vote. There will be a special vote in the supplementary estimates providing for rehabilitation work. It is under that vote that these protection belts have been established in different parts of the prairie provinces, particularly in the drought areas. I would suggest a discussion when we reach the vote I have mentioned.

Mr. COLDWELL: Very well. One other question: I have heard complaints regarding the wages and working conditions of men working on the experimental farms. For instance last year the average wage at Indian Head was twenty-one cents per hour on a basis of a ten hour day for eight months of the year, amounting to about $2 per day, or less than $50 per month. In Saskatchewan, where housing and heating arrangements are costly, that is considered too low. The rate of wages set by the provincial authority varies from thirty-five to forty cents an hour in the towns. These men live in the town of Indian Head, and the government is paying twenty-one cents an hour. If the men desire meals I understand that at harvest time they have to pay twenty-five cents for a meal, which is a very serious consideration. Does the minister know about that situation?

Mr. GARDINER: This matter was brought to my attention some little time ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and I found that the minimum rate paid for labour at Indian Head was twenty-one cents an hour. Of course there is this to be taken into consideration, that the labour employed is paid at about the same rate as is being paid by farmers in that particular area, but I am not so sure that the rate is as high as it might be in view of the fact which was brought out, that at certain times it is necessary for the individual to have his meals at the farm, and in such cases he is required to pay for them. I am not entirely satisfied that the rate of twenty-one cents is as high as it might be, in view of the fact also that the labourer is required to have his meals at home at other times, but that question is being inquired into and will be dealt with in a way that I believe will satisfy the people locally and others that a wage is being paid which compares favourably with the rate of wages being paid by farmers in the surrounding districts.

Mr. BEAUBIER: Are these men employed the year round at a fixed rate of wages, or are they laid off in the fall after the rush of work? Is their employment only seasonal? The same condition prevails at Brandon experimental farm that my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just mentioned, and the answer to his question with regard to wages is equally applicable to the Brandon district.

Mr. GARDINER: The question my hon. friend raises is one of the matters that should be taken into consideration in deciding whether this wage is sufficiently high. But this is just casual labour, and as I know casual labour upon the farms it is usually more highly paid than labour employed throughout the year. The rate paid for expert labour throughout the year I understand is somewhere around thirty or thirty-five cents. The pay of the casual labourer is somewhat lower, and that is a matter that might be given some consideration.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): May I ask who sets the rate? Is it the department, or is it left more or less to the local superintendent or farm officials?

Mr. GARDINER: The department and the superintendent confer with regard to the matter and the rate is governed partly at least by the prevailing rate in the community. Some of the permanent employees are more likely to be men with some technical knowledge, and they are probably paid more because of that, but the man who is picked up casually for a job that needs to be done is probably to be compared with the ordinary labourer in the community.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the minister a question for information? I understand what an experimental farm means, but I do not understand the functions of an experimental station. Would the minister explain the difference between the two?

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps what the hon. member has in mind is the substation.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The method followed is this: The department chooses in a community a man whom they think capable of carrying on experiments that will be helpful to others in the community. The department pays a rental for a man's farm, and directs the work which is carried on by the farmer on that part of his farm. He is required to take instructions, and then he is entitled to the whole crop, I understand, that is produced as a result of the work so carried on. The work is done for the benefit of the people in the community who can come and see the experiments being carried on.

Mr. VENIOT: I thought that was a demonstration farm. There are three categories, I understand—the experimental farm, the experimental station, and the demonstration farm.

Mr. GARDINER: The illustration station is conducted somewhat on the same basis except that only a part of the farm is used instead of the whole farm as under the substation plan.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): What progress is being made in developing a rust resistant wheat? Have there been any developments in that direction?

