I would not stay for ever here, In this sad world of eare and pain; I would not have life linger on, Or give my thoughts to earth again. I long to close my readul eyes, Recline my wary, aching head Upon the couch where all is peace, And rest among the early dead.

I would not have my humble name
In costly marble sculptured deep;
No darkening yew should spread its gloom,
Nor o'er my head the willow weep:
But insect hum, and voice of bird
Should float upon the sunny air:
The happy will not turn away
While cheerful sights and sounds are there.

Long have those bright, mysterious stars Their silent watch o'er sorrow kepf; The pale, solt moon looked cainly down, As if she saw no eyes that wept. There tracing still her radiant path, Far out upon the spotless blue, Why may not love thus steady burn? Why cannot frends be always true?

A weight is on my closing lide, The dews are gathering round my brow and, with the shade of vanished years, Fond menory holds communion now; Invove with many a darkening thread The texture of my life appears: How vain were all its sweetest hopes, ned. Not a line of his writing Jack Bannister, when the latter

How more than bitter were its tear I strive to imitate his love,
Who every cruel wrong forgave;
And o'er my tried and suffering soul
Peace, like a river, rolls its wave.
O, surely, is that better land,
No vulture shall the dove molest, Take me, my Father, to its rest.

FASHION.

The fashion of this world is folly, Is nothing but an empty show; All tends to grief, and melancholy, To want, to misery and woe.

Those who trust to earthly treasure, Are trusting to a glittering toy; That for a moment gives false pleasure, But will at last, their peace destroy.
