PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—AVAILABILITY OF REPORT RESPECTING T.C.A. WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and when I have stated my question of privilege I shall move an appropriate motion based thereon.

As all hon. members are aware, the government has steadfastly refused to make public the report of R. Dixon-Speas and Associates on the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines. The government has refused to let parliament see that report. It has refused to let the government of Manitoba see it, and of course we recall the incident in connection with which the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mrs. Konantz) saw it in the distance but did not see the report itself. In other words, it is quite clear in the minds of hon. members that this is a document which the government feels is privileged and must not be seen by us, and I would take it, therefore, must not be used in public.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Winnipeg Free Press of Wednesday, November 27, 1963, on page 1 of which I find a story entitled "T.C.A. won't boost fares, house told", a story based on questions and answers in the house on Tuesday. The fourth paragraph in this story, which is written by the Winnipeg Free Press staff person here in Ottawa, reads as follows:

> Gordon McGregor, president of T.C.A., was quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press yesterday as having announced that continuing the maintenance base in operation at Winnipeg until 1973 will cost T.C.A. an additional $19,800,000. This figure was contained in the Dixon-Speas report on the economic operations of T.C.A.

When I first saw that story I wondered how the staff person—and I won't be coy about it, the staff person here in Ottawa for the Winnipeg Free Press is my good friend Mr. Victor Mackie—had seen the report and knew that figure was in it. Then I find another story, also in the same issue of the Free Press on page 27, entitled "Anxious T.C.A. chief hits base decision". This is under the by-line of Victor Mackie and the first part of it reads:

> Continuing the overhaul and maintenance base in operation at Winnipeg until 1973 will cost T.C.A. an additional $19,800,000, according to the president of the air line, Gordon R. McGregor.
> That figure was set out in the Dixon-Speas report, a spokesman for the air line said. He said that was what Mr. McGregor based his estimate on, the findings in the report.
> The economic study had found that if T.C.A. did not phase out of its operation of the overhaul and maintenance base at Winnipeg by 1966, as was originally planned, and kept the base operating for another eight years, it would cost the air line $19,800,000.

It is a much longer story. There is a good deal in it that is interesting with respect to the conflict between Mr. McGregor's opinion and the opinion of the Prime Minister, but I do not wish to import into this question any extraneous material. My question of privilege as a member of parliament is that a document which we have been denied, a document—access to which has been denied the government of Manitoba—is being seen by other people, and some of its contents are being used by other people for arguments in connection with this issue that confronts the country and us in Manitoba in particular.

My view is that if we are to be denied the opportunity of seeing this report, no one should be able to make any public use of it. If Mr. Mackie is seeing this report—I do not think he is; I think he has just learned that somebody else has seen it—and if the president or spokesmen of the air lines are permitted to learn what is in it, I think the government of Manitoba, which is very much concerned with this matter, should see it and we in this house should have the right to see it. As I see it, the privileges of parliament are being violated by this incident as reported by the Winnipeg Free Press in the article I have just quoted. Therefore, on the basis of the question of privilege which I have raised, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

> That in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the question of making public the contents of the report of R. Dixon-Speas and Associates on the economic operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: You will note, Mr. Speaker, that I have limited my remarks and my motion to the one issue. I have not imported other things that could be said so far as this question is concerned; I have limited it to the one question of making the report public. I have even exercised restraint in the sense that my motion does not demand that the report be published, but simply says that the house has the right to express to the government its view on this matter, in the light of what has happened, and asks the government to give consideration to the question of making public the contents of this report. I therefore move, seconded by my deskmate from Skeena, this motion based on my question of privilege.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to say something on the question of privilege that has been raised. I think I should first point out that what we are dealing with here is a report procured by Trans-Canada Air Lines from a firm of consultants. The former government, for some reason of its own but I presume a perfectly proper and correct reason, did not obtain this report, order its preparation or retain the firm of R. Dixon-Speas; rather, they requested Trans-Canada Air Lines to retain a firm of consultants, and Trans-Canada Air Lines did this.

The point was raised at the time, and the decision taken by the previous government was that it would not itself have this study undertaken but that the air lines would retain the firm. The air lines did that. The report was finally prepared some time, I think, in August—I am subject to correction on the date—and it does contain information of a nature that must remain confidential because it would be wholly destructive of the—

An hon. Member: Liberal party.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member shows his complete lack of appreciation of the subject matter with which we are dealing. The report does contain material that cannot be made public because it would materially damage the competitive position of T.C.A. vis-à-vis other air lines, because the information would be of a nature not normally given by operating companies to their competitors. There is great difficulty on that score.

I had hoped that when the report came it would be of such a nature that it could be readily tabled and made public. I well understand the position of the Manitoba government, who are interested in this subject, and of other persons who have a natural curiosity to see the report, but there are two points I wish to make. The first is that the report is not a government document. It is a report having to do with the internal management of a company obtained by the company itself; therefore there is that reason for not tabling it. But quite apart from that reason, which was never the main reason relied on for not tabling it, the report does contain material that cannot be made public.

I have spent a great deal of time on this subject since last August, I regret to have to say, in an effort to meet the problem, and I finally came to the conclusion that the problem could be met by taking out of the report those parts of it which cannot be made public for obvious reasons. To that end I had the government retain R. Dixon-Speas and Associates to delete from the report those parts that are of a purely confidential nature to Trans-Canada Air Lines, and gather the rest together so that it could be presented to the house, to the government of Manitoba and to the public.

I gave a lot of thought to this matter. At one time I contemplated having the Department of Transport do the deleting and at another time having Trans-Canada Air Lines do it, but I came to the conclusion that no matter how carefully they did it they would be subject to the charge of being an interested party. So I then decided that the correct way of doing it was to retain the firm which had prepared the report, and this is in the course of being done now. I do not know when it will be available. I hope it will be very soon, but I cannot say precisely.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? Do I gather from what he is saying that in effect he is prepared to accept my motion, which simply asks that the government give consideration to the question of making the contents of the report public? I gather he is prepared to make portions of the report public, and in that sense he could meet the terms of the motion.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if I conveyed that impression. The motion is quite objectionable on grounds I thought I covered. It cannot be accepted in its present form because the report very clearly contains material that no responsible government could consider publishing. But I have taken steps, I believe, that will meet the difficulty the hon. member seeks to raise now, and those steps were taken some time ago. In that context I would think the hon. member's motion should be one of commendation of the government for already having taken those steps some weeks ago, but the motion itself is quite out of order.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is quite correct when he says it was perfectly proper for Trans-Canada Air Lines to hire a consultant to look into the economic feasibility of moving the maintenance depot from Winnipeg. He is also quite right when he says that reports of this nature are usually confidential and privileged because they may contain information which, if made public, could do harm to Trans-Canada Air Lines or any other crown corporation in its competitive capacity.

However, I think the minister has missed the vital point, that if the document is to be confidential and privileged to the government, then certainly neither the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines nor anyone else has any right to quote extracts from that report in substantiation of a particular line of argument. If they are permitted to do that they are advancing the conclusions of that report without the rest of us having any opportunity to study the bases upon which those conclusions were reached. We should have the right to see the computations and arithmetical foundation upon which this alleged loss of $19,800,000 is based. It is most improper, it seems to me, for use to be made of this report, isolated statements being taken from it and quoted in argument, and at the same time deny hon. members of this house access to the report. As a matter of fact the minister should be concerned about this statement.

It goes much further. My colleague from Winnipeg North Centre was being kind in not reading the rest of this comment. It quotes the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines as saying:

> If the Winnipeg base is worth that ($19,800,000) then Mr. Pearson is the man to decide.

This is a clear allegation that a decision has been made which is uneconomic, unwise; that it will cost the country $19,800,000; and we have no way of knowing whether or not that is a conclusion which is warranted. The minister said that he could see no objection to releasing parts of the report provided the confidential parts of it were not disclosed. I submit to him that there is no reason why he should not accept this motion. The motion does not demand that the government table the report, but that it should take into consideration the tabling of it. The minister could accept that motion subject to the reservation he has just made, that there are parts of the report which he would consider it advisable to withhold. It seems to me that he should accept the motion now subject to the reservation he has made regarding the confidential sections of the report.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I think the point which is of most importance and which should not be lost sight of by the house is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised this matter as a question of privilege. As the house knows, matters of privilege should be raised immediately, and this matter has been under discussion on a previous occasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not use that last argument to suggest that this is not a matter which should be raised as a question of privilege. The point I am raising, however, is this: that this document is not a document of the government; this document is a document of a crown corporation. If there is a question of privilege here the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must tie in that privilege with the responsibility either of a member of parliament, or of a minister of the crown, or of the government itself. That is the link which is lacking at the moment in order to abide by the rules of the house.

That is why I agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that what the Minister of Transport has said concerning his desire to give to the house a summary of matters which are not confidential and not of a technical nature indicates the desire of the government to assist hon. members to the extent that it can. But the point, and the only point at issue here in my opinion, is that this is not a document of the government but a document of a crown corporation; and under all the circumstances it seems to me that the house has already accepted the proposition that communications of this nature are privileged.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice, particularly the point about immediacy, may I point out that my question of privilege is based on two reports in the Winnipeg Free Press of Wednesday, November 27. Today is Friday, November 29. Even that is fast service. I saw these stories at nine or ten minutes to eleven this morning. I could not have raised a question of privilege much more immediately than I did.

As to the minister's suggestion that this is a report which belongs to a crown corporation, may I point out that it has been admitted several times by the Minister of Transport that he is in possession of a copy. He has made reference to it. He has cited it. He has told us why it cannot be produced. He has told us why he did not wish to disclose it to the hon. member for Winnipeg South. He told us this morning that he is studying whether or not to have extracts made, and who is to make the extracts. So, while the report may have been paid for by Trans-Canada Air Lines, a copy is in the minister's possession, and surely the air line is a responsibility of the government. If the government says this information must be kept confidential, and an emanation of the crown is making parts of it public, I suggest we have a question of privilege and the government itself should redress the wrong that has been done to us by making public at least sections of the report.

I want to emphasize what was said by my leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. It seems to me the course which the Minister of Transport should follow is clear. I would be happy to accept his reservation that the government should make public only those sections of the report which he feels would help clear up the situation. If he wishes to make the kind of reservation he has indicated I would be happy to accept it.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question before making certain observations. Would he verify the amount mentioned by Mr. McGregor as reported in the newspaper article? Is that the extra cost which would be involved in maintaining the base in Winnipeg?

Mr. McIlraith: That question is improper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member is seeking to make me disclose to him the contents of the report, and I have consistently refrained from doing this for the reasons I have explained. The hon. gentleman will be able to satisfy his curiosity about the answer to that question when the summary of the report is tabled. I cannot answer his question now.

Mr. Churchill: Are we, then, to accept the statement of Mr. McGregor that this will be the extra cost if the base is maintained there, or are we to reject that statement. This is what has now complicated the issue. I am not going to accuse Mr. McGregor of not telling the truth, but if this is an inflated figure we should know about it immediately. If this is a figure which is going to influence the government in making a decision, and if it is a wrong figure, what position are we left in?

It seems to me the government must now take some action. The minister has told us repeatedly that he is relying on this report in order to reach a decision as to what should be done about the base in Winnipeg. The other members from Winnipeg have not been given a chance even to peek at the report. I have not even seen the volume, but apparently the report has now been partially disclosed by the president of T.C.A. If the government intends to make a decision based on the figure disclosed by him it seems to me we should know whether that figure is accurate or not. There is no question but that the government should now take immediate steps to clear up this issue.

The government of Manitoba has made a request to examine the report so they could put their case forward. In fact the Prime Minister has asked the government of Manitoba to present its case again. It did so in June of this year and received what was understood to be an assurance by all those present, that the other factors would be taken into account in addition to any report made as a result of the Dixon-Speas economic survey. It is a very peculiar situation now in so far as the base in Winnipeg is concerned, when we learn that the medium jets are not going to be serviced there and that the Viscounts are going to be withdrawn. The assurance, therefore, was just a sop to attempt to bemuse the people of Winnipeg and the government of Manitoba.

This motion, Mr. Speaker, is certainly extraordinarily mild, stating only that the government should give immediate consideration to the question of making the report public. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, he has tried to be very kind to the government, which is not an unusual position for him to take.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Churchill: He has so worded the motion that the government can easily get off the hook. However, the situation has now reached the stage where the government must take some steps in order to clear up this situation. Is Mr. McGregor giving the right figure with regard to the base in Winnipeg or is he confusing the issue? Only the minister has seen the report and read it, and only he can clear this up.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): We listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as he set out his reasons for raising a question of privilege. He made out a very good case, and one that deserves the support of the house. I feel that this question of privilege is one that is indicative of the need for action to be taken by parliament to secure information from this government which has shown a propensity for concealment or for selective information.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I repeat, it has shown a propensity for selective information. However, after having made a strong statement the hon. member now puts a motion which, if it had been drawn in co-operation with the Secretary of State, could not have been weaker. I cannot understand this. It merely says that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the question of making public the contents of the report. I am impressed with the fact that there is a breach of the privileges and rights of parliament. I am also impressed by the wonderfully co-operative spirit in the motion which, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said a minute ago, is not unusual.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest, sir, that this should be accepted as a question of privilege and that the government would be able to accept a motion as weak, as watered down as this, without any loss of prestige, and would be in the same position as they were a short time ago when they were able to join with the New Democratic party in their amendment. This is weaker than that. It is so worded that the government has an easy way out. I appeal to the government to take advantage of the opportunity the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has afforded them to get out of a very disagreeable position by means of a most agreeable resolution.

Mr. McIlraith: I will not avail myself fully of the same privilege the Leader of the Opposition made use of to discuss the government in a general way. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that it was his government which made the decision that this consulting firm should be retained by Trans-Canada Air Lines and who had refused to retain it themselves; it was his government which refused to take its responsibility as a competent government would have done. This step having been taken, we are today bound by it. I would point out further to the right hon. gentleman, if he wants to digress into this field, that this is precisely the thing we are finding in the departments so far as his government was concerned; that it could not make decisions or take responsibility.

Now, having said that, I want to address myself to the point at issue here, because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has raised a point that deserves the consideration of the house. The point he raised was this, that we should accept as a question of privilege that with regard to an officer of a crown corporation using information concerning the internal operations of that crown corporation, after this information has been procured for its own purposes, such officer is now precluded from using such information without making public the whole of the report. I would draw the attention of this house to what is the relevant point here: Crown corporations, if they are to operate effectively, must have a right in their internal operations to retain professional people to prepare reports for them and to use the information obtained in these reports. This is standard practice with relation to architects, engineers and so on.

Surely it cannot be argued here that they are not able to do so, that there is a breach of privilege when the officer of a corporation makes a reference to the kind of conclusion that he says he obtained in that way. I was amazed at the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre which was tantamount to this, that the information obtained by a crown corporation from outside experts should be treated differently from information obtained from its own employees. That is the absurdity which is inherent in his argument. As a former minister of the crown he should know better. It typifies exactly what put this whole subject matter in this position in the city of Winnipeg, that splendid city where the people are concerned about this subject.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: When the government declares that a report is to be treated as confidential, does that not apply to all those who have copies of the report?

Mr. McIlraith: That is the very point I am making.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: The government is in the position that if the government had committed a breach of that confidence, the position might be different. This question before the house, however, arises because an officer of a crown corporation made a reference to a document he properly obtained and which he presumably obtained for the purpose of using it. That is the distinction that is to be drawn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I will extend the courtesy, not extended by the right hon. former prime minister and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, to ask a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to limit the hon. member of course, but we have had an extended discussion.

Mr. Balcer: A point has been raised by the minister, and we have heard about the case of the people of Winnipeg, but I would like to say a few words for the people of Montreal on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Are you speaking to the point of privilege or are you describing the beauties of Montreal?

Mr. Balcer: The minister has raised doubts about the responsibility of the last government in matters of transportation, and said we were afraid to take our responsibilities.

Question of Privilege

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but we are discussing a point of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker. On a question of order, the minister made gratuitous remarks—

Mr. McIlraith: To you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and the former minister of transport has the right to reply.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the comments of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, but this point of privilege has almost developed into a debate on both sides of the house. It is my duty to try to bring it to a conclusion and reach a decision as to whether the motion is in order. I think the extended discussion this morning almost proves the point that we are anticipating a grievance or a debate. For example, citation 113 in Beauchesne's fourth edition says:

> Members often raise so-called "questions of privilege" on matters which should be dealt with as personal explanations or corrections, either in the debates or the proceedings of the house. A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in parliament. It should be dealt with by a motion giving the house power to impose a reparation or apply a remedy.

Well, we have a motion in front of us, which I am glad to say is the customary procedure, and I wish it were followed more often. But it has to be decided whether this motion is in order. In my opinion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could easily put a notice on the order paper asking for the production of papers. At that time the government could make up its mind whether to accede or not. In the light of these circumstances, and in the light of the extended discussion this morning, I regret to say I do not see a prima facie question of privilege on this matter.

Mr. Knowles: With respect, Mr. Speaker—I know I cannot argue at this point—but in view of what has been done to parliament in this matter, I must appeal your decision.

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the decision of the Chair from which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has appealed to the house. All those in favour of sustaining the decision of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling of the Chair, which is as follows:

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose on a question of privilege and proposed a motion as follows:

"That in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the question of making public the contents of the report of R. Dixon-Speas and Associates on the economic operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines."

I stated that in my opinion the hon. member could put a motion on the order paper in order to permit the house to take a decision on the question. That being so, I ruled that there was not a prima facie question of privilege in regard to the proposed motion; whereupon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre appealed to the house from this decision.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Third report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Boulanger.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann) presented the fourth report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Proposed Legislation

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I move, seconded by my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer):

That items numbered 1 to 155 inclusive, and items numbered L10 and L15, as listed in the main estimates, 1963-64, and items numbered 1a to 117a inclusive, and items numbered L10a and L13a, as listed in the supplementary estimates (A), 1963-64, relating to the Department of External Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

In making this motion, I wish to point out an obvious error in the printing of the supplementary estimates at item L10a on page 25. This item should refer to an additional advance to the working capital fund of the United Nations organization and not to the world health organization.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO REVISE DEFINITION OF "ELEVATOR"

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-114, to amend the Canada Grain Act (off-track elevator licensing).

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Olson: The purpose of this bill is to revise the definition of "elevator" under the Canada Grain Act so that an inland elevator is no longer restricted to premises served directly by a railway. The amendment thus authorizes the board of grain commissioners to license premises which are off-track and served by other means of transportation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING QUALIFICATIONS OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-46 (from the Senate), to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before the adoption of the motion for first reading of this bill which was sent to the house by the Senate, I should like to say a few words about the subsequent consideration of the bill by the house.

Hon. members know that after the bill has been read for the first time, it will take its place at the bottom of a long list of public bills on the order paper. Consequently, it is unlikely that the house will be able to consider it during the present session.

As this legislation is of some importance to the management of the two savings banks concerned, I intend to ask, when public bills are called at five o'clock, that the house unanimously agree to give priority to this bill.

Meanwhile, I shall now ask that the bill be read for the first time.

[Text]

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall said bill be read the second time. Later this day.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

PENHOLD, ALTA.—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF CLOSING OF AIR BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, and ask whether he will bring the house up to date on any investigation which is taking place with respect to the Penhold air base and as to any probability of the order being altered which was made earlier to the effect that jet training would not be permitted at that base.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I have nothing new to add. My colleague the Minister of Transport is carrying out a careful review of air safety requirements in respect of all air training bases. No conclusions have been reached so far, I suspect; consequently there has been no change in the decision announced with respect to Penhold.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the hon. gentleman still take the stand that the safety regulations which, he said, forbade the use of this base, might be altered so as to permit the change in that decision?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, all I said was that safety regulations made it impossible to use the Penhold base for ab initio jet flying training.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO CRASH OF CF-100 PLANE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to put to the Minister of National Defence. Having regard to the fact that a member of the crew was a native of my home town, and indeed a personal acquaintance, can the minister report to the house on the crash of the CF-100 jet aircraft near St. Hubert air base yesterday, and if a full investigation into the causes will be carried out.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, at 1300 hours local time on November 28 an R.C.A.F. CF-100 crashed one mile from the end of the runway while on final approach at R.C.A.F. station St. Hubert. The pilot, Flying Officer D. B. MacKenzie, and the navigator, Flight Lieutenant W. C. Henderson, were both killed. The reason for the accident is not known at this time, but a full investigation is being held.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED EXISTENCE OF SPY RING WITHIN DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) asked me whether I was in a position to confirm or deny the existence of a spy ring within my department, as stated in an Ottawa newspaper, the South End News.

To give a specific reply to the hon. member's question, I emphatically deny that there could be a Russian spy ring within the Department of External Affairs. The departmental officials are constantly in touch with the R.C.M.P. with regard to all matters relating to the security of the department, and there is no actual fact to confirm such an allegation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS TO DETER ATTACKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence based on a statement he made in a speech at the Empire club in Toronto yesterday. He was referring to the NATO allies and the sentence reads as follows:

They prefer to deter both nuclear and non-nuclear attack by the threatened immediate use of tactical atomic weapons and to accept the risks inherent in this strategy.

Would the Minister of National Defence tell us which of the allied nations in NATO prefer that use of atomic weapons?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that would be helpful. I think it is well known that there is some difference of opinion in respect of strategy. Our main interest is to seek agreement so we can have a strategy which is fully supported by all members of the alliance. A meeting of the NATO council of ministers is taking place shortly, and it would not be the least bit helpful to mention now any of the positions that may be taken by different delegations.

Mr. Churchill: Then may I ask a question of the minister for external affairs. What steps will the minister for external affairs take at that NATO meeting in December to ensure that there shall be no use of either tactical or strategic atomic weapons without the concurrence of the NATO allies?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure the hon. gentleman, as an experienced minister of the crown, knows how improper that question is at the present moment.

Mr. Churchill: I am asking for the position of the Canadian government in a matter of vital importance to the peace of the world. Let me phrase my question again. I am asking the minister what steps he is going to take on behalf of the Canadian government and the Canadian people to ensure that no nation within the NATO alliance will use either tactical or strategic atomic weapons without the concurrence of the other allies.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend knows quite well that the response I gave him a moment ago was the response which he, as a responsible minister, if he were on this side, would give. These are matters which the government makes public at the appropriate moment, and this is certainly, in the interest of the alliance, not the time to give the kind of response which my hon. friend encourages me to make.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I am surprised that the affable minister should answer in that way. Has not parliament the right to know, on a matter as important as this, the stand that Canada is going to take?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My right hon. friend is quite correct. Parliament has the right to know the position of the government. But the government has the responsibility of saying when it shall inform parliament concerning government policy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The same old contempt of parliament.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question arising out of his Toronto speech. Would he care to elucidate the statement made in the course of that speech, that the situation of one half of our air division is clearly not satisfactory? If it is not satisfactory, what is the government going to do about it?

Mr. Hellyer: I think the statement speaks for itself. I said it was not satisfactory, and I proposed to make recommendations in respect of it in the very near future.

Mr. Martineau: When is that?

Mr. Hellyer: In due course.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He said a moment ago that the government reserved the right to tell parliament when it had reached a decision. May I ask the minister if parliament will be informed before any commitment is made by the government of Canada, or afterward?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend, who has had long experience as the head of a government, knows that the answer to that kind of question would depend on the circumstances.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister tell us the circumstances which would determine when parliament would be informed?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As an experienced parliamentarian and former head of a government, my hon. friend knows that the answer to that must be that it would depend on the situation at the time.

BOBCAT PERSONNEL CARRIERS—INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the statement in his speech yesterday that the brigade in Europe is in urgent need of armoured personnel carriers, could he inform the house whether the pre-production run of 20 Bobcats has been completed, and if not what is the reason for the long delay in this program which should have reached this stage quite a long time ago?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the development has not reached the stage where the vehicle is technically perfect, and the hon. gentleman is just as familiar with the reasons for that as I am.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask a supplementary question. This pre-production run should have been completed some months ago. I asked the minister, what is the reason for the delay in completing the run of 20 vehicles?

Mr. Hellyer: Well, generally speaking I would say three or four years of not pressing it as quickly as might have been the case.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Does the minister agree that this situation is seriously interfering with the operation of our armoured brigade in Europe?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I think it is a quite unsatisfactory situation.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could the minister tell the house whether the hon. member for St. Paul's is informally speaking for the government when he is suggesting the merger of the New Democratic party in this house with the Liberal party, since according to the hon. member, the socialist party is only a radical wing of the Liberal party?

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE—STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT AS TO COST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Since the Minister of Transport is one of the privileged few who have read and reviewed carefully the Dixon-Speas report, I wonder if he could tell the house whether he agrees with the figure of $19,800,000 that has been mentioned by Mr. McGregor as the loss to T.C.A. if the maintenance base in Winnipeg is not moved to Montreal.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be quite improper for me to start disclosing the contents of the Dixon-Speas report, having refused to table it in the house for very good reason.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister going to reprimand the president of T.C.A. for doing exactly that?

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. McIlraith: I trust that the hon. member for Three Rivers is referring to the earlier discussion this morning, and he will have noticed that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in raising this matter, was very careful not to indicate Mr. McGregor did that.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION IN DEVELOPMENT OF FEDERAL POLICIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fluid and changing relations between the federal government and the provinces, will the provinces in future have any share whatsoever in the development of federal government monetary, tariff and transportation policies?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot recall, other than in the fiscal field, whether that matter was on the agenda, because I was not present during all the discussions; but it would seem to me that some of those matters are exclusively under the jurisdiction of the federal government, whereas others are for discussion between the two levels of government.

SUGAR

PROTECTION OF CARIBBEAN MARKETS IN MAKING NEW CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Recent newspaper reports have stated the government is considering the possibility of a long term sugar contract with Rhodesia. As any diversion of sugar purchases from Caribbean countries could have a serious effect upon the markets for maritime salted, pickled and smoked fish, would the minister give serious consideration to this problem before entering into any contract that would further disrupt our present salt fish markets?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. gentleman that this kind of consideration will certainly be taken into account in any forthcoming discussions with commonwealth sugar producers. I think I should assure him, however, that I do not believe any of these discussions are likely to have the kind of adverse effects on the trade of the maritime region that he fears.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO ABSENCE OF MINISTER FROM HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it a fact that he did indeed address the Saskatchewan Liberal association in Regina city last Tuesday, November 27?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Last Tuesday; that is correct.

Some hon. Members: You were sick.

Mr. Nasserden: As a supplementary question, I wonder could the minister tell us whether he was sick before he went to the meeting, or after?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I think the day I was absent here was Wednesday, not Tuesday; and they were surely not sick after I spoke to them.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REPORTED CHANGES IN EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief preamble to my question, which is to the Acting Prime Minister. In a press release from the dominion-provincial conference last night or early this morning it is stated that the additional revenues that will accrue to the provinces are something as follows. In the case of Quebec there will be an additional equalization direct grant of $35 million and an additional $7 million in succession duties. In the case of Ontario an additional $14 million in succession duties only, with no increase in equalization payments. In the case of British Columbia there will be somewhat less than $4 million out of succession duties, and nothing from equalization payments. I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister would care to state is this new Liberal formula of mortar for the construction of confederation on into the future?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the preamble to the hon. member's question was unquestionably one which indicated his intention to initiate a debate. I shall not follow in that area but I would say, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said, that in so far as equalization payments are concerned that has been the policy of the government, and has been announced for the last two years. There is no discrimination toward any province so far as the formula is concerned, and while I was at the conference this morning it seemed to me that with but very few exceptions there seemed to be on the part of the premiers acceptance of the formula.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister why the government has departed from its own announced policy of raising the equalization formula to the level of the wealthiest province, and has brought in extraneous matters such as the consideration of natural resources?

Mr. Chevrier: I think that is a matter which is leading into debate, and I can well understand why the hon. gentleman would want to know the answer to the question. I think that should be left for a discussion of the matter, and I understand the Prime Minister will make a statement when he returns to the house on Monday.

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): The Acting Prime Minister has stated there were two exceptions to the rule of agreement this morning. Would he please advise the house who raised the objections and on what grounds?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Speaker, the conference is not over yet, and it is one wherein the statements are not made public except those given to the press at the beginning or end of sessions, such as was the case last night. I do not think I should make any further statement or add to my responses to this question.

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER PLANT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT DECISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Industry. Could he now answer the question respecting the heavy water plant in Canada, which was directed to him through the Acting Prime Minister yesterday?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members will appreciate that the government has been preoccupied during the past week with matters of substantial national importance, and as a consequence has been unable to give proper consideration to this particular question. I would hope that very early next week a decision will be announced.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH B.C. PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell us whether he has availed himself of the presence of the premier of British Columbia in Ottawa this week to discuss the Columbia river treaty and, if so, were the discussions encouraging?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the premier of British Columbia three times this week. I had the pleasure of breakfasting with him early this morning, and the discussions we had were very satisfactory. We are both of the same mind in respect of discussions that should be under way very shortly with the government of the United States.

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): As a supplementary question, on a number of occasions it has been stated by both the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister that only one outstanding question remains to be resolved, the question of price. Can the minister now advise the house what other outstanding questions there are, and what resolution has been made on them?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think my hon. friend will understand that it would not be advisable to reveal the nature of the negotiations; but the question of price is the final matter to be determined, and the province of British Columbia and the government of Canada see eye to eye on that particular subject which is now vital in these negotiations.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Would the minister please advise the house how it is possible that if the question of price can be revealed, other matters must be kept secret?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman will have to trust to the good judgment of the negotiators on this matter, because I do not propose to reveal anything that would in any way disclose matters involved in negotiations; to do so might be prejudicial at this time to the interests of Canada and British Columbia.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In view of previous statements made by the Prime Minister over a period of time, would the minister give his word as a minister that the negotiations will be completed by January 1, 1964?

[Mr. Drury.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend is not serious in that question. But I may say to him that the government and the minister are doing everything they possibly can to bring to a successful conclusion the negotiations that have been under way for some months.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, arising out of this discussion and the very complete answers the minister has given, I would ask him whether an opinion has been asked of the law officers of the crown regarding the question of the availability for irrigation purposes of waters from the Columbia being diverted into Saskatchewan. He has received representations from the government of that province in this connection. Has the minister looked into this question and is he assured that, on the basis of the treaty as it now is, diversion of the necessary water for irrigation purposes in Saskatchewan is possible under the treaty?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the law officers of the crown have specifically been asked for an opinion, for the simple reason that I do not think there is any doubt about the implications of article 13, part 1, of the treaty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I gather from that answer, Mr. Speaker, that the minister, having made the usual careful study for which he is noted, has concluded there is no basis for the fears of the government of Saskatchewan that diversion would be denied them under the treaty as it now stands.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under the article to which I have referred it is clear that consumptive uses provide an opportunity for the irrigation to which the province of Saskatchewan feels it should be entitled under the treaty. I have given the premier of Saskatchewan my view of the implications of the treaty. If the premier does not accept that, it is of course not my responsibility.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Saskatchewan cannot take advantage of the water under this item covering consumptive uses without there being pumping on one side and the production of electrical energy on the eastern slopes of the Rockies, can the minister say whether that article meets this multi-use purpose?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer I have already given covers the question which my hon. friend has put so lucidly.

INCOME TAX

LIABILITY FOR AWARD TO VICTIM OF NAZI PERSECUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister exercise that side of his nature favouring equity and arrange, by legislation or otherwise, to nullify the effect of the ruling of the tax appeal board published yesterday, which held that an award of compensation to Phillip Koller, as a persecuted Jewish person, by the district board of compensation of West Germany is subject to Canadian income tax?

Mr. Speaker: This surely is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Fairweather: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the treatment by Canada of victims of nazi—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no dispute about the importance of the question; it is just the timing of the question that is wrong.

WORLD FAIR

REPORTED TECHNICAL DIFFICULTIES RESPECTING SITE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is it true, as indicated in La Presse of Montreal, that the world exhibition authorities are thinking of changing the site's plans following unforeseen difficulties concerning the filling up of St. Helen and Notre Dame islands?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the report published in La Presse, which refers to a statement made by Mr. Lucien Saulnier. I am not in a position to confirm or deny any of the facts contained in it. My hon. friend will understand that, before saying anything on the matter, I shall have to get an official report.

Now I must say that the city of Montreal authorities are responsible for the completion of the site before June 30, 1964, and even if it were true that part of the original plans would have to be altered in the course of the work, I am convinced that this will not prevent the fair from taking place on the St. Helen's complex and to be a great success.

Mr. Pigeon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If major or minor changes are brought forth, must the fair authorities submit such changes to the bureau of international exhibitions?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I have no direct means of communication with the authorities of the city of Montreal, but following the information conveyed to me and published in the newspapers, I will surely request the commissioner of the exhibition to report to me on the situation.

[Text]

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF LIAISON OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works has clearly shown this morning that he was badly informed about the situation in Montreal, as far as the world fair is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order, please. Be kind enough to formulate your question.

Mr. Grafftey: My question stems from that lack of information.

Did not the government appoint a liaison officer in order to be informed as quickly as possible of what is going on in Montreal as far as the world fair is concerned?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, of course I do not accept the premises of the question of my hon. friend. I said a while ago that I would always refuse to comment on a statement before having an official and complete report. If I did otherwise, I think that my hon. friend would be the first one to blame me.

Mr. Grafftey: Correct.

Mr. Deschatelets: As far as the appointment of a liaison officer is concerned, I can say that for the time being I myself am this liaison officer. This aspect of reorganization will be considered later, but as soon as a liaison officer is appointed, if it is necessary, the house will be informed.

HOUSING

SASKATOON—ANNOUNCEMENT WITH RESPECT TO WINTER CONSTRUCTION BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Garland (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Yorkton asked a question as to the regulations in connection with the winter house building incentive program. While the conditions as to eligibility referred to by the hon. member come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour, the function of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is primarily one of inspection in connection with this matter. I thought I should make a short statement in reply today, because the inspection will be taking place this week end. I would advise the hon. member that the conditions of eligibility stipulate that to provide the maximum employment during the winter months, construction must not proceed beyond the first floor joist stage prior to December 1, 1963. To provide for the processing of applications and the undertaking of the necessary on-site inspections by that date, applicants have been requested to mail their applications to the Department of Labour by November 10. I am advised that this date was selected to encourage the submission of applications well before November 30.

Applications can, of course, be submitted after November 10, and it may be of interest to the hon. member as well as to other members of the house to learn that up to November 10, some 19,000 applications were received. Since that time an additional 5,000 applications have reached the Department of Labour. I am happy to report that all applications to date have been processed and every effort will be made by the staff of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to inspect all these houses this week end.

Any applications received after December 1 will also be accepted. Construction, however, in these cases should not exceed the first floor joist stage before an inspection has been arranged and an applicant informed of the result of this inspection. The Department of Labour is asking that applications be mailed at least 15 days prior to the date on which an inspection is desired.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister inform the house whether there is any unreasonable delay in the inspections, or does it appear that the department has enough inspectors to carry out these inspections quite speedily?

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I heard the hon. member correctly, but inspection is not to take place until this week end, and it will take place at that time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FRENCH SPEAKING UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Has the Secretary of State taken steps to set right the situation revealed in a collective letter to the newspapers, signed by eight federal civil servants and denouncing the treatment of French speaking university graduates, who are deprived of their rightful positions in favour of English speaking candidates who never went beyond high school?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the subject, but I will look at the hon. gentleman's question and answer it at the first opportunity.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF LEGISLATION NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the government give to the House of Commons the assurance which the Prime Minister is reported as having given to the press, that legislation respecting the Canada pension plan will be presented to parliament at the next session?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had given that assurance as warmly, as vehemently, as categorically as I could on a previous occasion.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Minister of National Health and Welfare take this opportunity, having regard to yesterday's sessions of the federal-provincial conference, to confirm that assurance?

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

REPRESENTATIONS FROM HULL RESPECTING FEDERAL BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): My question is directed to the Minister of Public Works.

Following many articles published in the Ottawa newspaper Le Droit by Mr. Gerard Morin, did the minister receive the brief prepared by the city of Hull requesting federal buildings, and does he intend to take action?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): The matter is under study, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Gordon) moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $377,400,841.02, being the aggregate of—

(a) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except agriculture item 100, atomic energy item 5, external affairs items 78 and 107, fisheries item 45, mines and technical surveys items 45 and 80, northern affairs and national resources items 5 and 10, public works items 20 and 190, transport item 35 and loans, investments and advances item L20 for which no amount is being released, $318,822,963.00;

(b) an additional two-twelfths of external affairs item 105 and finance item 45, $4,700,000.00;

(c) an additional one-twelfth of mines and technical surveys item 140, national film board item 1, northern affairs and national resources item 80, post office items 5, 10 and 15, public works items 150 and 165, transport items 40 and 220, loans, investments and advances item L70, $21,342,422.50;

(d) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except external affairs items 96a and 117a, finance item 5a, northern affairs and national resources item 110a, and loans, investments and advances items L13a and L63a for which no amount is being released, $24,023,455.00;

(e) an additional one-twelfth of finance item 45a, $83,333.34;

(f) one-twelfth of the amount of the item set forth in the supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $583,333.34;

(g) one-twelfth of the amount of item set forth in the supplementary estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $1,666,666.67;

(h) one-twelfth of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except external affairs item 117d for which no amount is being released, $6,178,667.17;

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964.

He said: Mr. Chairman, I think everyone in the committee knows that the Minister of Finance had to be at the conference this afternoon, and he has asked me, in the formal sense, to substitute for him. If any hon. member is bold enough to wish to ask any questions of substance I hope he will direct them to the Acting Minister of Finance, who is much more expert in this matter than I. I hope in fact there will be a minimum of questions asked, and I say that for two reasons, which I will put to the committee in, I hope, a friendly and uncontentious spirit. The government has endeavoured during the session, and intends to go on endeavouring as rapidly as time will permit, to bring all departments before the committee of supply so there will be other opportunities for dealing with practically any subject that anyone might wish to bring up. The second reason is that I think all of us are conscious of the fact that this is the last sitting day in November, that it is the 99th day of this session, and—

Mr. Nowlan: No, it is the 100th.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I was looking at yesterday's Votes and Proceedings. It is the 100th day of the session, and I thank the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings for supporting me in what I am about to say. I think all of us would like to go home for Christmas feeling that this session had been completed. It will be the endeavour of the government to secure every co-operation and to meet every desire of every hon. member opposite in all quarters of the house, as well as the government's supporters as well, to get the business done in an orderly fashion as quickly as possible. I am therefore appealing to all hon. members to give us this other month's supply. We are asking only for supply until the end of December, because we hope and expect, and I think all hon. members expect, that all the estimates will have been voted before the end of December.

I could go on and explain in detail what is contained in the bill, but I can assure hon. members that in no case is the government asking for the full amount of any vote. Therefore none of the ordinary rights of the committee of supply is denied or will be denied in any way by this bill. Unless I am specially asked to do so I do not intend to deal with the items for which more than one twelfth is asked. I think all hon. members know that some expenditures do not go on at an even pace throughout the year and more than one twelfth has to be asked for. I am prepared to give information on any of these if any hon. member wishes, but I think the matter is all very familiar to the committee, so I shall at once take my seat.

Mr. Nowlan: Might I ask the Secretary of State, without his going through the usual wording, to give on behalf of the government the usual undertaking which every minister of finance gives when interim supply is asked for, that no debate will be precluded? In other words, the usual formal undertaking is being given by the Secretary of State?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I did not give it in the usual language. I was trying to give it from memory, but I do give the undertaking that the full amount of no vote has been asked for, or is being asked for by the bill now proposed.

Mr. Nowlan: And no debate will be precluded because of any discussion which might take place.

Mr. Pickersgill: No debate will be and no debate can be. But I do not mind expressing the hope that some of the debate will be abbreviated.

Mr. Nowlan: Then in view of the plaintive plea which has just been made by the Secretary of State I will make my remarks very abbreviated indeed. I cannot help but recall that it was just a little short of one year ago, I think one year less a week, when I had the responsibility of sitting in another seat and asking this committee for interim supply.

Mr. Knowles: And you gave the same assurance.

Mr. Nowlan: I gave the same assurance, but the committee did not give me the co-operation I asked for and for which the Secretary of State is asking this afternoon. In fact I recall that we were six or seven days discussing the matter before we got one month's interim supply. Actually it was seven days, I am told.

The Secretary of State's eyesight appears to be not entirely effective, because he thought this was only the 99th day of the session. He might be trying to save a day, and I can understand that. But actually it is the 100th day and this is the ninth month, and the government is again asking for one month's supply. The record—and if we had one it could be played over and over again—tells the story of inefficiency of a government coming along in the ninth month of the fiscal year and asking for interim supply. I am sure the echoes are still resounding around the top of the chamber somewhere and I could bring them down here, but I am not going to do so. We were told a year ago that we should have followed this government's example; that we did not assemble immediately after the election; that we took off 60 days or two months during the summer when we could have been sitting here, and if we had not taken that time off we would have had no problem with respect to interim supply.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you remember what happened on this occasion. There was no delay. The ink on the writs was hardly dry and the writs hardly tabled by the returning officer before parliament had reassembled in May for the first 60 days of indecision. We have had indecision ever since, and we are facing it now.

I could go on and on but I will yield to the pleas of the Secretary of State and will not make any extended remarks this afternoon.

We are in the ninth month of interim supply now. I hope, with the Secretary of State, that before this interim supply expires the committee will have passed the estimates and we shall not need any further interim supply. I can say that from the heart, because I had the same wish last year. It was denied to me. I hope it will not be denied to the Secretary of State, because this time we have an opposition which is co-operating fully with the government in every way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate that there is unanimous acceptance of that fact in all corners of the house. I can assure the hon. gentleman that as far as the opposition are concerned we shall continue to give the same degree of co-operation as we have shown so far. I hope that before Santa Claus comes climbing down the chimney we shall have passed all the estimates of the various departments.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, the members of this party are naturally influenced by the conciliatory mood of the Secretary of State, and we shall co-operate in seeing that this interim supply measure is passed as expeditiously as possible. However, there are one or two things which I think ought to be said on this occasion.

During this week the federal-provincial conference has been meeting here in Ottawa. It was hailed in some quarters as the most important federal-provincial conference since confederation. Personally I would doubt that. I think something like that is said almost every ten years about one or other of these conferences. However, there is no doubt this has been an important conference, particularly in view of some of the statements which were made before it opened. I think its deliberations and what might emanate from them could have far reaching implications for Canada.

The New Democratic party was probably the first party in Canada to devise a program called co-operative federalism which we incorporated in our founding program statement in 1961. Whether we were the first or not, we certainly did enunciate a program for co-operative federalism. I wish to say something about our views on co-operative federalism. To me it means working together to make our federal system work, not for one province or for one region but for all Canadians. It does not mean looking upon Canada as a loose federation of autonomous provinces held together by a central government bereft of legislative or fiscal confidence. I do not think the people of this country look upon themselves primarily as Quebecers, Nova Scotians, British Columbians and so on. They look upon themselves first and foremost as Canadians. They look upon a federal-provincial conference as a meeting of Canadian leaders representing Canadian provinces and concerned with the problems of the Canadian people.

The purpose of such a conference should be to set national goals and, having done so, to co-operate in working for their attainment. This cannot be done by fragmenting Canada into semi-autonomous states, nor by reducing the powers of the federal government to the point where it has little to do except collect taxes and excise duties and run the post office. The New Democratic party believes Canada is more than the sum total of its parts. Economically we are an organic unit striving to achieve a Canadian identity and Canadian unity. I do not think the people of Canada want this country balkanized according to provincial boundaries or geographical locations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask a question? Is it not true that at the convention of his party they adopted the idea of the two nations?

Mr. Douglas: If the Secretary of State would possess himself in patience I will deal with that in a few moments. I have all the time in the world, if he has, so we could continue this debate indefinitely.

Mr. Pickersgill: I regret already having asked that question.

Mr. Douglas: I was trying to expedite the matter, but I will certainly deal with this at greater length when I come to the question of the two nations.

Mr. Pickersgill: I withdraw the question.

Mr. Douglas: The Secretary of State usually gets the estimates through in spite of himself. I was saying, when I was unnecessarily interrupted, that I did not think the Canadian people want to see this country balkanized according to provincial boundaries or geographical regions. They want their provincial governments to have the revenues necessary to discharge their constitutional responsibilities; but equally they want a federal government with legislative authority and fiscal capacity to promote economic growth, full employment and equality of opportunity for every Canadian irrespective of where he may live.

The whole trend of our times is toward greater economic co-operation among states, even among nations which have been bitter enemies for centuries and which in the past have gloried in their absolute national sovereignty. In the European economic community six nations are not only integrating their economies but are moving toward the free movement of people across national boundaries and the establishment of uniform, portable social security benefits. It would be ironic indeed if at the very time when Europe is welding its economies into an efficient unit, we in Canada were to splinter this country into ten economically weak fragments.

If Canadians are to enjoy prosperity, full employment and adequate social security, our economy must continue to expand.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Douglas: Perhaps it could be asked later.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Douglas: I said no. I have the floor. Would the hon. member sit down? I do not intend to be interrupted.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order—

The Chairman: The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. gentleman identify the document from which he is reading?

Mr. Douglas: That is not a point of order. I am reading from some notes on this subject. If that is the most profound observation the hon. member for Yukon can make on this serious subject I think he had better remain silent.

Our economy will only expand if we can compete in the markets of the world with such industrial giants as the United States, Great Britain, West Germany and Japan. We cannot meet this type of competition by a process of fragmentation. We can only grow if we are unified into a strong economic entity with a deep seated sense of national purpose and capable of making national decisions.

I am not urging more centralization, but I am pleading for a federal system in which there will be more co-operative planning at the federal and provincial levels directed toward objectives which are worthy of Canada. Demagogic appeals to local self-interest may be popular for a time, but I do not think they will commend themselves to the Canadian people as a whole. What will it profit this country if one or two areas prosper while others languish in economic decay? A chain is only as strong as its weakest link and confederation is only as strong as its weakest member. If Canada is to grow and prosper it must do so as a unit. Having poor relations may give one a feeling of superiority but it never leads to lasting friendship. If Canada is to go forward it must go forward as one people, with two languages—

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have been watching the hon. member since he started his speech and he has been reading all of it, except for the interjection by the Secretary of State. I refer you, sir, to citation 144 of Beauchesne, which states that the rule of this house prevents a member reading his speech because it may have been written by somebody else. I think if the rules are going to be applied, they should be applied to the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, if I may proceed—

Mr. Nielsen: May I have a ruling on my point of order, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before Your Honour rules, may I say that I hope the usual courtesies that have normally been extended in this house will be extended to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam?

Mr. Douglas: I was trying to save the time of the house by keeping fairly close to notes rather than making a rambling speech. I am therefore confining myself fairly close to my manuscript. I shall be glad to throw it away and take all the time necessary, if that is what the committee wants done.

I simply say if Canada is to go forward she must go forward as one people; with two languages and two cultures and proud of our diversity, but united as to our ideals and objectives. Nothing that I have said about unity in economic affairs precludes the fullest development of bilingualism and biculturalism. Before I go to the point which was raised by the Secretary of State, in the view of the New Democratic party Canada is composed of people from many lands. Our constitution recognizes two official languages and two cultures stemming from the two nations which came together to form the partnership of confederation.

If those of us who are English speaking Canadians have not always lived up to the spirit of that partnership, then we must reexamine our actions and mend our ways. I think we are doing that today more seriously than we have ever done it since 1867. I want to make it perfectly clear to the Secretary of State that talking about an economic entity is one thing and talking about binationalism and biculturalism is a totally different thing. We are talking in one field in economic terms and in the other about social relationships and cultural areas of living.

[Translation]

Mr. Pickersgill: That is something I understand.

Mr. Knowles: That is very kind of you.

[Text]

Mr. Douglas: I am not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that the provinces do not need more revenues to carry out the responsibilities allocated to them under the British North America Act. On the contrary, I believe the provincial governments have an unanswerable case for a larger share of the direct taxes, particularly income taxes and corporation taxes. At the present time the provinces are getting about one fifth of the revenue from the three shared tax fields. It seems to me that the request for 25 per cent of the income tax revenue and 25 per cent of the corporation tax revenue is reasonable. Most of the provinces will undoubtedly spend this money, if they get it, on education, because their municipalities simply cannot hope to meet the increasing costs of education as they are at the present time and as they are anticipated over the next ten years.

However, Mr. Chairman, it is a totally different thing to talk about a larger portion of the shared tax fields for the provinces and to talk, as some have done, about the federal government being asked to vacate the present tax field entirely and leave each of the provinces to fend for itself. Some provinces might do well, although even that is doubtful in time of economic recession. There are provinces which would suffer very greatly. We must keep in mind the difference in tax potential as it obtains among the respective provinces. It is estimated today that to raise $10 per capita of its population, the province of Ontario would require to increase the income tax rate by 6 per cent; Newfoundland would require an increase of 23 per cent and the province of Prince Edward Island an increase of 31 per cent.

Now, surely one of the functions of the federal government is to equalize opportunities among the various regions of Canada so as to guarantee a minimum standard of health, welfare and educational services for every Canadian irrespective of geographical location. It should be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the money collected in taxes in any one province was not necessarily earned in that province. We have banks, insurance companies, railways and large corporations like oil companies which make their money all across Canada but pay their taxes in the province where their head office is located. Much of the income on which they pay this tax was earned in various parts of Canada. Those parts of Canada where the wealth was actually produced are entitled to some share of that revenue.

The same thing is true with regard to succession duties. When succession duties are levied, they are levied in the province where the deceased passed away and the will is probated. However, the deceased may have moved there only recently after his retirement, and the estate on which the heirs are paying succession duty may have been earned in many parts of Canada or may have been earned entirely in some other province of Canada.

The whole basis of confederation was the assumption by Canada of a responsibility for the less industrialized areas. The maritimes came into confederation with the understanding that their particular situation would be recognized and appreciated. For nearly 100 years it has been national policy in this country to develop the great central industrial heartland of Canada by means of subventions, freight subsidies and a whole variety of programs. I am not complaining about that at this particular time. I am simply saying that if national policies have made some parts of Canada more prosperous than others, then it is the function and responsibility of the federal government to redistribute some of the tax revenues collected in the wealthier provinces, much of which may have been earned in other parts of this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think anyone in this house needs to argue for the principle of equalization. It is a principle that has been accepted by all parties quite fully, and the present government has made its position clear in a great many cases. I could give many illustrations, but let me refer to my favourite book and my favourite author, "The Liberal Party" by J. W. Pickersgill. On page 133 of this book which sets forth the Liberal program it says:

We do believe, however—

I am sorry; I have got the wrong page.

An hon. Member: And the wrong book.

Mr. Douglas: I have got the right book. The page is 125, and it says:

At the national Liberal convention of 1958 the party pledged itself to alter the basis of equalization payments so that revenues of all provinces from income taxes and succession duties would be brought up to the level of the province having the highest per capita revenue. This principle was reaffirmed at the national Liberal rally in 1961.

I will not take the time of the committee to quote the statements of the Prime Minister as they have appeared in Hansard from time to time. I need only refer to his opening statement at the federal-provincial conference this week when he said, according to the text which was circulated:

It is well known that my colleagues and I prefer to see equalization paid up to the level not of the average of all the provinces, as parliament enacted in 1961, but up to the level of the highest.

In my opinion the government was perfectly sound in suggesting its original proposal that the best equalization formula would have been to equalize the three tax fields, income tax, corporation tax and succession duties, up to the per capita level of the highest province. That would be a fair system of equalization, and what I hope the government will explain is why it has now departed from a principle which it enunciated in the House of Commons, which the Secretary of State enunciated in his book "The Liberal Party", which it passed at its convention, and which the Prime Minister himself referred to the other day in his opening speech to the conference. Why has the government departed from this and introduced a formula which detracts from equalization?

First of all it suggests equalizing income and corporation taxes up to the level of the average of the two highest provinces. Second it introduces a factor of income from natural resources. Why natural resources? If we are taking into consideration the other tax revenue sources of the provinces, why not include all other sources of taxation? But more serious still is the fact that the government has introduced another factor into the formula. The government is now going to raise the share which the provinces can get of the succession duties from 50 per cent to 75 per cent, but this additional revenue is not to be included when computing the equalizing payments. I hope the government will tell us why it has discarded the formula to which it was pledged, a formula which was reasonable, fair and just, and has instead adopted a formula which is a departure from the principle of equalization. It is not because of the cost involved. To have raised the equalization payments for the three tax fields to that of the wealthiest province on a per capita basis would have cost the federal government about $90 million. The formula which is now being placed before the provinces by the Prime Minister will cost about $87.5 million. Therefore it is not a matter of cost.

I say that this new formula is a rigged formula. There is some reason that the government has decided to load the dice, and I want to know who twisted the government's arm. I want to know who it is we are trying to curry favour with, at the expense of the whole principle of equalization. Let me just put on the record the additional revenues which will come to the provinces as a result of this new equalization formula. I will give them in round figures, and I believe they are reasonably accurate. They are Newfoundland $3,282,000; Prince Edward Island $599,000; Nova Scotia $5,742,000; New Brunswick $5,558,000; Quebec $42,716,000;

Ontario $14,416,000; Manitoba $7,023,000; Saskatchewan $2,469,000; Alberta $1,722,000; British Columbia $3,921,000.

When this is put on a per capita basis, this is the additional revenue which the provinces will get under this new formula: Newfoundland $6.83; Prince Edward Island $5.60; Nova Scotia $7.60; New Brunswick $9.05; Quebec $7.81; Ontario $2.24; Manitoba $7.39; Saskatchewan $2.65; Alberta $1.23; British Columbia $2.31.

I say, as one who has long advocated an equalization formula that will help to offset the disadvantages under which some provinces labour, I have always been pleased at the position which the government took with reference to equalization. I was delighted when I read the Prime Minister's statement of last Tuesday when he said:

> It is well known that my colleagues and I prefer to see equalization paid up to the level not of the average of all the provinces, as parliament enacted in 1961, but up to the level of the highest.

I cannot help but wonder what has happened between last Tuesday and today. The government, very apparently, has tossed over in part the principle of equalization and has worked out a formula which I can only describe as based on expediency, in order to secure the support of certain parts of this country.

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Douglas: Yes.

Mr. Winkler: Would he agree that the new formula could be that it is more blessed to give than to receive if the government comes out with the most votes?

Mr. Douglas: I am not trying to read the government's mind. I am simply endeavouring to point out that a very solemn pledge made to the people of Canada has been broken, and that the government has now set its feet along the path away from the principle of equalization.

I have read the debates which took place in the house following the tax sharing arrangements of 1961, in which the previous administration was criticized by the Liberals because it was alleged it had departed in some measure from the principle of equalization. It was at that time, and I can give hon. members the date—June 2, 1958—that the Prime Minister, then the leader of the opposition, stated in clear and categorical terms what the Liberal party would do in establishing a fair and just equalization formula. I am simply rising for the purpose of saying that this equalization formula has been discarded and a new one based on expediency is apparently going to take its place.

Having made these remarks about the needs of the provincial governments for increased revenue; having given the unqualified support of this party to equalization, and a fair and just principle of equalization, I say the federal government must have, in our opinion, the fiscal capacity to meet any economic fluctuations which this country may experience. The ability to increase taxes in times of inflation and to reduce them in times of deflation in order to stimulate the economy, is a power which the federal government must have. The federal government must have the power to direct investment, to direct both private and social capital into underdeveloped areas and into surplus labour areas at any time the need arises. It must have the capacity to direct resource development capital into those areas that have not been able to attract private capital for that purpose.

To this end we in this party support the idea of the federal government retaining its fiscal powers. We reject any suggestion that the federal government should be asked to vacate the direct tax field. We also—

The Chairman: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have the feeling that the hon. gentleman has almost completed his remarks. Perhaps the committee would agree to the hon. gentleman finishing what he has to say.

Mr. Douglas: I think I can complete my remarks in about three minutes, Mr. Chairman, if I may have the indulgence of the committee.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: The last point I wish to make is this. I believe the federal government must also have the legislative authority to provide certain social security measures where uniformity and portability are necessary. I have in mind particularly such things as unemployment insurance, which we already have, the Canada pension plan and other programs which will undoubtedly arise in the future. A great many plans can and should be worked out in conjunction with the provinces. I agree with the provinces which asked the government at this week's conference to move steadily from conditional grants to unconditional grants. I think there is need for more flexibility in these grants, and that grants should be given for health, for welfare, for technical education, and we should allow the provinces to decide the best way in which these grants can be spent within their particular areas of responsibility. But after we have worked out all the programs we can on a joint federal-provincial basis, there will always be a need for Canada-wide programs. In these days of mobility of labour there are programs which need to be country-wide in scope. I hope the federal government will retain its right to carry on such programs in the interests of all the people of Canada.

There are many other things which one would like to say on this matter of federal-provincial relations, particularly with reference to the announcement of the offer which the government has made to the provinces under the tax sharing arrangements. I hope the Prime Minister will arrange for a debate at an early date so he can explain to the house the offer he has made to the provinces, why it has been made, and why the government has departed from the original equalization formula which it espoused. I think such a debate would be useful. I hope it will be held soon. I express the hope of this party that out of the federal-provincial conference and the meetings which will subsequently follow, this country will go forward as a united and unified Canada.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member's time had expired. The hon. member for Hamilton East cannot ask a question unless there is the unanimous consent of the committee. Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: I hear dissenting voices; therefore I recognize the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Chairman, without taking too much time, I should like to make a few comments following the speech made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas).

In spite of what he said, I do not think everybody in Canada has the same conception of Canadian federalism and also of the authority and autonomy of the provinces.

Personally, I believe that confederation resulted from an agreement reached between different provinces to achieve a common goal. It was not a question of losing an identity which already existed, but simply of working together to succeed in doing certain things which the provinces could not have accomplished individually.

Obviously, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is angry at himself for preaching centralization but, while refusing to accept it, he is advocating measures of an increasingly centralizing nature.

While almost all the component parts of confederation are now in favour of decentralization, because the common good to which we attach the greatest importance is the one closest to us, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam would like the federal government to take much more vigorous stands in many fields which, normally, should be none of its concern.

As an example, he referred to the European countries which set up the European economic community. The example is a good one in a way, as long as it is realized that the European economic community will be strong to the extent that each of its members is strong. That is why, when France, England or Germany are economically strengthened, it gives the whole community much greater strength.

By the same token, when the hon. member claims that the tax capacity should be adequate to enable the federal government to carry out any activity it would like to carry out, I say to him that the capacity to pay of the whole country can be no greater than the capacity to pay of each of the parts which make up that country. That is why Social Credit always criticized our present economic system under which no matter where the taxation system is placed, no matter the priority given to the central government, the provincial government or the municipal government, we will always be facing the same problem which is to pay interests and carry a debt that we cannot carry any more than the federal government itself.

We know for instance that last year, the national debt went up by some $760 million and that at the same time, the federal government had to pay close to $800 million in interests on the debt.

We wonder where is the deficit and why the government cannot make progress in the economic field. Well, one does not have to do much searching, because the figures released in the public accounts of Canada are so clear and so obvious that they enable us to readily realize where the problem lies and why the government cannot meet its obligations. It is not because the provinces want too much, not because the municipalities want too much, not because the federal government wants too much, but rather because our present economic system is wrong and neither planning nor centralization nor any of the other proposals put forward by the hon. member could settle that.

That is a typically and purely economic problem. Of course, to that economic problem, a linguistic problem and a cultural problem have been added, which make matters worse and harden positions on both sides.

When the provinces got together to create what was called confederation, they did so in order to help each other in fields where it was better to stand united than divided. However, we find ourselves today in a situation against which the province of Quebec was no doubt the first to react. For political reasons of course, in a very large measure, following the people's awakening, the province of Quebec found out that it had to be the master of its own future, while remaining part of an association of provinces, but that if it could not do what it was meant to do, it had to ask the federal government to do it. Various provinces decided afterwards to adopt more or less the same stand as the province of Quebec.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, a strong confederation means strong provinces, not weak provinces which weaken themselves in order to strengthen the central government.

The solution does not lie there. The provinces should be allowed to be strong, to meet their obligations in the fields which are theirs according to the constitution, fields which are dear to them, because they were granted to them by the constitution and, because at the time of their union, they insisted that some matters fall under the jurisdiction of the provinces, while others could come under that of the central government.

Of course, there has been talk of an equalization system. There again, since what took place was the free founding of a free association of free provinces, I think the provinces should find among themselves a solution to the equalization problem.

I do not think that it belongs to the federal government to impose an equalization system. The first system was bad; if the system we have now or which was suggested recently is based on political expediency, as alleged by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, that does not mean that everything must always be subject to the decision of the federal government. Let the provinces establish between themselves an adequate equalization system in order to bring about a balanced economy in this country.

One must not be selfish, want everything for oneself and give nothing to others. We must work in very close co-operation. If the contacts between the various provinces are more and more frequent, I am convinced that co-operation will develop accordingly. What people want is not only to be able to carry out in their own areas the functions which are properly theirs, but also that the other provinces be permitted to do the same.

[Mr. Marcoux.]

Mention was made a moment ago of the maritime provinces. I visited these provinces many times. They are rather handicapped economically, and this because of political discrimination, because unfortunately, we have always been led by partisan considerations since the very first years of confederation.

When the government took decisions, it was in terms of the votes it could get in order to stay in power and rule.

That is why certain areas known as being easy to rally over to the government have always been politically ignored.

The other day, when we heard the government say they had decided to confirm the decision taken by T.C.A. with respect to the DC-9 again we saw there a decision that was probably taken because it was advisable from the political standpoint. It was also the same thing when the hon. members from Winnipeg—there are several of them—insisted that the maintenance base in Winnipeg should remain there.

Well, in my opinion, that was granted, as I say, for political purposes, because the province of Manitoba was not to be hurt since she was needed, and also because it had been realized that after the settlement of any situation, people in the province of Quebec are always good fellows and eventually come around.

Mr. Chairman, I must say that if in several parts of Canada the Canadair problem was associated with the Caravelle aircraft, it was not a matter of language nor a racial issue, but a matter of unemployment which is more serious in the province of Quebec than elsewhere, while—by a strange coincidence—when we talk of poor provinces, other provinces than that one are mentioned. In short, that was the point at issue much more than anything else.

I can assure you that if the DC-9 had been built in Montreal at the same conditions as the Caravelle would have been, the people in the province of Quebec would have favoured the DC-9, because the building of that aircraft would have helped to stem unemployment in Quebec.

Once more, it is not at all a matter of security or efficiency of that aircraft.

Naturally, like the rest of Canada, the province of Quebec will readily acknowledge the superiority of the other aircraft if it proves to be better as far as security, efficiency and economy are concerned. The people of Quebec are not more stupid than their fellow citizens.

However, no justification has been given to anyone. No one has agreed to say why the experts chose the DC-9 instead of another aircraft. That is why no one can state any definite reason because both T.C.A. and the government have refused to give any explanation. It is well known that the parliamentary committee which considers the budgets and financial statements of the C.N.R. and T.C.A. has never been able to secure from the respective presidents of those two corporations any explanation of the reasons which motivated previous decisions.

In fact, I challenge the committee to try to draw from the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines the true reasons why he accepted the DC-9 rather than the Caravelle aircraft.

Now I am telling you, that if technical, economic and security reasons favour the DC-9 rather than the other aircraft, the Quebecers will be the first to accept this decision, if the reasons are obvious, the difference between the two aircraft is appreciable, and if it is, moreover, proved that Trans-Canada Air Lines arrived at the best possible decision.

That, Mr. Chairman, was simply to explain what I was saying a few moments ago. If confederation has reached this point today, the respective governments, provincial as well as federal must take the blame. The federal government is not the only one to deserve blame, nor are the provincial governments; they all made the same mistake of playing at politics; and whereas they all were elected to represent the people's interests, they hastened, as soon as they were put in power, to safeguard their own political and the financial interests.

As long as the problem of the economic situation is not solved, I fully believe that it is mere illusion to think that we can settle the tax problem.

When there is a question of moving the taxation basis, of dividing the federal government pie, in order to increase or decrease the quota of each province, we have a good time and give our voters and the provincial premiers a good time because we are giving them some hope. But, the problem indeed remains; our liabilities will always by far exceed our means, and we will have to pay interests exceeding our income. Whether there are 10 isolated units or a single one it will still be "You-know-who", who will have to pay for the breakage, and who will indeed have to tighten his belt. Whether it is for the federal government or the provincial or municipal governments, the one to suffer will be the worker, the small wage earner.

As usual, those who suffer hardship in depressions, as a result of our governments having failed to take this problem seriously, are those same small wage earners, who become the leaven of revolutions, which brings about conditions like those we have seen in colonial countries in the last few years, and which may also develop here. For we are now in a colonial country; we are "colonized" by high finance, by people without soul, who have forgotten every Christian principle. It will therefore be absolutely impossible to find a solution for the present situation, if the problem remains unchanged.

I will stop here, Mr. Chairman. I merely wanted to express my opinion and, perhaps, that of my colleagues on confederation. Indeed, confederation will be strong inasmuch as each of its components is strong and inasmuch as it can play the role which was entrusted to it by the provinces when they endorsed the principles set out in the British North America Act. When the provinces have obtained satisfaction, they will renew with the federal government their acceptance of their role. Then will we have co-operation between the provinces and especially between the two great races which form Canada. Then, in my opinion, we will be justified to say that we have reduced tension in our country as we wish to reduce it in the world.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, at a time when federal-provincial relations on fiscal matters are being discussed in Ottawa, we hear statements in the house about the fiscal policy and the existence of two cultures, of two languages which make up the very basis of our country.

We also heard about centralization, and when the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) suggests, for instance, that the federal government should not withdraw from the taxation field with regard to health, he should go further and include the fields of social security, education, highways, in short, all other fields in which the provinces are playing a prominent part at present.

Mr. Chairman, it is not through centralization that we shall attain the highest standard of emancipation, either cultural, personal or individual, in Canada.

The federal government controls fields of taxation that properly belong to provincial governments. In the last few days, that is, since Tuesday, all provincial premiers are in Ottawa conferring with representatives of the federal government. Discussions are being held on fiscal matters, on tax sharing, on the distribution of money that is collected from Canadian taxpayers. Then, when provincial premiers return to their respective provinces, they will still be faced with contributions to be made to municipalities or school boards. All this constitutes an enormous problem, almost a deadlock, because no attempt is being made to strike at the root of the evil.

The governments merely talk about tax matters and the other day, more exactly yesterday, the Quebec delegation suggested that the federal government should give the provinces a greater share in the development of the Canadian monetary policy.

It was, in my opinion, an excellent suggestion, because it is my contention that fiscal matters especially proceed from a well-established system called the banking system, the Canadian monetary system. There were no fiscal matters before the introduction of the monetary system. Now, all our present difficulties are due to monetary difficulties from which stem all the financial difficulties with which Canada is faced.

Mr. Chairman, on October 31 last, I put in the order paper the following question:

Since 1942, has the Minister of Finance received written notice from the government of the province of Quebec, pursuant to section 23(5) of the agreement signed by both governments on the vacating of certain fields of taxation during the war with a view to denouncing the agreement and, if so, what steps have been taken in this respect, and what agreements are now in force?

And as reported on page 5148 of Hansard of November 27, 1963, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), replied as follows:

No. Under section 23(1) of the wartime tax agreement, it was provided that the agreement would terminate on the last day of the fiscal year of the province ending nearest to the thirty first day of December in the first calendar year which began after the date of cessation of hostilities. As order in council P.C. 7409 dated 21st December 1945 fixed the 2nd September 1945 as the date of the cessation of hostilities, the wartime tax agreement automatically ceased on March 31, 1947, and Quebec was free to resume the imposition of a provincial tax on individual and corporation incomes. As Quebec did not enter into subsequent tax rental agreements, that province has retained its freedom to tax individual and corporation incomes.

Now, I contend that the federal government subsequently, lied shamelessly to the Canadian provinces when it said that Quebec could not resort to direct taxation and to personal income tax since Ottawa already occupied this taxation field. Quebec lies or Ottawa lies, when we are told that the province of Quebec was free after March 31, 1947, to recover her whole rights, in taking away from the federal government this field of taxation, since, at that time, it had not used its rights to resort to personal income tax. As the province of Quebec concluded no agreement in the taxation field, it had kept its freedom to resort to personal income tax and corporation income tax.

On several occasions, we heard statements to the effect that Quebec, as the other provinces, is entirely free to levy a personal income tax or a corporation income tax. However, the federal government never agreed to quit that taxation field, so that we had, in Quebec, double taxation or double income tax. In fact, several other provinces also had to resort to this double taxation.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Now, it is not at all interesting for a province to resort to such double taxation, which is not very popular among the Canadian taxpayers, no matter in which province they happen to live.

Mr. Chairman, this answer from the Department of Finance establishes clearly that the provinces are free to recover their rights, which means that the federal government is ready to quit those taxation fields. That is true, but nevertheless I doubt the truth of that statement. For is it not a fact that the province of Quebec has had to impose double taxation? And now, once again we are faced with this taxation problem.

The federal government and the provinces set equalization payments per capita in Canada. As a matter of fact, in certain areas of this country, the payment per capita will amount to $7, in another, $1.31, in still another, $3 or $5, and so on and so forth.

Equalization payments are established per capita, in somewhat the same way domestic animals are bought or sold on both domestic or foreign markets.

Mr. Chairman, I said a moment ago and I will say it again; the very foundation of our taxation system is a defective monetary system under which this country has been and is still stagnating, saddled as it is with exorbitant interests that it is incapable of paying, not only at the national level but also at the provincial, municipal and school levels.

I base my case upon solid facts and not upon imaginary figures which nobody could prove. I refer to the Canada Year Book for 1962, and more particularly to page 1087, where we find the following information on currency and banking:

The Bank of Canada—

That very bank about which we talk so much, not only in the house but also—and even more so—outside of it, to explain to the Canadian people the part that is played in our monetary system by the Bank of Canada.

The Bank of Canada is Canada's central bank. It was incorporated under the Bank of Canada Act in 1934 and commenced operations on March 11, 1935. The Act of Parliament which established the central bank charged it with the responsibility—

Note this, Mr. Chairman:

—the responsibility for regulating "credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation", and conferred on it certain specific powers for discharging this responsibility. Through the exercise of these powers, the Bank of Canada determines broadly the combined total of the basic forms of Canadian money held by the community —currency outside banks plus deposit balances in chartered bank accounts.

By virtue of the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act, which enable the central bank to increase or decrease the total amount of cash reserves available to the chartered banks as a group, the Bank of Canada is able to determine broadly the over-all level of the total assets and deposit liabilities of the group, and hence of the combined total of currency and bank deposits. The Bank Act requires that each chartered bank maintain a minimum amount of cash reserves in the form of deposits at the Bank of Canada and holdings of Bank of Canada notes. This minimum requirement is 8 per cent of the bank's total Canadian dollar deposit liabilities on a monthly average basis.

That means that under the Bank of Canada Act, a chartered bank having a deposit equivalent to 8 per cent of its assets, of its deposit liabilities in the Bank of Canada, would have the right to loan $92 for every $8 deposited with the Bank of Canada.

I quote again:

The ability of the chartered banks as a group to expand their total assets and deposit liabilities therefore depends on the level of total cash reserves. An increase in cash reserves will encourage the banks to expand their total assets (which consist chiefly of loans and marketable securities) with a concomitant increase in deposit liabilities; a decrease in cash reserves will bring about a decline in their total assets and deposit liabilities as they seek to restore their cash reserve ratios.

Mr. Chairman, each time the Bank of Canada demands that the chartered banks bring their cash reserve ratios to a 10 per cent level, credit restrictions immediately spring up. On the other hand, when the Bank of Canada allows the chartered banks to have reserves of 8 per cent only, credit tends to expand.

Further:

The chief method by which the Bank of Canada can affect the level of cash reserves of the chartered banks, and through them the total of chartered bank deposits, is by purchases and sales of government securities. Payment by the central bank for the securities it purchases in the market adds to the cash reserves of the chartered banks as a group and puts them in a position to expand their assets and deposit liabilities.

Mr. Chairman, as soon as the Bank of Canada buys securities, the assets of chartered banks increase, as they multiply by 12½ the reserve amount created by a purchase of securities by the Bank of Canada.

I continue my quotation:

Conversely, payment to the central bank for securities it sells causes a reduction in reserves of the chartered banks and makes it necessary for them to reduce their assets and deposit liabilities.

Mr. Chairman, going on to page 1089:

The bank may buy and sell securities issued or guaranteed by Canada or any province—

Note that Mr. Chairman, "or any province".

—short term securities issued by Britain treasury bills or other obligations of the United States, and certain classes of short term commercial paper.

Mr. Chairman, under the Bank of Canada Act, the central bank may buy and sell securities issued or guaranteed by Canada or any province in the country. And I think that the paradox is this: Why oblige the provinces to go and borrow abroad? Why oblige the provinces to go to other institutions than the Bank of Canada when the legislation stipulates that the provinces can issue securities guaranteed by their resources?

That is the part laid down for the Bank of Canada, the role for which it was established in 1934 and for which it began its operations in 1935.

Besides, the Bank of Canada may accept deposits that do not bear interest from the government of Canada or from the government of any province. That, I think, is another paradox.

That is the paradox facing us.

And I continue:

The bank may accept deposits that do not bear interest from the government of Canada, the government of any province, any chartered bank or any bank to which the Quebec Savings Bank Act applies.

But those deposits do not bear interest. How is it that the deposits with the Bank of Canada do not bear interest, while it has to charge interest to the central government or to the provincial governments for the loans they need to administer their business?

I continue:

The bank does not accept deposits from individuals and does not compete with the chartered banks in commercial banking fields.

Mr. Chairman, the bank does not compete with the chartered banks in commercial banking fields. It exists only to help the chartered banks; its very reason for being is to control credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation.

Well, there is no rule to order credit restrictions at a time when the number of unemployed is going up in Canada, at a time when instability sets in and becomes the nightmare of the Canadian nation.

Why does not the Bank of Canada, through its administrators and its governor, take measures to maintain a progressive and prosperous economic life for the whole Canadian nation?

Again, according to the Canada Year Book:

The Bank of Canada may vary the minimum cash reserve requirement of the chartered banks between 8 per cent and 12 per cent of their Canadian dollar deposit liabilities....

When this legislation became effective on July 1, 1954, the requirement was 8 per cent and it has since remained at that level. (Prior to July 1, 1954, each chartered bank was required to maintain at all times cash reserves equal to not less than 5 per cent of its Canadian dollar deposit liabilities; in practice, the chartered banks as a group normally worked to a ratio of about 10 per cent.)

Mr. Chairman, during the years 1956-57, did we not see restrictions imposed on the Canadian people while chartered banks had to maintain a reserve of only 5 per cent of their Canadian dollar deposit liabilities?

Another point: One has fed the Canadian people the gold myth, according to which Canadian paper money was based upon gold. Some Liberal members running for parliament during the last election used to say to the provincial electors: "If our dollar is to have any value in Canada, it is necessary and compulsory that it be backed by a gold reserve.

Now on page 1089 in the Canada Year Book, I find the following:

> Section 23 of the Bank of Canada Act provides that the bank shall maintain a reserve of gold equal to not less than 25 per cent of its outstanding notes and deposit liabilities.

Such are the terms of section 23 of the act.

> This requirement was suspended in 1940 when, under the terms of the exchange fund order, the bank's gold holdings were transferred to the exchange fund account to form part of Canada's official gold and United States dollar reserves. The Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act passed in 1952 provides that, notwithstanding section 23 of the Bank of Canada Act, the Bank of Canada is not required to maintain a minimum or fixed ratio of gold or foreign exchange to its liabilities unless the governor in council prescribes otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a single ounce of gold behind our Canadian paper money. Nevertheless, there are still people to maintain the opposite in Canada.

We have proved and are still proving at present, by referring to the Canada Year Book, that the monetary and banking system is responsible for the financial and taxation difficulties we have to cope with.

The problem which faces the provinces, namely their being at grips with the federal government from which they are demanding a better distribution of taxes collected by the central government, is not the only problem that we know of. In the province of Quebec, which we know best, we have school boards on the verge of bankruptcy at this moment; the provincial government has to direct them to increase their school taxes, otherwise they will have to be placed under a trusteeship by the said government; thus those school boards are compelled to increase their taxes or else be deprived of any provincial subsidy for the construction of their schools or the remuneration of their school teachers.

Mr. Chairman, this is the outcome of taxation policies in the provincial education field. In the municipal field, the same problems arise and here we are in Ottawa grappling with the same difficulties on a higher level. While the federal government only can legislate on monetary matters, they refuse to face up to their responsibilities and to discharge their duties.

[Mr. Caouette.]

What can they do at this time to get the general economy of Canada going again? All the federal government has to do is to instruct the Bank of Canada—if an amendment to the legislation is necessary, let us introduce one—to make financially possible what is physically realizable and morally good in the whole of Canada. Then the Bank of Canada could help the provinces, the municipalities, the school boards and the public administrations of Canada.

There is no other way out. Even if we listen to the hon. leader of the socialist party telling to the house that we need greater centralization, it is not with centralization that we will reach the goal at which we are aiming, "security and freedom for all Canadian citizens", but through decentralization and the respect which we owe to every Canadian citizen, every Canadian taxpayer.

Let us take for instance those who control money and credit. That system has been condemned thirty two years ago by His Holiness Pope Pius XI, who said, in 1931, what follows:

> Those who control money and credit also control our lives and no one can breathe without their permission.

That was true ten or 15 years ago and it remains true today. No one can breathe without the approval of those who control money and credit.

According to the Canada Year Book, the Bank of Canada has something to do with the control of money. As Canadian legislators, we must direct the Bank of Canada to play its role to the full extent. It must not be satisfied with playing only half a role by imposing a strait-jacket on the Canadian people, but rather it must free human beings from bondage. That is what we all want, no matter where we sit in this house.

We have to admit that the economy will not really reach its objectives until it provides each and every one with his share of the wealth produced by nature and industry, and that share should be large enough to provide every one with a decent living.

It is for that decent living that Social Credit members of this house and Social Crediters throughout Canada have been working so strenuously for nearly 20 years. What is important to them is not to bring down a government and replace it with another, but to get results for the people of Canada. Let the Liberal government now in office give us the results we want and we shall be the first to vote for it. Results are the things that matter to us.

Mr. Chairman, there will be a debate next week on the results of the federal-provincial conference. Such conferences have been held for the past ten years; there have been conferences between provincial premiers, who have been replaced following elections, and federal governments, which have been changed following general elections. At one time, the premier of Quebec was the Hon. Mr. Duplessis, today it is the Hon. J. Lesage. At one time, in Manitoba, so-and-so was premier, today, it is Mr. Roblin.

Thus all the provincial premiers meet with the Prime Minister and the federal government; they discuss taxation, but none dares to deal with the monetary question, the banking question, the financial question, the very root of all the economic chaos which we have been going through for too many years.

Mr. Chairman, we will pass the interim supply, because the money has already been spent, but I wanted to inform parliament of what we stand for. It is not a matter with which to play politics; it is not a game for petty politicians; of little politicians; we demand results, whether from one government or another.

There are two provincial governments which abide by the Social Credit doctrine: the government of British Columbia and the government of Alberta. We wonder why those two governments do not request the immediate use of the Bank of Canada to start the general economy of this country moving again. The Social Credit doctrine is very clear; Major Douglas was very clear in his manifesto of 1918, and principles set forth by Mr. Douglas in 1918 are still true today; it is due to the changed economic conditions in which we live.

Today, there is more automation than in 1918 and in 1920, and we have moreover to face replacing man by machines.

We now have to determine whether machines are to penalize men or to serve them. If we believe in machines for punishing people, Mr. Chairman, I think we should pursue the course charted by the Conservatives and the Liberals.

If we believe that machines should serve the human being then we should consider the problem from another angle, looking to the controllers of the nation's economic blood stream, and when we discover deficiencies or needs, the most elementary honesty will probably induce this government to put the axe to the present monetary system which is causing this country's present distress.

We want security and freedom in Canada. We are in no way asking for the impossible, because we know Canada is one of the richest countries in the world. If we realize it, let us try and show all taxpayers and voters that we are aware of our responsibilities as their representatives in the House of Commons, where laws are enacted, and where they have to be worked out with due consideration for the needs of the human beings whose interests we should watch. Indeed, people are not made for the law, but in Canada the law must be made to serve people.

That is what we want the government to do. That is the aim towards which we work, meaning to obtain as much as we can, and we shall not desist, as long as we have not succeeded in providing for the welfare of Canadian citizens.

[Text]

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on another subject. The interim supply which is before us gives me the opportunity to set out very briefly an answer to an allegation that has been raised outside the house, and occasionally inside the house.

A couple of weeks ago a statement was made outside the house that the opposition was impeding the government by endless votes of confidence in the house. There were other statements made along with it, but this one bothered me because I felt it was not true. When it was made I raised the question briefly with the Prime Minister, and asked him if he would straighten out Mr. Keith Davey on who actually was calling all the confidence votes and supply motions. Naturally at that particular moment it was not a subject for debate, but now I do have a few minutes in which to raise the matter.

I have made a study of the proceedings in the house since October 1, on which date the first vote of the fall session was taken. I find that during the period from then until today —and certainly not counting today—there have been a total of 26 recorded votes in the house. These have been on various matters, and I want to break them down because I think it is important for us to know whether or not the opposition is conducting a blockade of the business of the government by calling endless votes of confidence.

There were 26 recorded votes during that period of time. Nine of these votes—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder if the hon. member is now dealing with the resolution before us, or whether he is not referring to votes which have already taken place in the house during this session.

Mr. Aiken: I am speaking on interim supply, and I thought we were open to discuss any subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say a word on the point raised by the chairman, because the same thought was running through my mind. I think it is generally understood when we are in committee of supply any grievances can be raised against the government. Now, I am trying to say this in a non-contentious way, because I appreciate the hon. gentleman's feeling about this matter, but he is not expressing any grievance against the government.

So far as I am concerned no one in the government has made any such allegation. Certainly I have not, and I want to make that very clear. I have not made any such allegation at any time about the opposition. I think there has been a reasonable measure of co-operation, but I question whether it is proper to raise this now. I could look up Beauchesne, but I do not imagine we want to have a discussion on points like this. However, I question whether it is proper, when we are in committee of supply, to go over matters that have already been settled by the house in the same session, and to open up any debate that has already been concluded.

I think there is that limitation; but if the hon. gentleman has some very brief statement he wished to make, notwithstanding this fact, I would not want to stand on ceremony. I would sincerely hope however that not very much time would be taken up with it, because the hon. gentleman, if he extended his remarks, would be doing the very opposite of what he is seeking to do. It is very important to the government and to the conduct of business that we get this supply, and get on with the other urgent matters we have to deal with, if we are to finish the session before Christmas.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I think I could have said what I was going to say while the Secretary of State was speaking. However, if he wants to expand slightly on what he said a moment ago, and admit the opposition has been responsible in its actions up to now, I will discontinue my remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will remember—and here perhaps I am breaking the rules myself by referring to the debate on redistribution the other day—that I am one of those who think there ought to be debate in parliament, and I do not regard debate as obstruction. I have not said and I have not thought that, taken by and large in this session of parliament, particularly since we met in September, there has been anything I would be inclined to describe as obstruction.

Mr. Knowles: Send a copy of this Hansard to Keith Davey.

Mr. Aiken: If I would be permitted by the committee to make my point in a brief sentence, I would continue. I merely wanted to say that out of the 26 votes we have had, ten were in connection with supply motions brought on by the government, on which it is the duty of the opposition—

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: The right.

Mr. Aiken: —to move motions of non-confidence; three votes were on bills which we felt were unsatisfactory; five related to the division in the Social Credit party; one was to adjourn the debate and was brought on by the Liberal government; four were on the Speaker's rulings, and three were on the Chairman's rulings. I would not consider these to be endless votes of non-confidence and instances of delay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take only a few minutes of the time of the committee in order to air a grievance or a problem that I have. Quite frankly, I do not know where to go with it, except here. I wish to appeal a decision made by treasury board. I have made inquiries around parliament hill but I really have not found anyone yet who can tell me exactly what a member can do in a situation such as this, where treasury board has made a decision and one wants to appeal it.

This question concerns the raising of the rentals of the crown owned dwellings in the village of Ralston, Alberta. The Department of National Defence, which is indirectly involved in this matter, tell me it is not in their hands at all because there was an order, or a directive which came from treasury board that these rentals should be brought in line with some standard that prevails. I disagree with this standard. In any event, I cannot get any satisfactory answer from the Department of National Defence. The defence research board of the Department of National Defence claim that they are in the same position, that treasury board has issued this directive, or order, and they therefore have no power to rescind it or do anything about it.

This village is some 30 miles from a city. It is therefore that distance from doctors, dentists, markets and most other community services that are right at hand for dwellings inside a city. I think this is something that should be taken into consideration. I wish to put on the record the answer to a question asked about this matter. This answer is to be found in Hansard of June 12, at which time I asked:

> What was the total cost of constructing the crown owned residences in the village of Ralston, Alberta?

The answer was "$1,694,789". The second part of that question was:

> What is the total amount of rent collected on these residences?

The answer I received was "$10,769 per month". I wanted to know what was the total rent collected on these residences from the time they were built, to see whether the government had recovered most of its capital investment through rental. But the government did not answer it in that way, so I had to do some calculating myself. I find that even at the old levels of rent, before the raise came along they were collecting $10,769 a month, as I said, which amounts to about $130,000 a year. I happen to know that many of these residences have been in place and have been earning rent for the government for 13 years or more. At this rental figure it would take almost exactly 13 years for the government to recover all its capital investment in them. Therefore the government had no justifiable reason whatever for increasing the rents effective August 1 this year. In some cases the increase in rental was as much as 94 per cent, all at once. If the government were to tell us how much they have collected in rentals over these years, I think we would see that almost all their investment has been recovered, and they are therefore making what might be termed an unconscionable profit on the rentals now being charged. In spite of this they have raised all the rents. As I said, in one case at least the increase was as much as 94 per cent.

The grievance I have is with treasury board. I appeal to them to rescind this order raising the rentals, because there is no apparent justification for it; and in any event the increase is too much. I also disagree, if that is the right word, with the method used to evaluate what the rentals should be. I am told they sent an inspector from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to assess these buildings and establish a fair rental for them, but he took the general area into consideration. Certainly, if they were in the city of Medicine Hat the rents these people are now charged following the raise would not be more than that being collected commercially, if I may call it that, for houses of the same size and with the same accommodation right in the city. But they are not in the city; they are 30 miles out. I believe that a low rent in this village could be considered as one of the legitimate fringe benefits to people living there who have to commute back and forth 30 miles to doctors, dentists, market facilities and most other community services.

That is all I wish to say on this matter, Mr. Chairman. This is a grievance I have had for the last three or four months, and I seem to run right up against a stone wall in trying to find in the government anyone who will even take this question back to treasury board and have them consider it.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to draw to the attention of the government certain points which, in my opinion, are of vital importance to our areas and eastern Canada.

I would like to draw the attention of the hon. members and of the representatives of the federal Department of Agriculture to very serious problems which I already raised many times during this session. I did say "the representatives of the federal Department of Agriculture"; these hon. members do not realize, it seems, that the onus lies upon them as representatives elected by the people to give to their department instructions which would help to settle the many problems facing farmers in eastern Canada, in my province and in the maritimes, as well as in the eastern part of Ontario.

The house will remember that on October 15 last I made a stand against the millions of dollars lost by our farmers and especially those in the dairy industry in the province of Quebec.

I regret that there are no members of the government from eastern Canada, no responsible ministers in this field now in the house. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) is still absent today and I deplore the fact that the Minister without Portfolio and his parliamentary secretary are also absent.

I especially wish to call the attention of the government on the millions of dollars that farmers in my province and in eastern Canada lose now because the new government policy was put forward too early, was not considered carefully, with the result that at present, our farmers received much less money than last year. Indeed, it should be the reverse as the prices of dairy products are higher than they were last year.

I should like to emphasize another point—and my comments will only take a short time —that is equally important to eastern Canada's agriculturists. I am referring to feed.

It seems to me that since last April, the government has had enough time to draft proper legislation. Besides, legislation had already been drafted by the previous government, which would have been favourable to eastern growers as well as to those in my province.

This question is a very important one. At the present time, the prices of feed are too high. The growers of my province and those of the east cannot make any profits. Therefore, it is the duty of the government to take adequate action as soon as possible.

As I mentioned earlier, I say again that, in my opinion, the Minister of Agriculture could easily draft legislation to authorize farmers, flour mills and co-operatives of eastern Canada to organize themselves into a purchasing board in order to buy the feed they need directly from the Canadian wheat board, so as to secure their supplies at favourable prices during a period of from eight to ten months.

I should also like to call the attention of the government on the point made in their brief by the Cooperative federee and the united farmers of Canada, to the effect that the federal Minister of Agriculture should like the government to consider the matter and submit a report as soon as possible so that when we go back to our respective provinces and ridings, we may tell our farmers that we are looking after their problems.

My third point has to do with a question I put to the Minister of Agriculture last June. When I asked whether the government intended to appoint a vice president within the Farm Credit Corporation, the minister replied that the question was under advisement. The matter has been under consideration since last June and it is well known that the corporation will loan over $100 million to Canadian farmers this year.

In my opinion, the Minister of Agriculture should make such an appointment immediately so that some will look after the interests of Canadian farmers in general.

Since I am on the subject of farm credit, I should like to say a few words in that connection. Last Sunday evening, I listened to a program on television where the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) stated that only 109 loans were granted in the province of Quebec last year.

Subsequently, he asked the people to deny that fact. As a matter of fact, last year, in the province of Quebec, 804 loans were granted for a total amount of $11,434,700. This is a far cry from the 109 loans mentioned by the hon. member for Lapointe.

I should also like to refer to the building of a bridge between Three Rivers and Ste. Angele, in my riding. I hope that the Minister of Transport will soon be in a position to inform the house that the government supports the legislation carried by the Conservative government on March 4, 1963, so as to remove any doubts among my constituents who have been looking forward to the construction of this bridge for several years. It is high time it was built.

The Minister of Transport should necessarily face up to his responsibilities and say: "Well, the bridge will be built."

I would also like to discuss the new legislation granting a $500 premium for housing construction during wintertime. A $500 premium is paid for each dwelling; so if the house includes four units, a $2,000 premium is paid. But when the house has four units and an additional one in the basement, then no premium is paid.

[Mr. Vincent.]

I had understood, as many taxpayers in my constituency did, that the maximum was $2,000 and that if the house being built contained five or six units, the limit was a maximum of $2,000; but after explanations from the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen); we found the situation is entirely different.

If the house being built contains five units, the owner receives absolutely nothing, whereas if the house being built contains four units, the owner will receive $2,000. I wonder whether there would be some means of improving markedly the provisions of that legislation. I am of the opinion it would be wise to allow those persons who build five housing units, one of which is in the basement, to benefit from this maximum premium of $2,000.

The last point I want to raise in this debate on interim supply concerns federal-provincial relations. You recall that, before the election on April 8 of this year, at a time when there was a Conservative government in office in Ottawa, the premier of the province of Quebec delivered an ultimatum. We were not the ones to use that word, the premier himself did in a televised broadcast. As a matter of fact, to a reporter who asked him:

Do you consider that part of your speech on the budget which refers to the increase in tax-sharing to 25-25-100, as an ultimatum?

Mr. Lesage answered yes.

And according to an editorial published last November 23 in La Reforme, the official organ of the Quebec Liberal federation, it was indeed an ultimatum on the part of Mr. Lesage.

Today, we are entitled to ask ourselves whether Mr. Lesage would still have delivered his ultimatum to the federal government, prior to last April 8, if the Liberal party had been in office. As a matter of fact, during the election campaign, they said that the Grits had to be in power in Ottawa and at Quebec. And now that this is exactly the situation in which they find themselves, they feel the ultimatum no longer exists.

It was thought that ultimatum from the province of Quebec was to be taken seriously. But it is found that such is not the case. In fact, if you have a quick look around the house, you will see that the ministers from my province and all the other members, except the few that are here, have probably gone to meet Mr. Lesage to tell him: Do not feel sad, we will maintain at least the prestige of the federal government.

Mr. Chairman, the governments which, before 1940, succeeded each other in the province of Quebec—the Liberal as well as the Union Nationale governments—always fought for the province's autonomy. But, unfortunately, during the war the Liberal government in Quebec and the Liberal government in Ottawa agreed to deprive that province of its taxing powers, while promising to give them back when the war was over.

Afterwards, the Quebec government fought unceasingly to recover its taxation rights yielded to the federal government. We need those fiscal rights because we want to carry through our education system which comes under the sole jurisdiction of the provinces.

We need these taxation rights to look after our highway system which comes under the sole jurisdiction of the provinces.

Moreover, we need these taxation rights because provincial responsibilities are forever increasing. We need the necessary funds to meet our ever increasing responsibilities and fulfil other commitments entered upon in every field.

Before closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to say that several times in this house I heard members make speeches with which I did not agee. But I want every member who sits here, from whatever province he may come and to whatever party he may belong, to be able to talk freely and say what he really thinks.

I listened the other day to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). I liked his speech, not because I accept or approve what he said, but because I saw a member stand up and say what he really thinks. Even if we do not agree with the hon. member, we must act like gentlemen and let him speak freely, and perhaps do the same ourselves later on. I also read the speech which an hon. Liberal member made the other day in Toronto, and though I do not at all agree with what he said, he at least fully expressed his views, and that is what all those who represent various ridings here in this federal parliament, should do. And when we are gentlemanly enough to accept the fact that each hon. member may rise to express his views—in short, speak as he thinks fit—then the dialogue will start and we may say with some truth that in Canada, we are able to know what others think and to express our own thoughts.

Therefore we should stop whining whenever a member from another party and another part of Canada rises to say something with which we may not agree. If he is a member from Quebec, we have something to say about the views expressed by other members, and, if the member is from another province, he may object to our ideas. Well, we want all hon. members to be able to speak freely, and then we shall be able to reply and to air our own views. The only way a democratic parliament can operate is when the elected representatives of the people are able to express themselves as they see fit.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman. However, I shall urge the government carefully to consider the points I raised. First of all, the dairy industry in eastern Canada; then, the prices paid for feed grain by eastern farmers in Canada; third, farm credit, and, more particularly the appointment of a vice president of the Farm Credit Corporation, and the possibility of increasing the loan ceiling so that family corporations may avail themselves of a higher loan limit than the present one of $20,000 or even $27,500; in the fourth instance the Three Rivers bridge. I would like the government to assume its responsibilities in that respect; in the fifth place I mentioned the $500 bonus. And finally I also dealt with federal-provincial relations.

Mr. Chairman, having said this, I shall conclude my remarks by asking this government to consider those six points in view of bringing about considerable improvement in those fields.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, before embarking on the main part of my remarks I want to refer for a moment to the figures which the leader of the N.D.P., the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, put on the record this afternoon. He was speaking about the Liberal promises and was recalling them from memory. I think it was a fairly accurate recollection, but since there has been a complete disregard of the promises which the Liberal party made in the last election campaign with respect to equalization payments I should like to put on the record what the promises were. I am reading from a pamphlet printed by the National Liberal Federation, 251 Cooper Street, Ottawa, entitled: "The Policies of the Liberal Party, General Election, 1963". On page 7 of that pamphlet we find these words under the heading "Equal Partners in Confederation":

> Work well with the provinces. National unity and good government in Canada depend on co-operation between Ottawa and the provinces. The essential foundation for effective co-operation, in all matters of national concern, is full respect for the rights of the provinces in matters within their jurisdiction. All Liberal policies will be carried out with this full respect.
> Provide full equalization of provincial revenues from the tax fields that the provinces share with the federal government.
> This is the only way the provinces can afford similar standards of services, and so provide equality of opportunities for all Canadians. A new Liberal government will make equalization payments which bring the other provinces up to the level of the richest, in revenue per head from shared taxes.

This promise is just one of those several promises which have fallen by the wayside, which were expedient for the Liberal party to make during the election campaign, but which, when it comes to facing the hard facts of reality, and after speaking with the provincial premiers, they have discarded completely.

I asked earlier in the session why there was not some representation for the two northern territories in this federal-provincial conference. It might interest hon. members of the committee to know that the territorial governments signed five-year fiscal agreements which are exactly similar in all respects to the fiscal agreements signed by the federal government with the provinces.

As far as the territorial council of the Yukon is concerned, it is wholly elected and if it does not approve that fiscal arrangement it is not bound to sign it. It has full legislative authority in this regard. A similar situation exists in the Northwest Territories. I asked the acting prime minister yesterday, or the day before, what representation was given to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories at the dominion-provincial conference. He said, as has been said in the past, that the matter was being considered. There is a committee in the Yukon, consisting of three members of the council, which calls itself the advisory committee on finance. The commissioner of the territory, who is a federal civil servant, is required to sit with that committee during the process of preparing the territorial budget. The committee visits Ottawa once a year for the purpose of discussing with federal officials the fiscal affairs of the territory. The federal-provincial conference has made decisions with respect to indian affairs, public works, health and welfare and virtually every federal activity in the provinces and in the territory. I have not heard one member mention today the fact that there are Canadians who live in the north and who contribute to the revenue of this country. It seems to me that in this situation some voice should be heard from the territories before any new tax arrangements are entered into between the federal government and the provinces.

Perhaps through lack of information, perhaps through ignorance of the territories involved, members of this house and of the committee are prone to forget that 40 per cent of Canada's land mass lies north of the 60th parallel and that this is a region from which the federal government derives a substantial revenue. The Yukon, alone, provides 90 per cent of Canada's gold. It is true that much of this revenue finds its way back to the territory by way of provision for the construction of roads, the building of homes for Indians and other federal projects. The fact remains that the territory government is autonomous. It has these democratic institutions set up and has virtually the same legislative powers as the provinces with certain exceptions. One of these lies in the field of natural resources, from which the federal government derives most of its revenue. This is why the federal government has the responsibility and duty to spend money in the north to encourage the development of resources which it owns on behalf of all Canadians. It is no excuse to say that, because the territory comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to at least some extent, it should not be represented at fiscal conferences such as that which has gone on in Ottawa this week. Since the federal government does own these resources it should speak in that capacity in these arrangements with the provinces; and that, I imagine, is what the minister has been doing at this conference. What I am concerned about is that no territorial voice has been heard at the conference to express the northern point of view.

The territorial council in the Yukon unanimously passed a resolution requesting representation at these federal-provincial discussions. I think that was a reasonable request, and the government should have had no difficulty about accepting it. The council did not go as far as to say there should be full representation at the conference. They wanted simply to sit in as observers, so that they could take back their observations to assist them in their deliberations in the territory. This session the council passed a resolution calling for expert assistance from the Department of Labour in connection with matters which were of concern to them in the Yukon. They also passed a resolution calling for assistance from the Department of Transport. The council has repeatedly passed resolutions asking for the extension of the emergency landing strip construction program in the Yukon. They say in their sessional proceedings that the reason continually given by the Department of Transport for not improving these facilities is the cost which would be involved. Surely this could be the subject matter for discussion at a conference of the kind which has been going on this week; it is a subject with which the council is properly concerned.

I express concern about the amount of expenditure of a federal nature which has gone into the northern territories in the past six years, and what is likely to be in the books for the future. I think many Canadians lose sight of the fact that the resources of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories belong to all Canadians. This parliament, because it has direct jurisdiction over the natural resources of these areas, has a responsibility and a duty to spend money for the purpose of developing these northern territories. If this approach is not made, these areas will remain undeveloped in direct proportion to the extent to which the federal government is disinterested in the development of the territory.

Upon returning to the house, after a visit I had made to the Yukon, I read with interest what had been said by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, when introducing his estimates. He indicated that the federal government would in future place much more reliance on private investment for the development of the territories than on a continuing program of development construction. I think this would be a tragic mistake. If the government does not continue the development road program which we instituted in the northern territories, together with the roads to resources program in the northern parts of the provinces, the effect will be to diminish private investment by corporations and others in the north. I obtained from the Minister of Transport an assurance that a new terminal building will be constructed in Whitehorse. This is a good thing. Of course, the decision was made by the previous government, though in a different form. The previous plan was to convert one of the existing hangars in the city. The minister has informed me that the new plan is to construct a new building.

Mr. McIlraith: The cost of conversion was too high.

Mr. Nielsen: I understand the reason why it was too high was because of the requirements, or demands of the Department of National Revenue and its customs and excise branch, as always seems to be the case when that particular department is concerned with public buildings. At any rate, the idea to give us a building is an extremely good one. We were all hoping it could have been constructed during the winter, in order to relieve the unemployment situation in the Yukon.

This is another area in which I think a word or two might be said. We heard all sorts of high flown promises during the last election campaign that unemployment was one of those matters that was going to be cured immediately upon the Liberal government taking office. The 60 days of decision were going to accomplish wonders. In very short order there would be full employment; that is how it was described. There seems to have been some disagreement among certain members of the Liberal cabinet. The Minister of Finance, for instance, said that full employment was not possible and I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the same thing. However, the Prime Minister went across the country saying that this was not an impossible achievement at all and that it would be accomplished. There were statements made by the Secretary of State. Here is one that was reported in Summerside on March 26, 1963 and in Charlottetown on March 27, 1963 in which the Secretary of State said:

> It is the Liberal policy to see that every able person willing to work will have the opportunity to earn a decent living.

That is what he said. Now, in co-operation with the minister of northern affairs several years ago, I developed a program for creating jobs for the Indian people around the Yukon. I am sure all hon. members will agree with me when I say that this is one sector of our population that, instead of having to rely on welfare handouts, deserves job opportunities being created in order that they may keep their self-respect. This program that was developed was a program of slashing timber for rights of way for the construction of new development roads in both territories, I may say.

Now, I received a copy of a letter for which I asked, from the assistant deputy minister of northern affairs, dated August 16, 1963. This is on the deputy minister's stationery and reads as follows:

> Just before leaving Ottawa you inquired about clearing on the Watson lake-Ross river road in the winter of 1963-64.
> The department intends to clear 24 miles between mile 120 and mile 144. As previously, the work will be supervised by the Indian affairs branch and it is expected that about 40,000 man hours of labour will be provided at $1.60 per hour, and that approximately 100 workmen will be required.

It is signed by Mr. Cunningham, assistant deputy minister. I was very happy when I received that letter because it meant that these jobs were going to be made available to people who sorely needed jobs. When I got back to Whitehorse I made an announcement which was published in the press, and the Liberal organization was quite annoyed that a Conservative member had access to this information which, after all, is public. In any event, I understand the minister raised quite a ruckus when he got back to his department, trying to find out who had passed this information on to me. The upshot of this whole thing has been that the program has been cancelled, I understand. I think the reason for its cancellation is simply an endeavour to embarrass me politically, and I feel that is a very sad state of affairs.

A decision was made by the government to go ahead with the slashing program. The announcement was made, and unfortunately it was not made by the minister when he visited the Yukon. As soon as he returned, I discovered that the program had been cancelled. What the minister is doing by cancelling the program is putting 100 men out of work and denying 40,000 man hours of labour to people in the Yukon who sorely need it. It seems to me that this particular project deserves some consideration.

I see the Minister of Transport in his seat and I should like to draw to his attention the proceedings during the last session of the Yukon council during which there was a request for the officials of his department to visit the Yukon for the purpose of sitting down with the council to discuss airport costs. There is the question of lengthening the runways at Mayo, or constructing a new airport there. The huge iron ore holdings of the companies north of Mayo demand that there should be some efficient transportation link set up for the purpose of encouraging that development. It would not need to be restricted to that area, but the whole central portion of the Yukon could be considered because there are potentially rich resources there and there should be an airport of higher standard than the one existing. The excuse the council is always getting from the minister's department is the high cost. They have asked for someone to discuss the problem with them.

I turn now to post offices. This business of employment is a very interesting one. Unemployment was the subject of a hue and cry by the Liberals while they were conducting the last two election campaigns, and it is the subject on which the least amount of effort has been exerted by them during the months they have been in office. Perhaps I am a little unfair there, because there has been some increase in employment, particularly amongst the ranks of the Liberal party and particularly in the Post Office Department. It seems that there has been a rash of appointments and a rash of discharged employees in the post offices across this country. It appears that the purpose of this move is to replace existing office holders who are not Liberal supporters with those who are.

I am very sorry to observe that the fair program of calling for tenders for every mail contract in the last six years in the Yukon has now been discarded. I understand these contracts are being allotted by appointment on the basis of selections made by the government. I think the fair approach would be to call tenders for all of these contracts, so that interested Canadians could bid on them because, after all, they are all taxpayers.

The Chairman: Order; it being five o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day?

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): It is understood, Mr. Speaker, that when the committee resumes later this day it will take up the various estimates of the Minister of Industry and we will not return to this matter. Perhaps I spoke a little hastily when I replied to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills and private bills.

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that this morning I stated that at this juncture of our business I would ask for unanimous consent to proceed with the second reading of Bill S-46, an act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act. Accordingly, by unanimous consent, I would like to move, seconded by Mr. Tardif, that Bill S-46, an act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be now read a second time.

Mr. Knowles: Are copies of the bill available, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent of the house to put this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING QUALIFICATIONS OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-46, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: This catches some of us as a bit of a surprise. Perhaps we could have a very brief explanation—not the kind the Secretary of State would give—a brief one.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a reflection.

Mr. Knowles: Which the minister enjoys.

[Translation]

Mr. Dube: Mr. Chairman, with your consent, I will try to explain Bill S-46 in the shortest possible time.

Bill S-46 is an act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act. Its purpose is to amend the 1954 act, which had itself been amended in 1957. The purpose of Bill S-46 is twofold:

1. To make it easier for the two savings banks concerned to appoint directors;

2. To authorize the two banks concerned to make loans on the security of first mortgages up to 60 per cent, instead of 40 per cent as is the case at the present time.

You will notice in clause 2 of Bill S-46 that the two banks concerned are:

1. The Montreal City and District Savings Bank.

2. The Quebec Savings Bank.

I believe that the explanatory notes on the bill are plain enough with respect to the results ensuing from the proposed amendments.

There are three clauses in the bill which I move tonight.

The first one is to vary the qualifications required from the directors. According to the present legislation, a director must hold $5,000 worth of stock; the purpose of this bill is to replace $5,000 by 500 shares.

The second clause of the bill is to reduce the value of the shares from $10 to $1 a share. Under the present legislation, a director must hold $5,000 worth of stock, that is 500 shares at $10 each. Now, the shares of the two banks in question sell at a price well above $10. As far as the Montreal City and District Savings Bank is concerned, they sell at $160 each, and as regards the Quebec Savings Bank, $74 each; so that according to the present legislation one must be the owner of $80,000 in shares to become a director of the Montreal savings bank and of $35,000 in shares to become a director of the Quebec Savings Bank.

I submit with respect to the members of the house, and to you, Mr. Chairman, that those amounts are too high. Those two banks have directors aged 70 and over. Those men must be replaced by younger directors and you cannot easily find a young man with ability and that kind of money.

So, the combined effect of those two clauses is to reduce those amounts to some $8,000 and $3,500 respectively.

The third clause of this bill is quite simple. Its purpose is to replace 40 per cent by 60 per cent.

In brief, the purpose of those three clauses is this: the first two clauses are to facilitate the election of new directors in the two banks, and the third clause is to authorize those two banks to lend up to 60 per cent of their deposit liabilities.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, could the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Dube) tell us for each of the two banks concerned, what is the number of directors?

Mr. Dube: I regret, but I do not have that information.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting of the house.

BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING CONTROL OVER COMMUNITY ANTENNA

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-30, to amend the Broadcasting Act (community antenna).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill should really be read in connection with my companion Bill C-49, to amend the Radio Act. In the Broadcasting Act as it was enacted and assented to in December, 1958, section 10 gives these objects and purposes:

> The board shall, for the purpose of ensuring the continued existence and efficient operation of a national broadcasting system and the provision of a varied and comprehensive broadcasting service of a high standard that is basically Canadian in content and character, regulate the establishment and operation of networks of broadcasting stations, the activities of public and private broadcasting stations in Canada and the relationship between them and provide for the final determination of all matters and questions in relation thereto.

I would like to turn to section 2(b) where "broadcasting" is defined as follows:

> "broadcasting" means the dissemination of any form of radio electric communication, including radiotelegraph, radiotelephone, the wireless transmission of writing, signs, signals, pictures and sounds of all kinds by means of Hertzian waves, intended to be received by the public either directly or through the medium of relay stations;

I would point out that this amendment would change that definition so that "broadcasting" would have added to it:

> The redissemination for commercial gain of broadcast matter by wired transmission intended to be received by private persons.

The reason for introducing this amendment is that I think the national purposes, the national objects of the Broadcasting Act are beginning to be affected more and more by the growth and development of the community antenna systems, or so-called wired systems. On April 17, 1963, the board of broadcast governors, who had referred to this problem a number of times in its annual report, including a reference on page 19 of its report for 1961-62, issued this press release:

The board has for some months now been concerned with the effect of the distribution of television programs by means of cable systems on the distribution of programs by broadcasting stations. The board's concern centres around the fact that broadcasting stations, as a condition of licence, are directed by law to achieve certain national purposes. Distribution of programs by cable system is not so directed. Thus, if the achievement of national purposes is threatened by the use of cable systems, the board feels it should be in a position to draw attention to the conditions which create a threat and to recommend such action as it deems necessary to the preservation of the achievement of the national purposes.

In order to receive evidence, opinions, arguments and suggestions, the board will hold a public hearing on the general subject of the relationship between the development of wired television systems and broadcasting, and broadcasting policy.

The board seeks representations from broadcasters. An opportunity would be given to operators of wired systems to make representations, if they wish to do so. The board is hopeful that groups of citizens who are neither broadcasters nor operators of wired systems will contribute their opinions on the matters outlined in the notice of hearing.

Because of the vital nature of this hearing in the whole area of serving the national purposes through the broadcast media, the board is making arrangements to have the proceedings transmitted on both radio and television.

I do not even know whether the board had the power, but no one questioned their power. Anyway, they did call these hearings and I will refer to them later. I should like to point out that it has been the custom here for many years to have a special committee on broadcasting. In 1960-61 this committee met. I have in my hand a volume of the evidence—it is very thick—and amongst the evidence heard were representations with regard to wired systems. In the final report of this special committee one of the recommendations made was No. 4, which appears at page 992:

That the governor in council consider the expediency of making reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for the purpose of determining:

(i) the constitutional jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada as to those means of electronic communication known as wired systems;

(ii) and, in the affirmative, whether such wired systems are covered by the word "broadcasting" as presently defined under paragraph (b) of section 2 of the Broadcasting Act, 1958.

At those same hearings there was a report of the committee on wired systems. I may not be completely accurate here, because I have not been able to track it down as yet in the hearings, but as I understand it the members of this committee included the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, the Department of Transport, the members of the board of broadcast governors and members of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. They presented this fairly substantial report which had a number of conclusions, and I would like to put the conclusions on the record. I wish to do so because I think it is necessary at this time, in suggesting this amendment, that the house should know I am not trying to cut the throats of the community antenna people in any way, shape or form. They perform a very real and important function in many parts of the country. I want to come at it from the point of view of the preceding history and the fact that things are changing very rapidly and we need to do something about it. It seems to me that we need to do something about it in terms of the framework of the national purposes which have been the objective of the broadcasting system in Canada since it was developed early in the 1930's—I might point out, by a Conservative government—and have been carried on and confirmed ever since by succeeding governments, royal commissions and committees of the house. These were the conclusions of this special committee on wired systems:

The evidence of the growth of television broadcasting since 1952, the substantial coverage already achieved, and the emergence of "second" television stations suggests that the policies and regulations designed to advance the national purposes have not been seriously inhibiting in their effects. The comparatively small total coverage of wired systems suggests that the service offered by them has not had a significant retarding effect on television broadcasting generally.

This was in 1961:

In some situations community antenna television systems have provided service where television service was not otherwise possible. To the extent that these systems have extended the coverage of Canadian television broadcast services, they have made a positive contribution to the national purpose; and are continuing to do so.

I might say amen to that:

In other situations where they compete with local television broadcasting, they provide alternative viewing by extension of Canadian and U.S. signals. The extension of the reception of U.S. signals does nothing to advance the national purposes. However, the general effect does not appear to have been significantly detrimental to the national purposes. The operations of some broadcasting stations affiliated with the corporation may be less profitable than in the absence of competition from wired systems; and some reduction in the costs of the national public servcie might result from the elimination of the wired system. It might also be easier for the board of broadcast governors to apply its regulations. But it does not seem that these factors are so substantial as to justify a general extension of controls over wired systems, having in mind that regulations similar to those now applying to television broadcasting would prevent any CATV system from carrying signals of U.S. stations. However, in marginal situations, it must be conceded that the introduction or increase in the service of wired systems could prejudice the national purposes required of broadcasting.

My point here is that in 1961 the effect was not considered inhibiting, but it was pointed out that the introduction or increase in the service of wired systems could prejudice the national purposes required of broadcasting. The submission goes on:

It has been pointed out earlier that there is no doubt that some aspects of the operation of CATV systems could be brought under the terms of the Broadcasting Act. (There is some doubt as to whether all aspects of CATV operations could be included). It has also been pointed out that CATV systems are licensed by the Department of Transport.

That is all I wanted to read from this point of view, except the final sentence, which is:

Because of the board's responsibility—

That is, the board of broadcast governors:

—for the national objectives under the Broadcasting Act, and the similarity between the end results (television reception) of television broadcasting and the closed circuit system, the board of broadcast governors should be expected to keep informed on the development of closed circuit systems, and if necessary to report to the minister on their impact on television broadcasting.

This particular committee report also has an appendix A which sets out the commercial broadcasting and receiving stations, the community antenna television systems and the rules and regulations under which they operate. It is my contention that the situation has now been reached where the size of the community antenna television audience is large enough that we need to consider its impact on the national purpose. It is my contention that we should bring it under the definition of broadcasting in the act so we can be sure that in its future extension it does not cripple the present licence holders and the objectives of the national system.

I should like to point out that I specifically say "commercial" in the bill, because there are a great many community antenna television set-ups in Canada that are formed on a co-operative basis or on a non-profit basis, particularly in smaller towns, or they may be provided by companies in company towns to many of the residents of those towns. My specific purpose is to bring under the act the mushrooming development of very strong, powerful, commercial organizations that are beginning to establish community antenna systems very widely, which are promoted well and in such a way that they are getting the kind of response that is digging very strongly into what I conceive to be the national purpose and the effectiveness of the present licence holders of radio and television stations.

I might refer to the promotional material of Lakehead Videon which operates in my own area. They have gone from a very small number of subscribers until they are up in the thousands now. They do a very good job of pushing their service. I have a kind of brochure of theirs here which sets out how cable television works and points out that subscribers can get three extra American channels as a result of their service. They also offer a certain number of specials, such as fights and other sporting events that are available on their service which, as far as I am concerned, extend them beyond just the normal area and turn them into real competitors of the broadcasting stations. I want to make it very clear that the response to Lakehead Videon in my own area is such that it would be very unpopular if any regulation led to the cancelling of the kind of service they are providing. I would be persona non grata. I want to emphasize again that this is not my intention.

I have a Canadian Press report of the meeting of the board of broadcast governors last June which I should like to put on the record, because it is the best summary I have been able to find and encompasses what took place at their meeting. It is found in the Gazette of June 5, 1963 and reads as follows:

Public and private broadcasters sided together Tuesday before the board of broadcast governors in expressing fears of a potential threat to their existence in the event of the development of closed circuit pay T.V. on a national scale.

"They're five feet high and risin'," said R. C. Fraser, C.B.C. vice president for corporate affairs, of the recent growth of community antenna (cable) systems in Canada.

Added Spencer Caldwell, president of the rival privately owned C.T.V. Television Network Limited: "There is a possibility that if cable T.V. reached such proportions that it reduced our revenues and ratings, it would make it difficult for us to achieve our national purpose as broadcasters."

In reply, F. T. Metcalfe of Guelph, Ont., president of the national community antenna television association, said: "Basically, the real threat to a national purpose in broadcasting is that the Canadian viewer wants a choice of service".

He contended that in effect, most of Canada's 322 community antenna systems serving some 200,000 households are only a superior aerial service, making possible improved reception of Canadian and U.S. signals. They were not in competition with broadcasters.

The public session was called by the B.B.G. to give persons associated with the broadcasting industry an opportunity to air opinions about the relationship of wired systems with licensed television stations.

B.B.G. vice chairman Carlyle Allison said the broadcasting industry's concern is with the future extension of wired systems to "the possible detriment of what is called 'free television'." The B.B.G. did not intend to make a recommendation to the transport minister following the hearing, he said, but would provide a summary of opinions expressed so the government itself could determine whether any further actions is required.

The broadcasters differed in their specific recommendations but all were agreed in essence that the possible linkage of community antenna systems into what in effect would be a closed circuit national network would pose a serious threat to them.

I will not go on with the points that were made. It seems to me that is a fairly good summary. I should like to refer to some missionary work that was done by the president of the national community antenna television association of Canada, Mr. Metcalfe. I have been in touch with him, have been interviewed by him and have had a number of letters from him. One of the points he made to me was that I was carrying a torch for the private broadcasters and he thought this was a most retrograde step for a person identified with my particular party. I want to make it perfectly clear I do not feel like carrying a torch for the private broadcasters, except in the sense that if we in parliament set up a licensing and regulating authority, force some persons to operate under it and then by not acting allow some other kind of agency operating in the same field to come in and undercut the persons we have charged a licence fee and whom we require to do certain things, I think we have a responsibility to look at the situation and see whether it is on all fours with simple equity. It is in this sense that I have brought forward the bill.

Mr. Greene: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. Has the hon. member considered, or can the authorities he cited earlier answer the question whether or not redissemination for purely intraprovincial purposes is within the federal ambit of legislation, or is this not purely a provincial matter if it is within a province?

Mr. Fisher: This is brought up in a number of places in the literature I have, and I am not going to go into it because as far as I am concerned it is a morass. For example, as I understand the situation the Telemeter subscription system in Etobicoke would not be affected by this particular change in the act. My point is that what would be brought under the act by my amendment would be any system operated for a profit that took out of the air Hertzian waves and rebroadcast them to wired sets in homes. That is as far as I want to go with respect to the point the hon. gentleman raised. There are some differences of opinion, and perhaps the minister who speaks for the government in this regard may be able to clear them up.

Finally, in relation to Mr. Metcalfe and the national community antenna television association, I want to say that they made a very good case in the brief they presented to the board of broadcast governors that they should not be put under the act and under the control of that board. Personally I do not feel their case is good enough. I think that the extension, particularly in terms of the skill and the capital they have behind them, is such that the thing is really going to become sweeping. I know, for example, that the owner of the Montreal Alouettes, Mr. Workman, intends to get into this field—I believe he is already in it in order to push his football games and other sporting events. I know that at the present time there is a set-up in Toronto for the rebroadcasting of certain hockey games which may be extended. I feel that this bill would not apply to the telecasting of Montreal Alouette games by means of a wired system, as long as the actual picture presented is not taken off something which is sent out by means of the so-called Hertzian waves. I know from contacts I have had that the wired systems are growing in number very quickly. It is only logical to assume that in the very near future they will be in a position to provide what is in effect a network. I am not concerned, and I do not think other members should be, over the kind of financial set-up they may have or how they extend their system. But when you have in effect a system which is competing in the same kind of programming with the licensed stations and with our national corporation, it seems to me it is time we acted.

It was more in the spirit of encouraging the government to accept what I think is their responsibility than with any intent to create havoc among the community antenna people that I brought forward this bill and a sister or brother bill to amend the Radio Act. If the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) would care to make a comment from the point of view of the attitude of the government on this question, I am sure not only I but everyone in broadcasting would be very interested in his remarks.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much time in what is an hour which I think should be properly devoted to members of the house who do not sit on the treasury benches, but the hon. gentleman has invited me to express a view and I feel that this is a matter of very grave national importance.

In the 1920's when radio broadcasting began to grow in this country it was the view of the government of that day, a view shared in the early thirties by the Conservative government which succeeded the government in office in the twenties, that radio broadcasting could have such an important influence upon our country that it was a matter of major concern to Canada, our being, as we were then and still are, a country with a population about one tenth that of the country to the south of us. The governments of those days felt it was important that radio broadcasting should therefore be Canadian.

I do not think that importance has diminished one whit with the years. We have taken the view about private corporations that broadcast as the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) has indicated, that they must be licensed by the public authority. We have also taken the view that they must be owned predominantly by Canadians, and I think that that is the right view to take. I do not think that anyone in this house of any party would seriously argue that there should be allowed to take place any development that it is within the power of this parliament to control or to legislate about, which would indirectly undermine what has over a period of 40 years—indeed, ever since the beginning of broadcasting, or licensed broadcasting, assumed any real importance in our community life—been regarded as a matter of national importance, a matter perhaps affecting the very existence of our country as a separate entity. With television, of course, I think the influence is far more pervasive.

This community antenna system has many things to commend it. I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Port Arthur that a community antenna system which merely provides better reception for broadcasting in any given area is highly to be commended, and perhaps it is the only way that many communities in this country which are somewhat remote and isolated, particularly in constituencies like those represented by the hon. member himself and by me, can expect to get good reception.

But it is quite another matter if a system is to be created which can do indirectly what we do not permit broadcasters themselves to do directly. If community antennae are to be put up in places like Winnipeg and Vancouver for the purpose of bringing in United States stations which would not be allowed to broadcast in Canada, then it seems to me it is perfectly clear that the intent of parliament, which I believe must have influenced every successive government which believed in the view that it is the intent of the Canadian people, is thereby being circumvented.

In the few months I have been a minister I have taken a very serious view of this problem, as has my colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. McIlraith) as well. At the present moment, or almost at the present moment because this morning I read one of the papers on the subject in the few minutes I had before coming into the house, we are giving very careful consideration to recommendations which we feel we ought to bring before our colleagues as to possible courses of action in this field. I have not, and neither has the Minister of Transport, had the time or the opportunity yet to discuss this matter with my colleagues. Therefore I am not attempting, and it would be wrong for me to attempt, to indicate what disposition the government feels it should make of this matter or what disposition it feels it should ask parliament to make.

I have the impression—this is one reason the hon. gentleman has, of course, introduced the bill—that there must be some amendment to the law, if there is to be any kind of effective control of competition of a kind which would not be permitted by broadcasters themselves, Canadian broadcasters, in this field. It seems to me that it is very likely that there will have to be legislation of that sort; but precisely what form it ought to take, how far it should go, and so on, is something which it would be very presumptuous of me, with the rather scanty information I have on the subject, to attempt to say at this stage. However, I have no hesitation in saying that the position of this government, and I hope it is the position of the whole house, is perfectly clear—that we intend to do everything we can to see that broadcasting remains substantially, to the greatest degree we can reasonably make it, Canadian.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, along with the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) I have been a member of the broadcasting committee, and I think this was one of those points on which the hon. gentleman and I were in accord without too much difficulty during the hearings of that committee. Over the past years I had a considerable amount to do with broadcasting, in my position of parliamentary secretary to the minister of national revenue; and this matter was one which exercised me a good deal.

It has been suggested that the Broadcasting Act and the Radio Act were not sufficiently broad in their wording to include what is really known as broadcasting by wired systems. With all due respect to the hon. gentlemen who held that view, I felt there was a very strong argument that the act as presently designated covers the subject matter. It will be remembered that the question of federal jurisdiction over broadcasting was referred to the supreme court many years ago and the reference at that time included dissemination by means of Hertzian waves. If we look at the act itself, at section 2(b) we find a definition of broadcasting given. Since "broadcasting" includes the dissemination of any form of radio electric communication intended to be received by the public either directly or through the medium of relay stations, I think there is a highly arguable case for the contention I am now putting forward. In line 2 of paragraph (a) of clause 2 of the bill, after the words "radio electric communication" the text goes on to say: "including—" —that does not mean including exclusively; it means "including"—"radio telegraph, radio telephone, the wireless transmission of writing, signs, signals, pictures and sounds of all kinds by means of Hertzian waves intended to be received—", and so on. Notwithstanding a good deal of argument to the contrary, I have not been persuaded that my interpretation of the act in this regard is entirely wrong.

Mr. Fisher: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he not agree that up to the present time both the broadcasting industry and the sponsors of community antennae have taken the attitude that the definition does not cover these systems?

Mr. Lambert: In that regard, I know the advice given to various bodies has raised some doubt about whether they are covered. Without telling tales out of school I think it would be fair to say that the board of broadcast governors, who are concerned about this matter, felt it might be unwise for them to embark upon a program of controlling this form of broadcasting activity only to find, perhaps after having been taken to court, that they had no authority to do so. I suggest it is for that reason they have not acted. This is a lawyer's law. As long as it does not hurt anyone too much, it is difficult to get an amendment passed.

If this proposal were to be acted upon now, I would be in favour of it. I am fully in favour of what the hon. member has proposed, and I think the Secretary of State, too, is ad idem with the hon. member. It has been the purpose of the Broadcasting Act and of all parliaments since the 'thirties, emphasized and underlined by successive royal commissions and governments, both Liberal and Conservative, that there should be no division in this regard and that broadcasting is to be the subject of a definite aim. We have a national broadcasting policy outlined in the Broadcasting Act which prescribes the duties of the board of broadcast governors on the one hand and of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the other. As to the proposition put forward with regard to these isolated areas, these community areas where the system proposed would ensure a clear signal to those with television sets, that is all right. But even now—and I could cite cases—applications to build a reception tower with a microwave relay to another tower for dissemination thereafter by cable must be submitted under the Radio Act to the Minister of Transport, and there is an informal reference to the board of broadcast governors. There is already partial control but it is not as overt as it should be.

What is the danger about informal broadcasting? It is, really, what I consider to be the possibility of creating glorified satellites of United States stations along the southern border of our country. We have set up regulations which govern the operation of our Canadian systems. These look to the financial stability of applicants. Licences are withheld or deferred on the basis of economic considerations. Yet if it is permitted to establish without restraint wire systems which are, in effect, satellites of non-Canadian stations we would be defeating the whole purpose of our broadcasting policy. I know there are some of these so-called wire systems which are really baby stations. At certain periods during the day they introduce news broadcasts and sports broadcasts into their program schedules. Where does one stop? One might then introduce local programs.

Mr. Fisher: And commercials.

Mr. Lambert: Yes. The hon. member for Port Arthur says you begin to slip in the odd commercial. This is natural and you would then have a baby station operating without any control.

I, myself, think such stations must be brought under supervision of the board of broadcast governors. I would have hoped to see this done earlier, because millions of dollars have already been invested in this direction and if action is deferred too long the situation becomes set, economically. Suppose legislation is then introduced to bring these wire systems under the control of the board of broadcast governors. There may be good reason why some of them should be eliminated; yet this could not be done because to take action would be to operate to the detriment of a business established quite legally under the law as it existed.

However, as I say, my view is that the board of broadcast governors already has power in this regard under the interpretation I have placed upon the act. Perhaps the quickest way to solve this difficulty would be for the board to act on one of these cases —to have one of these companies summoned to court to show cause. This might be quicker than trying to get the government to amend the act. I do not know. But with the purpose or objective of this bill I am in full accord, though I hope action can be taken without the formality of making an amendment at this stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I must say to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) that, personally, I do not share at all his opinion with regard to his proposed object in introducing this bill.

Those sections which complement Bill C-49 are very short; indeed, it is not a question of changing the definition of the term "broadcasting", but only of giving it a broader sense. However, I believe that this bill could seriously affect a very great number of T.V. viewers.

This proposed amendment of the Broadcasting Act and Radio Act will result in placing T.V. community aerials systems or other similar operations under the control and supervision of the board of broadcast governors, if I understand the explanatory notes accompanying the bills.

Personally, I feel that the board has enough authority as it is, and that it should not be allowed to interfere in a field which is not its concern, especially in view of the nature of this system and of the service it renders.

In addition, I truly fear for the freedom of viewers who can now select the program or channel of their choice. Indeed, under Department of Transport regulations, licenses are issued only for systems which meet the technical and mechanical requirements concerning, for instance, the height and location of antennas, the type of cable used, the territory served, and the signals which are received and transmitted.

Mr. Speaker, I also feel that the result of those regulations is to restrict the broadcasting of television programs by cable to the waves that can already be received in a given area through proper equipment or antenna.

It is essential, of course, that regulations should be applied to ensure the orderly and proper operation of this system.

In order to be in a position to decide whether it is advisable or necessary to pass this legislation, it would be necessary to know something about the services rendered by this system and the part it plays in the broadcasting of programs.

At present, television signals are picked up by two mediums in areas more or less distant from broadcasting stations; first of all, through the adjunction of one or several individual antennas, which is the first and only method possible in many areas. Generally, this method is rather costly for the owners of television sets. In addition, it involves a great deal of inconvenience, without ensuring an adequate reception in spite of the high standard of the receiving set or of the broadcasting stations.

On the other hand, a group of individuals or a corporation may set up at a location that lends itself to the reception of waves, a tower or powerful community antenna that would surely be more costly, but the cost of which could be divided among all users. They would thus be assured of a much better reception from distant or low-power stations, as well as of a wider variety of programs.

In short, this is only an extension of the usual antenna, except that a main antenna is located in a place where reception is better and where interference is reduced to a minimum.

This antenna, as any another ordinary antenna, can only pick up signals which can already reach a given area. It neither reduces nor adds anything to the broadcast, it does not alter in any way the waves which are merely picked up and retransmitted. It is an absolutely passive element which moreover does not interfere in the public field.

It can be claimed, that in such a case, the need has created the means.

Some ten years ago, there were few, if any, such organizations in this country.

Today, there are more than 300, with an average of 800 subscribers for every system. A total of 240,000 homes, that is about a million people, are served by such systems.

And more than half of those systems operate in the province of Quebec.

I remember that about ten years ago, more particularly in the eastern townships, we had to set up expensive individual antennas, which frequently did not work because of storm damage, on account of the distance from Montreal, for topographical reasons or due to the mountains around us. In fact, we were getting better pictures from stations on the other side of the border, in the United States, and I think that this was the case of all areas near the American border.

Now, thanks to that system, we are able to watch Canadian stations, and more particularly those of Montreal, which was formerly impossible.

And we now have a choice between two fine relay systems, and can enjoy television of a quality we never knew before.

Those systems are appreciated by all their users. They supply us with very high-grade television at a very reasonable rate and they enable us to watch Canadian programs in our district, which are generally excellent, even if there is room for improvement.

The subscribers have a diversified choice and are completely free to watch whatever program they like.

The local broadcasting stations have no reason to fear such a system, for it multiplies the number of telespectators and thus increases the audience which can enjoy its favourite programs.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that any additional regulations would be unnecessary and unwelcome. It might interfere with the liberty of the individual, who wants to be able to choose whatever program he pleases.

Mr. Speaker, I see that it is six o'clock. I had several things to add. I hope that I will be able to continue my remarks if and when Bill C-49 comes before the house.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; it being six o'clock, I must advise the house that the hour for consideration of private members' business has expired. Since the business for this evening will be the consideration of the estimates for the Department of Industry, would the house agree to go into committee of supply now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; house again in committee of supply on the estimates of the Department of Industry.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY

1d. Departmental administration, $665,000.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the last time the estimates of the Department of Industry were under consideration it was suggested that a statement would be made by the Minister of Industry on the various activities with which he was charged, covering all of them; that this might well be followed by general statements by hon. members on all of these activities; and this would be followed by a detailed examination of the estimates of each of the several departments in the order I indicated.

The order I suggested was first the Department of Industry, then atomic energy, then the Department of Defence Production, the national research council and finally the department of public printing and stationery. I have made some remarks regarding the Department of Industry and regarding atomic energy, and this evening I will speak on the activities of the Department of Defence Production, the department of public printing and stationery, and finally the national research council.

Under the provisions of the Defence Production Act the Minister of Defence Production has exclusive authority to buy or otherwise acquire the defence supplies required by the Department of National Defence. Although the Department of Defence Production was itself established in 1951, the government's policy under which defence procurement is undertaken by a separate civilian agency dates back to the early days of world war II. As I pointed out to the special committee on defence on July 30, at that time—> —the Canadian government decided the procurement of goods and services required for defence purposes would be under the control of a separate civilian organization staffed by people who, through experience, had become experts in the purchasing field. This permits the Department of National Defence to concentrate on military functions and, through unified buying procedures, tends to reduce the costs and bring the taxpayer the best possible value for the dollars that are spent on defence material.

This responsibility for the procurement of defence supplies is of very great importance. However, there are other additional responsibilities which are of almost equal significance. My department has the responsibility for defence development and production sharing with the United States, defence export activities with other friendly countries, and the co-ordination of Canadian activities in connection with the research, development and production program of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

In addition the government has adopted certain recommendations of the royal commission on government organization in respect to the establishment of a central purchasing agency to serve all departments and agencies, both civil and military, of the federal government, other than commercially oriented crown corporations, and also in respect to the transfer of certain responsibilities of the department of public printing and stationery. These decisions are of great importance to the Department of Defence Production, and I shall deal with these matters in greater detail later on.

As will be seen from the estimates which have been tabled, the most significant increase over the 1962-63 estimates is found under vote 25 covering development sharing. The purpose of vote 25 is to sustain technological capability in Canadian defence industry by supporting selected defence development programs. This has stimulated development activity to a marked degree. It has resulted too in other benefits such as maintaining capabilities and putting the companies in a position to obtain work in related fields. Initial sales of doppler navigation equipment, sonobuoys, Caribou STOL aircraft and turbo aircraft engines, for example, indicate yield ratios of 10 to one in dollars spent for development to export sales received. One project, which was assisted financially to the extent of approximately $1 million, has accomplished $30 million in defence sales.

Another item which I have mentioned is the Canada-U.S. defence production sharing program. This has resulted in 4½ years of useful activity in Canadian industry. This program, in essence, aims at optimum mutual utilization of the Canadian and U.S. defence industrial capability. Arrangements include providing equal opportunity for Canadian industry to participate with U.S. industry on the competitive bases of price, delivery and technical competence to meet North American defence requirements.

Sustained effort in the past four years by both governments and their defence industries has resulted in such major achievements as the exemption of certain Canadian defence material under the provisions of the buy American act, the duty free entry of such material into the United States, and increasing response of Canadian industry to United States defence procurement opportunities. Defence development and production sharing ramifications have become widespread throughout Canadian industry, and a large proportion of Canadian research and development capability is oriented towards United States and mutual defence requirements.

In terms of Canadian industrial activity generated by the program, the total of United States defence production sharing business placed with Canadian companies in the 4½ years to the end of June 1963, amounted to about $657 million. For the last full calendar year, 1962, this business totalled about $254 million. This was a 75 per cent increase over 1961, due largely to contracts for Caribou aircraft and a contribution by the United States to the joint Canada-U.S. F104G aircraft program. On the other hand, Canadian defence production sharing business in the United States amounted to some $127 million in 1962. The total for the 4½ years of the program is about $574 million. While the balance of production sharing business between Canada and the United States had been some $47 million in favour of the United States at the beginning of 1962, it had at least temporarily reversed by the end of June, 1963, to about $83 million in Canada's favour. This achievement of mutually advantageous reciprocal procurement I consider to be very worth while indeed. Over 300 Canadian companies have received contracts since this program began, and the achievements of some of these companies is a clear indication that participation in the United States defence market is of outstanding benefit. I feel that Canadian industry deserves great credit for its efforts in this regard.

Both the Canadian and United States governments have recognized that Canada's ability to participate in future defence industrial production programs would be lost without continuing research and development projects in Canada, and the future role of Canadian defence industry would therefore be confined to the production of the more simple items of hardware. As a consequence, our ability to contribute to equipment programs for the defence of North America would be seriously weakened. Since 1959 substantial sums have been provided to assist Canadian companies to undertake development projects for both United States and other allied programs. As a result, a significant amount of research and development work has been stimulated in Canadian industry. Since 1959 to the end of August, 1963, a total of some 130 development sharing projects valued at about $76 million have been initiated in Canadian industry with funding support from the government, Canadian industry and other governments. Of this total, Canadian government support from vote 25 amounts to $32 million. Clearly there is now a greatly increased awareness in Canadian industry of the need to undertake research and development activities. To further reinforce this development sharing activity the United States secretary of defence and I have this month signed a memorandum of understanding in the field of co-operative development between our two departments.

My department's efforts in the development field are co-ordinated with the defence industrial research program which was initiated in 1961 by the defence research board. This program represents another step forward in our efforts to maintain Canadian scientific skills, and to ensure that the results of government defence research are made available to Canadian industry so that our industry can participate more effectively in the development and supply of defence equipments needed by the United States and other allies.

In concluding my remarks on production and development sharing, I want to emphasize the importance that is attached to this program of co-operation by ourselves and by the United States government. I refer to my report to the house on June 7, following my meeting with the United States secretary of defence, when I said in part:

> Our meeting was held in a spirit of great cordiality and reaffirmed positively the intention of both our countries to continue to support a defence production sharing program. Assurances were given that the difficulties experienced by both countries in respect of balance of payments problems should not be allowed to interfere with the continuation and enlargement of this program—
> The maintenance of a general balance of our reciprocal cross-border procurement of equipment seems the best answer to concern at the drain on foreign exchange reserves through such procurement.
> For the future, as in the past, Canada expects to procure from United States defence industry those items which it does not make economic sense to try to produce in Canada. In return we look to continuing opportunities for Canadian industry to supply United States defence requirements where Canadian companies can compete on the basis of price, quality and delivery.

I should now like—

Mr. Fisher: May I ask the minister a question, Mr. Chairman? Will the minister have any time in the course of his remarks to speak to a program such as the Bobcat or our aircraft production, in terms of the difficulties of obtaining any defence sharing arrangement with the United States, so that they take some of our goods?

Mr. Herridge: We want to hear about the Port Arthur bobcat.

Mr. Drury: It was not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to cover those particular topics in these general remarks; but if there is interest in them, I will be very glad to report later on. I should now like to review the departmental role in the NATO program of co-operation in research, development and production and in the field of overseas defence export activity generally.

Unilateral weapon development is gradually becoming a thing of the past in most countries and this trend has a particular and critical significance for Canada. Our defence industrial planning must, therefore, to an increasing degree take into consideration foreign as well as Canadian military requirements and must be harmonized with defence development and production plans of NATO and other allied countries. Today, more than ever before, national efforts to participate in defence production programs of other countries are being intensified and international collaboration in defence research, development and production is possible only where appropriate government to government arrangements are established within which sales activity on the part of industry can achieve positive results. The primary role for government in this field is, therefore, development of bilateral, trilateral or multilateral arrangements based on specific areas of national technical capability which can be utilized to meet common requirements.

In planning the current re-organization of the department, careful attention has been given to the establishment of a management group which can provide effective central direction of our over-all department defence export activities as they relate to United States and other NATO and allied countries. While the Canadian Commercial Corporation has played a valuable part in these departmental activities, its function has been gradually assumed over the years by the Department of Defence Production. Complete integration of the working staff of this crown corporation into the department has now become essential. Accordingly, arrangements are in hand toward implementation of the recommendation of the royal commission on government organization that management and staff for activities of the corporation be provided by the Department of Defence Production.

A new international programs branch is being established to consolidate these activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation with the staff co-ordination work of our United States and overseas divisions and thus to provide effective guidance and control of all of these elements of our departmental defence export activities within a single branch.

My department is responsible for co-ordination of Canadian activities within the NATO program of co-operation in defence research, development and production and provides the Canadian representative on the NATO armaments committee which administers the program. Arrangements are now in hand for strengthening this representation.

Canada has submitted for consideration by NATO groups a number of projects in the aircraft, armament and electronics fields. Canadian aircraft and electronics firms have submitted design proposals in response to specific NATO requests. There has been a broadening of the exchange of information on national research, development and production programs. As a concrete result of our active participation in the NATO armaments committee, and on the invitation of Canada and the United States, four other NATO countries are participating in a co-operative research and development program on a counter mortar radar being developed by a Canadian firm. A Canadian-Norwegian plan for joint production of our combined requirements of the M72 light anti-tank rocket has been approved as a NATO program. Other NATO countries have been invited to consider participation in the Canada-United Kingdom joint development of a short range surveillance system using an unmanned aerial vehicle known as the CL-89.

May I restate the responsibilities of the Minister of Defence Production as being, first, to procure the goods and services required by the Department of National Defence and, second, to ensure that the necessary production capacity is available in Canada to support our defence production program. These responsibilities form the basis for our over-all departmental defence export activities which include the defence development and production sharing program with the United States, armament co-operation within NATO, and bilateral defence production arrangements with NATO and other allied countries.

The increasing tendency toward complexity and high cost in weapon development and production make it essential that every avenue of co-operation with our allies be explored in efforts to make the most effective use of our respective national resources in terms of funds, manpower and technological capabilities. At the same time we cannot overlook the benefit to the Canadian economy of performance in Canada to the greatest extent possible of the research, development and production associated with advanced weapon technology.

There are two additional matters which already have been of great importance to the Department of Defence Production and which will no doubt be of even greater significance in the future. These are, first, the recommendations of the royal commission on government organization and, second, the establishment of the new Department of Industry.

The royal commission on government organization, better known as the Glassco commission, included in its report the following recommendations, in addition to that already mentioned in respect of the Canadian Commercial Corporation:

That a central purchasing agency be established to serve all departments and agencies, both civil and military, of the federal government other than commercially oriented crown corporations.

That the Department of Defence Production be renamed the department of purchasing and supply and its responsibility be extended to include procurement for civilian departments and agencies.

That the new department of purchasing and supply be given the responsibility in conjunction with user departments and agencies for developing standard specifications for all appropriate items.

That the department of purchasing and supply develop warehousing, stocking and materials handling services across Canada for all departments other than the Department of National Defence and that a traffic advisory group be established within the new department with the responsibility of improving traffic management throughout the public service.

These and other recommendations of the Glassco commission, with the exception of the renaming of the department, have been adopted by the government, and the Department of Defence Production is now making plans for the implementation of such recommendations.

Among the other recommendations of the Glassco commission was also one which advocated the division of the department of public printing and stationery into two independent units, one to be absorbed by the proposed central purchasing agency which I have just mentioned and the other to be headed by a queen's publisher.

The government has chosen this recommendation as one of the first to be implemented and since August 21 the control of the procurement, purchasing and stores branch, the production branch and certain other of the branches of the department of public printing and stationery has been the responsibility of the Department of Defence Production.

The queen's printer is directly responsible to me in my capacity as Minister of Industry for the publication and distribution of government documents. I consider these changes to be a significant move in line with the recommendations of the royal commission.

The proposed role of the queen's publisher involves questions of some technical complexity as well as considerations of a policy nature. This matter is now under consideration.

I should now like to outline a few of the considerations relating to the national research council. The functions of the national research council cover four broad areas:

1. To advise the government on the position of science as a whole;

2. To promote and encourage research in the universities;

3. To operate a system of laboratories directed toward fundamental science and toward applied science in fields which fall outside the specific responsibilities of other government departments and agencies;

4. To promote research in industry through the industrial research assistance program, and to give assistance through the technical information service.

In order to keep pace with its increasing responsibilities, the council has developed a continually expanding group of committees for the purpose of co-ordinating research and the various aspects of technology. At the present time the membership of such committees is approximately 3,400, drawn from the national research council itself, other federal government organizations, provincial organizations, Canadian industries and universities. This committee structure has had a most important effect on Canadian scientific co-ordination. With the expansion of research in industry it becomes particularly important to co-ordinate research undertaken by various organizations, and to make certain that all interested parties are aware of what others are doing, in so far as this may be feasible without interfering with commercial secrecy or competitive advantage.

The research council is also actively concerned with international science and, particularly in recent times, this has begun to impinge more extensively on international affairs than formerly. There are two aspects of international science: First, the benefit which Canada can obtain through her contacts with other scientific groups and, second, the co-operation which can be extended in large international undertakings such as the international geophysical year, the year of the quiet sun, the coming hydrologic decade, all of which have yielded and will continue to yield important and useful results to all participating countries and indeed to the whole world.

To meet its obligations to foster research in Canadian universities increased expenditure will be necessary, and this can be expected to increase steadily for the foreseeable future. The graduate student population of the universities is increasing about 20 per cent per annum, and since a significant percentage of national research council grants supports these students, directly or indirectly, and since science is becoming more and more complex, requiring more expensive instrumentation, an increase of a minimum of 20 per cent is necessary merely to maintain the same level of research as that of the past fiscal year. The N.R.C. grants give university staff members an opportunity to pursue their research and to inspire an increasing number of students to proceed to advanced studies. Canada enjoys a high reputation in world science despite the fact that her expenditure on civilian science is low compared with that of most other advanced nations. In a world in which science plays a dominant role research will need increasing support if Canada is to achieve a competitive position.

The medical research council is continuing to operate as an autonomous body within the administrative framework of the national research council. It is the primary aim of the medical research council to promote the broad field of medical research in Canadian universities and their affiliated hospitals and institutes. It provides grants in aid of research projects carried out by established investigators, and as well personnel support in the form of associateships for highly qualified research workers, and fellowships for young doctors wishing to advance their research training and to provide the essential personnel for an expanding medical research program so essential for our welfare.

Increasing demands have been made on the N.R.C. applied laboratories for the benefit of Canadian industry, and over the past years the laboratories have been of assistance to many segments of industry, including the aircraft, construction, chemical, electronics and food industries, and further facilities are necessary to meet some of the demands. A new supersonic wind tunnel is nearing completion and will provide an additional facility for the aircraft industry.

The national research council library provides an important service to all segments of Canadian science, and it is being used extensively by universities and industry, and has been recognized as the major science library of Canada.

[Mr. Drury.]

With respect to industry, the research council devotes its attention mainly to secondary industry, since the primary industries are assisted to a large extent by other government department and agencies, for example, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Forestry and the Department of Fisheries.

In the previous fiscal year, the council undertook a program to assist research in industry. This program was in effect during the latter part of the fiscal year only, but the projects initiated will, in practically all cases, be continued for the full current fiscal year. As a result of this the new applications anticipated, a substantial increase in the vote is necessary if the program is to be continued at an effective level.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at length at this particular stage of the discussion of the estimates, but from considerable experience in the House of Commons I realize that it is necessary to record dissent at certain times; otherwise later on someone will rise and say that no one objected to a certain course of action, and we will be pursuing the matter again. Therefore I now record my dissent to this method of dealing with a large number of estimates under the Department of Industry. I understand the circumstances which have brought this about, but I want to make it clear that in the next session of parliament we would ask for the estimates under this minister to be taken in a different way. Rather than have a comprehensive statement by the minister covering the five or six areas for which he is responsible, we would prefer to revert to the practice which has prevailed in the past of taking these matters separately, so that debate on each area of responsibility is related directly to the estimates under consideration. We are in some difficulty here tonight. Various hon. members may wish to speak on any one of these half dozen items and we may get the debate rather mixed up, just as the minister's statement was a cumulative effort.

The reason we are going to be helpful to the minister is simply because we know that on interim supply which was in front of us today, the government is requesting money for the ninth month in the fiscal year. In other words, three quarters of the total amount of money required to operate government institutions and efforts will be voted by the house through the method of interim supply. It is rather pointless then to deal with the estimates item by item, scrutinizing every single dollar of expenditure, when nine twelfths already has been expended.

The other consideration is that as a responsible official opposition we are interested in bringing this session to a close before the Christmas recess. We are not taking the attitude or the stand which was taken by the irresponsible official opposition of last year which refused to pass a single estimate of the estimates which were placed before it. So in that co-operative mood, all I am doing now is making sure that our position in the next session will not be misunderstood, and we would ask at that time that the Minister of Industry deal with his estimates for the Department of Industry and let the house comment on them, then move on to defence production with appropriate comments, and then the other items which he has under his authority.

Let me say I fully appreciate his difficulties. He has so many departments or crown companies to supervise that he is a thoroughly overburdened minister of the crown. I went through that myself, Mr. Chairman, with the duties of atomic energy, national research council, medical research council, at one time Eldorado, over and above the Department of Trade and Commerce. Superimposed on that were my government house leader duties, and I have forgotten what other problems were shifted to my shoulders. So I sympathize with this minister who has obviously become the workhorse of the present Liberal government.

So far as the Department of Industry is concerned, the estimates there are the only ones which are new, brought in by way of a supplementary estimate. We presented in this house our objection to the setting up of that Department of Industry. We had rather an extensive debate on it at the time, and we are still not very happy with regard to that arrangement. A very prominent businessman suggested to one of my colleagues the other day that the minute we again resume office —and he is a Liberal and anticipates this event—we should abolish the Department of Industry and put the field it encompasses back where it belongs, under the Department of Trade and Commerce; so we will take that under advisement.

As I say, some of our members will be speaking about the Department of Industry. I thought the minister should have continued immediately with defence production when he had finished with his department, but he interposed the atomic energy field between those two and then came along with national research. It is unfortunate to mix them up like this. If I get the opportunity later this evening, I may have something to say with regard to atomic energy and national research, and I will particularly ask the minister some questions with regard to those fields of activity. With regard to the medical research council, he might as well have ready an answer to the question whether or not he is going to bring in legislation next session concerning the council, because that was one of the plans we had under way. We have been given a mixed bag to deal with. I do not intend at this stage to talk about these things seriatim. I merely indicate and record permanently on record in Hansard my dissent from this method of dealing with these estimates.

Mr. Fisher: There are a number of items with which I could deal this evening but I imagine I shall only have time to consider one or two of them. I know my colleagues are anxious to discuss a number of topics and I am sure we shall have the minister before us for some time. I do not know whether he should be congratulated or not for bringing such a large bevy of officials with him. It is embarrassing to us to see those packed benches in one place and the scarcity in another.

Mr. Churchill: There are 15 on that side. They are outnumbered by the officials.

Mr. Fisher: Some remarks have been made about the loyalty of the civil service. Now we can see it.

The subjects of the Department of Industry have been debated so much this session that it is difficult to find anything new and relevant to say, but I would draw the attention of the committee to something which happened in my own area—something which I thought was bound to happen. There is now a concerted effort by the industrial and municipal groups in our area to be classified as a designated area, despite the fact that the formula, about which I have complained earlier, will not qualify the area to become so designated, at least not for several more years when conditions have got a great deal worse than they are now. The Minister of Finance told us a few weeks ago that certain adjustments to this formula were being considered and that more variables would be taken into account. I would like to have been given more information about this. I read the text of the speech the minister made last Friday and I do not recall he had anything to say about this aspect of the matter. I am sure there are other places, in addition to northwest Ontario which are beginning to stew about this question. The gist of the request is: why cannot we share in these advantages which are to come from the establishment of the Department of Industry and the tax concessions which are to be made? Advertisements for personnel to staff the department have appeared in papers across the country. I know, having gone through the newspapers in the reading room, that a considerable bill for advertising has been incurred. I have seen at least five or six editorials in small papers commenting on these advertisements, the salaries offered, the qualifications desired, and so on.

To my mind, a certain puzzlement has arisen, one which the pamphlet which has been published cannot answer. How are these officials to work, and what administrative framework is to be set up? I know the deputy minister has been making speeches in various places, because I have seen the reports. I know the minister has commented on the reaction of Manitoba to the Department of Industry. I do not know how much truth there is in this, but I hear there was a blow-up or at least some criticism expressed at the federal-provincial conference on the subject of the department after the minister had made his explanation. I understand the minister had a pitched battle in one of the corridors with Mr. Eric Kierans of the province of Quebec. That is just tittle-tattle, but I am sure of this: The Department of Industry and its policies have been the subject of discussion and explanation while the provincial ministers have been down here. I think we should be brought up to date as to those discussions and be told what response the minister received. I assume, since he has not been here in the house so much this week, that he has been attending the conference and, knowing him, I assume he has not been sitting there like a dummy without making any contribution.

Like many other people, the minister must, I am sure, realize that his new Department of Industry is in a somewhat precarious position in terms of general acceptance, or in terms of popularity, and the sooner its function is clarified and popularized, the sooner we see some evidence of people out in the field working with the local regional development groups, the more quickly will it be able to perform those tasks which we can expect it to perform. With regard to what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to the effect that if and when the Conservatives came back to power they would abolish the department, I am sure we were reminded of what Ross Thatcher was going to do about medicare. If the department gets running and functioning well, we shall not have to worry about any subsequent government destroying it.

The main question asked in my region and by the people I encountered in Manitoba and southwestern Ontario about the Department of Industry is a simple one: How is it going to work with the provincial groups which are already in existence; how much flexibility will there be in this relationship? The main problem seems to be this: Who will take the lead? We all know the steps which have been taken by Manitoba and I am sure we shall hear more about them, because I see the hon. member for Marquette is there with that massive volume about Manitoba's plan between 1962 and 1975. What is to be done in Ontario? What is to be the relationship with the regional development councils and the development associations in the various provinces? When are we to be given some idea as to the degree of initiative which is to come from the provinces and from the federal government in terms of projects. This is important.

We saw what I think was the best piece of legislation passed by the former government, that is, the ARDA legislation, lying on the counter for a long time before it was picked up. There was, and still is, a great deal of confusion in many parts of the country about what could be done with ARDA. There was uncertainty about its implementation. I know a period of more than two years passed in Ontario before Mr. H. F. Crown was appointed by the provincial government, and a response was forthcoming from the province. It is still not certain, as far as ARDA is concerned, whether the initiative should come from regional groups or from the provinces, or whether it is for the federal government to take the initiative. Indeed, I am confident, from what I know of ARDA operations, that all those concerned are still hazy about it. I suggest to the minister that he will not be able to afford the maturity period which ARDA has been allowed. I say this because I think the pressures in this area, where employment is concerned, are much sharper in the case of the new department. This is why I would have appreciated—I will not say "more candour", because it is not easy to see how there could be much more candour when there is nothing to be candid about—but I would have appreciated more detail about how the process of building up the department is going on. How many men has the minister hired? What is their quality? Where did he stand in the competition? Where are the advisory offices to be established? What research assistance is to be available to the outer offices?

Information of this kind would be important and useful. It would have a definite bearing on the department's future. I know the deputy minister has been speaking about this in Ottawa but the reports are in general terms. I think some of this information might be given in greater detail during this debate.

The next thing I wanted to touch on is something that is dear to my heart, as the minister knows, and that is the question of government printing and publishing. It has always been my suspicion since I arrived in Ottawa some years ago that this is one of the least efficient operations of the government. Most of us remember the reckless doings of the public accounts committee a few years ago when they were turning up trout streams in the basement of the establishment in Hull, and we had all kinds of cynicism and bitter wit about the place. Subsequently, we had a change in the headship over there and things quieted down considerably.

It seems to me, as a matter of principle, that there needs to be an element of contract letting in so far as printing is concerned. I am speaking for my party here when I say that we are not so much dedicated to the socialistic idea that we want to see all the printing done for the federal government—particularly I am thinking of text print—handled by the queen's printer. I can see the advantages of a balance, but I can also see the possibility of patronage and pettiness in so far as the letting of contracts is concerned. I know from my personal knowledge that there was one magazine put out for the Canadian army, and as soon as the government changed a few years ago, slam bang, the printing contract was shifted to someone favourable to the party in power. We may have an element of this; but forgetting that sort of thing it seems to me that what we have to look for in that kind of contracting is the absolute in competition, with favouritism ruled out. I am not so sure that we have it. I should like more details on how this print purchasing is going to be carried out, to be sure that under the reforms the minister is introducing we will have this as a guarantee.

The next point in connection with the queen's printer's operations relates to something that has exercised me for six years, and that is the fact that all of these small contracts for materials and goods that I think run to something like $18 million a year, have always been concentrated in this particular area, that is in the Ottawa-Montreal-Toronto triangle. There has not been nearly enough dispersal out across the country. We have had suggestions of this over the past years which showed, particularly in 1960-61, that there was an attempt made to spread these orders out. Almost anywhere I have gone across Canada the printers, suppliers of forms and so on, even in the smallest towns, feel they could compete or should have the right to bid on this kind of order. Yet, in fact, the small orders which these people could fill seem to be given to a very select group in this particular triangle. I should like to bring this to the minister's attention in the hope that it will be his aim to improve the situation. I do not believe the Glassco report makes the situation clear as to whether more purchasing in this category could be made in the provinces beyond Ontario and Quebec.

The minister will also be aware from some of the questions which I placed, and which he answered, that there is a tremendous amount of initiative put in the hands of the man who is in charge of this kind of purchasing. It is the kind of initiative that has to be handled with scrupulous fairness. There is too much power, in a sense, placed in the hands of someone purchasing that much in the way of supplies in a year, unless the rules and the code are very strict. In time, the man at the top of the organization has the right, which is exercised and I think the minister will concede that it has been exercised to a considerable extent, to change orders, to change the number of competitors, to call for new bids or to have telephone calls go out to get quotations from the select people. You have here the opportunity for corruption and unfairness.

I think that if the minister could say that under the new procedures that are going to be developed under the Department of Defence Production this situation will be taken care of, I will be pleased and I know several other members in this house who will be pleased. This particular community of Ottawa and Hull is a great place to generate rumours and suspicions. I do not want to go into the information that has been brought to me. I am willing to accept the minister's integrity in this matter, but I should like to have along with that general assurance something of the details that are planned for this kind of purchasing.

Then, I should like to point out to the minister that there is a bit of discrepancy in some of the answers that were given to me. I will just give him an example. I should like to refer to question No. 1,286, on page 3623 of Hansard for October 16, 1963, which reads in part as follows:

> Has Mr. Roger Duhamel, the queen's printer, been offered the proposed post of queen's publisher and, if so, (a) has he accepted (b) will his salary remain unchanged (c) what are his major responsibilities (d) to whom is he immediately responsible, and (e) on what date did he first act in an acting capacity?

The answer given by the minister is as follows:

> The creation of the proposed post of queen's publisher and the related changes in legislation are still under consideration.

Well, the minister will concede that there have been purchases made under this new arrangement in the name of this so-called queen's publisher.

Mr. Drury: Queen's printer.

Mr. Fisher: No, the queen's publisher. In addition, there was this answer which reads:

As a result of P.C. 1963-1254 of August 21, 1963, and P.C. 1963-1450 of October 3, 1963, his major responsibilities are the sale of publications for both houses of parliament and departments of the government of Canada, and include the procurement of print for these publications. He reports to the Minister of Industry.

Then, the answer to the next question was as follows:

The creation of the proposed post of queen's publisher and related duties is under consideration. For current duties see answer to question 1,286.

Then you turn to page 3807 of Hansard, question No. 1,295, which reads as follows:

How many (a) printing job tenders for print requisitions by government agencies have been issued (b) contracts have been awarded, since the day on which procurement, purchasing and stores branch became a responsibility of the Department of Defence Production and, of these (i) how many tenders have been issued and how many contracts have been awarded by the procurement, purchasing and stores branch as a responsibility of the Department of Defence Production, and (ii) how many tenders have been issued, and how many contracts have been awarded by the proposed office of queen's publisher?

The answer to part (ii) shows that 23 tenders have been called and 16 contracts awarded. In other words, the proposed office of queen's publisher is actually functioning, according to the answer. This is a matter of genuine puzzlement. What is the authority—

Mr. Drury: If I may answer the hon. member right now, the office of queen's publisher has not been established. The functions of the queen's printer have been divided into two, one of which involves the mechanical operation of printing and the procurement of stationery and supplies. This has all been assumed by and put directly under the Department of Defence Production. The queen's printer, in relation to his proposed functions, or functions suggested by the royal commission on reorganization, is to become the queen's publisher, and is in fact performing now these more specialized duties, of rather more than an editorial nature than the previous mechanical ones were, but the title has not yet been approved. The title has not been assumed and if inadvertently—and I suggest it was inadvertently—the answer was given that the queen's publisher had done something, it was taken to mean the queen's printer had done it in his new capacity.

Mr. Fisher: Well, we will be interested and looking forward to the appointment of the queen's publisher, and the definition of his duties, when that develops.

I have mentioned the Bobcat to the minister. I remember it was four and a half years ago when Fort William was dreaming of getting an actual contract for the Bobcat, and at that time the development contract for it was with the Canadian Car Company in Montreal. I remember attending on a delegation here which was met by the Hon. Howard Green, and I remember the deputy minister being asked point blank by Mr. Green how long it would be before the contract would be ready for awarding, that is, when the decision would be made that the Bobcat was worth producing.

As I remember it, the deputy minister took some care in answering, because I imagine this is not the kind of thing a person likes to get on the line for; but there was further insistence and he then came up with the figure of 18 months. In other words, approximately three years ago the thing should have been ready to go out to contract, but the defence committee apparently has been told there are still bugs in the Bobcat, and this is three years after the estimate made by the deputy minister.