Mr. GARDINER: The matter of rust resistant wheat is something which becomes of interest periodically in western Canada. I remember three outstanding years during the time I have been in the west when we had great destruction of crop as a result of rust, and after each one of those years there was strong agitation for the development of a rust resistant wheat. We experienced very little success in that direction until the last ten or twelve years, during which there has been a decided effort on the part of the department to develop a rust resistant wheat, working in cooperation with agricultural colleges on both sides of the line, provincial authorities and others. A few years ago, I think it was while the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was Minister of Agriculture, he emphasized the importance of the development of rust resistant wheat, and secured funds with which to set up a laboratory at Winnipeg. That laboratory has been operating since. Certain lands have been set apart on which wheats have been developed. These wheats have been distributed to the experimental farms, at Indian Head and elsewhere, and to agricultural colleges, and certain developments have taken place. I understand that as a result of those developments, there originated three strains of what are generally recognized to-day as rust resistant wheats which are now in the course of development. It has been fairly well established by the experience of last year, when we had one of the worst attacks of rust the west has experienced, that at least three of these strains are likely to be rust resistant. It is not the intention, so far as these strains are concerned, to give them wide distribution until the fall of 1937. Those who are familiar with the distribution of wheats in western Canada will recall that there was some difficulty in the distribution of Reward wheat because of its having been distributed while it was still affected by loose smut. The department is anxious to avoid any such difficulties in connection with the distribution of rust resistant wheat. The wheat will probably be distributed in the fall of 1937, I assume in the usual way, a few bushels being sent here and there to farmers who are interested in having it. They will grow a crop from it, and that crop will be for sale to other farmers to sow on their land, so that eventually it will be sown fairly widely over the west.

There is a wheat called Thatcher wheat which is being brought in from the state of Minnesota, where it was developed. It is being sown this year by some of the farmers in western Canada. The department has taken some action to assist the farmers to get this wheat across the line, but is not taking any part in the real distribution. The wheat is being applied for by the farmers and is being brought into western Canada to be sown. No doubt this will prove of assistance in carrying the farmers over until next year when a distribution of these other wheats will be made.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister any information regarding this rustless wheat that is coming in from the Dakotas?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the Thatcher wheat.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is there anything in this item to cover the control of noxious weeds, or is that matter dealt with by the federal department?

Mr. GARDINER: The control of weeds is carried on almost entirely by the provincial governments. Legislation is passed from time to time and the provincial governments work in cooperation with the municipalities in the control of weeds. All this department does is to carry on a certain amount of research work at the experimental farms.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, every time during the past ten years when this vote has come before the committee I have protested against the treatment given my section of the country. I had a certain amount of support in my protests from 1926 to 1930, but from 1930 to 1935 I received very little, although I was promised a lot. I am asking for an increased expenditure for the Kapuskasing experimental farm. When the twenty million dollar public works program was inaugurated two years ago I was told by the then Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Weir, that a certain amount of money would be expended on buildings on that farm. I know the situation at that farm and I do not have to go to any officials for information. I believe the officials there are the best in the land. The minister must know the situation. During the war the land upon which the farm is now located was cleared by German prisoners of war. These men were quartered in shacks which at that time were probably fairly comfortable, but some of these shacks are still being used to house the workingmen on the farm. I really believe the cattle are better housed than the workingmen. Surely a certain amount of money could be voted to erect buildings more suited to human habitation. This experimental farm is the only one in northern Ontario and Quebec and it serves a new agricultural population of nearly a quarter of a million people. I believe the minister is aware of the fact that the last census shows that the growth in population was greater in northern Ontario than in any other part of the country. I contend this farm should receive more consideration than it has received in the past. I believe the minister will be astonished to learn that there is no adequate barn accommodation on that farm. Everyone knows the kind of weather encountered in that part of the country when the crops are being gathered. With no barn available losses will be incurred in gathering the early crops. Surely it is possible to provide a decent barn.

If the estimates of any department are increased, it should be those of the Department of Agriculture. The settlers in these new sections are entitled to the benefits of an experimental farm. Wonderful work has been done at this farm, work which has proven beneficial to the entire country. An increase in the work of this farm would, I believe, be the best means of taking fifty per cent of our farmers off direct relief. Three years ago the federal government placed a poultryman on this farm. This young man continued to work for three or four months. He gave lectures in all sections of that country in an effort to give the settlers an idea of what could be accomplished by raising poultry. There is a fine domestic market for these products in that section of the country. Many of these settlers went ahead and built hen coops and bought other equipment at considerable expense, but without any explanation whatsoever, either to the man or to the settlers, this poultryman was withdrawn. Upon making inquiries at the department I was told that this man was fully qualified for the work he was doing, but without any explanation he was withdrawn. If this was done because of economy, I believe it was false economy. Many of these settlers still have uncompleted hen coops which they started on the advice of the federal government. The government is being penny wise and pound foolish when it takes such action as this. All the people in Canada benefit from the work carried on at these experimental farms. I believe the minister is fully acquainted with northern Ontario and Quebec. I am not asking that millions of dollars be expended; all I am suggesting is an expenditure of about $10,000 or $15,000 so that the men who work on this farm can be housed in a decent manner and the administration of the farm may not have to surmount the difficulties it has to face at the moment.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to point out that the total expenditure provided for the Kapuskasing farm is $42,000, which compares very favourably with the expenditures being made at other places. As a matter of fact, in only a few cases is the amount more than that. The total vote under this item is being decreased by only $18,000, which decrease is comparable with what is taking place in connection with votes for other branches. I understand that there are three log cabins on this farm and probably there was some reason for complaint as to their fitness for living quarters. However, three new cottages are being constructed by the Public Works department. These would not come under this vote, but I understand that the estimates for that department provide for $1,200 to complete these cottages. I understand that there are barns on the farm, but as they are not considered to be sufficient for the purposes, another barn is being requested. Up to date the department has not seen fit to construct this other barn as we have no money with which to do the work. I think we are doing as much at this point as is being done at other points throughout Canada, I understand that so far as the poultryman is concerned an effort was made in the department a year or two ago, and that effort is being continued, to remove so far as possible any duplication of the work in connection with agriculture as between the provinces and the dominion; and the work that is being done by some of these officials, one of whom I understand is the gentleman under discussion, is really considered to be provincial work. Some of these men were removed in so far as the federal staffs are concerned, and it has not been the intention of the department to reestablish them, but rather to place the responsibility for that work upon the province.

Mr. BEAUBIER: Reverting to the subject of rust resistant wheat, a Mr. Orchard, who farms north of Brandon, had a crop of wheat of about fifty acres in which there was no rust. That was not at all a common condition in the vicinity of Brandon, as rust affected all wheat crops very badly there. I took the matter up with the manager of the experimental farm, Mr. Tinline, informing him that there were fifty acres of wheat which had no rust upon it. It so happened that an official of the seed department at Ottawa whose name I cannot now recall was visiting the Morden farm, and Mr. Tinline called me up and I went out with him and viewed this crop of wheat. There was no rust perceptible on that wheat, which this gentleman from Ottawa identified, I think, as No. 27 and it appears that the experimental farms had been experimenting with this particular wheat to see if it was not rust resistant. Afterwards the experimental farm, I suppose through orders from Ottawa or some place, bought that man's entire crop. I should like to know what information, if any, the minister has about that. It appears that the experimental farm bought the entire crop and had it threshed at their expense, and they are taking it over, I understand, for distribution for seed from that farm.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course there was very little opportunity prior to last year, since the department has been attempting to develop this particular strain of wheat, to have it really tried out, and the strain that is spoken of is one of the strains developed at the laboratory in Winnipeg. When these wheats are put out to the experimental farm some trouble is taken by departmental officials at the farm to see that the wheat is not removed in any way whatever from the farm. Of course it is always possible for persons who live in the vicinity, or even persons who are travelling by plots on the experimental farm, to gather some of the heads or to take samples of it and perhaps make experiments of their own and develop crops on their own land as a result of having done so. Probably it was as a result of something like that that we got into difficulties in connection with Reward wheat. Reward wheat was found to be shown at exhibitions before the department really knew that it had been distributed, and some investigations were made with regard to that. Of course care is taken in the development of all these strains. It was found that this field of wheat in the vicinity of Brandon was a rust resistant wheat; the wheat was examined into as indicated by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Beaubier) and was found to be the same strain as that which is being developed at the laboratory in Winnipeg. As a result the department took steps to see that this wheat was all purchased so that the distribution will be made from the department and in the proper way. The wheat was all secured by the department; it is under the control of the department now, and will probably be used in connection with further experimentation down to the fall of 1937, when general distribution will be made.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I am not quite clear about the minister's reference to a distribution of rust resistant wheat in 1937. Will any of the three kinds that we are experimenting with in the dominion be ready for distribution for seeding this spring?