Through all the years since then there has been an item in the estimates for the development work, but there must be something badly wrong or haywire about the situation, about the kind of ineffective leadership coming from the department, particularly when something fumbles and bumbles along like this. I know the one conclusion I draw from a defence point of view is that much of our defence posture is nonsense, because obviously if we can afford to fritter away years like that before we get an armoured carrier, we really don't care a damn whether we get an armoured carrier or not.

My point is that the minister needs to give some explanation of how this could take place under an efficient department. It does not make sense to me that four and a half years ago we got an undertaking it would be ready for contract in 18 months, and there was an indication given that favourable consideration would be given to Fort William. In fact I remember the headlines in the Fort William and Port Arthur press saying, "We are going to get 400 Bobcats to build in a year and a half." It has now become less than a joke; it is just a wry irony.

How can this take place under any kind of efficient direction by a government department? Has part of the stalling been that the government has been trying to get cooperation with some of our NATO allies on this matter? I know that the other day the Minister of Defence Production sent me a photograph of the Bobcat, with some British officers looking at it. I suppose there has never been an armoured vehicle looked at and examined so much as the Bobcat, but ten years after it was first talked about we still have not got anything except a nice bill.

One of my colleagues tells me the United States and United Kingdom now have their own vehicles. I do not know about that, but it is quite obvious they do not go for the Canadian vehicle. It also seems to me there is no use trying to fasten it in any political sense on the former Liberal government or the former Conservative government. There is just something completely haywire, and it is this kind of thing which makes one wonder how good is the Department of Defence Production.

I have my own specific case in connection with the Department of Defence Production which I would like to go into tonight, but since it is still under review I will not. It relates to a contract in my own area, which convinces me this is not the greatest of departments; but this Bobcat business is just unbelievable. For 10 years we have been fiddling around trying to get an armoured carrier for Canadian troops, and the latest results show it is still not worth very much. I am not surprised that the Americans and British are not anxious to take up any of our creations, inventions or developments, if this is the pattern.

We have never had a clear explanation of it, and I think the minister should tell us about it. We have spent millions of dollars on the development program. I am sure it supplied work, though not very much because there are only about 20 prototypes, but a lot was spent on materials, and it made work for engineers and a small staff in the Canadian Car Company in Montreal. Surely we should have some explanation from the minister before his estimates are passed.

It also seems to me that the minister should tell us more about the aircraft problems we have—that is, the problems of selling our aircraft to some of our allies under the defence program. It is quite apparent that the CL-44 is a successful aircraft, but it has not yet met with great purchasing responses by other countries for defence purposes. I would like to know the reason for this, particularly with regard to that aircraft, because greater production of it would do something for Montreal, which has been bleating so much over the DC-9, and also particularly because of the fact that an adaptation of it was taken for our air force, and I understand is in use.

We need to know more about the responsibility of the department in helping to get sales contracts for that particular aircraft, and I would like to know something about whatever funds the department may have contributed in connection with the cushion aircraft—you know, the flying saucer type, and also in connection with the hydrofoils, I would like to know if there is any program under which the Department of Defence Production is contributing money for research services and development. I understand we have been experimenting with hydrofoils ever since Casey Baldwin was fooling around with one in Nova Scotia 30 years ago; but if the same pattern prevails as with the Bobcat, I can see us still fiddling around with hydrofoils in 2000 A.D.

The next point I want to touch on is related to the national research council and the role that it plays as the encourager or the leader in the field of science. I have a paper here by W. P. Thompson entitled "The number of university teachers: needs and prospects". Dr. Thompson was formerly the head of the University of Saskatchewan and was the author of a book called "Graduate education in the sciences in Canadian universities" published by the University of Toronto Press in 1963. This paper is for publication in the December issue of the Canadian Association of University Teachers Bulletin. I do not want to put a great deal of it on the record, but in substance Dean Thompson is telling us that our graduate program—that is, the program to produce graduates, particularly with Ph.D's—in the social sciences and the humanities is in a hopeless position. It is just fantastic that a country with this many people in universities should be turning out so few graduates in these fields. There is in this paper a table of the number of theses accepted for doctorate in different subjects in different Canadian universities in 1960-61. One of the interesting things is that in the sciences we have 151 theses accepted; in medicine, agriculture and engineering—which is another type of science —we have 53. But when we get into the social subjects we have a total of only 68. When we get into the humanities we have a total of only 51.

This is not the place to make an argument for the social sciences and the humanities, but I would suggest that even the record in the sciences of only 151 in biology, chemistry, geology, mathematics and physics is a pretty weak effort. The national research council needs even more encouragement than it is getting at the present time in order to broaden this program. I know the minister indicated this was so; but what is the scale of this, what is the imagination, what are we shooting for, how many hundred graduates a year can N.R.C. sponsor? This is what we need to know. I wish to quote from page 4 of Dean Thompson's paper:

> Disregarding the applied subjects for the moment—

That is, the applied sciences:

> —the number of teachers who will be required in the basic sciences in relation to those in the social subjects and humanities cannot be determined accurately by estimating the number of students registered in the different faculties, since students in each type of faculty take varying amounts of work in the other faculties. But a reasonably accurate comparison may be made by comparing the numbers of present faculty members. An examination of the lists of teachers in several universities which have typical establishments of faculties shows that the present numbers of teachers above the level of part time sessional appointees are approximately the same in the basic sciences as in the social subjects and in the humanities (for example, in one institution 7:6:8). Therefore, the number of doctorates actually conferred in the sciences is out of all proportion to those in other areas—three to one instead of one to one.
> In this connection it should be pointed out that six of the 13 universities which conferred the doctorate did so only in the sciences, and that two others conferred only one or two doctorates in all the other subjects put together. Apparently only five institutions—

That is institutions in Canada:

> —make any serious effort to carry students through the doctorate in the social subjects or humanities. Although only 13 institutions conferred the degree in 1960-61, 15 offer work leading to the degree, but two made no awards in that year. Those two offer the degree only in the sciences.
> The reason for the great disproportion cannot be a matter of cost since research and advance teaching in the sciences are much more costly than in other areas, although it must be admitted that more money may be available for scientists from outside sources. Other possible reasons may be suggested for consideration: (1) a difference in the number of suitable fellowships and assistantships; (2) an established tradition owing to the greater number and variety of subsequent jobs hitherto available; (3) less interest on the part of many social scientists and humanists than on the part of natural scientists in original scholarly work; (4) less inspiration to their students to proceed to graduate work at the doctoral level. At any rate it appears that the attitude of many scientists must be different from that of many non-scientists and that the difference is recognized in general university policies.

This might be taken as an argument—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Tardif): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Marquette would allow me to have the floor for just a few more minutes, I only have one more paragraph to put on the record. Perhaps the committee would give unanimous consent to my completing my remarks.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Tardif): Does the committee consent to the hon. member completing his remarks?

[Mr. Fisher.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. This paper continues:

> Even though the doctorates in the natural sciences greatly outnumber those in other areas, it is clear that even they are far short of the need. Mathematics is an especially weak spot with only eight, although mathematicians are in great demand. Moreover, a large percentage of fresh Ph.D.'s in the sciences go into industry, the professions, or government service. Precise information on this point comes from two sources: (1) according to Thompson, the deans of graduate schools estimate that less than 20 per cent of Ph.D.'s in chemistry, 33 per cent in physics, 5 per cent in geology, and 50 per cent in biology join university staffs; (2) Stock and Beaulieu showed that of the science students who received their Ph.D.'s in 1960 and immediately took jobs, only 27 per cent joined university staffs, 23 per cent went into government service, 23 per cent into other occupations in Canada, and 26 per cent into various kinds of employment in other countries. Twenty eight per cent of all science students who received the Ph.D. in that year did not take employment at once but continued their studies at the post-doctoral level.

The evidence Dr. Thompson introduces here suggests that the sciences are in better shape than the social sciences and the humanities in having people capable of university work. I think the N.R.C. deserves a great deal of credit in this regard. Those of us who are not interested so much in the sciences lament that we have not a comparable body—at least, I do not think the Canada Council is yet. But the point is, even this is not very good, and it seems to me that the N.R.C. needs to give even more leadership and opportunities for post-doctoral work and pre-doctoral work, and there should be a more aggressive program, particularly in providing the kind of research projects that will keep that 26 per cent—which I think is a fair average—who go every year to other countries because they can get greater research opportunities in terms of projects and funds. I would ask the minister and the N.R.C. to let us know just how big they are thinking, and I would encourage them to think big in this kind of program.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate I have no intention of delaying the estimates of the minister. I only wish to put on record some thoughts in connection with the Department of Industry. The minister has so many irons in the fire that it would be futile to attempt to discuss all the matters which fall within his jurisdiction; but the Department of Industry is a subject of wide discussion and criticism across the land. I agree that probably it is practical to put under one roof various activities that are related but in the words of an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of October 28 under the heading "A Pretty Costly Beginning," it states:

Whatever else might be said about the federal government's new Department of Industry, there is no doubt that it is going to Think Big.

Well, it thinks big; it talks big, but whether we will get big results time alone will tell.

The Department of Industry was created by parliament in the same manner as was the case with other legislative enactments that have been passed since this session of parliament opened. The government has the habit of putting the cart before the horse. It leaps before it comes to the stile. It makes a decision and then it decides to consult those who are most vitally concerned.

The province of Manitoba in particular is greatly concerned. That province was not consulted. That province, which has such an efficiently working department of industry, should have been consulted or at least kept aware of what Ottawa intended to do. But the government has acted in the same way as it did with the municipal loan fund and contributory pensions. They put the legislation on the books and then they start to consult. I believe consultation was promised the members of the government of Manitoba at the federal-provincial conference. Whether consultation on this point was carried out, we do not know. However, the Winnipeg Tribune of October 19 has this comment by the premier of Manitoba:

Premier Duff Roblin likened the new Department of Industry to "the pension muddle".

Premier Roblin is disturbed and fears there will be duplication and confusion with regard to industrial surveys which this department will be making, trade missions it may be sending overseas and personnel it may be be hiring. The minister of industry of Manitoba, the Hon. Gurney Evans, is quoted in the same issue of the Winnipeg Tribune as saying:

—the present course "seemed to be one of building two competing empires".

Why is Manitoba disturbed? I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the government of Manitoba under the leadership of the Hon. Duff Roblin spent three-quarters of a million dollars making an economic survey in that province. The result of that survey is this monumental volume I hold in my hand. I draw it to the attention of the minister and I suggest that those high priced officials who are being sought in this little pamphlet issued by the civil service commission the other day be told to read and study this monumental volume, because it covers every field of economic activity. I want to point out to the minister that it covers Manitoba, an economy in transition, population and manpower, primary industries, secondary manufacturing industries, prime requisites for industrial development, tourism, recreational development and accommodation, service industries, physical factors in economic growth, capital requirements and taxation, social factors and economic growth.

This is a most exhaustive study and it will be well worth while for the new Department of Industry to make a thorough study of it and save the thousands and thousands of dollars that would be required to make an economic survey of the province of Manitoba. I do not know what the situation is in other provinces, but as far as Manitoba is concerned this study is most exhaustive. I want to put on record how it came about.

In 1961 the government of the Hon. Duff Roblin realized that job opportunities were not keeping up with the number of candidates in the labour field. There were more workers than there were jobs. Consequently the government budgeted three quarters of a million dollars to start a survey. They initiated a committee on Manitoba's economic future consisting of 42 members. They hired consultants from various parts of Canada and the United States and 200 public spirited citizens of the province also banded together voluntarily to help to make this great survey of the whole province. The recommendations contained herein were made by representatives of labour, primary producers, educationists, professional men and government officials. In this volume the minister will find how to increase job opportunities at least in the province of Manitoba, if in no other.

I wish to return to the comments in the Free Press, the mouthpiece of the Liberal party in Manitoba. In the issue of October 28 last there is an editorial which indicates that the Free Press is greatly disturbed. It points out that 300 top jobs are being created and that the civil service commission is carrying on a recruitment program and offering top salaries from $12,000 to $17,000 a year. Premier Roblin is quite disturbed by the fact that many of those working in the Manitoba department of industry may be enticed to join the federal Department of Industry because of the salaries being offered. There was no consultation even on that point.

This same Free Press editorial questions what industrial activities will be launched by virtue of the establishment of the Department of Industry and the employment of around 300 top level people. What new industrial activities are going to be launched to justify the establishment of this department? I think the minister should be given the opportunity to answer that question when he replies, so as to alleviate the anxiety that some people, even those who support his party, feel about the whole matter.

The editorial in the Free Press goes on to say that the Department of Industry will have to create $100 million in new investment each year to justify its existence. Was any thought ever given to that? I should like to quote the last paragraph of the editorial:

> The first 300 executives, however, are only the start. The department hopes to double that number in time. All in all, the new men of the Department of Industry are going to have to produce some pretty substantial results to earn their keep. Canadians who, heaven knows, recognize the need for industrial development will wish them luck but also hope that the government in its enthusiasm does not forget its obligation to make offsetting economies elsewhere in the public service.

I submit this for consideration by the minister. I hope he gives us some answers as to the new field of endeavour he intends to enter with this army of personnel being advertised for at high salaries. I, like everyone else, have been very interested in this pamphlet entitled "Department of Industry" issued by the civil service commission. It sets out the qualifications required of various officials. In particular it refers to the department's functions and organizations. I was interested in its responsibilities at the management level. It first of all refers to the establishment and maintenance of liaison with industries, and the acquisition of information covering all aspects of their activities. I take it that the department intends to establish liaison, not only with large industries which are established in the east in Ontario and Quebec, but also with small industries established out west. The pamphlet says:

> —to plan, conduct and implement comprehensive studies...to provide advice and assistance in the establishment of new manufacturing facilities and in the growth and improvement of those already in existence.

In this connection I have another question for the minister: Is he going to give any attention to industries already in existence, large or small? I have in mind industries such as have been established in Minnedosa, at Carberry, at Sprague, and other places, through the effects of this active Manitoba department of industry.

I am also particularly interested in an industry in my own riding. Minnedosa is a small town, as small towns are measured in the east. It is in an agricultural area and has about 3,000 population. It found itself in difficulty several years ago owing to the fact that the repair shops of the C.P.R. in the town were closed down. Some enterprising citizens made a survey of the possibilities of finding employment and a company was organized called Minn-Toba Industries, Ltd. As a result of the survey they decided to manufacture tractor and combine cabs—everyone connected with agriculture knows what they are—and short-line farm equipment. This company has organized and was assisted by the industrial development board of Manitoba, some $10 million being set aside by the board, for cases like this, to assist small industries setting themselves up. They started to manufacture these implements in 1961 and employed as many as 52 men. That, of course, means 52 wives, and if you multiply that by three it means the feeding of 250 people.

These tractor and combine cabs proved to be of superior design to, and better workmanship than, those brought in from the United States. As a result of the survey it was discovered that there was a tariff against United States imports of tractor and combine cabs. Once this company was nicely established a network of distributorships was set up and the company carried on on a straight business basis. Then bang, the tariff on United States tractor and combine cabs was removed. When this company Minn-Toba Industries Ltd., set out to see what business they could get in the United States, they found that the tariff against Canadian-manufactured tractor and combine cabs was 20 per cent. This particular industry employed last April 52 men. By August this number was cut to half, production of these cabs cut to one-third, and all because United States manufactured cabs are imported duty free by our large implement companies in Ontario. They give distribution discounts and are knocking this little industry, which meant so much to that town, out of existence.

My suggestion is this. If the Minister of Industry intends to justify his position and that of his officials, he may have to co-operate with the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance to this extent. We are asking—probably there are other small industries in Canada who are in the same plight also—that we clamp a tariff duty on United States imports, a like duty of 20 per cent, taking the matter up with the tariff board or the powers that be, or else asking the United States to remove the tariff on our tractor and combine cabs so that they can enter the United States and compete with the United States product.

All that we and our industries want is fair play. If the Department of Industry is going to direct its activities toward helping even the small industries, I say it justifies its existence. But it should explain at once what it intends to do so as to allay any fears which may be in the minds of provincial governments, and so on. I do not blame the minister for not consulting other provincial governments on this score because he is only one member of the government. As I said in my introductory remarks, the government decides first of all to pass legislation, and then secondly enter into consultation. I hope the minister and his department will co-operate in this regard. When public money has already been spent let us take advantage of it. I repeat that I hope the minister sets his personnel the task of studying this large report, which is bigger than a family bible, consisting of hundreds of pages. It is in great detail and is worthy of consideration. But do not forget the small industries. If the minister's colleagues co-operate with him to see that our little industries get fair play, that is all I am asking tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, before I make my speech, it is my painful task to announce that an awful air tragedy has just happened. A T.C.A. airliner carrying 111 passengers and a crew of 7 has just crashed 20 miles out of Montreal. News of that terrible accident has just come in and I wanted to communicate the information to the house.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since we are considering the estimates of the Department of Industry, I should like to express the views of the Social Credit party on that subject.

First of all, I take the liberty to congratulate very warmly the minister who was chosen to fill that post. He is perfectly bilingual, has a great experience in administrative matters and is highly qualified in industry and business. I feel also that the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) is able to direct his department masterfully. However, knowing the government's good intentions, in words at least, with regard to bilingualism, I was very surprised to notice that out of 14 officials appointed to his department to date, only two have French names and I am asking myself: Are all the high officials bilingual?

When creating this new department, the government had a unique occasion to show publicly to Canada that it is serious about bilingualism.

Mr. Chairman, the function of the Department of Industry is no doubt to work closely with the provinces, the municipalities and the area industrial promotion organizations, etc., in order to promote and facilitate the creation of new processing industries throughout Canada and particularly in depressed areas.

Canada needs diversified and decentralized manufacturing industries. Industrial concentration is responsible for excessive growth in some areas of the country and pernicious anemia in others. That occasion should be taken to destroy that clever illusion or myth which has been kept alive in public opinion those last few years, namely that being far from great consumption centres was for some areas an obstacle to industrial expansion.

In that case, not one industry would be suitably located in relation to domestic and foreign markets. When a company manufactures a product of good quality which can prove useful to the consumer, it will sell anywhere and the geographical location of the industry has nothing to do with it. In proof of this, one only has to look at the shelves in shops and wholesalers' warehouses and check the origin of the great variety of goods, to realize that they come from every part of Canada and from approximately 50 foreign countries with which we transact business regularly.

We should also do away with the fable spread by certain representatives who advocate the merger of medium-sized industries, claiming that only the big industry can survive in our times. Such an attitude can kill resourcefulness and discourage those who are bold and determined enough to set up a business. The survival of industry does not lie in concentration or merger. Those are false arguments inspired by socialism.

Beside large businesses, there is room for the medium and the small industry, that is undertakings in keeping with the abilities of man. To that effect, we should not be afraid to consider new solutions. We should free public capital—governments, municipalities, school boards—to direct them in industrial and commercial investments, in order to ensure an unlimited development of the national economy by establishing a public credit bank which would be a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

On the other hand, the industrial development bank should guarantee, after the required authorizations, the issue of industrial and commercial bonds, in order to ensure complete security of private savings from any source whatever, and enable Canadians to regain control of their economy. Moreover, the exchange fund, to facilitate the international exchange of goods and services, should accept in its reserves the monetary units of many countries, that is currencies not convertible into gold, which would result in settling the problem of international payments and increasing considerably our foreign trade.

We must go still farther to get out of this inflationary debt-money financial system of ours, which makes debts and taxes go up and interferes with the economic activity in Canada.

It is the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), the national leader of the Social Credit party, who was stating at Orleans on November 28 last that chartered banks had extended or created $1,200 million dollars worth of new credit in 1962, on which 6 per cent had to be paid, or an amount of $70,000,000 in interests only, that is $17.50 annually for each family, and that indefinitely.

Mr. Chairman, with the new Department of Industry, the national production should show a substantial increase; but if the government thinks it will thus solve the unemployment problem, it is greatly mistaken, for the consumers or the families of Canada, in a proportion close to one third, do not have the means to buy present production. Already, our national production will hit the $44.6 billion mark. Our money has no value, because of inflation, and it is impossible to buy the whole present production.

Is it not the beloved martyr, President John F. Kennedy, who said last September that the most important task facing the United States was that of the monetary reform?

New President Lyndon B. Johnson dealt with that subject when he stated the following, as reported in Le Devoir, Wednesday, November 27:

> And second, no act of ours could more fittingly continue the work of President Kennedy than the earliest passage of the tax bill (which would bring about a tax reduction of $11 billion) for which he fought, a bill designed to increase our national income, our federal revenues, and our insurance against recession.

Without the monetary reform advocated by the Social Credit, it will be impossible to create a constant economic prosperity keeping pace with the population growth in Canada.

As the minister said a moment ago, the number of university students increases at a rate of 20 per cent every year. If we add to this number all those who are in secondary schools, how shall we succeed in employing all the new manpower coming regularly on the labour market?

Mr. Chairman, I cannot deal with industrial development without calling the attention of the Minister of Industry to my own riding of Chicoutimi and the Saguenay area. The riding of Chicoutimi is divided into two depressed areas: Chicoutimi and Port Alfred. Special care is required for this area, because 27 per cent of its population depend on unemployment insurance or welfare assistance.

There is in Chicoutimi an important industry that could be brought back to life with the co-operation of the Quebec government.

I know that the minister, in a speech delivered here in Ottawa, said that he would cooperate with the Department of Industry in the various provinces. That would be a wonderful occasion to bring back to life industries closed since 1930 and to put to work again assets worth $20 million which lie idle now. A regional economic planning council was set up last October whose primary object is to promote industrial expansion. I feel that good relations must be created to facilitate industrial promotion.

In Chicoutimi North, my home town, an industrial and commercial exhibition was recently held and was a great success. The industrial board of that city helped three new minor industries to re-enter business during the past year.

We are trying presently to create an industrial spirit in our area. Our ports: Bagotville, Port Alfred, Chicoutimi, and even L'Anse Saint-Jean, are open gateways on the whole world. Those places are even the major ports in Canada for shipping the raw materials we have, and with all the industrial facilities at our disposal, there is every possibility for a very intensive industrial development.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will give particular attention to the few points I have outlined, for we need the help of the Department of Industry, which has just been created, to promote industrial development and allow our families to live decently.

[Text]

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add my words of congratulation to the minister on his appointment to this lofty post and on the very efficient way that he has been carrying out his duties in that capacity. I may say that the very fast way in which he has commenced the operation of this department might indicate that the comparison that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre made is not an entirely correct one, since he called him the workhorse of the cabinet. I suggest that his present pace might indicate he is built along speedier lines. He might well turn out to be the Man-o'-War of the cabinet, rather than the mere cumbersome Clydesdale. No matter how it turns out, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that at the end of the race he will pay off across the board for the party I represent.

Now, having passed these few equine bouquets, I trust I will not do what hon. gentlemen opposite do so often when they pass bouquets, that is take them away again before the minister gets a chance to put them in the flower pot. I have a few words I should like to say on behalf of my constituents with regard to this department, and that is the purpose for which I believe I was sent here by my constituents.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the creation of the new Department of Industry the minister has a very great opportunity to remedy some of the defects in the department as it existed before, that is the Department of Defence Production. As I understand it, the Department of Defence Production grew up very largely, and certainly came to maturity, during the war years and the immediate post-war boom years. I suggest that in the process it may be that the department, which played a large part in the economic life of so many of our industries, lost sight of the fact that, being a department of government it was something more than just an agency of business. It should have been operated in a different way from a business organization, and as a department of government it surely had a very great social purpose which industry in the private sphere does not have to entertain.

I suggest that possibly in the past, from time to time, the Department of Defence Production as it has been operated has lost sight of any social purpose, as it must have if it has any raison d'etre as a government department or as a government agency. I suggest that possibly at times, particularly in its buying aspects, the Department of Defence Production lost sight of its social purpose and operated purely as a private business on a dollars and cents basis. I suggest that for a government department this might not be entirely correct. I hope that the minister, in conceiving the road and direction which this new Department of Industry is to walk, will consider not only efficiency, not only the cheapest way to buy, but will also consider the social ramifications to various parts of Canada in the various operating policies and in the directions the new department is going to take.

It is obvious that the department to date, at least the Department of Defence Production, has been very largely concerned in the aircraft and electronics fields. If in those areas there is to be bidding for contracts, and if there is to be no delimitation of any kind on that bidding, if there are not going to be certain preferences for small industries, certain areas where only small industry is allowed to bid or certain areas where industries that are particularly suited to a locality are allowed to bid, then surely the big are going to get bigger and there is going to be no room at all for the small. If this takes place the consequences will be that the big will have the field to themselves, and I suggest that in the long run this will redound to the detriment of the Canadian taxpayer.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the formation of the philosophies and the policies of the new department there should be a very careful look, not just at the dollars and cents aspect, not just at the big business aspect, but at the aspect of what is best for Canada. Because behind the very theory of the Department of Industry there is surely the idea, as is indicated by the fact that designated areas have been appointed—there is, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam stated today, the very idea on which Canada is founded, namely that there must be some equality between the rich and the poor, that all must not go to the few and none to the many. I think this not only applies as to provinces between themselves but surely as to the citizens and workers of Canada also.

Therefore I suggest there should be areas within the department, and within the bidding practices of the department, that will be reserved to the small industries, to the encouragement and growth of industries that we wish to develop; and in particular, on occasion if certain industries are well adapted to a certain area, then surely the buying practices of a government department such as this should lend themselves to the encouragement and development of these industries. They should not be left out in the cold and cruel marketplace, where sometimes the methods and techniques of the giants of industry make it impossible for the small to compete.

I cite but one small example of this, and while this is not pervasive it is a fact, that certainly in the electronics industry there are subsidiaries of large industries who make components, which will ultimately go into a contract the department is bidding on; and I am given to understand that if a subsidiary is bidding on certain contracts, then the parent company, in giving prices to other tenderers, may charge them a great deal more for those parts than they charge to their own subsidiary. This puts any other bidder right out of competition.

I do not know how actively the old department of defence production looked into this type of practice, but certainly in the United States there has been an area of great concern that monopolies and combinations in industry, interlocking directorships and so on, would render it impossible for the small and new industry to compete. I hope in the buying practices of the department in the future there will be great concern in the new department, not only to ascertain that the bidding practices of the big make the game fair for the small, but also that the department will definitely have it as a policy that it will encourage the growth of small and new industries in the electronics and allied aircraft field, so that it will not just be a feeding ground for those industries which are already large and well established.

In this regard, in my constituency we have such industries that have developed with hardship in this type of a difficult market; because certainly in the electronics field, if you cannot do business with the government it is pretty hard to survive in the small, restricted consumer market we have in this country. And if the big fellows are going to get all the government business, then it is going to be very difficult for these new industries to develop.

What of industries that are having a difficult time in surviving in the competitive world and yet have something to contribute to Canada's future, and what of the industries we need very badly in times of national crisis? In my constituency there is an industry known as Light Alloys, which is possibly the best foundry in North America manufacturing magnesium castings. During the days when our aircraft industry was thriving, in particular prior to the unhappy demise of the Arrow, this industry was getting along very well. It produces magnesium castings that no other firm in Canada can produce. During the second world war the government was very glad to have that plant and encouraged its development and growth. This was under the leadership of the late C. D. Howe, who I think will go down in history as the man who did more than anyone else to encourage the growth of industry, and in particular the growth of the Canadian aircraft industry in all its allied fields.

Today it is difficult for an industry such as this to compete. It needs encouragement, and possibly some preference from time to time from the government. Ultimately, if industries such as this fold up, we will have to buy these magnesium castings from the United States, and it must be remembered that both the Minister of Industry and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are working very hard to the end that our balance of payments position be improved.

If industries like this are not encouraged to develop, and are not given help at the government level during the difficult years, it may be we will not only lose them as employers but their departure will render great detriment in the field of the international balance of payments.

There is just one other aspect, on which I like to call the social policy, that I believe should concern the department. I suggest there is a great opportunity in the formation of a new department to instil this sort of social philosophy, not only overtly within the department but within the new employees who are coming into it. If they can be made aware there is some national and social purpose to their work and that it is not purely the same as big business, it would be a great help.

In this connection of a social purpose, within the buying rules of the department might I suggest that the minister consider giving a greater preference to Canadian manufacture and production than is presently given. I know it to be a fact that we cannot be national hogs in this regard. Trade is a two way process, and we cannot set up high barriers to prevent competition. But surely in the area of new industries that we are trying to develop, industries such as electronics, if small industries do not get some protection, the big will surely devour them, and there will be no incentive for our industries to develop. In this regard, in the departmental buying by the old department of defence production I have seen examples of American manufactured goods being bought, goods which did not provide a single job in Canada, and these goods won contracts over goods which were completely manufactured in Canada and which created employment in Canada.

Surely that again redounds to our detriment in the international balance of payments. I wonder if our manufacturers would be permitted to sell on a competitive basis in the defence area in Washington, unless it was under a defence sharing arrangement. I suggest that undoubtedly the American manufacturer gets greater protection in this regard, and surely our Canadian manufacturer, if he is to survive, particularly the new and growing manufacturer, should get some greater preference than is presently given him. I understand our manufacturers are given some preference, but it obviously has not been sufficient to see to it that our defence production contracts go out to as great a degree as possible to those manufacturers and employers who manufacture, and employ men in Canada.

In this regard I would like to bring to the minister's attention one other point. In my sister constituency of North Renfrew is the great atomic energy commission and the plants and works of that organization, which come under the minister's department. It is to be hoped—I think this probably is the case at the present time, and may it continue to be so—that the employees of this organization will be given continued encouragement by way of wages comparable to industry, comparable to what they could obtain in the United States of America, so we may maintain the very favourable and enviable position that we as a small nation have built up in this field. It would be a tragedy indeed if by reason of pettiness or penury at the government payroll stage we in any way impaired this great industry. We have had one sad example of losing so many of our skilled and highly trained aeronautical engineers by reason of the fact that the Arrow is no longer manufactured here. This, an industry in which it had taken years to develop the talents needed, fell apart.

An hon. Member: And the frigates.

Mr. Greene: A great number of these highly skilled and highly trained employees found their way to the United States of America. It is to be hoped that the atomic energy scientists and the trained personnel there will receive no encouragement to leave Canada by reason of the fact that anyone can pay wages which attract them out of our country. We surely can afford in this land to pay, in the technological age that we are entering, the best of wages to these people who have built up our atomic energy commission in all its aspects.

There is one other point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister with regard to the Department of Industry as it affects my constituents. I suggest that the government plans with regard to the growth and development of our industry have shown a keen concern for the underdeveloped, for the economically unfortunate. I think this is in the best traditions of our party. They have done this in the maritime provinces by giving very large capital funds to assist in the development of this area, which has lagged behind the rest of Canada. They have recognized this principle, an egalitarian principle, if you like, of equalizing opportunity in various parts of Canada, by putting 35 designated areas under the care of the Department of Industry.

Unfortunately, this does not solve all our problems in this regard. I think there are areas of Canada the development of which is very analogous to that of the maritime provinces, but which unfortunately are not physically located in the maritime provinces. There are areas the growth of which has lagged behind, and not over a period of eight years, which was the determining period under the designated areas program—and quite properly so, because the areas that were so designated undoubtedly needed help. These are areas that possibly had grown to a very considerable degree and only lagged behind in the past eight years. I suggest there are areas much as the maritime provinces, even in rich Ontario, which over a period of 50, 75 or 100 years have not kept up with the vast growth in other parts of Ontario and other parts of Canada. Because they were not in the maritime provinces they received no capital grants to help them; and because possibly their lack of growth was not just over eight years, and accordingly they have not had a sudden surge of unemployment—they have been stagnant over many, many more years than eight—there is to date no specific plan to help them. These areas are not slow growth areas under the definition of designated areas, but they need capital help in much the same way that the maritime provinces need capital help.

I sincerely trust that the minister in his wisdom will find a way in the new Department of Industry to help this type of area. I suggest this problem is applicable to a considerable part of my constituency and other parts of eastern Ontario, and possibly also to eastern Quebec. They need some sort of capital incentives or, as many of these areas are former lumbering areas that have petered out, perhaps under the Department of Industry it will be found possible to devise some way whereby the remaining lumber resources can be profitably used, with government help and encouragement, to create new industrial hope and new employment.

There is just one other point upon which I should like to touch briefly. It does not particularly affect my constituency, but I think this situation has struck all Canadians from time to time. I refer to the printing bureau. Having read the qualms expressed in the Glassco report about the printing bureau, and having from time to time over many years heard public doubts as to the propriety of having this giant institution doing government printing at the expense of private business, it may be that now this minister has taken over the department and has undoubtedly already shaken it by the heels—which is no doubt a good thing—he will take a look at the entire philosophy behind the printing bureau. Why should government compete to a great degree, as this huge institution does, with private business? If we are going to have a printing bureau competing to this extent, why not start manufacturing cars? I suggest that this is not properly within the government area of business, in a party which embraces private enterprise as its basic philosophy.

We have seen that this bureau publishes myriads and thousands of publications on everything from ducks to cartels. I do not know whether anybody ever reads them. They are undoubtedly published at great public expense. It is very difficult to find the exact cost of the printing bureau under its present set-up. If the set-up indicated in the Glassco report is put into effect and we revamp the fiscal system of the bureau, we may be able to find out exactly what it costs, or at least be able to obtain more accurate figures. There undoubtedly is a place for a government printing bureau, but I think a good look should be taken at it. Are all its publications necessary? Is the taxpayer of Canada paying too much for what he is getting? Are we competing unfairly against small business or private business? We would like the printing bureau to be doing something that is necessary to the government, but not that which is competing unfairly in the market place and at the same time being the drag on the taxpayer that it appears to be today.

Mr. Stenson: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on these estimates I shall refer to the Department of Industry. This seems to be the most popular department the minister has this evening. The Minister of Industry brought to our attention the fact that a great number of skilled workers, such as scientists, engineers, designers and other professional men were leaving our country to find gainful employment elsewhere. The hon. member for Renfrew South also brought this to our attention a few minutes ago. I should like to ask the minister if he knows the percentage of people leaving Canada because of lack of opportunity here? I think everyone in the house is aware that we are importing many skilled and professional men from outside Canada today.

Will this new department not take the incentive out of industry? The Prime Minister said that this was not a new department and that the facilities for the department would come from the Department of Trade and Commerce. If this the case, why should we have this change? Under the last government the Department of Trade and Commerce was working very successfully and many members of the house realized this. The people of Canada realized it, for in 1961, 1962 and 1963 we experienced the best export trade and business expansion that our country has ever known.

I feel that the setting up of the new Department of Industry could very well mushroom into more and more red tape for our business people. Can the minister tell me whether the staff the new department is employing will come from the Department of National Defence, the Department of Defence Production and the Department of Trade and Commerce or are these people to come from our industries, where I feel they are vitally needed at the present time? If the latter is the case, then since this is a completely new department which will make further demands on industry and labour the result will be that this undoubtedly will be another burden for our industries to carry.

Those who are successful in the manufacturing field do their own planning and are tired of being planned by others. Anyone who has ever been in business knows the enormous amount of paperwork demanded by the government. All these government departments and their demands tend to raise the cost of producing to a point where some businesses find it impossible to continue. Will this department make further demands from businesses by requesting statistics and reports? I do not believe this is what the Glassco commission recommended. They felt that these departments should be curtailed.

Since the bill has been passed the government has gone over the heads of municipal and provincial authorities to designate depressed areas, and this has caused much unrest and fear in industrial circles throughout the country. The hon. member for Marquette mentioned that this evening. I should like to put on the record an excerpt from an article in the Financial Times this week. It is headed, "Windsor Resents Designated Area Tag" and reads in part as follows:

> Greater Windsor has become the federal government's most reluctant ward. It is one of 35 "designated areas" in Canada qualifying for special federal assistance because of chronic economic problems. The only trouble is that many in the Windsor area simply do not want the help.
> The reason is that, on the surface at least, Windsor and surrounding municipalities have not had it so good for a long time. The economy of the area is largely tied to the fortune of the Canadian auto industry, which is now entering its third boom year in a row. The auto business has been so good, in fact, that Ford and Chrysler have called back men laid off as long as nine years ago. Chrysler has no unemployed men left on any seniority list...
> Community officials seem almost obsessed with creating a new image and infusing confidence. But the term "designated area" does not fit into the image-making scheme. Some local officials resent it. They would like the government to withdraw it.

To be fair to the minister I should point out the view of industrial leaders in Windsor.

> Industrial leaders do not agree. They think that new industry is more likely to be attracted by the financial benefits of the federal plan than by any new image.

I do not feel that industry in this area should have a preference over industries in other areas. These designated areas were set up before the new Department of Industry was really created and got under way. What can we expect after the new department is completely formed? Industry all across the country is worried. Is the department going to distribute contracts to the favoured industries or to so-called distressed areas? Are they going to affect further the law of supply and demand?

The cost of the new department when it gets rolling will run into millions of dollars. My chief question is, does industry need this guidance? I should like to ask the minister this question: Will any assistance be given to universities to set up research departments to aid industry, so that these services would be available for the development of new products and new methods of manufacuring? By promoting this type of research in our universities we would be setting up a challenge to the students and making available information to industry that I feel is not available at the present time.

Finally, I should like to say that we must find markets and capital for industry. If we find these I am sure industry will build and expand in Canada without too much assistance from this new department.

Mr. Gelber: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about the Department of Industry and the problems we in Canada face at this stage in our economic development. Some feel, like the previous speaker and other speakers, that our development should be haphazard. There is a happy go lucky theory that everything good is going to come to Canada, that there are unused frontiers and all we have to do is go west and the untapped virgin resources will pay for all our problems and all our mistakes, and that somehow or other the inevitable destiny of Canada is up, up and up ascending plateaus. I feel this is not realistic economics. It is not a realistic examination of the economic problems that face Canada in the sixties.

One needs only to look at the rate of economic expansion in countries which we always considered old hat. Somehow or other Italy was poor, Britain was in another century, France had its grandeur in other days and Germany was destroyed. If you take a look at the rate of economic development in these countries during the past decade you will see that it far exceeded the rate of growth in Canada, and far exceeded the rate of growth in the United States. Rich as we are in natural resources, abundant as we are in the things required to make economic growth, countries like Italy, poor in economic resources, have shown a much higher rate of growth.

Industrial activity in the north of Italy was so great that it was necessary to import labour from other countries into the rural areas of the south to replace those attracted by growth in the north. The rate of German recovery has been phenomenal. The skilled labour in Germany, plus the stream of refugees from the east and the great torrents of United States capital which were invested there after the war made for enormous economic development. France is a country which has surged ahead. Somehow or other it became one of the household fixtures in North America that France periodically would be involved in great crises. The franc was in a constant process of devaluation. Yet we have this enormous industrial expansion in France. France is a rich country, and has reached economic maturity with policies adequate to the circumstances of today.

We always looked to Britain in the latter years to face crisis after crisis. They have had problems of exchange and yet the British economy has bounded ahead. These things did not occur by happenstance. These things did not come about because somehow or other the month of the calendar arrived and that was the month to go ahead. A proper assessment was taken of the problems of these countries. They marshalled their resources and made a plan and encouraged the development of their economies along productive and economic lines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this country has reached the end of its frontier. We can no longer look for boundless discoveries of natural resources that are somehow or other going to pay our bills. We have to make a proper assessment of our capabilities; we have to take a proper inventory of our resources. We must take a look at our manpower, we must measure our markets and we must plan to assure that Canada will achieve ascending plateaus in economic development.

The history of Canada has been from staples to highly processed commodities. We all know that Canada started with the fishing industry, the cod on the east coast, the lumbering industry and the fur trade which hammered out the frontiers of the land. It was wheat and lumber and all our staples, which measured the economic development of the country.

Now we are in a period of industrial growth. We went into the first war with about half of our labour force employed in agriculture. After two world wars we have become very highly mechanized and industrialized. Today the portion of our labour force engaged in agriculture is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 11 or 12 per cent. Today we find that 26 per cent of our labour force is employed by industry, and 26 per cent of our production comes from industry. It is interesting to see what is happening with industry, because it is facing a serious testing time. We have to take the measure of our secondary industries and see what we can do by way of mobilizing our best resources, which I believe this department can and is most likely to do, in order to assist in the planning of our economic and industrial growth. Twenty six per cent of the value of all goods and services produced in Canada are produced by industry. Industry also accounts for 26 per cent of our employment. Since 1945 there has been an increase of only 15.6 per cent in the labour force in industry, but an increase of 61.2 per cent in our volume of production. That means that more and more industry is becoming highly mechanized, more efficient, and production is growing. We must mobilize our resources to ensure that we can use highly efficient industry to engage the manpower of the country.

There is the enormous importance of capital investment as the key to the rate of economic growth. If we do not have a sufficient rate of capital investment, then we will not have an adequate rate of growth to use our plants and employ our manpower. We are increasing the rate of capital investment. It slowed down in the early 1960's but is increasing again. We are once more enjoying a high rate of economic growth. As industry expands and the rate of industrial production grows, and investment flows into industry, there is an increase to new plateaus.

I should now like to say a word about the training of our labour force. We have to invest in industry, we have to invest in factories, we have to invest in arterial roads, and all the paraphernalia of industrial development. But we also have to invest in men. A few days ago we discussed a new bill to increase facilities for training manpower. It seems to me that the training of manpower for industry must be associated with industry, not only with formal education. Formal education quite often puts handicaps in the way of absorbing people into the training stream, because we place restrictions on those who can be trained, on who can qualify for industrial training in schools of formal education. They have to have a certain standard of formal education to begin with. We are bringing to this country hundreds of thousands of people who will never be absorbed into our formal schools of education. We must expand facilities for on-job training, and we must examine the plans in Europe which have led the way to on-job training to increase industrial skills, and to investment in manpower.

Another thing we must look at is management. Robert Macaulay, a recent minister of industry in Ontario, made a sensational speech in the city of Windsor the other day in which he said the management in this country is not moving ahead or meeting the challenge, and that it is not as developed as it might be. The problem of management is something we must look at to ensure that we get the most efficient and wisest direction of industry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said about foreign capital in this country. I sympathize very much with those concerned about the control of industry, but I feel that the problem of foreign capital is an economic one. It is not a political problem, as has been said; it is primarily an economic problem. It is an economic problem to the extent that we have to pay a price in foreign exchange for foreign capital investment in this country. To the extent that we can pay that price we should do so. We must welcome capital investment and make it profitable. We should create conditions which are profitable and secure for all people who invest in this country. At the point where the price becomes too onerous we must look at the problem, and I believe we have to do more to encourage investment by Canadians in Canadian industry. Foreign industry has brought to this country great know-how and industrial skills, both in management and in labour. It is a debt we will have to continue to pay, and to which we must look and remember. Not only have many of the people who have migrated to this country come here highly skilled, but the branch plants which have been established by the most advanced and mature industries of the world have brought their skills, their techniques, their understanding and their knowledge of markets for developing Canadian industry.

We must plan, Mr. Chairman, and put our best intelligence to this problem. It presents many challenges to Canada in the 1960's. I believe the minister and his able assistant will give a direction and an understanding, which will bring a formulation of policies and lend incentives, so that Canada can continue to grow and use her best industrial might for the welfare of all.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Industry provide an opportunity to say a few words on this newly-created department. It has been created by an act of parliament and includes not only its new sphere but also several departments or branches of departments which were already in existence. Above all we want new industry. I am one who is hoping that the new Department of Industry will turn in a good account of itself. We are doing everything possible to assist the minister in the riding of Macleod and in the Crowsnest pass, which has been designated a slow growth area, in order to bring about industrial development.

Before coming to some of the things we are doing by way of co-operation with this department I should like to bring to the attention of the minister some of the obstacles facing his department. There has been some criticism of the word "industry" as the name of the new department. I do not wish to go into the pros and cons, but I think everyone realizes there has been a certain amount of public criticism of the choice of that particular word. I have also heard it said—and I have no hesitation about mentioning this; I do so for a purpose—that a number of industrialists are somewhat afraid that this new department will be in a position where certain individuals may be able to dictate to them. I hope the minister and the splendid officials he now has from one end of his department to the other will exercise caution in their dealings with industry, and be very careful at all times not to take any kind of dictatorial attitude toward industry. I think, on the other hand, that the policy of the department must be spelled out. It must be made clear and set down in such a way as to enable all those who wish to work with the department or to take advantage of the offers to be able to do so without the possibility of misunderstanding.

The other day, speaking on the estimates of the Department of Finance, I raised the question of the 95 per cent new machinery requirement imposed on new industry desiring to take advantage of the designated area assistance. I still hope the minister will reconsider this particular provision, if he has not already done so. If he has some change to announce in this regard I would be delighted to hear him. I would point out that when small industries are being started in the new area it is usual for them to gather together machinery which has already been used and move into premises which are not new. A great deal of capital is necessary before a new industry can become established, and it is often necessary to begin by using second hand machinery and buildings which have been occupied before. I was hopeful when I raised this question with the Minister of Finance that he would be able to make some alteration in this rigid rule with respect to the 95 per cent requirement.

In the Crowsnest pass area we have the only designated area in Alberta. Part of it is in Alberta and lies within the Macleod riding, but the western part of the designated area lies within the constituency of east Kootenay. The area in Alberta has already organized a chamber of commerce which includes the entire Crowsnest pass area. In other words, instead of having a chamber of commerce attached to each particular town, we have one body for the entire area. In addition, the people there have organized an association known as the Crowsnest pass development association. They have gone several steps beyond that. They asked the Oldman river regional planning commission to help by preparing a new brochure which will bring together all the potentialities for industrial development, and make them available to prospective investors who might wish to know what the opportunities are in the Crowsnest pass area. The feeling is one of optimism. We have seen a tremendous growth of industrial development in southwestern Alberta during the past six or seven years. Some 20 new industries have been started in the Macleod riding. And we want more, especially petrochemical industries. We have the natural resources and we want more industry.

I might spend a few moments pointing out how some of these industries that we now have came about. One method has been the sale of abandoned airports. The airport at Macleod was sold to the town of Fort Macleod, and the town in turn resold two hangars to a plywood manufacturing concern which is now employing over 60 people. When it is in full swing we expect it will employ over 100 people. The other hangars were sold to a trailer manufacturing concern which is employing between 60 and 70 people. Then a steel factory was established in another hangar and this, in turn, has been employing 30 or 40 people. The Trail Smelters, selling fertilizer, have purchased one hangar and have put in a spur railroad. They are now employing 20 or 30 people and using the hangar as a warehouse and distribution point for Elephant brand fertilizer. Another hangar has been leased to a furniture and mattress manufacturing concern.

So industries are coming to the old town of Fort Macleod. It stood still for a number of years but now, with the sale of the airport and the spread of industry there, everything is booming. The people are happy and that is what we want to see all over, with the growth and development of new industry.

The Vulcan airport was sold to the county of Vulcan and the county, in turn, sold part of it to a concern which is building houses. I understand this concern is now doing very well. I am informed by the minister, by officials of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, by members of the municipality of Willow Creek and of the town of Claresholm that the sale of the Claresholm airport is in its final stages, if it has not been completed. I made the suggestion to the three levels of government that they should get together and decide among themselves on the purchase of this airport. The purchase has been held up for a number of years as a result of legal action, but this was all swept away with the amendment of the Alberta municipal district act. It was hoped that these three levels of government would formulate a policy which, in turn, would help the industrialization of the Claresholm area.

While I am on this subject I want to say a word of congratulation and thanks to the people in the Department of Industry and in particular to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. During the past five years I have had occasion, during the handling of these other airports, to co-operate with and do my part as a member to help bring about this development of industry in these old hangars. I have always received excellent co-operation from Mr. Richard, who is the president of the corporation, Mr. O'Donoghue, and many others I could name in the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. Quite often these people are the unsung heroes when it comes to matters of industrialization. They have a job to do and in these complicated matters you have to get a meeting of minds. My experience has been that we have had good co-operation from the members of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

We have had word, Mr. Chairman, of this terrible new tragedy, this airplane tragedy, which occurred between Montreal and Toronto in which 111 passengers and seven crew members were involved, and this has served to dampen our whole evening performance. There is a bigger crowd out in the rotunda than there is in this chamber. This tragedy brings to one's mind the question of safety, which is an industrial problem. These airplanes are manufactured in Canada, the United States or in England. Safety is of paramount importance in the construction of these airplanes in this day and age, when we look to air travel as one of the accepted methods of travel.

So, Mr. Chairman, I close with the hope that the Department of Industry, with the problems which a new department does have, will be able to overcome the difficulties with which they are faced. Finally, I should like to invite the minister to come to the west, and I will take him in a car to the Crowsnest pass and show him what we have in the way of natural resources that we want developed. We want more petrochemical industries. We have almost every natural resource you can imagine, but what we need is industry. We have 7 per cent of the world's coal supply, and we believe that industries which locate in the area will be competitive with those operated in any other area of Canada. So, I extend an invitation to the minister to visit us and become familiar with the things that we have to offer. Then, as a result of this close-up view he will be in a better position to appraise the work of his department and co-operate with all of us who are trying to co-operate with him.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words to the remarks made today on the estimates of the Department of Defence Production and of the new Department of Industry, in order to comment on certain events likely to influence the economic growth of our country, and more especially of some of its areas.

I know that the new Department of Industry, headed by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Drury), who is also Minister of Defence Production, is a department which in the next months and in future years will become vitally important if our country is to undergo the industrial development which we all hope for and which our country sorely needs.

Mr. Chairman, if we wish to direct the development of industry and of our natural resources, I think that the Department of Industry which has just been established along with the Canada economic council will have an essential part to play. However, its function will be conditioned by the co-operation granted by the provincial governments and other similar bodies which these authorities have established to look after the development of our natural resources.

Mr. Chairman, this shows our need of a liaison body between the provincial and federal authorities, in order to develop our industries and our natural resources.

We cannot imagine at the present time the federal government fully discharging its duties without a close and continuous co-operation with the provincial governments. I believe the discussions which have taken place these last few days, within the framework of the federal-provincial conference just ended, have proved that we could no longer conceive the role of the federal government as an absolute one to be played regardless of the needs and wishes of the provinces.

I believe that, in the economic development of our country, we must not expect any action to achieve concrete results without the full co-operation of provincial organizations.

Mr. Chairman, many recent developments in our country were such as to make us understand how important that co-operation is.

I should like to refer especially to what happened when an attempt was being made to designate the areas in this country which were to get special assistance from the government to deal with chronic and permanent unemployment.

From what we have heard, those areas were designated without the provincial governments being consulted beforehand.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that this shows the extent of the lack of co-operation and planning.

The provincial governments have area development agencies and economic planning agencies. When the central government decides to choose arbitrarily some areas in order to help them, without taking into account the views expressed or the plans submitted by the provincial governments, I think that proves the lack of co-operation which must necessarily result in duplication of agencies that must help an area. I do not think that is in the interest of our country and its expansion.

These designated areas were selected according to criteria referring to the unemployment situation over the last eight years. I know that several criticisms were submitted to the various departments concerned as well as to the Minister of Industry, about the basis which was used for the selection of these areas.

Like many other members, I submitted my personal criticisms and those of my fellow citizens on this matter, precisely because some criteria that were used as a basis were not fair and did not represent the problem as it existed.

I know that other areas and other cities were designated since, and can benefit from the advantages of the plan. And I am sure also that here again we have a measure that is only a temporary makeshift to the major problem which faces us at this time, namely the development of our industries.

As most hon. members in the house and probably most citizens in this country, I followed with interest the effort made by the Minister of Industry to increase the production of automobile parts in our country.

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised at a certain moment to see that Canadian ministers had to go to the United States in order to request, or rather to beg permission to increase production of automobile parts in Canada. I then realized to what extent we were dependent on the United States and also to what extent we were still a colony. I realized how impossible it is to understand that Canada is politically independent, since, at the base of all independence, there must be economic independence, and there is no possible sovereignty, if we do not have first of all economic independence. I was really amazed to see that we had to ask the Americans permission to increase our production of parts involved in the construction of automobiles used on Canadian roads.

That leads me into believing—I may be wrong—that if the Canadian government saw fit to choose the DC-9 for T.C.A. rather than another aircraft, no matter where it came from, but which would have been practically completely built in Canada, that decision was taken under undue pressure. Indeed, the aircraft chosen is still in the development stage and the government probably reached that decision in order to be authorized, in return, to increase production of automobile parts in Canada.

We know that the American government, through some of its high officials, threatened to retaliate to that praiseworthy project of the minister, which I completely approve, to increase production of automobile parts in Canada. I think that the minister and probably the government had to make some concession behind the curtains to get the authorization to increase production of automobile parts in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, that was very detrimental to our country because if we must, every time we wish to increase our industrial production in this country, concede an advantage in the same proportion to another sector of the American industry, all our efforts are useless and give no concrete or practical result.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the government based its decision on technical reports prepared by experts who picked the DC-9 rather than the Caravelle or another aircraft. It simply played with words, because this same government rejected the findings of the report submitted by these same experts to keep the maintenance depot of Trans-Canada Air Lines in Winnipeg.

There we see to what extent a government may be influenced first by political considerations and secondly by unwarranted pressures from a foreign power on our industrial development. We, of the central government, want to use the whole potential of this country to increase its productivity, to fight unemployment in the various sectors, and I suggest this is quite fair and normal. The Department of Industry and especially that of defence production, which are both under the same man, should realize that the country is made up of ten provinces, when the time comes to award contracts to meet the requirements of the Department of National Defence concerning armaments or various supplies.

Thus, in those contracts to be awarded, the lowest tender should not be the only factor to consider. Keeping the economic development of our country in proper balance should also be taken into account. By that, I want to point out to the minister that when, in any one year, he has to grant contracts to the amount of about $100 million, the provinces are entitled to consideration on a fair basis for these contracts. No province has a priority right.

I hope the minister will remember that there are in the province of Quebec, as well as in the province of Ontario and other provinces in Canada, industries which are duly qualified to meet the needs of his department. Moreover, such a policy would help reduce the high level of unemployment we now have in the province of Quebec.

I would like to mention at this point that we cannot rely solely on the expenditures of national defence and defence production departments to maintain our country's economy. I feel it is wrong to base the economy of a country on defence production. I do not believe we can build an industrial complex on military production alone, but since the government spends almost $1.75 billion yearly for military purposes, since in the present circumstances it seems impossible to do otherwise in the near future, I am of the opinion that it is natural for all citizens of the country to be able, at least on a reasonable basis, to share in this distribution of revenues from taxes taken from the pockets of all Canadian taxpayers.

Along different lines, the Minister of Industry will certainly be able to play an important part in the establishment and development of some industries in this country.

As a member from the province of Quebec, I would like to draw the minister's attention to this plan which the province is now considering, namely the setting up of a steel industry.

Of course, I agree that it might come into conflict with some interests in southwestern Ontario, because there is already one such industry in the Hamilton area; but, in my opinion, if you consider that Quebec is rich in iron ore which, in the years to come, will not only supply the Canadian market but also parts of the European and American market for raw materials, I maintain that the province has the right to get some assistance from the central government to carry out that project.

I believe that the province of Quebec is counting heavily on that project at the present time, since it considers that, logically, other secondary or similar industries will be built around that industrial complex to increase the number of jobs in our province, thus alleviating unemployment while increasing the production of consumer goods in our country, which will make up for our chronic trade deficit with regard to manufactured goods.

Mr. Chairman, we realize that the steel industry will experience difficulties in the beginning. We also realize that the domestic market is limited and that we will have to compete with foreign markets. But I feel we must be optimistic in this regard and consider that the world population is growing steadily, that requirements are increasing, and that the supply sources of European countries are gradually becoming exhausted, as is the case in the United States at present.

If the province of Quebec is to supply heavy industry, I think it is only logical that it should benefit not only from the raw materials, but also from certain stages of their processing.

[Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John).]

The newly established Department of Industry is, therefore, well suited to establish the kind of planning that seems to be advocated by everyone. It can therefore play an essential part which will actually be worthwhile, if the department seriously considers the prospects now available in the province of Quebec as far as industrial development is concerned.

We should develop our heavy industry as well as our secondary industry and the minister has a gigantic task to carry out. I know that he will prove equal to the task in all respects and I hope that he will come up to our expectations because he is responsible for the progress of our national industrial development.

Mr. Chairman, like several of my fellow citizens and colleagues in this house, I have returned from a trip to Europe, and I have been astonished to see how some countries with very limited resources could come up with tremendous achievements.

Allow me to give you only one typical example of what I saw. Denmark, a country without any known natural resources, located on a peninsula and a few islands, has a balanced trade and enjoys full employment, with a population of only 4½ million people. In addition, it is in Europe where trade is highly competitive. Yet, the standard of living in that country is almost as high as ours. In short, it is a country where living conditions are good.

I was particularly surprised when I found out that that country managed to maintain a favourable trade balance thanks to its merchant marine, and I should like to draw the minister's attention on this particular point. Why? Because recently, the government, through the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) decided—and I readily support this move—to cancel the famous contract for the building of eight frigates at a cost of $452 million. Ships which in no way would have increased our industrial or commercial potential.

Mr. Chairman, I insist on purpose on the fact that if we had the money to build eight ships at a cost of $452 million, we could have set up a merchant marine for the shipping of our products to potential markets, instead of having to rely on foreign shipping companies.

If a small country like Denmark can build up a powerful merchant marine, I wonder why Canada could not do the same.

Recently, I was told of a company which operates 100 cargo ships which sail the seven seas but which are never anchored in Danish harbours. Those ships serve several countries and it is with the profits which Denmark makes with its merchant marine that it can balance its trade deficit since it has no natural resources.

If such a small country of 4½ million people can do that, I must say that I am somewhat ashamed to be a Canadian because a country as rich as ours lacks the energy, the will-power and the initiative to achieve such an objective.

I believe that if the present government is willing to give a positive ideal to the Canadian people and has the courage to make them aware of the sacrifices they must undergo to attain this ideal, the Canadian people will agree to these sacrifices in order to achieve such a commendable purpose. I think that if those countries were able to attain such unsuspected goals, we Canadians should be able to attain similar objectives in a relatively short time. Mr. Chairman, the Canadian government is able to do that with the support of all members of the opposition, if it is willing to take action.

Time for talk and planning is over and if this government wants to regain the confidence of the people, which is now rather shaky, it will have to take positive action and not be afraid of the criticism of some groups which will necessarily be affected by the resulting general well-being. The government must act so that the problems of economic stagnation which we are now experiencing in Canada may be solved in a relatively short time.

We have switched governments, we had four and even six elections during a comparatively short period, and the Canadian people are now asking: where is the solution? Where are the men who will actually solve our problems?

Mr. Chairman, it is our duty and our responsibility to find an answer, and if the present government has a concrete plan to solve our present problems, I suggest that they table it and we will support it, for it is not the interests of a particular political party which I have in mind: it is the well-being of the people and the country which must take precedence over all other considerations.

It is for that reason that I earnestly ask the minister to realize the importance of the responsibility which has been placed upon him at this time, because in this government, this is undoubtedly the department best suited to solve one of the most serious difficulties of the country: unemployment and all the ensuing economic and social problems.

I wish him well and he may be sure of my wholehearted support for any concrete plan which he may care to undertake.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

1. Administrative expenses of the atomic energy control board, $133,700.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know if the minister is going to make any statement with regard to all the questions that have been asked recently about the location of developments. Has he got anything more to add now?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if these votes can be carried rapidly I think I will fill in the remaining time trying to answer the hon. member for Port Arthur.

Item agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

L5. Advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in such amounts and in such terms and conditions (including the delivery to Her Majesty, in satisfaction of the advances, of obligations or shares of the company) as the governor in council may approve, to finance the construction of the Douglas Point generating station; to finance the construction of housing and other works near the Whiteshell nuclear research establishment and to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to undertake construction of housing and other works for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, $28,923,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the vote carry?

Mr. Nowlan: On the understanding the minister will make a statement later saying the heavy water plant is going to be put in Nova Scotia.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

15. Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown owned defence plants operated by private contractors, $164,000.

The Deputy Chairman: I think there is a correction to vote No. 15.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

1. Salaries and other expenses, $40,725,200.

Mr. Fisher: Could the minister give us further details about what general plans he has? He indicated that the national research council is going to expand its program. How much?

Mr. Drury: In respect of the question asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur, at the present time the national research council is supporting in Canadian universities, in most cases wholly but in some cases only in part, by grants in aid, 1,200 professors and 2,400 graduate students. The five year forecast for university support, not including support specifically for medicine, is that it will be just about triple by that time. That is what is planned. I cannot give the hon. member precise numbers as to how many post-graduate students, pre-doctorate students and university professors this will involve but it does indicate that in addition to the quite substantial numbers now in the physical sciences who are being assisted by the national research council there will be a substantial increase in these numbers.

Mr. Fisher: Five years will take us to 1968. If, as I understand, university enrolment is going to double at a minimum by 1970 from what it is at the present time, the tripling of this particular program in the next five years really does not look that impressive when it is put in those terms. I should like to know what plans the national research council has to scale their program in relation to this increased enrolment.

Mr. Drury: I suggest that the tripling of support in relation to the hon. member's forecast of only a doubling of enrolment indicates that there will be a relative increase in support. As I indicated, we do recognize that more has to be done. In the forecast I have just given of a rate that is triple perhaps recognition should be had of the fact that, as the hon. member pointed out a little while ago, one of our tasks is not only to increase the output of the universities but more particularly to find jobs for them in Canada. The hon. member will recollect the figure that he gave, that some 26 per cent of those who graduated went elsewhere than Canada to find work. It seems to me, as I indicated in my initial remarks, that the first and increasing emphasis should be placed on increasing the possibilities of these graduates in the physical sciences finding employment within Canada, while at the same time increasing the scale of assistance itself. All I can say is that we have a slightly different scale of priority than that suggested by the hon. member for Port Arthur. But I would indicate that the national research council intends to increase its support to universities in light of the measure of its present effort and the forecast expansion of our universities.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Fisher: Ten thirty.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, is it not advisable to carry on and complete these various areas? There has been a good bit of restraint exercised here. I have put aside some very eloquent speeches on atomic energy, the national research council, the medical research council, and so on. Surely we should get on and sit for another 15 minutes, if you like. The minister might answer certain questions which we have asked and we can complete this particular department. There was an unfortunate incident last week when he was prevented from going ahead with his estimates; let us now make up for that lost time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Vote No. 10—

Mr. Fisher: Ten thirty.

Mr. Nowlan: And you write about parliament.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten thirty o'clock shall I rise, report certain resolutions, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: Do I understand the minister will not make a statement until Monday saying that the heavy water plant is coming to Nova Scotia? Do we have to wait till then for the word?

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the acting house leader what the business will be for Monday and other days next week.

Mr. Hellyer: On Monday we will take interim supply and after that the redistribution bill. Unfortunately the business for Tuesday cannot be announced at this time, until we see what progress is made.

Mr. Churchill: What about the defence estimates? Are we getting those next week?

Mr. Hellyer: I would certainly hope so.

It being twenty four minutes before eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply this day:]

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY

1d. Departmental administration, $665,000.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY FOR FAMILIES OF CRASH VICTIMS

Mr. Speaker: This past week end, like the one before it, has been highlighted by tragedy. Just seven days after the untimely death of the President of the United States, Canadians were faced with another shock in the air disaster near Montreal that happened with such suddenness and took 118 lives. This crash, the worst in Canada's aviation history, has brought grief to many Canadian homes and has made its tragic impact on the entire nation.

I am sure that hon. members on all sides of the house would want me on their behalf to record their grief and sympathy for the families of those who lost their lives in this disaster.

[Translation]

I am sure that hon. members would not object to my expressing sympathy on their behalf to the bereaved families of those who lost their lives in this tragedy.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING CRASH

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement regarding the catastrophic accident which occurred at St. Therese, Quebec, on November 29, 1963, involving a Trans-Canada Air Lines DC-8F jetliner operating as flight 831 which departed Montreal at 28 minutes past six o'clock and crashed approximately six minutes later with the loss of 118 lives and complete destruction of the aircraft.

To date the major hub of activity of the investigation which was instituted immediately has been at the crash scene. In addition, immediate steps were taken to secure the area in order that the technical investigation would not be hampered, and in this connection my officials have informed me that the Quebec attorney general's department, the Quebec provincial police and civil defence authorities have rendered invaluable assistance and co-operation. The assistance and co-operation of all organizations in the area has been most outstanding.

Investigation of this accident is under the direction of the most senior accident investigator of my department, and temporary headquarters have been established at the Montreal international airport. Because of the very nature of the accident it has been necessary to establish a comprehensive accident investigation organization unique in the history of this country. Experts from every available source have been called in to assist my department in this investigation.

The scope and complexity of the investigation is such that it was necessary immediately to set up six groups of specialists from various fields of aeronautical activity, which include structures group, aircraft systems group, human factors group, operations group, power plant group and historical records and documents group. Personnel to head or work in these groups have been recruited not only from the department and from Trans-Canada Air Lines but also from the national research council, from the security and criminal investigation branches of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, from the Royal Canadian Air Force, explosive experts from the Canadian army and an expert adviser from the Canadian air line pilots association. In addition the United States federal aviation agency and civil aeronautics board have offered assistance, as well as the manufacturers of the aircraft and engines.

Any aircraft accident investigation of this complexity may be expected to be laborious and time consuming because every possible avenue must be explored fully. For this reason it is extremely doubtful whether I will be in a position to give the house any firm indication of the cause of the accident for some time to come.

The investigation to date indicates that the departure from Montreal was normal in every respect and radio communications between the airport and the aircraft were routine, with no indication whatsoever of the flight crew experiencing any abnormalities. Department of Transport radar operators tracked the aircraft from take-off to a point north of the city, when it disappeared from the radar scope. Communications during this period confirm that the aircraft was following its air traffic control clearance and had passed through 3,000 feet on a climb in accordance with its flight plan.

Beyond this, I am afraid I must advise the house that I am unable to provide any further information at this time.

Trans-Canada Air Lines Plane Crash

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): On behalf of the opposition I wish to thank the minister for having given us an interim report on this tragic accident, and in the name of the opposition I would like to join with the hon. gentleman in offering to the families concerned, the management and the personnel of Trans-Canada Air Lines, our condolences.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Members of this party would like to join in the expression of condolence which has been made by Your Honour and by the hon. member for Three Rivers. We share the deep sense of grief caused by a tragedy which came so unexpectedly to so many homes in Canada. To the families of the passengers and of the crew of the airliner which was destroyed the other evening we extend our deepest sympathy.

I am glad to learn the minister has ordered such an extensive inquiry. I think it would do much to relieve the minds of the people of Canada to have a report at the earliest possible date particularly as to whether there is any defect in the aircraft itself, whether there was any disregard of the air regulations set forth by the air transport board, and so on. These are factors which the public will want to know at the earliest opportunity, and I am sure the minister will press the investigation as speedily as possible.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Social Credit group in the house I should also like to express our deepest sympathy to the members of all the families who have been struck by the unexpected and heartrending catastrophe and tragedy that took place over the week end. I think this disaster has perhaps hit us harder than it otherwise might have because of the tremendous safety record that our two national air lines have been able to establish through the years.

Whenever travel is involved on the scale that exists in Canada, whether it is in the air, via railroad or by any other public carrier, there is always the danger of accidents claiming the lives of people. Certainly this also applies to the highways, where we are not so impressed by tragedy as we are in this case even though over the year highway accidents take many times the number of lives. We do have something for which we are grateful, however, and that is the safety record which our public carriers have established. This does not detract from the sorrow and grief that the whole nation feels at this time because of this particular tragedy.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, the members of our party join with the other members of the house to convey our deep sympathy to the members of families bereaved when a DC-8F aircraft of T.C.A. crashed on Friday evening.

[Text]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I wonder if the Minister of Transport could inform us whether this crashed plane was carrying a flight recorder, and if there are any regulations concerning the installation of that type of equipment in this large transport plane.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I should like to check the answer, but I believe it was not carrying a flight recorder. I should like to check the question fully and give an answer tomorrow.

Mr. John N. Turner (St. Lawrence-St. George): I wonder whether, in view of the difficulty of investigating this crash, the minister is contemplating imposing a regulation under which a flight recorder will be made a compulsory piece of equipment.

Mr. McIlraith: I will take the hon. member's suggestion under consideration.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCINTOSH—STATEMENT IN DEBATE BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of a statement in this house by the Minister of Agriculture. I am sorry that he is not in his seat today.

An hon. Member: As usual.

Mr. McIntosh: As a basis for my question of privilege I should like to repeat a question I asked the minister in the house on November 26. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of a statement the Minister of Agriculture apparently made to a Liberal audience in Red Deer, Alberta, as reported in the Edmonton Journal of Monday, November 25, in which he said in part "Patronage, what is that? I select people according to merit." If it is government policy that personnel are selected on merit why was it, in view of this statement by the minister, that Mr. George Walker, the former P.F.A.A. supervisor for Swift Current, was discharged from the government service? Either this statement is false or the minister does not practice what he preaches.

On November 28 the minister was in his seat. My remarks at that time are reported on page 4188 of Hansard and read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I think we are all pleased to see the Minister of Agriculture back in the house, and that he has made such a rapid recovery from his recent illness. I see he has Hansard in his hand, and I presume he has an answer to the question I directed to him in his absence the other day.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek asked the Acting Prime Minister this question on Tuesday last, and the Acting Prime Minister was pleased to turn it over to me this morning. I am glad to reply to the question, which reads in part as follows:

I will not repeat my previous question. Then the minister went on to say:

Mr. George Walker was discharged on the recommendation of the director because he did not perform his duties satisfactorily. The director was appointed by the previous administration and is a good man.

Then I asked a supplementary question as follows:

I have another question for the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the answer he gave to my earlier question. I understand that in his files he will find the report made by the present director in regard to the supervisor to whom I just referred, to the effect that he was the most capable supervisor in that branch.

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is your question?

Mr. McIntosh: If he does find this report, will he consider firing the director and reinstating the supervisor?

Mr. Hayes: I should like to answer the hon. member's question. Apparently he does not understand that the problem arose out of the fact Mr. Walker was taking orders from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek instead of the director. This was one of the problems, and was not satisfactorily fulfilling his job.

It is on that last statement my question of privilege is based. In fact I believe there are two people involved in this question of privilege, and the first is the supervisor who was wrongfully discharged and is unable to come into this house to protect himself. I suggest to hon. members in this house, particularly the backbenchers, that they should make an effort to protect civil servants from these bureaucratic senior officials, which is apparently what happened in this case.

In so far as I am concerned, I deny that I gave orders of any kind to Mr. Walker at any time. I ask that the minister either withdraw that statement—and if he does withdraw the statement there is no basis for the dismissal of the supervisor—or I will waive the privilege and challenge him or the government to produce the facts on which they base the statement that I at any time gave orders to this supervisor.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, since the rules prevent me from directing a question to you, may I direct it to the Prime Minister. Since no action can be taken on the question of privilege I raised until the Minister of Agriculture is in this house, will the Prime Minister advise the house when the minister will make his next appearance? My second question is, will the Prime Minister give consideration to reinstating Mr. Walker because he was dismissed on false evidence?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am informed that the Minister of Agriculture, who is on official business today, will be in the house during the day and no doubt will be anxious to take under advisement the statement made by the hon. member this afternoon.

MR. DIEFENBAKER—NEWSPAPER REPORT OF STATEMENT RESPECTING PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of a report by the Canadian Press, a Winnipeg dispatch, and also a reproduction of a portion of that statement by Le Devoir. I read what the statement said:

Mr. Diefenbaker, here for a Conservative Grey Cup party, said that Prime Minister Lester Pearson has acceded to every demand made by Quebec and that whenever Mr. Pearson receives a request from Mr. Lesage, the federal government seems to bow to Quebec's wishes.

Later on I am quoted as saying:

"And it's true that the Prime Minister has diplomatically capitulated every time Quebec has asked him to do something".

Then further on, also in quotation marks:

"But generally speaking, it seems the government gives in to Quebec on many matters".

Then in Le Devoir there is this statement:

—he noted the federal government seems to give in rapidly to the desires of Quebec.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that those words purporting to have been said by me were not said by me. At no time throughout my entire interview did I refer to Quebec. That is not the only portion of the alleged interview which is incorrect. There is also something with reference to the agriculture minister. The report states that I said:

"He is never on the Liberal bench in the House of Commons".

I have a manuscript which sets out what I said, a record of the interview which I gave, and it entirely bears out what I have already said. However, so there is no mistake about the Minister of Agriculture, what I said was this:

The Liberal team has failed and it is generally agreed there will be a number of unconditional releases at the end of this season. The Minister of Agriculture is away most of the time scouting for replacements.

It is unfair to the Minister of Agriculture to suggest that he is never on his bench. In so far as the other statement is concerned, I cannot understand how a statement like that could have been reported in quotation marks. I say unequivocally and without fear of any contradiction that under no circumstances did I mention Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, you certainly left that impression with the house last Wednesday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not catch the observation of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Chevrier: I said to the right hon. gentleman that he certainly left that impression with the house from the question he put to me on Wednesday of last week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The impression made on the Minister of Justice was not a result of anything I said, and I have made that unequivocally clear so that this kind of political action which is in mind by those who propagate that type of thing is answered now once and for all.

MR. NASSERDEN—ABSENCE FROM HOUSE OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of an answer given in the house on November 27 by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Chevrier), who at that time indicated that the Minister of Agriculture was absent because of illness. Last Friday, in answering a question in the house, the Minister of Agriculture indicated that he was in Regina that day to address a Saskatchewan Liberal association meeting. I wonder if the Prime Minister would set up a committee, headed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to look into this matter and establish the truth.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: Surely the Minister of Justice will answer my question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) presented the first report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUE BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table in English and in French the communique of the federal-provincial conference which met in Ottawa from November 26 to 29.

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER PLANT—ACCEPTANCE OF PROPOSAL AND LOCATION OF SITE

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that the government has approved the acceptance of the proposal submitted by Deuterium of Canada Limited to construct and operate a plant to produce heavy water in Canada. In its proposal, submitted to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited prior to May 31, 1963, the closing date for receipt of proposals, Deuterium of Canada Limited made an unconditional offer to produce heavy water in Canada for sale at a price which is considerably lower than that of other bidders who fulfilled the conditions established by the government. The proposal by Deuterium contained a commitment that the company would have a substantial degree of Canadian equity participation. Also the company agreed to utilize the maximum possible quantities of Canadian materials and equipment in the construction of the proposed plant.

Deuterium of Canada plan to construct their plant in Cape Breton. The plant will provide an assured market for Nova Scotia coal in Nova Scotia.

The production of heavy water is a further important step in Canada's program of developing nuclear sources of energy. The facilities of the new plant will be available to supply the requirements of heavy water in Canadian-designed reactor stations in Canada and abroad. Under the new arrangement, Deuterium of Canada will produce not less than 200 tons of heavy water per year for the first five years of production. The sale of this quantity of heavy water will be underwritten by the government of Canada. In view, however, of the keen interest at home and abroad in the Canadian reactor program the prospects for the sale of heavy water appear most promising.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all listened with great interest to the statement by the minister. I listened with particular interest, and I would think all members of the house are more than pleased that the government has taken this action. I can only say we have had a little while to wait, but it certainly has been worth waiting for this announcement.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the government has finally made an announcement regarding the location of the proposed heavy water plant. I hope that at some future date, probably during discussion of his estimates, the minister will give us some further information as to whether this was the company that was recommended by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and its technical advisers. Until we have that kind of information we cannot know whether this was the right decision, but if it was the site recommended by the technical people involved in this field, then of course we are satisfied.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this is not a time for debate, but I think a remark is in order in relation to the announcement just made by the Minister of Industry. I am particularly pleased that the announcement has finally been made. It is almost five months to the day since tenders were supposed to have closed, and I trust that the time it took to make the decision is that much more evidence that the decision is the right one. I am particularly concerned to know whether the decision which has been made is the one that is based on the economic factors involved, because it is the tax dollars of the Canadian people which will be spent on this project. I trust further information will be made available so the Canadian people may understand that this was the basis of the decision which has just been announced.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): May I direct a question to the Minister of Industry arising out of the statement he made this afternoon with regard to the heavy water plant. Has he been advised that under this proposal the government of Nova Scotia has undertaken financial commitments with regard this heavy water plant, I understand in the vicinity of $25 to $30 million?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not quite get that question. Would the hon. member repeat it?

Mr. MacEwan: I ask the minister whether, in the company proposal which has been accepted concerning the heavy water plant, it is correct that the province of Nova Scotia has undertaken financial commitments to the extent of approximately $25 to $30 million.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the government of Nova Scotia directly has undertaken no commitments with respect to financial assistance. The approved contractor has made arrangements with crown corporations in the province of Nova Scotia in respect of both location and the provision of energy.

Mr. MacEwan: Is that Industrial Estates Limited?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Industry. Could the minister inform us how much subsidy the dominion government will be paying per ton of coal which it is proposed will be used for this new heavy water plant?

Mr. Drury: The precise subsidy is not fixed. It will vary from year to year; indeed, it will vary from each period of review. But the equalization subsidy payable in relation to the production of power in the particular source of power concerned will be in the order of 91 cents per ton.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, could the minister say whether the government of British Columbia or any crown corporation of the B.C. government made an offer similar to that made by Nova Scotia?

Mr. Drury: Not to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question. Could I ask the minister what subsidy the government of Nova Scotia has promised with reference to coal being used in the production of energy for this project?

Mr. Drury: I have just said, I think, that the government of Nova Scotia is, to the best of my knowledge, providing no subsidy.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question to the Minister of Industry. Could he tell the house approximately how many tons of coal are required to produce one ton of heavy water? In other words, what will be the coal subsidy required to produce one ton of heavy water?

Mr. Speaker: That is a question for the order paper.

SHIPPING

TABLING OF DECISION RESPECTING COLLISION IN ST. LAWRENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I beg to table the decision of the commissioner appointed under the Canada Shipping Act to investigate the collision between the vessel Tritonica and the vessel Roonagh Head on July 20 last.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL ANTHEM

LEGISLATIVE PROVISION FOR ADOPTION OF "O CANADA"

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina) moved the first reading of Bill No. C-115, to provide for a Canadian national anthem.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to constitute "O Canada" the national anthem of Canada. It provides that the music shall be as originally composed and written by Calixa Lavallee and as subsequently arranged by Hon. R. Stanley Weir. It provides further that the words in French shall be the first verse and refrain of the Routhier version, and the words in English shall be the first verse and refrain of the Weir version.

Power is given to the governor general in council to add verses in either French or English for use on special occasions. I know all would prefer to see words of the same meaning in both languages, and when these are composed to the satisfaction of all, an amendment could then be made.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Now.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, before you ask the house when this bill will receive second reading, may I point out that, in our opinion this bill is very important, and as many bills appear on the order paper for consideration during the hourly periods devoted to private member's business, I request the unanimous consent of the house so that this bill may be given priority at the next period devoted to consideration of private members' bills.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I regret that unanimous consent must be asked by the mover of the bill, and not by the hon. member.

Mr. Ryan: I would ask for such unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Questions.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, on the Liberal side we heard "No".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Questions.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: There is no point of order, and I regret to inform the hon. member we are now at the heading of questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: What is your point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. From this corner of the house we cannot hear everything which is being said, and personally, I have not heard any "no".

I would ask the house to be quiet so that we may know whether the hon. member got the unanimous consent which he requested or whether there were some members who said no. We did not hear any.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I believe it is for the Chair to decide whether unanimous consent was given. In my opinion unanimous consent was not given. Consequently I moved on to the heading of questions. We are now at questions.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*SPECIAL VOTE FOR B.C. INDIANS

Question No. 1,277—Mr. Howard:

Since January 1, 1957, has any communication or letter been directed or sent to any Indian or Indian band or bands in British Columbia with respect to the so-called B.C. special vote of $100,000 for Indians in British Columbia suggesting or asking ways or means of dealing with the said B.C. special vote and, if so, what are the contents of any such communication or letter?

Mr. Munro: Yes. The minutes of the fourth meeting of the Indian advisory committee, B.C. special vote, held in January, 1962, contained a number of recommendations concerning the size of the committee, replacement of members and the administration of the vote. In accordance with established practice, copies of the minutes were distributed to each Indian band council and Indian superintendents were requested to obtain the opinion of the band councils on the various recommendations of the advisory committee. In most agencies the superintendent obtained the views of the band councils at council meetings. In others, a circular letter was sent to the chiefs requesting their views on the size of the committee and the replacing of one member each year. Band officers were also informed that the superintendents would be pleased to discuss any questions relating to the administration of the vote.

GERALD M. TAYLOR, PARRY SOUND, ONT.

Question No. 1,510—Mr. Aiken:

Is Mr. Gerald M. Taylor of Parry Sound, Ontario, employed by the Post Office Department and, if not (a) does he have any authority to act for or on behalf of the department (b) has he made recommendations to the Postmaster General on postal matters?

Mr. Denis: Gerald M. Taylor of Parry Sound, Ontario, is not employed by the Post Office Department. (a) No. (b) Yes.

APPOINTMENT TO OSHAWA HARBOUR COMMISSION

Question No. 1,559—Mr. Starr:

1. Does the Minister of Transport intend to reappoint Mr. S. Jackson of the city of Oshawa as a member of the Oshawa harbour commission, in view of his excellent service to that commission as its chairman for the past three years and, if not, for what reason?
2. Has anyone else been appointed to fill the vacancy?
3. If someone else has been appointed, what is the number and date of the order in council authorizing such appointment?
4. If no appointment has yet been made (a) is it under consideration (b) when is it anticipated that it will be made (c) what are the names of any persons being considered (d) on whose recommendations to the government were such names submitted and (e) when were the names submitted?

Mr. McIlraith: 1. No. Mr. Jackson's term of office has expired.

2. Yes.

3. Order in council P.C. 1963-1570 dated October 24, 1963.

4. Not applicable.

TENDERS FOR MAIL SERVICE, ADVOCATE HARBOUR-PARRSBORO, N.S.

Question No. 1,607—Mr. Coates:

1. Who was the successful tenderer for the mail stage service between Advocate Harbour and Parrsboro, N.S.?
2. How many tenders were received, what were the names of the individuals tendering, and what were the amounts of the bids submitted?

Mr. Denis: 1. Mr. Ronald Edwin Lent of Advocate Harbour submitted the lowest tender. Following regular inquiry, if he is found to be personally suitable and is able to meet the other requirements of the service, the contract would be awarded to him in strict conformity with the terms of the Post Office Act.

2. Ronald Edwin Lent, Advocate Harbour, $2,490; Clarence W. Copp, Box 337, Parrsboro, $2,900; Purdy F. Davis, Advocate Harbour, $3,050; Girvan M. Field, Advocate Harbour, $3,120; Vernon I. Lunn, Advocate Harbour, $3,300; Foster E. Morris, Advocate Harbour, $3,400; James H. Dunbar, Spencer's Island, $4,300.

BAR LIGHTS, PICTOU LANDING, N.S.—DISCHARGE OF CARETAKER

Question No. 1,618—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Has Gordon Chisholm been replaced as caretaker of the Pictou bar lights at Pictou Landing, N.S., and, if so, why was he discharged, and who made the complaint, or complaints against him?
2. In what form were the complaints made?
3. Under what legal authority was this discharge effected?

Mr. McIlraith: 1. and 2. Yes, because of active political partisanship. When Mr. Chisholm was confronted with charges of active political partisanship he did not deny them.

3. As the compensation for his services was only $200 per annum, he was released under departmental authority.

AMALGAMATION OF POST OFFICES, N.B.

Question No. 1,631—Mr. MacRae:

1. On what date was a decision taken by the Postmaster General to investigate the advisability of amalgamating the post offices at Durham Centre and Jacquet River, Restigouche county, New Brunswick?
2. Was a letter sent to Mr. Douglas B. Pettigrew, Jacquet River, offering him the position of postmaster and, if so (a) on what date was the letter sent (b) on what date was it delivered?
3. If the letter was not delivered, has the Postmaster General instituted any investigation as to the causes of such non-delivery?

Mr. Denis: 1. August 30, 1963.

2. Yes, by the Moncton sub district office of the civil service commission. (a) August 16, 1963. (b) Mr. Pettigrew claims that he did not receive the letter.

3. See 2 (b) above. An investigation is being made.

WINTER MAINTENANCE COSTS, LAC MEGANTIC AIRPORT, QUE.

Question No. 1,671—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Has the Department of Transport received any request from the town of Lac Megantic concerning sharing winter maintenance costs of the town's municipal airport and, if so, what decision was taken and what will be the share of the federal government?
2. If no representations have yet been received, will the government give consideration to sharing such maintenance costs?

[Translation]

Mr. Cantin: 1. Yes, in a letter dated April 16, 1962.

2. The Department of Transport is not authorized to provide financial assistance for operation of municipal airports such as Megantic, as they serve primarily air traffic of a local nature.

APPLICATIONS FOR MARKET GARDENING ASSISTANCE, COMPTON-FRONTENAC CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,684—Mr. Latulippe:

Did the federal government receive any applications of any kind for assistance to market gardening in the constituency of Compton-Frontenac during the past five years and, if so (a) from whom, and (b) from what source in the estimates were the amounts allocated (c) if no money was spent by the federal government, under which program could assistance be given?

Mr. Hays: (a) The Farm Credit Corporation reports that applications for loans are not recorded by type of enterprise; it is, therefore, impossible to determine whether any applications for loans for market gardening purposes were received during the past five years.

No formal applications for assistance to market gardening enterprises were received by the Department of Agriculture, although there have been a number of requests by individual farmers for technical information relating to market garden crops, and this has been given by officials of the experimental farm, Lennoxville, and the research laboratory, St. Jean. (b) No specific funds have been allocated for assistance to market gardening enterprises, but in connection with the supply of technical information funds are available within vote 25, research branch, Department of Agriculture. (c) Mortgage credit is available from the Farm Credit Corporation for market gardening enterprises.

Order for Return

*MOUNT REVELSTOKE PARK—RECONSTRUCTION OF ROAD

Question No. 1,722—Mr. Herridge:

1. What is the estimated total yardage of material to be moved in the reconstruction of the road to the summit of Mount Revelstoke park?
2. What is the estimated cost of this reconstruction?
3. When is it expected this work will be completed and the road reopened?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Public Works is undertaking this project on behalf of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. They advise that the answers are as follows:

1. While the preliminary field survey for reconstruction of the road has now been completed, the estimate of contract quantities will not be completed before February, 1964.

2. $700,000, preliminary estimate only.

3. September, 1965.

Return tabled.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

WHEAT—FINDING OF GLASS IN SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should direct this question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the question of glass having been found in shipments of Canadian wheat to the U.S.S.R. I realize the difficulties in any investigation that might be undertaken in this connection, but I would like to know what investigation has been undertaken. Also, is there any basis in fact for the allegation of the presence of glass, and as of this moment is there anything to indicate its source, if glass was found in the shipments?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I could best answer the question by making a statement giving all the facts I have up to this time. I think that would best meet the requirements at the moment.

As is generally known, the board of grain commissioners takes extensive steps to ensure and maintain the high quality and reputation of Canadian grain. There have, however, been isolated cases of foreign material, including glass and bottles, being found in export grain cargoes. Where they have occurred, it would appear that the foreign material enters the cargo after it leaves the elevator. The first such report over a long period occurred this summer on two small cargoes out of Montreal, not to the Soviet union or to a communist country.

Commercial firms are, of course, involved in the handling of grain once it has received the final certificate from the board of grain commissioners and left the elevator. On the occasion referred to this summer the national harbours board called a meeting of shipping, stevedoring and elevator companies and urged the adoption of measures to avoid any recurrences.

The chief inspector of the board of grain commissioners visited the Soviet union recently in connection with the recent large sale of wheat to that country. While there he was informed that glass and whole bottles had been found in some of the cargoes. This was confirmed on November 28 by representations from the representative in Winnipeg of V-O Exportkhlev, the U.S.S.R. grain trading organization. Following the return of the chief inspector a meeting was held on November 28—that is, the same day—of interested parties. As a preliminary step, notices have been sent to shipping and stevedoring companies, union officials, vessel masters, gang foremen and union members to avoid the use of bottles in or near grain holds.

The quality and reliability of Canadian grain is renowned throughout the world. It is very rare that complaints are received about our shipments. I wish to assure the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and the house generally that the government is looking into this matter thoroughly and carefully and is considering what action can be taken to avoid the recurrence of these incidents.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. First I would thank the hon. minister for his very full and comprehensive report. Is he in a position to advise the house how many cargoes to the U.S.S.R. were found to contain glass and the like?

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I do not have that information. I will try to get it. I should indicate at once that a relatively small part of the shipments was involved.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): May I ask a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister, while he is investigating this matter, would find out how much of the total shipment of grain will be lost, and what will be his ultimate decision in this regard. In addition, I wonder if he would advise the house whether this grain is covered by any form of insurance and who will sustain the loss in connection with it.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice and try to get the information.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could tell us who has the over-all responsibility for carrying on this investigation. Is it his department, the Department of Agriculture, or what department does this come under?

Mr. McIlraith: Five authorities are most immediately involved. There is the board of grain commissioners, of course, which is primarily concerned with the quality of the wheat that is exported; there is the national harbours board, which has jurisdiction over some of the harbours from which shipments are made; there is the Department of Transport, under whose jurisdiction some of the other harbours come; and there is the Department of Agriculture which is interested in this matter. Then, of course, there would be the police, if called in.

Mr. Harkness: I have a further supplementary question. Is there any over-all authority to co-ordinate the activities of these various departments and agencies in this investigation?

Mr. McIlraith: The authorities have been meeting together and are now co-ordinated quite well in fact. I do not know just what further authority you could grant to them. They are working as a co-ordinated group now.

PENSIONS

BLIND AND DISABLED PAYMENTS—REQUEST THAT INCREASE BE RETROACTIVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the understanding that a decision has now been reached to increase the pension to disabled and blind persons, can he tell us whether this increase will be made retroactive to October 1, which was the date upon which the increase in the old age pension was effective?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The date upon which this legislation will come into effect, if parliament approves it, is under consideration.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gerard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Following the statement made by the Prime Minister to the effect that allowances to the blind and the disabled and old-age assistance will be increased, could the minister tell the house if this plan will involve a personal income tax increase.

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE, BLIND AND DISABLED PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. How soon will the government be able to make some announcement regarding the increase in the old age assistance pension, the blind pension and the disabled persons allowance? Is that dependent on further communications with the provinces or can the government make a statement fairly soon?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some further communications will be required with the provinces, because the ultimate result will depend on action by the provincial governments as well as the federal government. But we hope to make this announcement without any delay.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. I am sure there must have been some discussions as to an effective date. What is the effective date which is being aimed at by the federal and provincial authorities?

Mr. Pearson: There were discussions about an effective date, but the provinces differed with regard to that matter. That must be ironed out before a statement can be made.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): A supplementary question. Is it the intention of the government to increase taxes, as they have in the past?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): May I ask a supplementary question. Is it not possible for the government simply to bring in legislation to make it permissive for the provinces to participate?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, that is possible and we have, of course, discussed that. But there are still one or two matters we should like to iron out with the provinces. There will be no avoidable delay in connection with this, I can assure the hon. gentleman.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Prime Minister if he proposes in the near future to give to the house some explanation why the government has presented an equalization formula to the provinces which is at variance with the pledge of the Liberal party to introduce an equalization formula to bring all the provinces up to the level of the wealthiest province on a per capita basis, related to income taxes and succession duties.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope to make a statement on the conference at the earliest possible opportunity. If the interim supply debate should continue, this would be an opportunity. If the interim supply bill goes through, then I would do it on my estimates, which should be under discussion in a few days.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since he mentioned a while ago that if the interim supply debate were to go on this afternoon he would make a statement on the federal-provincial conference and since we do intend to discuss that federal-provincial conference today, would the Prime Minister be ready to make his statement on the conference at the very beginning of that debate?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: We had rather hoped that interim supply could go through without too much delay. We want to get away for Christmas. If the debate is going on, as my hon. friend suggests it is going on, and that subject is going to be discussed, perhaps it would be just as well if I spoke first.

PARTICIPATION BY MINISTER IN DISCUSSION OF PENSION PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could indicate what substance there is to reports that the Prime Minister took the role of spokesman for the government in discussions with the provincial premiers about the Canada pension plan because the federal minister responsible was unacceptable to some of the premiers.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there just does not happen to be any basis in fact for that statement. I did preside over the plenary session which dealt with this matter, and I had the minister concerned sitting beside me. When we went into committee and discussed health and welfare matters, the Minister of National Health and Welfare presided over the committee.

Mr. Peters: That means they didn't get anywhere.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ACCIDENT AT LONDON, ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister give the house any word on the findings relative to the DC-8F which crashed in London some three weeks ago?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I should point out that there was no crash of an aircraft in London. The incident to which the hon. member is referring is a case where the pilot did not take off. However, I will try to get whatever information is available and provide it to the house.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not going to engage in an argument about whether there was or was not a crash, but certainly a DC-8F was in serious trouble in London three weeks ago. Is there any intention at the present time of grounding the DC-8F, in view of the fact that this is the second one that has been involved in an accident and T.C.A. has several more of this type on order?

Mr. McIlraith: What I was seeking to explain was that the incident in London was not in any way related to the kind of crash where an aircraft has been in difficulties in the air. It was a matter of the pilot deciding not to take the aircraft off the ground.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I wonder if the minister could tell us if there was an inquiry into this accident.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, but I should like to take the question as notice and get full information so that I can give a comprehensive answer.

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Since a DC-8F, built in the United States crashed at St. Therese de Blainville, is it the intention of the government to cancel the purchase of the DC-9 which is not yet operational, in favour of the Caravelle, which has been proven?

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR EMPLOYMENT OF BILINGUAL PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister add the name of his own parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Cantin), to the list of those who found out by experience that T.C.A. flights between Montreal and Ottawa seldom have personnel qualified to serve bilingual passengers?

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): The assertion made by the hon. member in the latter part of his so-called question is altogether contrary to the facts.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

What I have just said is not contrary to the facts, since the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport was sitting next to me, at noon, in the plane, and that he was in a position to find out for himself.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is in the nature of a complaint and not a question of privilege.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING MULTILATERAL NUCLEAR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs which arises out of a statement made by President Johnson that the United States intends to pursue its desire for the achievement of a multinational mixed nuclear force. Have there been any representations to this effect made lately by the administration of the United States? Has there been any change in the viewpoint of the government of Canada, and would the Prime Minister or the minister say whether there is any intention on the part of Canada of participating in such a force?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been no representations made by the United States to the government on this matter recently, and the position of the government remains as stated in this house, that we would not participate in this kind of collective force. Indeed, we did not take part in the recent NATO discussions about it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister for that answer. Were there any other nations within NATO that took the position of Canada, not to take any part in the discussions in NATO in that connection?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I speak subject to correction, but I think three or four NATO members took the same position as Canada.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER FOR HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Was the hon. member for Halifax expounding government policy when he stated in Halifax over the week end that "Needed were single purpose ships whose sole duties were in sub. killing", or was he providing an excuse for the government's cancellation of the frigate program?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I have not even seen the report, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Has the Prime Minister any plans for meeting with President Johnson in the near future?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This matter came up in the short discussion I had with President Johnson and we agreed that we should have a meeting as soon as it can be arranged, but no details have been worked out.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister has referred to getting away by Christmas. Has any consideration yet been given by the government as to when the next session will commence? I ask that because naturally members, having been here for many months, are anxious to have some idea as to when the next session might commence so they can make their plans for a holiday.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): When the next session begins will depend, of course, on when this one ends. Supplementary to that brilliant observation, I would say that all parties would want an adequate recess and that would be, I suggest, three or four weeks. It might be helpful if the representatives of the parties could get together very shortly and discuss the possibility of an ending date and a beginning date.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question. Can I ask the Prime Minister whether he has changed in any way the outline of business which he set forth as the program which would have to be dealt with at this session?

Mr. Pearson: Not in any material way, Mr. Speaker, but there are one or two matters which should not be too controversial which will have to be added to the list which I gave to the house some weeks ago. Perhaps after we have had the kind of discussion I have just mentioned I could make a further statement in the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH INDIAN CLAIMS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he can state with more precision, now, just when either the resolution or the bill relating to the Indian claims commission will be introduced in the house?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As I have said earlier, it will be introduced before the end of the present session.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEMS OF INTEGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Webster (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is it true that Professor Harry Hawthorne, of the University of British Columbia, has been appointed to conduct a study across Canada into the problem of how to encourage our native Indian population to integrate more quickly into Canadian society?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having given me ample notice of his question, which I shall now answer in French.

[Translation]

It gives me pleasure to inform the hon. member and the house that we have undertaken a three-year research program to determine to what extent the Indians in all parts of Canada share in the social and economic life of our country.

This survey is designed to provide comprehensive data from which to draw basic principles for the setting up of the policy and general program we shall have to follow in future if we wish to promote the welfare and progress of the Indian population of Canada.

Mr. H. B. Hawthorne, of the University of British Columbia, and Mr. Adelard Tremblay, of Laval University, have undertaken, as director and assistant director, the carrying out of this extensive research project.

Specialists and research assistants attached to Canadian universities and research centres will be charged with various sections of the programs as required. The research work will apply to four important aspects of the Indian question: economic development, promotion of education, present-day responsibilities at various government levels, band councils and progress toward administrative autonomy.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF LIAISON COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Before I resume my seat—which is an unparliamentary way of saying "while I am on my feet"—may I answer a question put to me last week by the hon. member for Skeena as to whether or not the government made a commitment to one H. Castilou of British Columbia to the effect that there would be an Indian liaison committee appointed consisting of parliamentarians and advisers for the purpose of making annual visits to various Indian villages in British Columbia.

I must tell the hon. member that though the purpose might be laudable, for the moment, the answer is no.

LOTTERIES

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Could the minister tell the house whether, following the federal-provincial conference, the Criminal Code will be amended so that provinces which so desire may set up lotteries?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time since the opening of the conference that this question is asked. All I can say is that the government will take into consideration the representations which were made.

Mr. Pigeon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. So, contrary to what was reported in the press, no decision has been taken?

Mr. Chevrier: Absolutely no, Mr. Speaker.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REQUEST THAT CONVERSION OF DESTROYER ESCORTS BE DONE IN B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production. In view of the grave concern of B.C. shipyards, which will now be aggravated by the statement made by the minister on motions, would the minister say whether the conversion of the two remaining St. Laurent class destroyer escorts will be carried out by B.C. shipyards?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, that matter is currently under examination.

SUGAR

REPORTED SALE OF U.S. BEET SUGAR IN KENT CONSTITUENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or, in his absence, to the acting minister. In view of the fact that Pioneer Brand beet sugar refined in the United States is being offered for sale this week in the constituency of Kent, which is the centre of beet sugar production in Ontario, can the minister assure the house that his department is investigating only the question of supplies of raw sugar from abroad, not supplies of refined sugar subsidized by foreign governments in direct competition with our own producers and workers in our own refineries?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will take the question as notice.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EXPENDITURES RESPECTING PRISONERS OF WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the minister received a request from the Hong Kong veterans association urging him to use his influence to get the government to give a detailed report of the expenditures of persons who suffered in Hong Kong and other prison camps owing to action in the last war?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, I have received such a request.

Mr. Herridge: What is the minister doing about this request now that it has been received?

Mr. Teillet: I am taking it under consideration and making a study of it at the moment.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, my final question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister read the articles by Marcel Gingras in La Presse, with respect to the portraits of ministers, including his?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $377,400,841.02, being the aggregate of—

(a) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except agriculture item 100, atomic energy item 5, external affairs items 78 and 107, fisheries item 45, mines and technical surveys items 45 and 80, northern affairs and national resources items 5 and 10, public works items 20 and 190, transport item 35 and loans, investments and advances item L20 for which no amount is being released, $318,822,963.00;

(b) an additional two-twelfths of external affairs item 105 and finance item 45, $4,700,000.00;

(c) an additional one-twelfth of mines and technical surveys item 140, national film board item 1, northern affairs and national resources item 80, post office items 5, 10 and 15, public works items 150 and 165, transport items 40 and 220, loans, investments and advances item L70, $21,342,422.50;

(d) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates (A), for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except external affairs items 96a and 117a, finance item 5a, northern affairs and national resources item 110a, and loans, investments and advances items L13a and L63a for which no amount is being released $24,023,455.00;

(e) an additional one-twelfth of finance item 45a, $83,333.34;

(f) one-twelfth of the amount of the item set forth in the supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $583,333.34;

(g) one-twelfth of the amount of item set forth in the supplementary estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $1,666,666.67;

(h) one-twelfth of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except external affairs item 117d for which no amount is being released, $6,178,667.17;

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964.

Mr. Nielsen: When I resumed my seat on Friday I was speaking about the activities of the Post Office Department. Before continuing to do so I wonder whether I might draw the attention of the Minister of Justice, while he is in his place, to the situation which exists in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories with respect to the Judges Act.

As the minister knows, there are in the north two magistrates, one in each territory, known as police magistrates. Their jurisdiction is in practically all respects comparable with the jurisdiction of county court judges. The amendments to the Judges Act passed this session, by oversight I believe, omitted any mention of an increase in salary for the police magistrates of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. The county court judges across the country had their salaries raised. I placed a question on the order paper, and I obtained a copy of the recent order in council appointing a magistrate, for the Yukon, and I noticed that the salaries paid in the north are still $10,000 per annum.

I recommend most strongly to the minister that he consider this matter with a view to raising the salaries of these two justice officials in the two northern territories so they might be on the same level as county court judges across the country.

Let me return now to the department of the Postmaster General and the conduct of that department, particularly in the Yukon. The minister will see, if he examines his files, that since 1958, when I first came to this house, I have advocated a policy of the calling of public tenders for every contract for the carriage of mail, whether by ground or by air or any other means. Mr. Pageau, who was then director of the transportation division of the department, will concur in that. I am sorry to see that the department is now departing from this fair course of action.

Mr. Denis: On a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) claims that I am departing from the policy of calling tenders. I should like him to state names so that an investigation may be undertaken to prove whether he is right or wrong.

[Text]

Mr. Nielsen: I will be pleased to do that. As a matter of fact I was about to do that on Friday when I had to resume my seat. The particular post office where public tenders have not been called is a newly established one at Ross River. I understand that the procedure followed by the department was for certain selected companies to be asked to tender for the carriage of mail to that post office from Whitehorse. In fact only one company was invited to tender, a company in Whitehorse. The department subsequently received a further offer from a company in Teslin in the Yukon, and this was rejected for reasons which I am forced to agree, because of the size of the post office and other considerations, are acceptable. But there is more than one company in Whitehorse and in the Yukon capable of carrying mail by air to that post office.

In the past public tenders have been called and advertisements have been placed not only in newspapers but in post offices throughout the territory. To return to the policy of selecting certain favoured individuals or companies and saying "would you like this job" is not my idea of giving a fair opportunity to every Canadian interested in supplying a public service.

I have given only one instance. I am sure if the minister would check he would find that what I have told him is accurate. Whatever the minister does in any other constituencies in Canada because of pressures brought by his own backbenchers and in his party's caucus, we in the Yukon want to be fair minded about these contracts. I think even the supporters of his own party have gone on record as saying that they want to get back to the system where everybody has an opportunity to tender on contracts for public goods and services. From a personal point of view I think the situation should be the same all across the country.

Certainly situations should not be allowed to exist such as that which existed in the riding of the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac, where the postmistress at Enterprise was thrown out of work peremptorily and arbitrarily despite the fact that she was a veteran.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I deny categorically that, arbitrarily and against the law, I dismissed the postmistress the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is talking about.

First of all, she was not postmistress, except temporarily until someone was appointed on a permanent basis. When five, six or eight people apply to be appointed postmaster, the Postmaster General must choose one of them. Therefore, I say to the hon. member that this procedure is far from being arbitrary and that everything was done according to the regulations of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that is rather an argument and that there is no question of privilege. I ask the hon. member for Yukon to proceed.

[Text]

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly I am bound to accept the minister's explanation of this matter. I can only go by what I read in press reports, and the press reports are quite firm in stating that this veteran of the last war, who has five children, did not even know she was fired; and despite the fact that a petition was signed by over two thirds of the people in the village of Enterprise, the minister went ahead with the decision to dismiss this veteran. Not only that, but he did it in a very questionable fashion, because a certain date had been set for moving the post office itself and 24 hours before this well published date the post office was moved.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, again I rise on a question of privilege. The Post Office Department is accused of having transferred that post office to a new postmaster without notice. Well, in that connection, I want to put on the record that Mrs. Stewart herself wrote us as follows:

[Text]

Re transfer of Enterprise office. Would you kindly arrange to have the transfer done on Friday the 29th—

That is what we did according to the request of Mrs. Stewart.

The Chairman: Order. I wonder whether we are not getting into an argument now. As I suggested a moment ago, this is argumentation, and perhaps the minister might have the opportunity later to reply to the representations made by the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I am just dealing with the general trend that seems to be developing in the government of returning to the very evil system of patronage which we seemed to be so singularly successful in keeping out of the activities of the government when we were in power.

I can mention other departments. In the last year the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys had $250,000 worth of helicopter contracts in the Yukon alone which were allotted by selection. No tenders were called on those contracts, whereas under the system in the past—

Mr. Pickersgill: Autair.

Mr. Nielsen: I could not care less whether they are air contracts or contracts for other kinds of goods and services. The basic principle is that every Canadian who is a taxpayer should have the opportunity to bid on such contracts. I think that is a basically fair principle to hold to. It does not make any difference whether or not they are air contracts. It seems to me this is a practice that the government could well consider getting back to.

The Haines road operation, which comes under the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, also comes in for a little criticism. Here is a Canadian road that the government has very laudably decided to keep open on an experimental basis for one year. It is being maintained on an all-weather basis. Yet I rather strongly suspect that the road is being maintained by United States equipment and with United States labour.

To me this is an untenable state of affairs. We have unemployed workmen in the Yukon Territory who are capable of doing the work, and we have Canadian equipment there which could very well be used on this job. All I have to go on now is suspicion, but I certainly do have the suspicion that this is not being done.

I have asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources several times whether the negotiations have been completed yet between the governments of the United States and Canada in so far as the maintenance of the road is concerned. All I have had by way of answers from the minister and other cabinet ministers are evasions and concealment. As a matter of fact, when answering all these questions the cabinet ministers seem to have a noted talent for concealing the truth.

The Chairman: Order. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I will resume my seat, but as I did not want to take the time on the orders of the day I should now like to make one or two corrections in my remarks of last Friday.

The Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Nielsen: The remarks I refer to are found on page 5272 of Hansard. At the bottom of the left hand column I am reported as having said "90 per cent of Canada's gold". That should read "90 per cent of Canada's placer gold". I said something else which I think the reporter missed. I said "The Yukon and this industry have contributed hundreds of millions of dollars to the national treasury". At the top of the right hand column on the same page it should read "territorial government" rather than "territory government", and it should be "is not" rather than "is". On page 5273 halfway down the left hand column the words "in the city" should read "at the air field".

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I did not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman a moment ago when he referred to the increase in salaries of the county court judges and compared them with those of the magistrates in the Northwest Territories. I should like to tell him that a recommendation for the increase in the salaries of magistrates in the Northwest Territories went forward some weeks ago, and it is a substantial one.

Mr. Nielsen: I am very happy to hear that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish on this occasion to follow my hon. friend, who has just spoken, into the realms of postal affairs. I accept the purity of his protestations on these matters as I recall our own protestations on similar matters when we used to sit on the other side. Today, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss the recent federal-provincial conference which has already entered into this debate and which I have been assured would continue on that subject whether or not I spoke this afternoon.

Perhaps it is just as well if I put on the record my view of what happened at the conference, its value, its results and what I consider to be its considerable achievements. The conference met in a spirit of friendliness and mutual good will as one would expect in a conference attended by the leaders of the governments of Canada, ministers of Canadian cabinets and officials of Canadian governments, provincial and federal.

It is quite true that the provincial leaders defended very vigorously, as it was their duty to do, the interests of their provinces, just as the federal representatives spoke for the policies and the interests of the federal government. But it is also true that at this conference, as at previous conferences, we all spoke and, I hope, acted as Canadians, and that in a way, an intangible way which cannot be measured, because these things can never be measured, we spoke with recognition of mutual interests, difficulties and problems, with a recognition of the things we had in common, a recognition of the problems we had in common, and I think this conference brought the provincial and federal governments closer together. In that sense the result was a good one.

The procedure at the conference was that which is often followed at conferences of this kind. We had plenary sessions and we broke up into committees. The committees reported back on the last day of the conference, and on that last day we agreed on a communique to the press. There was one innovation, at least in my memory of these conferences it was an innovation, that instead of making longish opening statements at the first meeting, these statements were prepared and circulated in advance, so that when the conference met it had been possible for all the delegates to it to become aware of the position of all the other delegations, and this was the basis for discussion from the very beginning.

Through me the federal government circulated a statement, that has been made public, and tabled, on the federal position with regard to many of these matters. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it would not be inappropriate for me to put on Hansard two or three paragraphs from this statement which had a specific bearing on certain general matters, general problems and general principles which we had to face at the conference. Among other things, I said this:

> In many areas, the federal and provincial governments are responsible for parallel action within their respective jurisdictions. Each must operate in its own sphere of jurisdiction, and respect the other's sphere. That is essential to both the letter and the spirit of our constitution. But it is equally essential that, in discharging the modern responsibilities of government, our parallel action should also be, in an important measure, concerted action. And concerted action means that there should be consultation and co-operation. Such consultation and co-operation can be effective only if they are mutual, working in both directions.

I went on:

> This is essentially what I have had in mind when speaking about the need for a "co-operative federalism". This new approach means several things. It means, first a mutual respect for the jurisdictions and the responsibilities of Canada and of the provinces. It means, second, timely and reliable two-way consultation as the basis for co-ordinating the parallel action which Canada and the provinces must take on matters of common and overlapping interest. Third, it means that if and when certain tax fields are shared, this should be done in a manner appropriate to the respective responsibilities of federal and provincial authorities. And it means, fourth, assurance that this sharing not only is equitable between the federal government and the provinces generally, but also is equitable among the provinces themselves, so that each separately can discharge its own responsibilities.

Then later on in my statement on this same general point I had this to say:

> A healthy and co-operative federalism requires strength in the provinces; it also requires a strong and healthy government for Canada as a whole, in whose parliament the people of each province have their representatives. Each government must not only have the powers required to discharge the responsibilities entrusted to it but also be in a position to exercise those powers.

There is one final paragraph which I might be permitted to quote:

> We are rightly conscious of our differing responsibilities, jurisdictions and powers in government. But we all recognize that we have a common purpose to advance the interests and welfare of the Canadian people. That purpose transcends separate interests without in any way diminishing them, because those interests are contained within it, and because they all contribute to the fabric of a Canada that is more than the sum of its parts.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, there was an opportunity for the delegates to study each other's opening statements, and so when the conference began we proceeded at once to the consideration of the agenda before us. The items on that agenda which commanded most attention and took up most time were those concerned with fiscal and economic questions generally. At the opening of the first meeting to deal with these questions specifically, again on behalf of the federal government, I put the federal position on the record. This was a closed session, but I think it is not inappropriate if I repeat what that position is, as stated then, because it has a bearing on what I wish to say subsequently.

I mentioned that special emphasis was placed in the briefs of the provinces, and in my view rightly placed, on the provinces' responsibility for our human resources, for our investment in people, and as the most important phase of that, investment for education in all its aspects. That is a responsibility which we as a nation can discharge only by devoting to it increasing resources to match the increasing needs of these kinds. I mentioned that provincial expenditures on education had increased, were increasing and ought to go on increasing, and that this was described in most of the provincial briefs as a priority, indeed in some as a first priority need; on that basis of priority, and indeed on other grounds, that the provinces had made a strong plea for increasing the provincial share of tax revenues in Canada.

They gave, as it had been expected that they would give, priority to education in the whole context of Canadian governmental activities, federal and provincial. They gave priority to education and to the increasing costs of education, and they claimed as a first priority the need to increase the provincial share of the total tax revenues in the country, primarily though not exclusively, to take care of this priority.

That was the view which, as I have just said, and as I admitted to the conference, would come naturally to the provincial governments. It did not perhaps come quite so naturally to the federal government, which had other important responsibilities to consider and which had, in its turn, to remain strong financially and economically, and strong in other ways in order to discharge its responsibilities. Nevertheless we on the federal side made it clear that we shared the view of the provinces as to the high priority that ought to be attached, in the interests of Canada as a whole, to educational improvement, and we appreciated the financial implications of such priority.

I went on to say—as I have already indicated this afternoon—that it was right and proper in our view that at this conference each government should defend its own interests. But then I added this, and it was really a repetition of what I had said in the statement which was circulated before the conference:

> But it is also proper that each of us has, above all a lively sense of the interests of the Canadian people, which are the first loyalty of us all. For that reason, we do not in these matters argue against you in principle, though we may not accept all your arguments or even your evidence supporting it. We know that your financial needs are increasing—and you know that ours are not decreasing.

So while we might agree, and did agree in principle at this conference, that the provinces needed more resources to meet increasing provincial responsibilities, there was one point, a point of fact, which some of the provincial briefs passed over rather lightly, I thought, but with regard to which we on the federal side were compelled to be very conscious. This was that we were living under a fiscal arrangement which already recognizes increasing provincial responsibilities; that the abatement of federal taxes on personal income in favour of the provinces, by arrangements made previously, was increasing year by year under that legislation. In short, Mr. Chairman, on this matter—and I will be coming back to it again—the question before this conference was not one of principle but of degree of priority and degree of assistance.

It was a question, not of the direction in which we should be travelling both provincially and federally, but of the pace at which it was practicable, or even possible, to move. That question of pace and priority involved fundamental questions about the shape of our tax system in Canada, questions which go deeper and beyond—as was pointed out by more than one representative at the conference—the problem immediately before us, of reallocation. These are questions that go right to the heart of our tax structure and our federal system, questions which are at present under examination by a number of expert commissions both at the federal and provincial level.

Therefore I proposed—and the proposal was made by others, notably, if I may say so, the premier of Alberta who has attended, I think, every federal-provincial conference since 1940—that we take a hard look at this whole question of federal-provincial relations in the tax field. We realized that we could not come up with a final answer to that problem in a conference which lasted only four or five days. It was obviously impossible, as we all agreed at the conference at this first meeting—and it was a first meeting—to rewrite in any fundamental way the fiscal arrangements under which we are now operating.

We had to look at joint programs, of course, because these, among other things, were and remain closely related to fiscal relationships. I made plain in this opening statement, as I had made plain earlier before the conference was called, the federal government's willingness to withdraw from some of these programs, on an agreed basis, if the provinces so wished. In mentioning that fact I went on to say we would have to re-examine tax sharing, not only in the light of the changes in costs and responsibilities within our jurisdictions but also in the light of what the provinces wished to propose about shared programs. I said it was only after a thorough review of such programs that we could decide how much or how fundamentally our fiscal relationships could wisely be changed.

It was not difficult, Mr. Chairman, to convince anyone at that conference of the need for such a complete review. The differences of emphasis in the provincial statements—and I take it that hon. members have had an opportunity to look at those provincial statements—were themselves enough to show the need for much more examination and discussion on a matter which more, perhaps than any other, calls not for unilateral action but for close federal-provincial consultations. At this opening meeting I went on to discuss one aspect of federal-provincial fiscal relationships which had to be considered at this particular meeting and which seemed to us to be ready for change. That was what we referred to as equalization. We need, as I said, to take note of the extent of federal and provincial occupation of common tax fields. But on the need for a more genuine equalization applied to any given degree of provincial occupation of the shared fields there seemed to be little room for doubt. I emphasized that the federal government—and I think this view was shared in one way or another by every provincial leader—regarded the concept of equalization as making possible a more co-operative federalism. We could not, I said, have co-operative federalism at all unless all the provinces, with all their variety of size and wealth—indeed, if there was not so much variety we would not need equalization—had power to discharge their constitutional responsibility, and no tax system in a confederation such as ours would make that possible unless it embodied the concept of equalization.

There was no difference of opinion on that. We all agreed that we could not build, sustain and keep united a strong confederation from sea to sea unless we ensured that the opportunities open to Canadians in one place were not allowed to lag behind the opportunities open to Canadians in other places. Also, an attempt to make opportunities comparable in education and other provincial services would not be successful, indeed would not be possible, unless our tax system secured in some manner to the provinces comparable—not, of course, equal, because that would be impossible—revenues per capita from standard rates of taxation. Obviously, as I pointed out at the beginning and as became very clear as the conference went on, there was room for discussion as to the formula which would best express this concept of equalization.

There were arguments for taking one type of revenue into account and not another. Indeed, an argument was put forward by one provincial premier for taking every kind of revenue into account. There were arguments as to whether equalization is best defined quite simply, "in order to bring the revenue yields up to those provinces in which, in any year, they are the highest"—I admit at once that it was the position that we had taken in opposition—or whether some slightly more elaborate formula was better because it would give more stability and certainty and perhaps do more to prevent inequities.

I said, having mentioned these points, that these were the points on which we wished to have the views of the provinces before we put forward our own proposal to the conference. I can assure the members of the committee that we did indeed hear those views. It was only after hearing those views that the federal delegation volunteered to put forward a proposal which I will come to later.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in a way, the communique which was tabled this afternoon, summarizes the results of the conference. However, perhaps I could try to put these results under certain headings, indicate very briefly what was accomplished in respect of each of those headings, and in one or two respects go into somewhat more detail.

The first question, and this occupied a good deal of attention, was the examination of the state of the Canadian economy. There was a general agreement on the need for federal-provincial consultation in the formative stages of economic policy of concern to the provinces, and this meant the long term economic objectives. In this connection, the federal-provincial ministers of trade and commerce and of industry agreed to meet shortly at the invitation of the federal Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Then, the next subject, and one that occupied most of our attention, one about which I have talked and will talk some more when I come back to it, was the question of fiscal arrangements. As hon. members know, equalization payments were altered from the national average to the average of the top two provinces and the abatement of federal estate taxes is also increased from 50 per cent to 75 per cent in favour of provincial succession duties. The effective date of these changes, Mr. Chairman, is to be April 1, 1964. The total cost to the federal treasury in 1964-65, and this arrangement is for the forthcoming year only, will be $87.4 million.

In putting forward this arrangement, Mr. Chairman, there has been some charge made, if I can use that word, that this represented a capitulation on the part of the federal government, more particularly to the provincial government of Quebec. It is interesting to note in respect of the charge of capitulation, that the premier of Quebec, when he went home over the week end, was charged with having capitulated to the federal government in Ottawa. We must try, therefore, to find out who capitulated to whom.

The fact is, of course, that there was no capitulation. It is very easy, therefore, for me to answer the question asked on November 27 by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, which appears on page 5156 of Hansard, when in referring to a brief which had been presented to the dominion-provincial conference by the premier of Quebec, the Leader of the Opposition said, "Can he say whether it is the intention of the government to capitulate to this ultimatum, as has been the case in the past?" I repeat, Mr. Chairman, there was no ultimatum and there was no capitulation. There was consultation. There were concessions, and there was an agreement.

Now, the next question dealt with conditional grants and shared cost programs. As a result of the discussion of this important matter, the conference agreed to set up a working group to study the need for conditional grants and shared cost programs, in preparation for the next federal-provincial conference which will take place early in 1964. No date has been fixed, but it will probably be in February or in March. The conference has been invited, and I think this will be a precedent, in that it will be the first time a federal-provincial conference has met outside of Ottawa, to meet in Quebec. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, with his encyclopaedic knowledge of these things, tells me I am wrong and that a conference has met out of Ottawa once, and it met in Quebec.

This conference, which it is proposed to hold in February or March, would be in a sense a continuation of the meeting last week to deal with other aspects of fiscal relationship and continue consideration of what was done last week, relating that consideration to what will be done about the shared cost programs. As I have already said, there are important financial implications about the action which may be taken in regard to these programs. In a sense, then, this will be a follow-up of the meeting last week.

The next matter on my list that was discussed was hospital insurance and costs of operation. Here, it was agreed that there should be an early conference of ministers of health to discuss hospital costs and related matters.

Then, we dealt with the question of categorical assistance programs. One of the constructive changes that was made in the first draft of the communique was to eliminate the word "categorical" which seems to be attached now to these assistance programs. It was agreed that an additional $10 per month would be paid under the welfare programs for old age assistance and for blindness and disability allowances. These are the three categorical assistance programs. There have been a great many questions asked in the house in recent weeks as to what we were doing about this part of the federal program, and in return we have replied that we would wait until the conference met so we could find out what the provinces desired. At the conference it was agreed we should take the step I have just mentioned and we will proceed to do that as soon as possible.

Then, under this heading it was agreed also to establish a working group, a federal-provincial working group to review the operation of all joint welfare programs in preparation for a discussion by the ministers at the next conference. This will be to prepare for the work of the next conference in this particular field.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Did the provinces not agree, in agreeing to the $10 increase, that they would raise the allowable income ceilings?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, there was unanimous agreement to that effect and I should have mentioned that. I am not sure of my figures, but I think the allowable ceiling has been increased to $1,260 from $1,140.

We discussed, though rather briefly, the question of the agricultural marketing boards, which matter was on the agenda. After a preliminary discussion that matter was referred to a meeting of federal and provincial ministers of agriculture which is to take place in Ottawa this month.

There was a discussion of Indian and Eskimo affairs, in the course of which we agreed that the objective was to achieve closer association of these Canadians with the lives of other Canadians; and that native people should be consulted as fully as possible so as to obtain their support and cooperation in the realization of this objective. It was decided that a federal-provincial ministerial conference should be held in May 1964 to discuss Indian affairs.

The next item on the agenda was the question of provincial lotteries. There was some discussion of that matter and a special meeting held of the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general. There was a strong desire on the part of one province to have the Criminal Code amended to make lotteries legal in any province which desired to have such lotteries. The federal delegation indicated that it had no intention of introducing national lotteries itself but was anxious to hear the views of the provinces with regard to this matter. While one province, the province of Quebec, was strongly in favour of this amendment to the Criminal Code, there were others who were opposed to the amendment, because while they themselves would not have to institute lotteries under such an amendment—there would be no obligation on their part to support any such action—they nevertheless in one or two cases felt some objection should be taken to the recognition of lotteries in this way, and in other cases felt that if there was a provincial lottery in one province where it was legal, there would be great difficulties in enforcing it in an adjacent province where it was illegal. Therefore the federal government, as the communique said, merely took note of the views expressed by the provinces and will have to give the matter consideration.

Then we had a quite complete discussion, or as complete as possible in the short time available, of the Canada pension plan. As a result of that discussion, we indicated that we would supply the provinces in writing with certain detailed information regarding the plan. I had a statement to make on this matter before the conference, and perhaps I can tell the committee that, in introducing the discussion, I listed headings under which I thought discussion might take place, and those headings included the main features of the federal pension proposal. The main discussion ranged around these features: First of all, coverage; to whom the plan would apply. Second, earnings limits; the amounts of income on which pensions were to be paid and contributions collected. Third, benefit levels; the size of pensions and the conditions under which they would be available. Fourth, pensionable earnings; a definition of what a man has been earning as the basis for calculating his pension. Fifth, the maturity period; the number of years over which pensions scales would rise to the full level of the plan. There was quite a vigorous discussion of that and some difference of opinion on it. Sixth, funding; the scale of contributions to be levied in relation to the size of reserves to be provided and the contribution which would thereby be made to savings during the years before the plan reached full maturity. Then next, the relation of the public plan to private plans and the question of such private plans contracting out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister allow a question at this stage? What were the views expressed by the federal government in regard to private plans? What is the scheme that the federal government has in mind which will permit the continuance of private plans; or, if continuance is not permitted, the scheme that would give credit to the various participants in present pension plans? What is the general outline in that regard? We have never had that.

Mr. Pearson: It would not be easy for me to go into detail at this time, of course, but I appreciate the importance of the subject and the interest of the committee in it. We pointed out to the conference that while we on the federal side had no objection to private plans contracting out—that is, no objection in principle—there were very great administrative difficulties. Those difficulties had been shown by experience in some countries to be almost insurmountable in the case of certain types of national plans.

Therefore we thought it would be better to proceed—we put this to the provinces for their consideration, and this is one of the matters on which we are writing further and giving them more detail—by introducing the kind of national plan to which private plans could be adapted. The provinces wanted to know about this principle of adaption and we all agreed that whether adaptation of that kind could be possible would depend on the nature of the public plan and how it could be assimilated with private plans, or vice versa. We hope, with the information which we will be giving to the provinces and giving to the house, to remove some of the fears expressed by some of the provinces that this would be the greatest stumbling block in the way of a satisfactory national pension plan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister allow a further question. He is generalizing at the moment, but could he say whether or not the federal government has a plan which will assure that those who today have private pension plans will not find themselves in a position where the contributions they have made and the credit to which they are entitled will not be taken into consideration by any federal plan?

Mr. Pearson: I can give my right hon. friend an assurance that in the plan that we will eventually put forward, after these exchanges of views which I have been talking about, the interests of those who are now contributing to private plans will be protected and that they will not lose by the Canada pension plan. I do not think I can go any further than that at the moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the plan is ready?

Mr. Pearson: The plan has been ready, Mr. Chairman, but as a result of consultations with the provinces—and surely this is the purpose of consultations with the provinces—we are now going to examine that plan in light of the views which have been put forward, and in light of the views put forward at two previous conferences with the provincial governments. I think this is the last such conference which will be required, and as a result of this conference and the exchange of written communications which will now take place in order to clear up some difficulties I think we can go ahead with a final federal pension plan. I am encouraged, Mr. Chairman, by the events of last week to say that the position of the provinces, who I hope will co-operate with us in the plan, and the position of the federal government, are both much closer than they were before the conference took place. I think the provincial premiers who were here would agree with that statement. The premier of Quebec indicated the intention of his government to stay out of the plan, as is their right, and to put into effect a provincial portable universal plan. But I think he would agree that as a result of the discussions last week and the final form which the federal plan will be taking, it would be easier for the Quebec provincial plan, if it is put into effect, to be dovetailed into the federal plan, or vice versa. So, as I say, I think it was a helpful conference from that point of view.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the Prime Minister has raised the views of various premiers, were the views expressed by the premier of Ontario in keeping with that spirit of co-operation which would indicate that the province of Ontario and the federal government have now come to a position so analogous that there will be agreement in this connection?

Mr. Pearson: I have every hope that that will be the case, Mr. Chairman, but I think I had better let Mr. Robarts—and I am very glad to pay tribute to the constructive part he played in the conference—speak for himself and his government in this connection. But I am hopeful we shall be able to work together and that Ontario will co-operate in a national pension plan. However, it will be for them to decide.

Another point which was discussed concerned other benefits which might be included—provision for disabled contributors, for younger widows with dependent children and orphans. This is another matter on which we shall have to exchange information with the provinces.

A further subject upon which views were exchanged—and it is an important one—was this: what safeguards could be established in order to restrain any tendency—some delegates thought it would be an inevitable tendency—to increase pension benefits without taking adequate account of the future cost and the effect on savings. I think we cleared up some misgivings which were in the minds of some of the provincial leaders that this federal scheme might, in the form in which they had studied it earlier, get out of control and ultimately have a bad effect on the financial stability of our country. We agreed that the provincial governments had a legitimate interest in this aspect of the matter and that some arrangement should be worked out by which the federal government will be able to co-operate with the provincial governments in the administration of the plan to see that this did not happen. There were some proposals put forward as to how this might best be done. I think we made progress in this direction and we agreed to continue the process by means of an exchange of briefs on some of the points which were not finally cleared up.

On behalf of the federal government we told the provinces that while we were willing and anxious to modify our plan in any way which seemed practical and desirable in order to meet provincial points of view and, in some cases, political apprehensions, nevertheless there were certain essentials in a federal contributory plan on which we must stand, and unless these essentials were embodied in any such plan we did not feel we could submit it to the House of Commons. Of course, the provinces wanted to know what these essentials were. They were outlined to the provinces during the course of the conference and they are as follows:

1. The plan must be as near universal as administratively practicable but with provision for voluntary participation.

On this point, there were some provinces which felt that the plan should be universal and compulsory so as to include all wage earners, whether self-employed or otherwise. Of course, that is a desirable thing and that is the objective to which we would be working if we had such a plan; but we felt it would be undesirable to make the scheme universal in a compulsory way from the beginning. The experience of other countries, notably of the United States, has shown how difficult this would be. We felt that the plan should be as universal as administratively practicable and that we should work toward the objective of complete universality.

2. It should apply up to the average level of earnings.

3. In combination with the flat-rate benefit, provide pensions which are modestly adequate for those who cannot make other provision for their retirement.

4. Leave scope for further provision by those who can make it; to this end, keep the disturbance of private plans to the minimum practicable.

5. Because many who cannot make further provision are now middle aged, it should have a moderately short maturity period.

There was a good deal of discussion on what that period should be.

6. Make the adequate minimum pensions available from age 65.

7. Provide security in real terms by relating pension levels to earnings levels at the time of retirement.

8. Provide safeguards against the costs of the plan being increased, to the detriment of savings.

These were what we considered to be the essentials in any federal plan.

Now I should like to turn to a subject which, perhaps, aroused the greatest attention, certainly the most controversial attention. I wish to return to the question of equalization and fiscal relations. In dealing with this matter I want to say something about arrangements for liaison and consultation between conferences and the discussion we had on that point.

I said before the conference began, and I repeated it this afternoon, that its success would not be measured by the number of specific decisions which were made during the week. Urgent as some of the problems are, the basic fact is that we were building for more than today. We are, or we should be, shaping the direction of Canadian federalism for a generation. I think the conference succeeded in its most important purpose, which was to ensure as far as it could that the direction in which we are proceeding will be that of what we now call co-operative federalism. In that spirit, I believe the main achievement of this conference, the achievement which is in my view of fundamental importance for the future of our country, was to improve the mutual understanding of the problems of the 11 governments and, on that basis, to provide for close consultation and co-operation in the months ahead.

It was agreed, without any dissenting voice, that it was now of the most urgent importance—more important than it has been in the past—that there should be this kind of consultation and continuous co-operation. Things have been done in the last year or year and a half or two years—and I am not thinking in any partisan way, nor do I wish to—which have been questioned by certain provinces. When these things, or analogous things were done ten or 15 years ago—and, indeed, they were—they were not questioned by the provincial governments. And there have been activities of the provinces, in their turn, which have had a bearing on federal responsibilities and federal actions. I do not think we can complain about these developments, because they are going to take place. Somehow or other, if the provinces are going to extend their activities in their own fields—and the federal government is bound to do the same—and if these activities overlap—and they are bound to overlap on occasions—and if sometimes, they seem to get in each other's way and contradict each other, it becomes more necessary for consultations to take place between the two levels of government than at any previous time.

I think this was agreed by everyone attending the conference and I am sure it will be agreed by all members of the committee.

On the federal side, it was pointed out that consultation is a two way street, and if we are to consult the provinces on the federal activities which are proposed—legislation and other matters which are of direct interest to the provinces—then the provinces should be anxious to carry out the same kind of consultation when they propose to take action in the fields of industry, the nationalization of power, trade promotion and other matters which have a direct bearing on the discharge of federal responsibilities.

There was no disposition to disagree on the necessity for that kind of consultation. In discussing the way this could be worked out—and again this could not be done in a few days—we agreed that there should be in each government, federal and provincial, some agency under a minister particularly charged with federal-provincial relations and federal-provincial affairs. This has already taken place in some governments. I think there is a minister of federal-provincial relations in Quebec. I believe there is one in New Brunswick and I believe there is one in Manitoba. The premier of Ontario, to his great surprise, found during the conference that he was the minister in charge of federal-provincial relations in Ontario, although he had not been aware of it up to that time. One of his officials told him so.

It was agreed that we should in our respective governments work out suitable machinery in the sense we should have agencies in our governments particularly charged with the responsibility of ensuring, in so far as it can be assured by this kind of action, that there will be the kind of consultation which will remove difficulties before they become crises. Very often when there are difficulties of this kind it is not due to calculation or design on anybody's part, but rather to carelessness and the fact that we just did not think about it. We know about that in international affairs.

I think this would be a step forward and we all agreed to do that. We on the federal side will be taking steps toward that end.

Then it was thought that in addition to these separate agencies or departments, provincial and federal, we could set up a liaison secretariat. It was felt we should proceed carefully about this, because this is not the kind of thing that should be done overnight in that a secretariat of this kind in Ottawa, if you like, might create more confusion than it would do good in the field of consultation and co-operation, because it would be difficult to figure out at the beginning to whom such a secretariat would be responsible, if it had representatives of all the governments, provincial and federal. We thought this was an objective to be worked out in the light of experience.

Finally, in this field of consultation it was felt it would be helpful if we could have a kind of calendar of federal-provincial meetings each year. At the beginning of the year the federal-provincial ministerial contacts required during the year would be worked out. Some of my hon. friends opposite have had experience with this kind of thing and if hon. members will study this matter, as I am sure some of them have, they will be surprised, if they did not know it before—I know I was surprised—at the amount of federal-provincial consultation that now goes on and the machinery that has been set up for federal-provincial consultation. It was felt it would be helpful if we could organize this matter, pull it together and relate one kind of consultation to another, so that at the beginning of the year we would have a kind of calendar of federal-provincial conferences during the year, culminating at the end of the year perhaps in a federal-provincial conference at the prime minister-premier level, to which there could also be invited ministers of finance and economic affairs, who would take part in that kind of consultation at the end of each year. We thought that would probably be a very good thing to do.

While there was general agreement on the desirability of this kind of consultation, I pointed out, and I think others had the same feeling, that while consultation is essential, consultation is not an end in itself and consultation can be no substitute for action, as some of us have learned from experience in the field of international affairs. Therefore consultation should not get in the way of action. It should ensure that the action that is being taken is the kind of action that will not cause trouble afterwards because people who were concerned were not consulted about it. I hope we will be able to make a good deal of progress in the months and years ahead in this development, which is so important with this new concept of what I have referred to as co-operative federalism.

The most important work in this field lies ahead of us, because it certainly was not completed last week, and indeed the most important subject that we discussed last week in its immediate effect was the question of tax sharing and equalization. As I pointed out, as a result of the conference, the federal government will now propose to parliament certain changes in the fiscal arrangements for the coming financial year. As I have said, they are changes which will mean the federal government's revenues next year will be $87 million less than they would be if the existing arrangements had carried through without change, and the revenues of the provinces will be correspondingly increased.

The changes that are to be made in this field are not exactly the changes that I indicated at the beginning of the conference the federal government would have preferred to make. I emphasized in the discussions at the beginning of the conference, as I have emphasized many times before, my belief in the concept of equalization of provincial revenues through the shared tax field, and we would have preferred to have full equalization, which means equalization up to the revenue level of the top province. We have been criticized and very strongly criticized at the conference, for not doing just that. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam had a few words to say on this and my hon. friend's successor as premier of Saskatchewan criticized us at the final meeting at the conference, and in public, in much the same terms. I should like to deal with this particular criticism, but as it will take me ten or 15 minutes to complete what I have to say, perhaps you might permit me to call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, before I go into that.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed with the consideration of private members' business, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROVISION OF MEDICAL AND DENTAL CARE TO PENSIONERS

Mr. Gerard Laprise (Chapleau) moved:

That in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of providing all federal government pensioners with free medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to introduce this evening the following motion which is found on the order paper under No. 17, and reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of providing all federal government pensioners with free medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care.

Mr. Speaker, when I had this motion put on the order paper on May 17 last—which is quite a long time ago—my aim was then, as it is today, to make the house understand the anxiety of elderly people drawing a pension from the federal government, when they have to face ill health. The small pensions they receive hardly permit any savings. In many cases, when illness strikes, our old people just wait and hope to get over it. They persist in only calling a doctor at the last minute, to hear him say that it is now too late and that they should have called him earlier.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of the many letters I received from our old, blind and invalid people, and others, who have been struck by illness and have nothing but their meagre pension, that I introduced the present motion.

Some lucky people, as I would call them, claim that if the parties concerned do not have enough savings on retirement and have not provided for their old age, it is because they have spent too freely and have not saved enough. In reply, I would say that if Canadian citizens and especially our workers and farmers are unable to save for their old age, it is simply because they have to pay to the government in income tax and otherwise, throughout their lives, whatever they could have saved for their retirement.

Mr. Speaker, that is why we are making this request today and why the people of Canada ask that the government ensure medical security for the aged.

Everybody agrees that that small pension only helps older citizens to survive; it could not be their only source of income.

I feel that it is the duty of the national government to provide for the security of our retired citizens who can count only on such government allowances to live.

If, as suggested in this motion, the government provided necessary care to people drawing a pension from the state, it would contribute a great deal to the banning of much misery and worry.

I hope the government will consider the motion with the greatest attention and understanding.

I know that the government is now discussing certain retirement plans for our older people. But the subject matter of this motion, that is some forms of illness should, because considerable medical expenses are perhaps more frequent in that age bracket, be the main concern of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the motion will be agreeable to all the members and that the government, after having studied it exhaustively, will bring in, as soon as possible, the necessary readjustment.

The federal-provincial conference which has just come to a close has brought a glimmer of hope to our blind and disabled people, as well as to our senior citizens, as far as an increase in their pensions is concerned. But we hope that the government will go one step further and grant that assistance to our older citizens, without a means test, from age 65, and from age 60 in all other cases.

I would like to think that the government will continue to examine carefully the situation and that, together with the provinces, in an improved spirit of understanding and cooperation, it will find the means to give more adequate assistance to the disabled and the blind.

[Text]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think there are very few members in this house who are not in favour of measures to relieve hardship, especially hardship due to ill health, and especially hardship of people in the general category of pensioners. But while we all sympathize very much with the objectives of such a motion, as members of this house we have a responsibility to act according to measures which can be generally recognized as responsible measures.

The wording of this particular motive gives me a great deal of concern. It states:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of providing all federal government pensioners with free medical, surgical, dental and opthalmological care.

If there ever was an omnibus resolution, this is one, and I would like to pay a little attention to the problem of definition. The motion refers to "all federal government pensioners." Just whom are we talking about?

Are we talking about the retired employees of the government of Canada? Are we talking about retired members of the armed forces? Are we talking about those persons in receipt of old age security pensions, in receipt of old age assistance, in receipt of aid to the disabled, in receipt of blind pensions, and those who are in receipt of unemployment assistance and general assistance at the local level, which is in part reimbursed to the provinces through federal grants? Are we considering family allowance recipients who, in a sense, are pensioners—if we define "pensioners" as persons in receipt of regular payments from the government of Canada?

The matter of definition has not been faced by the sponsor of this motion, and surely one of the first things we should give attention to is the definition of those who would be eligible for benefits. For example, I find in the last report tabled by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which states that in March, 1962, there were 927,590 persons receiving old age security. These are certainly federal government pensioners, and their numbers are now approaching one million.

At that time there were 6,562,287 children receiving federal monthly payments. Their numbers again have increased fairly substantially since that date. There were just about 100,000 persons receiving old age assistance, over 50,000 persons receiving aid to the disabled, and 8,750 persons receiving blindness allowances. There were something of the order of 600,000 persons benefiting from the unemployment assistance payments, which were credited through the provinces to the municipalities administering the benefits at the local level.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we have to define the coverage. I listened carefully to the hon. member moving the motion, and my impression is that he was talking about those persons who are retired employees of the government of Canada. I wish he, or those who will speak in support of it, would clarify this particular point. I would like to know just what particular group of citizens we are talking about, because if we take a definition of pensioner to be anyone who is receiving benefits from the government of Canada, we come up with a very substantial portion of the population of our country. We are talking about something like seven and three quarter millions of persons, something in excess of 40 per cent of the population of Canada, if we take the broadest possible interpretation. If this is the intent of the mover of the motion, then obviously this is a measure of very substantial financial magnitude.

If its intention is to define in a much more restrictive sense the persons who are eligible, he has failed to do this so far in the debate; and I think one of the first rules of debate is to define the terms we employ so everybody will know what we are talking about.

We are also talking about benefits. Again, the mover of the resolution is most generous; he wants to provide free medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care. This is a very comprehensive approach to health services. I personally—and I am sure this applies to every hon. member of the house—regret any circumstances in which persons in Canada, no matter who they are, are not able to receive adequate health services. Certainly the World Health Organization, in its definition of health as being the complete social, mental and physical well being of a person, takes a comprehensive approach to the problem and suggests that this type of service is one of those things which citizens in a democratic society have some right to expect. The problem, again, is this: It is one thing to respect the right to services; it is another thing, in an omnibus resolution, to bring about a revolutionary, overnight change in a measure under which something like 40 per cent of the population of the country could receive such services, if that is the intention of the mover of the resolution.

If it is his intention to deal only with a small, restricted group of persons who are former employees of the government of Canada, without regard to a means test, that is an entirely different proposition and one I would not be prepared to accept in those terms, any more than I am prepared to accept the omnibus resolution. If it is the concern of the mover of the resolution to deal with various categories of disabled persons, blind persons, recipients of old age assistance—and there was a reference in his opening statement to such persons—I think he has an obligation to look at the services being now provided province by province across Canada. In one breath the mover of this resolution talks about constitutional problems; he is very anxious that the federal government should not invade anything that is a provincial responsibility or provincial prerogative. Health traditionally has been a provincial responsibility in Canada, and the federal government's role in this field has been largely developed in the direction—I say largely; there are some provisos which I want to deal with later—of making grants in aid to the provinces for hospital insurance and diagnostic services provided by the hospital. The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act is an example of this. That is a good example of the role the federal government plays in this field, and the rights of the provinces and their primary obligations in this area have been carefully safeguarded.

Many provinces in Canada have developed programs of health services for special needy groups of persons. The province of British Columbia, the province of Alberta, the province of Saskatchewan, the province of Manitoba and the province of Ontario have developed programs by which they have made per capita allowances into pooled funds. Out of these funds services are provided. The medical profession bills the fund, usually on a fee for service basis, for services rendered. If the funds are insufficient to meet the claims as billed by the professional men, there is a formula for taxing the claims, pro rating them and administering them out of the funds. This is to safeguard both the professional man, the provider of the service and the recipient of the service and is in the interests of the public in that it makes sure that funds which are committed in this area are used wisely and effectively, with a minimum of waste.

If it is the intention of the mover of the resolution that such funds should cease to operate, I think he should say so. If it is his intention to extend this type of coverage, province by province, to those parts of the country in which such benefits are not now enjoyed, I think he should frame a totally different kind of resolution to place before this house. I for one do not believe it is the responsibility of the federal government to intrude upon fields which have been developed and are now being exercised as provincial responsibilities, in the form of adopting this kind of resolution, without a great deal of prior consultation to make sure that, whatever moves are made, they are made with the consent of those affected and with due regard to our constitutional arrangements. I find it difficult to believe that the mover of the resolution can speak so strongly of provincial rights in one respect one day and then make a motion of this nature which would, in a very revolutionary manner, set aside provincial rights and intrude the federal government into areas in which the federal government has not so far been regarded as having a primary responsibility.

When we talk about the provision of these services I think there are two or three very fundamental principles involved. If the object is to provide free medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care, we have to make sure there are the necessary facilities for the provision of such care. Traditionally there have been two approaches. One is for the federal government to provide such services, in the manner, for example, in which the Department of Veterans Affairs provides services. The last annual report of the Department of Veterans Affairs that for the fiscal year 1962-63, which was tabled in this house, shows for example that 182,713 men and women are receiving service-connected pensions, benefits as a result of pensions which have been awarded from war service. A wide measure of care is provided to such persons through hospitals operated by the federal government, through medical practitioners who work for the federal government, and others and who perform services under an established tariff for the federal government. A broad range of health services is provided of a standard that I am proud to say makes Canada rate very highly with regard to other nations of the world. Certainly a tremendous amount has been done by way of providing services to veterans that certainly goes far beyond the record of previous wars and the record of many other countries associated with us in our military efforts. But this type of provision is an expensive one. I for one do not quarrel with expense as such—although as public representatives we must always be aware of expense—but I am concerned with an approach which selects certain groups of the population for preferred benefits and does not provide a general, across the board approach, which I think is the healthier one and one that we must set as an objective.

In regard to hospital insurance, one of the conditions the government of Canada required of every province signing an agreement before it could claim federal grants in aid was that services must be universally available within the province. "Universally available" meant there should be no arbitrary or categorical distinctions; that citizens of Canada or people who met the residence requirements, regardless of age, regardless of sex, regardless of any other social attributes that may or may not have been the basis of discrimination in other countries, would be eligible for services as a matter of right within the framework developed. I think it is wrong to pick out one category of citizens. The category the mover of the resolution has in mind may be people who happen to have been employed by the government of Canada. Perhaps he has in mind that they should qualify under a means test administered for one of the various aid programs. It is not clear from his statement what he had in mind. Regardless of what he has in mind, I personally feel that the objective in the extension of these services should be on a universal basis, or at least a basis which is spelled out clearly to allow broader sections of the population to benefit.

One of the methods of determining it could be, of course, the means test. That is the basis of eligibility for the category of programs to which reference was made a little while ago. But to set up a category of the population, a large group of persons, as those who would be eligible for services on the basis of a means test is a fundamental move which this house could not take without a great deal of prior consultation with the provinces, and with the professions involved.

The other method on which services have been provided is the so-called indemnity benefit. Instead of the service approach, you take the approach of providing benefits through an indemnity type of insurance plan. I do not think, generally speaking, the benefits under the indemnity type cover complete medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care because the private insurance companies, in developing this indemnity approach, generally insist upon certain types of financial deterrents, such as the co-insurance clause, before comprehensive insurance of this nature is underwritten. Again, there was nothing in the resolution or in the introductory statement by the mover of the resolution which suggested that he had this type of provision in mind, the indemnity type of approach, which is the approach generally favoured by the private insurance industry, and many of other carriers.

Regardless of which approach is taken, the service approach or the indemnity approach, there must be a careful determination of the categories eligible. There must be a careful spelling out of the limitations of the financial commitment with respect to the services used. With many of the service plans a pro rata device or a pool fund seems almost inescapable, if the service approach is to be adopted. If, on the other hand, the indemnity approach is to be adopted, then certainly the experience with those plans which have experimented with this type of indemnity plan would not indicate that the type of coverage provided would meet the general requirements of this resolution, that is free medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care. Certain deterrent charges requiring the patient to pay a portion of the charge has been found, in many cases, to be necessary as part of the administration of these plans in order to keep financial responsibility within limits.

In summarizing what I have argued, may I say that the mover of this resolution has not defined "federal government pensioners". As I have pointed out, a very large proportion of our population receive cash benefits from the public treasury, and they could fall within the popular acceptance of the term "pensioners", as used in this resolution. If, however, it is the intention to restrict it to ex-employees of the government of Canada who are retired, or to those beneficiaries of the categorical assistance programs administered by the provinces with federal government reimbursement, then that is another matter. This has not been made clear. If the hon. member's introductory remarks suggested that categorical assistance recipients should be eligible for this care, then there would at least have to be a great deal of discussion with the provinces in a federal-provincial conference before any move of this nature would be justified by the federal government. I feel that there is a grave constitutional question as to the way in which the resolution would be interpreted in its present wording. I am not saying it could not be done, but I am saying if that is the intention of the mover of the resolution, then his resolution should have been worded accordingly.

I pointed out, sir, the way in which benefits were provided on the service basis or on the indemnity basis. The service basis has been adopted by D.V.A., and that has a very obvious limitation within the framework of the program itself. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that a commitment of this magnitude for the benefit of certain categories of the population only, is not a proper approach. I would prefer to approach assistance of that type in the hospital insurance field, for example, where we have the general categories of the population benefiting. If it is the intention of the mover of the resolution to adopt the indemnity approach to his provisional plan, then this has not been stated and is by no means clear. The indemnity approach, as exemplified by the private insurance companies, contains many deterrent clauses and co-insurance clauses, while the wording in the resolution refers to free medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care.

For all of these reasons, I feel that the mover should withdraw this resolution and introduce one more precisely worded to state his intention, indicating clearly what group of the population he intends to have covered. I think such a resolution should also define much more carefully the method of providing benefits. I do not feel, Mr. Speaker, that in the manner specified in the resolution it is possible to cover the greatest range, because of the limitation on the concept of providing service, and at least the resolution should spell out quite carefully the intentions of its mover.

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this motion. I take exception, first, to the use of the words "federal government pensioners" because this term is not defined. One should define what a federal government pensioner is. If we assume that all those now in receipt of a pension from the federal government are included, then I believe this type of service is provided for these people now.

Then, too, I take exception to the use of the word "free" in the wording of this resolution because this puts people in the category of accepting charity, which is a degrading state. We, in this party, feel that medical care is something one has a right to pay for, and therefore one is not accepting charity. Then, too, this should not be limited to old age pensioners or to federal government pensioners, but rather it should be available on a universal basis. People should receive medical care in accordance with the need for medical care, rather than in accordance with ability to pay.

At the present time, I believe it is rather degrading to subject these people to a means test. This takes a person out of the category of being a human being, because in many cases he is herded into hospital clinics. It is degrading because the person cannot have any worldly possessions at all. He must get rid of them before he is eligible for free medical care. This care is very limited so far as private doctors are concerned. The patient is allowed to go to the hospital for major procedures, such as surgery. In the hospital students who are learning, interns, are allowed to look after these people.

This state of affairs does not make one very happy. I have worked in it; I have seen it. I have had many patients myself in need of medical, dental or ophthalmological care, and this care was not available to them under any circumstances, unless a friend provided it or someone donated money.

Another bad feature of charitable care of the sort we have now is that a person is looked after by the private doctor up to a certain point, and then the patient goes to a hospital clinic. At that point that person loses complete contact with his family doctor, which I think is a bad state of affairs. Contact should be maintained. It must be something which is continuous, and the patient's history must be followed through in all its phases. If such a person is to receive charitable care, I think there should be liaison with the family doctor so that the patient is adequately looked after and cared for on a continuous and interested basis, keeping in mind that the man is a human being, regardless of his financial state.

The degradation of charity suggested by this motion is a very poor suggestion. On the other hand the suggestion that these people receive medical care is an excellent one. The wording of the motion is very poor in that it is not explicit at the beginning and it is too all-inclusive of the type of care a person gets, which is putting him on a charitable basis, as I have said, rather than on the basis that the man has earned his right to health.

I think the government should set themselves up as an ideal employer, and their employees should be covered by a plan, contributions toward which are deducted from their pay, and the plan carried on after retirement. At least, that should be done on a temporary basis until we have some universal form of medical care for all our citizens. The government should be an ideal employer. The motion intimates that government employees are not adequately cared for but require some special action to get complete medical care on a charitable basis. I think the wording of the motion is such that the question needs further study. This motion should be more explicit in its definitions before it can be accepted and approved.

Mr. D. G. Hahn (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion I think all of us can be tagged with the same tag, and that is that we literally do not know what we are talking about; because the resolution is so ill defined it is impossible to really clearly understand what the sponsor is proposing. The motion suggests that the government should provide medical services to all federal government pensioners. But it stops there without, as has been previously said, defining the motion further. It does not say which particular federal government pensioners. It does not say whether we are talking about old age pensioners, veterans or retired civil servants. It does not say whom we are talking about, so we have no idea from the motion how large a body of people we are referring to.

In the second place, it does not clarify exactly what type of medical, surgical, dental and ophthalmological care should be provided. Does this mean free glasses? Does it mean free medicines? Does it mean free dentures? We just do not know. So the motion tosses out what is a very nice idea, but does not in itself define it. It leaves out what I think is a pretty important piece of information which must be brought before the house, if we are to look at a measure such as this. Nowhere does it indicate how much this service would cost. How can we in all conscience pass any piece of legislation in this house without some idea of the cost involved? Not only should we know the cost; we must also have some idea of how we are going to raise the funds. Is the recommendation of this particular motion within the economic power of the country? What effect will it have? Is it far reaching enough that it is going to be a major piece of social legislation which will put a major burden on the treasury, or is the motion referring only to a small group of people, to limited services, and hence a limited drain on the treasury? These things we do not know, and I think we must know about these matters before we can pass judgment on such a piece of legislation.

This motion covers a certain group of people with a certain type of medical care. But neither proposal is clearly defined. It also excludes some people. Let us look at some of the people who are excluded. Excluded, as I read it, from the free medical care might be the welfare cases in our municipalities. Surely these people are in need of medical, dental and other care. Surely they need it as much as some classes of federal pensioners. In proposing this motion the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) did not tell us why he selected for this special treatment the group he did, but excluded others. He did not say a word about those who are excluded from this care and those who might be equally deserving.

The last point on this proposed measure is the problem of provincial rights. We have had a lot of discussion about this problem in the last few months, and it seems to me that here is a motion which, if it were drafted as legislation and passed, would be a direct impingement on the rights of the provinces. Nothing has been said by the hon. member about that particular aspect of the problem, which I think is a pretty important factor and calls for further study.

This motion, Mr. Speaker, probably will not come to a vote. I think the reason for this is that we have here a good concept, something to which it is very difficult to say no. It is extremely difficult to go on record as saying no to giving medical care to people who need it. So we start with a good concept, to which it is difficult to say no. In proposing the motion the hon. member puts us on this side of the house in this position: What would happen if we voted for this motion? It is true the motion does not bind the government, but it is surely an expression by the house, directed to the government, of an opinion that the government should give consideration to doing certain things. A favourable recorded vote would be a pretty strong lever toward directing government action, and I believe the government could be properly held to account if they proceeded to do nothing. Therefore we on this side are put in the position of accepting this motion, of voting against it, or of doing something else. If the motion is agreed to, as I have mentioned earlier the government will be put in the position virtually of having to do something about bringing forward legislation in this area. Because, as I say, it is very difficult to say no to a measure which contains the germ of an idea as good as this.

We are, thus, in the difficult position of having to find some other means of stopping this motion, because this particular motion cannot be allowed to pass. I do not think any member of the house could, in all conscience, allow a blanket resolution of this kind to go through, or assent to a piece of legislation without having some concept of the cost involved. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis), this could turn out to be a piece of social legislation of great magnitude; it could have a significant effect upon the economy of the whole country and we would be negligent in our duty if we allowed it to go through without knowing how great this effect might be.

Many of us are reluctant to put ourselves on record as being against some course of action which would be a nice thing to be able to do. So, in all probability, we discuss the question and are horrified because there is no further time left. I believe this is not a particularly good process. Maybe if we were to get a vote on some of these measures there would be a better discussion of these points. But I do not think we should be required to vote on some of these issues, unless their full impact has been presented to us. In other words, if we on this side are to be expected to say yes, or no, the speakers on the other side of the house should, equally, be expected to present a fully rounded package for discussion; they should indicate the less agreeable side of the proposition—the extent to which taxes would need to be raised to put their ideas into effect, and so on.

I do not think this motion will, in fact, come to a vote, but if it did, in the circumstances I would have no choice but to oppose it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gerard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, just a few words about this motion. Like the members who spoke before me, I did not fail to notice a lack of precision in this motion, with regard to the beneficiaries and, finally, with regard to the amounts; as some understand it, private members' hour simply gives the members an opportunity to express their views, but I am happy just the same to make a few remarks about the measure under consideration.

I am pleased with this motion because the house realizes that it has some merit and especially because it enabled some members opposite to insist, in the name of the constitution, on the rights of the provinces.

While I was listening to the hon. members opposite, I told myself that if they had shown the same zeal during the election campaign, when the portable pension plan was promised, the province of Quebec would not have to make such a fuss to have the plan postponed.

I admit that in my opinion, the hon. members were right when they raised the big question of the constitutional character of the measure with respect to recipients. I think the motion could include the category of people having worked for the federal government and, simply, our old people who are in receipt of an old age pension.

If I suggested that this notice of motion would help setting up a pension plan beneficial to retired employees, the federal government itself could establish a plan and thus set an example for all employers throughout the country.

It is high time the government consulted with the provinces in order to provide our pensioners with the medical care they need. The government gave them a $10 pension increase, and I must admit, that this is very commendable. The main concern of our old people is, of course, housing and food, but as mentioned by the hon. member for Chapleau, they are mostly obsessed by the fear of illness. They fear that in a month or two, they will be ill and will have to face the cost of medical care.

In my opinion, the government should consider social legislation, providing free medical care to government pensioners, because in a developed society it is quite unlikely that our senior citizens would be starving and roofless, but it is still possible for our old fathers and grandfathers to be deprived of dental care, opthalmological or medical care, simply because they cannot afford them.

I take the opportunity afforded by this motion to suggest to the government, that when they decide to give something to our old people, they should grant free medical care rather than an amount of $5 per month which has been mentioned, even if I am also in favour of that suggestion.

Miss Pauline Jewett (Northumberland): The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard) has just said his understanding of the motion is that it would cover retired employees of the federal government, and old age pensioners. I am somewhat confused because the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) in introducing the motion talked mostly about the disabled and the blind. Presumably he thought these would be the primary groups in receipt of free dental, medical and other care. Perhaps this only goes to prove what other hon. members have already argued this afternoon, namely that none of us is sure about who are covered by the phrase "federal government pensioners" in this motion.

[Mr. Girouard.]

However, rather than take the hon. member for Chapleau further to task for his definition, I think I shall congratulate him on the wisdom he has shown in a general way in implying, at any rate, that matters relating to health care are a national responsibility in this country. I have often felt in recent weeks and months that, increasingly, members of this house and, to a still greater extent, members of provincial legislatures, particularly in the province of Quebec, have been taking the view that matters relating to health and welfare are matters solely of interest and concern to the provinces. This has saddened me. I think these are matters which affect all Canadians and with regard to which we should have certain national goals, objectives and standards. Therefore, if the hon. member does not mind, I would congratulate him on bringing forward a motion of this kind which does, it seems to me, clearly imply a national responsibility in this field. It is true his proposals cover only one sector of the whole health field. Nevertheless it is clearly a large sector, as my hon. friend from Carleton has pointed out, if the term "federal government pensioners" is taken in its widest meaning. But, if I may interpret the hon. member's opening remarks, his feeling seems to be that this would only be a beginning, and that later we might move toward a comprehensive or universal scheme of health insurance for the country as a whole emanating from the federal government, undoubtedly in co-operation with the provinces.

Apart from congratulating him on sharing my feeling that this is a national responsibility, and that we must have national objectives and national standards in the field of health, I should like to say, as the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) said—here I am afraid I am being a little critical—that I feel the use of the word "free" is inadvisable. It strikes me that it does seem to smack a little of charity, of a government handing out largesse in a kind of benignant way to the poor, the elderly and so on. I am sure the hon. member did not intend it in that way, but when one phrases a motion as he has done the implication is one of condescension to a large number of citizens of our country and, of course, certainly none of us should feel condescending toward them.

The hon. member for Chapleau implied that the older citizens of Canada would not be in the difficult position they are in today in relation to the enormous costs of health care which practically all of them face, had they not had so much of their incomes taken away from them by taxes during their working years. It is through taxation primarily, of course, that we are able to redistribute income in such a way as to make possible a health scheme or a social welfare scheme in this country.

My experience so far in the political field, and it is a short one, has been that often those people who have smaller incomes object the least to the paying of their share of taxation. I find that the people who receive larger incomes are usually the ones who grumble a great deal about taxes, and may try to find ways of avoiding them. The great bulk of the Canadian people, it seems to me, are quite well aware of the fact that it is through the payment of taxes that we get a redistribution of income and all the benefits. Indeed, to quote a famous justice, it is through the paying of taxes that one buys civilization. I do not believe the people think that one should simply take away taxes, and then let them do all the worrying about health care, and other provisions for their later years. Surely most citizens believe rather in a social welfare scheme of things whereby they will be able to make some contribution during their working years through taxes, and whereby they will be able to make a contribution more or less in accordance with their incomes that will then enable all members of the society to have a decent standard of living and, if necessary, of social security, including old age pensions, and so on.

To revert for a moment to the use of the word "free", as I say it does imply, whether or not the hon. member intended it, a kind of condescension of those who have to those who have not, which to my way of thinking is quite contrary to the way we really feel about matters in this country. I believe that all of us, no matter what our incomes, really want to make some contribution to the total welfare system.

This brings me to the final point I should like to make, and I will not say much about it because other members have mentioned it. It is that we do want to have in this country a universal system whereby all people of all ages, children as well as adults, will have contributed to a general health and welfare security scheme which will include them and of which they will be a part. Indeed, it is my hope that before the four years are up that we will be in power we will have introduced such a scheme in the health sphere to complement what we have already done in the hospitalization sphere, and what we are now in the midst of doing in the old age pension sphere.

Mr. J. E. Lloyd (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in agreement with those critics of the wording of the resolution who have indicated that it leaves unanswered a number of questions as to the scope of its application. I believe the resolution perhaps fails to guide the government in that it refers in its wording to all federal government pensions. Here is a point where one finds a most serious omission. Indeed, if the resolution were passed the government would have to send it back to the house for clarification and identification of the thoughts that were in the minds of members of the house when they passed such a resolution. In essence, therefore, if the resolution were passed we would indeed be occupying the attention of the government to no avail, and this would simply result in a waste of time.

I share the concern of other speakers that certainly our society in 1963 must look at every avenue possible to provide social justice for its citizens. Indeed, the things we are now engaged in in many ways in trying to protect the free world are such—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, the house will revert to the consideration of the business interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in winding up my remarks on the recent federal provincial conference I wish to say something in greater detail than I have up to the present on one matter which caused very considerable interest and some controversy; that is the formula which the federal government announced to alter the equalization payments to the provinces.

I admit we could have adopted a formula which would have equalized the revenues from the tax sharing sources up to that of the highest province, and if we had done that there would have been, presumably, no criticism that we were not carrying out a formula to which we had been committed previously. But if we had—and the conference certainly showed this—we would have been criticized by some members of the conference in other ways.

This was a conference, as I said at the beginning—and I quoted this afternoon from my words to that effect—at which we listened to provincial views. We knew perfectly well whatever formula we adopted in this matter of equalization it would not please everyone. Our purpose was to find a course which, given the views of the federal government and the differing views of the provinces, would on balance be a reasonable course, a course that would in our view best serve the interests of all Canadians, and a course which would be put forward for one year only. I think in the circumstances we adopted the right course.

I think we arrived at a result which was reasonable. There are those who would have certainly preferred equalization to be based on the revenues of the top province to which indeed, and I repeat, we had committed ourselves; but when we heard all the provincial views, when we had all the facts and figures of economic and financial conditions in the provinces before us, we were impressed by the argument which was put forward for returning to the former system, by using the average of the two top provinces.

The difference in money terms between taking the top province and the average of the two top provinces is not very great. For next year that difference is estimated at something over $12 million in total, and while $12 million is a very substantial sum of money, in respect of this particular problem and spreading it across the country to all the provinces, the difference in respect of any particular province, except the province of Quebec, is not very great. If we had taken the top province it would have meant another $600,000 for Newfoundland, another $144,000 for Prince Edward Island, another $1 million and a few thousand for Nova Scotia, $832,000 for New Brunswick, $7,464,000 for Quebec, nothing of course for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, $1,200,000 for Manitoba and $1,250,000 for Saskatchewan.

Now, I am not making light of these figures, because they are in themselves important, but the point is that they are estimates for one year. For another year on that basis they might have been appreciably different, not so much in total but—the way things were moving—in the distribution between provinces. The point of using the average of the two provinces is that it gives more certainty and stability in the application of this principle of equalization, and while it does give considerable assistance to those below the average of the top two, it lessens year to year fluctuations in the equalization payments in which provinces can anticipate, and those fluctuations, according to our calculations, would have been greater if we had taken the top province rather than the average of the top two provinces.

[Mr. Pearson.]

So, listening to the views of the provinces as a whole, there were those who wanted to equalize to the top, there were those who did not want any change in the present formula, and there were those who accepted the equalization to the top two as the best formula in the circumstances.

In the same spirit, Mr. Chairman, we took account of the views of some provinces on the subject of natural resource revenues as a factor—and it is a factor which had been introduced by the previous government—to equalize grants.

Perhaps in the future we may find a better way of doing all this, a better way of equalization than that which has been attached to any formula we have been able to agree to in the past. The disparities in the yields of the shared taxes are accepted as the best single measure for the measurement of needs as a basis for equalization. But, as was pointed out by a good many provincial premiers, these disparities are not a perfect measure. The yields of most other provincial taxes vary in much the same way as those of the direct taxes that are chosen, but natural resource revenues do not vary in that way. They are very much greater for some provinces than for others, and in the provinces where they are highest they are, in a sense, alternatives to the revenues which those provinces might otherwise have raised in corporation income taxes. Therefore, with all the facts and figures and opinions before us, we concluded that the purpose of equalization would best be served by recognizing these facts, by recognizing this factor of natural resource revenues, but by modifying it. As I said to the conference, after listening to the views expressed:

> The balance of the discussion seems to us to be that such revenues—

That is, natural resource revenues:

> —should be taken partially into account. The best practical way to do this is, we have concluded, to adjust the equalization which would be payable to any province having natural resource revenue above the national average by deducting an amount arrived at as follows: one half of the extent by which the natural resource revenue per capita exceeds the national average, multiplied by the population of the province.

That was the formula that was included in the offer we made. While I admit, Mr. Chairman, that there was a certain dissatisfaction, and a strong dissatisfaction in certain quarters about this formula, I think in the circumstances it was the best that could be achieved. Dissatisfaction was expressed in very strong terms by the representatives of Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island and Quebec. There was no formula, of course, in these matters which could have been hit upon which would have satisfied everybody, but in our view this was the one that on balance was the most satisfactory.

In these ways, by putting forward this particular formula, we found what we believed to be the best way to restore better equalization to our tax sharing arrangements for next year. That was our purpose. But we were engaged—and let me emphasize this—not in making unilateral decisions but in a genuine process of consultation. In that consultation all the provinces—and, leaving equalization aside for the moment including the wealthier provinces—put to the conference a strong case for more revenues generally. As I said this afternoon, we recognize their increasing responsibilities, especially in the field of education. The existing tax arrangements put into effect by the previous government, which provide an extra percentage point each year in the abatement of the federal tax on personal incomes, recognize that situation to some extent.

So it was our duty to weigh the provinces' arguments for a bigger increase within this formula, put forward most emphatically by the premier of Quebec, against the financial needs and problems facing the federal government and expressed in the federal budget. We came to the conclusion, after listening to the case put forward by the provinces, that the best interests of the country would be served by making some further increase next year in the tax shares of the provinces. As the committee knows, Mr. Chairman, the federal tax abatement which has remained unchanged since its inception is that of succession or estate duties. We decided that the most appropriate change to make at this time would be to increase that abatement from 50 per cent to 75 per cent.

This will free approximately $32 million of revenue for the provinces next year. The main purpose of this change for next year was to do something to meet the needs of the provinces, especially, in this case, those provinces which do not benefit at all from equalization. Therefore the best thing to do, within the general limitation of what is financially possible next year, was to provide this extra abatement of federal tax without at the same time adding an additional element of equalization, to which we had not been committed.

There are, on the one hand, critics who say that equalization ought to have been carried further. There are some who say it should not be tampered with at all at this time. On the other hand, there are those who complain that the extra per capita revenue which the provinces will receive, as a result of the changes we are proposing, is greatly different for different provinces. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is true; there is no doubt about that. That, indeed, is the point of the changes. There was not, in our view, adequate equalization before. The effect of the changes is to make it, not perhaps perfect but, we believe, considerably more adequate.

Therefore, the changes which would be made as a result of the formula we have put forward—including the new formula for equalization, the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants, additional grants to Newfoundland, the additional succession duty abatement of 25 per cent and the natural resource factor in the equalization formula—would mean that with this change, Newfoundland would receive $3,282,000 more, Prince Edward Island, $599,000 more, Nova Scotia, $5,742,000 more; New Brunswick, $5,558,000 more; Quebec, by the application of this formula, $42,716,000 more; Ontario, $14,416,000 more; Manitoba, $7,023,000 more; Saskatchewan, $2,469,000 more; Alberta, $1,722,000 more; British Columbia, $3,921,000 more—making a total of $87,448,000.

I make no claim, as I made no claim this afternoon, that the fiscal arrangements we have made for next year are either perfect or final. That was not the purpose of the conference. There will be other conferences, and the next one quite soon. Consultation will be a continuing process. What we have achieved by this conference is to restore a better concept of equalization in our fiscal arrangements. We have made a large step forward toward full equalization. We have helped to meet the pressing fiscal needs of the provinces as a whole pending, if we can find it, a better solution to this problem of fiscal relations. In searching for that solution, we are now engaged.

We have done this at a conference where there was a great deal of harmony and a desire to co-operate and work together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: We have, in the steps we have taken, preserved the essential interests of the government of Canada, which must be preserved. We have set ourselves, I believe, on the path of a successful and effective co-operative federalism, the path that is fundamental to the unity and progress of our country.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Prime Minister would answer a question?

Mr. Pearson: If I can.

Mr. Martineau: Does he envisage that it will be necessary to effect early changes to the British North America Act in order to implement the co-operative federalism of which he spoke?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot answer that question, Mr. Chairman. I would hope it could be done within the confines of the present British North America Act; but if constitutional changes are required and they are agreed to by the provinces and the federal government, of course they could be made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this evening I do not intend to go into too much detail or review what was done at the recent conference, excepting in a general way. It may be, as a result of what the Prime Minister has said and what will be said after I speak, that the committee will continue to debate this matter, in which case I will have an opportunity later during the progress of the discussion in committee to deal in particular with a number of matters referred to by the Prime Minister. I say at once that his concluding words, while well chosen and having merit of a crescendo in hope and aspiration, are exaggerated beyond anything that I have heard descriptive of any benefits that may have flowed from this conference.

I say at once that this conference was preceded by pre-conference ballyhoo designed to lead Canadians to expect a solution to their problems under a new confederation formula. From day to day there were outstanding examples of hyperbole to build up the conference in advance, to create a crisis atmosphere as it were, to frighten Canadians that confederation was on its last legs. During the course of his opening words to the conference, the Prime Minister used such expressions as "a new beginning", in reference to what was about to be placed before the conference; a new chapter. In the light of what has taken place, I can only say that the hopes and anticipations that this conference was to do something that no other conference had ever achieved, have been dashed, and the event has proven to be a highly propagandized one which did not achieve the results which were expected. As a matter of fact, it looked for several months in advance that a banquet was going to be provided for the provinces. Well, several of them went home hungry.

I can only review this matter by going back a few months prior to the election campaign and placing before the committee something of what was said at that time, and noting the degree to which the rash promises were dissipated in the light of what took place at this conference. In his opening speech the Prime Minister said, in effect, that the conference would shape the direction of Canadian confederation for generations. Tonight he says it shaped Canadian confederation for one year.

[Mr. Martineau.]

Now, sir, I am going to refer to something that I think has been an effective outcome of this conference, and that is that this government has learned there is such a thing as consultation to make confederation effective. Consultation with the provinces on these matters that affect the provinces should be made in advance of action taken by the federal government. When the results will be felt not only by the federal government or when action concerns joint programs between the federal and provincial governments, there should be the widest possible measure of consultation. I suggest that when the next conference is called there should be a representative for the northern territories. Over and over again, the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for the Northwest Territories have been asking for action in that direction. Only within the last few days the Yukon legislative council passed a resolution requesting that a representative councillor should sit in as an observer at such a conference. I think that is something to which favourable consideration should be given.

We have contended that this government, in a cavalier manner, has been disregarding the basic principle of confederation, which is consultation. My hon. friends opposite have said that there was no basis in fact for our demand for consultation. I have always found that the best witness one can call is a witness that is not unfavourable to the side against whom an argument is being advanced. I call as my witness in support of the stand which we have taken in this connection the Hon. Jean Lesage, the premier of the province of Quebec. I ask the pardon of the committee for reading these lengthy remarks into the record. The length rather denies me doing that under normal circumstances, but I know after I have read this the committee will agree that it has a place on our records.

During the course of the past few months, we have had several unfortunate examples of a lack of consultation; the municipal loans fund, the pension plan and the designation of depressed areas eligible for special economic aid. This latter measure, because it considerably modifies depreciation allowance rates, constitutes a serious onslaught on the fiscal and administrative economy of the provinces, for without their consent, it influences their basis of taxation.

These views, now expressed by the premier of Quebec, represent the stand we have consistently taken throughout this session.

Thus, it is one government which—

He is referring to the government sitting opposite.

—without previous consultation, will determine the taxable income of another. It is true that Ontario and Quebec could refuse to grant this accrued depreciation allowance since they themselves collect corporation taxes. However, by acting in this way, one would reproach them, for creating many useless complications and with not co-operating with the federal government and the other provinces.

Now, the next paragraph reads as follows:

An immense confusion which persists to this very day—

This very day was November 25, 1963.

—is the result of all these unilateral decisions.

You will notice, sir, that "all these unilateral decisions" were those made by the present government in a period of seven months.

Too late we realized that the goals of the federal government did not necessarily meet with those of the provinces. It has provoked perfectly understandable spine-stiffening. This offensive, with centralization as the target, inevitably gave rise to violent reactions.

I pause now to explain that here the premier of Quebec said the present government is a centralizing government. This is exactly what we have been saying. We have been pointing out his conduct and his policies. I imagine that the smile now on the Prime Minister's face was not there when Mr. Lesage was giving him this lecture.

Mr. Pearson: I smiled because you said that we had capitulated to him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have touched a sore point to make the Prime Minister smile like that. It is the centralizing activities of this government, not the previous government, that Mr. Lesage is dealing with.

Such experiences must never be repeated for the very essence of the confederate system shall disappear.

That is the warning of a Liberal premier to a government which, in a few months, has earned his condemnation for its centralizing proclivities. It is no longer sufficient to make honourable amends before harm is done and to promise that, in the future, intrusion in fields of provincial jurisdiction will be avoided. For let us not forget that the harm has been done and that it constitutes a precedent that no one will fail to invoke in the future, no matter what happens. These were our views regarding the centralizing conduct of this government in the legislative measures which it introduced and to which the Prime Minister has made reference.

Quebec—and several provinces share its opinion in this respect—is definitely opposed to the federal government's jostling the priorities of the provinces by unilateral action.

Then it says, in order to sweeten the dose, probably well intended but not always well measured:

This is obvious in the case of regional development and the locating of industries, which fields are clearly of the provincial jurisdiction. We do not conceive the role of the federal government as one giving direction to and determining the policies which the provinces should follow in fields of their own jurisdiction—

I do not have to make any observations on the statements made by the premier in this regard. However, throughout the period of the last several months when we have raised these objections the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council, who is the epitome of knowledge about everything connected with legislative distribution of powers, in his own estimation, gave support to what was done, which denied the basic principles of confederation. That this government has learned; for it now agrees, as the Prime Minister has pointed out in the most fulsome terms, there is a need for consultation. The communique says in this regard:

It was agreed that both the federal government and the provinces would take steps to improve their arrangements for close and continuing consultation.

There was general agreement about that.

Now let me deal with some of the matters which were considered. The provinces agreed to provide their share of old age assistance and pensions for the blind and disabled. There is nothing unusual in that. As to the pension plan that was advanced here with such a shrill burst of trumpets, that plan no longer exists. The federal government has retreated from its original arbitrary position and an advance will now be made toward the achievement of a comprehensive plan because of that retreat.

I come now to the question of equalization, and also to the general fiscal arrangements which have been made. We find that great changes have taken place in a few months. A few days before the election an ultimatum was given to Ottawa by Mr. Lesage. Not one paper in Canada failed to describe it as an ultimatum. The Canadian Press report of the Ottawa Journal is dated April 6 and says:

Premier Lesage last night laid down a virtual ultimatum to the next federal government to turn over a minimum of 25 per cent of income and corporation taxes collected in Quebec—

In a budget speech highly flavoured with election spices Mr. Lesage reviewed the fiscal policies of the four federal parties. ...

The premier gave the next government, no matter which party forms it, one year to meet Quebec's demands on federal-provincial fiscal problems.

Another report in the Financial Times is as follows:

One year to act, "or else". Quebec is carving out a new role for the provinces of Canada. In an almost pugnacious speech the premier gave the next federal government 12 months to meet his demands—

Specifically, Mr. Lesage asked, at the least, for 25 per cent of all personal income taxes collected from residents of the province, 25 per cent of corporation taxes, 100 per cent of all succession duties.

He intends to get them.

With reference to tax sharing conferences Mr. Lesage said:

"I have no intention of repeating the same—results"—

He left an ominous but undefined "or else".

What does that mean?

Then Mr. Levesque had something to say, which is reported in the Montreal Gazette for April 25 as follows:

Natural resources minister Levesque said last night acceptance of Quebec's tax ultimatum by the federal government is "probably the last remaining chance" for confederation.

He warned that if the new federal government fails to act within 12 months on the "minimum demands" on tax sharing spelled out by premier Lesage in his budget speech of April 5, "I think the supreme chance for confederation will have been lost—and for good".

The other day I asked the question, before I had seen the attitude which was being taken by the premier of Quebec, whether or not the ultimatum would be accepted by the federal government. No objection was taken then; but it was said earlier today that there was not an ultimatum. I have before me La Presse for November 22 which says:

M. Lesage retire son ultimatum.

"Mr. Lesage withdraws his ultimatum." Is that not a strange thing, Mr. Chairman? From fire and brimstone in April to honeyed words in November. I find it difficult to understand this change. Were the arrangements made as the premier of Quebec and the leader of the Liberal party met two or three days before the election? Were the arrangements made while the premier of Quebec, full of fire and fury, was saying these things?

At the same time, an arrangement was being made between these two: Don't worry about it; all will be well. The fury and the forcefulness of April suddenly became the joyfulness of November. Indeed, he has not secured the things he said he was going to get—"or else". He ended the conference by saying: I will be with you next May or June, or whenever the next election comes around. Is that not the strangest transformation in all history? He said: I will support them; this is so good that I will stand with them whenever the next election comes.

What happened? What happened in the intervening months? Why did this change take place? I read in Saturday's issue of Le Devoir: "Lesage is unhappy but he intends to recoup in March". So that is the beginning of the story which is so difficult to understand. Why the earlier ultimatum? Why the subsequent retreat? The Prime Minister says this is a good deal. He says the premiers were not all happy about it. Mr. Speaker, the honey may be sweet at this time, but the bee will sting. Oh, it is an interesting revelation. If only the Prime Minister would just be frank and tell us what they did as they sat down together to bring about this metamorphosis in the thinking of the premier of Quebec.

Today, the right hon. gentleman says this is a fine deal which has been brought about on equalization. He says the purpose of these grants is to bring about an equalization in the per capita revenue of the provinces from direct taxes. He promised that equalization revenues would bring the recipients up to the position of the highest provinces. That was the undertaking. That was the promise. I have it here in two or three places. Why the change? What came about? Well, he said, it came about because, in an attitude of mutual respect, we discussed these matters. He undertook that the equalization would be carried out on the basis of the per capita taxes of the highest province in Canada. A while ago he gave us the results which would have flowed from the carrying out of that promise. He said we were wrong in what we did with regard to equalization, and he undertook to make a change, an undertaking from which he has now completely retreated. It is difficult to understand what may have happened in the course of the last few weeks to bring about this change.

In 1961, the Liberal convention said equalization should be on the basis of the highest province. All through the election campaign the right hon. gentleman said this, and those sitting around him said the same thing. When he went to the conference the other day he said he thought this was the proper course. This evening he gave a record of what the distribution of the moneys would have been had he followed that course. Why the change? Today he would have us believe it came about as a result of consultation. A few weeks ago he indicated the hopes ahead of this conference: Canadian federalism to be fixed up for a generation. This evening he admits that what has been done is simply a makeshift, an improvisation and a postponement for another year. That admission indicates that this government does not yet know where it is going on this problem. But it does know that it has no intention of carrying out the undertaking which it made from 1959 and 1960 to the election in 1962 and 1963. What has been the distribution? It is a case, after all, of the mountain in labour which brought forth a mouse. Eighty seven million dollars—

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that a mouse?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is, compared with the larger animal envisaged by Mr. Lesage. He said he was going to get $150 million as a minimum. What the total for Canada would have been, had he done so, I leave to those who know something of billions. The right hon. gentleman and his friends changed around. They produced $87 million. They did not produce that sum until they decided they would add an extra 25 per cent to the share of the provinces in succession taxes. If they had not done that, Ontario would have got nothing. So they said: we shall have to give them something. So they came up with this proposal at the last moment—a 25 per cent addition to the 50 per cent of succession duties already provided for.

I do not intend to re-read the distribution, as a result of the action taken by the government, in the various provinces. But had the Prime Minister carried out the promise he made, the distribution which would have been in effect when the agreements are entered upon would have been far different and the smaller provinces would have received a greater share of the $87 million. But it had to be changed. A moment ago the Prime Minister said $87 million did not mean very much.

I intend to give the figures to show what we did during our period of office in this field of dominion-provincial relations. To begin with we increased the 10 per cent share of personal income tax and corporation taxes to 13 per cent. We were not obliged to do that, for the agreement would have been in effect for five years more. We made available to the Atlantic provinces $25 million in grants. Again, we were not obliged to do that. The agreements were still in effect, but we desired to give the maritime provinces a reasonable equalization opportunity. After all the promises which have been made during the last few months about how significant this conference was going to be, $87 million is the final amount. Let me compare it with what we did during our period of office in assisting the provinces to carry out their responsibilities. In 1956-57, the total amount of unconditional grants was $552.6 million. The total amount of conditional grants was $111 million. The total amount of payments for the benefit of provincial institutions, university grants and grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property was $25.7 million, or a grand total of $689,300,000. But I am not going to take 1956-57 as the actual figures, because there were changes made in the spring of 1957, as I recall. In 1957-58 the total amount for unconditional grants was $658.4 million, the total amount for conditional grants was $144.8 million, the total amount for payments for the benefit of provincial institutions was $34.1 million, or a grand total of $837.3 million.

In the following year the over-all total was $1,037.9 million. In the next year, 1959-60, the total was $1,264.2 million. The 1960-61 forecast was $1,326 million and for 1961-62 the estimate was $1,460 million. In other words, not taking into consideration the lower figures of 1956-57, during our period in office from 1957 to 1962 we increased the amount of unconditional grants to the provinces, conditional grants and payments for the benefit of provincial institutions by $623 million. That is one of the reasons why we had a deficit during that period of time. If it had not been for our granting extra assistance to the provinces and the extra payments we made throughout the entire period of time we would not have had a deficit except in one year. There was an increase, as I say, of almost $700 million over 1956-57. Compare that with what is being done here. There were great hopes, great expectations; but all we have is the distribution of a total amount, including the increase in the share of succession duties, of $87 million.

I am not going to place on the record what the amounts of the increases in the various provinces were that we brought about during our period in office, when we recognized for the first time in this country the necessity of the provinces being placed in a position where they could properly carry out and discharge their responsibilities within the constitution of Canada. I should like to know what actually took place that resulted in the failure in November to carry out the undertakings of April. What promises have been made as to what will be done next March? Certainly all that came out of this conference was the recognition by the government that no longer can it arbitrarily trample on the rights of the provinces, but must consult with them. That is all to the good. That is what we have been trying to teach this government since the session began. They have learned the lesson now. They learned it in connection with the municipal grants. They learned it in connection with the pension plan. They have learned it now in other fields.

Turning to the communique; if there ever was a document conceived with a desire to gloss over the shortcomings of the conference it is this. The communique reads:

> The governments of Canada and of the ten provinces of Canada met in Ottawa—

I am leaving out the surplus words.

> Their discussions were marked by a common recognition that the extent and the diversity of Canada create unusual problems in the discharge of the increasing responsibilities of government for the general benefit of all Canadians.

They did not need to meet for that. Everybody knew that.

> There was a warm mutual recognition of the differing problems faced by each province and by the federal government.
> The conference in this spirit agreed that government in Canada must be a co-operative federalism which provides complete, exhaustive and continuing examination of the problems that fall within the jurisdictions of its different governments.

That is what we have contended for. It is agreed that there should be improvement with regard to close and continuing consultation. Then it deals with shared cost programs. Why, only a few weeks ago, these were about to end. Whatever provinces wanted to end shared cost programs, they would end; but now they come out with this.

The conference therefore agreed on the particular need for a continuing review of fiscal arrangements and shared cost programs and the relation between them. It was agreed that these matters would be the subject of joint study by officials, in preparation for another session of the federal-provincial conference in the early part of the new year.

With regard to altered equalization payments the communique says:

These changes are intended to take effect in the next fiscal year. The provinces stated their views on this proposal.

They did not agree to them, as the Prime Minister admitted today. Then the communique deals with a federal lottery and proposals for legislation to permit the Canada-wide operation of agricultural marketing boards. There was general agreement in connection with pension increases for old age assistance and blindness and disability allowances. Then it ends up with a word on Indian and Eskimo affairs, on which there was general agreement on the objectives of policies designed to achieve closer association with the life of other Canadians. Finally, the communique ends with these words:

The conference ended with the expression by the heads of all delegations of their determination to work in co-operation for the strength and welfare of Canada and its provinces.

They could have written 99 per cent of the communique before they started. This conference was promoted as another example of the Pearson plan. We have had the plan drawn in a broad panorama today, but when the opportunity came to place that plan for the future of confederation before the representatives of the provinces, the government ended up with this small and, compared with the increases we gave to the provinces, insignificant increase of $87 million distributed in the manner set out by the Prime Minister.

Sir, they have learned one lesson, that they must consult, and that is to the good. Beyond that we will have to wait until March to ascertain what deal, if any, has been made. In the months of April to November Mr. Lesage was breathing brimstone, but at the meeting the ultimatums suddenly evaporated and in place of what he was going to achieve, this comparatively insignificant result is attained.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

No matter what eloquent or grandiloquent words the Prime Minister has used, what was achieved was a denial of the undertakings of the Liberal party and of its pledged word in connection with equalization grants. Then they ended up with the sop on succession duties so that they would be able to say, "Well, we have taken the first step in the direction of the demands that were made on April 5 by Mr. Lesage." They call that agreement among the provinces, but the provinces could do no other than say, "That is what we are going to get. We will now return home and there will be further consultations. Possibly next April the government will have a plan to place before the provinces for consultation."

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great attention to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. It reminds me very much of the type of speech that the Prime Minister himself used to make when he was in opposition. I only regret that the Leader of the Opposition did not make the same statements a year ago, because then we might have had some results. I have listened to him telling us about everything they were supposed to have done, but when we look at the results, after five years of the Conservative party being in power, we see that they were very poor.

I also listened to the speech made by the Prime Minister this afternoon. Since becoming a member of this house I have always found that he can make fine speeches with nice sentences and good words, but they are only words. As he himself said, he arrived at the inauguration of the federal-provincial conference with no solution. He went there and listened, and then he claimed he produced some solutions.

[Translation]

I have here, Mr. Chairman, a few remarks made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) at the opening of the federal-provincial conference:

It is my hope that the well-defined policy which the federal government and the provincial governments need in matters of common interest will take shape during this conference. Such a policy will result from our discussions rather than from statements made as suggestions to give our talks a start.

And in his speech this afternoon, the Prime Minister of Canada said:

We could not come with a final answer to that problem in a conference which lasted four or five days.

But with regard to this matter, the Prime Minister might be blamed for failing to acquaint himself, before the conference, with the requests and suggestions of the provincial governments, for not having studied them so as to come with some solution to the federal-provincial conference.

In his brief, the premier of Quebec makes on several occasions, a comparison with the priority needs of the federal government. But at this time, provincial needs have the priority.

A little further on, we find in this brief:

> After the war, and for some ten years perhaps, the Canadian economy had to readjust itself to new conditions.

And looking at those comparisons between federal priority needs in wartime and provincial priority needs in times of peace, we realize that there is now a question of developing human capital in this country, which has been alluded to many times, and, today, the premier of Quebec, at least, seems to realize that there are some needs which come before national defence.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) tells us about federal priority needs and about provincial needs, he should not forget that the war ended long ago and that there are now provincial needs which come before his own needs and before federal expenditures at this time.

Further on, the Prime Minister of Canada said that:

> The discussions involved are not necessarily a matter of principle as there is agreement on the principle, but rather a matter of priority and possibilities.

It would be a good thing to know what really are the priorities. As I said earlier, we shall see that the provinces have much more urgent needs, which must come before the needs of the federal government.

Possibilities are also mentioned. But, Mr. Chairman, it is up to the Prime Minister and his cabinet to find the financial and economic possibilities to meet the country's responsibilities.

After all, it is the Prime Minister and his government who have control over the destiny of the country. In the field of agriculture at the federal level, in the field of national defence, or in that of external relations and, above all, in the financial field, it is the Prime Minister who is responsible for the destiny of Canada. Together with his cabinet, he must see to it that Canada develops a system which will make it possible for her to rise to our potentialities, to make—as it is often put—financially possible what is physically feasible.

In considering the results of the federal-provincial conference, one hears, and one reads headlines such as this:

> Ottawa has granted $87 million, out of which Quebec will pocket $42 million.

On the face of it, it would seem that we are going to get half of these $87 million. We read:

> Quebec requests and gets half of the cake.

It thus seems that the federal government has yielded to Quebec's requests. I know that it is the impression one gets from such results. The other provinces get the erroneous impression that half of the pie has gone to Quebec.

I also notice—and this, to my mind, is a failure—that this conference runs counter to the current tendency, which is that Quebec should have its own taxation rights, its sources of income, in order to spend that revenue as it pleases. Quebec will spend what it collects. That seems to be the tendency in the province of Quebec. But what does Ottawa do? Ottawa keeps on taxing as before. Ottawa taxes, gives to the provinces and the provinces do the spending, but always through Ottawa.

The province of Quebec, as well as the other provinces, still appears to be a beggar, coming to Ottawa hat in hand. Ottawa continues to control income sources, to tax, to give to Quebec money which the latter can only spend according to the stipulations laid down by the federal government. It is still the old system, a system which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lamontagne) has called co-operative federalism. But what does it mean in fact? It means a centralizing power of control. Ottawa controls revenue sources, Ottawa controls taxation and, when it pleases, Ottawa relinquishes part of it to the provinces, which, willy-nilly, must make the best of a bad bargain.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss another aspect of that federal-provincial conference. Ten provinces are brought together at a round table. The ten provinces come with various requests, various needs, and when they are finally set at variance, it is a good opportunity to tell them: "You do not agree." That situation is invoked to turn down the requests of the ten provinces. In fact, having set them at variance and having placed them in difficult circumstances, advantage is taken of that fact to give them practically nothing.

That is no way to solve problems between Ottawa and the provinces. I think that each province should settle its problems with Ottawa. At this time, Quebec has a justified claim. The problem of the province of Quebec should be settled with that province alone, not with the nine other provinces, whose problems could be settled later on. The problems of Ontario, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island are not the same as those of the province of Quebec.

There should not be set up, like the last time, a meeting of the ten provinces, which do not agree and which bring forth contradictory requests, in order to take advantage of the situation to turn everyone down. Under those circumstances, the negotiation system does not rest on an honest basis. The problems of each province should be settled with each one separately.

When I consider the results of this conference, I cannot help remembering the sad political history of the province of Quebec: "Grits in Quebec, Grits in Ottawa". Poor Quebecers. It is always Quebec which is the loser; it is always Quebec which is taken in. We have experienced that situation in the past: "Grits in Quebec, Grits in Ottawa". What was the result? Our province was always the loser. The Quebec people were always the losers. And the same thing is happening again.

Let us review the events which occurred before the last general election. There was the ultimatum, and this nobody can deny. The ultimatum was served on April 5, and Premier Lesage confirmed that himself on television, using the word "ultimatum".

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chevrier) admitted, on May 27, he had heard Mr. Lesage speaking on television about an ultimatum. In fact, the premier of Quebec uttered the word "ultimatum" before millions of French Canadian televiewers, besides using it in the legislature, a fact which was confirmed later on by some ministers of the provincial cabinet, among whom were Messrs. Rene Levesque, Gerin-Lajoie and Pierre Laporte.

Mr. Gerin-Lajoie, more than anyone else, wants to have a bigger slice of taxation, or, otherwise, he will be forced to tell the school boards to increase their taxes. Indeed, school taxes have increased by $1 to $1.25 per $100 of assessment in the province of Quebec to reach $6 or $7 per $100 of assessment; taxes increase so much that Mr. Gerin-Lajoie has become public enemy number one. At first, Quebec wanted better tax sharing, but suddenly we stop hearing about an ultimatum. They speak of requests, as a basis for discussions in order to make a claim at the federal-provincial conference. They got practically nothing. They have $42 million but no taxation rights. They leave everything to Ottawa. That is exactly what has happened in the political history of the province of Quebec, when it was "Grits at Quebec, Grits at Ottawa." Once again, the province of Quebec is the loser. Arrangements were made between the two, behind the curtains. Informal meetings are held and arrangements made, but the province of Quebec is always the one taken in.

Mr. Chairman, I can say that the citizens of the province of Quebec, who still had some confidence in their premier, are quite disgusted with the results of the federal-provincial conference. Once again, they have found out that the premier of Quebec came to Ottawa to yield all along the line, as his predecessors had done in the past, before the centralizing schemings of the federal government.

The province of Quebec has always been convinced that the Liberal politicians she sent willingly to Ottawa or Quebec deserved credit for their wonderful promises, but, on the side, they always saw to it that the province of Quebec ended up the loser.

The ultimatum was given in April and will expire next April. Another federal-provincial conference will be held next March. A one-year delay was agreed to and will expire on April 6, 1964.

I hope that, at the next federal-provincial conference, the Prime Minister will not simply try to brush discussions aside, then adopt a certain policy and say that a few days were not enough to take decisions. I hope that, at the next federal-provincial conference, the Prime Minister will not arrive with high sounding phrases as he did at the beginning of this one, but rather with decisions and facts.

In my opinion, what the province of Quebec is asking for is only a beginning: 25 per cent each of corporation and personal income taxes and 100 per cent of succession duties. These are only initial requests that will go on increasing until 100 per cent of direct taxes are obtained.

In my opinion, the best brief submitted at the federal-provincial conference is still that submitted by the premier of British Columbia, Hon. Mr. Bennett, who said among other things:

[Text]

British Columbia believes it is time that independent decision on all matters other than those of genuine national and international concern be restored to the provincial legislatures. We submit that much of the strain of recent years on national administrations has arisen from a failure on their part to recognize the appropriate boundaries of their sphere of operations.

[Translation]

The premier of British Columbia, Mr. Bennett, said a little further:

[Text]

One of these rights, designated as an "exclusive power", was the use of direct taxation within the province.

[Translation]

Direct taxation is a right that belongs exclusively to the provinces. And I had the good fortune to find a statement made by the federal minister of finance during the first world war. Premier Bennett quoted this statement from Sir Thomas White:

[Text]

"The income tax is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the province and is a suitable tax for the purpose of the province—

I have placed no time limit upon this taxation measure; but I do suggest, and I should like this suggestion to be on Hansard, that after the war is over this taxation measure should be deliberately reviewed."

[Translation]

And here is the request submitted by the government of British Columbia, a request that we fully support:

[Text]

British Columbia requests the government of Canada to vacate progressively the fields of direct taxation, so that the provinces may reassert their fiscal responsibility and rights of confederation. British Columbia urges the federal government immediately to plan and implement the necessary steps.

[Translation]

Here we have another province, besides Quebec, which claims the total return of direct taxation to provincial governments. The Quebec premier was also expressing these ideas. He enumerated these provinces' needs and he proved beyond doubt, at least in his brief, that the provinces' needs were far more urgent than those of the federal government.

In fact, here is what Premier Lesage stated on page 10 of his brief:

The attainment of this objective, whose results will be beneficial to the country as well as to the provinces, implies that the provincial governments' activities must be considered before some federal projects. It is from this standpoint that we can assert that provincial needs resume the priority which had been temporarily given to the central government during last war.

Here again is a hint of the excessive expenditures of the present government towards national defence at a time when our country has more urgent needs.

The Quebec premier mentioned also the debts which are forever increasing because provincial governments do not have enough income to carry out all the projects they should.

For instance, when the Liberal party was chosen in the province of Quebec, the provincial debt amounted to $305,905,000; it now amounts to $644,962,000. By this, I mean the net consolidated debt.

The Quebec premier mentioned also the needs in the education field. Is it going to be suggested that those requirements are less important than those of national defence? What about hospital insurance? And the development of natural resources in order to promote economic recovery? Will it be suggested that the needs of the federal government are as important as those?

Mr. Chairman, when one thinks of all the wasteful expenditures made by the federal government, in many cases, I cannot help but feel that the provinces must recover their sources of income, because to them belong the main fields of activity which can enable them to develop and, in this way, to help the country.

What about the minimum requests of the province of Quebec? This is what Mr. Lesage stated, as reported on page 46 of his brief:

We are asking once again as minimum taxation powers: 25 per cent of personal income tax, 25 per cent of corporation taxes... and 100 per cent of estate taxes.

This was the minimum, and the premier added:

They actually represent for a us a bare minimum and they surely not exceed what might result from our current work on fiscal matters.

Mr. Lesage also stated:

It is obvious that the compensation, that is, the equivalent amount the provinces would derive if the federal government were to withdraw its financial contribution to joint programs, has nothing to do with the distribution of taxes as stated in our request for 25-25-100. This is an entirely different matter.

Mr. Chairman, there is talk about restlessness and turmoil within the province of Quebec. In fact, not very long ago, the present Prime Minister stated that he did not wish to be the gravedigger of confederation, the one who would preside over the division of Canada. But if he does not want to do so, he should refrain from making bombastic speeches and try to find solutions. He should begin by solving the problems. Time for speeches is over; now action is what is needed.

The Prime Minister spoke of certain Canadian claims concerning a national flag and a national anthem. This afternoon, a government member introduced a bill respecting the adoption of a national anthem. We were then willing to give full credit to the government for such a measure and to pass the bill. It would have taken five minutes.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) was asking us to vote one twelfth of the main estimates, that is several hundred million dollars in a few minutes. We could have as well studied the bill concerning the adoption of a national anthem this afternoon, more especially as it was proposed by a government member. Nobody was against. But no, it was alleged that there was not unanimous consent. The Prime Minister knows quite well that his party would have had obtained political credit. But still again words and no action.

Mr. Chairman, when we reach the period devoted to private members' business, we will ask that this bill be given priority. And the Prime Minister should encourage the adoption of this bill, especially as it has been introduced by one of his supporters. We would then have at last some positive action. But why must we always wait until it is too late?

The present Prime Minister should remember that the province of Quebec long advocated bilingual cheques. It was put off for 12 years and then suddenly, on the eve of a general election, the former prime minister who has now become the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), decided to give in. However, we had been requesting that for so long that Quebec's reaction was: "Too little and too late".

Is the Prime Minister going to delay the solutions until he also is told that it is too little and too late?

Now is the time to act.

The province of Quebec is willing to stay within confederation and to live in harmony with the other provinces and the other great ethnic group which makes up Canada but, above everything, it wants to develop by its own means. It is as simple as that. When it is given the chance to develop itself, when it has its own sources of income and can spend its money as it sees fit, then, Mr. Speaker, will both cultures peacefully coexist in Canada.

The cabinet too often forgets that, and I feel that is the fault of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lamontagne) who, in a very confidential report to his cabinet colleagues, said the following:

French Canada is not proud enough to act big.

In a 200-page brief he submitted to the cabinet, the President of the Privy Council also stated this:

The people of Quebec have no time for great ideals.

This is what he said lately:

Quebec stands to lose if it separates from the rest of Canada.

As if that were the end of the world.

All that implies that the province of Quebec can neither run its own affairs nor develop on its own. But if our sources of revenue were left to us, and also our direct taxation system, if we were allowed to collect and spend ourselves instead of always seeing the federal government interfere with our business, we might succeed. So, if the province of Quebec had someone to blame, it would not be the federal government but itself.

Then harmony would be possible between the two great races that live in our country, but not otherwise.

[Mr. Gregoire.]

The ultimatum that was delivered a year ago enabled everybody to procrastinate for a while and wait to see what would happen.

When the province of Quebec was content to crawl and beg, as it always did in the past, it got nothing. We were happy to see at last a man who demanded, who claimed and did not merely ask: "Would you—please—by any chance, if you would be kind enough—" It was a demand.

The present cabinet should not deceive itself about the consequences of this ultimatum, for I am the first one, Mr. Chairman, to tell the members of the cabinet and the Prime Minister, that if the country refuses to mend its ways and let the province of Quebec develop itself, I for one shall not hesitate to break up confederation.

Let the hon. members on the side of the present cabinet laugh if they want to. If they do, it is because they try to deceive themselves, not to see the forthcoming day of reckoning, because the province of Quebec will not accept indefinitely the system imposed on it or her present situation. What happens when it wants to have a heart-to-heart talk with the federal government? Ten provinces, 11 governments are called for a meeting, and the province of Quebec is overwhelmed.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Text]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the Prime Minister gave a very excellent and interesting review of the federal-provincial conference which concluded last Friday. I think he is to be commended for reporting to the house so early on that conference, so that we might have the opportunity of discussing some of the matters arising out of the conference, and expressing an opinion with regard to them.

Federal-provincial relations are always ticklish in any federal system and have always put a great strain on confederation in Canada; and I imagine they will continue to do so for a great many years to come. I think the Prime Minister, with his excellent training in international diplomacy, is probably fitted as well as anyone to chair federal-provincial conferences, and from reports which I have had he conducted himself very ably last week. But when we come to face up to federal-provincial problems it will take a great deal more than high sounding phrases and cliches to solve these problems.

I should like to look at one or two of the things the Prime Minister said, with many of which I was in complete agreement. He said that each government must be able to discharge its constitutional responsibility. Undoubtedly the two pillars on which confederation is built are that, on the one hand, the provinces, and on the other hand the federal government, shall each have the revenues which they require to discharge responsibilities allocated to them by the constitution. It stands to reason that they cannot discharge all the responsibilities to the full extent they want, that this will be limited by the amount of money available at both levels of government. Therefore, the constant problem of federal-provincial relations is to try to steer a fair and even course between what part of the national revenue goes to the provinces to look after their needs and what part goes to the federal government.

The provinces have faced for the last 50 years a problem which has been growing, namely that the fields of responsibility allocated to them have been enlarging at an amazing rate, particularly education, although health and welfare, have not been far behind. The provinces have not had the additional sources of revenue with which to meet those responsibilities. It is true that ever since the Rowell-Sirois report there has been some improvement. The figures which were read this evening by the Leader of the Opposition indicate that in recent years the provinces have been given additional sources of revenue, and certainly they need them, and they still need more. At the same time it has to be recognized that the federal government requires revenues to carry out its responsibilities. When speakers, such as the last, say that if the provinces were given all the direct taxes they would be able to solve their own problems, I am afraid they overlook two facts. The first is that many of the provinces could not meet their constitutional responsibilities if the direct taxes were restored to them. Second, much of the income derived from these tax fields is collected from wealth that is earned all over Canada, and the province in which the taxes are collected really has no claim upon all of that tax revenue. So that the real problem in Canada is how to allocate these direct tax fields fairly as between federal and provincial governments.

We are never going to be able to meet all the needs of the federal government and the provinces unless we can very considerably increase the total wealth production of Canada. That is one of the reasons the federal government must retain some of its fiscal powers and some of its shared programs, because it is responsible for stimulating the economy. If we had full production in Canada and no unemployment, it is estimated that we could increase our gross national product by $4 billion per annum. This would provide a much larger pie to divide up between the federal and provincial governments. The transfer of payments, the control of investment, the ability to raise and lower taxes wherever this will have the best effect on the economy, are some things which we feel the federal government must retain.

The Prime Minister said this afternoon that there was a need for a complete review of fiscal relations, and undoubtedly this is true. But I want to point out that we have been saying this now for years. There has not been a complete review since the Rowell-Sirois commission made its report, and we have steadily moved away from almost all the recommendations made in that report. The Prime Minister says that these fiscal relations will have to be decided, not on the basis of unilateral decisions but on the basis of consultation. With this all of us agree. Consultation is the very essence of a federal-provincial system. But if we are going to have consultation it seems to me that we must set up some machinery to make consultation effective. Just talking about consultation does not bring it about. The Prime Minister suggested that a liaison secretariat may be set up. I hope it is and that it will work. Personally I have my doubts, but it is worth trying. I think eventually it will be necessary to set up a department of federal-provincial relations in the government of Canada, with a similar minister in each province. I think we shall find it in our interests to hold an annual conference between premiers and the Prime Minister to deal with these matters. I cannot understand why the Prime Minister does not appoint the premiers members of the privy council and bring them periodically into the privy council to review some of the federal problems so that they would raise their sights and see things from a federal as well as a provincial point of view.

The Prime Minister said the provinces are giving top priority to the problem of financing education. He said, if I took his words down correctly, that the federal government appreciates the financial implications of this priority. Well, the federal government might well do so, because all the data which has been supplied indicates that the demands for education are likely to be doubled and trebled over the next few years and that the provinces and municipalities will not be able to meet the additional education costs. Trained and educated people are essential if we are to expand our economy, and the problem which faces us is this: People move from province to province in this mobile age and in this period of technology, and when a province spends money educating young Canadians it may be educating young people who are going to spend a great part of their lives in another province. For this reason alone, the federal government has a responsibility.

I think the best way to help the provinces is not by the federal government meddling in education but by moving toward the acceptance of the plea put forward by some of the provincial premiers for 25 per cent of the income tax revenue and 25 per cent of the corporation tax revenue. I do not agree with those who went one step further and asked that the provinces be given 100 per cent of the succession duties. I think that if there is any tax which ought to be redistributed over Canada, it is the succession duty tax. These are taxes which are collected from estates accumulated from business done right across the country. When a millionaire or a multimillionaire dies in one part of Canada, the chances are that his fortune has been made from business done all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But in suggesting they be given 25 per cent of the income tax revenue and 25 per cent of the corporation tax revenue, I think the provinces had a good case. It is not enough for the federal government to say it understands the financial implications of giving education a high priority. I think it must recognize now and in subsequent conferences the necessity of providing the provinces with a larger share of the income tax field if the provinces are to discharge their responsibilities in the sphere of education.

I come now to the question of equalization. The Prime Minister said that equalization makes co-operative federalism possible, and I agree. But, surely, the converse is true, and anything which departs from equalization makes co-operative federalism more difficult. The principle of equalization is based on two premises, first, that the government of Canada has some responsibility for those provinces which are less developed and less industrialized than others. Second, that direct taxes are levied on wealth which is earned all over Canada, not necessarily in the province where the wealth is being taxed and, therefore, that some redistribution of direct taxation is fair and just.

The Liberal party during the years has recognized this principle, as I said on Friday—and I do not intend, now, to cover the ground which I covered then. The Prime Minister himself, in a statement in the House of Commons on June 2, 1958 said:

> Not only is the principle important but the application of that principle is even more important. On what basis are equalization payments going to be made? As far as this party is concerned we are pledged to equalization on the basis of the per capita yield of the three taxes in the wealthiest province.

The other day I quoted from the book "The Liberal Party" by the Secretary of State. I quote from it again only to draw attention to two words. It says, at page 125, that during the national Liberal convention of 1958—> —the party pledged itself to alter the basis of equalization payments so that the revenues of all the provinces from income tax and succession duties would be brought up to the level of the province having the highest per capita revenue.

This principle was reaffirmed, according to the same author, by the national Liberal rally in 1961. The Liberal campaign literature said the same thing:

> The Liberal party believes that in order to ensure a basic equality of provincial services between all parts of Canada, all provinces should receive an equal revenue per head of population from the tax fields shared between the two levels of government so that all Canadian citizens will benefit equally.

There can be no doubt that this was a pledge. It was not just a preference, not just something which could be set aside if, after listening to the various provinces expressing their opinions, some other formula could be determined. This was a pledge made by the Liberal party, by its leader and by its chief author. It was a pledge to the people of Canada that a Liberal government would introduce equalization in a specific way by ensuring to each province the equivalent of the per capita income from the three tax fields, income tax, corporation tax and succession duties, enjoyed by the wealthiest province in Canada.

It is all very well to be prepared to listen, but there is a difference between flexibility and flabbiness. Here was a fixed principle to which the Liberal party had committed itself, a promise upon which they had been elected. I must say that after listening to the Prime Minister's explanation this afternoon I am far from satisfied as to the reasons why the government discarded a commitment it had made to the people of Canada in favour of a formula which departs from that principle of equalization. It is not merely that the new formula takes the average of the two top provinces rather than the figures of the top province. It is more important than that. It promised to take the per capita income in the top province from all three fields of revenue, income tax, corporation tax, and succession duties. The government has not done that. It has introduced the factor of resource revenue. There was no good reason for doing so. There was no more reason for including resource revenue than there would have been for including revenue from sales tax or consumer taxes or anything else of that kind.

If the government wishes to include other provincial revenue, let it include revenue from all sources. It is unfair to take one which affects some provinces more than others and which brings in many factors which are not comparable. Some of the provinces do not have much revenue from resources because they sold their resources for consideration in the past and have spent the money. Are the provinces which did not sell their resources for a limited sum, but which continue to derive revenue from them, to be discriminated against because of that? But I think the most unfortunate aspect of this new formula is that the provinces are to be allowed to retain another 25 per cent of succession duties, and this is not to be included when computing the equalization grants. If there is any tax which ought to be included in computing an equalization grant, surely it is succession duties, because succession duties are going to become more important as the years go by. Succession duties are levied usually on large fortunes which are left in one province but which have been earned all over Canada, and to leave these out seems to me to be taking a very serious step along the road away from equalization. I think the people of Canada have a right to ask themselves why the government has discarded what was a just and reasonable formula for equalization and adopted one which in many ways is a monstrosity.

The Prime Minister said this afternoon there was no ultimatum, there was no capitulation. Whether there was an ultimatum or not, whether there was capitulation or not, the fact remains that most Canadians can do simple arithmetic. They know that the premier of Quebec, along with other premiers, asked for 25 per cent of the income tax revenue and 25 per cent of the corporation tax revenue. They did not get it. They got instead a formula which is going to give the provinces in total $87.4 million and will give the province of Quebec $42.7 million or almost half the total amount paid out under this formula. That may not be capitulation, but it will look to a lot of people as being very much like a behind-the-barn deal in which one province is going to get almost half the total amount of money. When this is broken down on a per capita basis it gives the province of Quebec $7.81 per head compared with $5.60 for Prince Edward Island. Surely those two figures alone indicate how far we have moved from the principle of equalization. If we take the three far western provinces we find that the figures are $2.31 for British Columbia, $1.23 for Alberta and $2.65 for Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether my hon. friend would permit a question. Does he not agree that if the formula had been equalization up to the top province, the province of Quebec would have got $7 million of the $12 million that would have followed from that new equalization?

Mr. Douglas: I am going to suggest that the government would have been far better, it seems to me, to have left the equalization formula as it was, if it could not do a complete job, and to have said to the provinces: We are now prepared to start moving step by step toward giving you 25 per cent of the two income tax fields. This would have given all the provinces something. It would give it to them on a fair and equitable basis, rather than on this formula which smacks so strongly of favouritism and expediency.

I do not want to drag this out, Mr. Chairman. I want to say just a word about the Canada pension plan. I am glad of the progress which the Prime Minister has reported. I think the government ought to consider whether or not some of the reserve which will be built up in this fund could not be reinvested in the provinces on some allocation based on population. I know the plan is not supposed to be a funded plan, but since the extra $10 a month to the old age security pensioners is not to be taken out of the fund, there will be a reserve built up, and I think it would help to sell the plan to the provinces if the federal government were prepared to take some part of the reserve and reinvest it in the provinces by the purchase of provincial or municipal bonds, or some other form of investment in the provinces.

With reference to the old age assistance pension and blind and disabled persons allowances, I should like to say that I hope the government of Canada will press very hard to get the provinces to agree to make the increase retroactive to October 1. I think it is unfortunate that all of the people who come under these shared programs always get cheated out of several months of increase in pension because of the fact they have to wait until the federal and provincial governments negotiate. It should be remembered these groups come under a means test. In other words, the only reason they get any pension at all is because that they have practically no other means of subsistence. They are people who need this increase if anybody needs an increase. I certainly urge the federal government to exercise all its influence on the provinces to agree to making the increase for these three shared programs retroactive to the 1st of October.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that we wish the Prime Minister and the government well as they continue these federal-provincial meetings. We hope they will be able to resolve some of the very serious problems that face the country. I want to suggest, however, in all kindliness that they will not promote co-operative federalism by following the principle that the wheel that squeals the loudest gets all the grease.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, since this is interim supply and with a view to getting it through I wonder whether, provided the hon. member for Red Deer would be the last speaker, there would be a disposition to go on and complete it tonight.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: We have other speakers.

Mr. Pigeon: And we would like to hear the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Pearson: You will hear him Christmas eve.

Mr. Thompson: May I call it ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader what is the forecast of the business for the rest of the week?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer not to make any forecast beyond tomorrow because, pursuant to the suggestion made earlier by the Prime Minister, I should like to have conversations with certain hon. gentlemen opposite with a view to planning the business for the rest of the week. Tomorrow we will go on with this urgent business of interim supply and hope to conclude it after one or two brief speeches. As soon as it has been concluded we will go on with the redistribution resolution. If this should be completed, as I fervently hope it will be, the Minister of Transport has several legislative items on the order paper we could take up, starting with the C.O.T.C.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 3, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HAYS—DISMISSAL OF P.F.A.A. SUPERVISOR

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On Thursday last, November 28, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) addressed a question to me which he had directed to the Acting Prime Minister in my absence on Tuesday, November 26, regarding a statement I had made in Edmonton to the effect that I appointed people according to merit.

He then went on to say that if it is government policy that personnel are selected on merit, why was it, in view of this statement by myself, that Mr. George Walker, the former P.F.A.A. supervisor for Swift Current, was discharged from the government service, and went on to say that either my statement was false or I did not practice what I preached.

My reply to the hon. member indicated that my statement was not false and that I do practice what I preach. This man was discharged on the recommendation of the director because he did not perform his duties satisfactorily. I also pointed out that the director had been appointed by the previous administration on June 1, 1961, and he is a good man.

The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek then stated that he understood I would find in the files a report made by the present director in regard to this man, to the effect that he was the most capable supervisor in that branch, and asked if I did find this report would I consider firing the director and reinstating the supervisor. In reply to this question I may say that I have had the files searched, and am advised that Mr. Walker was employed as a part time inspector under the P.F.A.A. for varying periods each year from September 4, 1957 to December 5, 1962, when he was appointed district supervisor for the Swift Current area on a full time basis. However, there is no report in the files to the effect that he was the most capable supervisor in the branch, as stated by the hon. member.

At the time the hon. gentleman asked the question I stated that apparently he did not understand that the problem apparently arose out of the fact that Mr. Walker was taking orders from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek instead of from the director, and this was one of the problems, and that he was not satisfactorily filling his job.

The basis for the dismissal of Mr. Walker was a report received from the director of the prairie farm assistance administration to the effect that for some time the matter of continuing the services of Mr. George Walker as supervisor for the Swift Current area had been a problem to him. The administration of the P.F.A.A. in the Swift Current area was most unsatisfactory and, all in all, a situation had developed where there was a lack of any co-ordination between the Swift Current office and head office in Regina. The supervisor was simply not carrying out the director's instructions. His utter lack of co-operation with the Regina office was one fault, and his disregard for the director and Mr. W. F. Davies, the superintendent, could not be overlooked.

Although he was quite conversant with the operations of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act from experience gained as office manager for his predecessor, he made no effort to check inspectors who were not properly carrying out their duties when taking cultivated acreage reports from farmers in the area. In a number of instances he failed to carry out the inspections of those townships which were contiguous to other townships which had been declared eligible for award by the board of review. This is one phase of the administration that is quite necessary, and it is insisted that each supervisor complete the inspection of such townships.

He was explicitly instructed not to endeavour to answer any correspondence with officials of rural municipalities or farmers in his area, but rather that all such correspondence be directed to the Regina office, where files are kept for reply. He disregarded instructions in this matter. He refused to co-operate in the investigations of alleged irregularities in some cultivated acreage reports which were filed in his area for awards. A situation developed in the area under his supervision which the director felt required a recheck of certain townships, but he received no co-operation whatsoever from Mr. Walker in making these rechecks. Had

Mr. Walker followed the director's instructions there is no doubt that the situation would not have developed.

On the basis of the director's report on the lack of co-operation and disregard of his instructions by Mr. Walker, I approved his recommendation that Mr. Walker's services be dispensed with.

Yesterday the hon. member raised a question of privilege with regard to my statement on Tuesday last that one of the problems arose out of the fact that Mr. Walker was taking orders from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek instead of the director. I understand it is a rule of the house that if an hon. member rises in his place and denies a statement made by another member, that member must accept the denial. I am quite prepared to accept the hon. member's word and am prepared to withdraw my statement that Mr. Walker was taking orders from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, which I had been led to understand had been the case. I would point out, however, that that was not the basis on which Mr. Walker was dismissed as the district supervisor for the Swift Current area. He was dismissed for not giving satisfactory services and for not carrying out the instructions of his superior officer.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, is it not a rule of the house that if a report is mentioned by a minister it should be tabled? If so, I make the request that the director's report be tabled, because it is obvious that Mr. Walker is the innocent victim of a dispute between the director and myself. At no time was he told either by the minister, although the request was made, or by the director, to whom also a request was made, the reason for his dismissal. Being an innocent victim, I believe he should be given the chance to refute the statement made by the minister.

Mr. Speaker: As to whether the report should be tabled, I will leave that to the discretion of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Table it.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, this is a departmental report and I am sure the hon. member knows that this cannot be tabled.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIntosh: Then, Mr. Speaker, I have no alternative but to move this motion:

That the question of privilege I raised respecting the statement by the Minister of Agriculture that:

"Apparently he does not understand that the problem arose out of the fact Mr. Walker was taking orders from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek instead of the director. This was one of the problems, and was not satisfactorily fulfilling his job."—be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MR. GREGOIRE—FAILURE OF POSTMASTER GENERAL TO TABLE DOCUMENTS

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on another question of privilege.

On Wednesday, October 23 of this year, this house ordered the Postmaster General to table certain documents. Six weeks have gone by since that order was given to the Postmaster General and the documents have not been tabled yet.

I feel the minister should comply with the order given to him. So we ask him to explain why he has not done so.

Hon. Azellus Denis (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I got in touch this morning with the officials of my department and I believe the documents will be tabled presently, to the satisfaction of the hon. member for Lapointe.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEFICIENCY PAYMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to inform the house that the agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to support the price of eggs by a deficiency payment program for the twelve month period, October 1, 1963 to September 30, 1964, at a national average price of 34 cents per dozen to producers for grade A large size eggs. The support price of 34 cents is the same as last year and represents 92 per cent of the base price or ten year average. Last year the 34 cent support price was 90.7 per cent of the base price.

There has been no change in the procedure established for claims, and payments to any one producer during the support year will continue to be limited to 4,000 dozen grade A extra large size, grade A large size and grade A medium size eggs. Producers must be registered with the board and have marketed their eggs through registered grading stations, or have sold their eggs to retail outlets as producer-graders to be eligible for any deficiency payments which may be made.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Earlier this afternoon he announced the deficiency payments to egg producers under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act. Could he tell us what steps his department is taking to make sure these deficiency payments go to the egg producers, rather than to commission men and agents who handle the products of the egg producers?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would direct those people who are not receiving them, or he thinks are not receiving them, to write me, I would be glad to investigate their cases.

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the egg price support announced by the minister, we appreciate the Conservative farm policy he announced, but what happened to the Liberal promise of regional averaging and quarterly payments?

FINANCE

REPORTED REDUCTION IN FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and draw his attention to the latest bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics on the question of foreign investment in Canada, showing receipts of only $98 million from this source compared to foreign capital inflows of $391 million, $410 million and $386 million in previous quarters.

I should like to ask the minister whether he is satisfied with the reduction of foreign investment to this extent and, if not, what is going to be the attitude on the part of the government toward increasing the amount of this investment?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has drawn attention to the effects of the introduction of the United States interest equalization tax, or the announcement of it, and the fact that while it is still being considered by congress there will continue to be a very considerable reduction in the amount of capital flowing from the United States to Canada. I should like to be able to do something about it, but obviously the only effective way of doing anything would be to speed up the legislation through the United States congress, and unfortunately I am not able to influence that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, now that the Americans are blamed for this and not the legislation brought in by this government, does the minister agree with what hon. Mr. Kierans, the Quebec revenue minister, said yesterday in speaking at the Windsor hotel:

> —denial of access to American capital markets, promoted by the Canadian government, is making more costly the financing of growth in the private and public sector—"Ottawa's hostile attitude against foreign investment" has forced one United Kingdom company to abandon its plan to set up a subsidiary plant in the Drummondville area.

Does the minister agree with that criticism by one of his good friends?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Kierans is a colourful character, but I am afraid I cannot always agree with his statements.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. In view of this lack of United States credits, is the Minister of Finance considering the creation of Canadian credits in order to replace those U.S. credits which are not flowing any more to Canada?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I think this is hardly the time to discuss monetary theory.

Hon. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Industry. Is this the practical effect of his policy of regional development that we are experiencing now?

[Later:]

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance in connection with the question asked earlier by the Leader of the Opposition. Can the Minister of Finance tell us whether the diminution in United States investment, the flow of United States capital into Canada referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, exceeds the amount the minister hoped to achieve by his ill fated legislation earlier this year?

Mr. Churchill: That is a loaded question.

Mr. Gordon: I think I need counsel, Mr. Speaker, before I deal with a question of that kind.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, that I tried to get in earlier. What plans can the minister announce which will lessen the "distinct cleavage" which Quebec revenue minister Eric Kierans says exists between the federal government's international policies at the political level and the economic policies now being pursued by the government?

Mr. Gordon: I have not seen this statement, Mr. Speaker. I would like to study it before I try to deal with a general statement of that kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further supplementary question. As the hon. gentleman has given the house the assurance that he has not seen this statement—it is on the front page of all the papers—I might read it and ask whether he agrees with it:

> Mr. Kierans said the federal government's application of withholding taxes and depreciation allowances "is going to get us into trouble".
> "For one thing it is going to invite retaliatory action by the United States government", he declared.

I ask the minister, does he agree with that statement from this colourful character whom he derogated a few months ago?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I read the Globe and Mail this morning, and that was one of the papers that did not, as far as I recall, carry that statement on its front page.

An hon. Member: You don't read the right papers.

Mr. Gordon: I thought the right hon. gentleman said "all the papers". In any event, I think that interpretation as reported is highly—

Mr. Mandziuk: Correct.

Mr. Gordon: —exaggerated.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

LACK OF INTERPRETERS—LATE RECEIPT OF COMMITTEE REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond C. Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding what is taking place at the committee on agriculture which held a sitting this morning. I would also ask the Secretary of State to make representations to you concerning the lack of interpreters and the delay in publishing the French report of proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. members for Roberval and for Kamouraska, who sit on this committee, are not too familiar with the English language and would like to have an interpreter attend the sittings, if possible, in order to provide simultaneous translation.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

[Text]

This is a question we have discussed before, Mr. Speaker, and I know it may be embarrassing at times when there are not enough interpreters to cover so many committees sitting at the same time. However, I ask the Secretary of State to get one for this afternoon if possible, since these two gentlemen will probably be attending that committee again. They sat there not understanding a single word. We were talking about sales of grain in eastern Canada and they did not understand what we were talking about. They will only find out in two weeks time when the report will probably be submitted. This is my question of privilege, and I wonder whether the Secretary of State has something to say.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that this situation has arisen on several occasions during the present session. Part of the reason, of course, is that there are so very many committees sitting at the same time and there is only limited personnel. I am sure that Your Honour and the officers at the table, having heard the hon. gentleman's point, will do their utmost to see that the situation is improved just as far as it can be humanly done with the number of officials that are available. Personally I regret very much that we do not have more people to do this work of interpretation and translation. I have made repeated representations in many quarters to get the staff strengthened in order to do this work adequately. I repeat the invitation I have extended before, that if anyone knows any competent translator who would like a job, I wish he would give his name to the chairman of the civil service commission right away.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he is aware that some of these committees could have been meeting two months ago and thus avoid all this rush at the end of the session.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I am not.

Mr. Langlois: I may not be considered competent, but if I may be of help to the government this afternoon I am quite willing to do so without pay, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF INCENTIVE TRAINING PROGRAM FOR OLDER WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour regarding the older workers training incentive program. I notice that according to the literature sent out by his department, this program is only available to workers who are hired between November 1, 1963 and January 31, 1964. The question I would like to ask the minister is, why is it limited to such a narrow period? Would the minister and his department give some consideration to widening the period during which this incentive program will be applicable?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): The purpose of the particular period was to attempt to encourage a substantial volume of hiring in a period that would have the maximum effect on high seasonal winter unemployment. However, I am glad to assure my hon. friend that consideration will be given, and I think it is now being given, to a possible extension of this period.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT RESPECTING PRIMARY PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

I received at noon from Mr. Sorel, president general of the catholic farmers union, a telegram which reads as follows:

On behalf of all Quebec farmers, we state once again our full support of Bill C-5—stop—considering it as an essential protection of the already low livelihood of thousands of farmers—stop—asking for passage of the whole bill during this session.

Has the Prime Minister received such a telegram and if so, does he intend to submit Bill C-5 for the approval of the house before the conclusion of this session?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall receiving that telegram, but I will be glad to look into the matter as soon as I get to my office. The government's intentions with regard to further legislation this session will be made known in a day or two.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REPORTED RUMOURS THAT SABOTAGE CAUSED RECENT CRASH

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of rumours that are rampant regarding the cause of the terrible disaster to the T.C.A. aircraft last Friday. Is the minister in a position, on the basis of the investigation so far, to eliminate and rule out sabotage as the cause of that accident?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I was not able to hear the right hon. gentleman's question.

An hon. Member: Put your earpiece on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, either the minister's hearing is bad or my voice was not loud enough for him. I asked whether he was in a position now, on the basis of the investigation that has so far taken place in connection with the tragedy at Montreal last Friday, to eliminate sabotage as the cause thereof.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have had no report from the investigating team so far; therefore I would not rule out any possible cause whatever. I do not want that remark to be taken as indicating that I have any reason to suspect one cause more than any other; I simply have not the information.

[Later:]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Were either or both of the DC-8F aircraft recently involved in accidents, at London airport and in the tragic occurrence at Montreal, equipped with Pratt and Whitney fan jet engines rather than Rolls Royce engines?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, that subject matter was dealt with in committee this morning, and I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to take his question as notice and give him a full answer later.

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER PLANT—INQUIRY AS TO OWNERSHIP OF SELECTED COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I should like to ask the Minister of Industry if he can tell the house whether the Deuterium Corporation of Canada, which has been awarded the contract for the heavy water plant, is a wholly owned Canadian corporation.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes, I can. It is not wholly owned, as my announcement made clear yesterday, but a very substantial portion of the Deuterium Corporation of Canada will be Canadian owned.

Mr. Thompson: Perhaps the minister will tell us how much of it is expected to be Canadian owned, and whether he is aware of the reasons Mr. Spivak, president of this corporation, severed his connections with the atomic energy commission of the United States.

Mr. Drury: The percentage of Canadian ownership is anticipated to be 51 per cent.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Anticipated, or is now?

Mr. Drury: Anticipated; the issue of stock to the Canadian shareholders has not yet been made.

Mr. Thompson: Could I have an answer to the second part of my question?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the reasons given for Mr. Spivak coming to Canada after having left the service of the atomic energy commission of the United States.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Will the minister tell us how much of the firm is now Canadian owned?

Mr. Drury: This, like a number of other proposals, represents a proposal by a corporation which in itself will only come into full flower if it is awarded the contract. It is only then that the proposals will become operative. Now it is merely a shell of a corporation.

Mr. Knowles: Shades of the trans-Canada pipe line.

Mr. Drury: It will be brought into full existence when it is told that in fact it will have a job to do.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister now telling the house that this company has been awarded a very important contract although it is not a corporate entity at the present time? If so, how is it possible to determine whether this firm has both the technical and financial capacity to carry out the contract which is being given?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the corporation does exist. The proposals made to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited were for an operation which would involve changing substantially the financial competence and plans of the corporation, changing substantially the equity ownership of the corporation, changing substantially the personnel of the corporation. This is a corporation which is going into a brand new operation, and requires substantial changes.

The contract has not been awarded. As I announced yesterday, it is merely that the government has approved the application of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to enter into an underwriting agreement, Deuterium of Canada Limited having indicated that it had viable, sensible economic plans to do the things it said it could do. When the corporation does sign agreements providing that it will in fact do the things it says it will do, a contract will be signed with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

Mr. Douglas: Do I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is saying this company is really at the present time a United States company, and the proposal is that it will alter its structure so as to have some degree of Canadian ownership after the reorganization? Is that correct?

Mr. Drury: It is a Canadian company, of which the principal shareholder is a citizen of the United States at the present time.

Mr. Thompson: Coming back to my original question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the reason for this United States citizen who is president of Deuterium of Canada Limited severing his connections with the United States atomic energy commission.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question in the affirmative.

Mr. Thompson: If the minister is aware, will he inform the house?

An hon. Member: Read Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to disclose information regarding the motives of a private individual. I do not think it would be proper for me to make public this type of information.

CONSIDERATION OF FRENCH CANADIANS IN MAKING SENIOR APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Industry?

Could the minister tell us why he has been unable to appoint a French speaking deputy minister or assistant deputy minister within his department since the three present directors are English speaking? Will any of the seven proposed directors be French speaking?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the hon. member that the only thing I can do is to recommend a candidate for the position of area development agency commissioner; the present incumbent is French speaking.

In every department, the appointment of deputy ministers comes under the jurisdiction of the Prime Minister and not the minister.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question? Can the minister tell whether the three appointments made by the government can be called "co-operative bilingualism"?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that I shall do everything possible to appoint French Canadians to the Department of Industry. However, I must recognize, unfortunately, that with the competition given us by the Quebec government, I find it quite difficult to find competent French speaking candidates.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a kind of argument, and I would point out to the hon. member that this is question time.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. I should like to know what steps he took or what inquiries he made to find bilingual or French high officials for his department before asserting that he could not find qualified candidates?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think that question could not be answered orally on the orders of the day.

[Later:]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Following the answer given by the Minister of Industry, could he tell us whether that statement means that he chooses himself the deputy ministers in the various departments of his administration?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister to appoint deputy ministers.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry.

The minister complained a short while ago of a lack of French Canadian applicants in his department. Why could not Mr. Lavigne, who holds the fifth position in his department, be appointed deputy minister, so as to give fair treatment to French Canadians and to recognize their rights.

[Text]

ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRIES IN DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry. Is he in a position to mention a single new industry established in one of the designated areas since the enactment of the legislation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes, Mr. Speaker. For instance, in the town of La Malbaie, the construction of a new plant for Reynolds Aluminum is being started.

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister mention another new industry that would have been established in the Abitibi area?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for his question, but for the time being I cannot think of any other example.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Is not that new aluminum plant being established at Murray Bay precisely because this company has concluded a very important contract with the federal government, which will endeavour to absorb the company's production in years to come?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question. That is an argument or a statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I feel that my question was quite in order and I raise a point of order.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The question is out of order. The hon. member for Port Arthur.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that whenever a member raises a point of order, he has the right to do so. That is what the hon. member for Lapointe is asking just now.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Port Arthur.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

According to the rules, when a member rises on a question of privilege I believe that the Speaker must listen to that question of privilege.

Inquiries of the Ministry

My question of privilege is this. I wanted to rise on a point of order following a question which I had asked in order that I might explain why it was in order. You prevented me from doing so. It seems to me that I have the right to raise a point of order when the occasion arises. I ask for your ruling on the matter.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Fisher: I can't compete with that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lapointe will understand that I am a human being, too, and sometimes it is difficult for me to make my voice heard; but I am sure he heard me when I said three times that his question was out of order. It was as simple as that; the question was out of order. The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, an hon. member of parliament is asking a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Villeneuve must recognize that I am still the Speaker. I will be glad indeed to give the hon. member my reasons for not hearing him at this time. They are very simple. The hon. member for Port Arthur had precedence; he rose before the hon. member for Lapointe. All hon. members have equal rights in this chamber, including the hon. member for Port Arthur, and he rose first. The hon. member's question of privilege or point of order may come in later, but not at this time.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER FOR DRUMMOND-ARTHABASKA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to confirm the statement made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska last Sunday, in Drummondville, to the effect that the province of Quebec would get everything she asked for at the federal-provincial conference, and that the amount of $42 million already granted to her by the federal government was but a first instalment on what she would receive under the new distribution of fiscal rights?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm that statement, which I have not seen, if in fact the statement was made.

[Mr. Gregoire.]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

HAINES ROAD—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING MAINTENANCE DURING WINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can he inform the house whether the negotiations between the Canadian government and the United States government have yet been completed with regard to the maintenance of the Haines highway?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the arrangements are completed, but I would prefer to read the hon. member's question, as well as hear it, and I might make an announcement tomorrow.

Mr. Nielsen: While the minister is announcing that, I wonder if he will inform the house whether negotiations have been completed as to the salient features of maintenance, particularly the equipment that is being used and the labour being utilized on the highway?

Mr. Laing: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY BRANCH LINES—CONFERENCE RESPECTING ABANDONMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Sometime ago I asked if there would be a meeting of all interested parties before any further railway abandonment would take place. Does the minister anticipate calling this meeting, or is the document I have in my hand a final disposition of this matter?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what document the hon. member has in his hand, but I would indicate to him that it has been made clear on several occasions that the abandonment of grain lines in western Canada will not be proceeded with for the time being, and I have also indicated that I propose bringing forward legislation to deal with this subject.

Mr. Cooper: The document I have is headed "Rail line abandonments by C.N.R. and C.P.R. as of November 6, 1963."

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF ANTI-SMOKING CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. What portion of the $600,000 for the anti-cigarette smoking campaign will the federal government provide?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I would be glad to look into the question, Mr. Speaker, and give an answer tomorrow.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

QUEBEC—COMPLAINTS RESPECTING TREATMENT OF ARSENAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaule (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, first, I may tell the hon. member that I am aware of what is going on at the Val Cartier arsenals. The Val Cartier plant has been given less work lately, and consequently employment has dropped. However, we are doing our best to try and find jobs for those who have been laid off.

On November 13 I asked the minister a question about the unjust treatment which had befallen the employees of the Val Cartier arsenals, near Quebec city. More than 15 days have elapsed since then, and I wonder if the minister is now able to answer my question?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, first, I may tell the hon. member that I am aware of what is going on at the Val Cartier arsenals. The Val Cartier plant has been given less work lately, and consequently employment has dropped. However, we are doing our best to try and find jobs for those who have been laid off.

Mr. Beaule: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not speaking of the employees who have been laid off, but of the treatment which is meted out to those people who are still employed.

Mr. Drury: According to my information, Mr. Speaker, those who have stayed on are treated quite well.

[Text]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FORT CHURCHILL—FUTURE PLANS FOR USE BY ARMED SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to give a further report in relation to the plans of his department concerning the future use of Fort Churchill by various branches of the armed forces?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything I could usefully add at this time.

Mr. Simpson: As a supplementary question, could the minister say when he may be able to make such a report?

Mr. Hellyer: I would hope it would not be too long, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the report appearing in the newspaper today with regard to the proposed closing of Fort Churchill for army purposes is accurate, plus the other reports with regard to general cutting down of the services?

Mr. Hellyer: I have not seen that report, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: You don't see any of these reports.

BRIDGES

THREE RIVERS, QUE.—COST OF PROTECTION OF NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question. Does the government now have in hand an estimate of the cost of the protection of the navigable waters in the St. Lawrence which protection will follow from the erection of the proposed bridge at Three Rivers?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is this estimate of cost any factor at all in the government's reconsideration of the order in council relating to this project and, if so, when does the minister think he can give us an explanation of the government's final position?

Mr. McIlraith: The cost is very heavy, Mr. Speaker. The responsibility for building the bridge is not that of the federal government, as I think the hon. member knows. The responsibility of the federal government is that of protecting the water in the St. Lawrence river, which is the navigable stream, the shipping route. The estimate of the cost is very substantial and is a consequence of the location of piers for the bridge.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask whether the government was not seized of this information or did not try to get the information at the time the proposal was put before this parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know what information the former government had; that would be their responsibility. I am not able to say what information they had on this subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Clement Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Is the corporation of the Three Rivers bridge now authorized to start the construction of this bridge?

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: The order in council referred to by the hon. member for Port Arthur was one indicating the concurrence of the government to the construction of a bridge. There were some questions raised about the order in council.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question.

Could he tell us whether his department studied the order in council, dated March 4 last, concerning the Three Rivers bridge, and if so, whether his department recognized the validity of that order in council?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we did study that order in council and, as the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska certainly knows, an opinion once expressed becomes the property of him who requested it, in this case, the Minister of Transport, and it would be up to him to communicate it to the house when and wherever he deems fit to do so.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to ask the Minister of Transport with regard to this matter. Could he tell us whether or not the Department of Justice told him that the order in council was valid?

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: The Department of Justice did provide an opinion on this subject, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he could tell us what was the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Balcer: Why not?

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of this series. If the cost estimate to the government in connection with this project is high, will the government have the authority, aside from whether the order in council is valid, to make sure that the project is not proceeded with?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): On a point of order, I would be glad to arrange for the estimates of the Minister of Transport to come up the next day we have an opportunity so that this information can be supplied to hon. members. It seems to me that a detailed question of an argumentative, debating nature such as the one which has just been asked is not appropriate on the orders of the day.

Mr. Fisher: The Secretary of State has raised a point of order. I should like to point out that we have on the order paper for consideration a bill which is very similar to the one setting up this Three Rivers bridge organization, and I feel there is some urgency in finding out what is the position of the government in this case as far as the Department of Transport is concerned, because it would certainly affect the consideration we would give to this other bill when it is before the house. It is for this reason I think there is a certain urgency about it, particularly if the cost which is to devolve upon the government rises as much as the minister has indicated.

WORLD FAIR

REPORTED TECHNICAL DIFFICULTIES RESPECTING SITE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I refer to a question which I have already directed to the Minister of Public Works and to which he could not give any answer because he did not have the proper information. Can the minister tell the house whether any change will have to be made to the site of the world exhibition following the problems involved?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Definitely not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question if you allow me. Could the Minister of Public Works tell us whether his statement is inconsistent with those made by the mayor of Montreal, according to whom many difficulties have arisen which could result in the selection of a new site?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I wish to be quite clear on this subject. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is asking me whether the site would be changed. The answer is positively no, the site will not be changed.

Mr. Pigeon: If there are major or minor changes in the development of the islands?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, if major changes are made, plans will be submitted to us and we shall then advise the hon. member.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO WORKERS IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour regarding lumbermen who work across the border. I am referring to the impossibility of their being able to obtain unemployment insurance once they have quit their work. There have been many negotiations over the past few years, and can the government tell us where they are at now and if there are any conclusions on the horizon?

Mr. Speaker: That is a question for the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Langlois: I will rephrase my question to the Minister of Labour. Can the hon. gentleman assure the house that he will look into these negotiations to see whether any progress has been made in the situation affecting these lumbermen?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, though I know the situation without looking into it further.

PENITENTIARIES

NEW WESTMINSTER—RECOMMENDATIONS THAT CONDITIONS BE INVESTIGATED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, about ten days ago I asked the Minister of Justice a question regarding three recommendations which had been made by a jury in Vancouver, one of the recommendations being for an independent investigation of the conditions in the penitentiary at New Westminster. I wonder whether the minister has since received a report from the judge and, if so, what action is he contemplating in this regard?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know there has been no report from the judge as yet.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON COLLISION IN MONTREAL HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to make any statement to the house on the reported collision of two large vessels in Montreal harbour either early this morning or late last night?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I do not know that there is a great deal to report. Early this morning, at about 12.30 a.m., two vessels, the Manchester Merchant of United Kingdom registry and the Lionel of Norwegian registry were in collision in Montreal harbour.

It appears that the Manchester Merchant which had taken on cargo at Montreal, was proceeding downstream to leave the harbour. Two vessels, the Donnacona, a laker, and the Lionel, had left the seaway and had turned below Canadian Vickers shipyard in order to proceed into the upper harbour. The Donnacona was in the lead and the Lionel followed approximately 500 feet behind. Both vessels were moving slowly.

The Manchester Merchant had safely passed the Donnacona and then appeared to veer off to the south striking the Lionel midships.

An explosion and fire occurred in both vessels. The fire on the Manchester Merchant was brought under control and the vessel is now at anchor opposite elevator No. 4 in Montreal harbour. She is expected to go to drydock.

The Lionel lost control and had to be pushed by tugs to the downstream tip of Ile Ronde. The fire aboard the Lionel had not been brought under control when I checked this forenoon. There was no loss of life and only one seaman was injured. Both vessels involved had pilots aboard, and I am looking into the matter further.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $377,400,841.02, being the aggregate of—

(a) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except agriculture item 100, atomic energy item 5, external affairs items 78 and 107, fisheries item 45, mines and technical surveys items 45 and 80, northern affairs and national resources items 5 and 10, public works items 20 and 190, transport item 35 and loans, investments and advances item L20 for which no amount is being released, $318,822,963.00;

(b) an additional two-twelfths of external affairs item 105 and finance item 45, $4,700,000.00;

(c) an additional one-twelfth of mines and technical surveys item 140, national film board item 1, northern affairs and national resources item 80, post office items 5, 10 and 15, public works items 150 and 165, transport items 40 and 220, loans, investments and advances item L70, $21,342,422.50;

(d) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates (A), for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except external affairs items 96a and 117a, finance item 5a, northern affairs and national resources item 110a, and loans, investments and advances items L13a and L63a for which no amount is being released $24,023,455.00;

(e) an additional one-twelfth of finance item 45a, $83,333.34;

(f) one-twelfth of the amount of the item set forth in the supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $583,333.34;

(g) one-twelfth of the amount of item set forth in the supplementary estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $1,666,666.67;

(h) one-twelfth of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, except external affairs item 117d for which no amount is being released, $6,178,667.17;

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964.

Mr. Thompson: In making my comments today I shall try to be brief. The occasion is vitally important but I do not share any enthusiasm for unduly prolonging this debate.

The recent federal-provincial conference is now history. While it did not turn out as well as some may have hoped, it certainly did turn out a great deal better than many feared it might. I would commend the Prime Minister for his detailed report and explanation yesterday. I think it has helped all of us, as well as the nation, to understand the government's view of what was accomplished at the conference and the results which may be expected from it.

Perhaps no federal-provincial conference had received so much negative publicity in advance. The entire tone of the news media during the weeks preceding the conference indicated that Canada was headed into a major crisis which might well mean the splitting of our nation in two. Such was not the case, and I am sure Canadian citizens from Vancouver island to Newfoundland are relieved that it was not so. I believe every provincial premier, in spite of certain areas of difference which existed among them, should be commended for this demonstration that not one of them would have any part in demands which would pull Canada apart at the seams.

Let us hope we are entering upon a new era of consultative confederation. It is my hope and prayer that the conference in Quebec city in 1964 will prove as vitally important to continuing confederation in 1967 and beyond as the original Quebec conferences in 1864 were vital to the establishment of confederation and its continuation up to the present time. Perhaps the conference last week will represent a turning point in the history of federal-provincial affairs.

Another commendable feature was the decision to hold a number of ministerial conferences in the months ahead. We hear that the ministers of agriculture are to get together. The finance ministers will also get together to discuss matters relating to the next federal budget. The ministers of health are to get together to consider the problems arising from a hospital insurance scheme. This is an important subject on which there must be further consultation. We hear that the representatives of the different governments are to get together to consider ways in which more administrative responsibility relating to Indians and Eskimos can be passed on to the provinces. This is the type of continuing consultation which Canada needs. I believe this is progress, the kind of progress Canadian people expect from their elected governments.

I was interested in a point which Premier Lesage made in relation to this matter, when he said:

> The present policy of making decisions behind hermetically sealed doors in different sectors of government is no longer at all possible.

That statement is very true. I was particularly gratified to hear that the Prime Minister indicated there would be some form of secretariat for co-ordination and liaison established. I would again urge the government, as I have done many times in the past, that the time has come when a full fledged department of government should be established for this purpose. In our federal government in Canada we need a department of federal-provincial affairs. I am pleased to know that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam also supports this suggestion. We know that several provincial governments have already set up their counterpart ministries, indicating again that perhaps the provincial governments are ahead of the federal government in bringing in many of the logical reforms that are necessary.

I would say to the Prime Minister and to his government that diplomacy is good. There was a real place for it in the recent conference, but diplomacy in itself is not enough. We urgently need some leadership in Canada with relation to confederation, the holding together and the building up of our nation to the kind of country that we like to think Canada is. I should like to refer to a very interesting comment in this regard made by Premier Robarts of Ontario, as reported in the Montreal Star of December 2:

> "A generation ago," said Mr. Robarts, "it was still quite reasonable to expect that many activities of the federal and provincial governments in the economic field could be carried on separately without much fear of duplication or contradiction. ... The impact of governmental activity is now so great that unco-ordinated action by several levels of government can have serious effects on our economic development."

I would add, on the whole picture in Canada as it relates to confederation and to the nation, Canada.

However, this does not mean that every problem has been settled. Far from it. Nor are the decisions reached at the conference the total and final answers. Far from it. The new fiscal arrangement providing $87 million extra for the provinces is not really the basic item of importance. At best it is a temporary, makeshift agreement. We must have a more durable agreement, one that can continue at least for the foreseeable future.

I am concerned about the taxpayer. The struggle has been for the taxpayer's dollar. I am sure the taxpayer will realize more than ever before, that it is not as important to whom he pays his tax dollar or who it is that is going to spend it. He is concerned about how many more tax dollars he is going to be forced to produce in order to meet the demands of increasing governmental costs. The one thing that John Doe taxpayer can be sure of as a result of the conference is that his taxes are going to increase, and that the deficits are going to increase as well because the $87 million more than last year that is to be turned back to the provinces is going to have to be raised somewhat. The only source is out of the taxpayer's pocket or else out of further borrowings by the government. The only other alternative is that the government will drastically reduce its own expenditure and this does not seem possible, particularly in view of what has happened this year when we expect to have an even higher deficit although the Minister of Finance very carefully explained in his budget presentation that he hoped to decrease these deficits which he recognized could not continue.

We can say that a lot of good was accomplished by the conference, but when all the good about it has been said a dreadful, hollow feeling still remains, if we will be honest with ourselves. A little more haggling, a little more patching up, an agreement to discuss some other points later; is this the best that can be done at this critical time when we should be rethinking the whole situation and laying down a pattern for the entire basis of confederation? If this is it, then I do not believe this government can be regarded as anything more than a caretaker government, an administration that cleans up some of the leftovers from the previous occupants of the seats of power, an administration that tidies here and there and sweeps and dusts, but an administration that is not making progress in solving the basic problems of our confederation because it does not seem to know the direction in which it must go.

The premier of Alberta, Mr. Manning, in his opening statement asked the conference to lay out a basic groundwork of sound principles that could be a guide in working out the whole basis of federal-provincial relationships in the future. This seems to me the logical first step in providing the answers for the future, but the conference took no action on this suggestion. What has emerged, particularly when it comes to the apportionment of tax equalization payments, can be attributed to no really sound principles at all. It was a solution that was expedient, and probably necessarily so for the time being; but what about the future? In my opinion Johnny Canuck's pocketbook is up for grabs. We have yet to see those sound and constructive financial policies which are the clear responsibility of the federal government and which will fill that pocketbook sufficiently for Johnny Canuck to be able to pay what is required of him. Again, it is not how we are going to spend a dollar that he has available today but how are we going to expand the entire economy so there will be more dollars available to the taxpayer and more for governments as well.

It is in the light of this entire picture that it is important that steps be taken whereby the financial operations of the federal government can meet the problems that the different levels of government face, and so that the private sector of the economy can give assurance to the nation that we are really going forward and expanding. The Minister of Finance will surely agree with me that if we could relieve the federal government of its burden of debt and its burden of interest payments we could then place the creation of an adequate money supply, which the economy of the country needs, on an orderly basis through the Bank of Canada, which after all was created for that very purpose. That was why it was brought into being, as the prime minister of that day explained, and if this were done there would at least be some hope for a financial future for the federal government, the provincial governments and the country as a whole that would not involve complete collapse under intolerable levels of taxation and interest costs and ever increasing deficits. As it stands at the present time, there is no alternative prepared or projected for this problem.

I maintain that unless we can do this we will continue to have conferences which will attempt to patch up and make something work which is really not working at all. Provincial and municipal governments are forbidden by law to invade this federal field. Therefore the entire responsibility falls back on the federal government. The other levels have their own responsibilities but they do not have the funds to carry them out. This past conference has not changed the over-all situation in this regard one single bit. This wrangling over money, with all the bitterness and discord that it generates between the provinces and the federal government, is bound to provoke more, and it will go on until there is an entirely new approach to our nation's fiscal requirements at the level of the federal government.

I might ask the question, what are some of the basic ground rules governing the powers and responsibilities of the federal and provincial governments with which we must be concerned? I believe it is idle thinking to think that we can have a single and united country if we do not have at least a minimum of co-ordination in fields such as welfare, employment and living standards throughout the whole nation. Whether or not the letter of the constitution states it in those words, I believe it must be recognized everywhere that the federal government does have a moral responsibility to the people of the entire country for the maintenance of standards in these fields. Rich provinces turn their backs on the poorer provinces and deny them help in attaining at least the minimum standards which we believe necessary in Canada in this twentieth century. On the other hand, the principle of provincial autonomy and individuality is one that we must prize and respect at all times.

I believe the answer for the future must lie in a new pattern of division of powers between federal and provincial governments. Our present division of powers in Canada today is a vertical one. It allocates some fields of activity here and some there. More and more I believe, especially where matters of a social nature are involved, we must work toward a division of responsibility which runs not on a vertical basis but on a horizontal basis. The federal government must be responsible for seeing that there are certain basic standards maintained in the fields of health, social services, pensions—yes, perhaps even the field of education. It must do that, but it must not do more than that.

If what is considered an adequate basic standard for Canada as a whole is not considered suitable in richer provinces, which also have higher living costs, then it must be up to such provinces to supplement the basic standards at their own expense. In turn, federal plans must be flexible enough to allow them to have supplementary provincial programs built on top. Only in this manner, I believe, will it be possible for us to achieve a unity in national basic standards, with enough diversity to make provincial governments capable of satisfying the more particular wishes of their people. Eventually the division of powers has to be reviewed in the light of the changing conditions which are before us, and this division has to be applied on horizontal lines rather than a strictly vertical one because it is only in this way that we can maintain these basic minimum standards.

If the picture is reviewed in this light, this can be done without interfering with the responsibilities of the provinces. This will demand close and continuous liaison between governments at the federal and provincial levels, which I believe would be best achieved if we had in the federal government a separate department of federal-provincial affairs.

I appreciate very much the fact that this conference has produced plans which will permit further and continuing consultation. I think it has been good that there has been provision for these ministerial conferences. It is excellent that the time and even the place has been set for the holding of the next federal-provincial conference. I do hope the government will start now to get down to these basic problems with which they should be dealing, both in the ministerial conferences and the other conferences. Then perhaps these conferences can accomplish some of the fundamental decisions which must be made in connection with the planning and the groundwork for the development of confederation and for the continuance of confederation in order that Canada may stay a nation.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take the opportunity afforded by our discussing interim supply to relate my remarks, for a few minutes, to the federal-provincial conference.

At the outset of that important conference, two major organizations of the province of Quebec, namely the boards of trade of the province of Quebec and the federation of the St. John the Baptist societies, expressed their views and condemned, as it were, the present tax agreements. Both organizations stated that those agreements could only lead to a monolithic state, and they requested the federal government to give back to the provinces their right to levy taxes and also to return to the spirit of confederation.

The pact made in 1867 between the two great nations of the country must be fully respected and the federal government should leave to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces such fields as education, social security and others which, in the spirit of confederation, normally come under the provinces.

In my opinion, the federal-provincial conference has been a failure. No one is satisfied; not a single province is happy with the results and I am not surprised.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to part of the budget speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) on June 13 last and to an excerpt of the famous book written by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lamontagne). I regret that the latter is not here this afternoon, because I should have liked to put certain questions to him and to ask him to give us his impressions of the results of the federal-provincial conference.

Here is what the Minister of Finance stated in the house:

> The federal government has a special responsibility in the matter of ensuring adequate production and employment throughout our country. Fiscal policy is an important means of achieving this objective. Most people will agree, I am sure, that if the federal government were to give up a major part of its present revenue sources, even in exchange for compensating expenditure adjustments, its ability to exert an influence through fiscal policy over the level of economic activity in Canada would be weakened.

As for the President of the Privy Council, in his book entitled "Canadian Federalism", he said:

> The doctrine that defines federalism as a form of political unification where sovereignty is shared by several governments having their own and exclusive sphere of jurisdiction is therefore not acceptable.

I wish to emphasize.

> "therefore not acceptable".

That is from page 246 of the book written by the President of the Privy Council.

> It is therefore the participation of all governments in the main responsibilities of the state which must become the general rule. (p. 248)

And on page 264, the President of the Privy Council concluded:

> Consequently, central government subsidies to the provinces seem unavoidable at this time and strongly in line with traditional politics in Canada. The tax agreements system designed to solve the provinces' financial problems is one solution based upon federal grants.

Mr. Chairman, we, on this side of the house, agree that the federal government undeniably has responsibilities, but the fact remains that the provinces also have responsibilities.

Members on the government side often speak of priority needs and that is why I regret that the President of the Privy Council is not here.

I would be most happy if the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) were to give us the list of the federal priority needs. If such a list were given to the house by the present government, it would make for more orderly discussion at the next federal-provincial conference. Knowing the central government's needs, the provinces would know what direction to give to their discussions and that would surely contribute to the success of future federal-provincial conferences.

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I should answer the hon. gentleman's question right now. I think the needs are exactly the same as they were a year ago when he was a fervent supporter of the government of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pigeon: I will answer this question, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, when we were in power, the provinces had recovered a great part of their taxation rights. Unfortunately, the opposition parties did not leave us enough time to go on with our work. Nevertheless, I may assure the house that we decentralized taxation powers, and we never heard as bitter a criticism from the provinces, as was recently voiced by some premiers.

Mr. Chairman, it must be admitted, as I said before, that the provinces have essential needs. Now, apart from being essential, those of Quebec probably have some priority, because the province has a different culture and language, and, therefore, different needs.

To my mind, though it is important for the other provinces to have their own taxation powers it is still more so in the case of Quebec, because the province dislikes being told by a central government, which is to a great extent Anglo-Saxon, what its cultural, educational and other needs should be.

I think that this is an unsound procedure, and if we really wish to reach agreement at the national level, the province of Quebec should look after the fields under its jurisdiction. Therefore, Quebec is sensitive when the federal government tries to impinge upon the educational field, because the federal concept of the problem, or rather the federal mentality, is certainly not in accord with the Quebec mentality.

Of course, I know that other provinces look favourably upon agreements concerning joint plans. I can understand that attitude, because people in those provinces are mostly English speaking, and, therefore, in agreement with the attitude of a largely English speaking federal government. But what the province of Quebec wants, for instance, are its own sources of revenue, because it objects to a mostly Anglo-Saxon federal government's looking after its culture and educational needs.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that during the last federal-provincial conference, the central government should only have given some scraps to the provinces. Indeed, I would say that the conference has been a failure.

The premiers are dissatisfied. Even Mr. Lesage publicly expressed his discontent as a few months ago, he had asked for an amount of $150 million. Therefore, I said that the provinces just obtained a few scraps.

What is going to happen now, Mr. Chairman? School taxes will be constantly rising in all provinces, and more particularly in the province of Quebec.

Indeed, we recently read in the papers that the Quebec farmers had threatened to refuse to pay the government taxes which were increasing at a terrific rate.

Mr. Chairman, I admit that the federal government has powers of its own, but the provinces also need more money in order to meet their requirements.

I feel that Mr. Lesage was inconsistent when he publicly denied having used the word ultimatum. This fact was proved actually on a television program, as evidenced by the following report published in La Presse of Friday, November 29, 1963:

> Lesage actually termed his requests as an "ultimatum". During the program "Aujourd'hui" on channel 2 yesterday, was shown part of a press conference held last April in Quebec city which proves beyond doubt that Premier Jean Lesage actually termed as an "ultimatum" his fiscal requests for greater taxation fields.

Mr. Chairman, I think that when Mr. Lesage used the word "ultimatum" during an electoral campaign, he did so without knowing which government would be elected. But now he wants to back out. He cannot use the same word, because his friends are here in Ottawa.

If Mr. Lesage really wants to keep the promise made to the people of the province of Quebec, I feel that he should take some positive action to provide for the needs of his province and proceed as he said he would, namely to establish double taxation.

Even the Quebec premier is dissatisfied with the treatment received from Ottawa. In fact, I am surprised by his stupid attitude when he asks the Quebec people to vote for the present government at the next election when he knows that this same government refuses to accede to his requests and to surrender to his ultimatum, because he did use that word.

And what happened to the related questions? We asked some questions about the transfer of New Quebec Eskimo affairs to the province of Quebec, about joint programs and lotteries. It would seem that nothing, absolutely nothing has been solved. All these problems have been postponed for further studies. I feel that the federal government is not entitled to rejoice, when confronted with the fiasco of our last federal-provincial conference. All the premiers are dissatisfied with the prevailing situation.

As I said a moment ago, it is a pity that the President of the Privy Council is not here at the moment; he could have told us about his plans for the future, and commented upon the reactions of the various premiers after the conference.

Mr. Chairman, before concluding, may I be allowed to say that I sincerely hope that our next federal-provincial conference will meet with more success, and will answer more fully the wishes of the provincial premiers; I am inclined to doubt it, after the last fiasco. To my mind, the premier of the province of Quebec has not carried out his promises to the people of Quebec, and has gone back on his own positions.

Mr. Deschatelets: Your party is quite used to fiascos, and it can chalk up quite a few of them.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) wishes to take the floor, I will be glad to let him do so. I would be happy to hear this minister from Quebec tell if he feels that the decisions taken by the federal-provincial conference are really satisfactory.

He could tell me what he thinks of Mr. Lesage, his ultimatum and his retreat?

When Mr. Lesage says the federal government should think in terms of human resources rather than in terms of guns and cannons, I would like to know whether the Minister of Public Works shares his views. I am giving him right now an opportunity to let us know.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I just have to say one word which will summarize my whole thought. The time for speeches ended in April last, the present government is one of action.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, when the minister says the time for speeches ended—

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm yielded the floor to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Pigeon: It was simply to give the minister a chance to make a short speech during this session.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm yielded the floor to the minister, who joined in the debate. I do not believe the hon. member can say: "I gave the minister an opportunity for making a short speech, and as it was very brief, I shall resume."

Mr. Pigeon: I wonder if the house would unanimously allow me to conclude my remarks.

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope we will let the hon. gentleman finish.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Public Works talks about speeches and action; I wonder how it happens that the President of the Privy Council spends his time travelling across the country making speeches every day. It seems to me that the minister's language is rather illogical.

Mr. Choquette: He does not make speeches, he advocates action.

[Text]

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister, and others in this debate, on the subject of equalization with a great deal of interest because I am very mindful, coming from one of the provinces on the extremity of confederation, of the necessity for equalization in cementing confederation. I am also mindful however that equalization and our capacity as a nation to make payments on equalization are based upon taxation.

I am also mindful that taxes in return must be taken from the people and the corporations which earn the money to pay them, and in turn taxes cannot come at optimum levels unless first there are profits, and profits come from efficient and competitive industry wherever it is found in Canada. It was for this reason I was a little astonished yesterday when I learned that a company, which would be located in an area which I really doubt has the capacity to produce its product economically, has been awarded a contract to supply deuterium to the Canadian government. Hence, when we discuss the question of equalization, this poses the question as to whether or not taxes will ever flow to the Canadian government from that plant, for the purpose of participation in equalization.

To understand this, perhaps I had better go back a little bit and explain what the position of Canadian industry and the Canadian people is, relative to a plant such as a new deuterium plant to be established in Canada. We got into nuclear science during the course of the war, and subsequently, and grew up to be possibly the only country in the world with a nuclear capacity large enough to build a nuclear bomb, if we wanted to. We decided however that what we would do with our nuclear capacity, and with our scientists with nuclear knowledge, was to engage in peacetime pursuits.

We followed a course in this field somewhat different from that followed by the United States and other nations working along the path of developing the science of nuclear physics. In particular we chose to build a reactor in this country which burned unrefined uranium. This was a very valuable thing in its way, because to refine uranium, first of all you must have a whole new industry, a uranium refining industry, and this is quite an expensive industry.

The United States on the other hand took the other course and built reactors which burned refined uranium, and also built themselves uranium refining plants. We moved along the course of developing our raw uranium, or unrefined uranium reactors, for some considerable time, and it was not a particularly profitable venture in physics. We were considered to be the Cinderellas in this business, and to have made a mistake in the direction we took.

There was another factor in these reactors which was rather strange too, and in which we were pioneers, and this was in using heavy water as a modifier to check the radiation of a reactor down to usable levels; and as deuterium is really a form of heavy water it could also be used as a cooling agent. So, it served two purposes,—as a modifier for our unrefined uranium reactors, and as a cooling agent to cool the heat of the reactors.

The United States had experimented along this line, but it was not the main line which they followed. They had made some deuterium, and I may say that deuterium is made relatively simply in a chemical plant, somewhat similar to a cracking plant that you find at an oil refinery. It is made by applying vast quantities of heat to water, in conjunction with sulphuric acid, and out comes deuterium.

As I say, the United States had made some at considerable cost, pretty much upon an experimental and not upon a commercial basis. As time went on, and as people in this country began to realize that the cost of building reactors was coming down, we were getting to a point at which reactors could be built at costs comparable to electricity generated thermally in areas where there was no available hydroelectric power, and it was realized that we could actually get into the business of building power reactors on a commercial scale.

Also, in having some skill in this field it looked as if Canada was on the verge of coming into a new industry, an industry in which we Canadians had built a particular skill and had some scientific knowledge not available in the rest of the world. We were a leg up; we were on the march towards doing something in which other nations, even with high skills and technology, would have a difficult time competing with us. We had a particular advantage in that we had been the students, and we had the know-how relative to the operating of reactors of unrefined uranium.

To build these reactors, to make them cheap enough, and to make the electricity which flowed from them cheap electricity, competitive with thermal electricity, what we needed was cheap deuterium, because deuterium is a large factor in the cost of building a reactor of this kind. If we did not have cheap deuterium, then the cost of the reactor would be expensive, and the electricity which flowed from it would, as a consequence, be expensive power and not competitive with thermal power.

First of all, if we succeeded in building a plant which produced cheap deuterium we then had an opportunity as Canadians to sell deuterium abroad—and not only that, but to sell reactors and the whole technology of reactors, in the same way that today some Canadian engineering firms are enormously competent in the design, building and installing of paper making machinery in countries all over the world.

This presupposed that to have an industry like this, a national industry, an export industry, we would seek wherever we could in Canada to find the cheapest possible source of power to extract the deuterium we needed. Where would you go for such power? Well, you could go to gas wells. There are gas wells on the prairies, for example, which are so dirty that they have wet gases which have to be cleaned from the wells before the gas can be used for domestic purposes. This makes it almost an uneconomic proposition from the business point of view; but it is burnable gas, and when used in an industrial project of this kind is about the cheapest kind of power you could find.

Then there are several ways of getting very cheap electricity. For example, there are the open coal pits, or strip mines, where the cheapest kind of coal can be obtained and burned for the purpose of extracting deuterium from the water. But what puzzled me, and I am not an authority in these things, was that I found that the contract had been let to a company which would put down its plant on one of the most expensive sources of fuel in Canada. I can only think that, having done so, the cost of producing deuterium in this country is not likely to be an economical cost, or a cost which will make it desirable for Canadians to enter the export market in this new scientific field on a large scale. Therefore, to follow up the advantage and the knowledge we have in the nuclear field of raw uranium reactors, we have put into Canada an enormous amount of money. A great many millions of dollars has been put into the building up of this nuclear technique and in acquiring the skills we have. I can imagine that we are about at the stage where benefits will flow from this investment. Therefore I hope I am mistaken when I see a deuterium plant put down on an enormously costly source of fuel, rather than on the cheapest source of fuel to be found in the country. I hope that is not in the long run to be the way we extract deuterium, although certainly on the surface it appears that it is.

I earnestly feel that there are profits to be made in Canada in the very near future in the nuclear field from the know-how we have accumulated. Having given this brief explanation of our costing methods and our capacity to compete in business, I hope the committee will be mindful of the advantages that we as a nation have in this field, rather than considering it merely an unprofitable venture and constructing plants, letting contracts and engaging in further work in nuclear physics in ways which are uneconomic. We have gone through that stage and have now acquired the know-how. Our task in the future must be to make this thing pay. I hope the government will move in that direction, and make it a paying proposition instead of a burden upon the Canadian people.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the last speaker I could not help but wonder whether he had given the Minister of Industry the benefit of his advice. There are, of course, many reasons other than cost which I presume were in the government's mind when they selected Cape Breton island as the location for this new plant, not the least of which would be the reason that it is an area of high unemployment. Presumably such location would also follow the government's much heralded plan for regional development.

However, I am not going to get into this field, in which I am not competent to speak. I have one or two things on my mind and I am going to take about ten minutes to get them off my mind. In his statement to the federal-provincial conference last week, the Hon. Duff Roblin discussed what he called a crisis of priorities. This is an apt phrase, and I want to develop it in so far as federal aid to university education is concerned. This is an area of our contemporary life which is rapidly reaching crisis proportions and one to which I do hope the new government will give its early attention. The much heralded Liberal party scholarship plan will be useless if the universities cannot accommodate those in receipt of these scholarships.

Last May the Canadian universities foundation presented a brief to the Prime Minister. To date the government has made no announcement of its intentions. The brief is a clear statement of the problem of enabling Canadian universities and colleges effectively to meet their great responsibilities to the Canadian people. The brief outlines three specific needs. These are, first, grants for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick universities made necessary by the number of universities. Second is the expanding need for new construction of research facilities in medical schools and university-affiliated teaching hospitals. By the way, many of us heard the forcefully outlined statement about this last Thursday by Dr. John McCreary, dean of the faculty of medicine at the University of British Columbia. The third specific problem was the provision of funds for the construction of university libraries and the purchase of books and library research aids. Of course, these problems do not touch the over-all serious crisis concerning aid to universities as such.

In its brief to the Prime Minister the foundation makes the bold and arresting statement that it is—> —alarmed by the fact that Canadian institutions of higher learning are steadily falling further behind in providing facilities for rapidly rising student enrolment and in satisfying the growing demand for professional and post graduate education. Available facilities become each year more inadequate.

I have had the privilege of a close association with the president of the University of New Brunswick. I know of the work he is doing and I know of the crisis of priorities as it refers to that university's plans. I know that prompt action is essential. Last month Dr. Davidson Dunton, president of Carleton University in a report published last month which received some editorial comment, gave this problem careful and thorough attention so far as his particular university was concerned.

The Canadian universities foundation brief is studded with words like "crisis", "urgency", "increased enrolments", "need for action", "promptness", and many others. These are not idle words loosely spread through the brief; they are all documented by statistics and examples of their aptness.

I urge from the remote opposition backbenchers immediate action on the part of the government. We do not need large committees planning for our one hundredth birthday. Our centennial program could be started tomorrow. It could take the form of a plan for massive attention to the known needs of our universities. It would be a recognition by the government that it understands the need for priority in this area of our responsibilities. We seem to be able to commit millions for world fairs, but are hesitant about a genuine and concentrated effort to aid the universities of Canada. I commend the brief of the Canadian universities foundation to the government and, if I may say so, to parliament. In support of this brief, if any support is needed, let me remind the committee that just two years ago the national conference of Canadian universities and colleges met in Ottawa. The proceedings were published and the resolutions are there for us to heed. I also commend this document to the government and to parliament.

Surely, we must acknowledge a "crisis of priorities" in Canada. I suggest that one of our centennial projects could take on philosophical, yet surely basic, overtones and that we give our universities and schools the necessary facilities so that they shall not, as Mr. Walter Lippmann suggested over 20 years ago, "continue sending out into the world men who no longer understand the creative principle of the society in which they must live."

I have a second and more modest centennial project. I deplore the fact that we seem to need deadlines and anniversaries to focus our attention on needs which know no such artificial timetables. Could we not make funds available so that by 1967 Canada would have ten times more young people serving in other parts of the world under the auspices of the Canadian universities service overseas?

I had a modest proposal before this parliament but, by a paradox which I have not forgotten, it was talked out by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who defeated the distinguished former secretary of state for external affairs. This was irony of the highest order. I saw many of these dedicated Canadian men and women when I was in Malaysia recently. This program needs money from government. It has not enough, now, to look after the volunteers who are ready to serve. I suppose that if the energy and funds used over the years to get an acceptable design for a Canadian flag had been used to pay travelling expenses for Canadian technicians and teachers to go across the earth, the current need would have been met many times over. In my simple philosophy this is another question, if not a crisis, of priorities.

I have one or two other observations to make about my journey. First of all, the people serving Canada in embassies and high commission offices abroad were most thoughtful and attentive. I thank them publicly for this. But I hope the committee studying the Canada Elections Act will suggest a formula whereby these Canadian citizens can vote in future elections. This should be easy to get established. Most other countries give their foreign service staffs the privilege of voting. Canada should do this, too, and I hope the committee will attend to the matter soon.

In the United States a private foundation has been set up—the Woodward foundation, I think it is called—which buys paintings and sculpture and other works of art. These are then sent on loan to foreign posts on a revolving basis as representative of United States culture. Canada might well introduce a program on similar lines. Perhaps one or more of our great corporations would be prepared to undertake this enlightened public service. Our artists would be helped and our embassies enhanced.

A last minor complaint about amenities for Canadian public servants abroad: In this age of the immediate, why is it not yet possible for Canada to provide up to date Canadian news to our staffs anywhere in the world? Perhaps some would doubt whether there is much Canadian news deserving of such attention and priority. However, I strongly suggest that C.B.C. news bulletins arriving in some embassies five or six days after the event make the items contained somewhat less than compelling.

I trust my suggestions will receive the early attention and broad non-partisan support to which they are entitled.

[Translation]

Mr. Perron: Mr. Chairman, I feel I must make certain corrections before the conclusion of this debate. I do not intend to talk at length about all the remarks which have already been made concerning that famous federal-provincial conference. So my remarks will be about the comments that were made after the conference.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) claimed yesterday afternoon that the federal government was unduly influenced by the claims of the premier of Quebec. If by that he means that once more the province of Quebec received a special treatment as a result of the conference, he is wrong.

Referring to some newspaper articles, we realize that the results which seemed to be a step toward a new form of federalism have not attained the objective which had been set; far from it, it seems that the misunderstanding between the provinces is getting worse all the time.

The comments made on the radio on television and in the newspapers concerning the results of this federal-provincial conference are forever stressing the fact that the province of Quebec may have been favoured more than the others because it will receive nearly $42 million out of the $87 provided under the equalization agreement.

Here is a comment published in Le Devoir of December 3, 1963 and written by Mr. Marcel Thivierge, which says:

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Of all the provinces receiving equalization payments from Ottawa, Quebec is still getting the least per capita.

At first, when you find that, following the federal-provincial conference, Quebec is to get $42 million out of the $87 million that the federal government is handing over to the provinces for the next fiscal year, you wonder whether there has not been some favouritism shown there.

This allows Mr. Diefenbaker to state that the Pearson government has just yielded to pressures from Quebec.

However, if you take a closer look at the figures, you will find that Quebec is far from getting special treatment.

Indeed, you will find that Quebec is getting the lowest amount per capita as far as equalization goes. If to those payments you add the special grants to the maritime provinces, the amounts per capita are as follows:

Quebec, $18.11; Newfoundland, $38.34; Prince Edward Island, $35.82; Nova Scotia, $32.91; New Brunswick, $35.52; Manitoba, $18.27; and Saskatchewan, $26.52.

If you add up what the provinces will receive through an increased share of taxation revenue (the 18-9-75 formula)—

—compared to the 25-25-100 formula—

—equalization payments and special grants to the maritimes, you will find that Quebec receives $50.02 per capita compared to $61.01 for Ontario. The other provinces receive per capita grants as follows: Newfoundland, $95.34; Prince Edward Island, $90.25; Nova Scotia, $72.69; New Brunswick, $75.31; Manitoba, $58.63; Saskatchewan, $53.00; Alberta, $44.67; and British Columbia, $54.68.

At $50.02, Quebec gets much less than the average which is $60.14.

This is where, in my opinion, it becomes necessary to set the record straight, and I wish that those who claim that Quebec got preferential treatment would keep quiet because there are official and non-official figures.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset of that famous conference, the Canadian people still hoped that confederation would move forward, but it merely gave a new direction to our federal system and provided a new formula to prevent the shameful spectacle of governments quarrelling over taxation powers. As a result, the Quebec premier who went to the conference as a lion came back as a lamb. I was not the only one to have that impression. In an editorial published in L'Action Catholique, last Saturday, parliamentary correspondent J. M. Poliquin stated that some people were dissatisfied with the results of the federal-provincial conference. Amongst other things, he wrote this:

It is with mixed feelings of satisfaction and dissatisfaction that Mr. Lesage came out yesterday of the federal-provincial conference room in Ottawa He was pleased about the way Mr. Pearson had led the proceedings of the eleven upper level governments of our country. He paid him an unqualified tribute, saying during yesterday afternoon's press conference. Mr. Pearson fully exercised his natural talents for diplomacy, he is an extraordinary man, he knows how to voice an opinion contrary to another, while showing respect for our ideas; he seeks to achieve a balance between the provincial needs and the resources of the federal treasury.

Therefore, he is quite satisfied with the great diplomacy showed by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

Last Sunday, during a radio program in my riding, I asked taxpayers whether they were satisfied to see that the $150 million claimed by the Quebec premier in his ultimatum of April 5 last had come down to $42 million during the federal-provincial conference. I asked then whether they considered reasonable the allegations of the minister of education, Mr. Gerin-Lajoie, claiming that within three years, $500 million at least will have to be devoted to education in the province of Quebec.

My question was as follows: From now on, shall we build schools in the province of Quebec with Quebec unemployed, with materials supplied by the country or the province of Quebec, and pay for them with diplomacy?

I also direct this question to taxpayers today.

In my opinion to claim that the federal-provincial conference was a failure is saying a lot.

I know that some circles are under the influence of economic experts who claim that it is a utopia to talk of monetary matters. It seems more logical to them to waste time dabbling in fiscal matters. Personally, I feel it is much more difficult to solve problems by taking only fiscal matters into consideration, than by rejecting the system that created this economic disagreement and this lack of understanding in economic and political fields in this country, I mean taxation.

Mr. Chairman, whether we like it or not, the province of Quebec must protect its rights in the field of education. That field has been recognized by the Canadian constitution, as one pertaining to the province of Quebec.

If some rights have been yielded, on account of the 1939-1945 world war, on the pretence that priority had to be given the federal government in matters of national defence and commitments entered into at the time we were taking part in that world conflict, 20 years after the end of that conflict it is high time not only that we review the taxation question but that we find a way to remove the seeds of discord resulting from the Canadian taxation problem.

The Prime Minister was saying yesterday that he had imposed nothing, that in the course of his opening speech, he had not even dared make a suggestion, as he wished to let the provincial governments be entirely free to express their opinion.

Representations have been made, most of the provinces have submitted written briefs, but one cannot help but realize the deep contradiction in the views of the provinces on the problem of taxation in Canada. For there is an unquestionable fact: certain provinces cannot, within the framework of the present financial system, obtain the funds they need to contribute normally to the development of Canada as a whole, by developing both their own natural resources and the already existing industrial facilities; they cannot produce fully.

For those provinces, the present tax system, under the equalization formula, may seem adequate to develop their natural resources. However, the procedure is outlandish: promises are being made. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) mentioned yesterday that the Liberal party had promised that in the equalization system the revenues of the richest provinces would be taken into consideration.

Now, a conference has just been held during which this was not taken into account and the promises made in the last three or four years have been constantly disregarded.

Even though this could be accepted, I feel it would be doing on a large scale what is actually being done on a small scale. Is it not under the pretext of helping the poor nowadays that the well-to-do are being taxed? Under the pretext of helping the have-nots, the haves are being dispossessed.

Thus, under the pretext of helping certain provinces which are unable alone to reach their full economic and cultural development that they have a right to expect, other sources of income must be sought.

The hon. member I quoted earlier rightly said: A new formula might finally have to be found. I do hope so, moreover, but we did not hear of many suggestions during that famous federal-provincial conference. However, some premiers having a sufficient knowledge of our monetary system and its deficiencies were supposed to attend. We were, therefore, justified in expecting suggestions rather than a battle about taxes around the famous federal-provincial conference table.

I have here the Canada Year Book, 1962, in which the function of the Bank of Canada is concisely stated, I admit it, as follows:

Legislation of 1934 provided for the establishment of a central bank in Canada, the function of which is to regulate credit and currency, to control and protect the external value of the Canadian dollar and to stabilize the level of production—

Perhaps it could be added that it would be a very good thing also to stabilize the intrinsic value of the Canadian dollar.

It says also:

> to control and to protect—trade, prices and employment so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action.
> The bank has the exclusive right to issue notes which are to be used in Canada.
> The bank is operated by a board of directors consisting of a governor, a deputy governor and 12 directors. The deputy minister of finance sits on the board of directors...

The Bank of Canada, therefore, comes under the federal parliament through the Minister of Finance, and it is governed by a piece of legislation passed under the terms of the constitution.

The role played by the bank is defined in the Canada Year Book. The bank deals also with the monetary question, not only with regard to the stability but the international and national value of the currency.

When it comes to determine the amount of goods that the Canadian citizen can buy with a dollar which may be available to him, there is a whole accounting force which affects and establishes the price which the purchaser of any goods will have to pay.

The federal government should also take into consideration the need of new credit and I think that matter should be the subject of a discussion at a federal-provincial conference where monetary problems and tax questions are dealt with at great length.

Since it was suggested that the provinces should meet again in March to study the taxation problem once more, I think it would be appropriate for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon), who is responsible for the administration of the Bank of Canada, to be at that conference. In fact, I see that the role of the Minister of Finance is also explained in the Canada Year Book. Here is what can be found on page 95:

> This department was created by act of parliament in 1869 and now operates under the Financial Administration Act. The department is responsible for the financial administration of Canada including the raising of money required for the various government activities by way of taxation or borrowing. The comptroller of the treasury, an officer of the department, is responsible for all government disbursements. The work of the department is organized in six principal divisions: administration, economic and international affairs, federal-provinical relations, ...

Mr. Chairman, since it is stipulated that the Minister of Finance is concerned with federal-provincial relations, I wonder whether it would not be appropriate, at a meeting of the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada, that the federal Minister of Finance and the ministers of revenue of the ten provinces be also present. There, a study could be made of an equalization system based not on the richest province—because after all, this only means taxing the haves under the pretext of giving to the have-nots —but a system to give the provinces the funds they need for the development of their natural resources.

It would also be possible to use existing criteria as a basis. It would be logical, it seems to me, to redistribute money among the provinces according to their natural resources, since they are responsible for them.

The available manpower should also be taken into account. As a matter of fact, statistics readily show which provinces do not make full use of available manpower so as to increase the national gross product. Last September, the province of Quebec held the unenviable record of having 40 per cent of the total number of unemployed in Canada. And yet, natural resources are not lacking, but they remain undeveloped.

In the last few years, the province of Quebec has been going through a period of full development. It needs new access roads to natural resources.

In view of the work which should be done for the world fair as well as the labour requirements of the steel complex which has been widely discussed these past few months in Quebec, would it not be possible to use a very large part of this manpower potential available for the development of natural resources in Quebec? What prevents such projects from being carried out except the limited financial means made available to the departments concerned in the province of Quebec?

I think that we could also extend the framework of the Bank of Canada and establish district offices in every province with officials responsible to the governor. By so doing and following meetings between the federal Minister of Finance and the provincial ministers of revenue and after having considered the possibility of providing credit to the provinces in exchange for provincial bonds, the credit could be made more easily available to the provinces, in order to help them develop their natural resources.

Mr. Chairman, the province of Quebec borrowed $300 million on the American market, on behalf of hydro Quebec, in order to help build the Manicouagan dam. Now, through a branch of the Bank of Canada, hydro Quebec might have issued bonds to this amount and obtained the necessary credit to carry out the project. And, instead of undertaking to pay an interest of 6¾ per cent, it would only have had to pay the carrying charges on this credit with the Bank of Canada.

Moreover, considering the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, which is now 8 per cent less than the American dollar, this means, for the first year, an interest rate of 13 per cent which hydro Quebec has undertaken to pay.

Is it not time for the federal Minister of Finance and the provincial revenue ministers to consider and stress the priority needs of the various provinces at the next federal-provincial conference? At that time, the real priorities, if any, will be revealed.

Mr. Chairman, considering that, at this time, the federal government allots almost 27 per cent of the national budget to the Department of National Defence, I wonder whether the educational field, in Quebec as well as in other provinces, does not have the same importance, and should not be further developed, in order to equalize the living standard of all Canadians?

I realize that some provinces must resort to other than the fiscal means now provided by the constitution, but I think that in this case, the federal government should hand over to them the rights and powers to which they are entitled.

Mr. Chairman, there is some talk about a new federalism. According to what I heard, the Prime Minister stated that in no way does he wish to be the one to liquidate confederation. Well, I wonder if those who are in favour of the present system, that is to say the government members and the members of the Conservative party, when they had the same responsibilities, are not actually liquidating confederation?

Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand, sir, that the hon. gentleman is the last speaker. I wonder if he could conclude in a sentence or two and then we could get the bill through.

Mr. Pigeon: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Perron: Thank you Mr. Chairman, I shall soon finish my remarks.

When reading some comments published in the press, it might be inferred that the province of Quebec has, once again, made unfair claims on Ottawa for sums of money which the province urgently needs.

Now this is not the true position. A few moments ago, I quoted some figures which I want to put on the record. As far as those figures are concerned, we did not get any more than what we were entitled to. On the contrary, our average is lower than the $10 per head throughout the country.

Our claims are therefore, not unfair. We claim the same rights as the other provinces, where they may sometimes be stressed to a lesser degree than in the province of Quebec which has insisted on those rights for several years.

It was, however, always done in a spirit of thorough understanding with regard to our fellow citizens of the other provinces. We want a united Canada, yes; a Canada where agreement prevails—yes, of course. But a Canada where there is agreement in the taxation field, and where nothing is wrongly implied or inferred.

Three weeks ago, the premier of one province implied, when assistance to vocational training was being discussed, that the province of Quebec had no reason to recriminate, because it had received its full share. And yet, the official figures were submitted here. It may be noted that in the three years during which the legislation was applied, the province of Quebec received less than the share it was entitled to because, at that time, it was not ready to take advantage of that legislation.

Now, this is also true with regard to the future of this country. We want a united Canada, of course; we want a Canada where mutual understanding will be the order of the day. The best means of reaching that goal, is to look in a more realistic perspective, at all those things which now divide us, and which, perhaps, make us acrimonious, at all those things that, in the opinion of our fellow citizens, make us look like dissatisfied people, or people who are impossible to satisfy.

We do not ask for the moon and stars. We simply want the province of Quebec, like the other provinces of Canada, to benefit fully and completely from the fabulous wealth which the Canadian people as a whole inherited, by making it easier for each of the provinces, within the framework of confederation, to develop soundly the natural resources of this country.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Lamoureaux in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Gordon) moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964, the sum of $377,400,841.02 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Gordon) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-116, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1964.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Chairman: When shall the said bill be read a second time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Gordon) moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureaux in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding further I would like to make one observation in respect of this bill. We have a copy of the bill before us, and on the front page it says "Bill C" blank, as of course is the case with all bills in this category. Then it says:

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1964.

Then in bold, black letters it reads: "As passed by the House of Commons, November 1963". I think we should have some explanation and perhaps an eradication of "November 1963", so we are not doing things retroactively.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. gentleman does not mean to be taken too seriously. It is well known that the bill was printed in advance, and there was perhaps an undue expectation that it might be passed on Friday. It did not seem wise to have it reprinted. Of course, it has not passed the house. In the final form it will show, I hope, that it passed the house on December 3. This document is only a draft. I will give such undertaking as I can that the hon. gentleman's observation will not be disregarded.

Perhaps I should say that the proportions requested in this bill are intended to provide for all necessary requirements of the public service up to December 31, 1963. In no instance is the total amount of an item being released by this bill. The form of this bill is the usual one for interim supply bills. The passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 4 agreed to.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? Now, by leave?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Gordon) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to thank all hon. members for the co-operation we have had in these last few minutes. I will make another declaration, that I have not suggested that any part of this debate was in any way obstructive.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE PHARMACY EXAMINING BOARD OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. S-7, to incorporate the Pharmacy Examining Board of Canada—Mr. Mitchell—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, we are today requested to pass legislation which was first carried by the Senate and which is entitled:

Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Pharmacy Examining Board of Canada.

The purpose of this bill, Mr. Chairman, is to form a pharmacy examining board which will issue certificates of qualification throughout Canada.

It has always been understood that education in each province was the responsibility of the provincial authorities. But, when you want to set up, under federal legislation, a board which will, among other things, issue certificates of qualification, then I claim that there is interference from the federal government in a field expressly reserved to the provinces, namely education at any level.

In the province of Quebec, at the present time, there are faculties of pharmacy affiliated with universities. They hold examinations and award diplomas. They decide on the strength of the number of years of study and of the examination results whether the pharmacists may receive a diploma and be admitted to the practice of their profession.

In addition to the universities, there is the college of pharmacists of Quebec which will also issue the certificates required to allow applicants to practise pharmacy. That comes under the education system in the province of Quebec and in each province. Today, you want among other things, to set up this committee which will issue certificates of qualification. This pharmacy examining board of Canada—those are the very words used in the bill.

Pharmacy examining board of Canada.

That board wants to hold examinations in the province of Quebec. I claim that to hold examinations, it must first give courses and then make it compulsory for those who have attended the courses to take examinations; now, this is exactly what our universities are doing at present. It is not at all what the pharmacy examining board of Canada intends to do. Its sole intention is to have people pass examinations. We know, on the other hand, that in the province of Quebec there are rules and regulations which differ from the rules prevailing in other provinces. For instance, in Quebec, people who want to own a drugstore must be druggists. Besides it is not possible in Quebec to just organize a chain of drugstores, as is done for instance with grocery stores, and hire professional druggists to run that chain. In order to own a drugstore, one must be a druggist, according to rules which differ from the rules enforced in other provinces. We find the Quebec rules satisfactory.

There is talk of setting across-the-board examinations which would be the same in all the provinces, however great the differences between these provinces. As written in one of the clauses of the bill—

The Chairman: Order. I understand that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis) wishes to ask a question from the member for Lapointe.

[Text]

Mr. Francis: Is it not possible in the province of Quebec for a medical doctor to be the owner and operator of a pharmacy?

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that doctors in medicine can own drugstores and even laboratories. This state of affairs stems from understandable circumstances. In some parishes, rather far from the centres, there is nothing which might attract a druggist; besides in some parishes, not enough drugs are sold to justify the presence of both a doctor and a druggist. That is why in the smaller parishes the physician often combines both fields of endeavour, and will at once exercise his own profession and own a drugstore.

That goes to prove that in the province of Quebec, even if the law is broad enough to allow co-existence, there is a specific understanding of the problems which prevail in various communities and in various districts. This is proof of the understanding shown in the writing of Quebec legislation, and not only in this field but in many others. When cases come up where the situation does not seem to have been well understood in the preparation of certain legislation, our people, be they doctors or pharmacists, broadminded as they are, have accepted those few exceptions.

I have examined this bill a little. There is a section which says among other things —I am going over certain sections of the bill a bit at random—

An hon. Member: What number?

Mr. Gregoire: It is the one which provides that a certificate of qualification may be issued to someone who has been practising for ten years. At that time, he would be given a certificate of qualification, when we know that, in other provinces, one does not have to be a pharmacist to practise pharmacy. That means that even if someone has not studied that science at all, he is still allowed after ten years, to operate a pharmacy without being a pharmacist. He is given a certificate of qualification as a pharmacist, even though he may never have studied pharmacy.

[Text]

Mr. Francis: Could the hon. member name such a province where it is possible for a person who never studied pharmacy to be a pharmacist?

Mr. Gregoire: May I ask the hon. member to repeat the question?

Mr. Francis: I understood the hon. member to say it is possible in other provinces to own and operate a pharmacy without having studied pharmacy. I would like to know which provinces the hon. member is referring to.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, it is evident, if all kinds of distinctions are to be made, that with the kind of drugstores we see today, where all medicine sold are patented pills or syrups, it is possible for an individual to sell such medicine behind a counter; but the fact remains that in other provinces, an individual could be the owner of a drugstore without being a pharmacist. An individual could have a drugstore registered in his name without being a pharmacist, provided he has operated such business for ten years. I do not say he would be granted the title of pharmacist, under this act, but he would be granted a certificate of qualification. I agree he could not hold a university diploma, but he would nevertheless have a certificate of qualification which would allow him to operate a drugstore.

[Text]

Mr. Mitchell: With the sanction of that province's graduating body.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I am actually looking for an article of this bill. I have not looked at it. I had no opportunity to read this bill since about a month ago, for every time it was allowed to stand. The article says:

Any qualified pharmacist licensed or registered—

[Text]

Mr. Mitchell: Take a look at 15.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: It says:

Any qualified pharmacist licensed or registered in any province—

It means, if I understand correctly the words and the phraseology, that one or the other—since after the word "licensed" there is the word "or":

Any qualified pharmacist licensed or recognized in any province prior to the coming into force of this act shall, after ten years from the date when he became so licensed—

[Text]

Mr. Mitchell: May I direct your attention to the word "qualified"? Now go on from there.

Mr. Gregoire: Can you let me have a copy of the bill in English, please? I have the French one, and if I explain the French one it says—

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt for a moment to explain that in the English version of the bill, which is quite easily understood, the clause commences:

Any qualified pharmacist licensed or registered in any province—

First of all a pharmacist must be qualified and then licensed or registered.

Mr. Gregoire: I appreciate what my hon. friend says, but I think there is a difference between the French version of the bill and the English version, because in the French version there is a comma after "Any qualified pharmacist". So it makes it completely different in meaning. For that reason, I think it would be opportune to move that this bill be referred back to the committee or referred back to the responsible authorities so that they can determine which version is the correct one, the English or the French version, and make the necessary correction accordingly. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix:

That this bill be referred back to the committee to make the appropriate correction, and to determine which one is the approved bill, the French or the English.

It is impossible for us to discuss the bill now because there is a difference of meaning between the French version and the English version. There is a difference in interpretation between the French bill and the English bill, so I think it should be referred back to committee so that the committee could question the people presenting the bill and would know whether the French or the English version is the good one.

[Translation]

The Chairman: I should like to remind the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) that he cannot move that amendment at this time. He could do it on third reading but not in committee of the whole.

Perhaps I might suggest that the hon. member move an amendment to the clause which was discussed, that is section 15 of this bill. Then, the hon. member could introduce a private motion to change the wording of the section.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I feel—

[Text]

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, perhaps if we could make the amendment here and now to the French version and remove the comma, so that both the English and French versions are the same, it would satisfy the hon. member. I would so move that amendment.

The Chairman: May I suggest that we at least wait until we reach clause 15. We are still on clause 1. We can, of course, have a general discussion of the bill on clause 1, but we cannot amend clauses which are not yet before the committee for consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, that affects not only one clause but the whole bill. The whole principle is changed. That is why we cannot let the clause pass while we know that we will have to wait until third reading to introduce an amendment. We insist on presenting our motion calling for the bill to be referred to the committee so that the latter may determine which is the official version, the French or the English.

Mr. Dupuis: We can discuss it now since we are in committee.

Mr. Gregoire: I should like to point out to the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) that it is quite easy to change a formula like that but it might be a good thing to know the intent of those who requested the adoption of the bill.

Mr. Dupuis: The mover is here, he could represent the petitioners.

Mr. Gregoire: Is the hon. member himself convinced that this French version is erroneous, that there is a mistake in the bill now before us?

If there is a mistake in the passage I have shown, there can be many more in the bill. That is the reason why I think it would be advisable still to refer this bill to the private bills committee to be re-examined so that, when it is before us, it will contain no errors and above all, there will be no difference between the English version and the French version.

[Text]

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, this bill has been before the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills not once but twice, at two separate sittings. First of all, it was called for consideration last July. At that time the sponsor of the bill agreed to adjourn consideration until the parties who appeared to oppose it could make representations with regard to it. Then it also appeared before the same committee some three or four weeks ago, perhaps longer, at which time the hon. member for Lapointe acknowledged that he was examining the bill for the first time.

I would suggest that the proper forum in which to consider it and amend the wording if it is proved defective in the French version—because I submit that it is not defective in the English version—is in committee of the whole. It makes no sense to say that the bill should receive no further consideration now but be referred back to the committee on miscellaneous private bills. This committee is the proper forum for making such technical amendments to wording as may be necessary for the purpose of giving both French and English versions of the bill the same effect. Therefore, for that reason I submit that the motion which has been moved should not be entertained.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I point out that when the bill was introduced in its original form, it was in English. It is in the French translation that you find a comma, but the original presentation was made in English. That is therefore a translation error, and if a comma must be taken off, I think we will have unanimous consent to do so. I do not see why this bill should be delayed any longer.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville raised an extremely important point.

When petitioners introduce a bill in the House of Commons, while it is a known fact that this house is made up of English and French members and that the country is bilingual, that bill should be introduced in both languages and necessary precautions should be taken for that purpose.

If we had all the Senate and the House of Commons bills as well as the reports in both languages, we would not know what to do with that pile of documents. That is why they are given to us in only one language. But having this bill in French, I took the trouble to check the French version. If it is a French translation rather than a French drafting, it is not enough.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

> That the said Bill S-7, which differs in French from the English version and which is not very clear, be referred to the committee for a period of six months.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Lapointe moved:

> That the said Bill S-7, which differs in French from the English version and which is not very clear, be referred to the committee for a period of six months.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: I do not think we should just listen to calls for the question to be put. I think it would be setting a risky precedent if this question were put. The bill is not before us. What is before us is clause 1. If the hon. member does not like the bill he can move that the committee rise.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should make a ruling. It is a simple one, and along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I pointed out previously to the hon. member for Lapointe that every amendment had to relate to the clause under consideration. What we have under consideration now is clause 1. The proposed amendment does not refer to clause 1. It is, therefore, irrelevant and cannot be considered at this time. Perhaps I should add a citation from May, sixteenth edition page 554:

> An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the bill, or if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the clause under consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, we heard your ruling, but we believe that on clause 1 of a bill, we can have a general discussion. Without casting blame on your ruling, I think that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lapointe refers to clause 1 as well as to the whole bill.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling.

[Text]

Mr. Moreau: I think the hon. member could accomplish the purpose he has in mind by simply making a motion that the chairman now leave the chair. We should not have to go through the whole business of appealing a ruling of the chairman.

Mr. Caouette: On that point of order, when we moved that the bill should be returned to a committee for further study it was because we did not agree with the bill itself. That is why we are presenting this motion. I still wish to appeal the ruling.

Mr. Moreau: I might add that the motion to leave the chair would have the effect of killing the bill. It would go to the bottom of the list and would not appear again.

Mr. Caouette: I think that is where it belongs—at the bottom of the list.

Mr. Knowles: If the hon. member wants the bill sent to a committee he should, surely, be prepared to move in the proper manner. It does not help to appeal the chairman's ruling on a matter such as this. If he wishes to move that the committee report the bill and then, when the bill is reported, that it be referred to a committee, that would be the proper procedure.

Mr. Deschatelets: Surely, when his motion is out of order—

Mr. Caouette: If a member of the cabinet or of the government is prepared to move such a motion, we would withdraw our appeal from your decision, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Douglas: It is open to any member of this committee to move that the chairman rise and report progress.

Mr. Caouette: I would not mind if the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam would move such a motion as he has been suggesting. We would support it 100 per cent.

Mr. Howard: Surely, the hon. member for Villeneuve is capable of doing his own work, whatever it might be.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that all this discussion has taken place at a time when no discussion could take place, I assume that the proposal to appeal your ruling has been rescinded by the action of the committee. Perhaps the members have waived their right to appeal. Surely, the hon. member for Villeneuve and the hon. member for Lapointe realize we are not objecting to the substance of what they are arguing. But we are asking that parliament stay on an even keel. We are now on clause 1 of this bill. The hon. member is right when he says there is a tradition, an understanding, that we can discuss all of the bill at this time. He and his friend are free to discuss the bill, but the only motion they can make is a motion with respect to clause 1 itself—that it be amended or that consideration thereof be deferred. To move that something be done with respect to the bill is to make a motion with respect to something which is not before us. It seems to me this is so clear that the committee ought not to be asked to go through the motions of calling Mr. Speaker and appealing the ruling.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Caouette: This goes beyond a point of procedure. We are now discussing a bill and there is a mistake in that bill. How can we agree to discuss a bill when it contains an important mistake? This is why we would like to send this bill to the private bills committee. I believe it is important that the bill should come before us without a mistake, so that we might be able to discuss a bill which did not contain any errors. That is why we would like it referred to the committee.

Mr. Byrne: I do not think we should keep on wrangling all the afternoon. I think the Chair should either decide that the ruling cannot be appealed, or we should carry on in the normal way.

The Chairman: The chairman cannot say that his ruling cannot be appealed. It is my understanding that the appeal is still before the committee. I appreciate that there has been discussion, perhaps at a time when there should not have been, while the Chair was preparing to submit the appeal to the house. That is what we intend to do now, unless, of course, it is the wish of the proposer of the amendment to withdraw it.

[Translation]

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, must I understand that before raising this particular point and following his exchange with a member whose name I cannot think of for the moment, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) will wait until we have reached the clause in question, which would allow us to proceed until that time.

Mr. Caouette: That is the principle of the bill.

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Villeneuve does not want to proceed in the usual way.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I hear the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) say that we do not want to proceed in the usual way.

Mr. Dupuis: That is right.

Mr. Caouette: What we do not accept is the fact that we are studying the bill clause by clause while we should be considering it as a whole.

We moved an amendment which the Chair ruled out of order and we appeal against that ruling. If the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville used his head, he should understand that.

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Villeneuve refuses to proceed in the normal way.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville wants to speak, I suggest that he address himself to the Chair.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

In committee of the whole when clause 1 of Bill S-7 was being considered, the hon. member for Lapointe moved an amendment as follows:

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire, seconded by Mr. Caouette, moved that the said Bill S-7, which differs in French from the English version and which is not very clear, be referred to the committee for a period of six months.

[Text]

The Chair ruled the proposed amendment out of order on the grounds that it was irrelevant to clause 1 of the said bill. Whereupon, the hon. member for Villeneuve appealed to the house from the decision of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR OFFICE OF REPRESENTATION COMMISSIONER AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 27, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the office of representation commissioner and to define the duties of the commissioner under the said measure, in addition to those assigned to him under the Canada Elections Act and under a measure to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith; to provide for the salary and expenses of the commissioner; to provide for the appointment of a substitute commissioner and for the payment of his salary and expenses; to authorize the commissioner to appoint such officers and employees as are necessary for the conduct of his office and to engage on a temporary basis persons having technical or specialized knowledge of matters relating to the work of the commissioner; to increase the salary of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and to effect certain other changes in the Canada Elections Act consequential upon the said measure; and to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund under the authority of the said measure of all amounts required for the payment of salary and other expenses under the said measure and under the measure to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions, including expenses of administration thereunder.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, as I proceed this evening with the consideration of the resolution in regard to redistribution I should like to tell the committee that initially the matter now before us was not one with regard to which I intended raising any objection. However, when sitting on the other side of the house for a few minutes on the last day of discussion I spoke to several hon. members, particularly the hon. member for York-Scarborough and, I believe, the Secretary of State. I expressed my view that possibly the matter could be disposed of rather quickly, provided we had the co-operation of the members of the Liberal party. Then, of course, the hon. member for York-Scarborough intervened in the debate and used my constituency of Grey-Bruce for comparative purposes. Although he told me before he spoke that his reference to my constituency would probably be in complimentary terms, I have failed to find this agreeable sentiment in that particular portion of his speech. This is probably one of the reasons I have risen to intervene in the debate this evening.

Let me say immediately, Mr. Chairman, that in other respects, as the terms of the resolution are fairly general, one does not find many of the specifics contained therein to be objectionable, with the exception of the suggestion made by the Secretary of State as to the way we should proceed. As I went back into the previous debates on redistribution, particularly those in 1932-33 and up to 1936-37, I came across some words that I thought were rather applicable at this time, particularly having listened to the Secretary of State in most affable terms appeal to the members of the opposition in such a way that would lead one to expect there would be absolutely nothing objectionable in the bill when placed before the house. Indeed, this may be so: I hope it will be so. But I think these words spoken by Mr. Brunelle, the then Liberal member from Champlain, as reported in Hansard of January 21, 1937, indicate some of our reasons for being concerned about this measure, even after listening to the affable words of the Secretary of State when he appealed for co-operation, and so on. We think these words apply equally today, in the year 1963:

Everyone will admit that in framing a representation act the party in power, whichever it may be, will be naturally inclined to abstain from favouring the opposite party and to adopt the course most favourable to its cause. But to be normally interested and anxious to help a party is one thing, and to be so unreasonably ambitious as to adopt a system utterly subversive to the spirit of representative institutions is quite another.

Therefore I do not think too many of us on this side of the chamber anticipate that the function or mechanics of the proposed legislation will be very favourable to anyone on our side of the house. There are some indications that possibly we are more fearful than is justified, and in this connection I quote the words of the Secretary of State. They were not his own words, as he indicated, but he uttered them in this house in such a manner that we must take it he agrees in every sense with every word he put on the record. He went on to say, as recorded at page 5114 of Hansard for November 26:

> There is no thought of changing the senatorial floor provided in the constitution which, at the present time, protects the representation of the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

This of course is one of the problems we are confronted with in considering such a legislative measure. How will this situation be resolved—maintaining the senatorial floor in one part of the country where the population is rather small, in accordance with our constitution, and then dealing with the situation as it exists in some of the larger provinces? The problem that does arise is that we must bear in mind the number of people in these sectors of the country in comparison with the number in other sectors where some of us think changes might be made.

I am not afraid of the political surgeon's scalpel being drawn in my direction, but I am concerned if this is done in a very broad manner. Therefore I come to the point that was raised by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. He indicated that there are approximately 36,000 people in my constituency, whereas the 1961 census indicated there were 267,000 people in his riding, and of course he made the point that this was too many people for one member to represent.

Then he was somewhat complimentary in his subsequent sentences, but not overly so, because in the final analysis he said the committee would not hear much objection from me, probably, because I was energetic enough to be able to represent more people. Maybe that is so in the manner he indicated in his speech, but I wonder why the hon. member for York-Scarborough did not use the constituency of one of his colleagues as an example. Indeed I myself could point to several constituencies represented by colleagues of mine, constituencies that are similar in size to my own.

The hon. member for York-Scarborough referred to my constituency in approximate terms of being in the ratio of seven to one with his own, but I must at once point to the constituency of Iles-de-la-Madeleine which, when compared with my own, is in a ratio of one to four. Therefore I feel that the people I have the honour to represent justify a member in greater measure than the number of people in Iles-de-la-Madeleine. I do not object to the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine having a seat in this house, but I would point out that in representing the people of Grey-Bruce in the House of Commons I do so in such a manner as to stay in constant communication with them.

My home is in that constituency and I visit there frequently. I understand there are quite a number of members who do not care to represent their ridings in this way and that, of course, is their prerogative. For instance, the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine is, I believe, resident both in the domiciliary sense and the business sense in the city of Montreal and does his representation by a sort of remote control. More power to him, if he has the ability to do it this way.

I do not know how the Secretary of State carries on in his riding. I doubt very much if he goes there too frequently, but he may have some other election machinery there to look after his affairs. But I put this forth, so that when the time comes and political considerations are being examined, that this should be taken into account just as much as any of the words used by the hon. member for York-Scarborough; because they are of equal importance.

I can remember a previous redistribution that affected my constituency, which at that time was represented by a Miss Agnes Macphail, the first lady member of the House of Commons, and a very worthy one at that. She was not a Grit, but it was the Grit chalk, the Grit black pencil changing the constituency lines that eliminated her from this house in the very next election, and she disappeared from the federal political scene.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Miss Macphail, I recall, was defeated in 1940, and if I remember correctly the redistribution previous to that was in 1933, when Mr. Bennett was prime minister. Is he suggesting that the Liberals were responsible for that redistribution?

Mr. Winkler: I think the Secretary of State has a certain propensity for doing things this way, but if he examines the record he will find—

Mr. Teillet: The truth.

Mr. Winkler: The truth? Well, I think the truth on that side of the house is judged in halves and quarters, not in full measure, because I think if the Secretary of State investigates very carefully, and in conjunction with the weatherman in that 1940 election, he will find it was a pretty cute political manoeuvre to eliminate Miss Macphail.

Mr. Pickersgill: No doubt the weatherman was a Liberal.

Mr. Winkler: Certainly I think the weatherman sometimes is too liberal.

Let me point out a couple of other factors in regard to the speech made by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, and I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will not judge me irrelevant when I say this. We would indeed like some of the advantages that have been enjoyed by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, and we in Grey-Bruce would welcome some of the expansion that has taken place in the area he represents, in all the constituencies around us; but we are inhibited by certain other factors.

For instance, there is the designation of depressed areas which receive financial assistance for the attraction of industry. Are we ever considered for that in our part of the country? We are not, but the constituencies of Algoma East, Windsor, and even Stormont are, and I have almost forgotten to mention Brantford. It seems to me there is no possibility of our getting financial assistance to attract industry, and therefore the hon. member for York-Scarborough cannot have it both ways. He cannot have this tremendous development and the advantage of supporting the government without putting up with some disabilities.

In any event, if he has great fears of not coming back to the house maybe the government will cut off part of his constituency and put it in with mine. I do not know, but I will give the Secretary of State good marks for the manner in which he presented this measure. If the words he uttered one week ago in regard to it are followed very closely, and if that degree of affability is carried through in the terms of the bill, and in the mechanics of the redistribution, then I do not think we have too much to fear. On the other hand, to be fair about it we must ask ourselves tonight, if there is any intention on the part of the government to move into the area of an election, whether it is expedient to accept this legislation. If it is not expedient, then I think we should carry this measure over to the next session of parliament for further consideration. Certainly the time and study which will be given to the matter by hon. members, as well as the benefit of discussions which will take place in constituencies, will be worth while in guiding the implementation of the mechanics of this legislation. In that event we would be prepared to be more co-operative.

I disagree, for example, with the method by which it is proposed to set up the commissions. I believe one commission should be sufficient for the whole country. With ten commissions there will be ten differing views, so how can there be unanimity in the way the measure is to be brought forward? That is another important point. I also disagree with the thinking of the Secretary of State in regard to the quotient to be used and the tolerance on either side; in this regard I also disagree with the hon. member for York-Scarborough. I maintain that one way in which the representation of rural areas can be perpetuated, unless it is proved otherwise, is by a tolerance of 30 per cent on either side of the base figure established. If these two matters alone are brought into line, the effects of which will be apparent to most of rural Canada, I think we would be prepared to go along with the Secretary of State in an affable spirit of co-operation if he were to reintroduce this measure in the next session of this parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I have but a few words to say on the resolution now before us and which reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the office of representation commissioner and to define the duties of the commissioner under the said measure, in addition to those assigned to him under the Canada Elections Act and under a measure to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith; to provide for the salary and expenses of the commissioner;—

Mr. Chairman, if one considers the representation as it is now, one is struck by the example provided by New Brunswick. It is generally recognized that this province will always be represented by ten members. Furthermore, at the present time, there is a difference of ten members between the number from Ontario and that from Quebec.

Now, the first duty of the commissioner or substitute commissioners who may be appointed will be to define the boundaries of the constituencies and set the exact representation of each province. They will also be authorized to establish commissions at the constituency level, in the various provinces, so that these commissions will decide upon the boundaries of the constituencies, that is whether a constituency is to be enlarged or reduced in size according to the population of the different areas involved.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the resolution introduced by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) is a mess that is rather difficult to straighten out and, at the same time, it provides for the establishment of an organization which could readily be used to grant political favours or to act upon government decisions or suggestions, whatever government happens to be in office at the time.

It is actually suggested that they would be independent commissions. We have already seen independent commissions in Canada which reeked of politics. I think that this resolution would likely be partial to political friends, not only on the national or provincial level, but also within the riding. I do not think that the commission should be authorized to act without parliament being held directly responsible, and this means not only the government, but the Canadian parliament.

We are not against redistribution, far from it. As a matter of fact, we know that certain ridings on Montreal island have a very high number of voters, whereas others, like that of Laurier, for instance, the constituency of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chevrier), has only a small number of them. In fact, there are two or three other ridings on Montreal island which are thinly populated and which are nevertheless represented in the House of Commons. And if a redistribution was made on Montreal island, nobody would object.

But I will never forget the electoral redistribution made in 1947, I believe, when members were invited by the committee on privileges and elections to voice their opinion. I was then the member for Pontiac in this house. The southern limits of the Pontiac constituency extended up to the northern limit of the Hull constituency which made an area of about 300 miles long by 150 miles wide.

At that time, as I have already said, the members were asked to make suggestions. Thereafter, the Pontiac constituency was divided in two parts, one forming the southern part of the Pontiac-Temiscamingue constituency and the other, the new riding of Villeneuve.

Mr. Chairman, I think that before proceeding with redistribution, we should consider the representations of the present members for ridings which will in some way be affected, whether their limits are to be extended or reduced, or whether their population is to be increased or decreased. Anyway, we would not like redistribution to be used as a political football by any party. What we want, in this parliament, is an adequate representation for the Canadian people.

Whether we establish constituencies of 70,000 people, with a margin of 20 per cent above or below that figure, may be an important point. As a matter of fact, it is perhaps an acceptable figure, under the circumstances. But, I repeat that redistribution should not be used as a political football, where political party patronage might play a role, whatever it may be.

Now, we are not here to please our friends or displease our enemies. We are here to legislate in the best interest of the people. I think that all hon. members, beginning with the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) who is submitting this resolution, are anxious for a good representation and want Canada to be composed of ridings as equal as possible to one another, as far as their territories and populations are concerned.

There is no doubt that the Canadian people will thus be better represented here, even if the number of voters were sometimes to be increased—and I always take the city of Montreal as an example—as it may be the riding of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Chevrier). There might be some advantage for him—as he could have a larger majority—or be more easily defeated. As we do not know which, we shall be content with assumptions.

We want an adequate representation.

I think that this resolution which wants to establish boundary commissions in the various ridings, as well as on the provincial and federal level, will mean a tremendous expense, because new officials and new employees will be needed; if we want to spend such an amount of money, let us make sure that it is not thrown away, but that it is used in the interest of our people and of Canada as a whole.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I should like, first of all, to congratulate the Secretary of State on the manner in which he introduced this important piece of legislation last week. He seemed to have high hopes, after introducing it in such a fine and open way, that the resolution might carry on the day on which it was first considered.

It was with some regret I had to point out to him that there were still a number of speakers who wanted to take part in the debate. I regret the look of chagrin which crossed his face when he realized the measure was not going to pass on that occasion. However, the hon. gentleman should not be entirely surprised that we in the opposition did not accept his attitude at face value. He can hardly blame us for that. We have observed him for a long time in the House of Commons and we have come to the conclusion that he is either a present day disciple of Machiavelli, or else he is constitutionally incapable of refraining from the temptation to strike a low blow at either his colleagues or his opponents, if they place enough faith in him to allow him the opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is not shameful at all. It is learned from bitter experience. In this connection I do not want the Secretary of State to be depressed or downhearted. If his approach is genuine—and I have no reason to think it is not on this occasion—we welcome it. At the same time, even if the hon. gentleman's repentance for past attitudes is sincere, there is bound to be a period of penance, or something of that sort, before we can accept all his suggestions at their face value.

Apart from that, this is an extremely important debate and one in which many members want to take part. There are two principles under consideration. The most important one is the method of redistribution. The legislation proposes that we embark on an effort which is new, as far as Canada is concerned, though it has been in use in a number of other commonwealth countries for a number of years. In other words, it is proposed that the boundaries of constituencies should be delineated by an independent commission, or by independent commissions, rather than by a committee of the house as in the past. Final approval would, of course, have to be given by the house. I think this is an important step forward. I think it is a step on which all parties agree, at least in general terms. But if we decide on this new method I hope those who are responsible for carrying out the redistribution will not be entirely carried away by the very good objective, in general terms, of representation according to population, right down to the last decimal point. Even at best, redistribution will have a profound effect or, at least, it will have a far reaching one. I am not sure that the effect will be profound; the composition of future houses elected after the next redistribution will probably remain much the same. But it will have a far reaching effect on the boundaries of all the constituencies in Canada.

I think we should realize, too, in approaching the objective of representation by population, that the constituencies of Canada vary a great deal in size in almost every province. For example, in the province of Ontario during the last census it was found that constituencies varied in population from around 29,000 to 267,000, while in Quebec they varied from 12,500 to about 233,000. This is a wide discrepancy. However, it should not be forgotten that these variations arise from two reasons, and I think those reasons should be kept apart in our thinking. One cause is a population change arising from the migration of people from rural areas to suburban areas, and the growth of cities generally. This has resulted in large populations within constituencies which were mainly rural at the time of the last redistribution. There is another reason for the large discrepancies in population of constituencies across Canada: They were made that way for reasons which were considered sufficient at previous redistributions. In many cases these reasons were good ones and I believe they should have considerable effect on those who are now charged with the responsibility for redefining our constituencies. After all, it has generally been recognized over the years that there are certain areas which should have representation for certain special reasons. It has been thought proper that the northern territories should have at least one member each. We have also accepted the principle that there should be a certain minimum representation from each of the provinces which joined together in confederation. Thus, the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are protected in their representation.

There are still further considerations. Over the years it has been customary for rural constituencies to have a smaller population than urban ones. Theorists may scoff at this and consider it unjustified, though I would not agree with them. After all, there are some who argue that members of parliament—and I would not pursue this reasoning too far—represent not only the people of their constituencies, but the constituencies themselves. There is some room to argue this. For example, I think it would be agreed that the member of parliament representing a vast empire like the Northwest Territories not only represents the people in that riding at the present time but has a certain responsibility to safeguard the great natural resources of that area that are now held in trust, as it were, for the generations which may populate that area in the future.

I think most members of parliament will also realize that generally speaking rural constituencies require more representation per thousand of population than urban ones, or this seems to be the case quite frequently. This arises because of a number of reasons. One is that rural people in isolated areas frequently do not have readily at hand the office facilities of the various departments of government to which they can go. Instead of dropping around the corner to the federal building and seeing the appropriate civil servant, they write to their member of parliament for information as to how to proceed with regard to innumerable matters having to do with government, such as how to apply for an old age pension or how to put in a tender on some small contract. Rural constituents have the habit of writing to their members of parliament about things of this sort. I stand to be corrected but I have the impression that members of parliament who represent urban constituencies do not have such a large volume of mail as those who represent rural constituencies.

In addition, by the very nature of the geographical size of the constituency the number of matters that are brought to the attention of the member of parliament is greater. This is especially true, I think, of seacoast constituencies. There are constituencies in the maritime provinces that have literally hundreds of federal government establishments of one sort or another within their boundaries. They may be small, but in a constituency like my own there are dozens of lighthouses, dozens of wharves and large numbers of other small federal government establishments and facilities, all of which require a certain amount of attention from the members of parliament for the areas. These are things that do not exist in inland constituencies and do not exist to any great extent in urban ones.

Therefore I think there are many considerations of this sort that should be brought into the balance when the matter of representation by population is being considered. It is a worthy objective as a theory but it is one that can only be approached. It cannot always be achieved.

I think it would also behoove us to consider how many people a member of parliament can properly represent under our system. After confederation each member of parliament in a much smaller house represented only about 18,000 Canadians. Now and after redistribution each member of parliament on the average is and will be representing about 70,000 Canadians. In addition there has been a great growth in the activity of federal governments over the years. For example, 70 years ago in the early 1890's the federal government spent in each year's budget approximately $200,000 per constituency. At the present time the figure is something like $22 million per constituency. In terms of dollars, and of course the dollar has not remained constant, there has been a hundredfold increase in the activity of the federal government in the average constituency over the last 70 years.

There are other things that should be considered as well, such as the community of interest of a certain area. If we set out to delineate constituencies of approximately the same size it should be realized that in order to adjust one constituency we will have to adjust the boundaries of perhaps all the constituencies extending in one direction from that constituency to the border of the province. If one constituency is too small you cannot just simply adjust it by taking a certain amount of territory away from the next one because the surrounding constituencies may not be too large. The result is that a general reaction sets in, and I can visualize that even with a variation of as much as 30 per cent in constituencies in the next redistribution this will be the most far reaching distribution since confederation. It will create a tremendous amount of dislocation.

I would venture to say that it will not be possible to bring the constituencies of Canada within 30 per cent of equality without displacing a large number of the present membership of the house from the constituencies in which they now live. I would venture to say that after the next redistribution many of the present members of parliament will find themselves no longer resident in the constituencies they now represent, but perhaps in adjoining ones. There will be many cases where there will be new constituencies without any resident member of parliament, whereas others will have two or three.

The same thing will apply, of course, to the returning officers. Many of them will have to be re-selected and re-appointed because they have to be electors of the constituency in which they operate. When the boundaries are changed many of them will not be resident in the constituencies in which they now reside.

I should like to say a word for a moment about the question of the Senate floor as far as it concerns the provinces which now have protection under it, namely Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Some people, perhaps without thinking deeply about the matter, look on it as an ad hoc arrangement that was made without any valid reasoning or justification behind it, but I should like to point out that is not the case. When the various provinces of Canada entered confederation one of the terms under which they came in was that their representation should have a certain weight in the parliament of Canada. The Senate representation, of course, is fixed; but there was an understanding or a belief at least that the weight of provinces, like the maritimes, would continue to bear a reasonable proportion to the whole in the future. Already, of course, the percentage weight of representation from the older parts of Canada is much lower than it was immediately after confederation. If the unit of representation were the same now as it was then, Prince Edward Island would have six members of parliament but the percentage weight of those members to the total house would be much smaller than it was at the time of confederation because the house is larger. The protection afforded by the Senate floor gives Prince Edward Island as well as New Brunswick greater representation in the House of Commons than they would be entitled to strictly on the basis of representation by population.

This is a recognized principle. Perhaps the most obvious example of it occurs in the United States. The more influential of their two houses is the senate, but every state of the union, regardless of population, is represented by two senators. You have states like New York and California with populations around 16 million represented by two senators, whereas you have a state like Nevada with a population of something like 300,000 also having two senators. This means that the senator from New York represents about 50 times as many people as the senator from Nevada.

Mr. Macaluso: You might also include in your comparison the electoral college system for the election of the president, because the two systems are quite different.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am not talking about the election of a president at the moment, but that is true. The president is actually elected by the electoral college which has representation from all the states and, depending on the majority obtained in each state, as I understand it, all the votes from that state go to the candidate in question. It is possible, I believe, for a president of the United States to be elected by a majority of the electoral college but still have a minority of the total popular vote.

However, I was not intending to embark on that question at the moment. I was simply pointing out that, with the protection of the Senate floor, in so far as the representation of certain provinces is concerned it is merely an attempt to guarantee a certain minimum weight of representation in the national parliament from those provinces. As the Secretary of State pointed out, it is generally agreed that this principle will be followed and I do not believe it is contemplated that it should be disturbed.

Mr. Pickersgill: The senatorial floor?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly I would oppose disturbing it, very strongly indeed.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, I understand that. I am not questioning the views of the Secretary of State on this at all. I was just pointing out that I believe that we are all agreed that should be the case.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that, so far as this contemplated legislation is concerned, I believe it is an important forward step so far as Canada is concerned, that we should embark on a new method of redistribution. Then I should like to point out that the first redistribution under this new system, if it becomes operative, will be vitally important. I think we should not try to make progress too rapidly with this first redistribution under the new system. Great care should be taken to look carefully at all these various factors, so that we do not disturb some principles that would have to be reinstated at a following redistribution. I think if we make progress without trying to accomplish everything at once then, after the first redistribution, under the new system following redistributions will be relatively easy.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, the subject dealt with in this resolution, that of redistribution, is an extremely important one to every member of this committee. This evening I should like to speak primarily on the question of tolerance. The Secretary of State has mentioned 20 per cent, someone else has mentioned 30 per cent and still another person has mentioned 40 per cent. I want to point out to the Secretary of State and to the committee that there is a tremendous difference between rural and urban ridings. There is the question of heterogenous conditions in rural ridings as compared with the relative homogenous conditions of urban ridings.