Mr. GARDINER: No, none of it will be available for distribution this year. The purpose of the department is to bulk this wheat during the next two sessions and to have sufficient of it to permit rather general distribution over the western provinces in the fall of 1937.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask another question of the minister with regard to wheat? I have read several articles, I believe by a Professor Hanson attached either to North Dakota State college or at least to one of the American colleges, on experiments with perennial wheat. Is the department doing anything with regard to experimentation with perennial wheat, and if so is there an appropriation here, and to what extent have the experiments been successful?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, some work is being done, with the idea of producing not grain but hay.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like to pursue a little further the line of questioning I started earlier in the afternoon. The minister, in his reply to a question I asked about the number of experimental farms in the various provinces, remarked that in western Ontario the provincial government's experimental farm at Guelph is being used—I understood— by the federal department of agriculture. I assume also that the provincial government's experimental farm at Kemptville is also being used. Does this department compensate the Ontario government or its experimental farms for the service rendered to the federal department of agriculture? The federal government apparently has only two experimental farms of its own in Ontario, one at Harrow and the other at Kapuskasing.

Mr. GARDINER: Some funds are provided for special work carried on for this department at the college at Guelph and on the farm at Guelph, but generally speaking this department does not take responsibility for the work that is done there. There is cooperation as between the college and those who are connected with the farm there, and the officials of the department. I think that cooperation has been carried on quite successfully over a term of years. But no considerable part of the cost of running the farm or institution at Guelph is supplied by the federal government.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would like to ask the minister, Mr. Chairman, if this appropriation contains any grant for laboratory or experimental work in connection with the universities where some of this work is done; if so, are these grants being maintained, increased, or decreased? I have in mind a recent article by Doctor Cora Hind, who stated that on her recent tour through Russia she found that there were something like eight hundred agricultural laboratories fully equipped, with hundreds of scientists working on agricultural products. Whatever we may think about the Russian experiment, of this we have to take notice, that we shall be faced ultimately with competition from the fields of that particular country. I was wondering if we are keeping our experimental and laboratory work up to a standard which will enable us to keep in the forefront of agricultural development.

Mr. GARDINER: The department has a chain of laboratories across Canada where work of the kind the hon. member has mentioned is being performed. Much of that work is being done here at the Ottawa station. Included in this vote is some $37,000 for cooperative assistance to provincial institutions. That vote is used for pretty much the same purpose; that is, as far as the province from which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar comes is concerned, certain work is carried on at the agricultural college at Saskatoon and this government cooperates, financially and otherwise, with that college in carrying on that work. Work of the type suggested is being done all the way across Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are the grants being maintained?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: I notice a decrease of $18,000 in this vote. Perhaps it would be interesting if the minister would give the committee the details of this vote and also the reason for the reduction.

Mr. GARDINER: Practically the entire decrease is accounted for by the fact that publicity work, previously done in this branch, has been transferred to the publicity section. I might read over the various items and give the reduction on each:

	Decrease
Equipment	$1,500
Land, buildings and works	1,884
Miscellaneous	5,773
Wages	7,111
Rents	3,538
Supplies and materials	4,700
Feeds, bedding, etc.	823
Transportation of things	2,665
Travelling expenses	3,020

There is an increase of $12,364.64 in salaries and, of course, the decrease in the other item

I mentioned, which does not show here as a decrease but which will be shown elsewhere in the estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are any automobiles being purchased under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there will be a few replacements of cars already in use that have gone their distance.

Mr. SENN: The minister mentioned an item called "miscellaneous." In that case he gave only the reduction, and I wonder if he would itemize that account so that we may have an idea of what it includes.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry I have not the itemized miscellaneous account.

Mr. SENN: Could the minister give us the main items under that account?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a list of headings, of course, such as salaries and wages, lands and buildings and so on. Expenditures under the miscellaneous headings are small current expenditures that do not properly come under any of these other headings.

Mr. SENN: I understand that different branches are provided for under this item. For example, there is the experimental farms branch, and in the auditor general's account we have the itemized expenditure from year to year. There is also a department of animal husbandry, a bee division, a horticultural division and so on down the line. What I was trying to get at was this: Are the expenditures of these different branches under this particular item kept separate or are they all mixed up in the auditor general's account.

Mr. GARDINER: The total votes under the different headings, according to division, are as follows:

Expenditures 1935-36—Experimental Farms System

Equipment	$ 82,487 00
Lands, buildings and works	42,029 00
Miscellaneous current expenses	70,503 00
Supplies, materials, feeds, bedding, etc.	185,350 00
Transportation of things	25,241 00
Travelling expenses	110,348 00
Salaries	636,994 86
Wages	755,596 00
Rents	44,823 00
	$2,034,549 86

Mr. SENN: There is a department of animal husbandry within this branch, as I understand it. Can the minister give the total cost of the operation of that branch, as separate from the operation of this whole division?

Mr. GARDINER: Our estimate this year for the animal husbandry branch is $50,000.

Mr. SENN: Is the minister able to itemize that?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes:

Equipment	$ 900
Lands, buildings and works	100
Miscellaneous current expenses	855
Salaries	1,881
Wages	34,164
Rents	700
Supplies and materials	8,000
Feeds, bedding, veterinary supplies	800
Transportation of things	800
Travelling expenses	1,800
	$50,000

Mr. SENN: While we are talking about this matter of animal husbandry, I understand that a year and a half ago the department purchased some hogs, known as Landrace hogs, from either Sweden or Denmark. I understand that since then they have been experimenting with these hogs, from which I believe Danish bacon is produced, and experiment is of very great importance indeed. Would the minister tell us just what progress has been made, whether the hogs are ready for distribution, and give all the details?

Mr. GARDINER: Some of these hogs were purchased in Sweden a little more than a year ago, and certain experiments have been carried on with them at the farm since that time, with the idea of determining whether or not they are suited to our climate, whether the feeds we have been using produce the same results as are obtained in other places, and generally whether it is wise to have them distributed in this country for breeding purposes. The hon. member will understand that a year's time is not sufficient to carry out these experiments. No general report has yet been made in regard to the experiments, but I understand that in the tests so far made the meat does show up as being a very acceptable product. The department, however, is not yet in a position to say that these animals should be distributed generally throughout the country.

Mr. SENN: Is this experiment being conducted in any other place besides the central experimental farm?

Mr. GARDINER: Three lots were sent out, to three of the western stations, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to determine whether or not these hogs would be suitable to weather conditions there.

Mr. SENN: I suppose during the year a number of them will have grown to maturity.

Can the minister tell us the feeding results and what gain they made? How do the gains compare with other breeds of hogs with which the department has experimented?

Mr. GARDINER: They have no detailed information that I can give the hon. member with regard to costs. So far as the experiment has gone they compare very favourably with our best Yorkshires, but there are some drawbacks in connection with which the department would like to make further experiments before saying they are equal to our Yorkshires.

Mr. MARSHALL: For 1935-36 the amount under this heading is shown as $2,034,549.86. Is that the amount that was actually expended or the amount of the vote in that year?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the estimate for last year, and at the moment we estimate that the expenditure will be a little under that.

Mr. MARSHALL: May I follow that with a further question? According to Appropriation Act No. 1 in the statutes of 1935, page 37, the appropriation under this heading was $1,937,898. On page 256 we find the same figure. There is a difference of $96,651.86. Could the minister explain that?

Mr. GARDINER: The explanation is that last year's amount is increased by the statutory increases less the five per cent deduction on salaries.

Mr. BROOKS: How much is allocated to each of the experimental farms in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: The amounts are:

Charlottetown, P.E.I.	$37,000
Summerside, P.E.I.	17,000
Kentville, N.S.	58,000
Nappan, N.S.	43,500

Mr. SENN: When was the experimental farm at Delhi set up?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a tobacco substation, set up two years ago.