In the rural riding, for example, there are all the various industries and types of production which one can find spread over a large area. I speak from experience with my own constituency of Macleod, which consists of an area about 150 miles from north to south and 150 miles from east to west. There are the Rocky mountains on the west which divide the two provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. In this area one finds oil and natural gas. Fifty per cent of the natural gas which goes to Ontario originates in the Pincher Creek area; another 25 per cent or 50 per cent goes to California, and it also originates in that area. In addition there is the oil in Turner Valley. Then, at Okotoks, Texas-gulf Sulphur has constructed a plant, and if it were working at capacity it would be in a position to ship out one trainload of sulphur per day. Sulphur is also produced at Turner Valley at the Shell plant, and at the B.A. plant south of Pincher Creek.

In addition to these products which come from beneath the surface there are the various lumber products and agricultural products. There are approximately 6,000 farmers producing wheat, cattle and a wide range of products. If a member is to get to all the corners of his constituency he is faced with a vastly different problem in serving a constituency scattered over an area 150 miles in both directions than in serving an urban area where a member can walk down a street and talk to someone. In other words, in a compact area all of your problems are centralized and it is much easier to get around to the various parts of your constituency.

Now, I mention this because I believe that in considering the principle of representation by population in connection with redistribution, a tolerance of at least 40 per cent should be given to rural areas. In other words, the theory of representation by population is all right as far as it goes. It is also necessary to recognize that a member of this House of Commons not only represents the people in his constituency but also the constituency itself, with all the natural conditions and natural resources with which he is familiar. He must also serve the people working on the resources in his constituency, scattered as they are throughout the riding. There is a tremendous amount of travelling involved, and so on.

I go even further, Mr. Chairman. My constituency is not the largest in the dominion by any means; I am not suggesting that. I could cite many others which have a much greater area than Macleod. One hon. member has mentioned the Northwest Territories, which is a tremendous area. People in the house who represent rural areas believe we must have a tolerance when it comes to representation by population, and this tolerance must be at least 40 per cent in favour of the rural constituencies. There is another factor which I hope the Secretary of State, the commissions and those who may be giving direction with regard to this measure will take into consideration. I believe that in so far as possible the people living in a constituency should be left there. If an addition is to be made, all well and good. If something is to be subtracted, that is equally well and good. But to take people from one side of a boundary and add them to another would simply cause great confusion to the constituents of a riding. People become accustomed to looking to the constituency in which they have lived for a number of years. For example, those who live in Bonavista-Twillingate look to that constituency as being the one in which they belong, and if they were suddenly pulled out of that riding and put into another there would be a great deal of confusion in their minds.

An hon. Member: They would be delighted.

Mr. Kindt: It would also mean that the people moved would take a considerable time to catch up with the facts of another constituency. The same would be true of the riding of Macleod. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I believe that wherever it is possible the commissions that will be working under this legislation should keep intact the boundaries and the people now living within the constituency of which they have become part. In other words, the constituency of Macleod has 51,000 people in it, and if it is necessary to subtract or add to that constituency in order to bring it up to some over-all average, I believe it is not necessary to take from one side and add to another. The constituency should be added to in a way that would not disturb the people now living there.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would say that the remarks I have made this evening are only by way of preamble, because we have not before us the bill that will be introduced in this regard. When that bill is introduced there will be an opportunity to study and comment on its provisions.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, when the resolution was first introduced I did not intend to speak at this stage in the debate. After hearing the Secretary of State on that occasion making his rather interesting approach and presentation of this very important matter, and having come to the conclusion that the government's consideration of this new approach to redistribution is still in a somewhat fluid state, I thought it would be best to make my comments before we passed the resolution.

In introducing the resolution the Secretary of State pointed out that it was the desire of the government, as it had been the intention of the previous government, once and for all to get this matter of the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons, which follows automatically after every decennial census, out of the hands of the politicians themselves. I think all hon. members of the house will agree that this reform is long overdue. Indeed, if one looks back at the history of the discussion of the measure in the house, he is invariably surprised that it has taken so long for parliament to come to grips with this obvious abuse. For anyone who has been a member of the House of Commons for a number of years, particularly during a period when redistribution has taken place, has had forcibly brought home to him, from personal experience, the fact that there is indeed a better method of dealing with the redistribution of parliamentary constituencies than any of those which have been used hitherto.

I have experienced one redistribution in this house, that which was carried out following the census of 1951. It was obvious on that occasion that the objective approach was not taken in handling this difficult problem.

My own experience in dealing with the matter at that time was of course restricted to the problems of Manitoba. The problem there, as has been the case in the redistribution previous to 1951, was made more difficult by the fact that it was necessary for the province of Manitoba, along with the province of Saskatchewan, to lose some of its seats in the House of Commons. Hon. members who have reviewed the history of former redistributions will have discovered that Saskatchewan lost several seats at that time; but in order to save the situation an artificial floor was put into operation in that particular instance. Manitoba had no artificial floor placed under its representation following 1951, with the result that we dropped two more seats in the House of Commons. This has meant that our representation since 1941 dropped from 17 to 14 seats. That, for a province such as Manitoba, was a very serious loss indeed, particularly when we take into consideration the fact that Manitoba is dominated by Winnipeg, an urban area which at the present time contains almost half the population of that province.

In 1951 the decision was made to amalgamate the constituency I represented at that time, the old Brandon constituency, with the former constituency of Souris. This meant that the whole southwestern corner of the province of Manitoba would be represented by one member of parliament, and the population of the new constituency rose to something like 70,000, which was about the average for a typical urban riding. It meant that the member for Brandon-Souris, which happened to be myself, would be representing an area much larger than most urban ridings, but having at the same time a population that was comparable to the more closely integrated and more easily serviced typical urban constituencies.

There was an even deeper implication. It so happened that the only two rural Conservative members at that time were from the southwest corner of the province of Manitoba. The late Arthur Ross had sat in this house from the year 1940 as the sole Conservative representative from Manitoba until I and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre joined him in 1951. It might have been merely a coincidence that the decision was made to amalgamate those two constituencies. There could have been an operation conducted on other parts of the Manitoba political anatomy, but it was not without some significance that the decision was made to combine the old Souris and Brandon ridings into the new riding of Brandon-Souris. In fact I would dare to suggest there might have been some aspect of gerrymandering involved in the considerations.

Having come through that experience I think, Mr. Chairman, you will understand my present enthusiasm for the resolution that is before us and my desire to make a brief statement on it at this stage, particularly as my good friend the Secretary of State indicated he was still flexible in his thinking as to the specific proposals that would be in the bills when they are brought down. It is for that reason I am making my brief remarks at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder would the hon. gentleman permit me to say one word on that?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to indicate to the committee that not only am I paying careful attention to every suggestion being made at this stage, but when the bills have been given first reading it is also the view of the government that anything in those bills can be changed, and can be changed by a majority of the house, even if that majority does not necessarily include the majority of hon. members on this side, provided it does not touch one fundamental point which is that there must be an independent, impartial redistribution; and on this we are all agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am pleased to have that interjection by the Secretary of State. I only wish that attitude of sweet reasonableness had prevailed back in 1951, because I think we might have been able to save the day for the old Souris riding if we had such a spirit of tolerance at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would never have been here then.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is a matter of interesting speculation, but as I recall it at that time it was hoped I would not be here representing the new constituency, because it was anticipated that the late Mr. Arthur Ross, who was several years my senior in the house, would receive the nomination and that the new member from Brandon, who had only been here for two years, would be sent out into the political wilderness.

As it happened, and as it always happens, there is poetic justice in all of these things. Colonel Ross stepped aside. He was a man of great courtesy and chivalry, and he went on to contest the provincial election and wrested a traditional seat from the provincial Liberal party. Indeed, looking back in terms of historic perspective, I might say that was the beginning of the ascendancy of the Conservative party in Manitoba. So you see, in all such things, as the poet Robbie Burns said, "The best laid plans of mice and men gang aft agley." That is why I find it so difficult to understand that parliament had not decided long ago to deal with these matters from a scientific and objective basis rather than from a political basis.

I would like to make some mention of the degree of tolerance that will be decided upon in the legislation. We have had various suggestions made as to how far this should go. Certainly it should represent the traditional viewpoint of representation by population. However, the geography of Canada being such as it is, with the population distributed across the country on a somewhat inequitable basis, we must give ample consideration to the geographical aspects of representation.

It is not just a rural-urban problem in the traditional sense, because in many parts of Canada there are no urban communities in the sociological sense. In some constituencies there are a series of small towns which might be semi-urban and semi-rural, but they certainly do not meet all the characteristics of the typical urban community. The very fact that there is a constituency made up of a series of these small towns places an additional burden of responsibility on the member representing it.

For example, in my constituency there are about a dozen substantial towns, and this means that all the community organizations and services are duplicated in each of these areas. A member representing an urban constituency might complain that its population is somewhat larger. According to the tolerance that is being suggested, he might have a population of some 85,000 in an entirely urban constituency, but in his constituency he has only one group of social institutions. There is only one of each denomination of churches, only one Canadian Legion and only one municipal authority to deal with, and so on. I could go through the whole list of community institutions, but in what I might call a rural-urban constituency, a constituency that is semi-rural, semi-urban, with up to 12 small communities in it, and with a population of 70,000, all these social institutions are duplicated in each of the larger towns.

It would seem to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the matter of tolerance should be very closely examined by the government, and those who will be carrying on discussions with the government regarding the specific terms of the legislation. This has particular significance in the province of Manitoba. As I have already mentioned we have an urban community which, in terms of population, represents almost one half the total population of the province. I suppose the population of greater Winnipeg now would be somewhere around 500,000 which does in absolute terms of population represent one half of the population of the province. If some of the suggestions put forward in the preliminary statement by the Secretary of State are applied in the province of Manitoba, it would mean that an urban centre such as Winnipeg occupying a comparatively small geographic area would have almost one half the representation of that province. This would be particularly so were the province of Manitoba to lose another seat and reduce their representation to 13 members.

Therefore I take this opportunity to point out to the Secretary of State, and through him to the government, that in setting a specific percentage quota this problem, which is perhaps peculiar to a country like Canada, should be given earnest consideration. If we are going to have the kind of representation which is required in all parts of this country we must give consideration to geography in the specific terms I have outlined in my remarks this evening. It was mentioned the other day when we were discussing this resolution that the provincial government of Manitoba had already tackled this problem of redistribution within its own boundaries; and I think hon. members of this committee would be interested in knowing that it gave very careful consideration to the special problem which I have outlined.

Another point I should like to raise is that of the machinery that is to be set up in order to carry out this independent, impartial redistribution. On all sides of the house there has been agreement that the spirit of independence must prevail if this forward step is going to prove successful. The only difference between the official opposition and the government is that of the membership of the commission and the number of commissions which should operate in the various areas of Canada. The Leader of the Opposition expressed some reservation about a commission for each province. I would underline that reservation because it seems to me its going to be difficult enough to get uniformity across the country, because of different social, economic and geographic circumstances prevailing in the various regions of Canada, if we do not have some method which will closely integrate the policy. True enough there is going to be an attempt at co-ordination among the ten commissions suggested by the government in this resolution. However, it seems to me that some closer measure of co-ordination is going to be required; perhaps the regional approach would be better than the provincial approach. But there certainly needs to be some better method of co-ordination to meet the special circumstances of Canada which I have already outlined, if we are going to have some uniformity in carrying out redistribution.

The final point I want to make is that I would draw the government's attention to the desirability of having judges connected in some way with the redistribution process. This is the formula that has already been established in the province of Manitoba and it has worked there with eminent success. There have been no complaints concerning the workings of that independent commission on redistribution in the province of Manitoba. It was one of the proposals in a somewhat similar resolution and consequent legislation contemplated by the former administration, and it seems to me that it would be the best method of ensuring the high degree of independence which I am sure all hon. members of this committee are desirous of obtaining for the work of this commission.

[Translation]

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Chairman, last Wednesday, when the house adjourned, I had not completed my remarks concerning redistribution of electoral constituencies, but I did not intend to complete them, because I had thought at that time that everything had been said at the resolution stage. My only hope was that, since all parties agreed to the redistribution, this might be done as soon as possible.

However, in view of the stand taken by the Conservatives, who seem to want to prolong the debate, without telling us just why, I feel I will not be blamed for prolonging it a little if I make a clear contribution to the proposed measure.

Mr. Chairman, after listening to several members, one reaches the conclusion that the real problem with redistribution is that it must be done in such a way that representation of one group of the population must not be detrimental to another group. In that connection, one recognizes the claim of some people who want the rural ridings to be represented according to their population and in as great a number as the rural ridings.

Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that the size of the electoral ridings as well as the linguistic and religious aspirations of the various areas must be considered in order to determine exactly the boundaries of an urban or a rural electoral riding.

As far as I am concerned, as I stated the other evening, in view of what is happening in the house, I would be in favour of a decrease in the number of members rather than of an increase since every time we are studying a bill, we have to go through the resolution stage where suggestions are made to the government but very seldom accepted since it already holds its views on the matter. Moreover, when we come to the motion preceding the second or third reading of the bill, we renew our claims which always remain unsatisfied. Therefore, it would be better to do away with the resolution stage so that we would not have to listen so often to speakers who do not intend to make a constructive contribution to the progress of the business of the house.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that everyone agrees that the distribution of seats should be revised and that the principles of such a redistribution consist of the unbiased appointment of qualified people. However, in the present framework of Canadian politics, it is very difficult to find people who are proof against any partisan influence, because even at the judicature level, it must be remembered, as I pointed out the other day, that in most cases, judges are appointed by virtue of their political ties.

Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated that he advocated the appointment of judges instead of commissioners for the redistribution job in the various provinces. Moreover, as I said before, I think the commissions should be created at the provincial or regional level throughout the country, and that there should be five or six commissions which would represent the various territories of our country. Besides, these commissions should include members who understand the needs of the different areas, in order to be in a position to proceed accordingly with redistribution.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to mention the inconsistency we have shown at election time ever since 1867, as the problem of redistribution dates back to the beginning of confederation, when everybody admitted that the distribution of ridings had to be constantly revised.

Today it is more and more obvious that an immediate redistribution is necessary in order to be fair with everybody. At the present time, elections are made to the prejudice of several citizens of this country. We find that there are several parties which would nevertheless like to have elections in ridings where they know that justice will not be done to voters after the election.

I believe that the fact that the present distribution is inadequate should be taken into consideration before considering whether to bring about an election because the parties already agree the Canadian people, in the event of another election, would be unfairly treated on account of the wrong distribution of the constituencies.

There is a view, Mr. Chairman, which it would be wise to remember. If, as I suggest, the number of members of the House of Commons should be decreased, owing to the time being wasted, often on account of empty speeches, higher allowances should be provided for those members or candidates who have to travel longer distances during their electoral campaigns.

A travelling allowance could be provided for candidates or members for large ridings like those of the prairie provinces, for instance, so that there would be no disparity between them and members for urban constituencies.

Mr. Choquette: There is not a penny left in the hon. member's campaign fund.

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that it would be more appropriate to make such a proposal when the house is discussing the Canada Elections Act, but I feel that it is relevant to the question under consideration.

Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, I still say that the debate on the resolution is a waste of time for the taxpayers, for the house and for everyone. The sooner it is over the better it will be.

[Text]

Mr. Baldwin: I appreciate the generous invitation of the Secretary of State which, as I understood it, constituted a suggestion that all members who had some contribution to make or some suggestions to advance should, either at this stage or on second reading, give the committee or the house the benefit of their views. That statement removed any doubt I had felt about speaking at this time. As a matter of fact, I think that at this stage we are far less cribbed and confined than we are on second reading, despite the fact that the Secretary of State did hold out the hope—and I think we can take it at its face value—that the government would not be too strict in its interpretation of the rules and would be prepared to consider meeting reasonable suggestions and making amendments at that time.

Like the previous speaker I feel that on a subject as important as this it is not only the right but the duty of every member to make his views known. I should like to have seen the range of our discussion on this particular measure broadened to include expressions of opinion by those who sit opposite and support the government. I hope that before this resolution passes we shall have the benefit of their wisdom. I say this because here we have an opportunity, on behalf of our constituents, who are even more vitally concerned with the results of this measure than are the individual members of this committee, to make known the views of those who elected us. If we have been good members we probably know by now what the people in our constituencies feel about this measure. Now we have an opportunity to put those views on record. Not only will the government be able to hear and read them in due course, but the tribunal itself will, I hope, in the discharge of its task, turn to this debate and to the debates which follow to learn how the people of Canada wish these problems of redistribution to be handled.

I am in accord with what has been said by my hon. friend from Brandon-Souris, by my leader and others, that it is of the essence that the tribunal to be established should be composed in part of people who are or have been high court judges. I do not wish to go into the subject to any great extent because I think everything that could usefully be said has been said. But I think it is undoubtedly a fact that men who have been partisan and prejudiced in political life, upon taking the judge's oath and ascending to the bench have, in almost every instance I can think of, put to one side their preconceived prejudices and views and have discharged the duties which have been cast upon them without regard to the views they may have held in the past. For that reason I think it would be most useful to have as at least a considerable element in this tribunal some people who have held judicial office.

I think that all of us bring to this particular problem some of the views we have elicited as a result of our own particular circumstances in the constituency or the area of which we have particular knowledge. I do not think it would be amiss for me to give very briefly some of my views which have been generated as a result of my own experience in a constituency vast in size and covering more than one third of the province of Alberta but which has a population of approximately 80,000 people. I can say that my remarks tonight are objective. Nothing that can be done within the limits of what has been suggested would in any way hurt my constituency or do damage to it, so I hope my remarks will be considered to be generally objective.

The constituency of Peace River extends from the westerly boundary of the Canadian shield to the eastern slopes of the Rockies and from the 55th parallel to the 60th parallel. The population is scattered throughout the constituency, not like many northern constituencies where the largest number of people are to be found in the southern areas of those constituencies. In this case they are to be found in all parts of the constituency. When I go home during recesses it takes me two months to two months and a half to cover the constituency adequately and attempt to give that service to the people of the area which in my view a member of parliament should provide if he is going to be a good member of parliament. This does not mean that I make personal contact with anything other than a percentage of the people, but at least I attempt to place myself in a position where the people of the area have the opportunity to see me, talk to me and present their views. I do so because, as I see it, it is part of my duty when I come here representing these people to bring to the house the views I have gathered during discussions with those I represent. I submit that anything less than that would be short of what my true function as a member of parliament must be.

Having in mind the impetus which has been given to northern development—I hope hon. members will not think I am being too partisan if I refer to some of the measures passed under the last government—this district will acquire another 20,000 to 25,000 people in a comparatively short time. There is bound to be a division. Yet as I see the situation, if specific and inflexible rules are laid down requiring that population shall be the main criterion as to the size of a constituency, it may well be that a division cannot be arranged which will permit the true representation that the area should have.

It is my submission that, apart from anything else that has been said, some attempt should be made to introduce, in addition to the criterion of population and the tolerance which would go with it, a measure which would provide that, subject to certain set, specific conditions being present, a member may be returned from an area with less than the minimum population referred to in the legislation. I think you would have to provide very specifically what those conditions were. I do not think such a provision could be allowed to be used improperly or injudiciously, but I do feel this suggestion might well provide an answer to some of the views which have been expressed by some of the members during the course of the debate.

I think there is a precedent for this, Mr. Chairman. The government has just concluded a conference with the 10 provinces. During the course of and following these discussions certain new views have been advanced as to payments to certain provinces on the basis of equalization. It is my understanding that in this unique experiment of building a nation from sea to sea in the northern part of this continent, which is subject to such tremendous variations in geography and economy, we have established the equalization principle in order to provide a measure of equality and to iron out these differences. Without that we would not have a viable nation. I submit that the same principle of equalization might well be applied to the question of representation.

I appreciate the problem of those members who represent constituencies with tremendously large populations. Their problem is a very difficult one. I do not for one minute attempt to minimize it, but I think there is at least a homogeneity to their representation which is of advantage to them and, more important, permits their constituents to have access to them. This is not always apparent in the case of rural constituencies.

What will be the ultimate result if we should carry through to its logical conclusion the principle of representation by population? As I see it, we would ultimately find in Canada not only 10 provinces but, superimposed upon those 10 provinces, some 10 or 12 or 14 large city states. These city states would probably control two thirds to three quarters of the representation in the House of Commons. This in turn would attract a concentration of power into the hands of these city states which I think would add immeasurably to the complexity of governing this country. Hon. members are familiar with the old principle as expressed by one southern senator, "Them that has gits". Having in mind human nature, which all of us recognize is a factor, large cities with a large membership in the house would inevitably in due course be able to provide greater and greater benefits for these large centres of population through legislation which they would be able to control. If this should happen I believe the inevitable result would be the breakdown of the country as we see it.

There may be hon. members who feel I am too far fetched in projecting my thoughts to this ultimate conclusion but I do not think so. I think this is very likely to happen. Therefore in my view any measure of redistribution affecting the membership of the house should take into consideration the vital fact that there should be a measure of representation which is not necessarily consistent with population but is consistent with the proper growth of the country. To that end I suggest that those who have spoken, and I understand and appreciate the sentiments which motivated them, for a rigid yardstick of population with a very small tolerance are, in the final analysis, doing a disservice to this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I might be permitted to say a word at this point, Mr. Chairman, I have the impression that it is not the disposition of the committee to carry the resolution this evening. I have no criticism whatever to make of that. Perhaps it might be helpful to have a little consultation outside the house before we go on with this particular matter.

If it were agreeable to the committee I should like to move—I am not doing so now—that the committee rise, report progress and then I would ask hon. members if there would be unanimous consent to have item No. 16 on the order paper called. This is a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Aeronautics Act. I think this is a non-controversial measure and it is designed to remedy a defect in the law. I think the debate on this measure could be conducted far better when the bill is in front of us and we see precisely what is in it. If there were such a disposition the bill would be available, amongst the several measures that I hope to announce at the end of the day, with which the house could deal tomorrow.

I think it would be better if we could stand over this redistribution matter for a few days and then we could make better progress towards the goal I think all hon. members share, and that is trying to conclude the business of this session in an orderly fashion before Christmas.

Mr. Churchill: We are in agreement, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHARGES FOR USE OF FACILITIES AND SERVICES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act to authorize the governor in council to make regulations prescribing charges for the use of any facility or service provided by or on behalf of the Minister of Transport for or in respect of aircraft or at an airport and to make such regulations as he deems necessary to impose upon the owners or operators wherever resident, of any aircraft charges for the availability during any flights of such aircraft within or outside Canada of any facility or service provided by or on behalf of the minister; to provide also for the payment of certain expenses of witnesses attending before boards of inquiry established by the minister to investigate aircraft accidents; and to make certain other amendments for the better administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Mr. Herridge: I have one question to ask the Secretary of State, and that is whether this legislation applies to airports owned by municipalities that have received grants from the federal government?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the bill will make that point clear. This is precisely why I thought it would be preferable to have the bill before us. I have read the resolution carefully and it does not appear to me that it would apply to any airports except those under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport. I think the bill will explain this much better than I could hope to do.

Mr. Barnett: Might I ask the minister, is it the intention of the government that this bill be referred to a standing committee for detailed consideration after second reading?

Mr. Pickersgill: There has not been any such thought. I think when hon. members see the bill they will probably have doubts about whether, in view of the number of other committees we have sitting, it would be worth while to do this. However, if there were such a disposition I am sure the Minister of Transport, who is one of the most agreeable members of the house, would be very happy to consider the request.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. McIlraith) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-117, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the committee would like to take the C.O.T.C. bill, which was in committee of the whole. We could probably do that in the next couple of minutes.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CO-ORDINATION WITH OTHER NATIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, November 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-112, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act—Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Composition of board.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Give us a chance to find the bill, otherwise we will not agree to this at all.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps we should hold it for the next sitting in case any hon. member who was not here this evening might wish to say something on third reading.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May we now hear about the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, acting on the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I am not going to ask the house to go on tomorrow with the resolution we were considering this evening. Instead I hope, unless there is any strong objection, that we could start with third reading of this bill to which we have given such careful consideration. Having done that, we would take the second reading and, I hope, all the other stages of the aeronautics bill, and then the bill on the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act. If we make very good progress, there are two or three other bills which could be dealt with. There is No. 5 on today's order paper, regarding an agreement with the province of Ontario respecting public harbours; No. 7 the National Harbours Board Act; and No. 8, the Carriage by Air Act. These items standing in the name of the Minister of Transport might be disposed of. I think that will probably be enough; but if not, there are one or two other items on the order paper. Anyway, I hope the house will be prepared to go on with those items with which the government intends to proceed.

Mr. Churchill: No. 4?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, we could dispose of No. 4.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 4, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GREGOIRE—COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF BILLS C-83 AND C-84

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

On Monday, July 8, 1963, as recorded on page 1968 of Hansard, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) made a commitment to some hon. members, and more particularly the member for Lapointe.

At that time I had asked the Secretary of State the following question on Bills C-83 and C-84: If the committee is ready to sit, and the Secretary of State can assure us that it will and sit before the bill is presented, then we will agree to the bill being read for the first time. The Secretary of State answered:

> I would be quite prepared to give an undertaking that in some fashion or other this matter would be remitted to a committee so that the matters the hon. member wishes to raise could be raised, if that is satisfactory.

I wish to point out that it was to the member for Lapointe that the Secretary of State was speaking, when he said:

> —so that the matters the hon. member wishes to raise could be raised.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) confirmed that promise, as can be seen on the same page of Hansard:

> I would confirm the undertaking given by the house leader that we will have a committee set up suitable to the hon. member where these matters can be discussed.

Further on—and here the matter becomes clearcut—the Secretary of State said as recorded on the same page of Hansard:

> Once these two bills are seen, if there is any demand from any quarter of the house that some of the matters in the bills or other matters related to them could usefully be reviewed by a committee, I will undertake to ask my colleagues to have this done, and I feel sure they would agree with me. In fact, I am quite prepared to commit the government to putting a motion on the order paper for a reference to a suitable standing committee of the house to consider these matters before we proceed with the legislation itself.

Mr. Speaker, I can give further proof of what I am saying by referring to Hansard of October 11, 1963, page 3469, left hand column. The Secretary of State said on that date:

> Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question that I did make a very precise commitment and I intend to carry out that commitment if there is any insistence on the part of any hon. member that I do so. The commitment was to refer a specific matter—

Mr. Speaker, that specific matter was the frontiers of the Northwest Territories, as it will be seen in a moment.

I continue with my quotation:

> The commitment was to refer a specific matter, namely the frontiers, to the consideration of the committee before we proceed with the bill.

Mr. Speaker, those were formal and definite commitments on the part of the Secretary of State and of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. And I think that at one time the Secretary of State mentioned that it was precisely the matter of northern frontiers that was referred to the committee on mines, forests and waters. Indeed, the Secretary of State stated, a little further:

> But if the hon. member or any other hon. member wishes to insist that the matters raised in the debate, that is to say, the question of the frontiers of the territories, should be considered separately first by a committee, I will endeavour to consult with whoever raises objection, the hon. member for Lapointe or anyone else, and try to draft some kind of motion to refer the matter to some suitable committee and bring it forward for debate.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the committee was specifically set up to study that problem. Now, the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) and the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Turner), have violated the commitments—

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I think at this point I should raise a point of order. I have been listening attentively to find out what the hon. gentleman was raising as a question of privilege. It is evident now that he is complaining about something which took place in a committee, complaining that it did or did not do something. If that is his question of privilege, that is a matter for the committee itself.

I will tell him right now that if there is anything which I am supposed to have done or not to have done which concerns that committee or which the committee wishes to question, I shall be quite prepared to go before the committee and be questioned about it. But it is a rule of the house that the time of the house is not taken up with proceedings in a committee until the committee has made a report, and it seems to me it is altogether wrong for any member to attempt, in the guise of raising a question of privilege, to bring before the house a matter which is still before a committee.

An hon. Member: It is not before a committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member wishes to speak, perhaps he would wait until I have finished. I believe it is proper to appeal a decision of the chairman of a committee, just as one can appeal a decision of the chairman of the committee of the whole. There is a procedure for doing that. It is a recognized procedure. But it is not a proper procedure to bring up as a question of privilege in the house anything which happens within a committee, and if we are to make any progress in the house this practice, if seems to me, will have to be curtailed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to complain at all about what happened in the committee, but since the commitments made by the Secretary of State and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources were violated, I move, seconded by Mr. Caouette:

> That this house direct the standing committee on mines, forests and waters to undertake the study of the frontiers of Northwest Territories and neighbouring provinces, in relation to Bills C-83 and C-84, in order to comply with undertakings by the Secretary of State and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to decide whether or not there is a question of privilege here. First of all, if this motion is in the nature of a substantive motion it requires notice, but I do not believe the question is that difficult. It is more in the nature of a grievance. I allowed the hon. member to speak at very considerable length. Although points of privilege should be stated as concisely as possible in order not to waste the time of the house, I allowed him to continue at some length in order to see whether he would move a motion.

I really do not have much trouble in resolving the point at issue. Only a few days ago I suggested to the house and I now say that a committee is bound by the order of reference to it, and that the committee decides within its own confines questions of procedure and points of order. If there was a point of order which the hon. member wanted to raise in the committee he should have done so, and if he was not satisfied with the decision of the Chair at the time he could have appealed to the other members of that committee.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: But in order to help the house and the hon. member I have given some thought to this question, which fortunately I anticipated might arise. May I say that the so-called question of privilege raised today is in effect an appeal to the house from the ruling of the chairman on a proceeding in a standing committee, and I must say I question very seriously the regularity of this procedure at this time.

The first precedent in this regard arose in 1956, when the chairman of the standing committee on banking and commerce reported that his ruling had been appealed in the committee and he submitted the question to the judgment of the house. This is recorded at page 6388 of Hansard of July 24, 1956. Mr. Speaker Beaudoin in part dealt with the question as follows:

> I have to rule now that the appeal from the chairman's ruling should be settled in the committee on banking and commerce and not reported to this house.

This matter is referred to in Beauchesne, fourth edition, page 241, citation 295, which reads in part as follows:

> On July 24, 1956, an appeal was taken to the house from the standing committee on banking and commerce, and the Speaker ruled that the chairman's ruling should be settled in the committee and not reported to the house.

The second precedent in this regard is found on Wednesday, August 6, 1958, page 3141 of Hansard. Following the first precedent Mr. Speaker Michener stated among other things:

> —it must be stated that there is no known precedent wherein the Speaker of the house has acted either as arbitrator or as judge in connection with the regularity of any proceedings in any committee of the house.—I find, therefore, that it would not be practicable for the Speaker, nor would it be competent for him, to review a ruling upon a regularity of a proceeding in a standing committee. This decision, of course, does not interfere with or deprive the house of its jurisdiction over its standing committees and their reports.

On the matter of the jurisdiction of the committee I could follow this up with the following quotation from May's Parliamentary Practice, sixteenth edition, page 655, under the heading, "Reporting of Bills to the House Before Their Consideration Has Been Concluded". I am giving this detail because I think it might be useful to all hon. members.

It is the duty of standing committees, as of all committees, to give the matters referred to them due and sufficient consideration. Accordingly, the chairman of a standing committee will not accept a motion that the committee do not proceed further with the consideration of a bill from a member who is not in charge of the bill, nor will he accept a motion for reporting a bill to the house before its consideration has been completed by the committee, or any other motion which conflicts with the obligations imposed on the committee by the house.

Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, page 520, also says:

Every committee on a public bill is bound to report thereon. The house alone has power to prevent its passage or to order its withdrawal.

Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 506, says:

Every bill referred to the committee must be reported.

And later:

It is the duty of every committee to report to the house the bill that has been committed to them—

In this connection I might refer hon. members to standing order 109.

On the subject of an order of reference, an indication by a minister of the crown that something may be done in the committee is not a part of the order of reference.

On June 19, 1924, Mr. Speaker Lemieux stated, as found in Hansard, page 3389:

Under the rules and customs of British parliaments, standing committees are not administrative bodies and their power is limited by such orders or instructions as may be given the house.

For the reasons I have given I am of the opinion that there is no question of privilege involved, nor is there any point of order which would justify my interference with the proceedings of the committee in question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I appeal against your ruling.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the decision of the Chair, from which the hon. member for Lapointe has appealed. All those in favour of the sustaining the decision of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Division

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

"The question before the house is an appeal from the ruling of the Chair which is as follows. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) having risen on a question of privilege, proposed a motion as follows:

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair decided, in effect, that the motion did not raise a prima facie question of privilege and stated that it appeared the said motion was in effect an appeal to the house from a decision of the chairman of a standing committee, and ruled there was no question of privilege involved nor any point of order which would justify the Chair's interference with the proceedings of the committee in question. Is it the pleasure of the house that the Speaker's decision be sustained?

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Woolliams—106.

[During the taking of the vote, the Second Clerk Assistant having called the name of Mr. Herridge while the names of those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling were being recorded:]

Mr. Herridge: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the Speaker please put the question so we know where we are?

An hon. Member: Call for those opposed.

Mr. Speaker: I had called for those in favour, and if there are no other hon. members in favour I am about to call for those opposed.

And the result of the vote having been announced: Yeas, 106; nays, 106:

Mr. Speaker: Since the decision has not been negatived, I declare my ruling sustained.

[Later:]

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Speaker, I should like an opportunity to declare that I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted to sustain Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege regarding the mines, forests and waters committee. I do so because this is the first time it has come to my attention that the committee is meeting to study the matters which were referred to it.

At page 559 of Votes and Proceedings for November 15 last a motion appears, moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which was carried, stating in effect that my name be substituted for that of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) on that particular committee. So far to date I have received no notification that the committee is meeting. If a motion were to be moved on this matter I think it would be to the effect that the chairman of that committee be instructed to carry out his functions and notify all members of that committee of the times and places of meetings of the committee.

Mr. Gene Rheaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, certain matters were referred by this house, prior to the holding of committee sessions, to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters. When the matters referred to it by this house were brought forward for discussion, the chairman of that committee ruled that those matters could not be considered because they were out of order; that they must be referred back to this house for approval before they could be raised. When the hon. member for Lapointe attempted to carry out the instructions of that committee you, Mr. Speaker, ruled him out of order.

My question of privilege is this. What does a member of the house do when the house refers a matter to such a committee, which matter is then ruled out of order by the chairman on the ground that only this house can instruct the committee, and when we bring it up in this house Your Honour rules us out of order?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member seriously contends that he is raising a question of privilege. He is in effect discussing a matter which was up for discussion before a ruling was made on it. As that matter has now been decided I do not see any point of privilege.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege which the hon. member has just raised, surely it is of concern to this house if a commitment made by the government leader of the house with reference to certain legislation is not honoured. I am not a member of that committee and I do not know whether or not that commitment was honoured, but members on that committee do feel that there has been a breach of faith. I think the government has a responsibility to do something about this question and not hide behind some interpretation of the rules of the house. If the house in good faith accepted a minister's word and sent legislation to a committee for study, surely that committee ought to deal with that legislation in the terms outlined to the house by the minister responsible for making the commitment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I indicated when I interrupted the hon. member for Lapointe nearly an hour ago—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Playing politics.

Mr. Pickersgill: Am I not to be heard after my word is questioned? I indicated, and the house has now sustained the decision, that matters within the committee shall be settled by that committee. I also offered to go before the committee to be questioned on any undertakings which I had given, about the committee, in the proper place. It seems to me that if the house had accepted that undertaking at that time we would have got on with the business of the house today.

I repeat the undertaking. I am most anxious that any undertaking I gave as house leader or in the name of the government shall be carried out, and I will be very happy at any convenient time to appear before the committee to be questioned about the exact nature of my undertaking. I give that to the house as my word. I am not a member of that committee. I had nothing whatever to do with the proceedings which took place in the committee. However, I make the offer to appear before it and give any information I can which will assist the committee in any way in regard to this matter; and I hope that the undertaking I gave in good faith will be kept.

An hon. Member: You had better tell the chairman.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, the Secretary of State is simply stating that he will appear before the committee and answer their questions. The point is that he made a definite commitment, a commitment which is on the record. The chairman of the committee can overrule the Secretary of State when he does make an appearance. Surely this is a case for the Prime Minister to intervene and speak to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Martineau: May I just ask a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have had a point of privilege raised and it has been decided. We have now had further discussion. I think we should get on with the business before the house.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier) presented the fourth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and asked for unanimous consent to move that the report be concurred in.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we do not propose to give unanimous consent to this recommendation, because we feel it is wrong that any committee with 60 members should be able to proceed with a quorum of only 10.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE FORM OF BANK NOTES

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-118, to amend the Bank of Canada Act (form and material of notes).

[Translation]

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, as is indicated in its contents, the object of this bill is to decree that bank-notes must not be incorrect or misleading. Now, the notes issued by the Bank of Canada are certainly incorrect and misleading because they bear the following mention:

Will pay to the bearer on demand.

Such words printed on Bank of Canada notes, which are legal tender, are misleading. Instead of these words:

Will pay to the bearer on demand

I move that the words—

Legal currency

—be printed, because since 1940 our legal currency is no longer guaranteed by gold.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*INVESTIGATION OF UNIDENTIFIED FLYING OBJECTS

Question No. 1,416—Mr. Winch:

1. Is Canada co-operating with the special United States program for investigation of unidentified flying objects and, if so, is this entitled "Project Magnet"?

2. Is "Project Magnet" an unpublicized world-wide operation, using specially equipped, super constellations, non-uniformed pilots and civilian scientists?

3. Was the late Wilbert B. Smith, a government scientist, the head of the Canadian section of the U.F.O. research operation?

4. Is any data available from "Project Magnet" to the general public?

Mr. Dupuis: 1. The R.C.A.F. co-operates with the United States in the investigation of reports of unidentified flying objects as in other matters of mutual interest, but not as part of a special program. The United States program known as "Project Magnet" is not directed to the investigation of unidentified flying objects.

2. "Project Magnet" is a program conducted by the naval oceanographic office of the U.S. navy concerned with the compilation of geomagnetic data covering all the oceans of the world. The data are obtained in survey flights of U.S. navy aircraft carrying civilian scientists. Information concerning this program has been freely available for some years to interested scientists.

3. Between December, 1950 and August, 1954 a small program of investigation in the field of geo-magnetics was carried out by the then telecommunications division of the Department of Transport with a view to obtaining, if possible, some physical information or facts which might help to explain the phenomenon which was generally referred to as unidentified flying objects. Mr. W. B. Smith was the engineer in charge of this program.

4. It is understood that data obtained in "Project Magnet", in the form of geo-magnetic charts, is available upon application to the naval oceanographic office of the U.S. navy.

C.B.C. EXPENDITURES FOR CANADIAN PERFORMERS

Question No. 1,480—Mr. Martineau:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation expanded, in the course of the current fiscal year, the proportion of its budget spent in Canada on Canadian performers?

2. What proportion of its budget is spent for this purpose?

3. Have any measures been taken by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, of the current year, to increase the Canadian content of programs and, if so, what are these measures?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. The corporation does not assign on a proportionate basis a specified amount of its over-all program budget to be spent on Canadian performers. It prefers to allow greater flexibility to meet the variation in program needs and availabilities. Therefore it is not possible to give a categorical yes or no answer to the question. However, it can be said that, as the present winter program schedule gets underway, the indications are for an expansion in the over-all amount paid to Canadian performers.

2. See No. 1.

3. Measures have been taken by increasing the weekly amount of television network programming thereby opening up more opportunities for Canadian performers in C.B.C. produced programs, as well as those produced by other Canadian sources for the C.B.C. television network. It should be noted that the C.B.C. French and English networks carry a considerably higher percentage of Canadian content programs than the 55 per cent required by the B.B.G. For the year ending October 12, 1963, the English t.v. network carried 63 per cent Canadian, 6 per cent commonwealth, 31 per cent foreign and the French t.v. network carried 62 per cent Canadian, 15 per cent commonwealth, and 23 per cent foreign, programming.

FILM BOARD PRODUCTION "FIELDS OF SACRIFICE"

Question No. 1,487—Mr. Matheson:

1. What is the nature and character of the national film board production "Fields of Sacrifice" and, why was it produced?

2. Who were the persons principally responsible for its production and, what were their qualifications?

3. What actual battle scenes are shown and, what areas are revisited in modern technicolour?

4. How can the Canadian public see this film and, when, and how will it be available for distribution to interested groups?

Answer: 1. The national film board production "Fields of Sacrifice" or "Champs d'honneur" is made up of a 40 minute film in English and in French and a 20 minute version in English and in French. It is in colour except for flash-back sequences. It was made in two lengths in order to achieve the widest distribution.

This production was commissioned by the Department of Veterans Affairs to recall the courage and sacrifice of Canadian servicemen during the 1914-18 and 1939-45 wars and to show Canadians, particularly the next of kin of those who died, how the memory of Canada's war dead is honoured and cherished in the countries where they fell. It is also designed to give renewed and vital meaning to the spirit of remembrance to the comrades of the war dead, to their next of kin and to those who were too young to know them at all.

3. Battle scenes: Normandy invasion, Dieppe, Sicily, Ortona, Dutch canals, Ypres, various unidentifiable photographs of world war I action on the western front.

Areas revisited: Normandy beaches, Normandy villages inland including Beny-sur-Mer and Bayeux, Hong Kong, Dieppe, Londonderry, Boxstead airfield, Reichswald forest, Runnymede, Agira, Cassino, Ortona, Bergen-op-Zoom, Groesbeek, Ypres, Mons, Arras, Armentieres, Poperinghe, various cemeteries in western front area including Beaumont Hamel, Quesnel, Bourlon wood, Dury, Sanctuary wood, Passchendaele, Courcelette, St. Julien, Vimy Ridge. Also German cemetery at Langemarck.

4. "Fields of Sacrifice" and "Champs d'honneur" are being distributed theatrically through Columbia Pictures of Canada Limited, and are available to every theatre in Canada. Non-theatrical release will commence July 1, 1964. The films will then be available to any individual or group across Canada through national film board sources, film councils, public libraries, etc.

Questions

*BICULTURALISM COMMISSION—VETERAN MEMBERSHIP

Question No. 1,495—Mr. Herridge:

Has the government received any complaints from any organization or persons with respect to its failure to appoint any veterans with overseas service to the membership of the royal commission on biculturalism and, if so, what were the nature of these representations, and the government's replies?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is no.

*SPRUCEDALE, ONT., POSTMASTER

Question No. 1,511—Mr. Aiken:

1. Has the postmaster been appointed at Sprucedale, Ontario, and, if so, what is his name and address?

2. What other persons applied for this position?

3. From whom were recommendations for this appointment solicited by the Postmaster General?

4. Which of the applicants had service in the armed forces?

Mr. McWilliam: 1. Yes, Mr. William H. Kirkpatrick, Sprucedale, Ontario.

2. Miss Rose Jennie Plupek, Mr. William Ewart Pearce, Mr. Robert Soper, Mr. Henry Leon Deschamps.

3. District director of postal service, North Bay, and Gerald M. Taylor.

4. Henry Leon Deschamps served overseas but he is a resident of Jarlsberg, therefore not eligible for appointment. Robert Soper served in Canada only, therefore not entitled to the veterans' preference.

CIVIL SERVICE COMPETITION 63-588

Question No. 1,557—Mr. Prittie:

1. Who is the winner of civil service competition No. 63-588?

2. Has he taken on any other tasks as yet?

3. What has been his experience in the field of public health?

4. Did he graduate or take any training at a public health course?

5. What is his age, place of birth, school, and year of graduation from professional school?

6. Is he a veteran?

7. How many other persons applied in this competition and qualified for it?

8. How many of the qualified applicants were veterans?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been given the following answers by the civil service commission:

1. The first ranking candidate in civil service competition 63-588 is Dr. Ralph Aubrey Connor.

2. Dr. Ralph Aubrey Connor has been appointed to, and is performing the duties of the position of chief of dental health division, Department of National Health and Welfare.

3. The experience of Dr. R. A. Connor in the field of public health, and as related to the duties of the position which he now occupies include:

Questions

(a) December 1946 to July 1948, dental officer with the department of health, Guelph, Ontario, (b) June 1949 to August 1956, director dental public health, Lincoln county, (c) November 1956 to October 1958, regional director, Lincoln, Wentworth and Brant county health units, (d) November 1958 to October 1963, director, dental services, province of Manitoba, (e) Dr. Connor has been a part time lecturer in public health dentistry at the University of Manitoba.

4. Dr. R. A. Connor received his diploma in dental public health from the University of Toronto in 1949.

5. Dr. Connor is 56 years old, was born in Thornbury, Ontario; attended the University of Toronto and graduated with doctor of dental surgery in 1933, doctor in dental public health in 1949.

6. Dr. Connor is entitled to the veterans preference under the terms of the Civil Service Act.

7. Of the 28 persons who applied in this competition only one other person qualified in it.

8. Only one of the qualified applicants is entitled to the veterans preference provided for in the Civil Service Act.

AIR MAIL SERVICE, QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS

Question No. 1,560—Mr. Howard:

With respect to the 14 complaints received regarding mail that was marked or posted for "Air Mail" to the Queen Charlotte islands but which reached its destination by boat mail what was, in each case (a) the name and address of the complainant (b) the date the complaint was made (c) the reason for the error, and (d) the remedial action taken?

Mr. Denis: Detailed information regarding complaints received prior to November 1, 1962, is not available. Files on cases where investigation is completed are kept for a period of one year only.

It was initially reported that 14 complaints were received. Subsequent inquiries established that 12 complaints were submitted. Six complaints have been received since November 1, 1962.

1. (a) Mrs. E. J. Arnold, 2066 West 3rd Avenue, Vancouver 9, B.C.; (b) November 6, 1962; (c) uncertainty as to whether a flight would operate, therefore the item was despatched by steamer; (d) no action taken.

2. (a) Mrs. G. Cotter, Department of Transport, Sandspit, B.C.; (b) November 29, 1962; (c) human error; (d) personnel instructed to exercise greater care.

3. (a) M. Lacusta, Box 37, Queen Charlotte, B.C.; (b) January 21, 1963; (c) human error; (d) personnel instructed to exercise greater care.

4. (a) Masset Auto Marine, Masset, B.C.; (b) March 1, 1963; (c) human error; (d) personnel instructed to exercise greater care.

5. (a) MacMillan, Bloedel and Powell River Limited, Sandspit, B.C.; (b) September 13, 1963; (c) human error; (d) personnel instructed to exercise greater care.

6. (a) Mrs. D. O. Johnson, Juskatla via Sandspit, B.C.; (b) October 17, 1963; (c) investigation not yet completed; (d) investigation not yet completed.

*PUBLICITY EXPENDITURES OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

Question No. 1,588—Mr. Knowles:

1. Are there any regulations concerning expenditures by life insurance companies on advertising or on promotional campaigns of various kinds and, if so, what are such regulations?

2. Are the expenditures by life insurance companies on campaigns in opposition to the proposed Canada pension plan considered legitimate advertising expenditures and, if so, by what authority?

3. Are the expenditures by life insurance companies on campaigns in opposition to the proposed Canada pension plan allowed as deductible for corporation income tax purposes and, if so, what is the estimated amount of the cost to the public treasury during the current year?

Mr. Benson: 1. No.

2. There is no legislation in Canada controlling the amount insurance companies may spend on advertising.

3. Expenses of a life insurance company are charged to the insurance funds. Taxable income is determined mainly by amounts transferred from these funds to the shareholders fund, the amounts so transferred being at the discretion of the directors within the limitations prescribed by the insurance acts, and subject to the maintenance of reserves and surplus margins necessary for the protection of policyholders. It is impossible to determine whether the amounts that may be so transferred would be affected by expenses that may have been incurred of the type described. In this connection I refer the hon. member to section 30 of the Income Tax Act.

*IMMIGRATION OFFICES, FRANCE AND ENGLAND

Question No. 1,614—Mr. Pigeon:

1. Does the government maintain immigration offices in France and, if so (a) what is the annual cost of these offices (b) how many persons are attached to these offices (c) what is the total of their salaries?

2. (a) How many immigration offices does the government maintain in England (b) what is the annual cost of these offices (c) how many persons are attached to these offices (d) what is the total of their salaries?

[Translation]

Mr. Munro: 1. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration maintains one office in France and this is located in Paris. There are plans at the moment for the opening of two new immigration offices at Lyon and Bordeaux, contingent upon satisfactory arrangements being worked out with the appropriate authorities; (a) $182,079 for fiscal year 1962-63; (b) 27; (c) $100,512 per annum.

2. (a) The government maintains four offices in England and these are located in Bristol, Leeds, Liverpool and London; (b) $480,731 for fiscal year 1962-63; (c) 77; (d) $286,274 per annum.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMISSION ON PATENTS, ETC.

Question No. 1,645—Mr. Brewin:

1. Have any of the recommendations of the report on industrial designs of the royal commission on patents, copyright, trademarks and industrial designs, dated the 1st day of June, 1958, been carried out and, if so, which recommendations?

2. Does the government intend to implement any of the recommendations of the said report which have not yet been implemented?

3. Does the government propose to bring in legislation amending or replacing the Industrial Design and Union Label Act, c.150, R.S.C. 1952, which is substantially the same as that passed in 1861?

Mr. Pickersgill: 1. No.

2 and 3. This is a question of government policy which it is not usual to announce in response to questions on the order paper.

*CHANGES IN SECURITY PROCEDURES

Question No. 1,656—Mr. Knowles:

1. Do the changes in procedures with respect to security, announced by the Prime Minister on October 25, 1963, apply to Canadians generally as well as to government employees and service personnel and, if so, in what way do the new procedures apply to Canadians generally?

2. Have any corresponding changes been made with respect to security investigations on university campuses and, if so (a) what are the details of such changes (b) what courses are open to students or professors who are investigated (c) have university organizations (student or teacher) been advised of any new procedures applicable to university campuses?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, it will take several minutes to read this answer into the record. I would therefore ask permission of the house to table the answer and have it printed in Hansard today.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to above is as follows:]

1. and 2(a). The procedures announced on October 25 were designed to apply to employees of the Canadian government. They may also be intended, with modification if necessary, to apply to persons involved in federal government contracts which have a security aspect. They are designed solely for a situation in which a person, by reason of employment or contract, may have access to classified information. They cannot therefore, have application to Canadians generally, whether within a university or not, since the problem of access to classified information does not arise.

2. (b) Students or professors are not investigated. If they are applicants for employment in the public service in positions in which access to classified information is involved, security screening is the same as for any other applicant. A student or a professor could conceivably become involved in an investigation into a case of possible subversion or espionage. The ordinary processes and provisions of the law would apply if prosecution developed in any such case.

2. (c) The Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the commissioner of the R.C.M.P., have met representatives of the C.A.U.T. and the N.F.C.U.S. in recent months to discuss the problem of ensuring that the responsibilities of the R.C.M.P. with regard to security do not conflict with freedom of thought and discussion on university campuses. Both the government and the R.C.M.P. as the responsible agency are fully alive to the importance of ensuring that no such conflict arises and renewed care is being taken to provide against it. Both the C.A.U.T. and N.F.C.U.S. have been advised that there is not now and will not be any general surveillance of university campuses.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES, COMPTON-FRONTENAC CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,677—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What is the name and salary of each employee of the Post Office Department in each of the towns and villages located within the constituency of Compton-Frontenac?

2. How many employees of the Post Office Department in Compton-Frontenac have been dismissed during the past two years and what was the reason in each case?

3. How many promotions, transfers and salary increases were granted to employees of the Post Office Department in Compton-Frontenac during the past two years?

4. How many persons are under contract for rural mail delivery in Compton-Frontenac and what is the name, salary and length of contract of each?

5. During the past two years, what changes were made with regard to the people delivering the mail?

6. What expenditures did the Post Office Department incur in Compton-Frontenac during each of the past five years?

7. How many requests for route changes in the constituency has the department received during the past three years and (a) what is the location of each (b) what were the reasons given (c) how many requests were granted (d) how many were refused (e) by how much did the expenses increase in each case?

[Translation]

Mr. Denis: This information is not readily available. Its compilation would necessitate a review of a great number of records and require undue labour and expense.

RADIO AND TELEVISION SERVICE, WABUSH, NFLD.

Question No. 1,694—Mr. Fisher:

1. What Canadian radio or television broadcasting is available to residents of Wabush, Newfoundland?

2. Has either the Department of Transport or the B.B.G. entertained any applications for licenses from individuals or organizations seeking to establish such facilities in Wabush and, if so, what are the details, and what has followed from such applications?

Mr. McIlraith: 1. Wabush, Newfoundland, is outside of what is considered to be the normal service area of any Canadian sound or television broadcasting station.

2. See reply to part 1 of question No. 1,695 which was answered on November 27 (page 5154 Hansard). The application is now being dealt with by the Department of Transport for reference to the board of broadcast governors.

C.B.C. PROGRAMS RESPECTING "RENEGADE IN POWER"

Question No. 1,713—Mr. Gundlock:

1. How many interviews, reviews and panel shows have the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation organized in which the program material relates to Peter Newman's book "Renegade in Power", on (a) television stations (b) television networks (c) radio stations (d) radio networks?

2. With respect to each category of program, how much in fees has been paid or is owing to (a) Peter Newman (b) other participants?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. (a) five; (b) three; (c) five; (d) one, as detailed below:

City of origin	T.V. station	T.V. Network	Radio station	Radio Network
Montreal	–	1	1	–
Ottawa	2	2	1	–
Toronto	–	–	2	1
Winnipeg	1	–	1	–
Vancouver	2	–	–	–
	5	3	5	1

2. It has not been customary to require the corporation to give information as it could affect the corporation in the competitive business in which it is engaged.

HOUSING CONDITIONS OF ESKIMOS

Question No. 1,714—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Have surveys been made of housing conditions available to the Eskimos of Canada's north and, if so, what percentage of the Eskimos are living in houses considered to be substandard and detrimental to the health of the occupants?

[Mr. Latulippe.]

2. Has any federal government department made plans for an aggressive program of building new housing accommodation for Eskimos designed to check the serious health hazards caused by inadequate housing?

Mr. Laing: 1. Yes. As of March 31, 1963, it is estimated that about 2,000 Eskimo families were in need of better housing. The total Eskimo population is estimated at 12,000.

2. Yes, (a) through departmental initiative, since 1959, some 400 houses have been sold to Eskimos, and some 300 provided to other Eskimo families who are unable to pay for such houses; (b) a continuing program to improve designs and techniques of construction has cut costs and provided Eskimos with better houses for less money; (c) water and sewer services have been improved as part of a continuing program to provide adequate sanitary facilities.

HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANTS—REPRESENTATIONS OF SCARBOROUGH TOWNSHIP

Question No. 1,718—Mr. Scott:

1. Did the Prime Minister receive a letter, dated November 2, 1963, from the clerk of the township of Scarborough requesting the Prime Minister's help in arranging an appointment with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to discuss the matter of hospital construction grants?

2. Has the said meeting been arranged and, if so, when will it take place?

3. If the meeting has already taken place, what was the nature of the government's response to the representations of the representatives of the township of Scarborough?

Mr. Pearson: 1. Yes.

2. Yes, December 18, 1963.

3. Not applicable.

EXPORT CREDIT INSURANCE

Question No. 1,719—Mr. Scott:

1. Is the government presently reviewing its export finance and insurance machinery and, if so, along what lines is the review being conducted?

2. Have there been requests that the provisions of the export credits insurance corporation be applied to transactions under $2,000,000 and, if so (a) how many such requests have there been (b) what products were covered (c) who made the requests, and (d) what was the nature of the government's replies?

3. What amount of export insurance was handled by private insurance companies in 1960, 1961, 1962 and 1963 to date, and what ratio does this bear to export insurance handled by the export credits insurance corporation?

4. Has the government given consideration to providing export credit insurance to exports to the U.S.A. and, if so, what was the nature of such considerations?

Answer: 1. Export Credits Insurance Corporation continually reviews its export finance and insurance machinery. This is also reviewed by interdepartmental committees and ministers are kept informed of any changes which might be required.

Questions

2. (i) Insurance. (a) Requests are received daily and policies issued daily. See list below of policies in force at September 30, 1962, classified by annual export volume.

Export volume grouping	No. of Policies current	Amount
Up to $ 25,000	90	$ 1,472,369
$ 25,001 to $ 100,000	198	$ 12,001,408

(b) See list below for products covered. Agricultural, vegetable products, animal and animal products, fibres, textiles and products, wood, wood products and paper, iron and products, non-ferrous metals and products, non-metallic minerals and products, chemicals and allied products, miscellaneous commodities; (c) This is confidential between E.C.I.C. and the exporter; (d) Answered by (a).

(ii) Financing. (a) approximately 12 requests for financing of amounts under $2 million over the past three years; (b) the products involved were communications equipment, transmission line equipment, small boats and vessels, pulp and paper machinery, road maintenance machinery, railway track maintenance equipment; (c) confidential information; (d) requests turned down because applications did not meet criteria for financing.

3. Export Credits Insurance Corporation insures both the political and credit risks on sales to all countries. Private insurance companies insure only the credit risk on sales in Canada and the U.S. and not overseas. The volume of such sales is not available.

4. The corporation has insured sales to the U.S. where insurance was not available from private insurance companies and the buyers met the normal criteria of credit worthiness.

MERCY FLIGHTS FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 1,723—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has the R.C.A.F. discontinued mercy flights for seriously ill Prince Edward Island patients requiring hospitalization on the mainland?
2. If so, what reasons prompted such a decision?
3. Did the Department of National Defence approach a private air line company to take over such a service?
4. Is such a company now operating such a service?
5. Is it based in Prince Edward Island?

Answer: 1. No. As in the past, R.C.A.F. mercy flights have been authorized in accordance with normal policy, namely that flights necessary to save life are carried out when no suitable alternate means of transportation is readily available.

2. Not applicable.

3. No.

4. Atlantic Central Airlines has one aircraft suitable for mercy flights and this company so informed the provinces in March 1963. The provinces, in so far as is known, although aware of R.C.A.F. policy, did not use this air line but continued to refer all cases to R.C.A.F. Since October 1963 when maritime air command headquarters became aware of this air lines' capability, provincial authorities have been requested to investigate use of air lines aircraft prior to requesting R.C.A.F. airlift.

5. No. The air line is based at Moncton, N.B. This location is closer to P.E.I. than Greenwood, where R.C.A.F. aircraft, which are used on mercy flights, are based.

COMMON CARRIER PIPE LINES

Question No. 1,727—Mr. Scott:

1. Is the government conducting any research into the possibilities of developing common-carrier pipe lines which would provide an economic means of moving products over great distances and, if so (a) what is the nature and extent of such research (b) how much is being spent upon it, and (c) what is the nature and extent of the studies being made?
2. To what extent and, in what way, are such projects co-ordinated with provincial research programs in this field?

Answer: 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

FRASERVIEW HOUSING PROJECT, B.C.

Question No. 1,728—Mr. Scott:

1. Has the government received representations from the Fraserview (veterans) home owners and tenants association of British Columbia concerning their dispute with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with reference to rental increases and terms upon which they are entitled to buy their home?
2. What reply has been given to the association?
3. Have the rents in the project been raised, by what amount, and for what reason?
4. What are the terms of sale being offered to tenants of these houses?
5. What was the original cost of the project, how was it financed, and at what rate of interest?
6. What is the total amount of rents received since the project was commenced?
7. Have the rents covered depreciation and other costs, and what is the present undepreciated figure on the corporation's books?

Answer: 1. Yes.

2. The association has been advised that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been requested to retain the services of an independent accredited appraiser to appraise each type of house in the Fraserview project in order to ensure that the sale prices and rental rates established by the corporation do not exceed their fair market values.

3. Proposed rental adjustments have been deferred pending the report of the appraiser referred to in 2, above.

Questions

4. The terms of sale are 5 per cent down payment with the corporation taking back a mortgage amortized over 25 years at the current N.H.A. interest rate.

5. The original cost of the project was $11,340,452. It was financed under section 37 of the National Housing Act, at a borrowing rate of 2 per cent per annum amortized over a 40 year period.

6. It is not possible to provide the information requested in this part because the accounting has been on an over-all branch basis and not on a project basis, nor is it possible to recreate the accounting on a project basis because records have been destroyed from time to time in accordance with the policy relating to such matters.

7. The present rents are insufficient to cover depreciation and other costs. As at December 31, 1962, the undepreciated capital cost of the unsold houses was $7,349,320.

MAIL CONTRACT, SALT SPRINGS, N.S.

Question No. 1,741—Mr. MacEwan:

Have tenders been called for a mail contract for R.R. 3, Salt Springs, Pictou county, N.S., and, if so, (a) what were the names of the various tenderers and the amounts of their tenders; (b) to whom will the contract be awarded?

Mr. Denis: Yes. (a) George Martin MacDonald, $2,100; C. E. Wilson, $2,180; John A. MacLeod, $2,236; Austin N. Roblee, $2,340. (b) Decision pending.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS IN BOTH LANGUAGES

Question No. 1,746—Mr. Boutin:

1. Are the questions asked applicants in examinations held by the civil service commission, in both languages?

2. Can the candidate write his examination in whatever language he wishes and, if not, why is one language compulsory rather than the other?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been given the following answer by the civil service commission:

1. Yes.

2. Except for language examinations, candidates may write any examination in either English or French.

[Mr. Scott.]

MAIL CONTRACT, ST. ZACHARIE DE DORCHESTER, QUE.

SALES ABROAD BY CHEMICAL COMPANIES

Question No. 1,757—Mr. Scott:

1. Has the government's attention been drawn to the loss of export business suffered by Canadian subsidiaries of United States chemical companies as alleged in recent newspaper reports on the grounds that the Canadian subsidiaries are not permitted to sell products abroad?

2. If so, has the government any knowledge of how widespread are such restrictions and what action is the government taking to deal with the matter?

Answer: 1. The reports referred to have been drawn to attention.

2. The Canadian chemical industry exports material worth approximately $250 million per year or an average of 16 per cent of production. More than half of this total is attributed to subsidiaries of foreign firms.

The government encourages subsidiaries of foreign companies to export from Canada. Many of these subsidiaries participate in the department's trade fairs and trade missions programs. Market studies have been conducted on their behalf and trade opportunities have been discovered for them. Their response to this assistance has resulted in expansion of exports.

ESKIMO CO-OPERATIVES

Question No. 1,758—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many people are there working in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the promotion of co-operatives among Eskimos and what areas do they cover?

2. How many Eskimo co-operatives have been organized and what is the location of each?

3. How much business do these co-operatives do according to the reports received by the department?

4. What plans do the department have for increasing the staff working on the promotion of Eskimo co-operatives?

Mr. Laing: 1. There are at present four people engaged in the promotion of co-operatives among Eskimos. Two additional positions are vacant at this time, one of which will be filled in early December, 1963; the other as soon as a suitable candidate can be found. The co-operative development offices cover the Northwest Territories and Arctic Quebec.

2. The following 18 Eskimo co-operative organizations have been established with the help of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources:

3. Because of the different closing dates of the fiscal years for the various co-operatives, it is not posible to give definite turnover figures for any given year. It is estimated that during the fiscal year 1961-62, sales of nine co-operatives in existence at that time amounted to $360,000.

Business turnover for 1962-63 is estimated at $750,000. More definite figures are not available.

4. The department proposes to seek authority to employ one additional co-operative development officer in 1964-65.

ESKIMO LOAN FUND

Question No. 1,760—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How much money is there in the Eskimo loan fund?

2. How much money has been loaned to Eskimo communities from this fund to help them establish co-operatives?

3. How many loans have been made and for what periods of time?

4. At what rates were these loans made?

5. How much of the money loaned has been repaid?

Mr. Laing: 1. $475,000.

2. $274,000.

3. 122. A maximum period of five years for individuals and ten years for co-operatives.

4. Five per cent per annum.

5. $60,253.

FEDERAL TAXES ON MINING PROPERTIES

Question No. 1,765—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Does the federal government levy taxes on mining properties and, if so, what is the nature and basis of such taxes?
2. Does the government obtain any other revenue from mining properties and, if so, what was the total of such revenue over the last five years for (a) Canada (b) province of Quebec (c) constituency of Compton-Frontenac?
3. By what procedure does a mining operation register with the federal government?

Mr. Benidickson: 1. The federal government levies production royalties in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory in an amount ranging from 3 per cent to 12 per cent depending on the value of production and the type of mineral. It also levies an income tax on mining operations.

2. The government obtains revenue in the form of rentals on claims or leases in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. These rentals vary from 25 cents an acre in the N.W.T. to $200 per claim in the Yukon Territory.

3. Mining operations in the Northwest Territories are registered with the federal government in accordance with the provisions of the Canada mining regulations, Territorial Lands Act and Public Lands Grants Act. In the Yukon Territory the governing legislation is the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

MINING PROPERTIES IN COMPTON-FRONTENAC CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,766—Mr. Latulippe:

Has the government a list of all mining properties located in the constituency of Compton-Frontenac and, if so (a) what is the location of each (b) what is the date of opening of each?

Mr. Benidickson: The record of all mining companies operating in Quebec is maintained by the Quebec department of natural resources.

EARNINGS OF MANUFACTURING CORPORATIONS

Question No. 1,772—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What are the earnings of manufacturing corporations for the last three years, after taxes, at annual rate, seasonally adjusted?
2. What are the earnings on each dollar of sales, or profits, after taxes, per dollar of sales, seasonally adjusted?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Answer: 1. The earnings of manufacturing corporations for the last three years, after taxes, at annual rate, seasonally adjusted, are not available.

However, annual profits after taxes of manufacturing corporations for the last three years are estimated as follows: 1960, $768 million; 1961, $776 million; 1962, $930 million.

2. The earnings on each dollar of sales, or profits, after taxes, per dollar of sales, seasonally adjusted, are not available.

However, annual profits after taxes per dollar of revenue, (i.e. sales plus investment income), of manufacturing corporations for the last three years are estimated as follows: 1960, 3.1 cents; 1961, 3.0 cents; 1962, 3.3 cents.

DEPRECIATION ON SEVEN PASSENGER AUTOMOBILES

Question No. 1,775—Mr. Irvine:

Is the government giving consideration to permitting depreciation allowance on seven passenger automobiles, all of which would be over the $5,000 class, in order to assist funeral directing firms?

Mr. Benson: This is a matter of government policy. If the government were to consider a change in the regulations concerning passenger automobiles it would be made known at the appropriate time.

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES IN GOVERNMENT, MANUFACTURING, ETC.

Question No. 1,791—Mr. Latulippe:

What was for the past year, the increase or the decrease in the number of workers in relation to the total number of employees in (a) the government (b) manufacturing (c) insurance (d) finance (e) the building trades (f) transportation (g) mining (h) agriculture?

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: The increase or the decrease from 1962 to 1963 in the average quarterly number (July-September) of employees in the following trades has been: (a) government, +1.8%; (b) manufacturing, +2.7%; (c) and (d) finance, insurance and real estate, −0.4%; (e) building trades, +4.4%; (f) transportation, communications and storage, +0.2% (g) mining, −2.4%; (h) agriculture, −1.1%.

2. Has there been a change of postmaster or postmistress at any of the foregoing postal stations since April 8, 1963, and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what is the name of each postmaster or postmistress in the case of each such change?

3. What contracts for the carriage of mail by air, ground or any other means of transportation are held by any person, firm or corporation within or without the Yukon for mails carried into, out of, or within the Yukon?

4. In the case of each such contract (a) what is the amount (b) what is the name of the holder (c) has there been any change in the terms or provisions thereof or the parties thereto, since April 8, 1963 (d) what is the expiry date?

5. Is it the policy of the Post Office Department to continue calling for public tenders for any and/or all contracts for the carriage of mail into, out of, or within the Yukon, as the policy has been in the six years prior to April 8, 1963?

6. Has the Postmaster General or any official or employee of the Post Office Department had any correspondence with Mr. N. V. K. Wylie, Harry Johannes, Dave Howard, or any other person in the Yukon not in the employment of the government and, if so, what has been the nature of such correspondence?

Return tabled.

YUKON TERRITORY—COMMERCIAL FISHING

Question No. 1,573—Mr. Nielsen:

1. With respect to the operation of the Department of Fisheries in the Yukon Territory, to what extent has commercial fishing been carried out in the Yukon since the establishment of the policy allowing commercial fishing in the lakes of the Yukon?

2. Does the government contemplate extending its commercial fishing policy in the Yukon so as to allow fishing to a greater extent in a larger number of lakes than heretofore?

3. What lakes were fished commercially in the Yukon during the years 1962 and 1963, and what number and type of fish were caught in each lake?

4. Were any fish exported for sale outside the Yukon in the years 1962 and 1963 and, if so, what number and type of fish were so exported?

5. Has the government been co-ordinating between the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration a(Indian affairs branch) to establish Yukon fisheries for the Yukon Indian people and, if so, what are the details of any plans existent or contemplated for the establishment of such fisheries?

6. What fisheries personnel are now established in the Yukon, and what are the respective salaries?

7. When was the last raise in pay provided to these personnel, and if no such raise has been provided, for what reason?

Return tabled.

Motions for Papers

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH EXECUTIVE OF YUKON LIBERAL ASSOCIATION

Motion No. 152—Mr. Nielsen:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, documents and other papers exchanged between the Postmaster General or any of the officials or employees of the Post Office Department, and Mr. N. V. K. Wylie, Mr. H. Johannes, or Mr. Dave Howard, all of the city of Whitehorse, in the Yukon Territory, or with any other member of the executive of the Yukon Liberal association.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the adoption of this motion and to the tabling of all official correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is agreed to, subject to the reservation of the minister.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear any reservation expressed by the minister. He said that the correspondence would be tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion agreed to without reservation?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hellyer: With reservation.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Postmaster General indicate whether it is with reservation or without reservation?

Mr. Denis: I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. Nielsen: I understood the minister to say the correspondence called for in the motion would be tabled.

An hon. Member: Show a little more "Enterprise".

Mr. Denis: All official correspondence shall be tabled.

Mr. Nielsen: I wonder if the Postmaster General will explain what he means by "official".

Some hon. Members: No.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN ARSENALS LTD., LINDSAY—SALE OF PROPERTY AND EQUIPMENT

Motion No. 157—Mr. Brewin:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, communications, agreements, tenders and other documents and replies originated or received by the government of Canada or any of its departments regarding the sale of any property of Canadian Arsenals Limited at Lindsay to the Hercules Sales Limited of Toronto, through or by crown assets corporation, or in relation to the sale of any surplus equipment, or relating to the resale by Hercules Sales Limited of any of the said property or assets or its subsequent use.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I might intervene to say that I am withdrawing this motion.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

BATTELLE INSTITUTE REPORT TO ALASKA COMMISSION

Motion No. 160—Mr. Nielsen:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of a general assessment of the Battelle institute report to the Alaska international rail and highway commission and of the latter's recommendations to the United States congress, prepared by the economic division of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, May 26, 1961.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, somewhat unusually this motion relates to a document prepared under the previous dispensation. If the motion were accepted it would make public a series of internal, confidential reports made by officers for the guidance of the minister. Such papers, as my hon. friend knows, have always been considered privileged by the house, and I think he has some knowledge of the consequences that would flow from changing that general rule. So I would ask him whether on reflection he would agree to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly prepared to have the motion stand until I can discuss the minister's request with him. I have a particular reason for wishing the document to be tabled so I can have access to the information, but I certainly would not want to prejudice any negotiations which may be going on or which may be contemplated. Perhaps the motion could stand until I have had the opportunity to have a word with the minister.

Mr. Laing: There is no objection to that.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

ECONOMIC REPORT ON HAINES ROAD

Motion No. 161—Mr. Nielsen:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of an economic report on the road from Haines, Alaska, to Haines Junction, Yukon Territory, prepared by the economic division in 1961.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I request that this motion stand until the minister makes his statement, which I understand he will be doing on orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

[Mr. Brewin.]

CORRESPONDENCE WITH WORLD FAIR CORPORATION

Motion No. 162—Mr. Valade:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the government, any parliamentary secretary or executive assistant to any minister of the crown, including the Prime Minister's office, and any member, full time employee or subcontractor of the world fair corporation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit this motion to stand today. I should like to have a word with him about it.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, it depends on how the work of the house progresses, because I should like to get this information before Christmas or before the world fair is already operating. I should like to know from the leader of the house when he expects to have this conversation with me, because on the basis of his answer I may accept or refuse. It depends on the answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will be glad to do so at any time I am not busy before one of the standing committees.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING MAIL TRANSPORTATION CONTRACTS

Motion No. 163—Mr. Valade:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the office of the Postmaster General and any employee of the department concerning the awarding of contracts for the transportation of rural or city mail, other than those awarded by public tenders.

[Translation]

He said: Mr. Speaker, following a consultation with the Postmaster General (Mr. Denis), I am willing to withdraw this motion, if the house agrees.

Motion withdrawn.

CLOSING OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION OFFICE, KITIMAT, B.C.

Motion No. 171—Mr. Howard:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government or any agency or branch thereof and any other organization, person or government since April 8, 1963 dealing with the proposed closing of the unemployment insurance commission office at Kitimat, B.C.

Motion agreed to.

LOCATION OF HEAVY WATER PLANT

Motion No. 173—Mr. Douglas:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence between any department of the federal government or any of its agencies and any other person or persons regarding the location of the proposed heavy water plant.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, this is subject to the usual reservation that correspondence, if any, between governments be tabled subject to the approval of the provincial governments concerned.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is agreed to, subject to the reservation of the minister.

Motion agreed to.

REQUEST TO RUSSIA FOR RELEASE OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING HALIBUT FISHERY

Motion No. 175—Mr. Howard:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the governments of Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics relating to the making public of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the two said governments regarding the halibut (Hippoglossus stenolepis) fishery.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the desired effect has been attained and I should like to withdraw this motion.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH LEGION ON CANADIAN FLAG

Motion No. 176—Mr. Ormiston:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Royal Canadian Legion on the subject of a Canadian flag since April 22, 1963.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTER, JACQUET RIVER, N.B.

Motion No. 177—Mr. MacRae:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, documents and other papers, including memos or records of telephone conversations between the Postmaster General or any of the officials or employees of the Post Office Department and Mr. Douglas Pettigrew, M.C., Jacquet River, N.B., Mr. Raymond Doucet, M.L.A., Durham Centre, N.B., and others in connection with the appointment of a postmaster at Jacquet River, N.B.

Mr. Denis: I have no objection to the adoption of this motion and to the tabling of all official correspondence.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BRIDGES

THREE RIVERS, QUE.—POSSIBLE REVOCATION OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Could he tell us, once and for all, whether the Three Rivers bridge corporation has received the necessary authorization to undertake the construction of the said bridge?

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I do not know whether the hon. member for Three Rivers wants me to give a legal opinion, but I may say that it is a body incorporated under a provincial statute, and I presume it has the necessary statutory authority.

Mr. Balcer: I just want the facts. I should like the minister to tell us, once and for all, if the present government is going to defer approval that was already given by the previous government for the construction of this long awaited bridge.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I should explain to the house that an order in council was passed by the previous government under date of March 4, 1963, the validity of which I have seen fit to call into question because of its contents and form. This matter has not yet been settled. The reason the matter got any notice at all when the order in council was discovered was that the work proposed would involve interfering with the flow of the St. Lawrence river in the spring of the year in a way that it would be very expensive to remedy, and would involve possibly severe interruption in the use of the river.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister is aware that the order in council in question was adopted following a complete survey of the whole question, and that there was an undertaking from the federal government to construct certain works in the river. Following the passage of this order in council the bridge corporation decided to go ahead with construction, and they are going to let the contract within a few weeks for the construction of this $35 million bridge.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not aware of the assertions contained in the hon. member's statement. There was some lack of completeness in the information in the files, so much so that I asked the hon. member if he would consider making available his files on the subject so I could get more information than was in the files I had available. I should point out that I could find no commitment of the former government to expend $60 million for the remedial work.

Mr. Balcer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, there was no question of the federal government spending $60 million at that time. The information from all the experts in the Departments of Transport and Public Works was to the effect that these works would cost $6 million.

[Later:]

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this question period, but in view of an answer given by the Minister of Transport to my colleague the member for Three Rivers I think I should ask him what the implications were in his statement that he was questioning the validity of an order in council. I can understand that an order in council, once it has been signed by His Excellency and promulgated, can be modified or repealed, but what right has a minister to question it? It can only be referred to the courts. I think this matter should be clarified this afternoon; it is on the record, and I think it should be straightened out.

Mr. McIlraith: It is concerned, Mr. Speaker, with what the order in council means. It has to do with the identity of plans. The language of the order in council refers to plans; there are a whole series of plans.

Mr. Nowlan: That may be a question of fact, Mr. Speaker, as to all of the factors involved in the order in council; but I suggest that does not go to its validity. I am questioning the right of any minister to question the validity of an order in council once it has been signed by His Excellency and duly promulgated. I would ask the minister whether he does not agree that the courts are the only place in which the validity of an order in council can be questioned.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the whole question up for consideration now.

Some hon. Members: Where?

Mr. Nowlan: Is that consideration in the minister's office or is it under consideration in the courts?

Mr. McIlraith: It is under consideration at this point in the minister's office.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I have been trying to ask the finance minister for the last half hour, but in order to speed up proceedings and get a reply I think I will write him a letter.

TRADE

EFFECT ON CANADIAN INDUSTRY OF U.S. TARIFF RECLASSIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him if he would comment briefly on the newspaper and other reports which have been appearing with respect to the effect upon our exports to the United States of the United States tariff reclassification act, which came into effect on August 31, and particularly with regard to reports that the government's policy concerning the export of automobile parts has been curtailed because, instead of being classified as parts having a duty of 8½ per cent, they have been classified as materials going into the machinery of production carrying a tariff of 18½ per cent.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member will probably recall from my statement in the house on November 12 that uncertainties created for all Canadian exporters as a result of the recent introduction of a complete revision of the United States tariff nomenclature were under discussion with the United States. These discussions are continuing. It will be recalled that the question relates to whether certain items shipped to the United States should be classified under the new United States tariff language as parts or as manufactures of the metals or other materials from which they are made. Auto parts are definitely involved and could if preliminary classifications are upheld, be subject in certain cases to rate increases such as the hon. member has mentioned.

However, the United States bureau of customs has not ruled on these classification questions. In the meantime we are in constant touch with the United States government and will of course insist that Canadian interests be safeguarded.

WHEAT—FINDING OF GLASS IN SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Transport regarding the investigation into the glass found in wheat shipments to the Soviet union. I should like to ask two questions. First, were any foreign bodies other than glass found in these wheat shipments? Second, I would like to ask either minister whether it is correct that these foreign objects, particularly glass, have been more common in shipments passing through ports coming under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board than in shipments which have been passing through ports coming under the supervision of the board of grain commissioners?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I answer the first part and then refer the hon. member to my colleague the Minister of Transport. Of course from time to time small quantities of foreign objects are found in grain, and it is impossible to avoid all contamination of this kind. On the particular question of glass found in some recent shipments, my colleague, the Minister of Transport has been co-ordinating an interdepartmental meeting on this subject, and I think he should answer that part of the question.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the second part of the hon. member's question, the bottles or glass were found in shipments from different ports, both those under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board and those under other jurisdictions.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Is there not available a report following the inquiries made into contamination of shipments made to Great Britain?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, there is not.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister what quantity of grain was affected by this contamination?

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot tell that, but I think the stories on the subject, if I may use the term as comprising a lack of precision, appear to have been magnified quite materially. It is a matter of great seriousness, because of the necessity of preserving the very fine reputation of Canadian wheat. It is important that the matter be thoroughly investigated, and every remedial step that can be taken must be taken to prevent any possibility of any recurrence or continuation of these incidents.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question that is supplementary to the previous one. Has the minister received any information from the government agencies involved as to a possibility that this kind of, one might say, industrial sabotage, has been done by supporters of the F.L.Q.? If so, are any of his officials giving any assistance to the investigation?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to answer that question. Neither the officials of the Department of Justice nor the R.C.M.P. have received any information to that effect. However the Minister of Transport and the other minister involved have been told that the R.C.M.P. are at their disposal, and are willing to assist and to co-operate with the provincial police, as well as with the municipal police and the national harbours board police if they should be required.

Mr. Douglas: Could the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us when the house will be given a report arising from these investigations, and also what steps are being taken in the meantime to prevent a recurrence of this unfortunate incident?

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could add to something I said on the former question. There is no suggestion in this that there is a conspiracy, sabotage, or irregular action of that sort. It appears to be a matter of pure carelessness of persons who are working in very dusty conditions, and I may say—

An hon. Member: They don't like water.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, they like the contents of a little glass, and if anyone saw the kind of work they have to do that would be well understood. Now, Mr. Speaker, this occurrence should not be permitted to get out of perspective. It is a very serious matter, but there is no suggestion of sabotage or anything like that involved. As a matter of fact, since the F.L.Q. was mentioned, I have to report that some of the bottles were found in two railway cars that had come from Ontario shipping points, one of which was a carload of soybeans.

Mr. Douglas: I asked the minister whether a report would be made.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I want to answer the question of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. As soon as I can get anything to report to the house I shall be glad to do so. In the meantime steps are being taken to deal with the problem.

Mr. Douglas: What are they?

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could indicate some of them. Very close attention is being given this matter by the board of grain commissioners, the national harbours board, the other harbour authorities, the other grain shipping people and the shipping interests, because it would appear that the bottles are going in after the grain is on the ships. The kind of remedial measures taken can be illustrated by the fact that in one particular harbour the agency which sells soft drinks no longer uses bottles, but paper cups.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Woolliams: I would like to ask a supplementary question, because Canada's good name in reference to wheat is at stake. Surely the minister is able to tell us how many millions of bushels have been affected. He tends to minimize a situation that affects a contract worth $500 million.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to do the very opposite. I was trying to emphasize the importance of the subject because of the proud name Canada has as a wheat supplier and wheat producer. I have no information how many bushels were affected and there has been no claim made asserting the number of bushels. Whether there will be, I do not know.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Perhaps I could help the Minister of Transport by asking him if it is not a fact that the Canadian responsibility ends after the grain has left the terminals and is being loaded on to the ships? Does it not then become the responsibility of the shipping company or of another country.

Mr. McIlraith: That is correct.

[Later:]

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to revert to the last subject and ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he has had any official correspondence from any customer country—

An hon. Member: What about Cuba?

Mr. Clancy: Never mind Cuba. Has the minister had from the importing countries official complaints about wheat—

An hon. Member: With glass in it.

Mr. Clancy: Has the minister had any official complaints about the adulteration of wheat? Has he had any claims on the insurance; and if so, will he table them?

Mr. Sharp: In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I can only answer on behalf of the Canadian wheat board, and I can inform the house that the wheat board has received no claims.

[Later:]

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, in view of the reply the Minister of Transport gave me earlier, could he indicate—and this time I would ask him to answer without any prompting—whether, as he has already mentioned that our responsibility ends once the grain leaves the terminal point, from there on the responsibility in this particular case was with the Russian authorities? Could he indicate what authority he has over any investigation, and whether the Russian authorities have indicated their co-operation in any investigation?

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that the hon. member put this question on the order paper.

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER PLANT—PRICE PER POUND OF PRODUCT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. What price per pound of heavy water have the government and Deuterium Corporation of Canada finally agreed upon?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): The price, Mr. Speaker, for which acceptance was approved was $20.50 a pound.

Mr. Thompson: As a supplementary question, what is the total amount of the subsidy that will be paid on coal used to produce heavy water?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, this is somewhat difficult to answer as Deuterium Corporation of Canada will be buying steam from a source of steam in Nova Scotia, and not buying coal itself. It is difficult to say, therefore, how much coal will be used in this operation.

Mr. Thompson: As a further supplementary question, what is the amount of the subsidy paid on the coal that is used to produce this steam that will be used to produce heavy water?

Mr. Drury: At the particular location where it is proposed to produce this steam there is a subsidy payable, called an oil equalization subsidy, which varies from period to period depending on pithead costs and the distance of the user of the coal from the mines. In the particular case in question for the present period it will be of the order of 91 cents a ton.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Is Deuterium Corporation of Canada a wholly owned American company?

Mr. Chevrier: We answered that yesterday several times.

Mr. Drury: At the moment, Mr. Speaker, Deuterium Corporation of Canada is, I understand, not owned by Canadian residents. There is to be a further distribution of shares, amounting to something in excess of 50 per cent, which will be made to Canadian residents.

Mr. Thompson: As a supplementary question, does this price of $20.50 per ton represent the lowest tender bid per pound of heavy water?

Mr. Drury: As I said in my statement, Mr. Speaker, the price of $20.50 represents the lowest price for an unconditional proposal made to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

Mr. Thompson: A supplementary question—

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Thompson: —does the Minister of Industry—

Mr. Speaker: Order. A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

Mr. Pugh: It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that on orders of the day there should be a few questions and a few answers, but we have had a full scale debate on about four subjects in the last four questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking some very urgent information.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must say that due to the importance of one or two of the questions asked this afternoon I have perhaps permitted more time than is usual. However, it seems to me that to go any further on this line of the heavy water project would be to waste the time of the house; or, putting it in other words, I think questions would be better placed on the order paper seeking detailed information of this sort, which to a large degree is anticipating something which has not yet officially happened.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT TO CALL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of persistent rumours that an election will be called in the near future, can the Prime Minister indicate if it is his intention to call an early election?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, contrary to some reports that have been made, we intend to proceed with our program for this parliament, and if an election is called before the end of this parliament it will be the responsibility of those on the other side of the house.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the last answer was very complete. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse).

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to direct to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is the information he just gave to the house the same as that which he gave to the caucus this morning?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING 12 MILE FISHING ZONE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Are the Minister of Fisheries and the Secretary of State for External Affairs negotiating at the present time with Washington over the 12 mile limit; and if so, will the Prime Minister give the house a report on the progress being made, either today or as soon as possible, in these negotiations?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the meeting that is being held today in Washington is over, either of the two ministers mentioned will be glad to report to the house.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

JACQUET RIVER, N.B.—APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General, of which I sent him notice. When does the Postmaster General propose to fill the position of postmaster at Jacquet River, New Brunswick, for which a competition was held and an eligibility list established? Or does he propose to continue to act in flagrant violation of the Civil Service Act in regard to this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there has been no violation of the law concerning the matter mentioned by the hon. member. The transfer of the post office was made last December 2 and the new postmaster is Mr. Douglas Bonar Pettigrew.

[Text]

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO RENEGOTIATION OF TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. With reference to the Columbia river treaty, on November 20 the Prime Minister stated that the discussions were to be held on a rather different level and that he would look into the matter and obtain more details for me. Would he now tell me whether a top level meeting was held, and the results?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, those meetings are still going on. The premier of British Columbia had a talk with the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the matter when he was here last week. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is in Washington today, and I hope will be in a position to make a report on this matter very shortly.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO OPENING CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a less ominous question for the Minister of Transport than some which have been directed to him today. Now that the new Winnipeg airport has been in use for several weeks, has he any advice to give to the house as to when the official opening ceremonies will be held?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the official opening will take place on January 17, 1964.

Mr. Enns: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether there are any security precautions planned for that date to protect the modern abstract art forms of the new building from an irate public.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSULTATION RESPECTING DESIGNATION OF DEPRESSED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask my question of the Minister of Industry, but in his absence I will put it to the President of the Privy Council, who is responsible for federal-provincial relations. Now that the federal-provincial conference is over, does the minister, in the mood of co-operative federalism—

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: Now that the federal-provincial conference is over, can the minister guarantee to the house that the provinces will always be consulted in the future by the Minister of Industry before local areas are designated?

[Mr. Pugh.]

An hon. Member: He said yes.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, at the meeting last week, and especially at the special committee which dealt with this matter, there was complete understanding between the provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Balcer: Answer the question.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I now led to believe that "complete understanding" indicates that the federal government will consult the provinces at all times in the future before local areas are designated in the provinces concerned?

Mr. Lamontagne: This undertaking was given by the Minister of Industry, and it was also made public previously in the brief presented by the Prime Minister himself.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON NEWSPAPER ARTICLE RESPECTING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he has now read the report which appeared in the papers yesterday disclosing defence policy; and will he inform the house whether the army base at Fort Churchill is to be closed down; is there to be a 10 per cent reduction of the forces; are the estimates for this year to be reduced by $74 million—

Mr. Chevrier: Are you in a debate?

Mr. Churchill: —and is the forecast of next year's budget correct, in the articles to which I have referred?

Mr. Chevrier: That is five questions in one breath.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): To be perfectly honest, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had a chance to read the article.

Mr. Churchill: Your picture appears in it.

Mr. Hellyer: I am not really interested in looking at my own picture. However, I will try to locate it between now and tomorrow, and if my estimates are called tomorrow afternoon I will answer as many of the hon. gentleman's questions as I can at that time.

Mr. Churchill: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. These articles speak about informed sources giving this information, meaning from the Department of National Defence. The minister should surely be able to inform the house whether these statements are correct. That is all I am asking him.

Mr. Joseph Slogan (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Would the Minister of National Defence say whether it is government policy to close about half a dozen radar stations in the Pine Tree radar line in the not too distant future?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it is not normal to answer questions on policy at this time. I will be glad to go into these things more fully tomorrow, if I have the opportunity.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—INQUIRY AS TO STORAGE ON CANADIAN SOIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether United States nuclear weapons are now stored at La Macaza or North Bay or at any other bases in Canada.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would have to take that question as notice.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REPORTED DISPUTE CONCERNING JURISDICTION OVER CRASH INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister any comment to make on the reports that a conflict of jurisdiction between the Department of Transport and the Quebec provincial police impedes the investigation of the circumstances surrounding the crash of a DC-8F at St. Therese de Blainville?

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have seen some of these reports. There is no jurisdictional dispute whatever between the two authorities. I think perhaps, because of the seriousness of the matter, I should explain my answer a little further by saying there is concurrent federal and provincial responsibility and jurisdiction in regard to investigation of the T.C.A. aircraft accident which occurred last Friday.

Under the Quebec coroners act and the Quebec police act responsibility for investigating circumstances relating to deaths, and authority for such investigation, is established. Similarly, in the Aeronautics Act and the air regulations made thereunder federal responsibility and authority exists for investigation of the accident to the aircraft; and, as I announced on Monday, steps have already been taken to set up a very extensive investigation under federal authority and control. There are, in effect, two sources of authority for investigation, provincial and federal. The provincial authorities are acting in accordance with their area of responsibility, while the federal investigation is proceeding under federal authority and responsibility. Both are working in close collaboration and in a spirit of mutual co-operation and assistance in this regard.

FUTURE OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE OF VISCOUNT AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if it is correct that 34 Viscount aircraft will be operated by T.C.A. during the next ten years and serviced at the Winnipeg overhaul base, as he is reported to have stated to Mr. Victor Mackie of the Winnipeg Free Press.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Yes. I think I gave that information here in the house in answer to a question, and it was repeated yesterday in the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping by the president of T.C.A.

Mr. Churchill: Does that mean that 34 planes will be kept in operation throughout the ten year period?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, and that is what I sought to convey to the hon. member when I answered a question of his some days ago and told him that the significant change contained in the announcement was the part which indicated that the Viscounts would be kept in operation, and not phased out as had been previously intended.

Mr. Churchill: On a question of privilege, the minister, on November 26, declined to answer the question I put to him.

Mr. Chevrier: Where is the question of privilege?

Mr. Churchill: The minister gives this information to a reporter, and my question of privilege is that he denied to this house information to which we had a right, though he disclosed it to a newspaper which is friendly to him. That is my question of privilege, and I accuse the minister of misleading the house on November 26 on this subject.

Mr. Chevrier: You are attacking him because he gives too much information to the house.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Chevrier: You did a while ago.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. McIlraith: I think I should point out that the first day questions were asked on this matter I did not have the precise figures with me. The second day, I had verified a great many of the figures as best I could. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that on no occasion did the hon. gentleman do me the courtesy of giving me notice when he wanted precise numbers.

TYPE OF ENGINE USED IN DC-8F PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he is in a position to answer the question I asked yesterday concerning the type of aircraft engine used on the DC-8F's which crashed recently?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Yes. I am informed these aircraft were equipped with Pratt and Whitney fan jet engines type JT 3D-3.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

SUGGESTED APPEARANCE OF PRIME MINISTER BEFORE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On November 20 I asked him a question, reported on page 4961 of Hansard as follows:

> I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to appear before the standing committee on privileges and elections to outline to that committee the details of the government's program for making a contribution from the public treasury toward the costs incurred by parties and candidates during election campaigns?

The answer given by the Prime Minister at that time was:

> I have not been invited to appear before the committee, so the question is indeed hypothetical.

I should like now to ask the Prime Minister whether as yet he has received an invitation to appear before that committee.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I asked whether, if I found it not easy to appear because of other activities, I could delegate a spokesman for the government; and I have done that.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question. Is that spokesman the Secretary of State?

Mr. Pearson: At the moment I am not quite sure, but I will look into it.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Now that 61 days have passed can he tell me when my question No. 1,237 on the order paper will be answered? It was placed there on October 4.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question involves 141 contracts. It is a complicated question. We have answers to most of it, but expect a complete answer to be ready by next Monday. I would ask the hon. member to be patient until next Monday.

UNITED NATIONS

PORTUGAL—CANADIAN VOTE ON RESOLUTION RESPECTING COLONIAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would assist the house in reconciling the strong condemnation of Portugal's colonial policies by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in last Thursday's debate and Canada's vote at the United Nations yesterday against a resolution opposing those policies?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity to reconcile those two positions, but I will bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I think will be in the house tomorrow.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATION OF "O CANADA"

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-Andre Boutin (Dorchester): On November 21 I put the following question to the Prime Minister:

> Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to suggest that "O Canada" be adopted as the national anthem of Canadians, when he introduces his bill to give Canada a truly Canadian national flag?

This question having been ruled out of order at that time, I put it on the order paper the next day, as suggested by the Speaker.

As I have not received any answer yet, I ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to answer that question soon or to include it instead in the Liberal program at the next election?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I hope to be in a position to answer this question in a very few days.

PENITENTIARIES

NEW WESTMINSTER—RECOMMENDATIONS THAT CONDITIONS BE INVESTIGATED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question which was put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam concerning the trial of three inmates in British Columbia. I did receive a letter from the judge at the trial of Messrs. Carlson, Wood and Casey, the three inmates who were tried and convicted for activities in connection with the attempted jail break from New Westminster penitentiary on April 19 and 20, 1963. The judge enclosed with his letter the recommendations brought in by the jury. In summary, these recommendations are:

1. That one inmate be given a cancer check at a recognized cancer clinic in Vancouver.

2. That the three inmates be transferred from British Columbia.

3. That based on evidence presented in this case regarding treatment of prisoners, an independent and official investigation into these allegations was recommended.

The honourable judge stated in his letter to me:

> The jury brought in recommendations as set out on the sheet enclosed and I promised that these would be passed on to the proper authorities.
> I should add that I am not at all in accord with any of these recommendations as I was not satisfied on the evidence that there was anything to be investigated except the alleged crimes before the court.

The commissioner of penitentiaries informs me that the inmate Casey has been examined on many occasions and has not got cancer. However, he is directing that a specialist consultant is to give this inmate a complete check and that a report is to be furnished to him by the penitentiary psychiatrist concerning the obsession that this inmate has.

On the second recommendation, steps have been taken to transfer the young inmate Carlson to another institution to get him away from the influence of Casey. Casey will remain at British Columbia penitentiary until St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is in a proper state to handle this inmate.

On the third recommendation, I accept the statement of the honourable judge, that there was nothing in the evidence presented at the court that disclosed that there was anything to be investigated. I am satisfied that the British Columbia penitentiary is well run and that an investigation by an independent body is quite unnecessary. Incidentally, the commissioner of penitentiaries is out there now, and I am sure he would have reported to me had there been anything amiss with the operation there.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the ubiquitous and indispensable Secretary of State a question.

An hon. Member: Indispensable?

Mr. Fisher: Nobody is indispensable.

Mr. Howard: I ask it because of the possibility that the privileges of the house may be involved. Would the hon. gentleman mind looking at motion No. 169 which stood in my name and related to a single telegram. The motion was passed by the house and I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether that telegram, or a copy of it, could be tabled at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to look at it.

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS

INVITATION TO SECRETARY OF STATE TO APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of standing order 39, paragraph (1), I would ask the hon. member for Nickel Belt, chairman of the committee on mines, forests and waters, if he intends to invite the Secretary of State to attend the next meeting of that committee in order to give him the opportunity to explain the commitments he made in the house.

[Text]

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): I will be pleased to report to the committee any decision which I may take concerning the evidence to be heard by the committee at the meeting on Friday morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the hon. member for Nickel Belt. He has not answered the question I asked him. I asked him if he intended to invite the Secretary of State following the latter's suggestion that he appear before the said committee. What I want is an answer to that question.

[Text]

Mr. Godin: That would seem obvious, since the Secretary of State himself indicated he would be prepared to appear.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct another supplementary question on this matter. Could I ask the chairman of that committee at what time he intends to ask the Secretary of State to appear before the said committee?

[Text]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a question of privilege; I failed to catch the entire exchange between the hon. member for Lapointe and the chairman of the mines, forests and waters committee. Did I understand the chairman of that committee to indicate that he would do something? Considering that at the committee meeting this morning, at the insistence of Liberal members, the steering committee could not even make a decision—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the reply of the chairman was sufficiently clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF BUSINESS FOR REMAINDER OF SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A few days ago I asked the Prime Minister if he intended to add to, or change in any way, the outline of the legislation which the government had announced for this session. The Prime Minister said at that time he would make an answer in a few days. I wonder if he is in a position to make it now.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): There have been some discussions as to the procedure to be followed during the rest of the session. I hope to be in a position to make a statement on this and related matters tomorrow.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I wonder if I could ask the leader of the house which estimates will be taken up tomorrow, so that everybody may have an opportunity to prepare.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Tomorrow it is proposed, immediately after the orders of the day are reached, to take the estimates of the Department of National Defence. If they should not be concluded by tomorrow evening it is proposed to go on with them on Friday. I will indicate at the usual time and in the usual way what will be taken after that.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CO-ORDINATION WITH OTHER NATIONS, ETC.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-112, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHARGES FOR USE OF FACILITIES AND SERVICES

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-117, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: A bill containing a large part of what appears in the measure now before the house was given first reading by the last parliament but because of the dissolution of that parliament it was not proceeded with. Perhaps I should outline briefly the principles included in the existing bill.

At the outset let me explain that the amendments are primarily intended to clarify and strengthen existing legislation and to make provision for fees and charges, some of which are now collected pursuant to the Financial Administration Act. Fields with which the amendments deal are fields in which the department is already active. The department's efforts in these fields have been taken under the general over-all authority of the Financial Administration Act and part I of the Aeronautics Act, but the experience which we have had has led us to believe that on a number of points our authority and our responsibility should be more clearly spelled out. I will review these points briefly.

The bill provides for regulations prescribing charges in respect of aircraft and airports. At present, charges are levied under air services fees regulations made under the authority of the Financial Administration Act. This act provides in part that fees may be prescribed by regulation charging the whole or part of the cost of any service to the person or persons for whom it is provided. Some of the facilities required by modern aircraft in the air and at airports are not encompassed by the word "service", and accordingly it is considered desirable to broaden the base on which charges may be levied. To accomplish this purpose it is felt that it would be better to place the authority for charges in respect of aircraft and airports in the Aeronautics Act. The amendment would permit the government to deal with the situation which developed recently when it was decided to withdraw the route facility fee which had been imposed in January, 1960, under the authority of the Financial Administration Act. There is serious doubt that the Financial Administration Act authorizes this charge.

The bill also provides for regulations respecting the maximum hours of work and other working conditions for pilots, co-pilots, navigators and flight engineers employed by any person operating a commercial air service licensed by the air transport board. The complexity of the larger aircraft of today, the speeds at which they travel and the ever-increasing number of aircraft now in operation require flight crews to be at a peak of physical and mental efficiency during flight. To ensure this standard of efficiency it is necessary that the crew members do not remain on duty for excessive periods of time and be not required to work under conditions which are detrimental to safety.

There is provision for regulations to be made respecting the entering of the premises of any aircraft manufacturer and the inspecting of those premises, including any equipment, stock or records found therein, for the purpose of determining the airworthiness of aircraft manufactured by that manufacturer. No aircraft manufactured in Canada may be put to civil use unless it is airworthy and fit and safe in all respects for flight. It is the department's responsibility to ensure this; and to do this it is necessary to obtain complete information on the aircraft, including its parts and components and the facilities and equipment available to its builder.

There is also provision for regulations respecting the preservation and removal of aircraft involved in accidents, including the cargo thereof, and the preservation, removal and testing of any part of the aircraft. All hon. members will be particularly sensitive in these recent days to the fact that it is of the utmost importance that the exact cause of an aircraft accident should be determined, since this knowledge may serve to avert other mishaps. If the cause of an accident is to be determined, however, then it may be necessary to retain custody of the aircraft and its cargo and to remove and test any part of the aircraft.

Provision is also made for regulations respecting the use and operation of rockets, moored balloons and kites that, in the opinion of the governor in council, are hazardous to air navigation. It is rather interesting to note here that in more recent times the firing of rockets for military and scientific purposes has engendered intense public interest in this field of endeavour, so much so that we now have the amateur rocketeer constructing and firing his own rockets. Many of these do-it-yourself rockets are capable of reaching considerable altitudes and, although it has not happened yet in Canada, aircraft in flight have already suffered damage from these missiles. Although they have been with us for a considerably longer period of time, the moored balloon and kite are also something of a hazard to aircraft in flight, particularly when flown in close proximity to an aerodrome.

Another provision would vest the Canadian courts with jurisdiction in respect of offences against air regulations committed outside Canada. The Aeronautics Act already authorizes the making of regulations respecting the conditions under which aircraft registered in Canada may be operated outside Canada, but it does not confer jurisdiction on any Canadian court in respect of such offences committed ex juris.

Finally, the bill would authorize the establishment of boards of inquiry to investigate aircraft accidents or any alleged violations of the regulations, and would give such boards the necessary powers to fulfil their tasks properly and provide for the payment of witnesses' expenses. This amendment is particularly important as regards aircraft accidents since, if the cause of the accident is to be determined, it may require the establishment of a board armed with sufficient authority to summon and examine witnesses under oath. Hitherto this right has not been given specifically under the act.

I consider the bill to be a forward step. I consider that it will improve the financial position of the department in the operation of airports and route facilities, and it will also advance the safety of air travel in Canada. I would hope the bill would commend itself to the house. As I indicated in my opening remarks, a very substantial part of it was brought forward by the previous government but was not proceeded with by reason of the dissolution of that parliament. Those parts are reincorporated in this bill, together with some new material, as I have indicated in my speech.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for the explanation he has given of the bill now before us. It is a fact that such a bill was brought to the attention of the house in a previous session and from what I can gather from the minister's remarks only a few changes have been made in the bill.

I am interested in the indication in the minister's remarks that the department has decided to give up its regulation with regard to route facility fees. I know that in the past this has always been a sore point with the foreign carriers. The matter was brought before the courts and I do not think the position of Canada in this regard was too sound legally. I quite agree with the minister that the matter has to be settled one way or another. It would be interesting to know from the minister what amount would have accrued to Canada if the regulations could have been proved to be legal, and also what amounts are going to be paid back to air lines and what air lines are involved.

With regard to the other matters in the bill there is no doubt that most of them are needed amendments. I am sure that members will have a few questions to ask on the various clauses of the bill. For myself I will reserve my other remarks until we are studying the clauses one by one.

Mr. Eric Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have some pertinent remarks to make with respect to the general principles involved in the bill, as well as the individual clauses of the bill itself. I feel that one of the most serious threats to the efficient use of private aircraft is the present attitude of Canada's air transport board. I speak as one who is quite familiar with the air transport board's operations and the regulations made under the Aeronautics Act because I come in contact with them constantly. I fly my own aircraft and use the airports right across this country and in the United States. I feel that there are three real threats to the growth of private flying in Canada. One, as I have already stated, is the attitude of the air transport board, and the other two are related because as our commercial air industry grows the tendency is for the government, and rightly so in certain respects, through the air transport board to design their regulations and their laws to favour the commercial sector of the aircraft industry in Canada.

The air transport board, I think, readily admits that one of the purposes of its existence is to deter private flying to the extent that private flying may interfere with the efficient operation of commercial carriers. If private flying detracts from the revenues of commercial air lines, then there is an immediate tendency to protect the sources of revenue of the commercial carriers. There are specific sections in the bill, for instance, which impose fees on airplanes using the Department of Transport facilities. The commercial air carriers are not hurt, because of the size of their treasuries, when it comes to complying with these sections, but the private flying industry is seriously affected.

I think it would be useful at this stage to consider the extent to which private flying in Canada has grown in the past few years. As of June 30 this year, official Department of Transport records showed that there were 6,381 Canadian civil aircraft on the registry. Of those only 5,242 had valid certificates of air worthiness. If we compare this situation with that existing in the United States, we find that in that country there were in excess of 8,000 private aircraft on the registry. Most other countries in the world have substantially lower numbers of private airplanes on their respective registries. The fact then emerges that Canada, amongst all the nations of the world, has the second largest private air industry in existence. This is quite a phenomenal growth from the days when transportation was by horse and buggy, by train or by automobile.

We are now faced with legislation that is designed specifically to curb Canada's private air industry. The fees which it is intended to levy against private airplanes using D.O.T. facilities, as the minister has stated, will greatly increase the revenues of the department. I feel, however, that the imposition of a one dollar landing fee at Toronto international airport, Montreal and Vancouver, whether on a private aircraft or any aircraft using these facilities, is not going substantially to increase the revenues of the department. I think, therefore, a valid argument could be made, and I would hope the minister would give serious consideration to it, for changing the section as it applies to private aircraft in respect of these landing fees.

The airports of this country are there for the benefit of all Canadians, just as are the highways. It seems to me wrong in principle that a landing fee should be charged the operator of a private aircraft who goes into a government airfield, just as it would be wrong for an automobile user to pay a toll on the trans-Canada highway. It seems to me that the aircraft owner is already a taxpayer. He contributes towards the cost of these Department of Transport facilities in the same way an automobile owner contributes through his taxes towards the construction of highways. Why should the private owner pay double taxation simply because he chooses one form of transportation over another?

Mr. Byrne: Does he pay tax on gasoline?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, taxes are paid by aircraft users who purchase gasoline. There is a special tax on gasoline products purchased at most airports across the country. In Ontario, the tax is 17 cents, I think, although certain rebates are granted in most cases. Additional taxes to those paid by automobile users are imposed on the users of aircraft fuel. This is a provincial source of revenue, I believe, and has no significance so far as the federal government is concerned. For the life of me, I cannot see how the private aircraft owner who is charged a dollar whenever he lands at Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal, is going to make any substantial contribution to the federal treasury. Think of the harm the imposition of this fee will cause. It already has caused harm in Montreal, and I believe the minister or his officials have received representations from organizations in this country who have brought this matter to his attention.

The business concessions at these airports which dispense fuel, the flying clubs which heretofore have been visited frequently by the private aircraft owner who had the privilege of using these services before, are no longer used to the same extent by him as they were before the imposition of these fees. While I am talking about fees, perhaps the minister might explain something to me. It seems to me that the purpose of the bill is the imposition of these fees against private aircraft using these D.O.T. facilities, and yet the fee is already being charged. This is a matter that perhaps requires explanation. If the fees have been charged without authority, then there seems to be something wrong.

There is another sector of the economy that is going to be affected by the imposition of these fees. As the minister knows, there are no national airports in the United States, the airports being owned by municipal or civil authorities. Consequently, there are no national laws requiring the payment of landing fees or other payments for the use of nationally provided facilities. In fact, there is complete freedom in the United States to use these facilities for air travel without any charge whatever. What we are doing is imposing on the United States air travellers who come to this country in great numbers, a nuisance tax—because that is in effect what it is. The air traveller has to land, walk into the airport manager's office and pay one dollar. As I have said, I think that this is going to discourage a great deal of tourist traffic, particularly in the Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal areas.

I want to say a word or two about one or two of the other regulations which I think impose an undue restriction on the growth of the private air industry in this country. One of them is the present air navigation order No. 7, series 1, which sets forth that the owner of a private aircraft is exempt from certain air regulations in respect of claiming compensation by way of rebates on income taxes and the like, if he uses his aircraft on his employer's business.

He can, under the air regulations, be reimbursed for the use of that aircraft if he is travelling on business, but the anomaly in this regulation is that he is the only one who can claim such reimbursement and before he does so he must receive prior approval from the air transport board. Having regard to the speed with which any government agency operates, hon. members can see immediately that where a private aircraft owner is using his aircraft for a business trip he has to plan weeks and months ahead, in order to write to the air transport board to obtain approval before he can obtain reimbursement.

The provision is workable so far as large companies are concerned, with respect to large fuel costs; but nowadays many small businesses are using private aircraft, and if the owner of a small business uses an aircraft to transport his employees from one place of business to another place of business in Canada, the owner of the aircraft can claim reimbursement only for himself. If he takes his accountant, his solicitor, or any other of his staff on that private air journey and just for business purposes, he cannot claim reimbursement under the existing regulations. I think this is an unduly restrictive provision of the air regulations, and is one which is deserving of the minister's very serious consideration.

It would be just as strange to hon. members as if a person using his automobile on business in the province of Ontario had to write to the Department of Transport if he wished to claim allowances when he uses his own automobile for business purposes. Certainly under the provisions of our present legislation the owner of a private automobile, if he moves from A to B on business, can carry the employees of his business with him and obtain reimbursement for travelling expenses. Therefore I cannot see why the owner of a private airplane, which he is using in the course of the conduct of his business, cannot be entitled to claim the same reimbursement. The aircraft is becoming more and more an accepted means of transportation, and it should be viewed in that light.

The other matter which I would like to draw to the minister's attention covers the allowances now in existence under the legislation, permitting a privately owned aircraft to be depreciated. A person in business who owns an automobile and uses it for business purposes is allowed certain depreciation allowances, and those allowances, while they may not be generous, are regarded as being sufficiently broad so that the businessman has no doubt as to when he may claim depreciation and when he may not.

But the private aircraft owner is not so fortunate. Again these matters do not apply to the commercial operators, but they certainly do to the private operators. Right now the sleuths in the Department of National Revenue are down on the necks of practically every business that operates a private aircraft for business purposes. It is an uphill battle and struggle to claim reasonable depreciation allowance on privately owned aircraft that are used in the businesses of the owners.

I mention one organization about which I am sure the minister has heard. It is the Canadian owners and pilots association, with headquarters here in Ottawa. I am sure they must have made representations to the minister with respect to the imposition of the fees being called for by this legislation. They publish a magazine called "Canadian Flight," and in the April-May issue of this year, and again in the October-November issue, editorials set forth their objections to the imposition of these fees. I read from the April-May issue where the editorial has this to say:

> The latest move in what is obviously a creeping campaign to discourage the use of major airports by small private aircraft is the imposition by the Department of Transport of landing fees for private aircraft at Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal. And to make the pill even harder to swallow, the department at the same time has announced rate increases of up to 50 per cent for outside storage of aircraft at various D.O.T. airports across the country.

This is another matter which is not covered by the regulations, and to which I take serious objection. The minister has airports under his jurisdiction all across the country, with hangars standing on them empty, or filled with farm equipment, or material other than aircraft. Over the past few years I paid rent for storage in a hangar at Whitehorse at a cost of $30 a month. This year, the rate has been increased to $50 a month, and this is not the type of policy that will induce Canadian citizens to engage in flying activity.

I think it is desirable to encourage the growth of a private air industry, but we are certainly not going to do it by following a policy that is going to utilize hangars, which should be made available for aircraft at more reasonable rates, for the storage of farm and other equipment. Also the rates for outside storage have been increased by 50 per cent. Even just to tie an aircraft down on a D.O.T. managed airport costs $18 a month, and the aircraft may suffer from snow-blowing equipment that scatters ice and rocks over it.

The editorial goes on to say:

> Even if these decisions were justified—and that is a highly debatable point—the manner of their introduction has proved to be irritating in the extreme and has stirred up a violent storm of opposition in all parts of the country. In the first place, the new levies were imposed with virtually no warning at all, thus making it impossible for the affected parties either to present opposing arguments or to plan a switch in their operations to other airports. Nor has D.O.T. offered any suitable alternatives to those aircraft owners who are being "pressured by price" away from the major airports.

Here we seem to have a very confused policy with respect to the decisions of the Minister of Transport. Anybody who has read the press or listened to the debates in this house over recent months, must realize that the Department of Transport is trying to separate the light aircraft training operations from scheduled aircraft movements. I only need to quote the exchanges which have taken place in this house with regard to the Penhold training base, and with regard to the Edmonton air base, as being prime examples of this confusion in policy.

I think I can do no better than quote the minister as recorded in Hansard for October 1 at page 2888 where he says in part:

> Because of the capacity of the international airport, the size of which was increased during the construction period, I see no need to hold the city to its earlier commitment that it maintain a secondary airport.

He was referring to the city of Edmonton, and this is obviously opening the way towards federal concurrence in the discontinuance of services at the municipal airport. In other words, the minister is saying the new airport in Edmonton can absorb all the flying activity, which includes training schools and scheduled flights.

Mr. McIlraith: No, just read the statement.

Mr. Nielsen: That is going to be the result of it because the small aircraft mainly used the municipal airport. The majority, perhaps 90 per cent of the private aircraft owned in the Edmonton area, use the municipal airport. If that airport is closed down—which seems to be the likelihood because it seems the minister is in favour of that idea, judging from what I read of his remarks, anyway; and perhaps he can clarify this matter—all those private aircraft will be forced to go to the Edmonton international airport. I believe we have a direct conflict here. If that is to be the policy, how does it stand when you set it side by side with closing the Penhold air base, simply because in the opinion of the minister and the government jet flying training in that vicinity interferes with the commercial operation. I do not agree with that either. This also has to do with facilities which are being closed down and which I think are very, very necessary to the safety of aircraft navigation in this country.

At the Portage la Prairie base, for instance, the jet training station was right in the middle of an airway. The radio range in the area was bent. I am sure the minister has been advised by his officials that it is possible to bend radio ranges so that air traffic can be routed around dangerous areas. They do it in mountainous areas and other areas in which there are obstructions to safe navigation. It seems to me that very little difficulty would be encountered in bending the range at Red Deer, Calgary and Edmonton if it were felt desirable to have jet training operations at Penhold. The Portage la Prairie base, for instance, is right on the edge of the airway at the moment, the airway being ten miles wide. There is no technical difficulty that I can see in bending the radio range so that commercial air traffic can be routed as far as 20 miles away on a dog leg around the Penhold air base. If that is the only reason for not going ahead with the jet training program at Penhold, it is a very flimsy one. I think the minister's technical advisers will tell him that what I have been suggesting—that is, bending the radio range—is very, very possible.

The Department of Transport, as I understand it, has ordered all training away from terminal areas. I would like the minister to clarify this when he replies to these remarks. My understanding of the instructions which have been issued by his department is that it is going to be the policy to get training away from terminal areas and to use secondary airports, or encourage the building of more secondary airports, and encourage private and light aircraft to use those secondary or other airports. There exists, in my view, a very serious confusion in policy here, and I think it requires clarification.

I want to get back to rates, Mr. Chairman. I think the decision to raise the rates for outside storage is particularly hard to defend. The editor of "Canadian Flight", which is the official publication of the Canadian owners and pilots association says:

> At many airports, private aircraft are allotted space on land that the D.O.T. does not use and on which no maintenance or servicing expenditures are made. In return for a 50 per cent increase in rates for use of this land, the aircraft owner is being offered no additional services or benefits of any consequence.
> The new tariffs will impose a greater hardship in some areas than in others. Because of a variety of factors, Vancouver seems to have been dealt the severest blow—

I am sure that hon. members on both sides of the house who come from the Vancouver area will have these facts in mind when they come to support this legislation, if they intend to so support it. This article continues:

> —with the result that a new province-wide organization of aircraft owners has sprung up, practically overnight, in order to fight this legislation.

I am sure that the new organization has made representations to the minister. There was a meeting last November in Alberta of the C.O.P.A., the Alberta aviation council and the new B.C. organization. Out of that meeting came certain resolutions with respect to these new rates. The support this new B.C. organization received was such that within a ten-day period the organization was able to finance itself, set up 13 committees and send a delegation to Ottawa. Surely the minister considers this rather convincing evidence, if any were needed, of the unpopularity of the latest Department of Transport action against private aviation.

If we read the provisions of this bill we see that most of them are designed as an invasion of what I consider should be the prerogatives of private aviation in this country. Certainly the air transport board is a very necessary organization. There is no doubt whatsoever that the highest possible standards of flight safety have to be maintained in a country such as ours, which has experienced such a rapid growth in aviation technology and use in recent years. Tragedies are going to occur. I think many people misunderstand and miscalculate the comparisons that are made between travel by air, travel by road or by any other method of transportation. I think it is very interesting, in this connection, to look at the figures. Very recently the dominion bureau of statistics drew up a comparison of accident rates of motor vehicles and aircraft. Private aircraft in Canada do not have to report the miles travelled, so these comparisons can only apply to Canadian aircraft other than those privately registered or those owned by government departments such as the departments of forestry in Ontario and Saskatchewan. In the three years 1959, 1960 and 1961 the average number of fatalities per 1 million motor vehicle road miles was 5.9, according to the bureau of statistics. For the same three year period the fatalities which occurred as a result of aircraft accidents in Canada averaged .022 per 1 million air miles. So the motto perhaps might be "Be very careful when you drive to the airport". I think these statistics testify to the level of safety which has been achieved by the commercial air industry in this country.

The air transport board and other divisions and branches of the Department of Transport which have been concerned with flight safety in this country have contributed to this very enviable record of safety in air travel in Canada. But I do not think we should confuse the desirability of encouraging the growth of safety factors in the commercial air industry in Canada with the undesirable effect produced by government agencies suppressing the growth of the private air industry. For instance, I can take one clause of the bill, clause 2, which purports to clothe the government with the authority to stipulate the maximum hours of work and other working conditions for pilots, co-pilots, navigators and flight engineers employed by any person operating a commercial air service licensed by the air transport board. This is a very necessary thing as far as large commercial operators are concerned. They have to maintain high standards of health in pilots, co-pilots and air crews generally who are flying machines of the size and complexity of the DC-8. But I wonder how much consideration was given by the drafters of this legislation to the operator of the helicopter service who is operating, say, out of Inuvik, Dawson Creek or Prince George, or to the operator of a fixed-wing operation across the Arctic, because the regulations apply to those pilots, navigators and flight engineers as well. I do not think very much consideration was given to the small, private operator of a commercial air service in Canada, because with the seasons as short as they are in the north country, and with the exacting standards of work placed upon these operators by government departments such as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in their laudable desire to get work accomplished as quickly as they can, these operators are taxed to their limit.

The pilot of a helicopter carries an engineer with him wherever he is operating under contract with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. That engineer is on duty 24 hours a day. If there is a regulation proposed in clause 2 of the bill imposing a restricted number of flying hours on commercial pilots, it not only applies to commercial pilots flying DC-8's, if no exceptions are made, but also to operators flying a Bell helicopter in the north country, or a Cessna 180, or a Beaver, an Otter, or a Norseman in northern Ontario.

Another clause of the bill which seems to invade not only the rights of private operators of commercial air services but also involves the rights of individuals is clause 3, where a board of inquiry is going to be set up to investigate aircraft accidents. That is a very laudable feature of the bill, but nevertheless I wonder if the evidence given before such a board, as is usual in air transport board hearings or hearings involving government departments, will be made available to the general public. For instance, if I were to testify before such a board, what disposition would be made of the evidence that I give? This matter gives me some concern.

I should like to say that in my view the Canadian public has come to accept the aeroplane as a primary means of transportation. The versatility of use to which an aircraft can be put bears this out. For example, pleasure flying, flying for business purposes, for agricultural purposes, such as crop spraying and the like, are only a few of the many forms of activity which comprise our aviation industry, other than that part which most people think of in terms of T.C.A. or C.P.A., and other large air lines. All of these flying activities have become essential to our modern way of life, and aircraft owners in Canada, as I have shown from the statistics I have put before the house, are on the increase. The industry should be encouraged to grow. I think the public requires that the benefits of transportation in all its forms, including aviation, should be widely available at low cost, and with the minimum imposition of tariffs and inconvenience. The imposition of fees such as those which are going to be authorized by this bill are not going to contribute at all to the growth of private aviation in Canada. In my view they are going to retard the free use of the private aeroplane.

There is one feature the hon. member for Three Rivers mentioned a moment ago with regard to over-flights and the endeavours of the government to impose certain fees on foreign carriers flying over Canada and using Canadian facilities. As I see it, the hon. member for Three Rivers suggested that the government had abandoned its attempt to impose these fees. I hope that is the case. However, my reading of the first clause of the bill indicates to me that the government may, if it wishes, impose these very fees. As the clause reads now, it will allow the governor in council to make regulations to impose any fee or charge for the use of any facility provided by or on behalf of the minister in respect of any aircraft. Those facilities include radio ranges and non-directional beacons, as well as airports; in fact, every single facility that is provided by the Department of Transport for air navigation in this country.

Here I want to mention the policy of the department of discontinuing the use of radio ranges. Hon. members know how airplanes get from point A to point B in this country in weather conditions which do not allow one always to look at the ground. The facilities used are radio navigation facilities. The basic facility, which has been with us now for 20 years, is the air radio range station. The policy of the government now is gradually to close down these radio range stations. This is being done in a phased fashion, but I think it is a wrong decision to make. First to go in the radio range station is voice communication. Next to go is the station itself. These stations are being replaced with what are known as non-directional beacons. That is all very good for the large air services. They can operate because they have thousands and thousands of dollars worth of radar equipment in their aeroplanes and have advanced radio aids which are being installed by the department, and very properly so. But I would again turn the minister's attention to the private aircraft industry in this country, which involves some 5,000 aeroplanes actively flying around the country which have not got this type of facility. Even if they could get it the aircraft would be too small for its installation. These aircraft are left with a diminishing number of aids to navigation. As a matter of fact, the discontinuance of these services is taking place so rapidly in Canada that the "Canada Air Pilot" cannot even keep up with them. One can pass a radio range these days and attempt to report, and the "Canada Air Pilot" has made no mention of the fact that voice communication has been discontinued at that radio range. The first thing that pilot knows is that he is reported missing because he has not reported, after having planned to report at that particular station. I am thinking in this instance of Brandon, where voice communication has been discontinued. I should like to support any move which would result in a saving of funds to the Canadian taxpayer, but I do not do so if it be inconsistent with the safety of air navigation. I very seriously question whether the government policy of discontinuing operation of radio ranges in this country is sound, because I think it is going to impair the safety of air navigation, not of the large carriers but certainly of the smaller carriers.

On the other hand, on the credit side, some of the facilities offered by the Department of Transport to the air industry in Canada are very desirable indeed; for instance, the development of ultra high-frequency equipment and the authorization of a continuous wide area of broadcasting of aviation weather over the Toronto low-frequency radio range. This is of benefit to every pilot flying in southern Ontario. I understand that this is being done on an experimental basis, and I would urge the minister to do it in other areas of Canada as well.

These facilities, as with airports, are services provided by the Canadian taxpayer. One of these taxpayers is the private aircraft user, the private aircraft owner, and it seems to me that if he has to pay for these very desirable services he is, in effect, paying double taxation. I have already made the analogy of the use of an aeroplane and air highways and the use of an automobile and ground highways. There should be no taxation of the private aircraft user any more than there should be taxation of the automobile user in the form of direct fees for the use of facilities. If airport charges are to be made—and certainly clause 1 of the bill gives this authority to the government—I see no reason why the clause could not also be extended to tax private aircraft users using radio ranges and other like facilities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I was interested to notice the intention of the minister, as indicated on the order paper, to introduce amendments to the Aeronautics Act. If I am not mistaken, this is the first time since 1952 that the act has been before the house for amendment. I was hopeful that the hon. gentleman would have taken advantage of the opportunity afforded by these amendments to include something in this bill to revise that section of the act which makes provision for appeals to be made to the minister from decisions of the air transport board only by the air line which happens to be immediately affected or, perhaps I should say, by the one which has applied, and not by others which might be affected. However, having given consent last night to allowing the resolution stage of this measure to pass without debate, I suppose I cannot pursue this matter further at this time and that I will have to reserve any further comments I might have to make in this connection to a later date.

I regret I was called out of the house for a short time, with the result that I missed the opening remarks made by the minister in introducing this bill. He may have answered, then, some of the questions I have in mind and which I intend to raise in the course of these observations. If that should be the case, perhaps he would just indicate to me, when he replies, that this is the situation, in which case I will consult his earlier remarks when they appear in Hansard tomorrow.

As I see it, one of the principal amendments contained in this bill has to do with the power of the governor in council to make charges for the use of airport and other facilities provided by the department. One question which occurs to me is this: Just what additional charges are contemplated to the users of these facilities in addition to those currently charged? What impact are these extra charges, if any, likely to have on air line fares and passengers? I must say I cannot share the thinking of the hon. member who preceded me on this aspect of the subject. If I understood him correctly, he was inclined to think no charges should be levied upon private plane operators for the use of facilities provided out of public funds. It seems to me this is an area where it could very well be that those who use the facilities should pay for them to a reasonable extent. It is obvious that most Canadian taxpayers are not, now, and will not, at least in the foreseeable future be, in a position to fly around in their own planes. I really do not think an analogy can be drawn between the situation of a plane owner and of an automobile owner in our present society. As the owner and driver of an automobile I certainly feel I contribute substantially in the course of a year toward the operation of public facilities which enable me to drive around the country. I do not feel that an unduly high levy should be exacted from plane operators, but I feel there is some reason why they should be required to pay a reasonable amount to defray the cost of facilities provided out of public funds.

I was interested, too, in what the hon. member had to say about clause 2 of the bill which gives the governor in council authority to fix maximum hours of work and make other regulations governing the working conditions of pilots. As I understand it, this clause authorizes the making of regulations which are yet to be drafted. I fail to see how one can reasonably conclude that the hours of work and conditions of work of a pilot of a DC-8 would necessarily be those provided in the case of pilots of some of the smaller aircraft operated by the smaller commercial lines. I would like to say, however, as one who has occasion to travel not only on DC-8's but on some of these smaller aircraft, that as far as I am concerned it is the same hide which is involved whether I am travelling aboard a DC-8 or on a Norseman. I am just as concerned that the pilot of that small plane should not be endangering himself or his passengers because he is working under conditions of undue fatigue, or for other similar reasons, as I am that the captain of a DC-8 should be in good shape to do his job. The crash of a small plane might not be as spectacular as the tragic accident which took place recently, but its effects are just as unfortunate for those who happen to be passengers on the small plane. If the minister has not already done so I should like him to indicate what changes are contemplated in the present regulation with respect to the hours and working conditions of pilots, navigators and other flight personnel.

With these observations I think I will conclude, and await the reply to be given by the minister when he closes this debate. In the light of that reply I may have further questions to ask during the committee stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is the house ready for the question?

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Nielsen: I should like the minister to reply to my questions, if he does not mind, and state more fully what his intentions are with respect to clause 1 of the bill in particular.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I must advise the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I am glad to reply to the remarks made by the hon. member, to the best of my ability. I would prefer, though, if it would be agreeable to him, to deal with most of the questions he raised when we reach the committee stage, because at that point I will have the officials before me and be able to give the detailed answers to the particular questions he asked.

The bill primarily clarifies the authority for making charges which are already in existence. The whole of the subject matter in this connection was brought to light by a question raised in the course of a dispute as to the right to make a charge in respect to overflights. Such charges were made under the authority of the Financial Administration Act. When one looks at the wording of that act he finds that it covers, primarily, services provided to some person and which can be charged for. The situation as it affects airports is somewhat different. The charge levied is, to some extent, a charge for services but it is also, to some extent, a charge for the provision of a facility which is available. The bill is to clarify the legal position in this respect so that there should be no doubt about it; and it is to give authority under the Aeronautics Act to make regulations on this subject that this measure has been brought forward. I think this represents a welcome improvement. I must here give my predecessor in office credit for initiating a part of the legislation, although there have been parts added since he left office.

That is the basic need. It is not a matter of imposing a series of new charges that we had not previously thought of; it is a matter of regularizing and clarifying the authority and removing any doubt as to its legal validity.

Some questions were raised as to the propriety of any charges. I think I should remind hon. members of what is a rather obvious fact. In this country, with the vast distances we have to contend with, it is obviously desirable that our airports be well maintained and made more efficient for the use for which they are intended, and that more of them be built. Perhaps at this stage of our development the need applies to the very smallest airstrips in some of the thinly populated areas even more than in the case of the more up to date airports in the larger cities.

But surely as a principle it is desirable that charges be made for these facilities so that the moneys available to the consolidated revenue fund can be used to expand facilities, increase the number of airstrips and meet the constant demand for increase and improvement of airports, rather than cutting back on the charges and having the moneys that are available used for the service operation of the operating facilities used by certain people. I must say I find myself differing with the hon. member for the Yukon when he refers to a charge being made to aircraft operators only and tries to say they are being discriminated against.

The hon. member made reference to parking on airports and other such matters. I think a great many cities and towns in Canada today have parking meters on their streets and they are very efficient in seeing that payment is made for the use of the public roadway for parking. I cannot accept the proposition that airport parking and other facilities should be provided without charge. I think we will make much better progress in the development of our country if we make these charges and use what additional money we can provide through taxes for the expansion of facilities, whether in the form of new airstrips or the improvement of facilities.

Some question was raised about safety regulations. I do not know that it is germane to the bill, but I certainly must defend the government's decision not to use Penhold as an ab initio jet training base. I do not believe there is any other area in Canada where three air routes converge in such a way as they do in that immediate locality. I am frank to say I am not technically qualified in this field, and I must say I spent a great deal of time checking the reports of the technical officers very closely. I simply do not believe there is any hon. member who would concur in the establishment of an ab initio training base in the vicinity of these very busy air routes, particularly when one bears in mind the speed of the newest modern jet aircraft and also the larger number of persons carried in passenger aircraft. I am sure that if hon. members had had the opportunity of checking into the matter thoroughly they would feel we simply could not defend taking risks that do not require to be taken. It is bad enough to have the risks that are involved these days in modern means of transport, but to add to them in that way when there are other areas of the country available is a risk that I cannot imagine any member on either side of the house taking.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Nielsen: I do not know whether he is familiar with the situation at Portage la Prairie which is now an R.C.A.F. jet training base. Would he mind comparing Penhold with Portage la Prairie? It is true that Portage la Prairie does not have three air routes converging there, but at Portage quite a large area has been set aside well south of the air route and the air station and procedures have been developed which do not endanger the main air route which passes right over the edge of Portage and is sufficiently close to cause danger under the principle enunciated by the minister. Could not the same procedures be developed at Penhold whereby jet aircraft would be routed in such a fashion that they would be in an area free of any commercial air traffic?

Mr. McIlraith: The simple answer to the question is no. We had that situation looked into rather thoroughly because of an interview that took place recently with persons making representations respecting the Penhold base. They made the same point, and as a consequence we had it looked into particularly. The situation is different in almost every material respect. The ab initio jet training base at Portage does not have three air routes around. They have three sides free. There are also other differences. On practically every point that is relevant there is quite a sharp distinction to be drawn. I must say I was quite concerned about the matter when it was first raised and for that reason I had it looked into very carefully. I do not believe there are other answers I can usefully add at the moment at the second reading stage. I will answer particular questions in committee if that is agreeable.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Charges for use of facilities or services.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister one question. Has this bill any application to airports owned by municipalities that have received grants for their construction and development from the federal government?

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I might first answer the question asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers. As I understand his question, he wanted to know how much money the crown will have to refund as a result of the decision to cancel the route facility fee by reason of some question being raised as to its validity. The amount to be refunded is about $1 million.

A question was asked also as to the number of companies involved. Actually, because of the way the accounts are kept and the fact there are other charges credited against some of these charges, it involves some 213 separate accounts. This answer, perhaps, is not very helpful but I should point out that in a good many cases it is just a matter of checking out the accounts and very little is involved by way of refund.

Mr. Balcer: Is the purpose of the new section simply to legalize the position of the department? Is it the intention of the department to use the authority of this section to carry on the charge of $64 by way of route facility fees?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it would make it possible to do this; it grants the authority. The government would have to take a decision of course to make these charges under this authority, but it does grant such authority.

I wonder if the hon. member for Kootenay West would repeat his question?

Mr. Balcer: May I just ask one last question on the same subject? Is it the intention of the department to charge the $64 from now on?

Mr. McIlraith: It has not been decided yet.

Mr. Herridge: I just wish to ask the minister this question. Has the first section of this bill any application to airports owned by municipalities which have received grants from the federal government for their construction and improvement?

Mr. McIlraith: No, it is only applicable to federally owned airports.

Mr. Nielsen: I did not mention aircraft parking fees, Mr. Chairman, as the minister thought I had. Since he has raised the subject, may I say that I do not believe aircraft parking can be compared to the parking of automobiles. This is, of course, one of the nuisances, the imposition of a fee for parking an aircraft on a D.O.T. airport. You cannot draw an analogy between an airplane and an automobile in this respect. They are just as different as night and day. In the first place, the main reason an airplane remains located on an airport is that it must have a large area of ground on which to land. Then, the aircraft, due to its design is not capable of being driven down city streets or highways. In effect, it is forced to remain at the airport. The aircraft owner has not any choice. The automobile owner has scores of alternative places in which to leave his car, but his own property is the most common place.

The average Canadian taxpayer pays for many facilities which are constructed with the use of public funds. My general plea against the provisions of section 1 of this bill is that while an individual may never expect to use these facilities to which he has contributed, it is not merely those who use the facilities who benefit from them. In this case, the general public benefits from the facilities established at airports. The D.O.T. facilities are for public benefit and the individual is free to use them whenever he has the opportunity. I could refer to such facilities as parks, bridle paths in national parks, playgrounds, museums and so on, which are operated without fees. Airports are such facilities just as much as our highways are. They are part of the public transportation system, just as much as the highways and railways are. The users of airports should no more be subjected to excess tariffs than the users of highways or railways. I would add at this point that this argument applies only to those who use the facilities of D.O.T. airports in a private capacity and not to those operating in a commercial capacity.

Private aircraft owners of this country are just as much taxpayers as any other group of taxpayers. They have, as I said, already contributed to the cost of airports. If we start imposing fees on the users of airports in this country, and not just airports but all facilities, then we are going to have to expect the authorities in the United States and Alaska will impose the same kind of fees. This will only have one result and that will be to curtail private aircraft travel between the two countries. Taken in total it imposes a restriction on the use of some 14,000 to 15,000 private airplanes.

The minister has said it is not the intention of the government to impose the $64 per hour fee on foreign users of air facilities for overflights in Canada. I hope I am correct in that assumption because that is the basis upon which the following remarks are going to be made.

Mr. McIlraith: In answer to a previous question on that point I said the matter had not yet been decided by the government, that it had not been up for decision.

Mr. Nielsen: Then, what the minister is asking the committee to do, because section 1 of the bill does not cover this aspect, is to grant authority so that it will be there in the event the government decides to use it. I think that, in itself, is a very dangerous thing to do. If the government does decide to impose a tariff on foreign air line users who use our Canadian air facilities on overflights, then I suggest the foreign nation will impose a like tariff on Canadian aircraft using foreign facilities. I believe that was the position before the government changed. I think the minister is aware of this. If this government decides to impose this type of tariff, the United States will retaliate and so will Mexico and the other nations which have terminals used by Canadian air carriers.

I think what we should be doing is encouraging the free intercourse of commercial aviation in the world. Canada should take the lead and operate on such a basis. I do not think there is a move on the part of any other nation to impose such a fee as this tax on facilities which, in effect, are provided for safety in air navigation. This covers the use of the facilities so far as commercial air carriers are concerned. But consider for a moment the effect it would have on the users of some 8,000 private airplanes in the United States, many thousands of whom travel into this country and use our air navigation facilities. This clause would authorize the government to impose such a tariff on those users.

I have already stipulated my reasons for being generally opposed to the idea of placing a tax on facilities supplied by the department for air navigation in Canada. Here I do not speak of a tax for airport parking or a tax for landing at an airport, a tax incidentally which is already supplemented by the one cent per gallon gasoline tax, which is paid by everybody who buys a gallon of gas at an airport in Canada. But I am speaking also of the facilities in the way of radio ranges, weather services, and all the vast range of very desirable facilities provided by the department for the safety of the commercial and private air industry.

I do not think that these facilities should be taxed. The minister has left the implication with the committee that if these taxes are not imposed on the users of D.O.T. facilities, we will not be going ahead with the program for expanding our existing airports and navigation facilities. I do not think that is a valid argument. I think the government has a duty to provide these services for the benefit of all Canadians, and no particular segment of Canadians should be taxed for the purpose of paying for these facilities. The test is not who uses the facilities but who benefits from the establishment of them. My submission is that all Canadians benefit from the establishment and enlargement of these facilities, and therefore all Canadians should pay an equal amount for their construction and maintenance.

Clause 1 in the bill establishes an order in council power which would allow very far-reaching regulations to be made, with no limits to the amount of tax that could be imposed with respect to the use of these facilities. If the government wished, it could make it so difficult, in terms of exacting tariffs on private aircraft users in Canada, that they would be forced to discontinue the use of our major airports and would be forced, if you like, to use farmers' fields. That is the effect of the provision as it now stands. I am not saying the government will abuse it to that extent, but the power is there.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question. I have been trying to follow his argument, which I take it, refers to paragraph (b) of the proposed new section 3A. As I read it, the last three words say "at any airport". I fail to follow his line of argument that that included such things as radio ranges and other aids to air navigation. As I understand it, paragraph (a) would apply to facilities for an aircraft on an airport, and paragraph (b) would apply to facilities other than for an aircraft on an airport. I wonder how he relates his argument to a charge on navigational aids.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member would read the whole clause he would see the effect of subclause 2 is to give the minister the power—> —to impose upon the owners or operators, wherever resident, of any aircraft, charges for the availability during any flights of such aircraft within or outside Canada of any facility or service provided by or on behalf of the minister.

That covers every facility provided by the department, and includes radio ranges, beacons, I.L.S. systems, and every system used for navigation in Canada. I do not want to go through a list of them. There is such a wide variety of very excellent services, supplied by the department for the users of airways and air space in Canada, that it would be too lengthy to go through them all, but therein lies the very danger of giving to the minister these very wide powers for the imposition of this type of tax.

In principle it is wrong because the facilities are for the benefit of all Canadians. As such they should be paid for by all Canadians, and a particular segment of Canadians should not be taxed in addition to the taxes they already pay. Second, the minister has left the implication with the committee that the only reason the clause is being passed is to legalize something that has already been done, first of all with reference to the $64 per hour for overflights by foreign carriers, and second with respect to the fees now imposed, and which I have mentioned, at Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto. I ask for an explanation how these fees could be imposed—and I believe they have been in effect since April or May—when this legislation is not yet passed.

For all these reasons I feel that the clause is an extremely undesirable one and gives rise to all sorts of dangerous possibilities. It stifles the growth of the private air industry in Canada, and the minister himself has said that the government has not yet made up its mind as to whether or not the hourly rate will be charged for overflights. It seems to me the power is not necessary in that regard at the moment, and so far as taxing private aircraft owners in Canada for parking, landing, and using air navigation aids, I think it is not a very good principle to establish. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler):

That clause 1 of Bill No. C-117 be struck out.

Mr. Macdonald: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member for Grey-Bruce is here. I do not see him.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry. Then the hon. member for Peace River will second it.

Mr. Peters: Six o'clock.

Mr. Nielsen: No, it is not.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair in this particular case will have to consider that the amendment is not in order as it is a direct negative. Even with the clause as it is, the hon. member still has the right to vote against it, which will produce the same result.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, Mr. Chairman, I of course accept your ruling. I know I have the right to vote against it, or for it, but as I understand the rules these restrictions against members placing motions before the committee, or before the house, have only to do with increasing the amount of money expenditures which may be imposed on the treasury.

Mr. McIlraith: You cannot move a negative.

Mr. Nielsen: But there is no restriction, at least that I know of, which would prevent a member from making an attempt to reduce the expenditures on the treasury.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not want to argue with the hon. member about this ruling, but I am still of the opinion that a direct negative in this particular case could not be considered as an amendment.

Mr. Nielsen: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the house leader to confirm that there will be no sitting of the house tonight. Our party was agreeable to resuming at eight o'clock, but I presume that has fallen by the wayside. Would he repeat the business for tomorrow and Friday, so that it will be in the proper place in Hansard?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am very regretful that it was not possible to reach agreement to sit this evening; but it was not possible. Therefore we will be adjourning until tomorrow at 2.30. Some time after that when we reach the orders of the day we will call the estimates of the Department of National Defence. If they are concluded this week, and there is still some time left, we will take other departments that have already been discussed. The departments I have in mind at the moment are the Department of Labour and the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Fane: What about the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said, departments that had already been discussed. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources would also be available. It might be that the order of those departments might have to be changed because of other circumstances. I endeavoured to see my colleagues in the last few minutes but was not able to do so. That is what I have in mind at present. In any event, it is quite certain as far as the Department of National Defence is concerned.

I think perhaps hon. members will not mind my stressing the fact that unless we get some of these estimates concluded and some of the other business concluded, the prospects for prorogation before Christmas do not look too bright.

Mr. Peters: Easter would be a good target date.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 5, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House
5th December, 1963

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable J. R. Cartwright, judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 5th December, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,

A. G. Cherrier,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

PRIVILEGE

MR. THOMPSON—SUPPORT FOR GOVERNMENT LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. A question was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra of the Prime Minister in these words:

In view of persistent rumours that an election will be called in the near future, can the Prime Minister indicate if it is his intention to call an early election?

The Prime Minister answered as follows:

Mr. Speaker, contrary to some reports that have been made, we intend to proceed with our program for this parliament, and if an election is called before the end of this parliament it will be the responsibility of those on the other side of the house.

The reference, of course, is to the opposition. If the legislative program to which the Prime Minister referred means that he intends to complete and put into legislative form those things which will permit full employment for all Canadians; introduce the Canada pension plan as agreed to by the provinces; the extension of family allowances to include student age groups; the Canadian flag and national anthem; and the redistribution program, we in the Social Credit party want to assure the Canadian people that we will not stop the government as long as it really intends to carry through to completion these highly desirable items of legislation. We do not want the government to accuse us of planning to block its legislative program.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am raising a question of privilege. My point of privilege is that we should not be subjected to these phony points of privilege.

MR. CAOUETTE—INCOMPLETE ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to rise on a question of privilege.

Last November 26 I put question No. 1,751 on the order paper, to which only a partial reply was given yesterday.

For instance, no reply was given to that part of the question dealing with the value of consumer goods and services produced in Canada during the last five years. Neither have I received any information concerning the value of goods and services consumed in Canada during the same period.

Mr. Speaker, I say that the manner in which the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) replied to my questions is further proof of the government's arrogance toward members of this house and the people of Canada.

I also submit that the minister is or should be capable of answering such questions. Otherwise, how could he determine what he calls the gross national product when he prepares his budget? If the minister is unable to answer those questions, it is not surprising that our economy is drifting, that the country is badly administered and that the government is constantly in the red.

On the other hand—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Caouette: —if the minister knows the answers to the various parts of my question, I would ask for a reply.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is quite evident that there is no point of privilege. There is no prima facie case. This is in the nature of a complaint. If there were more supply motions I presume the hon. member could raise his complaint at that time. However, I am advised it is possible that we will be on the estimates before very long, and if the question relates to any of the estimates under discussion the complaint can be raised at that time. I understand that today we are beginning the estimates of the Department of National Defence, and if they are finished we will then take transport, labour, public works and northern affairs, all of which should give hon. members an opportunity for raising matters of complaint, if there are any. Obviously it is altogether out of order to raise that type of complaint at this time.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) presented the second report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, and asked for unanimous consent to move that the report be concurred in.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): If I may speak to this motion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate that unanimous consent is not given. I believe that it is wrong that we should be reducing the quorum for this particular committee, and I wanted to make it quite clear that the motion did not have the unanimous consent of this house.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, as I am the one who moved that the quorum be reduced from 14 to 10, I must state that we had to wait three quarters of an hour this morning before we had the required number of members so that the committee could proceed.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must realize by now that matters affecting committees and the proceedings before committees should be dealt with during the sessions of those committees and not brought up on the floor of the house.

Unanimous consent being refused, the motion will not be put.

PENSIONS

INVESTMENT OF RESERVE FUNDS IN PROVINCIAL OR MUNICIPAL SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Press reports indicate that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has suggested in British Columbia that the federal government will make an offer to the provinces that half the pension reserve fund will be used to purchase provincial or municipal securities. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the house if such an offer has been made to the provinces or will be made in the near future.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no such offer has been made in those terms. However, in the discussions which took place at the conference last week this was put forward as one way of reassuring the provinces on this matter, and dividing any surplus funds. But there were other methods put forward, too, and no definite offer in any particular terms has yet been submitted.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): As a supplementary question, does this mean that the further scheme to be put forward will be a funded scheme, rather than the plan which is indicated on the order paper at present?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in that respect. There will be a contingency reserve and there will be an element of funding in the national plan, but it could not be looked upon as a funded plan.

Mr. Douglas: Is it not a fact that since the $10 a month to old age security pensioners will not be paid out of the fund, this will result in some accumulation of funds not previously anticipated?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot answer that question, but I will be glad to look into it.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

OFFER OF SUD-AVIATION TO BUILD CARAVELLE PLANES IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry and Defence Production. Has the minister received from General Puget, president of Sud-Aviation, a letter referring to the possibility of building in Canada the Caravelle aircraft that Trans-Canada Air Lines could eventually require?

[Text]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my recollection, yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry and Defence Production. When he took that request into consideration, did he consider that it could help reduce unemployment in Canada?

[Text]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, naturally the representations made in the letter were taken into consideration, but I can assure the hon. member that in so far as the proposals contained in the letter were concerned in relation to their effect on unemployment in Canada, the decision of the government in respect of the purchase of aircraft would have a more beneficial effect on unemployment than those proposals.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport?

In view of the contradictory statements made and of the confusion which exists in the Canadian public, does the minister intend to recommend to the cabinet the setting up of a royal commission to clear up the T.C.A. matter concerning the choice of the DC-9?

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: On a point of order, I addressed a specific question to the minister and I ask the hon. gentleman to answer yes or no. That is all.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I am sorry if I am not as capable as I should be of hearing questions in both languages. I would prefer to take the hon. member's question as notice because I am not sure that the translation represented exactly what the hon. member meant.

Mr. Pigeon: I will put my question in English.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it would be very good training for the minister to read it in French.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he agrees with Mr. McGregor's statement that future purchases of airplanes should no longer be submitted to the government for approval.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not agree with the hon. member's interpretation of what was said. I think he should take the record and read it.

Mr. Pigeon: Is it the intention of the minister to recommend that a royal commission inquire into this question?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFFS IN CANADIAN SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, I will direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister inform the house of the steps taken to prevent the lay-off of 10,000 workers in Canadian shipyards, as reported a few days ago by Mr. Ted Payne, an official of the metal trades federation?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the premise on which that question was based, but in any event I would have to look into it, and I could not answer it at this time on orders of the day.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—ALLEGED MISCARRIAGE IN COFFIN CASE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbiniere): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the fact that Mr. Jacques Hebert published a rather contentious book, where the efficiency of the judicial system of Canada is questioned, and where unkind things are said about a former minister of justice, Mr. Garson, does the present Minister of Justice intend to make a statement or to take any particular measures on that matter?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I read this morning in the papers the statement mentioned by my hon. friend. As I often had occasion to say to this house, it is to the provinces that the Canadian constitution grants jurisdiction in the field of justice; consequently, the provinces have the prime responsibility of maintaining law and order on their own territory. The same opinion prevailed in the Coffin case.

As for the reference to the former minister of justice, I do not think that it affects him in any way, as it was not he, but rather the solicitor general who, at the time, was responsible for that question. In any case, it is a question which does not hold today.

I thank the hon. member for Lotbiniere for having given me notice of his question and, if need be, I shall convey it to the attorney general of the province.

[Text]

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Since doubts have been cast upon the Criminal Code in this case and the code comes under federal jurisdiction, is the minister not of the opinion that the matter should be investigated?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, my answer is no because, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Lapointe said in the preamble to his question, the constitution specifies quite clearly that the administration of justice is under provincial jurisdiction.

[Text]

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: There is a supplementary question.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that it was a decision of the federal cabinet in declining to commute Mr. Coffin's sentence of death which resulted in his execution, does the minister still not feel there is any obligation on the federal cabinet to investigate these charges of what amounts to a conspiracy to murder Mr. Coffin?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add anything to the answer I gave the hon. member for Lotbiniere, which I think deals amply with the situation as I understand it.

Mr. Peters: Parliament might like to hear it.

REPORTED REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF ONTARIO POLICE COMMISSION CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Is it true that the federal Department of Justice have asked for the resignation of Judge Bruce MacDonald as chairman of the Ontario police commission? The reason I ask this is that this gentleman has been asked to visit Sudbury in the near future to comment on his report on the Sudbury police commission investigation.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. On the contrary, the former government early in 1962 gave leave of absence for 18 months to His Honour Judge MacDonald to serve as chairman of the Ontario police commission. That leave expired at the end of September and I was asked for further leave, which I recommended to the governor in council on September 30. That leave was granted, and it does not expire until the end of this year. If a request is made for still further leave of absence, it will be given consideration at the time.

BRIDGES

THREE RIVERS, QUE.—REPORTED BEGINNING OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is he aware that a bridge is being built in Three Rivers at the present time; and if so, what is he going to do about it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION RESPECTING 12 MILE FISHING ZONE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and I am not sure whether it should be directed to the Minister of Fisheries or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. However, as they are both in the house, having returned from their trip to Washington, I wonder if one or the other would give the house a report on the negotiations with the United States regarding the 12 mile limit and its implications for United States and Canadian fishermen.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and I yesterday attended in Washington the second meeting with representatives of the United States government following the announcement by the Prime Minister on June 4 last that it was the decision of the government of Canada to establish a 12 mile fishing zone to be effective some time in the month of May, 1964.

When this announcement was made following his statement of intention to the President of the United States, the Prime Minister intimated that Canada would take into consideration the historic fishing rights of certain countries, including the United States. As the United States had a very definite interest in this matter, it was decided that the negotiations with the United States and as well other countries should be pursued. These began, my hon. friend will recall, in the month of August of this year in Ottawa.

The second meeting took place in Washington yesterday. There will be a third meeting in Ottawa some time in January, which I believe and trust will conclude this phase of discussions. I may say that the discussions yesterday marked considerable progress in the positions of the two countries. There was an acknowledgment of the position of Canada, and we have taken careful note of the position put forward by the United States in these talks. I can go no further at this time because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: You are still standing still.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can go no further, as my hon. friend will understand, until these negotiations have been completed.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs imply that United States fishermen will still be permitted within three miles of the coast of Canada, while Canadian fishermen must still remain 12 miles outside Canada's fishing boundaries?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I gather that my hon. friend is basing his question on a newspaper report. The newspaper correspondents were not present at the discussions, and I do not propose to reveal any discussions except to say that these newspaper reports do not represent the full situation.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question to the minister of external affairs. Is it the intention of the minister of external affairs and the Minister of Fisheries to visit Spain, Portugal, France and the U.K. before they let the house know exactly what the position is in this matter?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps my hon. friend may not be pleased to know that there is no such intention.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries which is related to the matter just raised about the visit of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries to Washington. I would ask the Minister of Fisheries, now that we have had that answer from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if he would tell us what really happened in Washington.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have very little to add to what has been said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs except that the meeting held yesterday was most satisfactory.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STATEMENT BY QUEBEC MINISTER RESPECTING FEDERAL CONCESSIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the statement made by the Quebec minister of natural resources, Mr. Rene Levesque, to the effect that the concessions the federal government made at the last federal-provincial conference were but an appetizer and that the meal will come later, can the Prime Minister now tell the house what he intends to serve to the provinces as the main dish?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make. Indeed, it would be improper for me to make any comment on a statement of that kind reported to have been made by a provincial cabinet minister.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a rather pertinent question to the Prime Minister. In view of opinions being expressed by some of the Prime Minister's associates, particularly the hon. member for Lotbiniere, can the Prime Minister tell the house whether the Queen of Canada is bilingual in the best Canadian tradition?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I am happy to say that that is in the true Canadian tradition.

TRANSPORT

WELLAND CANAL—FINANCING OF CAPITAL COST OF LOCK TWINNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What is the plan of the government in financing the $180 million capital cost of the lock twinning on the Welland canal?

Mr. Monteith: Replacing the tolls.

Mr. McMillan: Will any part of this amount be recovered through tolls?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I would like to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs. What stage have the proceedings of the boundary waters commission reached concerning the Richelieu river canalization project? I should like a definite answer.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, I must say that last June the commission visited the Albany to Sorel area as well as the Valleyfield and Laprairie basins. In September it held its first public hearings in Canada and in the United States. The comprehensive information brought before the commission during that public inquiry is now under consideration. Of course, that information will be subject to an examination by the board in the context of its general investigation.

Mr. Pigeon: I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker. When does the minister expect that a final report will be made public?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I could not say at this time.

[Text]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

FORT CHURCHILL, MAN.—USE OF MILITARY BUILDINGS FOR INDIAN EDUCATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I wonder whether the minister could tell the house whether his department is planning to establish school facilities for a large number of Eskimo children at the present site of the military camp at Fort Churchill.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of government policy and will be announced in due course.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister would be able to indicate approximately when we might be able to get some information along those lines?

Mr. Laing: I hope very quickly, Mr. Speaker.

HAINES ROAD—STATEMENT RESPECTING MAINTENANCE DURING WINTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): On Tuesday last the hon. member for Yukon asked if I would make a statement in respect of the agreement which has been reached with the state of Alaska for keeping open the Haines cut-off highway. As he knows, this originated out of the sending of a group of senior officials from various departments to study the entire communications system in that area, which is becoming so important to northwest Canada.

I wish to inform the hon. member now that a senior official of my colleague the Minister of Public Works has proceeded to Alaska and has concluded an agreement with the state of Alaska to keep open our portion of the Haines cut-off road in British Columbia this winter at a cost of $127,050 payable in United States funds, for which the state of Alaska will furnish the equipment and the operators for the tractors, snowplows and so on. The government of Canada in the person of the Minister of Public Works will be providing the supervisory personnel.

When Mr. Williams of the Department of Public Works was there he also saw the minister of highways for British Columbia, Mr. Gaglardi, who had indicated prior to September 30 that his government would contribute toward the maintenance of the highway. However, he has indicated now that he would prefer to wait until after this experimental season is over, and if the operation is successful his government will be glad to contribute in the coming years.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of what the minister has said in his announcement, am I to understand that the agreement that has been arranged has been concluded on the basis that the Canadian government is going to pay $127,050 for the rental of United States equipment and the wages of United States labour to maintain a Canadian road?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that my hon. friend, who took full credit for the success of this project some time ago, should now find fault with it. As he well knows and as I am sure many members of the house do not know, because of the particular and highly unusual nature of the geography of the area it would cost many times more than the amount I have referred to if Canadian equipment were made available. And I want to tell him that, as I think he probably knows, this type of equipment is not available at the present time on the northwest highway system. Any alternative involving the provision of Canadian workmen or Canadian machinery for this experimental period of one year would cost us infinitely more money.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I will reserve my remaining remarks for the minister's estimates.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT OF 1962-63 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister report to the house whether any final payments will be made on the 1962-63 crop year and when such payments will be forthcoming, since it is approximately six months ago that the crop year ended?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the first question is yes; to the second, as soon as possible.

DURUM WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO DELIVERY PROSPECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We are pleased that western hard spring wheat is moving in increasing volume, although delivery quotas are not as high as they were at this time last year. Has the minister received inquiries regarding Durum wheat, and can he give any indication of Durum delivery prospects for the remainder of this crop year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would have to take part of that question as notice. I can assure the hon. member there has been a very active demand for Durum wheat throughout the year. However, I am not sure about delivery prospects, and I should like to take that part of his question as notice.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED ASSAULT ON INDIANS IN DRIFTPILE AREA, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the department has received, I believe, a petition of right filed on behalf of several Indians in the Driftpile area of my constituency in regard to an alleged assault by a member of the R.C.M.P., will the minister, in collaboration with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, give the most careful and exhaustive study to this matter before instructing his department as to whether a defence is to be filed?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): I can assure the hon. member that I will, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR INCREASED HOSPITAL GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the urgent request of the metropolitan council of Toronto, and the fact that there is a critical shortage of after-treatment beds in hospitals, requiring an early start on construction, a matter which depends on the government's answer to that request, would the Prime Minister tell us now or announce shortly the policy of the government with respect to the requested increase in federal grants for hospital construction?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I cannot answer that question without notice, but I will be glad to take it as notice and discuss it with my colleague the minister of health and welfare, who will be in the house later today.

USE OF CHILDREN'S TEETH AS RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT CHECK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister of health and welfare a question, but in her absence I will address it to her parliamentary secretary, who may want to take it as notice. My question is based on a newspaper report in which the minister threw doubt on the efficacy of experiments being carried out at the University of Toronto, a matter reported in the Toronto Telegram as follows:

> The usefulness of a University of Toronto experiment on babies' teeth as a check on radioactive fallout was questioned yesterday by health minister LaMarsh.
> She said some broad conclusions could possibly be drawn from such an experiment but too many questions could not be answered. The university, with assistance from the Voice of Women, have appealed to parents to send in their children's baby teeth when they are removed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Miss LaMarsh said information such as diet, parentage, where the child lived and so on were required before tests could be conclusive.

My question is, on what scientific basis does the minister question the experimental work being done at the University of Toronto?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this question as notice.

PUBLICATIONS

COMPETITION WITH CANADIAN EDITIONS OF U.S. MAGAZINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he is ready, or can tell us when he will be ready, to give us that policy announcement or statement with regard to Canadian publications as he promised, which publications are being grieviously affected, as I think he agreed, by certain kinds of competition.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did tell my hon. friend that I hoped to be in a position to make a statement on this matter this week, but there have been certain developments which may require the postponement of that statement for a few days. I will be glad to explain those developments to the hon. gentleman.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIVY COUNCIL PRESIDENT RESPECTING CANADIAN NATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Privy Council a question?

Following a statement attributed by various newspapers, among which Le Devoir and the Gazette, to the President of the Privy Council does the hon. gentleman still deny the existence of two nations in Canada and reject the French Canadian nation?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must state that I never said such a thing. It is just an inaccurate press report.

I said, rather, that the word "nation" has two very definite meanings. First of all, a political one, and, from that angle, there is, under our confederation as it exists only one Canadian nation. Then, there is a cultural meaning, and, in that respect, it is perfectly admissible to speak of a French Canadian nation.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Has the minister received a communication from Mr. Rene Levesque, blaming the minister for calling him a cryptoseparatist?

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED DISMISSAL OF INSURANCE OFFICIAL THROUGH POLITICAL DISCRIMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether his attention has been drawn to a report that Mr. James A. Renwick, a member of the Canadian board of the Norwich Union insurance societies has been asked to resign by the chairman, Mr. Henry Borden, because of his affiliation with the New Democratic party. I want to ask the Minister of Justice what steps the government can take to protect people in this country against political discrimination by firms owned and controlled outside Canada.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): While I read the Globe and Mail rather hurriedly this morning, after several other papers, I am sorry to say that apart from having seen the picture of the person to whom the hon. member has referred I am not familiar with the details, and I will have to look at the article in order to inquire into the situation. I would think if there is any remedy it would lie in a statute passed by this house, one with which I am sure the hon. member is familiar. It is known as the bill of rights.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): If in the course of his investigation the minister finds this allegation to be true, would he consider the possibility of cancelling the licence under which this company operates, in protest against this disgraceful piece of political discrimination?

NATIONAL PARKS

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN SITUATION RESPECTING LAND TENURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I want to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. It was reported in at least one Calgary newspaper that the hon. gentleman's department is anticipating abolishing the leases governing the tenure of land situated in the national parks and instituting a system of land taxes. I might add that the newspaper said the minister himself made that statement. Would the hon. gentleman care to comment on the accuracy of that report?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): We are embarking on some studies with reference to the entire leasehold structure within the national parks.

HARBOURS

GROS CACOUNA, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works?

Could the Minister of Public Works tell me whether an order in council has been passed to authorize the building of a deep-water harbour in Gros Cacouna?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker, but we are giving serious consideration to that project.

Mr. Ricard: What would be the approximate date on which the minister feels he will be able to take appropriate action concerning the project?

Mr. Deschatelets: As soon as we receive reports from our engineers as regards a possible site at Riviere du Loup; then the cost will have been determined and I will be pleased to advise the house as to it.

Mr. Ricard: How can the minister say that this project will be carried out when he is not sure yet of the engineers' approval?

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—FACILITIES FOR IN TRANSIT PASSENGERS ON INTERNATIONAL FLIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In answer to a question on November 21 the minister said he was looking into the arrangements at the new Winnipeg airport for international air line passengers who have to stop over there between flights. Has he been able to look into this matter, and has he any report to make regarding an improvement in these arrangements?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Yes, I have looked into the matter and some changes have been made. I am not yet able to give a report, but I will bring forward a report for the hon. member's information.

UNITED NATIONS

PORTUGAL—CANADIAN VOTE ON RESOLUTION RESPECTING COLONIAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Royal inquired about the relationship between my criticism of Portugal's colonial policy in my statement on November 28 and Canada's abstention in the vote on the resolution on Portuguese territories passed by the general assembly on December 3.

In an explanation of our vote in the fourth committee on Friday, November 29, the Canadian representative said that the Canadian government had strong sympathy for the aspirations of the African people in Portuguese territories and viewed with deep regret the failure of the government of Portugal to acknowledge its obligations under the charter and to apply the principle of self determination in its overseas territories.

Canada fully supports those parts of the resolution calling upon Portugal once again to co-operate with the United Nations. We do not, however, consider that the present situation warrants a recommendation for action under chapter VII of the charter which deals with situations threatening to the peace. We believe that under the charter of the United Nations this is a matter for the security council to decide.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister agree that to express sympathy for the colonial peoples who are under Portuguese subjection and then at the same time to lack the courage to vote in condemnation of the imperialistic exploitation of these people borders on hypocrisy?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend may have established in his own mind a foundation for his conclusion, but the fact is that this government, as well as the preceding government, has expressed its condemnation of certain aspects of colonial policy as practised by Portugal. The government believes, however, that it is consistent with the procedural and constitutional requirements of the charter to oppose particular policies practised by certain powers with regard to colonial administration. We believe that the future integrity and usefulness of the United Nations depends upon respect for the charter by all members of the United Nations, those that may be subject to criticism and those who feel they should level that criticism.

Mr. Korchinski: May we have that last statement in English?

Inquiries of the Ministry

STORMS

NEW BRUNSWICK—DAMAGE TO LOBSTER FISHERMEN'S GEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he has a report on the heavy storm damage to lobster fishermen's traps in southern New Brunswick over the past week end.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the lobster fishermen of Grand Manan, Mace's Bay, Dipper Harbour and Chance Harbour suffered heavy loss of gear in a severe storm earlier this week. I am asking my officials to report at the earliest possible date as to the extent of the damage. I might point out to the hon. member that a fishermen's indemnity plan has been established to cover loss and damage of this nature.

Mr. Bell: A supplementary question. Inasmuch as this is the height of the lobster season, may I ask how an appeal for federal assistance should go forward?

Mr. Robichaud: I am sure the fishermen concerned are aware of the existence of the fishermen's indemnity plan, a federal insurance scheme which covers losses of lobster gear. If they have not taken advantage of this insurance which is available to them there is very little that the department can do.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister assure us that consideration of assistance will be accelerated in every possible way, inasmuch as the lobster season is just beginning in these areas?

Mr. Robichaud: If an official request is received from the fishermen concerned it will be given consideration.

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS

INVITATION TO SECRETARY OF STATE TO APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has the Secretary of State been invited to appear at nine o'clock tomorrow morning before the standing committee on mines, forests and waters to explain the formal commitments he made to the house?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Frankly, sir, I do not know.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State how it is, when his word is being questioned by the members of this house, he does not know today whether he has been invited to appear tomorrow before the committee where he can explain himself?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain to the committee that I am very careful in the answers I give in the house. I have not visited my office since one o'clock, and I cannot say what may have reached my office since I was last there. But I believe the committee has not met since the incident yesterday, and I do not see how I could be invited to the committee until the committee had met and decided to invite me.

Mr. Pugh: Have you ever heard of a steering committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If it is on the same question, we have had enough.

TRADE

WHEAT—STEPS TO ENSURE DELIVERIES TO RED CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question, if I may, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the Canadian wheat board has announced the second sale of wheat to mainland China as part of the second long term agreement, will the minister indicate to the house whether he plans calling together all those interested in the handling of grain through west coast ports in order to rebuild the co-operative efforts to achieve maximum efficiency through these ports? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, for two reasons; first, to ensure that the permanent market now available in the Orient will not be hurt by such events as those which endangered our market to the east, and which occurred within recent months on the St. Lawrence system; second, my information is that certain bad habits that we eliminated in 1961 on the west coast are beginning to creep in again.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government is very much aware, as is the hon. gentleman, of the necessity for achieving the maximum movement of grain through the west coast, and I personally am very much aware of some of the difficulties that have arisen recently. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we are doing everything we possibly can to achieve the necessary co-operation of the handling agencies concerned. Whether we shall follow his example I am not certain, but I can assure him, I think, that it will be just as effective.

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO INCREASE EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I was tempted to call him the minister of wheat and commerce because of all the announcements he has made in the house recently. In addition to exports of oats, barley and wheat, can the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house what other form of exports is considered by the present government to alleviate the present slump in other areas of Canadian activity and to combat existing unemployment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to inform the hon. gentleman, who should already know it, that there has been a very rapid increase in Canadian exports of all kinds and this will indeed, apart altogether from exports of grain, be the greatest export year in our history.

Mr. Valade: A supplementary question. For the sake of clarity, can the minister give an example in view of what he has just said in order to illustrate his policy?

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not think he should have said "continuous increase"?

Mr. Sharp: I have no objection to the use of the words.

CHICKENS—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF CANADIAN PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. In view of the fact that the European economic community has imposed a very high tariff on United States chickens entering those countries, and in view of the fact that the Americans will be looking for a market for this product close to home, what steps does the government propose to take to protect Canadian chicken producers?

Hon. Rene Tremblay (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAM FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell us how soon legislation will be presented to parliament to provide milk for children in schools?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any definite information on that matter.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

1. Departmental administration including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, for total commitments of $2,529,570,600 for the purposes of votes 1, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40, 45, 50, 55, 60 and 65 of this department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $978,136,600 will come due for payment in future years) and authority to make recoverable advances under any of the said votes in respect of assistance rendered to the United Nations, any party of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or any provincial or municipal government, $3,432,000.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): In presenting the estimates of the Department of National Defence to the committee for the first time, I should like, at the outset, to make reference to the ministers who were responsible in recent years for presenting the estimates of the department when I myself was sitting on the other side of the chamber.

I am sure members will recall the outstanding services performed by Major-General Pearkes, now His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia, and in the more immediate past, those of the hon. member for Calgary North.

Both of these gentlemen carried out their duties as ministers of national defence with distinction and I am sure that in so far as the hon. member for Calgary North is concerned, members will join with me in the hope that he will have an opportunity to take part in our discussions, since with his experience in office and notwithstanding any criticism he may feel obliged to make, his views on the important subject of defence will be greatly appreciated. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that normally in view of the large sums of money involved and of the significance of the subject matter, concerning as it does our national security, the house would expect a detailed statement from me at this time. However, in so far as these estimates are concerned, special conditions apply.

In the first place, they were prepared by the previous administration, and although some changes in detail have been made, to which I will refer later, they are in concept essentially those put forward by the previous government. Second, as hon. members know, we are now in the ninth month of this fiscal year and, in consequence, a large part of the money allocated to the department has already been spent.

A third consideration, and I think a very important one, is the fact that a special committee on defence has been established by parliament and since June of this year has been actively considering various aspects of defence. The committee has received statements from the service chiefs, from the chairman of the defence research board, from myself and, in addition, has called witnesses, both in Canada and abroad, from outside the department. Minutes of the defence committee, of course, have been available to all members and I do not want to take up the time of this committee in repeating information which is already on record in those minutes. The 1963-64 estimates which you are now being asked to approve, are required to carry out our present defence obligations.

Wherever members of our forces are involved in implementing these obligations, whether it be in the Congo or the Middle East in support of the United Nations, in Europe, on the high seas on behalf of NATO, or elsewhere here at home and overseas, they are carrying out their duties in the highest traditions of those who have served in the Canadian forces throughout our history in peace and in war. I am proud, indeed honoured, to be associated with the men and women of our navy, army and air force, who I feel are second to none in the world.

The members of this house, particularly those who have visited the forces serving abroad, who have observed their work and who have had the opportunity of talking with the international commanders with whom these forces are associated, will know at first hand of the high regard in which they are held. In Europe, they have quite rightly earned the reputation as "The Elite Corps" of the NATO forces, and the same high standard applies wherever they serve, in Canada and around the world. I am sure that all members of the house would wish me to say these few words of tribute to the men and women who serve Canada so well in our armed forces.

One of the reasons for the high calibre of our forces is the training received by young officer cadets in our service colleges. As hon. members know, the Glassco commission had something to say about these colleges and, in fact, recommended closing Royal Roads. The advisory board of the colleges has carefully considered this recommendation of the commission and has submitted the opinion, with which I am heartily in accord, that the colleges are performing a necessary function having regard to the special nature of education and training required, the needs of the armed services and the current competitive situation in Canadian universities.

Royal Roads is an integral part of the Canadian service college system and the advisory board of the colleges, in expressing their views, recognized this fact. An educational institution is only as good as its teaching staff. At the end of the last academic year 56 per cent of the arts and science faculty at Royal Roads held doctorates, and this percentage will have increased to about 62 per cent by the end of the current academic year. This staff is active in research, in professional societies in Canada and abroad. Among other awards, one of the faculty was the only Canadian to receive a NATO research scholarship this year and another was the first Canadian in several years to receive a major award from the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique. The quality of the teaching staff has been reflected in a reducing failure rate: The rate for first year students is down from 20 per cent to 17 per cent, and the record of Royal Roads students in the third year at the Royal Military College is down from 17 per cent to 11 per cent. This is a very good record of achievement, and in recognition of the importance of this establishment, I state here that I agree with the opinion of the advisory board. Therefore, Royal Roads will not be closed.

Wherever our forces are serving, it is our concern to give them adequate equipment to carry out the assignments to which they have been committed. That has been the undertaking of successive governments over the years and, in general, Canadian servicemen on active service have been furnished with such equipment. There is one area, however, which is of immediate concern: This is the requirement to convert the truck-mounted motorized units of our brigade in Europe to armoured carrier-mounted, mechanized units.

To meet this requirement, a vehicle known as the Bobcat has been under development in Canada since 1954. At that time there were no competing United States or British developments and it was hoped that successful completion of the Bobcat development would result in a wide export market for the manufactured vehicle. Now, nearly 10 years later we find that the development of the Bobcat has not yet reached a stage where the vehicle could go into production.

The contract for the manufacture of 20 pilot-production vehicles required the contractor to subject the first carrier produced to a 2,000 mile endurance trial. The vehicle failed to complete this trial successfully. As a result, further redesign work is required so that we are now faced with the fact that, even if no further delays occur, delivery of production vehicles could not commence before late 1965 nor be completed before the spring of 1967. I might add here that the foreign produced content of the Bobcat is approximately 28 per cent of the total, and the estimated production cost per model has increased to a very considerable extent over the original estimate.

In the meantime, the M-113 armoured personnel carrier similar to the Bobcat, has been developed in the United States. The M-113 has been in service for three years and has been adopted by several of our NATO partners including Denmark, Greece, Italy and Germany, as well as a number of other countries outside NATO. From the logistic point of view, this is of considerable importance. Important too is the fact that the Bobcat would cost per unit close to double that of the M-113.

In view of all these circumstances, and bearing in mind the urgent requirement of the brigade, the government has decided to terminate work on the Bobcat program and to meet the brigade requirements by procurement of the M-113 carrier.

Parts of the M-113 for the United States production are already being manufactured by Canadian sub-contractors, and through the production sharing arrangement with the United States, further sub-contracting in Canada of a variety of equipment can be anticipated.

As hon. members, especially members of the special defence committee who are here today know, a review has been under way within the Department of National Defence to determine the best and most effective contribution we can make to the collective defence of the free world and to the maintenance of peace in the years ahead. This review is proceeding and some preliminary decisions have been made, following studies in particular fields; relating to equipment programs which, if proceeded with, would seriously limit the determination of what our policy may be in the future. With rapidly changing concepts of warfare and improvements in weapons technology, I think most hon. members will agree that such a review is not only desirable but essential.

In addition to the work we are carrying out, I am looking forward to receiving the interim report of the special committee on defence which, I understand, will be submitted to the house later this month. As I have stated previously, I expect to be in a position to table in the house a white paper on defence next year, prior to the consideration of the 1964-65 estimates.

In so far as the estimates for the current fiscal year are concerned, these, as shown in the blue book, amounted to $1,590,006,537 and I think it would be of interest to hon. members to give some breakdown of this amount in addition to the details contained in the blue book. Personnel, operating and maintenance costs account for 77.3 per cent of the total; major equipment 16.6 per cent; construction 3.1 per cent; development 1.0 per cent; mutual aid 2.0 per cent.

The ratio between maintenance and capital costs is a matter of concern which has been, and is being given serious study within the department. Our aim is to find ways and means of reducing overhead, and by cutting operations and maintenance costs, achieve a re-direction of expenditures to improve our defensive capability. This is not a simple task. It requires an intensive study of alternative ways to achieve our purpose, and careful cost-effectiveness analysis of the components of the defence programs. This is clearly a process requiring continuous and constant attention.

Without this careful attention—call it judicious pruning, if you will—our defence budget would soon top the $2 billion mark if we were to maintain our present establishment, with all its ramifications, and at the same time furnish our forces with adequate equipment and weapons. It is our intention to keep defence expenditures within reasonable bounds, without affecting the true operational effectiveness of our contribution to collective security.

Our end objective is to get the best result for each defence dollar spent. To do this, it is essential to examine critically each element of the defence program in terms of its cost and its contribution to effective defence.

Over the last several months a thorough examination has been made in a determined effort to appraise whether the dollars going into the various components of our defence organization are producing appropriate results. We have now reached a number of conclusions which will result in reductions in expenditures for maintenance of the defence establishment. This is an essential first step towards providing, in the longer run, a more effective contribution to the national security of our country from the resources that can be made available for this purpose.

These changes do not materially affect the estimates you are being asked to approve today, as it will take time to implement them. Also, it is inevitable that there will be substantial one-time costs associated initially in the process of bringing about these changes that are designed, over the long run, to save money.

There is no way of accomplishing these worth-while re-adjustments without causing some individual and community problems. We are therefore anxious to give the maximum advance notice of changes in order to minimize these problems of re-adjustment.

Speaking first of all of the Royal Canadian Navy, our examination has shown us that costs can be reduced in some areas. The navy now operates about 160 auxiliary vessels of various kinds such as tugs, supply ships, harbour craft, and so on. We find that we can take 10 of these vessels out of service, the majority by March 31, 1964, and continue to support the operation of the fleet adequately.

We have also examined the utility aircraft squadrons on the east and west coasts and we propose to reduce these by six fixed-wing aircraft and two helicopters before the end of this fiscal year. These squadrons are engaged in support functions such as target towing, transportation of personnel and so on.

An examination of the ammunition storage depots has led us to the conclusion that the naval ammunition depot at Kamloops, British Columbia, can be closed, and the ammunition stored there re-distributed to other depots.

We propose as well to close the naval supply depot at Lynn Creek, British Columbia. This is a stores depot that has been used by the navy and also in part by the army. The functions can be re-distributed to other units with a saving in overhead costs.

The naval armament depot at Longueuil, Quebec, is to be closed as the essential functions of this depot can be carried out at the naval establishment at Ville Lasalle at a considerable saving in costs. The navy has maintained a naval repair facility at Point Edward naval base in Sydney, Nova Scotia, and this repair facility will be discontinued but the navy will continue to operate the stores depot and record centre at this location.

It is also the intention to discontinue the naval activities at Fort Pepperrell, Newfoundland. The navy has provided the housekeeping of this establishment and this has been a costly activity in terms of its present defence capabilities.

It is anticipated that most of these changes will be completed by March 31, 1964. However, it is not planned to have any of the reductions in ship repair work at the Point Edward naval base take place until after the beginning of the new fiscal year on April 1, 1964. This will ensure that operations at the naval base are gradually reduced after that date in relation to the development of alternative opportunities for employment. There will be adjustments involved for some of those now employed at this base. In order to assist, efforts will be made to organize training and re-training programs in co-operation with the provincial government wherever these will be suitable. Other measures will also be introduced as appropriate in the circumstances. These changes should produce in a full year, once they have been implemented, savings estimated at $7,750,000.

Turning to the army, an announcement has already been made regarding the transfer of the northwest highway system, effective April 1, 1964, to the Department of Public Works. At that time the Department of Public Works will assume responsibility for employment and it is expected that the majority of the present civilian employees will be retained.

Also, as I have intimated to the house, we intend to withdraw personnel from Fort Churchill, Manitoba, in 1964 at which time administrative responsibility will be taken over by other government departments.

Mr. Churchill: All army personnel?

Mr. Hellyer: All army personnel. It is expected that most of the civilian personnel, numbering 346, will be taken over by other government departments assuming responsibility for administration at Churchill. The rocket responsibility facilities at Fort Churchill will be continued. It is also intended to close the army vehicle depot at Hagersville, Ontario. Dispersal of vehicles to meet command and national survival requirements is now under way and should be completed by April, 1964. The balance of the vehicles will be moved to other army units, including London, Ontario, during the period May to October, 1964. Civilian personnel now at Hagersville will not be released until the vehicle movement program has been completed. These changes, when fully implemented, will result in an annual saving in operating costs to the army approximately $16 million.

As far as the Royal Canadian Air Force is concerned, adjustments include the withdrawal from Churchill, which I have already mentioned, and Resolute Bay, where in both cases responsibility for airfields will be transferred to the Department of Transport; the cessation of fixed-wing aircraft activities at Rockcliffe airport; the transfer of the electronic warfare unit from St. Hubert to Uplands; and the transfer of responsibility for St. Hubert airfield to the Department of Transport. These changes will be effected in the spring of 1964.

Mr. Woolliams: What about Penhold?

Mr. Hellyer: The R.C.A.F. station, Calgary and No. 10 repair depot, Calgary, will be closed as early as possible in 1964; the buildings will be declared surplus to Royal Canadian Air Force requirements. The disbandment of No. 107 search and rescue unit, Torbay, Newfoundland, and the closing of R.C.A.F. station Torbay will be completed by the spring of 1964, although the R.C.A.F. radio station will remain. The deletion of one band by the spring of 1965 has already been announced. The air photographic section of the R.C.A.F. photographic establishment, Rockcliffe, will be transferred to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. Royal Canadian Air Force stations Vancouver, Saskatoon and Hamilton will be closed early in 1964, with the search and rescue school and composite unit, now at Vancouver, being transferred to Comox. In a full year these changes are expected to reduce operating costs by about $8 million.

A review has also been made of the requirement for the reserve forces. The reserve forces of Canada have traditionally been maintained as a mobilization base for active service formations, for providing reinforcements for regular force units, and for filling positions not required except in an emergency. In recent years they have had the added role of assisting in civil survival in the event of a nuclear attack on this country. We have looked at the reserve force organization as it now stands, with the object of determining realistically the support which reserve formations can provide in an age when combat readiness is a key-note of defence power. This has led to the conclusion that the reserve forces of all three services can be reduced from the present levels.

The reserves of the Royal Canadian Navy now comprise 21 divisions and two reserve air squadrons with a current strength of approximately 4,000. To meet those needs of the Royal Canadian Navy in an emergency which could be, we believe, satisfactorily met by reserve forces, it has been concluded that a strength of approximately 2,700 is required. As a result it is proposed to close out seven naval divisions and the two air reserve squadrons. The reserve air squadrons are located at Toronto and Victoria. The reserve divisions which are to be closed are those at Prince Rupert, Victoria, Edmonton, Regina, London, Charlottetown and Halifax. I should add that the Charlottetown division will not be closed out next year because of the centennial celebrations taking place in that province.

Mr. Churchill: Politically unsound, is it?

Mr. Hellyer: The tender at Kitchener will also be closed. It is planned to reduce the militia to a strength of approximately 30,000. The militia now has a strength of 51,000. This will necessitate a major re-organization of the militia. The militia is now organized on the basis of a very large number of units in the various army corps essentially, as I have said, based on the traditional concept of a substantial mobilization base. This organization for example includes 26 regiments of the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, 29 field regiments, six medium regiments and a number of independent batteries of various types in the Royal Canadian Artillery, seven field regiments in the Royal Canadian Engineers, and so on. Hon. members will agree that a re-organization of this magnitude is both important and complicated and must necessarily take account of the regional interests across this country taking part in and supporting the militia. We will be appointing shortly a select group of militia officers from across Canada who will be asked to examine this problem and to make recommendations as to the way in which this re-organization should be brought about.

The R.C.A.F. maintains a reserve with a current strength of approximately 2,200. The air force, by the nature of its responsibilities, must be maintained constantly in a state of immediate readiness and there are few areas in which support from the reserves would be necessary in an emergency. It is planned to reduce the R.C.A.F. reserves to a strength of approximately 860. This will retain in the reserves six auxiliary flying squadrons and their associated wing headquarters. The auxiliary squadrons at Vancouver, Calgary, Saskatoon and Hamilton will be closed out early in 1964. The six squadrons that are being retained are located at bases which serve other R.C.A.F. purposes and the costs associated with these are consequently very much less than those at the squadrons which are to be closed.

The changes in the Royal Canadian Navy and Royal Canadian Air Force reserves are expected to result, when they have been fully taken into effect, in savings in operating costs of about $5,250,000 a year. The savings resulting from the re-organization of the militia are expected to be very considerably in excess of this, but until the details have been worked out I am not in a position to give a figure. It would, however, be of the order of magnitude of about one third of the total now spent on the militia. The total now spent is about $45 million a year. Some changes are proposed in our regular force structures. As these involve consultation with our allies I am not in a position to announce them at this moment. They will, however, result in substantial savings of money and military personnel.

The changes I have mentioned today will result in a reduction of both military and civilian staffs. The military strength reduction will for the most part be brought about by attrition. Every effort will be made to ease the impact on civilian staffs affected to the extent that it is possible by transferring them to vacant positions in other civil establishments in the government service and including full consultation with the Department of Labour.

This year's estimates provide for an average regular force strength of 124,054; consisting of Royal Canadian Navy, 21,620; army, 50,000; Royal Canadian Air Force, 52,434. The actual strength as of September of this year was 123,246, made up of R.C.N., 21,593; army, 49,381; R.C.A.F., 52,272. The estimated average strength of civilian employees on which the estimates are based came to 43,885, which was 1,203 below the average strength in 1962-63. The current strength is 43,377.

It is the capital votes that have been largely affected in recent months. These include the cancellation of the general purpose frigate program and the decision to reduce the number of additional CF-104 dual aircraft to be procured from 24 to 16. On the other hand, preliminary funding is now included for the purchase of three Oberon class submarines and for the construction of storage facilities for nuclear warheads required to make effective weapons systems previously obtained. There is one other item which is not reflected in the estimates of the department, but is of some importance, and that relates to the decision of the government to increase armed services pay and allowances and the salaries of class "D" employees retroactive to October 1, 1962.

The estimated cost of these revisions for the 18-month period ending March 31, 1964, amount to just over $43 million, but since no provision was made for this expenditure in the 1963-64 defence estimates, this is being financed by means of allotments from the Department of Finance general salaries vote. In addition, there was a supplementary estimate of $827,000 for the defence research board satellite program.

In these brief remarks it has not been possible to discuss wide areas of our activities. As I stated earlier, the special committee has studied many of these at some length. My remarks today have dealt with current housekeeping changes. In each case careful thought has been given to the possible effect on future policy, and in each case it has been concluded that the proposals do not limit the range of possible policy options which might be considered by the government. I am sure hon. members will prefer to leave the policy discussion until the special committee has reported and the government has had a chance to study that report. However, if there are any specific questions which would aid hon. gentlemen in their deliberations, either the associate minister or myself will note them and provide the information requested at a later stage in the debate.

At this point I would like to pay tribute to the associate minister. On the basis of an understanding between us, he has been carrying the bulk of the administrative load in the department. He is one of the hardest working members of the administration, and without his assistance a general review of the kind we have undertaken would have been impossible. I do hope that his invaluable contribution will be fully recognized. I would not like to conclude without saying that the associate minister and I are both appreciative of the wonderful co-operation we have had from all members of the department since we took office.

Finally, may I say that it is a matter of some regret that these announcements must be made now in advance of the tabling of the white paper and the presentation of the government's defence policy. As a result an incomplete picture is available which can only be completed at a future date. Decisions had to be taken in order to permit the preparation of estimates for next year, and on careful reflection it was considered that the interests of the people affected overrode other considerations, and with this in mind, immediate announcements should be made in order to give maximum notice and opportunity for readjustment. Consequently, we have decided in favour of human considerations and followed the course which provides the maximum notice possible under the circumstances.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, before I commence my brief remarks I wonder whether the minister would complete his answer to the question I asked him yesterday, and the answer to the question asked the Prime Minister as to whether or not the Bomarcs are now equipped with nuclear weapons.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the Bomarcs are not yet equipped with nuclear weapons. I have forgotten the question asked yesterday; could I be reminded?

Mr. Churchill: The question asked yesterday was based on a newspaper article quoting informed sources in the Department of National Defence, and concerned the lopping off of $74 million and a reduction in the armed forces of 10 per cent, and other matters like that.

Mr. Hellyer: That is a speculative story. An amount of $74 million would not be too far off the mark, by the time all of these considerations have been taken into account. The reduction in the size of the armed forces strength is speculative.

Mr. Smith: What about the reduction in the 14 radar stations?

Mr. Hellyer: I think it will be more satisfactory for me to take note of these questions and answer them later on. As I stated earlier in the session however, we have been reviewing radar establishments to determine whether some reductions can be made without affecting unduly the effectiveness of the whole system. These changes or proposed changes require consultation with our allies, and for that reason I am not in a position to make an announcement at this moment.

Mr. Simpson: May I just ask one question.

The Chairman: Order. May I bring to the attention of the committee that the minister's time has expired, so that we would need unanimous consent of the committee before questions could be asked. I understand that these questions are asked of the minister as part of his speech. I just bring this matter to the attention of the committee, as I think I should.

Mr. Simpson: I just want clarification on one matter.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Simpson: In relation to taking a look at the radar stations, does it include both the mid-Canada line and the Pine Tree line, or just the Pine Tree line?

Mr. Hellyer: The whole system has been under review, because it is interrelated.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I said my remarks would be brief. I say that partly for the reasons advanced by the minister, that nine twelfths of the estimates of this department for this fiscal year have already been appropriated and I expect spent; partly because these estimates were prepared by the former government and naturally we support them; and partly because the session is drawing, we hope, to a close. But in the time available to us—and I want to give plenty of opportunity to other members of the committee to speak—I want to state my disappointment at the half hour discourse of the Minister of National Defence. He had to admit that he was dealing largely with current housekeeping problems, and he said that they might have some effect on future policy. Some of them are minor housekeeping matters and some are major, but he did not indicate their effect on future policy.

I thought, Mr. Chairman, that at this stage, after eight months in office, the Minister of National Defence would have given us, as former ministers of national defence have done under similar circumstances, a statement of the policy of the government. This government was to be the government of decision, the government that was to tell us what was wrong with the past and what they were going to do for the future. Eight months have now gone by and all we get is a housekeeping account from the Minister of National Defence. I think he should turn in his housekeeping keys and hand the job over to somebody else. Surely we should have had at this stage some statement of general policy on the part of this government. We heard from these people sitting opposite us that no statements of policy were made while we were in office. I have gone to the trouble to look back and see the statements made in the past, statements published by General Pearkes in 1960 and by the hon. member for Calgary North when he was minister of national defence. Yet here we are faced with this minister who, in the course of his eight months in office, has made no statement of policy in this house on the part of this government with regard to national defence. That is a shocking neglect of duty.

A great deal was made by the minister earlier this year when the session opened in May, and again when it was resumed in the fall, about the question of nuclear arms, the so-called commitments which our government, he alleged, had entered into and how they were going to deal with these matters, and deal with them promptly. The minister has just been asked: Where are the nuclear weapons for the Bomarcs? As I say, eight months have gone by and there is nothing in position. What about the protection of Toronto and Montreal which we heard so much about last winter? They are neglected cities.

Mr. Woolliams: He said he was not aware whether he had them or not.

Mr. Churchill: We said that these Bomarc sites were intended for the protection of the strategic air component, the deterrent of the United States; and a secondary effect might be, in the case of a prolonged bomber attack, some defence for industrial areas. But members opposite said, supported by a notorious press realease from south of the border, that the Bomarcs were for the defence of Toronto and Montreal. Now, what is the situation? Not a weapon in place, eight months after taking office. This was to be done within three weeks or six weeks. They said: "Sign an agreement; get the materials here; do not wait until a crisis is upon us; we must be ready." And here we are in a state of unpreparedness which is simply shattering, in the light of the statements made by the Minister of National Defence and by the Prime Minister in those days. Not a weapon is in place and eight months have gone by since they took office.

What about the Voodoo planes? They were to have been armed with nuclear weapons. The minister can correct me, now, if he wishes, but I say they are not armed at the moment with nuclear weapons.

Not a word from the minister. I am, therefore, correct in my statement.

These planes were to have been armed immediately so that they could play their part in the defence of the North American continent. Again, I point this out: eight months have gone by and not one step has been taken to correct this so-called deficiency.

How do we stand with regard to our air division in Europe, the force which has been called the elite among our defence forces as far as the air is concerned and I accept that description? Is it ready to take action if war should break out today or tomorrow or next week? Is one single plane of the air division ready for action? Is one single plane of that division, on the quick reaction alert station, in position, with a nuclear bomb attached to the undercarriage? Let the minister answer if one single plane is thus equipped. He will have to say, first, that the air division is not yet complete and that it will not be complete as to the total number of planes, until the spring of next year. He will have to admit he has done nothing about the squadrons which either are, or may be, stationed in France, without any nuclear equipment. And he will have to admit that the squadrons presently in Germany have no nuclear bombs available immediately for action at the present time. Eight months have gone by and nothing has been done by the Minister of National Defence in this regard.

I suggest there has been no occasion since the days of the Liberal government in 1939 when the Canadian air force has been less able to take action in war than at the present moment. Members opposite talked about unpreparedness. This is a shining example of unpreparedness, and it is typical of the Liberal regime in that period of the 'thirties, in 1939 and 1940. Here we see the same crowd, or their successors, carrying on the same attitude as was shown then. Our great air division in Europe is unable to do a thing. Last May I asked the Prime Minister how many planes were then ready for action and how many were ready in April of this year. The Prime Minister replied—and this answer will be found in Hansard on page 114: "Not one, because they need ammunition". I say, now, to the Prime Minister, and to the Minister of National Defence, that not one is ready today —because they need ammunition. Except for the period up to 1939 I do not know of any period in Canadian history when we have been less prepared for action in the event of an emergency. This is a shocking state of affairs.

Let me ask the minister this question: Why did he discontinue that part of the air division in Europe which was equipped with interceptor planes and which had been active for a number of years? Why did he discontinue all of this force before he was ready with the Starfighters equipped for action. He wiped them out. Only two or three weeks ago I was at Murviel in France. There was not a fighting plane in action there. This was not the case for years, previously. We had effective interceptor forces, the elite of the air force in Europe. But at the present moment there is not a fighting plane at Murviel and Starfighters elsewhere are not equipped for an active role.

The Minister of National Defence cannot excuse himself. He carries a heavy responsibility. The people of Canada are relying on his assurance that our defence forces are ready at a moment's notice to take action. But that is not the situation at the present time. As to taking effective action, we are in worse shape than we were a year ago, because the air division in Europe then was equipped with interceptors; the changeover was just commencing. Now the hon. gentleman has let the whole thing collapse and there will be a lapse of several months yet before the air division is ready to fight. Even then, unless he makes some arrangement with regard to the bases in France, he will not be able to equip a full half of that air division.

This is not good enough. We have given this government an opportunity. We have given it a chance. People have said: Let them get on with the job and demonstrate what they can do. Well, how long do they need? I suppose, a year, or a year and a half. We are to have a white paper some time in January or February. We do not know when the house will meet again. I will hazard a guess that we shall not see that white paper until late in February. Then we shall have a statement on defence policy. Perhaps.

This is not enough. The people of Canada have, up to this moment, been relying on the Minister of National Defence to provide adequate defence for this country. The people of Canada have, up to this moment, considered that our forces were now ready to fight. Well, the air division in Europe is not ready to fight, and the Bomarc sites in Canada are not ready for an emergency, and the Voodoo planes in Canada are not equipped with the nuclear missiles which the present minister said were so essential if they were to fulfil their role. How many months does the government need? Eight months have gone by. The minister has been making housekeeping arrangements—arrangements which will be subject to criticism when other hon. members speak because they, like myself, think that some of those arrangements are wrong.

The other day I asked a question of the minister with regard to Canada's role in the NATO alliance. I thought he would deal with it this afternoon, but he did not. I wanted to know whether, within the NATO alliance, we could be assured that the nations within that alliance possessing nuclear weapons, whether tactical or strategic, would not use them without the concurrence of their NATO allies. The minister said this question was improper. The Secretary of State for External Affairs gave one of his tortuous, winding answers. He started from nowhere and ended nowhere.

An hon. Member: And said nothing.

Mr. Churchill: —and said nothing that was effective in the reply. But this is a vital matter for the people of Canada. Can we be plunged into a nuclear war? Will our forces in Europe, the brigade and the air division, be plunged into a nuclear war by the unilateral action of a member of the NATO alliance, without any consultation with Canada? This question has to be cleared up. I thought this would have been one of the subjects that would have been discussed and settled at the NATO conference last May.

That is why we talked about what Canada's role is. We said: Let NATO determine what is Canada's role; and this was part of it. At that time we could not disclose this particular aspect of it publicly, but the Minister of National Defence in a speech just a few days ago publicly stated that this is a problem facing NATO, and that he could not answer our question in the house. But there the problem is, and it was there last May. What has this government done about it since? I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, what is he going to do at the NATO meeting which occurs this month? What is the Minister of National Defence going to do at the NATO meeting this month to settle this important problem within the NATO alliance; or are we just committed without any answer at all? Are we not to be consulted? This is a problem we have raised with the United States with regard to NORAD and our commitment in NATO. Are we or are we not to be consulted? We are allies. We should be consulted. Within NATO are we to be consulted or are we just to tag along? If somebody in NATO who has possession of nuclear weapons wants to start a nuclear war, what is our position?

These are problems that I thought the minister would deal with this afternoon, but he did not deal with policy. Again he has just given us promises that we will have a white paper and that there will be a statement of policy next spring. He has simply said: Just be good little boys and wait until we get around to it. I suggest that this is simply not good enough. The position of Minister of National Defence is of vital importance to the people of Canada, and we expect the minister to carry out his duties. He has failed and is failing to provide for Canadian defence along the lines I have pointed out. I do not know of any failure in the Department of National Defence since the second world war to equal his failure in this regard. There was a failure before the second world war, but not since.

This is a failure on the part of the Minister of National Defence and a failure on the part of the government. I am sorry the Prime Minister is otherwise engaged because he has to take full responsibility. The Prime Minister is too prone to give the reins to his cabinet ministers. They are running all over the country developing policies of their own, and there is no controlling hand from the Prime Minister's office, as there should be. The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence are the three leading ministers with regard to national defence, and the Prime Minister cannot evade his responsibility in this matter.

Depending on the developing of the debate and the time that is available, Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal later with the proposed reduction in the militia. I simply give warning now that this is one field in which I think a most serious error is being made. After a good 15 years experience in the militia I can speak with some knowledge of that organization. However, as we move along we will perhaps come to an appropriate moment when we may discuss the proposed reductions in the army establishment and I will reserve my remarks on that particular phase until that time. I conclude my remarks now at this point in our discussion with a condemnation of the unannounced policy, the non-existent policy of the present government, and the ineffectiveness of the Minister of National Defence in performing his proper function of protecting Canada.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the introductory remarks of the Minister of National Defence and the concluding remarks of the previous speaker I wish I had an hour in which to speak instead of only 30 minutes. May I say only one thing about the defence critic of the official opposition. I think it is too bad, in the interest of Canada and in the interest of parliament, that in condemning the government for having no defence policy after a period of eight months in office he did not explain why there was no Canadian defence policy in the years when the Conservatives were in power.

Mr. Churchill: There was a defence policy, and you know it.

Mr. Winch: There was none at all.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Winch: If you do not mind, I have only got 30 minutes.

Mr. Churchill: You can take 30 minutes. I am raising a point of order. The hon. member has made a statement which is false and it must be corrected immediately. He says—

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order. This is not a point of order that the hon. member is raising.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, false statements made in this house must be corrected immediately.

Mr. Douglas: I raise a point of order.

Mr. Churchill: I am on a point of order now.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I am asking for a ruling.

The Chairman: Perhaps we should hear the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre first.

Mr. Churchill: False statements made in this house must be corrected. They must be withdrawn if they are false. The hon. member's statement is false, because defence policy was announced and published by our government. Here are copies of our defence policy as announced in 1959, 1960 and again in 1961.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to follow through by saying that Canada has never had a defence policy.

Mr. Churchill: That is nonsense.

Mr. MacEwan: That you agree with.

Mr. Woolliams: If anyone had listened to you back in the 'thirties we would have had no policy.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I hope you are taking note of the interruptions so that I will not lose any of my 30 minutes. I hope that in some ways I may be considered a little bit different from the previous speaker.

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Winch: I would have liked to have longer time to speak than I am allowed. I want to say at once that although I sit in the opposition I think there are two grounds on which the government and the Minister of National Defence should be commended. The first is that for this subject, a most important one to parliament and to Canada, two consecutive days have been allocated for the discussion of these estimates. Second, although there are other points on which we may criticize the minister, I think we should commend him for having the courage after eight months in office to make announcements on these estimates regarding housekeeping which should have been made a long time ago, and which if it had been done before would have saved millions of dollars of the Canadian taxpayers' money.

An hon. Member: It is only peanuts for them.

Mr. Winch: My hon. friend says "peanuts", but it runs into millions of dollars. I am prepared to commend the minister for his courage in announcing the housekeeping arrangements which he has under contemplation.

It is impossible in the time allotted to me to comment on all the various aspects of defence raised by the minister. I shall have to proceed, therefore, as speedily as possible with what I had in mind, and which I believe deals with defence policy.

In that connection I must say first of all, as is well known, there are 24 members of this house who are members of the special committee on defence. We have been meeting since last June, sometimes in camera, not only here in Ottawa but also in Colorado Springs and in Europe. Whenever we had a special meeting in camera the chairman of the committee always opened the in camera meeting with one statement, that we could always use the information as long as it was not attributed to the particular source. I want to make that clear because in discussing defence policy one must use some information.

I want to say, and I say it on behalf of the New Democratic party, that in our estimation there has never been a Canadian defence policy under any government in peacetime which took into consideration the part that Canada could or should most efficiently play in the military world on behalf of the democratic countries. I want to go even beyond that, Mr. Chairman, and say that we strongly feel that the defence policies of all governments in the past in peacetime have been governed by political expediencies and economic pressures, rather than by an understanding of the part that Canada could or should play. To that, sir, I add my third point, that Canadian defence policy has been based on misinformation supplied by civilian and military authorities, not only in Canada but in NATO and in SHAPE. This is something of vital concern to Canada.

I only want to give one illustration of what I mean by "misinformation". Over the past few weeks many of us in this house have been hearing how policy in Canada, NATO, SHAPE and various countries, is based on the Soviet threat, on the fact that within a matter of weeks the Soviets could have between 165 and 174 divisions in the field. Right up until November 23, we in the defence committee of this house were being told that by civilian and military authorities. However, we find that on November 18, while SHAPE or other ministers were giving us that information, the United States secretary of defence, Robert McNamara made a statement in New York. I am not quoting from a newspaper; I am quoting from a copy supplied by the United States information service, supplied to me by the embassy here in Ottawa. What is this statement? I quote:

> Recent intensive investigation has shown that the number of active Soviet divisions that are maintained at manning levels anywhere close to combat readiness is less than half of the 165 and the 175.

We have the United States secretary of defence making a statement like this on November 18, and one week earlier and later we were being told by the military people in Europe that it is 165 to 170. You understand now why I say I am afraid there is flim-flam, balderdash and misleading statements being given to the members of NATO, SHAPE and Canada.

I should like also to raise a matter which I believe is of major importance to all members of this house. I am not going to do this on a partisan basis; but, I am going to remind all members that in the early days of this session there were many counterchallenges and charges between the Prime Minister of today and the Leader of the Opposition of today, as to whether or not Canada had made a commitment on nuclear warheads and nuclear weapons. In recent weeks I think we have found the answer. Both are right and both are wrong. The information is now available and it can be found on the records of our special committee, to the effect that the NATO council has never at any time discussed what a commitment is as it concerns the 15 member nations of NATO. I quote the answer, because I asked the question:

> A commitment starts with plans submitted by military authorities to governments. Ministerial meetings give approval. This constitutes a commitment, but is not a binding contract. The exact meaning of a commitment has never yet been discussed in the NATO council.

I think that information should have been given to this house in the early days of the discussion at this session as to whether or not Canada was committed by a binding contract to nuclear weapons and to nuclear warheads. I should like to put a question in this way. It is time for honesty in Canada, NATO and SHAPE as to what defence policy is in Europe, what defence policy is in Canada. May I just remind the members of this house that we are in NATO. We have 6,500, approximately, in our brigade and we have 6,500 in our air force. In the last five years we have paid, for these 13,000 armed personnel under NATO in Europe, no less than $350 million a year and as high as $436 million—that is for these 13,000 active Canadian personnel. Why is this so? It is my belief that it is mostly from a psychological point of view. However, they are there.

They are called the elite, and I believe it. Everybody told us how wonderful and, sir, if you want to check the report you will find it complete. I cannot mention names, but included are NATO, SHAPE, and our own representative. I will just give one quotation, "It is conceivably true that Canadian forces in Europe are short on mobility." You find in the records from NATO and SHAPE over-emphasis on nuclear tactical weapons and under-emphasis on conventional.

You will find, sir, if you check the record, and it is an official record, that Canada is in a strange situation. We have 6,500 men in a brigade which is not mobile. I ask why?

I was at the NATO meeting in 1961 and was a member of the scientific and technical committee. We put forward a unanimous recommendation that we all get together and stop wasting money on duplication of research and production. Some 24 of us were in Europe two weeks ago, and we were told on the highest authority that in many cases, in the absence of political expediency and economic pressure, military equipment could be produced for less than one third of what NATO had to pay for its military equipment.

This brings us to the situation in Canada where we have got to face it too, politically and economically, whether we are interested in a Canadian defence policy and Canadian defence purchases, or whether we are interested in political and economic pressures, and to hell with what it costs the taxpayers of Canada. If we in Canada are not prepared to face up to that issue, how do we expect that the NATO council is going to face up to it?

We in this party continuously and consistently have opposed Canada becoming a part of a nuclear club, with the acquisition of nuclear weapons and nuclear warheads. Anyone who reads the entire text of the speech made by secretary of defence Robert S. McNamara, on November 18 in New York, will find paragraph after paragraph of evidence of the need for building up conventional forces, highly mobile, and he also made a most important statement to the effect that he does not anticipate a war will break out in Europe.

War might break out in African or Asian countries, and if it does then comes the need, not for a NATO force with nuclear, tactical weapons, but for highly trained, fully mobile forces, which will answer one request, that is, the suppression of brushfire wars throughout the world; and this can only come under the United Nations.

I see my time is drawing to a close, so in conclusion I wish to say I regret we have not seen any publicity in our Canadian press during the past year concerning the fact that three Scandinavian countries have got together and have reached agreement on highly trained, mobile forces to be placed at the disposal of the United Nations as a police force for the world. Only three days ago I found out that in two of these Scandinavian countries this policy is going to be referred to their parliaments for adoption, following which an official offer will be made to the United Nations.

Surely Canada should have given the lead in this regard? Even though we are late now, I believe we should get together with these three Scandinavian countries who have this enlightenment and understanding, and then have a real Canadian defence policy that will enable us to play our part on behalf of maintaining peace throughout the world. This demands that we have an idealistic and factual Canadian defence policy so we can play our proper role for the peace of the world.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity of participating in the debate on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. There is an increasing interest in the importance of this subject, and this is both healthy and understandable when viewed from a number of points; first, the tremendous amount of money involved in the carrying through of the responsibilities of the department, second, the fact that it involves the welfare of thousands of Canadian servicemen and servicewomen and, third, it is something that has to do with the very survival of Canada and the free world.

At the beginning of my remarks I would like to refer to the statement made by the Minister of National Defence, which has been characterized as a housekeeping report. I believe it does indicate the fact that serious attention has been given to a number of items, sometimes of lesser or greater significance, but items that should receive attention. With regard to the statement made by the spokesman of the official opposition that he expected the minister to make a statement of government policy, may I point out that the minister has been considerably kicked around in past weeks because of the fact that he has been anticipating the report of the special committee on defence. Therefore it is rather unusual that on an occasion like this he should be criticized if he fails to come out and make definite defence policy statements.

I prefer to confine my remarks to general statements because I do not want to anticipate the report that will be brought in by the defence committee, of which I have the privilege and honour to be a member. There is widespread questioning of the adequacy of our defence program, and I believe a general feeling that we are not getting our money's worth as far as this essential program is concerned. While sympathizing with the minister and his officials in the task of trying to plan effectively in a field where changes are so rapid and far reaching, we hope the minister's program of rethinking and reviewing defence policy will result in some basic and much needed dynamic reforms.

A statement appeared in a periodical some time ago. I am not going to quote it because unfortunately it was just a sheet taken out of a periodical and I have not on the sheet the name of the periodical or the date. But it was very critical of the defence department because, instead of getting down to it and facing realistically the problems of the present day this article suggests the department is made up of those who are writing or rewriting United States and British defence reports. If that has been true in the past, and if it is true today, then surely we must come to the point of recognizing the need for a new look at and a facing up to the changing situations that exist in this particular field.

The Minister of National Defence himself was apparently very unhappy with certain aspects of the defence program. He called attention to the fact that as far as our NATO commitments and our forces overseas are concerned he was not satisfied that we were in a position to discharge effectively the tasks to which we have been committed. I think one of the most significant moves to meet the situations in the realm of defence was pointed up in the appointments of the special parliamentary committee on defence. We are very happy about this; it was something we had anticipated, and the leader of our group suggested that this particular defence committee be set up. It is a matter of record that we presented this suggestion in certain campaigns. We were therefore very happy that the Prime Minister saw fit to introduce legislation setting up this defence committee, because I believe it has fulfilled and will fulfil a very important task in this particular field of activity and study.

I believe there are several aspects of our defence program that must be covered and will be covered by the inquiries conducted by the defence committee. I know that sceptics belittled the proposal, and in fact I remember one of my opponents pointing out that it was inconceivable that a group of politicians would be able to sit down and work out, in a spirit of harmony and co-operation, a policy that was adequate for Canadian needs and present day conditions. I think the activities of this committee have indicated that it is possible for a committee to work in this particular way, and as we look back over the work of the committee I believe it will prove eminently worth while in the setting up of proposals relative to national defence. As has been pointed out by other speakers, we have made a number of inquiries here in Canada. Our inquiries have also taken us to Colorado Springs and North Bay, and we have had a great many sittings right here in Ottawa. We spent two weeks overseas visiting defence establishments, listening to briefings by government leaders of the various nations comprising NATO, and we have been briefed by the military authorities of those nations as well as by the leaders of the collective defence organizations of the free world.

The work of this committee is still incomplete; there is still a great deal to be done. But I believe, as I have said, it will accomplish a great deal in the setting out of worth-while guide lines for the minister's information as he endeavours to set a course with regard to national defence for this country. One of the encouraging aspects of the work of the committee was, I might say, the complete absence of political partisanship. I am hoping this particular attitude will prevail not only as far as the committee is concerned but as far as parliament is concerned as we endeavour to set out what we believe to be adequate defence policy for this country. I have said before, and I say again, that this is too important an issue to be dealt with in the political, partisan arena. This was kept in mind in the setting up of the committee. The view was that it could be lifted above political partisanship and we could arrive collectively at some policy that would be adequate to meet the need in this field.

I would suggest it is highly improbable that the government, having had this committee set up, would consider lightly or would ignore the recommendations that without question will be forthcoming. As has been stated, the work of this committee has been carried on conscientiously and diligently with an almost complete lack of political consideration. We are expecting the government in turn to accept the recommendations that are given, in the spirit in which they have been formulated and will be formulated, and will give very careful consideration to those recommendations that will be forthcoming.

I have promoted among the members of the committee, and perhaps among the public generally, the idea that the committee work should not be confined to just this one particular session but should become something more permanent, in order that the valuable information secured and the work carried out will be able to assume a degree of continuity that will be of assistance to the minister and his department in this vital field.

Canada's defence policy must cover three very important areas; first of all, our own national territory—and what a stupendous task this is.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): It being five o'clock p.m. the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions for papers.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH U.S. RESPECTING UNION TRUSTEESHIP

The house resumed, from Thursday, October 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martineau:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, communications and other documents and replies thereto between the government of the United States of America, or any of its departments, and the government of Canada, or any of its departments, concerning the great lakes shipping situation and the proposed trusteeship of Canadian maritime unions since the 6th of July 1963.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the wink of an eye or the brief flash of a second in which I had the opportunity to speak when this matter was first brought up for discussion some weeks ago I indicated to the house that I should like to enter into a discussion of the principles involved in connection with the production of diplomatic correspondence such as that called for by the notice of motion presently before the house. I also indicated that I should like to make specific reference to certain precedents which had been cited to the house, and make a few observations on parliamentary practice in general. The position I should like to take is not exclusively related to the particular correspondence or the particular diplomatic negotiations between Canada and the United States concerning the great lakes; it is related to the status of diplomatic correspondence generally.

My first argument is that a compulsory revelation of diplomatic correspondence in response to a private member's notice of motion for production of papers would have an adverse effect on the good conduct of Canada's diplomatic relations. My position would be that not only would such a motion embarrass Canadian diplomats and the Department of External Affairs in its negotiations with foreign parties, but it would have an adverse effect on the country as a whole.

The first argument to which I would direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that above all it is desirable to have complete candour of discussion in diplomatic intercourse and correspondence. Indeed, if the art of diplomacy and the conduct of diplomats have been the subject of any criticism in this century it is because in the public's eye, at least, there has been a lack of candour. I suggest that it is desirable, in international negotiations and relations generally, that the diplomats representing various nations be able to deal with each other with the same candour as any two contracting parties in a commercial transaction—perhaps even with a greater degree of candour if that is possible.

At the same time I would point out that the private candour which diplomats might show in such negotiations between themselves may frequently be too blunt for public discussion. What I mean to suggest is that the field of discussion between diplomats may prove to be too strong meat if it is to be unreservedly placed before the public. Direct embarrassment in international diplomacy might result if at any particular time negotiations with foreign parties or, extending the principle even further, discussions between the foreign offices of two particular nations, should at any time be forcibly revealed to public gaze under the compulsion of a motion such as this. I think the reasons for that are quite clear to all hon. members. I think it is quite clear that the publication of communications from a foreign country to this country, and this country's replies to such communications, and vice versa, may well embarrass the foreign country concerned in its dealings with its own citizens.

I do not think it requires much by way of example to indicate that there may be times when a foreign government might be prepared to discuss a particular position, or a particular move or treaty, for which it might not have prepared its own subjects. The compulsory disclosure of such negotiations, or even the suggestion that that particular country should make such correspondence available for its own citizens, might well result in a political storm in the country concerned. Equally, I submit that undue exposure of diplomatic correspondence might embarrass such foreign country in its dealings with third parties or its allies.

May I take an extreme example merely for purposes of illustration and remind hon. members of the adverse effect to the country concerned of the accidental disclosure of the Zimmerman telegram in 1917, which, perhaps more than any single incident in that particular spring, became a direct factor resulting in a state of war between the kingdom of Germany and the United States. It is quite clear that, as in the case of the Zimmerman telegram, if communications between party A and party B which make reference to their relations with party C are forced out onto the open, a step which the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) is taking in moving a motion such as this—although I am not suggesting here that any third parties are involved—then, embarrassment, although not on the scale of that resulting from the disclosure of the Zimmerman telegram but which nevertheless would be considerable, could injure the foreign country concerned in its dealings with other contracting parties and allies.

Mr. Scott: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald: Certainly.

Mr. Scott: Is he suggesting that disclosure of the papers in question would prove highly embarrassing to the United States?

Mr. Macdonald: I am talking in terms of the general principle that the disclosure of diplomatic correspondence might prove highly embarrassing to any country involved in diplomatic negotiations with Canada. Therefore, I point out to hon. members to whom this fairly obvious fact does not seem to have occurred, that motions of this kind, which would provide essentially the means of forcing into the public record these particular communications, would have the inevitable result of making foreign powers less candid in their dealings with this country as well as in their international negotiations. We are fortunate internationally in having a great many allies; there is a very friendly demeanour toward Canada in international circles. It would therefore be a great pity if those friendly relations were to be put in jeopardy, and the candour one would expect from friendly nations prejudiced, as a result of action taken by members of this parliament to disclose to the public diplomatic negotiations which might thereby result in embarrassment to the particular country involved.

Nor, I suggest, contrary to what some hon. members have indicated, is this a matter, as it is with regard to the provinces, of merely asking for foreign consent to the disclosure of these documents. I know that on occasions it has been done, but I believe even this procedure entails distinct diplomatic disadvantages which could inconvenience Canada in its foreign relations. For one thing, the mere act of withholding consent by a foreign power could be misconstrued and result in suspicion as to the motives for withholding that consent. It could, indeed, result in suspicions which might go far beyond the merits of the particular question involved. These are reasons, I submit, why the house should continue to recognize the long established principle that confidential diplomatic correspondence should not be made available in response to motions of this kind.

I should like to refer in this connection to the views of an outstanding foreign diplomat, Mr. Jules Cambon, a distinguished member of the French academy in his monograph "The Diplomatist". He observes at page 27 of the English version:

> Last of all, a negotiator must observe discretion, and indeed it is no more than his bounden duty to do so, not only for the sake of his chief but of his fellow-negotiator as well. Negotiations partake of the nature of a conversation, and neither of the principals is at liberty to make even the smallest disclosure without a grave dereliction of duty towards the other. You can make things very awkward for your opponent by showing up his hesitations, his offers, and his various twists and turns; but you will often defeat your own ends by doing so and almost certainly ensure the breakdown of negotiations.

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the hon. member a question? What does he think of the impact on the discussions when one of the negotiators issues statements to the press on the very subject which is being discussed?

Mr. Macdonald: I am prepared to agree that from time to time international relations are certainly not helped by actions such as that, but I would remind him, as I was tempted to do while he was advancing the same proposition earlier, that two wrongs in this regard do not make one right. If it is felt that the other contracting party is in dereliction of duty, matters are not necessarily improved by engaging in a similar practice oneself. But, to continue the quotation, this time from page 29:

> As, however, human nature never changes, mischievous interference in negotiations on the part of intriguers can never altogether be avoided: it is they who by bruiting abroad whatever information they succeed in obtaining—

Mr. Martineau: On a point of order, I wonder whether the hon. member would get down to the subject matter of the motion. As was pointed out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when this matter was debated on October 31, the scope of the debate is very limited. So far, the hon. member has been engaging in generalities far removed from the subject matter and I think he should return to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Macdonald: It was evident to those who were in the house when the hon. member originally made his presentation that he was not very clear on the question of relevancy, and his intervention now makes this lack of clarity even more apparent. We are discussing the principle whether or not diplomatic correspondence should be made available to the house and whether it is in the public interest to do so. In the course of considering this matter I am putting on record statements made by a distinguished member of the diplomatic profession establishing the fact that great embarrassment in international negotiations could arise as a result of anything which is done to make negotiations public. I was referring to intriguers, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martineau: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether you would follow your own ruling of October 31 and ask the hon. member who now has the floor to return to the subject matter.

Mr. Gray: May I speak to the point of order? I suggest the point raised by the hon. gentleman is not well taken. I believe my hon. friend from Rosedale is addressing himself to the subject matter of the motion in attempting to answer the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue in favour of these documents being produced. All that the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue is doing is this: he is complaining about the manner in which my hon. friend from Rosedale is making his argument. I do not think that is a valid point of order. Unless he transgresses the rules I do not think the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue can complain about the particular type of approach—

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Chapleau.

Mr. Gray: The hon. member for Chapleau?—no, the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue. My apologies to the hon. member for not properly citing the name of his riding. One of my hon. friends whispered in my ear. I apologize to the hon. member for Chapleau, for putting another member in his place. I am sorry my colleague whispered.

To return to the point of order. I do not believe it is valid to complain about the particular approach made by an hon. member toward the subject under discussion, as long as it remains within the bounds of the subject matter of the motion. If the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue finds the arguments of the hon. member for Rosedale to be painful, or unhelpful to his own contention, it is not proper for him to complain about them by raising a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think the house recognizes that ever since this procedure was admitted the Chair has taken the view that the resulting debate must take place within very narrow limits. The only thing we are discussing here at the moment is whether or not the documents mentioned in this motion should be tabled. At the moment I am inclined to agree that the hon. member for Rosedale is not too far out of order, because he is explaining why, in his view, diplomatic papers should not be made public. But I would advise the hon. member to remain as closely as he can within the limits of this particular type of debate.

Mr. Macdonald: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I thank my hon. friend from Essex West for the opportunity of putting some of these principles before the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue who appears never to have heard of them before. But to continue my quotation—we are referring to intriguers:

> It is they who by bruiting abroad whatever information they succeed in obtaining undermine the authority of those in charge of the negotiations and impugn the good faith of the government they claim to be serving.

I am submitting that it would be against the interest of the Canadian government to hamper Canadian diplomatic negotiations by accepting a motion of the type put forward by the hon. gentleman. I should like to refer to a number of outstanding authorities who would support this proposition. I suggest, in particular, that the proper view of these circumstances is that the executive, in other words, the government, must retain the power to decide in any particular case whether confidential documents such as these would, if revealed, result in harm being done to the public interest. If the government does so decide, then the house should recognize the need for taking such a decision and the issue should not be pressed. In support of this contention I should like to refer to the second edition of Todd on Parliamentary Government in England. As hon. members will recall, the learned author was the distinguished librarian of the parliamentary library of this house. He observes, at page 356:

> It is unquestionably of immense advantage to the country that the diplomatic transactions and proceedings of government abroad should be freely communicated to parliament. . . .But a certain amount of discretion must always be allowed to the government in respect to communicating or withholding documents and official correspondence which may be asked for by either house of parliament. While it is necessary that parliament should be informed of all matters which are essential to explain or defend the policy of government, it is equally necessary that a minister should be able, upon his own responsibility, to withhold from the public such information as he may judge could not be afforded without detriment to the public service. Ministers are sometimes obliged to give "extracts" only from official papers, in certain cases; but parliament is bound to receive what is communicated upon the faith and credit of the administration in whom their general confidence is reposed, unless they are prepared to question the personal integrity of ministers, or to pronounce a verdict of censure upon their public conduct.

And continuing later:

> Thus, it is generally inexpedient, and highly impolitic, to communicate to parliament papers concerning diplomatic negotiations which are still pending; and "nothing is more prejudicial to the action and efficiency of the diplomatic service than the perpetual motions for the production of papers, which are made by a certain class of politicians", who insist upon the fullest information on questions of foreign policy, at unseasonable times.

Then, at page 359:

> Any attempt to coerce the government into producing to parliament all the papers they may possess upon a matter of foreign policy, without regard to their being confidential, or unsuitable for general publication, could only result in compelling the agents of government to have recourse to "private correspondence" for the communication of everything but mere ordinary information. This would occasion not only immediate public loss, but also permanent injury to the state.

I would also point out—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member for Rosedale, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Macdonald: I wonder whether I could seek unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. MacEwan: Seek and ye shall not find.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the privilege at this time to rise for the purpose of putting forward reasons for the consideration of my colleagues why this motion should not be adopted. As a month has elapsed since the motion was last considered I think it would be useful at this time to read it again. It is in these words:

> That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, communications and other documents and replies thereto between the government of the United States of America, or any of its departments, and the government of Canada, or any of its departments, concerning the great lakes shipping situation and the proposed trusteeship of Canadian maritime unions since the 6th of July, 1963.

When the hon. member proposed this motion some weeks ago he raised certain arguments in support of its passage. I should like to take this opportunity to comment on them briefly. First, the hon. member referred to certain press reports of comments of officials of the United States government on the issue then concerning the two countries, the United States and Canada. I gathered that he in effect said that, by reason of these officials making these comments to the press, in a sense the privilege ordinarily attached to such documents might be considered to be waived and there was therefore no grounds for withholding the documents from the house on the basis of the arguments of lack of consent, in effect, of the neighbouring government of the United States, and of public policy.

May I suggest to the house that there was no suggestion in the press reports or, more important, in the arguments put forward by the hon. member that the words of these United States officials were in any way quotations or summaries of any of the documents which the hon. member seeks to have produced through his motion. I have read his remarks with some care, looking for some evidence contained in them that the references he made to quotations from the press and, in fact, words of ministers of the crown in this house with respect to these comments were in a sense quotations or extracts made by these officials from documents of the United States government or any of its departments or instrumentalities. Certainly in the remarks of the hon. member on the last occasion this motion was debated we find no such evidence.

I think the principles to be applied here are basically two. One arises out of the fact that the correspondence, tabling of which is requested, has passed between two governments, our own and that of the United States of America. The other is linked to the question of public policy and the public interest. I think the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) has brought forward some valuable and useful precedents to indicate the problems that arise when documents are exchanged in the course of diplomatic negotiations between two sovereign states. I think it is clear that it would certainly be most inappropriate, if the other sovereign state in question should not indicate its consent or desire for the tabling of the documents in question, for this house to pass a motion which would in effect compel the government to table the particular documents. We have no indication that the government of the United States of America would be in the least way willing to have these documents brought before us.

I think the hon. member for Rosedale put before us quite a useful point in directing our attention to the fact that a new and in this case quite unnecessary cause of potential conflict between our two countries might be created, if it should happen that a motion of this type were passed compelling the government to produce the documents in question at a time when the necessary consent of the government of the United States had not been obtained, a consent which they might well consider to be most necessary involving as it does correspondence, documents, state papers, which in their view of the public interest, not only of their own country but the general mutual interest, are such that it would be better that the documents in question not be produced.

In the attempt of the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) to bring before us some precedent he referred to the fact that on occasion international air agreements have been tabled in the house. He attempted to show that since these agreements were between two countries, the United States and Canada, and were documents involving two nations, and since they were tabled, this in effect created a precedent for the passing of the motion compelling the tabling of the documents which the hon. member seeks. In my opinion the precedent, if there is such, is not relevant to the situation. In fact, I would go further and suggest it is not really a precedent at all because in discussing the motion before us what we are talking about is not a document involving a final conclusion, a final agreement, the entering into of some type of final accord between two nations but rather the preliminary documents that have embodied in them and reflect negotiations that might lead up to some type of final agreement.

I think it is clear it is not the customary practice, especially in matters as delicate as the one out of which this motion has developed, to bring before the house the documents which the hon. member seeks under a motion of this type.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the only effect of bringing these documents before us would be to help make more difficult the solution of the problem out of which this particular motion has arisen. In making this comment I am not implying that I have personal knowledge, which I do not, of the contents of these documents. Each side might be referring to bargaining positions taken for the purpose of reaching some ultimate conclusion. The documents might contain certain factual information which, if generally made available to the public, would make it most difficult to reach some appropriate and final conclusion. It can easily be seen, I submit, how the presentation of these documents. which are really only preliminary steps in an attempt to reach some final conclusion, could be a most difficult and harmful thing when we are trying to solve the problem on which this particular motion is based.

Let me, then, turn to the ground of public interest which is relevant in considering whether or not the documents covered by this particular motion are such that their production should be compelled. I think that this is an occasion when, as often happens in assemblies of this type, events have overtaken the particular motion or question under which debate is taking place. If you read the motion you will see that it refers to the proposed trusteeship, and legislation in connection with it was passed many weeks ago. The first time the subject matter of this particular motion arose was October 31. I suggest, sir, that events have certainly overtaken the hon. member's motion. Since that time, the parliament of Canada has passed into law a bill setting up a trusteeship over the maritime union. The trustees have been appointed and have assumed their functions. They have taken over their duties and are carrying out those duties under the powers given to them by the parliament of Canada.

We find, too, that the emergency situation which seemed to be in existence at the time this motion was presented no longer seems to exist. Although we can readily admit there is still a problem of grave seriousness in the United States and Canada, shipping that has not already been halted by the onset of winter is being carried on from Canadian ports. The wheat shipments we have undertaken to make to Russia and other countries are being carried forward. The problems that faced our Canadian ships in United States ports are not of the same intensity that they were some five or six weeks ago. While I think it is correct, as the hon. member has suggested when he presented this motion, that this is essentially a Canadian problem, it is one that we have to recognize transcends to a certain extent the boundaries of our own nation, since the waterways in question obviously are those through which the international boundary runs.

I think we can readily agree that it would be impossible to come to a final solution of the problem on which this motion is based without the co-operation of the United States government and the leaders of the United States labour movement. I would suggest to this house and to all hon. members, that at this point, when relative calm has descended on the troubled maritime transportation scene, nothing at all could possibly be gained by proceeding with this motion at this time. In fact, I suggest to the hon. member who presented this motion that if he is really as concerned with the public interest, as I am sure he is in respect of this matter, if he still feels, as I am sure he did at the time he moved this motion, that there is a grave question of public interest involved, it would seem to me that the way to serve this public interest at this time would be to withdraw this motion, to remove the opportunity for inadvertently re-opening at an inappropriate time a question which, if it is not closed, is at least not as troublesome as it was.

We had a situation which seemed to be on the verge of explosion. The maritime labour front situation at one time appeared to be likely to halt Canadian shipping and to spill over the boundaries of a friendly nation, thus troubling the labour movement in that country. This situation does not appear to have the same potential violence now. We can recall that there was a situation which appeared to threaten the friendly relationships, the links between the two labour movements in the United States and Canada. It would appear that at least temporarily, and we hope permanently, some type of accord has been reached between the two principals. We hope some understanding has been reached or is on the verge of being reached between our two governments on this important question.

I suggest again to the hon. member who proposed this motion that it would be the highest expression of action in the public interest to withdraw the motion and to remove even this slight risk of opening this question at a time when it is unnecessary. I suggest, therefore, for a number of reasons this motion should not be supported by this house. First of all, I suggest the action of the United States officials in making comments to the press, and to which the hon. member who moved this motion has referred, were not quotations or summaries of official documents; second, I think it is clear that the public interest cannot possibly be served by revealing documents of this type, documents which as I have already indicated have been exchanged between the United States and Canada; and we have had no indication that the government of the United States has expressed any willingness whatever for these documents to be presented to this house.

So, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I not only suggest that this motion be defeated if it should happen to come to a vote, but that the only appropriate thing for the hon. member to do with this motion at this time is to withdraw it. We would give unanimous consent to that course, since this would be the highest expression of public interest on this very important question.

Mr. Macdonald: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that if the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) rises at this time he will close the debate and there are several other hon. members who would like to speak.

Mr. Speaker: According to the order which I have, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) was next on the list. I believe this was agreed to by various members of the house. The hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to move that the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue be now heard.

An hon. Member: That is closure.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is what you people are doing over there, talking one after another.

Mr. Speaker: I listened to the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) with great interest but I am advised, both actually and legally, we cannot accede to his request, because if the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue speaks now he will close the debate, and under our rules, if there are other members who wish to talk at this time, they have the privilege of doing so. I regret I cannot accept the point of order.

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the various speakers who preceded me, and indeed because of my very deep interest in the subject upon which the motion is founded, ever since it first appeared I have taken an interest in it and looked forward to the time when it would come before the house.

I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray) and his argument that it would not be in the public interest at this time, in all the surrounding circumstances, for these documents to be produced. Like the hon. member for Essex West I wonder that the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue, in view of the great improvement in conditions on the great lakes that has come about since the trusteeship went into effect, should insist on going forward with this motion, because at this late date it would not have any beneficial effect on the over-all situation. Indeed it could start up the controversy again. The troubled waters of dissention and strife have receded somewhat, and I think the public interest would appear to indicate that these papers and documents should not be produced at this late stage.

Indeed the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue, because of his broad knowledge of matters of this type, is perhaps more aware than many hon. members of the house of the possible very unfortunate developments that—

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the hon. member a question. I wonder, would he not allow the house to decide the points which he is arguing, and let the matter now be put to a vote?

Mr. Macdonald: Let him have freedom of speech.

Mr. Regan: With all respect to the hon. member, there are certain remarks on this subject that I would like to put on the record. I feel that in the interest of free speech, and so that the opportunity of hon. members on this side of the house to speak on matters of this type should not be restricted, I should continue my remarks. Perhaps if the hon. member will bear with me he may find that, before I conclude, he will be in full accord with the sentiments I express, though I would be quick to assure him I am not absolutely sure of that possibility.

I note, as reported at page 4229 of Hansard for October 31, 1963, the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue was involved in an exchange on a similar question and said:

> Concerning precedents, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of precedents where documents involving two countries have been tabled in the house. The government is continually tabling international air agreements between various countries. The latest I believe was in November, 1962, when an agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom concerning air traffic was tabled. Last session the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr.

Knowles) submitted a motion to the house, which was accepted, for the tabling of correspondence with other countries—

I presume the hon. member was referring to international conventions on civil aviation. These international agreements or treaties are essentially law making instruments, since they create international rights or obligations. Further I might point out to the house that under article 102 of the United Nations charter it is required that international agreements of this character and nature be registered with the United Nations, so that the obligations arising therefrom of various countries would be well known.

International agreements differ very much from diplomatic papers and negotiations leading up to them. This is a distinction which the hon. member did not make at that time, and it is one of the fundamental differences between the question of international air agreements and the subject matter of the motion before us.

Turning to the question of other precedents as to why documents of the type should not be produced—other than the public interest argument, which I hope to return to in due course—I would point out that on February 8, 1962, as recorded at page 687 of Hansard for that date, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) moved this motion:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the government or any agency, department, or branch thereof, and any other government since April 1, 1960, relating to the breadth of the territorial sea and proposals for the widening thereof.

Speaking on that motion the former minister of veterans affairs, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) had these words to say, which I think are pertinent to our consideration of this matter. They are reported as follows at page 683 of Hansard:

There is plenty of evidence to show that over the years it has been the custom for governments, when asked to produce that type of material, to decline to do so and certainly, if prepared to produce the material, to do so only after having received permission to that effect from the governments concerned.

At this point I might interject that, as an earlier speaker said, there is no indication that the United States government has agreed to the production of these papers in the case we are considering at the moment. Returning to the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre:

In this particular instance we are involved, I would imagine, with a number of governments which are interested in the problem of territorial waters or the law of the sea. To put the matter briefly, what we are dealing with is diplomatic correspondence.

On May 27, 1931, the prime minister of that day, Mr. R. B. Bennett, in discussing a motion for the production of papers similar to this one, stated as found on page 2020 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Admiralty Act.

An act to amend the Income Tax Act.

An act to amend the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act.

An act to incorporate Allstate Life Insurance Company of Canada.

An act respecting The Canadian Union Conference Corporation of Seventh-Day Adventists.

An act respecting The Canadian Equity Insurance Company.

An act respecting The Manufacturers Life Insurance Company.

An act respecting Adanac General Insurance Company of Canada.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1964.

Mr. Speaker: The house will now resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock p.m., namely committee of supply.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

1. Departmental administration including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, for total commitments of $2,529,570,600 for the purposes of votes 1, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25 30, 35, 40, 45, 50, 55, 60 and 65 of this department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $978,136,600 will come due for payment in future years) and authority to make recoverable advances under any of the said votes in respect of assistance rendered to the United Nations, any party of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or any provincial or municipal government, $3,432,000.

The Deputy Chairman: May I advise the house that we are meeting again at seven o'clock. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Patterson: At five o'clock I was referring to three areas which must be considered when we are thinking of Canada's defence obligations. The first, of course, is our own national territory, and when we consider the geography of this nation, its immense area and the distance of its boundaries in relation to a population of just 19 million people we can appreciate what a tremendous task it would be to defend these shores. In these circumstances we recognize the necessity of forming alliances which would bring others to our assistance in the defence of our national boundaries, just as they would oblige us to help defend the interests of our friends.

The second area to which I referred is, of course, the North American continent as a whole and our obligations in this respect are covered to a large extent by our link with NORAD. There is, in addition, the contribution which Canada must make to the defence of the free world, and this contribution is made most apparent by our part in the NATO alliance. All this is a large order for a nation of 19 million people, but it represents a task we must face realistically and courageously. It may be we shall have to make a choice between providing a small and, possibly, inadequate contribution in many fields, on the one hand, and making an adequate contribution in a selected role on the other. This is a matter to which careful consideration will have to be given.

Canada has never shirked her responsibilities, and her efforts in the past have earned the gratitude of all her friends. The hon. member for Vancouver East has referred to the statements we heard while we were in Europe regarding the quality of Canada's forces and I am sure that those qualities will be recognized in the future, as in the past, by all those with whom we are allied.

I should like to take this opportunity of dealing with the question of our personnel stationed abroad. An article appeared in tonight's Ottawa Citizen entitled: "Hellyer plans to pare military attache posts". It has to do with the attitude of the Minister of National Defence toward certain of our personnel abroad. The article states, in part:

> It is reported that defence minister Hellyer was appalled when a manpower study he had ordered showed that Canada's 39 senior military attaches abroad draw annual living and rental allowances totalling $343,200.
> Most of these embassy posts are filled by colonels or their equivalent in the navy and air force—captains and group captains.

The article draws attention to the obvious risk of overlapping which occurs, and points out that other officers in various areas could well undertake the responsibilities now carried by these attaches. It states:

> A military attache is maintained in Paris, though dozens of Canadian senior officers serve at supreme allied headquarters there. He draws a monthly living allowance of $609 and a rental allowance of $247 on top of a monthly salary of nearly $1,000 excluding marriage and subsistence allowances.

While we were in London a question was raised as to the number of officers and other ranks attached to our missions there. We were told there were 52 officers, 47 other ranks, 348 dependants and 77 civilians. I repeat, there were 52 officers. I do not know, but it seems to me the situation we face overseas is the same as the situation which faces us right here in Canada: We have too many chiefs and not enough Indians. This may explain why our expenditures are so tremendously high in relation to the number of active personnel we have in the forces. It appears that the minister himself is unhappy over this situation, and no doubt he will be taking some action in relation to it.

I should like to return now to a statement to which I referred this afternoon. I refer to another statement made by the Minister of National Defence, this time to the Empire club in Toronto. I should like to quote from a report which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of November 28:

> Defence minister Hellyer today admitted there are "serious problems" in respect of the Canadian army brigade and air division in Europe.
>
> The minister said plainly that the brigade is not properly equipped to hold down its present advanced role with the NATO northern army group in Germany.
> He said the situation of the R.C.A.F. air division, with half its strength in France where nuclear ammunition was not available, was simply not satisfactory.

Here again we find the minister very unhappy with the situation of our personnel abroad. Once again, speaking personally I would agree that the minister has some reason to be perturbed about this situation. When we were at Zweibrücken we had the opportunity of meeting the leaders of the third wing of our air division, and in reply to questions and through the contacts we made there we found that the air force was not in any way prepared to meet any kind of emergency that might arise. It seemed as though they were completely without weaponry. They were vulnerable in every sense of the word. When we hear references made to combat readiness they certainly do not appear to apply in that particular respect.

As far as the army brigade group is concerned, some of the factors that were brought to our attention there indicated that they are very ill equipped to fulfil any essential and prominent role in defence. I am not saying anything whatsoever, Mr. Chairman, by way of reflection on the personnel of our armed forces abroad. I believe they are of the highest calibre and they are anxious and ready to do any job that may be assigned to them.

There were a number of officers and men who expressed themselves as being very happy that the defence committee set up so recently had seen fit to come to visit them and to investigate the contribution that they, representing Canada, were making. The particular role assigned to our forces abroad is not the important question to them, as far as I could ascertain. They expect such decisions to be made in Ottawa. But they are extremely anxious that their role be defined and communicated to them so that they can go ahead and be tops in the job with which they are charged. The morale is high but I believe that morale can only be maintained if our service personnel know what the job is and are given the opportunity to maintain peak performance and preparedness in the face of that responsibility. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is absolutely essential that policies must be forthcoming.

Reference has been made to the past months and past years when we have not had an adequate or effective defence policy. I say again that policies must be forthcoming. Decisions must be made. A reassessment is essential and action is imperative to give a sense of direction and to lay down the guidelines for the responsibility that we are accepting in the roles which we intend to fulfil.

As I stated before, I do not intend to anticipate the committee's report. I do not even submit personal views at this time with regard to defence policy. But with the tabling of the report of the committee and the outlining of its recommendations I believe it will be the responsibility of the government to prepare to move quickly and decisively in the adoption of a defence policy that will establish the role of our forces at home and abroad so that uncertainty will be ended and our forces enabled to reach the maximum standard of preparedness to fulfil their tasks.

It is true, as we were reminded when overseas, that the era when war could be a continuation of foreign policy in another form is over. War with our present destructive capability is, as we are all aware, too catastrophic to contemplate. However, I believe our defensive capability must be maintained lest any possible aggressor consider our unpreparedness a sign of moral weakness and use the opportunity afforded to further his own objectives. While respecting the minister's hesitancy in acquiring weaponry that might limit operations in the future, I believe it is imperative that no time be lost in defining our roles and then moving quickly to prepare to fulfil those roles to the maximum degree possible.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, I pay tribute to those who are serving in the forces abroad, and here at home, of course, but I am sure we all recognize that we must set the objectives and outline the roles. Without question, those in the forces are then prepared to go ahead and make their maximum contribution to the defence of Canada and the free world.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, we are considering the estimates of what I believe to be the most important department, namely the Department of National Defence. When you study the estimates for the various departments, you find that 25.6 per cent of the national budget is spent by the Department of National Defence, whereas only 19.1 per cent goes to social security and health, 5.3 per cent to veterans affairs, 4 per cent to transport and 1.4 per cent to unemployment insurance.

There is no need to say that when 25.6 per cent of a national budget is allocated to one department, its expenditures must be scrutinized, not only by the ministers but also by all the members of the house.

The estimates of the Department of National Defence amount to $1,560 million this year, after deducting the $74 million which were to be used for buying CF-104 and Voodoo CF-100 aircraft. And despite that reduction the expenditures will amount to 25 per cent of the national budget, while the estimates for natural resources and industrial development represent only 8 per cent and payments to the provinces, 5 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that this percentage of 5 per cent for the provinces could have been increased by acceding to the requests of the premier of the province of Quebec as well as those of the other provincial premiers.

The estimates of the Department of Agriculture amount only to 2.7 per cent of the whole national budget, while those for the unemployment insurance commission represent only 1.5 per cent, as I said earlier.

Mr. Chairman, among the larger estimates of the Department of National Defence, we see that $291 million are allocated to the Royal Canadian Navy, which is $24 million more than last year. Does this increase include the $30 million we will need to purchase submarines from Great Britain? The estimates do not say.

The estimates for the Canadian army amount to $444 million, that is $7,791,000 more than last year.

As for the Royal Canadian Air Force, its estimates amount to $691 million, that is $38,702,000 less than last year.

The estimates for defence research and development amount to $51,217,000, that is $8 million more than last year.

The estimates concerning mutual aid for NATO amount to $32.1 million, that is $4.8 million more than last year. The estimates for contributions and other allowances have been reduced by $2,720,000.

As I said a while ago, these various amounts make a total of $1,560 million, that is $30 million more than the previous year, despite the decreases announced this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Chairman, what is most surprising to me is the detail of vote No. 1, which reads as follows:

Departmental administration including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, for total commitments of $2,529,570,600—

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Caouette:

—$2,529,570,600 for the purposes of Votes 1, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40, 45, 50, 55, 60 and 65 of this department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment—

Now, the Department of National Defence is authorized to spend up to $2,529 million, an authorization that is actually granted, while these expenses will amount to $1,560 million this year.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder how it is that the Department of National Defence, which is authorized to spend up to that amount, does not allow, through a cabinet order, other departments to use that portion of its supply.

For example, why is the natural resources and industrial development division not allowed to use that supply which the Department of National Defence will not be using this year?

They are authorized to spend up to $2,500 million and only 8 per cent of the whole national budget is allotted to industrial development and to the development of our natural resources.

We could also allocate the amounts which will be of no need to the Department of National Defence to other departments, so as to allow a more adequate development of all the riches and physical facilities we have in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, the government might, for example, double the family allowances' rate; that would cost $1,040 million, half a billion less than what we are spending at the present time for national defence, and there would be one billion more that would circulate among Canadian families.

If old age pensions were increased by $10 a month, that is by $120 a year, for each of the one million Canadian pensioners, it would cost Canada $120 million. Instead of increasing income tax rates, the government could have used national defence estimates which the minister will not use this year any more than he did last year.

Under its contribution to joint programs, the federal government pays out $50 million: $30 million for old age assistance, $4 million for the blind and $16 million for the disabled. If those federal benefits were doubled, it would cost the government only $50 million. Here again, the necessary funds could be taken out of the estimates of the Department of National Defence which are not used at present.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the minister's attention to those cuts in expenditures as it seems to be done in other countries of the world.

This afternoon the Minister of National Defence gave clearly to understand that some radar stations would be closed in various locations in Canada in order to save the department approximately $74 million.

Some people have been employed in those radar stations for eight, 10 or 11 years and they are very worried following the statements made by the Minister of National Defence. There should be some co-ordination and agreement between the various departments so that when jobs are abolished or there are layoffs in a department, such as that of National Defence, another department would look after the workers deprived of their jobs. In such cases, I suggest that the departments of trade and commerce and industry should look after the matter or that they be authorized to spend the funds which will not be used by the Department of National Defence.

I will now quote an excerpt from La Presse of December 3, 1963:

The budget which will be presented by the Department of National Defence for the next fiscal year, will amount to about $1,560 million.

The $74 million reduction mainly stems from the decisions made by the minister of defence, Mr. Hellyer, not to buy other CF-104 atomic bombers for the air division of the R.C.A.F. in Europe and other Voodoo CF-101B interceptors for the R.C.A.F. air defence command in the country—

—Following those decisions, estimates for weapons and equipment which were supposed to reach $279,441,000 fell to a new low for the decade. On the other hand, expenses for personnel, operations and maintenance continued to go up and reached more than $1,100 million.

That is just for salary increases and ordinary operations.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that some changes could be made in the estimates of the Department of National Defence. The report which was submitted to us last year on the expenses of the Department of National Defence and those of the Department of Defence Production clearly shows that the government and the two departments concerned make extravagant outlays.

I read in the issue of Wednesday, December 4, 1963, of Le Devoir, an article by Paul Sauriol which said:

Three days after the federal-provincial conference, a news report from Ottawa informed us that the Minister of National Defence had cut his budget for the current year by $74 million. The federal treasury thus recovers almost the equivalent of the $87 million it is giving to the provinces. There may not be any direct link between the two occurrences, but it is more than a coincidence, because many people feel that the most efficient and the most logical way to meet the requests of the provinces is to reduce considerably our defence expenditures.

It is true, several provinces, particularly the province of Quebec through Hon. Rene Levesque, suggested to the federal authorities to reduce expenditures for national defence in order to be able to give larger amounts to the provinces.

And he went on to say:

In spite of all that can be said with regard to our commitments to the Atlantic alliance and our share in the defence of North America, our military budget is too big, and it is the part of federal expenses which may be most easily reduced.

Mr. Chairman, when comparing our expenses with those of the United States, the difference is obvious.

And further on:

Those statements were illustrated by some figures: The United States has more than 500 I.C.B.M. and will have over 1,700 in 1966, whereas the Soviet union only has a fraction of that figure. The United States has more than 500 bombers ready for action, which is twice the number which the Soviets would send as a first wave over North America. The same superiority exists with regard to the hundreds of I.R.B.M. So that, if anything more were to be done in the nuclear field, the point of diminishing returns would be reached...

...There is no more question of the old monopolies, the American nuclear monopoly or the Russian conventional forces monopoly. The west realized the limitations of the nuclear deterrent, and increased its conventional forces, but Moscow also knows that an aggression with those conventional forces which would endanger the major interests of the west, in Berlin for instance, would bring about retaliation with tactical nuclear warheads. It is therefore a question of balance.

That is all Mr. McNamara said, but those who were listening could read the budgetary implications of his remarks between the lines. It meant that the new balance of forces might result in the reduction of some military expenses, more particularly with regard to nuclear arms; moreover, in order to reduce the deficit in the balance of payments, Washington may progressively decrease the importance of its forces in Europe, the more so as a recent experiment showed that a whole division could be transported by air in two or three days.

Therefore, if the military budget is notably reduced without jeopardizing the security of the country and of the west, the American government will have more ample resources available to stimulate economy, to modernize industry, to give a greater measure of assistance to emerging countries, to be more competitive on world markets, and to make up the deficit in the balance of payments.

In that light, Canada may hope to reduce also its disproportionate military effort, which absorbs one fourth of the federal budget. Even after the reduction which has just been announced, those expenses remain above one billion and a half. An energetic reduction of those exorbitant expenses would allow a better equilibrium between the federal and provincial finances. The hierarchy of needs would be easier to respect.

This amounts to what I stated a minute ago, that all the reductions in the national defence budget should be directed towards other divisions, such as that of the economic expansion of Canada.

If, in order not to weaken the armed forces of the country, we have to maintain our soldiers' pay, their standard of living, their jobs, it would be as easy, I think, to do so through building something in Canada instead of letting them exist in a passive way, as is the case now.

Those fabulous amounts should be devoted to the transfer of several thousand soldiers, if necessary, toward a direction other than that of national defence. So, it would be advisable, it seems to me, that those military men be directed towards the economic expansion of their country, instead of remaining in passivity or in a sort of idleness, as is the case now.

Mr. Chairman, we have here, under the heading of national defence, cases which are presented to us day after day. I feel I should call the attention of the minister to a statement from General Charles Foulkes of Victoria, B.C., who, speaking on national defence expenditures before the special committee on defence, the chairman of which is the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Sauve), declared, on October 22, 1963, the following:

I am not convinced that we know really which antisubmarine force is the more effective and the most economical for Canada.

And the Minister of National Defence was announcing at that time the purchase of submarines at a cost of $30 million. General Foulkes said:

We are not convinced, we do not know exactly which would be the most effective and the most economical antisubmarine force for Canada.

There was never, as far as I know, an impartial estimation of the relative value of the aircraft carriers, scouting planes, frigates, submarines, helicopters and long range marine aircraft, to combat nuclear submarines. We have replaced the Magnificent by another aircraft carrier, and wartime frigates by relatively slow escort ships, at a cost of $30 million. (That figure would be obsolete today.) Lancasters have been replaced by Argus marine aircraft, and these will have to be replaced also in 1970. We are right in asking ourselves whether this present combination of an aircraft carrier with scouting planes, frigates, helicopters and long range marine aircraft constitutes the most effective, the most useful, the most economical combination for this job. I consider this combination rather as a conglomeration of plans and ambitions of the navy and air force organizers.

That is a statement by General Foulkes, a Canadian general who said boldly: The present arrangement is rather a collection of plans and ambitions by navy and air force organizers.

And now, here in the parliament of Canada, we are voting $1 billion, possibly $1½ billion for national defence or something which amounts to a collection of plans, instead of an effective defence in case of attack, need or necessity.

Mr. Chairman, the Department of National Defence spends 5.6 per cent of the total national budget. Out of those fantastic expenditures, we still see the Department of National Defence treating people in the most arrogant manner you could think of.

I have a case here which dates back to 1951 and was discussed before various ministers of national defence, not necessarily before the present minister, but before the ministers of past administrations.

I am referring to the Senneterre radar station, in the riding of Chapleau, which was established in 1951. At the time of the establishment of that radar station, the government decided to take over claims which properly belonged to a mining prospector of the city of Val d'Or whose name is Joseph Lavoie.

Mr. Joseph Lavoie was the owner, since 1950, of mining claims located on the present site of the Senneterre radar station.

He asked the Department of National Defence for compensation. On several occasions, he was asked to report to the latter, or to send his claim to the Department of Transport, and afterwards to the Department of Industry, and then again to the Department of National Defence, and later still to the Department of Defence Production. He was sent from post to pillar since 1950, without ever getting any compensation though he was the owner of that mining claim which is the present site of the Senneterre radar.

Here is for instance, a letter dated 1957, written by Mr. George Hees, the then minister of transport, to Mr. Andre Begin:

[Text]

Dear Mr. Begin:

This is further to my letter of November 15 in connection with the effect of crown requirements on property owned by your client, Mr. J. A. Lavoie.

Actually the question of whether or not Mr. Lavoie can work his claims is one for the Department of National Defence to settle, and my department will again take the matter up with national defence to see if arrangements can be made which will enable Mr. Lavoie to develop his claims without interference with the R.C.A.F. installations.

I understand that my real estate officers have informed you that Mr. Lavoie's claim is very similar to the one filed by the Sullivan-Bourlamaque Gold Mines Limited as a result of the establishment of an airport at Val d'Or and that it was understood that you had agreed that negotiations could be held in abeyance, until a judgment is rendered in this case. Unfortunately, although some of the evidence has been heard the date of the final hearing is indefinite, and it may be some time before a judgment is rendered. I am afraid, therefore, that if the Department of National Defence feel that development of the claims cannot be allowed we will have no alternative but to await the completion of the Sullivan-Bourlamaque case.

I will write you further as soon as we have something definite from the Department of National Defence.

This letter is dated December 11, 1957.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, that letter was written in 1957 by the minister of transport of Canada Mr. Hees. Since then, Mr. Lavoie went on writing and communicating with the Department of National Defence; and again he was sent from post to pillar, trying to find out whether he was the owner of those claims or not, and whether the Department of National Defence could, without any compensation, expropriate land duly registered as claims with the provincial department in Quebec.

Here are the facts:

Mr. Lavoie has been since 1950 the owner of those mining claims, located on the present site of the Senneterre radar, whereas the building of that radar station only was started in 1951. When construction begun, Mr. Lavoie was formally denied entrance to the site of his claims when he wanted to work.

In 1958, the Department of Transport authorized him to proceed with his work within certain limits, and under entirely impractical conditions. Actually, Mr. Lavoie was refused the right to enter his own property.

By 1958, Mr. Lavoie had spent $51,113 with regard to these claims. At that time, the department concerned still refused to award Mr. Lavoie any damages, under the pretext that a similar case was pending in the exchequer court for the exact site occupied by the Val d'Or airport. That property had been taken over without any compensation being offered.

Therefore, I am asking the Minister of National Defence who could cut down the expenditures in his department by $74 million, if he is now in a position to honour his commitment concerning Mr. Lavoie, in Senneterre, where the radar station is located, or if he intends to open negotiations in order to settle this matter which has remained unsolved for years.

Under the previous regime, Mr. Lavoie was already making trips from Val d'Or to Ottawa to meet the then member for Chapleau, Mr. Martel, the minister of mines and technical surveys and the deputy minister of national defence. The case was never settled under the Conservative regime and the present government does not seem willing to settle it either. I continue:

> On November 10, 1960, judgment was rendered concerning the Val d'Or airport and Sullivan Gold Mines, Bourlamaque.
> Until November 1961, the authorities had never claimed they had acquired from the province a right to the piece of land in question. On November 1, 1961, the Department of National Defence, in a letter signed by Mr. David McBrown, executive assistant, admitted that, to that date, the land concerned had not been transferred from the provincial to the federal government.

That was in 1961.

A few days after that letter was received, the deputy minister of national defence informed Mr. Claude R. Baillargeon, of Val d'Or, Mr. Lavoie's attorney, that he was ready to meet him to discuss the matter. As a matter of fact, the meeting took place on December 14 and 15, 1961. The compensation suggested then would not have been sufficient to cover the expenses incurred up until that time by Mr. Lavoie in legal fees, engineering fees and others to regain his rights.

On January 4, 1962, Mr. Lavoie indicated in writing the necessary conditions for his operations.

On May 25, 1962, the department of defence proposed a new method of operation under conditions impossible to comply with.

It would be superfluous to mention to you the extremely heavy correspondence at the office of Mr. Baillargeon, at the department concerned and at the department of lands and forests of Quebec about the matter.

The main point at stake now is not the amount of damages, since practically no serious proposal has been made concerning that matter, but the possibility for Mr. Lavoie to develop the mineral resources which he owns.

A fact worthy of notice is that three settlers have received compensation as early as September 1951, when their land or part of their land was transferred to national defence.

Must we therefore conclude that the department in question claims absolute priority without having to compensate the owners of mining claims? In fact, can the Queen in right of Canada take over a property which was obtained legally from the Queen in right of the province? Perhaps the hypothesis may seem far fetched but facts prove that such an incident can and did happen.

The only way that argument could make any sense, would be to establish that the Department of National Defence had legal title before Mr. Lavoie. Otherwise, the department could offer Mr. Lavoie fair and reasonable compensation.

The last alternative has failed to materialize; as for the first one, official documents of the Quebec department of lands and forests prove the contrary.

A letter sent by the assistant deputy minister of lands and forests on October 15, 1957, bears witness to the fact that there has been no legal transfer yet. A letter dated November 1, 1961, and signed by the executive assistant to the Minister of National Defence reads partly as follows: "We are not yet in a position to give you a complete report, but we are informed that departmental officials are now ready to negotiate with Mr. Lavoie the settlement of his claim as soon as it appears that the Senneterre property was transferred to the department by the provincial department. The necessary steps have been taken to have the transfer made but the proper order has not yet been issued."

Even to this date, it is doubtful that the federal government has acquired legal title to that land where the radar station is located in Senneterre. I wonder if it is right for the government to act that way towards a Canadian citizen. Even if there is only one person involved and regardless of where the situation may arise in Canada, I feel that the Department of National Defence does not have the right to treat a Canadian citizen like that.

In the interest of the government, of human rights and of private property in Canada, I would therefore ask the Minister of National Defence to have the numerous cases like that of Mr. Lavoie settled in the nearest possible future.

Mr. Chairman, as I said a while ago, the Department of National Defence accounts for 25 per cent of the federal budget and its expenditures must be closely scrutinized. I agree that the Minister of National Defence is very competent and that he is an honest man—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Caouette: If the committee will bear with me, I just have two sentences left.

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: There would have to be unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue.

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: I have heard someone say no; unfortunately I cannot accede to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Bechard: Mr. Chairman, although I will now speak on the national defence estimates for the fiscal year 1963-64, I do not intend to prolong this debate but rather to bring my humble contribution to that delicate and very important matter which is the defence of our country. As the member from a constituency which along with the Gaspe riding gave to the Canadian armed forces during the last world war 35,000 men and women, many of whom fell on the battlefield, I feel doubly justified to speak.

Kindly allow me, Mr. Chairman, to express my most sincere gratitude and my great admiration to those courageous Canadians for the sacrifices they made in the name of a principle which is dear to us all: liberty.

To speak of defence is to speak of protecting our country against any eventual aggressor. When I say "our country", I mean its human capital as well as its territory. It is to speak of protecting our most cherished rights, our tongue, our faith, our traditions. It is, in short, to speak of safeguarding our democracy and our liberties.

In this framework, I feel that defence must be put above partisanship, because it is impossible for any country to have a true defence policy if it is bound by petty and often selfish interests that might be dictated by such and such a political party. Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I intend to remove all traces of partisanship from these few remarks.

I wish to devote the few minutes allotted to me to speak very briefly about the necessity of a good defence system for Canada and its responsibilities as a member of NATO and I will conclude with a few general comments.

In the first place, we, Canadians, should thank divine Providence for having spared our country from the disasters of war which the European countries and other continents have known for centuries. However, with the progress of science, with its effects in the military field as well as in all the others, with the development of the atomic bomb, jets, intercontinental missiles, etc. the enemy is at our doors. And we know some dictators who, if they would now decide to conquer the world, would represent a greater threat to Canada than the danger which existed 15 or 20 years ago.

Faced with such a prospect, no country, including Canada, can afford to disregard its own means of defence. When one thinks that only one mistake, wherever it might be made, can soon degenerate into a world-wide disaster, there should be no hesitation about the necessity for our country to be ready for any emergency in order to protect its own territory. Therefore, I feel that Canada should have an army, an air force and a navy equipped with the most modern and efficient weapons. I will be told that all this would cost huge amounts of money that a country like ours, large in size but rather small in population, cannot afford. To that I reply that in order to protect itself, any country must be willing to make the necessary sacrifices if it is to survive.

To come back to what I was saying at the outset of my remarks, no price is too high to preserve one's freedom and the control over one's territory. After talking with our French, German or British friends who suffered from the disastrous effects of the numerous wars they experienced, it is realized what sacrifices those people made and are still ready to make and the price they are willing to pay in order to protect their freedom and to banish the curse of war which, according to the present outlook, would be a nuclear war.

It would be an overstatement perhaps to suggest that Canada, with its existing possibilities, could eventually hope to beat off alone an attack launched against its territory. That is why it must necessarily rely on the co-operation of its partners, the closest and the most powerful being the United States. This brings me to the second part of my statement, namely the North Atlantic treaty.

Shortly after the second world war, western democracies expected that a new era would begin an era of security. Demobilization was quickly undertaken as our faith was then put in the U.N. However, the Soviet policy very quickly cast a gloom over this fine dream. Before this sad prospect of Russia which had already annexed several countries, namely Poland, Finland, Czechoslovakia, etc. and wished to extend its rule throughout the world and in view of the inefficiency of the U.N. as a result of the repeated vetoes of Russia, there remained only one possibility for western countries to ensure their security: to unite in order to protect themselves.

Such was the origin of the North Atlantic treaty which was signed on April 4, 1949. This treaty states that the member countries are:

> —determined to safeguard the liberty of their people, their common heritage and their civilization established on democratic principles, individual freedom and the rule of law.

Canada was one of the first 12 countries to sign that treaty. On that score, our country, as long as that multilateral agreement lasts, must have the best means of defence which will allow it to take the action that it will deem necessary, in case of any aggression against one or several of the contracting parties to the treaty.

Knowing, at least fairly well, the military might of the Soviet union, and its determination to achieve first place in the field of nuclear energy, and its admitted intention to spread all over the earth its communistic philosophy, by all the means available to it, the NATO members, and Canada among them, cannot afford to neglect looking after their defence, if they want to save the threatened democracy. It is useless to say, in the present context, as long as there is no ban on nuclear arms, that any possible world war would not lead to the use of the atomic bomb. Consequently, if the North Atlantic treaty has any meaning, the signers should be ready to face their obligations by being provided with the best defensive weapons.

However, considering the mutual fear of complete destruction, considering the terrible consequences of an atomic war, it is unlikely, though not impossible, that we will have eventually to suffer the atrocities of such a war. In view of these developments, the members of NATO will be called upon to change their defence policy.

According to information available, our powerful neighbours, the United States, are reputed to have enough nuclear arms to face an atomic war with Russia. If we can realize the rapidity and the destruction capacity of the nuclear weapons which these two countries have, I am of the opinion that it is useless to carry on the making of such a costly weapon which burdens the budget of all the countries involved, since it seems likely that the American reserves are adequate to meet any possible aggression.

This does not mean, however, that Canada, a member of NATO, should discontinue its defence program and cut all its expenses in this field. However, our country must increase its endeavours to equip its three services with the best conventional defence weapons, which are considered as most effective and least expensive, and not hesitate to discard equipment, material and armament which are obsolete or not effective enough.

The progress of science is so fast nowadays that a more serious study of each weapon likely to meet modern military requirements should be made in order to avoid finding ourselves in a situation at least uncertain, with an obsolete equipment, even before it is used.

I also suggest that the Department of National Defence should not be used to settle the problem of unemployment in this country. Through a carefully conceived economic planning and a genuine Canadian defence policy, in compliance with our commitments in NATO, we would avoid these lay-offs which never fail to happen after the slightest change in our defence policy.

Before I conclude my remarks, I would like to express the hope that our country, which has always co-operated with its allies in order to establish a genuine and lasting peace in the world, will continue, together with the other western powers, to turn its endeavours toward that ultimate goal, without however yielding to ingeniousness and neglecting its own protection against an artful aggressor whose greatest wish, let us not forget it, is still to spread its totalitarian tenet to the whole world.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Bechard: Definitely, if it is a relevant one.

Mr. Pigeon: Is the hon. member in favour of Canada being equipped with American nuclear warheads?

[Text]

Mr. Harkness: I should like to thank the minister for the kindly references he made to myself and to my predecessor in office, the Hon. George Pearkes, at the beginning of his remarks. I appreciate what he said and I know General Pearkes will appreciate it, also.

Before going into the subject matter of the debate I should like to make one comment on the statement by the hon. member for Vancouver East to the effect that there was no defence policy while the Conservatives were in power. On the contrary, we had a very definite defence policy. I stated it in the most explicit terms in presenting the estimates of the department to the House of Commons in September, 1961, which was the first opportunity I had of making such a statement. I expressed it, also, in dozens of speeches across the country. I know the hon. member for Vancouver East is a fair-minded man, so I should just like to ask him to turn up in Hansard the speech I made on September 11, I think it was, 1961, when I made a definite statement on defence policy. I should like him to read that statement and then come to his own conclusions. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, there were definite statements of policy made in white papers and blue papers throughout the period when the Conservative government was in power.

I turn, now, to the remarks made by the minister and to the particular matters under discussion. To begin with, I must say I was shocked and disappointed by the statement which the Minister of National Defence made to the committee this afternoon. I had expected much more and much better. First of all, I think his statement gave the impression that a program of scrapping right and left was in progress without either a policy or a plan—that is, if we are to accept the statement that the government's review of policy has not yet been completed and that no definite decisions will be reached with regard to these matters until the recommendations of the defence committee have been studied. This is the situation presented to us, and it would appear to be correct. However, I submit that the government cannot have it both ways. Either the reductions announced must relate to a policy, or they make no sense at all. For this reason I think the government is on the horns of a dilemma in this connection. If the reductions announced in the hon. minister's statement are related to a definite defence policy, then the minister has refused to disclose to the house what the policy and the plans are to be. If that is the case, I think we have reached a point at which parliamentary government is not operating properly, and both the minister and the government could not be too strongly condemned for their part in such a situation.

On the other hand, if we accept the general tenor of the statement made, which conveys the impression that the reductions are nothing more than an unplanned, apparently desperate effort to cut defence spending by x million dollars, then I think the government is following an irresponsible and dangerous course. I think the situation should be resolved by a statement on the part of the minister because, otherwise, the committee is in an almost impossible position when it comes to considering these defence matters.

To deal with the actual statement which the minister made, may I say I think the inevitable effect of the long list of reductions which he announced, together with the cancellation of the frigate program and other reductions, will be to reduce the strength and effectiveness of our armed forces—it could not possibly have any other effect—and thus to reduce the contribution which we could make and which we are obligated to make to the joint defence of the western world under NATO and NORAD. I think, too, it will probably reduce our ability to meet any request which might be made of us by the United Nations in connection with its military interventions. In addition, these announcements are bound, in my view, to shake the confidence of our allies in our will and ability to meet the obligations we have assumed. Thus they will weaken our position in the councils of NATO and in the councils of the world generally, and destroy, to some extent at least, our ability to influence decisions in directions we think they should take. This might well be the most dangerous result of widespread reductions such as have been announced, as far as I can gather without consultation with our allies and without there being any plan for replacement or for keeping up the general level of our contribution either to NATO or to NORAD, or to the service of the United Nations, whenever that might be required. At the same time, as far as our own forces are concerned, these announcements will deal an extremely heavy blow to the morale of all our armed forces and particularly to the morale of our reserve forces, and their ability to operate in any effective manner whatever.

I was disappointed that in his remarks the minister gave no indication when the implementation of the announced program to supply nuclear ammunition to the four weapons systems we have secured and which require it in order to be effective would take place. When the minister first assumed office I recall he made a statement that this would be looked after within a month. I have been extremely puzzled why there has been such a long delay in implementing the nuclear policy which I firmly believe in, the policy which I promoted when I was minister of national defence and which I was delighted to see the present administration take over. But I have been extremely puzzled why it has taken the present government so long to implement that policy. The government has given every evidence of dragging its feet in regard to this most important matter.

I think this chamber must and should have a statement from the minister telling us what the reasons for the delay are, and when the program will be implemented. I think we have been kept far too long in the dark in regard to this very important matter. As pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre this afternoon, until nuclear ammunition for these four weapons systems is supplied our present defence posture is much weaker and much poorer than at any other period in the past since the second world war, certainly since the Korean war, because of the fact that the effective armament we had then, the interceptor planes and so on, have been phased out and have disappeared while the more effective equipment which was planned to take their place has not yet been brought into operation. Therefore at the present time we are in a bit of a hiatus in that we have got rid of the armament we had, but we have not yet got new armament to take its place. In my opinion this situation constitutes a dereliction as far as our obligations to our allies are concerned and as far as our obligations to the country are concerned in maintaining the security of this nation.

I do not have time tonight to comment on all the reductions announced by the minister, nor has there been time to study and assess them and thus come to some conclusion as to what the result will be. However, I should like to say a few words about some of these matters. The first one I should like to deal with is the cancellation of the general purpose frigate program, which was announced some time ago. I think this is an example of welshing on our naval commitments and our naval obligations as far as NATO is concerned. It amounts to a unilateral decision to reduce our naval contribution to NATO. I would be the last one to argue that the only naval program which is acceptable and which should be put into effect is the construction of the general purpose frigates. There are always alternatives in this regard. However, what I take the strongest possible objection to is the scrapping of a program decided upon after long study as being probably the best, looking ahead for the next 20 years and putting nothing in its place. If something had been put in its place I would say all right. People's ideas on these matters differ. We would at least be living up to obligations we have assumed, but to just scrap the program without having any replacement plan means that in effect we have taken a unilateral decision to reduce our naval contribution to NATO.

I asked the minister and the government a question whether a decision had been made to reduce our naval contribution to NATO and the answer was no, but the cancellation of the frigate program means that in effect that decision has been taken. Something is really being done here by indirection which I think the government perhaps dared not do openly and boldly. I think this is just as serious a dereliction with regard to our obligations and commitments as anything that could be instanced in respect of Canada or any other member of NATO.

Mr. Winch: I wonder whether the hon. member would answer a question on this point?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Winch: When the hon. member was minister of national defence did he make any commitment to NATO for the building of these general purpose frigates?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I did not make any specific commitment in regard to the building of the general purpose frigates. The point is that many years before we had agreed to supply a certain number of ships to NATO. I do not say for a minute that our commitment should not be negotiated down or up. As a matter of fact, I would think most of the members of NATO would perhaps be insistent that it should be negotiated up rather than down. But as long as we are in that situation I think this cancellation is a very bad piece of business and causes a loss of confidence on the part of our NATO allies if, simply by allowing obsolescence to reduce the effectiveness of our NATO contribution, we thereby reduce the effort we are making on behalf of the alliance as a whole.

Mr. Winch: But you had no commitment?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, there is no use dealing in semantics with regard to whether you have a commitment or have not, whether you have a written contract or whether you have not. In NATO these things are arrived at as a result of long periods of conferences involving the permanent NATO council and at the NATO ministerial meetings. In many cases it is a matter of an agreement or a commitment by word of mouth being made at a NATO ministerial meeting. To try to pin this thing down to a matter of a written contract completely ignores what the realities of the situation happen to be.

To return to some of the particular matters that the minister mentioned, I must say that the termination of the Bobcat program fills me with a great deal of sadness. I do not for a moment absolve myself from all responsibility in connection with the failure of this program. As the minister said, it was started in 1954. We were the first nation really to get into the field of an armoured personnel carrier, and we should have been able to carry the program through and produce a carrier before anybody else. Instead we have had a long series of delays. To me the whole thing has been completely inexplicable and extremely frustrating. It was one of the most frustrating things I dealt with during the time I was minister, and I am still at a loss to understand why we failed in the way we did to carry this program through to completion.

It may well be, as the minister stated, that since the program has been so long delayed and as there is no possibility of anybody else buying the equipment with the result that the cost would be twice that for which we could buy somewhat similar equipment from somebody else, the wisest thing to do is to cancel the program. But I must say that when we embark on programs of this sort in the future I think there will have to be time limits placed on the commercial companies carrying on the work, and if the time-tables are not met, then that is the time to cancel the program, not years later after a great deal of money has been spent on it. In other words, we have got to be much tougher in connection with development programs of this kind. Otherwise we are not going to get any place with them, and at the same time they are going to cost us a good deal of money.

There is quite a considerable list of reductions as far as the navy is concerned in the various reductions announced by the minister. With regard to the 10 auxiliary vessels which are going to be retired, all I can say is I do not know what vessels they are. Nobody else in this chamber, except perhaps the minister and associate minister, knows what they are. We are not, therefore, in a good position to say what the effect of this move will be.

Then, there is the reduction in the air squadrons. If you are going to continue to have an air arm in the navy, I think this is an error. If you are going to wipe out the air arm of the navy altogether, then the move may be justified. However, the mere reduction of the air squadron as a means of saving a few hundred thousand dollars, unless there is a definite plan behind it, is not defensible in my opinion.

I understand the Kamloops ammunition depot is to be closed. I think there are other members who will have something to say about that. However, there has been a lot of money spent on this depot—this applies to a lot of these other installations that are being closed—and it was put there for a definite purpose. I feel that pretty good reasons have to be produced for closing these various installations before it is possible for the members of this committee to accept their closing in this way. The same thing applies to Longueuil, to the repair facilities at Sydney, to the installation in Newfoundland, and so on. Until we have had an opportunity to find out definitely what is being done, and particularly until the minister produces reasons which are acceptable for the closing of these installations, we have to look at this process with a very hard eye indeed.

Now, we come to the army. The turning of the northwest highway system to public works is something with which I would thoroughly agree. I must say that I attempted to do that during the time I was minister of defence. I did not believe it was a commitment the army should continue any longer. In fact, we probably should have given up some time ago. However, this brings up a question with which I think the committee ought to concern itself, and that is how much of the $40 million or $50 million of savings, which the minister is alleging in these reductions, are going to be actual savings and how much are merely transfers to some other department. I think a close examination will reveal that there is a great deal of what is represented as savings which are not really savings at all but merely transfers to some other department.

In addition to the northwest highway system, there were certain airports and other installations which were being turned over for operation to another department. Then, there was the closing of Fort Churchill. So far as the army and R.C.A.F. are concerned, this appears to me to herald the end of cold weather training and research. I regret this move from that point of view. I think we have made a very distinct contribution to the entire NATO alliance by maintaining the facilities at Fort Churchill, particularly for research under cold weather conditions, and to determine what military personnel and equipment can do under these cold weather conditions. I feel that the closing of this installation is probably a very shortsighted policy in view of the great amount that is still to be learned, and needs to be learned, so far as operating under extremely cold weather conditions is concerned. This action is something which I believe needs a very good explanation before it can be accepted by this committee.

Now, I see that my time is getting rather short so I will go over some of the other matters rather quickly. I should like to protest particularly the closing of the repair depot at Calgary and also the closing of the auxiliary squadron there. This action will remove the R.C.A.F. entirely from a city which has been one of the great supports of the R.C.A.F. before the war, during the war and following the war. I can say nothing more than that I think it is a serious error and I protest against it. Once more, I should like to see reasons produced for this action.

I believe that the most serious criticism that can be made of the reductions the minister has announced relates to the reduction in the reserve force. So far as I can see, these reductions are designed to cut the reserve force by about 50 per cent. This is going to destroy this force which throughout our history has been the basis for our military build-up in time of emergency. I completely fail to understand the reason for destroying the reserve force in this country. I think there is no question but that this move indicates a definite change in policy, and I think the minister should announce that this is the case.

The cutting down of the army reserve to a maximum of 30,000 men, which I understand is the objective, means that the policy of using the reserve force for survival operations has to a large extent been thrown out the window. In other words, the whole emergency measures organization set-up, on which a large amount of money has been spent, has been abandoned. This must be the policy or otherwise there would not have been such a serious reduction so far as the militia is concerned. As I have said, throughout our history, our military build-up has always been dependant upon the militia. So far as the immediate defence of Canada is concerned, the existence of a militia reserve is essential in order to get a sufficient number of men and units who are trained or semi-trained in the event of an attack on this continent. This is particularly true in the event that there should be a nuclear attack on this continent and there is a need for survival operations. Instead of reducing the number of the militia, the minister should be increasing the number.

I take particular objection to the reduction in the reserve force because during the time I was minister I made every effort possible to build up the morale, the spirit and the strength of the reserve force. I believe we had considerable success in that regard. I think there is no question about it, the comparatively small amount of money spent on the reserve force in comparison with the total military budget, is the best value we get for our defence dollar. I suggest to the minister that in cutting the reserve force to such a serious extent he has begun to make cuts, in an attempt to cut down defence expenditures, in the very worst way he could possibly have gone about it. I believe the minister said a total of about $5,250,000 would be saved in this way so far as the naval and R.C.A.F. reserve forces are concerned. I would estimate that about $5 million to $10 million would be saved by the reduction in the army reserve force. In comparison with the total budget of $1,500 million, that is a comparatively small amount and it destroys morale to such an extent, not only in the reserve force but in all the military forces, that it cuts down the ability to recruit and to build up rapidly in the face of emergency. I believe this is a completely unacceptable method of cutting defence expenditures. I plead most earnestly with the minister and with the government to wipe out this part of the program and to maintain the reserve forces, at least at the level that they have been during the past several years.

As the debate progresses I expect there will be a number of other matters on which I will wish to make comments, but at this particular time in closing I would like to point out that I have not dealt with general policy. However, if the debate develops along that line I should certainly like to present my views in that regard.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, I am one of the newcomers to this house. Up until just recently I spent my life as a sailor in the Royal Canadian Navy, and let me say before anybody else gets a chance to say it, I am still at sea with regard to many of the activities that go on here.

This is the first time I have spoken in this chamber but I have served on a number of committees, and I know you will understand me when I say that, for me, the most interesting one is the defence committee. I should like to talk about this for a moment and, if you would permit me, I would like to take a short while to reminisce. I served as a very young man on a ship, the H.M.S. Hunter, a destroyer in the British Mediterranean fleet. For some 23 years now she has been lying at the bottom of Narvik fiord with most of my former shipmates.

We had a motto in that ship which somehow captured our imaginations and united us as one body. I often remember it. It was "To strive, to seek, to find and not to yield." In my opinion this would be suitable in many ways as a motto for the defence committee, so many members of which I see in the house tonight. So many of us are veterans that I feel we are drawn together by our common experience, and to me there is a very obvious wish to set aside many of the differences that plague us in this house and to get on with the job that a defence committee is supposed to do—to get on with the job that has to be done. We all know that we are facing a most difficult problem, and I think we are generally striving and seeking for the answer.

My riding of Victoria, which contains both a permanent army garrison and the Esquimalt navy base, has long and close military connections. We do most of the shipbuilding on the west coast, and altogether I suppose there is no town in Canada as affected as we are by shifts of defence policy. Not only are the servicemen affected, but our shipyards employ some 4,000 men, and their wages are a major factor in our economy. I must admit that the recent decision to purchase three submarines in Great Britain, which came as it did on the heels of the cancellation of the frigate program, came as an unexpected blow to me and to the people of my riding.

Victoria is going through an anxious time while the government decides what course it is going to take in defence, but the restraint which the people and the press of Victoria have shown so far demonstrates their understanding of the situation and I as their member appreciate this more than I can say. But I cannot stress too strongly that once a decision on defence policy has been made, some speedy and imaginative action on the part of the government will be necessary to pump new life into the defence industries in Victoria and elsewhere, if they are to be kept alive.

Coming back to the defence committee, Mr. Chairman, I get the feeling that perhaps too much may be expected from it. The developments of science and technology over the past 20 years have made so-called defence experts out of anyone who wants to voice an opinion, for the very understandable reason that there are just not any comprehensible rules of defence and war any more. One is dealing these days with speeds of thousands and tens of thousands of miles an hour, and with hundreds of millions of tons of explosive power, and these are almost beyond ordinary human comprehension.

The point I am getting at is that we on the defence committee, and I certainly include myself, are not experts on military defence and we do not pretend to be. Through our travels and our briefings we can become well informed, but I think that is about as far as it can go, and it would be wrong to expect us to be specific and detailed in our advice or in our observations to the House of Commons. I would suggest that we have, however, a very useful role to play in pointing out some general signposts and some general guidelines for defence policy. I believe that is what we are trying to do.

The committee has not yet presented any report. I do not want to anticipate it, but I did want to point out that there are limitations to what the committee can rightly be expected to produce when it has built-in restrictions on the type of information it can acquire and when it has been in existence only such a short time.

I would like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley that consideration be given to making this a permanent committee of the house, and now I am going to leave that subject because my time is limited.

It may interest some hon. members to know that in recent months I have been twice to Europe with the NATO parliamentarians, and while over there I was fortunate in being one of those who were able to travel from the northernmost tip of Norway to as far south as Turkey, which is the southernmost hinge of NATO. I also visited our Canadian army brigade and R.C.A.F. wing in France and Germany.

As a navy man I naturally went prepared to be critical, but I agree in all sincerity with the remarks the minister has made. We have every reason to be proud of our servicemen. All over Europe, from every quarter, we were complimented on them. They are held in the highest regard by the military and by civilians alike, and we were gratified, but not overly surprised, to hear that their contribution to European defence far outweighs their numbers. I particularly noted how high their morale was. They are giving a good account of themselves and, while this is not news, I want to pay a tribute to them in this house.

While our Canadian forces are playing an important part in Europe, I must confess that in recent times I have felt that perhaps we should be paying greater attention than we have to defence on and around this continent, where I believe we have an even bigger role to play in the future. There is no doubt in my mind, and I think it is generally agreed, that it is what I call, for want of a better term, the weapon and defence equilibrium between the east and the west which provides us with our peace today, and which will continue to do so until some better arrangements can be made.

Today the heart of western defence is on this continent. Where do the nations of Europe look when the chips are down? If this is the case, then it is of vital importance to us all that this equilibrium be maintained at all costs and that our western side of the balance, particularly that major portion of it which lies on this continent, be given special care and attention.

I do not think there is much argument that the two main threats to both the east and the west are the other sides intercontinental ballistic missiles and missile carrying submarines. Against neither of these at the moment does there appear to be a satisfactory defence. But I am convinced, by the evidence of history and by the information we have gathered in committee, that a defence against both of these will be developed some time in the future. Enormous efforts are being put by both the east and the west into finding this solution. It will come, probably discovered by both sides at about the same time, and when it does the defence equilibrium must be quickly re-established. Because of our geographic position, next to the core of the western alliance, we Canadians will most assuredly have an important part to play, and if we are not prepared to take on the job, the United States or even NATO itself will demand the right to do it for us; and I cannot believe that Canadians would want that. I am making this point at some length, Mr. Chairman, because there is a not unnatural disposition on the part of all defence planners to discount forces for which there is no immediate urgency. I can understand this in view of the high costs involved; but security, we all know, is not cheap and efficient military forces, be they navy, army or air forces, just cannot be created or recreated overnight. They are the product of years of training and experience, and if there is a foreseeable need for them in the future, we destroy or debilitate them at our peril.

I believe there is a need, a foreseeable need, for all our armed forces, but I am thinking of the navy particularly at this moment because they have come in for some pretty hard knocks lately and because dealing with half of the problem that I outlined, the missile-carrying submarine part, is their business. We have an admirable navy which is only now beginning to realize its full promise. Our Canadian navy has made a specialty of antisubmarine work—and it is good at it; make no mistake about that. If it is not capable at this moment of coping with fast nuclear powered submarines, I venture to say it is because this is a comparatively new threat and the R.C.N. has never been provided with a means of developing this capability. The threat is there; it is a threat that lies off our coasts perhaps today, and it is a major threat to the entire western alliance both now and increasingly in the future. I suggest that we will be shirking our responsibility if we do not busy ourselves right away with the task of preparing in earnest to meet this threat. I suggest this is no time to cut down the capability of our navy and I am glad to see there is nothing, to my mind, in the minister's statement today to indicate that the navy's capability is being permanently cut back. Bearing in mind the facts of the present and the probabilities of the future, we should in my view provide our navy with the type of naval vessels, equipment and research facilities which it will use, and use well, to meet and beat the threat. I do not think Canadians realize what outstanding men we have in the submarine, antisubmarine and research fields.

As I see it, as parliamentarians our duty to the nation in this regard is quite clear, and I for one have every confidence that this government will act in a responsible and satisfactory manner in facing up to the facts when early next year it reveals its defence plans for the future. I think, Mr. Chairman, we can all see the necessity for change now in the armed forces if we are to make progress in the future. There are some difficult days ahead for the minister, but the job has to be done and I am sure no hon. member of this house envies him the job. After all the talk and advice is over, it is the minister who has to make the decisions, particularly the hard ones. It is he who has to wring the last cent's worth of effectiveness out of the defence dollar, and he has my sympathy and support. We make no contribution to security if as a nation we go broke on defence.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the minister's statement this afternoon, I am pleased that Royal Roads will continue as a service college but I am saddened to think that the naval reserve division in Victoria is to be disbanded. I am sure, however, that its past and present members, most of whom I knew so well, will agree to disbandment, if in its passing there will follow a real contribution to the future well-being of the naval service in Canada. The urgent requirement today, surely, is for military forces in being, ready to go at a moment's notice.

I think I am right in saying that the Victoria naval reserve division, now called H.M.C.S. Malahat, was the first to go on active service in world war I, and I have a feeling that we have not heard the last of it yet. This prompts me to end my remarks with a question to the minister, and it is this: Should the former members of the reserve division in Victoria organize themselves into some sort of supplementary reserve or association which would permit them to continue their contact with the naval service, would the minister consider allowing them to use some of the naval facilities now in Esquimalt, provided this can be done at no cost to the crown?

[Translation]

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the special committee on national defence, I would like to seize the opportunity afforded by the study of the credits of the Department of National Defence, in order to say a few words about these credits, and about the task of the special committee.

As the members of the committee already know, we have had the privilege of visiting a few European countries which are members of NATO. We saw on the spot the progress accomplished in the defence set-up of the European continent, and we studied the condition and the role of the military forces of the alliance.

Those who have occasion today to visit western Europe, cannot fail to be struck by the revival of countries which were terribly ravaged by the war of 1939-45. They are also able to ascertain that the Atlantic alliance has proved a success, in so far as it prevented western Europe from being drawn into the communist orbit.

I think that the alliance has inspired the fundamental policy of the European members of NATO, and that it should consequently be protected.

By shedding completely all spirit of partisanship, the members of the special committee on defence have become capable to praise on the one hand the success of the alliance, and on the other, the fruitful contribution that our forces in Europe allowed us to make.

Mr. Chairman, the members of the committee have also been impressed by the clear-cut policy of the majority of the European countries in NATO.

This, by contrast, throws sadly into light the lack of firm policies of our country, and more particularly of the present government, concerning our true role in matters of defence.

Mr. Chairman, it is possible of course not to be entirely in agreement with the aims, the policies and the objectives of some of our allies, but we cannot fail to see that they, at least, have a clear and well-defined program, and seem to know where they are going.

Let us look at the situation in France which is one of the main powers of NATO, and which, under the guidance of President de Gaulle, is following a policy of nuclear arms, which she calls her program of "independent deterrent".

There is no doubt that France is today a nuclear power and that, in a few months or at the most in a few years, she will have an independent nuclear deterrent, and will be able to drop nuclear heads on any enemy territory.

In the field of defence, most of the efforts of the French are aimed at this very definite objective. A few allied countries approve that attitude while others condemn it.

And if you go to Germany now, you will find there again a very definite defence policy aimed at the reunification of the German soil, the protection of Berlin against communist aggression, the defence of the German territory, that of West Germany. It favours also the creation of a European nuclear force under direct NATO control, and the German authorities leave no doubt that they intend to pursue that objective.

The members of the committee also went to Denmark and I am of the opinion that the primary aim of that short visit was to see the part that a small country could play within the alliance. With a population of only four or five million people, Denmark does not expect to play a major part within NATO. In view of the strategic importance of its geographical situation in Europe, the Danish government is totally opposed to any form of nuclear armament whether it be the storage of nuclear warheads on its soil or the equipment of the Danish forces with offensive nuclear weapons.

The stand taken by the Danish government is very clear on that matter. It is opposed to all nuclear arms of any kind, as far as the Danish soil or the Danish armed forces may be involved.

And I remember, when a member of the committee asked one of the chiefs of staff what would happen in case of a sudden attack from an enemy nation, the answer was: in case of emergency or attack, do not fear, we will get our nuclear equipment early enough. But until war breaks out we will be unswerving in our determination to oppose any acquisition of nuclear arms for our country.

Mr. Chairman, I make these remarks to indicate that it is possible for some countries, whose interests may be quite divergent, to work out a defence policy consistent with their needs.

As far as our country is concerned unfortunately, I regret that we were not given by the Minister of National Defence a clear and specific statement on the Canadian defence policy.

The minister commented this afternoon on the military situation of Canada, but his remarks were a strange contrast with the things he did not mention.

For example, at a conference in Toronto, he stated—and he repeated the same thing here —that the military requirements of Canada were under study and the military situation was a subject of constant study by himself and his experts.

But he seems unable to derive from his studies the elements that must be selected to work out our defence policy.

As a matter of fact, the minister this afternoon has not given us any idea of the necessary steps to protect the Canadian territory and the rest of North American territory. He said nothing at all about that.

He did not talk either of the most effective part our military forces might play in NATO.

He also ignored a current topic, namely the integration of Canadian armed forces.

And he did not say a word of the future role of the Canadian navy, the air force, and research in military technology.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that instead of laughing during our remarks, the minister should rather listen to them. Since he is introducing his estimates for the first time, he should make an effort to give the committee members and the Canadian people an outline of the way public funds allocated to defence are spent.

The minister stated that 77 per cent of the estimates were for the maintenance of the Canadian armed forces, while only 16 per cent are earmarked for designing and developing new weapons and for supplying our armed forces with the required equipment as well.

Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that something is rotten in the state of Denmark. It seems to me that too large sums are spent for the maintenance of the armed forces. In other words, it is much too expensive to train a soldier and to get him ready for action.

And although the estimates of the Department of National Defence account for 25 or 26 per cent of the national budget, I think Canada does not spend enough to keep up to date as regards military technology.

It is recognized today that defence is mostly ensured by technological facilities. Military technology develops constantly, and a country which does not devote the necessary amounts to research in military fields, economic fields and others, will certainly lose its rank among the progressive and industrial powers. And Canada, unfortunately, is in the process of so doing, in military fields as well as in others.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is time the government revise entirely its attitude on defence and give a clear and unequivocal reply to the questions which the Canadian people ask themselves, and rightly so, as concerns their constantly threatened security, should no attention be paid to it.

Mr. Chairman, the committee members have also found other things in the course of their European tour.

For instance, it may be said the morale of the air division is excellent, that it has very well-disciplined troops. In fact, were they provided with the necessary equipment, they would be ready for combat. In brief, they are a credit to Canada.

There is nothing wrong with those troops. Our allies and the members of NATO all agree that the Canadian forces, whether they be the army or air forces, are first class troops in every respect.

But the minister has some problems to settle concerning the air division. He said a few days ago that a situation not very satisfactory existed, that is that half of the air division stationed in France did not have available the aircraft or the equipment required by those aircraft and so was prevented from playing the part which could be expected from it as a member of the NATO armed forces.

It is not enough for the minister to say that an unsound and regrettable situation exists. As a minister, he has the responsibility to settle that situation, and that, first of all, in the interest of the members of our air force, as well as in the interest of the defence of Canada and of the NATO nations.

But the minister gave no indication, neither in his speech the other day nor in his remarks this afternoon, of the steps he intends to take to settle that problem.

Now, as far as our land forces are concerned, no one can question the ability of those soldiers as fighting units. But those soldiers have not yet received the equipment they need to fully play their part and in fact—and the members of the committee had an opportunity to find that out—the equipment available to them more often than not is old, obsolete and in a conflict, could play neither a protection nor a defence role.

Mr. Chairman, that is an intolerable situation which the minister has the responsibility to settle without any delay.

There is also the matter of tactic nuclear weapons which are or would be available to the army and the forces joining that army in case of a conflict.

Mr. Chairman, the members of the committee were a little frightened by the unconstrained manner with which the members of the army use those nuclear weapons during training. In listening to some commanding officers reporting on the situation which would probably exist in case of real attack, you might have thought that those nuclear weapons can be used as any other conventional weapon, that if the enemy should attack in sufficient number, a division commanding officer would only have to give some order and the soldiers included in that division would immediately start using nuclear weapons. It seems to me another philosophy should exist about the hypothetical use of nuclear arms in case of war.

I know that the Minister of National Defence will say: that is impossible because nuclear arms cannot be used without the authorization of the highest authorities, possibly the President of the United States. It is no doubt true in theory but, in practice, the members of the committee got a very clear impression that the order to use those nuclear arms would come from the commanding officer at the brigade or expeditionary force level. Thus the danger of setting up nuclear bases and also the indescribable horror that would result from the start of a nuclear war. The danger is very real and it seems to me that our soldiers show an unconcern that almost shocks the observer with regard to the use and control of those nuclear arms. I would like the minister to give us some detailed information about that.

Personally, I feel that as far as the use of those tactical nuclear weapons is concerned, special units should be established which would be well trained to use those weapons in case of war, would be aware of the consequences if they were used and would not use them unwisely in the confusion that an attack would create.

It seems to me that, in that regard, military leaders should get very definite orders from political leaders.

Mr. Chairman, we spend a great percentage of our total budget for military purposes. It seems to me that we should try very hard to reduce it, if possible, because a quarter of the total budget going for defence, that is too much. If Canada wants to play an influential part, it should direct its efforts towards the achievement of peace.

The other day, I heard about a project submitted by President de Gaulle to some of the main industrial countries: this project consisted essentially in an appeal to reduce military expenses by one half of one per cent and to use those savings for research on cancer.

I do not know whether Canada has received an invitation to join that group of countries, but I know that others were invited and reacted in a positive way. I have in mind the case of England, for instance, which immediately sent some of its military experts to Paris, as well as some specialists in the cancer field to study the possibilities.

Canada, which is a medium-sized power, should rather direct its efforts to attaining peace.

There seems to be some contradiction between the Minister of National Defence and one of his fellow members of the cabinet, that is, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), with regard to the creation of a mobile force operating under the United Nations.

Indeed, the Minister of National Defence admitted the other day that there did not seem to be much enthusiasm as far as a police force operating under the United Nations was concerned. This very morning, the Secretary of State for External Affairs very categorically stated that he favoured setting up such a force and that he believed Canada could play a useful part in that field. He favoured the immediate setting up of a Canadian force which would be available to the United Nations on request in any situation which would be considered a menace to peace.

Well, Mr. Chairman, it is through such actions that Canada, as a medium-sized power, with rather limited financial resources, will be able to play a useful part. It has often been said that this country is highly respected by all the others and more particularly by the important blocs within the United Nations. A great many of those new countries look to Canada playing a constructive role.

Well, Mr. Chairman, if we want to play a constructive part on the world stage, we should first be in a position to define our objectives, and no other than the minister and the government can do so, and wisely shape our policy.

I therefore ask the minister, before the discussion of his estimates is over, to give the members of this committee a full and unambiguous statement on the part to be played by this country in respect of defence, and to prove that the amounts asked for will be spent to good purpose, for attaining the true objective of this country, which is a durable peace.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, defence is a subject that is currently attracting widespread attention across Canada, and well it might. Defence expenditures consume approximately $1.6 billion annually. This is over 7 per cent of our gross national product. It is nearly one quarter of our national budget. It represents about $90 for every man, woman and child each year in this country.

It is obvious that expenditures of this order have a profound economic effect on our country. But defence is more than just plain economics. Defence is our only protection for our way of life. Defence is a factor that influences our relationships with all countries of the world, both east and west. Our activities in this field affect our strength when we bargain with other countries politically and economically.

Because of the importance of the subject I am particularly glad that the government, parliament and Canadians generally are taking an increasing interest in the problem. I particularly welcome the establishment of the special committee on defence that has been set up to study some of these topics. I think that already, through press coverage of some of our meetings, there is a greater awareness among Canadians generally of some of these problems. Not only is there greater awareness but I think there is probably also greater discussion of these problems. To me the increased interest and discussion are in themselves a pretty worthwhile result.

To deal in any depth with the problems of defence, Mr. Chairman, would require an outline of the threat that is posed against us, the strategy that has been devised to meet that threat, the alliances that have been formed to carry out this strategy and, finally, the part that we might play within these alliances. None of these topics is simple and, as we know, there are widely differing views on many of these things, particularly among some of the nations of NATO.

Some speakers have already given some background information in this area. I believe that at this stage this is as far as we should go. I think that we of the defence committee must first get together as a committee, hammer out our views and prepare our report. I think that a general debate before we do this would not be wise. In my view the report must cover all those topics having to do with strategy, alliances, Canada's part and many other aspects if it is going to be of any benefit.

The minister has promised to issue a white paper on defence early in the next session covering government defence policy. I believe this white paper, plus the report of the defence committee should provide good material for a first class, informed debate on defence policy and I hope that debate takes place early in the next session. Because of this I am going to resist the temptation to expound at length on defence problems, and instead wait until that debate.

Today we are dealing with the defence department estimates and it is not my desire to delay unduly the passing of these estimates. I do have one point, however, that I think is important, and in view of the minister's statement today I believe it is particularly pertinent. My point is that I believe our defence expenditures should be for one purpose only, that of providing the maximum useful defence effort for each dollar spent. I do not think we should confuse defence dollars with social capital. It seems to me that an attempt to solve social problems with defence dollars produces a second rate defence effort and a second rate solution to some of our social problems.

During the last few months there has been discussion in the house concerning the cancellation of the frigate program, the Penhold air base, the base at Churchill and other matters. Undoubtedly as a result of the minister's statement today there is going to be a great deal of discussion about some of the items he mentioned.

Much of the discussion has disturbed me. I have been disturbed because some of those who argue against these changes in our defence program do not argue on the basis of the military necessity of these changes but argue on the basis of the social and economic effects of the changes. In effect their argument is: "You cannot reduce this item, you cannot reduce this program, you cannot cancel this base, not because the particular item is needed, but because the communities surrounding it cannot survive economically without it." This approach of applying social reasoning to military problems is wrong in my opinion. I should like to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that I am not defending or discussing the military reasons for some of these decisions. It is possible some of them might have been wise and some of them might have been foolish. This is not the point at issue so far as I am concerned. What is at issue is the basis we use for judging these decisions.

Canada cannot afford to spend all it wants or all it should on defence; no nation can. It is, therefore, vital that each dollar we spend be spent to the best possible advantage. In my opinion, this means applying the sort of techniques that are now called military cost effectiveness studies. We cannot afford to acquire, maintain or keep in operation an airplane, a ship, a weapon or a base that serves no really useful military purpose.

The government must make military decisions and it must answer for those decisions. I believe that a government must also be aware of the social problems which are raised in making military decisions, and equally a government must answer for the steps it takes to meet these social problems. But a government should not avoid making a military decision in order to prevent facing a social problem.

I hope that in the future governments will not be taken to task for changes in defence expenditures because those changes are going to hurt some section of the country. I hope governments will be taken to task for making a decision that hurts some section of the country, and for not taking some steps to alleviate that hurt. A government should be taken to task also, obviously, for making a wrong military decision. We must accept this split between the military effects of a decision and the social problems it raises. I believe, as a matter of fundamental principle, that failure to do this is going to result in wasted defence dollars and it will result also, I believe, in poor economic conditions because, defence dollars are an inefficient way of providing social capital.

There is a second important reason for accepting this principle and accepting it now. I think all of us in this country, in fact everyone in the world, hopes that some day we will be able to move in the direction of finally achieving disarmament. This is going to have a disastrous disruptive effect on our economy if we have not prepared plans in advance. If we are going to work towards this goal, we have to start now in preparing for its realization. No one knows if it is ever going to be militarily possible to achieve disarmament, but if it is, and if the military situation will allow this, then let us not be in a position where we have to let social problems stand in the way of achieving this goal.

I think if we are going to prepare now to move in this direction, we must first think realistically about the role of our defence expenditures. We must accept the fact that defence spending is for military purposes only. We must learn also to adjust our economy to the change in military demands. We have to learn to use the tools, some of which already exist, such as the economic council, technical retraining and the area development agencies as well as the Department of Industry and other departments of government, to alleviate some of the social problems that are going to result from changes in military spending.

If we do not develop these skills, if we do not develop our thinking along lines which will enable us to accept the fact that our military spending is only for defence purposes, then in the future we are going to be unable to adjust ourselves to the acceptance of any possible decrease that might be militarily possible in the field of armaments. We are going to be unable to develop this thinking and those skills which we will have to develop to accept disarmament, if that ever were possible. In addition to that, if we do not adopt these techniques, if we do not adopt this type of thinking, we are going to continue a course which will waste our current defence dollars and which will, I believe, lead to incorrect solutions of some of our social problems.

In the future, Mr. Chairman, I hope to hear lots of debate, lots of argument and lots of criticism of the defence practices of this and future governments, because the subject is important enough to warrant this. I hope that these debates, these arguments, and these criticisms will be based on sound fundamental principles.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wish to take this opportunity to say a few words on the estimates of the Minister of National Defence. At the outset, I should like to say that I am certainly not a defence expert, I do not profess to be one. In fact, I could fill a very large book with all I do not know about defence. However on behalf of my constituents, I should like to say a few words this evening with regard to the minister's statement. He said that the Point Edward naval base would be one of the establishments that would be closed. I was shocked and horrified, Mr. Chairman, by the minister's statement concerning the closure of this base. I wonder if he realizes the economic implications of this decision. The previous speaker dwelt for some time on the social problems connected with these decisions. He took the negative side, and I shall take the positive.

I should like to point out how important this base is to the people of my area. There are between 500 and 600 employees at this base. I understand that when the minister is through with his cutbacks and closures we will probably have only 100 left there. I may be wrong, and perhaps we will have 200. However, what will happen to the other 300 or 400? As I understood the minister's statement, he said that the navy had maintained a naval repair facility at Point Edward naval base in Sydney. In fact, the minister does not even know where the base is. It is not in Sydney at all, but is at Point Edward in the municipality of Cape Breton. He then said that this repair facility would be discontinued, but the navy would continue to operate the stores depot and record centre at this location. According to the minister, it is not planned to have any of the reductions in ship repair work at the Point Edward naval base take place until after the beginning of the new fiscal year on April 1, 1964. He is being very kind in this instance: He is going to allow these employees to have Christmas dinner.

Then, he goes on to say that this will ensure that operations at the naval base are gradually to be reduced after that date in relation to the development of alternative opportunities for employment. I hope the minister will tell us what those alternative opportunities for employment are in the Cape Breton area. I just hope that he will spell them out when he replies.

There will be adjustments involved, according to the minister, for some of those now employed at this base. This is another typically vague Liberal statement. In order to assist, efforts will be made, as the minister has said, to organize training and retraining programs in co-operation with the provincial government, wherever these will be suitable. I know that Bob Stanfield, the premier of Nova Scotia, has done a tremendous job in trying to retrain people and help them. However, I do hope the minister will tell me, after these people are retrained, where they are going to find employment in Cape Breton.

The minister makes another very clear statement when he says that other measures will also be introduced as they appear appropriate in the circumstances. I should like him to tell us what those other measures are and how soon they will be introduced. How soon will he, and the Minister of Labour who is also from Cape Breton, arrange to get these people back to work.

I would like to give the committee an idea of how important this is economically, and in this instance I would like to quote. The department gave me a reply to a question on October 16 indicating that for the last year of the previous Liberal regime the payroll at Point Edward base was $1,856,851. Last year, 1962, it was $2,634,767. The minister should realize what this is going to do to the economy. I suggest that when we came into power in 1957-58 the plan of the previous Liberal administration was to close this base at that time, but the government after 1958 kept the base going and, as I have indicated, the payrolls were increased. The continuance of this base was brought about through the efforts of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and of the very efficient government of that day. I regret to say we do not seem to have an efficient government now.

I am no expert on defence but I do hope I can get through to the minister how important and serious this is to the economy. On June 10 of this year I asked the minister:

> What is the planned schedule of refits for Point Edward naval base for the next year?

The answer, which bears his initials P.T.H. on it said:

> The refit plan for Point Edward naval base calls for the refit of one frigate or equivalent at any one time making an approximate work load of three frigates per year.

I wonder what has happened to that decision. When the previous administration was in power the navy arranged at that time for a proper schedule of refitting, but I do not know what has happened since.

Again on June 17 this year I asked the minister:

> 1. What are the plans for the expansion of the magazine facilities at the Point Edward naval base?
> 2. What plans has the government for the expansion of other facilities?

He replied:

> 1. It is intended to expand the magazine facilities by constructing four ammunition storehouses, one ammunition laboratory, an access road and improvements to fencing in the magazine area.
> 2. It is intended to provide bulk storage for ships' bunker fuel and aviation gas with receiving and dispensing lines.

They went ahead and called a contract. Tenders were submitted; but then they cancelled that tender and did not do anything about the second contract. Today, however, they really did something. They are going to knock everybody out of work—and this, along with all the other cutbacks since this government took over, cutbacks in five or six different departments. In fact there was a cutback in the constituency of the Minister of Labour the other day.

This is the pitiful administration which said, "The Liberals have the answer." What answer are they going to give to these men who will be unemployed, and some of them have ten, 15 and 20 years service? Will the minister tell them, "Take a stand for tomorrow"? How are these people going to stand for tomorrow? They will not have any jobs, to be able to eat. They will not be able to lie down, far less stand.

I just cannot understand this. Then there is the Secretary of State, and I am sorry he is not present tonight. Speaking at Summerside, Prince Edward Island on March 26, 1963, he said:

> A Liberal government will do everything to give this part of Canada equality in income and employment with the rest of Canada.

Is this the way they are going to do it? Is this the way the Minister of Finance is going to do it with his cutbacks and his crazy budget? The Secretary of State, again speaking at Summerside on March 26, as reported in the Charlottetown Guardian on March 27 said this:

> It is the Liberal policy to see that every able person willing to work will have the opportunity to earn a decent living.

This is the way they are doing it. They are just laying the men off without any consideration. Yes, they are going to keep them on for a few months until they recover from the shock and that is the end of it.

Speaking at Toronto on March 23, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of March 25, 1963, the Secretary of State said:

> Canadians have to face three outstanding problems:
>
> —getting work for all Canadians;
> —maintaining security and peace in the world;
> —bringing about the unity of Canada with equality of citizenship for all.

Then he said:

> The Liberal party has answers to all these problems.

This is the way the Liberal party gets work for Canadians. Again, speaking at Summerside on March 26, as reported in the Charlottetown Guardian of March 27 he said:

> The Liberal program offers the people of Canada work and income security in peace, equality and unity.

My, my, these are wonderful words. I wonder how wonderful these employees will think they are, these employees who are going to be given—let us put it frankly—a kick in the pants by the Minister of National Defence and this inept and arrogant government. Why, Paul on the road to Damascus eventually saw the light, but I doubt if this Paul we are dealing with now will ever see the light.

Let us look at some other words that have been written about some of these illustrious and distinguished members of the cabinet. In the Edmonton Journal of October 1 we find these:

> Just what is a politicians' word worth? Judging by the sad performance by Mr. Hellyer, not very much.

Last week the Minister of Labour, who is one of my colleagues from Cape Breton, made a special trip to Cape Breton. He appeared on television, and in his Buddha-like manner he was very glad to try and take some of the kudos and credit for the establishment of a heavy water plant. I regret he is not in his seat tonight, but I suggest he should go down this week end and appear on television, and smilingly announce the closure of the Point Edward naval base. After all, it is only the right thing for him to do.

I would suggest that the minister of defence should go down too, but I doubt if he would be allowed to come back, or even to get across the causeway into Cape Breton island. During the last election the Liberal candidate who ran against me, and other members of his party, made many great, glorious, and as some people thought, honest promises. They were going to do wonderful things for the economy of the maritimes and Cape Breton island, but instead we have this dastardly crime perpetrated on the people of Cape Breton island.

I suggest that the Minister of National Defence is not alone responsible for what has happened today, and let me say to the Secretary of State and to the Minister of National Defence—you certainly have not heard the last of this episode yet. Let me say to the Prime Minister, and I wish he were here tonight, that I invite you, sir, with all your so-called bow-tie diplomacy and your bland little smile, to go to Cape Breton and explain in the most diplomatic manner you can the mess into which you have placed Cape Breton island and this country.

These are the people who tried to do their utmost to assassinate the character and the government of John Diefenbaker. So far as I am concerned, after so much has happened in the last few months, and with today's latest episode, I suggest that some of these persons who are prominent in the Liberal party are not even fit to polish the boots of John Diefenbaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I ask the minister to reconsider this decision, to think seriously about what he is doing to the economy of Cape Breton island. As I have said before in this house, on the one hand they give; on the other hand they take twice as much away. There has been a great hullabaloo about the small part they played in the locating of the heavy water plant.

Mr. MacInnis: A very small part.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A very small part, as my colleague from Cape Breton South says. Two hundred people will be employed there, whereas we have between 500 and 600 employed at the base at the present time, on an entirely different type of work, an entirely different type of employment. It is a different situation altogether. I do not think we can replace them, unless the minister has some ideas, which he has not disclosed yet.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): No, I will not permit a question. I will be rude and discourteous like most of the Liberal party when we ask questions. Talking about courtesy, I should have started my remarks by being rather courteous and extending congratulations to the minister on presenting his estimates for the first time; but I do not feel very courteous tonight—perhaps I am not a very courteous individual—so I do not want to be a hypocrite and extend congratulations, because I do not think the minister or the government deserve congratulations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bigg: It is time we had some fire.

Mr. MacInnis: Enthusiasm, at least.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Let me suggest to Paul, this Paul I am thinking about, that a wise son maketh a glad father, but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother—and indeed the Minister of National Defence is the heaviness of Canada.

I could go on at some length, and I will on another day. Let me assure the minister and the Prime Minister that they have not heard the last of this yet. In fact, Mr. Chairman, Harold Macmillan did not sleep with Christine Keeler; but he had to reply for Profumo and take the responsibility. I say this Prime Minister should go to Cape Breton and reply on behalf of the Minister of National Defence. In conclusion, I hope to see every organization of every type on Cape Breton island join together in a march on Ottawa to show this arrogant minister and this arrogant government what we think of this decision, this minister who replied to me a few weeks ago, when I asked whether there were plans for the expansion of the base, after jumping up in his arrogant, snarly way, and replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any plans for expansion, but I think this is the type of question which might wait until our estimates are before the house.

We have your wonderful reply, fellow. I hope—as I started to say—that every organization on Cape Breton island will join together in a march on Ottawa and show this arrogant government and this arrogant minister the strength of the condemnation we have for the irreparable damage he has wrought on the economy of our area, and the tremendous hardships that will emanate from it. I invite you to come to Cape Breton; I invite the Prime Minister to come down. I will pay for the time you take on television to explain this decision, to explain to these people who are not going to be employed, and where they are going to get other employment. I see the minister listening most intently and I trust he will give every consideration to my request to reconsider the decision with regard to this base, not for my sake but for the sake of the men who are employed there, their wives and children. Let me tell you that when you are in Cape Breton you are not in Toronto or some other area of Canada, as far as employment is concerned. This base means much to the economy of Cape Breton and this decision is a most serious and dastardly blow.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I have listened to a number of so-called debates on defence over the last ten years in this chamber, and we do advance. I realized how quickly we are advancing when I was listening to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, because apparently we have now abandoned the pretence that these vast sums of money we spend on so-called defence have anything to do with defence; we realize now they are primarily designed to provide jobs for the people of Canada, which may be—

Mr. Smith: You mean you didn't know that before?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): No, I did not know that before. I knew that our Tory friends for five years made the pretence that they were spending the money to defend Canada, and I know that for 22 years before that our Liberal friends made the same pretence, and I know that the present Minister of National Defence is in a position to again start making the same pretence. But, as I say, we do advance, because the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria has come out of the bushes and now we know what is the purpose of defence expenditures.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria was never in the bushes.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I see.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): He was never in the bushes on anything.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Oh, on anything. In the bushes is quite a good place to be. If I am annoying the hon. member—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): No, I am enjoying it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is fine. Then I will suggest this is the basis upon which we should discuss these estimates. I sympathize with the hon. member in his concern for his constituents, and I suggest to him that his arguments are almost the same as the arguments that used to be advanced in Great Britain for relieving the aristocracy of that country from heavy taxation, because if they were taxed heavily they would be unable to employ so many footmen and housemaids as they would employ if they had a larger income. Therefore the effect on the economy of Britain would be very bad. The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria suggests that we should not reduce our expenditures in this regard and should employ as many footmen and as many housemaids as possible. He does not seem to realize that if we employ these people in more useful ways, perhaps Canada as a whole might benefit.

I, like the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, make no pretensions at being a military expert. I have always been rather suspicious of the estimates of military experts, ever since I lost two horses for the government of Canada. In fact, I was almost before my time. Since my time they have put horses on the payroll: I took two of them off. This was almost 50 years ago, here in Ottawa. This is unveiling part of Canada's history, in what I am about to reveal. On this occasion I was sent with a number of my comrades to bring a number of horses from outlying stations into Lansdowne park. We were all given one horse to ride and another to lead. We were riding them bareback, I might say. The pair of horses that I had were not very well suited in their gait, and the one I was riding was much faster than the one I was leading. For this reason I was dropped off in the middle of the road, in the middle of the night. They vanished in the darkness and I said, "Well, I presume this is the sort of thing for which one gets shot at dawn. I had better get back and face the music." I trudged back to Lansdowne park, and mercifully the sergeant was blind drunk. He would not have known whether I had arrived with two elephants or nothing at all. From that day to this I have never heard of the two horses that I lost. I may say that for months I was in fear and trembling that at any moment I might be summoned before the authorities to answer for the two horses I lost. Ever since then I have been a little doubtful about military experts and their estimates of costs, because if one can lose two horses 50 years ago I presume that you can lose several squadrons of aircraft now, without causing any more ripple of dismay.

Mr. Knowles: But they turned up on the payroll 40 years later.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That may be, but I do not think these lived that long. I thought that I did a service to the Canadian economy and that some farmer in the Ottawa valley got a team of horses which he would not otherwise have had. He probably increased his production with the use of these horses instead of their being wasted on useless military exercises. Instead they were set to work producing food.

Our defence policies in this country are, of course, inextricably bound up with our general external affairs or foreign policy. That is understandable because although within three years we are going to be celebrating ostensibly the one hundredth anniversary of Canada as a nation, in actual fact I submit that Canada is really only 50 years old; that it was in the process of the first world war that we first began to have any realization of national identity; that that national identity was underlined some 20 odd years later in the second world war. Therefore it is quite natural that we should always be equating our sense of national identity with a military exercise of some sort.

That, I believe, may be the cause of some of our present diseases and troubles in Canada, that we have been unable to find a military role and have therefore begun to doubt the reality of our national identity. Because we have been trying to find a military role for years. We have been spending countless millions or billions of dollars on an attempt to find a role which does not exist. I say it does not exist because that is the opinion and the advice that has been given to us time and time again both by military and scientific experts, when they tell us there is quite literally no defence in war, that no matter what our vigorous and active young Minister of National Defence may try to do, even he is not going to be able to evolve a means of defence. This is an extremely difficult emotional concept for people to take. Always they think that if they look somewhere else they will find some way of defending us, that there must be some way. It is understandable, because this is the first time in the history of the human race that mankind has had to face the fact that there is no defence, that no matter what man does, no matter how much of his treasure and wealth and people's lives he may expend, there is no defence. Because there is no defence, there is, therefore, no real military role. Because there is no military role there is, I think, no sense of national identity in Canada.

I believe the search for this will-o'-the-wisp of a real military defence role is preventing us from really finding the worth-while role that Canada could be playing in the world today. With what tremendous fanfare of trumpets—perhaps that is not right because trumpets would not be wrapped up in quite so much wool—but with what éclat the Minister of National Defence announced the increase in Canada's aid program, to the staggering amount of about one tenth of the money we are spending on military expenditures. There is tremendous heart searching, and head scratching too, before any money is spent abroad, or at home, in developing the civilized aspects of our life. On the other hand, with what gay abandon we throw away a billion and three quarter dollars year after year, and year after year we have to admit to the fact that we get nothing for it if it were spent with the idea for providing defence for this country.

It may be that there is some sort of defence on the basis of the theory of the massive deterent, but if that is so we have played no part in it. I suggest that the speech of Mr. McNamara which my colleague from Vancouver East quoted today, and the speech of his subordinate Mr. Nietze some months ago, indicates quite clearly that if there is any validity in the theory of the massive deterrent it points quite clearly to the fact that the United States has everything which might deter any nation from now until doomsday.

However, I suggest there are other considerations to be taken into account too. History changes very rapidly. I note that, except for the lunatic fringe, practically every authoritative spokesman in the United States of America is now agreeing that we have moved into a new era. Someone remarked shortly after the tragic assassination of President Kennedy that there was one man who very few people seemed to realize had been placed in an extremely dangerous position because of this frightful event and that man was Nikita Khrushchev, who had risked his political life and neck—possibly more than his political neck—to reach a rapprochement with President Kennedy, and now had to do it all over again with the new President, attended by similar risks as in his attempts to reach a rapprochement with the late president. I think these considerations indicate that the situation for which the theory of the massive deterent was evolved no longer exists.

I have repeatedly suggested in this chamber that only an assessment of the leaders of the Soviet union as criminal lunatics would lead anyone to suppose that they would launch an attack on North America, to create in North America a radioactive desert with the certainty that in their own territory a similar radioactive desert would be created. Why we have to go on pretending that the men in the Kremlin are half-witted or imbecile, or that their counterparts in the United States are half-witted or imbecile, is beyond my comprehension. I suggest it is because we are stuck in this absurd situation of trying to find something that does not exist, and that is a valid military role for Canada and a valid defence position for Canada, that we are unable to move into the new world which we might achieve.

I was perhaps rather rudely making fun of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria when I started my speech. He was concerned for his constituents, and I should like to extend that concern to another group we must consider, and that is the young men in our armed services. It is not good enough to advocate, and I for one would not for a moment advocate, that tomorrow morning we heave them all out of the service and put them on the labour market. However, I suggest that there is another role for them in the world today, a role which Canada should be seeking and achieving. That role is helping toward the development of the undeveloped areas of the world. We have in our armed forces a large number of extremely highly trained and intelligent young men whose services could be placed at the disposal of world development today. These young men could play a role in establishing a real foundation for global peace that they can never hope to give us by their present traditional role in a military defence force. I was very much struck with the quality of many of these young men when I was in Europe this autumn. They were young men of definitely extremely superior capabilities, young men who would not only be first class ambassadors for Canada but would also be the very type required to aid the newly-emerging countries in the development of their democratic institutions, their economic institutions, in the development of their whole society to take part in this twentieth century of the modern world. That is the sort of thing we should be doing, not harking back to a situation that is hopelessly banished forever; or perhaps not hopelessly; it is extremely hopeful that it has disappeared completely. I feel very strongly that it is because we are wasting our time, our efforts and our treasure in the pursuit of this will-o'-the-wisp, this foolish chase after something which does not exist, that we are allowing a friction to arise in this country which need not arise. If only we could place the economy of Canada at the service of this world development we might be able to forget that we are English Canadians or French Canadians or any other kind of Canadians except plain, ordinary Canadians. We might be able to go even further. We might forget we are Canadians and remember that we are human beings in a world which is daily getting smaller—a world in which the concepts on which defence policy is based today are largely outmoded.

I do hope that the government of Canada will eventually become courageous enough to make the sort of dramatic and useful gesture in the world which would advance the cause of peace much more effectively than the nonsensical expenditure on which we are now engaged, expenditure which gives rise to equally nonsensical debates in this house during which we hear supporters of the previous government denouncing the present government and supporters of the present government denouncing the previous government in turn, neither of the parties being prepared to face up to the real facts of life in a world in which there can be no defence in the military sense of the word.

I hope to live long enough to see the Minister of National Defence transformed so as to carry out a more useful function than his present one, able to apply his energies to the pursuit of peace, not to the pursuit of a nightmare by means which have completely lost their validity. Let us move into the 20th century, not back to a situation which no longer exists. It might be difficult for the minister to face such a concept, but I suggest that within a short time the role he is playing now will appear to him and to every other intelligent person to be as ridiculous as the roles played in the early stage of human history when every part of the earth was divided into warring states whose people fought with their neighbours. Today, we laugh at those people. We say they are primitive folk. Let us not be primitive in our own time. Let us realize that the revolutionaries of the laboratory have been at work, that the world has been reduced to a unit and that we must live together as human beings or be prepared to have no future generations to enjoy the world which could be built if we were to stop playing with our expensive and dangerous lead soldiers today.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lake St. John.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate this evening, I realize—

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order; I know how fair you are in selecting those who are to speak, but may I point out, Mr. Chairman, that up to this moment there have been 12 who have spoken—four from the Liberal party, four from the Conservative party and four from the groups which are in the far left corner, whose total membership is only 41 out of 265 in this house. I think the rotation should now pass to the Liberal party and then back to ourselves.

The Chairman: The hon. member will realize it is not too easy in circumstances such as those we have in the committee now, to distribute speakers objectively and fairly. As the member has pointed out, we have had four speakers from each of the major parties. The Chair thought it might be fair to make a round of the small parties at this stage, subject to coming back to two or three, possibly three or four speakers from each of the major parties. That is why the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Lake St. John. Perhaps after he has spoken we shall revert to speakers from the two major parties.

Mr. MacInnis: On the point of order—and I have no intention of displacing the hon. member whose name has been called—am I to understand the Chair is working from a list?

The Chairman: The Chair is not working from a list. The Chair is trying to work as fairly as possible without a list. I might say the Chair has received names from the whips of certain of the parties, but this does not constitute a list. There are names received for the assistance of the Chair.

Mr. MacInnis: That is what is commonly referred to as a list.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member is wrong if he considers this to be a list. They are names which have been given, and there is no commitment.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not saying there is a commitment. But I say to the Chair that if there is a paper there with any names on it, the statement made by the Speaker that this house does not go according to a list of names is not borne out.

The Chairman: I do not intend to argue with the hon. member, but I have names before me and the Chair does not consider them to be a list.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, now that this dispute seems to be settled and the hon. members opposite are willing to let us state our views, I must say that I am pleased that we have, as elected members to this house with a fair majority, the right to voice our opinion, all the more as, since the setting up of the committee, I have attended all its meetings and followed its activities with an ever-increasing interest.

In my opinion, I am in a position, as well as any other member of this house, to make a worthwhile contribution to this debate.

Mr. Chairman, when considering the minister's estimates, we realize that this subject can give rise to many controversial discussions. Since this debate began, we saw some members take a rather radical stand against the decisions just announced by the Minister of National Defence.

As the previous speaker said, this enables us to realize to what extent our economy is based on a military organization.

In the course of my remarks, I would like to show to what extent the committee established by this house early in the session was in a position to play a useful part. It will be remembered that the establishment of such a committee was advocated by our group in previous election campaigns. We were very pleased to note that the present government saw fit to set it up as one of the first items of its program. The most satisfying feature was that members of the various parties who sit on the committee succeeded in keeping politics out of their deliberations. In my opinion, the committee's mandate was of such importance that political considerations had to be left out if it wanted the present government to act upon its recommendations.

I feel that the most serious question the committee had to examine was the advisability or importance of Canada's role as a middle power within NATO and in Europe especially.

During our discussions and also during the trip we made, we were able to appreciate how much NATO has done to maintain peace in Europe. That does not mean that NATO will be in a position to continue playing such an important role. However, in view of the stability which prevailed in the countries protected by NATO, we must acknowledge that, for all practical purposes, only the older countries and especially those of Asia, have enjoyed a certain degree of peace and have been able to rebuild their economies. It has been my privilege to realize that Canada has played a useful role in the sense that it has created in the minds of Europeans a spirit which enabled them to rebuild their economy because they felt truly protected by their allies.

On the other hand, one can ask whether the maintenance cost of these units in Europe is warranted. It would therefore be wise to make a comparison with the one who pays for a fire insurance. Were he sure that no fire would break out, he would not incur such an expense. However, everyone of us is glad to pay a premium in order to have protection against any fire hazards. We make sacrifices in order to feel protected.