Mr. SENN: Can the minister tell us how much money is being expended on demonstration farms, and where they are situated? I do not mean that we should have the location of each one, but perhaps he can give the information by provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: The total for all the provinces is $72,000. I have not the amount itemized by provinces.

Mr. SENN: Could we have the number of stations?

Mr. GARDINER: They are as follows:

British Columbia	20
Alberta	20
Saskatchewan	47
Manitoba	16
Ontario	15
Quebec	49
New Brunswick	18
Nova Scotia	18
Prince Edward Island	13

The number in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta includes those which were specially set up in the drought area last year.

Mr. SENN: Just what is carried on at these demonstration farms? Does it vary with the different localities or is it all one line of agriculture that is being demonstrated?

Mr. GARDINER: In order to answer the question fully I would have to go right across Canada and deal with each of them separately; I do not think the hon. member expects me to do that. The object the department has in mind in connection with the stations is that of developing experiments in different soil and climatic conditions, and different products grown in the various parts of the country. For instance, where tobacco is grown there would be a station dealing with tobacco, developing experiments as to conditions under which it can best be grown. Experiments are carried on and investigations made in connection with fox raising in Prince Edward Island, and other investigations concerning other kinds of production right across Canada. The type of station depends upon the type of agriculture carried on in the district.

Mr. BEAUBIER: Are there demonstration farms under the operation and control of any of the provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: A number of provinces have them, but I do not wish any information I may give to be considered complete. I believe there is one in Manitoba, one in Saskatchewan, one or two in Alberta, and quite a number in Quebec. I do not think Ontario has established any.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not one at Kemptville?

Mr. BEAUBIER: Is it not generally understood that there is a great deal of overlapping of services in agricultural departments of the provinces and the dominion? Could there not be some line of demarcation whereby federal and provincial departments would not give the same service, thereby reducing the expense of operation both to the provinces and to the dominion?

Mr. GARDINER: Before coming to Ottawa I had always understood that there was considerable overlapping, and I had heard many discussions on the point. At the time of the dominion-provincial conference I was still more or less of that opinion. At the conference the whole matter was reviewed, first by branch heads of the federal department and afterwards by representatives from the provinces, and it was apparent that the provincial representatives had no complaints in this regard. I could find very little of what might properly be described as a duplication of work carried on by both federal and provincial departments. We are examining the situation and, from information I gave a few moments ago, I would judge the previous minister was doing much the same thing. Some of the overlapping was removed by eliminating certain employees, as I indicated a few moments ago.

Mr. LEADER: The cost of doing this work has many times been the subject of discussion throughout the country. I have been asked how it is that the provinces maintain so many demonstration farms when the dominion maintains experimental as well as demonstration farms. I am fully aware that the experimental farms are not self sustaining, and yet some revenue is produced. Looking at the auditor general's report for the last five years we find that the deficits on our experimental farms amount to $9,000,000. I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to consider that point; he might be able to effect an economy in this regard. I am not finding fault with the management of our experimental farms under either the last administration or the one that held office before that; I believe those farms have done much useful work. But in view of the fact that the work of the provinces and the dominion overlaps, I suggest that the government consider seriously turning the work over to the provinces. I do not mean that the dominion should forsake the work altogether, but I believe it could pay annually a substantial sum of money—nothing like $9,000,000, but perhaps as much as $500,000—to help the provinces carry on the work. In addition, I would give a bonus to experts who have developed many of our cereals and whose horticultural work has been beneficial to the whole dominion. The cost would not be great, but the expenditure would be an incentive to some of these men to complete their work and perhaps to develop something of material benefit to the dominion. There is a feeling throughout Canada that there is too much overlapping, and the dominion government would be well advised to leave the work to the provinces, the officials of which are most familiar with their respective soils and needs.

Mr. GARDINER: There must be some confusion in the minds of those who have made the criticism to which the hon. member has referred. So far as I know in the western provinces the demonstration farms are carried on as the result of activities of the federal, not the provincial department. The fact that these demonstration farms are scattered here and there throughout the provinces may have led some to the conclusion that they are provincial activities, whereas in fact they are federal. Until I came to Ottawa I was under the impression that the demonstration farm established at Lockwood, Saskatchewan, by the provincial government for the purpose of making demonstrations in regard to weed control was financed by the province, but since looking at the records here in Ottawa I found that it is financed partly by the federal government. In other words the work carried on in the provinces is financed at Ottawa.