Up to now, what we have paid to NATO may have seemed forbidding, but I believe that it has amounted somewhat to an insurance premium which allowed us to live in a state of relative peacefulness, to generate a certain understanding among the peoples of Europe, and to induce at the same time the lessening of tension which we now enjoy.

The role this committee has to play is not to analyse what has been done in the past so much as to supervise what is being done at the present time, and in the light of acquired knowledge, to endeavour to determine what part Canada should play in the military field, in years to come. We have concluded agreements, whether they have been signed or not they are none the less agreements and, as gentlemen, we must honour them as long as conditions upon which they are based remain the same.

I think that we have agreements and that as long as these agreements last it is unlikely that the situation will change.

But we may anticipate that before a few years, perhaps three, four or even five years, the military situation will have changed enough to enable us to depart to a certain extent from the role we now play in Europe.

I do not think I would anticipate the forthcoming report of the committee if I made this remark, since the forces of France, Germany and other European countries are being restored day after day. If we consider that Germany, only in the last few years, set up a military force about 380,000 strong, I feel it is logical to conclude that in future we will play a token role in Europe to show our willingness to participate and our solidarity with our European allies.

However, we noticed that most of our servicemen in Europe seem to be satisfied with their living conditions. We noticed also the high degree of efficiency achieved by our military forces.

However, we were rather alarmed to learn that possible repatriation of our servicemen's dependents who are now in Europe, has not been considered in the event of war. I am of the opinion that the government should give its attention to this problem and find a solution to safeguard the security of Canadian civilians who are now in Europe with our servicemen.

In the introduction of his department's estimates today, the Minister of National Defence stated that he was contemplating a substantial reduction in the expenditures of his department by closing a great number of auxiliary bases and reducing the military forces.

Referring to his statement, we can conclude that the most affected will be the Royal Canadian Air Force. I do not think the minister is wrong in considering a reduction of amounts assigned to air forces. If we consider the development of arms which are now used, which are a threat to peace, it is sensible to conclude that the part assigned to the air forces will gradually decrease because the future threat seems to lie, for many years to come, in the availability to the two contending camps of nuclear weapons carried by guided missiles and nuclear submarines carrying Polaris missiles.

This, Mr. Chairman, leads me to the conclusion that, if we believe that Canada has a nuclear role to play, I think that it would be more logical if this role were to be a contribution to the cost of the expenditures resulting from the maintenance of the retaliation force that we have at present in the west.

It has been admitted, from all the evidence gathered, that there is no adequate defence system as such, and that our retaliatory power alone has been able up to now to maintain peace.

I am of the opinion, unless I have proof to the contrary and until other armament are produced, that we must stand by this acknowledgement of the facts. I submit that it is of no avail to allocate the nation's credits for military defence establishments which, after all, have no value.

Turning back to the announcement made by the Minister of National Defence to the effect that he will reduce the strength of some military establishments, I shall point out to him that all Canadians wish for a reduction of military expenditures. Besides, all members have expressed that wish.

All responsible economic bodies also wish that the government would reduce its military expenditures in order to balance its budget.

But, when the Minister of National Defence announces these reductions, some people seem to be personally affected and they rebel. I think that these people follow the theory by which when others are affected and they are not, they are satisfied.

Mr. Chairman, I can assure the minister that I myself and the members of my group, fully agree that we should work together towards reducing the amounts allocated for military purposes. But we must also take into account the fact that if we increase unemployment by reducing the amounts allocated for the defence of our country, we prove beyond any doubt that since the end of the war in 1945 we have maintained, without any good reason, an economic system based too much, unfortunately, on a military economy which, today, plunges us in a small economic crisis which seems to be only starting and which will no doubt be felt in various areas in our country.

It is unfortunate that such a thing should happen, but I think the present government will have to realize that it cannot reduce expenditures, thus creating some unemployment, without putting into effect at the same time a clear program devised to create jobs resulting solely from the industrial and economic growth of our country and from the development of our natural resources, since these are the only areas on which we can safely depend.

As a matter of fact, it is toward those sectors that European countries have directed all their efforts, since the end of the last conflict, and we have been able to appreciate the happy results achieved thereby.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we must consider that military problem in terms of the future, in the light of the changing relations between the various countries of the world.

If we study the economic philosophies which are put forth at the present time throughout the world, we can divide them in three groups.

First, there is the controlled economy of the totalitarian communist states, such as Russia and her satellites.

Then, there is the controlled economy which could be described as a modified socialist economy and which is to be found in central Europe. And we have here, in the west, the capitalist system.

I think those three philosophies will evolve. The two extremes will attract each other, which means that the communist group will evolve in the same direction as the central European group, towards a mitigated socialism. On the other hand, we, in the west, shall evolve in the same way, as, with the passing of the years, a multiplication of contacts, relations and travel between the various nations of the world will tend to erase boundaries.

I think we shall have to take up the challenge of a cold economic war, if we want to keep abreast of our responsibilities and that we shall have to consider a scheme for the development of energizing countries. This scheme should benefit those countries, and not the capitalist colonizing nations, as was the case in the past. We shall do it as a friendly country putting its technological knowledge at the disposal of people who cannot look after themselves.

Moreover, I am of the opinion that the amount of money we proposed to take from military establishment should be, to a certain extent, given to religious organizations, because I always think that in underdeveloped countries, the organizations which are best suited to help those regions are the semi-religious organizations that are on the spot and which, with the men at their disposal, can help those people to develop and to take their responsibilities.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member who preceded me when he said that in the years to come, we shall see the various people in the world united.

In closing my remarks, I want to tell the house my personal impression with regard to that infernal contraption we call nuclear arms: those arms which we have cursed since their creation, that is for the past 18 years, I think, that we shall soon bless them, because they will contribute to restore somewhat the sense of responsibility of national leaders who, nowadays, may not take any uncompromising or irresponsible decision nor plunge their people into wars.

Mr. Chairman, the day is probably not far when we shall thank those who have created that infernal machine because it shall contribute to safeguard us from the blunders of a few invidious, a few proud people, such as others before us have known in the centuries and years past and whose decisions these have dearly paid.

Some pretend we may be able to ban those weapons. I say no, that we shall not be able to ban them because, even if we wanted to, I am sure if there were a conflict in which conventional arms would be used for a few weeks, if not a few months, later on, we would see those weapons reappear. We have them; let us look at them with their power of destruction, let us look at them with that bit of wisdom they are forcing on us, for they make us realize to what extent we are irresponsible when we plunge our peoples into war.

Mr. Chairman, with these last words, I am ready to allow the house to adjourn.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to go on for another half hour in view of the interest in this subject, and in view of our anxiety to complete these estimates tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there are quite a few speakers on the list. Do we gain anything by sitting another half hour?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we gain a half an hour. There is a tremendous amount of work to be done between now and December 20. I hope hon. members would accept the excellent suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: I dispute the claim we gain a half an hour by sitting another half hour, but once in a while we have to yield to the blandishments of the leader of the house.

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Chairman, may I first congratulate the minister on his appointment and wish him well. I should also like to congratulate the previous speaker. I thought his was an excellent presentation, sensible, logical, and at least slightly patriotic. I wish I could say the same for some of the preceding speakers, particularly the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. He mentioned Cape Breton very often, but how few were his references to Canada.

I come from a very small province, probably the poorest, and we need many things. We have not got a $30 million heavy water installation.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): You have Smallwood over there, which is why you don't have anything.

Mr. O'Keefe: It is because we have Mr. Smallwood we have what we have. Mr. Chairman, it will be obvious I regret very much the decision of the Department of National Defence, especially with regard to Torbay, Newfoundland. It is particularly hard because this department has never had a very heavy investment in my province, despite the fact that we are right off the Atlantic and are the actual Gibraltar of the continent. Our defence installations were mainly American. But, we are not an unreasonable people. We know that the minister has had to make unpleasant decisions, but surely the Canadian taxpayers generally will be glad to learn that some of the unnecessary defence expenditure will be cut out. This, of course, is a very laudable course of action, if at the same time we do not jeopardize our national security.

We of St. John's have no illusions that money grows on trees. Far from it; we know the government must find the money for equalization payments to the provinces. In this respect, Newfoundland will receive well over an additional $3 million. We know someone must pay for an increase in the old age pension, in the blind pension, in old age assistance and in the disabled persons' pension.

We know that the federal government is now paying 90 per cent of the cost of completing our sorely needed trans-Canada highway. But the fact remains that the economy of my city cannot help but be affected in some way. St. John's, and indeed all of Newfoundland, asks the federal government to aid us in the development of our city and our province, and we do not ask as a pauper.

It might be of interest to some hon. members to realize that Newfoundland, if you think of it as a separate entity, as it was before 1949, is now Canada's third biggest customer, exceeded only by the United States and Great Britain. So, we ask for development, not for charity. Therefore this temporary setback on defence installation places a greater onus on the government to approach the problem of unemployment with even yet more vigour.

What will happen to the men who lose their jobs—the men who will be out of work? Surely some extra attention and consideration must be paid to them. An extra effort to find them alternative employment must be, and I am quite sure, will be made. Perhaps as a result of this very decision the acute problem of unemployment in my district, and in all Canada, will be brought to the attention of the government more forcefully. Perhaps, too, the Minister of National Defence will understand, if we look to him for sympathy and support when other proposals to assist my province are brought to the government.

Already we have had at least one department of defence ship come to our drydock in St. John's, the first in many years. I wonder if the minister, as a result of his difficult decision today, could not lend his weight to greater use of this drydock by the ships of our Canadian navy, and to a greater use of our harbour by ships of every department? The people of St. John's will understand this decision, but only if they see that the money so saved by the department will be put to other, more worth-while usage.

Indeed we hope the government will soon increase the family allowance, and soon keep our promise that this allowance will be paid so long as students remain at school. If this announcement of the minister will make this decision with regard to family allowance come sooner, then many will applaud.

Surely too, this unfavourable decision puts a greater onus on the federal government to launch an all-out attack to find a solution to the Bell Island problem. There are no doubt numerous valid ways in which the federal government could spend constructively in Newfoundland, and in the other nine provinces. Therefore, if the experts tell us that we are spending this money uneconomically we are the first to want a change, because in our province as in others, there are many ways in which this money can be spent profitably, and if this cutback will mean this money will be spent more profitably in other ways, then we support it.

I have one last word, and it is that I hope the government is taking every possible step to ease the effects of this decision on the persons actually laid off. I would like to know just what consideration has been given to their investments in pension plans. I would like to know if any consideration has been given to ease any financial problems placed on those who have mortgage payments to meet and who might be required to move elsewhere.

I would also request the Minister of Labour to send a special representative from the national employment service at once, to assist in finding alternative jobs. I suggest that this be an extra assistance over and above that normally given. While we understand, we regret the necessity for this decision and, as a result of it, we will expect some extra effort be made to compensate for its temporary ill effects.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, early in the afternoon when the minister was making his remarks I feel that the Chair more or less jumped the gun when it came to the defence of the minister to halt questions that may have been asked, with the remark that the minister's time is limited. As I understand the rules of the house the minister, as spokesman for the department, has unlimited time at his disposal, and the opportunity to ask—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member does not understand the rules clearly, because the minister was limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. MacInnis: For that I apologize, Mr. Chairman, but nevertheless by custom, and during the questions that were put this afternoon the following speakers showed every willingness to yield the floor in order that the questions could be put—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member realizes that the Chair is bound by the standing orders.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, again I apologize. I only hope that in the future this binding will continue. Now, during the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East this afternoon, a remark was made in the committee about defence spending, in the terms of something about peanuts. It was picked up and repeated by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I do not imply that he meant to be derogatory in any sense, but I would like it clearly understood that the remark passed at that time came from directly behind the speaker and should not be attributed in any way to any member of this party. It will show in the Hansard report tomorrow.

I would like to make reference to the last speaker for a moment and the remark he made about the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. He referred to the fact that he had much to say about Cape Breton. I find no fault with any member of this house who stands up at any time and fights for the welfare of his constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: Whether it is a mass lay-off or whether it boils down to one individual, the rights of the individual are just as important. It does not matter whether he is laid off his job as an individual, or is laid off with another 500 or 1,000 men. It does not matter to him whether he has company in being laid off; the fact remains that when an individual is laid off from a job I think it is the duty of every individual member of this house to make any representations he can on behalf of the individual.

Having made this point about the member from Cape Breton North and Victoria, and saying that he spoke a great deal about Cape Breton and nothing about Canada, he then launched into the subject of Newfoundland and did not get off that island until he sat down, after reading every word of the speech that was prepared for him by somebody else.

Mr. Cashin: That is what he was sent here for, to fight for Newfoundland.

Mr. MacInnis: Good for him; I do not deny him that right. But if he wants to do that for Newfoundland there is no reason why he should take exception to another hon. member fighting for Cape Breton. I would ask the hon. gentleman from Newfoundland—

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. MacInnis: —to look into the remarks of the former member from—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for St. John's East is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member suggested a moment ago, or stated quite bluntly and unequivocally, that I had read every word of a speech that had been prepared for me by someone else. That is simply not true.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the rules dictate that I shall have to withdraw that remark. I will withdraw it to the point of whatever integrity I can place on my own remarks, and say that the hon. member for St. John's East was reading every word of the speech he had before him. He never got off the island of Newfoundland, but he criticized the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria for fighting on a local issue affecting the island of Cape Breton. Going along with the wealthy young member for St. John's West, I am not taking exception to the fact that the hon. member for St. John's East was fighting for the people of Newfoundland; but I do take exception to the fact that he criticized the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria for fighting for Cape Breton.

I suggest that in the case where the United States government saw fit to withdraw from Fort Pepperrell, hon. members should read the remarks of the member who represented St. John's at that time and see the effort and concern he showed then for the people of Newfoundland. I might also refer them to the remarks of the premier of Newfoundland and what he had to say when the Americans withdrew from Fort Pepperrell. I would look forward to seeing the same remarks made by the premier of Newfoundland with reference to the withdrawal by this government. I should now like to deal with what the minister himself had to say this afternoon. I would at once remind this committee—

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacInnis: We are sitting an extra half hour. The time is very limited tonight. I will have more to say tomorrow. I will have time then, and I will handle whatever questions the wealthy young man wishes to ask at that time.

An hon. Member: Wealthy in brains; not like yourself.

Mr. Nesbitt: A party of bureaucrats.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member who made that remark care to rise to his feet and identify himself?

The Chairman: Order. Would the hon. member resume his seat, please. The remarks being made are not perhaps conducive to the good order of the house and I would ask hon. members on both sides of the house to concentrate on the item that is before the committee at the moment.

Mr. MacInnis: I appreciate your thinking on the matter, Mr. Chairman, but as I heard that remark it was very personal and I think the hon. member who made it should rise and withdraw it; or if he cares to repeat it, I will see what I can do about handling it at a later time.

I will continue with my remarks. One of the first remarks made by the Minister of National Defence this afternoon was nothing less than a complete denial of the words his own Prime Minister spoke previously in the house. With regard to the defence committee, everybody is well aware of the fact that when the defence committee was set up the words of the Prime Minister at that time were that the committee was to look into all aspects—I repeat, all aspects—of defence matters. This afternoon the Minister of National Defence referred to the committee as looking into "various matters". This is exactly what has taken place. This committee is unlike committees set up by other allied nations which have defence committees. All such committees working under other governments have the opportunity to examine every bit of evidence that is available, including classified information. But this minister and this government have denied the committee set up by this house—and they made a big noise about setting it up—classified information; and well they might, when they consider what the present minister did while in opposition. This is the minister who I consider individually is the greatest threat to security in this country. And why do I say that?

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. MacInnis: If you are having trouble, go wash out your ears. I say it because the opportunity to seek classified information was open to him while in opposition. This same minister, with his arrogant attitude, came before this house and is recorded in Hansard as having said he could not understand why it was classified and he was going to take the responsibility of repeating it. If that is not a security risk, I do not know what it is. It is a security risk for which in other free countries he would be placed behind bars.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: They are "oh'ing" and "ah'ing" over there. It is rather nasty of me to say this, but this is a nasty situation. This afternoon hon. members referred to the minister's decision as brave; they said it was a brave decision. It is a gutless decision; because when he was in opposition he had all the answers and all the cures, and what he has brought forward now is sickening. It is not a cure; it is a sickness. Why do I say it is a sickness? This minister is aware of the situation with our allies in the NATO set-up. I defy any member of the defence committee, any member of that party or any member on that front bench, to rise and deny that the attitude in defence among the allies today is one of the deterrent, and the deterrent is made up of nothing but tactical weapons, I.C.B.M.'s and the like. In other words, the approach of the allies on the matter of defence boils down to nothing but "a good offence is the best defence." These are all offensive weapons held as deterrents in order to prevent an outbreak of war in any part of the world. I say again, they are offensive weapons.

If the minister wants to make a brave decision, to which he and his government have already committed themselves, why not get rid of the Bomarc? I say that for the reason that the Bomarc is nothing but a defensive weapon with a very short range. Its capabilities have been discussed before the committee, and every capability of the Bomarc has been questioned from one source or another. As a defensive weapon it does not belong in the arsenal of the NATO countries. They are depending upon tactical nuclear weapons, I.C.B.M.'s and the like. In addition to that, the savings—as I followed the minister's remarks this afternoon: I did not have too much opportunity to add up the particular savings—of maintaining the Bomarc I understand will be in the vicinity of $37 million. I should say, of keeping the Bomarc, because after all this was a housekeeping presentation which the minister made. Not counting maintenance and other costs involved I understand it is in the vicinity of $9 million a year. What about the other facilities involved? Owing to the fact that the Bomarc is still not armed with nuclear warheads, why does the minister not make a brave decision? The government had already committed itself to negotiating out of the agreement and doing away with the Bomarc, so possibly we could salvage something from the cut-backs he has made today.

The minister talks about withdrawing ten ships from naval duties. After withdrawing them he then maintains there will still be adequate support for the fleet. I would ask the minister to explain who gave him such advice. He has already announced the scrapping of the frigate program. We have heard the former minister of defence speak about this program and at the time he was minister it was considered a substantial program for the next 20 years. Who is advising the minister to make these cut-backs, and why? It is not the navy which advised the cut-back of the frigate program. Admiral Rayner appeared before the committee and gave his thoughts on the matter. Yet the minister decides to withdraw from the frigate program and now says that ten ships are to be withdrawn from the navy. It is very surprising that this minister made that decision in face of this advice from the senior admiral in the navy. It might also surprise the minister to know that this was a program in which the British government were very much interested. I call his attention to the committee reports of what was told us while in Britain by the upper echelons of the British defence department, wherein he will find an indication that the United Kingdom were very much interested in this program. They would not have been interested in the frigate program, Mr. Chairman, unless that particular program had merit, because I cannot imagine the British wasting their time on this program unless it was thought a worth-while one.

So here we have a minister who had failed to advise the committee where he is getting his advice on these matters. The minister said on one occasion that a remark he made before the committee did not show up as such in the committee reports, but the same minister has the audacity, in view of remarks he made when he was on this side of the house, to suggest we forget the remarks which he made in respect of defence. We were supposed to time the matter by the calendar, but I prefer the watch. Since it is the minister's advice that we should forget what he said about defence I will continue to forget it, because in my opinion he does not know very much about what is going on, in view of the fact that he is defying advice of a senior admiral with respect to the frigate program. Now he has branched off on this cut-back program. As I say the government has committed itself to negotiate out of the Bomarc problem—and it is a problem, because it does nothing for the defence of North America.

The hon. member for Vancouver East referred to what Mr. McNamara said about the Bomarcs, and we know what his intentions were. On one occasion he said it was a decoy. This minister is the same hon. member who on many occasions concerned himself about Canada's image abroad. His great slogan was: "Save Canada's image abroad". It appears to me that to save Canada's image abroad today calls for a very big sacrifice. It calls for the sacrifice of the personal image of Canada and Canada's own integrity. The government have considered nothing of their attitudes on defence and other matters in respect to the people of Canada; they only try to continue to pull the wool over people's eyes in respect of matters they consider in the honour of Canada's image abroad.

I would not want it thought for one moment, Mr. Chairman, that we are not grateful for the very small part the federal government has played in announcing the fact that the government will purchase heavy water from Cape Breton. I know this news was gratefully accepted in Cape Breton, and I myself am grateful for it. However, as was said earlier this evening, the government gives you something with one hand and takes away twice as much with the other. While I am at it, I might also say a lot has been said by other hon. members about the heavy water plant going to Nova Scotia. One hon. member said that it cost $13 a ton in Nova Scotia to mine coal whereas it could be mined in his area for $3. There must have been a strong profit motive involved, if heavy water could be produced using coal that much cheaper than in Cape Breton, when they did not underbid Nova Scotia to begin with. I am very grateful that this particular project is coming to Cape Breton, but whatever benefits it may have to Cape Breton or Nova Scotia have been offset by what happened here today.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. MacInnis: May I call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the house leader if we may assume that the estimates of the Department of National Defence will be continued tomorrow, and what would be the stop gap items if we complete them?

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope they will be more than stop gaps. When we complete national defence I hope we can complete public works and also northern affairs. May I be permitted to say that I think there is an understanding that certain resolutions, of which notice has been given today, might be advanced tomorrow without debate, so that the bills would be available for debate on Monday and Tuesday of next week. Notice was given yesterday and they will be on the order paper tomorrow.

It being one minute after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING B.C. FISHERIES DISPUTE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege. Very briefly, my question of privilege is that the Minister of Fisheries misled the house on August 2, and I should like to make reference to Hansard of that day in order to prove my contention. Incidentally, it was not possible for me to raise this question of privilege earlier. This is the first opportunity I have had because it did not come to light until a document was tabled in the house yesterday pursuant to a motion for the production of papers to which I shall refer. I think it is necessary to read a little more than usual in order to illustrate my point.

The hon. member for New Westminster asked the Minister of Fisheries the following question, as reported at page 2945 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask him for what I hope will be a final progress report on the negotiations with the British Columbia fishing industry?

The minister made the following reply:

Mr. Speaker, as I reported to the house yesterday, negotiations resumed on Wednesday between the two parties involved, the union and the fisheries association of British Columbia. I am pleased to inform the house this morning that the situation has improved greatly in the last 24 hours. In fact, with the indulgence of the house may I be permitted to place on record part of a telegram I received at five o'clock from the union, which reads as follows:

"Reurtel our central strike and policy committee decided upon receipt your telegram bearing in mind urgency expressed regarding resumption operation and failure reach agreement upon scope and terms arbitration that we shall immediately recommend to our membership acceptance of appointment by federal and provincial governments of single arbitrator whose decision shall be final and binding and that the arbitrator shall decide scope and terms of reference after consultation with both parties to the existing dispute."

The minister then went on to say:

A few hours later I received another telegram from the fisheries association which reads in part as follows:

"—the member companies of this association are prepared to accept the decision of a single arbitrator to be appointed by the Hon. H. J. Robichaud and the Hon. L. R. Peterson as final and binding upon the matter or matters which will be agreed to be referred to him."

The only problem which remains, Mr. Speaker, consists of the details of the terms of reference.

Then there are a few other words which are not germane to this particular point. The key points upon which I rest this question of privilege are, one, the fact that the minister read only a portion of the telegram from the fisheries association; and, two, followed the reading of that portion with the words:

The only problem which remains, Mr. Speaker, consists of the details of the terms of reference.

I make this statement especially in view of the fact that the telegram from the united fisheries and allied workers union made reference to the arbitrator deciding the scope of the terms of reference after consultation with the parties to the existing dispute.

I filed a motion for the production of the telegram from the fisheries association of British Columbia which the minister read in part, and it was tabled yesterday. It is dated Vancouver, B.C., August 1, 4.26 p.m., Pacific daylight time. It is addressed to Hon. H. J. Robichaud, M.P., P.C., Minister of Fisheries, Ottawa, Ontario, and reads as follows:

This is a further letter delivered to Mr. R. G. Clements today quote We refer to Mr. Homer Stevens letter addressed to you dated August one 1963, a copy of which you have made available to us. We repeat that the member companies of this association are prepared to accept the decision of a single arbitrator to be appointed by the Honourable H. J. Robichaud and the Honourable L. R. Peterson as final and binding upon the matter or matters which will be agreed to be referred to him.

Then the telegram goes on to say:

It is our understanding that the only matter in dispute which requires reference to arbitration is that of the minimum price to be paid for pink salmon during the 1963 fishing season. If there is any other question in dispute which the union wishes to have referred to the decision of the arbitrator we would appreciate your asking them to inform us through you immediately so that we may consider whether or not we can agree to such question or questions being so submitted. We are unwilling to agree to arbitration of any matter which has not been referred to arbitration by agreement.

Fisheries Association of B.C.

The principle point here is that the association of B.C. indicated in their telegram to the minister that they were only willing to submit to arbitration one single, solitary question, and that was the matter of the minimum price to be paid for pink salmon caught during the 1963 salmon season. If there is any doubt that this was the case, the fisheries association sent another telegram to the minister; and if he did not mislead the house the first time by reading only parts of the telegram, which I contend he did, then he certainly did on another occasion by not relating to the house something which was made even more clear to him by the fisheries association of B.C.

Again this is a sessional paper, No. 64C, which was filed on November 15, and it contains a telegram from the fisheries association of B.C. to the Minister of Fisheries, dated Vancouver, August 2, 1.05 p.m. Pacific daylight time. Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the house sat until 10.56 p.m. that evening, and I suggest this telegram was undoubtedly in the possession of the minister by that time. They say in it, and I only want to quote a part:

> That our member companies will agree to arbitration by a single arbitrator to be appointed by the Honourable H. J. Robichaud and the Honourable L. R. Peterson of the minimum price to be paid for pink salmon during the 1963 fishing season and of no other matter whatever.

I submit that when the minister related that information to the house, notwithstanding this second telegram which makes it undoubtedly clear, he misled the house, when he quoted only part of the telegram and when he interpreted that part to say:

> The only problem which remains, Mr. Speaker, consists of the details of the terms of reference.

As a result not only was the house placed in the position of not knowing fully what the situation was, but there was an agreement to proceed to arbitration, and that arbitration has not yet been held because the matters to be referred to the arbitrator are still not cleared up; and I submit they are not cleared up primarily because of the information which the minister gave to the house.

I therefore move, based on this question of privilege, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

> That this house regrets the Minister of Fisheries misled the house on August 2 by failing to advise the house fully of the position of the fisheries association of B.C.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to decide whether there is a question of privilege. I would refer to Beauchesne's citation 104, paragraph 5, which reads as follows:

> As a motion taken at the time for matters of privilege is thereby given precedence over the prearranged program of public business, the Speaker requires to be satisfied, both, first—

The "first" is my own insertion:

> —that there is a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed, and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity. If he is not so satisfied he may allow the member to make a statement with a view to ascertaining whether or not a prima facie case can be made out.

[Mr. Howard.]

It seems to me that the long explanation given by the hon. member, working up to the presentation of this motion which he asks the Speaker to accept, is really in the nature of a grievance. I do not believe that the minister, if a misstatement was made, intended to make any misstatement. With regard to the allegation that a false statement was made, I do not believe that has been proved by the facts alleged by the hon. member this morning. In my opinion this is really in the nature of a grievance, and a prima facie question of privilege has not been made out. Therefore in my opinion the motion should not be accepted.

Mr. Howard: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I do not believe a matter of privilege involves whether or not the minister intended to do something. The fact is that he did.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Howard: Second, there is no allegation that it was a false statement. I say it was a misleading statement, and the silence on the government benches proves it.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert Temple (Hastings South) presented the fifth report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO GOVERNMENT PLANS FOR REMAINDER OF SESSION

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the other day I said I would make a statement on the government's plans for the business for the rest of the session. On Monday, I think it was, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam I undertook to say whether there had been any changes in those plans since my statement on this matter on November 4.

On that date I stated that the most urgent business was to complete the consideration of the estimates, and that remains the case. Of the legislation I mentioned then the first three items have been dealt with by the house, the income tax bill, the surcharge on imports bills, and the amendment of the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act.

The house has also been dealing with the next major item on the list, redistribution, about which I will say a word in a minute.

However, I can no longer be hopeful of the house going on before Christmas to the items which were next on my November 4 list, the National Housing Act amendment and the major railway legislation arising out of the MacPherson royal commission, though a resolution to precede that measure is now on the order paper. These matters will probably have to stand over till next session.

The government considers it essential to have the house deal in this session with the following items on the order paper and which have been on the order paper now for some time: first, the amendment to the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act; second, the amendment to the National Centennial Act; third, the resolution and bill respecting C.N.R. finances.

In addition there are the following items on today's order paper which the government desires to have dealt with in the present session: first, the amendment to the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disability Allowance Act and the Blind Persons Act; second, the amendment to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; third, the amendment to the Small Businesses Loans Act; fourth, the amendment to the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation Act; fifth, a bill to appoint auditors for the national railways. There will also be a measure introduced next week respecting statutory salaries which the government would like to have dealt with.

With respect to redistribution, Mr. Speaker, the government would like to have the resolution and the bill to set up the office of representation commissioner passed during this session. However, it is prepared to hold over the boundaries bill until the next session. Perhaps there could be discussions among the representatives of the parties on the procedure to be followed in respect of that matter, and perhaps some informal discussions in between the sessions concerning it.

Other measures on the order paper which the government would like to have dealt with in this session, and I do not believe these are very contentious items, are first, the Newfoundland savings bank bill; second, the bill approving the Ontario harbour agreement; third, the amendment to the National Harbours Board Act; fourth, the amendment to the Carriage by Air Act; fifth, the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act, which I believe is now in committee. A resolution preceding a measure respecting payment of certain provincial taxes and fees by crown corporations appears on the order paper today which it would be desirable to deal with. There is also a bill respecting what is called the Blue Water bridge at Sarnia which is still to be introduced and which the house might wish to dispose of in this session.

To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, subject to any emergencies arising, this is all the legislation the government intends to seek to have completed this session. A resolution respecting Indian claims will be put on the order paper, but the government does not expect the house to complete consideration of this measure. I believe there is general agreement to adopt, without debate, the resolutions preceding the bills which have not yet been placed on the order paper—though I think they are on this morning's order paper—on the understanding that the debate would take place on second reading and in committee on the bills in question. If there are any considerations arising out of this statement which require consultation among representatives of the parties, I am sure that can be arranged without delay.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I thank the Prime Minister for setting out the menu. All I can say on this, the 105th day of the session, is that his contemplation that so many other matters can be dealt with in a few days, while expressive of a hopeful desire, in the light of the experience during the years I have been in the house would be difficult of attainment before Christmas. There has been excellent progress made. The other day I was glad to hear the Secretary of State, a wise parliamentarian who understands parliament, expressing himself so clearly and definitely that since September there has been no suggestion of obstruction whatsoever, though the fullest debate has taken place; and with that he was in full agreement.

I agree with the Prime Minister that the estimates must be passed, because they cannot be delayed and postponed indefinitely. There are, of course, one or two departments —defence, whose estimates are now being discussed, and agriculture, when the Minister of Agriculture is available—which will require consideration. I think the suggestion made regarding redistribution is a proper one. We shall give every co-operation in the passage of the legislation setting up the representation commissioner and, of course, during the recess we shall be able to meet with representatives of the government and of other groups in the house to discuss this important matter of redistribution legislation.

There is also the question of the resolutions. The Prime Minister referred to this. While preserving and maintaining our rights, and without prejudice to them, we shall not debate these resolutions.

I was surprised, however, that amidst the somewhat unusual collection of legislation mentioned by the right hon. gentleman nothing was said regarding the serious situation which has arisen with respect to foreign investment in our country. Only yesterday the Minister of Finance, speaking in Chicago, emphasized that Canada needs a large influx of capital. The latest returns given by the dominion bureau of statistics indicates that in the last three months there has been a reduction, on an average, of $100 million per month in foreign investment in Canada.

That is a serious situation and one which I feel deserves the earliest consideration on the part of parliament. I think when one considers what has happened during the last three months in the field of foreign investment, one can only conclude that some of the tinkering which was done in the budget has brought about a reaction in the United States, necessitating the taking of action now in this regard in preference to proceeding with several measures which, I am sure, are of lesser importance.

I think these are all the observations I intend to make at this time. Certainly this situation which was spoken of outside the house yesterday by the Minister of Finance deserves and demands action at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Pearson: In view of what the right hon. gentleman has said perhaps I should add a word, if only in clarification. If I did not make any statement on the question of foreign investment in Canada it was because I would have been entirely out of order in doing so. The right hon. gentleman knows that this important matter can be discussed as thoroughly as he desires to discuss it when the estimates of the minister are up for consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We need action, though.

Mr. Pearson: The right hon. gentleman said it was his view, in the light of past experience, that the items I have mentioned could not be passed within a few days. That might well be the case, but there is no reason why—and it would be the intention of the government to suggest this course—if they cannot be passed within a few days we should not come back after Christmas and see that they do pass, and not allow any desire for a holiday to interfere with our duty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): The Prime Minister has given us what is virtually a second speech from the throne.

Mr. Churchill: And an ultimatum.

Mr. Douglas: This is a very heavy agenda of legislation, much of which has been added since the right hon. gentleman made his previous statement on November 4.

I think the government has placed the house in a fairly awkward position. Some of this proposed legislation could not have been introduced earlier. I refer in particular to the measures concerning old age assistance pensions, blind pensions and disabled persons allowances, which had to be left until the federal-provincial conference had concluded. But there are a number of other items which could have been introduced at any time in the last several weeks. The Canadian National Railways auditors legislation, the gold mines assistance legislation, statutory increases, surely these things have not just come up since November 4. It seems to me it is an indication of very poor planning of the business of the house when we find a heavy agenda like this suddenly placed before parliament.

I want to make the position of this party abundantly clear. I think it is essential that most of the legislation which the Prime Minister has announced this morning should be passed this session. There are one or two measures whose urgency is less apparent, but in my opinion most of them should be passed now. As far as we are concerned we are prepared to expedite the passage of the legislation by giving up, as we have already agreed to do, debate on the resolution stage of certain measures. But we are not, of course, prepared to rush the legislation through without giving it proper consideration. As far as we are concerned we are prepared to have a very short Christmas recess of a few days and come back so this legislation can be given the proper and full consideration which it deserves. We shall be most insistent that this session of parliament be not prorogued until at least the legislation having to do with old age pensions, blind pensions, disabled persons allowances, gold mining assistance and other essential matters has been dealt with.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): We appreciate the announcement made by the Prime Minister this morning with respect to the program of legislation for the days ahead. I agree with those who have spoken on behalf of the other opposition parties that it does look as though we have a formidable array of legislative items before us.

However, certain discussions have been going on in the usual way and tacit agreement, at least, has been given to certain proposals. I believe it is the desire of every member of the house to proceed as expeditiously as possible in the carrying through of this legislative program. As far as the Social Credit party is concerned we are ready to co-operate to the fullest extent, though reserving our right to criticize and set forth our views with regard to the controversial subjects which may be brought before the house. We intend to exercise that privilege, but to do so with the least possible extension of debate.

As I say, we appreciate this announcement. We will do our best to co-operate, but at the same time we want to express our views with regard to some of the very important issues mentioned this morning, including the increases in various pensions and other matters.

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister, the government and all other members, we wish to reach Christmas at the same time as everyone else. The announcement made by the Prime Minister this morning as to the legislation to be passed before the Christmas recess is certainly of a kind to interest this house and especially the Canadian people.

However, I wonder why these measures were not introduced earlier in this house, since we have been sitting for almost three months. The resolutions and notices of motion could have been introduced a long time ago, right after the last elections, even at the very beginning of the session on May 16, 1963.

We are all anxious to see the Small Businesses Loans Act extended. We would have liked also to have the resolution introduced concerning the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, but especially regarding the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Blind Persons Act, so as to increase their monthly allowances to $75.

When the Prime Minister serves us an ultimatum and threatens us to have the house sit between Christmas and New Year's, if necessary, we are willing to return to the house in order that those measures may be passed by parliament as soon as possible.

On the other hand, why wait until Christmas is only a fortnight away to present those resolutions? That is what we are asking ourselves in this corner of the house. At the very last minute the government introduces a whole lot of bills that could have been presented much earlier. We are given a great deal of legislation to consider, with the implication that we are to pass it in haste, without even discussing it, so that the session may end before December 20.

We are ready to co-operate with the government but we would ask the government to co-operate a little more with the opposition and all hon. members and to submit its bills and resolutions earlier so that we may examine them adequately and enact legislation which will benefit the Canadian people as a whole.

GRAIN

DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS OF GRADE EXCESS AND OVERAGE

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-119, to provide for the restitution and distribution of the proceeds of grade excess and overage unlawfully confiscated and converted in 1955 and continuously thereafter under an act intituled an act to amend the Canada Grain Act to the use and purposes of the governor in council.

He said: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that earlier this session I introduced Bill No. C-8 to provide for the construction of a grain terminal at Tisdale. Your Honour ruled it out of order on the ground that it involved an unlawful expenditure of public money.

The bill I am now introducing provides again for the construction of a grain terminal at Tisdale but out of the proceeds of grade excess and grain overage belonging to the western grain farmers but held in trust by the board of grain commissioners. Mr. Speaker, we farmers lay claim to these moneys which rightfully belong to us so that we can have a grain terminal built at Tisdale for the benefit of all grain producers. Even though we had to bring in Magna Carta to make our point, I can assure Your Honour that everything is on the level now.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WORLD EXHIBITION CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SITE, NUMBER OF DIRECTORS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-120, to amend the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide a legal basis for the proposed site for the world exhibition, to enlarge the board of directors and to deal with one or two other minor amendments.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-121, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Proposed Legislation

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE FOR DEALING WITH GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTIONS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, before you call government notices of motions, pursuant to the statement made by the Prime Minister I wonder whether the first, third and fourth motions could be put in the form "later this day". It might then be agreed to go into committee as soon as orders of the day are reached, pursuant to the understanding, so the bills could be introduced today in order to be available for debate early next week.

In the case of the other two motions, if the house were disposed to treat the second one having to do with provincial taxes on crown corporations in the same way I would be grateful, but it was not part of the agreement. In the case of the one concerning the Railway Act I am not asking that it be treated in this way at all.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING LOAN PERIOD, ESTABLISHING NEW PERIOD, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee later this day to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act to extend until December 31, 1966 the time during which guaranteed business improvement loans may be made under the act; to provide for the establishment of a new loan period during which business improvement loans made by banks may be guaranteed by the Minister of Finance; to provide that the minister is not liable in respect of losses sustained by banks for business improvement loans made during the new loan period after the aggregate principal amount of such loans made by all banks during the period exceeds $300 million; and to make certain clarifying amendments to the securities provisions of the act.

Motion agreed to.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF CERTAIN PROVINCIAL TAXES AND FEES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee later this day to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of certain provincial taxes and fees by crown corporations on or after the 1st day of April, 1962.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING APPLICATION AND MAKING CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee later this day to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to extend its application to the years 1964, 1965, 1966 and 1967; and to provide also for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING OLD AGE ASSISTANCE, BLIND AND DISABLED PAYMENTS, ETC.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee later this day to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Blind Persons Act to increase to seventy five dollars per month the maximum amount of assistance or allowance, as the case may be, in respect of which payment may, subject to such action as may be necessary by the appropriate provincial authorities, be made to the provinces under the provisions of those acts and to increase the total amount of allowable income, inclusive of assistance or allowance, by one hundred and twenty dollars a year in the case of an unmarried person and two hundred and forty dollars a year in the case of a married person, the said measure to be effective the 1st day of December, 1963.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION

LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION, ETC.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the implementation of certain recommendations of the royal commission on transportation with respect to the rationalization of branch lines of railways and passenger train services and the fixing of freight rates under and consistent with a national transportation policy suited to modern transportation conditions; to establish a branch line rationalization authority and a branch line rationalization fund to be continued for fifteen years to assist in the establishment of an orderly, rational and planned program of abandonment of uneconomic branch lines; to provide authority for public funds to be used where assistance of a type similar to that provided by the branch line rationalization fund may be required after such 15-year period; to provide for payments out of the consolidated revenue fund on a reducing scale for a period of five years commencing with 1964 to compensate the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for passenger train deficits of their systems in Canada during such period; to authorize payments to maintain freight rates on western grain and grain products moving by rail to export positions at the level of rates prevailing on the first day of July, 1963; to permit the lapsing of the subsidy (known as the "bridge" subsidy) now provided for the maintenance of trackage of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company between Sudbury and Fort William and the corresponding trackage of the Canadian National Railway Company between Capreol and Fort William and between Cochrane and Armstrong; to authorize agreements relating to the carriage by rail of Her Majesty's mail, and members of the Canadian forces and police travelling on Her Majesty's service and to provide further for other matters consequential upon or related or incidental to any of the foregoing.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

PENHOLD, ALTA.—REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT ON CLOSING OF AIR BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has anything to report regarding his investigation into the Penhold jet base. Has there been any advance made over and above what he said earlier, and is there any possibility of any alteration in the decision earlier made that this base, for safety reasons, should not be used as a jet training base?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): There has been no alteration in the decision, Mr. Speaker. For reasons of safety, it is quite impossible to use that base for ab initio jet training.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And that is the final decision?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR LIST OF PROPOSED RAIL LINE ABANDONMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport regarding rail line abandonment. My information is that the Canadian National Railway has supplied to those interested a complete outline of its plans for rail line abandonment, and that so far the Canadian Pacific Railway has not supplied such information. Would it be possible for the minister, if it is not yet available, to ask the Canadian Pacific to make this information available to the board of transport commissioners and consequently to the general public?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): I might say that what Canadian National Railways have supplied is in application form. There is a list of those lines on which the railway might ask for abandonment, and that is dealing with the prairie provinces only. It is not to be taken that the railway will necessarily apply for rail line abandonment on any of the lines indicated. I want to clear that up because there has been some misapprehension on it.

The Canadian Pacific has not followed the same course of action, and has not seen fit to disclose what its plans are in this connection.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the uncertainty for grain companies which are building elevators on railway lines, and the large expenditures involved, would the minister consider asking Canadian Pacific Railway to make this information available so that persons who live or do business in those areas can make their plans accordingly?

Mr. McIlraith: I think there is no difficulty in so far as companies building grain elevators are concerned, because they can get that information, I am quite sure, in relation to a particular line at any time. I have made a request that an indication be given of any line which the railway company proposes to abandon, but the railway company has not seen fit to give that information since it is regarded as part of its own responsibility.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. Is the minister aware that the Reston-Wolseley line was abandoned just a year after a grain elevator had been built on it?

Mr. McIlraith: That may well be, but I am aware also that the railway companies have undertaken not to proceed with any of these abandonment applications on the grain lines in the three western provinces, and none has been proceeded with for quite some time. This undertaking was originally given to the former government, and it has been very carefully followed since.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister have a list of the applications for abandonment by the Canadian National, and will he make it available to the members of the house?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not have a list. I want to repeat something that I have been trying to make clear in answering these questions. I deplore the constant reference to this list as a list of abandonments. In cases where there are two closely related lines, one of which may be abandoned, both are indicated as possible lines for abandonment. All this information has been filed with the board of transport commissioners. If it is not readily available there I would be glad to look into the question of getting some kind of list into a form that could be made available to all hon. members.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I wonder if the minister would mind telling us why he is reluctant to ask the Canadian Pacific to reveal their plans for abandonment?

Mr. McIlraith: I regret that the hon. member apparently did not hear my answer to an earlier question on that point.

SUGGESTED ADDITIONAL FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister tell the house the results of any discussions he may have held with the premier of Nova Scotia during his recent visit, with regard to any decisions that may be reached relative to establishing a second ferry between Nova Scotia and New England?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to advise the house that on my recent visit to Nova Scotia I did not meet with the premier of that province. There must be some misunderstanding.

Mr. Crouse: As a supplementary question, I meant during the recent visit of the premier of Nova Scotia to Ottawa for the dominion-provincial conference. Will the minister tell the house when he plans to carry out his commitment that he made to me on June 25 and look into this matter, which is of paramount importance to the people of Nova Scotia and the tourist industry there?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I can tell the hon. member that this subject is under study now, and in addition there has been some correspondence with the premier on subjects that are directly related to it. These are getting quite active consideration.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET REPORTED INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): In the absence of the Minister of Finance, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of this morning's announcement by the dominion bureau of statistics of the startling rise in the cost of living during the last month or so, what steps does the government intend to take to counteract this dangerous trend?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Every step possible, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

INCREASE IN U.S. TARIFF ON CANADIAN MADE TRUCKS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he tell the house whether the Canadian government has been advised by the United States of their decision to raise the tariff on trucks built in Canada and exported to the United States?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question requires detailed information and should be put on the order paper, unless the minister wishes to reply.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps I could answer the question. The answer is yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Did the Canadian government protest to the American government? If so, in what terms were those protests made?

[Text]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we inquired very carefully as to the consequences of this change in the United States tariff which arose out of the so-called chicken war, and the inquiries did not elicit much response from anybody in Canada. There seemed to be a very minor interest in this item.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S. FISHING RIGHTS WITHIN CANADIAN 12 MILE LIMIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to address to the Minister of Fisheries or the minister of external affairs. It has to do with the matter we discussed briefly here yesterday, the 12 mile fishing limit. Would the minister care to comment informatively on current press reports that Canada has now surrendered the point upon which it insisted at the previous law of the sea conferences, the point being that the United States fishing rights within 12 miles of Canada's coasts cannot be maintained unlimited and in perpetuity?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot comment on the press reports referred to, as I have not seen such reports. However, I want to assure the house and the hon. member that no surrender has been made by Canada in its negotiations with the United States on the 12 mile limit.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

USE OF WORDS "AIR-CANADA" ON PLANES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does he intend to contact the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines, Mr. McGregor, to authorize him to spend, or to suggest that he do so, the sum required to have the name "Air-Canada" placed on the aircraft of that crown corporation?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I had better read the transcript of the hearings first and find out exactly what Mr. McGregor said.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister share the opinion of Mr. McGregor who refuses to adopt the designation "Air-Canada" for financial reasons?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am required to comment on opinions of this kind expressed by a private citizen.

Mr. Pigeon: Take your responsibility. You are the Prime Minister; the Canadian people elected you for that.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): I have a supplementary question to ask the Prime Minister in this regard. I had intended to ask him another question but I will go to the supplementary question first. Does the Prime Minister intend to bring in an amendment to the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act to make it legally possible for Mr. McGregor to change the wording on the aircraft, "Trans-Canada Air Lines", to the wording "Air-Canada", as was proposed by Mr. McGregor?

Mr. Pearson: I have already given the list of legislation to be put before parliament this session, which seems to be considered already too long by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Valade: Does this mean no by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Pearson: It means what it says.

REPORTED INTENTION TO TRANSFER EMPLOYEES FROM WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I intended my question for the Prime Minister, but in his absence perhaps the house leader would take it as notice. In view of the statement made by Mr. McGregor before the sessional committee on air lines, railways and shipping to the effect that as many as 200 employees may be transferred from the Winnipeg overhaul and maintenance base prior to 1973, how can the Prime Minister justify his statement as reported at page 5055 of Hansard for November 22, 1963 that the level of employment at that base may be increased during that period?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker I will draw the Prime Minister's attention to this question, although I have some doubt whether it is the kind of question that is normally asked on orders of the day.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR INCREASED HOSPITAL GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a question I put to the Prime Minister yesterday, and of which I gave notice to the minister some days ago. Does the government propose to increase hospital grants in accordance with the urgent request of the metro council of Toronto?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform my hon. friend that this matter is under active consideration.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED APPROACH TO STUDENT AT UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Justice. Is the government aware of the story which appeared in the Globe and Mail on Wednesday, December 4, to the effect that charges were made by the student council at the University of Saskatchewan, Regina campus, that a student was approached by the R.C.M.P. and requested to co-operate in an investigation by the R.C.M.P. on the campus in Regina? If so, can the Prime Minister make a statement on the veracity of this charge?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I saw the report and inquiries are being made about it.

Mr. Orlikow: As a supplementary question, I wonder would the Prime Minister take steps to investigate the truth of this charge by some agency other than the R.C.M.P., through inquiries from the student council and the principal of the Regina campus, Dr. Riddell, in the light of the discussions with the university students and C.A.U.T. and the assurances of the Prime Minister to the house on this issue on an earlier occasion?

Mr. Pearson: I have already said, Mr. Speaker, that we are making inquiries.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPROVAL BY PRIME MINISTER OF PROPOSED REDUCTION IN RESERVE FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of his overriding responsibility for the defence of Canada and the protection of the Canadian people, does the Prime Minister approve of the proposals of the Minister of Defence for the partial annihilation of the militia and the reserve forces of the navy and air force, and the consequent crippling effect that the proposed reductions will have on survival operations?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman himself once served in another cabinet, and ought to know something about the principle of cabinet responsibility, and also about the proper way to ask questions.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the Prime Minister if he will suggest to the minister of defence that the proposed major change in policy be referred to—

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Churchill: —the special committee on defence before a conclusion is reached?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, are not both the question and the answer out of order? Is this not a debate on a matter that is before the house today?

Mr. Speaker: I must agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Churchill: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: It was due to the prestige the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has that too much leeway was given.

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, like the Prime Minister, likes to lecture the house, but this is not a subject for debate today. The questions I asked the Prime Minister refer to his responsibility as Prime Minister of Canada, and he is responsible for the safety of the people of Canada and for the defence of this country. That does not enter into questions that may be asked of the minister of defence on his estimates. Consequently I claim that my question is perfectly in order, and the Prime Minister should give an adequate and satisfactory reply.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose and brought up the point that both the question and the answer were out of order. The Chair, in dealing with that point of order, told the house that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was given too much leeway in his question. What about your ruling on the answer that was also declared out of order?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lapointe.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Was it the intention of the Prime Minister, when he asked the house to set up a special committee on national defence, to have that committee examine proposed changes in policy and report to the Minister of National Defence before the changes were introduced or promulgated?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I understand, from reading the hon. gentleman's statement of yesterday, that he was complaining that the minister had not announced policy yesterday, before the committee on defence had completed its work. The minister said yesterday, and I am glad to repeat it, that one of the reasons a policy statement was not possible at this time was that we wanted to get the report of the committee on defence and study it before a statement was made on behalf of the government.

Mr. MacInnis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister aware that before the defence committee the Minister of National Defence said that certain steps would be taken regardless of whether the committee dealt with them? Is he aware of that statement by the Minister of National Defence, who in effect said "We will do it, whether you like it or not"?

Some hon. Members: Arrogance.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the special committee on defence of the House of Commons will only be able to present an interim report before the end of the year, and having in mind the terms of reference of the committee which call for a long term policy report, if there is a new session early in the new year will the Prime Minister make a recommendation as to the reinstatement of the committee and the reappointment of the same personnel?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be glad to give consideration to that matter and make an announcement before the end of the present session.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—ALLEGED MISCARRIAGE IN COFFIN CASE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I may not have the prestige of the hon. member who asked the previous question, but, the Minister of Justice being absent, I shall put my question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has launched an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the Coffin case, is the Prime Minister not of the opinion that now it should be up to the Minister of Justice instead to make such an investigation in order to put the public quite straight on the circumstances surrounding that case.

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what the Minister of Justice said yesterday, but I would like to reassure the hon. gentleman who asked the question and tell him he enjoys exactly the same prestige as the hon. member who preceded him.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: I wish to ask a supplementary question.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: Who has the floor?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lapointe rising on a supplementary question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Since the Minister of Justice has decided that this case did not come under federal jurisdiction, does the Prime Minister feel it proper for a crown corporation such as the C.B.C., to conduct an investigation into this matter, considering especially the way it is doing it.

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not see the relevancy of those two matters, but I will be glad to discuss that aspect of it with the Minister of Justice.

WORLD FAIR

INQUIRY AS TO SALARIES OF COMMISSIONER AND ASSOCIATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the bill introduced this morning by the Prime Minister to amend the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation Act, will the Prime Minister tell the house whether this bill will give us the details of the salaries which will be paid to the commissioner general and his associates, and also how many new commissioners will be appointed and how many members there will be under this amendment, so we may discuss the bill having before us complete information on this subject?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that I asked a question of the Prime Minister. Your Honour ruled my question out of order and said it was a question for the order paper. I question this, because we need the information before the bill amending the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation Act is discussed. I do not think my question is out of order, because it does not ask for statistics; it requires just a simple answer as to whether in this amendment we will know what salaries will be paid to the commissioner general and how many other members are to be appointed, so we can discuss the bill having complete information on it.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the bill has been printed. It is available. My hon. friend can read it.

Mr. Robichaud: If he can read.

Mr. Valade: Arrogance from the Liberal party again.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Robichaud: He cannot read.

Mr. Valade: Arrogance from the Prime Minister.

INQUIRY AS TO RECEIPT OF COMPLETE PLAN OF PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works?

When will the world fair authorities submit to the Minister of Public Works a complete plan of the site, including related services concerning the fair?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we will receive within ten days and surely before December 20 the complete plans of all development projects which are considered necessary by the fair authorities to achieve their objectives, as well as the budget for the coming fiscal year.

FINANCE

STATEMENT BY HEALTH MINISTER RESPECTING PAY AS YOU GO POLICY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister intend to apply in his department the policy that was put forward by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in Edmonton, when she stated that she was in favour of the "pay as you go" policy?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I am not one of the bilingual members of the house. My machine is out of order, and I did not get the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: Your whole financial machine is out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat my question to the Minister of Finance. Does he intend to apply in his department the policy put forward by his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who stated in Edmonton that she was in favour of the "pay as you go" policy?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I will have to consult my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare before giving a specific answer to that question.

[Mr. Valade.]

REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S. RESPECTING MODIFICATION OF TAX PROPOSED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of a statement made in Chicago last night that the inflow of foreign capital was necessary for Canada's economy, and in view of the sharp drop in such inflow in the last quarter, could he tell the house whether he intends to make any further representations to the United States government in regard to the equalization of interest act; and does he also intend to modify his stand on the withholding tax in order to encourage a greater inflow of foreign capital to this country?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the second part of the question, I understand that the income tax bill was given royal assent last night. On the other part of the question, perhaps I might refer to reports in the press this morning of the findings of the ways and means committee of the house of representatives in connection with the equalization of interest tax. I have not seen a transcript of the evidence, or the report, but according to newspaper accounts it seems clear that the exemptions for new issues of securities which the United States administration intends to apply to Canada have been confirmed by the house of representatives ways and means committee.

In addition the committee, in consultation with the administration, has been further responsive to the requests of the Canadian government. Three examples of this responsiveness emerge from the newspaper reports. First, some adjustment of the legislation which may prove to be of considerable importance has been recommended in the direction of exempting from tax the investments of U.S. insurance companies operating in Canada, up to 110 per cent of their reserves. Second, the head offices of international trade unions and fraternal organizations will apparently be able to invest in Canada, if the report is accepted, free of tax in respect of the dues they collect in this country. Third, it is apparently proposed to exempt from tax, trading in the outstanding securities of certain Canadian corporations which are owned to a substantial extent in the United States.

While this latter point does not fully meet our requests for complete exemption to be granted to Canada-U.S. trade in outstanding securities of such Canadian corporations, it would appear to involve a very substantial step in this direction. I can assure the hon. member that we shall be keeping in the closest touch with what is going on in Washington and will continue to make representations to obtain full exemption.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister's answer seems to indicate that the equalization of interest act is not a cause for the sharp drop in the inflow of foreign capital. Must we therefore conclude that the main reasons are the provisions of his June 13 budget?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, that interpretation is of course completely wrong and it is quite contrary to everything I have said. It is also quite contrary to an answer I gave the Leader of the Opposition just two or three days ago.

Mr. Pearson: And it is contrary to the facts.

Mr. Gordon: It is known and appreciated, I think, by everybody in financial and industrial circles that the reason for the drop in the inflow of capital from the United States in the last quarter was due to the uncertainties surrounding the interest equalization tax.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance says it is known to everybody. I ask him whether it was known to Mr. Kierans. I should also like to ask the minister this question. Did he receive the information he has given us from Washington, or is he just making an observation on a press dispatch which he has before him?

Mr. Gordon: In answer to the last part of the right hon. gentleman's question, I prefaced my remarks by saying that this information was based on a fairly full press report. I also said, if I recall, that I had not yet obtained the report from Washington but that we were proceeding to get it. I have nothing further to add to what I said the other day about Mr. Kierans.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister saying that he is approaching this matter with that seriousness which it deserves when all he places before the house is what he has read this morning from a newspaper?

Mr. Gordon: I think I am approaching this question with the utmost seriousness, which it deserves. I have been doing so ever since last July.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question. The minister has just asserted that the drop was due to the uncertain—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member would rephrase his question.

Mr. Martineau: My question to the minister is, is that uncertainty which prevails due to some of the actions of the present government?

Mr. Gordon: I would not think so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martineau: Everyone else does.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Could I ask the minister whether he knows if this exemption will extend to provincial and municipal securities?

Mr. Gordon: That was the intention. That was recommended by the administration. That is the implication of the press report, but I will have to wait until I get the report.

Mr. Douglas: Has it been confirmed by the house of representatives?

Mr. Gordon: According to the press it has, but as I said earlier I have not got the report of the ways and means committee.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIORITY FOR CONSIDERATION OF BILL NO. C-5

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in connection with his announcement of priorities this morning. Does the government intend to give a place in its list of priorities to Bill No. C-5, respecting the position of primary producers under the Bankruptcy Act, if this bill is reported back from the committee next week?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This is, of course, a private member's bill, and there has been no report from the committee concerning it. I was dealing with public legislation this morning.

GRAIN

DURUM WHEAT—STATEMENT ON DELIVERY PROSPECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre asked me about Durum wheat. As he knows, there are no longer special quota arrangements for the delivery of Durum wheat, which can be delivered on the specified acreage quota itself. As for the general situation regarding Durum wheat, stocks in the elevators are fairly large. At November 27 there were 26.6 million bushels compared with 15.6 million bushels at this date a year ago. On the other hand, exports at November 27 were up from 9.1 million bushels last year to 11.8 million bushels. I am informed by the wheat board that they expect that exports will be larger this year than last.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I place a request before the Secretary of State. Will he look at the motion for the production of papers No. 105 passed on October 23, under which the house ordered the tabling of correspondence with life insurance and other companies regarding the Canada pension plan. Six weeks having gone by, perhaps this return could be brought down.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I would be very glad to inquire into this matter, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

MONTREAL—REPORTED OBJECTION TO PRODUCTION OF CARAVELLE AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Industry?

Is there any ground for the report to the effect that Canadair authorities objected to the construction of the Caravelle because of the prohibitive cost of the equipment necessary to build this aircraft?

[Text]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that the administration of Trans-Canada Air Lines did object to the construction of the Caravelle.

Mr. Caouette: I did not say Trans-Canada; I said Canadair in Montreal.

Mr. Drury: I was not aware, either, that the administration of Canadair objected to the construction of the Caravelle.

Mr. Speaker: Special order No. 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could interrupt to suggest that all four resolutions be called, or all three, depending on the wish of the house; that is to say, the first one, the third one and the fourth one. If the house would be agreeable to the second one respecting the payment of certain provincial taxes and dues, we could take them all in committee at once and have all the bills introduced when we get out of committee.

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the Secretary of State a question. I am particularly interested in the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Do I understand that this is being done on the understanding that whatever debate might be relevant at the resolution stage would be relevant on second reading?

Mr. Pickersgill: That applies to all these measures. I think there was an understanding among the representatives of all parties in debate, so that anything which would have been relevant at the resolution stage would not be objected to from this side of the house at the subsequent stage of debate.

Mr. Churchill: That was the understanding, and as far as we are concerned we would take the four resolutions now.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING LOAN PERIOD, ESTABLISHING NEW PERIOD, ETC.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act to extend until December 31, 1966 the time during which guaranteed business improvement loans may be made under the act; to provide for the establishment of a new loan period during which business improvement loans made by banks may be guaranteed by the Minister of Finance; to provide that the minister is not liable in respect of losses sustained by banks for business improvement loans made during the new loan period after the aggregate principal amount of such loans made by all banks during the period exceeds $300,000,000; and to make certain clarifying amendments to the securities provisions of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-122, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF CERTAIN PROVINCIAL TAXES AND FEES

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of certain provincial taxes and fees by crown corporations on or after the 1st day of April, 1962.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-123, respecting the payment of certain provincial taxes and fees by crown corporations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING APPLICATION AND MAKING CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to extend its application to the years 1964, 1965, 1966 and 1967; and to provide also for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Benidickson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-124, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSIONS

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING OLD AGE ASSISTANCE, BLIND AND DISABLED PAYMENTS, ETC.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Blind Persons Act to increase to seventy five dollars per month the maximum amount of assistance or allowance, as the case may be, in respect of which payment may, subject to such action as may be necessary by the appropriate provincial authorities, be made to the provinces under the provisions of those acts and to increase the total amount of allowable income, inclusive of assistance or allowance, by one hundred and twenty dollars a year in the case of an unmarried person and two hundred and forty dollars a year in the case of a married person, the said measure to be effective the 1st day of December, 1963.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Miss LaMarsh thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-125, to amend the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Blind Persons Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

1. Departmental administration including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, for total commitments of $2,529,570,600 for the purposes of votes 1, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40, 45, 50, 55, 60 and 65 of this department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $978,136,600 will come due for payment in future years) and authority to make recoverable advances under any of the said votes in respect of assistance rendered to the United Nations, any party of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or any provincial or municipal government, $3,432,000.

Mc. MacInnis: At the conclusion of my remarks last night I was referring to the attitude of the present government and the action which has recently been taken. I would like to repeat, with regard to this so-called brave decision of the Minister of National Defence and the cutbacks announced yesterday, that it would be much better if he had followed the commitment undertaken by his government to cancel the Bomarc program. There was a definite commitment by the government to renegotiate the Bomarc program. I repeat, in the light of my experience on the defence committee and in the light of my experience in the various allied nations we had an opportunity to visit, that those nations have placed the emphasis for their defence on tactical and strategic weapons, both of which are offensive weapons. Never is emphasis placed on defensive weapons. Considering the fact that this government promised to renegotiate the Bomarc program, I would point out that this is a defensive weapons which is not in line with any theory of defence based on the deterrent and the use of offensive weapons both tactical and strategic. There is no doubt that the cancellation of the Bomarc program—

The Chairman: Could we have some order?

Mr. MacInnis: I was not sure whether the minister of defence was on his feet or not. A little order will be required here, especially from the minister who is responsible for these matters. He has no intention of paying attention to what I have been saying on the subject of defence. This is a very pertinent matter at this time, and there is not much sense in my carrying on with the debate—

Mr. Byrne: Not much attention is being paid on that side.

Mr. MacInnis: There seems to be quite an effort on the part of members opposite to represent Cape Breton South. I have been given the floor. I must warn them that there are certain procedures they have to go through, and since they have not gone through them, I have the recognition of the Chair and the least I can expect is order from the other side. Members on the other side will have an opportunity to refute what I have to say, if they will get on their feet and say it later. But while I have the floor I would appreciate a little quiet, especially from the member from British Columbia, whatever his constituency is.

I say the attitude of the government has been hypocritical throughout, and the hypocrisy shown yesterday by the minister of defence was such that it should turn the stomachs of everybody in the services. He got up and complimented the services on their ability. We had a good example of that overseas. I do not question that for a moment. The men and women in our services deserve every compliment that can be paid to them. But while complimenting them on their service, the same minister has defied the wishes expressed by the senior officers in the navy; he has defied the opinions expressed by officers holding high positions in the upper echelon of the army and he has ignored their representations. Again, I ask the question: where is he getting his advice from? He has completely ignored the advice which has been given him.

The minister has gone before the defence committee and said: Forget what I have said about defence. And, really, we should. Here the opportunity was taken to save a certain amount of money. As far as I can calculate the savings from the cuts announced yesterday, they will amount to about $37 million. I say: get rid of the useless Bomarcs and perhaps these cuts can be restored. The minister has, in the past, talked a great deal about commitments. What about the commitments made by the previous government? What is he doing about the commitment of the government to maintain the operations of the naval base? As the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria said yesterday, these operations were not only maintained but they were increased under the previous government. The minister has now gone into Cape Breton and cancelled out these gains. We are grateful for the heavy water plant, but he has now taken more employment away from us than we derived through the benefits of the heavy water project. Cancellation of the operation of this base amounts to the betrayal of a commitment. The former government had undertaken to maintain this base and increase its operation. Now the present minister, who was so concerned about commitments has gone back on that undertaking and does not consider it to be a national commitment, important, in every way, shape or form, hypocritical, every step.

The cut-back affecting the naval base will bring a grievous problem to the people of Cape Breton. What about the contracts under the Department of National Defence? Contracts for the naval base at Point Edward have been either cancelled or postponed. A tracking station which was on the planning board and which was to have been placed at the north end of Cape Breton has also been cancelled. Everywhere we look, across the board, we see cancellations, withdrawals or delays. Even in the constituency of the Minister of Labour contracts have been cancelled. As I understand it, no consideration whatever was given to the contractors who, at great expense to themselves, had estimated the cost of these programs. I understand that one particular contractor has been the successful bidder for three of these contracts and that not one of them has been activated. I have no axe to grind in this respect. None of the contracts involved are in my constituency. But it only underlines the attitude taken by the government toward these matters.

Mr. Deschatelets: Do not take yourself too seriously.

Mr. MacInnis: Here we go again; "too seriously", someone says.

Mr. Deschatelets: I said so.

Mr. MacInnis: Well, get on your feet and say it. I am not going to be standing here and taking those remarks from a man who has not the guts to get on his feet and say it. Put him in his place.

The Chairman: Order. May we have some order? It is difficult to follow the remarks of the hon. member if there are these interruptions. At the same time, I would suggest to the hon. member who has the floor that he kindly address the Chair.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the difficulties under which you are working, but in a case where order has to be called with reference to any particular member I think it was your place, Mr. Chairman, to identify the Minister of Public Works who did not have the guts to get up and repeat what he had said.

Mr. Deschatelets: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacInnis: I will say one more thing before I resume my seat.

The Chairman: Order. Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Deschatelets: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member said I have not got the guts to repeat what I said. I am going to repeat what I said.

Mr. MacInnis: This is not a point of order.

Mr. Deschatelets: I said that the hon. member should not take himself too seriously.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should be given the opportunity to hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. MacInnis: Provided he has a proper question of privilege. My remark was that the Chair should have identified the Minister of Public Works.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: I suggested that the minister should have been identified.

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member resume his seat. I would think it is for the Chair to decide whether there is a question of privilege and not for the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am sorry, but with the interruptions I did not hear what the minister said. Perhaps he would like to repeat it.

Mr. Deschatelets: I said that the hon. member should not take himself too seriously.

The Chairman: That, of course, is not a question of privilege. I recognize that.

Mr. MacInnis: I hope the Minister of Public Works will also say the same thing to the Minister of National Defence. I will say one more thing before I resume my seat. I disagree with the remark made by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria when he referred to the shoes of the Leader of the Opposition. He made a remark which I am not going to repeat. But I will say that I disagree for the very reason that I believe the record of the Minister of National Defence in the last war would indicate otherwise, and that possibly the minister is only qualified to do what the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria suggested yesterday he was not fit to do.

Since the Liberal backbenchers seem to want to place the Minister of National Defence in the hero role, I should like to suggest that he return to that role for which he was well suited during the war years when he got his headlines because of driving a motorcycle from California to his home town, a very dangerous mission. Since this is the role best suited to this hero, why does he not get back on that motorcycle and return to California?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. MacInnis: As is suggested, shame.

[Translation]

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with the utmost attention to the speeches made during this debate on national defence. All these speeches, with one or two exceptions—and more particularly with the exception of the speech we have just heard, and which clearly does not deserve any comments—have been serious and well documented; they proved that the essential problem of our national defence is taken seriously.

On the other hand, I feel that many members do not fully realize the magnitude and the necessity of the review which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) has undertaken a few months ago.

Naturally, the minister cannot very well speak himself of what he has accomplished in that field; however, as I have been indirectly connected with that review, I feel that I must inform this house of what is understood by a survey of national defence policy.

May I tell the committee that I feel very happy to have been able to bring my small contribution to that survey. I also wish to stress the fact that my colleague the Minister of National Defence and myself are jointly responsible, and that I accept my share of responsibility for any serious decisions which have already been taken, or which might be taken later.

That survey, which started sometime ago, and which is unprecedented, requires considerable amount of work. The Minister of National Defence had to draw upon his resources of courage, determination and initiative in order to undertake such a review.

Last April, not long after having been appointed Minister of National Defence, he started a series of surveys on the three armed services and throughout the national defence department. I must say that the employees of the department not only offered their cooperation, but were quite enthusiastic, because they realized, as did many others in the country, that it was time to look more closely into our national defence set-up.

Some might ask why we should deem it necessary to proceed with an extensive survey of our national defence system. Well, there were two reasons for it in mind: the first one was that we are living in a new era, where scientific and technical progress controls our way of life. But it is mainly since the first atomic bomb was dropped that we had to undergo those changes, and today's strategy and art of war are very different from what they were before.

It is hardly probable that we should now be called upon to fight a war similar to those in which we took part in 1914 and 1939.

Yet, in spite of those changes in the international and armament fields, there did not seem to be any comparative transformation within the national defence department; we were still preparing to fight a war according to the standards of 1939, or 1914.

Mr. Chairman, some things have changed now, while others have not, which means the necessity for Canada to participate, with the other western countries, in security and collective defence organizations like NATO.

Russia has still the same objective, it is only by having a collective force to face any possible aggression that we will be able to maintain peace.

Now, I heard somebody say yesterday that there was no possible defence against nuclear arms. Probably not. Yet, if we proceed to arm ourselves it is not so much to fight a war, but to safeguard peace. That is the very reason for which we have troops in NATO, that is, to be able to maintain peace in Europe.

If we had to take our forces out of NATO, we would be in the very same position as in 1939, and Russia would again start its aggressive policy against the west European countries as it did a few years ago with regard to east European countries. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that it is our responsibility to contribute to organizations grouping collective defence forces.

We must also make available to that collective force the best we have, the most effective equipment we can find and what we can afford as a country with a population of 19 million people.

The second reason which justified a complete review of the expenditures of the Department of National Defence is that those expenditures were going up at a staggering pace, to the point that if that situation had continued, the expenditures of the Department of National Defence would have exceeded the $2 billion mark by 1970, and that, without having any more assurance that the weapons and equipment available could be adequate to face the conflicts which might arise in the next 10, 15, or 20 years.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that during this debate, some hon. members tried to indulge in petty politics. Surely, the matter of national defence and all the problems involved call for the good will of everyone.

I have listened to the speeches made yesterday and today by members of this house on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Some of them were very good. Constructive suggestions were made and take my word, they will be given serious consideration.

At the very beginning of his remarks, the Minister of National Defence stated his two-stage plan to cut down expenditures.

As he stated himself, the first phase consisted of a general house cleaning, that is, the expenditures were fully looked into. Attempts were made to avoid duplication, to eliminate wasteful and excessive expenditures and also to cope with uneconomic operations.

Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) that cuts in expenditures were not made lightly and in a haphazard way and without due consideration. On the contrary, nothing has been cut out before one, two or even three studies have been made into such matters, so as to ensure the general efficiency of our armed forces, both in Canada and in Europe, while curtailing those expenses that could be reduced.

I am convinced that most responsible people will admit that we had tremendous difficulties in deciding to cut certain expenses made by the Department of National Defence. It was not easy to decide to curtail the expenses on such and such an item as, for example, the frigate or aircraft program. It is not easy, moreover, to eliminate radar stations throughout the country.

Since such steps were so difficult to take and so unpopular, I feel it should be recognized that we took them because we thought we were justified in doing so in the common interest.

We are not indifferent to the difficulties that decision might create in the country; we are not indifferent to the fact that people will be laid off. We want to do everything possible to help retrain them. We will, as much as possible, stagger those lay-offs over a period of a few months.

We will work in co-operation with the Departments of Labour and Industry to put these people back to work in industry, if possible. We do not feel some uneconomic stations should be maintained just to keep men at work. In my opinion, we cannot accept that principle. I feel it is a matter of finding for these people another job that will enable them to earn a living.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to the second stage of that plan, the Minister of National Defence has intimated that it would be made public at the beginning of next year. That second stage is related to what we have done already. On the other hand, much research remains to be done before that program is completed and put into force.

That is what we are doing now. We are trying to create a military force that will meet our requirements in Canada as well as in Europe. We want to set up, in the next ten or 15 years, a well-balanced mobile force equipped with the latest weapons and equipment.

Of course some complain because it took us eight months to formulate a complete plan. Well, I sincerely feel that there are not three members in this house who have any idea of the work involved in the preparation of national defence estimates. And I fail to understand how the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) and the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Martineau) can criticize the government and the Minister of National Defence for not revealing their defence policy.

Mr. Martineau: What is that policy?

Mr. Cardin: Those two hon. members sit on the special defence committee and have been given all the information they requested. There is a reason why we cannot reveal what our defence policy will be.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Cardin: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: The minister has just said that the people on the defence committee had all the required information. Not one word of the proposed annihilation of the militia was given to that committee. We have had no information about the reduction of the reserve force. What does the minister mean, therefore, by saying that information has been given to that committee?

Mr. Cardin: What I meant, Mr. Chairman, was that there are no precedents for the information that has been given to the special committee on defence. It has been given all possible help in order to arrive at some kind of policy. The committee has been free to call any witness. It has been allowed to go to NORAD, overseas and anywhere it desired. It was allowed to call anyone. The minister was there and offered to appear before the committee at any time that the committee might want him to do so. If the members of the committee did not do this, then it is not our fault.

Mr. Churchill: You are doing things behind the back of the committee, and that is what I object to.

Mr. Cardin: I know how the hon. member feels. However, we have given the committee all the powers that could be given. I do not believe the committee can replace the government, and the decisions that have to be taken will be taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the minister another question?

Would the associate minister agree that when the Minister of National Defence appeared before the special defence committee he gave no inkling of the changes in the military expenditures he announced yesterday?

Mr. Cardin: No, Mr. Chairman, he may not have said anything and, in my opinion, it was not up to him to do so.

[Text]

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago I had the pleasure and the privilege of visiting our troops in Europe, and like most hon. members of the house who had that opportunity I came away with a feeling of pride in both the brigade and the air division. I have been told by General Stockwell of SHAPE, the British general, that our brigade are the best troops, best trained and best disciplined in Europe. They enjoy an excellent reputation among the countries of Europe and they have been given an assignment that shows the confidence that is placed in them. We can all be justly proud of our Canadians overseas.

The same thing can equally be said of the air division. I have also been told that most of the air forces in NATO look up to our air division, and the members of it are doing an exceptionally fine job under conditions that are not always very easy. They should have our support and our appreciation for their work.

I find it very regrettable that one of our Canadian magazine writers who visited our air division thought it necessary to write a most deprecative article. I have often wondered what prompts a writer to turn out that type of article. All I can say here is that I believe the article was uncalled for, unfair, unjust and untrue. I only wish that the people who may have read it could have the opportunity of visiting the air division in Germany to find out for themselves that we can be justly proud of it and that we need not in any way take for granted what this writer has written.

Mr. Fisher: Would the associate minister at least identify the magazine so that we could get some idea what he is talking about?

Mr. Cardin: I would, if it were not for the fact that in doing so I would give more publicity to the article than I wish. I will tell the hon. member personally, if he wants to hear it.

Mr. Fairweather: I would like to hear it, too.

Mr. Cardin: You come and see me, too. During the course of the debate it has been said that our forces in Europe are ill equipped and they do not have a definite role. Of course this is unfounded. As far as the brigade is concerned the equipment is good, except for one weakness and that is the armoured personnel carrier which we are going to change as soon as it is feasible. So far as the role is concerned, the Canadian brigade has been given a definite role and an important role in the whole set-up of NATO forces in Europe.

So far as the air division is concerned, it too has an important role to play, a role that was accepted by the previous government. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have the same people who gave this role to our air division asking questions about arming our four weapon systems with nuclear warheads.

I can understand the concern of the hon. member for Calgary North who was in favour of them, and who felt there was nothing else to do but to arm the Bomarc, the Voodoo, the CF-104 and the Honest John with nuclear weapons. I can understand that, but I cannot understand the anxiety that was displayed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who, during his term of office, even as minister of national defence could not see his way clear to provide nuclear weapons for these four missile systems.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Cardin: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Were there nuclear warheads available during the term I served as minister of national defence?

Mr. Cardin: No, perhaps there were not—

Mr. Churchill: Are they available now?

Mr. Cardin: —because the hon. member at that time was not even willing to sign the agreement with the United States for the procurement of these weapons.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask another question? Are missile dumps for nuclear weapons for the air division in Germany completed? Have the missiles been placed in those dumps by the Americans?

Mr. Cardin: If the hon. member will let me go on I think I have the answer for him right here. But it seems strange for the hon. member, who was so silent and reticent about these nuclear weapons, that he should now be exhorting this government to acquire these weapons in a relatively short space of time. He has even accused us of not having fulfilled our duty—

Mr. Churchill: That is right; you have not.

Mr. Cardin: —because the weapons were not provided with these missile systems. I am sure the hon. member knows quite well that there were several procedures that had to be carried out before the weapons could be acquired. One of those was the basic government-to-government agreement, which was signed on August 16, 1963. Then there were also the technical agreements that had to follow with respect to the Voodoo and Bomarc. These were completed on October 18, 1963. The agreement concerning the CF-104's is expected to be completed shortly.

To answer the question the hon. member asked with regard to the construction of the necessary storage sites and other facilities for nuclear weapons, these facilities for the air division are provided under the infrastructure arrangements and it is expected they will be completed about the spring of 1964. In Canada it was considered prudent not to commence construction of these facilities in so far as the interceptor squadrons are concerned until a nuclear agreement had been signed and the technical agreements completed. Contracts for the construction of these facilities are now being awarded, but they will not be completed until the late summer or fall of 1964. The facilities for the acceptance of these weapons for the Bomarc are available and we anticipate the delivery of the weapons in the very near future. I might add that the authorization for delivery of the weapons must be given by the President personally, and President Kennedy's untimely death has caused some delay.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Calgary North posed questions as to why we phased out the interceptors, the F-86's, before having acquired nuclear weapons for the CF-104's. I am sure both hon. members must know that the conversion of the overseas squadrons to their new role is being undertaken in accordance with SACEUR's plans. There is no alternative to making a conversion of this kind than to discontinue flying the F-86 aircraft because the crews and all the facilities at the bases must be used in converting the crews to their new operational role.

It was earlier expected that the conversion of the R.C.A.F. air division squadrons to CF-104 aircraft would be completed before the end of 1963. Due to technical difficulties with these very complex aircraft it was not possible to train the pilots for the air division squadrons in their new role at the operational training unit at Cold Lake, Alberta, as quickly as would have been required to meet this schedule. There will, therefore, be a few months delay in getting the last squadron formed in Europe. This will be accomplished early in 1964.

If the hon. member was justified in claiming that we did not do our duty because we were unable to furnish these weapons in a period of eight months, I wonder how he can excuse the procrastination of the previous government, which in that time were not even willing to sign the agreements with the United States for the procurement of these weapons.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit another question, or would he prefer me to speak later on this subject? He has just said it is under SACEUR's arrangements that the changeover was effected from Sabre jets to 104's. He has just said it was under the infrastructure of NATO that the missile dumps were to be constructed. If that is the case—and it was the case—what could have been done by the previous government to provide the nuclear weapons for those 'planes?

Mr. Woolliams: That will take some consultation again.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, my colleague informs me that the infrastructure that was being built was held up because of the fact that the government had not agreed to sign any agreement with the United States.

Mr. Churchill: I regret that I cannot accept that statement.

Mr. Hellyer: It is true, whether you accept it or not.

Mr. Churchill: It is not true.

Mr. Hellyer: Certainly it is.

Mr. Cardin: The hon. member for Cape Breton South—I think he may have corrected this statement earlier today; I am not sure—yesterday claimed that the cost of maintaining the Bomarc sites was $9 million a year. Actually the cost of maintaining the two Bomarc sites is approximately $3 million a year. Of course, the hon. member—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, if the minister would permit it, I can clarify this matter. If the minister checks my remarks he will see I made a correction. I was referring to the expense saved in the cut-back. There was an interchange of the remarks in Hansard, and if the minister will examine what was said he will find I was referring to just the keeping, the holding of the Bomarcs as being in the vicinity of $9 million a year. It had nothing to do with the maintenance or the capital cost.

Mr. Cardin: I accept the hon. member's correction as valid, Mr. Chairman. However, the cost of maintaining the two Bomarc sites is approximately $3 million a year. The hon. member thought we should scrap the Bomarc and he based those remarks on statements purportedly made by Mr. McNamara. I understand that the hon. member is going to Washington very shortly with the special committee on defence, and I would invite him to try to get further information as to that aspect. As far as I know, the Bomarc "B" will be required for several years to come, and indeed Mr. McNamara pointed out that for the protection obtained from the Bomarc he did not believe the annual operating cost to the United States of $20 million was an unreasonable amount. So there is, I am quite sure, ample proof to show that the Bomarc "B" has a very useful life for several more years.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit another question? Will he indicate to this committee where in the NATO group of countries there is a defensive nuclear weapon other than those, as we were informed in Europe, of a tactical and strategic nature, which are of course offensive weapons. Their defence is based on the deterrent power of these weapons.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I think we could have a long debate on that question. But I would say that you cannot quite compare any of the NATO countries with our geographic situation here with the United States; and the Bomarcs, of course, are exclusively for the defence of the North American continent. The hon. member for Calgary North asked some questions pertaining to the auxiliary vessels that were to be taken out of service, and reductions to the fleet. These reductions comprise two small stores ships; two 46-feet harbour ferries; two 75-feet harbour ferries; one fire tug; two Glen class tugs, and one Saint class tug. The one Saint class tug is to be put in reserve. However, the other nine vessels were constructed during the second world war and would be due for disposal very shortly.

The hon. member for Calgary North, I think it was, was also worried about the possibility of holding winter training if we should withdraw from Churchill. I would like to tell the hon. member that the present garrison is basically an administrative one, supporting a small Canadian army training establishment, the establishments of the other services and D.R.B., and the Churchill research range. The Canadian army and R.C.A.F. will continue to plan on using Fort Churchill as an advanced or staging base for defence operations or exercises in the eastern Arctic. Such exercises are also carried out at other locations. There is, for example, a joint exercise with the United States to be held in the Yukon and Alaska this year. Arrangements are being made with the Department of Transport regarding space for and maintenance of the stand-by communications equipment required for this purpose. Similar arrangements have been in effect for some time at other locations—for example, Fort Nelson, British Columbia—and have proven to be quite satisfactory.

The hon. member for Calgary North also inquired about the savings which were to be made, and he was making a comparison—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Mr. Churchill: Go on.

Mr. Cardin: I will take only a minute to answer this question, Mr. Chairman. The savings to be accomplished by transfers to other departments of government as distinct from savings due to abandonment of operations are as follows. First, the navy will transfer its housekeeping responsibilities at Fort Pepperrell to the Department of Public Works. Second, the army functions in connection with the northwest highway system are being transferred to the Department of Public Works. Third, the airfields at Resolute Bay, St. Hubert and Torbay are being transferred to the Department of Transport. Fourth, the R.C.A.F. air photographic section, Rockcliffe, is being transferred to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. As the hon. member will appreciate, it is difficult to estimate the exact change in cost to the government in operating and maintenance costs that will result from these transfers, but the total is expected to be in the vicinity of $10 million.

The Minister of National Defence and others of my colleagues, Mr. Chairman, will answer questions as they arise. May I, in conclusion, say that I am very much convinced that the decisions made by the Minister of National Defence are a right step in the right direction at the right time, and that as a result of this review not only will we have a clear and positive national defence policy but we will have more balanced, effective and versatile armed forces.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Chairman, it would have been very useful at this time if we could have had a general debate on policy, and it is to be earnestly hoped that such a debate will be held before the white paper is published. Because after the white paper is brought down government policy is fixed. So far as the timetable goes, I am quite sure we will have plenty of time to debate policy before it is published, because I can see the early flowers of spring blooming before we get the white paper here. However, in the meantime I commend to the minister the speech of the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, on naval policy. I am sure the minister can find a great deal of help from that speech when he is dealing with naval affairs.

The minister said in his opening remarks that our end objective is to get the best result for each defence dollar spent. I am sure every hon. member of the house and every Canadian agrees with that very worthy objective. However, I think we would have a lot more confidence in what the minister said yesterday if we were assured that the economies he talked about were real, and that they would not impair the efficiency of the services. I have the feeling that perhaps the Minister of Finance ought to be in the committee today, or at least his parliamentary secretary, because these changes and chops in the services were dictated more by the necessity of the Department of Finance, in its recovery from some of the worst mistakes made in the last budget and in its getting ready for the next budget, than from the point of view of military realities. It seems another case of the bright promise of April fading into the false dawn of winter.

I did agree with the minister on one matter, although not for the reasons he gave. I am very pleased to note that he is not proposing to close the military college at Royal Roads. I am much persuaded by the arguments of some former serving officers who suggest that it would be better for the services, for the officers and for the country generally, when it is necessary to give higher education to cadets and officers, to provide it in civilian universities, where the men would live in a civilian atmosphere rather than the narrow atmosphere of serving life. However, I realize that such a course is not possible at this time, because of the great shortage of universities and teachers, and as long as that shortage continues I should hope that such institutions as Royal Roads would be kept open. Indeed, one of the things which is most often overlooked in the discussion of defence expenditures generally is the great value derived from technical training, discipline, and the various courses of education given serving personnel while in the services. I think that is probably the most real dividend that we get from our expenditure on national defence.

I should like to say a few words later about the cuts in the militia. The minister was silent on this particular aspect but I hope he is not contemplating any cut in or curtailment of the training of army cadets, air cadets or naval cadets. That training is also a most worth-while and necessary branch of military training and it has a value far beyond the short term needs of the moment, which at this particular time appear to one sitting here to be the need to help the Minister of Finance.

The minister said that his was a housekeeping statement. I have been wondering since last night who is going to keep house while the minister is making up his mind. There are many instances where he has not made up his mind, and this gives a rather disquieting feeling to one. I think it is disturbing and feel that we should have further reassurance beyond that given to us by the Associate Minister of National Defence just a few minutes ago. The minister was talking about the reduction of ten auxiliary naval vessels. It seems to me he was trying to come down on both sides of the fence. In one breath he said that the saving was very small, and in the next breath said: "Well, we are doing this to save money". It has always been my understanding that these surface craft and the few helicopters and planes in the navy formed a very small part of the strength of our naval forces, yet added a disproportionately high percentage to the efficiency of the force. In other words, the better served the more efficient are our naval vessels. I think we should have more assurance on this point.

Another matter I should like the minister to assure us on concerns a rumour current today—although a large number of "rumours" have subsequently proved true, as evidenced this week in relation to the Department of National Defence—that there is going to be a further cut in the establishment of our naval vessels. That matter was mentioned on the radio this morning.

There is another matter on which we should have some reassurance. We should know what alternative arrangements, if any, have been made following the decision to close the rescue station at Torbay, Newfoundland. Is the same degree of service to be provided? How are these necessary activities to be continued. Proposals have also been made to close down certain airfields. I think the savings which will follow are purely illusory. We regret the transfer of jurisdiction over the airfields at Resolute Bay, Churchill and, possibly, St. Hubert, though I am mainly concerned about the two in the north. I think this is a mistake. I do not think there will be any real saving and I believe it would be far better to allow those northern airfields to continue to be occupied and run by our armed forces.

There is another so-called economy which the minister has talked about and which causes us on this side of the committee some concern. It involves the transfer to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys of work done by the photographic section of the R.C.A.F. It would seem to me that this branch of the R.C.A.F. should have been kept in being, not scrapped in response to some short term economic need.

We should like to hear some explanation from the minister, particularly in the light of what has been said by the associate minister, as to the probable date by which the Starfighters will be armed. We should also like to hear his views on whether it was wise or unwise to withdraw all our interceptors from their bases in Europe at a time when the Starfighters were a long way from being operational.

The minister has given his explanation of the cancellation of the frigate program. He has not said what is to become of our shipyards if the number of our naval vessels is to be reduced. Fewer vessels would be requiring repair and the result would be that shipyards which specialize in naval work would be unable to keep their staffs together. Attention should have been given to this problem earlier. Indeed, that should have been done before the destroyer escort frigate plan was cancelled.

I should also be interested to hear the minister tell us something about Canada's plans in connection with antisubmarine warfare. We know that under NATO there is an antisubmarine warfare research centre. We should like to know what part Canada is taking in the work of this centre and whether enough research work has been done to set some guide-lines so that we can start on a naval policy again before our naval shipyards have been completely destroyed.

The minister talked about savings—illusory savings, I think they are, for the most part, though I hope some of them are real. He has been talking about transferring various jobs from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Transport. I should like to suggest a job that we could transfer from one department to the other, and we could get on with it quickly, because the plans are already made. I refer to the rebuilding of a merchant navy, a task which would help shipyards all over Canada. Everywhere we go, in the defence committee and elsewhere, we hear talk about the need for mobility, the need to be able to move men and equipment rapidly. The United States is building a large fleet of specialized merchant ships. The British have a new merchant ship which can be easily converted to troop transportation. If we wish to shift some of the burdens which the Department of National Defence is now carrying, why not tell the Department of Transport to go ahead and provide Canada with ten modern merchant vessels which could be easily converted to use in time of war and which could supply our northern stations in summer? Why not do this? It is a positive plan of action and it would save us foreign exchange because we would not have to pay so much out on foreign charters.

The minister spoke of giving those whose jobs will become redundant as much warning as possible. I suggest that his statement with regard to the radar station, leaving it in doubt whether it would be closed or not, is bound to have a most unsettling effect on those directly concerned. If the minister is not yet ready to make an announcement it is unfortunate that the news was allowed to get out. The same applies to the reduction in our naval forces, which he foreshadowed.

The minister based his programs on ability to obtain worth-while economies. I suggest he could have found other fields for economies during the eight months in which he has held office. He could have found some of them by reading parts of the Glassco report. I would be interested to hear him tell the committee what progress was being made in the co-ordination of specialized services within the department. I have in mind the training which is common to those who serve in all arms—vehicle driving and mechanical skills, for example. I believe a much more worth-while saving could be made in this area than may be expected from some of the minister's proposals.

The part of the armed services most severely shaken by the minister's announcement yesterday will be the militia. Out of every ten men now serving in the militia, four are unnecessary—they can get out as quickly as possible. Maybe it works out to nine out of every 20—I did not calculate the percentage too carefully. I would like to remind the minister that the volunteer is the basis of our armed forces. We have never had conscription in time of peace, and even in time of war we have not had more than limited conscription. Frankly, I hope we shall always be able to get enough volunteers to satisfy our requirements for the armed services. We must have a certain facility or knowledge or friendliness with the armed services The minister may quote statistics to show that very few people serve in the militia and then go on to active service. I do not know. Statistics can be used in many ways. But I suggest the fact that we have a good militia and have always had a dedicated and interested militia has made it easier for us to get the soldiers we need for our armed forces on a volunteer basis. I hope that these and related matters will be taken into consideration before these cuts are made. Again, as hon. members know, militia has played a central part, in the last few years, in the operations of the emergency measures organization. Has proper consideration been given to the effect the minister's proposals could have on these arrangements, or is the emergency measures organization going to be abandoned? I think we should have a fairly full and detailed explanation of that point from the minister.

It would also be nice if the minister would give us a little of his thinking on future policy. We do not expect him to give the complete policy at this time but he has been fairly free and open at various meetings in expressing his views. I am an avid reader of the Globe and Mail and the Hamilton papers and I have noted that he has made some very interesting disclosures on policy. I should like him to make a few of his random thoughts available to us here in the house, so that we may get some idea of what our future policy is going to be.

In the associate minister's last remarks there was a somewhat disturbing note, because I got the impression that he was speaking of the Honest John and the weapon that will go on the Starfighter in a rather positive sense and more or less saying: You made the arrangements whereby they would be accepted, and therefore we have to accept them. Military history is strewn with discarded armaments, and I would hope that the decision to retain the Starfighter or not to retain the Starfighter and to retain the Honest John or not to retain the Honest John is made on a better and sounder basis than the fact that the previous government in 1959 or 1960 made a commitment. I trust that there is more logic and reason to the basis of the government's policy than is contained in the intimation we got from the associate minister. He looks a little concerned. I may have read something into his remarks that he did not think was there, but that is the impression I got from his final words.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention in taking part in the debate this afternoon to try to cover the waterfront with regard to the Department of National Defence. I thought I might confine my remarks to a subject with which I have had the occasion to become fairly familiar in the last year and that is the Canadian role in NATO and, more particularly, the Canadian role in the NATO parliamentary association.

I had the honour of being the only member of the house who attended the NATO meeting last year, visited the NATO countries from Turkey through to Norway and again attended the NATO conference in Paris this fall. I should like to give some of the observations I made and the opinions I gathered during these trips.

First of all, may I say it appeared to me that the Canadian NATO parliamentary delegation this year was able to make a much better impression at the conference than the delegation last year. This is not for the reason that was noised about so much in the newspapers approximately a year ago, but in my view came about because of the co-operation shown by the delegates who attended the conference this year. As I say, this is contrary to what happened last year. Unfortunately, some of the delegates last year seemed to be more intent on making political capital than they were in representing Canada at an international conference. I might add that some of those delegates now hold cabinet positions in the government.

I am very pleased to say that this year this was not apparent. The members of the delegation co-operated very well and I think the results at the conference showed that this is the proper way for a Canadian delegation to act when attending an international conference. In fact, the co-operation that was shown by the delegates who attended the conference in Paris this year could very well be followed in this house sometimes, and if it was I think we could accomplish much more than we seem to have over the last three or four months.

With regard to the visit in September to the various NATO countries, I cannot emphasize too much the importance of a trip of this kind from the point of view of its educational value to people who are interested in NATO. The trip, while a very hurried one, enabled the delegates to visit all these countries and to see at first hand things that before they had only heard about in speeches or read about in books. It also enabled us to see just what NATO means to these various countries. It is all very well for us to sit back some 3,000 miles away and debate the obvious shortcomings of NATO, but when you visit these countries and places and talk to both elected representatives and people from every walk of life you get a much better picture of just what NATO means to the various NATO countries.

There is something else that in my opinion we can and should learn, if we really want to take our proper role in NATO. We can learn about some of the things that are going on in some of these countries. We know that only 20 years ago many of these European countries were desolated and completely smashed. They had been overrun and completely subjugated. I should like hon. members to stop and think for a moment just what that does to the morale and pride of a country. Yet we find that in the short span of 20 years these countries have picked themselves up and have raised themselves to the point where today they have a higher standard of living than we have in Canada, which has had none of the problems to overcome that many of these countries have had.

We find, for example, that in a period of three years West Germany had to import over 800,000 Italian workers to fill jobs. We find that West Germany has a government agency whose task is to recruit workers in various countries to try to fill the jobs that industry is providing in that country today. Now that Italy is booming and the source of supply is dried up there, this agency has had to go to such countries as Turkey, Greece, Spain and Portugal, and according to the last information I have the agency was still running some 50,000 workers behind the demands of industry in West Germany. These are some of the things we can learn, bring back to this country and discuss in order to find out where we are falling short.

For example, let me take Norway, a country which had a political crisis while we were there. Some hon. members may recall reading in the newspapers that the government of Norway was defeated about the end of August or the first of September, but contrary to what happens in this country this did not force a general election. The leader of the opposition there was called upon to form a government but his government only lasted for three weeks. The leader of the previous government was then called upon again to form a government. The point I am trying to make is that if we would take a leaf out of their book we would not find ourselves, as we have far too often since I have been a member of the house, fighting the next election on the floor of the house instead of getting on with the business of the country. In Norway elections take place about every four years and in the meantime government continues in the manner I have outlined. In my opinion there are things we can learn from some of these countries.

We can learn from Sweden, Denmark, Italy and Norway how countries can get along very well with coalition governments. We should get away from the idea we have always had in this country that minority governments are a tragic thing, and that no country can operate properly with them.

As I say, when you look at these countries, when you see the standards of living they have and you see the manner in which they have recovered in the last 20 years, you realize that not one of these countries has had a government with a big majority such as we have had during this same length of time. The problem is not whether we have a majority or minority government. The problem is what the government does with regard to the needs of the country. For example, we could see evidence all the way through the NATO conference this year of the almost overwhelming opinion that in the near future Harold Wilson would be forming the next government in Britain and Willy Brandt would head the democratic socialist government of Germany. In so far as Harold Wilson was concerned, this view was expressed by some of the Conservative delegates as well.

If these events occur, then it will mean there will be almost a solid front of democratic socialist governments from Sweden and Norway in the north clear through to the southern part of the NATO alliance, with one or two rare exceptions. Perhaps we will be able to learn whether or not there is any connection between the high standard of living and the obvious prosperity in these various countries, and the form of government that they have. We might then turn to democratic socialism in this country, instead of making it the bugaboo that the old parties and the newspapers of this country try to make it.

It is not enough, Mr. Chairman, merely to learn what we can do. If we are going to participate in NATO, to play our proper role, we must make our own contribution to this alliance. I must say that so far our contributions, other than a very minor military contribution, have not been great. Judging from what has happened in the past, if the Canadian delegates to NATO are wise, they will keep their mouths shut and their ears open in order that they may learn something. If they are not wise, they will open their mouths and display to all and sundry how little they know about this whole situation.

Why is this so, Mr. Chairman? I maintain that the reason for this situation is that we have a wrong attitude towards our participation in this alliance. We have sent new men every year to this conference. We have taken a stand that this is not a serious conference to be dealt with seriously. It is more of a junket by means of which we reward the faithful of the various parties. When it comes time to choose our delegates we look around to ascertain who has not yet had a trip.

I should like to give you two brief examples to illustrate my point. I refer to the hon member for Victoria (B.C.), a man who has a very distinguished background in the naval service of Canada, a man of unquestioned ability. In September he attended one of these conferences and visited the NATO countries from Turkey through to Norway. This year he was chairman of the Canadian military committee to the NATO conference. This hon. member was a member of the parliamentary defence committee, but was told when we were leaving Paris that he was being removed temporarily from the defence committee to make room for somebody else who wanted to go to Europe for a trip. I might add, too, that the hon. member has one other qualification in that he is a supporter of the present government of this country. My point is that if there was one man in this whole delegation who should have stayed with this tour by the Canadian military committee, it was the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.). However, that is not the way we run our business.

I will give you another illustration. Last year the hon. member for Edmonton East was chairman of the Canadian parliamentary delegation to NATO, and again was a member of the tour in September from Turkey through to Norway. This year he was not sent to participate, so no use was made of the knowledge he may have gained last year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what can we, as Canadians, contribute to this conference? I say that we are truly well suited to make a contribution. All we need is men of high calibre who have gained the necessary experience to enable them to make that contribution. We have, traditionally, had a role which we have carried out for the last 100 years of interpreting the United States to the United Kingdom and, in turn, interpreting the United Kingdom to the United States. This should be a land of born diplomats. We have the experience of trying to carry on the government of a vast country made up of two distinct national groups. Possibly this is a poor time to mention this fact, because we do not seem to be doing too good a job of it at the moment. However, I would suggest that if the newspapers of the country would pay a little more attention to the cool heads on both sides and a little less attention to the crackpots, we might not be approaching the crisis we appear to be at the moment.

We have something else, Mr. Chairman, Canada has an excellent reputation abroad. This was brought about, in the main, by the conduct of Canadian troops during two world wars. It has been brought about also, as has been mentioned by several hon. members, by the deportment of the Canadian troops who are abroad at the moment as Canadian representatives in the NATO forces, and other places. We met many people, both in military circles and civilian life, who had only the highest praise for the Canadian personnel who are carrying out Canada's commitment to NATO at the present time. These other countries are looking for something more from Canadian representatives than they have had so far. I should like to give another illustration, Mr. Chairman. We have, in the person of Senator Connolly, a man who has had great experience and who has shown tremendous interest in the NATO alliance. He is well qualified to be chairman of the whole NATO conference, but this will never be brought about until we have delegates behind him who can carry their proper role in the NATO conference. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that these are some of the things we should think about the next time we send delegates.

First, we should choose people who are really interested in the NATO alliance. We should choose people who have recognized stability. We should appoint them for the duration of this parliament, and not just for one trip, be it to Paris, Berlin or any other place. They should continue their interest in this alliance the year around, and not just in the fall when the annual NATO conference is held. In fact, I would like them to hold monthly meetings in order to keep themselves posted on the latest developments in NATO. We should insist upon reports, both to the various caucuses and, by the chairman, to parliament itself, concerning what has been done by our representatives there. We should not hesitate to change any representative if we find he is not carrying out his duties properly. If we want to carry on as we have in the past, just rewarding the faithful with trips to Europe, then let us not make those trips to the NATO conference. Once we recognize the importance of this alliance, once we recognize what we could contribute to NATO and what we can contribute to this country by knowledge gained by NATO, then, and only then, can we play our proper role in NATO, make our proper contribution and make a greater contribution to the service of Canada itself.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, members of parliament are frequently asked why we should place the emphasis we do on this matter of defence. Many members today have had phone calls from militiamen in their areas who have very strong views with respect to the service they have given to Canada and they, of course, regret it has been found necessary to cut back the amount that will be allotted for their own service.

We have other people, good people, who wonder why Canada is spending as much money as it is on defence. I think at the outset I should say the answer I see is that there is in existence a red army of 2.5 million men, highly mobile, well trained, fully equipped with nuclear as well as conventional weapons; an air force which is judged to be considerably over 12,000 aircraft; and a greatly strengthened navy of formidable submarine strength the like of which the world has never seen before. Those are the reasons that we have to look most earnestly at what we are doing in the area of national defence.

I remember back 40 years and have impressions of the military of that day. I was a little boy at that time, but I remember going down regularly to listen to the spritely music of the Royal 22nd band on the esplanade in Quebec, and visiting Repulse, Renown and maybe old Hood whenever they came into port. There was also the summer training at Petawawa and Valcartier, and all this represented the military effort of those days. It was pretty symbolic; but today we have an armoured brigade in Europe which is characterized as the best in the world. I do not think there is any dispute about that. I spent some time with the R.C.H.A. in Soest and I knew this regiment and its state of training in 1941, 1942 and 1943 when its quality and spirit was comparable in many respects to what is demonstrated today at Soest.

We find components of our army, navy and air force in Laos, Cambodia and Viet Nam. We find components of our army and air force in the Congo, and components of the navy and army operating in the Yemen. I mention these only as illustrations of the kind of extensive operation undertaken by our armed services today.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, defence is just one aspect of Canada's external policy, Canada looking out at the world, and here there is something of a contrast that we must face. I think we have three external departments, defence, external affairs, and trade and commerce, and ideally we would be very happy if these three branches of our government, our extrovert reaction to the world, would move in generally parallel directions. But we find they do not, and we deplore this.

The external affairs department takes the somewhat urbane and sophisticated view that we have got to live with everybody, that everybody is reasonably decent, that we want to extend our relations with them and communicate with them, that we want to understand people everywhere, and that the world is not made up of good guys and bad guys, cops and robbers. It is not like that at all. Today it is a case of where we must adjust, influence, make compromises, with the hope of extending the ring of friendship wherever we can.

Trade and commerce has quite a different point of view. There has been an aggressiveness displayed, particularly during post-war history, by both administrations, which shows that it is quite proper in the field of trade and commerce to trade zealously with our ideological enemies and be as good customers as we can with them. We want to give them our wheat in good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over, and we deplore anything like bottles or glass in shipments to them. We are proud of the fact that we are able to move forward with the China Resources Company to important new contracts, and we have new extensive contracts with the U.S.S.R. providing for the sale of some 247 million bushels of wheat and flour. On October 8 Bulgaria signed a contract to buy 3.7 million bushels; on October 29 Czechoslovakia signed a contract to purchase 44 million bushels, and on November 5 Poland signed a contract to buy another 44 million bushels.

I am just mentioning these details because they demonstrate on this side of our external policy, that of trade and commerce, that we have come to regard these people as our very good customers and business friends. There is something paradoxical about the fact that we now regard these people as our good customers, and not as our enemies. I am sure that Canada is in the position of wishing that her external policies, involving trade and commerce and defence, could move along more generally parallel lines. Maybe one day they will.

Why is it we find ourselves in the particular defence posture that we do today? I submit, sir, that if we look at the pattern of the defence structure in Canada we find the only thing we are doing in defence is living up to alliances with our allies, and these alliances have been formed because we consider they are in the best interests of Canada, the free world, and the world at large. Perhaps it would be proper to list them chronologically, in a somewhat different way.

On June 26, 1945, the United Nations was formed, and there are a number of distinguished senior members in this house who actually were there and who can attest to the fact that the purpose of the United Nations was to maintain international peace and security, and to be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends. That was the purpose why so many countries gathered together and entered into the United Nations organization. We remember that this did not work out, and because of the failure of the United Nations to do the things that were its declared objectives, there was formed the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It was established on April 4, 1949. What are the objectives of the NATO allies?

> They seek to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area.
> They are resolved to unite their efforts for collective defence and for the preservation of peace and security.

[Mr. Matheson.]

The parties to the agreement undertake to maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack, and there was this most important undertaking that an armed attack against any one of them in Europe or North America was to be considered as an attack on them all.

Then on May 12, 1958, we entered into the NORAD contract, and there we find essentially the same philosophy but of course on a more local basis. In the documents covering NORAD we find this:

> It was essential, therefore, to have in existence in peacetime an organization, including the weapons, facilities and command structure which could operate at the outset of hostilities in accordance with a single air defence plan approved in advance by national authorities.

I think this was expressed most felicitously by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, on February 20, 1959, when he was prime minister, as recorded at page 1223 of Hansard for that day. He said:

> Under the irresistible dictates of geography the defence of North America has become a joint enterprise of both Canada and the United States.

Mr. Chairman, it has been my privilege to be a member of the special committee on defence, and I have tried to be critical, to discover why it was that we are involved in the relationships and commitments in which we now find ourselves. Looking over the whole pattern of NORAD and its defence structure I cannot see a place where I feel there was a decision taken that was not very well considered, very thoughtfully considered from the standpoint of the best advice available at the time, and taken in the interests of Canada and the alliance. The particular alliance I am referring to here is our special military alliance with the United States. It seems to me it is proper I say this because many of us have asked whether these alliances we entered into were in the best interests of Canada.

In terms of actual material and personnel, Canada's contribution to NORAD may not be very outstanding, but what an amazing thing it is to be part of this tremendous defence complex of scientific and mechanical devices, defensive weapon systems, and dedicated personnel. The fact that our Air Marshal Slemon has been able to serve as deputy to three NORAD commanders shows the respect in which this country has been held.

Looking at NATO now, Mr. Chairman: NATO has been under fire at different times and by different people. I have not seen all the NATO countries but I have been in several of them this summer. In particular as a member of the defence committee, I have asked one question in every NATO country that we visited on this recent trip to Europe.

The question was this: In the event that Canada should feel, perhaps politically, that it was in her interests not to be involved in this particular role, the strike reconnaissance role, the CF-104 Starfighter role, delivering nuclear bombs, if we wished to get out of this role would we be doing a disservice to the alliance? I want to tell the committee, Mr. Chairman, that in every country in which I asked that question I received a very categorical and frank answer—and the answer was yes. This may not be an answer for all time, perhaps, but it seems perfectly clear that this role is an important one, probably dictated by military considerations at a very high level in the alliance.

We wondered, of course—particularly the members belonging to my party—why we got into the business of the delivery of these very offensive bombs. The answer appears clear. First of all, for five out of six years we have won both the team and individual competitions in Europe as flyers of interceptor aircraft. Our boys are just the best flyers there are in Europe. This is recognized. Also this country has had a tradition of political stability and it is appreciated even among our enemies, that we do not want to perform a disservice to anyone or take offensive action against anybody anywhere. I asked this question in the neutralist part of NATO, in Denmark. I asked it in France, with its considerations of force de frappe. What answer did I get—"Yes, this role is significant; it is important". The members of this committee asked this question in Germany and the answer by a responsible German was, "If you withdraw from that particular role, someone has to take it over"—probably Germany. Do you want Germany to take on this role?

If you ask this question in the Nordic countries, what is the answer? It is, "We have recognized it is an unattractive role. We do not have that role ourselves. We do not want it. But if you relinquish this role the fact is that someone else has to take it on; and it is a necessary role". And so say they about the role of our forward brigade. Why is it that one little Canadian brigade, that Alastair Buchan says costs the equivalent of two European divisions, and not even very magnificently equipped, I might say, is so important in that forward position? It is because it is a symbol of the integrity of the alliance, of the strength of the alliance. It is a symbol that North America cares.

Particularly after the ramifications, publicitywise, of operation Big Lift, this is highly important. At this time, it seems to me, we cannot countenance for a moment the withdrawal of this forward brigade from its present role. We know that a brigade cannot stop anything very much; we know that our brigade is right on the front line facing all this Russian strength; but the Russians know there is no offensive intent in a Canadian brigade. I am leaving aside questions of military hardware, questions of tactics, and so on. To me they are secondary to the continued location at the front of our brigade. We cannot fail to recognize the importance of our NATO relationship and particularly at a time of strains and stresses. We may be the factor to change, to alter, to shift NATO's strategy or even to reverse NATO's strategy with regard to the importance of tactical nuclear arms. I believe there will be this kind of shift; at least, I hope there will be.

The heavy reliance on tactical nuclear weapons in Europe I believe has been a mistake. There will have to be shifts to the conventional but they will have to come cautiously at the proper time. The way for these shifts to take place is collectively with leadership from a good ally that does its job superlatively, and Canada is the country that in my judgment can provide precisely that leadership within the NATO family.

I have touched on two of these alliances, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to weary the committee, but I think I must refer briefly, because this is so important, it seems to me, to the direction in which we are moving in the universal alliance known as the United Nations. This trend is highly significant. The U.N. was our first hope in defence. If that alliance could have been successful after 1945, as we all hoped it might, these two and a half million Russian troops would never have been maintained with expensive armour, guns and ultimately nuclear weapons. Had we been able to dispense with the costly defence of Europe, how much richer a world we would have been; how much richer a world in every important sphere. But unfortunately this hope has not materialized. We are still struggling with the hope that the United Nations will one day take over and move into this area which NATO has been compelled to fill, and which in its own sphere NORAD has been compelled to fill.

Our Prime Minister, in his speech to the general assembly on September 19, 1963, gave positive leadership to this principle of universal security with a proposal that could lead to a pooling of available resources and the development in a co-ordinated way of trained and equipped collective forces for United Nations' service to meet possible future demands for action under the blue flag of the United Nations. This was not just a casual speech. We find the then secretary of state for foreign affairs of the United Kingdom, Lord Home, on October 1, 1963, after discussions on this proposal saying:

I want to see the element of improvisation removed from such policing operations, and in particular a start made to strengthen on a permanent basis the chain of command at the disposal of the Secretary General;

The matter was pursued further by our Secretary of State for External Affairs, who on October 18, 1963, said before the first committee of the United Nations general assembly:

The Prime Minister of Canada urged others to adopt similar arrangements and he proposed that there should be an examination by interested governments of the problems and techniques of peacekeeping operations with a view to the development in a co-ordinated way of trained and equipped collective forces for United Nations service.

The Canadian Prime Minister was not advocating a standing United Nations army but rather the more modest objective of co-ordinated national preparations to meet the sort of United Nations requests a number of us have already repeatedly been called upon to fulfil.

We know this is technically and constitutionally difficult, but we know also that there are strong movements in this direction. The Nordic countries which have been happily able to stay out of this nuclear involvement altogether are able to present a nucleus for such a military force. We had the assurance of the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the external affairs committee last night that there was a collective interest in this recommendation. We should move along the lines suggested by Lieutenant General Guy Simonds when he said before the defence committee:

I believe that a role which is suited to a country of our size and having regard to the financial burdens possible to be borne over a lengthy term, would be a tri-service force whose main objective was peacekeeping. I believe its organization should be very much like that of the United States marine corps which is a mobile force complete with all its ancillaries and able to meet what are commonly called brushfire situations.

I think that is what the associate minister of defence means when he speaks of the objective of more balanced, more effective and more versatile armed forces. John Strachey puts forward this view:

The introduction of tactical nuclear weapons to redress the balance between the ground forces in Europe was a wholly unsuccessful move. But this is not to say that they could now be abandoned.

If Canada could play a part in the role of practical nuclear disarmament when such proves possible we would be bringing our defence policy more nearly into line with our other external policy of trade and commerce.

I listened with interest to my hon. friend representing the island of Cape Breton when he went after my colleague, the member from the bigger island of Newfoundland last night. As he was talking I was reminded of the minister in Little Cumbrae on the Clyde, who always prayed for the people of Little Cumbrae, then for the people of Great Cumbrae, and finally for the people of the adjoining islands of Great Britain and Ireland. Thus in our defence policy in Canada we must have regard for the defence of the North American continent under NORAD, and our common defence under NATO, these being our closest and most trusted allies. The democratic alliance of these NATO nations must be kept strong if it is to survive. But we must always bear in mind the ultimate purposes of the United Nations.

I will conclude, Mr. Chairman, with only one comment. Throughout the period of the sittings of our defence committee I personally have been disturbed and concerned with the fact that the proportion of our navy dollar, our army dollar and our air dollar devoted to equipment has declined each year since the Korean war. This decline has been rapid. This has happened under both administrations and it seems inevitable that as we proceed costs tend to increase. The cost of living is going up and we have been on a fixed budget with the result that we have been living on equipment capital in the army, navy and air force to a progressive degree for the last five to ten years.

I do not know what the proper proportion or balance should be. I have asked this question in a number of other countries. In some I have been told that the proportion of each dollar spent on the army, navy or air force should be 50 cents as to equipment and 50 cents as to the rest. In other countries I have been told that it should be something in the order of 30 cents on the dollar for equipment and 70 cents for the rest. But obviously we are compelled to make adjustments, there cannot be a progressive paring of equipment costs without specific displacement of our forces. Our brigade in Europe speaks of two great needs, that of armour and carriers on the one hand and adequate artillery on the other. Our guns at the present time are outgunned by equivalent German or Russian guns by 3,000 metres, and that is too serious a matter to leave unremedied. I know we must look at the whole matter of the militia again. One thing I deplore is that in all these statements which have come down from our service chiefs very little emphasis has been placed on the useful part the militia has played in any of its activities. Perhaps we in the committee have been negligent in not asking specifically for greater information on this question. A number of us have asked questions on the point, but perhaps not with the concentration which was necessary.

I know there are many who wish to contribute to this debate so I will conclude my remarks.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question. With regard to his last statement, had the committee had any advance information that the militia was to be so seriously curtailed, would the committee not have taken this under consideration?

Mr. Matheson: I may say that I am not a member of the steering committee, although the hon. member who asked the question is.

Mr. Churchill: No, I am not.

Mr. Matheson: I am sorry, I thought he was.

Mr. Churchill: I am under the thumb of you people.

Mr. Matheson: I regard the hon. gentleman as one of the important leaders in our committee. I think it is fair to say that as a result of the committee sitting so regularly and having gone to so many places and interviewed so many people it may be that this matter of militia has been overlooked. I am sure we have not yet covered all the ground necessary to give a complete report, and I feel personally neglectful on the matter. I asked questions relating to militia of a number of witnesses, and I know that the hon. gentleman who asked me this question has as well. He has demonstrated the same concern. All I am saying, and I am sure he will agree with me, is that the evidence on the record to date does not give a very compelling argument in favour of the role of the militia. That is certainly the case with respect to the briefs presented by the service chiefs. I think the matter should be re-examined.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question?

An hon. Member: He is not a minister.

Mr. Latulippe: In view of the threats caused by nuclear weapons, is the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson)) not of the opinion that it would be better for us to engage in peaceful pursuits instead of preparations for war, and that our efforts should be directed towards the setting up of peaceful undertakings?

[Text]

Mr. Matheson: In answer to this question, Mr. Chairman, no person more than the members of the defence committee is concerned about peace. Everything Canada has done in defence is designed only to prevent war breaking out. If I may take an extreme view of this defence thinking, it is that expressed by the French people we interviewed, with their idea of force de frappe. When we questioned them about their independent nuclear force as to whether or not it was adding to the dangers, they said no, because it was their insurance that if there is any trouble anywhere in Europe nuclear war would be involved at once and it accordingly followed that this made war absurd. I am not saying that their logic is my logic. It is not. It seems to me that there has been leadership given by the late President Kennedy and Mr. McNamara with respect to the need for balanced response, which perhaps was not quite as clear under the former United States administration. But it was precisely because some Europeans were concerned that the Kennedy administration was soft on making real nuclear war on Russia if necessary—this was the argument made both in France and in Germany—that there has been this proliferation of nuclear arms. I hope ultimately we can get out of this impasse.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: With the hon. member's permission, I should like to ask him a supplementary question. Is he not of the opinion that the first people to benefit from the huge amounts spent on national defence are not the Canadian people, nor those who work for defence production, but rather the moneylenders who, with millions, finance military expenditures.

[Text]

Mr. Matheson: I agree with something said by my hon. friend for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, that if we could put the same brains, capital and energy into other activities than the manufacture of war implements we would be immensely further ahead. I think ultimately that is what we are all working for.

Mr. Willoughby: Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure you that originally it was not my intention to take part in this debate. However, in view of some of the points raised in the minister's speech yesterday I think it might be appropriate for me to mention one or two items in this report. My association with the army and the militia for many years has taught me the importance of these departments, but I want to assure you that it does not qualify me as an expert. I appreciate the importance of his department and recognize that world conditions demand that our defence must be maintained at a very high standard. I recognize that world conditions demand that we be also prepared to assist our allies, particularly in the maintenance of world peace. However, I hope that common sense will prevail in our defence department.

Any effort to effect economy without affecting efficiency is to be commended; I agree with that 100 per cent. On the other hand, we must not be penny wise and pound foolish in this administration. We must ask ourselves what is best for Canada. What can be done to bring about greatest efficiency at least cost? These are my thoughts in the matter, and I believe I was justified yesterday in feeling shocked when I heard it was the intention to close the ammunition depot in Kamloops. The minister inferred in the early part of his speech yesterday that the estimates before the committee had been prepared by the previous administration. I have since had an opportunity to check on this situation and I find the previous administration had never considered the closing of this valuable institution in Canada.

It might not be improper for me to give the committee a brief history of the development of this important station. About 25 years ago, after a complete investigation by the defence department, it was decided that in the interest of Canada ammunition depots should be removed from coastal areas where they were subject to attack and placed at a strategic point of the interior of British Columbia, so as to supply the west coast with the least danger to the source of supply. The result was that the air force, the army and the navy all developed munition storage depots at Kamloops. After the last war, the army and air force depots were gradually closed, and amalgamated with the naval depot. The navy, for its part, spent a lot more money on extending its facilities, and after spending millions of dollars on the project, we now have subterranean storage depots covering a large area—certainly one of the best in Canada, if not the best in the whole country.

Why was Kamloops chosen to be the site of this particular station? It was chosen, of course, because of its advantageous geographical location. Kamloops is not subject to attack in the same way as a station in a coastal area might be. It is situated far enough inland to be relatively safe. Kamloops is a railway centre, a focal point for two transcontinental railway systems, and the hub of an important highways network. It also has a good airport and facilities for seaplanes. Because of its ideal geographical location in a relatively safe area, Kamloops was chosen. The minister said yesterday that the supplies in this depot were to be distributed among other stations. As far as British Columbia is concerned, the only place I can think of where they might go would be Esquimalt. Comox is another possibility, because we understand there is to be a nuclear warhead station there, and there might be provision for this other ammunition, too.

I assure you, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing against Victoria; it is a beautiful place. But Pearl Harbour was also a beautiful place; it was a magnificent place. I do not think it is necessary for me to draw the attention of the committee to what happened at Pearl Harbour. Much as I admire Victoria with respect to the facilities available to the navy, air force and other armed services, I think it must be admitted that, from a defence point of view, Esquimalt is a sitting duck in the event of an attack. I cannot see how we are likely to increase our efficiency if we place this station at Esquimalt and send there the most important part of our whole defence, that is to say, the ammunition necessary to supply our forces. If we do that, I cannot see how we would avoid running the risk of another Pearl Harbour. I certainly hope such a thing will never occur, but the risk is there and I think the committee should take it into consideration.

I do not believe we should be concentrating all our supplies in one basket. We should be considering the possibility of distributing them in other areas in order that one attack might not completely disable us. There is a further possibility that the minister may be considering removing this material to the prairies. To my mind, that would be absurd, an impractical move. Purely from a local point of view, I naturally have an interest in this situation as a representative of Kamloops, but I maintain I am still in favour of economy with efficiency. I do not know whether the step which the minister proposes now to take will constitute a saving. It might not, because the facilities at Esquimalt would have to be increased. Would the new arrangement be efficient? I do not think it would. I cannot see how. This government told us it intended to do a great deal to help relieve unemployment. I hope the minister and his colleagues will give consideration to the fact that this proposal would involve 150 or more employees—their homes, their families, their friends and all the contacts they have made during many years at this depot. I cannot see how this proposal would assist the employment situation.

I plead for economy, with common sense, but I think it important that common sense be exercised in the interests of efficiency and advantage to Canada. I suggest the removal of this depot would not be in the best interest of efficiency, and that it would certainly not be in the best interest of the defence of western Canada. So I must protest against this policy and ask that it be reconsidered. I ask that a thorough study of this question be undertaken. If this is done I believe the information I have placed before the committee this afternoon will be verified, and the conclusion will be reached that in the interest of national defence the station should not be taken to the coast, where it would be open to attack.

In conclusion, may I say I have had many years of association with the militia. I feel it should be recognized that this branch of our armed services is of great importance as a basis for our active forces in the event of war. It is already difficult to obtain volunteers to maintain these militia services. I hope this difficulty will be borne in mind when consideration is given to any curtailment of expenditure in this field. We should make it more interesting for our young men to join this service. We should not be so economy minded as to curtail expenditure to such an extent that they are discouraged from joining. I hope, therefore, that the minister will reconsider his policy in this respect. I think it is important that the militia be retained. I plead for the encouragement of those who serve in the militia, and I do not wish to see any curtailment of the activities of this body.

Mr. Lloyd: In recent weeks, as a member of the defence committee, I have been exposed to a variety of terms which have been strange to me. I do not intend to employ them in this debate on defence estimates today. It might be wise to avoid the use of the term "posture" on this occasion. I shall not detain the committee by employing the various adjectives used to qualify the word "deterrent"—active, minimum, negative and passive. We have heard much about a force de frappe nationale, forestalling blows, cost effectiveness, and similar mysteries. I have also become familiar with Corporals, Honest Johns, Hound Dogs and Davy Crocketts, in addition to such specialized expressions as I.C.B.M., logistics, interdiction and hard bases.

I apologize, if after all this work in the defence committee, I refrain from using these most informative words which have been added to my vocabulary and try to examine, perhaps in a simpler form, the position in which we find ourselves today.

Only three months remain of the current 1963-64 fiscal period. A review of the defence estimates in December precludes any meaningful revisions of the projected expenditures. Our normal calendar of events has been upset by an April election and a change of government. The current year's estimates reflecting the policies of the previous government will not, therefore, produce the usual sharp criticism of the official opposition.

On the other hand, the minister of defence is now engaged with defence policy considerations preliminary to his submission of the 1964-65 estimates. It is a commitment of the present government to revise Canada's defence policy. It has already taken steps in that direction. We are aware of the urgent need to review and revise our defence policy. It arises from serious problems with our balance of payments—current deficit financing, increasing the already heavy burden of interest charges; the needs of the provinces and municipalities for resources with which effectively to perform their responsibilities; the pressing need to remove the tragedy of unemployment, particularly in areas such as Bell Island in Newfoundland and Cape Breton in Nova Scotia. Steps have been taken in this direction in recent months.

We are grateful to the previous government for having established an oceanographic station in my constituency. Likewise, we appreciate what the present government has done in this direction. Some mention has been made during this debate of developments in Cape Breton in connection with the supply of heavy water. Here again, we must recognize an example of the kind of thing that happens to the economy when you start adjusting defence expenditures within provinces, and other provinces engage actively in promoting economic development within those provinces. As an example, I might cite steel in Quebec and steel in Cape Breton. The problem, therefore, stands as one of varied complexity for the government at federal-provincial and municipal levels.

Apart from these considerations, the fantastic cost of defence hardware in this nuclear age compels drastic steps to remove every item of waste, inefficiency and obsolescence within our military forces. It is vital to our national existence, Mr. Chairman, that we contribute to the deterrents within NATO and NORAD to prevent an all-out nuclear war. Under the umbrella of such deterrents we must make our contribution to the police force services of the United Nations. Economic problems in our domestic affairs cannot be neglected. An effective military contribution in alliances with the western world democracies, our trading friends and neighbours, cannot under any circumstances be avoided. Government measures to combat our economic and social problems cannot be undertaken in isolation from defence policy. Changes in defence measures cannot be accomplished without consideration of the far reaching effects on the economic and social affairs of our nation.

Major changes in the character of defence expenditures will, without doubt, shift economic benefits to some areas and subtract from others. Subtraction of the import dollars to cities, towns and regions by this process will vary from minor adjustments to major hazards to their economic base. Despite this, no government can avoid responsibility for combatting the conditions I have described. No government is worthy of the compliments of Canadians that fails to comprehend the realities of our position, and thus shirk its responsibilities.

To clear the decks for action, we require new tools with which to perform our tasks. We need them to meet the social-economic conditions at home. We need them to perform our contributions to the alliances we make with other nations. We have already undertaken measures to that end. There is the economic council, to provide government with advice on economic matters independent of narrow partisan consideration. In the light of that advice and information, we need the Department of Industry with its areas development agencies organized to encourage or establish a stable economic base either in the servicing or manufacturing fields in cities, towns or regions suffering from chronic unemployment and, in particular, those areas that must withstand, now that we have come to grips with this problem of a new defence policy, the shock of changes in defence expenditures.

We need, and are gratified to have, the all-party defence committee to spread among all members and all parties in this house the harsh realities of our necessary contribution to the common defence of the western democracies against the threat of communism. Without doubt, that committee report should be filed with the minister before the issuance of a white paper on defence policy. This procedure is essential if we expect to achieve an acceptable policy without delay and with a maximum of co-operative effort on the part of all members of this house. We need it, to have less than a minimum of goading and gloating over past policies that disrupt and confuse our national sense of direction.

Without the tools of government I have described, without an all-party defence committee in this house of minority government, lacking that prior organization of this house for the important task, any major change in defence expenditures would be disastrous and only compound our present difficulties. Parliament has seen fit to approve of this direction of preparations and of the necessary measures to provide us with the means of a proper approach to our defence policies. Full use of these measures will certainly be the constant concern of every member of this house. We on this side, who are not members of the cabinet, will be aware of the existence of these measures and will apply them ceaselessly through the party caucus and through other means of consultation, to maintain that awareness of the great urgency which exists when you undertake a major change of defence policy. We will do so with good will, because we know that our government's policy is oriented to do just that, but they also need constant awareness from the constituency level. We will welcome the constructive efforts and criticisms of any member of the opposition, like-minded and concerned with the defence of Canada and the objectives we seek.

It is not my purpose at this time to present final conclusions reached from my work as a member of the defence committee. They include an awareness for Canada to stay out of membership in the nuclear club for the production of thermonuclear strategic weapons; the need to participate in the military control of the air space and the ocean waters of the North American continent. The conclusions I have reached on those and other matters of defence policy should be objectively presented first to the all-party defence committee. I can, however, declare that the studies shared with all my colleagues on the defence committee deepen my awareness of one inescapable fact, namely that our nation must share with its friends and allies the heavy responsibility of deterring the ambitions of the U.S.S.R. to force its ideology throughout the world. In that role we are not fighting only for the technological or economic perfection of our free enterprise economic system, we are fighting for the right to continue our efforts to establish the maximum of social justice for our people, in our nation, in our time. We are fighting to preserve the right of self-determination of individuals and people.

It is our duty, Mr. Chairman, to fully grasp the over-all prospect for the decade ahead of us. If we do, we will agree with that distinguished late president of the United States, John F. Kennedy, who stated:

> We are confronted by the challenge of the century. We have no alternative but to take up the challenge.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I shared with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd) who has just spoken, and other members, the experience of being on the special defence committee and going to Europe. As all members know, that committee has not yet made its report and I will reserve, with the degree of self-restraint that other members of the committee have, my detailed comments on defence policy until that committee has had a chance to discuss its conclusions and tries to justify its existence by making a worthwhile report to the house.

I hope it is going to be able to achieve that. If good will, hard work and a nonpartisan approach to our task can achieve that, then I think it will in fact be achieved, but of course I do not want to underestimate the difficulty of the task we have to face, and no doubt we shall have disagreements and draw different conclusions from the same facts.

I would, however, like to make a few observations in this debate. First of all, having had the advantage of this trip I would like to join with the minister and the associate minister, and others who have spoken, and tell the committee of the very excellent impression that our forces in Europe—and I think I should include as well those at Colorado Springs—are making upon those with whom they have to work. In my judgment and from what I saw, we have every reason in Canada to be proud of the high morale and efficiency with which our services are doing the tasks assigned to them.

But, Mr. Chairman, having said that I would like to go on to express my very grave sense of disquiet at the tasks which are in fact being assigned to our forces. I want to address, not only to the members of the special committee, but to this committee and the minister, a plea for a radical review of our basic military policy and military doctrine, on which all we do in defence must be based.

In introducing his estimates the minister has announced, as he calls them, a number of housekeeping items. I do not propose to comment on those. We have also been told, and no doubt quite accurately, that a general review of policy is under way. I hope this review will be pursued and the conclusions which emerge from it will be firmly and courageously put into execution. I think we have already seen from the changes already made—and I do not want to call them minor changes because they are important to a lot of people—some of the difficulties that pursue any government in doing its duty, which is to use as efficiently as it can the limited resources it has for the purpose of acquiring the best possible defence and security measures that can be taken, without regard too much to local or political pressures, however necessary or important those pressures may be. I hope the minister will not be in any way deterred from carrying through whatever conclusions this review leads him to.

In my view the military role of Canada has been based on certain fundamental misconceptions, and I do not mean just in the past. I mean those misconceptions are still to some extent with us. On June 18 last the minister appeared before the special defence committee at its initial meeting and gave us a public statement on the basis of Canadian policy. He said:

> At the same time that the free world has an adequate or better capacity in strategic forces, there remains demonstrable deficiencies in its conventional and tactical capacity in Europe.

Again, as recorded at page 15 of the committee proceedings he said:

> The dependence upon nuclear weapons against both strategic and tactical targets has been brought about for two basic reasons:—the marked superiority in Soviet manpower vis-à-vis NATO forces in being, and the knowledge that the Soviets have similar weapons in operation.

I may say that this observation of the minister was repeated by him at other times and by other witnesses as a basis for Canada's continued acceptance of the so-called tactical nuclear role, both for our strike reconnaissance force and for our army division in Europe.

We are told of the supposed deficiency in tactical nuclear weapons available to allied forces. I asked the minister what these deficiencies were and he quite properly, I presume pleaded that the security consideration made it impossible for him to enlarge on what these deficiencies were.

He also referred, and we were referred to it again and again, to the supposedly vastly superior Soviet conventional force as related to the particular role and effort we should make.

Both of these points turn out to be myths, and policies based on myths are apt to be useless, expensive, and indeed dangerous. Why do I say they are myths? Again I want to refer to the speech that was made in New York on November 18 by defence secretary McNamara. What he said then was not new, but he collected together an account of the development of strategic doctrine and a re-assessment of some of the military facts upon which that strategy had been based. I do not wish to go into all he said in detail. I want to confine myself to those references which are essential to the point I am making, and which I think destroy the very basis upon which the minister told the defence committee that our defence policy rests.

Secretary McNamara, after referring to the tremendous superiority of the strategic nuclear power of the United States, proceeded to say:

> In the field of tactical nuclear weapons, the picture is in important respects similar. The U.S. at present has in stockpile or planned for stockpile tens of thousands of nuclear explosives for tactical use on the battlefield, in antisubmarine warfare and against aircraft. They include warheads for artillery, battlefield missiles, demolition munitions, bombs, depth charges, air-to-air missles and surface-to-air missiles. The consensus is that the U.S. is presently substantially superior in design, diversity and numbers in this class of weapons.

I ask the minister, what becomes of his statement on which he based our policy in Canada—that there was alleged deficiency on our side in tactical nuclear weapons?

Mr. McNamara went on to deal with the other myth, the myth of the so-called massive hordes of Soviet forces in Europe, which requires our dependence on the strategy of the almost immediate capability of tactical nuclear weapons. He pointed out that in fact the some 160 divisions were in fact half that number, that the divisions available were half as large as divisions measured in American terms. He went on to point out that the contingencies which would most likely have to be met were not contingencies of the—and although the hon. member for Halifax has warned us of the danger of using these expressions—dangers of warfare at what are called the lower end of the spectrum, and not in a massive attack to be repelled by the tactical nuclear response, which in itself will assure a holocaust and world destruction.

He added that what we have to deal with, what we have to have a force with mobility and the capability of dealing with, are the troubles at the so-called lower end of the spectrum, the end where relatively minor troubles occur. I suggest that we, in rethinking our policy, have to rid our minds of the myths that have prevailed in the strategic doctrine, and which are no longer the basis of the real facts of the situation.

I want to refer to one other passage in the speech of defence secretary McNamara. He says this:

The fact is that at every level of force, the alliance in general, and the U.S. armed forces in particular, have greater and more effective strength than we are in the habit of thinking we have—and with reasonable continued effort we can have whatever strength we need. I have spoken already of strategic weapons, where the great superiority of the United States is the superiority also of the alliance. In tactical nuclear weapons a parallel superiority exists—and while many of our allies share with us in manning the systems which would use these tactical warheads in the hour of need, it is not unfair to point out that, even more than in the strategic field, the tactical nuclear strength of the alliance is a contribution of the United States. That strength has been increased, on the ground in Europe, by more than 60 per cent in the last two years. Today the thousands of U.S. warheads deployed on the continent for the immediate defence of Europe have a combined explosive strength more than 10,000 times the force of the nuclear weapons used to end the second war.

So I think it is a myth that we have to worry about the need to meet deficiencies in the tactical nuclear field. We belong to an alliance. If we are to have any significance at all in the defence of the world today, it must be as partners in a concerted and dependant effort; but it must be one that gives us a certain freedom to choose that role which makes sense, not to supplement what is already a vast and overwhelming superiority of force; to do those things that are needed, rather than those things that are not needed.

I suggest that nothing could be more foolish than a country like Canada, with relatively limited and small resources, trying to supplement this tremendous mass of power which is deployed in Europe to such an extent that its deterrent effect makes any attempt to use those forces insanity on either side. All the evidence seems to point to the need for conventional, highly mobile troops. One of the things we have learned in our defence committee is that a great many of our planned forces and our forces in being, efficient and able as they may be, cannot be transported to the scene of trouble in time to do any good in the sort of hostility that is likely to break out. We should be hearing about this area and what is needed in it. Our present strike reconnaissance force—and this is something the defence committee will have to consider —seems rapidly to be becoming obsolete. It is highly vulnerable. Unless it were used in a first strike it would probably be destroyed before it could be used at all.

Even in Europe within NATO our real danger is on the fringes, on the flanks, perhaps in Denmark, Norway, Turkey or Greece. There is an urgent need that if some force is to be contributed by Canada to NATO, it should be in the nature of a force that can be moved quickly to where there are trouble spots, to prevent these trouble stops expanding into a full scale war in Europe. I believe that is the sort of thing we should be considering and it is in that sort of field we would make the maximum contribution within the alliance. It surely makes sense to look over the whole field of possible contribution and pick out that which is needed, rather than contribute to that of which there is already a tremendous surplus. We should pick out that field in which Canadian capacity, experience and ability makes it likely that we can make a most important and indeed a very worth-while contribution.

We must learn to relate our defence policies to our international policies. I was at a committee meeting yesterday which was addressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He told us about his desire to enter into discussions with—I think he had already started the process—Scandinavian countries, and with one other unnamed country, to provide standby forces for the United Nations for peacekeeping, for a fire extinguisher sort of role. If we were to concentrate on a highly mobile, versatile, tri-service force that could be moved to any part of the world quickly, we would be fulfilling that major political objective, which is to help to build up not only the regional alliance of NATO but the forces of law and peace throughout the world as a whole.

How can we do this? We are told we have a force earmarked for this purpose. But what sort of a force is it? I think it would take a minimum of 30 days to get it quickly to where it is likely to be able to be used. By that time the trouble would be over or the fire would be long past extinguishment, and peacekeeping activities would be meaningless. We have to concentrate on doing those things which are required and which coincide with the policies we adopt in international affairs. I suggest it is possible for us to do that. We cannot do it overnight, but we must look very, very closely at it. At the present time it seems to me—I was going to say "we were prepared" but in the interest of accuracy I should say we are half prepared, and I adapt the words of a famous United States general, to fight the wrong war, at the wrong place and with the wrong weapons as far as Canada is concerned.

I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver East who complained earlier in this debate that we had never had a defence policy in Canada. Considerable objection was taken to that remark by a good many people, including the former minister of national defence. He said, "Of course we had a policy", and he said he had announced it. I think what was meant was that we had never had a made in Canada defence policy. We have been told this by witnesses who appeared before our committee. We were perfectly agreeable and content at one stage of our history to be part of the British commonwealth of nations, or the British empire, and to fit in with its defence plans. That is the role we were called upon to play. Of late we have been part of an alliance in which the United States of America has been the major and predominant force. I suggest that our policy has been to adopt, almost uncritically, the strategic doctrines and theories current within that alliance. It seems to me that Canada has made and is making a first-rate contribution to the actual execution of military policy within the alliance, and it is high time we started to make a contribution in the thinking-out of the military policy within the alliance.

I believe that if Canadians are able, and undoubtedly they are, to make a major contribution in the execution of policy—an important contribution—it is about time they started making a Canadian independent policy, thought out in Canada, dealing with the whole strategy of the alliance and our part in the alliance. This is what I mean when I say we have not had a Canadian defence doctrine or policy, and we urgently need it. I do not blame the minister for not announcing it at this time. I am sure I would have criticized the minister, as would other hon. members, if he had attempted to give us at this stage a detailed outline of defence policy. But I do believe that growing interest in this country in defence—evidenced I would suggest, if not by the attendance in this debate, by the anxiety of hon. members who speak in this debate—and the fact that at long last we have a defence committee which has been studying these matters, and the review the minister is making, all lead to the position where we are going to develop a policy made in Canada which will involve a role for Canada, suited to Canada, within the alliance. I have no doubt whatever that this is necessary if we are to talk meaningfully at all about defence or security. I believe we are moving toward that end. I would like to finish as I began, Mr. Chairman, by saying to the minister that he should not be deterred from taking a radical and firm view about what is required to be done in this field, in Canada's interest.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, the remarks I have to make on the minister's estimates will not be at all lengthy, but I do want to express my views on defence policy since the minister, in introducing his estimates, saw fit not to do so. Perhaps my views, together with those of other hon. members, as far as defence policy is concerned might assist him when he is preparing his white paper for whenever that might be tabled in the house.

I think there is certainly a vagueness about the defence policy, or lack of policy, which exists in Canada. I believe we should be defining the issues before speaking about what specific forces are required for Canadian defence and how these forces are to be employed. I was very impressed, in the short time I was listening to the evidence given before the committee, and sitting on the committee itself—I refer to the special committee on defence—by the evidence of several witnesses, one of whom I recall saying that Canada had no real defence policy and that the tendency was to slavishly follow —I believe these were his words—the policies advocated and set down in the United States. He separated the defence objective by saying there should be a truly national defence policy and, of course, on the other hand we must also shape our policy to discharge our political commitments with regard to such alliances as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Then, of course, there is the third field that our policies should be directed to, and that is the United Nations and the requirements of that organization with regard to international peacekeeping operations.

From the evidence I have studied in the special committee on defence it seems that what we should be striving to do with respect to the first aspect of our policy, namely our truly national policy, is to provide security for our national boundaries and the seas surrounding them, as well as the air space above our national territories. I think this objective must be established before we can determine what force is necessary to bring about that security of our national boundaries, our waters and air space. From there we can proceed to decide how that force is going to be used; but as politicians at the policy level it seems that our job is to establish the national objective in the first place. Once that has been established the requirements can then be determined in a logical fashion, and then the experts in the defence of our country can use that force in order to provide that security in the best military fashion possible.

I have referred to the second aspect of our national defence policy as our political commitments. I feel that our commitments to NATO are indeed political. What we are doing in supplying forces to NATO is making a contribution to maintain Canadian prestige and having a voice in international affairs. Because as the previous speaker pointed out, a nation of our limited means cannot make any substantial contribution which is going to have any great effect in any international conflict. I believe in that school of thought that concludes that there is no possibility of a limited nuclear war, and that any nuclear holocaust is going to be all out and unlimited. Therefore, the remarks of the hon. member who preceded me are very much in point when it comes to determining the precise extent of Canada's contribution to the international effort through organizations such as NATO.

With regard to the United Nations and our obligations to that organization, as far back as 1945 the right hon. Leader of the Opposition suggested that Canada could effectively contribute to a United Nations police force; and after the passage of almost 20 years it seems perhaps that we should be directing more attention toward promoting the establishment of a permanent United Nations police force to assist in the keeping of world peace.

With those remarks on the over-all defence policies of the government, which I take it will be established sooner or later, I will leave that subject. Certainly we anticipate that the minister will bring down his white paper in short order. The usual procedure as I have been accustomed to it is that before or at the time the minister's estimates are brought before the house we have either studied or are given the opportunity to study the white paper before engaging in debate on it.

The remarks now following will be devoted to the specific announcement the minister made last night in committee with regard to certain housekeeping arrangements, as he styled them, in order to save the national treasury money so far as defence is concerned. The bulk of my remarks are directed toward the air force, because I am more familiar in that area, having spent ten years in that service. I know something of its wartime operations as well as its peacetime operations.

The first observation I have to make concerns the decision of the minister with regard to the auxiliary squadrons. I feel quite strongly that the defence of Canada is going to be primarily an air defence; that any attack Canada would experience will be an attack from the air; that any move by the minister to reduce or diminish the effectiveness of the Royal Canadian Air Force is a move in the opposite direction to that which we are taking. I feel that the transport role of the air force should be enlarged so that it can provide that mobility which so many members have spoken of in these estimates thus far; so that it can provide mobility for all our forces in meeting any threat to our security, whether it comes from the air or from the ground.

The transport arm of the air force has been enlarged in the last few years, but in my view it is far from reaching that stage which provides the degree of mobility which I think essential in order to ensure the standard of security to our national boundaries for which we should be striving. Therefore, I believe the minister's decision with respect to the auxiliary squadrons is wrong. The cut is quite a substantial one. The personnel is cut from 2,200 to 860. It is the intention to retain in the reserve only six auxiliary flying squadrons and their associated wing headquarters, the auxiliary wing squadrons at Vancouver, Calgary, Saskatoon and Hamilton being disbanded. I take the implication from the minister's remarks in Hansard that the reason for this is because these locations at Vancouver, Calgary, Saskatoon and Hamilton do not have other air force services on the units, that it is uneconomic to retain them.

However, I suggest that it is foolhardy to disband them. Not only must Canada's air force be in a position to react immediately to any threat which may come to our national boundaries and the air spaces above them, but it seems to me it is vital for Canadian defence to maintain an effectively trained air force reserve. If we start slowly eroding the foundations of our auxiliary forces in Canada, particularly the air force, we are going to disband completely the effective trained force which would, I feel, make a substantial contribution to any defence effort that the air force might be called upon to make in an emergency.

I believe that the minister's decision to disregard the possibility of jet training at Penhold—although this decision may not have been the sole responsibility of the minister—is wrong. I think the minister will agree that the training facilities in the air force, particularly the quality of personnel performing those training functions, are top line. I do not think that anywhere in the world would be found instructors, officers and men more dedicated to their task. But I think the morale of these forces is deteriorating. One of the reasons, judging from my conversations with air force personnel, is that these people do not know what is happening. They do not know whether they are going to be called upon to continue performing a training role for staffing a nuclear strike force in Europe or for performing a transport role. They are rather vague as to the direction they will be taking in the future.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Progress reported.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING QUALIFICATIONS OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska) moved the third reading of Bill No. S-46, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING POSSESSION AND CONSUMPTION OF INTOXICANTS

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-34, to amend the Indian Act (liquor rights).

He said: It gives me a great deal of pleasure to have this opportunity at long last to move second reading of this bill which has been on the order paper, now, for some considerable time. The purpose of this bill is to remove one of the existing restrictions on the full citizenship rights of the native Indian peoples of Canada.

Mr. Clancy: Explain.

Mr. Barnett: I am often thankful that the attention of the peoples of the world is not focused upon the situation which exists here in Canada with respect to our native Indians as it is upon the southern states of the United States or on South Africa. It is obvious to me—

Mr. Clancy: On a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Yorkton wish to rise on a point of order?

Mr. Clancy: Yes, I do. I have listened to enough nonsense today. This is a provincial matter and the hon. member knows it is a provincial matter. Let him fight it out in his provincial riding.

Mr. Barnett: I would be glad if this were a provincial matter, but unless something has happened of which I am not aware there is still on the statute books of Canada an act known as the Indian Act. As long as it remains there, I believe the subject matter of my bill is very much of concern to members of this house.

This measure, as I need hardly point out, is one which proposes an amendment to the Indian Act. It deals with a minor matter, in a relative sense. Nevertheless, I think it is a subject which calls for action and I do not think much difference of opinion could really arise among members of this house, in this day and age, as to its merits. If hon. members will look at the explanatory notes set out with the bill they will see that this measure seeks to carry out a recommendation which was made to both houses of parliament by a joint committee on Indian affairs presented on July 8, 1961. I think it will be agreed that scarcely any of the recommendations of that committee have yet been implemented.

In relation to some of the other recommendations which have to do with health, welfare, education and the development of human resources, the measure before us today sets out to deal with a topic of minor importance, perhaps; but, in my view, progress along the lines I suggest would represent a further step in enabling our native Indians to enjoy the full rights of Canadian citizenship. The purpose, here, is to make provision for Indian people to enjoy, within a province, the same rights as any other Canadian citizens in respect to liquor laws which are drafted from time to time and put into effect by provincial legislatures. In that respect, this is a provincial matter.

Mr. Clancy: On a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Yorkton rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Clancy: Privilege. This is a provincial privilege. He knows it, as well as I do, under section 92 of the act. All right, if he wants to change the B.N.A. Act, change it now.

Mr. Barnett: I am not sure whether that was a point of order or a question. I might say, in answer to the hon. member, that the purpose of my bill is, really, to place this matter where it belongs, that is, entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has the floor and perhaps he might be allowed to continue without interruption.

Mr. Barnett: As I was saying, this would place the responsibility for the use made of alcoholic beverages by the Indian people where it properly belongs, namely in the hands of the provinces. It would make Indians entirely subject to the ordinary laws of the province in that respect, except that it would substantially preserve the rights of the Indian people to the use of the local option idea as far as the consumption or possession of alcoholic beverages within their reserves is concerned. The bill is completely in line with the recommendations of the committee. It is something which, so far as my knowledge of the situation goes as a result of discussions with the Indian people, meets with their approval and desires. I think perhaps that the actions that are being taken by the Indians in regard to holding plebescites on their own reserves, show that they are interested and concerned in this matter. I think the sooner we get on with the job of implementing the recommendations of this joint committee, not only in this connection but in a number of others, the better it will be.

I was not a member of the house at the time this report was introduced. I do know that the presentation of this report and its acceptance by the house was hailed with a great deal of delight by many Indian people, certainly in my area. They assumed that the approval of the recommendations in the report practically made them law. I felt constrained, as a matter of fact, on several occasions to point out to them that the mere adoption of the committee's recommendations in the house did not mean that the committee's proposals had become the law of the land. I tried to give them some warning, and events certainly have proven me to be right, that it might be some time before the changes which they hailed would become law.

Certainly, I suppose one would have to admit that political events since 1961 might have had something to do with the delay. I suggest, however, that the passage of this bill at this time would constitute a small crumb of acceptance of the committee's report and would, in some respects, be a vindication of the Indian people in this parliament of Canada. I urge, therefore, Mr. Speaker, the speedy adoption of second reading of this bill.

Mr. Clancy: I should like to suggest that this bill be referred to the committee on citizenship, immigration and Indian affairs.

An hon. Member: And provincial rights, too?

Mr. Clancy: It is my right to stand up here and ask for directions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Ian Watson (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has proposed in Bill No. C-34 that sections 93 through to 96A of the Indian Act be amended, and he has proposed that sections 93 and 94 of the present Indian Act be amended to make them applicable only to persons on reserves. The present Indian Act makes it illegal for any Indian in Canada, even off a reserve, to have liquor in his possession or to be intoxicated. The act makes it illegal for a person to give or sell liquor to an Indian off a reserve. I think everyone in this house is in accord that this is a pure anachronism. I think it is one of the many statutes we have on our law books that are neither enforced nor enforceable.

In addition, in Bill No. C-34, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni seeks to repeal sections 95, 96 and 96A of the original Indian Act and replace them with a new section 94 which removes the necessity for the lieutenant governor in council of a province, through the governor in council, proclaiming that subparagraph (a) of section 93, which relates to selling liquor to Indians off a reserve and paragraph (a) of section 94, which relates to an Indian having liquor in his possession off a reserve, so that they are no longer in force. I think all members will agree, that this is a welcome change. Moreover, this amended section 94 proposed in Bill No. C-34, retains the right of the governor in council to make regulations respecting votes and referendums and defining a reserve, as outlined in paragraph 4 of the present section 96A, and also maintains the requirements outlined in section 96A, paragraphs 3 and 5, conditioning the proclamation of the governor in council on a resolution of a band council and upon a referendum of the band in question.

Bill C-34 also eliminates the necessity for a request by the council to the attorney general of the province in which the reserve is situated. This, too, is a needed change and I have no quarrel with the amendments offered by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni so far as they go. I believe the bill is a step forward. I submit, however, Mr. Speaker, that the bill does not go far enough. It is a step forward but it retains, and I do not think this was the intention of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, discrimination, in that members of Indian bands who live on a reserve will continue to be in a position where it is illegal for them to have liquor in their possession on the reserve.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt? I should like an answer to the question which I asked ten minutes ago. It is your duty to advise me if I am out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, I might say that at this point the hon. member is out of order because—

Mr. Clancy: Well, I come back to my original question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that he resume his seat. The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie has the floor.

Mr. Watson (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): In order for me to illustrate what I mean by saying that the discriminatory effect would remain in our laws governing the use of liquor by Indians, even if Bill No. C-34 were adopted, I think I should run through the present circumstances of the Canadian Indian. I am going to start with the Indians in my own riding. I have more Indians in my riding than there are in the whole of the Northwest Territories. The Caughnawaga Indians and the St. Regis Indians have been located on reserves since 1680. I think I am correct in saying that the Indian affairs department was originally set up in 1774 for the Indians who were living on those two reserves. Initially, it was under civil control and in 1816 it came under military control, and then in 1830 it went back under civilian control.

Eventually the present Indian affairs department evolved out of this original Indian department that was created for the Indians in my constituency. Now, the Indians living on the two reserves of my constituency are not faced with the problems that confront many of the bands who live on reserves in the northern areas of our provinces. I think the average wage of Indians living on the Caughnawaga and St. Regis reserves is probably higher than that of any other group of workers in the province of Quebec. The reason for this, of course, is that these men are experts in high steel work and earn a rate of pay that corresponds to the very dangerous work at which they are so expert.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, these Indians who are living in Caughnawaga and St. Regis have a number of problems. These problems exist, I think, perhaps only because of the lack of good will between the Indian affairs department and the Indians living on these reserves. There are no economic reasons for serious problems on the two reserves I have mentioned, yet problems exist, misunderstandings exist and mistrust exists to the extent that during the last federal election only eight people out of over 3,000 electors voted. This, I submit, is a clear indication of the mistrust that has built up on perhaps the two most prosperous reserves in Canada.

Now, if this problem exists in the two most prosperous reserves in the country, surely the situation in those areas that are just emerging from a hunting and fishing economy must be worse. As a matter of fact, indications are that the problems are far more serious for the people in the northern tier of our provinces from Quebec to British Columbia where most of our Indian population resides.

The Caughnawaga situation holds out hope for the rest of the Indians in the country. The Caughnawaga people and the St. Regis people have adapted themselves to our economic system. They have found areas of work in which they can become experts second to none. As a result, and because of a long history of extremely well known representatives from their own bands, and because of their proximity to Montreal and Cornwall, these Indians have developed a very real pride of race, a pride in their achievements and a pride in their Indian way of life. These are some of the reasons that they have been so successful in finding a part to play in our mid-twentieth century economy.

The Indian living on the reserves further east in Quebec and in New Brunswick tend to be in somewhat similar positions to those Indians who are presently emerging from the hunting-fishing type of life along the northern tier of all the provinces. This emergence has become very rapid since the war, and in their new life they are confronted daily with problems of integrating into mining communities and acquiring skills in order to take part in the many industries opening in our northland.

This evolution that has taken place in the last few years has brought our Indian population to a point where, unless we rid ourselves of the archaic Indian Act and—though I do not like to use the word but it is justified in this instance—the archaic administration of Indian affairs, unless we rid ourselves of this antique apparatus then very quickly we will find that Canada will be in a most embarrassing position, although I do not consider this the reason that we should do something about the present circumstances of the Canadian Indian.

As conscientious Canadians we must recognize that our Indian brothers have rights to the same type of livelihood, standard of living, jobs and educational opportunities that all other Canadians have. The Indian affairs department has made giant strides in the last few years towards making educational facilities available to our younger Indian population, but this has resulted in accentuating the problem which exists in the northern part of our provinces of adapting our Indian people to the social standards of the areas in our northland where their future lies.

I can give an example of this. In Chibougamou the local Cree population is emerging very rapidly from the hunting and fishing economy, and yet with few exceptions the local corporations have failed to take on Indian personnel. This is not the fault of the local corporations in Chibougamou, because four years ago an association was set up there called the northern citizens guidance association, composed of members and heads of practically all the mining companies in the area. For four years these people have worked towards meshing the local Cree population with the local mining population. They have achieved some degree of success, but that success has not been the result of any help from the Indian affairs department.

As a matter of fact, they have been unable to make progress in the last two years with efforts to acquire housing for these Crees who are moving in from the Mistassini reserve into the Chibougamou and Chapleau areas. They have been unable to move the Indian affairs department in the direction of supporting the Indians in obtaining national housing loans for the erection of individual homes. The national housing people have indicated they are quite willing to listen to any proposals that may be brought forward. It has been two years now since this proposition was brought to the attention of the Indian affairs department and the national housing people, but so far not a house has been started. This is just an example of the thinking that has been behind the actions of the department over the past few years.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that a fresh wind is now blowing through the department. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has an extremely broad and open mind on the subject, and there have been some changes made in the department which augur extremely well for the future. In fact I am confident the necessary changes will be made in the administration of the department as well as in the act itself. But at the moment, although changes are absolutely necessary in the act and in these archaic regulations, which we are discussing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Watson (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I wonder, could I have the permission of all hon. members to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Watson (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I want to outline my three main objections to Bill C-34, which I have not reached.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, normally no one would disagree, but the hon. member has spent his entire time talking about everything else but the bill, and it would be unfair to the rest of the hon. members who wish to speak.

Mr. Watson (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I understood I had started at 5.20, and I was watching the clock and thought I had until 5.40.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Does the house give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Watson (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Bill C-34, although considerably more flexible than sections 93 to 96 of the Indian Act, is considerably less flexible than what is needed in 1963. I think we are all prepared to admit that the abuse of liquor increases at a rate proportional to the number of restrictions placed upon its use. This was amply demonstrated during the days of American prohibition, and this truism is no less applicable to our Canadian Indians. There is no question that the Indian Act regulations governing liquor must be amended, as must many other sections of the Indian Act to keep abreast of the rapidly changing circumstances of the Canadian Indian.

I am hopeful, as I said earlier, that the present government will decide in the near future to alter the existing liquor regulations applicable to Indians in a manner that will allow Indians throughout Canada to be subject only to the liquor regulations of the province within which their reserve is situated. In order that the transition from stringent liquor regulations to the normal existing provincial regulations should not result in excesses in northern areas of our provinces where liquor regulations have to date been rigorously enforced, I think the minister should be given discretion to maintain certain of the existing regulations in specified reserves, only with the approval of the local band council or in reserves where he was requested to do so by the local band council.

I would submit this is the type of flexibility that is necessary and which is not afforded by Bill No. C-34. Bill No. C-34 would retain the anachronisms that I mentioned earlier. In Caughnawaga, which is a suburb of Montreal, an Indian would still be breaking the law if he invited me into his house and served me a drink.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question. Has the Caughnawaga band not conducted a plebiscite?

Mr. Watson (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): They have not. This is the result of the fund of mistrust that has been built up in Caughnawaga over many years through the lack of a proper approach to Indian affairs. The paternalism that has characterised our Indian affairs department ever since it was initiated has sown the seeds of the very situation that exists. The Indians in Caughnawaga are against voting on any question; it has reached that point. I think it will improve but this is really the reason they have not voted in a plebiscite in favour of liquor, because at the moment they are against voting in general.

I would submit that any regulation which reaffirms the theory behind the Indian Act liquor regulations, which theory really says that the Canadian Indian is not equal to his fellow Canadian, that he does not possess the qualities of self-control and self-regulation which the remainder of the population possesses, is, I am sure everyone in this house will agree, a regulation based on a theory which is without foundation and has encouraged, as it would in any group of people, the very excesses it was designed to curb.

The third major objection to Bill No. C-34 is that it is a piecemeal approach to remedying the anachronisms of the Indian Act and is not what is needed today. We need a general overhaul of both the Indian Act and, as I said earlier, its administration, and I am confident that this general overhaul will be made soon.

Mr. Robert Temple (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill I wish to say that I think its intent is very good. In the explanatory notes it says the intention is that the same rights extended to non-Indian citizens of the various provinces shall be applicable to Indians. I think it is quite fit and proper that Indians should be allowed to have liquor on the reserve, and by "liquor" I mean any form of intoxicant. But if under this bill, as I read it, we allow them these rights, then of course they come within sections of the various acts of the provinces. I seriously question whether we are doing any great service to the Indians of, let us say, the province of Ontario, from which I come, by putting them under the liquor control act. This act is a pretty tough piece of legislation. In the liquor control act practically all the presumptions are against the individual. Nowhere else in our Criminal Code, with the exception of certain offences such as the possession of stolen goods, do we find this presumption of guilt if a prima facie case is shown against the individual.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Temple: Yes.

Mr. Barnett: Is the hon. member trying to suggest that the Indians who reside in the province of Ontario do not come under the provisions of the Ontario liquor control act as well as the provisions of the Indian Act?

Mr. Temple: They only come under the provisions of the liquor control act while they are off the reservation. While they are on the reservation they come under the provisions of the Indian Act.

Mr. Barnett: If that is true, this bill would not alter that situation.

Mr. Temple: To this extent it will, and I was coming to this point. I think I can show that the bill would alter this situation to some extent. I should like to deal further with the presumptions under the liquor control act which apply to the Indian on the reserve as well as to the Indian off the reserve. If you have a bottle and it bears a label saying "Dow ale", as long as a police officer finds you with such a bottle, even an empty bottle or one with very little in it, because of the label on the outside the presumption is that you have a bottle of beer. Then the accused person must rebut this and prove that it was not a bottle of beer.

What is even more serious, I submit, with regard to the liquor control act—and this is something to which Indians on the reserve would be subject and I think it is a disgraceful thing—is the practice in Ontario of having a blanket search warrant. If someone is suspected of being a criminal, under the Criminal Code a police officer or officers must go to the appropriate justice of the peace and obtain a search warrant. But this is not the case under the liquor control act. If any police officer has what he thinks is a reasonable suspicion that liquor of any kind is being held or kept illegally in any residence, officers of the provincial police force of Ontario can go to that home, without having to go to a justice, and can demand entry under this blanket search warrant.

We pride ourselves, and rightly so, on our criminal law and the fact that the individual is innocent until he is proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Under our criminal law there is no question about this, and it is fit, right and proper that it should be so. But we do not do this under the liquor control act. All the presumptions are there; this blanket search warrant is there. The idea of this bill is excellent, but by its implementation we would be further extending what I consider to be a grave abuse. Another question I have in connection with this bill concerns the provisions for voting. It is good that a vote should be taken on any reserve. But what is it to be? Will one vote of more than 50 per cent carry it; or does it require 60 per cent, as is the case in the province of Ontario? As I have already stated, the presumptions under the liquor control act makes it very, very difficult for the individual. The previous speaker stated, and I think correctly, that intoxication increases in proportion to the number of restrictions. It flashed through my mind, of course, that it also increases in proportion to the amount of liquor consumed.

In the constituency of Hastings South, which I have the honour to represent, there is a very ancient and proud band of Mohawks on the Tyendinaga Indian reserve. They settled there many years ago and they have produced some outstanding citizens of Canada. They have produced doctors and engineers, and as a matter of fact one of the medical doctors from that reserve founded the Indian order of foresters and was exceptionally well known in North America.

This concludes my few remarks. The reason I rose to my feet stems from the dislike I have for the provisions of the liquor control act. I think it is absolutely ridiculous that we go along with provisions of an act such as this, which we would not go along with so far as criminal offences are concerned.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, somehow or other this bill has only recently come to my attention. I think I understand the details of it. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and I are not exactly in adjoining ridings but there are many similarities between the two.

[Mr. Temple.]

Mr. Byrne: Blood brothers.

Mr. Groos: Blood brothers of a sort. There is a great deal in this act which to my mind is commendable. There are a number of Indians both in my riding and the adjoining riding. I have a great number of Indian friends. As some hon. members may know, I served in the service of this country with a number of Indians whom I got to know very well. There is little indication in my opinion that, given the chance, the Indians cannot handle their own affairs just as well as anybody else. It seems to me peculiar that if we can accept the fact that Indians as individuals are no different from any individual in other groups, why is it that we cannot accept the idea that Indians as a group are no different from other groups on the matter of liquor? If there is a difference then I think we have only ourselves to blame in that we have in the past taken patronizing attitudes towards them.

Although one point which I like about the bill is that it is a step in the direction of sweeping away these anachronisms, I agree with the opinions expressed by a couple of previous speakers that it does not go far enough. It seems odd to me that we lay so much emphasis on this aspect of liquor. I think more attention should be paid to the other problems Indians have, such as problems of education, employment and housing, which I think are every bit as important, if not more so, as this matter of liquor.

There are some features of the bill which I do not quite understand. I see in the explanatory notes there is a note which says, if I may be forgiven for reading it at length:

> The joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Indian affairs, in its second and final report presented on the 8th July, 1961, under paragraph (b) of heading VII, recommended as follows:
>
> "Liquor
>
> (b) In view of the fact that the possession and consumption of intoxicants off reserves by Indians is dependant on a request by the province, your committee recommends that all existing liquor restrictions in the Indian Act be deleted; and that the same rights extended to non-Indian citizens of the various provinces be applicable to Indians"—

—and this is the important part—

> "—except that the right of possession and consumption on the reserve be granted only after the approval by a majority vote of the band".

This matter of the majority vote brings to my mind the question whether this is to be a simple majority, in which case I do not think it would solve the problem, or—

Mr. Barnett: I wonder if the hon. member is aware of the fact that under the regulations as presently drafted by the governor in council the provision is for a simple majority vote? That is the actual procedure which is currently being followed with respect to votes being held on a great many reserves in British Columbia.

Mr. Groos: Then this is one of the things to which I object. I do not think a simple majority vote would solve very much on a reservation in a matter of this kind. The problems which would be introduced by a very close narrow vote would outweigh some of the advantages it is hoped to gain from the bill.

I should like to repeat the point made by one of the previous speakers that the members of this parliament will be able to assist the government and that in the near future the government will decide to bring in a more comprehensive bill covering the liquor regulations as far as they apply to Indians; and that at that time they will sweep away all restrictions completely as far as liquor and Indians are concerned.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just a word or two before my hon. friend talks the bill out. What this bill seeks to do, Mr. Speaker—and I am sure all three members who have spoken so far will be very appreciative of it—is to undo the damage which the previous Liberal government did when it enacted the present sections in the Indian Act with regard to liquor.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this subject of Indian affairs perhaps, as a member from a metropolitan riding, I owe to my hon. friends in the house an explanation of my direct interest in Indians. Perhaps I should explain that in representing a riding which covers much of the downtown core area of Toronto I estimate that there are between 500 and 1,000 North American Indians resident within my constituency. The agency under the united appeal in metropolitan Toronto which deals with this question is principally the central neighbourhood house, which is a settlement house covering both the area represented by my hon. friend for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) and myself. That house has devoted itself, through Miss Sutcliffe of the central neighbourhood house, to trying to assist North American Indians in the constituency who are suffering particularly from a very low standard of living. Central neighbourhood house has calculated that there are approximately 1,000 Indians within the ambit of its particular area.

It has become very evident to me from listening to reports and from my own observations concerning the conditions of North American Indians in my constituency, that any efforts which may take place in downtown Toronto with regard to these Indians are essentially efforts merely to right a wrong already conferred upon them, to try and correct a situation which should not have been permitted to occur in the first place. It seems to me that in our discussion of Indian affairs in this house one should be concerning oneself about trying to establish conditions in Indian reserves—I think particularly of the reserves from which so many of my constituents have come—whereby these people can be trained and enabled to integrate into our modern industrial civilization. One of the reasons why so many North American Indians in my constituency have been suffering from a low economic standard is because they have inadequate training. In some cases they are unfamiliar with some of the things which to city bred people may seem the most elementary practices of our lives. They are unaccustomed to dealing in a supermarket—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being six o'clock I must advise the house that the hour for private members' business has expired. The house will now revert to that business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

1. Departmental administration including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, for total commitments of $2,529,570,600 for the purposes of votes 1, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40, 45, 50, 55, 60 and 65 of this department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $978,136,600 will come due for payment in future years) and authority to make recoverable advances under any of the said votes in respect of assistance rendered to the United Nations, any party of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or any provincial or municipal government, $3,432,000.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. Nielsen: At five o'clock, when we proceeded to the consideration of public bills, I was speaking about the cut-backs proposed by the minister in air force training and I was making particular reference to the decision of the government in reference to the jet training program at Penhold.

There must be confusion in the government's policy here, particularly with regard to the course being followed by the Department of Transport and by the Department of National Defence in connection with Penhold. As I was saying before the committee rose, I feel it is essential to the defence of this country that we should maintain a healthy and viable training program and a high standard of training for the R.C.A.F. I do not think we can do this if we close down our training establishment and training programs. I have suggested to the Minister of Transport that there is no good technical reason why Penhold could not continue to be used as a jet training base. I suggested to him, and I am sure he has discussed this with the Minister of National Defence, that it would be possible to re-route the three converging radio ranges so as to allow an area of 20 miles around this base in order to permit the training program to continue in this area. I am convinced it is technically possible, if the government is prepared to go ahead with this scheme.

There is no trick about the installation of radio ranges and other such facilities to aid navigation in the interests of commercial flying in this country so as to enable Penhold to continue to operate as a jet training base. Re-routing of this type has been carried out in many areas in Canada where there have been obstructions, whether by mountainous country, by the training of air force personnel or by other conditions. There are three converging radio ranges in the Penhold area and each of these could be re-directed so as to re-route commercial traffic. This would ensure the safety of the commercial traffic and, at the same time, allow the air force to carry out the role which I think it should play in the defence of Canada.

I believe the Minister of Transport said a comparison could not properly be made between the situation at Penhold and the situation at Portage la Prairie. I fail to agree. Though the same circumstances do not exist today, there was a time when Portage did lie within a ten-mile wide radio range of a frequently used air corridor, but the radio ranges were directed so as to allow jet training to continue at Portage. While I am on the subject of Portage I think, with due respect to that particular training base, that the minister might find it in his heart, having achieved all these monetary savings as a result of the cuts he has made in defence expenditures, to spare enough money to supply a little paint for the buildings there, and perhaps to supply accommodation for the painting of aircraft at the base.

I wonder, sometimes, to what extent we realize the complexity of the machinery required to establish and operate a single air force air training base. To me, it is remarkable that the officers and men concerned with the operation of an air training establishment can accomplish their objective with the limited means which, in the recent past, have been made available to them. I should like to make some comments, now, with regard to morale in connection with air training. The air force personnel to whom I have spoken—and it might interest the minister to know I have spoken to air force personnel from one end of the country to the other in recent months—are very unsettled, indeed. I would not say their morale is at a new low but, certainly, it has been affected by the lack of ability on the part of the government to come out with a clearcut policy with regard to training. For instance, short service commission officers do not know whether their commissions are going to be renewed. They do not know because there has been no declaration of policy by the government to indicate where the government is heading with its air force program. I have heard airmen and n.c.o.'s in the air force discuss this matter. They have done so without knowing who I was, and I have heard them say among themselves: Where are we going to go in civvy street now, in view of all these rumours about cuts? Some have been discussing the possibility of going into the commercial air transport field.

I can assure the minister, as I am sure he is aware, of the extremely high calibre generally of the individuals in the air force training program. The engineers, airmen and n.c.o.'s who maintain the serviceability of airplanes used in the over-all air force training program are of the highest calibre that can be found anywhere, and it is a shame to see this deterioration in morale. I think that the minister, through his officials and those responsible in the air force commands, can reassure the officers, n.c.o.'s and men in the air force that there is no need for them to think about seeking alternative employment. This is what they are thinking at the present moment. There is a very distinct deterioration in morale. I have spoken to air force officers, n.c.o.'s and men from Ottawa all the way west and what I am saying arises from recent conversations, not conversations of months ago.

Morale is being very seriously affected, first of all by a lack of announced policy. I am sure it is also going to be affected now because the men do not know where the axe is going to fall next. If reassurance could be given to these very capable individuals who serve in our air force I think there would be an immediate raising of the level of their morale.

I have a word to say about the minister's announcement concerning Rockcliffe. I would hope that his announcement that fixed wing operations out of Rockcliffe airport are going to be discontinued will not affect the continued operation of that airport. I would hope that the minister and the Minister of Transport have had some sort of conversations which will result in the continued operation of this airport for fixed wing aircraft under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. When the minister replies to the comments that have been made perhaps he might cover this point. I am sure he is aware there is a flying club at Rockcliffe and there are other smaller fixed wing aircraft which could use this airport efficiently, provided it is not closed down entirely. I think the Department of Transport should take it over if the R.C.A.F. operation is going to be discontinued.

I am very sorry to see the photographic establishment being done away with. Here is an establishment that led the way in technical skill and ability in photography in Canada, particularly in the role for which it was best suited, that of air photography. It has accomplished more in air photography than any other organization in Canada that I know of. It has led the way not only in Canada but in the world in its operations. It is a sad thing to see this operation being transferred to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. However, unlike other members I have to agree that there should be some homogeneity in photographic operations in Canada and it would seem that this operation could be merged very efficiently with that now carried on under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys program for the air mapping of Canada.

May I say a word about the army militia. I think it is a very sad thing that the minister has announced these great cut-backs in militia establishments in Canada. It seems what his announcement really means is that the emergency measures organization is being virtually forgotten. It means that all the plans which have been developed over recent years to use the militia as a civil defence organization are being abandoned, along with their training in survival operations. So far as unlimited nuclear war is concerned, which I believe is the only result if nuclear weapons are used, the militia has been trained in recent years to meet this specific emergency and by cutting back on the militia units across the country it seems to me that we are very seriously endangering our civil defence organization. I believe this particular cut-back is going to have very serious repercussions indeed.

I would be interested in learning the real reasons for the disbanding of the 107 search and rescue operation at Torbay. It seems to me that this particular unit was performing a very necessary function. Search and rescue operations are essential to the safety of air travel in Canada and, as hon. members know, the search and rescue operation of the R.C.A.F. is the only organized search and rescue operation for all flying in Canada. Therefore I very much doubt the advisability of cutting back one of the key operations in the maritime provinces.

I cannot conclude my remarks without making particular reference to the plans of the defence department as they affect my own constituency. The minister mentioned, as found on page 5456 of Hansard, that an announcement had already been made regarding the northwest highway system being handed over to the Department of Public Works. In making this reference he said that it was not expected that the majority of the present civilian employees would be affected. He hoped that they would all be retained in the transfer.

I have made representations personally to the minister, which I am sure he will recall, urging him to approach this change-over with the idea that there should be a phased withdrawal of army personnel in the Yukon, because what the announcement means is that virtually every soldier and every family of a soldier will be leaving the Yukon. There will not be a single soldier left there. I am sure the minister realizes that this will affect the economy of the Yukon very seriously. What 390 soldiers did, a substantially lesser number of public works employees will be able to do. I do not say that by way of derogation in any way of the ability of the army personnel.

I notice that one of the former commanders of the northwest highway system is sitting in the gallery. He like all his predecessors did an extremely admirable job in the maintenance of the Alaska highway which does not only concern my constituency but some in British Columbia and Alberta as well. At this point I think I should pay a tribute not only to the commanders of the northwest highway system who have been maintaining the highway since 1945, but also to all of the personnel who have not only done such an excellent job in the maintenance of the highway but have contributed very substantially to the growth of the economy and the social life and every other aspect of the development of the Yukon. It is a very sorry occasion to have to see all of these soldiers leave the Yukon after such very close relationships had been established with these men not only on a personal basis but on every other basis over so many years. I suggest to the minister that a phased withdrawal is essential in order to assure the least possible disruption of the economy of the Yukon generally, and particularly Whitehorse where a payroll of over $1 million annually is involved. Certainly, the payroll of the public works personnel will not even approach the payroll of the army. Then, of course, there is the consideration of some 500 school children. I believe the date the minister mentioned in his remarks yesterday was April 1. Well, school does not get out until June, as I am sure the minister knows. It would be my hope that his plans would involve consideration of this aspect so that the bulk of the army personnel would not be leaving until after the school term had been concluded.

Until recently the army has been responsible for the maintenance of the Haines cut-off. The minister of northern affairs, has replied to my numerous inquiries concerning negotiations between the governments of Canada and the United States in a rather belligerent fashion, while the Minister of National Defence has been most co-operative. I certainly do not claim exclusive credit for accomplishing the all-weather maintenance of the Haines road, but I am sure if the minister of northern affairs would admit the truth of the matter, he would see from his files or would be advised by his officials that I have been advocating this course since 1958. I feel a real economy can be accomplished.

I was disappointed to learn yesterday from the statement by the minister of northern affairs that United States equipment will be used and United States labour will be used on a section of the Haines road that is purely Canadian. It seems to me we have unemployed people in the Yukon who could be capably employed in the maintenance of this road. We have the equipment which could have been used, rather than calling upon United States equipment. I know there is no snow-blowing equipment of the capacity of the United States equipment and able to do as efficient a job, but I am sure that Canadian contractors would soon supply that equipment and I am sure that Canadian labour could do the job just as efficiently as United States labour. Perhaps this question might be reconsidered by the minister and his colleagues in the hope that it might assist in eliminating the constant spectre of unemployment which exists not only in the Yukon but elsewhere in Canada, and which has not improved so substantially as to allow the government to spend $127,000 per year in order to encourage United States employment rather than Canadian employment.

Leaving the Yukon for a moment, I must express disappointment in the minister's announcements concerning cut-backs in the army and navy. Canada has only one aircraft carrier and one naval air operation. It seems to me that this has been essential—

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The time allocated to the hon. member has now expired.

[Text]

The Chairman: Order; the hon. member still has a few seconds according to the time which is being kept, not by the hon. member for Lotbiniere, but by the Chair.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry, I did not have my earplug in so I could not catch the French interruption. I should like to conclude, since I have a few seconds, in this manner: it seems to me that these cut-backs the minister is making are going to result in a further drift toward accepting the policies of other nations, particularly those of the United States, rather than formulating our own national defence policy. At the outset of my remarks, I said that we should establish national objectives for defence, and political objectives for defence with regard to belonging to organizations such as NATO, the U.N. force and the like. The announcements by the minister are simply a means of allowing us to drift further and further into following the policies established by other nations, particularly those of the United States. I think this is a very sad state of affairs indeed.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, on the evening of November 11 last I went with some of the members of the defence committee to the Arc de Triomphe. As you know, sir, France's unknown soldier is buried underneath that arch and an eternal flame burns there. De Gaulle had gone there in the afternoon to place a wreath on the grave. When we arrived we could see in the glare of the floodlights the flag of France, the tricolour, filling the whole of the arch. One almost felt that de Gaulle himself had called on the wind to fill out this symbol of the glory of France.

In the next three days we were never permitted to forget the presence of de Gaulle or the glory of France. De Gaulle is by nature an intellectual, rather like the late John Kennedy, and he tends to surround himself with men of keen intellect and tough fibre. The men who briefed us were incisive, tough and confident. All were men of considerable achievement. All felt the same intense loyalty to de Gaulle and to France. They understood their national policy; they believed in it. They knew where they were going and they felt sure that they knew how to get there.

This is what they told us. With the end of the t.n.t. age and the advent of the nuclear age, the principles that govern warfare have changed. Few have bothered to recognize that a new and clearly defined body of logic applies to the subject of war and peace in the nuclear age.

First, whereas it was possible for a nation to engage in a war of limited risk in the t.n.t. age, it is no longer possible today among nuclear nations. War is no longer, as Clausewitz said, an extension of diplomacy by other means, for in conducting nuclear war it is not possible to limit or control the extent of the destruction of national wealth which either or both sides may suffer. In Clausewitz' day in eighteenth century Europe, it was possible to send a small mercenary army against a neighbouring principality and to capture it. Thus, by risking the loss of the mercenaries, a valuable and comparatively undamaged territory might be won. In world wars I and II, the United States risked its expeditionary forces in Europe. These were calculable and limited risks on behalf of their allies and in the interest of restoring peace with all its benefits.

Nuclear arms now nullify the validity of all such military alliances. They are, according to the French, no longer valid or tenable, for the law of limited risk now no longer applies. The nation which goes to the support of its neighbour today may be exposing itself to complete or virtually complete destruction. If a beggar asks you for a franc, say the French, you may give it; if he asks you to risk your life for him you will quickly pass him by.

What country could persuade its people to wage war on behalf of an ally knowing that in doing so it might be inviting 10 or 20 or 100 Hiroshimas on its own soil? Would any president urge such a course upon his people? Would any people follow such a leader who promised, not a limited war of blood, sweat and tears, but total war and eternal oblivion? France does not believe that it should ask an ally to undertake such a suicidal mission on its behalf.

Hence, the first principle to be observed in the new logic of the nuclear age is that military alliances are no longer valid. Collective security has little meaning for nations facing each other with nuclear weapons in their hands. If a nation wishes to survive in the nuclear age it must have its own nuclear deterrent and a delivery system capable of surviving and retaliating, say the French.

That is why, we were told, France has established its own force de frappe and why it will have within a few years a delivery system of supersonic bombers, missiles and nuclear submarines of its own. Moreover, they assure us, no committee of allies will weaken the credibility of their deterrent. France's enemies will know that there is only one will behind the force de frappe, one finger on the trigger.

The second principle of war in the nuclear age is that armies are virtually obsolete in the face of nuclear weapons. An army has strength only when it masses the fire power of its individual members. But, when an army is massed or concentrated upon a narrow front in order to obtain maximum firepower, it also becomes an excellent target for nuclear bombs. Thus, the more it concentrates its power the more it invites nuclear attack and total destruction. An army is a cumbersome and inefficient way of concentrating firepower compared with nuclear bombs or missiles. Armies, therefore, will not hold the same importance as they once did.

In support of their theories the French told us that they were applying 50 per cent of their military budget on new equipment while cutting back on the total numbers in their armed forces. France's army of the future will be a strong army of only five divisions but dependant on the force de frappe if an enemy should attack the flesh of France.

The third principle to observe is that a comparatively small nuclear power like France can deter the attack of a much larger nuclear power like Russia. To illustrate this point the French tell a story, that France was anxious to own Monaco so it threatened to drop a nuclear bomb on Monaco if it did not capitulate. Monaco replied that it too was a nuclear power for it owned a fast plane loaded with two nuclear bombs. France laughed at the temerity of Monaco and dropped a bomb on it, destroying it utterly, but not before the one-plane deterrent force of Monaco took off and dropped its two bombs on Paris and Lyon. Thus France had completely destroyed the valuable prize it had hoped to seize and for its troubles two of its greatest cities were reduced to rubble. Did the great nuclear power win the war against the little nuclear power?

The story illustrates the point that, unless it has a completely impenetrable defence against nuclear attack, it is not rational for a big power to attack a smaller nuclear power, for in doing so the big power is unable to limit the risk involved.

These arguments lead step by logical step to the conclusion that there will be no nuclear war. The world of the future will consist of nuclear powers in balance and non-nuclear powers in ferment.

If these ideas seem strange to members of this house—remember, it is not the first time that de Gaulle has put forward new military ideas. He is one of the most brilliant of modern military theoreticians. In the 'thirties he outlined the principles involved in blitzkrieg warfare and urged their adoption. The French ignored him but the Germans read the book and applied it to France. He warned against dependence on the Maginot line and upon the theory of a static front. Again he was ignored. And when the time came the Germans went around the Maginot line, and France was overrun by fast-paced panzer divisions who had learned what France refused to learn from de Gaulle.

Now let us cross the Rhine into Germany. I do not propose at this time to dwell in detail on Canada's role in Germany where we have our air division and army brigade. What I want to discuss in more detail today is Europe itself in which we Canadians are so heavily committed, and upon which we depend for the security of the free world. For if we understand Europe and the forces at work there we will better understand how to approach the problem of defence.

While we felt in France that we had arrived in a country where the cold war is regarded with life-and-death seriousness, we felt when we crossed into Germany that we had arrived at the front. Twenty of Russia's best divisions are stationed in East Germany and Czechoslovakia. They can attack in force immediately without build-up and without warning—like Pearl Harbour. Forty more divisions are in the satellites and 100 are held in Russia. Yet in Europe we have within NATO only 22 divisions to meet the Russian threat. A Russian thrust into West Germany would immediately involve major cities. From the border of East Germany the city of Hamburg is only 30 miles away; the Kiel canal, 40 miles; Frankfurt 70 miles and Munich 100 miles from the border of Czechoslovakia. Cologne and Bonn are only 125 miles from East Germany and the port cities of Antwerp, Rotterdam and Amsterdam no more than 250 miles away. By striking 200 miles across southern Germany from Czechoslovakia, Russia could bring its armoured divisions face to face with France across the Rhine. From take-off time to bomb release time no city in this area is more than six minutes away from Russian strike planes.

Let us lay these distances out on more familiar ground. To capture Hamburg a Russian division would have to travel no further than the distance from Ottawa to Carleton Place. Frankfurt would be no further away than Brockville; Cologne or Bonn no further away than Belleville; and the coast of Belgium and Holland would be less than the distance from Ottawa to Toronto. Thus, we hold today in Europe no more than a narrow bridgehead upon the great land mass of Europe and Asia.

Some people of good intention, striving for ways to lessen the tensions of the cold war, or seeking means to reduce its costs, have asked why do we not pull our forces back and disengage from the cold war front. On the narrow strip of Europe on which NATO now stands we would have to move back to North America to disengage.

Why not then, hold our troops in Canada and fly them in when they are needed? The American operation, Big Lift, showed the delicacy of matching planes and men from North America with their equipment in Europe. But what would happen in wartime? There is greater likelihood that Russian soldiers would reach our equipment before we could and greet us with a well planned reception.

Why not establish a buffer zone between our NATO forces and the communists? We have such a zone now, clearly marked on all NATO military maps. It is there for the purpose of preventing our boys from inadvertently wandering across the iron curtain, and it is backed by electronic warning devices. This is a voluntarily imposed buffer zone. Why not negotiate a deeper one—say 25 miles on each side of the border, and remove all military personnel from the area? If the average east-west depth of Germany from the Baltic to the Rhine is 100 miles—and that is approximately correct—then a demilitarized zone of 25 miles on the west side of the border would reduce by 25 per cent the depth of the field in which NATO has to manoeuver. At the same time, Russia, making a similar concession would hardly be affected at all, as its depth of field extends to the wall of China.

Germany is scornful of France and its force de frappe. France still follows the myth of national grandeur and sovereignty, they told us. She is draining away the efforts of NATO to establish a strong conventional force and she is using the force de frappe to blackmail her allies. There should be co-operation in nuclear defence and not a drifting apart into separate nuclear blocs, they told us. Our conventional forces in Europe are not big enough to repel more than preliminary probes. Moreover, the loss of Berlin would destroy the whole credibility of NATO to defend the western world. Germans wrap themselves in Wagnerian gloom when they contemplate the cold war. NATO will never get into action in time to save them, they say; and they have written to Mr. McNamara asking him to permit the firing of battlefield nuclear weapons in the very first stages of attack. NATO must strike early to prevent being overrun and to preserve what strength it has, they say.

Much of what I heard in Germany confirmed what I had already heard in Paris. There are not the conventional forces in Europe to do more than hold the Russians for a short time, and the west has no intention of providing them. The United States in fact, is more than anxious to reduce the burden of maintaining a quarter of a million men in Europe. Western Europe is so small that a superior force of fast moving armoured units would overrun it in a week or two. Knowing this, the people of Europe have no intention of delaying the use of battlefield nuclear weapons.

Europe is gearing itself for trip-wire war. The doctrine of measured response in which we North Americans were to be given time to reflect on the war while European cities were slowly reduced to ashes by conventional means has been put aside. Instead Europe is readying for instant nuclear war—not a war in which we wait to be hit first but, if the situation warrants, a pre-emptive war, a war of first strike.

NATO officials are more reluctant than the French or Germans to discuss these cold war facts. They give the outward appearance of being more cautious than some of the fast guns we talked to in France and Germany. But they go ahead with the preparations to carry them out—and so we must infer that they follow, as Mackenzie King might follow if he were here, a policy of trip-wire war if necessary but not necessarily trip-wire war. For example, our own brigade under NATO practices sand table schemes and exercises in which the members of the brigade act as game beaters and bushwhackers to drive the enemy into a position where they can hit him with the Honest John, on a first strike basis.

As for our CF-104, it is singularly constructed and armed to fulfil a first strike role. One cannot imagine its being held in reserve even for minutes, for it is a weapon of such overwhelming power that it must strike first or itself be wiped out by the first missiles from behind the iron curtain. No enemy would let a weapon of such ferocity go unchallenged for a second. By comparison our Voodoos, our Bomarcs, our brigade, are toys. In world war II the first 1,000-plane raid on Cologne went aloft with 3,000 aircraft engines, 6,000 men and 2,000 tons of bombs. It took an hour and a half to pass over the target and it wiped out 935 acres. One CF-104 can carry out a somewhat comparable mission in a few minutes with its little torpedo shaped bomb. Their task, in military language, is to interdict the battlefield—to seal it off—by dropping nuclear bombs on all the eastern approaches to Europe in the first instant of war. In a nutshell, when the CF-104's come home eastern Europe will have been snuffed out.

In our journey through Europe the question was asked again and again: Is there a non-nuclear role for Canada? And each time it was asked we were met with the same enthusiasm a barman might have for a boy scout in a tavern calling for a lemonade. It was obvious from the first day of the tour that we are needed in Europe and that no one expects us to dilute our role there. The French, the Germans, NATO, the British, all made this clear. So in planning our long range defence role there are some conclusions about Europe which we should consider here, for we are involved in Europe.

First, NATO is no longer an alliance grouped around the single deterrent power of the United States. It has become a much looser alliance of nuclear powers including the United States, England, France, and perhaps within a decade some others, including Germany. As Woodrow Wilson might put it if he were here, the future of NATO offers open schism openly arrived at. In such a NATO Canada would not likely be required to carry out a nuclear role on the continent of Europe. But we are needed there now, and for some years to come, as much as we have ever been needed by our allies and by the people of the free world.

Second, because no country can defend itself completely against nuclear weapons, no country will invite nuclear war. The age of limited risk has passed. The age of unlimited and incalculable risk is here. As long as Europe is able to threaten instant nuclear retaliation, as it does now, there will be no war with Russia, for no Russian leader will deliberately risk the instant destruction of the great cities of his beloved homeland. There is real hope for mankind in this fact, for man is learning that nuclear war is suicidal.

Third, with Europe in nuclear balance we may expect to see the cold war fought all over the globe in revolutions, uprisings and petty wars of attrition everywhere. This is where our next and most vital role may be, and it is going to be a conventional and a dirty one.

Mr. Chairman, in Cologne on Sunday we went to the great cathedral which our bombers had spared during world war II, just as theirs spared Saint Paul's and Westminster Abbey, and we heard the choir sing Martin

Luther's great hymn Ein Feste Burg, which I suppose has been sung there for 400 years:

A mighty fortress is our God
A bulwark never failing,
Our helper He amid the flood,
Of mortal ills prevailing.

Hearing it, Mr. Chairman, I felt that we were learning to live in the nuclear age and that there is no reason why Luther's hymn should not be sung in that same cathedral for the next 400 years.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, while we are studying the estimates of the Department of National Defence, I wish to state that I deeply regret the decision of the Canadian government, which asked the United Kingdom to build three submarines at a cost of $33 million. Had this order been placed with our own shipyards, it would have provided jobs for 10,000 workers in Canada. The authorities of Davie Shipbuilding in Lauzon feel that the company might have built the three submarines with slight differences in measurements, as they would probably have been somewhat longer and broader, but their quality would have been better, and they would not have cost more than $58 million.

In my estimation, it would have been a clever move on the government's part, since it would have allowed the Canadian shipyards to give jobs to our workers.

What surprises me also is that Japan filed tenders and offered to build the three submarines at a lower cost than the United Kingdom, without any loss in quality.

I would have liked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), or his associate minister to give us some explanations on that point. I am sorry to see that the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cardin) is not here. I am told he is in Montreal at present. I would have liked him to submit to the house a report on the interviews he had with the various representatives of Quebec shipyards, these same representatives who came recently to Ottawa to protest against the decision taken by the Canadian government to build frigates outside Canada.

I have here a press dispatch published some days ago by Le Devoir and which says:

Sorel workers protest
Workers of the Sorel shipyards are angry at the government's decision to have three submarines built in the United Kingdom. "The contract is for $33 million, and that money will come from the Canadian taxpayers," said this week end Mr. Leandre Provost, secretary of the national shipyard workers' union, affiliated to the confederation of national trade unions.

"By this decision, the government is taking away jobs from Canadian workers and increasing unemployment and job insecurity," he added.

[Mr. Deachman.]

The article continues:

Recently, Ottawa cancelled the building of eight frigates in Canada which were to cost $452 million.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this decision will certainly not help the Canadian government to reduce unemployment.

May I also point out that we would have liked the Minister of National Defence to refer to the position of French speaking Canadians in our armed forces, as well as about what he intends to do to improve the situation at the College Militaire Royale de Saint-Jean.

Mr. Chairman, here are a few statistics for the year 1951:

Number of officials in the Department of National Defence earning $5,000 and over: 88. Number of French speaking officials: 10. Percentage: 11.3.

Here are the statistics for the year 1958:

Number of officials in the Department of National Defence earning $6,500 and over: 502.
Number of French speaking officials: 51.
Percentage: 10.1, that is a decrease of 1.2 per cent.

We would have liked the Minister of National Defence to tell us also whether he intends to study the recommendations made by the federation of Saint-Jean-Baptiste societies of the province of Quebec regarding the College Militaire Royale de Saint-Jean.

1. That the Department of National Defence make legally clear the bilingual status of the Royal Military College of St. Johns and that bilingualism be maintained at that college as we know it at the present time.
2. That be also maintained the ratio of 65 per cent French speaking cadets to 35 per cent English speaking, in each new enrolment at the college.
3. That the Royal Military College of St. Johns be officially affiliated to the University of Montreal so that the curriculum be perfectly suited to the previous training of the cadets.
4. That the full course be given at St. Johns, without the cadets having to go to Kingston to complete their studies.
5. That the Royal Military College of St. Johns be freed from Kingston's right of oversight and constitute a self-contained unit of the military colleges in Canada.
6. That the Department of National Defence make sure that all military and semi-military establishments be provided with school facilities for the benefit of the children of French speaking and Roman Catholic servicemen who are stationed there.

Mr. Chairman, I have learned that the children of our French speaking, Roman Catholic servicemen in Europe have to follow a school program practically identical to the one which exists in Ontario; in other words, the teaching is the same as in that province. In my opinion, this is a serious disadvantage. It is important that children of French Canadian families in Europe should enjoy an education system similar to the Quebec system, because when these students come back to Canada they are confused since they must continue their studies in colleges in the province of Quebec after receiving in Europe an education patterned after the Ontario school system. So, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the Department of National Defence should take the necessary steps to correct the existing situation.

Mr. Chairman, allow me to say a few words about the countries which are producing nuclear weapons and the countries which are accepting them.

In my opinion, to ensure peace and prevent world destruction, it is essential that the non-committed nations, that is those countries which do not produce or store nuclear warheads, reinforce by all possible means the United Nations efficiency in their efforts to maintain peace and security.

Drastic action should be undertaken as soon as possible by such nations. They must present a united front so as to grant extraordinary powers to the United Nations disarmament committee, which comprises at present 18 nations. That committee should, in my opinion, include a greater number of non-committed nations in order to force by all possible means both eastern and western powers to destroy and ban their nuclear weapons.

The nations having and producing nuclear weapons have already committed dreadful crimes against humanity. The after-effects of nuclear tests have shocking crimes to their credit, particularly the pollution of the earth waters and of the air, which will result for generations to come in food pollution.

The so-called nuclear powers which accept on their territory nuclear warheads produced by other great powers are criminal accomplices and jeopardize the future of mankind; they also become satellites of a foreign power.

Mr. Chairman, it is truly shameful that only a short while after the signing of the thermonuclear test ban treaty, which does not apply though to underground testing, certain countries including Canada have accepted the stockpiling of nuclear warheads.

Geographically speaking, Canada is squeezed between the two great nuclear powers. In case of a nuclear war, we would be the target of the enemy and our cities would be destroyed.

At present, radioactive fallout which is perhaps greater in Canada than anywhere else in the world, contaminates our foodstuff.

It seems a good thing for mankind to sign a nuclear test ban treaty since nuclear weapone have already been tested and proven.

The only logical means of ensuring the security of mankind is to give the disarmament committee full powers to stop countries from producing nuclear weapons and to force them to get rid of the stockpiles located on their own territory or that of their satellites as Canada is about to become one. If it had extraordinary powers, the committee could not only make inspections but also find means of destroying those stockpiles by burying them under the polar ice-cap for instance. An agreement could be reached whereby that territory would become the property of the United Nations.

The world might well rejoice because certain nuclear powers have signed a partial test ban treaty. It still remains however, that those countries are going to keep up the production of nuclear weapons and continue doing research work in their atomic laboratories for military purposes.

An embargo on nuclear weapons would result in a sharp reduction of military expenditures which could be earmarked for peaceful undertakings.

As far as military expenditures are concerned, it is estimated at present that all countries of the world spend approximately $120 billion a year for military purposes. This amount represents at least two thirds of the national income of all underdeveloped countries, and about 85 per cent of this total is spent by seven countries: the U.S.S.R., the United States, Great Britain, France, western Germany, communist China and Canada.

As for the use for peaceful purposes of resources released by disarmament, no country should fear it will not be able to put those resources to a useful purpose. Actually, there are so many ways of using those resources, that the real problem would consist in establishing a priority scale. Among those needs, one might mention the increase of individual consumption, more particularly in underdeveloped countries, the expansion of productive capacity, and investments in the social field, like education, housing, health and purely scientific research.

I appeal to all non-committed powers to launch a crusade to that end in the United Nations, in order to rid humanity of nuclear arms and thus ensure an era of true peace in the world.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I shall repeat the words I said during the conference of the international parliamentary union, which recently took place in Belgrade, and I shall also quote a few sentences from the encyclical Pacem in terris by His late Holiness Pope John XXIII:

> Justice, right, reason and humanity—demand—that nuclear weapons should be banned.

and further:

> Peace is a right, peace is a duty, peace is a gift.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Pigeon: No, Mr. Chairman, I want to give the minister, who has become very silent since he became a member of the cabinet, an opportunity to make a speech, because I have come to the conclusion of my remarks, having said all I wanted to say.

Mr. Deschatelets: If the hon. member would allow me to ask one single question—

Mr. Pigeon: No, Mr. Chairman, I am giving the minister the opportunity of making a speech, if he wants to—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member has refused.

Mr. Deschatelets: In a few moments I shall have an opportunity of speaking to the hon. member.

[Text]

Mr. Langlois: I have been listening to some of the speeches and exposes made here this afternoon, tonight and yesterday on the subject of national defence. I listened attentively to the speeches made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra tonight and by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. To his last citation concerning Pope John I could also add maybe that peace is also a state of mind and that you have to make it; it does not just lie on a platter. This is probably the main line on which to conduct the expose I want to give.

I should like to divide it into two sections. First, the position of Canada toward the allied forces in NATO, and the others, and then, Canada and its internal defence. We have an obligation toward our NATO allies, not only because we say we are Canadians and belong to the western bloc but because we owe those countries the help they may need and which we can spare them. It is not only the help we may give them, but also the help we might receive from them. Our participation in NATO is not only important on the military side.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra tonight gave an explanation of his tour with the NATO parliamentarians this fall and I came to the conclusion that he had probably attended the military meetings more than the others. I may say there is a defence committee, an educational and technical committee, a political committee and an economic committee. He was on the defence committee. What I wish to stress tonight is the role of the economic committee, which also belongs in the NATO alliance, and Canada's participation in that field of activity. From the military point of view, as far as I can gather on these NATO conferences and trips such as we had last summer, Canada is well accepted and greeted by the European countries in this NATO alliance. Militarily, yes, but also economically and, maybe further than that, morally. I think one of the greatest forces in the possession of our European allies and friends is the moral support and the hope we give to these people. They feel secure. They feel there is a friendship on the part of Canada, and also, necessarily, on the part of the United States. I am thinking particularly now of Norway and Turkey which are among the NATO allies. Turkey is a country which shares one of its boundaries with Russia. Norway has one part of its boundary on the Russian border. Its people watched what happened in Finland not long ago. They need Canada, morally and also as friends, so as to feel that they are not alone. Friendship is not necessarily extended by military force on the soil of others.

I have had an opportunity to speak with parliamentarians from some of these countries. I think their greatest hope is that Canada will stay friends with them and continue to give support to them. As far as military weapons are concerned, we have not brought in too much artillery to those countries, but we have brought them hope that we would help them in case of an attack by the eastern bloc. When I consider the military aspect, I ask the minister to study the situation of Turkey at this moment, a country which has been drained of its economic resources by a succession of wars for the past thousand years. Turkey has been fighting ever since that country existed. What has it brought? Go to that country and there is one thing that strikes you: If 10 per cent of the national defence budgets in the past had been devoted to developing the country it would not be in the economic state in which we find it today. You cannot drain a country of its resources through continual warfare. I have never known a war bring prosperity to any country; you always pay in the long run. Turkey is one country that has had its share of war and realizes it now. It does not depend on Canada for artillery, but like many other NATO countries it depends on Canada for the economic help we can supply. That has been stressed and I have noted this fact on different occasions. It came to the surface in the economic committee. I found this to be true also in the technical and educational field. These countries need the economic help of Canada and also of the United States because they are all at a low level in that field, in fact possibly more so than they are militarily.

Canada cannot do otherwise but help these people, but we need not necessarily do so with artillery. It would be too expensive for Canada to try to follow some of our allies into the nuclear race. There is one thing that Canada has to be on guard against, that we do not find ourselves in the economic situation Turkey is in now by trying to compete, or by trying to follow along in the nuclear race which is going faster than we can follow it.

We can play a role more or less like Sweden, which is situated between Finland and Norway, is playing, by adopting a neutral attitude toward the military side of things. Mind you, the eastern bloc is possibly more concerned with Sweden being neutral than with Canada being on one side. They understand the position of Sweden and respect it just as we do. Sweden is gaining the confidence of other countries. It has the confidence of Norway, its neighbour, and it has not furnished Norway with any military equipment or nuclear arms of any kind. Sweden escaped the last two world wars and its economic situation is possibly one of the best in Europe. Canada should follow this example of not going too far, so far as military warfare is concerned, but rather emphasizing more the economic help we can give to other countries based on our natural resources and the richness of Canada's own soil.

There is another aspect I want to consider, the internal defence of Canada, with which we possibly feel more at home. The scope is not so wide. We have two kinds of internal defence to face, that of wartime and that of peacetime. I agree that we do need a defence for our country, but in saying that I must also say that we have to have a defence that we can afford. It is all very nice to say that we like the Bomarc, we like the Honest John, we like the CF-104 or the Voodoo, but by the time we get them paid for they may be obsolete. The CF-104 was a very effective weapon, but the United States has since developed other weapons which are causing the CF-104 to become more and more obsolete every day, and possibly by the time we get our CF-104's paid for they will be obsolete. They may be paid for on the one hand, but we still have the debt on the other hand.

So far as Canada's own defence on our own soil is concerned I suggest that what we need is small effective groups of well trained men with up to date, modern, highly flexible, conventional arms, something that we can afford. We think about nuclear war sometimes but I think some of the world leaders fear it more than we do because they realize the repercussions of such a war more than members of this house or ordinary Canadian citizens. Canada cannot afford a nuclear war. We cannot afford to get the military equipment necessary to fight one, so we have to get what we can afford, mobile forces of men well equipped with conventional, up to date arms for rescue purposes and for defensive and offensive needs that may arise. If we have a nuclear war I do not know what we could do with what we have by way of nuclear arms now, so that it seems to me that rather than preparing ourselves to face a nuclear war we should prepare ourselves to face an ordinary conventional war and equip our forces accordingly.

But what about the potential of trained men we have in the country in peacetime? Are we going to have them continue to shine their buttons and march every day of the week? That is all very well in giving them their basic training, but can we not find something else for them to do that would help the country in peacetime? We could train the men in all three of our military forces to help in the case of national emergencies, regional emergencies, conflagrations, which we often have in Canada, and in the case of floods which we also have in Canada. It is true that the army already provides help. The army did so in the sorrowful event that took place when the DC-8F crashed near Montreal. The army was on the spot. But we could use more of the men in the army, navy and air force if they were also trained in that way. We could use them a great deal more. We could give our soldiers specialized training in the commercial field and in other fields. We could give them specialized trade training so that if they did come out of the armed forces they would have a specialty. If there was a war we could then recall these men with their specialties and bring them back into the forces, but in the meantime they would not be wasting their own time and the country's money.

I was looking at an article, which I am sorry I do not have with me, but which dealt with something the minister said and which I also heard about while at the NATO meetings. I refer to the suggestion of bringing all three military forces more or less under one command. The navy, the army and the air force would all be on one base working together and there would be no preferences as between one force or the other. I have heard the minister say that he would like to unify the forces and more or less assimilate them. This might be good in one sense and bad in another. I have heard both sides of the question from military men themselves. This is very suitable for basic training in peacetime. You can afford to have a little conflict, a little bit of friction, between officers in peacetime. However, when war is declared there is no time to have conflict or sparks flying between your own allies, between your own generals. They have to have a common goal. This is no time to have prejudice against one or the other. This is no time to say the navy is better than the army or the army is better than the air force.

It is bad in this sense, Mr. Chairman, that today the tendency is toward specialization. We have had several boat crashes on the St. Lawrence seaway, but these accidents have not been as prevalent as the ones which occur on our highways. I must say that I feel secure when I get on a boat and I know there is a naval captain in command. I feel just as secure when I get on an airplane—

Mr. Nesbitt: A ship, please.

Mr. Groos: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langlois: I know the hon. member was a naval captain who knew his job. I would feel secure if I were to get on a ship and he were the captain, but I would not feel so secure if he were the pilot of an airplane. There are technicians who develop skills in their own fields. If they do not develop these skills, they are not appointed to the air force, the army or the navy. We have to have specialization in machinery, in artillery in the type of warfare that is waged today. We need that specialization. I do not see how you can get specialists when you are going to combine all the forces.

Another point, Mr. Chairman, is the question of promotion. I might be an army officer and I might have a liking for my army colleagues. I see an air force officer who is eligible for promotion and who has the same rank as the army officer. You can be as honest as you want but you can also have a little bit of reconnaissance towards the one fellow. You may push the army fellow, and shortly this will be a cause of friction and the sparks are going to be flying. This is a question that has been discussed between military men themselves. Last summer we were talking to the allied forces in Europe and there was an observation made to this effect. I think the Minister of National Defence should take a little bit of time to inquire into that problem and he may revise some of his ideas on the subject. He did make these comments some time ago.

If you unify the forces, Mr. Chairman, you put everybody on the same footing. I do not see how you can apply this principle to normal human beings without having them feel that they are just a small cog in one big wheel. If we are going to have an effective defence program, we have to have every soldier, from the private to the general, feeling that he is a useful member of the army.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the minister has listened to quite a few speeches. I hope that he will take the best out of them. If I have made any small offering, I am glad I did. However, until somebody tells me I am wrong, I will feel the same way, Mr. Chairman. Before I close, I should like to tell the minister something about national defence problems in my own region. Thetford Mines has been asking since the last war for "menage militaire". Since 1914, two regiments have gone overseas from this region. We were talking about specialization and having competent men available for our armed forces. The asbestos mine in Thetford Mines would be willing to insert a clause in the contract of their employees that all the engineers working for the mine would have to spend some time at a military base before they would be employed. In this way, you would have engineers with military training. If a mining company such as this is willing to co-operate with the government, then I think the government should give some consideration to co-operating on a request of this sort. There are young people in that region who are willing to join the armed forces of Canada but who cannot do so at the moment because the local regiment is training outside in the snow in the wintertime. If it gets too cold they clean out a garage and train there.

You cannot interest anybody in a military career by giving him a glimpse of such a situation. I would urge the minister to look into that situation and do what he can to rectify it. I urge the minister to give consideration to the establishment of a versatile military force with conventional arms. This force could be used for the protection of the country in the event of an emergency. I think we should be proud to be a member of NATO, yes, but we should help the underdeveloped countries economically. I think we would have a stronger alliance, Mr. Chairman, if we had a little understanding instead of having fear. I think the greatest deterrent force is understanding and comprehension and not necessarily military power.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I rise to trouble the committee for a very few moments. Perhaps I might be excused having regard to the fact that the Hagersville army camp that is to be closed falls within the ambit of the riding which I have the honour to represent. In the circumstances, I feel it is my responsibility to state plainly and frankly my position in this matter. I cannot conceal from myself that I am torn between the competing demands of my constituency on the one hand and of the national economy and national defence policy on the other. I acknowledge frankly that public opinion in my constituency is acutely alive to the implications of the minister's announcement. That announcement, I also acknowledge, will set in motion a trying train of consequences both for the riding and, if I may be permitted to say so, for myself.

I realize that in the displacement of these workers some of the older men will be forced to go into a labour market to seek job opportunities where the scale is tilted in favour of younger men. It is in that atmosphere and in the light of these competing demands that I have to weigh the government's decision.

I must state that as soon as I heard the decision I went to the minister and, in the hope that he might delay the necessity of closing the camp, I asked him frankly if there was not some purpose that the Hagersville camp in the present circumstances or in the foreseeable circumstances could usefully serve. The minister, with equal candour, advised me that this camp was no longer essential, and its closure would save the Canadian taxpayers $1.5 million annually, and those savings would not include the cost of maintenance of the physical assets of the camp.

I realize economy must be fundamental in government decisions. It would indeed be easy to shape government policy if we did not have to consider money. Mr. Chairman, it would be easy and attractive for me to be seduced by personal and parochial considerations and therefore abuse the minister with the hope of advancing personal political fortunes. But I would only be deluding myself and my constituents to the realities of the need for economy and to the shifting circumstances of our defence policy.

Every unnecessary expenditure of the tax dollar does a great injury to the country, and a very grave injury. My mind was moved and my opinion was influenced by the knowledge that the minister had sincerely, searchingly and thoroughly examined the situation with the assistance of competent staff. There are increasing demands on the government for more money for social legislation, demands that cannot go long unanswered. There are increasing demands for more money from the provinces, and for a larger share in the tax sharing revenues. In short, we must cut the coat to suit the cloth. Indeed there is a duty upon the minister to cut the coat to suit the cloth, provided of course that the coat covers the wearer.

I should also say I have personally inspected the Hagersville camp on a number of occasions, and this camp has lived in the shadow of this decision for the past two years. I trust my hon. friends across the floor will acquit me of incivility if I draw their attention to the fact that it was only last September that the former government discharged 40 per cent of all civilian employees in the Hagersville camp. That announcement was met with silence from the supporters of that Conservative administration. I took no satisfaction from that announcement. I had occasion to discuss it then, with the associate minister of defence and I accepted his submission that he was moved by the same consideration that moves the present minister, the necessity for national economy.

In these circumstances, and with the greatest reluctance I accept the decision of the government, but I am bound to say that I hope those who are laid off will not become slaves of this policy of economy. I shall be watching with attention and critical interest to see that the government discharges its obligations to those displaced workers.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I listened very attentively to the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand as he indicated how he was going to bear the burden that is now forced on his shoulders in his own constituency. I wish I could share his views that various alternatives suggested by the minister have had the very careful consideration which he attributes to the minister.

I agree with him that economy is essential in any operation of government. At the same time, when you are dealing with the subject of national defence you have to consider the safety of the Canadian people and the country. Money is required for a vast number of things, for welfare purposes and social security, and we know the provinces are eager for a greater share of tax revenues. All those things are well known to us, but there is an overriding necessity on the part of the government to assure first of all the safety of the country and the survival of the people of the country. Otherwise all these other things count for nought.

Consequently my examination of the proposals put forward by the minister are not restricted to the effect that may be felt in any one particular area, but rather the overall effect with regard to national defence. The fact that I remained fairly silent today is no indication that I am any more favourably disposed to the lack of policies of the present government on defence than I was yesterday, but I wanted to hear from the Associate Minister of National Defence and I wanted to see what the attitude of the Prime Minister would be today.

I asked him one or two questions on orders of the day and he rested upon the collective responsibility of the cabinet, which is normal, and consequently he accepts full responsibility for the policies, or lack of policies, now being pursued by the Minister of National Defence. I wanted to come to the rescue of the Minister of National Defence. He is under the gun. I think the Minister of Finance has a pistol at his head and has said to him, "Now, unless I am going to be ruined again twice within 12 months, with the largest deficit in Canada's history, you must cut down."

Every minister of finance looks with a jaundiced eye at the expenditures of the Department of National Defence, but I am surprised that the Prime Minister has not supported the Minister of National Defence. Why did he not resist the pressure from the Minister of Finance, unless the Minister of National Defence is going to say that the ideas he has put before us are entirely his own? If they are, then of course he is open to even greater criticism.

Why did the Prime Minister not protect the minister and the associate minister from the ravening hand of the Minister of Finance? Of course cabinet ministers are expendable and there are other people in the Liberal party who are ready, willing and able to take over at any given moment. So, I appreciate some of the difficulties that face the Minister of National Defence, but I question again these half-baked solutions that have been put before us today.

Yesterday I heard the Minister of National Defence praise the Associate Minister of National Defence. I do not know why he would do it. We accept him in the position which he occupies, but the minister asked us to consider how hard worked the associate minister was and what a great piece of work he was doing. Then today the associate minister asked us to appreciate fully the hard work the Minister of National Defence is doing. So, they patted each other on the back, asked for our sympathy and hoped that we would understand their position. Certainly it was all completely unnecessary. Cabinet ministers have a job to perform; they do not have to be thanking each other for the assistance they receive, or patting each other on the back.

When the Associate Minister of National Defence was speaking I heard this phrase through the translation system. He said, "What we are attempting to do is a housecleaning operation". I wrote it down because it differed a bit from what the Minister of National Defence said yesterday; he said it was a housekeeping operation. If there is housecleaning to be done, I think it should start in the ministerial offices. Let us get things cleaned up there first, because they are certainly on the wrong track with the things they are doing. The Associate Minister of National Defence told us of the tremendous work that is going on: Studies in depth, he said. There are these vast studies in depth going on. I have never been quite sure how you make a study in depth. I suppose the Minister of National Defence and the associate minister have just been skating over the surface all these years and now they have discovered that there is more to it than met their eye when they were sitting over here in opposition. At any rate, they have entered upon studies in depth and all sorts of these studies are going on. The next thing we know, they will be having week-end seminars to determine what is to be done with regard to national defence.

I think all this is a bit of nonsense, putting up a pretence that this is a tremendous problem that nobody had ever looked at before but now these bright people are really making a study in depth and are going to find out what has been happening in the Department of National Defence. Of course they had a lot to learn and I hope they are learning, but I am disappointed that the learning is not proceeding very rapidly. Then there was talk about these comprehensive surveys that are going on. The associate minister said he doubted whether there were three people in the House of Commons who understood the magnitude of the work that was being done by the Minister of National Defence in these comprehensive surveys. I thought there were more than that within the Liberal party who should be given credit for some sensibility with regard to these matters. He was not very favourably disposed to his own members.

Mr. Chairman, it is not good enough. The associate minister—I am sorry he is not here because I dislike speaking about him in his absence, but we may not be back on these estimates again—said that I was now exhorting the government to accept nuclear weapons. I have been doing no such thing at all. All I am saying to them is, get on with the job. This government said that the minute they were elected they were going to make all the necessary arrangements so that the nuclear weaponry would be available to our forces. My accusation is that eight months have gone by and they have not completed the task. I do not know what the answer is to this except a careless indifference to defence matters. If this was what should have been done—and this is what they said last year—why have they not got on with the job? There is not a thing for the Bomarcs; they are sitting there unarmed, gaping up to the sky. If an attack occurred tomorrow, nothing would happen. This is what they were saying last winter, and eight months have gone by and nothing has been done.

They said our Voodoo 'planes will not be fully effective unless they have nuclear weapons. What have they done about it? They say, "Oh, well, you have to sign a general agreement with the United States, and then a technical agreement", and apparently they have done those things; the dates were given to us, August and October. But they are postponing letting out tenders for the missile dumps because it is not the appropriate time to do it. I would be willing to wager that a year will go by before nuclear weapons are available to the Voodoos. This is the speed at which this government is moving.

Then the associate minister was talking about the air division over in Europe and there was an exchange of remarks with regard to the missile dumps. I interrupted the associate minister when he was talking about the missile dumps and asked him a question. He spoke to his mentor about it, and I jotted down what he said. The answer was: "My colleague informs me that the infrastructure that was being built was held up because of the fact that the government"—that is, the Conservative government—"had not agreed to sign any agreement with the United States". I said: "I regret that I cannot accept that statement". The Minister of National Defence said: "It is true, whether you accept it or not". Then I said: "It is not true", and he said: "Certainly it is". This was just one of those friendly exchanges across the floor of the house.

Let us examine the facts, Mr. Chairman. I think it is regrettable when any hon. member misleads the House of Commons. There is perhaps a heavier responsibility on a minister of the crown. The missile bases by the air base at Zweibrücken were under construction last winter. The contract was let by the NATO authorities. This work is being done under the infrastructure arrangement; the associate minister said so today. I saw the commencement of the construction of the missile dump at Zweibrücken in February of this year. I asked about the delay, and the answer was that the German contractor was unfamiliar with the pouring of cement in very severe winter weather—and it was a very severe winter—and there would be perhaps a six months delay in the construction of the missile dump. No agreement had been signed between Canada and the United States. Since that time the construction work has gone on. The associate minister so informed us today, and he said the work would not be completed until perhaps next spring or later. Then he disclosed the fact that the technical agreement with the United States has not yet been signed and may be signed soon.

Where does this leave the Minister of National Defence? He said the delay in the construction of the missile dump at Zweibrücken and the other station in Germany was due to the fact that we have not signed an agreement with the United States. He has not yet signed an agreement with the United States, and the construction was under way last winter and is going on now. I say that the minister misled the house when he said this delay was due to the fact that we had not signed an agreement. Exactly as I said last winter, this was a NATO obligation. NATO headquarters had to make the arrangement. It has nothing to do with Canada at all. We do not own any territory there whatsoever. It is German territory and the agreement was with the Germans. I hope that settles this particular matter and I express the hope that the minister will not continue to mislead the house in this way.

Mr. Chairman, the importance of the subject of national defence is such that there are quite a number of things I would like to say and some answers I would like to receive with regard to this particular subject. I was disposed yesterday to move along very quickly with the estimates of this department, until I heard, examined and considered the statement made yesterday by the Minister of National Defence. I think the disturbing part of his statement, ignoring for the moment the fact that he enunciated no satisfactory over-all policy, was the announcement of the reduction in the reserve forces of Canada. That reduction will heavily hit the reserve forces of the navy, the army and the air force.

I am much more familiar with the reserve forces of the army than with the other two forces, because of 15 years experience with the militia of Canada. I know the minister does not think very much of the militia or he would not take this action. He has an impression, that is shared by other people in Canada, that the militia is an expensive operation and is ineffective. I spent 11 years between the two wars in the militia and I know the attitude. True, there was a depression at that time, but even when the depression was easing and the threat of war from Hitler was hanging over the world the government of Mackenzie King took no effective action on the militia—the non-permanent, active militia. For 11 years I was a member of that militia, but when the second world war broke out the same thing happened as had happened in the first world war: The first people to go to the colours and swear in were members of the militia. In Canada on August 31, 1939, when war was imminent, 10,000 militiamen were enrolled and were doing guard duty on the canals, railway bridges and places which required security protection. In September, 1939 in the city of Winnipeg—and I speak of things of which I am familiar—the Fort Garry Horse, the Winnipeg Grenadiers and the Camerons were enrolling their officers and men. Nearly all the officers and all the senior N.C.O.'s in those three regiments were from the militia. That is the response the militia makes in time of trouble. When the Korean war broke out in 1950 I stood in the armouries at Winnipeg when a troop from the Fort Garry Horse volunteered to serve in the composite force being drawn up by the Department of National Defence.

This business of writing off the militia of Canada completely shocks me. I wonder if these comprehensive studies in depth of the Minister of National Defence have embraced this absolute and worth-while masterpiece by Dr. Stanley of Kingston entitled: "Canada's Soldiers, 1604-1954," which gives the story of three and a half centuries of Canadian militiamen. We have a tremendous background of service to our country. The essential activity of the militia in the 18th and 19th centuries was matched again in the 20th. Why is this Minister of National Defence writing down the militia of Canada? Does he know anything about the history of our country and the history of the militia? In 1840 the militia of Upper Canada showed a strength of 248 battalions, of Lower Canada 178, all told about 230,000 men. That was mostly on paper; it was a muster which they had each year. This is what Dr. Stanley said about it in his book:

> The great advantage of the old compulsory militia system was a purely moral one, the fact that it brought home to every adult male and many an adolescent youth the idea that he was by virtue of his citizenship a militiaman, to whom the country had the right to look for its defence in time of need.

What was true in 1840 is true today in 1963. Why should not everyone in this country be prepared to serve his country? What is wrong with our young men joining the militia and, as some of them do, maintain an interest in it for 20 or 30 years? It is good for them and for their country. We owe more to our country than just the ordinary civilian service, important as that is.

I say that the minister has overlooked the history of this country and has downgraded the militia, and he will destroy the morale of our militiamen. It is hard enough to keep it up; if you weaken the force it will be very hard to sustain morale. Under our regime we were attempting to enlarge the militia because the two ministers of national defence who preceded me had an understanding of the militia, and I supported them in everything they did or said about it. The present minister does not appreciate the militia and he is ruining it. This is the annihilation of the militia of Canada. He is going to stand down, as somebody said this afternoon, four out of ten of the men serving. It means cutting out four out of ten regiments or battalions. This will have a shattering effect in community after community in Canada where people have gladly given this type of service.

Over and above that—and this is even more serious, as mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary North—the training of the militia in the last few years has been toward the question of survival. And let us be realistic and practical about it; much as we deplore war and do not want to see it, we still have to be ready for every type of emergency. We have, of course, to have our strike forces and our men ready and active in the field; and you have to have reserves behind them. But in this age of nuclear war you also have to do something about civil defence or survival operations. Let the minister answer this question: What is he going to do about the 265 columns which have been prepared for civil defence organized into 66 mobile groups? In this age, when the fear overhanging the people of the world is nuclear war launched by missiles against which there is no defence, all we can look forward to is proper survival operations afterwards, and for that we are dependent on the armed forces and on the militia. Because trained, disciplined bodies of men know how to act in time of emergency. We had that situation at the time of the flood in Winnipeg in 1950 when the city was in danger of being completely under water. The people called out were the militia. People from the militia took full charge. I worked for ten nights on the dikes under the command of a major from the militia. You have to have organization, men with training to conduct operations of that nature. There are always events happening in Canada where military organization is essential to assist civilians who are ready, willing and anxious to assist but need to have some direction and some organization so that their efforts are not wasted.

This is what bothers me and it is why I asked the Prime Minister today, who has the overriding responsibility for the protection of the people of Canada—the emergency measures organization, civil defence and survival operations all come under the Prime Minister of the country. and he gets assistance from the Minister of National Defence—

Mr. Hellyer: Not any longer.

Mr. Churchill: The minister says not any longer; there has been a shift of that to someone else. But that does not absolve the Prime Minister from the primary responsibility. He is the person to look to, if this is what is going to happen. Has the Prime Minister agreed to this reduction in the militia? Has he agreed to cutting this organization almost in half, when its main duty in the last few years has been connected with survival operations? This is why I am so concerned over this matter. I think the militia, together with the reserve for the navy and the air force, is essential to assist the service in time of war. But we are faced with other possibilities and we must be ready for them. Unless there are trained, organized bodies of men, what are we to do? It does not matter how much training we may have had as individuals; we are just a group of civilians, a crowd, a mob, unless there are disciplined men who are able to take charge, give instructions and direct operations.

Why has the Minister of National Defence slaughtered the militia? What is he going to save? About $15 million. It is a worthy objective, to effect economies, but let us have the economies in the right place. None of us can foresee the future and we do not know exactly the nature of the holocaust which would occur in the event of a nuclear war. But we have some idea from experiences in the second world war and later, and as sensible people we have to make some provision. We are responsible for the younger generation of this country and for the children, and nothing can be done unless there is an organization. We spent many hours and days when we were the government of this country, trying to work out planned emergency measures. It is not easy, but an organization was gradually being built up. I realize there is not a great deal of public interest in many of the cities of this country with regard to this matter. But that does not absolve the government or the Minister of National Defence from taking action. It does not matter what the degree of public interest may be. There is a job to be done and it rests with the Minister of National Defence to find a means of carrying it out. Having worked this organization up to a fairly competent level the minister now proposes to cut it down and destroy it.

This is not good enough for the Canadian people and this is the most serious accusation I am making against the Prime Minister of this country and the Minister of National Defence. In their avid desire to save money here and some money there, they have forgotten the safety of the Canadian people. I should like the minister tonight to tell us he intends to review this program, to consult with his colleagues and with the Prime Minister and, perhaps, withhold this proposed destruction of the survival operations program for this country. I am quite prepared to pause at this moment and await an answer from the Minister of National Defence with regard to this matter.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope to be able to answer some of the questions which have been raised by hon. gentlemen and then, perhaps, we might pass item one and go on to the detailed items upon which some of the other questions which members of the committee may have in their minds can be answered.

At the outset, I should like to explain the absence of the associate minister this evening. He has gone to Montreal to address the 50th anniversary dinner of the C.O.T.C. of the University of Montreal. In recognition of the brilliant service of thousands of officers who have graduated from that university to serve in our armed forces throughout the years we agreed it was right for the associate minister to fulfil that engagement. May I join in congratulations to the University of Montreal contingent?

I regret the hon. member for Villeneuve is not here but perhaps I might reply briefly to a question he raised in respect to Mr. J. A. Lavoie and his mining claim on lands at Senneterre. The property involved in these claims comprises the lands which form R.C.A.F. station Senneterre. These lands together with other properties required for defence purposes were made available to the Department of National Defence by arrangement with Mr. Duplessis, former premier of Quebec. As required, this department advised Mr. Duplessis of the land requirement at Senneterre on August 10 and on August 11, 1950. However, the provincial department of lands and forests were unaware of the recording of D.N.D. requirements and on 25 October 1950 issued a mining licence. Later, when Mr. Duplessis was informed of the double interest in the lands, he expressed the view that no difficulty would be experienced by D.N.D. as conflict would be obviated by the operation of the requirement that the mining licensee must have consent of the proprietor to go on the land.

It is interesting to observe that the subject lands had been explored and prospected for over 30 years with no active interest by any prospector until the date following D.N.D.'s survey. Further, the application for a mining licence covered precisely the land that had been delineated by D.N.D. as the site for station Senneterre, and following a reduction of the defence department's requirement for land, a similar reduction was requested in the extent of the mining licence properties.

Since 1952, Mr. Lavoie has made repeated representations to the department through each succeeding member of parliament and through the offices of solicitors. In each instance the department has set out its position and invited Mr. Lavoie to come forward with a reasonable and practical exploratory program which could be authorized or, alternatively, to present his claim to the court for determination of its validity. Mr. Lavoie refuses or is unable to do either.

The hon. member for Vancouver East read into the record yesterday some figures with respect to NATO. I expect there was a misunderstanding involved in them and, consequently, I should like to take this opportunity to correct the record. The hon. member referred to the costs of the brigade and the air division, comprising approximately 6,500 servicemen each, as being from $350 million to $465 million in each of the last five years. The cost figures used by the member appear to be those tabled in this house but I wish to point out that they include the cost of the ships and aircraft assigned to the supreme allied commander, the expenditures for mutual aid including contributions to infrastructure and NATO budgets, as well as the costs of the brigade and the air division.

The hon. member for Calgary North wished to have some further information with reference to the closing down of R.C.A.F. station, Calgary. I regret he is not here at this moment, but I may say that the flying field at this station, is a small one, built during the second world war, which cannot be used by the Tudor jet trainer to be introduced in 1964 in place of the Harvards. It would therefore be necessary to spend several millions of dollars on a major runway reconstruction project to continue the use of this field and the inherent facilities associated with it.

As the amount of repair and overhaul business available from R.C.A.F. operations in Canada has been substantially reduced with the discontinuance of NATO aircrew training and the reduction in the number of aircraft in the air defence system, it would be uneconomic to spend large sums on this airfield to maintain a repair facility at this location. These repairs can be undertaken at considerably less overhead cost by other arrangements.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister permit me to ask a question? It has to do with Penhold. The hon. gentleman's colleague, in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, said the decision as far as Penhold was concerned was final. At page 3204 of Hansard the minister gave the impression that before a decision of this nature was made the matter would be referred to the defence committee. Was the matter referred to the defence committee and were witnesses called before his colleague made the statement today that the decision as far as Penhold is concerned is final and that ends it?

Mr. Hellyer: I would have to check the reference the hon. member has made because I am sure I gave no undertaking I would refer the matter to the defence committee.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the minister would allow me to put it on the record?

Mr. Hellyer: You can send it over and I will take a look at it later.

Mr. Woolliams: If you really want it on the record now is the time to put on the record.

Mr. Hellyer: After I have finished you can put it on the record.

Mr. Kindt: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member mind waiting until we get down to the details and I have the officials in front of me? I can then answer these questions in greater detail.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) asked if we would permit former members of the naval reserve to use naval facilities if there is no expense to the crown. The question arises whether in fact this can be done within the premise as he has stated it. Presumably in order to use facilities, equipment would be required. If equipment is required certainly there would be maintenance costs involved. If maintenance is involved there are costs to the crown. However, this is an interesting suggestion and we will certainly take it under advisement and see if there is any possibility that it could be done within the terms of reference suggested.

The hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue chastened me for saying first of all that the situation with respect to the air division in Europe is not satisfactory and then not doing something about it. He says I have a responsibility to settle it and to settle it immediately. I intend to do something about it, Mr. Chairman. However, there are two considerations. First of all there is the defence committee report which I suspect may have something to say about the air division and the roles it undertakes in the defence of Europe. Second, any change in configuration in the air division requires consultation with our NATO allies. Under these circumstances it is just not possible for me to make an announcement at this time, even if that were advisable.

He also raised the question of the possible use of nuclear weapons and he gave the impression, which he said he had gleaned from his tour, that these weapons might be used by a brigade commander and presumably without any prior political authorization. This impression must be corrected at once because it is not in accordance with the facts. I am surprised that after all that has been said about the control of the use of atomic weapons some members still seem to be in doubt about the conditions under which military plans for their use are determined. I am sure it is realized by now that American weapons which will be available for Canadian forces remain the property of the American government and their ownership is never relinquished by that government.

American law provides that only the President of the United States can release atomic weapons to the American forces or to forces of other countries which have agreed to use them in support of NATO. This decision at the highest political level is a necessary first decision before any weapons can be used.

Once this decision has been taken to release the weapons the decision to use them in NATO is made at the highest level by the supreme allied commander, Europe. This decision is conveyed downward in the case of the Canadian brigade through the northern army group to the brigade commander, and the decision to release is conveyed downward from the senior American commander in Europe through a unique American communications system to the American custodial party, who retain custody of the weapons until they receive the release authority from the President of the United States.

Mr. Douglas: Is the President of the United States the only political authority whose consent must be secured by the chief commander of NATO?

Mr. Hellyer: He is the only political authority who can release the weapons for use. After he has released them, whether or not they are used depends upon other considerations and the national forces who are part of—

Mr. Douglas: Are the member nations to be consulted?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, they are. If I may finish the statement perhaps we could come back to that later. Before SACEUR would authorize the use of atomic weapons by forces under his command—I think this is the answer to the hon. member's question—he would require to obtain national agreement from the governments of the forces which would be ordered to use the weapons. It can be seen therefore that the impression that Canadian commanders at brigade or lower levels would on their own authority use atomic weapons just is not so. Any such false impression must have been gathered through misunderstanding of the situation.

The hon. member for Simcoe North—I regret that he too is not here—raised the question of cadets for the army, navy and air force. In respect of cadets there are no reductions contemplated. However, with regard to the university naval training detachment, the C.O.T.C. and the U.R.T.P. reductions are contemplated. These will be of the order of approximately 50 per cent and the saving will be of the order of $1,400,000 annually. Discussions will be undertaken with the universities as to how this can best be carried out.

A question was raised in respect of search and rescue. Those activities at present carried out at Torbay will be undertaken by the unit at Summerside. This will result in providing adequate service at a considerably reduced cost. The same hon. gentleman asked why the frigates were cancelled before new programs were announced. As I explained earlier, it was necessary to give notice to end uncertainty in respect of a major program. It would have been unfair to a large number of people to have withheld this information once a decision had been taken. No doubt if it had been withheld an outcry would have taken place.

As already announced, we are doing our best to determine our future requirements to the end that new ships can be laid down just as quickly as possible and in order that we can have the best possible equipment for our armed forces. I agree with the hon. member that the emphasis at this moment should be on research in order that we can be sure of just what future requirements are.

He mentioned the NATO antisubmarine warfare research unit and I should like to say a few additional words about that. The SACLANT antisubmarine warfare research centre at La Spezia, Italy, is a NATO research establishment with a scientific staff drawn from NATO countries. This laboratory conducts research in fields of antisubmarine importance, in particular in applied physics, oceanography and operational research. Currently Canada is supplying on loan from the defence research board the leader for the operational research program. In addition, Canada is providing the chairman for the scientific committee of national representatives which advises on the research program to be pursued by this laboratory.

While talking about research I have an announcement which gives me great pleasure. I am sure hon. members will share my pleasure on reading a statement concerning the Alouette by E. M. Cortright, deputy director of the office of space science of the national aeronautics and space administration, published in the special annual NASA issue of the magazine, Missiles and Rockets, November 25, 1963.

The statement reads:

> Alouette, the Canadian swept frequency ionospheric top-sounder, has had the best test and flight record of any free world scientific satellite. After well over a year of orbital operation the system is working perfectly and has not even employed any of its redundant systems.
>
> At this stage in the experiment, even though only a small fraction of the available data has been analysed, it is clear that a major advance in our knowledge of electron density distributions in the ionosphere has been achieved.
>
> For your further information, the following is an operation summary for Alouette as of local noon, December 4, 1963:

Number of orbits around the earth	5,888
Number of miles travelled,	169 million
Number of commands executed	15,250
Miles of magnetic tape recordings	3,170
Requirement for spare equipments	none

Mr. Fisher: It sounds better than the Bobcat.

Mr. Hellyer: You are right.

Now, I should like to deal with some of the major criticisms of my statement. The hon. member for Calgary North said I was irresponsible in proposing the changes I announced yesterday. I do not agree with this judgment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: That is the most surprising statement of the session.

Mr. Hellyer: On the contrary, I think I would have been irresponsible if I had not undertaken these changes at this time. As a matter of fact, I think some of them might have been implemented several years ago.

Let us put this matter in perspective. Approximately since 1959 the Department of National Defence has had a serious problem. Insufficient money has been available to carry out all of its tasks. Under these circumstances, there were three alternatives available. The first was to get more money from the treasury.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: I see one of my hon. friends, an ex-minister of finance, chuckling at that suggestion. The second one was to defer procurement and development programs. The third was to effect economies and to get a balance of forces, to provide an acceptable division of expenditures between operation and maintenance and capital programs. For national reasons, more money has not been available. There have been, as hon. members know, a series of very substantial deficits. The present Minister of Finance has stated that we will have a substantial deficit this year, and I think it is no secret we will have another substantial deficit next year.

An hon. Member: Carrying on your tradition.

Mr. Hellyer: We are carrying on your tradition. Under the circumstances, it seems unrealistic to expect larger sums of money to be available for defence in the immediate future.

Now, during those years, the option that has been chosen has been the deferment of programs. As a result, we now have an accumulation, a backlog, of about $400 million worth of equipment. If this policy were continued for a few more years, we would have no equipment for our armed forces at all. We would have the best housed, best dressed and best fed but most poorly equipped force in the western world. This is obviously an untenable position. A responsible minister has no real alternative but to reverse this trend. Only in this way can we have not only the best trained but also the best equipped force in the world.

Particular exception has been taken to the reduction in the militia. I am not a historian as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is. My knowledge of the militia back to 1600 is probably not as thorough as his. I do know, however, the historic part it has played in the recent history of this country, and particularly in the first and second world wars. I do admit that in the first and second world wars, without the non-permanent active militia it would have been impossible to mobilize as we did. It was, in fact, the mobilization basis for two world wars. The situation in 1963, however, is not identical with the situation in 1939. As a matter of fact, it is about a world apart.

Our main activity now is the deterrence of war, the deterrence first of all of nuclear war, second, of a major non-nuclear war, right down through the scale to sub-limital war, insurrection and so on. Through this whole spectrum of deterrence, the greatest weapon available is forces in being. The chances of a long major war comparable to world war II, although it is a possibility, is extremely remote. Consequently, mobilization potential of the type relied on in two world wars now has a much lower priority than forces in being. The choice before us, then, is expenditure on equipment for troops in the front line versus other expenditures such as the militia.

This is the choice. In the present situation, we have a brigade group in Europe in the front line exposed to a well armoured, well equipped enemy force, without adequate equipment. We have two reserve brigades in Canada that are equipped with training scales only. This decision taken in 1959 seems to me to be untenable. The choice, then, simply is an expenditure on the militia or on proper equipment for our front line troops.

Mr. Nasserden: Will $15 million do it?

Mr. Hellyer: No, but it would help. This $15 million would buy a lot of M-113 APC carriers. No one likes to make a decision of this nature because it is tough. Nevertheless, hard decisions have to be made. If there is any one element which seems to be lacking amongst some people in this country at the moment it is a sense of realism. If we are going to be realistic, we have to make hard decisions. Everyone applauds them in theory, but not so much in practice. We are now considering the militia on the basis of what real part it would play in a mobilization potential, and with a priority in the scale of priorities which can be applied against modern strategy.

We are also mindful of its potential role in national survival. I think it is a real consideration because notwithstanding the remote possibility of a thermonuclear holocaust, there is at least a mathematical possibility, and this risk cannot be completely ignored. It is our plan to retain sufficient strength to cope with this requirement. It will not require 265 columns, as my hon. friend has suggested. This figure was based on a target system which was completely and utterly unrealistic in present circumstances.

Finally I may say that in respect to the R.C.A.F. reserve units, they too are allied with the militia units in this survival task, and in the reorganization that will take place the target system will be taken into consideration, as will other factors. Unfortunately at present a great number of our columns are in target areas and this is a difficult problem to solve, but I am sure it will be tackled realistically by the gentleman we will ask to assist us in this task.

Finally, the official opposition critic has scolded me for not giving a statement on policy at this time. I suppose his objection, however, is nothing like as severe as it would have been if I had announced the policy now. It is not that I have not been considering policy, because I have, morning, noon and night. It is true that studies have been undertaken, studies in depth and studies in breadth as well. The matter has been given a great deal of thought and I, Mr. Chairman, along with other members of the committee do have some thoughts on this subject.

However, I have been impressed by the work of the special committee on defence. They have been diligent in their work. They have laboured in their efforts to acquaint themselves with the complexities of defence problems and policies based on modern strategy, the differences of opinion in this important fundamental field, and where perhaps a Canadian contribution might fit into the picture. This debate has reflected the new and much higher level of understanding in respect to defence matters which has been acquired as a result of the deliberations of the committee.

I think it is well worth while, therefore, to await their report before making recommendations to the government. If any of the hon. gentlemen opposite do not agree with this point of view, I would hope that in the course of this debate they would indicate that they do not agree with it.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, may I say again how much I regret the period of re-adjustment and uncertainty. I doubly regret the problems posed to individuals and to families. In the broader context, however, these dislocations will pass in time. Meanwhile we will be able to fashion a policy which will not only lift morale to its highest peak but will also produce the maximum and most flexible Canadian contribution to the peace and security of the world.

Mr. Churchill: Would the minister complete his answers by telling us how long the air division in Europe will be unarmed and not ready for immediate action?

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot answer that question precisely, Mr. Chairman, because as has been pointed out there are a number of factors which have to be taken into consideration, including the completion of storage facilities, the signing of the technical agreement, the state of readiness and training of the squadrons and so on.

Mr. Churchill: Then will the minister admit his decision to disband the interceptors was militarily unsound?

Mr. Hellyer: It was not my decision; it was that of my predecessor.

Mr. Churchill: I question the minister's statement with regard to that. He is now making an accusation. Are you meaning me as your predecessor, or the hon. member for Calgary North?

Mr. Hellyer: I was not specific.

Mr. Churchill: You never are. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I will have to make this a question of privilege. The minister has made an accusation which he knows is untrue, and I ask him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Hellyer: If it will please my hon. friend I will withdraw it, but may I say the decision, at least by inference, was taken some time ago because this was part of the phasing out of the old interceptor squadrons, which was directly related to the phasing in of the new CF-104 squadrons, which has been going on for a year and a half.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, although I have a very bad cold and it is very difficult for me to talk, I would like to say a few things which I feel are very important about matters which should be brought to the attention of the Minister of National Defence at this time. Principal among them is the reduction in personnel of the army, navy and air force, which would also contain the special training at the Kitchener tender H.M.C.S.

For the past three or four years the previous government did much to improve the conditions of the militia and the Royal Canadian Navy reserves in Waterloo North. However the minister now threatens to tear down all the splendid progress made, especially by the Kitchener tender H.M.C.S.

For over 30 years the city of Kitchener has been trying to purchase the old post office building on Benton and King streets, for the purpose of widening the street at this important intersection, which has been a distinct hazard for traffic. This building has now been sold through crown assets corporation to the city of Kitchener.

In order to bring about this successful purchase the former government leased property on Victoria street, so that the Twelfth Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps and the Royal Canadian Reserve could be moved from the old post office building to this new site.

Owing to the cost of housing the Scotch Fusiliers of Canada in the Dunker building, where they have resided for many years, it was decided by the Department of National Defence that this unit and the Twelfth Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps would be moved to the new armouries on Victoria street, and the Royal Canadian Navy reserve would be stationed in new quarters at the Kaya building on Weber street, which has been done.

Through the fine efforts of such men as Commodores Piercey, Kirkpatrick, and others, the Kitchener tender has produced the highest standard of training at the lowest cost per trainee in Canada. After much hard work by this unit they recently moved into these new quarters and are greatly concerned as to the intentions of the Minister of National Defence in regard to his remarks on page 5457 of yesterday's Hansard, that the tender at Kitchener would also be closed.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to read a telegram I received from the former officers of the Kitchener tender which explains their great concern in the announcement made by the minister.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Kitchener tender has been housed recently in a new building leased for five years. This unit has produced the highest standard of training at the lowest cost per trainee in Canada. Other than parade pay the only item to be saved by closing this unit is the pay of one writer. Furthermore, it is considered that the spirit of the ship's company is such that the unit could maintain its present strength if parade pay were discontinued. It is urged that the Kitchener tender be permitted to continue training during the tenure of its lease and to increase its complement to the training capacity of its new quarters in order to lower further the per capita cost of training R.C.N.R. personnel.

I sincerely hope the minister will give his very serious consideration to the Kitchener tender being continued in Kitchener.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I have been sitting here since eleven o'clock this morning.

An hon. Member: Since world war I.

Mr. Herridge: My colleagues behind are saying "Since world war I". My remarks this evening could possibly be properly described as a speechette, because I do not wish to delay the estimates longer than necessary. However, I am interested in this subject and I do want to have the opportunity to express my view briefly. I regret I was unable to be here yesterday, owing to my attendance in the veterans affairs committee in the afternoon, and in the evening I spent two hours in the external affairs committee listening to the superbly phrased ambiguities of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I was interested in listening to the minister's reply to the various speeches that have been made. I noticed that he overlooked what I considered to be one or two of the better ones, but he may have something to say about them later.

These delayed estimates and the circumstances of the present time provide an opportunity, in my opinion, for this parliament and for the government to reassess our defence posture in a rapidly changing world. I use the word "posture" because I understand it was a word used very frequently by the defence committee when they were overseas, and I want to use language that is current nowadays. During the last 15 years we have spent millions of dollars in an effort to keep in step with our powerful allies and to meet, as various ministers of national defence have informed us, our commitments. However, the records of this house—and anybody who reads the records carefully, commencing with the establishment of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the speeches in this house on that subject, will confirm this—show that we have been repeatedly misinformed as to the results that would flow from these massive expenditures and as to the future developments as the result of these expenditures in the political, military and economic fields.

Anyone reading the back history of these debates realizes how all governments were going into the future without much knowledge of what that future would be. We must make certain allowances for the fact that we are living in a very uncertain world, but these are facts. The minister's tale, shall I say, that was told this evening again amply demonstrates that fact. I remember that just a few years ago when the minister was in the opposition he was a famous anti-nuclear weapon exponent. He has changed his views somewhat in that respect. I also remember his telling us of the magnificent progress being made with the development of the Bobcat. My colleague from Port Arthur was quite interested in and enthusiastic about that subject. We believed what we were told. Now we are told it is being scrapped after spending some $7½ million on it, and we are purchasing a similar type of vehicle from the United States.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair as I usually am, or try to be—except under conditions of stress—and congratulate the minister on this first attempt to reduce the expenditures by cutting out some of the duplication and the waste that has occurred in his department, waste and duplication that has cost the taxpayers, the Canadian people, so dearly throughout the years. This is a limited approach, but we congratulate him for having the courage to do this, because our knowledge of military people is that you meet with great resistance when you start to cut down the budget of any of our forces. I remember—and I have quoted it repeatedly—that distinguished minister of national defence, who now occupies a high position in British Columbia, saying on one occasion that in all his lengthy military experience he had never known an admiral, a general or an air marshal who did not ask for far more than he required. I have always approached these estimates having that in the back of my mind, and I have quoted the former minister throughout the years. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think all of us give the minister credit for grasping a rather nasty stinging nettle when it comes to dealing with the reduction of defence expenditures, and we wish him well in all he undertakes in that direction from now on.

It is obvious that the government, faced with unexpected expenditures in connection with old age security, old age assistance, blind pensions and disabled persons allowances, began to look around to see where they could save some money in some department to make up for these unexpected expenditures, and to see where they could recover some of this expense. In my opinion the government correctly focused its attention on the department that offers the greatest opportunity for saving the funds necessary for socially constructive programs. We congratulate the government for that approach, and the minister for his limited economy program in this respect.

Our expenditures on defence began to rise rapidly with the formation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. At that time we were told that while NATO, as it is called, was basically a military alliance, great benefits were expected to flow from article 2 of this treaty, which provides for co-operation in economic, cultural and other fields. I remember the present Prime Minister making a considerable to-do about article 2 of the NATO treaty. It was the sugar coating, shall I say, that sweetened the treaty when it was presented to parliament at that time and attracted the support of many members of parliament who were somewhat dubious as to what this treaty would mean in the days ahead.

What has been the result as far as article 2 is concerned? The result has been nil. Only last evening in the external affairs committee I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he could mention one concrete achievement under article 2. If you read the minutes of the meeting last evening you will see that the minister was unable to mention one concrete achievement. He did mention the benefits of people getting together, even though they did not accomplish anything, and discussing trade, cultural activities and things of that sort—making a social event out of it. But he was unable to mention one concrete achievement. Of course, there was nothing done, although we had the committee of the Three Wise Men, of which our Prime Minister was a member. They made recommendations, but there was nothing done with respect to the recommendations of the Three Wise Men, because as many of us suspected even in the early days, persons engaged in a military alliance and that type of operation—and I do not blame them; they specialize in one field—generals, and so on, as far as I am concerned are not usually experts on trade, cultural and other activities of that kind.

The next step was the rearmament of Germany. This was one method that would help us keep Germany on our side, we were told; otherwise the militaristic elements in Germany might get out of control. By bringing Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization we did something to support the democratic element in Germany, we were informed, and a rearmed Germany would not be permitted atomic weapons or ships or submarines above a certain size. However, all these promises have been forgotten as German demands increase with the growing German economic and military strength. This has been noticed by a good many people in Canada. Our contribution to NATO has cost the Canadian people, I think, including all the infrastructure, logistic costs and things of that sort, and buildings and transportation, approximately $400 million a year. That is a very heavy expenditure. We are told that our presence is still required for the sake of maintaining the morale of our allies. However, there is a growing dissatisfaction with this continued expenditure under present circumstances. The Canadian people know that from a military point of view the European nations can provide the same forces at one quarter the cost. This is illustrated by articles in a number of periodicals and military journals. This is, in the first instance, a wasteful way of approaching defence, from our point of view.

This dissatisfaction with our defence expenditures is not confined to members of this party. A day or two ago, according to the press, a member of the Liberal party in the Senate complained of these wasteful expenditures over the years in NATO and a member of the Progressive Conservative party suggested economies would be made by bringing our brigade home and keeping it in Canada. Not that he was suggesting that we should withdraw from NATO, but he was suggesting economies would be made by returning our brigade and other forces to Canada.

This dissatisfaction is found amongst other members of this house. The minister knows there are members on the Liberal side who are quite critical of our expenditures with respect of NATO under present circumtances, and there are members on the official opposition side who are also critical. Anyone who has been on committees or had conversations with members of the house knows that there is a growing dissatisfaction with the value we are receiving for this type of expenditure. I know from letters and conversations I have had in the country that there are also supporters of all parties in the house who are beginning to question the value of these expenditures and urging that consideration be given for the use of the same funds to greater advantage in other directions.

In my opinion now is the time to reassess our defence posture. The present situation provides the government with an excellent opportunity to review the whole program.

People of all nations realize that war is international suicide. We can have nothing to do with the multiplication of nuclear weapons. We have the two giants with enough to destroy one another in a few hours. We can have nothing to do with that role. But we can do something effectively in other fields.

In regard to this theory, that war is international suicide, I want to quote briefly from a book entitled "Defence or Retaliation" by Schmidt. I have not read the book fully but I have read passages and on page 5 I find this paragraph:

> Public opinion must recognize that we are going to live less and less under the protection of H-bomb deterrence. Many military men and politicians believe that this exposure can be remedied by means of tactical nuclear weapons, but at best this proposition is not even half true. Many have yet to learn that in the event of a collision in Europe our peoples would be destroyed by tactical nuclear weapons every bit as efficiently as by strategic bombs, and that, furthermore, the fact of their existence scarcely reduces the risk of the outbreak of war at all. If Liddell Hart, one of Europe's most respected writers on strategy, can say: "These governments will be unworthy of their trust unless they tackle the problem of developing a non-suicidal form of defence and providing the minimum military strength required for it"—

The writer of the book, I understand, is the military critic of the social democratic party in Germany and the book is recognized as very well written and is accepted as an authority by many persons who understand something about this very complicated subject.

The fact is that the cold war as the way of deciding who shall have world leadership and who shall not is out of date. I think that is recognized by all who have given the subject serious consideration. It has been superseded by the emergence on the world stage in the last 15 years of over a score of new nations in Asia and Africa which neither support the east nor the west at this time. True, they have as yet little power. They are undeveloped and in many cases poverty stricken. But they are developing. They have already won considerable world influence and influence in the United Nations, and it is their future support of either the east or the west that, in my opinion, in the long run is going to determine the question of world leadership.

I think we all recognize that there still is, and will be for a long time yet, a contest between western and communist values, but in my opinion that contest from now on, in these balance of terror circumstances, will be decided not by cold war tactics but by the values that win or lose the loyalty and support of the new and presently uncommitted nations. Canada is in a very good position to exercise influence far beyond her military potential under these circumstances which offer us such a good opportunity.

What would this amount to in practice, Mr. Chairman? Economically it would mean our diverting that part of our military expenditure now required to keep our forces in Europe into uses such as social construction at home, and secondly as expenditures of foreign aid for the underdeveloped countries. It could also be diverted into manpower, as mentioned by one of my colleagues who is affectionately referred to by some of the ladies who sit in the gallery of the house and others as the Bertrand Russell of the House of Commons, namely the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I thought he made an excellent speech yesterday on this question, but the minister did not even make reference to his suggestions. I thought he made an excellent suggestion regarding the transposition of the use of manpower, taking advantage of the military training, the youth and knowledge of discipline of these men so as to utilize them in the field of assisting the underdeveloped countries. From a military point of view it would mean that we use our reduced establishment for home defence and civil defence and the protection of our population to the best advantage under the circumstances. Second, we would provide for the necessary air and sea patrols around our coast, and third we would provide for the maintenance of a highly trained mobile force with the necessary transport for use when required or called upon by the United Nations.

Politically, Mr. Chairman, what would this mean? It would mean a revamping of our foreign policy; a policy which would emphasize that the basic world problem is not the cold war—which we are inclined to overemphasize at this time—with an increase in nuclear weapons. We require a policy which underlines that the issue today is the future relationship between the rich and the poor nations and the need for some leadership on our part. In my opinion such policy takes time to develop; even some of the Liberal members agree with that. The only difference is that they were about 10 years behind us in their thinking, but you could see that subconsciously they were leaning in our direction, although the tempo of thought was somewhat slower. Such a policy is realistic from a Canadian point of view and provides Canada with the opportunity to set an example to the many nations who look to us for leadership in blazing new pathways to peace, which will gradually recognize the fact that the cold war is not an issue as far as we are concerned. It is the association with these underdeveloped nations and giving leadership to these nations that we could welcome.

Later on in the session I look forward to hearing the minister's statement on defence policy. I urge him to make a short step in the right direction. He has shown courage in clipping the wings of some of these wasters and I do hope that after listening to some of our arguments he will take another step in the direction we propose.

Mr. Kindt: It is always worth while to put things in their proper perspective. Taking the total amount of the cuts made in the military budget and dividing it into $1.6 billions which are, roughly, spent on defence, it amounts to about 4 per cent. Is that what the figure comes out at?

Mr. Hellyer: Close enough for argumentative purposes.

Mr. Kindt: Close enough for our purposes. In other words the minister is attempting to cut the budget by 4 per cent. Well, it is a move in the right direction, but I think the newspaper articles and the publicity which has appeared have distorted this matter out of its proper proportion. I know these cuts have hit us worse in Alberta than elsewhere and we are not happy about them. I want to say to those who are smiling over there, and who seem to be getting some pleasure out of it, that if they had been hit as badly as we have in Alberta they would be smiling out of the other corner of their mouths.

The minister said McCall flying field would be closed. May I ask him what is to follow the closing down of this field in Calgary? Is it to be sold? I understand it is to be sold. These are matters which the minister ought to have at his fingertips. He must have known when he gave the order to close that airfield what would follow and what would be done with it. Is he going to put it under the auctioneer's hammer? Will he get the Minister of Agriculture to auction it off? Perhaps he should get the Minister of Agriculture to auction it, because he does not spend much time in the house.

Mr. Hellyer: There may be a certain amount of negotiation required. The department may wish to continue to use some of the buildings. It could be that another department of government has an interest there. I have heard that the city of Calgary is interested. We will probably negotiate with the interested parties to see what the best solution might be.

Mr. Kindt: Is there any thought of adding to the length of any of the runways at McCall field?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kindt: I turn, now, to one other point, my last, because I do not wish to delay the passage of these estimates. It has to do with the contract which was signed with the United States in connection with the acquisition of atomic warheads. That contract, I understand, was completed last August or October. May I say to the hon. member who is sitting beside the minister that I should like to have the minister's attention. I am about to ask some serious questions. This means a contract has been signed and licenses have been issued by the United States government. In other words, the deal has been buttoned up and it is just a question of getting the warheads. Am I right in that? I think the Canadian people have a right to know these things.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. gentleman mind telling me which agreement in particular he was referring to?

Mr. Kindt: Under the McMahon act, the United States atomic energy act, it is provided that a licence signed by the President or some high official in the United States government must be obtained and that the acceptance of nuclear warheads is subject to certain conditions. The President reserves the right to pull the trigger. Let us look at this situation in another way. Have the military authorities completed the signing of that declaration with the authorities in Washington?

Mr. Hellyer: I am not as familiar with the act mentioned by the hon. member as I might be, but I do know that the two steps which are required to take in connection with our North American defence arrangements, the Voodoo and the Bomarc, have been taken. The first was the general agreement which was signed in August, as was stated earlier this evening, and then there was the technical agreement which I believe was signed in October. These steps have been taken and all the technical requirements necessary to meet the provisions of the McMahon act are included in those two agreements.

Mr. Kindt: In other words, it is all buttoned up. Now, where does Canada stand, as far as its sovereignty is concerned, in the event of an atomic war? The people of Canada are asking about this and they are looking to the minister to give them this information. Where does our sovereignty rest, now that these declarations have been signed and nuclear warheads have been taken from the United States?

Mr. Hellyer: As far as the use of the weapons system is concerned, our sovereignty remains with us.

Mr. Kindt: I did not get that last.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Hellyer: Sovereignty remains with us in respect to the use of the weapons system.

Mr. Kindt: All right. In other words, what the minister is saying is this. Let us approach it from another direction. The late President Kennedy sent a man to go around to the various NATO countries to obtain agreement on setting up committees on some kind of joint action before nuclear weapons were to be used, so that he as president would not have to shoulder the entire responsibility for making the decision. Those negotiations have been going on for some time. Could the minister tell the committee what progress has been made and where we stand with respect to that joint declaration, should we be faced with entering a nuclear war?

Mr. Hellyer: I think answers to most of the hon. gentleman's questions are included in reports of the special committee on defence. Since he is so interested in this subject perhaps he would find it worth while to read those reports and get the full background of information which is available in them.

Mr. Kindt: I know about that. It is all well and good for the minister to try to evade the issue, but the people of Canada are looking to him for a clear statement as to where our sovereignty lies in the present circumstances.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to give an example to show where our sovereignty stands and I hope this will satisfy the hon. gentleman because—

Mr. Kindt: That is what I am asking for.

Mr. Hellyer: —at first I thought he was quite familiar with the McMahon act, but now there appears to be some area of misunderstanding. The following statement applies to the Bomarc system. First, custody: The exercise of custody is a United States air force responsibility. This includes control over access to the nuclear warheads and related classified materials.

Base security: The security of all base facilities, consistent with the custodial responsibility of the United States air force detachment commander, is assigned to the R.C.A.F. squadron commander. All security guards on the base are R.C.A.F. The United States air force have the only custodial personnel and control access to U.S.A.F. owned weapons or non-releasable materials.

Storage: The storage functions of the warheads will be performed jointly under the direction of the United States air force personnel. The storage requirement is in fact very small because the warheads will normally be mated to the missiles.

Maintenance: All maintenance functions on the warheads are the sole responsibility of United States personnel. Other maintenance responsibilities, that is, on missiles, launchers or shelters, are either an R.C.A.F. or joint responsibility.

Safety: The development, observance and enforcement of safety standards and procedures is a joint responsibility. Compliance with applicable Canadian laws and regulations on the one hand and United States nuclear safety rules on the other, is an absolute requirement.

Inspections: After all preliminary inspections have been completed and the warheads have been delivered further inspections will be carried out at prescribed intervals. As a matter of convenience, United States air force standards and procedures for these inspections are being adopted. However, any additional Canadian requirement can be included. Actual inspections will be conducted on a joint basis.

Authorization for use: In general terms the policy is that Bomarcs may be fired only when authorized by both governments and then only in accordance with procedures established by the commander in chief, NORAD, and approved by the appropriate Canadian and United States authorities. Specifically, in the Bomarc control circuitry at the SAGE direction centre there are two locked switches, both of which must be turned "on" before a Bomarc can be launched. The keys to these two switches are held at all times by a designated Canadian officer and a designated United States officer respectively.

Actions that must have been taken before the Bomarc can be fired are: First, the commander in chief, NORAD, must have been notified that the President of the United States has authorized the release of weapons from United States custody for use by Canadian forces assigned to NORAD. Second, the commander in chief, NORAD, must also have received authorization from the Prime Minister or his authorized representative to release weapon carriers for use by Canadian forces assigned to NORAD. Third, the United States custodial officer on duty in the SAGE direction centre must have received properly authenticated evidence that United States governmental release has been given. He would thereupon unlock the United States release switch.

Fourth, the designated Canadian officer on duty in the SAGE direction centre must also have received properly authenticated evidence that Canadian governmental release has been given. He would thereupon unlock the second release switch.

Fifth, at this point the weapon would be available for firing but still would not be fired until the SAGE sector commander had authorized the senior weapons director to commence using the Bomarcs against hostile targets.

So you can see that once the supreme political authorities have given authorization, a considerable sequence of events must occur before the weapon can be used. A number of people are involved and certain preconditions must exist. Then the two keys, one American and one Canadian, must be turned before a missile can be fired. This procedure, with its many checks and doublechecks, is designed to prevent missile firing by accident or malice or without the consent of both governments.

Mr. Kindt: Is there any estimate of the time interval between the decision of the political authorities of both governments and the actual firing?

Mr. Hellyer: None that I could give, and it would depend on a number of circumstances, including the proximity of the hostile aircraft.

Mr. Kindt: I thank the minister for having taken the time to give us these details. It is spelled out in the agreement between the two nations, is it, that the leaders of both governments must decide?

Mr. Hellyer: It is spelled out in the procedures.

Mr. Kindt: Is that binding on both nations?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, it is.

Mr. Kindt: That is what we want to know. I want to thank the minister for having answered my questions and I shall turn the floor back to the chairman so that we can get on with the estimates.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two matters I should like to bring before the committee this evening in relation to the remarks the minister made yesterday and I also have one or two questions I should like to ask him. I had intended that my remarks would be mostly of a constituency nature in relation to the announcement of the withdrawal of all armed forces from Fort Churchill. However, keeping in mind the unjustified attack which I felt was made on the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria yesterday merely for coming to the defence of his own constituency, I suppose I should make a few remarks on the general aspects of national defence.

I feel there is probably no better time than the closing days of this first session of the twenty sixth parliament to mention one or two of the issues which were current during the last federal general election. While it is not my intention to rehash those issues I believe this would be a good time to put a few remarks with regard to them on the record. First of all, I am sure all Canadians realize by this time that the Liberal party perpetrated the greatest hoax that has ever been perpetrated in a general election when they created the myth that the former government had made certain commitments in regard to the acquisition of nuclear warheads. I feel that possibly the issue they raised in that regard in the campaign resulted in some of them being returned to the House of Commons. However, I also believe that as a result those Canadians who supported them must have expected that as soon as they took over the reins of office they would produce the evidence to show that the statements they had made were correct. But we all know what we have seen. Instead of producing any evidence the present government has built a sort of airtight capsule around what they say was the evidence of commitments. They set up a defence committee, but it was made quite apparent that the terms of reference of that committee would not include this question of commitment. In fact, there was a request made for copies of correspondence relating to these commitments, and some of the men who are sitting on the treasury benches made it quite clear that the correspondence concerning these commitments was regarded as classified and could not be given to the House of Commons. I believe I am justified in assuming that the people who supported these candidates are now wondering, if this information was so classified, how in heaven's name it was that practically every Liberal candidate in Canada seemed to know this commitment had been made. I am bringing this to the attention of the committee merely because during my own campaign I mentioned to my constituents that I thought the day was not too far removed when these charges would be proven to be the myth that they are.

There is one other minor issue of much the same nature that came up during the campaign. A great deal was made of it, and in fact some newspapers in Canada carried headlines relating to the charge made by the present Minister of National Defence to the effect that the former prime minister had given out confidential or classified information during a speech at Prince Albert. As I say, I am bringing this up now because headlines were created. It was not long before the former prime minister proved that this was not the case. The information he had given out at this meeting had been carried in publications in North America many months before. Here, we have a situation in which charges are being made that classified information was given out, and those charges are being made by a man who is now the Minister of National Defence. This person should be the last one to charge anyone with giving out classified information. As I say, it was a false charge, but if one turns to page 3425 of Hansard for February 4, 1963, he finds the present minister, then the hon. member for Trinity, when discussing some aspects of a trip the NATO delegation made to Europe, using these words:

> We were interviewed by the supreme allied commander of allied forces in Europe. We were briefed by Admiral Smeeton, deputy commander of the Atlantic fleet, by General Calmel deputy chief of staff of supreme allied headquarters...A number of questions have been asked as to what our commitments to NATO are. I realize that this information is presumably classified, but I could never understand why it was, so I am going to take the responsibility tonight of saying what they are.

Then, he went on to state the information which apparently was given to the NATO delegation. If one can judge by the words the minister used, it was classified information.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the hon. member would just let me interrupt for a moment to correct that impression? I had been aware of the commitments from the time I was associate minister, and as a minister you are able to classify or declassify certain information. It was on that basis I took the responsibility for making these commitments known, as I believed they were known to everyone in the world, practically, except the Canadian people, and I thought it was time they were allowed to be in on that information. Since then, they have been referred to publicly in the special committee on defence.

Mr. Churchill: May I say, with regard to that, the minister as a minister is not entitled to disclose classified information which has been classified by NATO headquarters? We were given information of that nature in Paris just a few weeks ago, but we are not at liberty to disclose it.

Mr. Hellyer: That is my point, Mr. Chairman; it was not information which I had received over there. It was information which, in fact, had been available to me for many years and which I thought should be given to the public.

Mr. Simpson: I noted carefully the remarks of the minister at this time, Mr. Chairman, and I am merely putting this on the record because at that time we were led to believe this was information which should not have been given to the public. I am particularly concerned about the minister's remarks at that time. He said he realized that this information was presumably classified, but he could never understand why it was. If you were to look up the word "presumably" I believe it would indicate he believed it to be classified.

Be that as it may, I felt I should like to get these two points on the record during these closing days of the first session of the twenty sixth parliament because I firmly believe these were two misrepresentations during the last election.

I should like to deal very briefly with the announcement which the minister made yesterday concerning the withdrawal of armed personnel from Fort Churchill. First of all, I should like to tell the minister it is my understanding that the people of Manitoba have been completely shocked by this news and for very good reasons. I noticed that the minister stated that the government was making this announcement at this time in order to give maximum notice to the personnel and allow for readjustment. This is a very worthy objective. I do not intend to indicate that any announcement was made previously outside of this house in relation to the closing of Fort Churchill, but I do feel it was common knowledge in the town of Churchill for many months, I believe as far back as October 14, that this might happen. At that time, as a result of numerous telephone calls and telegrams from Churchill concerning the rumour, I inquired of the minister who told me at that time that they had plans for the withdrawal of forces. However, quite a number of people must have known about it. I am wondering why it was not possible, if the government wished to give maximum notice to the people, to make this announcement in October instead of leaving it until now.

Mr. Knowles: It is ten thirty.

Mr. Churchill: We are prepared to go on for another half hour if the committee is agreeable, to see what we can do with these estimates.

Mr. Hellyer: This would be very much appreciated in the circumstances, if it is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles: Before we are asked to continue another half hour tonight, I think we should find out, if we can, whether or not we will conclude the debate on item 1. I do not think we gained anything by the extra half hour we sat last night, and I do not want a repeat performance of what we had then, but if we can complete the debate on item 1 in half an hour I would not object. I should like to make it clear that one member of this group, the hon. member for Port Arthur, wishes to speak.

Mr. Patterson: I would agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, if there is a possibility of getting through with the first item, but if the debate is to continue next week there is no point in it.

Mr. McIntosh: May I say a word on that. If we are on item 1 of the estimates as we have them before us, I would point out I notice a headline in the paper tonight, "Hellyer reveals massive slash in defence setup—more cuts coming." Could the minister provide us now with the revised estimates? I have all the estimates that are available, but there is nothing about any change in the estimates before us. How can we intelligently study these, if these are not the estimates we are going to be working on?

Mr. Hellyer: As I explained yesterday, referring to the cuts, they apply to the following year's estimates, and the reason the announcement was made yesterday was so that the affected people would have the maximum amount of notice in order to make the arrangements that are an inevitable consequence of the announcement. For that reason I would hope hon. gentlemen would agree to sit for a half hour and pass item 1 at least, and maybe even the balance, because the NATO ministerial meeting is coming up in a few days and I will be leaving next week to attend it.

Mr. Knowles: May I make a specific suggestion. To save this kind of argument, may I suggest we sit until eleven o'clock or until item 1 is passed, whichever comes first.

Mr. Churchill: I have another suggestion to make. We would have been prepared to pass all these estimates tonight had it not been for the unsatisfactory answer which the minister gave with regard to a question concerning the militia and the problem of civil defence. My alternative suggestion is that we now pass all the items, except item 1, and give the minister an opportunity to reconsider the situation, return to the house on an appropriate occasion and give us an explanation as to civil defence, which he has so seriously curtailed by his cutting down of the militia. That is the alternative proposal I put before the committee.

Mr. Knowles: My proposal was made first Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: It is very difficult to ascertain what the desire of the committee is. There are two suggestions that have been made, one by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and one by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Perhaps it might be easier to meet the requirements of the first suggestion, the one made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if that were the wish of the committee. That is the suggestion to sit until eleven o'clock or until item 1 has been passed. I am trying to ascertain the wish of the committee.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might reconsider. I am suggesting we stand item 1 and pass the others, and then get the answer to the question which I have been asking. Otherwise I do not see it possible to pass item 1, and frankly I would like to get all these estimates through.

Mr. Patterson: If there is not any thought of completing the estimates tonight, and this is just a matter of postponing one and going on with all the others, I do not think there is any particular point in doing that. If we could have some assurance we could wind it up by eleven o'clock then I think everyone would be agreeable to that. Otherwise I do not think we could.

Mr. Hellyer: I think it seems to be the consensus that we could pass all or most of the items tonight. That would be very helpful and would be appreciated. I would hope we would proceed on that basis. In respect to the civil defence aspect, what I would undertake to do if the committee would agree to pass the estimates tonight, is to prepare an additional statement, to be considered by the house at the time the emergency measures organization estimates are before it, and then the question of civil defence can be discussed in greater detail in all its aspects.

Mr. Churchill: On the face of it, that sounds all right, except for the fact that the minister has to explain to the house why the militia is going to be so seriously curtailed; and the militia is concerned with the problem of civil defence. I suggest that item 1 be left open and that we pass the others.

Mr. Knowles: I find that the alternative suggestion made by my friend from the other side of Ellice avenue is not acceptable. The first item is for $3 million. All the other items which we are asked to pass without discussion would add up to $1,500,000,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is sophistry.

Mr. Knowles: I think it would be highly irresponsible to pass all these other items with no discussion of them.

Mr. Churchill: Nine twelfths of these estimates have already been appropriated under interim supply. What the hon. member is saying is just nonsense.

[The Chairman.]

The Chairman: May I suggest we allow the hon. member for Churchill to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Simpson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I wish to thank the committee for allowing me to continue. Returning to the very surprising announcement of the withdrawal of army personnel from Fort Churchill I wish to say I am sure all the people at Churchill, and the people of Manitoba in general, would be very appreciative if a reconsideration were made. There are several points which I am going to bring out.

The hon. member for Calgary North brought out the point of the value that Churchill has been in relation to Arctic training, and I believe it could also be used for training in survival for R.C.A.F. and other personnel.

Due to the geographical makeup of our country I suggest that if we are going to develop it in the way it should be developed, we must decentralize in many ways. It is often very difficult to get industry to decentralize; but in regard to national defence this is something where the government alone has the power, and I feel the obligation, to decentralize as much as possible and assist in the development of the country.

At the townsite of Churchill, as members of the treasury benches probably know, the population have made their homes there entirely as a result of federal government establishments. For instance, the armed forces have the only hospital within several hundred miles. Therefore they have the only doctors and nurses in that area. I am mightily concerned for the health needs of the people of that area if the camp at Fort Churchill is closed, and possibly the hospital along with it. There are many other reasons for taking a second look at this. It may be that relatively the same work which is carried out at Churchill may continue to be carried out in some other more populated area of Canada. Therefore if this is going to be the case I think reconsideration should be given to the army camp at Churchill.

The minister mentioned that the rocket range would continue to operate. I wonder, could he enlighten the committee as to what type of agreement Canada has with the United States government in relation to the maintenance of that rocket base, in regard to the length of contract, and in general how long does the government feel this rocket range will continue to operate? With regard to the minister's announcement that this withdrawal would take place in 1964, my information from Churchill is to the effect that the withdrawal has been under way for some time and some 60 army personnel have been withdrawn and not replaced. Therefore I suppose the withdrawal took place some time prior to the announcement the minister made in the house.

I would also like to know the intention of the government with relation to the operation of the marine terminal at Churchill, which was built at a cost of some $7 million. The instructions for the construction of this marine terminal were given by a former Liberal government and I would be interested to know whether it can be turned over to other government departments; in other words, will this marine terminal continue to be used? I was very pleased to hear the minister announce this evening that cadet units would not be affected by this announcement. I am wondering whether he would consider it possible if cuts are made in certain departments of the army, to allow these cadet units, such as the naval, air force and army cadets, to have greater use of armouries throughout the country.

The minister also said something about air search and rescue, I believe, in Prince Edward Island. I would be very interested to learn from him whether it is intended to curtail R.C.A.F. air search and rescue to any extent in western Canada. I do not think this question has yet been raised. If I can get answers from the minister to those questions, Mr. Chairman, and an assurance that some reconsideration will be given to the matter of the withdrawal of all army personnel from Churchill, I would greatly appreciate it and I am sure the people of Manitoba would also.

Mr. Hellyer: With respect to the rocket range, Mr. Chairman, it is anticipated that it will be kept open during the term of the agreement, which I think extends to 1965. It is likely that it will be continued beyond that, but possibly by a civilian agency, and this is something that will be subject to negotiation.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I have only a very minor question to ask the minister and it relates to the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I wonder whether the minister has the figures of the present militia in these 15 centres that I will name: Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Regina, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec, Moncton, Halifax, Sydney, and Swift Current, Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: How did that get in there?

Mr. McIntosh: My reason for asking for these figures is that I understand the minister said the present strength of the militia is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 51,000 men and the intention is to cut it down to 20,000 men.

Mr. Hellyer: Thirty thousand.

Mr. McIntosh: Thirty thousand—cut it down by 20,000 men. Our concern is, first of all, as to where this cut-back is going to take place. Will it take place in these centres, or in the rural areas? I am also concerned about the relationship of the militia to the civil defence role. That role has changed. The minister also said he had two choices to make, with which I do not agree. He said, first of all, he had the choice of cutting down the militia or giving our first-line troops adequate weapons. If this is what he bases his cut-back on, I would say it is a false premise, because there are many other choices. It is not necessary to go into them at the present time because I doubt very much if this discussion will be over by eleven o'clock tonight. We are concerned with the role of the militia. We are concerned with the program of civil defence and with the emergency measures organization. I think if the minister would clear up these points he would have no difficulty in getting his estimates through the house.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. McIntosh: Would the minister answer my questions?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I do not have the figures for those cities here. I will be glad to get them for my hon. friend, probably tomorrow, if he is still in the city.

Mr. McIntosh: I will be here.

Mr. Hellyer: As I have indicated, these cuts do not apply to the militia for this year's estimates; they apply to next year. The determination will be made by a commission of militiamen which will be put together for that purpose. They will take into account the various factors, including the role of the militia, and particularly civil survival and how this could best be carried out, and all of the other considerations. I am sure they will be able to arrive at a solution in respect of these matters.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I was waiting for the hon. member for Lotbiniere to make his speech. I understand he had a little homily to make about the soldiers of the Queen, and I was ready to prevent his having a go. My original plans have gone by the board in view of the late hour. I wanted to talk about two specific matters. I suppose I spent too much time on kitchen fatigue during the war to ever feel I should rise to a sort of summit to approach defence problems from the heights from which the Minister of National Defence approaches them. I was going to confine my remarks to two things, the Bobcat and the educational program of the Department of National Defence. Instead of making a speech I will just ask the minister some questions.

I want to know how we could have such a dunderhead, clotted-up, stupid line of development with relation to the Bobcat. I use those adjectives of invective because I cannot conceive how any Department of National Defence or any Department of Defence Production with any integrity or any ability could manage to botch a program the way this program has been botched. You can go back through the years 1959, 1960 and before, and little statements were made, "We need another $1 million for the Bobcat", "We need another $600,000 for the Bobcat", "We need another $200,000 for the Bobcat development". Obviously either the army did not give a damn about that Bobcat, or the government did not give a damn about it, or Canadian Car and Foundry did not. The reason I am a little incensed about this is that our community at the lakehead was "suckered" on this deal: That is the word, "suckered". We were told four years ago that in 18 months the development program would be through and our factory would be considered as the place where the thing would go into production.

The Bobcat became a joke a long time ago in our community. We were under no illusions that anything was ever going to come of it. But the joke still exists. The minister has to give us some satisfactory explanation. He almost stood up here as though he was a hero when talking about cutting out the Bobcat. God, some hero. He has arrived well after the last act curtain has come down. How about it? How about knowing, Mr. Chairman, what is the real story on this ridiculous situation? I can remember that when Mr. Pearkes was the minister of national defence I went to knock at his door to speak to him about an important problem in my constituency. I went in. He was walking up and down. He said, "Fisher, I am just bogged down with problems—the damned Bobcat, the Bomarc, and so on. What do you want to see me about?" I said, "I have some ladies putting out washing on Monday mornings near the armouries at Port Arthur, and they want them to burn hard coal". I always remember his reaction. He said, "That's the kind of problem I like to deal with". And, by jove, they started burning hard coal. I wish some of these brains we have in the department had done something about the Bobcat. What a pitiful tale it has been throughout the years. I hear someone say it has not got a tail, but I want the t-a-l-e from the minister now.

Mr. Hellyer: It is a long, sad tale. To reduce it to one sentence it is: Two successive governments, treasury board, changes in ownership and problems of private management as well.

Mr. Fisher: Reduced to one sentence it is still not very satisfactory. What do we get out of all that money spent? What conclusions are we to draw about the military which can conceive a program like this and fumble it along? I want to ask the minister whether the army really felt any urgency about having that particular carrier. That is a direct question.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I would say categorically the army did have a feeling toward it and I think it still does. I think they realize now the only solution is the one we have taken. The concept was excellent. The failure was in the execution, and rather than point the finger at any one group it has to be summed up the way I summed it up in that sentence. It fell to a series of misfortunes.

The hon. member asked what lessons can be learned. One of the great lessons which can be learned from this experiment is that when you have a good idea, if the people concerned can push it through for all they are worth until it is completed in that way, there is some chance for success. But to string it out and procrastinate and spread the development over a longer period, for whatever reason, it almost inevitably winds up the way the Avro Arrow wound up or the Bobcat wound up. That is the lesson which has been learned.

Part of the problem is the system. The decision-making system is too slow and cumbersome; too many committees, too many reviews, some by people who do not have direct responsibility. A lesson can be learned in that respect too, I can assure my hon. friend. So far as possible we will push any developmental work which we undertake so as to get production started before the people who take away the same idea from us overtake us in their decision-making process and beat us to the finished product.

Mr. Fisher: Why should not some heads roll over this? A few years ago heads were threatening to roll over a five minute broadcast in the morning on the C.B.C. Here millions of dollars has been wasted. We have had this cumbersome procedure. Surely someone is responsible. Surely some minister, some politician, some senior administrative officer is responsible for this haywire situation. Where was the great defence research board establishment during this time? I have gone through the estimates and seen the details of the big salaries paid these scientists. They have a library full of classified material. They put out a beautiful magazine called "The Canadian Army" and you get the impression our army is swimming in experts on almost every phase of modern gadgetry in war. Yet the minister says this is an unfortunate thing and shows a weakness. At least the Avro people got the thing in the air and it looked good. It makes a nice model on the mantle. I do not know why there has been no investigation, instead of running off to find some horses who are on the payroll at Camp Petawawa. We have spent millions of dollars and swaggered and blustered about our own Canadian vehicle, and look at the lamentable result. What a travesty of defence. I am glad I stayed mostly on kitchen fatigue, if that is the kind of thing our military men come up with. What an outfit.

Mr. Churchill: Do not condemn them all. That is a generalization.

Mr. Fisher: I know it is, but the hon. member has to admit it is a pretty ridiculous situation in regard to the Bobcat.

Mr. Churchill: Of course it is.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member and I were of the same regiment and he remembers we wound up with a vehicle not designed for us, and it turned out very well. It was something thrown off by the Americans called the Staghound armoured car. The Canadian forces got it by luck and it turned out quite well. The minister has not given us any satisfaction in his announcement regarding the very relevant criticisms and analyses made by the Glassco commission of education establishments in the Department of National Defence. I am referring to the millions of dollars spent in the education of dependants overseas and in particular colleges. Tonight he comes along with a statement which flies in the face of what the Glassco commission says, and what is obvious from the statistics in relation to the cost of training an officer. He is going to cut down on the university training program for officers.

Mr. Hellyer: I think you have the two programs confused.

Mr. Fisher: Is the minister cutting down on Royal Roads and on C.M.R. and R.M.C.?

Mr. Hellyer: No. There are two training programs at universities, the C.O.T.C. and also the R.O.T.P. It is the C.O.T.C. we are cutting back on.

Mr. Fisher: As long as it is not the R.O.T.P. I think the minister should explain why he has not done anything about these educational costs and why he has gone in the face of the information on Royal Roads. One of the things which interests me is that in 1959 I had a letter from a person on the staff of Royal Roads giving exactly the same information and reaching the same conclusions. The Glassco commission reported that this junior college at Royal Roads is in effect redundant, and not only that but that it could never really be anything but a gross misconception of the university function because it is a junior college built up of a staff pushing for Ph.D's. The staff is very well qualified academically, yet does not live in an environment where they can exercise skill.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member says eleven o'clock. I want to ask the minister whether he would give us a fuller explanation as to why he did not accept the Glassco commission recommendations that something should be done, if necessary putting some of the responsibility for the cost on the parents. Second, how could he not move on the position of the high cost of the officer educated through the Royal Roads-C.M.R.-R.M.C. system, when the Glassco commission suggested that the R.O.T.P. produces as good an officer or as comparable an officer and much more cheaply?

Mr. Hellyer: This is a broad and comprehensive question and I should like to give time and thought to preparing a statement with regard to it. I should like to take the time between now and the presentation of next year's estimates, for which I shall be taking full responsibility, to prepare such a statement answering the hon. member in detail.

Mr. Fisher: I was given returns to two questions relating to the ability of French speaking as opposed to English speaking students. I have forgotten the numbers of the questions. I am not satisfied from these returns that the French speaking students are getting a fair deal. In brief, I think their failure rate is too high. Attrition from other causes is too high. I am still staggered by the fact that though, in the main, English speaking students at C.M.R. outnumber the French speaking students I should like the minister, when he is conducting this review and trying to develop an approach to the educational commitments of the department, to consider, if we are making an effort to have French speaking officers, whether it is not necessary for us to get better results than we have been getting. If necessary, we must spend a lot more time and effort in doing so. I would prefer to spend more money in this field than to carry on with Royal Roads out in British Columbia, which in a sense, appears to be an unnecessary adjunct to the military college at Kingston.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry. We are prepared to pass all the other items, but stand the first item. Let the minister come back and give us, after reflection, another report with regard to the militia and its relationship to civil defence.

Mr. MacNaught: I suggest we stand item 1 and call the other items.

The Chairman: Is that the wish of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item 1 stands.

Royal Canadian Air Force—

35. Operation and maintenance, $523,121,000.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, before item No. 35 is carried, may I ask the Minister of National Defence a very brief question—

[Text]

Mr. MacNaught: Put it on clause 1.

Item agreed to.

Defence research board—

45. Operation and maintenance, $25,416,000.

Mr. Knowles: We would like this item to stand. Perhaps we have done a good night's work.

The Chairman: Is it agreed we allow item 45 to stand and go on with the others?

Mr. Patterson: I think we have gone as far as we ought to go tonight. I know some would like to carry on, but they are the ones who have been taking a great deal of time during this debate. Therefore, I think we should call it eleven o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the acting leader of the house what the business will be for Monday?

Mr. MacNaught: On Monday, the first item of government business will be the resolution respecting the representation commissioner. If it passes and the bill is introduced, it is not proposed to proceed with the bill until the following Monday. The second item will be the resolution regarding finances of the C.N.R. and if it passes it is not proposed to proceed with the bill until the following week. The third item will be the bill respecting the emergency gold mining assistance. The fourth item will be the bill respecting the small businesses loans. The fifth item will be the bill respecting the Canadian world exhibition. The sixth item will be the bill regarding old age, blind persons and disability assistance. The seventh item will be the bill respecting the auditors of the C.N.R. The eighth item will be the bill respecting the currency, mint and exchange fund.

The same business will be continued on Tuesday in this order and, if it is completed, other items of legislation announced by the Prime Minister will be taken after consultation with representatives of the opposition.

It being eight minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply this day:]

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Inspection services—

5. Operation and maintenance, $6,936,000.
10. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $200,000.

Royal Canadian Navy—

15. Operation and maintenance, $210,680,000.
20. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $80,720,000.

Canadian Army—

25. Operation and maintenance, $386,579,000.
30. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $58,275,000.

Royal Canadian Air Force—

35. Operation and maintenance, $523,121,000.
40. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $168,679,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 9, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS

Second report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters—Mr. Godin.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Thirteenth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Wahn.

DEBATES—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's) presented the second report of the standing committee on debates, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DAMAGE FROM CHANGES IN WATER LEVELS, LAKE TIMISKAMING

Question No. 1,027—Mr. Peters:

1. With the raising of the water level in lake Timiskaming, how many farmers and property owners received compensation for the change in the waterline?
2. How many property owners are still eligible for compensation?
3. How much compensation was paid by the federal government to property owners along the shores of lake Timiskaming as a result of high water damage between the years of 1950 to 1960 and 1960 to 1963?

Mr. Badanai: 1. One hundred and sixty property owners received compensation following the construction of this dam which was completed in 1911. All eligible claims were settled by 1922, and no payments have been made since.

2. None.

3. None.

*NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION EXPROPRIATION, LEITRIM AREA

Question No. 1,493—Mr. Winch:

1. Has the national capital commission expropriated properties in the Leitrim area and, if so, on what basis was expropriation valuation based and, what prices have been paid on various properties in that area in accordance with their location?
2. How many owners have not accepted the expropriation figure and, what consideration is being given to hearing the owner's arguments without going through the expense of an appeal?
3. How many who have not accepted the expropriation value are veterans buying under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act?
4. On expropriation of properties of veterans buying under the Veterans' Land Act, with an interest rate of 3.75%, is provision being made on a repurchase value at the same interest rate, or an additional allowance to compensate for any difference?
5. Will any department protect a veteran in this matter or make legal services available to the veteran?

Mr. Dupuis: The reply to this question is somewhat over a page in length and includes many names and lot references. Perhaps the house would be agreeable to it being taken as read and printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of reply see below:]

1. Yes. Properties in the greenbelt within one half mile of the Leitrim public school which is assumed to be the centre of the Leitrim area which have been expropriated and settled by the national capital commission are listed below. Amounts of settlement were based on individual appraisals of each property. These appraisals used value to the owner to establish the amount and reflect the relative advantages and disadvantages of location.

Name	Acreage	Price
G. W. Kemp	117.5	$135,000

2. Within the aforesaid area, settlement has not yet been reached with one owner, Mr. Harold G. Clarke, for a small holding in the east half of lot 15, concession IV, consisting of four and a half acres, who was offered $31,300 in full settlement of his claim. For some time the national capital commission's staff has been awaiting a decision from Mr. Clarke's solicitor as to whether the amount is satisfactory.

3. Nil.

4. Financial assistance made available to a veteran under part I of the Veterans' Land Act bears interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. Loans made under part III of the act bear interest at 5 per cent. When a property is expropriated, the veteran concerned may elect to have the director redisburse all or part of the compensation moneys for the purchase of a substitute property and continue his contract with the director on the said substitute property. If he does so elect, the same interest rate or rates apply as applied prior to expropriation.

5. Although legal services are not made available, the veterans land administration will provide assistance to a veteran in settlement negotiations to the extent of the administration's opinion, based on appraisal data, of the value of the property concerned.

REPORT ON WORLD FAIR

Question No. 1,622—Mr. Fisher:

1. Is it the government's intention to report on or before December 20, 1963, on the Montreal world fair (1967) as required by statute?
2. Are there any other requirements of the particular statute that have not been observed as of November 6, 1963?

Mr. Pearson: 1. Yes.

2. No.

CULTIVATED LAND, LONG PLAIN INDIAN RESERVE, MAN.

Question No. 1,626—Mr. Enns:

1. How many acres of land are there on the Long Plain Indian reserve in Manitoba?
2. How much of this is under cultivation and operated by (a) residents of the reserve (b) non-Indians off the reserve on lease?
3. (a) What are the terms of the lease (b) to which office are the moneys paid (c) do all the residents benefit from this arrangement?
4. Can residents on the reserve arrange to operate any portion of the land under cultivation for their own use?

Mr. Munro: There are two reserves by this name in the Portage la Prairie Indian agency, Manitoba, Long Plain Indian reserve No. 6 and Long Plain Sioux Indian reserve No. 6A. The following is the information as it applies to both reserves:

1. Long Plain Indian reserve No. 6, 7,745.25 acres; Long Plain Sioux Indian reserve No. 6A, 1,317.10 acres.

2. Long Plain Indian reserve No. 6, (a) area cultivated by Indians, 1,262 acres; (b) area cultivated by non-Indians on lease, 3,053 acres.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Long Plain Sioux Indian reserve No. 6A, (a) Area cultivated by Indians, 131 acres; (b) area cultivated by non-Indians on lease, 254 acres.

3. Long Plain Indian reserve No. 6, (a) seven leases, ¼ share of crop; one lease, ⅓ share of crop; one lease, cash rental of $1,000 per annum; (b) Portage la Prairie Indian agency office; (c) Yes.

Long Plain Sioux Indian reserve No. 6A, (a) three leases ¼ share of crop; two leases total cash rent of $188.50 per annum; (b) Portage la Prairie Indian agency office; (c) Yes.

4. Yes.

C.N.R. RESERVATIONS, CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Question No. 1,644—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways discontinued allotting sleeping car space on the Ocean Limited train No. 1 for reservations through its Charlottetown office and, if so, for what reason was such decision made?
2. Is it now necessary to reserve space on coach cars on this train and, if so, may such reservations be made at Charlottetown?

Mr. McIlraith: The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes. With the introduction of an expanded teletype network for passenger reservations, all space in sleeping cars is held by the reservation office at the station where such cars originate. This was done in the interest of providing the best possible service to the greatest number of customers.

2. Yes.

C.N.R. SEGREGATION OF INDIANS

Question No. 1,661—Mr. Howard:

Since January 1, 1960, has Canadian National Railways engaged in the practice of segregating native Indians in separate cars or particular sections of cars on its railway operation and, if so (a) upon what lines and during what times was this practice engaged in (b) is the practice still in effect and (c) what was the reason for such practice?

Mr. McIlraith: No.

PROMOTION OF SEASONAL EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,707—Mr. Bell:

1. Is it the policy of the civil service commission to promote seasonal employees who are employed for specified periods under section 51 of the Civil Service Act in periods when such employees are not employed?
2. If so, is such a policy consistently followed in all competitions involving such classes of employees?
3. If not, when and under what conditions are such promotions made?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been given the following answer by the civil service commission:

1. Where it is considered that qualified candidates might be found among seasonal employees, it is the policy to admit such employees to competitions regardless of whether the competition is or is not held during a period in which they are required to perform their duties. A seasonal candidate, who was the successful candidate could be promoted during the period in which he was not required to perform his duties, as well as during the season in which he was employed, but the promotion in either case would be effective only from the date on which he assumed his new duties.

2. Yes.

3. Not applicable.

Note: The wording of the first part of the question has been discussed with Mr. Bell and it has been established that section 51 of the Civil Service Act is not applicable in the context of this question.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I. WHARF

Question No. 1,724—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. When is it expected to complete the construction of the new Department of Transport wharf at Charlottetown?
2. When will construction of the departmental buildings on the wharf commence?
3. Does the government contemplate constructing a new wharf for general commercial purposes?

Mr. Pickersgill: 1. Approximately May 31, 1964.

2. The requirements of the Department of Transport for the buildings on the new wharf at Charlottetown are now before the accommodations committee of the treasury board. As soon as authority is obtained, the plans can be drawn by the Department of Public Works and the work could be put in hand.

3. Not at the present time.

EXTENSION OF BONUS ON WINTER HOUSE CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 1,726—Mr. Scott:

1. Has the government received representations from groups and/or individuals requesting an extension of the qualifying period for completing winter-built houses under the $500 bonus program and, if so, who were the groups, and/or individuals, making such representations?
2. What was the government's response to such representations?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. Representations have been received from the national house builders association and a few individuals requesting an extension of the period for completing houses being constructed under the winter house building incentive program.

2. That, since the program is designed to increase employment in the house building industry in the winter months, the date for final completion of houses will remain at March 31, 1964.

Questions

REPAIRS TO SUPPLY VESSEL "NANOOK"

Question No. 1,742—Mr. MacEwan:

Have tenders been called for repairs to the northern supply vessel "Nanook" and, if so (a) what were the names of the various tenderers and the amounts of their tenders (b) to whom will the contract for the work be awarded?

Mr. McIlraith: Tenders due at 3 p.m. E.S.T. November 13, 1963, were called for repairs to C.C.G.S. Nanook. Tenders were received as follows: Ferguson Industries Ltd., Pictou, N.S., $88,173; Saint John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co., Ltd., East Saint John, N.B., $105,155; Halifax Shipyards, Halifax, N.S., $140,449.

No contract has been awarded as yet. Because of very extensive damage consideration is being given to whether the ship should be restored or modified for a different use.

ST. SYLVESTRE, QUE. RADAR STATION

Question No. 1,752—Mr. Caouette:

1. What was the cost to the Canadian government of (a) the construction and installation (b) the operation and maintenance, of the St. Sylvestre radar station for each year to date?
2. Since the establishment of this station, what was the total of the salaries paid (a) to persons of Quebec origin (b) to persons of origins of other provinces (c) to persons of foreign origin?
3. What. if any, was the amount of American aid?

[Translation]

Mr. Cardin: 1. (a) $2,196,000. (b) From 1954-55 to June 12, 1961, an average of $1,150,000 a year; from June 12, 1961, to date, an average of $1,670,000 a year.

2. From 1954-55 to June 12, 1961, an average of $280,000 a year; from June 12, 1961, to date, an average of $285,000 a year.

The records contain no information as to the various pay schedules of civilian employees mentioned in (a), (b) and (c). However, according to a recent report, out of 91 civilian employees at the St. Sylvestre station, 90 come from Quebec and one from New Brunswick.

3. Under the 1951 Pine Tree system agreement, total American aid was $14,900,000 as capital investment; and, from 1954-55 to June 12, 1961, an average of $710,000 a year for operation and maintenance. This last figure includes the $280,000 mentioned in reply to question 2 above.

INCREASED MEDICAL TRAINING FACILITIES

Question No. 1,753—Mr. Orlikow:

Have consultations been carried out with the provinces for the purpose of reviewing training facilities in medical schools and in particular to (a) determine the extent of the need for increased medical training facilities (b) consider additional financial subsidies as an incentive to increase the training facilities (c) institute long range planning for coping with the growing shortage of medical personnel in the years ahead?

Miss LaMarsh: A major study supported by the royal commission on health services was concerned with medical education. It is understood that the commission has received the report and will probably be commenting on its findings.

The importance of training arrangements for a great many of the health professions received consideration in briefs submitted to the royal commission. When the comments of the commission have been received on medical education, they will be thoroughly studied by the department.

MALE NURSES IN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,754—Mr. Scott:

Do the Canadian armed forces permit male nurses to enlist in said armed forces and, if not, for what reasons are they prohibited from enlisting?

Answer: Male registered nurses are not accepted for commissioning in the nursing branch of the Canadian forces medical service for administrative reasons which have been explained to the male nurses' committee of the registered nurses' association of Ontario. However, serving male personnel with the necessary technical and personal qualifications may progress to commissioned rank in the medical administrative field.

INFANT MORTALITY AMONG ESKIMOS AND INDIANS

Question No. 1,769—Mr. Orlikow:

What is the infant mortality rate (the number of deaths among each thousand babies born alive) among the Indian and Eskimo people in Canada?

Miss LaMarsh: Infant mortality per 1,000 live births during the past 3 years:

	1960	1961	1962
Indian	79.0	76.2	74.7
Eskimo	210	185	193

LIFE EXPECTANCY OF ESKIMOS AND INDIANS

Question No. 1,770—Mr. Orlikow:

What is the life expectancy at birth for males and females in Canada of Indian and Eskimo origin?

Miss LaMarsh: The data on Eskimos is not exact enough to permit a precise estimate of a true life expectancy index, but a rough estimate places it between 30 and 40 years, probably nearer 30 than 40.

An estimate based on mortality experience in 1961 and 1962 would place the life expectancy at birth of a female Indian at 57-59 years and a male Indian at 54-63 years.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

REVENUES FROM U.S. OIL INVESTMENTS IN CANADA

Question No. 1,785—Mr. Latulippe:

Does the federal government derive any benefit from American investments in the oil companies in Canada and, if so (a) in which provinces, and in what amounts for the last three years (b) what are the revenues from the properties involved (c) what were the American investments in oil properties or companies in Canada during the last five years?

[Translation]

Answer: (a) and (b). Data are not available in the form requested. The federal government derives benefits from United States investments in the oil companies established in Canada, just as it does from other companies in Canada, whether they are Canadian or foreign companies. (c) In the main, the book value of United States investments in the Canadian oil and gas industry increased from $2,063 million at the end of 1956 to $3,434 million at the end of 1961. That increase includes new capital of American origin as well as accrued profits of United States investors. The capital expenditures made by companies in question, in the country itself, can be financed also through depreciation and depletion allowances, and through capital obtained in Canada.

STUDY OF AIR AND WATER POLLUTION

Question No. 1,792—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Are funds voted to the Department of National Health and Welfare for the study of air and water pollution in Canada and, if so, what is the amount of those funds and, how are they divided?
2. How many employees are working on this problem?
3. Does the department intend to complete such studies of this matter before long?
4. Is there any federal-provincial co-operation with regard to the study of this matter and, if so, what form does it take?

Miss LaMarsh: 1. Yes. Funds for the study of air and water pollution are provided in the 1963-64 estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. These studies involve the occupational health division, the public health engineering division and the sanitary bacteriology section of the laboratory of hygiene. Expenditures of approximately $85,000 relate to air pollution and $60,000 to water pollution.

2. Fourteen employees are working on air pollution studies, six engaged full time and eight part time. Twenty employees are working part time on water pollution studies.

3. Air and water pollution studies are continuing programs.

4. There is close federal-provincial co-operation in the organization, planning and conduct of air and water pollution studies.

Assistance is being provided by the federal government under the national health grants and, on request of the provinces, services of the Department of National Health and Welfare are made available for analysis and special projects to supplement provincial facilities.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH BOLIVIA

Question No. 1,795—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many Canadian citizens are living in Bolivia at the present time?
2. What branch of the Canadian embassy in Bolivia deals with Canadian missionaries in that country?
3. What are the main commercial relations between Canada and Bolivia and what amounts have been involved in the last three years?
4. What Canadian companies own property in that country?
5. What is the approximate value of such properties?

[Translation]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): 1. There are approximately 100 Canadian citizens who reside in Bolivia at the moment, and whose names are written down on the registers of the Canadian embassy.

2. The Canadian ambassador in Peru is also accredited as Canadian ambassador in Bolivia; there is no branch of the Canadian embassy in Bolivia. At La Paz, it is the British embassy who supervises, at the local and immediate levels, the interests and the property of Canadian citizens, and naturally, of Canadian missionaries.

3. The commercial relations between Canada and Bolivia are regulated by the clause of the most favoured nation. This privilege has been granted by Canada by an order in council dated June 20, 1935.

The amounts involved in the last three years are as follows:

	Imports from Bolivia	Exports to Bolivia
1960	$ 433,000	$ 323,000
1961	883,000	353,000
1962	957,000	362,000

4. There are no official registers kept by the government and relating to Canadian investments in Bolivia, with the exception of confidential information.

5. (See 4).

STEEL EXPORTS TO AMERICAN MOTORS CO.

Question No. 1,796—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Has Canada exported any steel to the American Motors Company since June, 1961 and, if so, how many tons and what was its value?
2. In what provinces did these exports originate?
3. What revenue has the government derived from these exports since 1961?

[Translation]

Answer: The information requested in questions 1, 2 and 3 cannot be supplied because in the Statistics Act, the section concerning secrecy prohibits the disclosure of information which would reveal details about an individual or a particular business.

*LAST SHIPS OUT OF CHURCHILL

Question No. 1,798—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. On what date this fall did the last ship leave the port of Churchill?
2. What were the names of the last five ships to depart, and the respective dates of sailing?
3. Did any of the said ships suffer ice or other damage and, if so, what are the particulars thereof?

Mr. Cantin: The national harbours board advises as follows:

1. October 20, 1963.

2. M.V. Camellia, October 5, 1963; M.V. Sills, October 5, 1963; M.V. Meerdrecht, October 8, 1963; M.V. Warkworth, October 12, 1963; M.V. Deborah, October 20, 1963.

3. No ice or other damage to the above named ships has been reported to government agencies.

*INCOME TAX LIABILITY ON AWARD TO NAZI VICTIM

Question No. 1,799—Mr. Fairweather:

Has the government reviewed the ruling of the income tax appeal board published on November 28, 1963 which held that an award of compensation to Phillip Koller, as a persecuted Jewish person, by the district board of compensation of West Germany is subject to Canadian income tax and, if so, is any legislative or other action contemplated to nullify the effect of said ruling?

Mr. Garland: By judgment rendered on September 11, 1963 the tax appeal board decided that the life annuity payable to Phillip Koller by the government of West Germany is properly subject to tax under the Income Tax Act. To exempt this type of annuity from tax would require an amendment to the legislation which would ordinarily be introduced by the Minister of Finance.

APPLICATIONS FOR INCREASED BROADCASTING POWER

Question No. 1,807—Mr. Rideout:

1. Did the letter of Messrs. Stewart, Jamieson and Ouimet, addressed to the Secretary of State and tabled in this house on October 1, 1963 have any bearing on applications for increases in broadcasting station power output?
2. Is the board of broadcast governors now hearing any applications for increase in power, the granting of which would result in wider broadcasting coverage and, if not, when will such applications be heard?
3. Will the Department of Transport at present accept applications for increases in broadcasting power and, if not, on what date will the department again accept such applications?

Mr. Pickersgill: 1. Yes. The recommendation regarding applications for television licences was intended to apply to applications for increases in power in so far as these would result in the extension of alternative television service.

2. No. Such applications would not be heard until after July 1, 1964.

3. While the department would not refuse applications for technical consideration it is not passing them on to the board of broadcast governors as there seems to be no object in doing this until such time as the board is once more prepared to hear them.

APPLICATION FOR GRANTS FOR COLD STORAGE WAREHOUSE, NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC

Question No. 1,809—Mr. Laprise:

Were applications received, during the present year, from the government of Quebec or other organizations for grants toward the construction of a cold storage warehouse in northwest Quebec?

Mr. Hays: No.

*C.B.C. SCHOLARSHIP GRANTS

Question No. 1,810—Mr. Pigeon:

1. Did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation grant scholarships during 1963 to students who were the winners in such programs as "Affrontement de collèges" and, if so (a) what amount has been granted to date (b) what is the number of scholarships granted to date?

2. Were the provinces consulted before such scholarships were granted?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. The C.B.C. French television network carries an educational quiz program called F-MA in which teams of students representing classical colleges participate. Cash awards are given as prizes to competing teams to be used at the discretion of the student councils of colleges to provide scholarships for worthy students.

(a) and (b). From February 3, 1963, when the program started, to June 2, and from October 27 to December 1, 48 cash awards amounting to $11,450 have been given by the C.B.C. to competing teams.

2. No. The choice of the teams is made in close consultation with the Fédération des collèges classiques, which is a private organization.

HEAVY WATER PLANT

Question No. 1,817—Mr. Thompson:

1. With reference to the proposed construction of a heavy water plant in Canada, what were the 5 points upon which the original tender proposals were to be predicated and did all of the four companies submitting proposals fulfil these requirements in their original submissions?

[Mr. Rideout.]

2. Which of the four companies originally submitting tenders prior to the closing date of May 31 proposed a combination heavy water-power plant?

3. Does the proposal of Deuterium of Canada Limited call for an integrated electric power and heavy water plant?

4. If so, which Nova Scotia utility company is involved in the production and distribution of this power?

5. How many tons of coal will be used by the plant per year?

6. Will the government subsidize all coal used in such a combined or single plant?

7. How much subsidy will the federal government pay on the coal?

8. Which company will supply the coal for this plant and receive the government subsidy?

9. Which engineering firm will design and build the plant for Deuterium of Canada Limited?

10. Has this engineering firm any experience in this field?

11. Have the types of plant and process they intend to use ever been used commercially to produce heavy water?

12. If the engineering firm has not had any experience and/or the process has never been used commercially, does Deuterium of Canada Limited know what it will cost to design, build and operate this plant?

13. What price per pound of heavy water did the respective bidders submit in their May 13 proposals?

14. What price has been agreed to in the final arrangement with Deuterium of Canada Limited?

Answer: 1. (A) The five points are:

(1) A.E.C.L. would make available by way of licence to any applicant the proposal of which was to be accepted Canadian patent No. 574293, issued on the 2nd day of April, 1959, relating to heavy water manufacture, on a royalty free basis to 1st June, 1970, but subject to the payment of a royalty of 2 per cent of sales price thereafter.

(2) Heavy water would be required to be produced in such quantity as to guarantee a supply of not less than 200 tons per year for a period of five years dating from the commencement of delivery, the first complete lot of 200 tons to be available for delivery on or before the 31st day of March, 1966.

(3) A.E.C.L. shall have the first option to purchase any part or all of the first 1,000 tons of heavy water produced, such option to be exercised from time to time as and when heavy water becomes available for delivery.

(4) The price per pound of heavy water that would apply for the first five years of production must be quoted f.o.b. plant in Canadian funds. A price of not more than $22 per pound would apply to all deliveries during the aforesaid five year period. In assessing proposals, the price or prices quoted will be an important factor in any decision that may be reached; no proposal to which a price in excess of $22 per pound is incidental will be considered.

(5) In addition to the price factor, the degree of Canadian participation in any such project will have an important bearing on any decision reached by the government. Each proposal must, therefore, contain details disclosing

(a) in the event the applicant is

(i) an individual, the full name and address of such individual, his nationality and, if not a natural born Canadian citizen, his country of origin and the name, (if other than his own), under which he carries on business;

(ii) a partnership, the name under which the partnership carries on business, the full names and addresses, the nationality and, if not a natural born Canadian citizen, the country of origin of all partners; or

(iii) a corporation, and if it is contemplated that the applicant, if not a corporation, will form a corporation for the purposes of the project, the head office of the corporation or projected corporation, the laws under which it was or would be incorporated, and the extent of Canadian participation in the capital structure and direction thereof;

(b) the sources of capital to which the applicant has immediate or potential access;

(c) the degree of Canadian content in terms of labour and materials that would be incidental to the construction and operation of the plant and facilities incidental thereto;

(d) the contemplated location of the plant;

(e) the size of the plant, in terms of output, including information with regard to any increase in size contemplated in the foreseeable future; and

(f) the source of energy for the operation of the plant.

(B) No.

2. Dynamic Power Corporation specified the use of a combination heavy waterpower plant. Deuterium of Canada Limited and Western Deuterium Limited contemplated the possibility of using a combination heavy waterpower plant.

3. See 2. It is understood that the Nova Scotia power commission has undertaken to arrange for the supply of steam to Deuterium Canada Limited.

4. See answer to 3.

5. It is understood that approximately 106,000 tons per annum will be used to generate the steam for heavy water production.

6. A residual fuel oil equalization payment could be payable under P.C. 1963-957 for all coal used in the power plant.

7. The residual fuel oil equalization payment will depend on (a) application being made, and (b) the rate would be approximately 90 cents per ton of coal under present conditions.

8. Not known.

9. Not known. Burns and Roe Inc. did the engineering submitted in the proposal.

10. Yes.

11. Yes, such a type of plant has produced heavy water in commercial quantities, but improvements are contemplated.

12. N/A.

13. In the case of two proposals the bids quoted were qualified by conditions that rendered it impossible to calculate the net price. The lowest price that met the conditions of the invitation, namely, $20.50 per pound, being the price quoted by Deuterium of Canada Limited, has already been made known.

14. $20.50 per pound.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

YUKON TERRITORY—CONTRACTS FOR BUILDINGS, SERVICES, ETC.

Question No. 1,237—Mr. Nielsen:

With respect to the operations of the Department of Public Works in the Yukon Territory since April 8, 1963 (i) how many contracts have been entered into by the Department of Public Works with any person, firm, or corporation, for the construction of public works, the performance of services, the supply of goods, or the acquisition of buildings, or works by the government, any agency thereof, or, any crown corporation (ii) to which persons, firms, or corporations were such contracts awarded (iii) in the case of each contract, what was the contract price or cost (iv) in the case of each contract, was there a public tender called (v) in the case of any of such contracts where there were no public tenders called, why were such tenders not called (vi) in the case of any such contracts for which no public tenders were called, to which person, firm or corporation were the contracts awarded (vii) in the case of any such contracts where there were no public tenders called, by what authority were the same awarded (viii) in the case of any such contracts, did any of them remain incompleted and, if so, what was the reason (ix) in the case of any such contracts which have not been completed, is it the intention of the government to have the same completed and, if so, by whom (x) in the case of any such contracts which remain incomplete and which the government intends to have completed, what will be the additional cost of completion, if any, in each case?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION BOARDS OF REFEREES

Question No. 1,803—Mr. Barnett:

1. How many boards of referees, as established by the unemployment insurance commission, are in existence in Canada?

2. In what city or locality does each of these boards of referees have its headquarters?

3. Over what geographic area does each of these boards of referees exercise jurisdiction?

4. What remuneration is currently being paid (a) to chairmen (b) to other members of boards of referees?

5. During each of the last three fiscal years, what was the cost of operation of each of the boards of referees in Canada?

Return tabled.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

ACQUISITION OF HOME OF SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack) who is most interested in this question, and in view of the urgency of inquiry being made, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, since the home of Sir John Macdonald at Kingston is now for sale, whether the government would consider taking action to secure this home as a national memorial, where Canadians could do honour to one of the great architects of confederation.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the question the right hon. gentleman has put is a reasonable one which should be given consideration by the government, and it is one which I shall ask my colleague the minister of northern affairs to give his attention to at once. I shall also draw it to the Prime Minister's attention as soon as he returns.

SUGAR

REPORTED INTENTION OF B.C. COMPANY TO FREEZE PRICES AT PEAK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I wonder whether he noted in this morning's paper the report of the B.C. Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. who, in their annual report, show a net profit of $2,780,000, which is an increase of $591,000 over the previous year. In this report the president of the company also says it is the intention of his company to freeze sugar prices as of October 18 which, if I recall correctly, was when they were at their peak.

I believe the restrictive trade practices branch was going to look into the question of sugar prices to see if there was any collusion about price fixing. Will the minister undertake to have this matter gone into at the same time?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have not had the report to which the hon. member refers brought to my attention until now, but I shall draw it to the attention of the director of research in the combines investigation branch.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question, how soon does the minister expect to be able to make some statement as a result of the investigation of the restrictive trade practices branch into this whole question of sugar prices?

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Chevrier: There are two ways in which this can be done. I have not disposed of my estimates yet. The house has not been too generous with item No. 1, although I must say hon. members were very kind in their reception of the statement on security. The other manner in which it could be disposed of is by a report but, as my hon. friend knows, no information is made public until such time as a report has been made, and I shall have to ascertain from the director whether a report is about to be issued or not.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister mind informing the house what progress he is making with respect to the sale of the Columbia river to the United States?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I presume what the hon. gentleman had in mind was what progress was being made in the discussions which have to do with the Columbia river treaty project. These discussions began this morning. They will be resumed at 3.30 p.m. and will be continued later in the day, and perhaps tomorrow.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

POSSIBLE LEGAL ACTION AGAINST PRESIDENT BY SUD AVIATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that Sud Aviation will probably sue the president of T.C.A., does the minister intend to take the necessary steps to prevent T.C.A. from being sued jointly and severally?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend, I listened very closely to the announcement which was made on the radio this morning concerning the possibility of a lawsuit. However, before I do anything, I shall wait to see how things turn out because the hon. member's question is highly hypothetical.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I asked the Minister of Justice more particularly whether he intended to take the necessary steps to prevent T.C.A. from being sued jointly and severally, if such legal action were taken?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is hypothetical.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Justice think the hon. member for Lapointe should be included in the action for having provoked these outbursts?

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, my question is not hypothetical. It is just that I would not want T.C.A. to be involved, if such legal action were taken.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I said the question was hypothetical; and if it was not hypothetical, it was certainly largely imaginary as of the moment.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I shall put it to the Acting Prime Minister.

Following the statements of Mr. McGregor, president of T.C.A., to the effect that he would no longer submit plans for the purchase of aircraft for government approval, can the Acting Prime Minister assure the house that this same Mr. McGregor will no longer ask parliament to make up the deficits of T.C.A.?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that a somewhat similar question was put to the Prime Minister last week and he replied at that time that he would like to read the report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping before making a statement in this connection. Personally, I have nothing to add to that statement.

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF FRENCH SPEAKING DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to rectify the situation which prevails at T.C.A. and to suggest the appointment of some French speaking directors, since there are none at the present time?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm for having asked that question. The government will consider that matter in due course.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the false statements made by Mr. McGregor, president of T.C.A., with respect to the Caravelle, is it the intention of the government to suspend the president of that company, who contributes to the deterioration of relations between France and Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I believe that that question is definitely out of order, as it contains in its preamble words and epithets which are contrary to the standing orders.

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. I would like to know what the Acting Prime Minister means by in due course? When he says that he will consider the appointment of the French speaking directors in due course, what does he mean by that?

Mr. Chevrier: These words are clear and precise and I am quite sure that my hon. friend understands their meaning.

Mr. Gregoire: That is a loophole.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO CULTURAL AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It was announced over the week end that President Johnson of the United States has ordered an early start to be made in negotiations for a new Soviet-American cultural agreement. My question is, is Canada giving thought to making an early effort toward reaching a similar agreement?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his question. The government attaches importance to the cultural exchanges between Canada and the Soviet union on a basis of fair and reasonable reciprocity, and welcomes the progress which has already been made in this direction. The Canadian embassy in Moscow has been active in facilitating these exchanges. The question of further development of reciprocal exchanges is under study and the possibility of an agreement is not excluded. On the other hand, hon. members will appreciate that there are a number of implications, financial, administrative and other, which are receiving attention.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CUBA—APPEAL OF CANADIAN AGAINST SENTENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. gentleman will be less prolix in answering the question I am about to ask. Has the minister had any word from the government of Cuba relative to the appeal on behalf of the Canadian who was sentenced to 30 years imprisonment?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the appeal was disallowed and the government is giving this matter consideration. I have to see the Cuban ambassador later today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On what date was the disallowance; is the minister in a position to say that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think it was on Friday, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure; it was Thursday or Friday.

UNITED STATES—PROPER DESIGNATION OF CANADIAN PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What steps does he intend to take to inform the government of the United States that, for some years, we have had general elections in Canada, that the hon. member is himself Secretary of State for External Affairs and that the Prime Minister of Canada is the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that the facts upon which my hon. friend has based his question are very well known, not only to the officials of the United States' government, but by all Canadians as well. Actually, everybody knows that the present Prime Minister is the head of the Canadian government and that he has done much to maintain peace and encourage friendly relations between Canada and other countries.

[Text]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I wonder if the minister would inform Mr. Pierre Salinger of what he has just stated.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has been partially answered in response to a previous question, but would he tell the house whether he would be willing to inform the President of the United States that the Prime Minister is not the foreign minister of Canada but is serving temporarily as its Prime Minister?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this question because it gives me the opportunity to say it was quite apparent two weeks ago when the Prime Minister was in Washington that the new President of the United States regarded him as a very important spokesman in matters which concern not only our two countries but the peace of the world, because the Prime Minister was the second head of government to be received by the new President.

BOLIVIA—POSITION OF CANADIANS HELD AS HOSTAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he give the house any information regarding the three Canadians who are allegedly being held as hostages by certain elements of the population in Bolivia?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to this question I may say that the British ambassador in Bolivia, with whom we have been in close touch, Canada not having a mission there, has confirmed the news reported by the press that a number of persons, including three Canadians and four United States citizens, have been forcibly detained by striking miners in Bolivia. Both the press and the ambassador have identified two of the Canadians as Raymond Brousseau and Aurele Falardeaux, both presumed to be from Kirkland Lake, Ontario. The name of James McNamee of Kingston, Ontario, has also been given in the press but this has not yet been confirmed by the British ambassador. Although it is not certain, there was a report from the British ambassador that Robert Morrison of Ottawa was detained, but a later report now says that he has been released.

It appears that some but not necessarily all of the 21 persons detained by the miners are being held as hostages in order to secure the release by the Bolivian government of two trade union leaders. We have asked the British ambassador to call again on the Bolivian government with instructions to make strong representations to that government to ensure the safety and the release of the Canadians.

Our ambassador in Peru, who is also accredited to Bolivia, is going to La Paz tomorrow morning, the earliest time he can reach that city, and he will of course do everything possible to help the Canadians who have been detained.

TRADE

WHEAT—LOSS RESULTING FROM CONTAMINATED SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him what the current situation is with regard to the contamination found in several cargoes of Canadian wheat. I would also ask him whether these can be cleaned. If not, will the loss be charged to the Canadian wheat board fund, or who will suffer this loss?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there have been no claims against the Canadian wheat board by any of the recipients of this grain. My colleague the Minister of Transport has been in charge of a thorough inquiry into the causes of the glass being found in the grain. It would be possible for the Minister of Transport to make a statement when he returns on Thursday. I could also make a statement, if the hon. gentleman would like to have it, before that time.

TRANSPORT

NORTH SYDNEY-NEWFOUNDLAND—MAINLAND FERRY TERMINAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, but in his absence may I direct it to the acting minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am the acting minister.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Is the acting minister in a position today to inform the house which mainland port this government is going to designate for the new proposed ferry to Argentia, Newfoundland? As the Secretary of State is the acting minister, I am sure he will have a very good answer for us today since he is from the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think a definitive reply can be made until the Minister of Transport is back in his place.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISPOSITION OF BUILDINGS AND PROPERTY AT H.M.C.S. "PREVOST", LONDON, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. What disposition is to be made of buildings and property to be closed out by the Department of National Defence, particularly H.M.C.S. Prevost, London? Are they to be declared surplus and sold?

Mr. Speaker: That is a question for the order paper.

POLICY STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. It has reference to the appearance last Friday of Group Captain Lee, who I believe is the minister's public relations officer, on a national television network. In view of this appearance can the minister say whether it is government policy to permit serving officers or men to state or explain government policy announcements?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it was not a national network but rather just a local network, and he was explaining the effect of the changes on this immediate area. In view of the pressures of the day and as Group Captain Lee is associated with my office, I authorized him to make that statement on my behalf.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question along the same lines, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the article which appeared on the front page of Saturday's Ottawa Citizen quoting an informed source as giving information regarding certain intended reductions in defence expenditures? I am not objecting to the reductions in defence expenditures, but I want to ask the minister if this informed source is the same gentleman to whom reference has just been made. The article appears under the by-line of Mr. Dave McIntosh, and there have been similar articles in the past which have turned out to be very accurate. Are these statements coming from this gentleman in the defence minister's office?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, that would not be the same source, because that one was not very well informed. As I indicated in my statement to the house, there are some adjustments which will be announced following consultation, but they are minor adjustments. This particular story is a very great exaggeration of anything that would be contemplated.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's reply, could he inform the house whether government policy with respect to serving members of the forces has now been changed so that they can explain or state government policy?

Mr. Hellyer: There has never been any prohibition since this government took office against service officers explaining matters of detail having to do with service requirements.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister of National Defence, of all ministers, not aware of the restrictions placed on serving officers by their own rules and regulations?

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether it is now in order for any regular officers in the armed forces to make observations and public statements regarding matters that are controversial. I might also ask him if this Group Captain Lee, who was very recently a wing commander, is now public relations officer to the minister?

Mr. Hellyer: As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, there has been no determination that serving officers are not to give to the public information of a factual nature having to do with their duties. I cannot say whether or not this was the practice under the previous administration, but I have some reason to believe it was not. However, it always has been since the change in government.

Group Captain Lee is a special assistant in my office, and in carrying out his duties he is often called upon to amplify statements of fact in respect of determined policy. What he was doing the other day was strictly in line with his duties.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will he be interpreting for the minister? Will he be this silent source of certain information that goes to the press?

Mr. Hellyer: I resent the implication here. This is a job which is carried out in many departments and is necessary to the proper administration of the department in providing information to the various media, as well as conducting other office routine on behalf of the minister. It is a function which is carried out in all ministers' offices. I would not want the implication to be carried abroad that there was anything unusual in the carrying out of these duties by Group Captain Lee who, incidentally, carries out his duties well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply ask the minister this. Can he point to one example, under the British parliamentary system, where a serving officer becomes an interpreter for a minister?

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question?

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Woolliams: Let him answer that one.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask the minister if he is aware of the fact that in the defence committee when questions are put to serving officers which touch upon matters of policy, the serving officers will not attempt an answer?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think if you will examine the evidence given before this special committee on defence by the chiefs of the three services, you will find that there are rare occasions when there was any interference in respect of answering questions, and then only when they related to matters of unresolved government policy when the minister, who has the responsibility, took over the questions.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister agree that the functions of such an officer are certainly not to announce any reductions in expenditures, which ought to be done by the minister in this house?

Mr. Hellyer: Quite so; and none was, I can assure you.

Mr. Nielsen: I have a further question to the Minister of National Defence. I wonder if the minister could inform the house whether Group Captain Lee is paid by the government, by the air force, or by the minister? Will the minister, when he answers, say whether Group Captain Lee is still a serving officer or a politician's aide?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I object to this question, to the manner in which it was put forward. Group Captain Lee is paid by the Royal Canadian Air Force and his pay, like the pay of all other personnel, civilian or service, in the department, comes out of departmental appropriations. I might say, for my hon. friend's benefit, that this is not a precedent. The previous minister of national defence had a special assistant, Lieutenant Colonel Christian, who was seconded to the minister's office. There have also been precedents for serving officers making statements. When the previous administration was in office Vice Admiral Brock went on television to explain certain developments, and I think it should be set clear nothing we have done in recent times is in any way a precedent which is not in accordance with parliamentary principles and practices.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of National Defence. At future meetings of the defence committee will it be the prerogative of the defence committee members to insist upon an answer from any witness that may appear—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is a hypothetical question dealing with questions committee members might be asking.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was half way through his question, and I was waiting for the whole question to decide whether it was in order.