I believe the suggestion to turn the work over to the provinces would not be kindly received. If I understand their condition correctly, if anything the provincial treasuries are in a little poorer condition than the dominion exchequer, and I doubt very much if the work could be carried on successfully at this time by the provinces. As was indicated by one hon. member, research work is undoubtedly essential. Over ninety per cent of all agricultural research work done in Canada is done by the federal department. I think a continuance of the work is necessary, and at the present time I do not know of any place, with the exception of the dominion treasury, where it could be financed.

Mr. THOMPSON: Why is it necessary to have six farms and two stations in Saskatchewan, and six farms and one station in Quebec, when in Ontario, the greatest agricultural province in Canada, we have two farms and no stations? I note, further, that the amount of money spent in Ontario by the federal department is less than half the amount spent in some of the other provinces, despite the fact that Ontario pays approximately forty-five per cent of the taxes of the whole dominion.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No, no.

Mr. THOMPSON: The province of Quebec pays about thirty per cent, making a total of seventy-five per cent for the two provinces. I should like to know why in Ontario we have only two farms.

Mr. GARDINER: When giving the explanation before I did not go very much into detail, but I think it will be obvious to all members of the committee that naturally the greater part of the expenditure on this kind of work is being made right here in the city of Ottawa, which is in the province of Ontario. The most complete plant that we have in the whole dominion is the experimental farm at Ottawa, and the most complete plant that we have, from a provincial point of view, in the whole dominion is at Guelph, which is the central western part of Ontario. With these two plants operating to the extent they are, and with the amount of money that is being spent on them, I think my hon. friend will agree that Ontario is receiving its share. Perhaps I might mention one or two items of work which is being done by the plant here, and being done in the interests of all Canada, although of course those who are nearest to it get the greatest amount of benefit. On botany, for example, the expenditure at the central laboratory and nine branch laboratories was $280,000. I could give other items which would indicate that the greater part of the money is really being spent in Ontario, in which my hon. friend has a particular interest.

Mr. THOMPSON: I realize that, Mr. Chairman, but I also realize that the money spent on the dominion experimental farm is for the benefit of the whole dominion, whereas the college at Guelph is a provincial institution. Ontario does not seem to be fairly dealt with so far as expenditure on experimental farms is concerned.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): A few moments ago an hon. member made the statement that there was a deficit of nine million dollars on experimental farms. Is that an accumulated deficit over the years since the experimental farms were established in the dominion, or was there a mistake in the statement?

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the hon. member said that the cost for the last five years was nine million dollars.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): "Deficit" was the word he used.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): May I ask what amount was granted to the Guelph institution in 1935?

Mr. GARDINER: The amounts that are paid are not in the form of grants. It is cooperative work that is carried on in connection with soil surveys, and it would not represent, as I said before, any considerable part of the cost of carrying on the organization which they have at Guelph. I would not claim that this department is doing any considerable part of the work there. I thought I said that the expenditure was comparatively small, probably not more than four or five thousand dollars.

Mr. COLDWELL: How does the appropriation this year compare with, say, 1929? I am asking that because on a rough calculation the expenditure for experimental farms is just over one million dollars, and while that seems a large amount, I do not think this is the place to economize, particularly when we remember that in the estimates of another department which we were discussing the other evening there was an item of $300,000 for a subsidy to one shipping firm. So far as our stations in western Canada are concerned, it is a new country, and while we do not raise the greater portion of the revenues of this country, I would nevertheless take issue with the statement made a short time ago because we are undoubtedly paying very heavy duties in the way of tariffs and other exactions.

Mr. GARDINER: The estimated expenditure in 1929-30 was $2,369,000, and the actual expenditure $2,354,551.60, which is about $300,000 more than the estimate for this year.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I wonder if the minister would answer now my question with reference to the alleged deficit of nine million dollars.