Mr. MacInnis: I was waiting for a little order so I could make myself heard. The hon. member for Kootenay East rose to his feet, again without recognition from the Chair, which is a habit on that side. My question to the minister was this. At future meetings of the defence committee will members of that committee be in a position to insist upon an answer from any witnesses appearing, when they make the statement that they do not want to answer because it is a matter of policy?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it would depend on the witness. If he was a serving officer he would be required to answer questions of fact.

ADOPTION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF GLASSCO COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council.

Since the Prime Minister made him responsible for the implementation of the Glassco commission report, could the President of the Privy Council inform the house whether he made recommendations to the Minister of National Defence regarding improvements to and even a reorganization of his department in order to cut down administration costs as it was done recently in other sections of that department? Did the President of the Privy Council make recommendations to the Minister of National Defence on that matter?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

FLIGHTS OF NUCLEAR ARMED U.S. PLANES OVER CANADA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of National Defence?

Can the minister tell the house whether U.S. bombers equipped with nuclear weapons are authorized to fly over Canadian territory and to use Canadian bases?

[Text]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are intergovernmental agreements in respect to the use of Canadian air space by United States aircraft. If the hon. gentleman is referring specifically to the strategic air command, they do fly certain flights over Canadian air space from time to time by authority of the Canadian government.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it has always been my understanding that even under that agreement they have to have prior permission from Canada for all individual flights.

Mr. Hellyer: That is correct. Every individual flight is cleared on a daily basis.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—ABSENCE FROM COUNTRY WHILE ON BAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Some two weeks ago the hon. gentleman's parliamentary secretary said a report would be made with reference to Banks leaving the jurisdiction while on bail. Could we be graced by that report now? Further, when will Banks be brought to trial?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): As to the last part of the question, the hon. member probably knows that counsel appeared before the judge in Montreal and a date for the trial was fixed. I do not have the date in my memory now, but I believe it is some time early this month. As far as the first part of the question is concerned, I will have to make inquiries.

QUEBEC—ALLEGED MISCARRIAGE IN COFFIN CASE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gerard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question.

Since the charges made by Jacques Hebert concerning the Coffin case do not concern only the administration of justice, as the minister indicated last week, but also concern directly the criminal law; in short, since that charge is laid against an indictment based on circumstantial evidence, does not the minister think that his department should make its own investigation in order to give reassurance to the Canadian people with regard to the conclusiveness of well-founded circumstantial evidence? I might add that this seems to be the opinion in the broad legal circles in which I move.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is to be congratulated for moving in such broad legal circles. However, I have to tell him that I have nothing to add to the answer I gave last week concerning this case, because everything that happened in the past, both in the procedures and at the trial, took place under provincial jurisdiction. Although the Criminal Code is enacted and approved by this house, the fact remains that the matter, as far as the administration of justice is concerned, comes under the provinces.

However, I might add that Mr. Hebert has been kind enough to send me a copy of his book and I have asked officers of my department to be good enough to read it—as a matter of fact, I am reading it myself—and to please bring to my attention any aspect of this matter which could come under federal jurisdiction. When I get that report, I shall take this question into consideration.

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question on this matter, precisely the question I asked the other day in the absence of the Minister of Justice.

Since a crown corporation which is responsible to the federal government—the C.B.C.—undertook a public investigation of the Coffin case on television, is the Minister of Justice of the opinion that this corporation should have the help of experts and officers of his department?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think this does not change at all the answer I have just given, because if this crown corporation decides by itself to present a program on television, it is its business and the government has no reason to interfere with the internal operations of this corporation as it was announced on many occasions by the Secretary of State.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rheaume (Northwest Territories): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the endorsation by the Prime Minister of a certain book over the week end, could the hon. gentleman tell the house by how much this publication was subsidized by the Liberal party of Canada?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT'S PLANS RESPECTING FULL EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): In the light of the declaration by the leader of the Social Credit party last Thursday that he and his group would support the government on condition that plans to promote full employment for all Canadians were put into effect, will the Acting Prime Minister now inform the house of the government's plans for full employment and tell us when they will be placed before parliament?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Prime Minister): I think the answer to that question is clear. All one has to do is look at the things which have been done by the government thus far and compare this with the present economic activity of the country so as to ascertain what has been done by the government in this respect.

Mr. Kindt: A supplementary question. Were the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister based on employment figures as given by the dominion bureau of statistics, and was his comparison made in relation to former periods comparable with the present period?

Mr. Chevrier: Although this is a matter of debate, I do not hesitate to tell the hon. member that first of all it has to do with the gross national product, which is on the increase as my hon. friend should know—

Mr. Nielsen: Less than last year.

Mr. Chevrier: —and also with the unemployment figures, which show an improvement compared with the same period last year.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. I refer to question No. 1,705 on the order paper, which was placed there on November 19 last. This is the type of information that could probably be obtained in a few minutes, and since there is a hearing before the board of transport commissioners in this matter very shortly I should like to get the information as soon as possible.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

UNITED NATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—CANADIAN REACTION TO PROPOSED EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him if the government has imposed additional restrictions in respect of trade with South Africa in keeping with the decision taken by the security council of the United Nations last week?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have already dealt with this question. I announced an arms embargo in answer to directions of the security council last summer. With regard to the decision of the security council last week, I indicated on Thursday or thereabouts that the government would give consideration to the recommendation made by the security council pursuant to the Norwegian resolution.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON RIOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice an important question which has remained unanswered for several months. Is the minister now in a position to inform the house whether the commissioner of penitentiaries has completed his investigation into the riots at St. Vincent de Paul and the reported attacks by guards on the alleged leaders of the riots? If so, will the minister make the report available to the house for consideration and discussion?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Justice): I have not seen the commissioner of penitentiaries for about a week. He is in western Canada, or was last week. I do not know what the position of the inquiry is, but just as soon as he returns I shall ask him and report to the house.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question. Does it take over three months to make this investigation?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not familiar with the terms of the investigation, other than what I have already reported to the house in connection with another investigation, and I am not sure to which of these investigations my hon. friend is referring. If he is referring to the case which was tried in the Montreal court, I have already made a report on that matter. If he is referring to another investigation, I am afraid I shall have to inquire from the commissioner.

FINANCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY HEALTH MINISTER RESPECTING INSURANCE COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): May I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare this past week end to a meeting of the Manitoba farm union that there was a possibility of some Canadian insurance companies going bankrupt, is the government investigating to see if this is a serious possibility?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I might answer that question. The record of the Canadian insurance companies is one that Canadians can be proud of. There has been no suggestion that the policyholders of any Canadian company are in any danger whatever of losing their rights and benefits.

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER PLANT—PROVISION OF COAL AND POWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry which arises out of a press dispatch dated December 7, which states that Seaboard Power Corporation, owned by the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, has been chosen to supply power for the heavy water plant close by. My question is, is Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation to be responsible for supplying both coal and the production of power for this heavy water project?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): The final arrangements as to who is going to supply the coal and who finally will provide the steam have not yet been made. It is difficult, therefore, to give a categorical answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask a supplementary question. Would this be considered a mistaken bit of information that has been published in this Canadian Press dispatch?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, it will be mistaken or not, depending on how the final arrangements work out.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

LONDON, ONT.—REPORTED REDUCTION IN PAY OF SEASONAL HELP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): I have an urgent question for the Postmaster General. I understand from representations made to me that the casual Christmas employees at the London post office have had their pay reduced from $1.43 to $1 per hour in the middle of their eight weeks of special employment. Would the Postmaster General inform me if this reduction in pay is general in all post offices in Canada, or just in this isolated instance?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for telling me beforehand that he would ask that question.

In reply, I must say that temporary employees hired during the holidays in urban offices in Canada are paid as follows: sorting helper, $1 per hour; mailman's helper, $1.25 per hour; mail handling helper, $1.25 per hour. All other occasional help is still getting $1.43 per hour.

It may happen that some people work occasionally to replace regular employees who are absent and that their employment is terminated when the regular employees come back to work. If those people are subsequently hired to help during the Christmas season, they are paid according to the wage schedule I have just given.

[Text]

As far as the London employees referred to by the hon. member are concerned, the postmaster at London informs the department that seven persons who were employed as casuals at $1.43 per hour in November, replacing absent employees, were released because the absent employees returned to duty, and these seven people have now been offered re-employment as Christmas helpers at $1 per hour.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a very definite question of the Postmaster General because of the month we are now in, and I speak from experience of almost 30 years in opposition, 10 of them in this house. This being the month of December I would like to ask the Postmaster General, with regard to temporary appointments in the Post Office Department over the Christmas period, to whom do we, particularly in opposition, tell our applicants to apply for temporary work? Is it to the man who is named as the counsellor in my riding, the defeated Liberal candidate, or is it to the employment service?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, there are many ways to apply for positions at Christmas. First of all an applicant may go to the post office and apply. Second, he can seek work through the employment bureau, and there are also some members of parliament who recommend applicants. They can also write to the Postmaster General himself who will refer the names to the respective post offices. There are so many ways that I think the hon. member can rely on any one of them to recommend applicants.

Mr. Winch: Which is the speediest way for an opposition member to get results?

Mr. Denis: The speediest way, Mr. Speaker, is to ask for the job in September or October, not when it is too late.

Mr. Winch: I am speaking about three or five days of employment over the Christmas period. You say to apply in September?

Mr. Denis: Usually after the opening of the schools the students go right back to the post offices and file their applications. I am sure practically all of them are taken on with great pleasure.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker may I ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question?

Would the minister not think that the N.E.S. is the best and sole place which should be used by the applicants for employment?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, precisely. We contacted all the N.E.S. offices and all the people who went there got a job, at least in Montreal.

[Text]

Mr. Gene Rheaume (Northwest Territories): I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. When he suggested hon. members have applicants write to him, what will his address be after Christmas?

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR OFFICE OF REPRESENTATION COMMISSIONER AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 3, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the office of representation commissioner and to define the duties of the commissioner under the said measure, in addition to those assigned to him under the Canada Elections Act and under a measure to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith; to provide for the salary and expenses of the commissioner; to provide for the appointment of a substitute commissioner and for the payment of his salary and expenses; to authorize the commissioner to appoint such officers and employees as are necessary for the conduct of his office and to engage on a temporary basis persons having technical or specialized knowledge of matters relating to the work of the commissioner; to increase the salary of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and to effect certain other changes in the Canada Elections Act consequential upon the said measure; and to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund under the authority of the said measure of all amounts required for the payment of salary and other expenses under the said measure and under the measure to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions, including expenses of administration thereunder.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister going to say anything at this time?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think at the meeting of representatives of the parties there was an understanding that it was thought the debate on this matter was concluded; that we would, if there was agreement of the house, pass the resolution and give first reading to the bill, which would stand over until next Monday for debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I think that is correct.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Pickersgill thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-126, respecting the office of representation commissioner and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of procedure, now that we have given first reading to the bill respecting the representation commissioner would it not be appropriate to revert to introduction of bills and thus introduce the two bills on redistribution at the same time? We fully understand there is not to be debate on both bills at the present time, but possibly both bills should reach the light of day at the same time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In that connection I do not think we are agreeable.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid I am not agreeable either, because I do not think the bill is ready for distribution, but I hope it will be available tomorrow.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, June 3, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Batten in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures and to supply the financial requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines and other affiliated companies (i) in the year 1962, not exceeding $156,500,000 and (ii) in the year 1963, not exceeding $157,000,000, and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1964; to provide for the financial requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines in an amount not exceeding $31,800,000, either by means of loans from Her Majesty to the national company or by means of issues of securities of the national company, authorized and guaranteed as to interest and principal by Her Majesty, the cash proceeds by either method to be used only for the financial requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines, the capital needs of the national company itself being met entirely through the sale of preferred stock to Her Majesty and from reserves for depreciation and debt discount; to authorize Her Majesty to continue to purchase until December 31, 1964, Canadian National Railway Company 4 per cent preferred stock in an annual amount not exceeding 3 per cent of the gross revenues on the loan of $100,000,000 to the company authorized by the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1952; to authorize Her Majesty to make loans to the Canadian National Railway Company and Trans-Canada Air Lines to meet deficiencies in operating revenues to June 30, 1964, any such loans to be repaid from revenues of the railway company and Trans-Canada Air Lines or, if revenues prove insufficient, by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament; and to raise the limit on the Canadian National Railway Company's authority to refund matured, maturing and callable securities from the present level of $230,000,000 to $480,000,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could just say a word. It was also suggested, at the meeting that was held after the Prime Minister's statement on Friday, that there might be general agreement that this resolution too would be dealt with without debate, the bill given first reading, and the bill stood over for a week, until after the committee on the C.N.R. would have met. If that was agreeable to the house it was clearly understood that there would be no attempt from this side of the house to restrict in any way, on any technical points, the freedom of debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I think that is acceptable, provided matters that it would not ordinarily be permissible to discuss on second reading can be taken up by hon. members and their right to do so will not be challenged. There is, of course, the very important matter of the recent acquisition by Trans-Canada Air Lines of certain aircraft. The disputes that have arisen in connection therewith and the questions asked today indicate there are many phases of that matter which certain hon. members would like to discuss.

So long as it is clearly understood that when the bill comes up for second reading there will be no challenge, as the Secretary of State has said, to the right to proceed afield and deal with matters that under ordinary circumstances could not be dealt with under the rules with regard to second reading, the suggestion is acceptable.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may say a word in reply to the right hon. gentleman. The necessary freedom would probably be greater on clause 1 of the bill when we were in committee than it would be on second reading. But I can give the assurance to the house that no exception will be taken on any technical grounds at either of those stages—that is, on second reading, which after all is governed by certain rules, or on clause 1 of the bill—to any discussion that would be permissible at this stage of the proceedings.

If that could be the understanding it would certainly expedite the business of the house. I might also remind hon. members that the estimates of the Department of Transport have not yet been concluded, either, so that any questions that conceivably might not be in order at this stage would probably still be in order on the minister's estimates.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, that last qualification disturbs me a little. I hope it was not meant to be other than just a statement made for the purpose of completing the speech the hon. gentleman was making, because I have found the Minister of Transport, when asked questions, invariably concludes that they are loaded. We do not want answers of that kind. We want to be in a position to ask questions that will be answered, loaded or unloaded.

Mr. Pickersgill: I assure the right hon. gentleman that it is merely an additional opportunity.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) that many pieces of legislation concerning railways are now under study either by the committees or by the house.

Moreover, vote No. 212A of the Department of Transport's estimates, which deals precisely with subsidies granted to the Canadian National Railways, has been submitted to the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping.

Since the president of the Canadian National Railways is to appear before the committee this week, I wonder whether it might not be wise for the Secretary of State to make available to the members of this sessional committee all the necessary information, so that when we come back to the house to study the legislation, the most important questions will have already been threshed out by the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to avail myself of the circumstances to remind the Secretary of State that he already promised us something concerning a certain legislation. And even if we raised the question of privilege in that regard, the problem I am referring to—and the Secretary of State is well aware of what I mean—has not yet been settled to our satisfaction. Therefore, I ask the Secretary of State to look into that matter at the same time.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps, since I am a member of this committee and have a certain function in it, I can be more certain that what I say here will apply, than it might elsewhere. I am sure, however, that having the bill rather than the resolution will make no difference so far as the inquiry is concerned. In fact having the bill available will mean that hon. members can take the bill with them into the committee and will have an opportunity there to ask Mr. Gordon any questions respecting the bill before it comes to us for second reading, which will not be before next Monday.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Gordon) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-127, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1962, to the 30th day of June, 1964, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING APPLICATION AND MAKING CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-124, to amend the Gold Mining Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the house will not expect too much of an explanation this afternoon on this amending bill, because on November 27 as we were coming to the end of the session I took the precaution of explaining to the house the purposes of this bill.

The bill amends the assistance that has been available to gold mines since 1948. In brief there are only two matters of substance or change in the amending bill. One is that the assistance will continue for a term of four years. This is the longest term that has ever been offered in an amending bill. The other matter is the reference in the statement I made, as reported at page 5144 of Hansard, respecting a denial in about 18 months hence of assistance to new gold mines, where employees would not normally evolve around an existing community that was dependant upon the gold mining economy.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the minister for the brevity of his statement, because I expected he might have gone into further detail in regard to his bill, particularly in regard to some of its new provisions. The minister's statement of November 27 was welcomed by the gold mining communities inasmuch as it removed any doubts as to the possibility of the gold mining industry not relying on the assistance which they had been getting, particularly since 1958, at an increased rate. Since the coming into force of the emergency provisions I believe a total sum of close to $170 million had been paid up to the end of 1962. That assistance not only contributed but I think in most cases enabled the gold mines to remain in operation and produce for Canada the metal which is a source of great wealth. It also contributed in a very striking way to the prosperity of large sectors of our country.

I would have liked the minister to give the house some explanation about the restrictions which would apply to new mines after July 1, 1965. That particular provision has been questioned with anxiety by the gold mining communities and also by prospectors generally throughout this country. It could, I think, lead to a curtailment of the operations of a very vital industry for Canada, and I am afraid it will have a dampening influence on prospectors and mineral exploration. It may foreshadow within a few years a notable decrease in the amount of assistance which the government will be giving to the gold producers.

The main reason this provision has given rise to anxiety is that in its application it may defeat a most laudable objective, namely an extension of gold mining activities to other areas throughout Canada. Surely this country has not reached the stage where it feels it has a sufficient supply of gold. There is a saying which the minister must often have heard; "Gold is where you find it". Does this provision mean that if in the future a new discovery of substantial proportions is made outside the established gold mining communities, and a mine is established it will not qualify for assistance? If that is so I think the mining people are justified in viewing the provision with great alarm.

I was surprised that the minister did not amplify his statement in this respect this afternoon, and I hope he will do so before the end of the debate, because this is an important matter. I do not think this is the sort of measure which should be whipped through without adequate scrutiny. There is, I feel, something abnormal in the fact that the government must give emergency assistance to an industry which has contributed so much to the wealth of this country and which is producing a metal that is sought throughout the world. Throughout the centuries gold has been the one product which has always been in demand. It could always fetch its price. Yet despite this, and despite the fact that there is a world shortage of the metal, the gold mining industry has to be treated as a depressed industry requiring emergency treatment.

Of course we know the reason for this situation. It is because there has not been an increase in the price of gold since 1933, at which time the price of gold was raised from $20.62 an ounce to its present price of $35 in United States currency. Since that year, despite mounting costs and inflation throughout the world and despite the ever increasing demand for gold, the price has remained unchanged. This has been one cause of high prices in many countries and of a decline in activity, not merely in mining activity but economic activity generally. To my mind this measure, welcome as it is in its principles, and necessary as it is to the degree that it provides assistance to the gold producers is still nothing but a palliative, nothing but a stopgap.

It would seem according to informed observers, people in financial circles and experts who have made a special study of gold and its price, that the real solution to the problems of the mining industry and also, perhaps, to the slackening in the economies of several of the leading industrial nations of the world, would be an increase in the price of gold. There is a very good case to be made out in favour of such an increase at this time. One reason is that there exists a world shortage of the metal. Supplies of gold, including annual production, are insufficient to look after the normal needs of trade and commerce, and insufficient to accommodate public purposes.

To give the house an example, let me point out that in 1962 the combined governments of the western world were able to purchase only $325 mililon worth of gold out of a fresh supply of some $1,550 million. Most of the supplies which were purchased by the governments of the western world went to meet the normal demands of trade and commerce. A much larger share went into the hands of hoarders and speculators who for several years made a practice of accumulating gold in the belief that soon the world price will have to be increased.

The supply is short in Canada and it is short in the United States. As a matter of fact, in 1962 the United States had to earmark some $12 billion of its supply of gold simply to back up the United States dollar, which left only about $3 billion for normal interchange. In addition, it must be remembered that foreign demands on United States currency amount to some $15 billion and, of course, if all those demands were required to be met in gold, as they have a right to be met if the creditors insist, the United States gold stock would be almost entirely depleted.

There have been potent reasons why the United States should resist the world wide demand for an increase in the price of gold. To accept it would be tantamount to a devaluation of the United States currency. Nevertheless the advantages to be derived from an increase in the price of gold are obvious. There would be an immense stimulation of trade and industry. Unemployment would be reduced. More aid could be given to underdeveloped countries.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why did you not do it when you were in office?

Mr. Martineau: I will give an example, one which might at the same time answer the very intelligent observation just made by the Secretary of State. His interventions are always intelligent. They are always in the interests of shortening our debates and getting his legislation passed more smoothly. I take this occasion to congratulate him on his subtlety.

In any event, the Secretary of State asked me why this was not done while we were in office. In doing that he displayed an astonishing amount of ignorance, because a decision of that kind does not depend on the Canadian government. It makes no difference which party is in office; it is not the province of the Canadian government to increase the world price of gold. That can only be done by the power which controls the international market for gold and which controls the price on an international scale, that is the United States government. I am sure the Secretary of State knows that very well. But last year, in 1962—since the Secretary of State did bring this matter up, and because it is pertinent to the debate—the Canadian government of that day did devalue the Canadian dollar by a small amount, to 92½ cents in relation to the United States dollar. We know that this devaluation has already had, and will continue to have, as the figures for foreign trade reveal, a stimulating effect on the Canadian economy. It benefited Canada's foreign exchange position and, of course, resulted in an increase in our trade earnings.

Similar benefits, but on a much larger scale, would derive from an increase in the price of gold to say double its present price, making it $70 U.S. an ounce, which would amount to a devaluation of United States currency by half. An increase in the price of gold, the advantages of which I have just outlined, would help most industrial countries in the world but they would help Canada in a very particular manner because Canada is one of the primary gold producing countries of the world. The latest gold production figures I have are for 1961 although the minister may have the 1962 figures; but I would point out that in 1961 production of gold amounted to 4,425,000 ounces. Canada, of course, is a developing country with vast potential mineral reserves still untapped. There is no doubt that, as occurred in 1933 and later after the world price of gold was increased, a great new wave of mining exploration would follow today if the world price were increased. This would result in new gold discoveries which would help to alleviate the world shortage of gold and would bring new prosperity to Canada and create new communities where today only wilderness exists.

Not only the gold mines would benefit from the new mineral exploration and prospecting, which would be sparked in this way, but there would also be discoveries of other minerals, thereby enhancing Canada's position as one of the leading countries of the world in mineral production. In turn, secondary industries and the economy in general would greatly benefit from such a move.

Most people who have studied the situation are in agreement in saying that this is the one single action that could contribute most to Canada's prosperity. Perhaps I might give an example of the contribution one single mine can make to the economy of the country. Let me take Dome Mines Limited of South Porcupine, northern Ontario, which is not far removed from my own constituency. In 1961, this mine bought supplies from 126 communities in Canada broken down in this way: 82 in Ontario, 22 in Quebec, 9 in New Brunswick, 6 in Nova Scotia, 2 in Saskatchewan, 2 in Alberta, 2 in British Columbia and 2 in Manitoba. These purchases were made from a total of 622 companies. This means that in addition to the very worth-while contribution arising from the production of gold by this mine, gold being in great demand, as I have said, the benefits from the operation of this one gold mine are spread out in an intricate network throughout the entire country.

In my own constituency we had a notable gold producer which ceased operations a few years ago, not because it could not survive financially but because the reserves had been depleted. I am referring to Belleterre (Quebec) Gold Mines Limited. My constituency has along one border and on its fringe the pre-Cambrian shield which extends through northwestern Quebec and northern Ontario and in which are found the majority of Canada's gold producers. I often wonder what would have happened to our country during the dark and deepest days of the depression if it had not been for this vigorous industry which provided employment for so many people and also provided an impetus, encouragement and inspiration to the rest of the country which at that time was stagnating under the severity of a world-wide depression.

Because of the reasons I have just mentioned I believe the time has come for the government to initiate talks with the United States government and perhaps also with the world monetary fund officials in order to have the situation fully examined and to reach conclusions that might influence the United States government to decide to take the imperative step of increasing the price of gold. As I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, we are happy that the legislation is being extended but we hope it will not result in the initiation of a policy on the part of the government that will lead to the discouragement of mineral exploration, because if that were to happen it would be a very sad day for the industry, for the mining communities and for the country as a whole. I am looking forward to further explanations from the minister when he closes the debate.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, we are very happy to have the opportunity again to support the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and its extension for another four years. We do this knowing that the minister must be having certain difficulties with his conscience because of not having made the act permanent rather than emergency legislation. I think all who are interested in gold mining will agree that the industry is not likely to go ahead under present circumstances but that gold production is very apt to become a dying field of endeavour, and therefore the emergency that was apparent 17 years ago will still be apparent until the last one of the gold mines closes down.

We are very sympathetic to the position the minister takes in stipulating in the new legislation that assistance will not be provided to new areas developing gold production if it results in the establishment of new communities, but rather for the development of producers in areas already dependant on gold mining.

I believe the minister is to be congratulated on having learned one lesson which the Canadian people learned at considerable expense in the case of Elliot Lake where assistance was given to the development of a new mining field and the creation of a town without making sure that the industry would continue to be able to exist over a period of years.

I agree with something that the last speaker said but I would point out that he had the opportunity and failed to do anything about changing the price of gold. It is very easy for me to say this is a worth-while endeavour and that the price of gold should be increased, because I think this would solve the problems of many of the producers in my area and would have a favourable reaction so far as many of the producers in other areas are concerned. However, we are all aware of the fact that Canada as a prime producer of gold is dependant upon the international monetary fund, and more particularly the United States, for the price of the product.

I might give an example of something that happened years ago when I was a miner, and the president of a union that was on strike and had been for a number of years. I visited the president of this small independent company for which I worked. The company owned three gold mines. I went to the United States to discuss the matter of settling the strike with the president. I thought that the company I had worked for was quite a sizeable one but I was very impressed by the fact that while he was the president of the company he was also considered, in the United States city in which he lived, to be the largest real estate holder in that area. In addition, he was the head of one of the largest legal firms in that city and had many other interests besides gold mining.

The only reason I was able to see him was that I was naïve enough to think that I should be able to do so. When I arrived in his office I told his receptionist that I wanted to see the president, giving his name. She asked me if I had an appointment and I said no. She said, "Who will I tell him is asking for an appointment?" I gave her my name and I said, "You can tell him I work for him in Timmins". When she told him that he decided he had better find out whom he was employing in Timmins, because I imagine he never considered any of us in the gold mining field to be his employees.

We discussed the matter of increasing the price of gold, and it is not quite as simple as the miners or some of the mines sometimes think. He said to me, "I have a little money tied up in gold mines and I should like to see the price of gold go up but if the price of gold goes up you can easily figure out what this is going to mean to me in dollars and cents in relation to my real estate". It is easy for us to think only that Canada is in the position of producing gold, and we are not really too interested in the stockholders. The stockholder, of course, has to make a profit or he is not going to be interested in the particular field, but over a period of years the stockholders have made sizeable profits from many of the existing mines. The contribution made to the nation has been dealt with by the previous speaker. It is a contribution that cannot be overemphasized. It is not generally known that there are many other industries in Canada dependant upon the gold mining industry in one way or another. It is interesting to ride on the trains and, in talking to the engineers, learn that during the depression they worked for the gold mines under some sort of hoisting licence, and then were able to go back to the running trade after the depression. The same thing is true in so far as the manufacture of cable and other supplies is concerned.

There is much more gold, I am sure, under the pre-Cambrian shield than has been mined. It is necessary, in my opinion, for the Canadian government to go to the international monetary fund and demand an increase in the price of gold. We really cannot separate gold from the other monetized metals, but I think the time has come for Canada to decide whether or not we are getting proper value for the gold we export at $35 an ounce, or whether the Canadian government should stockpile it. We have never really objected to the mines stockpiling gold, and I want to talk about that later in connection with McIntyre. One time they were mad at the government and they stockpiled gold.

We have said many times that they are using this scheme to low-grade their property. This is a matter of great concern to the miners who are dependant on that ore. However, that is not the purpose of my intervention today. First of all, I believe the minister should remove the word "emergency" from this measure. We would be quite happy to move an amendment when we reach the committee stage, because I think the minister will agree that unless something happens we do not foresee at the moment, there is really no possibility at the end of four years of not having to extend this legislation.

I think we have an obligation to the communities because the communities have been literally unable to do anything for themselves. Not long ago the representatives of these communities came to Ottawa and, at the invitation of the minister, I sat in on the presentation of the briefs by the representatives of these communities. I should like to quote one sentence from one of the briefs. In the conclusion, the brief refers to the fact that the mines in these communities have derived $170 million in aid over the past 16 years. They want this continued because they have not been able to arrive at any other solution. The brief reads as follows:

> Beyond this immediate question, however, we have tried to persuade you and your colleagues and fellow members, that the time is opportune for an imaginative reappraisal of the whole scope and purpose of the legislation as an instrument of national economic development.

As an aside, I would say that I am sure this could be revised in many ways. However, I presume the only way they want it revised is upward. However, the brief reads as follows:

> Economic growth is the core of much of your policy thinking these days, just as it was of ours in, for example, the 1958 study of the gold mining community. Diversification has proved to be a rocky road to economic growth in the gold towns, until already the areas around Timmins, Val d'Or, and Rouyn-Noranda have been defined by your government as being so depressed as to be eligible for special federal assistance in business development. Most of the gold mining communities are in equal difficulty. Considering the gamut of local, national and international considerations bound up in gold mining, we would conclude this submission by calling to your attention the tremendous impetus to economic growth which would flow from a truly positive approach to the extraction of our gold resources.

Well, there is a difference of opinion even amongst the representatives who came to Ottawa. I am happy to say that my area may be just a little more progressive, a little more advanced in its thinking, than they are in Porcupine and some other areas. This is true for a very simple reason which does not relate to a difference in people or a difference in areas. The only difference is that many of the gold mines in Kirkland Lake have closed down, and those that have not closed are in the process of informing their shareholders and everyone in general that they are on the verge of closing down. The problem in this area, therefore, is immediate so far as the producers are concerned. They have made other suggestions which I believe the government is considering. I hope the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Benidickson) will keep in touch with the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) because it is my opinion that this money we are paying out in the form of emergency gold mining assistance would be better paid for the development of secondary industry. If we are going to take care of the transition period, I would say that the $17 million we will be paying this year could be better used in the development of secondary industry.

We have been interested in some of the things that have happened. One of the most interesting developments has been that of the McIntyre mine, which has adopted an archaic attitude toward some of its companies. This company may talk about the earnings of employees over the years, but at the same time they do not say much of what has been paid to shareholders or what the company, as an entity, has earned. The company has undertaken some development, but that has not any relationship to the amount of money the company has taken from the emergency gold mining assistance fund. The nearly quarter of a million dollars which has flowed from the fund to this company, in my opinion, has not been in keeping with the amount of profit the company has earned.

I suggest we should be interested in this matter. In 1962 we gave McIntyre $1,064,000 in aid. Then, that year McIntyre had a profit of $5,330,760 on which they paid income tax of only $67,586. I suggest that this is a cause for some alarm when we know that some of the smaller producers in adjacent areas are paying half of their total profit in income tax. As an example I cite the case of Cisco in the Gowganda area, a silver producing mine. I want to compare these two mines for the benefit of hon. members. In 1962, Cisco had a profit of $469,000, a little less than half a million dollars, on which they paid income taxes of $224,000, almost a quarter of a million dollars. McIntyre made $5.5 million of profit and yet only paid $67,586 in income tax. I think there is a great disparity between the two which we should think about.

The people of the community are of the opinion that the department has not the facilities to really ascertain upon what the emergency gold mining assistance is being paid at McIntyre. I have a statement here, and I will read some of it. It is to be found in sessional paper 88A of November 1962. We have in the Gowganda area a silver producing mine called Castle, which in 1958 was made a division of McIntyre mines. This mine has been making a very large profit and, according to the figures, has been paying about half a million dollars or so to McIntyre each year. We are of the opinion that the greater the loss at Castle, the more E.G.M.A. will be earned because costs have risen at McIntyre. This is not a separate branch, it is a division of McIntyre itself. If you make a calculation of the E.G.M.A. that has been paid to McIntyre, you will find a sizeable increase each year since Castle was made a division of McIntyre.

Why should we be interested, one way or the other? One of the reasons is that McIntyre has been living in the dark ages so far as their employees are concerned. The gold mining industry has paid the lowest wages of any mining industry in Canada. I think, Mr. Speaker, you would be interested in this, that the gold mines paid the lowest wages; silver paid a better wage, as did copper, zinc and the other base metals. The highest wage in the mining industry accrued to the iron miners, the lowest base metal we have in the mining industry. It looks to be the case that the higher the price of the product, the more precious the metal, then the lower are the wages in the industry. There is a definite relationship all up the scale.

The silver mining industry has been organized for some time. The two mines in Gowganda were organized last year by the united steel workers, and Siscoe made an arrangement in keeping with the wages in the silver mining industry. The Castle, owned by McIntyre, is run by an old mining baron by the name of Campbell, who for many years has had a connection with the Castle mine and who is an engineer with McIntyre. He has always kept his finger on the pulse of the gold mining area at Castle, but since the contracts were not agreeable the Castle closed down. This has meant that the McIntyre is showing a loss of $500,000, which will probably be made up by increased amounts under E.G.M.A., which means that the E.G.M.A. payments will be higher in 1964 because the Castle closed its operations.

I do not know if we can bring any pressure on this company to divorce itself from the wing of McIntyre, so that the miners can be re-employed, but we are going to make it really miserable for McIntyre until they allow the only silver company in my area to meet with the employees and make some arrangements.

The former minister got himself involved in this matter of surveys, but mining is a very difficult proposition. I laid a charge one time on information that was given to me regarding a particular stope at the McIntyre, which was one of these high grading stopes. The department said they would investigate it and report the findings of their investigation. However, according to my information, this investigation was never made, and it is also my information that if they are going to do this surveying they will have to borrow the men from the provincial department of mines because there are very few people in the department who can go underground and do the physical work involved.

Here is a letter sent out on February 28, 1962, from the head of the taxation and legislation section of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, to Mr. P. B. McCrodan, manager, McIntyre Porcupine Mines Limited, Schumacher:

Dear Sir:

T. W. Verity and W. J. Beard inspection engineers, will visit your mining property on or about March 23, 1962 to carry out duties in connection with the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act with respect to the designated year 1961.

Would you kindly prepare certain relevant information and plans prior to the visit. A "List of Data" and a copy of an inspection report form are attached for your guidance and convenience in the preparation of the information.

Yours truly,
E. C. Hodgson
Head,
Taxation and Legislation Section.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I worked for a long time in the mines and one of the greatest complaints miners had was the fact that in Ontario, when a safety check was going to be made at a mine, the mine was phoned up and told on Friday night about the check. Finally, because of our complaints, the government realized this was not a fair process, because all the men were taken off the work they were doing and were put to work making the mine safe so that the inspector would not get himself killed when he walked through it.

The department finally quit notifying the mines, but the inspectors came up with a different gimmick. An inspector would visit a mine the day before, bring his clothes and hang them in the dryer, which very fact indicated he was going to do the inspection there next day before he went anywhere else. We do not believe in this kind of inspection.

I mention the McIntyre in this connection, because not only have they played around with silver but they are now concerned with a new copper project. They have been fortunate enough to develop a copper body by accident. They were doing development work for gold in a gold mining area, and fortunately found themselves with a very large low-grade copper project close to their gold workings. I suggest that these mining inspectors were not, in 1962, able to do an evaluation for 1961 of the costs of production in that mine because they were not in a position to take into consideration the cost division between the development in copper and the development in gold.

We know that in 1963 the mine is ready to go into production. Now, we want to be very fair to the department because they have had requests to operate this as a separate mine, but after hearing briefs on the subject they have decided it is not a separate mine, and they are not going to allow the three year tax period from the development. I note that on September 9, 1963 they wrote to McIntyre Porcupine Mines as follows:

In examining the application submitted by your company for assistance for the period January 1 to June 30, 1963 it has been noted that a deduction of costs applicable to the copper mine has been made from the costs of producing gold listed on the "General expenses at mine" sheet. This together with a number of items showing increases in costs has raised the problem of providing a suitable means for the examination of the division of costs made between the production from the McIntyre gold mining unit and the McIntyre copper mining unit.

Would you be good enough, in the third quarter application for 1963 and subsequent applications, to submit detailed information on the cost of production from the copper mining unit in a manner similar to that used in the presentation of the cost of production of gold through the use of sheets number 1, 2, 3, 4A, 4B, and 5, schedule II.

The application for the second quarter of 1963 has been approved for advance payment in the amount of $210,495.25. In arriving at the amount of advance due, a holdback rate of 25 per cent was applied in view of the possible changes in the division of costs between copper and gold. Your attention is also drawn to an error in subtraction in the amount of $100,000 which was made in the computation of the amount of advance due in the application as submitted.

It was very nice that they should draw this small matter of $100,000 to the attention of the mine. I did not think McIntyre had that kind of accounting system and would make that kind of mistake. But, Mr. Speaker, you will see this is causing a great deal of concern. My concern is not so much in presenting difficulties to McIntyre in getting E.G.M.A., but in the fact that I think they are damned crooks so far as their employees are concerned. If they do not straighten up their affairs with their employees, then we shall be after them because the employees really are the communities. The employees working in these mines provide their communities with all the taxes they need for municipal services. The mines pay very little taxes and buy a very small amount of their materials locally, mostly on a wholesale level, so that it is the wages of the people they employ which provide the lifeline for the communities.

If McIntyre start playing around with their employees they are going to be in trouble with me, with the E.G.M.A. inspectors, and I am sure with the minister. Our avowed purpose in supporting E.G.M.A. is not that it is a cure-all for keeping life in these communities, but that it is a stopgap measure to keep the communities in existence until we can arrive at a system of providing them with industrial assistance as an alternative to gold mining.

So long as Canada is not interested in handling gold as an export commodity, and treating it as a mint commodity which the government itself is going to sell, then we are not interested in mining gold. We do not care if we have gold in our stockpiles because we do not use it as backing for money. It is the same as if Ford were manufacturing cars in Canada and were exporting them to the United States at a set price, and the reason the set price is there is the reason we are supporting E.G.M.A. assistance to these communities.

Therefore, we are giving advance notice that we are going to war on McIntyre until they decide they are going to do something about their employees. This company has several hundreds of millions of dollars in its portfolio, to invest in various forms across the nation, and every red cent of it was built up on the money it earned on the work, labour and resources that the Canadian people has had in the gold mining industry in the Porcupine area. The company has an obligation, because the miners are only earning $1.25 an hour, and they are working underground for that low wage. The base wage in most of the iron mines is well over $2 an hour. There are sweepers getting close to $2 an hour in the base metal industry. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are not asking for anything extra and certainly nothing in keeping with the occupation in which they work and the hazards under which they work. We are not asking for anything more than is due to the communities that were built around them. We are pleased, therefore—despite what I say about McIntyre—to support E.G.M.A. We think the controls being exercised by the department are probably not strong enough or active enough, however, to curtail a company that is perhaps out to beat the department.

This government is anxious, no doubt, as other governments have been, to keep the industry alive with this emergency gold mining assistance. I am not sure in my own mind that McIntyre has not abused the purpose of this act. To illustrate the attitude of these people I should like to read this letter. This is a letter that goes in to the department quarterly, four times a year. It is from McIntyre Porcupine Mines, Limited and says:

> We enclose herewith, in quadruplicate, application of this company for the six months period ended June 30th, 1961 for assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.
> Will you please give this claim your usual prompt attention and forward your cheque for $308,268.09 at your early convenience.

In other words, "Get cracking; my money is due". People do not write like this when their pension cheque is overdue. This is the attitude they use to the communities, to the government and to everybody with whom they deal. When they go to arbitration they speak of the master and servant arrangement; they go back to laws that have long been repealed. Therefore we think there has to be much closer supervision of a company that appears to be increasing over the years with the assistance of E.G.M.A. and which we find is in a position to make over $5 million profit.

I think a legitimate question to ask is, why should we be making a donation of $1 million to this company, when the profit they are making is so considerable? If they can prove this is for the production of gold and there are other factors involved, I think this is perfectly all right. But I suggest that when this copper project goes into operation we will have the same difficulty with the new product, with regard to getting better wages out of this company, because they will continue to use gold as the reason for not paying decent wages, instituting any pension plan or doing anything for the community or the people.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the minister, and I hope all hon. members will support the idea of not allowing new gold mines to develop outside those areas where gold is already a major production factor. This means, as I understand it—and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that if new mines can be found in Matachewan, Kirkland Lake or Timmins, these gold mines will be supported under the same type of arrangement—

Mr. Benidickson: With a proper margin of profit.

Mr. Peters: Yes, of course, taking into consideration the cost of production and other factors. But we hope this will not be extended into new gold mining areas if such were found on the outskirts of Ottawa or somewhere else, and particularly in areas more remote, for the simple reason that we want this matter of emergency gold mining assistance to produce benefit and assist the welfare of the gold mining communities as long as those communities are dependant on this industry as their source of income.

We also ask the minister to give complete co-operation to the Minister of Industry in searching out, through surveys and whatever means are available, all possible avenues for developing secondary industry in these areas so that sooner or later these communities will find themselves again in the self-supporting position which they desire, and which I think the Canadian people desire for them.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on the basis that the better you know your subject, the shorter your speech will be, I can say that I know the gold subject very well. However that is not exactly the case and I shall be very brief in my comments. I do wish to go on record as supporting the extension of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, because we believe it is essential for our gold mining industry in Canada at the present time.

The world situation in regard to the supply of gold is rather critical. For over 20 years now, in fact for almost 30 years, the price of gold has been at a fixed rate. The cost of living in all parts of the world has increased rapidly during this period of time, but the price of gold has not increased. From one aspect this has caused a great deal of pressure upon the gold market of the world, and it is becoming obvious that the price of gold will have to be increased in the not too distant future if this commodity is to continue to form the basis of international exchange, as it does at the present time.

There is no doubt that on an international basis we are in trouble with the gold standard, even as we were in trouble with the gold standard on an internal basis in 1935. This situation is forcing a new policy to develop in regard to international settlements. However, until this comes about I think the gold market will continue to be very strong as far as the need of the world for more gold is concerned. Certainly in Canada we should be doing all we can to increase, rather than decrease, the amount of gold produced. In other words, because of the short demand on gold today the demand for gold will continue for some time, even though the previous speaker mentioned that gold in its relative importance as a trading commodity may eventually go out of the picture altogether.

This brings me back to the point that it is important that the E.G.M.A. policy be continued, and we support the government in extending it at this time. I am particularly grateful to the minister for including in this extension of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act new mines which might come into existence within the next 18 months; that is, up to June 30, 1965. This means that new mines in the process of being developed at the present time are protected as well as mines which are actually in production. This is not the place to debate this matter at the present time, but I believe it is important that the government restudy and reassess its entire policy of taking care of the gold mining situation. I believe that the inevitable developments which will take place within our own economy as far as gold is concerned and also internationally, as far as the use of gold is concerned, demand that some more satisfactory policy be worked out to cover the gold mining industry. In the meantime there is no alternative but to extend the present policy, which is being done in this piece of legislation.

I do not wish to belabour the point any further, Mr. Speaker, but I repeat that we give our support to this bill. At the same time we urge the government to initiate immediately a study of how our over-all gold policy can be improved upon. We support the provision that new mines coming into operation in the next 18 months will also be covered by this assistance.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, it is too late in the day and too late in the season to take up too much time on the bill before us today. However there are a few things I should like to say. I wonder whether the government has really come to grips with this problem of gold, or whether they have just sort of swept it under the rug for another four years. After all, if we look back over the history of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act we see that it goes back some 16 years now. I would like to know from the government just what has been solved in those 16 years. Are we any closer to a solution of the problems of the gold mining industry today than we were 16 years ago, in 1948, when this act was first passed? Furthermore, over those 16 years has the government really done any housekeeping on this act? Have they given an appropriate accounting of their stewardship in regard to the $175 million or $180 million of the taxpayers' money that has been spent in this industry?

I was rather shocked two or three years ago when the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and myself dug into this matter and we found that over the years money had been paid out and there was not even an inspector on the payroll of the federal government to inspect these mines and see whether the money paid by the government was in fact being earned by the industry.

Like Caesar's wife, the industry was beyond suspicion and its word was accepted for everything. That has not been the experience of the gold miners who have worked for this industry over the years. It has not been the experience of the gold mining communities which have been dependant on this industry. These companies are not the knights in shining armour that we might think them to be, when we consider that the federal government is paying hundreds of millions of dollars into an industry without making arrangements for proper supervision and inspection to see how this money is being used.

My hon. friend from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has pointed out that the wages paid in the gold mining industry are still the lowest paid in any mining industry in Canada. I think this is something the government should think about, as it pays out this money over the years. I think responsibility rests on the shoulders of this government to make a closer check on this industry than has been made in the past. My hon.

friend from Timiskaming also mentioned the subject of safety. I think the records will show that gold mining is as dangerous an industry as any in the country today.

There is another aspect of this question to which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) might turn her attention. I was asked, rather jokingly, by some people in Toronto at one time whether everyone in the Porcupine area was on the provincial welfare payroll. I admit that a great many are. The percentage of those in the gold mining areas who have to fall back on the welfare arrangements of the provinces and the municipalities is probably higher than it is elsewhere. This, I say, is a direct result of the neglect shown by an industry which is shirking its responsibilities and shifting them on to the shoulders of the municipal taxpayers who, in turn, are the employees of the industry. I have in my files many hundreds of cases of men who have been injured or who have lost their health working in the gold mines. They have been shed by the industry like old clothing and they have had no choice but to fall back on the municipality for assistance. I think this is a scandalous state of affairs; it is a situation which the federal government should look into before it opens the purse strings to subsidize this industry for another four years.

I think, too, that the government should look back over the 16 years during which this act has been in operation. I believe it will be found that gold production has not been sustained by this measure. Gold production has declined considerably, compared with the figures for production when the act was first passed. I do not see how the government can honestly feel that the extension of this act, now, for another four years is going to bring about a solution to this problem, any more than the legislation which has been in effect for the last 16 years has succeeded in doing so. I think we would do well to consider the state of the Canadian reserves at this time. Instead of having gold as the basis of our reserves, reliance is increasingly being placed on United States dollars with all the danger this implies to our economy. I wonder whether the government has really come to grips with this problem, or whether it has just lifted the rug and swept it underneath for another four years, feeling that the job is done.

I say that the job is not done. I think the government would be most unwise to think that this problem is solved for another four years; because it is not. As I said in this house about two weeks ago, I think it is time we adopted a new policy with regard to gold. The government should not say that the job is done, simply because this subsidy has been extended for another four years. We should look at this problem again; we should try to come to grips with it, and make provision for a much better solution than we have reached to date.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): The one question I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister really relates to the schedule, and since the schedule introduces a new principle into the bill I think that on second reading I can discuss it in some detail though, normally, I would not be able to do so at this stage of the bill.

In the schedule we find a list of the communities which will be able to take advantage of the act, particularly in relation to the date 1965 which, in a sense, is a cut-off date for any new mines established in areas which are not what might be called old mining communities. There is one community which is not in that list, and its absence causes me some concern. It is the community of Beardmore, Ontario, which is not far from Geraldton. There is a rich little mine there named the Leitch gold mine which is coming to the end of its productive life. Because of the quality of the ore produced at this mine it has rarely been in a position in recent years to come under the provisions of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. The fact remains that this is an old gold mining community in which a considerable number of people earn their living from mining. Some of the other mines in the area, such as Northern Empire and a couple of others whose names I cannot immediately bring to memory, have been gold producers in the past and have taken advantage of this assistance. I think the minister will be able to acknowledge the truth of this from his own experience. It is not so many years ago that the Howey mine went out of production there, but the recrudescence, if I may call it that, of Red Lake causes us to realize how many lives these gold mining communities have. It looked as though Red Lake was a dead camp and unlikely to come to life again, but events proved differently. There is no question that in the general geological structure around Beardmore which runs to Geraldton, 50 miles away, a town which comes under the provisions of the act, there are prospects, which have some reality, that another producing mine may be discovered in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Benidickson: If the hon. member will look at clause 3 he will see there is the right to add.

Mr. Fisher: The minister says clause 3 makes provision for the right to add. My point is, really, that Beardmore is a gold mining community at the present time and its mines have been able to take advantage of E.G.M.A. in the past. My suggestion is that it should be in the schedule now.

Mr. Benidickson: I would agree.

Mr. Fisher: That is the main point I want to make.

I follow mining developments in the Northern Miner, as most people do, and there is one point which was raised in it, not too long ago, which I have brought up on previous occasions when this item was before parliament. It relates to this whole question of profits made by mines which receive assistance under this measure. I do not know what the way out of this dilemma may be. In the past it has been put to me this way by individuals—and this is the way in which it is put in the Northern Miner: certain shareholders in gold mining properties become incensed when dividends are not declared on their shares, despite the fact that companies have a profit margin as a result of gold mining subsidies. This point is made, somewhat crassly, in the Northern Miner for November 28 at page 78. A writer from the United States says:

> I think that recipients of the government's cost-aid should distribute any profits to their shareholders and not use this money to buy one another's shares on the exchange. I feel that if a new gold subsidy is to be enacted it should state that the companies that do not pass this along to their shareholders should not be entitled to it. I own shares in both Lake Shore and Wright-Hargreaves but for many years have not received any return on this investment. Also, the price of these shares continues to sink so that I am also faced with a very heavy loss.

This is not a very important point, but it does show the dilemma of free enterprisers when any company is receiving assistance from the government. It is for this reason I should like to support the generalization of my hon. friend from Timmins (Mr. Martin) when he said the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act does not solve anything. We are presented with a continuing problem which causes trouble in the mining communities and in the capitalistic world of the mining promoters, and I would like the minister to consider putting the mines, forests and waters committee to work in an effort to come up with something better than E.G.M.A. I think our main consideration should be the communities involved.

We intend to support this measure and we have no severe criticism to make, but I do wish to remind the minister again about the Beardmore problem.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion to go into committee of the whole, I believe the hon. member for Wellington South would be willing to let us go on with public business if there was general agreement to do so. Otherwise he intends to proceed with his motion. I wonder what the feeling of the house would be.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I would not mind, only I have a motion stacked up behind that of the hon. member which I have been waiting for four years to have debated in the house. The motion relates to the office of ombudsman. I do not want to have to beat the hon. member for Wellington South into going ahead, but I am going to insist that he do so unless the house leader can come up with some suggestion as to how this hour can be given to us at some other time before the end of the session.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be very glad to accept the hour between 11 and 12 on December 21 and listen to the hon. member for that whole hour, if that would be the general wish of the house. Much as we enjoy listening to the hon. member for Port Arthur, I think most members of the house would like to get the business of the house completed so that we can prorogue at Christmas. I appeal to the big heart of the hon. gentleman. When an hon. member who really has an opportunity to speak is willing to forgo it, the hon. gentleman might forgo his hypothetical chance, because he is third on the list.

Mr. Fisher: I am ready to go on today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Apparently there is unanimous consent minus one.

Mr. Howard: Minus two.

The house in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-124, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act—Mr. Benidickson—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock I do now leave the chair for the house to proceed to the consideration of private members' business, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions.

INDUSTRY

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL LOCATION COUNCIL

On the order:

Notice of motion—Resuming consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Peters:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the establishment of a national location of industry council for the purpose of directing new industry into those regions of the country which are dependant on a narrow industrial base and those which are areas of surplus manpower; and empowering the national location of industry council, in co-operation with the monetary and fiscal authorities, to offer incentives to attract new industry to such regions when requested by provincial and municipal governments.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to item No. 19 under this order and draw your attention to the fact that it is headed: "Resuming consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Peters". I refer to the debate that took place on November 18. I may say I have checked the standing orders and so on and find that the position is a very unique one. As found on page 4482 of Hansard of November 18, when this motion was discussed, it will be seen that just before the debate concluded the Acting Speaker on that day said:

Order. I should point out to the house that if the hon. member for Timiskaming speaks now he will close the debate. The hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray).

The fact is that I proceeded to speak at that time and closed the debate. It will be seen that farther down the page the Acting Speaker said:

Is the house ready for the question? Moved by Mr. Peters that—

The Acting Speaker had started to put the question when the fact that it was six o'clock was drawn to his attention. I submit that is no reason for interrupting a vote and this matter should have been voted on at that time. However, because it was not I would ask your direction, Mr. Speaker, on how we can go about concluding this matter, inasmuch as it only involves a vote that should have been taken. There can be no more debate. I am of the opinion that the situation can be remedied if you will call this item now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course, the understanding of the Chair is that the items can only be taken in the order that they appear on the order paper, and the item to which the hon. member refers is not the first item under notices of motion. I appreciate the particular difficulty which is now brought to the attention of the Chair by the hon. member. Perhaps the Chair might be given the opportunity to look into this problem before private members' business is called again, but I would suggest that at the present time, in view of the fact that the item in question is not the first item to be considered, it should be left where it is for the time being.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I will agree that I am in the wrong in not having raised this matter previously, and certainly I am in the wrong in not having demanded that it be completed at that time. However, I do think it is not a satisfactory arrangement to have this item appear in this position. This is not in accordance with the rules, and I would ask unanimous consent that we proceed with the vote on this matter now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore we have to proceed according to the terms of standing order 18, section 1, which reads as follows:

All items standing on the orders of the day, except government orders, shall be taken up according to the precedence assigned to each on the order paper.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, when you are examining this matter I would ask you to give some consideration to the procedure which resulted in its being placed in this position, because in my view the vote should be taken. When the Speaker calls it six o'clock and leaves the chair he automatically concludes any debate, with or without the consent of the house. However, I suggest that our business should be conducted in a more orderly fashion, and I would ask you to give consideration to that factor because when a vote is to be taken the normal procedure is for the vote to be proceeded with before the Speaker leaves the chair. If you were to leave the chair now I presume that by your act of leaving the chair you would be calling it six o'clock, but I do not think that would be in keeping with our parliamentary practices.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clancy: —sat for six minutes after the Speaker had called for him to stand up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Wellington South.

ESTATE TAX ACT

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF ASSESSMENTS BY INSTALMENTS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to amending the Estate Tax Act to provide for payment in appropriate cases of estate tax assessments by instalments so as to reduce the number of "forced sale" liquidations of estate assets, which in many cases have resulted in the loss of Canadian ownership and control of Canadian business enterprises.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to present this notice of motion at this time. It is difficult at times to get the opportunity to express one's views in the house and I appreciate having the opportunity on this occasion.

The Estate Tax Act, which came into force on January 1, 1959, was designed to replace and bring up to date the old dominion succession duty act. There is, however, one section in the new Estate Tax Act which I do not believe carries out the intention of the house. I refer to the payment of succession duties.

As hon. members know, as the act now stands these taxes must be paid in ordinary cases within six months after death. My notice of motion is in these terms:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to amending the Estate Tax Act to provide for payment in appropriate cases of estate tax assessments by instalments so as to reduce the number of "forced sale" liquidations of estate assets, which in many cases have resulted in the loss of Canadian ownership and control of Canadian business enterprises.

I believe a good argument could be put forward with respect to whether death duties are necessary at all. Only 1.5 per cent of the national revenue is derived from this source and in my opinion these taxes have a very crippling effect on the economy of the country. They certainly do not encourage a person to save and build up an estate. However, they are with us and probably always will be.

Therefore I think the government should give consideration to, first of all, extending the time of payment of succession duties from six months to five years and, second, making it possible to pay these taxes by instalments. As my motion deals with the payment of estate tax assessments in instalments I shall limit my remarks to this point alone.

It is of paramount importance to Canada to arrange the taxing statutes so as to encourage the retention in Canada of the ownership of Canadian enterprises and to encourage the development of capital within Canada. When the demands for taxes become confiscatory and so require the liquidation of a business at a sacrifice price, serious problems result. I submit that this is one of the reasons certain taxpayers are forsaking Canada and also why control of much of our heritage is being sold to foreign investors.

When the owner dies, in the case of a privately owned enterprise, six months is too short a time in which to secure the necessary funds to pay the succession duties. The widow or some member of the family may wish to carry on the business, but the payment of succession duties within six months is too great a drain on the capital reserve. Provided that a non-liquid estate furnishes the proper security and interest is charged on this sum, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of permitting the payment in instalments.

May I remind the house again of the difficulties of continuing family or small businesses or making a satisfactory sale of the business after the death of the owner. It does create real problems. Imposing the payment of succession duties within six months, only creates further problems and causes a forced sale, the loss of ownership, often to foreign investors.

I think I should draw the attention of the house to another hardship—the payment of these taxes within six months of death causes. When the survivor, in many cases a widow, has to make a forced sale of stocks or bonds, sales have to be made at low market value and this creates serious problems for the survivor, particularly in the case of a family owned corporation.

Another hardship that is often created by imposing the present regulations under the Estate Tax Act occurs in rural areas. I know of a case where the father, the owner of a large farm stocked with purebred cattle, died without a will. Within six months, the wife passed on, leaving two sons who had worked along with their father to build up this herd of purebred cattle. Not having the ready capital to pay the succession duties, which were quite large, they were forced to hold an auction sale. This purebred herd, which took years to build, was dispersed. The results, therefore, are detrimental to the building of a sound, agricultural economy in Canada. To say the least, it is disheartening to the survivors.

In conclusion, I say what I said at the beginning, that the estate tax, in respect of the payment of succession duties, should be amended to make death taxes payable in instalments, with interest in approved cases. Several representations have been made previously to the government on this matter by the national council of women of Canada, the estate planning council of Toronto. These organizations have presented briefs to the royal commission on taxation. I hope many members of this house will endorse their views on this very important matter and the government will give serious consideration to the amendment of the Estate Tax Act.

Mr. E. J. Benson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) in his motion implies that the necessity to pay quickly an estate tax on the value of estate property in the form of an equity in a business enterprise that contributes a significant portion of the capital of that business forces the business to raise capital by selling out, often to non-Canadians, to a degree sufficient to change the ownership and control of the business. He also implies that if the tax due could be paid in instalments, the number of such cases would be reduced.

Although the hon. member for Wellington South is not too precise in his motion, he is presumably thinking of a business that is closely controlled, perhaps by a family group, a business that is not usually listed on the stock exchange. This government, and previous governments, have given a good deal of thought to the possible importance of the situation envisaged by the hon. member. Although individuals have from time to time asserted that there is a problem, it has been found difficult to assess its extent because there has been little or no evidence, documentary or otherwise, submitted to the government. Sometimes a family owned business is sold shortly after or shortly before the death of a principal stockholder, but it is not known whether this is because of the problem of finding enough cash to meet his estate tax liability in respect of his shares, or whether there is no one in the family who is willing or able to carry on the direction and management of the business. It is also not known to what extent such businesses are sold to non-Canadians or for what reason. What is known is that, as of last December the industrial development bank, which was given additional powers in 1961, partly with this possible situation in mind, had not made any loans or purchased shares with a view to resale or entered underwriting agreements, specifically in order to prevent the forced sale of a business because of estate taxes. Again, however, this is not completely conclusive because the industrial development bank has made loans to businesses under second and third generation ownership, to assist in the growth or consolidation of such businesses and it is not possible to be certain in how many of these cases forced sale of the business would have been thought necessary if financing had not been available from the industrial development bank. In this regard, I would refer the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), No. 648, which appeared on the order paper, and was answered earlier in the session.

Assuming that there is or was a liquidity problem, it would appear that the facilities of the industrial development bank are available in appropriate cases to solve it. In addition, there is already in the Estate Tax Act, section 16, a general provision that permits postponement of payment of tax in cases of undue hardship or excessive sacrifice. In so far as section 16 of the Estate Tax Act permits the minister to defer payment of taxes in cases of hardship which may be deemed to occur if payment is demanded too quickly, this situation may be covered. This might be useful in those rather unusual cases where the estates in question do not include enough of other assets, such as insurance or readily marketable securities to pay the tax, or where a loan on the assets of the business cannot be obtained. In most cases, such assets would be available in the estate of a reasonably prudent person, unless the value of the shares of the company and the tax thereon was very substantial indeed. As a matter of fact, estate planning has become more and more important during recent years, and I believe that more and more businessmen are providing for just such a situation as that envisaged by the hon. member.

There is, of course, another provision, section 15 of the Estate Tax Act, which provides for instalment payments in certain cases where the greatest liquidity problem arises. I am thinking of an estate where the sole or main asset is in the form of any income right, annuity, term of years or life or other similar estate. Generally speaking, I refer to a situation where there is a right to income in the future but no capital with which to pay the tax at present. There is not, however, any special provision for cases where there is capital but it is tied up in a family business. If a special provision were inserted in the Estate Tax Act to provide for instalment payments in such cases, this would be unfair to the estates of decedents whose property was in other forms, such as portfolio investments or real estate, or in the case of the farmer to whom the hon. member referred. Also, this would mean additional delays in the settlement of the estates affected and possible retention of the control of assets for a long time by the tax authorities.

There are also at least two other important considerations in assessing this proposal. One is that the provision of more time by allowing instalment payments of tax would likely not be of much help in meeting really large amounts of tax imposed on a large holding in a large company, for example, the holdings of Sir James Dunn in Algoma steel. The only way to be helpful in such a case, if no large liquid assets outside the business were built up over a period of time, would be to ignore the top rates of estates tax for this kind of situation. This would, of course, mean discrimination in favour of large estates and consequently could hardly be contemplated unless the rates were reduced for all estates.

The other consideration is that whatever was done in the way of relief would be offset to a considerable degree in the provinces that levy a succession duty—Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia—unless such provinces followed the federal government's lead. Another point which I think should be raised is that, beginning in 1964, the federal government has agreed to turn over 75 per cent of the succession duties collected to the provinces of Canada. This would mean that such a resolution, if it were considered by the government, would have to be done in consultation with the provinces, who would naturally be affected through their revenues if the payment were spread out over a longer period of time.

It should be mentioned that cognizance of this problem has been paid in the income tax law, which permits companies with large surpluses to get out the surplus by paying a modest tax, at a rate of 15 per cent, on certain conditions. In this regard I would refer the hon. member to section 105 of the Income Tax Act. The remaining tax-paid surplus can then be used to meet estate tax.

I would like to refer the hon. member to a memorandum submitted to the royal commission on banking and finance by Dr. A. K. Eaton, on October 23, 1962, and I would take the liberty of quoting from it:

It was suggested that comment might be offered in this memorandum on the problem of meeting payments called for under death duties (presumably federal estate tax and provincial inheritance taxes). The question relates not to the absolute burden of the tax but the problem of arranging affairs to have sufficient liquid assets on hand to meet the payments within the required time. Possibly the main point of concern here is whether death duties in Canada have the effect of driving the family type of business into selling out—assets or shares—to public companies, particularly foreign public companies, in order to meet tax obligations. If this were so, it would be regarded as bad.

Perhaps as a general rule it can be said that insurance is the greatest source of liquidity in estates in Canada. The addiction of Canadians to insurance is something to marvel at. It is very useful, however, as a source of ready cash to meet death duties. Normally also, most estates will show fairly substantial holdings of marketable securities, bonds which have a ready market and stocks of a type and diversity that create no problem upon fairly quick realization.

The greatest liquidity problem arises, of course, in estates where the sole or main asset is in the form of "any income right, annuity, term of years or life or other similar estate". Here, the federal law allows the tax applicable to such property to be spread over six years without interest. There are no such special provisions relating particularly to the situation where the main asset is a closely held family business—a going concern. There is, of course, a general provision in the law which gives the minister discretion to postpone tax (with interest up to 5 per cent) if he thinks the payment of it would cause "undue hardship or excessive sacrifice". It is not to be expected, however, that the necessity of selling out a family business at a fair price, where no preparation had been made by the deceased for meeting taxes on his death, would be regarded by the minister as either hardship or sacrifice. It would probably be looked upon as just plain carelessness.

In approaching this question of liquidity in the case of closely held family businesses, there is no point in attempting to sidestep the fact that death duties are very high in Canada. Plenty of family businesses are worth $1 to $2 million. The tax (federal and provincial combined) on $1 million is just over $300,000 and on $2 million, it is nearly $800,000. From a $5 million estate, the tax would take close to half (54 per cent rate applies on excess over $2 million). Quite clearly, the so-called liquidity problem can be quite acute for estates of this size made up mainly of a single asset, a family business.

[Mr. Benson.]

For smaller businesses, the problem is not nearly so acute. For a business worth $160,000 ($60,000 exemption for married), the tax would be $19,000. The man might have insurance enough to cover this and his son would be able to take over the business unimpaired.

An estate made up of a $260,000 business would have to pay $44,000 tax. Ordinary life insurance might not be expected to take care of all of this, so a trust company might have to be called upon to arrange for a mortgage on some of the business property for, say, $25,000. This should be practicable with no particular problem of retaining family control. Mortgage interest will, of course, cut into the flow of income to his heirs but this has to be expected. At the same time, the interest charge against the business is a deduction in computing profits for corporate tax purposes.

At the $560,000 level the problem is getting a bit worse. Here, nearly $150,000 will have to be found. Insurance can no longer be counted on to take care of much of the tax unless the deceased had been foresighted enough to have over the years taken out an insurance endowment policy specifically to meet death duties. Mortgages of higher amounts may have to be resorted to. Even so, it is reasonable to assume that up to the half million mark, there is no very good case for saying that the tax forces people to sell out a family business to a public company.

For a business of $750,000, the tax is just over $200,000, which calls for some pretty substantial financing. It would, however, still allow for a fairly reasonable equity-debt ratio for the business if a large portion of this tax liability were raised through mortgages.

Interest, of course, would be cutting deeply into earnings of the heirs but if the business were fairly profitable with good prospects, there should be no real hardship. Still, not a very good case could be made for abatement in tax provisions.

It is for estates of $1 million up that the so-called liquidity problem becomes acute. It was mentioned above that for a $1 million estate, the tax is over $300,000, for $2 million, nearly $800,000 and for $5 million, about $2.5 million. One cannot expect that tax money in these proportions will be available without careful planning a long time ahead. For the $5 million estate, it is too much to expect to have business as usual after the government has taken away half of it. Such a family business could only be continued as such if over a period of a good many years the proprietor had systematically built up a heavy position of liquid assets outside the business. He may have decided long ago that it was not worth it and accordingly, today finds himself among those who complain about taxation closing up his family business, having to sell out to pay tax. It is, of course, next to impossible to get a decent price for unlisted minority shares in a family controlled business.

Dr. Eaton continues on, and in the final paragraph of his submission he says:

Today the corporate tax on income up to $35,000 is only 21 per cent, with a 20 per cent dividend tax credit. This is fairly lenient tax treatment. The proprietor of the business can then gradually create tax paid undistributed income on hand and thus put himself in a position to borrow money on mortgage from his business and provide liquid funds for meeting estate tax. It is suggested here that the way has been paved as far as is reasonably possible to enable family control of businesses in Canada to be maintained.

This was a submission by Dr. A. K. Eaton who used to be deputy minister of finance. To sum up, it would seem to be very difficult to ascertain or define the "appropriate cases" to which the hon. member refers in his motion, without discrimination; that the industrial development bank has been placed in a position to give the assistance envisaged by the motion in deserving cases; and that it is doubtful if anything more can be done without extensive revision of the provisions of the Estate Tax Act dealing with the time for payment and the rate structure, and without provincial co-operation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion moved by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales). Little did I think when I used to pal around with his uncle at college in 1909 that I would be supporting a motion of his in the House of Commons in 1963. Before proceeding I must congratulate the parliamentary secretary on his magnificent and curate-like reading of the liturgy prepared by the income tax department for this motion. I thought he did it very well. In fact he reminded me of a curate preaching a sermon to a questionable couple he has just married, and he is not quite certain about the future life they will lead.

First, let me say that the hon. member has introduced this motion as a result of discussions with his constituents and a knowlledge of the hardship that has been experienced. I do not quite understand the resistance offered to the motion by the parliamentary secretary, in view of its very reasonable terms. I shall not read all the motion but it asks for consideration to be given "to amending the Estate Tax Act to provide for payment in appropriate cases of estate tax assessments by instalments so as to reduce the number of 'forced sale' liquidations of estate assets..."

It is asking consideration for a problem many people face. I listened carefully to what the parliamentary secretary read. He used several arguments and mentioned the industrial development bank as a source to borrow money. Let me remind him the time limit is six months, and it usually takes from a year to two years to negotiate a loan from the industrial development bank. I know that, because several constituents of mine have mentioned their problems to me.

Then he said there was a provision which provides for postponement of the payment of these death duties in cases of hardship. Mr. Speaker, just try it, and see how long it takes you to get the question of hardship recognized by the department. I must say that the parliamentary secretary speaks from the viewpoint of the Department of Finance. From listening to his remarks, on that point, and the others which he read, I take it there is a complete lack of understanding that this is a problem faced by a good many people in small businesses and on family farms.

The parliamentary secretary read at great length from a submission prepared by Dr. Eaton, and suggested one should arrange one's affairs in such a way as to have liquid assets to meet these taxes. Does not the hon. gentleman know that you can be farming on quite a small scale, and successfully in that you are paying your way, and you can be running a small family business successfully but very often such operations, carried on in some cases from generation to generation because they provide a living for the families concerned, have made very little profit at the end of the year? These are the persons who are affected. Dr. Eaton suggests, through using the hon. gentleman as his mouthpiece this evening, that in such cases insurance should be taken out by the families concerned. But very often there is not sufficient profit to provide the insurance required to meet these death duties, which can be quite substantial and have increased rapidly in recent years. There are many properties that were considered in the first instance to cost very little but which have developed throughout the years, and because of inflated values now have a very much higher value than was the case ten years ago.

This presents a problem to the small business people or the family farm. I know what I am talking about because I have spoken to constituents who fear this sort of thing. I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion is also aware of this problem, and has met persons who have suffered because of the present Estate Tax Act. We are not talking about the wealthy people with whom the hon. gentleman was more concerned, because he mentioned persons who had $500,000 or $1 million. We are concerned with the little people. This particular problem does not arise with large organizations; they have liquid assets such as bonds and shares that can be sold. It is when one has to sell a family concern or farm that real hardship is created. These small businesses and farms have to be sold to meet the present taxes.

In supporting this motion, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the present law does not give consideration to the immediate responsibilities of the heirs and the problems they face, particularly in the smaller income groups that have been mentioned. Second, the present legislation gives no consideration to the economic value to the country and the community of these small businesses and family farms, and in some cases small industry. I know small saw mill operators who have carried on quite successfully, not making much money, employing men from year to year and investing capital now and again in order to continue their operation. These people do not make much profit. They are people whose God is not the almighty dollar. They like to accept their responsibilities to the community. There is no consideration given to the economic value of these small businesses, family farms and so on. With those few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I conclude what I have to say, because I know there are other hon. members who wish to express their support for this very reasonable and practical motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the house is considering now a motion which we are very happy to support, and I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) for having introduced it.

The motion urges the government to amend the Estate Tax Act in order to prevent the forced sale liquidation of many family business enterprises. In fact, Mr. Speaker, how many family businesses or industries, for instance, have been liquidated in Canada, especially in French Canada, owing to the implementation of the unfair Estate Tax Act? It would be really interesting to gather such information, because I know that we have suffered greatly from that situation, we of the province of Quebec, owing to the family type of business so popular in that province.

Mr. Speaker, family businesses have always been popular in the province of Quebec because they are consistent with French humanism. That is why most businesses or industries in Quebec are owned by families.

To date, we have many times witnessed the liquidation of businesses because the heirs or the executors had to sell some properties in order to pay estate duties. If legislation to provide for instalment payments of succession duties were enacted, it could help to correct a situation which has been truly disastrous, I would say in Canada, especially in French Canada.

And at this stage of my remarks, may I recall a great historic event to the attention of the house? It is that in 1760, just prior to the transfer of Canada to England, French Canadians had almost 100 million pounds of fiduciary money in circulation. Now, after the transfer of Canada, they were almost entirely dispossessed owing to the new currency introduced in the country by the invaders. And it is only through the amount of work done by French-Canadian families that family, commercial and industrial wealth was restored and that there was gradually developed a type of family business which, as I just said, was consistent with French humanism, with the French type of business.

Today, many businesses are turning to the Anglo-Saxon or capitalistic type of company because there is a propaganda urging French Canadian industrialists and businessmen to operate as public companies, especially to protect themselves against the problem of succession duties.

In my opinion, it is very unfortunate that we have to change this type of business which was the backbone of our people. However, for our own protection, we have to move toward this type of public companies, otherwise we would go on losing what we have succeeded in gaining, as we lost perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars in the past.

I hope that the commission which is inquiring into fiscal matters—I believe it is the Carter commission—will come up with practical solutions to reduce succession duties, for it is illogical that so many people and families who have acquired some property should be dispossessed in such a drastic fashion.

I feel that family property is sacred and I submit that governments have no right to dispossess families that way. That is why the Social Credit party is happy to support this motion which would slightly improve the present taxation system. We must go further than that, however; we must enact new legislation to bring about a considerable reduction in succession duties and taxes.

If all hon. members would take the trouble to examine the development of the monetary system throughout the ages, they might come to understand a little more easily how we passed, for instance, from the premonetary period to the bimetallism period, then to the fiduciary currency period and on to the credit money we have now in 1963—and God knows that credit money is practically the only one in circulation nowadays. Then we could proceed with monetary reforms allowing us to reduce the burden of enterprises, individuals and families.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I will only take a few moments to bring forward some of the reasons for my great interest in this motion. As a matter of fact, it was with a certain feeling of nostalgia that I listened to our genial hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) give reasons that I have heard many times in this regard. I will not be at all reticent, Mr. Speaker, in telling the house that over the years I have advocated the principle of this particular motion. However, as with many other things, one sometimes has to wait a little longer for the better things in life.

I was interested, first of all, in the alternatives that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance indicated were available to businessmen under the Industrial Development Bank Act. I fully appreciate the attempt which was made in amending the Industrial Development Bank Act, but let me say this: it does not go far enough. I was fully aware that there have been no applications for this type of loan under the act. I know that in one case where application was made to protect a financial business worth at that time an estimated $3 million it was subsequently sold for $20 million. True, we are dealing with a big asset, but it is one where there had to be a sale and it was sold to foreign investment merely by reason of fear of the estate tax and the impossibility at that time of making adequate provision.

Dr. Eaton has a very theoretical and nice sounding proposition in the lengthy quotations we got from the parliamentary secretary, but this presupposes that owners of a concern are master of all the factors and that they can plan to the nth degree. Let me assure him that I am concerned with companies where one cannot do so. I can cite the case of one of our better growth companies, controlled by four men in their forties, which had to be sold to what I am sure was foreign capital because the principal shareholder could not get any insurance. He was uninsurable. This was a growth company where there were no accumulated reserves. The principals drew good salaries but their capital was tied up in the shares of that company and its subsidiaries. If you cannot get a term insurance with a buy-sell agreement, how can you protect the interests of the estate and the remaining shareholders who must make some provision for eventualities? There was no doubt in my mind that against the potential assets of the principal shareholders of this company there was going to be a substantial tax assessment. I know of other cases where Canadians have lost control. I am not going to name the companies; they come through knowledge acquired in my legal practice.

I would draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary the discussion which took place in the taxation section of the Canadian bar convention this year. There were any number of representations in this regard. I find that most of the arguments against the principle are of an administrative nature. I would say that, in the case of a company, where there is an opportunity of getting an extension under section 16, there may not be too much sympathy shown on the part of the Minister of National Revenue. This is being realistic. It is my view that we should be able to make the appropriate changes in the act to provide for these cases, not only those referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), but the much larger growth businesses of this country. I know at least half a dozen good companies which had to be sold. There was such an attractive offer of outside capital and, by that, I mean foreign capital, that on balance they said: Why put up with the worry about estate tax? Let us get the money now and we shall be able to sleep a lot more easily.

The parliamentary secretary spoke about the difficulties of retention of control. I think in the case of most of these companies the surviving owners are prepared to pay at least a proportion of the estate tax that is due. The balance can be put even on a basis of ten years, on annual instalments with interest. There is no doubt in my mind that with the continuing shareholders or the remaining shareholders carrying on the business, the business will stand a better chance of success than if it were to pass into other hands.

Now I come to this matter of payment to the provinces and the suggestion that the provinces would have to be consulted. But have they acquired a vested interest? I would say it goes only to the question of moneys paid in to the crown under the heading of estate tax or succession duties, and that a vested interest is not acquired in any estate whether within the boundaries of a particular province or otherwise. I am sure the act does not provide for that, nor do any of the agreements and, therefore, I cannot see that this question of the consent of the provinces would have anything to do with the matter. The provinces will ultimately get the money. This was an argument which did not carry much weight as far as I am concerned.

I think we have canvassed this problem sufficiently. I do feel that sufficient reason has been shown that the appropriate amendments should have been made to the act or at least been more seriously considered in the past. I am sorry the parliamentary secretary came to us with a speech or memorandum prepared on the basis of a closed mind in this regard rather than with a conciliatory, "we will have a good look at it". I think we should take a much better look at this question than we have in the past, and I would ask members of the house to consider the resolution on that basis.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): When I first read the motion of the hon. member for Wellington South to amend the Estate Tax Act, the words "forced sale" intrigued me. As to the allegation that the severity of this act resulted, in many cases, in the loss of control of Canadian companies to foreigners, my first reaction was that this was not so. After looking into the matter I remain unconvinced. There have been some cases where the necessity of paying estate tax and provincial succession duty has been cited as the reason, or an additional reason, for selling a controlling interest in a company to foreigners or to a foreign company. This seems strange when one knows that any company with good management can easily make arrangements to pay the taxes due to both jurisdictions.

When one hears such talk he should consider whether or not an excuse is being given by an incapable or disinterested heir for his failure to assume an unexpected or unwanted responsibility. I would say from my own experience that in almost every case of such a sale the real reason is that death has brought about an unusual circumstance. There has been a change of management or there has been no management left whatever.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING APPLICATION AND MAKING CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

House resumed consideration in committee on Bill No. C-124, to amend the Gold Mining Assistance Act—Mr. Benidickson—Mr. Batten in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Act not to apply in respect of certain mines commencing production after June, 1965.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister explain the new section 4B as set out in clause 2? What is his interpretation of this provision in relation to adding other areas that have been mining areas in the past and are not at the present time?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, is my hon. friend not thinking of clause 3? I did agree this afternoon that I would readily accept an amendment to the schedule to include Beardmore in the list of communities, notwithstanding that clause 3 would still give the minister a right to add any other community that had not been properly thought of in the bill. The hon. member for Port Arthur explained this matter. Perhaps we overlooked Beardmore, simply on the ground it was not a community with a gold mine that was now getting a subsidy because it has a very high grade mine. However, if a similar circumstance should arise in the future we can add another community under clause 3.

Mr. Peters: I am really not asking a hypothetical question and it does not concern the Geraldton area. What I have in mind is the development in the last three months of a gold producer in the Matachewan area. Matachewan has not been classed as a gold mining area for some time and has not really had anything else since the mines there closed a number of years ago. I understand that Rio Tinto has done considerable development in that area and that within a year or two there is a possibility of a producing gold mine there which will be 14 or 15 miles from the town of Matachewan, but will be making use of the town. It is with that in view that I ask the question.

Mr. Benidickson: I think we recognized it would be very unfair if there had been beforehand investment, thought and work before the time of passing this bill that would not come into fruition in a mine. I think it was on November 27 that I explained we had about 19 months notice of this and my advice is that this is fairly satisfactory. I might tell the committee that since I made the announcement on November 27 I have not had the slightest objection from anybody.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a very brief comment in support of what the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue said earlier in the debate. The effect of clause 2, as I see it, will not only be restraining but restricting with regard to the exploration and development of areas, particularly in the Northwest Territories to the north of my constituency where areas have been predicated initially upon this type of industry. I think we can look at the matter this way. It is not only a question of the actual moneys expended and the contribution to the economy in respect of the mining operation. In my view this can be regarded as simply the fuse which brings about a far greater explosion. The addition to the gross national product, when you consider the moneys expended and the exploration and development, is very substantial.

Today in the Northwest Territories the search has been extended far beyond places like Yellowknife, and it is my fear that if this clause is passed and retained it may well lead to a very substantial reduction in the rate at which exploration is now taking place. In the light of the fact that the Great Slave Lake Railway will shortly be at the south shore of the lake, I think the people in the Northwest Territories feel that as a result of the combined rail-truck rate that will be available, exploration will be substantially increased; but I am afraid that in the face of this particular restriction in this legislation it is very likely that expansion may not take place. I wanted to put my views on the record in support of what the hon. member said, because I think they are the views of many people in the Northwest Territories.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4.

Mr. Benidickson: I can't, but perhaps my colleague would move the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: On clause 4 my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, has asked me to move:

That the schedule be amended by inserting therein in the sixth position thereof the words "Beardmore, Ontario".

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move that Matachewan, Ontario be added to the schedule in clause 4 after Madsen, Ontario.

Mr. Benidickson: I have no objection to that. I think it is the kind of amendment though that might involve an impost on the crown and perhaps will have to be moved by one of my colleagues. We want to be inclusive in this thing but, as I said, on the other hand we have the opportunity under clause 3 to add, if necessary.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will be glad to take over the hon. gentleman's suggestion and move this amendment.

The Chairman: Will the hon. member submit his amendment in writing.

Mr. Pickersgill: If he will tell me how to spell it I will.

Mr. Peters: M-a-t-a-c-h-e-w-a-n.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is prepared to accept it?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

The Chairman: Is it the desire of the committee that the amendment now proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming should be incorporated in that moved by the Secretary of State? Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave.

Mr. Benidickson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING LOAN PERIOD, ESTABLISHING NEW PERIOD, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-122, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Mr. E. J. Benson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this bill contains amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act which would enable the banks to continue making business improvement loans under this act beyond the end of the year. The present authority in the act for government guarantees of such loans expires on December 31, 1963. Legislative action must be taken now if guaranteed lending operations are to continue beyond that date.

Hon. members will recall that the royal commission on banking and finance was established in 1961 to undertake a broad review of the functioning of the Canadian financial system. The commission is expected to report within the next few months, and it can be anticipated that the commission has reviewed the whole question of financial facilities available to business, including small business enterprises. We have decided, in the circumstances, not to undertake an over-all review of this act until we can do so in the light of the report and recommendations of this commission. The proposed bill before us is accordingly limited to extending the act for another three years and to some clarifying amendments to the security provisions of this act, which can be usefully made at this time.

The Small Businesses Loans Act was passed three years ago to provide term credit for a wide range of business improvement projects to the proprietors of small business enterprises engaged in manufacturing, wholesale and retail trade, and in service industries. Loans of this type are made by the chartered banks with a government guarantee. The act limits the guarantee in effect during the current lending period, that is since inception to December 31, 1963, to a maximum of 10 per cent of the total of all secured loans made under the act by each bank, provided the aggregate principal amount of all guaranteed loans made by all banks does not exceed $300 million. In effect, this limits the government's maximum contingent liability in respect of losses on business improvement loans to $30 million.

During the first year of operations, in 1961, some 2,800 guaranteed loans totalling $25.6 million were made by the banks to small business enterprises. The number and volume of loans made under the act during 1962 were of similar magnitude, close to 3,000 loans totalling $25.7 million. Complete figures for 1963 are, of course, not yet available.

Turning to the specific provisions of the bill, clause 1 would amend subsection 2 of section 3 of the act to change the date to which guaranteed loans can be made from December 31, 1963, to December 31, 1966.

The Small Businesses Loans Act, like the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, on which it was modelled, runs in three-year periods.

Clause 2 would amend sections 5 and 6 of the act to provide an additional lending period, extending from January 1, 1964 to December 31, 1966, during which guaranteed business improvement loans may be made by the chartered banks on the same terms and conditions as those applying to loans made during the first lending period. It also specifies that the aggregate sum of total business improvement loans which may be made during this period by all banks under the government guarantee is $300 million, the same limit which applied to the first lending period.

Clause 3 of the bill deals with section 8, the security provision of the act. This section, in general, empowers the bank to take mortgage security, including chattel mortgage, on loans made under this act notwithstanding section 88 of the Bank Act. Some questions on the legal interpretation of this section have, however, arisen in the course of lending experience, and it is considered desirable, following consultation with the bankers association, to clarify section 8 in two respects. First, the proposed new section 8 would make it explicit that the Quebec commercial pledge comes within the scope of this section. The commercial pledge is a civil code concept comparable to chattel mortgage, which was made applicable to business by Quebec legislation earlier this year. The second change in section 8 would make it clear that mortgage securities can be taken not only as direct security for the repayment of a loan, but also in support of an endorsement or a guarantee given by a third party.

I am sure that hon. members will agree that the guarantee provisions of the act should be extended and that a review of its adequacy and effectiveness should be deferred pending the report of the royal commission on banking and finance. I can assure the house that it would be the government's intention to review the provisions of this act in some detail and to propose whatever changes are considered desirable after it has had an opportunity to consider the report of the commission, and that such a review will take into account comments and suggestions which have been or may be made in the house, as well as those of the business and banking community.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I am sure the house appreciates the statement made by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in respect of this bill. This measure, primarily, extends the period of an act which was introduced by the government of three years ago and carries it on for another three years. I am sure the house appreciates the figures which have just been given to us by the parliamentary secretary indicating the number of loans which have been made under this act.

I have a fairly clear recollection of statements which were made when the original bill was introduced. Hon. members said that this bill would be of little effect and that no advantage would be taken of it by the people of Canada. The figures which have been read tonight by the parliamentary secretary show how wrong those statements were, as have most of the statements which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Even the statement made by hon. members opposite when they were in the opposition were to the effect that this act should not be enacted. This was just another one of the steps taken by the preceding government which resulted in expanding the economy of this country, the benefit of which this government is receiving at this moment.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we shall support these amendments, which are very necessary but rather minor. I am pleased to hear the parliamentary secretary state that a more thorough revision of this act is now under way, because it certainly needs it. Some points which I think might well be considered are, a better rate of interest for small businesses receiving loans under the act; the amounts might well be increased; and there is another aspect, that is that the loans cannot be received for establishing a new business. They are only for existing businesses. There are a number of cases in which people have bought into old businesses, and not very good ones, in order to qualify for a loan under the act. There are a number of things of this nature which I think might well be reviewed.

I was checking the debates on this topic, Mr. Speaker, when the act was amended back in 1961. I noticed two very important Liberals were interested at that time, namely the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). They made a number of suggestions to the effect that you could improve or strengthen the act. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would refer those to the minister when this matter comes up for review. They described the act as inadequate and puny in some respects.

I should like also, Mr. Speaker, to mention to the parliamentary secretary that it is one thing to give help to small businesses in the way of loans so that they can become established, but it is another thing to keep them going. I hope that somewhere along the line the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) will consult with his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chevrier), with a view to strengthening our anti-combines legislation. I shall not go very far into this tonight, but I want to speak about it again when the justice estimates are under discussion.

It seems to me rather useless to give this aid to small business on the one hand and then leave them prey to very weak combines legislation such as we have now. I should like to suggest, too, that when this department makes a report on the Small Businesses Loans Act they try to make the report a little more complete. I have in front of me the annual report for 1962, which is a very poor document. There is a small amount of statistical material, but that is all. There is not really very much meat here. I think it would be very useful if we could get some examples of the type of business which has been assisted by this measure. This report is very meagre and inadequate.

However, to conclude, I may say I had a speech prepared on the basis of the fact that the legislation needs looking at, but I shall forgo making that speech tonight since we have the assurance that the act will be reviewed after the royal commission on taxation reports. Meantime, we support the proposed amendments.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, we in this party intend to support the amendments that have been proposed by the parliamentary secretary. He said that the act originally was to be of the same value to small businesses as the farm improvement loans legislation and other acts are to farmers and fishermen. However my experience with the Small Businesses Loans Act indicates it is not administered in the same way as the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

For example, we note there are some minor amendments broadening the basis for security, in the changes that are suggested. Under the Farm Improvement Loans Act a bank takes security only on the piece of equipment that is being purchased. In some cases it is necessary for a farmer to pay down 25 per cent or 30 per cent of the price, while the balance is financed over a period of from three to five years. Even if the farmer's credit rating is blemished a little, he is still able to avail himself of the provisions of the act, and small businesses should receive the same treatment.

I find that in many cases when a small business operator goes to a bank he finds there is no additional consideration given him, even though this act is in force. In other words, if a man's credit rating is not good enough for him to qualify under regular bank requirements for security, he is unable to get a loan under this act. Therefore I am pleased that the parliamentary secretary says the act is going to be reviewed and the basis for security should be broadened and extended. I did not hear him say the review would take place next session, in 1964, but I certainly hope that is the intention of the government. We give credit to whomever it was initiated this act, but I do not believe the practical application of it has been as extensive as was intended.

[Translation]

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we greatly appreciate the amendments contained in Bill No. C-122 which tends to be more beneficial to small businesses in Canada.

In the past three years, many small businesses have been assisted through this legislation which, as the former minister of finance pointed out a while ago, was passed by the Conservative government and is now being renovated by a Liberal administration.

We are not interested in knowing which party did what, but we are greatly interested in the matter of loans granted to small businesses. While many small businesses received assistance, several others did not get any. They were asked to fill out forms, to offer guarantees and then their cases were subjected to unending studies.

The point I want to make is this. We have, for instance, the industrial development bank which assists small businesses and even large ones and which lends money at higher rates than those of the chartered banks but for a longer period.

This bill will allow the chartered banks to ask for more collateral from people and small industries which apply for loans, for expansion purposes or to keep their business going.

How is it that the Bank of Canada, or the industrial development bank asks for a higher interest rate than the chartered banks and how is it that the same industrial development bank does not assume greater risks as far as small industries are concerned?

There are small businessmen, small shopkeepers who are confronted with hardship, who are faced with a dreadful situation, in our country, in every province.

Why does Bill No. C-122 not stipulate that both the Bank of Canada and the industrial development bank are authorized to assume more risks in order to give more help to small businesses, even if hundreds of them have already been helped in the past?

We will certainly support the proposed amendments, but we would like to see the government take action to facilitate access to more credit for small businesses, because the help granted is often inadequate. Then a small industry or a small businessman cannot go very far. The point is to lend them more and at a reasonable rate of interest, that is a rate of interest that will not dispossess them.

Mr. Speaker, we support the proposed amendments, but at the same time we suggest that the government should as much as possible place the industrial development bank at the disposal of these industries and small businessmen, with an adequate and reasonable rate of interest.

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to make a suggestion to the Secretary of State so that he will have the time to make the necessary amendment before study in committee.

I notice in clause 3, section 8 (1) (a) (i) of the French version that reference is made to:

...un mortgage grevant des biens immeubles ou meubles...

In the same way, section (b) refers to:

...un mortgage, une hypothèque ou une cession du genre...

It seems that the Secretary of State could amend the French version of the act by using a French word instead of the word "mortgage" written in italics.

In the case of real or personal property, it is rather a "garantie privilégiée".

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, this bill gives me an opportunity to say a few words about the success of the operations under the Small Businesses Loans Act which was introduced in 1960 and became really effective in 1961. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) was not sure who introduced it. I would like to tell him it was the former minister of finance, the Hon. Donald Fleming, in 1960, the same year that so much good legislation was put on the statute books.

My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Hales) who sits behind me, and who saw I was about to speak, warned me not to forget to tell how important the act has been for the tourist industry. I recall the many times I, and others, had the privilege of advocating assistance for service establishments to improve their accommodation and services to the travelling public. With the introduction of this legislation, and the inclusion of service establishments under it, tourist operations received a substantial lift.

The annual report for 1962 on the Small Businesses Loans Act, which came into our hands within the last few days, shows on page 10, under the heading "Loans to service businesses", that a total of 1,246 loans were made in the amount of $12,313,000. This means that 1,246 tourist operators, restaurant owners, motel and lodge operators have made substantial improvements to their establishments under the provisions of this act, and this accounts in no small part for the wonderful improvement we see in accommodation as we travel throughout the country. Just about the time this act was passed, the travel bureau was making a tremendous effort to reverse our deficit in travel account with the United States. In the year following the enactment of that legislation—although I know it was not entirely responsible—and in this current year there has been a wonderful improvement in our balance of payments in travel account. I will not go into that aspect now, except to state that it has improved. I think the fact that visitors have better accommodation, better restaurants and better facilities throughout encourages them to come to Canada and take advantage of the services that we have to offer.

It is not only the service businesses which have benefited, but also small businesses generally. On the same page of the annual report it is indicated that a total of 923 loans were made to the retail trade, totalling $7,710,000. The significant part of this report in tables 5 and 6 is that while the act was originally intended for the retail trade and small business, several of us who were particularly interested in the tourist business prevailed upon the government, and in particular the minister of finance, to include service businesses in the act. This was done, and the minister at that time honoured me by acknowledging the efforts I had made. The significant part is that there were actually more loans made to service businesses than to the retail trades, which I think proves the advantage of including the service businesses in this act.

That is all I want to say on the bill, Mr. Speaker. We certainly approve the principle of extending the provisions of the act for a further period of time. There are still shortcomings in the legislation and they have become apparent as the act has been administered. I am glad to hear there is to be a review once again of the Small Businesses Loans Act and I hope we may be able to put it in a little better shape after the experiment of just over two years. The figures I have given of the total amount of loans actually only cover a period of one year, and I think this is indicative of the benefits Canadians have reaped from the Small Businesses Loans Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my feelings about this amendment to the small business loans legislation.

I am pleased to see that the act is under review. That is why I want to participate in this debate and I should ask the Minister of Finance or his representative to consider how the amended legislation will be applied.

It is probably because this act was encumbered with red tape that it did not help small businesses as much as it should have.

It was a complicated act for those who wanted to secure a loan: they had to submit applications, fill out forms and submit to extensive investigations. I believe that such red tape has prevented many businesses to take advantage of that assistance.

I would like this bill to be considered in the light of the planning which has been proposed by the present government.

I wonder what those celebrated planning experts within the government are waiting for? They have stood in the forefront to sell the idea of planning as being a panacea. I see some of those experts: I see one in particular who has been formerly with the department of industry of the province of Quebec. I wonder what they are doing at the present time in the planning of industry in Canada so as to check unemployment as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I think this Small Businesses Loans Act is a formula through which the present government can not only help already established businesses but mainly help towards the establishment of new ones. I think they could give special encouragement if they could provide a special interest rate in the case of businesses which would be engaged in the production of consumers' goods or of some small industrial machinery.

I think the industries setting up in the services sector are also useful. But I think at this time, we mostly need small businesses involved in the production of smallwares which are consumed every day in the country and which can be bought only on foreign markets. All we see is "made in Japan", "made in Italy", "made in France" or "made in England". We seldom see "made in Canada" as far as smallwares are concerned.

That, I believe, is the field of small businesses. In the old countries, the small enterprise is a major factor of stabilization thanks to which unemployment is inexistent, because they develop readily when they have some incentives.

Such encouragement, Mr. Speaker, is up to the hon. members opposite and to the planning officers to give. I think that it is in the matter of interests, that adequate incentive can be given to those small undertakings. They can also be given incentive in terms of taxation. I believe that the income tax reports they have to file to meet the requirements of the government should be simplified.

Mr. Speaker, my suggestion should be taken into consideration by everyone, if we wish that this legislation providing assistance to small businesses meet the purposes for which it is intended, namely to help existing businesses. Furthermore, it is our duty to stimulate our industrialists and to encourage them to invest and establish the industries required at the present time in Canada.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to make what might be termed a miniature speech. I rise to support the principle and purpose of this bill, which includes some necessary amendments as a first step to further amendments that we look forward to in the very near future. I want to say a few words on this matter because I see the parliamentary secretary is, shall I say, closer to the opposition in respect of the terms of this legislation than he was in the debate that occurred between five and six o'clock, and I am going to take the opportunity to make a few suggestions in view of the review promised by the parliamentary secretary on behalf of the government.

This type of legislation was advocated for years by members of this party and we were glad when the former government originally introduced this act and also legislation to improve credit facilities for farmers. We must give them credit for that; they were both steps in the right direction. We look upon this as pilot legislation. This is the foundation upon which can be built an act that really works and serves the purposes for which it was enacted. It requires considerable amendment to meet various types of small business and small industry local conditions and circumstances. I have had some experience of the matter through discussing this act with retailers and small business people who have taken advantage of it, and a great many more who were unable to take advantage of it because of its present terms.

In view of the review that has been promised by the parliamentary secretary I am just going to take a few minutes to lay the groundwork for the philosophy which I think should govern the review when it is undertaken by the government. The development of monopoly control in business, with its consequent effect on small business, has been recognized in Canada for years. As I mentioned before, members of this party sought legislation of this kind for over 25 years in this house. I have read some of the speeches made in the house by the first members of this party. The retail merchants of Canada and other organizations made representations to government after government before they were able to get the legislation accepted by the government, or at least the pilot legislation put on the statute books of Canada. Then the government, commencing in 1956, published a small business manual, which I think was again published in 1957 and 1959. Later the small business branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce was established. The legislation that we are considering this evening followed those steps. I hope the parliamentary secretary is listening, because I want to quote some very good authorities. It may interest him to know that even John Buchan, former governor general of Canada, recognized this problem in his book "Pilgrim's Way" in 1940, in which he has this to say about the basic dilemma that confronts us now:

> Somehow or other, we must make our social and economic world more fluid. We must widen the approaches so that honest ambition and honourable discontent may have elbow room. The world must remain an oyster for youth to open. If not, youth will cease to be young, and that will be the end of everything.

I think that is very well put. The problems in small business have been considered in the United States and in other countries for some years. We are not alone in facing this problem. It is one which has developed because of the needs of a changing society. A cabinet committee in the United States made a report on small business in 1956. I think this is what prompted us to take action. In addition, a good deal of literature has been published on this subject. I wish to conclude by quoting from the United States report—I do not often go to the United States for my quotations but I think this one is particularly apt:

> Now is the time for all good men, regardless of party, to come to the aid of small business. The good society of the future which we seek in the face of war's terrible sacrifices cannot exist without small business, and small business cannot fulfill its part unless the necessary steps are taken to allow it the opportunity to function. This means giving it access to capital, especially equity capital, the vigorous enforcement of anti-monopoly laws, and encouragement in the way of tax relief or incentives.
> Once again we must choose. Either we wish to maintain free enterprise, modified in the course of industrial evolution to fit a twentieth century abruptly with our traditions to embrace a society of big business only, with cartelization and monopoly as accepted features.

I think that is very well put when one considers the source of the quotation. Members of this group believe that socially desirable free enterprise, where the genuine element of competition has free play, has a significant and important role to perform within the framework of a democratic and socialist planned economy directed towards definite economic and social objectives and designed to provide peace, plenty and progress for all.

In concluding I suggest that the review which it is proposed to undertake should include an extensive study of the operations of this act across Canada in various regions and in various fields. I have found that in many cases small business people require more information. I was talking to a businessman in Trail this summer. He had spent $25,000 improving his premises and then he applied for a loan under this legislation in order to buy stock. If he had been informed as to the situation he would have borrowed the money to improve his premises and kept his capital to buy his stock. That was unfortunate. I am familiar with other instances of local businessmen, sound men in their own enterprises, who lack an understanding of the operation of this act. I draw this situation to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. Again, I find that some bank managers are not too co-operative. I know four or five cases where businessmen who went to a bank intending to take advantage of the provisions of the act were, to some extent, cold shouldered. As a result, they applied to the credit union in that city to borrow the money that was necessary, in some cases up to $10,000, and without difficulty, because their enterprises were sound. On the other hand, some managers were co-operative and anxious to inform local businessmen as to the terms of the act and how they could take advantage of it.

I suggest that some of the officials of the department should visit certain regions and become acquainted with the opportunities which exist there for the expansion of small business. In the constituency from which I come there is an opportunity for the expansion of small lumber businesses. Other men are in the logging industry contracting for larger companies. There are opportunities for the expansion of the tourist industry. I know a few tourist operators who have been taking advantage of this act; the loans have been of benefit to them. I know others who could not qualify because of particular circumstances.

In conclusion I would urge, again, that the department send some of these officials out into the field. There is nothing like talking to these people. It would be a good idea to get in touch with businessmen's organizations, chambers of commerce and farmers' organizations interested in business in a small way, in a co-operative way. Thus the officials would get a picture of the numbers and the kind of people whom this measure is intended to serve. It might also be a good idea to have a school for bankers, perhaps one school in each province. The purpose of the act could be explained at these schools, and the suggestions of those attending could be sought. I am sure that in this way we could greatly improve this pilot legislation so that, ultimately, it would perform the function it is intended to perform.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Time after which minister not liable.

Mr. Benson: I should like to assure all members opposite that I have listened with great care to their representations with regard to this legislation and, like the members of the official opposition who spoke, I believe that this legislation, which they brought in, is good initial legislation. We hope that in the years to come we can make it even better legislation, and I assure them that we shall bear in mind, as well as the suggestions they have made, the suggestions which were made by the hon. member for Essex East and by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when they were on the other side of the house.

Mr. Aiken: I wonder if the parliamentary secretary has any information as to the loss ratio under the act?

Mr. Benson: The losses under this act, up to the report we have here, have been nil. A few losses have been incurred to date, in 1963, but I am informed by the officials that they are infinitesimal.

Mr. Douglas: On second reading the minister gave the figure of the total amount of loans granted. Could he tell us again what those figures were?

Mr. Benson: They were roughly $25 million and $28 million in the two years which have been completed. There could have been many more loans made under the act, had they been applied for. The total amount of loans which could have been made was $300 million, so it is clear that full advantage was not taken of this measure. Like the hon. member for Kootenay West I believe a greater dissemination of information about this act among the business community would be useful and this could be encouraged by members of parliament, since the act is clearly useful to small business.

Mr. Douglas: In other words, the total amount of the loans made during this period of the act's existence is less than $60 million.

Mr. Benson: Together with the 1963 figures it would run, I think, in the neighbourhood of $90 million. It could have been $300 million had the loans been applied for and approved by the banks.

Mr. Douglas: Only about 30 per cent of the capacity has been utilized.

Mr. Benson: That is correct.

Mr. Douglas: In the new period there will be another $300 million of loans which could be granted. I think these facilities would be more fully utilized if there were some publicity given to them by putting pamphlets in the branch banks where they would be readily available to customers. I am sure the parliamentary secretary is fully aware that $80 million or $90 million does not begin to represent the kind of business credit which could be utilized. I should like to ask him a further question. When this measure is under review, what aspects of the act are to be considered—the methods by which the legislation is to be extended? Perhaps the hon. gentleman could say a word about this.

Mr. Benson: I can assure the hon. member that the entire act will be reviewed. As I mentioned on second reading, the department and the government have been waiting for the report of the royal commission on banking and finance. When that report comes down, the entire act will be reviewed in the light of its recommendations to see how the legislation can be improved so as to better serve its purposes.

Mr. Douglas: Then I take it, it is not the intention to leave such a review until 1966 when the act has to be amended again to provide for another period of loans?

Mr. Benson: No, it is not.

Mr. Olson: I have not heard the parliamentary secretary say, even yet, whether it is expected this will be ready for the next session of parliament.

Mr. Benson: I would not like to indicate that it would be ready for the next session of parliament. It will be several months before the royal commission on banking submits its report and it is evident that it will take some time for the report to be considered and for the act to be reviewed. I would not like to say it would be in the next session but I can assure the hon. member that it will be as soon as it is physically possible to do it.

Mr. Olson: Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would undertake to review the matter to the extent of making some major amendments with respect to the security required under this act. This is one of the greatest problems, and I think it is also one section of the act that is far different from the Farm Improvement Loans Act. If the report that he requires is not available for the next session of parliament, perhaps he can give us some assurance that the basis of security will be reviewed and some amendments brought in at the next session.

Mr. Benson: The hon. member will realize that I am not in a position to assure him what legislation will be brought in at the next session of parliament. I can assure him that his question with regard to the matter of security will be brought to the attention of the government and will be considered by the government.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I think it is unfortunate that only some $90 million was lent out of a possible $300 million in that period of time. I do not think it has been a case of people not wanting to obtain loans. I believe many businessmen have applied for loans to branches of various banks where managers in some cases were not aware of the legislation or were not willing to make loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act, particularly to those people whose credit was such that they would be eligible for such a loan. I agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that there should be a conference with the heads of the banks so that they can reach down into their branches, acquaint their managers with the Small Businesses Loans Act and thus give some impetus to the matter. I think it would have a great effect not only on the expansion of business but also on the economy generally.

Mr. Benson: I will certainly bring the hon. member's representations to the attention of the officials who are responsible for administering the act.

Mr. Douglas: Is there a booklet or pamphlet that we could get so that the boards of trade in the various constituencies could be circularized? I am not referring to obtaining any tremendous quantity but simply sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. Benson: I am not sure that there is. I believe there was a pamphlet put out but I am not sure. However, I will look into the matter.

Mr. Douglas: If such a pamphlet were prepared and distributed early in 1964 it seems to me it might result in a much larger number of loans being made in the next three year period than in the last.

Mr. Benson: I agree that the aim should be to see that the provisions of the act are more fully utilized in the future and I think the hon. member can be assured that with such an active government in power every opportunity will be taken to see that the act is more fully utilized.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I might say that the preceding government, which was much more active, issued a booklet and everybody was advised of the nature of the loans which could be made under the act.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, there is one matter I should like to have reported upon, while the royal commission and the government are considering this matter. As the hon. member for Ontario has said, one of the difficulties under the Small Businesses Loans Act is that many bankers do not seem to be fully aware of the loans which are available under this legislation and, furthermore, are somewhat reluctant to use the provisions of the act. I know that in quite a number of instances applications for loans to banks under the act have resulted in the bank making a direct loan without using the provisions of the act. I should like to have an inquiry made from the banks and some report, if possible, as to the amount of loans stimulated by applications under the Small Businesses Loans Act which the bank may not have felt required a government guarantee.

If we had those figures I think we would find that the effect of the Small Businesses Loans Act has probably been much greater than appears in the report. I know of many cases where people wanted loans and the banks felt they were good security risks and made the loans to them directly, instead of making them under the Small Businesses Loans Act. I think that figure would be very significant.

Mr. Benson: From my previous experience in professional practice as an accountant I found that in many instances businesses had approached banks for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act but the loans were made on the credit of the individuals without the banks considering the government guarantee necessary. However, I doubt that the information requested would be available inasmuch as we would only have a record of loans that were actually made and forwarded to the government for guarantee. I doubt that the information could be accumulated.

Mr. Aiken: I am merely suggesting that the information could possibly be secured in general form, if not in statistical form, if the banks would seek such information through reports from their managers.

Mr. Benson: I would think that in a general way that might be true.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Bank security.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a very brief observation and ask a question of the parliamentary secretary. I understand that the purpose of clause 3 is to clarify certain doubts that may have arisen with regard to the original legislation, and the clause purports now to include a commercial pledge of movable property as required in the province of Quebec and refers to the types of security that can be taken and also the security given by guarantors. The question which runs in my mind is this. Is this amendment intended to validate securities of this description which might have been taken in the past or is it simply to deal with those which are taken from now on? I have no brief in this matter one way or another, but I think it might be useful to set at rest any doubts that may exist in the minds of those in the banks who may have taken securities of this type.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), would be ready to change the words I mentioned a moment ago? I think that the specific term which should be used in both places is the word "guarantee".

The word "mortgage" is in italics; if taken in its English sense, it has one meaning, while in French, it may have quite a different significance.

Even in the English sense, the term may have two different meanings, and I feel that in both paragraphs the words which are used may lead to a misconstruction.

Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would be ready to suggest the replacement of the word "mortgage" by the word "guarantee"?

[Text]

Mr. Benson: In answer to the hon. member for Lapointe may I say that I am informed by the Minister of Public Works that the word "mortgage" is a proper word in French. It is in Petit Larousse as a proper word and it is quite proper to be used in this sense.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, the word may be in the Petit Larousse but I will make bold to point out that it is written in two words, with a hyphen. In days gone by, the term was applied to various articles that people deposited in pawn-offices or in religious communities, and for which they had to pay an exorbitant interest rate. A time came when that method was forbidden. Such a method was called in French mort-gage. Today the word does not have the same meaning as in previous centuries; as the word is written in italics, I feel that in the French text it retains its English meaning.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I think that the remarks of the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) are well founded.

I studied the bill, a little while ago, and I must say to the hon. member that there is a fundamental difference between the civil code of the province of Quebec, which was modelled on the Napoleonic code, and the British common law.

Moreover, as the word "mort-gage" is used in French, I am of the opinion, according to the Petit Larousse, that we would be ill advised to move this amendment tonight as the experts who have reviewed the text have precisely taken into account the differences between the common law and the civil code of the province of Quebec.

Besides, I am convinced that if there had been a serious mistake in the use of the word mortgage, I would support the remarks of the hon. member. But as it comes to use one word authorized by the Petit Larousse, I wonder if it would not be advisable, under the circumstances, to let the text stand as it is now.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the explanations given by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) who mentioned the definition of the word "mortgage" as it appears in the Larousse dictionary, I must say that I read this definition which is as follows:

"Gage dont on laisse jouir un créancier, sans que les fruits dont il profite soient imputables sur la dette."

This might very well be the minister's intention but, in my opinion, it is very doubtful.

I feel that the word privilège should be used instead, because a privilege can encumber personal property and real estate, whereas a mortgage can only encumber real estate.

Mr. Deschatelets: In the province of Quebec?

Mr. Martineau: Yes, in the province of Quebec.

Since this legislation would use a word which does not appear in the civil code of the province of Quebec, I agree with the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) that we should perhaps substitute the word privilège.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, we accept the word privilège which the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) has suggested. The definition he has given is not quite the same as the one I read, but it is good just the same. It would be a pledge left with the creditor who would not enjoy the product.

Now, in this instance, if a man borrowed money from a bank he would not leave the pledge with his creditor. He will just simply continue enjoying the product of his pledge.

However, if we used the word mort-gage, as defined in the Petit Larousse dictionary, the objective of the act would not be served. Obviously, the person who drafted the bill gave a modern meaning to an English word; in this case, "mortgage" applies to both movable and immovable property. Now, in the province of Quebec, there can be no "mortgage" or hypothèque on movables:

Moreover, if you read the bill, you will see that the same words are used twice. Indeed, subparagraph (ii) reads as follows:

—a commercial pledge of movable property evidenced by a deed—

Throughout the bill, the word is used three times with both meanings. I feel that the word privilège would be quite adequate and would be agreeable to those who care for accuracy in legal terminology and in language in general.

[Text]

Mr. Macdonald: If I may, I should like to point out that not only are we attempting to translate an English word, but we are also attempting to translate an English concept of law. There is no such thing as a hypothec in the province of Ontario. Even in a riding such as that of the hon. chairman, Stormont, there is no such thing. What we wish to put in by virtue of this terminology is the concept of a mortgage. With a common-law mortgage the title transfers from the mortgagor to the mortgagee, which is unlike a hypothec. When you are referring to a mortgage in English and hypothec in French, you are referring to two different concepts. You have a hypothec in the province of Quebec, but it does not exist in the province of Ontario. For the people using the English language, we have to put in the word "mortgage", and for the French we use "hypothec", but we are referring to two entirely different forms of legal encumbrance.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, I hope that the subtlety of the French language will not put us on the warpath about this matter—the Wars of the Roses.

I know a big finance company which is named Credit-Mortgage, Credit M-G, Inc., which is related to the Societe Nationale D'assurance and the Societe d'assurance L'Economie, all subsidies of the St. Jean Baptiste Society of Montreal, which, in other respects, takes guarantees or privileges on real property by using the word mort-gage, as indicated a while ago by the Minister of Public Works.

That is why I am personally in favour of this word.

Mr. Martineau: I should like to put to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Macdonald) a question relating to the definition of a mortgage enjoyed by a creditor.

Is it then the intention of the legislator that the bank, which is the debtor in this case, which grants the loan, takes as security the property of the borrower or of the businessman who obtains a loan in accordance with this act?

Before giving him a chance to reply, I think that he will say: Not at all. If his reply is "Not at all", this word has no longer any meaning, and that is why I suggest that it be striken out and replaced by the word "privilege".

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word about that. The hon. gentleman was a privy councillor when this bill was introduced, upon the recommendation of the government of which he was a supporter. They must have had some reason for putting it in at that time. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us.

Mr. Martineau: I think the Secretary of State is making an argument ad hominem. If I am not mistaken, the purpose of this bill before the committee is to improve the act. The Secretary of State, by his intervention, has certainly not improved either the bill or the general tenor of this debate. I should like the parliamentary secretary, who seems to have much more knowledge of the subject than the Secretary of State, to give this matter his learned attention.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member for Rosedale, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice, really explained the point. If the bill is looked at carefully, and I am speaking very seriously but without the learning and knowledge of people like the hon. member for Rosedale and the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue, you will see that the word is in italics. It is in italics because it is obviously meant to be an English word, not a French word. It is not meant to be a translation any more than hypothec, which is put in the English translation, is a normal English word. The law is being made for the whole of Canada, in both languages, and it must contain both concepts, the common law and the civil code. I believe the hon. member for Rosedale really made that point, and that is the reason the word is there.

Mr. Pigeon: I should like to ask, is it the intention of the minister to suspend the bill and consult Dr. Ollivier, the specialist on this matter?

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State has just clearly indicated that, in this legislation, the word mortgage is used in its English sense. It is thus, by the admission of the Secretary of State himself, an English word which is being used in the French wording of an act. Personally, I am not at all satisfied, not only from the language standpoint, but also from that of the meaning of the civil code, for the word mortgage in English corresponds to the word hypothèque in French, and according to the civil code of the province of Quebec, personal property cannot be mortgaged. But it is said in the act that:

—a mortgage upon real or personal property—

Therefore, not only is it proposed to use an English word, but also it is suggested to use it in a sense that would not be applicable under the civil code of the province of Quebec.

On the other hand, I maintain we are given a general description where it is said:

—a mortgage upon real or personal property—

At that point, the person who wrote the act realized that the sentence was ambiguous and, to be more explicit, he added:

—a hypothec upon real or personal, immovable or movable property—

He added, in the case of movable property:

—a commercial pledge of movable property evidenced by a deed—

Which means that the first term is a general one. Therefore, instead of using a specific term in a general context, I would use a general term in a general context, that is to say what the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue suggested: a privilege upon immovable or movable property. Then comes the provision: hypothec upon immovable property or a commercial pledge on immovable property.

Then the demands of linguistics and the civil rights of the province of Quebec are taken care of.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I think we can credit the hon. member for Lapointe with starting a very interesting debate. We are all very happy to have spent a few moments on that problem. But if he studies this bill closely, I think the hon. member for Lapointe will see that the word "mortgage" has been in the act for the last three years. It has been understood clearly and its meaning well established.

We admit that the hon. member for Lapointe raised a very interesting point, but I feel that, in the interest of all, we should leave the bill as it is, with the word "mortgage".

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, the argument advanced by the Minister of Public Works is not very impressive, because we are amending this act precisely to improve it and one of the reasons for which we want to amend this clause is that, under the civil code of the province of Quebec, the word "mortgage" is not always applicable. In fact we have the word "mortgage": a mortgage on immovable property. Here are listed a number of ways by which the creditor can be protected in the province of Quebec. As a rule, as there cannot be any mortgage on movable property in the course of business, we agree rather to a conditional sale by which the creditor becomes the owner of the property on condition that the debtor may repossess it by paying back the amount owed.

That is why we are not going to be stopped by the argument of the Minister of Public Works who says: The act was passed two or three years ago and nobody complained about that expression.

If, today, it is advisable to improve this legislation by replacing one word by another, I submit to the committee that we must do so.

[Text]

Mr. Marcoux: Could the parliamentary secretary give us the exact definition of "mortgage", and "hypothec" since both terms are used?

Mr. Macdonald: The definition is as follows: a mortgage is the creature of English common law, as used in the other nine provinces; hypothec is a creature of the civil code as used exclusively in Quebec. In a mortgage the title in the property passes from the man who owns the land to the mortgagee, the man lending the money. Under the hypothec the ownership does not pass. From a lawyer's standpoint there are two entirely different concepts arising from two entirely different codes of law, and when the hon. member for Lapointe says mortgage is unknown in the civil code he is perfectly correct. I suggest the reason it is in italics is because it covers an entirely different system of law.

Mr. Martineau: I would like either the Minister of Public Works or the parliamentary secretary to explain what would be the position of a lawyer from Quebec reading this clause. If he refers to the debate which took place when the bill was being studied or adopted by parliament, he will see that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance stated the reason mortgage was in the French was because "mortgage" was a word recognized in the French language and found in the dictionary Larousse, and then he finds according to that dictionary "mortgage" is quite a different matter from what the bill envisages. Surely it is not the intention of the legislation that the borrower remit to the person who lends the money the goods he must keep in order to make his business operate?

Mr. Deschatelets: I think it is easy to answer. We should be practical in this field because we have to take into consideration that this act has been used for the past three years, and I am told there has never been any complaint, any misunderstanding as to the difference in terms in French and in English. The term is well known, and I think we should go ahead with the bill.

Mr. Martineau: The minister says there has never been any misunderstanding. I say there has been a lot of misunderstanding. I know many people who went to the banks in Quebec to apply for loans under this act and they were told, "We are very sorry. This act is not applicable here because under the civil law in Quebec we cannot get the required guarantee and therefore we must refuse a loan."

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I think the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice tried to confuse the issue a little when he gave a definition of the terms. Further evidence of the fact is that another crown corporation is called "Central Mortgage" in English and "Societe centrale d'hypotheque" in French. In this case, "mortgage" is given the same meaning in English as hypothèque in French.

However, there can be no hypothèque on movable property in the province of Quebec and if we keep the word "mortgage", we will be going against the civil code of Quebec. If the word "mortgage" is to be applied to both movable and immovable property, I am afraid there will be confusion. In addition, as the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue said a while ago, the use of that word would not always be in accordance with the civil code of the province of Quebec.

I agree with the Minister of Public Works that this mistake has been existing for three years, but this is no reason to allow it to last forever. There is always room for improvement, in my opinion, and if a mistake has been made, let it be corrected and let the wording of the act be improved.

It is not the first time that members of the house have complained of sentences that are too long, of wrong punctuation, of improper terms and mistranslations. It is time to see that such mistakes are corrected. With enough suggestions of this type, the drafters will finally improve the wording and terminology of the statutes.

This is why I suggest that the Secretary of State, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance and even the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chevrier), who, I am convinced, was appointed Minister of Justice because he was a good lawyer, must admit that I have a good point when I say that the word privilège should be substituted for the word "mortgage" everywhere it is used. By doing so, we would meet the requirements of the language as well as those of the civil code and the common law.

[Text]

Mr. Macdonald: If I might just refer to that, I agree that the term "hypothec" is used in the French title of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but I suggest that is a form of convenience. This is a technical statute, a legal definition of the type of property, and I would point out that the second line in the English version has absolutely no meaning in English law. The term "hypothec" imparts no legal right under the law of Ontario.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if the Secretary of State is ready to move himself that the word be changed?

[Text]

Mr. Macdonald: This, I think, illustrates better than anything else that we have two systems of law in this country.

Mr. Ryan: I would like to point out that at the time of William the Conqueror this word "mortgage" came into the English language from the French. At that time it meant a dead pledge. The French dictionary has the words "mort" meaning dead or lying idle and "gage" meaning pledge or pawn. The word "mortgage" is still in the English language but maybe it is not still in the French language.

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I would have liked to know whether the Secretary of State was willing to change the term in question.

[Text]

Mr. Fairweather: It is ridiculous to change the word just because the hon. member for Lapointe does not understand this is a statute designed for the whole country, and not one part of the country. We use one part of the clause for one part of the country, and the other part of the clause for another part of the country. This is bilingualism and biculturalism at its best, and I suggest that we get on with the debate.

Mr. Olson: I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary if the interest rate has been the same on all of the loans granted, regardless of their size, type of security, or the length of the loans? Is there one single interest rate or are there minimums and maximums?

[Translation]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, before clause 3 is carried, we would point out that we suggested to the government to use a term in keeping with language requirements and that the government is refusing to do so at present.

[Text]

Mr. Benson: The maximum rate under the act is 5½ per cent. The banks may charge a lower rate but they may not charge a higher rate.

Mr. Baldwin: Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would deal with the point I raised.

Mr. Benson: I can tell the hon. member that subparagraph (ii) and paragraph (B) are put in as a clarification. They could not possibly change the legal position of undertakings that had already been made.

World Exhibition Corporation Act

CANADIAN WORLD EXHIBITION CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SITE, NUMBER OF DIRECTORS, ETC.

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (for the Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-120, to amend the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to this bill. As I have indicated, my interest is solely in a point of order and not in the substance of the bill itself. One of the best known rules of this House of Commons is that a money bill must be preceded by a resolution. All of us who are private members of course know this, for it certainly applies to any bills that we seek to bring in. It also applies to bills brought in by the government. This, I may say, arises not just from a standing order of the House of Commons or from some citation in Beauchesne, but rather from section 54 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

That principle is carried forward in standing order 61 of the standing orders of the House of Commons, which says the same thing in standing order language, so that I need not repeat it. This principle is also confirmed in two or three citations in Beauchesne's—rather, I should say it is confirmed in a dozen citations, but I call attention to only two or three of them. I am looking at Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 243, which says:

> All bills providing for the payment of salaries or for any expenditure whatever out of the public funds of the dominion must be first considered as resolutions in committee of the whole.

Similarly citation 355 of Beauchesne's fourth edition says:

> Bills involving expenditure of public money or taxation, and all measures involving a charge upon the people must be preceded by a resolution.

As hon. members are aware, Bill No. C-120 is one of a number of bills that first reached us on Friday. We did not know at that time what the bill would contain. I recognize that the point upon which I base my point of order might seem to be a small one, but the principle is one that I think we must recognize. The bill includes provision for increasing the number of directors of the body established by it. Though they do not receive any remuneration, they receive their expenses; but in addition to that I would point out that for the commissioner general and the deputy commissioner general there has been added money for allowances. By the previous act they were provided with salaries but not allowances, but provision is now made for the commissioner general and the deputy commissioner general to receive allowances as fixed by the governor in council. I have read through the bill itself—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles: Surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. gentleman considered who is to pay these salaries?

Mr. Knowles: I cannot say that I have read in detail on that particular point, but it has been provided in this legislation, and the act we are now amending was brought before parliament as a money bill with a preceding resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was a grant to a corporation.

Mr. Knowles: But the provision for these salaries and allowances is to be made by the governor in council. It is really improper for me to go into the sections of the bill at this point, except to make the reference to the fact that it is the governor in council that fixes the amount of the salaries and allowances these people are to receive. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if this is the case this bill, even though it is a minor point financially, should have been preceded by a resolution.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in commenting on the different points raised by the hon. member. I think he has established very clearly that a money bill should be preceded by a resolution. There is no ambiguity there. But may I point out to the hon. member that on December 20, 1962, the act was passed and in section 11 it is provided that a grant not exceeding $20 million will be paid from time to time to the corporation of the world fair. Bill No. C-120 which is now before us makes a few minor amendments to the act. May I point out to the hon. member that any remuneration not provided for in the previous act will be paid out of the fund voted under that act. We are not looking for any additional funds; the funds have been voted and we are now asking for a few amendments to be made. I do not think that under these circumstances the jurisprudence quoted by the hon. member applies to this bill.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that members of the privy council both present and former will realize that even if additional money is not asked for, the government can only spend money or assign money to those purposes for which parliament has given approval. This applies to estimates; the fact that a total sum of money has been voted does not give the government power to move that money from one item to another.

I submit that the act passed last December stated certain purposes for which this $20 million could be used. One of those purposes was the salaries of these two people. There was no suggestion in that act that any of this money could be used for the purpose which is now spelled out in the bill before us. I submit that even though not another dollar may be necessary to carry out these purposes, what we now have is a bill indicating a purpose which was not envisioned in the previous legislation. That is the nub of section 54 of the British North America Act, that there cannot be such a vote of money for any purposes that has not been first recommended to the house by message of the governor in council. I recognize that there may be no additional money involved. If there is additional money involved, it will have to be brought in in some other way later on. But a new purpose has been imported into the legislation that was not in the legislation when it was introduced last year.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the hon. member that in the act passed on November 20, 1962 there was provision for the remuneration of officers of the world fair corporation; but no amount was mentioned, this being left to the discretion of the governor in council. I think—

Mr. Knowles: But there was no provision for allowances; that is something new that is being asked for. If it is not something new, why is it being asked for?

Mr. Deschatelets: I only want to add a word to this, Mr. Speaker. I think that once the funds are voted by parliament we should not require a resolution if we wish to bring in amendments to an act. I believe the points of order raised by my hon. friend have no application in this situation.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it may be useful if I refer to a reference in Beauchesne's third edition at page 479 which certainly supports the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and says:

> Another element which places this measure in the category of money bills is that its adoption would mean the transfer of the authority under which appropriated money is to be spent.

Further it says:

When money is voted, the main conditions imposed on its expenditure are embodied in resolutions. All the circumstances concerning its destination form part of the appropriation with which they are considered and if any alteration is to be made it must be by the same process as the original resolution.

Then it says that the circumstances under which an expenditure is to be made are indivisible from that expenditure.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if at the time you are considering this question you would take this point into account. I raise it specifically because of the contention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) to the effect that once an allocation of money is made and set out in the statute, you do not need any further resolution amending or changing the manner in which that money will be spent. I do not have the specific reference, but during the session of 1962-63 when Mr. Speaker Lambert was in the chair I had introduced a bill seeking to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to say that moneys expended under that act could be used for the purposes of highways other than the specifically designated trans-Canada highway. The amount of money was provided by a previous amendment to the statute. I in no way sought to have the amending bill changed, or alter that amount of money; merely that it could be expended with the approval of the governor in council for another purpose, another type of highway, in the same way as this bill now before us seeks to say that the amount of money provided by a previous statute can be expended in another way, namely for allowances.

Mr. Speaker Lambert ruled the bill I had introduced to be out of order on precisely the same grounds as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is saying that this bill is out of order. I appealed Mr. Speaker Lambert's decision. We had a division. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) was then a private member and he and every one of his Liberal colleagues then in the house voted to support the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lambert, though they are now singing a different tune.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I may say a word on this. It does not seem to me that the hon. member has drawn a true analogy, because what he was seeking to do on that occasion—and I remember it very well—was to change the purpose for which money could be expended out of the treasury. In this case parliament made a grant of $20 million to a corporation. The grant has been made. There is no suggestion that anything be added to it and there is no suggestion that the money be used for any other purpose apart from the world exhibition. All this bill seeks to do is to restrict the manner in which the corporation spend this grant; the governor in council is now asking parliament to restrict the corporation a little further in what it can do with the money.

Mr. Aiken: We seem to be spending a lot of time discussing a point of order—a point of order which certainly seems to have some basis—and I wonder whether the minister would not consider withdrawing his motion, starting again and putting a resolution on the order paper.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we had better hear from the Chair, first.

Mr. Aiken: I am trying to avoid, if possible, a ruling from the Chair and the chance of a division.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will accept the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Secretary of State explain his use of language when he says that what is being asked is a restriction on the powers of the corporation or of the governor in council? Let me stick to this one point. The legislation as enacted last December says, in section 5(1) that the commissioner general and the deputy commissioner general "shall each be paid by the corporation such salaries as are fixed by the governor in council." The proposal is to amend that, so as to make it read "such salaries and allowances as are fixed by the governor in council". It seems to me that this is not restrictive. It seems to me that this is enlarging the way in which this money can be spent.

I could take up other aspects of the bill, for example, the enlarging of the area where the fair could be held. The geographical limits set out in the original act were much more restricted than those proposed in this bill. As I say, I find it hard to understand the language used by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill). If the bill, were, in fact, restricting the objects on which the money could be spent I would have no point of order, but it is precisely because the bill has brought in at least one new purpose which was not there before, that I think section 54 of the British North America Act comes into play.

In one of the citations which I read—I think it was citation 243—it says further down in the paragraph that if a bill such as the present bill gets into committee and the approval of the governor general has not been given in advance, it can be given at that time. I am not holding out for the suggestion made by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) that we should start over again, by having a resolution, if this could be dealt with in another way; but having in mind the express provision of the British North America Act in this regard it seems to me we should be careful. I can see someone coming along later and saying these allowances were paid illegally and we would have another field day for the lawyers.

Mr. Nowlan: Let us hear from Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wonder if it would not be more conducive to good order and progress in the house if we were to let this matter stand and go on with the next item of business. There would, as I understand it, be no delay if the government decided to introduce a resolution to precede the bill; it would not kill the bill in any way. I am not suggesting that if a ruling were made by the Chair it would necessarily be in favour of the point of order advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but since time is advancing this evening it is the opinion of the Chair that the matter might be allowed to stand until tomorrow and the next order of business called.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just rising to make the same suggestion to Your Honour. It was obviously a very debatable point we were discussing—a matter which only the Chair can decide. I may say at once the government is only too happy to abide by whatever decision the Chair may make in this matter but I think it would be helpful if we could, as you suggest, have this matter adjourned until the Speaker has had an opportunity to reflect upon it, and proceed to the next item of business.

Perhaps, while I am on my feet, you would permit me to inquire whether it might be the wish of the house to let us go on for half an hour so that we could hear the hon. lady give her exposition of the important measure which is the next order of business.

Mr. Nowlan: It is snowing outside now. We do not want any more of it.

On motion of Mr. Pickersgill the debate was adjourned.

PENSIONS

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING OLD AGE ASSISTANCE, BLIND AND DISABLED PAYMENTS, ETC.

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-125, an act to amend the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Blind Persons Act.

Mr. Howard: Before the hon. lady makes her comments with respect to this bill I think we would do well to reflect on the suggestion made by the Secretary of State that we should sit half an hour beyond the normal sitting time in order that the hon. lady, or another minister, might make remarks of an introductory nature. Perhaps before we reflect on that suggestion we might consider it to be ten o'clock. This would give the hon. lady a fresh start tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I suppose one bows to the inevitable.

Mr. Churchill: Has anyone called it ten o'clock?

We are prepared to go on for half an hour.

Mr. Howard: I thought I had made it clear earlier that it should be ten o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not ten o'clock yet.

An hon. Member: Thirty seconds to go.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: If it is now ten o'clock, may I ask what is to be the business for tomorrow and Wednesday?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, in line with the suggestion made by Your Honour, it would be preferable to go ahead now with the bill on the pensions and then, perhaps, after that Your Honour could give a decision on the point which was raised and we would go ahead with the bill on the world's fair.

Then we would proceed to deal with the other two bills which were indicated by my colleague the Solicitor General, the measure concerning the auditors of the C.N.R. and the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act. If these were to be completed I am sure, by consultation, we could get something more done tomorrow.

I am very grateful for the excellent co-operation there has been today and if we can get at least those four measures done tomorrow I think we can be much more hopeful about the conclusion of the session.

Mr. Churchill: What are the prospects for Wednesday—legislation or estimates?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we should take estimates on Wednesday, and I hope to confer with hon. gentlemen opposite about which estimates will be taken. I would hope that on Wednesday the house would agree to sit either in the evening or, if that does not seem possible, at least until seven o'clock so as to make some progress with whatever estimates are before us.

It being one minute after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 10, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT—WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

[Translation]

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) presented the third report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping and moved that the motion appearing on today's order paper concerning concurrence in second report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping presented on December 5, be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

On the order: Introduction of bills.

The Secretary of State—Bill intituled: An act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think there was an understanding which was set out by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition last Friday that this bill would simply be introduced so it would be visible to the public and, in accord with the suggestion made by the Prime Minister and agreed to by the Leader of the Opposition, would be available for discussion among the various parties and groups during the session. It was also clearly understood that the bill simply set out a method; that it was subject to all the qualifications I set out at an earlier stage; that in any respect except the fundamental principle of an impartial non-partisan redistribution it would be open to amendment from any quarter of the house in accord with the views of the majority of hon. members.

I should perhaps say one more thing. There is one point upon which I would not want to be thought to have misled the house. I gave an answer during the course of the debate to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka about the suggested method the government had in mind in its legislation of setting up the commissions and appointing the commissioners. In the light of the debate that particular suggestion has been changed, and the change will be seen in the bill. The provision there is not as I explained it to the hon. gentleman because it seemed to me that several hon. members made certain arguments that deserved consideration, and I did not want even to put forward the suggestion that was originally intended because it seemed to me there was a better suggestion than that to put forward. But it, of course, is open to discussion and amendment, and the government has no intention of proceeding with the measure in its present form beyond first reading.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I might be allowed to reply to the minister, my understanding, and I may have been mistaken, was that there would be no introduction of the bill but that there would be discussion among representatives of the various parties during the period of the Christmas recess or between this session and the next one.

I must say that in my opinion even first reading at this time will not bring about that measure of agreement that all of us desire. I would hope that the minister would consider holding it back rather than having first reading at this time, because introduction of this bill can only increase very considerably the discussion on the bill respecting the appointment of the official. I feel that the bill should not be given first reading at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am only too happy to comply with the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman. There was only one reason the government thought it would be desirable to introduce a bill indicating a method. It was thought that this might facilitate certain public discussion outside the house, and at the same time we would have a document that would be available in the house. But the main concern of the government in this matter, which concerns all of us, is to achieve the utmost harmony; and certainly if the right hon. gentleman did not understand we were to follow the procedure which I thought had been agreed to I would not wish to proceed. Since the motion has not been put I would simply ask that the matter stand.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, before unanimous consent is given I should like to say that while I have no thought of disturbing any harmony which may or may not exist, the view of this party is that it would be most useful for us to have a draft bill, because if we had such a bill we could then better discuss the legislation having to do with the representation commissioner. Even though it is not intended to proceed with the bill at this session, it would provide a basis for discussion inside and outside the house, and we would be able to approach the problem at the next session much more intelligently if we had this material before us.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it was our understanding that this bill would be presented in this way in order to do the very thing that the previous speaker has outlined, and we would support this procedure without question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether there would be agreement to have the matter stand over for the time being so there could be consultation through the usual channels, which I will undertake to carry out in the next few days.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Winch: There is only one person with any misunderstanding and that is the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, if I may add a word in order that we may possibly have a clearer understanding of the situation, I would point out that the course now to be followed is precisely what I understood in the negotiations would be done.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Secretary of State a question. If it is not possible to get the necessary harmony to go ahead with the introduction of the bill today, will he consider discussing the matter through the usual channels in the hope that the bill may be introduced before this session ends, so we can have it before us and can examine it before the next session?

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought that was precisely what I said, and that there was agreement with that view.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, that is what you said, and there is agreement.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that this bill should stand. Is it agreed?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: At the request of the government, of course.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANTICIPATED REDUCTION IN ARMED FORCES AND CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, now that several days have passed since the minister of defence announced the cut-backs and reductions in defence estimates, is he in a position to advise, on the basis of the examination that must have been made in anticipation of his statement in this regard, what will be the number of personnel to be struck from the strength of Canada's armed forces, and what will be the reduction in civilian strength in consequence of this new policy?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not have this information with me at the moment, but I will try and get it for the right hon. gentleman if he would like.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Approximately.

Mr. Hellyer: The figures include one or two minor adjustments which are presently under consultation and have to be separated. If the right hon. gentleman wishes, either tomorrow or the next day I can try to separate them; otherwise I can give the detailed figures which will include all the proposals we have made when I get back from the NATO council meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the house should have this information before the NATO council meets. The government has determined upon this course, and this very important information has not yet been vouchsafed the membership of this house.

Mr. Hellyer: I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker, and get the information.

Mr. Churchill: Will you do it by means of a press release?

TRADE

WHEAT—REPORTED INABILITY TO SUPPLY LARGER AMOUNT TO RED CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Winnipeg Free Press for Saturday, December 7, carries an article which says that mainland China wanted 55,500,000 bushels of Canadian wheat in its second contract under the long term agreement but had to settle for 18,700,000 bushels. May I ask the minister if that is correct, and why it was not possible to take advantage of this very large offer to purchase Canadian wheat.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm, of course, that the wheat board did enter into a contract for half a million tons for the second half of the present crop year. The Chinese mainland authorities were interested in obtaining more at the present time. The wheat board, having in mind its commitments to its other customers, decided that it could not safely enter into a larger contract with mainland China at the present time.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. Is this due to the lack of supply or the inability to handle wheat at the port facilities?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I have explained on other occasions there is no lack of wheat in Canada today. The limitations lie in transportation, the capacity of terminal elevators, and so on.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, since all members are interested in trade matters, could the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house of the result of his meeting yesterday with the ministers of industry and trade from the different provinces?

[Text]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): We had a very satisfactory meeting of ministers from eight of the provinces who gathered in Ottawa yesterday. The other two provinces whose ministers were unable to be present were represented by their deputy ministers. These were the ministers concerned with trade and industry, and yesterday we discussed the question of trade promotion. The purpose of this meeting was to co-ordinate trade promotion activities of the federal and provincial governments.

I think our discussions were most useful. We decided there was need for more co-ordination than in the past. This was agreed on the part of both the federal and the provincial governments. We laid plans to accomplish this co-ordination both at home and abroad. As far as the federal government are concerned, we offered the utmost co-operation to the provinces. We made it clear to them that we had no quarrel whatever with their activities in the field of export trade promotion. We believe that the more people who are promoting our external trade today, the better it will be for the country. In that spirit we offered to help train their people. We offered the utmost co-operation.

If I may say so, I think this was an example of co-operative federalism in action.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Could the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us, in view of his great success in the sale of farm products from western Canada—wheat, in particular—whether he intends to try just as hard to sell products of the eastern farmers, namely dairy products and by-products such as butter, cheese, etc. since there is a surplus at the present time?

[Text]

Mr. Sharp: I can assure the hon. gentleman that in so far as external markets are concerned, the Department of Trade and Commerce does not discriminate amongst areas of the country. We give equal concern and equal attention to the products of all parts, including dairy products the exports of which my colleague the Minister of Agriculture and I are both promoting very actively.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): May I ask the minister if either the depressed areas or designated areas were discussed at this conference?

Mr. Sharp: I understand that is being discussed today with these ministers when they meet my colleague the Minister of Industry.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the minister if he discussed with the ministers from the provinces the question of smaller loans by export credits insurance for export credit?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the federal officials who were present gave an account of our policies in this respect, but I do not remember there being any complaint from the provinces about the inadequacy of our services.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION ON BILINGUALISM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the fact that last August 1, the minister promised to table a report on bilingualism within the civil service, that requests to that effect were made last October 1 and 16 and that the Secretary of State again promised last November 7 to present a report within two weeks, is the minister now in a position to provide us with a report on the state of bilingualism within the civil service?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to ask the chairman of this independent commission whether the report is yet available. As soon as it is I will bring it to the attention of the house.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the government intend to keep the promise it made a few months ago and give a bonus to bilingual employees?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a question of policy, and it is not normal to announce matters of policy in response to questions on orders of the day.

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN WINNER OF FRENCH AWARD

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Did the government send official congratulations to Dr. Leo Marion, vice president of the national research council, who is the first Canadian to receive the Jecker award from the Academie des Sciences of Paris?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as it happened I wrote him a letter myself this morning on behalf of the government.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR STAFF HOLIDAY ON BOXING DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General. Postal staffs are working at full capacity to handle a terriffic flow of Christmas mail, and their great efforts should be suitably recognized. Will the Postmaster General consider granting a holiday with pay to regular postal workers on Boxing day, Thursday, December 26, when most places of business are closed? In this regard I am thinking particularly of the men who deliver the mail. By December 24 they will have earned a holiday with pay.

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of sympathy for the postal employees and especially the letter carriers. I want to congratulate them in advance for the excellent job they will be doing, as they have done in the past, during the Christmas rush.

I am glad the hon. member made this suggestion. I am taking his question as notice and I shall give my answer in the near future.

[Text]

REPORTED USE OF PATRONAGE IN STAFF APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any comments to make concerning the hiring of part-time employees in Montreal and Ottawa, during the Christmas period and at some other time, especially following the statement made by the head of the postal employees' association to the effect that this procedure was only a means through which the patronage handlers within the department could dish out their favours?

Hon. Azellus Denis (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is surely not supplementary to one put to me by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe). In any case, I want him to know that there is no patronage as far as part-time jobs are concerned.

When the time comes to hire employees for the Christmas period, all applications are considered, As a matter of fact, all those made by persons who went to the Montreal post office, among others, were examined and more than 4,000 people were put to work.

Furthermore, as soon as school opens students from the various schools go to the post office and their names are taken down. At this moment most of them have been asked to come to work during the Christmas rush.

[Text]

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): My question is generally on the same subject, but it is addressed to the Prime Minister. It is prompted by the fact that the deputy minister of the Post Office Department engaged in a debate with some of his employees which led to the conclusion that there was patronage in the department on an accelerating scale. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has given consideration to having a parliamentary committee look into the operations of the post office under the present leadership.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No. The estimates of the Postmaster General's department will be before the house in a few days, and there will be ample opportunity to discuss its administration then.

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER PLANT—CONSIDERATION OF REPORTED NEW METHOD OF PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government reconsidering the question of heavy water manufacture in view of the offer made by British American Oil?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proposal of a certain company to the government indicating a new and cheaper method of manufacturing heavy water is now being considered by experts of the government, and a report will be made when that consideration is completed.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry. In view of the reply given by the right hon. Prime Minister to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka regarding heavy water, may I ask the Prime Minister if this would have any effect on the recently announced decision that a heavy water plant would be located in Nova Scotia?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I do not think an announcement was made to the effect that a heavy water plant would be located in Nova Scotia. The announcement made by the government was of a decision to approve negotiation of a contract with an efficient producer. If in the circumstances it turns out that the technological process envisaged by the present anticipated producer has in fact been superseded by a new and substantially more economical process, the government will have to give consideration to the new process.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did not the minister say the other day that the government had approved the giving of the contract to Deuterium Corporation of Canada; and would he not agree that if all other factors are equal—and I understood him the other day to say that they were—it ought to go to a low employment area such as Cape Breton island?

Mr. Drury: It is correct, Mr. Speaker, that I did announce the awarding of a contract which would result in this heavy water being produced in a low employment area. I would further agree that if all other factors are equal, the contract should go to a low employment area. I am sure, however, that the hon. member would not wish the government to embark upon the production of heavy water —which has a great potential future for Canada—by means of a process known to be obsolete. Unfortunately at the time the decision was made and the announcement was made knowledge of this new process, knowledge of this new breakthrough, if it turns out to be a fact, was not available.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, is the minister suggesting that the basis upon which he made the announcement the other day was a process which became obsolete in one week?

Mr. Drury: It is possible that the process— I say it is possible—on which last week's announcement was made is in fact obsolete and was made obsolete by the technological discoveries in the course of one week.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this matter cannot be discussed on the orders of the day, I wonder whether the Secretary of State, as house leader, will undertake to have the remaining estimates of the Department of Industry brought before the committee of supply at the first available opportunity so that we can then discuss it much better and more intelligently than we can now.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I will be delighted to do that, Mr. Speaker, and the earlier the availability, the better.

Mr. Nowlan: Tomorrow?

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. I wonder whether the Minister of Labour would take this opportunity to enlarge upon the statement of the Minister of Industry, in respect of the remarks he made at Sydney last week.

An hon. Member: They are obsolete.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to revert to the question of the Deuterium Corporation of Canada and ask the Minister of Industry whether that corporation were permitted by his department and the government to revise their bid after all bids were in and before awarding the contract.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the announcement made clear that the decision of the government was taken on the basis of the proposals made by the bidders, closing on May 31, 1963. Subsequent revisions and proposed alterations to bids were not taken into consideration.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government bound by contract with Deuterium Corporation of Canada?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Speaker.

EXPORT TO U.S. OF PRODUCTS OF STUDEBAKER CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I have a question for the Minister of Industry following upon the announcement that the Studebaker corporation will do all their manufacturing in Canada. Does the minister expect any difficulty in connection with the export of Studebaker products from Canada to the United States; that is, will there be any resistance on the part of the United States tariff authorities?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the specific question, while I think we all regret the economic difficulties in which the Studebaker corporation has found itself in the United States, I would hope that the United States authorities would not interpose any difficulties in the way of those in the United States who wish to purchase the products of the Studebaker corporation from Canadian sources.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBERS' SECRETARIES TO BE KEPT ON STRENGTH DURING RECESS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Could he tell the house whether the board of internal economy has come to a decision as to what will happen, during the intersession, to the members' secretaries or stenographers?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Speaking perhaps unwisely, sir, from recollection, I believe it was decided at the last meeting of the commissioners of internal economy that as the interval between this session and the next one would be rather short, it would be desirable to keep the secretaries of members on the staff during that interval.

[Mr. Kindt.]

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he considers the time is now ripe to give the house the facts in regard to the negotiations respecting the Columbia?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): These discussions are continuing, and they will be resumed today at four o'clock. When they are concluded, I think, would be the appropriate time, if the circumstances at that time warrant such action.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the widespread reports, I wonder if the Prime Minister could say whether any changes in the ministry are now imminent.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This is not the kind of announcement to make on orders of the day, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martineau: May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister categorically state that no changes are imminent?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I might take an airplane and go to Quebec during the Christmas recess.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the extraordinarily communicative attitude of the Prime Minister and his discussion about trips, could he tell us whether the Minister of Finance is about to take a trip to the United Kingdom to take over another position there?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my previous answer covered that point.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED CONNECTION OF AIR TRAGEDIES WITH AIR TURBULENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, or in his absence his parliamentary secretary. In view of the recent tragedies in which jet planes have been involved, and the suggestion that marked air turbulence may have something to do with these accidents, will the minister arrange for an investigation into this question immediately?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In the absence of the minister I will take this question as notice.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING FEES FOR OVERFLIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Secretary of State, and it arises as a result of research that I have been doing with others outside of this house on Bill No. C-117. This is the bill having to do with fees chargeable for overflights by international air carriers, and I wonder if it is the intention of the government to proceed with this legislation at this session.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Last Friday the Prime Minister indicated that this was not one of those measures that the government considered it essential to pass before prorogation. We will have to wait and see what progress is made with those items that are considered essential.

Mr. Nielsen: Can the Secretary of State say whether it is the intention of the government to proceed with Bill No. C-117 at all?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Secretary of State is not in a position to give any such information because he has not consulted the government as yet.

AGRICULTURE

SHEEP SCRAPIE DISEASE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him when his department will be prepared to answer question No. 1,730, which deals with scrapie in sheep. I ask him this because there is a certain amount of urgency in connection with this subject. The question has been on the order paper now for two weeks, and there are a large number of sheep men in the country who are very concerned that there may be some skulduggery or patronage involved in this question. We would like to have some light thrown on it.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): In so far as scrapie is concerned, I might say we are having a meeting of the ministers of agriculture on the 16th, 17th and 18th, here in Ottawa, and we are going to discuss the matter at that time. Dr. Wells, our veterinary director general, has also been to the United States to discuss this problem. I hope that after this meeting we would have something favourable to report.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question—

Mr. Olson: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Olson: The information requested in question No. 1,730 is all statistical. It does not deal with policy, and I do not see any reason why it could not be answered before the meeting of the ministers.

Mr. Hays: I think, Mr. Speaker, we could better answer it at that time.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and will be brief. How much compensation was paid to the same family in Drumheller in connection with loss resulting from this disease, and how much has this government paid as compared to the previous government?

Mr. Speaker: That is a question for the order paper, surely.

Mr. Hays: I am not allowed to disclose this amount. The compensation was suggested by a committee of three from the Canadian sheepbreeders and two people from the department. Of course this deal was made between the producer and this committee, and it cannot be divulged.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): On what basis does the minister state that this information cannot be divulged? Information along this line has been divulged previously when requested in this house.

An hon. Member: This was a deal.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the minister take the question as notice.

[Later:]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister arising out of the reply given by the Minister of Agriculture a few moments ago to the effect that he did not intend to divulge either the amount involved or the recipients of awards made because of the alleged diagnosis of scrapie. I would like to ask the Prime Minister under what authority the minister or the Department of Agriculture can make payments to anyone without divulging to parliament the amount and the recipients.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a legal question which I will be glad to discuss with the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Agriculture.

CONSIDERATION OF BRIEF PRESENTED BY FEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Has the minister received the brief of the federation of agriculture and, if so, is he in agreement with that organization which states in its brief that if Ottawa needs new revenues, it should get them from taxation?

[Text]

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I received a brief this morning from the federation of agriculture, which I have not had the opportunity to look at as yet.

FEDERAL AGENCY TO PROVIDE FEED GRAIN FOR EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In the eventuality of having a board of eastern feed grains formed, could this board purchase its wheat directly from the wheat board, and would the minister see any inconvenience in that?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question for the order paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. P. Antoine Belanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Does he intend to answer before the end of the session question No. 1,168, which has been on the order paper since September 30 last?

[Text]

Hon. J. R. Garland (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CONSIDERATION NEXT SESSION OF BILL RESPECTING BOUNDARIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in relation to earlier statements and answers on the boundaries bill. On December 6 when the Prime Minister was announcing the business of the house he stated as follows, as reported at page 5507 of Hansard:

However, it—

That is, the government:

—is prepared to hold over the boundaries bill until the next session.

Are we not right in taking that as an assurance by the Prime Minister that it will be held over and not introduced now?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it certainly will be held over in the sense that no action could be or would be taken in this session. That was the understanding I gave my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, and certainly we intend to abide by that understanding.

CANADIAN FLAG

REPORTED COMMITTEE OF LIBERAL MEMBERS TO CONSIDER ADOPTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaule (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether it is true that a committee of Liberal members has been created with a view to the adoption of a national flag?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, can the Prime Minister assure the house that the government will declare one official flag for Canada, and not two or six?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Danforth.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): My question has already been answered.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST FOR EARLIER SANDING OF ROADWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the number of motor car accidents which happened last night on and around parliament hill, would the minister consider having hazardous areas sanded as soon as possible after snowfalls?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): This is a very important question, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for having brought it up. We will certainly look into it forthwith.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): As a supplementary question, would the minister move with the same speed and alacrity with respect to the proposal for a second trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, there is no decision as to when the provincial ministers of highways will meet on this matter. As my hon. friend knows, the subject was before the federal-provincial conference which met here in Ottawa two weeks ago, which was adjourned and which should meet some time in the coming year.

WORLD FAIR

DUTIES TO BE PERFORMED BY MR. GLEN BANNERMAN

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works.

Could he tell the house what will be the functions of Mr. Glen Bannerman who has just become a member of the world fair personnel?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the hon. member to wait until the bill relating to various amendments to the world exhibition legislation is called—that might be today —and then I will be pleased to answer that question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN FOREIGN AID FOLLOWING U.S. ANNOUNCEMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Following the United States decision to reduce foreign aid by a billion dollars, does Canada also intend to reduce its aid to foreign countries?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF ANTI-SMOKING CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wonder if the hon. lady could advise the house what portion of the $600,000 for the anti-cigarette smoking campaign is being paid by the federal government.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as announced, this program is to cover a five year period, and all of it is to be financed by the federal government.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the minister propose to continue to pay the support price to the tobacco growers, to produce cigarettes?

TRADE

CHICKENS—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF CANADIAN PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for Wellington South asked me this question:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. In view of the fact that the European economic community has imposed a very high tariff on United States chickens entering those countries, and in view of the fact that the Americans will be looking for a market for this product close to home, what steps does the government propose to take to protect Canadian chicken producers?

This is the answer to the question. The higher tariff for poultry under the common market agricultural policy was placed in operation in August, 1962. The cut-back of United States imports subsequent to this time has had no effect on imports of United States poultry into this country. To December 6 of this year the imports of chicken, whole and parts, to Canada has actually decreased from 4,235,838 pounds in 1962 to 4,040,532 pounds this year, or approximately by 4.6 per cent. Chicken producers in Canada have a tariff protection of 12½ per cent, or a minimum of 5 cents per pound on whole chicken and 10 cents per pound on cut-up chicken. Our producers appear to be able to compete quite satisfactorily on this basis.

I am sure the hon. member now knows more about chickens than he does about tobacco.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer to my question of last Thursday, but I would now like to have him answer the question concerning tobacco. I do not think the chickens are going to use tobacco.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET REPORTED INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. The dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin shows that the cost of living index is now at an all time high of 134, basis of 100 in 1949. It is up six tenths of one percentage point for the last two months and up over two percentage points in the last 12 months. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, has the government any plans in mind for dealing with this very serious situation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government shares my hon. friend's concern at this rise and is giving the matter consideration, but I cannot make an announcement at this moment on orders of the day on any specific steps that might be taken at this time.

BRIDGES

THREE RIVERS, QUE.—POSSIBLE REVOCATION OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Clement Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Has the Prime Minister been officially informed of the difficulties which exist between the corporation of the Three Rivers bridge and the Minister of Transport (Mr. McIlraith) with regard to the order in council of last March 4?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I know of these difficulties.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Does the Prime Minister intend to make a statement before long on that matter, thus offering a nice present to the citizens of my area?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: I hope this matter will be cleared up in the near future, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSITION OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour?

Would the minister inform the house of the financial situation of the unemployment insurance fund and tell us how he intends to replenish it in case of a deficit?

[Mr. Douglas.]

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have already given an indication, on behalf of the government, of the method to be followed in replenishing the fund at any time that is necessary. That method is well known and has been employed on several occasions in the past. As to the exact status of the fund at the moment, I have not the details but I will be glad to get them for my hon. friend.

FINANCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY HEALTH MINISTER RESPECTING INSURANCE COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister. A similar question was answered yesterday by the Minister of Finance. It arises out of the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that insurance companies can go bankrupt, like any other company. It is stated in this morning's Gazette, in an editorial:

> —it would be as well if the Prime Minister himself publicly corrected this serious error, no matter how it came to be made.

Would the Prime Minister like to make a statement at this moment?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I was not in the house yesterday, but I read what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance said and I quite agree with his statement.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister agree that even though insurance companies are not likely to go broke, there is a greater possibility of their going broke than the government of Canada?

Mr. Nowlan: No, not the present government.

Mr. Pearson: I certainly agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNIONS—REQUEST FOR REPORT BY TRUSTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Will the minister be presenting to parliament, before the session prorogues, an interim report of the trustees of the maritime transportation unions?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, shortly after this question was raised by my hon. friend I was in touch with the chairman of the board of trustees. To date I have received no report on any aspect of the operation of the trusteeship. I hope within the near future to have a meeting with Mr. Justice Dryer, and at that time I will indicate to him the interest of the House of Commons in having a report before prorogation.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the minister whether any order in council has been passed containing regulations for this board?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether it is a fact that the trustees have retained a public relations firm that is communicating with all the Canadian seamen and asking them personal questions relating to their employment, what they do during the off season, and generally requesting very full information. Upon what basis are such requests made, and for what purpose?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the governor in council has approved an establishment for the trustees in which is included, as I understand it, at least one public relations officer. I have no information whatsoever with respect to any questionnaire or activity of the trusteeship except that I did read in the newspapers a statement made by one of the trustees that an effort would be made to gather information on the conditions of life of the seamen involved in the trusteeship.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister table the questionnaire; because it seems like an extraordinary procedure for the board of trustees to follow.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the chairman of the board of trustees and will proceed carefully so that in no way will I interfere with the responsibilities which parliament has given directly to the trustees.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister answer whether he will table the questionnaire in the house, or is he going to take the same attitude that the Minister of Agriculture did a moment ago?

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CONSIDERATION OF PETITION RESPECTING PROGRAM "NINE TO FIVE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he is ready to answer the question I addressed to the Minister of Justice a week ago concerning the C.B.C.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would refresh my mind by asking the question again.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Justice, as Acting Prime Minister, whether he would report to the house concerning the authors who signed a petition protesting against discrimination shown by C.B.C. with regard to actors in the program entitled "De 9 à 5", by dismissing one of the characters on the ground that he was a separatist?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I will be glad to give an answer to this question. Parliament, when it passed the Broadcasting Act in 1958, vested in the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation control over broadcasting. Control over broadcasting involves decisions by the corporation, which in my view it could not possibly delegate to anyone else, with regard to what shall be broadcast and what shall not be broadcast. It does not seem to me, therefore, that it would be proper for the government to seek, as a government, to interfere with those decisions which parliament has decided should be made by the board of directors.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Secretary of State tell the house when he will set up a special committee to consider the C.B.C. report, which was not done this year or last year?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think I did say the other day that I intended to suggest to my colleagues that a committee on broadcasting be set up at the next session of parliament.

PENSIONS

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING OLD AGE ASSISTANCE, BLIND AND DISABLED PAYMENTS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, December 9, consideration of the motion of Miss LaMarsh for the second reading of Bill No. C-125, to amend the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Blind Persons Act.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to increase from $65 to $75 the monthly benefits now being paid to some 162,000 Canadians under the categorical assistance programs which are shared by the dominion government with the provinces. I am sure that, especially at this time of year, this is a purpose which will commend itself to all hon. members on both sides of the house.

It will be noted that the effective date in the bill is shown as December 1, 1963. What this means is that the federal government will be ready to assume its share of the new increases on that date or any subsequent date that a province might choose to put them into operation. I might point out here that this date was selected after the fullest discussion of the matter at the recent federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa two weeks ago. Some provinces expressed the view that a later date might be more desirable, but none suggested an earlier date. It should be stressed that it will still be up to each particular province to decide when it wishes to implement the increases provided for in this bill. In this connection I might add that it will be necessary, on the basis of this bill as passed, to amend 36 separate agreements with the 10 provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Some hon. members will no doubt remark that in the past it has been customary to introduce separate amendments to provide increases in old age assistance and blind and disability allowances. It was the government's opinion that in view of the heavy pressure of impending legislation, we would save the house a considerable amount of time by including the three necessary amendments on this particular occasion in the one bill.

It is estimated that if all provinces choose to put the increases into effect on December 1 the added cost to the federal government for the current fiscal year will be $4.2 million.

It will be noted that the bill will also raise the permissible incomes for the recipients under these shared programs. For an unmarried person receiving old age assistance or a disability allowance the permissible income will rise by $120, from $1,140 per year to $1,260. For married persons in the same two categories the maximum permissible income will be increased by $240, from $1,980 to $2,220.

In the matter of allowances to the blind, where the federal government pays 75 per cent of the total as opposed to 50 per cent in the other two programs, the permissible incomes will also be raised by $120 for unmarried persons and $240 for married persons.

The latest figures in my department show that there are some 103,000 people receiving old age assistance, about 8,000 receiving blind allowances and 51,000 receiving disability allowances. As hon. members no doubt know, old age assistance is paid on a means test to those Canadians between 65 and 69 years of age whose income falls below a certain maximum. Blind and disability allowances are paid to blind and disabled persons from the age of 18.

I am sure the increased allowances provided for in this bill, combined with the old age security benefit which was also raised recently to $75, will give our older Canadians and afflicted Canadians who suffer from various forms of disability a greater degree of security and comfort than they have ever had before. This is a fact from which all members of this house, all members of provincial legislatures, indeed all Canadians, can derive a certain measure of satisfaction. It does not mean, however, that we can rest upon our oars. We must continue to move ahead in every way we can to make life happier and healthier for those Canadians less fortunate than ourselves.

Mr. Douglas: Before the minister takes her seat I wonder whether she would answer a question. She gave a figure of $4.2 million as the cost of the increase for the present fiscal year. Could she give the figure for a complete year? Does she have it handy?

Miss LaMarsh: I have it here somewhere. Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to give it later.

Mr. Douglas: The minister can give it later. Would the minister repeat the figures she gave as to the number of persons in the various categories? She said there were 103,000 receiving old age assistance. What were the other two?

Miss LaMarsh: There are 8,000 receiving blind allowances and 51,000 receiving disability allowances.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, this one bill covers three different acts. The minister has said that because of the time in the session when these amendments are being brought forward it is thought that this will save the time of the house. Personally I do not quarrel with the fact that it is being brought forward in this form as one bill; my chief concern is to see the legislation passed so that the people in these three categories will immediately begin to receive the benefits. The same result can be achieved in this way, but I feel that more particularized discussion as it concerns the three categories might have been given had each been brought in separately. I know that in 1957 the hon. member for Essex East, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, agreed with our program of bringing forward these resolutions immediately following the presentation and acceptance of the legislation regarding the old age security increase. I know that as the house agreed to pass the resolution preceding this bill without debate, it will demonstrate our complete unanimity on the fact that it should be proceeded with immediately, and will demonstrate our anxiety to get on with the matter. I only say that in my opinion it is a crying shame that the bill was not brought in before this.

The minister mentioned that the effective date of this bill was discussed at the conference, and that no province suggested an earlier date. I am convinced that at least the province of Manitoba earlier suggested moving on with this particular measure so that it would be brought in at an earlier date. If I am not mistaken the province of Ontario had also gone on record in this respect. Further, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is only brought in now as a result of the motion of the Leader of the Opposition on July 18 last to the effect that these benefits be separated from the over-all Canada pension plan.
